My dear Sir Adolphe,—I write you on behalf of one of my constituents who transfers the mails from the trains at the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway stations to the Brockville post office—Mr. James Cavanagh. I am very anxious that he should be appointed transfer clerk at that point, a position for which he is well fitted and which is much needed, as I gather from those who are in a position to know. I shall be very glad indeed if you can have this arranged for me, and oblige

Yours faithfully,

JOHN F. WOOD.

The Honourable

Sir Adolphe P. Caron, K.C.M.G., Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, 27th August, 1894.

My dear Mr. Wood,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 24th inst, recommending that Mr. James Cavanagh, who is engaged by contract by this department for the transfer of the mails at the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Railway stations at Brockville, be appointed transfer agent at that place.

In reply, I am to say that before Mr. Cavanagh could become eligible for this appointment he would have to pass the civil service examination, and having qualified himself in this way he would be obliged to relinquish his contract with the department on receiving such an appointment.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE P. CARON.

The Honourable J. F. Wood,
Comptroller of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

That the government inspector assumed that the contract had been superseded by the contractor's appointment as transfer agent appears from the following report of that officer :—

For the Postmaster General, Ottawa Division. Monthly Report of Variations in the Mail Service Expenditure, discontinued.

Brockville and Station Transfers.....	36 00	J. Cavanagh.	Jan. 15.	As required.	20 yards.

Mr. Cavanagh has been appointed transfer agent from 16th January, 1895.

F. HAWKEN,
Post Office Inspector.

Mr. MULOCK.

Brockville, Ont, 31st January, 1895.
To the Honourable J. F. Wood, Q.C., M.P., Comptroller of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I am informed that Mr. James Cavanagh, who is the present contractor for transferring the mails from the Canadian Pacific Railway trains to the Grand Trunk Railway trains, at Brockville station, has been appointed transfer mail agent at said station.

Will you be good enough to use your influence in my behalf with the Postmaster General to have the said contracts transferred to me under the same conditions as now held by Mr. Cavanagh.

Hoping that my application may receive favourable consideration,

I am yours faithfully,

P. G. CAVANAGH.

Ottawa, 18th April, 1895.

My dear Mr. Wood,—I am in receipt of a letter addressed to you by Mr. P. G. Cavanagh, in which he asks that the contracts held by Mr. J. E. Cavanagh for the station mail service at Brockville be transferred to him.

In reply, I beg to say that the matter will have the attention of the department.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE P. CARON.

The Honourable J. F. Wood, Q.C.,
Comptroller of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, 25th April, 1895.

My dear Sir Adolphe,—I shall esteem it a favour if you will personally look into a matter as to which I have been corresponding with your department for the past year, but, I regret to say, with little or no satisfaction.

Mr. James Cavanagh has for some years held the contracts—1st, for carrying the mails to and from the Brockville post office; 2nd, transferring the mails from the C.P.R. to the G.T.R. at the station; and 3rd, transferring between the Grand Trunk trains.

About a year ago, after more than one conversation with Mr. Hawken, Post Office Inspector, who agreed that Mr. Cavanagh had too much to do, having regard to the want of convenient arrangements at the station, that officer recommended, or agreed to do so, that Mr. Cavanagh should be made transfer clerk at the station, and that the contracts should be transferred to another person. Mr. Cavanagh's brother was ready to take the contracts so as to leave to the present holder more time to remain between the arrivals of trains and watch them carefully as ought to be done. Although this was the arrangement it seems impossible to have same carried out, for what reason I know not.

I earnestly hope the matter may be settled without any further delay.

Yours faithfully,

JOHN F. WOOD.

Sir A. P. Caron, K.C.M.G.,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, 26th April, 1895.

My dear Col. White,—I inclose herewith a letter from Mr. James E. Cavanagh, of Brockville, in relation to his position as mail clerk at the railway station. I am very anxious that this matter should be settled, and I think his letter fully explains the position of affairs. The idea of appointing him transfer agent was to benefit his condition, but not to deprive him of the benefit of his services previously rendered. Please give this matter your early attention and oblige,

Yours faithfully,

JOHN F. WOOD.

(Inclosure.)

Brockville, 25th April, 1895.

Hon. John F. Wood, M.P., Controller of Inland Revenue,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Wood,—In reference to the subject of our conversation re transferring of contracts, I might say that it was always my contention that the enormous amount of mail matter transferred at this station was more than I could handle alone. I wrote to Mr. Hawken on March 13th, 1893, asking to be released from my contracts (as my letter of that date will show), stating that the mail matter had such an enormous increase of late that I was obliged to employ an assistant. The amount paid per contract was in no way adequate to the amount of labour and time involved—hence my anxiety to have contracts cancelled at once and call for new tenders, so that I would have a fair opportunity to compete fairly for the work under the altered condition of affairs. Mr. Hawken advised me to retain the contracts until the time expired, when, he said, he would have me appointed transfer agent, and that the contracts would be given out. Then I would have the contractor to assist me. I have been appointed agent, but, as you are aware, the contracts haven't been given out, and I am worse off now than ever.

Under the contract system I got through with the mail trains at 4.30 a.m. Under the present system I am obliged to wait until 6.50 a.m. to put mail matter on mixed train going west, making it almost impossible for me to get to bed before 8 a.m.; and as I am obliged to be at the station again at 1.30 p.m., you will readily see that it is impossible for me to get the amount of rest that nature requires one should have. When I had the contracts, the G.T.R. staff performed a portion of the service that my contracts didn't cover. Now that I am under the direct control of the Post Office Department, it seems as though Mr. Hawken has changed his mind about giving out the contracts, and not only expects me to perform the service which I did under the contract system with an assistant, but also expects me to perform service which had previously been performed by the G.T.R. staff. I can't do it, and there is not a man between Montreal and Toronto who can. It is simply ridiculous for Mr. Hawken to expect it. Ottawa has two agents; Toronto has two and three assistants; Montreal has one (there is no night service there) with two or three assistants. Now there is as much mail transferred at this point as there is at Toronto or Montreal, in fact more, as the output of the Printing and Supply Department is all transferred at this station. Why should I be expected to do this work alone, when there is such provision made for the places named?

Since I have been appointed agent I have been carrying the mails to and from the C.P.R. night trains and Brockville post office as under contract. My quarter ended March 31st. I received two cheques that were due me, but cheque for the performance of this service has been omitted. I wrote to Mr. Hawken calling his attention to the fact; up to the present I haven't received cheque, or a reply to my letter. I am very much in need of the amount due me, and if I wouldn't be asking too much of you, or infringing too much on your valuable time, I would ask you to lay my claim before the Postmaster General with a view of having my claim adjusted, and I will feel deeply obliged to you.

Yours faithfully,

J. E. CAVANAGH.

Ottawa, 15th May, 1895.

My dear Col. White,—I beg to inclose herewith letter I have just received from Mr. J. E. Cavanagh, of Brockville, with inclosures re mail contracts at that place, and would request that you will try and have matters arranged, if possible, in accordance with his views.

Yours faithfully,

JOHN F. WOOD.

Col. W. White,
Deputy Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, 16th May, 1895.

My dear Mr. Wood,—Referring to the letter you inclose me from Mr. J. E. Cavanagh, of Brockville, respecting the transfer of his contracts for service at Brockville station on account of his having been appointed mail transfer agent at that place, I beg to say that Mr. Cavanagh is evidently under a misapprehension in regard to these contracts. When the question of changing the character of his relations with this department was under consideration, it was not for a moment supposed that the effect of the change was simply to increase the cost of the service at that point by $400 per annum. The intention of the department was to cancel the contract under which Mr. Cavanagh attended to the transfer duties, and to allow him to continue them as one of its officials. If Mr. Cavanagh with this explanation would prefer to revert to the original arrangement, his wishes in that regard might be carried out, but the department does not propose to allow two men's pay for the work to be done at Brockville station.

I regret exceedingly that it is impossible to carry your recommendation in this matter into effect.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE P. CARON.

(Memorandum for the Post Office Inspector at Ottawa.)

The Postmaster General authorizes the transfer of the contract for the mail service between transfer from train No. 4 to train No. 3 on Grand Trunk Railway at Brockville Junction, the name of the present contractor being James E. Cavanagh, and that of the proposed contractor, Peter G. Cavanagh. The transfer to date from the 1st January, 1895. Cost of service, $36 per annum. Contract terminates 31st December, 1897.

The inspector will please be so good as to transfer the contract accordingly.

ARTHUR LINDSAY,
Superintendent.

(No. 933.) Post Office Inspector's Office,

Ottawa, 15th October, 1896.

Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 2nd inst., in regard to the transfer of mails at Brockville railway station, I beg leave to state that up to the 16th January, 1895, James E. Cavanagh was contractor for transferring mails between the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Railway mail trains at Brockville, distance of 20 yards, for which he was paid the sum of $406 per annum (two contracts, $36 and $370), and on that date he was appointed temporary transfer agent for the performance of the same work at a salary of $400 per annum—Departmental letter No. 441, dated 16th January, 1895.—On the 5th July, 1895, the Postmaster General authorized the transfer of the above mentioned contracts from James E. Cavanagh to P. G. Cavanagh, to date from the 1st January, 1895, it being understood that J. E. Cavanagh would transfer the night mails and P. G. Cavanagh would attend to the day mails. Having learned previous to 5th July that this transfer was to take place, I made an inquiry into the matter and found that P. G. Cavanagh was a resident of Smith's Falls and would not, in all probability, take any part in the transfer of the mails at Brockville station, and that the whole thing was merely a scheme to supplement the salary paid to J. E. Cavanagh, and I accordingly brought the matter verbally to the notice of the Deputy Postmaster General.

James E. Cavanagh held another contract for the conveyance of mails between the Brockville post office and the Canadian Pacific Railway station four times a week, distance one mile, at 15 and 10 cents per trip, amounting to about $106 per annum. This contract was also transferred to P. G. Cavanagh. William Curry of Brockville is also a contractor for the conveyance of mails between Brockville post office and the Canadian Pacific Railway, 12 single trips at 21½ cents per trip, amounting to about $140 per annum. These two 'bona fide' contracts might, I think, be advertised as one contract, as I believe the work could be done at less cost.

I might here state that J. E. Cavanagh has a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway for conveying the mails between the Brockville post office and the Grand Trunk mail trains, for which he receives the sum of $450 per annum. He has been doing this work for more than fifteen years.

I have the honour, &c.,
F. HAWKEN,
Post Office Inspector.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The appointment of Transfer Agent Cavanagh was cancelled and the contract continued to be carried on at the contract price of $406 a year. On the expiry of the contract, the service was put up for public tender and awarded to the same contractor, Mr. J. E. Cavanagh, at the contract price of $250 a year, instead of the amount which was previously being paid, amounting to $806 a year, $406 under the contract, and $400 as Transfer Agent.

COLONIAL NAVAL RESERVE.

Mr. BOURASSA asked :

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the declaration made last week in the British Commons by the Right Hon. Mr. Goschen, First Lord of the Admiralty, which declaration was reported as follows by the Associated Press:

Colonial Naval Reserve.

The Admiralty was considering how it could organize a naval reserve in conjunction with the colonies. He explained that with an adequate organization the government could get a very valuable contingent from Canada and Australia. The negotiations with Canada were very well advanced. Canada had asked that the period of training be reduced, but a final decision on the subject had not been reached?

2. Have any negotiations been conducted, or are there any going on at the present time between the British government and the Canadian government, or any member of said governments in relation to the subject mentioned by Mr. Goschen?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The attention of the government has been called to the report of the declaration said to have been made by Mr. Goschen; but the government do not think it would be wise to take official notice of a report of that kind, without having seen the words of the minister himself. In the meantime, I may say that no arrangement has been made and no negotiations have been carried on, but there have been informal communications between this government and the Imperial authorities on the subject.

THE MILITIA AND THE ANNUAL DRILL.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked :

What are the respective numbers of infantry, cavalry and artillery who took part in the annual drill in the years from 1890 to 1899 (inclusive)?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). For the Minister of Militia and Defence, I beg to answer the question as follows :

The total number, by years, of cavalry, artillery and infantry, who took part in the annual drill in the years 1890 to 1899 (inclusive) are as follows :

1891	16,862
1892	1,279
1893	18,557
1894	18,574
1895	20,877
1896	18,349
1897	26,729
1898	25,296
1899 (exclusive of Military Districts 3 and 4.....)	25,163

No records have been preserved from which it can be readily ascertained what the numbers of the respective arms were, and to compile the return would involve a great deal of work at a time when the staff is already overworked.

INSPECTORS OF BOILERS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

Do the government permit their inspectors of boilers to purchase old boilers that have been condemned, have them repaired and sell the same, giving a guarantee that they will pass inspection for a number of years, or are the government aware that this is being practised?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The government does not permit steamboat inspectors to purchase or trade in boilers or steamboat machinery, or to be in any way peculiarly interested therein, and the government is not aware of any case in which an inspector has violated this prohibition.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. RUSSELL asked :

1. What was the total number of Canadian volunteers in connection with the first contingent which the Imperial government intimated its willingness to receive from the government of Canada for service in South Africa?

2. (a) When was such intimation received by the government? (b) Did it suggest a day for the sailing of the force?

3. What time elapsed between date of commencement of the work of enlistment and the date of sailing?

4. What arms, uniform and other equipments were provided for it by the Canadian government?

5. Did the Canadian government comply with the suggestion of the Imperial government as to the number of men to be so supplied? If not, in what respect was there a departure from such suggestion?

6. Did the Canadian government offer the Imperial government any additional force? If so, when, and to what extent? Has such offer been carried out?

7. On what dates did each Canadian contingent sail for South Africa? When did it arrive at the Cape? What was the strength of each Canadian contingent, and how equipped?

8. What are the total respective numbers of officers, men and horses composing the Canadian contingents already sent to South Africa?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. 500 by War Office despatch, dated October 2nd, 1899. 2. (a) 14th October, 1899. (b) Yes, not later than October 31st. 3. 14 days. 4.

PAYMENTS TO SIR CHARLES TUPPER,
SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER, AND GENERAL CAMERON.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked :

What sums have been paid each year out of the Dominion treasury to Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, M.P., and General Cameron, son-in-law of Sir Charles Tupper, for salaries, allowances, travelling expenses? What is the total amount paid?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The hon. gentleman will observe that he has given no dates in his question, and, therefore, it would be difficult, if we had the information at hand, to make the statement. I would suggest, however, inasmuch as he contemplates a lengthy statement, that it would be more convenient to have it by way of a return.

Question dropped.

NUMBER OF POST OFFICES IN CANADA.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

How many post offices were there in Canada on March 1 in each of the years from 1890 to 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The number of post offices in Canada on the 1st of March of each year from 1890 to 1900, was as follows :

On March 1, 1890	7,898
“ 1892	8,236
“ 1893	8,424
“ 1894	8,610
“ 1895	8,785
“ 1897	9,177
“ 1899	9,293

The number of post offices established, or being established on 1st March, 1900, is 9,570.

MAIL MILEAGE OF CANADA.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What is the yearly mileage of mails which are now being carried in Canada? What was the extent of such mileage on June 30, 1896?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The answer is as follows :

Service.	Year ended 30th June, 1896	Year ended 28th Feb., 1900
Railway	14,915,784	16,735,965
Water.....	1,013,083	1,496,088
Ordinary land.....	14,622,806	14,927,548
	30,551,683	33,132,601

These figures show an increase in the two periods of the yearly mileage carriage of mails as follows :

Miles.

Increase in ordinary land service.....	304,732
Increase in water service	456,005
Increase in railway mail service	1,820,181

Total increase in yearly mileage.. 2,580,918

POSTAL NOTES SYSTEM.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked :

When was the postal note system established in Canada? What has been the total yearly number of postal notes issued and paid since its establishment?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The postal note system began with the issue of three denominations 25, 50, and 70 cents between the 29th July and the 4th August, 1898; the last issue of the 16 denominations was not completed until the latter part of January, 1899, there has therefore been only one complete year. The total number of postal notes issued up to 31st January last was 1,231,686. The total number of postal notes paid up to the 31st January last was 903,092.

CEMENT FOR SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. How much cement was bought for the construction of the Soulanges Canal?
2. Was it bought by tender?
3. Who was or were the lowest tenderer or tenderers?
4. From whom was it bought and at what price?
5. Was there any formality to be used before the cement would be accepted and paid for?
6. Were such formalities always adhered to?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply to the first question I beg to say: 224,569 barrels. To the second question, 215,654 barrels were bought by tender, and 8,915 barrels, which were urgently needed before the opening of navigation, were bought in the market without tender. To the third question, the lowest tenders, taking into consideration the quality of the cement of their kind, were invariably accepted. To the fourth question: It was bought from Francis Hyde & Co., Clarence de Sola, Bellehouse, Dillon & Co., The Rathbun Co., W. McNally & Co., and James Battle, at the following prices: Portland cement, $1.96, $1.99, $2.09, $2.17, $2.40 to $2.41, $2.44, $2.50, $2.52, $2.54, $2.55½, $2.57, $2.60, $2.68, $2.69, $2.70, $2.72, $2.80, $2.95. Natural cement, $1.16, $1.26. To the fifth question: Yes. To the sixth question: Yes.

CUSTOMS SEIZURE BY B. H. DODGE.

Mr. MILLS asked :

What was the nature and circumstances of the seizure made by B. H. Dodge, of Kentville, Nova Scotia, which resulted in a payment to him of the sum of $600.04? What office did said Dodge hold, at the time of said seizure, under the government of Canada? When and where was the said seizure made? What was the total amount resulting from said seizure, how was it divided, and to whom?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In reply I beg to say that the seizure was made at Kentville by B. H. Dodge, in a case of smuggling, while he was sub-collector at Kentville, in April, 1883. The net proceeds of the seizure were $1,800.13, and the only award made there-out has been the usual award of one-third to the said seizing officer.

POST OFFICE BOXES RENTS.

Mr. WILSON asked :

1. To whom does the rent of the post office boxes and drawers go in places where the government have a public building?
2. If to the Postmaster, why?
3. Who fixes the rent?
4. When in public buildings, what general principle controls the revenues from these boxes?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply, I beg to say: 1. One-half the rent of boxes in buildings owned by the government is received by the department and the balance is assigned to the postmaster. 2. As a supplement to his salary and with a view to the more effectual renting of the boxes. 3. The rent is according to usage in different places subject to the control of the department. 4. This question is not understood.

SCHOOL LANDS, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Whether any school lands in the North-west Territories were put up for sale by auction last year? Where were these lands situated? How much in each case was realized? How much on an average per acre?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No school lands in the Territories were put up for sale by auction last year.

HAY AND OAT CONTRACTS FOR IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HALE asked :

Who has the contract or contracts for supplying hay and oats in Canada for the Imperial government in South Africa? How were such contracts let (if any), by tender or otherwise? What prices are being paid therefor at place of delivery? Was any hay purchased in St. John and in Carleton county, New Brunswick? If so, from whom was the same purchased and price paid therefor at place of purchase?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). By request, my department has been acting as agent for the Imperial government for the purchase of hay in this country for use in South Africa by the war office; and believing that the purchase of such hay in Canada was for the benefit of our farmers and hay dealers, I have allowed Prof. Robertson to conduct this work as the agent of the Imperial government. The details, such as are here asked for, are in the hands of the Imperial government.

DISMISSAL OF R. K. BRACE.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Why was Mr. R. K. Brace, Gas Inspector in the province of Prince Edward Island, dismissed? Were any charges preferred against him? If so, what was their nature? Were charges substantiated? Was there an investigation? If so, before whom, and who were the witnesses?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). In reply, I beg to say that the services of Mr. Brace, late inspector of gas at Charlottetown, have been dispensed with, on the grounds of economy, and the duties of inspector of gas given to Mr. E. Davey, inspector of weights and measures, without increase to his former salary.

HILLSBOROUGH BRIDGE.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Has the survey for the proposed Hillsborough bridge, in the province of Prince Edward Island, been completed?

2. Has the site for the bridge been decided upon? If so, where is it proposed to build it?

3. What amount, if any, has been expended on surveys since the 30th June last? What amount has been paid engineers and for ordinary labour (separately)? What amount has been paid for tugs, boats, scows and lighters? What are the names of the owners, and the amount paid to each of them?

4. What material, if any, has been purchased for construction? What is the cost, from whom purchased, and if by private contract?

5. Has a plan for the bridge been completed? If so, when?

6. What is the estimated cost?

7. When is it proposed to begin construction?

8. Will tenders be called?

9. Has the contract or agreement between the federal and provincial government of Prince Edward Island relating to the construction of the bridge, been executed? If so, when?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply, I beg to say: 1. Yes, surveys for the site of the proposed Hillsborough Bridge have been completed. 2. No, the site has not been finally settled upon. 3. The information is not on record in the department; but it will be obtained from the general office of the Prince Edward Island Railway in Charlottetown. 4. No material has yet been purchased for the construction of the bridge. 5. Plans for the bridge have been prepared by chief engineer and submitted to department, but cannot be finally approved until the question of the site is determined on. 6. The estimated cost can only be ascertained, approximately, after the site has been decided upon, and it would not be expedient to publish an engineer's estimate pending a call for tenders. 7. It is hoped the work of construction will be commenced during the ensuing summer season. 8. Yes, it is the intention to invite tenders. 9. No, but it has been the subject of discussion between the two governments and proposals are now awaiting the approval of the Prince Edward Island government.

MAIL SERVICE IN THE YUKON.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Has the Postmaster General received a memorial passed by the citizens of Dawson City, Yukon Territory, in regard to the mail service through that place, and which reads as follows :—

'That the Canadian Development Company have a contract for daily delivery of 700 lbs. of mail each week, but that the average weight of the mail matter transported each week, up to the 19th January, from the outside, has been 350 lbs. 'We are reliably informed,' continues the memorial, 'that under the instructions of the department, limiting the carrying to letters only, much matter upon which first-class postage has been paid, has been withheld and will not be delivered until the approaching summer. This works a great hardship on those depending upon the mails for documents and papers absolutely essential for the proper carrying on of business. Many of us are also subscribers to periodicals which are now withheld, although first-class postage has likewise been paid thereon. We would, therefore, respectfully request that relief be afforded us to the extent of forwarding up to the full quantity specified in the contract, all matter upon which first-class postage has been paid, and that, if necessary, to insure the sending of all first-class matter, an enlarged or supplementary contract be forthwith entered into. Your petitioners would also submit that all matter, of whatsoever class, consigned to the postal service, be promptly forwarded to its destination, as in many instances, periodicals, books, pamphlets, &c., are as essential to business interests as is correspondence.'

'The memorial is signed by the committee, consisting of H. W. Yeamans, chairman ; C. G. K. Nourse, L. R. Pulda, F. W. Clayton, secretary, and attested by Thos McMullen, President of the Dawson Board of Trade ; T. McMullen, assistant manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce ; D. Doig, manager of the Bank of British North America ; L. R. Fulds, general manager of the Alaska Exploration Company ; Yeamans & Chisholm, agents of the Empire Transportation Company ; J. B. Wood, manager of the Trading and Exploring Company (Ltd) ; William H. Haron, agent of the Alaska Commercial Company ; P. H. Amos, of the Amos Mercantile Company ; G. N. Byrne, of the Yukon Corporation Company (Ltd) ; J. J. Healy, general manager of the North American Transportation and Trading Company ; J. W. Burke, of the Yukon Saw Mill ; T. B. Cook, of the J. Ladue Gold Mining and Development Company ; Chas Milne, Yukon manager of the Parsons' Produce Company ; R. B. Craig, for Alex. Macdonald ; D. D. Buchanan, of the McLellan & McFeely Company (Ltd.), and W. H. Parsons, of W. H. Parsons & Company.'

2. Is it true that the Postmaster General has ordered that letters only be carried, and that papers and documents upon which first-class postage has been paid has been purposely kept back for delivery next summer, although the contract quantity is not being carried by the contractors ?

3. Is it the intention of the Postmaster General to give instructions that 700 lbs. of mail matter must be forwarded daily, as per contract ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). With reference to this question I have to state that the department entered into a contract, to begin at the close of navigation last fall, with the Canadian Development Company for mail service between Bennett and Atlin, and Bennett and Dawson. The question appears to refer to the winter service, and with reference to that branch of the contract, therefore, I would state that it provides for a weekly, not a daily service, between Bennett and Dawson, and a semi-weekly service between Bennett and Atlin. It provides that the weight per week of mails to be carried between these points shall not exceed 700 pounds. It could not be told, until after a reasonable trial, what the letter mail weight would amount to, and accordingly, for the winter service the mail was limited to letters only. It was, however, ascertained that the letter mail did not exhaust the limit provided by the contract, and, accordingly, on the 26th day of December, 1899, the public and the postmasters were notified that a limited quantity of newspaper matter would be carried by each mail, the weight of newspapers to Dawson being limited to 500 pounds per week, and that to Atlin to 300 pounds per week.

On the 21st February last, nearly two months after the order had been given, the petition above referred to was received.

There is no information in the department to show that any mail matter, offered as letter mail, had been refused transmission. No officer had any authority to refuse transmission to any letter matter.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's), (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Has a new contract been let on the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island ; or is work being done by day labour ? If by contract, to whom, for what work, for what amount, and when to be completed ? Who is the inspector ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). By examination of last year's budget, the hon. member will see that $3,000 was voted ; of which amount $1,500 was authorized to be expended for repairs to old work, repairs to be made by day labour. Everestus Gallant, foreman. The balance of appropriation, or $1,500, to be expended in procuring material for an extension. A supplementary vote of $2,000 is recommended in this year's estimates to complete the extension.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's), (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Does the government intend doing anything to improve the entrance to Cascumpec Harbour, Prince Edward Island, so as to make it a safe harbour of refuge for shipping according to the plans of the late government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). My attention has been called, by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) to this question which is now receiving my best consideration.

MIMINEGASH HARBOUR.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's), (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

Is the work at Miminegash, Prince Edward Island, completed ? If not, what do they intend doing there, and when and how ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The contract for a new extension was completed on the 11th of August last.

REPORT.

The report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year ending 30th June, 1899—Marine—(Sir Louis Davies.)

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. G. E. CASEY (West Elgin). Before we pass to notices of motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question with regard to certain papers that have been promised for some time, and that we were led to expect were ready some time ago. I have no doubt they are ready by this time, and I take this opportunity of asking the government about them. I refer to the papers in connection with the Pacific cable matter. And in order that this subject may be brought up, I will conclude with the usual motion to adjourn. The subject referred to is one of sufficient importance, I think, to justify its being frequently brought up and insisted upon. Since it was last discussed in this House, the delay caused by the action, or rather by the inaction, of the Colonial Office and the Imperial government has been the subject of considerable criticism in the press of this country, both ministerial and opposition, and the newspapers have united in thinking that a bargain once entered into between the Imperial government, and Canada and the Australasian colonies, should be carried at once to a conclusion. It has been pressed upon the home government and upon the public here, and pressed properly and with force, that at a time when Canada is making such sacrifices for her sister colonies and for the preservation of the empire, a question of this Imperial importance should not be shelved or retarded.

Mr. TARTE.

The question is one of Imperial importance but it is also of special Canadian importance. Its importance from an Imperial point of view may be left to the home authorities, but its importance from a Canadian point of view is a proper subject for discussion here, and a proper reason for pressure being brought to bear by this government upon the Imperial government to carry out the understanding long ago arrived at. In order to develop our trade with the Australasian colonies, it is necessary that we should have direct telegraphic communication with those colonies, so arranged also that there should be a port of call between here and Australasia at which vessels could stop for orders in regard to the disposal of their cargoes. The scheme as proposed in this House, as carried through this House, and as agreed to by all parties in the bargain, meets these requirements. We have already a line of steamers to those colonies, failing in business for want of this telegraphic communication. I say, therefore, that it is a matter of direct commercial importance to Canada that this scheme should be carried through ; and it is the duty of this government to be most pressing with the Imperial government in their representations in regard to it.

We have done our share ; the Australasian colonies have, in part, done their share ; the British government has agreed to do its share ;—and yet we are no further on than we were a year ago. The British parliament was in session last year after the necessary legislation passed this House in regard to this matter. Legislation was required from the British parliament to carry this scheme to completion. But that legislation was not obtained by the British government. We want to know why that government did not obtain that legislation last year, whether they propose to procure it this session, and, if not, what is the reason for the delay. Of course, if these facts are not within the knowledge of this government, they cannot tell us. But public opinion in this country is reflected even as far as Downing Street, and we have only to make public opinion felt there to make Downing Street understand that the people of Canada are putting only one construction upon that delay,—namely, that the Colonial Office, which is the advisor of the Imperial government in this matter, is in no hurry to have this scheme gone on with, and is not anxious that this scheme should succeed. Even Downing Street, which I blame rather than the responsible part of the political machine, must know that the public opinion of a colony like Canada, a colony which has almost ceased to be a colony, and has become an important partner in the great British combination, cannot be neglected in a matter of this kind.

I wish to ask the government, therefore, to give us all the information they have in regard to the following points:—In the first place, why cannot the cable scheme go on immediately, as it was hoped and expected it would when we passed the necessary legislation for it last year? In the next place, has the Imperial government proposed the necessary legislation, or have they promised to propose and secure it during the present session of the Imperial parliament? Again, who form the Cable Commission constituted by representatives of the different colonies of the empire; when did they meet last; when are they expected to meet again; and what has this commission done at meetings that have already taken place, towards the furtherance of the object for which they were appointed? And, above all, I want to know what instructions this government has given to our representatives upon that board, and what have they represented to, and urged upon, the home government in regard to this question. I think it is the duty of this government to clear their own skirts in the matter, to make the fullest possible explanation of what has passed between them and the home government upon this subject. An unaccountable delay has taken place, and either one government or the other may be responsible for it. It is the duty of this government to show that they were not responsible for that delay by making the fullest possible explanation. In order to do this it will probably be necessary for the minister who has this matter specially in charge, if he has the papers ready to present to-day, as I hope he has, to read some of the more important of those papers, especially those in which he may have urged his views upon the home government, and the answers of the home government thereto. It will be necessary for him to read those to us, and to give a pretty full explanation of the present situation generally as he goes along:

I hope, too, that in this matter he will not feel his hands tied or his tongue tied by too much consideration for what may be called technically 'confidential communications.' It seems to me, Sir, that communications between two governments in regard to a matter which has already received the consent of both, which has been followed by legislation here and in other colonies, which is not in any stage of negotiation or preliminary consultation—that public correspondence of this kind cannot be properly described as confidential. We all remember that a report of a commission appointed on this subject in 1896, on which the colonies and the mother country were represented, was withheld for two years out of consideration for the whim—I cannot call it anything else—of the Colonial Office on the subject. We do not want that to be repeated. If there is anything the public should know in any communications that have taken place since, I think we have a right to know it, whether the Colonial Office has given special leave to have it published or not. If this matter were under discussion, if there were anything diplomatic in connection with it, anything that might hurt the scheme or hurt either of the governments if it came out, then this otherwise public correspondence might be called confidential in that juncture. But, as I say, this is a matter in the nature of a settled bargain, and the only correspondence that can exist must be as to the carrying of it out, and I think any such correspondence is not in its nature confidential, and should not be treated as such. I shall urge, therefore, on the minister to put a very free interpretation on his liberty to present to this House and to read the correspondence that exists on the question. I do not want to take up the time of the House any longer, and shall leave it to the minister to give as full an explanation as he can from his personal knowledge and from the documents, and, if possible, fully to read the documents in the case. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I will state that with reference to his suggestion that we are no further on than we were a year ago with this scheme, I am not able to agree with him. The scheme is either much nearer success or failure to-day than it was a year ago. I am not able to say what the issue in the end will be, but I have not lost hope in its being successful. The hon. gentleman directed to me yesterday a communication informing me that he intended to ask certain information, and I have tried to gather the information for him in accordance with his letter. First, however, with reference to his observations as to what is or is not confidential. Some communications are confidential from their very nature; some are confidential because one party to the correspondence concerned does not consent to the other party publishing it. With reference to the correspondence that has passed between this government and other governments, whether Imperial or colonial, I have to say, that having gone through the correspondence of all classes, I have come to the conclusion that what I have in my hand at this moment is all that it would be wise to disclose. At present the negotiations between the various governments have not reached finality in one respect, I refer to the application of the Eastern Extension Cable Company for concessions in Australasia; and it would be prejudicial to the scheme if it were publicly made known here what were the various attitudes of all parties to these negotiations. It is, therefore, as a matter of prudence, in consequence of the scheme being yet in the balance, that anything is withheld; not from any technical regard for what is confidential, although, of course, that view would have to govern as well. My hon. friend, in his communication to me, asked to be informed as to the present situation of the cable question, and more particularly asks: Has the home government secured the necessary legislation? On that point I can only speak from general information, not having kept a record of all the legislation of the Imperial parliament. But my own impression is that there has not yet been legislation in the Imperial parliament on this subject. I am led to that view because, as is known through the press, the Imperial government made the proposal that there should be a temporary commission appointed for the purpose of ascertaining tentatively what could be accomplished in the way of this scheme, with the view ultimately of the report of that commission being dealt with by legislation. A session of the Imperial parliament has not yet gone by; and I am, therefore, looking forward to the Imperial government applying to the Imperial parliament this session for the necessary legislation.

My hon. friend asks who constitute the commission. The Canadian representatives are Lord Strathcona and Lord Aberdeen; the Australian representatives are Sir Julius Solomon, the Hon. W. P. Reed and Sir Andrew Clark; the representatives of the home government are Sir Francis Mowat, Sir G. Murray and Lord Selbourne, Sir Francis Mowat being chairman. The hon. gentleman asks when the last meeting of this commission was held. I can only speak from the published reports; I think the last meeting was held a week ago last Tuesday.

Mr. CASEY. Does not the government get the reports?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. By degrees. With reference to the inquiry: 'What instructions have been given to our representatives?'; they are set forth in communications which I have here from the Premier to the High Commissioner. 'What information have we about the Australian colonies?' The bulk of the information is also contained in correspondence which I have. I may say that since this matter began there has apparently been a change in the application of the Eastern Extension Cable Company. They, first of all, asked the Australian governments for certain concessions to go into effect at once. Those concessions I alluded to when my hon. friend interrogated me upon the subject a short time ago. The application for concessions has undergone a change. I think the opposition of the various governments to the concessions first asked, from the Canadian, and, I think, from other governments, bore fruit; and the Eastern Extension Cable Company, instead of now pressing for concessions to take effect at once, has varied them, asking that the concessions shall take effect when the Pacific cable is laid. The full text of those concessions is not before us, and I am giving my understanding of them from cable despatches. These concessions are to the effect that the Eastern Extension Company may, when the Pacific cable is laid, establish offices and carry on business, perhaps under limitations, I do not know, we have not detailed information. But, at all events, they ask for certain facilities for carrying on the cable business in Australia. My hon. friend asks me the present position of the matter. On the 11th of January, 1900, the High Commissioner cabled the Premier of Canada in these words:

Had further meeting Pacific Cable Board Tuesday. Matter progressing satisfactorily. Have also had meeting with Agents-General New South Wales, Victoria, New Zealand and Queensland respecting proposal Eastern Extension Company. Except first-named, they have telegraphed their governments most strongly deprecating acceptance, as result would seriously cripple Pacific cable, and stating, at my request, Canada concurred their views.

A portion of this cable contains matter of a confidential character. On the 15th of January, the Premier replied to that cable, setting forth the views of the Canadian government upon that proposal.

Mr. CASEY. Is that confidential or can it be read?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is not confidential.

Mr. CASEY. May we have it read?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no objection. On the 15th of January, the Premier communicated, by letter, to the Premier of Victoria, the views of the Canadian government, and in this letter he states:

Ottawa, January 15, 1900.

Dear Sir,—I beg to state that the Canadian government cannot but regard this proposal as another attempt on the part of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company to obstruct the construction of the Pacific cable, they doubtless hoping that their proposal might be received with such favour as to lead to the withdrawal of Victoria from the Pacific cable scheme, as the first step towards its breaking up.

My hon. friend seems to think that perhaps this government had been derelict in its duty and had not presented a proper argument, or perhaps had not been properly active. I beg to assure him that any such view of that kind, so far as the government is concerned, is without foundation. The Premier goes on to say:

The Canadian government attaches very great importance to the early construction of the proposed Pacific cable, and would deplore it if the scheme, which has for so many years engaged the attention of the Imperial and colonial governments, should now be put in danger, as it doubtless would were the proposal acceded to.

Even assuming that the granting of such concession might not prevent the construction of the Pacific cable, it would, at least, seriously impair its earning power, and thus stand in the way of the lowering of Pacific cable rates. Whilst the reduction in the Eastern Telegraph's rates would, for a brief period, be an advantage, it would doubtless be at the cost of a permanent injury to the success of the Pacific cable scheme, either by preventing its construction or impairing its usefulness by occasioning higher rates. Once the Pacific cable is constructed there would appear to be no advantage to the public, but rather the contrary, in the existence of a duplicate cable system with private capital, operating in Australia. But, however that be, there is no doubt in the minds of the Canadian government that the granting of the concession asked for would seriously prejudice the Pacific cable undertaking, and they confidently hope that the magnitude of the interests involved in the successful accomplishment of the Pacific cable scheme will justify the various governments in making all reasonable sacrifices in order to the completion of so important a national enterprise.

As requested, I have given to the Postmaster General of Canada the duplicate set of the papers sent me for that purpose, and invited his opinion upon the proposal, and confidently inclose copy of his letter to me upon the subject.

Yours respectfully,

(Signed) WILFRID LAURIER.

Prime Minister, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia.

Mr. CASEY. What letter is that which is referred to ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is the view that is taken by the Canadian government on this question. It is presented in a paper from myself to the Premier and adopted as the view of the government. It was communicated to the Premier of Victoria, and to the High Commissioner for the information of our representatives on the Pacific Cable Commission at London.

Mr. CASEY. May we have that ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is somewhat extended, but if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), wishes it, I have no objection, if the hon. gentleman will permit me, to give the salient points, as this document is somewhat lengthy, I will omit the most of it. It is dated the 8th of January, 1900. After setting forth what the papers state in regard to the application of the Eastern Extension Company, which I have mentioned before, for certain concessions to enable that company to do business in Australia, this paper proceeds as follows :

Whatever be the precise details, I think it may safely be assumed that from the beginning the concessions asked for will be of a nature to enable the company to acquire and control a considerable portion of the Australian cable business, with a not unreasonable probability of the company being able, from time to time, to secure still further concessions. The question then arises, will the granting of such concessions have any, and if so, what effect upon the Pacific cable scheme. Conceding the importance of the proposed reduction in rates, and the construction of the proposed cable from the Cape, yet it appears to me that the early carrying out of the Pacific cable scheme is of such paramount importance that its success should not be endangered by the establishment of any state of affairs which might result in the Pacific cable scheme losing any support which it now enjoys. Let it be supposed that the Eastern Extension Company obtains the concessions or others of a like nature, will they not naturally seek to turn the new situation to their own advantage? Their first aim undoubtedly is to defeat the Pacific cable scheme, or, that failing, to acquire such a foothold in Australia in advance of the completion of the Pacific cable as will seriously impair the financial success of the Pacific cable enterprise. What use then would the Eastern Telegraph Company, in the first instance, be likely to make of such concessions as it now asks? With its cable from the Cape to Australia constructed or about to be, its offices opened in leading cities in Australia, with patronage in the way of appointments, contracts, &c., at its disposal, the company will, from its new vantage ground, be in a splendid position to promote, throughout Australia, an active and powerful propaganda with a view to affect public opinion adversely to the Pacific cable scheme. Through the press and otherwise, it will seek to prejudice business men, public men, and the general public, against it. They will be in a position to point to their Cape cable, constructed or about to be; their actual as well as prospective reduction in rates; to make strong statistical statements going to show that the country must suffer financial loss by reason of the inefficiency of traffic to support two lines, and to urge that the altered conditions call for delay in the construction of the Pacific cable in order to enable the public to determine whether any longer there exists any sufficient reason for their burdening themselves with that enterprise. Add to this the many other arguments that may be suggested, such as fair-play to private capital, opposition to state ownership, &c., and it is not unreasonable to think that many, hitherto supporters of the Pacific cable scheme, may come to the conclusion that after all it would be well to go slowly; and the proposition for delay, so often a favourite mode of escape from dealing definitely with a vexed question, might carry the day. Such a presentation of the argument would be greatly strengthened if it happened that the Pacific Cable Board were to sanction the proposition of the Eastern Extension Company. In some quarters such action would be represented as practically a decision in favour of the Eastern Extension Company, and against the cable company; and would give immense encouragement to the Eastern Extension Company in its campaign against the Pacific cable scheme, and in all probability would result first in delay, and ultimately in defeat. During the many years involved in the development of the Pacific cable scheme, and so long as its success was problematical, the Eastern Extension Company appears to have confined its efforts towards blocking the way. The present proposal of the telegraph company is quite in line with its fixed policy to defeat the Pacific cable scheme, and appears to me a very transparent attempt to break up the partnership between Great Britain, Canada and Australian colonies, by inducing some of the subsequent withdrawal from the Pacific cable undertaking. Considering the difficulties and delays already encountered in advancing the Pacific cable scheme to its present position, it would appear to me most unwise to expose it to the slightest unnecessary risk. I therefore think that the consideration of the Eastern Extension Company's proposal should not be entertained.

Whether after the Pacific cable is constructed and thoroughly established it would be wise to entertain such a proposition, it is not necessary at this time to determine; but if one can venture to anticipate the future, it would appear to me as unnecessary to have a private cable company competing with the people's cable as to have a separate post office system under private ownership and control.

In the event of such a proposition being submitted to the Pacific Cable Board, I would point out that, according to the Pacific Cable Act, the board has no power to deal with such a subject, its powers being limited to the promotion of the scheme for the establishment and maintenance of direct cable communication between Canada and Australia. As, however, it is probable that the proposal may be brought before the board, I would suggest that, if the views herein expressed, meet with your approval, a copy of this letter be forwarded to Lord Aberdeen and Lord Strathcona, with the request that they may be pleased to give effect to them at the board on behalf of the Canadian government.

To advert, for one moment, to the Pacific cable scheme, I beg to state that there appears to be no reason for delay in calling for tenders, and as the necessity for the cable is constantly becoming more urgent, I would advise that Canada's representatives on the board press for such steps being taken as will, at the earliest possible moment, result in a contract being entered into for the construction of the cable.

Yours faithfully,

W. MULOCK.

The Right Honourable

Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G.,
Premier of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

My hon. friend will thus see the view that we have taken on the proposition. The rest of the papers are simply following up actively the attitude set forth in this paper. As I mentioned a moment ago, the Canadian government forwarded this memorandum as an instruction to our representatives on the commission, and they also communicated it to the Premier of Victoria. On the 25th of January, the Prime Minister of Canada cabled the governments of New South Wales, Victoria, New Zealand and Queensland, protesting against the granting of even this modified concession. On the 22nd of January, the Premier of Canada also cabled the Premier of Victoria :

Would sincerely hope that project of Eastern Extension Telegraph Company will not be accepted. Any kind of delay at this moment might be fatal.

On the 22nd of January, the Premier of Canada telegraphed the High Commissioner urging that the cable be put under contract at the earliest moment. On the 23rd of January, we received a cable from the Premier of New Zealand, as follows :

New Zealand will not accept Eastern Extension Company's offer and have protested against Australia accepting as inimical to Pacific cable.

The government of Canada also received a cable from the government of Queensland on the 22nd of January, 1900, wherein that government declared it would lend no countenance to the Eastern Extension Cable Company's demand. On the 4th of February, the Canadian government cabled the New South Wales government, as follows :

Canada strongly objects last proposal of Eastern Extension Cable Company or any other that will remove control of telegraph business from local governments and give Eastern Telegraph Company free hand in competing with Pacific Cable. Will you kindly communicate to Australasian Premiers.

On the 20th of February, the Canadian government cabled to the Premier of New Zealand :

Canadian government consider granting terminal facilities to Eastern Extension, even when Pacific cable laid, will seriously prejudice financial prospects and impair usefulness of Pacific cable scheme. Proposed concession material alterations of conditions under which governments formed Pacific cable partnership and may endanger scheme. Hope no change without consent of every partner.

The government received a reply from New Zealand, as follows, dated 24th of February :

Pacific cable ; quite concur.

On the 25th, another cable was received from the Premier of New South Wales, as follows :

Press cablegram here to effect that Premier New South Wales stated definitely had decided agree Eastern Company's terms. Have wired Victoria and New South Wales urging matter remain in abeyance until Pacific Cable Board's opinion on situation received.

We followed that up on the 21st by cabling to the High Commissioner, as follows :

Canadian government always regarded Pacific cable scheme intimately associated with welfare, not merely of colonies favouring same, but whole empire. In that view government considers Eastern Extension proposal, which appears to endanger scheme, as one not concerning colonial government only, and therefore, Canadian government looks for active influence of Imperial government to the end that no government consent to any change of conditions without sanction of partner government. We consider proposed concessions to Extension material change in basis on which Canada joined in Pacific cable scheme.

The Premier of Victoria on the 22nd of February took this view in a cable to the Canadian government :

Victoria government proposes if Cape cable laid and rates immediately reduced to give terminal facilities Eastern Telegraph Company only when Pacific cable completed. New South Wales apparently favours proposal. No contract yet signed. This arrangement will ensure fair competitive conditions for government cable suggested monopoly for Pacific route both novel and untenable. Rest assured Victorian government will not depart from Pacific compact.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the date of that?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That cable is dated the 22nd of February. My hon. friend will observe that there, for the first time, an Australian government has taken the ground that the granting of the concession to the Eastern Extension Cable Company to carry on a business which it had not when we went into the scheme, is not a material departure. It is only necessary to state the situation to see that it is a radical change in the conditions under which the various governments entered into that partnership. At the time we joined the partnership, at the time parliament dealt with it, there was no existing right to the Eastern Extension Company to land a cable or to do a cable business in Australia. The Australians control the land telegraph, and they control the landing, and they control the receiving offices, and upon these receiving offices must depend the earning power of the Pacific cable. Therefore, to set up a rival telegraph system throughout the colony of Australia, is to establish a competition which is wholly unnecessary, and which must seriously impair the earning power of the Pacific cable itself.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It is idle to pretend for a moment that any of the governments—I am sure that the Canadian government never for one moment contemplated such a condition of affairs when it agreed to pledge the credit of this country to the extent of about two and a half million dollars to go into this scheme. When we went into the scheme; when I laid the estimate before the House last session it was in the view that the conditions then existing, and as modified by the construction of this cable, would continue to be the conditions. I furnished to this House, with some little detail, the estimated earnings from our cable, never assuming that the Australian colonies would have permitted to be established a rival cable system throughout Australia. If they do that, it appears to me that they destroy the foundation upon which this whole scheme was based, and there must be a revision of the scheme before it can go on; or at least, parliament must again be taken into the confidence of the government and in the altered conditions determine whether or not it will adhere to the scheme. It is one thing to go into a scheme of this kind, involving a very considerable liability, with a good financial prospect before us; but it is another thing altogether to go into such a scheme, if its financial outlook is materially altered for the worse.

Mr. McNEILL. Our guarantee at that time involved no financial liability at all, according to the opinions of the best experts.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. My hon. friend is perfectly right. According to the testimony of the board that sat in London in the fall and winter of 1896-7, presided over by Lord Shelborne, they then estimated—I speak within the mark—that the enterprise would be self-sustaining in about the third year; but that was not on the theory that the Eastern Extension Company was to be established and in active competition with us; and when the Premier of Victoria—I speak with all respect for his view—suggests that it was never contemplated that the Pacific cable should enjoy a monopoly, I do not think the term monopoly applies to an enterprise under the control of the people themselves. The proposal of the colony of Victoria, appears to involve the duplication of capital, and the dividing of the earning power, and it must have the effect either of making the Pacific cable enterprise financially unprofitable, or of causing it to maintain such high rates as will practically make the scheme of no great value to the public. The great object of this scheme, apart from its Imperialistic character, as I understand, is to reduce rates so as to promote trade between the various parts of the empire connected by it; but if by duplication of the service, the Eastern Extension Company is permitted to transact business as well, if by such a concession as is demanded now, the scheme is made a financial failure, or the rates have to be maintained at an unduly high figure, there will be great disappointment, and I think it would be our duty to take parliament into our confidence before determining how far we should proceed with the scheme. Hon. gentlemen will see, therefore, that we are at a very critical stage of the scheme. It is somewhat expensive to interchange views by cable with people in the Antipodes; but at all events, this was the reply sent to the Premier of Victoria, by the Canadian government, to that cable:

February 22, 1900.

Fully understand proposal that terminal Eastern Company begin only when Pacific cable completed. Still Canadian government consider such concession endangering success Pacific cable scheme, and must injure it financially. Fail to see necessity for competition with government cable. Regret to stand in way of any immediate advantage to Australia, but cannot share responsibility involved in granting concession, which Canadian government considers may endanger Pacific cable.

On the 26th of February, the government received the following cable from New Zealand, dated the 25th of February:

Press cablegram here to effect that Premier New South Wales stated definitely had decided agree Eastern Company's terms. Have wired Victoria and New South Wales urging matter remain in abeyance until Pacific Cable Board's opinion in situation received.

The Premier cabled this information to the High Commissioner, and received from Lord Strathcona, the following cable dated the 26th of February :

Pacific Cable Committee on Friday passed the following resolution unanimously :

'That this committee would urge that no concessions should be made by any Australian governments to the Eastern Telegraph Company, as a condition of laying a cable between Africa and Australia until this committee has had an opportunity of considering and reporting on the effect of such concessions upon the financial prospects of the Pacific cable scheme.

This is very important, because it appears that the representatives of the various governments on the commission have agreed to this proposition. Whether the governments themselves intend to carry it out, remains to be seen. To that cablegram, this government replied as follows to the High Commissioner in London, on February 26th :

Trust Cable Committee resolution will prove effective to secure delay in granting proposed Eastern concession, which my government regard material departue, and if carried out, likely imperil whole scheme. As protection against other similar movements, suggest your committee consider proposition that no government in Pacific cable scheme hereafter consent anything affecting it without consent of other partner governments.

We deem it advisable to take that attitude. It is first one movement, then another movement, and it may as well be understood on the threshold, whether the various governments intend to exercise the best of faith towards each other and towards the scheme, and to enter into no obligations or changes of conditions, without consultation with, or the consent of those likely to be affected. That is the final attitude of our government as to the relations that ought to exist between the various partners in this scheme. The High Commissioner on the 1st of March cabled the government as follows :

Following telegram, dated Melbourne yesterday, appeared in 'Times' to-day: 'Details now arranged of an agreement between governments New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, Western Australia, and Eastern Extension Company in connection projected cable between Australia and Cape.

Then the government received the following cable, dated the 2nd of March, from the Premier of New South Wales :

Eastern Extension proposals seems some misapprehension. We are ready and anxious to carry out our undertakings re Pacific cable; admitted all sides this cannot be completed for three years, probably more. Meantime Eastern Extension offer immediate reduction our rates to four shillings, or about 16 per cent, and by sliding scale coming three years to two shillings and sixpence as business increases; also lay cable Cape to Adelaide, and then reduce present excessive Cape rates from seven shillings and threepence to two shillings and sixpence word. No concession asked for or given until Pacific cable completed; they want direct offices so as to compete on equal terms, and in meantime any reduction whatever to remain until Pacific cable laid. Our present agreement terminates April 30, and if no fresh one made, company can, instead of reducing rates, increase them up to eight shillings a word.

You will observe that in this despatch, it is stated that the cable could not be completed for three years, or perhaps a longer period. On receipt of that information, we at once took steps to ascertain its accuracy and communicated with the leading manufacturers of the world, the men probably to whom the commission would have applied to make the cable. In reply, we received two despatches from manufacturers of great standing in London. One despatch spoke of eighteen months; the other, from Siemens & Co., said that a cable could be laid within a year. However, we did not care, in our cable to the Premier of New South Wales, to insert the year limit, but gave the manufacturers the benefit of the longer term.

Mr. GILLIES. Can the hon. gentleman give any other names outside of Siemens & Co., to whom application was made for contract to tender?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. There was only one other firm. I do not remember the name, but could get it from the department, and will send for it if the hon. gentleman likes.

Mr. GILLIES. Not at all.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I remember that the Siemens proposal said twelve months, and the other, I think, said eighteen months or thereabouts. The cable that this government sent to the New South Wales government was as follows :

Have ascertained from best manufacturers, Pacific cable may be made and laid within eighteen months. Its advocacy has already greatly reduced Australia cable rates. Its completion will doubtless occasion further reductions and if several governments stand together will lead to further cable extensions likely to meet Australian and other governments cable requirements beyond anything private capital likely to afford. Deeply regret appear opposing temporary advantage offered Australia. Hope Australian colonies will postpone consideration of Eastern Extension Company's proposals until Pacific cable in operation.

You will observe that the Australian position to-day is somewhat embarrassing. They fear that on the 30th April, they will be to some extent at the mercy of the Eastern Extension Company, and owing to that unfortunate circumstance are perhaps disposed to accede to terms that otherwise they would not for a moment consider. They very properly attach a good deal of importance to communication between the Cape and Australia, and the Cape, and the Eastern Extension Company proposes to establish cable communication between the Cape and Australia. That, of course, is a temptation to the Australian governments, but we hope that the construction of a Pacific cable will not be the end, but only the beginning, of joint government action. We look to not merely successful cable communication between Canada and Australia, but to cable connection with Hong Kong and the Cape, and thus form a girdle around the empire, uniting every part of it together under government control. If we look forward to such a policy—and it is one well worthy of the consideration of parliament and the people of the empire—we cannot devote our attention for a moment to anything of greater importance than this very scheme. It appears now to be wavering in the balance, and the efforts of the Australian government, the home government and Canada, during the best part of a generation, to consummate this enterprise, appear about to be destroyed. Supposing for one moment that one of the governments chooses to withdraw from this scheme because of material alteration in its basis, that will involve beginning de novo, and worse, because you would commence again with our rivals more fortified and with the governments interested less likely to be zealous. If the scheme should now fail because of the defection of one of the governments or if some material change made by one of the governments should call for a reconsideration of the whole scheme, you will begin under great disadvantage to try and bring the governments of the empire together for the purpose of reviving the enterprise. If we are to succeed, it can only be by holding to the conditions that existed when the Canadian and the various other parliaments gave their adhesion, or if they must be changed by not changing them save with the common consent of all. So far as Canada is concerned. I doubt, important as this scheme is, if the Canadian public has fully grasped its practical importance and consequence. I confess that when I began to study it myself, I was not as zealous as I am to-day, but as I studied it, and began to realize its immense possibilities, I came to the conviction that there is no enterprise before Canada to-day more fraught with good than this scheme. Once we establish cable connection with Australia, a short line can be easily constructed from Australia across by the islands to Singapore, where we come in contact with a branch of the Eastern Cable Company extending from Singapore to Hong Kong; and although last session, it was for a moment thought that the Imperial government had parted with the right to secure concessions in Hong Kong, it is quite clear, from the reading of the contract granted by the Imperial government to the Eastern Extension Company, that that contract in no way interferes with the various governments acquiring cable connection with Hong Kong. The Imperial government has the right to expropriate the Eastern Extension Cable Company from Hong Kong southerly to where a connection would be made with it from Australia to the mainland, and if they do we would have cable communication between Canada and Hong Kong and the markets of China and Japan. And as the whole commercial world is endeavouring now to get into China and Japan, and we enjoy geographical advantages over other countries, we have a special interest in the early completion of the most direct cable communication between Canada and Australia, as a key to the situation of cable communication between Canada and the east. The connection between Canada and Australia, important as it is, is but the beginning and not the end. Important as it would be for the governments of the two extremities of the empire, it sinks into insignificance commercially as compared with its advantage in giving us more direct communication with the great markets of the east. So that Canada has an enormous interest in this enterprise, and if there is anything that can yet be done to promote its construction and secure the early completion of the cable it behooves every Canadian to help in doing it. We sent a despatch, which I do not find among the papers, in connection with the last cable despatch sent to the Premier of Victoria, to the High Commissioner urging the commission to put the cable under though last session, it was for a moment. We believe there will be no safety for the scheme until this is done. Once it is under contract, perhaps, it may give hope to the others and induce them to forbear wrecking this enterprise, at least until they can test the efficacy of the Pacific cable scheme. My hon. friend (Mr. Casey), in the commencement, intimated that perhaps this government had been derelict in its duty, or in some way not sufficiently zealous or active in connection with this matter. If there has been any such indifference on our part, I am not aware of it. I think I have brought the case down to this moment, practically. Although I have not given you all the literature on the subject, I have given the substance of that which may fairly be given to the public at this stage.

Mr. McNEILL. I suppose the papers will be laid on the Table, so that we may have an opportunity of looking over them?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes. As I mentioned—my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) was not here at the moment—I have gone through all the papers, and some of them, for reasons I have already stated, on account of their nature or of the parties to them, could not fairly or wisely be produced to-day. There is a very large number of papers. I have culled out those which tell the story up to the moment, and, to-morrow, if the House will give me permission, I will place upon the Table all the cables up to yesterday and all the correspondence I have referred to.

Motion (Mr. Casey) to adjourn, negatived.

DUTY ON TOBACCO.

Mr. JOSEPH A. GILLIES (Richmond) moved :

That, in the opinion of this House, the present high duties upon tobacco should be reduced.

He said : The notice of this motion has been on the paper since the 5th of last month. I placed it on the paper early in the session in order that the Finance Minister might give every possible consideration to the subject before bringing down his budget. I do trust that by this time the hon. gentleman has given it the consideration that the question merits, in view of its importance to the people of the province from which we both come as well as of the other provinces, particularly down by the sea. I may say at the outset that I have no personal object to serve in presenting this motion and submitting to the House considerations in favour of the change therein proposed. I have only one object to serve, and that is to have the position of the numerous consumers of this article considered, and, to some extent, ameliorated by a reduction of the very high duties now in force. I cannot forget that in the days not long gone by, when the party now sitting on this side of the House controlled the government and gentlemen now on the Treasury benches sat upon your left, Mr. Speaker, those hon. gentlemen went up and down the length and breadth of this country denouncing as too high the duties then levied upon tobacco. The Minister of Finance himself, I am sure I am correct in saying, was not the least strong in his denunciation of these duties, and his were not the least among the great promises as to the reduction that would be made in the then existing duties when they would attain power. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) also—his gallant and generous breast was filled with indignation at the hardships to which the people of his county and of the counties of the eastern provinces generally were subjected by the heavy taxes upon this article of general consumption. They said : Put us in power, and the moment that is done the duties upon this article will be cut in two, or even more largely reduced. I have listened to such words myself from leading members of the opposition of that day, who now occupy seats on the right of Mr. Speaker. As the opportunity is now afforded them, I hope they will aid me in bringing about the state of affairs that they promised us should be brought about if their party came into power.

I do not purpose delaying the House with a lengthy speech ; I desire only to lay before the government a few facts and figures that will, I trust, lead to their agreeing to the reduction of taxation that I am now urging. Although I am in favour of the reduction of the duties upon tobacco, I recognize the advisability of giving such protection to the domestic leaf as will encourage the cultivation of tobacco to the greatest possible extent. But I may add that no care in cultivation, no expenditure of capital, no skill in manufacture will enable a class of tobacco to be grown in Canada equal in quality to the foreign leaf. The reasons for this must be apparent to any hon. gentleman. Our climate is against the raising of a fine leaf to such a degree as to render it for ever impossible, no matter what skill and care in cultivation is bestowed upon it. There is no cigar tobacco, for instance, equal to that of Cuba ; there is no smoking tobacco equal to that of Virginia and North Carolina ; and there is no chewing tobacco—so experts tell me—equal to that of Kentucky. And, from the time tobacco came into general use, not one of these districts has been able to rival the other in tobacco peculiar to the other. When such variety exists amongst states almost in the same latitude, and apparently with the same climatic conditions and influences, how is it possible to rival the excellence of all of them in a climate such as we have in Canada ? The consumption of Canadian tobacco in Canada will be limited entirely, at any rate outside of the province of Quebec, to those who, on account of its cheapness, will accept an article of inferior quality, and the balance of consumption of tobacco will be of the foreign leaf. Now, my object is to show the government that the large increase made by them in the duties that obtained under the last government led to nothing except it be the imposition of a direct tax upon the consumers of tobacco, and also to excessive smuggling. Now, the duty under the old government, was 25 cents a pound. Hon. gentlemen opposite were pretendedly pressing for a reduction for several years, and when the present government came into power, I was astonished to find that the first change made in the tariff, was greatly to increase the duty on tobacco, increasing it from 25 cents to 39 cents a pound. I contend that the increase of 14 cents a pound, in the excise duty, bringing up the duty to 39 cents per pound, is more than is necessary to protect and encourage the cultivation of domestic tobacco. While they have succeeded in reducing the manufacture of the foreign leaf, they did not reduce the actual consumption of tobacco in this country, and the deficiency is made up of smuggled tobacco. Now, Mr. Speaker, take a pound of foreign tobacco, and see what is the result. I wish to address myself particularly to the hon. gentleman who is in charge of the Inland Revenue Department, and who will be able to bear testimony to the correctness of the statement that I am now making.

Foreign leaf tobacco is sold at 18 to 20 cents per pound, and on this is imposed a duty and excise amounting to 35 cents, or almost double the value of the tobacco, so that ten pounds of smuggled tobacco brings a profit of $3.50, or if brought into this country for the use of the person himself or his friends, a piece of tobacco more than double the size may be had for the same money. The result is that on the borders of New Brunswick, the Eastern Townships, the St. Lawrence River, the Great Lakes, the Territories and British Columbia, the trade in Canadian manufactured foreign leaf is continually decreasing while every train, every vessel or ferry brings into Canada in small quantities American tobacco and the ramifications of this smuggling on a small scale would be surprising to those not actually acquainted with the extent to which it has been practised in this country. I suggest that a lower excise will be sufficient to give ample encouragement to the domestic leaf and by reducing the difference between that imposed in the United States and that to which we are subject in Canada, would to some extent check the continually increasing smuggling which operates to the injury of the Canadian manufacturer and in loss to the public revenue and damage and injury to the consumer.

The public records show that the consumption of tobacco in Canada to-day is less than it was ten years ago. That, however, is no proof that the actual consumption of tobacco in Canada is less than it was ten or fifteen years ago. The fact is, that, although the trade returns show a less importation and consequently less amount paid into the revenue than there should be because smuggling is carried on on a larger scale, and that is due entirely to the increase in the duty. I must ask your permission to read a few figures; I will not read many, because I know that they are tiresome, but I will read a few to show that the present system is certainly defective. I find from a certain schedule of returns made to the Department of Inland Revenue, that in 1884, the total quantity of tobacco, snuff and cigarettes, taken for consumption, was ten million pounds. In 1898, the last year for which I have the figures, it was nine million pounds, showing that a less quantity was used in 1898, than was used fourteen years previously. For the year 1884, we find that the total quantity of tobacco, snuff and cigarettes manufactured was 10,940,000 pounds, and in 1898, 10,519,000 pounds; showing that about the same quantity apparently was taken at those two periods, although the population had considerably increased. I will give another statement for the years 1887 and 1898. In the first year the total amount of tobacco manufactured in Canada, was 8,752,035 pounds, and in 1898 we find that it amounted to only ten million pounds, a quantity entirely out of proportion to the increase of population. Taking the three years of 1887, 1888 and 1889, we find that 27,581,000 pounds were manufactured, while in the three years of 1896, 1897 and 1898, the amount was 28,000,000 pounds. These figures show that the manufacture of tobacco does not keep pace with the consumption that actually takes place, and the people and the public revenue both suffer in consequence. Well, how is the balance supplied? Simply by smuggling, which involves a large loss of revenue. If we look at the United States, we will find that the consumption of tobacco, as shown by their returns, is increasing year by year, simply because the excise duty was reduced and the consumption, paying duty, became proportionately greater. The very moment that the excise duty was reduced then the temptation to smuggle was less, and consequently a less quantity was smuggled, and the revenue benefited thereby, and the people paid less taxes accordingly. Let me illustrate that point. In 1878, in the United States, I find that tobacco paid an excise duty of 24½ cents, and the reports show that there was a consumption in that year of 108,824,843 lbs. In 1879 the excise duty was further reduced to 21½ cents, and in that year the consumption, as shown by the published reports, was 120,398,000 lbs. I will not weary the House with many of these figures, but I may say, that, in the following year the excise duty was reduced to 16 cents and the consumption was swollen enormously. In 1883 the excise duty was reduced to 13 cents, and the consumption went up to 170,000,000. In the following year the excise duty was reduced to 8 cents, and the consumption, as shown by the reports, went up to 174,000,000. The excise duty was kept at 8 cents in the United States, until 1891, when the consumption rose to 253,000,000 lbs. Then it was reduced to 6 cents a pound, as it is at present. For last year, 1897, the returns of the United States show the enormous consumption of 274,000,000. That shows that the lower the excise was the less temptation there was to smuggle; that the whole quantity consumed found its way into the public reports, and that the whole quantity consumed paid duty. I think this may be of some assistance to my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) when wrestling with his colleagues at the Council Board over this question, and while he is seeking to bring them to a clearer reason as to the enormity of this imposition upon the ordinary smoker.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) will pardon me; he gave statements for one or two years of the rate of duty and the consumption during these years in the United States, but he omitted to give several years. I want to ask him if he has a tabulated statement showing the consumption during the years when the rates of duty were changed in the United States?

Mr. GILLIES. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman did not give it; I watched him closely and tried to follow the points of his speech. Has the hon. gentleman the consumption for those years in which the duties were reduced?

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) is not as sparing of the time of the House—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) will put in Hansard it will serve my purpose.

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend is not as sparing of the time of the House in the way of quoting figures as I desire to be.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will see that so far as his argument is concerned, it is unsupported unless he gives the duties in those years and the results.

Mr. GILLIES. The hon. minister is correct, but I did not want to weary the House by quoting a lot of figures. I have the figures referred to by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and perhaps, I had better go over them. Beginning with the year 1878, when the excise duty was 24½ cents a pound, in the United States, the public returns of that year show a consumption of 108,824,843. In the following year the excise duty was reduced to 21½ cents, and the consumption went up to 120,398,458 lbs. In the following year the excise duty was reduced to 16 cents, and the consumption went up to 136,275,000 lbs. In 1883, the excise duty was reduced to 13½ cents and the consumption went up to 170,000,000 lbs. In the following year, 1884, the excise duty was reduced to 8 cents and the consumption went up to 174,000,000 lbs. In 1885, at the same rate, the consumption went up to 180,000,000 lbs. In the following year it went up to 191,000,000, in 1887, to 206,000,000 lbs., in 1888, to 209,000,000 lbs, in 1889, to 221,000,000 lbs, and in 1890 to 238,000,000. Then, in 1891, the excise duty was reduced to 7 cents a pound, and in that year the consumption went up, as shown by their reports, to 253,000,000 lbs. In the following year, 1892, the government of the United States reduced their excise duty to 6 cents a pound, at which it now is, and the consumption went up to 263,000,000. In 1897, the last year for which the figures of the United States consumption are available to me, I find that the consumption went up to the enormous quantity of 274,

000,000 lbs. The House will see that it went up from 108,000,000 lbs. in 1878, under the several reductions in the duty, to 274,000,000, lbs. in 1897. Now, I use that as an argument to show that these increases have taken place in the United States while the excise has been reduced, whereas, with ourselves, our consumption is practically stationary, while our excise duties are being enormously increased. Therefore, my argument is that if you reduce the excise duty on tobacco you will be benefiting the government and you will also be benefiting the consumer. I hope I have made this clear to my hon. friend (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). My hon. friend who is in charge of the Inland Revenue Department, assisted as he will be, by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), will have no difficulty in appreciating the nature of this direct tax. I will mention a few instances, and if they will keep them carefully before them, when adjusting this part of the question, I think they will be of considerable assistance to them. The tax was increased by 14 cents a pound by the tariff of the present government, or a cent a fig more than the old duty. In my own county there is a class of people, the fishermen, that use this article of luxury, to some people, and to them a necessity, to a very large extent. The last report of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries shows, that, in my own county, there were, in 1898, 56 vessels, with 358 men and 1,405 boats with 2,277 men, showing that there are 2,635 men engaged in the very precarious undertaking of the fisheries on that wild coast. These people, as I have told the House, are large consumers of tobacco of the coarser grades, and a duty of one cent a fig or 14 cents a pound has been put upon these people by the increase that was made on this article by the present government. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) is now in his seat and he will agree in what I say—

Mr. COWAN. I do not just catch what you say. Do you say that there is a tax of one cent per day—

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) will remember that when the present tariff was brought down in 1897, a tax of 14 cents a pound was put on a certain class of tobacco, and that is the very class of tobacco that the people of the lower provinces are constantly using. Now, this tobacco is divided into 'figs'; 12 figs to the pound. That is more than a cent a fig on that tobacco, but for the purposes of argument I will call it one cent a fig. Now, Sir, in my county, and in the other counties by the sea, every fisherman will ordinarily use one fig a day, and that means at least a cent a day; day in and day out, that each man has to pay additional in consequence of the 14 cents a pound that was imposed as duty upon tobacco by the present government. These are facts, and no one can contradict them. According to the official report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I have 635 fishermen in my county, and those fishermen have to pay in the aggregate, $26.35 day in and day out, additional on account of the extra 14 cents a pound imposed upon tobacco by the present Grit government. Let us consider what that extra tax will mean in a year. It is only a question of arithmetical calculation to ascertain and a very easy one it is. This $26.35 extra a day, means for, 635 fishermen in my county, $9,618.75 a year additional taxes that they pay over and above what they were paying before the present government came into power. That enormous extra amount of taxation is only on the one item of tobacco. Let us consider another fact. If this government will last for five years, the fishermen in my county will have to pay the sum of $48,000 extra, and hon. gentlemen can readily understand what that tax means. It is oppressive, unreasonable and unjust. Now, take the county of Victoria, C.B. My hon. friend who represents that county (Mr. Bethune), is now in the House, and he will remember how anxious the Conservatives were to return him at the last elections. He will also remember how annoyed he was, because he was then full of good Conservative doctrine, when the Liberal tariff came down, about the additional tax of 14 cents a pound upon tobacco, and how anxious he was at that time to protect his people against that tax. Since that time his allegiance to the party that sent him here has been seduced. We find from the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that in his county of Victoria, there are 856 fishing boats manned by 1,365 men. Now, these men pay $13.65 per day and every day, out of their earnings in additional taxation in consequence of this added duty on tobacco imposed by the present government.

Mr. FORTIN. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies), has the price of tobacco increased since that duty was imposed?

Mr. GILLIES. I will answer that very readily. The duty has increased the price by just 14 cents a pound, and my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) will get that answer everywhere to the question he asks. Let me tell him this. Under the Foster tariff the fisherman, when he went in for his plug or fig of tobacco in the store in his district, paid 5 cents for it, but the moment the present government came in and they increased the price, he had to pay 6 cents for the same plug under the Fielding tariff. That answers the question, and it shows how false the government have been to the people in their pre-election promises. There is, as I have said, an additional one cent a day imposed on the man who consumes one plug or fig of tobacco. When my hon. friend (Mr. Fortin) interrupted me I was dealing with the county of Victoria and I was saying that in consequence of this additional increase over the old or Foster tariff, the fishermen of that county paid $13.65 a day, day in and day out. That means, if you figure it up, an increase of $4,972 a year more than formerly, which the fishermen of the county of Victoria have to pay in consequence of the tariff on tobacco imposed by the Liberal government. My hon. friend (Mr. Bethune) must of necessity support me in this motion, and he must of necessity use his great influence (now) with the government in bringing about the reduction that my motion seeks to secure. In the county of Inverness, represented in this House so ably by my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), I find from the return of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that in that noble county there are 25 fishing vessels, manned by 130 men, and there are 790 fishing boats, manned by 1,700 men, showing altogether that 1,831 men from the county of Inverness are engaged in the fisheries. The same rule that applies to my county and to the county of Victoria applies to the county of Inverness, and so the fishermen of that county pay $18.31, day in and day out, in consequence of this new tariff on tobacco imposed by the Liberal government. That amounts to $6,693.15 a year over and above what they were paying under the Foster tariff, and during the lifetime of this government, if it lasts for five years, it will amount to $34,465.75 or something about that. I hope, therefore, that my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. McLennan) will join the hon. member from Victoria, N.S., (Mr. Bethune) and myself, in impressing upon the government the desirability of bringing about the reduction of the duty on tobacco which I am now seeking by this motion. Well, there is the county of Guysborough. I could not for the life of me pass this great county without bringing it to the notice of the House. What does the county of Guysborough pay because of the Liberal tax on tobacco? I can imagine my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser), who represents that county, striding up to the Council chamber and there demanding that this reduction be brought about. It is a reduction that he promised would be brought about. When the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches were out of power, my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) went throughout the land, and he promised that should the Liberals get into power the duty on this very article of tobacco would be largely reduced. Now, Sir, when the Liberals came into power, and when they increased the duty on tobacco, it must have met with the pronounced disapprobation of my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) and he will, I hope, join with the members from Victoria, N.S., (Mr. Bethune) and Inverness (Mr. McLennan) and myself, in demanding from the government that this reduction shall be made. What do the figures from Guysborough County show? I find from the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that there are 25 vessels engaged in the fisheries, manned by 128 men, and that there are 2,235 boats manned by 2,622 men, showing altogether that 2,700 men in Guysborough County, go down to the sea in boats engaged in the hazardous occupation of getting their living from catching the fish that are to be found in the great waters there. What does that show? It shows that these 2,750 men, day in and day out since this government imposed that additional duty, have paid $27.50 a day, making the large sum of $10,037.50 additional taxation imposed upon the people of Guysborough on the article of tobacco alone by this munificent government. What does that mean? It means that if Providence or the people allow this government to live out their legal term of five years, the people of Guysborough will have paid, in addition to what they paid under the old regime, $50,187.50 on the article of tobacco alone.

Mr. TAYLOR. If Guysborough pays that much, how much will be paid by the whole Dominion?

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend puts a question that is very pertinent, and it is only proper that I should answer it. That very question was answered last session by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière), who stated in this House that the taxes on tobacco altogether amounted to $3,566,461, and that $971,285, or a million dollars in round numbers, represented the increase imposed by this government over and above that imposed by the late government. That answers the question of my hon. friend. My hon. friends from Guysborough, Victoria, Inverness and Antigonish must join me in demanding, with no uncertain sound, that this reduction be made. My hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) gives to this government, I hope, a conscientious and unerring unswerving support; and, although his county is not so largely engaged in the fisheries as the counties of Richmond, Victoria, Inverness and Guysborough, he will, I am sure, see that it is to the interest of a large and deserving class in his county that this reduction should be made, and that he too should join the noble band who will act together in making this demand.

Mr. McISAAC. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that to-day in Antigonish and the other counties he mentions, the fishermen and others can buy for 5 cents a plug of tobacco of the same size and weight as the one that cost 8 or 10 cents under the old tariff.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) That is not true.

Mr. GILLIES.

Mr. McISAAC. I can produce the tobacco.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) It is not the same weight.

Mr. COWAN. It is better tobacco.

Mr. GILLIES. Will the hon. gentleman make the statement that the same quality and quantity of tobacco sold at a certain price under the old tariff can now be bought at the same figure under the new tariff?

Mr. McISAAC. Yes. I say that the fishermen in my county and in the others are satisfied that the plug is of the same size and weight, and they can get for 5 cents what they had to pay 8 or 10 cents for under the old tariff.

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. McISAAC. I am prepared to go to the country on that issue.

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken, and if he goes to the country on that issue, he will stay in the country. The hon. gentleman knows, if he knows anything, that the fig sold for 4 cents or 5 cents apiece under the old tariff now sells for 5 or 6 cents apiece; there is a cent difference between the two prices. The hon. gentleman will find that to be the case in his own county and in every county in the province. Now, in that county there are 303 men engaged in the fisheries. Though it is more largely an agricultural than a fishing county, still the farmers as a class are largely smokers, as well as the fishermen, and I trust that the hon. gentleman will join me in making this reasonable request of the government. These 303 fishermen pay $3.03 additional taxation for every day in the year, or $1,099 per year, so that the fishermen of his county will have paid during the lifetime of this parliament $5,495 of additional taxes on this one article alone. My hon. friend will find that I am strictly and entirely correct in my statement.

Now I come to the counties of Queen's and Shelburne. I find from the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries these facts: That in Queen's there are employed eight fishing vessels carrying seventy-one men, and 460 boats employing 508, and that the county of Shelburne has eighty fishing vessels, manned by 768 men, and 1,701 boats taking 2,140 men. This departmental report then shows that in these two counties, represented by the Minister of Finance, 2,908 men go down to the deep to draw their living therefrom. And what is the fact, Mr. Speaker. That these 2,908 men now pay daily into the government coffers of the county the sum of $29.08 of an additional tax under the Fielding tariff, above what they did under the Foster tariff. What does this mean? It means that the fishermen, represented here by the Minister of Finance, pay every year an additional taxation upon tobacco alone of $9,670.88; or, if the present government should live for five years, they will pay additional taxation, in consequence of their sending him here, amounting to $48,354.40. This in my judgment is a sorry return for favours conferred. It is now the duty of the hon. Finance Minister to stand by me when I ask that this outrageous and grinding tax be reduced.

I have nothing further to say in this connection except that I do trust that the government will make this reduction in the tax on tobacco which is loudly demanded all over the country, and especially in the lower provinces. That we should be subject to this additional taxation from a party who, when in opposition, promised to bring about large reductions in taxation, was something not to be expected even from them. I therefore make the motion, Sir, which has been placed in your hands.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. Speaker, the motion presented by the hon. member is: That in the opinion of this House, the present high duties upon tobacco should be reduced. I wish to say that I will leave this question to the judgment of the House, and I will merely now draw the attention of the House to the result which the increase in the duties has produced. In 1897, the tax which my hon. friend complains of—10 cents a pound on leaf, and 14 cents a pound on stemmed tobacco—was imposed. The leaf tobacco with the stem on, is naturally of less value than when the stem is removed, and, therefore, the customs duty on the former is 10 cents, and on the latter 14 cents a pound. This law was introduced in 1897, and what has been the result? In 1896-7, only 668,000 pounds of Canadian tobacco passed through our inland revenue factories. In 1897-8, 1,900,000 pounds passed through our factories, and were manufactured, or three times as much as in the first year. In 1898-9, 2,461,000 pounds Canadian tobacco passed through our factories. I am not making now any reference to the enormous quantity of tobacco cultivated by our farming community since this encouragement of 10 cents per pound was given. It is impossible to precise exactly the amount, but my hon. friends from Ontario and Quebec will be able to furnish an estimate of the enormous quantity grown in these provinces. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies), said it was impossible to smoke Canadian grown tobacco. I can hardly suppose he is sincere in making a statement of that kind. He will find a great many connoisseurs who will flatly contradict him. If there is any industry in this country which deserves encouragement, it is the cultivation of Canadian tobacco. I know of none which has a better future. Look at the magnificent results that have flown from the encouragement we have given to our dairy industry, although that is an industry with which one would naturally suppose every farmer and his wife were as familiar with as with the air we breathe and in which they could be taught nothing. Yet we see what beneficial results have fallen from the means taken by the government to encourage our people in perfecting that industry. Well, I think that the cultivation and curing of tobacco are susceptible of still greater improvement. Tobacco is one of those tropical plants imported into this country, which so far has not received the careful cultivation or curing that it deserves. I am confident that if we continue our experiments, we will find that with care in the choice of ground and cultivation, and especially curing our tobacco, if it will not acquire the rich flavour of Havana tobacco, it will fully equal Kentucky or Connecticut or Vermont tobaccos which are grown nearly under similar circumstances. At present our farmers understand fairly well the cultivation of that plant, but their weak point is in the curing, and that is the department we are attending to at this moment.

My hon. friend from Richmond deplored the fate of the poor fishermen who were obliged to pay an extra cent out of their hard earnings every day to pay for the tobacco they use. He says that in ten days the tax would amount to a pound of tobacco, and three pounds in a month, and thirty-six in a year. Well, I must say that those men do not deserve any sympathy if they will indulge in the extravagance of smoking imported tobacco, when they can use the Canadian grown, which is much more wholesome and palatable. If I had expected this discussion, I would have brought here samples of the Canadian tobacco, and would have shown the hon. gentleman that owing to the improvement in its quality we are now able to manufacture what is called combination tobacco, containing a certain proportion of imported and a certain proportion of home grown, which is sold for one-half the price that was formerly charged. I wish my hon. friend would make a trial of it. I will be very glad to give him some of that tobacco, if he is so happy as to be a smoker; and after he has tried it, I think he will say that we can do something with our Canadian tobacco. And we are only beginning. This is only the third year. And when we think of the thousands and thousands of men who have been encouraged by our legislation of 1897 to devote attention to this cultivation, would it be fair now, after so short a time, to withdraw that encouragement? Would it be advisable to do so, now that we see by the official returns, with which my hon.

friend is well acquainted, that such rapid progress is being made. The first year the produce raised was 600,000 pounds, the second year, 1,900,000 pounds, and last year, 2,461,000 pounds. There must be people to smoke and chew that tobacco. There would not be 2,461,000 pounds of Canadian tobacco put through our factories if there was nobody to smoke or chew it. The figures show that the taste for this tobacco is growing, and it shows that we are improving and certainly shall attain good results if we are patient enough to persevere. They show that we can grow tobacco as well as the neighbouring northern states, in which the conditions are nearly or quite the same as our own. It is true, our summers are very short; but they are so hot while they last that we can ripen the tobacco perfectly well. As I said, I am ready to take the opinion of men who have had experience in these matters, and who can speak with authority. These men tell us that with a careful selection of seed and soil, with intelligent cultivation, and especially with skilful curing, we can produce as good tobacco as our neighbours in the northern states, even if we cannot produce as good as is grown in Havana, which I do not suppose we can.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 21) respecting the Hereford Railway Company.—(Mr. McIntosh.)

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Ingram.)

THE BRANDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 25) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway.

(In the Committee.)

On the preamble,

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before the preamble of the Bill is adopted, I wish to make a few remarks with regard to the Bill itself. I propose at the proper time to move certain amendments to the Bill, one respecting bonding privileges, but, in the meantime, I wish to make a statement. The Bill is entitled 'An Act respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company,' and is in the nature of an amendment to a Bill passed in this House in 1890. The design of the original Bill was to construct a line of railroad from Deloraine, a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway, down to a coal mine some seventeen miles south. The Bill also gave the power of extending the line north-west as far as Brandon, a distance of about seventy or eighty miles. There is a land grant in connection with this original charter of 6,400 acres per mile. If that land grant applies on the entire extent of the road as originally laid down in the charter, you will understand that it would be of very considerable value. If that is given, you will see that this railroad will have a land grant almost sufficient to pay double the cost of the construction of the road. I am informed by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) that this land grant only applies for seventeen miles. If you allow $3 per acre, that would be something over $19,000 per mile for seventeen miles of this road. But the point I wish to make is this: The amendment now before us is not for the purpose of reviving a charter, but for the purpose of enabling the company to build a series of branch lines through that country, the approximate aggregate length of which is some four hundred miles. I observed, when the Bill was before the Railway Committee, that it was tacking a dog on to a tail. Of course, we have no objection to the construction of as many railroads as possible in that country, provided that they are obtained under proper conditions. I asked, when the Bill was before the Railway Committee, if it was not a scheme of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or if the promoters were not acting in concert with the Canadian Pacific Railway; and the promoter, Mr. Waddell, said he had no such arrangement. However, I took the trouble to look up the original Bill which was passed in the year 1890, and I find clause 11 reads as follows:—

The company may enter into an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for conveying or leasing to such company the railway of the company hereby incorporated, in whole or in part, or any rights or powers acquired under this Act, as also the surveys, plans, works, plant, material, machinery and other property to it belonging, or for an amalgamation with such company, on such terms and conditions as are agreed upon, and subject to such conditions as to the directors seem fit.

Now, I made the point then, and I wish to emphasize it now, that if we are to grant this charter which is to cover such a large extent of the province of Manitoba, I do not think it is desirable that we should allow this clause to remain in the Bill. I also mentioned at the time in the Railway Committee, and I mention it here, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had then on the Order paper, and it was brought up at the last meeting of the Railway Committee, a Bill of its own for the purpose of constructing 500, 600 or 700 miles of branch lines in the province of Manitoba. Now, you will see if we allow this clause to remain in the Bill, and if we give the Canadian Pacific Railway these other large powers, they will practically have the power to gridiron the entire province, there is nothing left for anybody else. I do not wish to appear in the light of blocking railroad construction, but I think we should not hand over to the Canadian Pacific Railway the entire province. The Manitoba government, as you know, was recently defeated, and according to my judgment, its defeat was largely owing to its position on the railway question. The government which attained power, headed by the Hon. Hugh John Macdonald, attained power on a platform the eleventh plank of which reads as follows :—

The government ownership of railways, as the circumstances of the province will admit, and the adoption of the principle that no bonuses should be granted to any railway company that does not give the government of the province control of the rates over the lines bonused, together with the option of purchase.

That government got into power practically on the plank of government ownership of railways. Now, I assume if we leave that clause in the original charter, this series of lines will fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and if this parliament is going to give to the Canadian Pacific Railway power to occupy every foot of the available space in that country wherever a railway might be built, how are the people of Manitoba to be able to carry out the platform of government ownership of railways? I do not wish at this time to discuss the general question of government ownership of railroads beyond saying that I believe the people of this country have become so thoroughly aroused on the question of transportation, and on the evil of the domination of the interests of the country by railroads, that they will shortly rise in their might and insist upon absolute control of the railroads in this country. I think I am making a moderate statement when I say that for the past fifteen or twenty years this country has been largely controlled by railway companies, and I believe this parliament will make a fatal mistake if it fails to rectify the error at the earliest possible moment. I am here to plead in the interests of the people of Manitoba that this parliament shall not commit the grave error of handing over to the Canadian Pacific Railway that entire country.

In the Railway Committee I heard the argument used that this would give competition in railroads. Now, I believe just as firmly as I believe that I am on my feet, that the intention is that this railroad and this series of railroads shall be handed over entirely to the Canadian Pacific Railway within a very brief period. We have a Bill which will, no doubt, pass the Railway Committee at its next meeting, to give the Canadian Pacific Railway power to build another 500 or 600 miles of railroad in that country. The difficulty of the situation is this: Suppose the Northern Pacific, or the Mackenzie & Mann combination, or any other company which is ready to offer competition in that country, wishes to construct a line of railway; they find at once that this powerful corporation jumps into the breach and attempts to construct a road, thereby heading them off. No later than last year we witnessed the spectacle in the province of Manitoba of the Canadian Pacific Railway actually putting a gang of men to work at a point near Hartney simply because the Northern Pacific had started to build at that point, and in order to bluff the latter company from building its line. The committee will understand that while the traffic might be sufficient to sustain one railroad in a certain section of that country, it certainly would not be sufficient at the present time to sustain a second one running parallel to and close beside it. And that is one of the reasons why I am on my feet at the present time to discuss this question, as to granting of such unlimited powers. In the Railway Committee, the other day, I suggested that this company should not be allowed to amalgamate or dispose of its interests, to the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to any other railway in the country, and I propose, while this Bill is under consideration, to move an amendment on that line. At the right time, as the clauses of the Bill are discussed, I propose to move amendments, one especially, with respect to the bonding of the railway company. You will probably remember, Sir, if you were present in the committee, that we had an interesting discussion in reference to the bonding powers of railways generally. There seems to have never been laid down any definite rule in this House, and this House has nothing to guide it in regard to the amount of fixed charges which should be allowed to a railway company. I believe I could prove, if I set myself about to procure evidence, that a line of railway can be built on prairie ground, in Manitoba or in the North-west Territories, at something like $7,000 or $8,000 per mile. If that be so, why should we allow railway companies to have unlimited bonding powers and unlimited stocking powers? Let us take, for instance, the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We allowed that railway company to stock to the amount of $65,000,000. Now, I am informed, and verily believe that not more than $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 of that vast amount of money actually went into the construction of the railway. What was done with it? I will tell you. I quoted on the floor of this House last session, a statement, which exists in the sessional papers at the present time, showing that a vast amount of this stock was distributed amongst the promoters of the railway themselves, who received it at the rate of 25 cents on the dollar, and that in five years, these gentlemen, who had distributed this stock to themselves, at 25 cents on the dollar, received, in dividends, 20 per cent more than they had paid for their stock, and that they paid themselves

6 per cent on the par value of the stock, or 24 per cent on the actual amount they paid for this stock. That is an absolute outrage, because it means that the people are taxed for all time in high freight rates in order to pay interest on a vast amount of money that never went into the road, and which should not form a charge thereon. Unless this House limits the fixed charges on these railways, how are we ever going to be able to secure reasonable freight rates? How are we going to be able to control freight rates on any railway unless this parliament sees to it that the fixed charges do not exceed the actual, or almost the actual cost of the railway? It is for that purpose that I propose, later on, to move an amendment to reduce the bonding privileges to an amount which will, certainly, be almost within the actual cost of the railway. Why should promoters of railway companies secure the power from this parliament to bond their railway for two or three times the amount that the railway actually costs? What is the result? When the cost of the railway is paid, the balance of this vast amount of money, that we enable them to raise in this way, is put into their own pockets, and it is no wonder, as I said in the Railway Committee, the other day, that we make millionaires and peers of the realm who are able to live in their palaces in the old land, while those who pay for it are obliged to wrestle with exorbitant freight rates.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I know that the House does not share my opinion as to the importance of the question raised by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), as regards the over-capitalization of railways. The question may not be as important as I think it is, but in my judgment it is as important as the editorials in La Patrie—yes, I may say, as important as the gerrymander Bill of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), by which he would trample down the principle of representation by population. This House has time to spare, I might say, time to waste, in discussing the editorial articles in La Patrie, or in trying to further the hon. Postmaster General's designs, for carving up the province of Ontario. The House has given little time to this all important question of over-capitalization of railways. I am speaking as an Eastern Canadian, and, so far as my voice can carry, I want the people of the west to understand that there are people in Ontario, yes, people in Toronto, who are entirely out of sympathy with this system of allowing roads built in Manitoba and the west, to be bonded for three and four times their cost. It is an outrage that the Railway Committee should serve continually as the well-meaning accomplice in a crime against either the widow or the orphan into whose hands the bonds may fall, or against the people who will be bled for freight and passenger rates, high enough to pay interest on the watered stock. If this parliament once permits bonds to be issued to a value far exceeding the cost of the road, future parliaments will not be able to reduce freight rates below a point which will pay interest on the bonds purchased in good faith. The question of the innocent third party comes in. The people who buy bonds issued by the authority of this parliament, have a good case against a proposal to reduce freight rates. The people who supply this road with this traffic also have a good case, because, like practically all railways in Canada, this line will be built without cost to its promoters. I say that the question raised in this Bill, is a big question, worthy more attention than it gets from the leaders on either side of this House. The government of all the talents which sits on the other side of the House ought to be able to devise something better than this rule of thumb method of fixing the bonding powers to be granted to a railway company. I know that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), is very ready with his promises. Whenever the hon. member for Lisgar, or the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), urges the Railway Committee to insert a specific safeguard in a specific Bill, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals suggests that the end can be reached by a change in the general law. The hon. minister helps the chairman of the Railway Committee, and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), to jump on every proposal for an immediate reform. They hit the people of the west with a club; the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals hits them with gold bricks. The effect is the same in each case. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is always making large promises of improvements in the general Railway Act, but the general Railway Act is still doing business at the old stand, and Canada is as far as it ever was from having a government which will provide that railways built largely, if not wholly, at the public cost, shall be honestly capitalized in justice to the people who must be dependent on these lines.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman, I think the statements made by the two former speakers will find a ready echo throughout the provinces of this Dominion, and they will receive more consideration than they have heretofore received. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that in this, the country has been going in the wrong direction. In the opening up of the country, and for the building of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, inducements had to be offered, because our country had to be opened up. The government of the late hon. Alexander Mackenzie had spent thousands of dollars in advertising and in trying to get capitalists to put their money into this great enterprise, and to build this great railway from one ocean to the other, which was essential to the integrity of the Dominion. It was a work of immediate and urgent necessity, and the government which succeeded that of Mr. Mackenzie, I think, made an admirable bargain, taking the circumstances into consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, these hon. gentlemen who say 'Oh, oh,' had five years of power in which they tried to make a better bargain, but they had to declare themselves utterly and hopelessly defeated in their project.

Mr. WOOD. I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will admit that if there was a much better offer made to the government at that time, then they would have accepted it?

Mr. WALLACE. I will admit that there was a much better offer made by a bogus corporation.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) to take his seat.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) raise a point of order?

Mr. WOOD. He says it was—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WOOD. I want to ask Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman want to make a point of order?

Mr. WOOD. I submit that the word 'bogus corporation' is not parliamentary.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will have to rule that the words 'bogus corporation' as used by the hon. member, is parliamentary.

Mr. WALLACE. I would be delighted to give the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) an opportunity to interrupt me, only that I am now talking serious business. I repeat that the offer to which the hon. gentleman refers was a bogus offer, made by a bogus corporation, for political purposes only. Why, Sir, these very men had spent $12,000 advertising in various papers of this country and in the old country for people to make a proposal for the construction of this road. Then, Sir, after infinite pains, the government had made a bargain and induced a syndicate of competent men to come along and make an offer. After that was done then came along a number of gentlemen most of them without any experience and made an offer which they knew the government could not accept. It is true that Mr. Gibson, of New Brunswick, was in it, and that he consented to put his name to it. I speak of the president of the road, Mr. H. S. Howland, with great respect. He had no knowledge of the building of railways, he had no opportunity of knowing what the enterprise was that he was to be engaged in. Besides that, I am not saying now anything but what every one knows, when I say that he had no money to put in the enterprise. They knew they could not get the contract. What results would have followed if the government had gone in with the bogus company which my hon. friend thinks was all right? The result would be an indefinite prolongation of the time for the construction of the road, and it would have entailed, as we know, serious disasters on the country, as well as the contractor for that road. At a time the best conditions that could be made were made.

Mr. DOMVILLE. What has that to do with this?

Mr. WALLACE. I will tell you. While in the early days the road was a necessity for the maintenance of confederation, for the development of the North-west, for the sending of the sons of our own country out there instead of allowing them to go to a foreign country, we might have made an admirable bargain. But, Sir, the conditions have all changed and a good plan twenty years ago is not a plan that we may be able to commend to-day. This country finds itself drifting into granting enormous bonuses for railways. We find ourselves giving them large grants of land and permitting them to have bonding powers, two or three times the value of the cost of the construction of the road. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) says, and I have no doubt he is right, that railways can be constructed through the prairie country of Manitoba and the North-west Territories at from $7,000 to $8,000 per mile. Well, Sir, I say it is utterly indefensible to give these companies the power to bond these roads for two or three times that value, and, as well, to give them subsidies by the Dominion and local governments for a large portion of the cost so that the promoters of the road do not pay one dollar of their own money for its construction. That is the kind of proposal we have perpetuated in this Bill. This road goes pretty near everywhere. They say there is going to be competition. We have been proposing amendments to these various railway Bills as they come before us from time to time, and we have been met by the statement from the Minister of Railways that he was desirous that we should not press these amendments, because he thought it would be better that they should be incorporated in a General Railway Act applying to all railways, which he promised to have passed. We recognized the fairness of that proposition, and so the several amendments which were considered desirable to these railway Bills were not pressed. We accepted the promises of the minister that he would incorporate such amendments in a General Railway Act, so as to make them applicable to all railway corporations. He has made these promises but he has not fulfilled them. Year after year we have been treated in the same way, the Minister telling us that these amendments would be incorporated in a General Railway Act, but he has never yet implemented these promises.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to specify the particular terms to which he alludes, and when they were made.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) made promises last session and the session before, and I would like to know when these promises will be supplemented. Now, about that railway we were talking about, it proposes to go almost anywhere, and this charter gives it power to go anywhere it likes. More than that, when was this charter first granted?

An hon. MEMBER. 1890.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, and ten years afterwards we have a proposal to extend this time limit. I might say that this speculative charter might be for the purpose of putting pressure on the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I do not know. But I do say, that a railway that has had a charter for ten years, and an amendment which extends its charter three years more from the first of November next, meaning four seasons of construction, I say that that is something that we should not tolerate. The railways of this country should be commercial enterprises, built because there is a necessity for them, and because there is a reasonable hope of returns being received, and no man should put a dollar in them without reasonable hope of having it returned. They should not be built for speculation, getting subsidies from the Dominion and subsidies from the provinces, and floating bonds, and as we know in the case of the Dauphin Railway, getting a railway that does not cost the promoters one dollar. We know that certain railways have got thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, and we know that they have been able to distribute back portions of that enormous amount which they have received for construction.

Mr. DAVIS. Who gave them the land?

Mr. WALLACE. The Dominion government gave them the land, and the giving of the land at that time was something that was perhaps to be commended; but the first subsidy given to them is no justification for the subsequent subsidies and the guarantees given by the Manitoba government which enabled them to reap the enormous benefits and advantages to which I have alluded.

Mr. DAVIS. The difference between the Manitoba government and the other government is that it did not cost the Manitoba government a cent, while your government gave away the land.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman cannot keep quiet. The giving of the first subsidy was perhaps a commendable act; but the giving of the second subsidy by the Manitoba government, knowing that the first subsidy had been given, was not a commendable or justifiable act. That was boodling; and we know that the Manitoba government got part of the assets back, and that these same gentlemen were in the last elections with their money-bags, assisting the Manitoba government to retain power against the will of the people. It is time that a stop is put to these proceedings, and that this parliament comes down to business principles, and says that railroads shall have to be justified by commercial necessity, that they will have largely to use their own money, that they cannot come on the Dominion or on the provinces either for large subsidies of land or money. It is time that we had a firmer grip upon, and a fuller control over these railways. We have the Railway Act, which we can amend, and we shall do no injustice to any railway company by so amending it as to control the freight rates of all the railways of this country, and show them that it is the people who are ruling the country and not the railways.

Mr. WOOD. I shall occupy the time of the House only for a moment to correct one of the wild statements made by the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) who has just taken his seat. It is not new to hear these wild and extravagant remarks from that hon. gentleman; that is his usual practice. He imagines when he is addressing this House that he is addressing some of the clubs in the country to which he is accustomed. The members of this House and the people of this country are better informed than he thinks they are. The statement which he makes that the company that offered to build the Canadian Pacific Railway for a much smaller sum than was paid to the company who got the contract was a bogus company, is a statement unworthy of any hon. member of this House. There was an endorsed check for $1,500,000 placed at the disposal of the government by that company; and the hon. gentleman has the temerity to suggest that such men as William Hendrie, of Hamilton, one of the leading Conservatives of this country, and Edward Gurney, of Hamilton, another leading Conservative, would be connected with a bogus company. Now, Mr. Chairman, the statement I make here I make because I know the facts. I had the honour of being connected with the company myself, I contributed a small portion of the money, and I can say that the money that was placed at the disposal of the government was solid, hard cash, and that there were no bonds or anything of that kind.

Mr. WALLACE. Who provided it ?

Mr. WOOD. Men provided it who were able to do so, and I say it is unworthy of the hon. gentleman to say that leading Conservatives as well as leading Liberals composed a bogus company for the purpose of preventing the building of that road. I have simply to say that the statement is not true and never was true.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Some reference has been made to myself personally by both the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Both of these gentlemen have felt that it was germane to the question under discussion that they should make an attack upon me and express the opinion that it was my duty to have implemented the many promises which they allege I made last session and the session before with respect to the introduction of railway legislation of the class they refer to. Now, I presume that both of these gentlemen imagined that they had some foundation upon which to rest that complaint, and I take it that they would not be unwilling to give us the grounds upon which they rely. I extended an invitation to the hon. member for West York to say upon what occasion I had made any of the promises he refers to, and I ask him to give the committee some little idea of what these promises were. The hon. gentleman was unable to support his allegation. He was unable to tell either the nature of the promises or any of them, or the occasion when any of the promises were made. Now, I am entirely unable myself to recall what the hon. gentlemen, either of them, can allude to. Certainly, I have no recollection of having made any explicit statement, or even any general statement, with regard to the proposed legislation beyond that which was introduced last year, and to which I made a very vain and unsuccessful effort to overcome the opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, or some of them at least, in order to secure its passage. Let me add that I cannot exactly see the point of the observations of either of the hon. gentlemen. They have made no suggestions to the committee. I doubt if either of them was present when this Bill was under consideration by the railway committee. If they had been there, they would have heard a discussion upon the question of the amount of bonds and stock that it would be proper for parliament to authorize this company to issue. They would have heard suggestions as to the amount made both by myself and by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). They would have heard the hon. member for Lisgar express his willingness to make the amount of stock and bonds larger than what even I had suggested; and it is very difficult for me to understand just at this juncture the point of the complaints which the hon. members are making, after having before the Railway Committee given their full assent to the figures which were finally adopted by the committee. I cannot myself see the point of it at all; there may be some point in it, but it is certainly obscure.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. minister permit me to say a word? The hon. minister says that I expressed a willingness to go beyond the figure he suggested. I think he misunderstood me. My own opinion was this, that the figure he named was sufficient, and I intended to contend for that, but the committee decided to increase it to $15,000. I make this statement because I intend to move that the amount be reduced to the figure the hon. minister suggested.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The amount I suggested was $12,500 a mile, but $15,000 a mile was the amount finally agreed upon. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen, when this matter comes before parliament, to pose as defenders and protectors of public rights and interests, but they are making a very sorry exhibition after all, and I doubt whether there are any people in the country who can be gulled, to any appreciable extent, by such pretensions. These gentlemen were members of the Railway committee, and if they held these very strong views with regard to bonding powers, why did they not attend the meetings of the committee and urge their views upon it. Had they done so, it would be proper for them now to ask this House to revise the action of the committee, but they did not.

I am open to no charge in this connection. No doubt I am amenable to many, for I do not mean to say that I have discharged my full duty as a member of this parliament, but I am not open to the charge these gentlemen have made. I am not open to a charge of an indisposition to scan closely and give the benefit of my voice and vote towards restraining corporations and keeping them within reasonable and proper limits. I do not assent to the proposition that railways can be built and equipped in any part of the country for $6,000 or $7,000 a mile. It is perfectly absurd to name any such figure. We know that to-day it would cost more than half that amount to rail one of these roads. These hon. gentlemen make no provision for equipment or bridges and for making the roadbed and all the other necessary work. I thought that $12,500 a mile was enough to allow this company to issue bonds for, and I do not think it is an excessive amount. If you wish to have railways built in this country, you have to allow a little consideration over and above the actual amount it costs, because these small roads cannot sell their bonds at figures which will yield par or anything like it. All these undertakings have to be helped forward or else we will not have them at all, and there is nothing more essential for the proper development of this country than to encourage within reasonable bounds, the building of railways.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has not quite stated the case correctly. He says that you cannot build a railway through this country for $6,000 or $7,000 per mile. Nobody said you could. What I particularly referred to, was the building of railways through a prairie country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I wished my remarks to apply to a prairie country.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. minister said $6,000 or $7,000, but our figures were $7,000 or $8,000, and we were talking of building railways through a prairie country. It is true that the price of steel rails has gone up, but I am speaking of the past.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And we are dealing with the present and future.

Mr. WALLACE. But these gentlemen were dealing with the past, when steel rails were bought in this country for $19 per ton, the lowest rate, I suppose that steel rails were ever purchased for. The hon. gentleman has challenged us to say what promises he has made and not fulfilled. One which occurs to me, was his promise, when we had the question of the location of railway stations before the Railway Committee, to provide for that in a General Act. Has he done so?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Will you allow me to answer the question?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, but not to make a speech.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I made every effort it was possible for a member of parliament, to carry out that promise, for I pressed the Bill down to the last moment, and it was only defeated by the strenuous opposition of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. WALLACE. Then where is the Minister of Railways and Canals, leading this

Mr. BLAIR.

House in railway legislation? He is directed by the opposition, and the leader of the opposition is the one who leads the House and the Minister of Railways and Canals is helpless. I think if I were placed in that position, I would resign. If I had lost the confidence of the House, I would resign. The hon. minister tells us that he proposed something of an important character and that the leader of the opposition killed the Bill. A nice Minister of Railways and Canals, and a nice government we have to-day! He challenged this side to name a single thing—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do, and you have not made good the challenge.

Mr. WALLACE. And, he was not aware that we knew he had made this promise, and had failed to carry it out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Did you help me to carry it out?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You did?

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. minister said, we should have attended the meetings of the Railway Committee. I can tell the hon. gentleman, that no member has attended those meetings of the Railway Committee more regularly, than I, except the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). I did not attend the last meeting, because I was unable through illness, but I believe that was the first meeting of the Railway Committee I was absent from, for several years. I was there and expressed my views, and the hon. minister cannot lecture me at any rate.

One instance I have given, and I can give other instances of promises the hon. minister has made and succeeded in evading. Why, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) had a Bill with regard to drainage under railways, and the Minister of Railways and Canals was in a dilemma. He wanted to defeat the Bill, but was afraid to openly come out against it, so he selected two members of the House, who, in the exercise of their judgment, had previously condemned the Bill, and who were Conservatives, and put them on a select committee of five members, the other three of which were Liberals. He appointed these two gentlemen, knowing that they would take the same position on a special committee, as they did in the House, and would only require the assistance of one Liberal member to kill the Bill, which would enable the hon. minister to say: I was in favour of the Bill, and did my best for it, but there were two Conservatives on the committee, who killed it. Just as he tells us to-night that the leader of the opposition killed his well-meant efforts to get good legislation through this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He took advantage of the lateness of the session to kill it.

Mr. WALLACE. The session is never concluded until the government's business is done. There is no end to the session so long as there is business to be done. And a government that is in earnest, and has its business ready, can control the House, but the Minister of Railways and Canals, according to his own statement had lost the control and confidence of the House. He could not get his legislation through. They have a majority of fifty on that side, they say, but notwithstanding this majority he could not get his Bill through this House. If it had been a government deal for millions—a Yukon deal, a Rainy River deal, a Drummond County deal, there would have been no difficulty in getting his supporters to rally as one man and carry it through the House by a triumphant majority. But with good legislation it is different. The hon. minister says: I was so desirous of getting it through, but the wicked leader of the opposition would not let me; he got up and spoke against it and the Bill had to go to eternal smash. What a confession to make. Then he challenges anybody. We will have another list, I hope, of things he has promised in the railway committee and elsewhere, when he said he was going to legislate on certain lines, and he was going to carry certain measures through the House. Even on this Bill, I am told, the proposal was made that a general Act would do the whole thing, that it was better to have a general Act than an amendment to one railway charter—and the thing was disposed of. And so the old game goes on. The Minister of Railways and Canals is claiming all the virtues and accomplishments; and when he cannot do anything he turns around and blames somebody else, and declines to assume the responsibility for himself.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I desire to say just one word. The committee will have noticed that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) following in the footsteps of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross-Robertson) charged me with having made various promises of legislation in amendment to the Railway Act. When I called on the hon. member for East Toronto to tell the nature of the promises, and when they were made, the hon. gentleman was silent. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) becomes coached in the meanwhile, and when I resume my seat he gets up and says that the minister made a pledge that he would amend the Railway Act with regard to the authority to control the locations of stations. When I point out—

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. minister allow me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The time for Private Bills having expired, I leave the Chair.

PRIVILEGE—PARAGRAPH IN WINNIPEG FREE PRESS.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a brief personal explanation. I received from Winnipeg to-day the following telegram:

Winnipeg, March 7.

R. L. Richardson, M.P., Ottawa:

The 'Free Press' Ottawa special to-day says, under the heading 'Represents Railways': 'Mr. Richardson, M.P., appears before the committee as a special pleader for corporations.'

The article then reads as follows:—

'Mr. Richardson reported that he was there in the interest of the railway companies, so that no more roads would be built than would pay the companies for building them. He said that he had letters from the Northern Pacific and Mackenzie & Mann opposing the Bill on the grounds that there were enough roads in Manitoba now.'

To that I give an absolute and unqualified denial. I did not say that I was there as a pleader for railroads, and I am sure that any reasonable man who was present in that committee would not hesitate for a moment to say that this is an entire misrepresentation of the position I took in that committee. I never said I had received a letter from the Northern Pacific or Mackenzie & Mann, or any one else in regard to the construction of railroads. I was seconding a motion of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), who asked that a map should be placed before the railway committee in order that the members might see where these different railroads that were asked for in the charter ran. In urging that the map should be provided, I made the point that it was desirable that the committee should see whether any of the lines asked for interfered with existing lines, or whether they ran so close to those lines as, in a measure, to destroy the value of existing property. I think that no man who has watched my course on the railway question in this parliament, would think, for a moment, that I have ever been a special pleader for railway corporations.

Mr. BERGERON. What paper is that from?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Free Press of Winnipeg, a paper which has practically become a by-word in that county as being the organ of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so, the object of this paper in attempting to discredit me will be understood by members of the House.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION TO THE SEABOARD.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bennett :

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to take a definite line of action with regard to the question of transportation of the grain and other commodities of the North-west Territories, Manitoba and the United States, with a view of centreing the same to the greatest possible extent in Canadian channels.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). In continuing this debate, I propose briefly to deal with the various routes which we are now using and the requirements of those routes, the proposed routes which may take the place of those now in use, and the necessities of them to facilitate the transportation of our goods from the west to the east. I am quite sure that you, Mr. Speaker, and the House will agree with me, as does the country, that transportation of our produce from the west to the east by the cheapest possible route and by the most expeditious way is one of the important requirements of the country to-day. For, in proportion as we can reduce the cost of transportation we give a larger profit to the producers of the goods and reduce the cost to the consumer as well. We have for a long time been struggling with this important question, and very heavy expenditures have taken place in the country for the purpose of improving our means of transport. Up to the present time we have spent on our canals $70,750,000, for the purpose of enabling the transportation of our produce to be carried on cheaply and expeditiously, and we have also spent $139,000,000 upon our railways largely for the same purpose. It is true that a very considerable proportion of this expenditure was not incurred for the purpose of making lines between here and the west, but a very considerable proportion of it was used for that purpose. The question at the present time is, what routes shall we use, or what routes have we that we may use? We have, at present, at least, two alternative systems of highways, and we can fairly draw comparisons between these two. It might be in the interest of the country that we should use both of these, or it might be that we should direct our attention particularly towards improving the one without making a large expenditure on the other. But we have looming up at the present time a third alternative route which is claiming a share of the attention of this House and of the country; and it will be my purpose to inquire for a short time which of these should receive the most attention at our hands. We have first what is called the alternative route of the all-water routes by the lakes and by the St. Lawrence, coming through the Welland Canal down the St. Lawrence River to

Mr. RICHARDSON.

Montreal, and thence to the seaboard. We have the all-water route that is proposed by the Georgian Bay, or the Ottawa and Montreal Ship Canal. I would like to say one word with regard to this, because I consider it a misnomer to call a canal a ship canal that only proposes to give 14 feet of water, because no ship could be navigated in that depth of water. The question is whether we will take that route up or not, whether it will be preferable to do so considering the large expenditure that would be required to make it available; or whether we should direct our attention to any other line. The second one is a water route by the lakes and thence part of the way by railway. We have at the present time a number of lines of railways extending to the Georgian Bay all competing for this trade. We have the advantage of a considerable strip of water from the Georgian Bay to Port Arthur on Lake Superior, and to Duluth and Chicago, and to all the western ports for the purpose of handling not only the trade of our own western country but that of the United States as well. Now, the question for us to consider is which one of these routes will we take up and improve and make useful for our ends. Then the last one is the all-water route by way of the Georgian Bay, which is called the Georgian Bay and Ottawa Ship Canal.

Let me make a comparison of these various routes in distance and in cheapness. If you did not take the trouble to look it up you might be inclined to think there was a considerable substantial advantage in distance in favour of the Georgian Bay route by what is called the Georgian Bay Ship Canal. We were told the other night by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Poupore) that this route has an advantage over all the others of several hundred miles. He says :

Certainly five or six hundred miles shorter than by any other Canadian route between these two points, that of the west and of the east.

Now, if that be a fact it would be a substantial advantage. But I have taken a little trouble to look up the records so as to satisfy myself how far that is the fact. This question was discussed a few years ago in the Senate, and we have the records of the engineers who have taken the trouble to go over the route, in a comparatively perfunctory way, I presume; but at least they made the measurements so as to establish the advantages of that route over the other. Now, what do we find? Instead of that route giving an advantage, as the member for Pontiac said, of some 500 or 600 miles from Chicago to Montreal, I see that this map gives it as 340 miles only. From Chicago to Montreal is 950 miles. By the Welland Canal from Chicago to Montreal the distance is 1,290 miles, or a difference in favour of this route of 840 miles. From Duluth to Montreal is 1,050 miles by way of the canal, and by way of the St. Lawrence it is 1,390 miles, or a difference of 340 miles. From Port Huron to Montreal is 660 miles, and by way of the St. Lawrence route it is 700 miles, showing a difference in favour of the Georgian Bay route of only 40 miles. I give these figures because I believe them to be as nearly accurate as any figures that are available to-day. I take the other map which is before me, and I find that it corresponds exactly with that. I wish to draw the attention of the House to that in order to show that there is not a great advantage in this route over the others with regard to distance, and if any saving could be made in mileage, in proportion to the distance, it is comparatively a small saving.

Then again I will compare this route with the routes we have already. I said one of the alternative routes was the all-water route to the Georgian Bay and further eastwards by way of the various railways. We are carrying a large portion of our grain to-day by these same routes. I made a clipping from a very interesting article that I saw a short time ago, criticising these different routes, and which professed to give the distances between the various points, and so far as I had an opportunity to verify those figures, I believe them to be correct. What is the advantage in the proposed Georgian Bay Ship Canal over the other routes? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) told us that he intended to put an item in the estimates for the purpose of improving the French River, so that the navigation of the Georgian Bay might be extended 49 miles further down towards Montreal. I went into an inquiry as to what it would cost to make these improvements so as to make the navigation available for that purpose; and I found that in these 49 miles there must be at least three locks. There is a fall in that distance of 62 feet, which is a very substantial fall to overcome. These three locks with the improvement and deepening of the channel, I am told, would cost a very large amount of money. I have no sufficiently accurate data to enable me to estimate very closely what it would cost, but one engineer told me that it must cost somewhere from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000; another said more and another said a little less. But whether it is the larger or the smaller amount, at least it is a substantial amount. Now, I do not think that would be a sufficient reason why we should not take up that route, because if you bring navigation 49 miles further down towards Montreal it might be available for all time in the future, and there might be other considerations that will compensate for a portion of that outlay besides the advantage of the navigation. But I say we would have to spend a very substantial sum of money for that purpose, and after we had spent it what would we accomplish in the way of shortening the distance. The distance from Fort William to North Bay is 550 miles. It is also 550 miles from Fort William to Owen Sound; so you bring navigation no nearer this way from Fort William, whether you go by Owen Sound or by North Bay. The distance from North Bay to Montreal is 364 miles, making, in all, from Fort William to Montreal, 914 miles. Now, we incur this expenditure of $1,500,000 or $2,000,000 for making a route that is only 914 miles long when we already have a route by way of Parry Sound that is 907 miles long, or exactly seven miles shorter. I think the country will agree with me that it would not be the part of wisdom to incur such a large expenditure for such a doubtful return, because, if we cannot succeed in making the route shorter, we are not likely to reduce, very much, the cost of transportation, as compared with the other. But I may be told that you have an expenditure for one which is an all water route, and for the other, which is a part rail and a part water route, and that an all-water route is always cheaper for the transportation of grain than an all-rail route. What is the difference? When we have only 375 miles by one route, that by way of Parry Sound, and 364 miles by the other, it cannot cost much more for the transportation of grain when you have 375 miles as against 364 by way of the canal. Let us take the Midland route. From Port Arthur to North Bay, the distance is 550 miles, and from Port Arthur to Midland it is 574 miles. From Midland to Montreal the distance is 381 miles, so that the whole route from Port Arthur to Montreal, by way of Midland, is 955 miles, while by the Georgian Bay Canal it is 914 miles. Take the Owen Sound route, which is operated to-day, as are the routes by way of Midland and Parry Sound. From Port Arthur to Owen Sound the distance is 550 miles, from Owen Sound to Montreal 460 miles, or, in all, 1,010 miles, while the short route by way of North Bay is 914 miles, or a little less than 100 miles shorter. Take the Welland Canal route, and I find that it is 1,390 miles. If you go from Chicago by the Georgian Bay route the distance is 980 miles. It is no shorter than by the route from Port Arthur, or from Chicago by way of the Sault to Parry Sound, or from Chicago by way of the Georgian Bay to Midland and then to Montreal. So that, practically, there is very little difference between these routes at the present time. It may be said that we cannot successfully handle the products of our country by a water and rail route as successfully as by an all-water route. That may be so, but, it is a fact which cannot be denied, that we are handling the produce successfully to-day. In that connection the information given us by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) will be found in his answer to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who asked: How much grain was handled by these various routes? The answer was that, last year, 13,098,398 bushels of grain passed over the Parry Sound route. This route is the shortest of any one of the three, being 907 miles, while, as I have said, the Georgian Bay Canal route is 914 miles between the same points. Then, by the Midland route, which is 955 miles, we carried, last year, 11,258,144 bushels of grain, by the Owen Sound route we carried 2,674,202 bushels of grain, by the Goderich route we carried 2,131,557 bushels, by the Sarnia route 3,636,791 bushels, by the Collingwood route 560,000 bushels, making, in all, by the present routes, water and rail, 33,359,192 bushels, giving, as I say, the very strongest evidence that we are successful in handling the produce of our western country by the routes which we have, notwithstanding the very imperfect condition in which they are, and which might be very much improved by the expenditure of a little money. How much grain did we receive by water last year? I have shown the House that we carried by rail and water, part rail and part water, 33,000,000 bushels from the west, but we only carried by water 12,582,933 bushels. How much grain was received at Montreal last year by water and rail? 17,162,026 bushels. I give these figures to make a comparison between what can be done by our canals and done by our railways and waterways, combined so as to enable us to determine which class of route is the preferable one and which is the best for this country to support. Then, we have another very interesting question, and it is this: Why do we want these routes improved, and why do we want a shorter route. We want a shorter route for the purpose of attracting the trade that is going by way of the great cities of the United States, New York and Buffalo, to ocean navigation, and which is exported from the country in that direction. We want to attract that trade to Montreal. It has been very frequently discussed in this House and in the country, but never, in my judgment, has it been as plainly put before the House and the people as it was the other night by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart). He gave what, in my judgment, was data which enables us—and I am glad to say that after comparing the figures I find them correct—to estimate whether or not, as a great many people imagine, the large bulk of the western grain of Canada and the United States is exported out of the country by way of Buffalo and New York, instead of by way of the St. Lawrence Canals and Montreal. He gave the figures, which were somewhat startling, which were, nevertheless, correct, and which, in my judgment, are very important, because they give us information that we can get from no other source. It is said by a great many people that this grain goes by way of Buffalo and New York because the harbour of New York is better than the harbour of Montreal, and that, although the distance is greater from New York to Liverpool, grain can be carried more cheaply, because insurance rates are higher by way of Montreal, and that at New York they have better facilities for shipping than we have by way of our own city of Montreal. But, when we try to ascertain how much grain goes through that channel, we meet with the startling fact that there were only last year 18,970,646 bushels of wheat exported from the country by way of New York. How much was carried by way of Montreal? 17,162,000 bushels, and we may fairly assume that that went to Montreal for the purpose of being exported to Europe through that channel, the same as the other did from New York. Now, if that be a fact, and it is a fact, because it is taken from the trade and navigation returns of the United States, we cannot say, even with all the disadvantages under which we have been labouring with our routes, that we have been otherwise than fairly successful in competition with the routes through the United States. They were handling 17,000,000 bushels of grain through the port of Montreal for export, while they only handled 18,000,000 bushels of wheat through New York. But some will say, you only give wheat for New York, while you give all kinds of grain from Montreal, and if you take the export of wheat, barley, peas, and corn, you will find that from New York, there were 72,000,000 bushels exported in all. Through that port of New York, there was exported as well, 1,668,000 barrels of flour. If you convert that into wheat, it would represent 7,560,000 bushels of wheat, or in other words, New York exported wheat to the amount of 26,000,000 bushels, while in round numbers, we exported from Montreal 17,000,000. The comparison is a fair one, but at the same time it does not show so very much in favour of the port of New York. We will naturally be asked the question: What becomes of this grain which goes to Buffalo and New York? Well, it goes to supply the home consumption in the great cities of New York, Buffalo, Baltimore and Philadelphia, and other cities on the Atlantic coast, in the vicinity of which they are not producers of grain. They are consumers in these populous cities, and the home consumption absorbs a large percentage of the grain supplied by the Western States, as well as the grain that comes from Western Canada. It is not exported through these channels because of the advantage these cities have over other routes, but it is taken there because there is a demand for local consumption and so the surplus goes through these channels. It has been said that the grain is exported through these channels because of the cheaper transportation. Well, I think the transportation is about as cheap by way of Montreal from Port Arthur, Duluth or Chicago, as by way of Buffalo, and New York. It is at all events about as cheap, for some time to come, unless there is great improvement in the Erie Canal, or in the railways that carry the grain from Buffalo. It is carried now from these ports to New York, at about 3½ cents a bushel, and I am told it is carried from Port Arthur and Chicago to Montreal, at from between 3½ and 4 cents a bushel, and has been carried at that rate during the last season or the season before. If that be the fact, there is not so much difference in the price of carriage between the American and the Canadian route. I contend that with a little improvement on our present waterways, and with better facilities in our harbours like Montreal and Collingwood and Owen Sound, we can carry the grain as cheaply to the port of Montreal as they can carry it to the port of New York. I contend that we can successfully compete with them for that trade the moment our contemplated improvements are made. There is one substantial advantage the Americans have over us, that perhaps we cannot provide a remedy for, and that is, the fact that they have return cargoes in most of the lines imported for consumption on this continent. But, Sir, as the development of our east goes on, there is no doubt that we will be sending more of our manufactured goods to the western country.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is only a very small percentage.

Mr. SPROULE. I am very glad to hear that, because it is an important element in the consideration of the question before the House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I do not think it exceeds ten per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. Then it is so much more in our favour.

Mr. WOOD. Can you get the same rate of freight from Montreal, as you can from New York, for grain, to Liverpool or to London?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, you cannot.

Mr. SPROULE. I will deal with that question later. Perhaps you cannot get the same rate, but still there is a fairly good rate. As the development of the future goes on, and as the east develops, we will supply a larger quantity of the goods westward, and, therefore, we will get a return cargo for these vessels, and that will help reduce the freight rates. I believe, Sir, that when we improve our transportation facilities, as we propose to, we can carry the produce of the west quite as cheaply as they can from the port of New York at the present time, or as they are likely to be able to in the immediate future. It may be said that you cannot carry grain as cheaply by the railways as by the canals. It is my opinion, that as from year to year we improve our railways, putting on heavier rails, and drawing larger loads by heavier engines, we will be able in the future to carry freight on railways more cheaply than at present. I believe that the fact of there being several railway competitors for freight to the port of shipment, ensures that we shall have cheaper rates for our grain. I am, however, far from saying that it is not in the interests of the country, that we should have canals, because I believe that canals are the most successful competitors to railways, and so long as we have canals which give us competition during the season of navigation, we will at all events have active competition against the railways. For that reason I would advise the improvement of our canal system as rapidly as possible. I advocate this for the reason that I believe that canals will be valuable in the future for the purpose of affording competition, although I believe that in time to come, they will not be so valuable to the country generally, as they have been in the past. However, I believe that our waterway system will always be a great competitor, will always tend to reduce railway rates, and for that reason I am in favour of its development. Now, let me ask what are the improvements we should make? It seems to me there are certain improvements we should make, and that there is certain expenditure we might with safety incur. A beneficial expenditure might be made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), in improving our harbours on the Georgian Bay, for instance, because some of them at the present time are not available for the needs of the country. Take the harbours of Collingwood, Meaford, Owen Sound, Goderich, and others, and they ought to be improved, and improved at once, and I believe that a wise expenditure of public money in their improvement would give good results to the country. Well, Sir, in my opinion we should go further, and I say, that one of the great needs of the hour, is the improvement in facilities for transportation in the harbour of Montreal. One of the members from Huron gave us valuable information the other day in instituting a comparison between the cost of handling grain at Montreal and at Buffalo and New York. He told us that some of these vessels which were carrying thousands of tons of freight, were compelled to lie at Montreal for days, sometimes, before they could get their cargo unloaded; while if they went to Buffalo or New York, they could be unloaded in a few hours. That tells us in the most unmistakable language that it is the part of wisdom to direct our attention to the improvement of the shipping facilities of that harbour and the building of proper elevators. I am glad to know that the present government, through the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is endeavouring to do that, and I am quite sure that his course will be endorsed by the people of the country, although they sometimes do look with a little apprehension at what is being done, fearing that the contract that is being entered into may not contain sufficient safeguards to protect the rights of the people. They know that scaly transactions have sometimes taken place in the past, some are uncharitable enough to say at the hands of the Minister of Public Works, and therefore they are anxious that every necessary provision should be made in this transaction for safeguarding the interests of the people. I would not be so uncharitable as to say that he is not quite as anxious as we are that these safeguards should be provided. That is one of the urgent needs of the present time, because if vessels going to that port with full cargoes are detained there for hours or days before they can be unloaded, it is a very serious loss in the earning power of the vessels, and just as their earning power is reduced, they are compelled to put up the rates for handling the produce. Then, we require greater harbour facilities. I am glad to know that some efforts are being made in this direction, but I do not think the government are moving with the alacrity which the interests of the country demand, and it is necessary to spur them on. The harbour facilities at the port of Montreal are very inadequate compared with those of other ports. We require elevators at Montreal to handle the grain to advantage. We require greater facilities for shipping other lines of produce. I am speaking now particularly of grain, but I am told that the same argument applies to the shipping of butter, cheese, cattle and every other line of produce shipped through Montreal. We are very much behind the times. Great improvements are needed there, and the sooner we make them the better it will be for shippers, producers, and the country at large. It is our duty to direct our attention to the making of those improvements which we are able to make. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) mentioned another matter in which great improvement is needed; that is, the very heavy rates of insurance when shipping by the St. Lawrence from the ports of Montreal and Quebec. When he was speaking, the question suggested itself to my mind, how many of these disadvantages can we remedy by our own efforts and is it not our bounden duty to remedy such as we can at the earliest possible date? The hon. gentleman suggested what in my judgment was a remedy for that; that is, that we should become our own insurers, even though we should have to come to the government for assistance. In my judgment that is not an insurmountable problem, and it should be taken up at the earliest possible date.

Mr. DOBELL. May I say a word on the subject of insurance? I was told only yesterday by the Traffic Manager of the Canada Atlantic Railway, that if some change were not made in the insurance rates by the 1st of September of this year, they would not be able to carry any more grain to Montreal or Quebec, but would have to send it all to Boston. The rate up to the 1st of September from Montreal is more than three times the rate from Boston, and after that date it is five or six times the rate from Boston.

Mr. SPROULE. I thank the hon. gentleman for the information, which adds force to the argument which I have been presenting to the House. This is one of the things that we have in our own hands, and why should we sit idly by and see the trade of our country suffer when we can provide the remedy ourselves. The government may say, we are not in the insurance line. The government of a country ought to be any line by which they can help the people. They may say it is a difficult thing to do; but it is the duty of a government to surmount difficulties; it is for that they are elected, and a government that is not prepared to grapple with difficult problems because they are difficult is a government unworthy of this country. This is one of the difficulties we can remedy, and the government ought to direct their attention to it at the earliest possible date. Then, we can make improvements in other ways. I am told by those acquainted with the St. Lawrence that one of the causes of the high rates of insurance is the need of a better lighted channel, so that it can be safely navigated both by day and by night. This is one of the needs that can be supplied by the expenditure of money, and the government should direct their attention to that. I am also told that the St. Lawrence channel is very irregular and zig-zag, and that at many points it could be straightened; otherwise it is impossible for vessels to navigate it at the speed at which they should travel. This is one of the things that can also be remedied by the expenditure of a little money. The government may say, we are spending money every year in the widening and the deepening of our canals. I know they are, and they deserve credit for all they are doing. I only call attention to these things so that the government may be spurred on to do what can be done by using a little more energy and spending a little more money. If we reduce the cost of insurance, enlarge and straighten our channels, and increase our harbour facilities, then and then only will it be possible to transport the produce from the west to the east at the minimum cost. But we are confronted to-day with another proposal, to which we are asked to give our grave attention, that is, the Georgian Bay Ship Canal. I do not wish to be too hard on this project, which has been before this House for a long time, because if that canal were built there would be substantial merit in it.

Not altogether for transportation, because I do not think there is so very much in it over our present routes, but there would be a substantial merit in the water power that could be developed for the purpose of generating electricity and of being used in a thousand different ways for the advantage of the people. But it must not be forgotten that we have already spent large sums on our canals. We have already spent $70,750,000 in building and improving our canals, and we are face to face now with the project of building the Georgian Bay Ship Canal. We are asked to take up that scheme, but before doing so we ought to inquire whether it is worth the money it will cost. We do not know what the cost will be, because we have no correct data to go by, but we do know that the promoters of that scheme made a proposal last year that the government should guarantee 2½ per cent interest upon $25,000,000 of bonds for twenty-five years.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The gentlemen who are promoting that undertaking have found it necessary to revise their figures to such an extent as to increase the amount of bonds they would have to issue, and they ask the government to guarantee them to the extent of $35,000,000, reducing the number of years to twenty.

Mr. SPROULE. I was about to mention that. The proposal I have given was the one they made last year, but I see by a newspaper called The Events, which is inspired, no doubt, either by the hon. member from Pontiac or the gentleman who has this scheme under his control, that they have increased their demand, and now want $35,000,000 of bonds guaranteed at 2½ per cent. That means a very large annual expenditure, and it is only guess work. It is held by some fairly good judges that even that large amount will not build the canal. The question is, would we be justified in beginning an undertaking which will involve such a heavy expenditure? In my judgment, with the other indebtedness we have on our hands to-day, we would not. We must not forget that we have various other routes which require only a small expenditure to enable them to be successful competitors with this route, as they would carry the grain nearly, if not as cheap. It may sound big to call this Georgian Bay route the ship canal, but a ship canal with only fourteen feet of water is not entitled to the name.

There are besides many short lines of railways that require to be built, and which are knocking at our doors for government aid. These roads are wanted in districts where there are no railway facilities; and if we spend the money in furnishing railway facilities to the people in these remote sections, we cannot have it to spend on this canal.

I am far from saying that if this canal were built, it would not be a valuable highway of commerce and give considerable returns, but I do not think the returns would compensate us for the heavy outlay. No doubt the time will come when we will take up that scheme, but I do not think there is sufficient demand to warrant our incurring the expenditure to-day. We have now a number of routes competing for the same trade. We have the lakes and the St. Lawrence route through the Welland and other canals. We have the water route to Owen Sound, and thence eastward by rail. We have the water route to Midland, and thence eastward by rail. We have the water route to Parry Sound and eastward by rail—the water route to Goderich and eastward by rail, and also to Sarnia and by rail east and to Meaford and Collingwood. All these routes are complete, with the exception of certain improvements that require to be made in the harbours of Collingwood and Meaford, and they are all carrying the trade at present. It only requires a small outlay of money to improve these routes so that they will be available and valuable for the successful carrying on of the trade.

The Minister of Public Works wants to improve Port Colborne harbour. No doubt that harbour will be of more value, if improved, but I do not think that the necessities are so great as to justify the heavy outlay its improvement and the building of an elevator will involve. Some say the expenditure will amount to $1,500,000, others $2,000,000, and others $5,000,000 to do the work properly. While we have these other routes, I do not think we would be justified in spending this large amount in improving the harbour of Port Colborne and building an elevator. The large bulk of our grain in the future would be carried by Georgian Bay, and then by railways eastward instead of through the Welland Canal. If there were any obstacle which could not be overcome in any other way, we might be justified in spending $2,000,000 for the purpose of improving Port Colborne harbour and building an elevator, but we have been told by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid), a man who is in the business, that at present the facilities for transshipment at Buffalo give all the advantages we could have at Port Colborne, even after the expenditure we are asked to make. If we desire to discharge the grain from large vessels into smaller ones, we need only go twenty miles across the lake to have the best facilities for handling the grain in the cheapest and quickest way. It can there be put into the elevator and thence into small boats which can go down the Welland Canal and carry it down the St. Lawrence just as it could be done if we had a harbour at Port Colborne. So that we can take advantage of the harbour. Though it may not be in our own country, it is so close to us that it enables us to control the transportation of the produce as well, or nearly as well, as though we had made that heavy expenditure on Port Colborne, built the elevators there and provided the other equipment for that harbour. I do not wish to be understood as being entirely against improving Port Colborne harbour. I am against it to this extent—that the heavy outlay necessary to make the improvements would not bring an adequate return over what we should gain with the facilities that we have at the present time, nor would it result, to any considerable extent, in cheapening the cost of transportation, or helping to carry it on more successfully than we are doing at the present time. Nor do I think we should be justified, as I said before, in building the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. That is too large an undertaking. No doubt, it will be built some time in the future, when our finances are all that could be desired. They are not bad at the present time, but there are demands upon our resources for work that is immediately more important and that will give a larger return than would be gained by money expended in the building of that canal.

To conclude—in my judgment, what we ought to do is, as far as possible, to perfect the St. Lawrence route. We are doing that now by building our canals and deepening them. We ought to perfect the route as much as possible by straightening and deepening the channels, improving the lighting and making other facilities for navigation better than are now provided. We should reduce the cost of insurance, which can, I believe, be done; build the elevators at Montreal, improve that harbour, and make facilities for transportation better. Doing this, you will do what, in my judgment, should be done in the interest of the country, leaving these very heavy undertakings until a future time. When these things are accomplished, we shall have accomplished what we can to improve the means of transporting our produce from the west to the east and vice versa. We shall then be able to transport goods at a cheaper rate than we can to-day, and shall compete successfully with the routes now carrying grain to Buffalo and New York. I say when it is looked into carefully, the competition we now offer to Buffalo and New York is very fair and commendable, notwithstanding the imperfect conditions under which we are labouring at the present time. When the improvements I speak of are made we shall compete much more successfully, we shall do what the country expect of us in bringing about the greatest good by the smallest expenditure of money and enable the people to carry on the transport of the country through our own channels to the seaboard and thence to Europe, where the most of what we export is consumed.

Mr. J. H. BELL (East Prince, P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) who has just taken his seat, has advised the government to spend a large amount of money upon the equipment and maintenance of the canal system. The other evening we had the pleasure of listening to an admirable address from the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) who gave the government advice along the same line. He advocated the spending of from one to twenty millions upon Port Colborne, five millions or so upon Montreal, and a number of scattered millions upon the route from Port Arthur to Quebec. Now, I need hardly say that the people of the province that I represent look with suspicion, I may say with alarm, upon such proposed expenditures. There are two reasons for this. One is that, owing to our isolated position, we do not and cannot possibly derive any direct benefit from that expenditure. The other reason, and the main one, is that when we entered confederation, it was understood and agreed that $25,000,000 only was to be expended on the completion of the canals; and our provincial debt,—the amount that was placed to our credit, was calculated and settled upon that basis. The people of Prince Edward Island naturally say: If you expend now $10,000,000 more upon canals, the result is that we in Prince Edward Island have to contribute, say, one-fortieth of the amount or about $250,000. The people of Prince Edward Island consider that a violation of the terms of union. We, of course, cannot expect to stop the wheels of progress for Canada; but if the government of Canada persists in spending large sums upon canals against our protest, we ought to receive some equivalent in lieu of that expenditure. We have necessities in Prince Edward Island that require to be provided for. We require piers along our shores, breakwaters for our harbours, dredging in our ports; and I trust that when these matters come up for consideration, this proposed expenditure on canals will be taken into account, and that the government will be prepared to do justice to us in Prince Edward Island. I hold in my hand the report of the commission on canals for the state of New York, issued about one month ago. In that report there is a proposition to spend $63,000,000 upon the canal system of the State of New York; and the commission recommends that that expenditure shall be assessed, not against the state of New York as a whole, but against those counties of the state of New York that derive special benefit from the expenditure. If such a recommendation is deemed just and expedient in regard to the counties of the state of New York, the argument is much stronger when applied to the isolated position of Prince Edward Island. If the principle which is recommended by the commission were applied to Canada, the expenditure proposed for our canals would fall, not upon Canada as a whole, but the largest percentage of it would fall upon the province of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, that will receive the largest share of the benefits. These, by reason of the deepening and equipment of the canals will receive benefit in the shape of two cents or more per bushel upon every bushel of grain that they export; they will receive corresponding benefit in the shape of a diminution in the freight rates of goods that they import. The next largest percentage of expenditure would fall to Quebec and Ontario. They will derive a benefit from the carrying trade that will be largely in their hands, their cities will be built up on the course of the water route, a large number of their people will be engaged in the transportation of grain. The least percentage of assessment would fall to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but no portion should fall upon the province of Prince Edward Island.

But Prince Edward Island, having joined the confederation, we must needs look at this question not alone from a provincial standpoint. We have to look at it from a national standpoint. And so regarding it, there are two facts that press themselves upon our attention. The first is that we have expended seventy million dollars upon our canal system. That canal system is now one of the main assets of Canada, and it is the manifest duty of the government to protect that asset, to preserve it for the benefit of the present and future generations, and to preserve it in a reasonable state of efficiency. There is another fact to be kept in mind. We are side by side with the people of the United States, we are rivals of theirs, and they are rivals of ours. We are both seeking for the larger share of the carrying trade of the great lakes. The people of the United States have been striving, are striving, and will continue to strive, by every means, and sometimes by questionable means, to preserve in American channels the great bulk of the carrying trade. They passed obnoxious legislation in the shape of coasting laws, the object of which was to legislate trade into American vessels and into American channels. They compelled us to build a second canal at the Sault. We were entitled to the benefit of the canals of New York State, under the Washington Treaty: they forbade us the free use of them. They took off the tolls upon their canals, to draw trade from Canadian waterways. And what are they proposing to do to-day? To expend sixty-three million dollars on the canal system of the state of New York, to give a further monopoly to the American route. So, from a Canadian standpoint we are obliged 'volens volens' to protect our national interests. For that reason, I say, that any reasonable expenditure involved in keeping Canadian trade in Canadian channels ought to receive the cordial support of this parliament.

But there is another phase to this question. The most interesting phase is its commercial aspect. Looking at it from that aspect, I agree with everything that has been urged with regard to the magnitude and importance of that trade. Its magnitude is indicated first, by the fact that it gives employment and sustenance to over 50,000 people, and profitable investment for hundreds of millions of capital. It is measured by the fact that in 1898 21,224,664 tons of freight passed down the Sault Canal, valued at over two hundred million dollars. It is measured by the fact that the annual profits of this carrying trade exceeds fifteen million dollars. It is measured by the fact that last year 273,000,000 bushels of wheat, or its equivalent in flour, was brought to Buffalo from the upper lakes. These figures give us a glimpse of the magnitude and importance of the trade. It is manifestly the duty of the government to do everything reasonable to obtain and preserve to Canada as large a portion as possible of the carrying trade of the lakes.

I was a little amused by a statement made by the last speaker, with regard to the number of bushels of grain exported from the city of New York. The other evening we had a similar statement from the member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart). He contended we were interested, not in the number of bushels that reached Buffalo, but the number exported from the city of New York. I agree with that proposition. But the hon. gentleman went further, and said that the total number of bushels of grain exported from New York last year was nineteen millions, and that all the grain exported from all the ports of the United States amounted to seventy million bushels. That statement has been repeated by the hon. member for East Grey. His figures are, he says, absolutely correct. So far as I understand the matter, those figures bear their own refutation upon their face. If these figures are true, the Conners Syndicate has a heavy contract on its hands. The syndicate is bound, under the terms of its contract, to divert to the port of Montreal twice as much grain as is exported from the city of New York, and half as much grain as is exported from all the cities of the United States. That contention is absurd. I turn to the report of the Commission on Canals, to which I have referred, and in that report we have a statement of the grain trade of the city of New York. It shows, speaking of the rail and water movement of grain at the port of New York, that the number of bushels of grain received in 1898, was 161,000,000, and that the number of bushels exported in that year was 124,000,000. This does not take into account the equivalent in flour; it is solely the receipts and the exports of grain. The exports of grain from the city of New York are 80 per cent of the receipts. Now, if these figures be true, and I have no doubt they are, as they are the latest returns we have—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is for the year 1898.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The statement for the year 1899 is a little less than that.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). Yes, but the difference is not material to the argument.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). What I mean to say is that it is not possible that only 19,000,000 bushels is the annual export of grain from New York.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, that is wheat. There were 19,000,000 bushels of wheat during the present year. There is quite a falling off this year in the wheat export.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) I cannot say what the rail and water movement of grain has been for 1899. This is the latest statement I have been able to find.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is down to 1898, but it does not include the year 1899.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). No.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There was a break this year owing to some special cause.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). At any rate, there is no question about the magnitude or importance, of the carrying trade of the great lakes, and there is no question about the duty of the government to do everything in its power to divert as large a portion of that trade as possible through Canadian channels. In discussing this question, we can consider it best by comparing the respective advantages and disadvantages of the Canadian and American routes. Starting from Duluth or Port Arthur, the Americans have a decided advantage in the matter of the vessels employed in the trade. In 1898 they had sailing vessels, 960; steam vessels, 1,764; canal boats and barges, 532, making a total of 3,256, having a tonnage of 1,437,

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.)

500 tons. Our vessels on the lakes, engaged in the carrying trade, are only a very small percentage of that amount. The Americans by their coasting laws, have endeavoured to legislate American trade into American channels. This with a large majority of the vessels, gives them a decided advantage at the start. What shall we do to meet that condition of things? We cannot, of course, take the Americans by the throat and compel them to abrogate their vexatious coasting laws. But we can nullify the effect of these coasting laws by encouraging the building of a Canadian fleet. In what way? At the present time a great deal is being done in that direction without the intervention of government. At Hamilton a number of vessels for the lake service are being built; Mr. Booth is purchasing three or four large vessels for his trade between Depot Harbour and Chicago, the Connors Syndicate are building 15 vessels adapted and equipped for the trade upon the lakes. No doubt these examples will be followed by others. No doubt our 14 foot channel and improved waterway will necessitate and create a Canadian fleet. But if our changed conditions do not bring us a sufficient fleet, then, I think it may be very well for the government to consider a proposition made last year, a proposition which I do not think will involve expense or liability, a proposition to guarantee the interest on a sum of money, for the purpose of fostering the building of a Canadian fleet upon the Canadian lakes, the government to provide against liability by taking the security upon the fleet so constructed.

The next point at which the Americans appear to have an advantage is in the port of Buffalo. They have there a deeper and better harbour, than at Port Colborne, better docks and better elevators for handling and transshipping grain. Now, in what way are we to meet that advantage. What can Canada do? The hon. member (Mr. Bennett), who introduced the resolution, asked for the policy of the government upon that question. He himself did not propound any policy. He wanted the government to announce theirs in order, if possible, to subject it to adverse criticism. But the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) had a policy. His was that we were to spend upon Port Colborne, from one to twenty million dollars for the purpose of constructing elevators, building a breakwater, deepening the harbour and improving it generally; in other words for putting it upon an equality with the port of Buffalo. Now, Sir, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that such a policy in regard to Port Colborne is rash and inconsiderate. Why so? The last speaker (Mr. Sproule), advised the government to go into the construction and operation of elevators. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) gave similar advice. Sir, I do not approve of that policy. Elevators are part of the transportation system. They should be built and operated by the same persons who build and operate the boats that carry the grain. The government has no right to go into the business of transportation. If the government begins to build elevators, they are establishing a precedent that is extremely dangerous. They are entering on a policy in which they will not know where to stop and cannot stop. The same rule that will apply to elevators here will apply to Montreal, to Port Dalhousie, to every port on the route between Port Arthur and Quebec. That is not the only reason why I oppose this large expenditure at Port Colborne. It is impolitic because we do not know the conditions under which the trade on the great lakes in the future is to be carried on. If the trade is to be carried on by large vessels carrying 300,000 bushels of wheat, if these have got to come to Port Colborne, if grain has to be taken into elevators, then it will be necessary to equip Port Colborne harbour by building a breakwater, and deepening a portion of the harbour. But no man can tell in what manner or by what kind of vessels the carrying trade of the future is to be conducted. We have now a 14-foot channel, and that 14-foot channel to my mind is going to revolutionize the mode of carrying grain upon the lakes.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) say in what way it is going to revolutionize the carrying trade on the lakes? The whole trend at present is towards larger boats.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). That is the point I am coming to. To my mind our carrying trade of the future is going to be different from that which now exists between Duluth and Buffalo. Look at the condition of things as they now exist at Port Colborne. Suppose to-day you have a vessel carrying 100,000 bushels of grain in Port Colborne harbour. She has to discharge 25,000 bushels, and that 25,000 bushels has got to be taken by an elevator out of the vessel into a railway car, and carried across to Port Dalhousie. When you come to Port Dalhousie you have got to go through the same process,—the elevator has to be used to transfer the grain out of the car back into the vessel. The vessel goes on to Kingston or Prescott. What happens there? A similar process. The elevators take the grain and put it into the barges convenient for carrying it the rest of the way to Montreal. Is all that done for nothing, for the love of doing it? Why the elevator charges alone amount to a very considerable sum. The hon. member for Huron stated that they amounted to about one-eighth of one per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. That is about it.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). According to my researches I find that the elevating charges at Buffalo amount to .625 or nearly two-thirds of a cent per bushel, and at New York to .5 or about half a cent per bushel. Here you have the elevator charges at Port Colborne, at Port Dalhousie, at Kingston. They amount to 1½ cents at least on every bushel of grain that goes through these elevators. That is an expensive luxury. More than that, look at the cost to run the grain by rail from Port Colborne to Port Dalhousie. The Grand Trunk Railway charges 2 cents a bushel upon all grain transported over that 26 miles of road. Take that into account with the elevator charges, and you have ample reason why the grain trade in the past has avoided this route. That is the condition of things existing to-day; that is the condition that will exist so long as you have the grain carried by the larger vessels.

Now, I come to the point raised by my hon. friend. He asks, in what way will the grain trade of the lakes in all probability be carried on? I say in all probability, because we can only speak of probabilities; we cannot speak of certainties. We can only say that a fourteen-foot channel in our canals is bound to work a change in the mode of carrying the grain on the lakes. Exactly what shape that will take it is impossible for any man to forecast. But the probability is that you are going to have a steam vessel carrying about 80,000 bushels with two consorts accompanying her in tow—composing a fleet of three vessels laden with a quarter of a million bushels. This fleet will start from Port Arthur or Duluth, will pass down the lakes, will enter the harbour at Port Colborne, will pass through the Welland Canal without breaking bulk, will pass down through Lake Ontario, will sail past the elevators at Prescott and Kingston and will go straight on to Montreal or Quebec, without elevator charges and without the expense of carrying the grain by rail from Port Colborne to Port Dalhousie. To my mind, that is the way in which the grain trade is going to be carried on in the future. That is the way in which the present canal system of Canada will revolutionize the carrying trade on the lakes. But this mode of carriage has other advantages: it involves the cheapest mode of building vessels, the least expenditure on coal, and the least outlay in the payment of men; it yields the greatest profit for the least expenditure. For these reasons, to my mind, the strong probability is that the grain trade of the lakes will be conducted in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him that a few years ago 20,000 bushels of grain was considered a vessel load; but to-day there are vessels carrying 250,000 bushels. Every year they are increased in size, and so far as my information goes, no one would attempt to take a vessel with consorts of smaller boats through Lake Superior.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). All I can say is that is the way in which a large proportion of the grain-carrying trade at the present time is conducted. Of course, it is subject to accident. The vessel which has the propelling power is liable to be driven ashore, or the vessel in tow is liable to break away; but these accidents are so rare that they need not be taken into account. A slight addition of insurance will cover any possible loss. I say, therefore, that this is the mode in which the carrying trade of the lakes will probably be conducted in the future. If that be true, what follows? This follows, that the policy of the government with regard to Port Colborne has to be in conformity with and subject to the conditions of the carrying trade. If the carrying trade is to be done in large vessels with a capacity of 200,000 or 300,000 bushels, then you have to provide a sufficient harbour at Port Colborne; you have to expend public money upon piers and breakwaters. But if the carrying trade is to be conducted in the way I have indicated, then the manifest policy is to do nothing at Port Colborne, except, perhaps, construct a breakwater. There is absolutely no need of any large expenditure. The hon. member who introduced this resolution asks about the government policy at Port Colborne. I do not know what that policy may be, but to my mind the very policy they have pursued is the policy that ought to have been pursued; it is the waiting policy and the watching policy. It is to watch to see in what manner the trade of the lakes is going to be carried on, and then to adopt such means at Port Colborne as will meet the exigencies of that trade.

Some hon. gentleman, in discussing this question, has proposed that the government should abolish the tolls on the canals. I look forward to the time in the near future when there will be a largely increased traffic upon these canals, and when the receipts from tolls will be much in excess of what they are to-day. When that time arrives the government would do right to reduce the tolls to the level of their working expenses; but to say that they should be abolished entirely is a proposition, which I am satisfied, the people of this country are not prepared to accept.

The next consideration is with regard to the Erie Canal. That canal has the disadvantage of being longer than ours—about five times as long. That operates in favour of the Canadian route. Again, the ordinary loaded fleet, on the Erie Canal, consisting of a steamer and three consorts, carries 40,000 bushels, while a steamer with two consorts on our fourteen-foot channel will be able to carry 250,000 bushels. That will give us a tremendous advantage.

Now, let us pass to the port of New York. The Americans contend, and with justice, that the port of New York has many advantages over that of Montreal. One advantage is, that the port of New York is open all the year round, whereas the port of Montreal is open only for six months of the year. Of course, it is impossible by any action of this government to overcome our natural disability. But have we not been overlooking a winter port that has great claims to our consideration. I refer to the port of Quebec. Those vessels that will pass down the canals and through the lakes without breaking bulk, those vessels that we expect to carry a quarter of a million bushels to the fleet can pass down as easily to Quebec as to Montreal, and with very little additional expense. The city of Quebec has besides, other advantages. In New York, the C.P.R. has to pay perhaps $200,000 a year for wharfage accommodation, and of course that expenditure is charged back against the exporters and producers of grain. But in the city of Quebec, besides a deep and commodious harbour you have wharfage accommodation of the very best character to an unlimited extent, and which you can obtain almost for the asking. In that respect, Quebec enjoys a considerable advantage over New York. But that is not all. A large portion of the risk in sending vessels from Montreal to Liverpool is incurred between Montreal and Quebec; but if these great grain carriers, to which I have referred, instead of stopping at Montreal, go on to Quebec, you overcome the difficulty, you get rid of the dangerous channel and the additional expense of insurance. There is still another advantage to the credit of Quebec. We all know that the great lakes are drying up. The amount of water in them is less now than in former years. This is due partly to the drainage by the Chicago and Erie and other canals. But the main cause of the diminution is the clearing up of the country, and the consequent drying up of the streams that run through cultivated lands to supply the lakes. The result is that the water in the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec is yearly becoming less—will yearly continue to decrease.

By taking Quebec as our winter port we avoid that difficulty. We will then have a port that is independent of the supply water from the lakes and of water in the channel between Montreal and Quebec. Quebec is a port which lies on the direct route between the upper lakes and England. We have been looking for ports in Halifax and St. John, but these are away from the direct route, and the long line of railway that connects them will always be a disadvantage. The port of Quebec, too, as I understand it, is a port that is open for ten months in the year. The navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence is possible for that period. If that be the case, then you have in Quebec a winter port which is almost equal to that of New York.

From the best information I can get, with the exception possibly from the middle of February to the middle of April, the Gulf of St. Lawrence is navigable all the year, and vessels in the carrying trade would require only a slight protection of iron to enable them to navigate the lower St. Lawrence and the Gulf during the winter months. When you take account of all these considerations you will conclude with me that Quebec has a larger claim as a winter port upon our consideration than any other port in Canada, and I trust that the people of that city will soon wake up to the strength of their position and the importance of their heritage.

There is another matter to which I would like to refer, and that is the question of insurance. It is alleged that New York has an advantage in the matter of insurance rates. That is true, but not to the extent stated. My hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Dobell), said the other day that there was a discrimination in rates between the city of New York and the city of Montreal amounting in some cases to three per cent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. All the ports on the southern side of the boundary line, New York included, are on the same footing.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). The ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) undertook to correct my hon. friend and said that the discrimination was not 3 per cent, but only one per cent.

Mr. DOBELL. May I explain that. It is 1 per cent during the summer months, up to the 1st September. After the 1st September it is 3 per cent, and later in the year, after about the 20th October, it is often 5 per cent and 6 per cent. I was within the mark when I spoke of 3 per cent. I am speaking from personal knowledge, having had to pay the extra rate.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). With all deference to the opinion of these hon. gentlemen, I contend that they are both in error. The statement they are making is not only erroneous, but calculated to leave a bad impression in Canada and elsewhere regarding the respective merits of the New York and Montreal routes. Why do I say that? I have here in my hand a schedule of insurance rates on flour. Although it is not a schedule of rates on grain, yet it will give us a fair idea of the discrimination against the port of Montreal. By way of New York, the rate to the United Kingdom is 50 cents—that is 50 cents on \$100, or half of one per cent. By way of Montreal, on the Allan Line up to September 1st, the rate is 20 cents extra, or $\frac{2}{5}$ of 1 per cent. So the discrimination against Montreal is not 3 per cent, it is not one per cent, it is $\frac{1}{5}$ of 1 per cent. After the 1st of September, the discrimination is 30 cents, or three-tenths of one per cent, by the Allan Line. By other regular lines, up to 1st September, the discrimination is 30 cents, and after the 1st of September, it is 40 cents.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Is there not a good deal of difference on the tramp steamers?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). I have been speaking of the ordinary rates on regular lines. But a tramp steamer of low grade, going out of New York, would be charged as much insurance or nearly so as it would out of Montreal—both would be charged high rates, dependent on the grade of the tramp steamer and the season of the year.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is in Lloyds, a discrimination against us north of the boundary line on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). The rates I have quoted are those from a marine insurance agent practically acquainted with the business. The rates on flour were the only rates he had available, and I assume that the rates on flour are much the same as rates on grain. If that be true, the highest discrimination against Montreal is $\frac{2}{5}$ of 1 per cent. Still a discrimination does exist; and it is the duty of the government, as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), has said, to do what it can to lower the rates of insurance from Canadian ports. That hon. gentleman has suggested that the proper course for the government to take is to go into the insurance business themselves. From that proposition, I dissent. The government have no right to deal with matters of insurance. They have a right, however, to do all in their power to bring the insurance rates by way of Montreal down as low as those by way of New York, by the only way that is open to them—namely, by reducing the number of casualties that happen on the route between Montreal and Liverpool. And how are they to accomplish that? By improving the channel—by improving the system of fog signals, and buoys and lights on the Lower St. Lawrence. When they have done that, they can go to Lloyds, and ask them to look at the record showing fewer casualties, and Lloyds will lower the rates.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They have increased the rates for St. John, and we have no casualties from that port at all.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). I am aware there is a slight discrimination against the port of St. John.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Against all the ports north of the boundary line.

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). I wish to refer to a point mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule). While the New York route has advantages, yet, notwithstanding these, grain can be put on board ship at Montreal as cheaply as it can be taken by way of Duluth and Buffalo, and the Erie Canal, and put on board ship at the city of New York. To prove that, I have here the rates for 1898.

	Per bushel. cts.
Via Duluth to Buffalo	1·80
Buffalo to New York	3·125
Charges at New York	1·075
Total	6·00

On the other hand, we find the charges via Montreal, are as follows :

	Per bushel. cts.
Charges from Fort William to Prescott...	4·08
Prescott to Montreal, f.o.b., ocean steamer.	1·75
Wharfage, Montreal	0·17
Total	6·00

Mr. SPROULE. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.), aware that wheat has been carried at rates away below that this season ?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) It may be so, I have not the figures for this last season. I wish to point out, however, and it is a matter of pride that even with all these adverse conditions, we have been able to do as well as we have in Canada. This is what obtains at the present time, but the question is, what about the future ? The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, in his speech the other day, said that a small fraction of one per cent is enough to divert grain from one route to another, so sensitive is the carriage of grain. He spoke the truth. But what shall we say with regard to the change in the lowering of the freight rates that is going to be the result of the opening and operating of a fourteen-foot channel ? Is there any man who is able to forecast to what extent the lowering of those rates will be ? Under the mode of carrying on the lakes and canals that I have suggested, it is manifest you are going to have a vast reduction in your freight rates. It is not going to be a fraction of one per cent. It is going to be two cents per bushel at least, and perhaps three, on every bushel of grain transported. It is possible—yes, probable—that the six-cent rate from Duluth will be cut in two. At any rate, there is going to be a vast reduction. The result is going to be what every one foresees, a diversion of a large portion of the grain traffic into Canadian channels. Why, we talk about the Conners Syndicate, and say it is going to divert grain. I say it is not the Conners Syndicate that is going to divert the grain, it is the changed and improved conditions of our canal system. The fact is, grain will be diverted over the head of and in spite of the Conners Syndicate. Of course, the Syndicate saw their chance, and they were willing and anxious to go into the carrying trade. They saw that the changed conditions would naturally tend to divert a large portion, probably the largest portion of the grain carrying trade of the lakes to the city of Montreal, and so they were eager for the chance to build elevators at Montreal and ships for the carriage of grain upon the lakes. Sir, it is not only the Conners Syndicate that are looking into our future. I want to call your attention again to this report upon the canals, issued by the state of New York. The people of New York see clearly the altered conditions, and they are growing apprehensive of the result in the near future of the deepening of our canals to fourteen feet. Read between the lines and listen to this quotation from this report of the commission :

The state of New York must be prepared to face from this time on a serious competition in the export trade over the St. Lawrence route. The Soulanges Canal, which was the last link in the improvements around the rapids of the St. Lawrence River, has been completed during the year 1899, and nominally opened for business. It will be actually open for business with the spring of 1900. This chain of improvements gives a waterway from Lake Erie through the Welland Canal, Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River and its canals capable of carrying boats or barges of about 2,200 tons capacity ; the size of the locks is 270 by 40 by 14, admitted vessels 255 feet long, and 12 to 14 feet draft, depending on the advantage of Lake Erie. The expenditures for construction and enlargement of this route during the last fifty years have been over 56 millions dollars, a sum which bears the same ratio to the wealth of Canada as 100 millions would bear to the state of New York. The distance from Lake Erie to Liverpool by the St. Lawrence route is about 450 miles shorter than by any route across the state of New York. It is certain that the Canadian government will do everything in its power to realize every possible advantage from this enormous expenditure. Already propositions have been submitted by a group of Chicago and Buffalo capitalists to the harbour commissioners of Montreal and accepted by the latter, the result of which will be to divert about 35 million bushels of grain from the New York route. These propositions involve the immediate construction of at least 15 barges of the maximum size which can be used on the canal, and costing $100,000 each, in addition to elevators, warehouses and other structures in the harbour of Montreal, costing more than 4 million dollars. These propositions contain no exclusive privileges, and it is open to another group of capitalists to make similar arrangements for the diversion of other large amounts of the grain which now passes through New York.

Sir, the people of the state of New York see the change and improved condition of the Canadian canal system, and they apprehend that a large portion, perhaps the largest portion, of the grain trade will be thereby diverted ; and in order to meet this contingency they have advised that the sum of sixty-three million dollars should be spent by the state of New York upon the system of canals. The people of Canada recognise the magnificent advantage we now possess, and rejoice in it. It is for the government of Canada to do all that is within their power to give to the people of Canada the full benefit, the full fruition, of that immense traffic upon our lakes that now appears to be fairly and fully within our grasp.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Might I ask the hon. gentleman what the government will take up to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the Bill founded on the contingent resolutions will probably be reached; also the third reading of the Redistribution Bill.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 8, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 71) respecting the Dominion Cotton Mills Company (Limited).—(Mr. Mills.)

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Merchants Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Russell.)

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—INSPECTION FEES.

Mr. GAUVREAU (by Mr. Gibson) asked :

How much are the inspectors of weights and measures entitled to charge each country merchant on making their visit of inspection? What is the salary of the inspectors, and to whom do the sums of from five to six dollars, collected by them from our country merchants, revert?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1. The fees for the inspection of weights and measures are regulated by order in council, and all inspectors are governed thereby. The amount, therefore, collected depends upon the number and description of the scales and weights inspected. 2. The salaries of inspectors vary according to the importance of the divisions. 3. All moneys collected are deposited to the credit of the honourable the Receiver General.

ELEVATORS FOR THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. A. H. MOORE (Stanstead). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to what I consider to be a defect in the internal economy of these buildings. In the departmental buildings we have a more convenient way of getting to the upper flats than by climbing long and tedious stairways. When we come to this House, to discharge our duties as patriotic representatives of this great country, and loyal subjects of the Queen, I think the government might provide elevators to facilitate us in the discharge of our duties. I would ask the government to consider the matter of furnishing elevators, and also to try and improve the ventilation of the building, as an hon. gentleman beside me has suggested.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Since I have been in office, I have endeavoured to serve my Queen to the best of my ability—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS—in the way of supplying elevators for Her loyal subjects in this House. I have provided elevators for the East block and the West block, and I quite agree that we should have a couple more elevators.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg to lay on the Table of the House certain papers, telegrams, &c., respecting the Pacific cable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had a motion on the Order paper for these, and I understood it was moved in my absence.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I sent the papers to the Secretary of State's office for the necessary endorsement, under the impression that it was an Order of the House, and I received them back again with the statement that the Order was not passed. I find, however, that the Order has been passed.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) There were some returns ordered by the House on the 5th of February, ten of them, I think, and although they do not require much time in their preparation, they are not down yet.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) Will the hon. gentleman send me a list of them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, if the Prime Minister sends the list back; it is the only check I have on him.

Mr. J. A. GILLIES (Richmond). I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals when a return ordered on the 12th of February, will be brought down? It was ordered twenty-four days ago, and as it refers to an important matter in which the public are concerned, I would like the minister to bring it down at the earliest moment.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Will the hon. gentleman state what return he refers to?

Mr. GILLIES. It is in connection with the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway, in the eastern part of Nova Scotia—at Sydney and North Sydney.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That has been sent for to Moncton, but it has not yet been received here. The very moment it comes, I will expedite it.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). On the 7th of February, an Order of the House was made for copies of all correspondence between any officer of the Interior Department, and any officer of the North-west Mounted Police, in the inside service at Ottawa, respecting the giving of contracts for supplies for the North-west Mounted Police, since the 23rd of June, 1896. Will the right hon. the Premier tell me when that return will be placed on the Table?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will send and see.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals, to an Order which was made two sessions ago, or early last session, for the papers and evidence relating to the dismissal of Peter S. Archibald, from the position of Chief Engineer of the Intercolonial Railway. The evidence exists, because the hon. gentleman quoted it in a speech two sessions ago, before it was brought down. I intended to have brought the matter up last session, but I did not discover that the papers had not been brought down until so near the end of the session, that it was useless then to mention it. I spent two or three hours going around to the different officers of the House who might know anything about them, and they informed me that so far as they knew, the papers had not been brought down.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) That recalls to mind that last session and the session before, I started in to get returns from the different departments with reference to those precious smelling commissions which were to try employees of the different departments, and dismiss them when they could be proved to have been Conservatives, and I have only been successful in getting about half of them from the departments. In the interests of uniform and full statistics, I would like those that have not been brought down, to be brought down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think there were no returns moved for answering the description of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, all moved for last session and all passed—for every department. The Order was a general one to the government to bring down the information as to all these dismissals, the expenses, and all that.

REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock), moved third reading of Bill (No. 13), respecting representation in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. I declared the motion carried, after I had waited in vain for some time.

Mr. FOSTER. There are two gentlemen on their feet.

Mr. SPEAKER. Shall the Bill pass, and the title be as in the motion?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I must say, that for the first time in my life I have heard the statement of the Chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am violating no principle of order. I say that for the first time in my life, in this House, I have heard the statement of the Chair, that the Bill was carried, when his immediate attention was drawn to the fact that an hon. member was on his feet, wishing to speak to the motion. It is the first time that I have seen an hon. member, under such circumstances, refused permission to go on and make his speech. Of course, technically, your statement may be correct; but from the first day this House was organized, a statement of that kind from the Chair, has always been considered subject to the wish of any hon. member to speak. On this occasion, it appears that two hon. members were anxious to settle between them who had the floor; and while they were agreeing which should speak first, the Chair undoubtedly, not having observed that, declared the motion carried. Under the circumstances, I think it could hardly be adopted as the practice of this House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I think Mr. Speaker was clearly within the rules of the House, as he waited for a long time, before declaring the motion carried. But there is no disposition at all to shut off the discussion in any way. If any hon. member wishes to speak on this question, I shall be the first to ask that he be given the opportunity. But, I want to say to my hon. friend, that the Speaker wished to do his duty fairly to both sides of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not question that.

Mr. FOSTER. The difficulty arose in this way. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island, spoke to me on Friday, saying that he wanted to speak, and I told him that he would have an opportunity to do so, on the third reading, and I was trying to catch his eye, when the motion was put, and the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), was waiting to see who had the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to correct my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition. I want to say distinctly, that I had looked for both of those hon. members who had intimated to me that they wanted to speak on this motion, but neither of them paid any attention to the Speaker. It was not until after that transpired, that I declared the motion carried, and then I saw the hon. member for East Simcoe rise to his feet.

Mr. McNEILL. May I just explain, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McNEILL. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that these unseemly cries are raised in order to give the government a little time to bring down their business.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot tolerate a statement of that sort. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. McNEILL. I will say, then, that no doubt these unseemly cries are made for the purpose of facilitating discussions in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot tolerate that statement. I am within the judgment of the House, but I think suggestions of that kind should not be made.

Mr. McNEILL. Then I withdraw the statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair; sit down.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, is that order?

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to respect the Chair, and at least take his seat. If the hon. gentleman has any personal explanation to make, I should be pleased to hear him.

Mr. McNEILL. I must confess that I feel somewhat at a loss at the present moment. I had just declared that if I had said anything which ought to be withdrawn, I was quite prepared to withdraw it. If I did not resume my seat, it was because I supposed I still had the floor. I certainly never have set the example in this House of disrespect to the Chair, and this is the first occasion it has ever been suggested that I did so. I wish to assure you, Sir, that nothing was further from my thoughts. I just wish to explain how it was that this misunderstanding arose with regard to the third reading of the Bill. I am seated in such a remote part of the House that often I can scarcely hear what is said, and I did not catch what you, Sir, were saying. That is why I looked hard at you, Sir, at the time; and as soon as I found out exactly how the matter stood, I rose to my feet.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman wishes to address the House on this measure, he can do so by consent of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. We are on the third reading.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to move the amendment of which I gave notice—an amendment to the second subsection of the second clause. The clause reads:

The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

That is the clause, as it stands in the Bill, and I propose to add the following words:

Irrespective of any consideration as to the balance of political parties in the several constituencies.

We have already discussed this question in committee, and I have no desire to further take up the time of the House, but submit this amendment and leave it to the government to say whether or not they are prepared to accept it.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is moved by Mr. McNeill :

That the House resolve itself again into committee with instructions to add the subsection 2 of clause 2, after the word 'justice,' the words following: 'irrespective of any consideration as to the balance of political parties in the several constituencies.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. McNEILL. The clause as it stands without amendment is, in my judgment, ambiguous and open to the construction that the judges might take into consideration this question of the balance of parties in order to make a distribution best calculated to do substantial justice. I think it would be most unhappy if the judges were placed in any such position, and it is well that we should add words to make it perfectly clear that any such consideration is removed altogether from the scope of reference to the judiciary.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must express to my hon. friend my surprise that he, of all men, should move such an amendment. He has always been supposed to be the Britisher of all Britishers. But where does he find any precedent in British legislation for such an amendment? He will look in vain through the statutes passed by the British parliament, from its earliest days to this date, to find any reference in them to political parties. This amendment of the hon. gentleman is an American idea; it is an importation from our neighbours. You will find it in American legislation, but not in any British legislation, and I must repeat that I am astonished to find my hon. friend, of all men in the world, advocating it. He is no longer himself. From day to day he poses as the apostle of everything that is British in this country; he is the father, and perhaps the mother also, of everything British in this country. But oh, what a fall is there—down from that height to the idea of introducing American legislation and referring to political parties by name in our statutes. That is a thing unheard of in British legislation, and I do not think that my hon. friend will, on reflection, continue to press his amendment. The words of the Bill are that its object is to do substantial justice. To whom? Not to any political party. Political parties are ignored, so far as this legislation is concerned. It is to do substantial justice to the electors themselves, to see that their rights are not in any way prejudiced, and the words convey all that is necessary to enforce what we have in view.

Mr. McNEILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think that the mover of this amendment has been affected by any disposition to view American precedents with favour or come down to their system. I am afraid that he has been simply impelled by his strong sense of justice to come down to the position of hon. gentlemen opposite in order to meet the very extraordinary conditions of things which has been presented in connection with this measure. It will be in the recollection of the House that the hon. mover of the Bill indicated, when it was first introduced, that the object and aim of the government was to do anything but substantial justice between the two political parties. I do not intend to take up the time of the House discussing that point, and I think perhaps, under the circumstances, my hon. friend would consult precedents, with reference to legislation in this House at all events, by accepting the explanation of the right hon. Prime Minister that the term 'substantial justice' is intended to apply to the whole of Canada and thus cover the position taken by my hon. friend. I hope that he will be good enough to accept that view of the case, because he wants to stick as close as possible to Imperial precedents, and I think, after the explanation of the right hon. First Minister, my hon. friend would do well to accept that interpretation of the clause.

Mr. McNEILL. I may say that I did not move this resolution without having consulted at least one of the most distinguished legal members in this House, and he, at all events, thought that those words were not improper words to use. I think that his view on the subject is probably as sound as that which has been expressed by my right hon. friend, whose partiality for English precedent. I am most happy to find, is to-day so very much stronger than it was only a short time ago. It is very gratifying to me to feel that, if I have been the apostle, as he calls me, of British institutions in this country—I beg to say I have been but one very humble worker among very many apostles—I have made so admirable and distinguishable a convert as my right hon. friend. Of course, I do not wish to press the amendment, in view of the absolute statement the right hon. gentleman has made. I can only say that I feel satisfied that, so far as the judges who have to deal with the matters are concerned, they would like some words inserted here which would make it perfectly clear exactly what the scope of the reference to them is. I say that the words here are ambiguous words, absolutely ambiguous, and all I asked was that they should be made clear. And I must say that I am surprised that the government, having in view, no doubt, that object which they allege they had in view, have thrown any obstacles in the way of the adoption of such a form of clause as may remove this ambiguity. If my right hon. friend did not like this form of words, it would have been easy to adopt some other form that would carry out my wish.

Amendment (Mr. McNeill) withdrawn.

Mr. BENNETT. When, last year, the Senate of Canada, in their wisdom, saw fit to veto the Bill that had been passed in this House, it was expected that, owing to the strong grounds the Senate took on that occasion, the last would have been heard of this Bill until the proper time for the introduction of such a measure—after there had been a census of the Dominion. However, the administration have seen fit to introduce the Bill which is now before us. The Postmaster General, to whom was entrusted the carrying of the Bill in this House, has stated two great reasons for this measure. The first is, that it would restore rights to the people, and the second, that it would afford the government an opportunity of carrying out the last of their unredeemed pledges. If this Bill were introduced only to redeem a pledge of the government, I think the country will feel that they might as well let this go with the other unredeemed and unfulfilled pledges that they have made to the people. It is something new to have the Postmaster General appear in a jocular role. When he tells the House and the country that the intention in introducing this Bill is to redeem a pledge, the country will see that he is treating the whole matter in jocular fashion.

As to the first ground for the introduction of this Bill, I do not propose to discuss it at any length. It has been an acknowledged principle, in the past at all events, that there should be a redistribution at the end of every decade, and when the government undertake to introduce such a measure at this time, the only reason that can be fairly assigned is party advantage. If it is acknowledged that at any time a Redistribution Bill can be brought in this House and carried here and in the Senate, then, whenever a government desire to gain party advantage, they have only to introduce a Bill similar to this. Had the government introduced a Bill on this occasion to deal with only one or two, or even three, constituencies, the measure would simply have been laughed out of the House. To be fair to hon. gentlemen opposite, however, it must be said, as will be in the memory of members of this House, that, on one occasion when they had the opportunity, they endeavoured to pass a Representation Bill. I refer to the famous case of Centre Huron. The government, in order to obtain a political advantage, was prepared to deal with that one constituency and leave all others alone. Any hon. gentleman who scans this Bill throughout will see plainly that the government have deliberately aimed at one object and one alone—wherever they think they can obtain party advantage they deal with a constituency, but where there is no opportunity to gain party advantage, they studiously leave it alone.

Let us take, in the first place, the question of principle. It has been argued that the first and greatest point in such a matter is to have regard to population. But this Bill simply makes that a perfect laughing-stock, hon. gentlemen opposite being careful to look ahead and see how their party interests are affected. The city of Quebec has a population, according to the last census, of some 63,000. That city has three representatives, or an average of about 21,000 for each constituency. Now, though 21,000 is supposed to be a proper number of people to be represented by one member in the city of Quebec, yet, when we come to the city of Toronto, with over 200,000, they provide that every representative must in effect represent over 40,000 people. Why is that principle laid down in the case of the city of Toronto and the exception made in the case of the city of Quebec? But that is only one of many cases we can instance of the great disparity of population under this Bill. Having regard to the fact that so many absurdities do exist, as I admit they do, in respect of population, as in the case of Toronto and Quebec, why have not the government gone to the root of the matter and taken constituencies, not only in one province but in the others, and dealt with them all on a fair business basis? The fact is that the government does not wish to have a redistribution on the basis of the next general census, for the reason that after the next census is taken and the redistribution is made on the basis of that census, hon. gentlemen will have, to their own consternation, half a dozen new members west of the province of Ontario. These will be distributed over Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia. This is a change this government would rather avoid—and the fact is notorious—they know that the west is a unit against them, and they are anxious that there should be no further representation from the west before a general election takes place.

Now, the Postmaster General and other hon. gentlemen endeavoured to make a strong point of the contention that under this Bill they are going to have equality of population. Let us take for review some of the counties in Ontario. Hon. gentlemen opposite now hold the constituency of Algoma. In 1891, the population of Algoma was 41,856, but since that time it has greatly increased. If they wish to have regard to population, why do they not assign two members to Algoma. On the other hand, the constituency of West Durham, with a little over 15,300 people, is represented by one of their own friends. They think that in West Durham 15,000 people should have a member; but when they go over to the large constituency of Algoma they say it is absurd to have more than one member for constituencies of over 50,000 of a population. An hon. gentleman suggests that the size of the constituency is so abnormal that even in the local House they have seen fit to assign to it two members. Now let us take more absurdities in the province of Ontario, as hon. gentlemen are pleased to call them, and which, under this Bill, they are not at all endeavouring to correct or change. Algoma has 41,856 of a population; Durham West, 15,374; Frontenac, 13,445; Lennox, 14,900; North Norfolk, 19,400; South Norfolk, 17,780; West Northumberland, 15,000; Peel, 15,466; West Peterborough, 15,808; while the large county of Simcoe with a population in 1891 of 84,000, or an average of 28,000 for each riding, is only to be assigned three members under this Bill. Now hon. gentlemen contend that under this Bill they are endeavouring to do away with disparities of population; but they only reveal to the public the fact that no regard whatever is had to the question of population, and that their whole aim is to obtain a party advantage by a division of the constituencies where they to-day are interested in gaining party advantage. Now, so far as county boundaries go, what has been done in that regard? In West Ontario they endeavour to change the constituencies, but in East Ontario they do not go into them at all. Well, the whole principle of the Bill is that counties should not be broken in upon or interfered with. All I can say to that contention is that the Bill on the very face of it has an utter disregard for population, and in the next place it has an utter disregard of observing county boundary lines or a semblance to it.

But it is in the province of Quebec that the greatest injustice is wrought as compared with other provinces. In the province of Quebec it is notorious that there are over a dozen ridings each with a population under 15,000 souls. Now, why don't the government interfere in the case of Quebec? Why do they not consolidate two of such ridings, or three of them, or whatever the circumstances of the case might require, in order that there might be a semblance of an approach to fair-play? The simple reason is that hon. gentlemen think that at the present time they are strong in that province, and they hope in the future also to be strong in that province; and where they see seats in the province of Quebec that they are looking upon with alarm, there they deny to the electors the privilege of having what they should have at the polls, that is, a proper representation of population. Sir, you may go from one end of this Dominion to the other and compare the populations of the different ridings, and absurdity heaps upon absurdity; and yet these hon. gentlemen pretend to have started out to rectify wrongs. Take a case, for instance, in New Brunswick. There is the riding of Albert, with a population of 10,000, represented by a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite. They say it is perfectly right that the people of Albert should have one representative in this House; but when they go to the adjoining riding of Westmoreland with upwards of 45,000 of a population, they say there should be only one representative for that riding. Why, on the very face of it the whole Bill teems with absurdities, and shows that these changes are proposed not for the purpose of equalizing populations, not for the purpose of keeping within county boundary lines, but solely for the purpose of gaining party advantages.

Then with a great flourish of trumpets the government announce that this Bill is to be different from all other Bills, that it is not going to be backed up by a partisan majority, but that they are going to hand over to the judges the power of rearranging the constituencies. Well, so far as that goes it is all very well on the face of it. But the trouble is that the judges have nothing to do in the premises, because they are simply given the counties and they are told to carve out two, or three, or four constituencies, as the case may be, not having regard to population at all except within those county boundary lines. What will be the result? The small county of Norfolk with 35,000 people, will have two representatives, and many others I might mention, Brant for instance, with only 17,000 or 18,000 souls in each constituency. These will be afforded two members, but in the other cases they will not be afforded representation at all according to their population.

Now, Sir, to my mind, the proper time to have introduced this Bill would be after a census has been taken. The hon. gentlemen to-day are right on the eve of taking a census, and for that reason they should wait until the census is taken and then deal with the question on its merits. What are the judges to have before them? They are to have the figures of ten years ago, and on these figures they are asked to change and to bring about this whole representation. Personally speaking, I would prefer the Bill to become law for the reason that it would give me a party advantage, as I would lose certain municipalities which are politically adverse to the party that I represent. But on the broad principle that it is an interference with the rights of parliament in the past to make these changes session in and session out, I propose for one to record my vote against the Bill. Why, Sir, if this Bill goes into effect what will be the result? Assume that there was a change of government, that next session or the ensuing session a Conservative administration came into power; it might be appealed to by its friends to do exactly what this Bill is doing, that is to patch up certain constituencies, to interfere with certain constituencies; and the result would be a spirit of unrest and disquiet throughout the whole country. No man would ever be sure of a constituency owing to the fact that these changes would be made session in and session out. We have heard a good deal in the course of this debate of threats held out to the Senate. Well, I suppose the Senate have not changed out of fear of hon. gentlemen opposite, and, I presume, they will do their duty in the future as they did on a former occasion when they vetoed the action of the hon. gentlemen in reference to an amendment that they passed at the wrong time in reference to Centre Huron. For these reasons, and for others that have been adduced during the discussion of this Bill, I shall vote against it becoming law.

Mr. J. H. BELL (P.E.I.) When this Bill was in committee it was understood that at the third reading an opportunity should be given to discuss subsection (c), of section 5, of the Act. Subsection (c) reads:

That the electoral district of King's, which shall consist of the county of King's, shall return one member.

It was my intention to move to strike out the words 'one member' and substitute the word 'two members.' But, upon further reflection, I came to the conclusion that such an amendment would be introducing a dangerous principle into the Bill now before the House. The object of this Bill is manifestly not for the purpose of increasing representation, but for readjusting it. To attempt to increase the representation would therefore tend to prejudice and possibly defeat the measure. I therefore concluded that it would be expedient merely to call the attention of the government to the special circumstances of the case and urge them at the proper time,—after the next census, to mete out justice to Prince Edward Island. I desire, in discussing this question first to emphasize the fact that our delegates, when considering the terms of the union in 1864, in the city of Quebec, insisted upon having a representation of six members in the House of Commons of Canada. They laid that down as the 'sine qua non' of entering the union. They insisted that unless they got six members they would prefer to stay out of confederation. The reasons assigned for taking that position were, first, We have three counties, we must have two members for each—no other political arrangement, no other division, no other representation will suit our circumstances. The counties had existed, as such for many years, they had their county institutions, their separate identities. The people of Prince Edward Island would never be satisfied to have these separate identities broken. Therefore we must have two members for each county. Second, We are a small province, yet we have important interests to conserve, we will not enter confederation unless we have a respectable representation of six members. That is the lowest representation that we consider will give us status or voting power or influence.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the population of the island?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.). I am coming to that. They said in substance: In order to guarantee us a fair influence and safeguard our interests we must have at least six members in the Commons and four in the Senate. In order that there may be no mistake about this proposition, which I consider of the utmost importance, I will read from 'Confederation Documents,' by Joseph Pope, extracts from the statements of the several gentlemen who represented Prince Edward Island at that conference. Mr. Haviland, one of the delegates said:

Prince Edward Island would rather be out of the confederation than consent to this motion. We should have no status. Only five members out of 194 would give the island no position.

Mr. Palmer, another delegate, said:

Representation by population is not applicable when a certain number of provinces are throwing their resources into one confederation, and giving up their own self-government and individuality. When a colony surrenders that right, she should have something commensurate in the confederation. . . . Why give up so great certainties for an uncertain benefit where we have only a feeble voice? . . . I never understood that any proposition at Charlottetown was to be binding as to representation by population.

Mr. Whelan, another delegate, said:

I do not think, however, I could say that I was satisfied with the representation of five in the Federal House of Commons. We are in an isolated position. Our resources are not large, and our people would not be content to give up their present benefits for the representation of five members. It may be said that confederation will go on without Prince Edward Island, and that we shall eventually be forced in. Better, however, that than that we should willingly go into the confederation with that representation.

Col. Gray, another delegate, said:

I am instructed by my co-delegates to say that the provision of five members is unsatisfactory. Prince Edward Island is divided longitudinally into three counties . . . We cannot divide the three counties into five members.

Mr. Coles said:

Mr. Galt had proposed six members for Prince Edward Island. I approved that rather than Mr. Brown's motion, because it allows us to give to our three counties two members each.

Mr. Pope, another delegate, said:

I agree in all that has been said by Col. Gray and Mr. Coles. But the circumstances of Prince Edward Island are such that I hope the conference will agree to give us such a number as we can divide amongst our three constituencies. Nature, as well as the original settlement of the island, has made three counties, and it would give rise to much difficulty if we had to adjust five members to the three counties. I cannot ask it as a matter of right, but one of expediency, as one without which it is impossible for us to carry the measure in Prince Edward Island. I, therefore, ask for six members.

These extracts prove my first proposition, namely, that the delegates insisted upon two members for each county, and for two reasons; first, that we had three counties and no other representation would suit; second, because unless we had a representation of six we would not have a proper status in the Commons. I want now to make another proposition—one that follows necessarily and logically from what I have enunciated, viz: that the reasons assigned for six members when we entered confederation apply with equal force to our future representation. They apply equally to the year 1864 and to the year 1900, and to all future time. Take the first argument used: We have three counties, and, therefore, must have six members. This was an argument which was not intended to apply temporarily; it was not a reason as permanent as county boundaries, expedient to suffice till another census. Then take the second argument: We are a small province, we are going into a large confederation, we demand six representatives to give a proper status. If that argument applied with force to the circumstances as they existed in 1864, with greater force does it apply to the circumstances of to-day, a larger population for Canada, and a larger representation in the House of Commons. My next proposition is this: That at the time we entered confederation, we did not have on the basis of population sufficient to entitle us to six members, and since that time, we have never had on that basis sufficient to give us six. That to my mind, is a most important consideration. Prince Edward Island entered the union in 1873. The population in 1871 was 94,021; the population in 1881 was 108,801; and the population in 1891 was 109,078. What was the unit of representation? I need not say that the unit of representation is found by dividing the number 65 into the population of Quebec. The unit of representation in 1871 was therefore 18,330; in 1881 20,090; and in 1891, 22,900. Now, if we divide our population by the unit of representation, we get the following results: In 1871, on the basis of population, we were entitled to five members, plus 2,371 persons; but as that surplus did not amount to 9,165 (which was half of the unit of representation), it did not count in our favour. In 1871, on the basis of population, we were, therefore, only entitled to five members. In 1881, we were entitled to five members, plus 8,441, but as this surplus did not amount to 10,045, it did not count to entitle us to six members. How did the matter stand in 1891? We were then entitled to five members, minus 5,422, but inasmuch as that deficiency did not amount to half the unit of representation (11,450), it did not count against us. So I have proved the second proposition. Now, Sir, we came into confederation with six members. How do you account for that? I have shown that we were only entitled to five on the basis of population. Why, then, did we come in with six? The answer to that question solves the whole difficulty. We came in with six because of the reasons assigned by our delegates in 1864. We came in with six not because we were entitled to six on the basis of population, but because we became entitled by the terms of the contract. We came into confederation on special terms. What is the distinction between general and special terms? Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, united in 1867, came in under general terms. The general terms were embodied in the Confederation Act. That is the original contract. By that contract if there be a diminution of population in one of the four provinces, there must be a diminution in the representation of that province, and if there is an increase in population, there must be a corresponding increase in the representation. These are general terms, and apply only to Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Special terms apply to all provinces coming in after 1867 to Manitoba, to British Columbia, and to Prince Edward Island. There is a provision in the British North America Act, that when any province shall thereafter desire to come into the union, it shall set forth its special terms by petition. That petition is presented to the Imperial Council, and by an Imperial Order in Council, the province is federated on the terms that set out in the petition. If there be any variance between the general and special terms the latter necessarily control. Now, Sir, I want to call your attention to the wording of section 12 of our petition. The first portion of the section states:

Notice particularly the wording. It says that there has been an increase of population since 1861 of 15,000. That would give an alleged population of 95,857 in 1873. Our petition sets forth, 'We have a population of 95,857, consequently we are entitled to six members.' That is no reason at all on general terms—on a basis of population. Why? Because you would then have to take into account the comparative population of the other provinces. But Prince Edward Island simply contended, and the contention prevailed, that because we have a population of 95,857, therefore we are entitled to six members, no matter what the unit of representation may be. I submit that that argument is directly in line with the propositions I have already enunciated, and confirms and strengthens them. And it goes to show not only that we were entitled to six members when we entered confederation, but that we were to be entitled to six for all future time. The argument boldly and bluntly is : we have a population of 95,857, therefore we are entitled to six members. If that argument availed in 1873, it applies with greater force to-day. Our population has not increased like that of the other provinces, but in 1891 it stood at 109,078. Now, I want to call attention to the latter part of section 12 :

The representation to be readjusted from time to time under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867.

What does that mean ? That clause is, to my mind, open to two constructions. One is in line with my argument, namely, that it refers simply to an increase of representation and not to a diminution. Now, I think I can strengthen my contention on that point by referring to Manitoba and British Columbia at the time those provinces were confederated. British Columbia came into confederation in the year 1870, and it came in on special terms. At that time it had a population, exclusive of Indians, of 10,586. This would entitle it under the general terms of union to a representation of one member ; but it came in with six—one for every 1,764 of its population. In 1881 the population was 49,459. It was then entitled to two members under the general terms, and yet it was allowed to retain six. In 1891 its population was 98,173, which entitled it to four members, but it was allowed to retain six. I am not pointing out these facts for the purpose of complaining against British Columbia. It had a right to dictate and insist upon its own terms. I am pointing them out to show that far better terms were accorded to British Columbia than to Prince Edward Island. I am pointing them out to show that British Columbia neither at the union nor since was entitled on the basis of population to six members, yet it has been allowed to retain six. There is a clause in the British Columbia petition providing :

British Columbia is entitled to be represented by six members, the representation to be increased under the provisions of the British North America Act.

That is exactly the provision, only expressed in more definite terms, which I contend was intended, under sec. 12 of the petition of Prince Edward Island. There is nothing said here as to what would happen in the event of a diminution of population. Suppose the population of British Columbia had gone down ; supposing no mines had been discovered, and the inhabitants had gone elsewhere, what would have happened ? British Columbia would still have claimed that she was entitled to be represented by six members in the Commons. But it would only be a matter of argument or inference.

Now, let us look for a moment at Manitoba. She was not brought into the union by an Imperial order in council, but by an Imperial Act. Nevertheless, she came in on special terms. What were they ? The population of that province in 1870 was 10,586, and the unit of representation was then 18,330. Thus, Manitoba was entitled only to one member on the basis of representation by population. Nevertheless, she came in with four. In 1881 she had a population of 65,954, the unit of representation was then 20,090, which entitled her to three members, yet still she was allowed to retain four. Manifestly Manitoba has been far better treated than Prince Edward Island.

Provided that, on the completion of the census in 1891, and of each decennial census after, the representation of the province shall be readjusted according to the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act.

That is exactly the provision in the Act governing the admission of Prince Edward Island. But how has it been construed in the case of Manitoba ? It has been so construed that she was not only entitled to four members when she came into the union, but to four members thereafter until her representation should be increased. That is the interpretation which I am seeking to have placed upon an exactly similar section governing the representation from Prince Edward Island.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Did not the population of Manitoba, in 1881, and again in 1891, justify her having four members under the readjustment clause ?

Mr. BELL (P.E.I.) No, in 1881 her population was 69,954, and that entitled her to three members only.

Here then are three provinces—British Columbia, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island all coming in on the same footing—on special terms. It would be manifestly unjust to apply to the case of Prince Edward Island a principle—a mode of interpretation which is not applied to the others. Let us be fair all round and apply the same interpretation to the Act of Confederation in each case. If we do so we will not attempt to diminish the representation of Prince Edward Island.

But suppose for argument's sake we put a different construction upon this section. Suppose we interpret it to imply a diminution in the representation. Look at the consequences that will then follow. The first is that our representation of five members will soon be further reduced. Take the figures for 1891. We had not then a population sufficient to entitle us to five units of representation by 5,422. If that condition of things goes on, if the unit of representation increases as it has done, if our population remains stationary as in the past our representation will be reduced from five to four. At the next succeeding census it will be still further reduced and so on until it is wiped out altogether. We will then have only our representation in the Senate to safeguard our interests.

I ask hon. gentlemen, in view of the facts I have presented do they think that such a condition of things was contemplated by any one at confederation? Insist on such a construction of the terms and you will not only do a wrong to Prince Edward Island, but produce a state of feeling disastrous to confederation. The people will never submit to such an injustice. Further, if we put such a construction upon the terms of union the necessary implication will be that our delegates who agreed to the terms were either fools or knaves. They were fools if they could not forecast our stationary population and the rapid increase of the rest of the Dominion. We had no mines or fertile unsettled lands to attract immigrants. Or if they saw all this and yet for some temporary purpose or to gratify some personal ambition, they signed away our right of representation and sacrificed our permanent interests—they were knaves. But such imputation no man will willingly cast.

Further, if we put such a construction upon the terms of union with Prince Edward Island it will be out of harmony with the express conditions laid down by our delegates when discussing the terms—out of harmony with the reasons assigned for giving us and allowing us six members from 1873 to 1891—out of harmony with the declaration of section 12, that a population of 95,857 entitled us to six members—out of harmony with the construction put upon similar British Columbia and Manitoba statutes—out of harmony with every intention of the parties to the contract and opposed to every principle of common fair-play and justice.

Again, if we put such an interpretation as will be conformable to the views and wishes of the people of Prince Edward Island we are not creating a precedent that can be taken advantage of by any other province. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec, came into confederation on general terms specified in the Confederation Act. There is no question as to how that Act is to be interpreted. But the others—Manitoba, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, or any province that you may carve out of the North-west Territories, or the province of Newfoundland if it comes in—any province that has come in or may come in after the year 1867, has come in or will come in on the special terms set out in its petition seeking confederation. There is no danger therefore of establishing a dangerous precedent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have presented this matter as clearly as I could, and as briefly as I could, consistent with the importance of the question. It is a matter of supreme importance to us. It is a matter of life or death politically. I press these considerations upon the attention of the government. I appeal to them on behalf of the people of Prince Edward Island for justice; I have every confidence that I shall not have appealed in vain.

Mr. MARTIN. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.) who has just sat down. He has brought before the House a question of great importance to the province of Prince Edward Island. By the terms of confederation, the province of Prince Edward Island was entitled to six members, the number to be readjusted after each decennial census. After the census of 1891, it was found that the province had not increased at the same ratio as the province of Quebec, and consequently the representation of Prince Edward Island was cut down from six members to five. I sympathize very much with the argument the hon. gentleman has presented to the House. I think he has admitted that it is impossible, under this Bill to secure to the province of Prince Edward Island the six members which he claims, yet he supports the Bill, and as he has put a notice on the Order paper in reference to this question, I would rather have had it discussed separately. I was sorry that so many members of the government, including the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), were absent when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.) was making his speech. I was especially sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), though he is now in his seat, was absent during the greater part of the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.)

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was not absent.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) took his seat when the hon. member for Prince was about half through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is mistaken.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman was certainly not in his seat. I was sorry also that the noise in the House during the time the hon. member for Prince was discussing this subject, combined with the low tone in which he spoke, prevented my getting the benefit of his whole argument, which, I have no doubt, was presented with great ability. But, inasmuch as this Bill does not provide any change in the representation as between the provinces, the discussion the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell, P.E.I.) has introduced will be of very little effect as far, at any rate, as this Bill is concerned. He appears to be contented with discussion. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries was in this House in 1892 when the last Redistribution Bill was passed; and if there is any one to whom blame should be attached that the representation of Prince Edward Island has been decreased from six to five, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is the man at whose door that blame should be laid. In 1892, when the last Redistribution Bill was before the House, was the time for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), to stand up and plead the cause of Prince Edward Island, if we were entitled to six members. We know that he is a great authority on constitutional law; and if the argument that was presented by my hon. friend from East Prince (Mr. Bell) has any foundation at all, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is culpable, he was neglectful of the interests of Prince Edward Island, in 1892, when the Redistribution Bill was introduced. I do not see that at any time he raised the question. The speech of the hon. gentleman has no effect as regards the operation of this Bill, for the Bill leaves Prince Edward Island practically with five members, as it was before. But there was, perhaps, a reason why the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in 1892, did not wish for two members for King's County. He knew, very well, that if there were two members for King's County, those two members would be Conservatives; and I suppose that is the reason why he has not been very alert in this matter or very attentive to the hon. gentleman for East Prince, when he was addressing the House.

But the hon. member for East Prince sees an anomaly in Prince Edward Island under this Bill. Prince Edward Island is divided into three counties; the population of King's County is 26,000; of Prince, 36,000; and of Queen's, 45,000. Those are the figures in round numbers. If there were two members for each of these counties, there would be no great difficulty in allocating them as between the counties. But Prince Edward Island, having lost one member, when you had to divide five members between three counties, there was no fairer way to do it than was done under the Bill which was introduced in 1892. Notwithstanding what has been said here by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that Bill was accepted in Prince Edward Island as a fair one; and in the election of 1896, though the hon. gentleman has stated on the floor of this House that the Bill was distasteful to the people of Prince Edward Island, it was never discussed during the campaign, but was accepted as a fair Bill dividing the island into five ridings, as fair as it could be, having regard to representation by population. Now, how is the representation divided under the Bill of 1892? The riding of King's has a population of 21,694; East Queen's has a population of 23,464; West Queen's has a population of 22,210; East Prince has a population of 20,723; and West Prince, 20,987. That was as fair a division of Prince Edward Island into five ridings as could possibly be obtained. Although the hon. gentleman raised a dust about it here, there was never any fault found with it in that province.

Now, if you go back to county lines, I will point out to the House, that you will create in Prince Edward Island, a great anomaly. King's County has a population of 26,000 under this amendment, and it will have one member. Prince County, which has only 10,000 people more than King's, will have two members; Queen's County will have two members also. But when you come to the voting power of these counties, that anomaly is actually still greater. The voting power in Queen's is only 9,927; the voting power in King's County, according to the voter's lists at present, is 7,120; and in Prince it is 8,198. That is to say, Prince County, with only 1,000 more than King's County, will have two members. It means, that in Prince County, one member would represent 7,120 votes, and the other member will only represent 1,000 votes; or in other words, in Prince one member would represent 4,000 people, and in King's, one member would represent 7,000 people.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated in the debate which took place on this question last year, that three townships were dumped into the riding that I have the honour to represent, which gave a majority of 300 votes to the Conservative party. Now, Sir, when the hon. member addresses himself to this subject again, I hope he will speak with some accuracy. I know it is very difficult for the hon. gentleman to speak with accuracy in regard to figures. I know if he can get within a couple of millions of the fact, when he talks about the debt of the Dominion, it is doing pretty well for him; and when he talks about majorities he is satisfied if he can get within a few hundred of the number. Now, instead of it being a fact, that I went into the election in my county with a majority of 300 in my favour, I will show this House that I went into that election with only 40 votes in my favour. That will be apparent from the figures that I am going to quote on the basis of the election of 1892. The three townships in King's County which were added to Queen's, showed the following results: In the election of 1892, Mr. John McLean, who ran as a Conservative, got 433 votes; and Dr. Robinson, who ran in the Liberal interest, got 400 votes. In those three townships, there was a difference of only 33 votes; so that instead of, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says, 300 votes being dumped into East Queen's from King's County, the actual fact is, that there were only 33 votes, and I believe that the hon. gentleman was afraid to contest that riding for fear of those 33 votes.

But, there is another thing. I am going to show that the division which has been made in Prince Edward Island gave no party any advantage whatsoever. When I tell you the majorities in each of those ridings, you will see that every riding is very close. We will take first the riding of King's. The majority that the Conservative member had in King's County, was only 15 votes. Does that show that there was any attempt made to gerrymander that province, so far as King's is concerned? It was that close that there was only 15 votes between the candidates. Take, then, the riding of West Queen's. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in this House that he had had a majority of 374; but he is inaccurate as usual, because he only had 334. But I suppose that is about as near correct as we can expect him to get when talking about figures. What was his object in misrepresenting that vote? His object was to show that the Redistribution Act of 1892 was not fair, because he got a large majority in his riding. But he misled the House, because his majority was not nearly as large as he said it was. Take East Queen's, which I have the honour to represent in this House. True, I had a majority of 354, but according to the returns from the election held in 1892, the majority in my favour, when I went into that riding, was only 40. Although I increased it from 40 to 354, that was not the result of this redistribution. Take East Prince; the hon. gentleman who is now Senator Yeo, was returned for East Prince by a majority of 116. He was, of course, a very strong man. His successor, the hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell), who spoke this afternoon, came in with a very much smaller majority, which shows that the riding is nearly balanced, and that there is no advantage for either side. As far as that is concerned, it has returned two Liberals on both occasions. Take West Prince; the majority received by Mr. Hackett, who is not now a member of this House, was only 45. Since that time, in a by-election, that majority was reversed, and in place of having a Conservative member returned for West Prince, we have now the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLellan), who sits on the Liberal side of this House, not with a very large majority, to be sure, but, he is a member of this House. This shows that in every riding in Prince Edward Island, as created under the Bill of 1892, there was no attempt to do anything but that which was in accordance with British fair-play. The result of every one of these elections showed it. Hon. gentlemen pretend to worship the old system of county lines, but, I think, it is the most barefaced hypocrisy. There are no municipalities in Prince Edward Island, as in Ontario, and the argument for county lines has no force in Prince Edward Island. While, as has been said here by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr.

Mr. MARTIN.

Clancy), hon. gentlemen shout for county lines in this House for the Dominion, we find the legislature of the province of Ontario breaking through these lines without any compunction. When these hon. gentlemen are in opposition and have not a majority at their back, they pretend to be very good, they pretend that they have no political object in view, that they are great purists, but as soon as they get into power, and they have been in Ontario for a long number of years, they have no compunction about breaking through these sacred county boundaries in that province. In the city of Ottawa, under this very Bill, they have shown a disregard for those county boundaries for which, they say, they have so much regard. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us, in speaking upon this Bill, the other night, that there were two cardinal principles in it, one of which was the appointment of judges. I would like to know, if that is a cardinal principle, why, judges are not appointed for the province of Prince Edward Island? Why limit them to Ontario? Is it a cardinal principle that only applies to one province and not to another? It is a cardinal principle as far as it applies to Ontario. It is not a cardinal principle when it does not apply to Prince Edward Island. Another cardinal principle, according to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is county lines. I have shown that hon. gentlemen have not adhered to that principle, in the province of Ontario in regard to representation in the local legislature, that they have not adhered to it under this Bill. They have not adhered to it in Ontario, excepting in places where it suits them, and where it suits them they pretend that it is such a sacred right that they make a fetish of it and fall down and worship it. They say of course that business is business. Well, it seems to be in this as in other things. When party gain is the object they throw principle to the winds. I am going to point out that a tradition of the Liberal party from time immemorial was representation by population. There is no attempt, as far as I can see, in this Bill to adopt that principle. I will quote what Hon. George Brown said in regard to representation by population. Here are the debates on confederation, and Mr. Brown, at page 994, said:

I think the hon. gentleman has risen for a very poor purpose. And in place of accepting his explanation as correct, I dissent from it in toto. The position of the matter is quite the opposite of what he states. He says this is a different thing altogether. I totally deny that it is. I say this is simply what we asked for, only in another form. The measure we asked for was representation by population. We got that. (Hear, hear.) And the hon. gentleman is the last man to object to this, which is the very basis on which he agreed to go into the Brown-Dorion administration—representation by population being the basis, accompanied by such checks and guarantees as might be shown to be necessary.

I could give statements by Mr. Mackenzie and others in the same strain, but I do not think it is necessary, because it is nothing new for the Liberal party to depart from the principles which they held in opposition and to throw them to the winds as soon as they get to the government benches. There is another thing that I wish to draw your attention to, Mr. Speaker, and it is to the fact that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, while addressing himself to this subject the other night, threatened the Senate. Judging by the way that the hon. gentleman shook his fist, and the war-like appearance he put on, I think the Senate must have trembled under the weighty threats of the hon. gentleman. I am sure that every fibre in the bodies of the senators must have trembled when the hon. minister raised his fist and threatened what would be done to them if they opposed this Bill. The hon. minister, while addressing this House in 1892, brought the House back to the introduction of the great Redistribution Bill in England in 1884, and he said that both parties had met in conference and came to an agreement in regard to the Bill which was to be presented to the House. Did he read what the Earl of Kimberley said then as to the privileges of the Lords, which I will quote here ?

Your lordships have undoubtedly the most perfect right to reject the Bill, and to reject it with the direct view that the result may be a dissolution of parliament.

Lord Rosebery said :

Every member of this House who has spoken upon this Bill has taken it for granted that this House has a perfectly indefeasible right to reject it.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries stands up in this House and predicts that the Senate is going to reject this Bill. I am not in the confidence of the Senate. He must think that, this year, the reasons which he advanced in this House for the passage of the Bill will have only half the weight that the reasons had last year. Last year the census was two years off, and this year, the fact that the census will be taken in a year hence shows that the bringing down of this Bill by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is merely an insult to the House, a great loss of valuable time—as well as great expense to the country. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is on record as predicting that a Bill just such as this would be introduced to this House. I quote from Hansard of 1892, page 3241, the words of the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), which shows that the minister is prophetic sometimes. He said :

Experience has shown to us that if the dominant party for the time being, when legislating on a matter affecting the very foundations of representative government, ignore the existence of their opponents—

The liberals are now doing this.

—and say, we will arbitrarily proceed to decide in this way or that way, the result has been and may be again almost to annihilate one of those parties; and when the party which is excluded for the time being happens by a combination of accidents to be returned to power—

That is just what happened. The present government has been returned to power in the way the minister predicted in 1892. He predicted that they would be returned by a combination of accidents, and that is what happened.

—that party will be, perforce, driven to adopt the same unjust and unfair system, and will introduce a Redistribution Bill not founded on justice or on the lines of the constitution.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries predicted that in 1892. He predicted that such a Bill as we have before us would be introduced here, and that it would not be founded on justice. While the constitutional law of the Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) may be at fault, as we would expect it to be, yet the hon. gentleman might have stood up in this House to plead the cause of Prince Edward Island for six members. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), in 1892, was apparently the only constitutional lawyer in the House from Prince Edward Island, and it would appear that he neglected the interests of his province at that time. The hon. member for East Prince (Mr. Bell) has done his duty to his province in bringing this matter before the House, and I am sorry, in the elections that are near, and which must come soon, that the province of Prince Edward Island will have to be satisfied with less than six members. I dealt with the question last year at such length that it is unnecessary for me to repeat what I said then. I do not believe that the government are in earnest with regard to this Bill, they are only marking time. They know it is not in the interests of the country, and they know that it is not such a Bill as Canada requires to-day. The census of 1891 are no basis on which to formulate a Bill for the proper representation of Canada in this House, and I am sorry that the time of the House is wasted in considering it. I see the hon. gentleman from St. John, N.B. (Mr. Ellis), in the House. Last year they stuck to the division in regard to his constituency, and they thought their proposition was right, but this year they have humbled themselves and they have wisely struck the provision with regard to St. John out of the Bill. There was no regard for county boundaries when that clause was put in the Bill; but the hon. member for St. John, N.B. (Mr. Ellis) brought the government to its knees. I would ask the Minister of Marine, if he has any influence at all with the government, to try and induce them to stike out the clause with regard to Prince Edward Island. He would be doing his province a good service if he would do that. I think it likely that if we had a lengthy discussion on the Bill, the government would amend it in such a way as to make it fairly acceptable to the people of Canada, but at the rate of progress in making those amendments we might fairly despair of making it a good Bill. There might be some justice done in the case of western Ontario, where this Bill proposes to gerrymander the Conservatives out of the House. I believe the honest people of Ontario will resent such a proposition as is contained in this Bill, and that the Bill will recoil on the heads of the government. It is my opinion that this is the most barefaced attempt at gerrymander which perhaps has ever been perpetrated in this House, notwithstanding what we heard from the Postmaster General and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) about the iniquities of the gerrymander Act of 1882.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) that a great deal of time has been wasted unnecessarily in the discussion of this Bill, and no one has wasted more time than he has and to such little purpose.

Mr. MARTIN. I spoke for only twenty-five minutes.

Mr. MILLS. He woke you up, anyway.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The arguments with regard to the province of Prince Edward Island were all advanced last year when the Bill was introduced. With respect to the argument of my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Bell), I listened to it with very great attention. I was not, however, able to follow him in the conclusion which he reached. He contends that under the terms of the union between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion of Canada, and especially under the terms of the 12th clause, that the island is entitled to retain its representation of six members which originally was given to it. The argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) was very carefully prepared and submitted to the House with a great deal of skill, but I myself am not able at present to agree with his conclusion, nor was I able to agree in that opinion in 1891. It did seem to me, whether I was right or wrong, that the latter part of section 12 was conclusive on that point. The whole section 12 reads as follows:

The population of Prince Edward Island having been increased by 15,000 or upwards since the year 1861, the island shall be represented in the House of Commons of Canada by six members.

If the clause had stopped there it might be argued that Prince Edward Island should continue to be represented by six members; but the latter part of the section says:

The representation to be readjusted from time to time under the provisions of the British North America Act.

My interpretation of the latter part of the clause is that when the census was taken in 1891, the representation should be re-

adjusted the same as in any other province of the Dominion. My hon. friend (Mr. Bell) has referred to the British Columbia clause, but he will notice that the British Columbia clause, instead of providing that the representation of that province should be readjusted from time to time as the Prince Edward Island clause did, went on to provide that the representation should be increased under the readjustment, and not merely 'readjusted,' as is the wording of the Prince Edward Island clause. It did not express in terms, as the Prince Edward Island clause did, that the representation was to be readjusted. However, I am very glad that my hon. friend has presented the argument which he has to the House, because the Department of Justice will have an opportunity to read it carefully, and to see whether or not they can come to a conclusion different from that which the Minister of Justice arrived at in the year 1891. If they do, or even if they have any reasonable doubt on the subject, the matter can be submitted to the Supreme Court under the law which provides for a reference of that kind. For myself, I may say that I entertain the same opinion that I did in 1891, and I am very much afraid that the words of the clause are conclusive against us. At the same time, I am perfectly willing that the matter should be carefully considered by the Department of Justice. So far as the representation is concerned, Prince Edward Island, having a representation of only five members, the question was: How was the island to be divided to give a fair representation? Was the principle of population to be the only one to govern, or were the county boundaries which had existed in the island from time immemorial, to control? We contended that county boundaries should be maintained there as in other parts of the Dominion. We knew not why the principle that was held sacred in other parts of the Dominion should not be held sacred in Prince Edward Island. For over one hundred years these county boundaries have been in existence in the island, the people have been accustomed to meet in the county towns on grand juries and for other purposes, and there was no reason that we could see why those boundaries should be ignored, townships taken out of one county and put into another, and electoral districts carved up for the mere purpose of promoting the interests of the political party which happened to be in power when the readjustment was made. The hon. gentleman talks about injustice. He ought to be ashamed to stand up in his place and talk about injustice. What was done in order to carve out a constituency to enable him to come to this House? Three townships were taken out of King's county and dumped into East Queen's, and township 24, which, geographically, was in West Queen's, was taken away and dumped into East Queen's; and the hon. gentleman would not have been here if these four townships had not been torn from the geographical divisions to which they naturally belonged, and transferred to the division where they had no business to be.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say a word?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Again, on the other side, three townships were taken from West Queen's and transferred to East Prince, where the people were never accustomed to go, and Summerside was made the county town, though for over a hundred years Charlottetown had been the county town. What do we propose to do? We say that the county lines shall remain as they have always been since confederation, when Queen's, Prince and King's each returned two members; and when we lost one member, owing to the decrease in population in 1891, the county that should lose the member naturally should be the county having the smallest number of voters. Which is that county? Queen's county had a population of 46,000 within 25, which was more than sufficient to give it two members, and nobody would question its right to have two members. The population of Prince county was a little below what was necessary to give it two members. It had 36,470, a few short of the number; but King's county had a population of only 26,633, only 3,600 more than the unit. The natural subdivision, therefore, was to leave Prince county with two members, and Queen's county with two members, and to give King's county one member. That is what we have done. There is no tearing away of townships from their natural geographical division. Every township remains where it should remain; the electors vote in their own county. Not a man is taken out of the political division where he has always been accustomed to vote, and which has existed for over a hundred years. That is a complete answer to all that the hon. gentleman has said. We seek no political advantage. We want to leave the electors of King's county to vote in King's county, we want to leave the electors of Queen's to vote in Queen's, and we want to leave the electors of Prince to vote in Prince; and in giving two members to Prince, two to Queen's and one to King's, we act on the same principle by which two members are given to the county of Cape Breton, represented by the hon. leader of the opposition, two members to Pictou, and two members to Halifax. The hon. gentleman, showing an ignorance that I was ashamed of, coming as he does from Prince Edward Island, asks: 'Why do you not apply the principle of appointing judges to Prince Edward Island?' The hon. gentleman ought to know, if he has read the Bill at all—I do not think he can have done so—that there was no occasion for applying that principle to Prince Edward Island, because the counties there were not subdivided, and the judges' aid is only invoked when the counties are subdivided. In Prince Edward Island the controlling principle of county boundaries is applied; the other principle is not applicable. It is only when the population is so large as to necessitate a subdivision of the counties that the judges are called to do the work which, if hon. gentlemen were in power, would, I fancy, be done by the politicians. There could be no possible objection taken by anybody to calling in the judges to do that work, because we could be sure that substantial justice and fair-play between the electors and the different parties in the state would prevail; and, therefore, we introduced that principle. I discussed the principle of maintaining county boundaries on the second reading of the Bill, and I have now shown its application to Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman has not been able to present a single argument to the House that the application of this principle to Prince Edward Island would work injustice to either political party.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, having expressed my opinion in reference to this measure on the second reading, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length, further than to say that having given the subject and the discussion on both sides of the House the fullest consideration, I am still confirmed in my opinion that the government are not serious in proposing this Bill as a piece of practical legislation. They may have some latent object which they have not fully disclosed, but my impression is confirmed, from the mode in which the hon. Postmaster General introduced the Bill, and the mode in which it has been dealt with, that there is no serious expectation on the part of the government that it will ever become law. I was not in the House when the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) spoke, but from what I gathered, he gave utterance to a threat against the Senate in case that body should venture again to reject this measure. I learned that with a great deal of surprise, because I think the precedent has been incontrovertibly established that the Senate has a perfect right to exercise its judgment on this as on every other measure.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has misunderstood the position I took. I said that if the principle we sought to apply to the subdivisions of counties were not accepted by the Senate, it might happen that the government would adopt, at another time, another mode of subdivision.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's correction, but

I think the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) suggested that if the government were not able to carry this measure through the Senate, they would have to adopt some other means of reaching the end in view. At all events, such an inference might fairly be drawn from some of the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think there is any real controversy in this House as to the absolute right and power of the Senate to exercise its judgment upon a measure of this kind as upon any other measure. If we go to the mother country, we will find that question settled beyond controversy. We will find that the House of Lords has maintained, and that both parties have admitted, its absolute right to deal with measures of this kind. But I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the Senate acted under a threat last year. It acted under a threat made by the government that before the House rose, they intended to submit a measure for the purpose of reforming that body in such a way as to enable the will of this House to prevail, although opposed by a majority of the Senate. I may say that my right hon. friend adopted that policy knowing that under the British North America Act—which is virtually a treaty between the provinces of this Dominion and the central power of the parliament of Canada—he could not take the first step towards changing the constitution of the Senate without having first secured the absolute authority of all the local legislatures. He therefore adopted the policy of calling upon the local legislatures to pass resolutions in favour of the principle that he had declared with regard to the Senate. Some legislatures did pass such a resolution, but the result has not been very encouraging to the government. I do not intend enlarging on that point because it is really not before the House, but wish simply to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that he has obtained one verdict, and a very important verdict, of the people on that question as well as others. The legislature in which he had a greater power, control and influence than almost any other legislature in the Dominion, passed a resolution which my right hon. friend submitted for its consideration and support, and committed itself to the policy propounded by him with regard to the Senate. Well, what has become of the majority in that legislature? There has been an appeal to the people, the sovereign voice of the people has been heard, and that legislature, which four years ago had but six opponents to the Liberal party out of forty members, is to-day almost entirely Conservative, the Liberals having been almost swept out of existence. The powerful party which had an overwhelming majority in the legislature a year ago, and passed my right hon. friend's resolution, has now almost completely disappeared, and its leader is so discredited that his own followers are abandoning him. I will not dwell longer on that subject, but I rose for the purpose of making a proposal to my right hon. friend, and especially the hon. Postmaster General, which I hope will receive every favourable consideration. One of the great grounds on which the party in power in this House claims that there ought to be a Redistribution Act is that political influences were so used as to lead to a gerrymander, especially in Ontario. They have gone some length in the direction of showing that the redistribution of seats should not take place by the mere political action of one party or the other, who may be in power. They have committed themselves very strongly to the position that the judiciary, for which we have all such high regard, should be introduced into this question, so as to prevent such an Act from having the party character attributed by hon. gentlemen opposite to the Act of 1882. I think I may say that I have established by the most incontrovertible evidence that they were entirely wrong as to the character of that Act, that the last general election proved beyond controversy that a minority of Liberals in the province of Ontario had succeeded in electing a majority of the representatives from that province; and that is entirely fatal to and disposes at once and for ever of any charge of the country being so gerrymandered as to favour the Conservative party. But, as I say, I do not intend to repeat myself in regard to that. I believe that there is something in the suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite that the redistribution should be so carried out as to prevent the charge, whether well-founded or ill-founded, being made by either one party or the other, that political influence had led to unfairness in the carrying out of such a measure. The present Bill accomplishes no such purpose; for, though the judges are introduced into it, they are so manacled, their hands and feet are so bound, as to prevent their exercising any practically effective choice. This Bill takes away any judicial authority from anything they could do. All they are allowed to do is, within certain boundaries and under certain restrictions, to make certain constituencies. So, while you place the judiciary in a position to have them charged with acting unfairly and not from an independent standpoint, you absolutely deprive them of the power of vindicating themselves against such a charge. This, I think, is a most vicious principle to introduce into the Bill.

But the great cardinal objection on this side of the House—and I am not without hope that our words of dissent will find an echo on the other side—is the inopportune time at which this Bill is proposed. This objection, as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island has so well said, is twice as strong this year as it was when the Bill was introduced last year. Last year we were two years away from a census, we are now only one year away. Absolutely, this parliament before it rises has to deal with the provision for taking the census; and, instead of that census having any effect on this Bill, we are told—in fact, the Bill says so—that the only cognizance they can take of the great question—as everybody admits it to be, whether they say it should have a commanding influence or not—the question of population, is to refer to the census of 1891. Hon. gentlemen may not admit that representation by population is the supreme consideration, and may say that long-established boundaries and other things may be taken into consideration, but nobody questions that a leading and vital question in the whole system of constitution and government in Canada is this question of representation by population. That being the case, can anything more unreasonable be asked of this House than to commission a number of learned judges, in whose independence of action we have all confidence, to undertake the redistribution of constituencies according to the census that took place in 1891, when every intelligent man in the country knows that the movement of population has entirely changed the condition of things, and would render any distribution they could make on the basis of a census that served its purpose nine years ago, an absolute absurdity.

I do not intend to detain the House at this stage of the Bill, but shall read a resolution which I think ought to commend itself to the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the objections that they, no doubt, have to postponing redistribution is that there is a strong probability that after the census of 1901 is taken, as hon. gentlemen opposite, I think, agree pretty well, those who are sitting on your left, Mr. Speaker, will be on the other side of the House, and the distribution will take place under their management.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid we shall not be able to settle that question here just now, but will have to defer it a little. It is not very far off, but I think that hon. gentlemen opposite will be glad to know that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are prepared to go the length of saying that it would not be an unwise act for the parliament of Canada to adopt the great principle consecrated by the combined action of both parties in the mother country of removing this question of the redistribution of seats from political influence altogether. I do not hesitate to say that, regarding this proposal that has occupied a little of our time, as not a very serious one, I wish to submit to the consideration of the House, and especially hon. gentlemen opposite, a measure which, I think, ought to command their hearty and united support, and which I frankly express the hope, if not the expectation, will command that support. I will read the resolution, which will speak for itself:

That all the words after the word 'That' in the original motion be struck out, and the following substituted instead thereof:

In the opinion of this House, it is expedient to introduce in place of the present Bill a measure based on the following provisions: First, that a commission to consist of the chief justices of the highest courts of judicature in each of the provinces of Canada shall be appointed for the purpose of fixing the boundaries of each constituency entitled to elect a member or members to the House of Commons in each province of Canada, and to determine the number of members to be elected for each constituency in accordance with the British North America Act.

That such commission, in so doing, shall consider the distribution of population according to the then latest census of Canada and the public interest and convenience, and shall particularly have regard to the principle of representation by population, and also have regard as far as practicable to the boundaries of counties, municipalities and cities.

That such commission shall be appointed as soon as possible after the completion of the next census and shall complete their work with all convenient speed.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, a stranger sitting in the gallery, this afternoon, when my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), placed in your hands, Sir, the amendment before the House, who had also been in the gallery when the discussion on the Redistribution Bills took place in 1882, and 1892, would have been surprised indeed to see the hon. gentleman at the head of the Conservative party coming down as he did, with the proposal contained in his amendment. This is no longer the language that we heard in 1882, or 1892; but, it is altogether a new proposition for the redistribution which must take place from time to time, according to the letter of the constitution. As to the merits of this amendment, I do not say a word at this moment, but I will call the attention of my hon. friend at once, and of the House likewise, to the fact that this amendment has actually no relevancy to the Bill before the House. It is altogether and absolutely foreign to the subject in hand. The subject which we have to dispose of is whether or not there shall be immediately, not after the next census, but immediately, a new redistribution of seats in the province of Ontario for the purpose, as was asserted, on this side of the House, last year, and reiterated again this year by my hon. friends, who are standing behind us, of remedying the wrongs inflicted upon the people by the redistribution of 1892, and still more, by that of 1882. But, the amendment does not provide anything at all which comes in contravention of any of the provisions which are contained in this Bill. This Bill has been fought with great tenacity by hon. gentlemen opposite, for two reasons. The first reason was urged last year, more vigorously than this year, that the Bill was illegal, that this parliament had no authority to pass such legislation at the present time. The hon. gentlemen contended, with great force last year, and the contention was maintained again this year, that parliament was absolutely powerless to pass such legislation, in fact, that the power of parliament on the subject of redistribution was limited to the conditions declared in the Confederation Act, and that a redistribution could only take place after each decennial census. The hon. gentleman contended for a long time, and with great tenacity for the truth of this proposition. Failing in this, he took a new line of defence, and the new line of defence which he took was, that, although we might have the power to pass such legislation, still, it was not opportune to do so, in fact, the hon. gentleman held that it was extremely inopportune, for the reason that we were very near a new census, and that a new redistribution must take place within two or three years. Anybody would have expected, after the measure had been fought one session, and again this session upon these two lines, that, if an amendment were to be moved by the opposition, it would have proclaimed either of these two propositions, that it would have asserted that it was illegal, or that it was opportune to pass such legislation, but the amendment does not assert anything of the kind. It does not affirm that the measure which we propose is illegal, nor does it assert that it is inopportune, but it asserts, simply, that certain rules should be laid down under which a redistribution should take place, not now, but after the next census. Such an amendment can be passed or not, but if it were passed, it could not affect this measure. I have only, for my part, to congratulate the House upon the fact, that, at last the opposition have come to a better understanding of the principle which is to guide the House when a redistribution is to take place, which we have long maintained, and which we maintained in 1882, and again in 1892, that a redistribution should be made by a judicial authority upon lines laid down by this parliament. These hon. gentlemen took issue with us: they would not hear anything of the kind. They insisted, in 1882, that the redistribution, instead of being made by judicial authority, should be made by the authority of parliament, and they said the same thing in 1892. Here is, at least, a confession that upon both of these occasions they have, in their own estimation, abused the power of this House. My hon. friend stated this afternoon, that he was quite sure, that, when the electors were consulted, there would be a change of seats, and the hon. gentleman and his followers would come to this side of the House. It seems to me, if the hon. gentleman were as sure, as he pretends to be, that, after the next election the parties would change places and that the opposition would occupy the seats of power, the hon. gentleman would cling to the ideas that he, and his followers, had in 1882 and 1892, that they would insist upon doing their own redistribution, but realizing that their prospects are the reverse of bright, they pretend, that, if a redistribution is to be made, as it shall be made then, by the party now in power, it shall be made, not by that party, but by the authority of the courts. We have introduced in our legislation, a measure of redistribution by judicial authority. We have gone as far as we thought we could go under the present circumstances. The hon. gentleman says: We adopt the principle, but we want to go one better at the proper time. At the proper time, it will be quite opportune to discuss the measure as to how far judicial authority will be extended or restricted, but, at all events, for my part, I am thankful that we, at last, have the two parties in this House committed to the principle of redistribution by judicial authority. This was one of the things which the hon. gentleman stood by to-day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), tell us when they supported that?

The PRIME MINISTER. We supported it last year; we introduced it in this Bill also, and my hon. friend opposed it last year, although, this year he seems disposed to come to this view. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, this afternoon, thought that he would derive some comfort from the fact that there has been an election in the province of Manitoba, and that this election turned out to the profit of the Conservative party. My hon. friend told us this afternoon, that if the Liberal party has been defeated in Manitoba, it is on account of the attitude and of the policy of this party in regard to the Senate. It seems to me that it is not very many days ago, not more than two or three weeks ago, that, I heard, and everybody heard, my hon. friend say, that, if the Liberal party had been defeated in the province of Manitoba, it was not on account of the policy of this party on the Senate question, but upon the tariff question and upon the Yukon question. It was because we had not carried out our pledges in regard to the tariff. It is true that my hon. friend, after having stated that a Liberal newspaper had said that the contest was between Mr. Greenway on the one side, and Sir Charles Tupper on the other side, my hon. friend hesitated to say that it was not so, that it was not between Mr. Greenway and my hon. friend, but he said that it was between Mr. Greenway on the one side, and Mr. Hugh John Macdonald on the other side. I have only this to say, that I am not much scared by the result of the elections in Manitoba. It may be that the statement which we had the other day from my hon. friend, is true, that the people of Manitoba are disappointed on the question of the tariff, but I want to know from my hon. friend, if they voted against Mr. Greenway because they were not thoroughly satisfied with the tariff, what they would expect from the hon. gentleman? Why should they take office from us and give it to him? Does my hon. friend remember the colloquy which once took place between Charles II. and his brother, the Duke of York. Charles II. was not a very good man, but he had some redeeming points in his favour, whereas the Duke of York had no redeeming qualities at all. Charles II., at all events, was clever, and one day when the Duke of York came to him and offered him his protection against possible assassination, Charles replied: Don't be afraid, brother, no one will kill me to make you king. So I say to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper): No one will kill this government to let him get into power. I am not at all scared at what the results of the elections in Manitoba may predict for us. Coming back to the amendment, Sir, I have to ask the House to consider that it really is not an amendment at all to this Bill. It does not provide an alternative measure to the Bill which we propose, and upon which we determine to have a redistribution now, and not after the next session. The amendment provides simply for the redistribution of seats after the census, and I have only to say to my hon. friend, that when the time comes we shall be prepared to discuss it, but at the present time, I have only to ask the House to vote it down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Whatever the amendment proposes or does not propose, there is one thing very certain, and that is, that it does not please the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) or his supporters. The right hon. gentleman has discussed the amendment with scarcely that fairness and that completeness which such an important amendment deserves. This House is very often stirred by party strife, and there are two subjects which engender that party strife more than any other subjects we discuss; one, the conduct of our elections, and the other, the rearrangement of our constituencies. I think I am within the judgment of the House when I say, that the resolution proposed by the leader of the opposition, if adopted by the government of the day, would be the most potent factor which this parliament has adopted in all its history, for the removal of that party strife, and that party contention, and that party bitterness which so often characterizes the conduct of the sessions of the Canadian parliament. The right hon. gentleman expresses his great surprise that such a resolution should be moved by the hon. the leader of the opposition, remembering his attitude in the past. Well, Sir, the same charge has been flung against the hon. the leader of the opposition upon many an occasion, but I have yet to see the occasion in this parliament when that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was shown to have been inconsistent in his long career in dealing with public questions and with public policy. But, Sir, if a stranger, coming to the gallery after the absence of a number of years, would be surprised at the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition, how much greater would he be surprised on listening to the statements which have been made by the leader of Her Majesty's government; cheered as they were by his supporters. Why, Sir, I asked the right hon. gentleman a question as to when he advocated the re-legation of the redistribution of seats in the Canadian parliament to the judiciary, and the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) answered me as though that had always been his policy. Will the Prime Minister permit me to read these lines from Hansard, the record of the proceedings of this House. They are the report of an address delivered by a gentlemen who was then Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, leader of Her Majesty's opposition, but who is now the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of Her Majesty's government. These are the words uttered by him some six or seven years ago:

In some quarters it is said, and the suggestion is made, that the duty of redistributing the seats should be left to a commission of judges, specially appointed for that purpose. I am bound to say, Sir, that this is a proposition that neither myself nor my friends can accept.

That is the language of the leader of the government in 1892, and the man in the gallery who listened to that speech and who returned here in the year 1900, whatever be his surprise at the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, would be struck dumb at the forgetfulness of the right hon. the leader of the government, in claiming here to-night that he had been the exponent of judicial redistribution through all the years of his history. That is not merely a bald statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister. It is a statement argued out, and he goes on to say in his argument that parliament has the power over this matter; that parliament has only once relegated its powers to a judicial tribunal, and that is in relation to the trial of election petitions. This matter of the redistribution of seats in parliament is a matter over which parliament, he contended, should have control; and, therefore, he refused to accept the policy which is suggested in some quarters for the re-legation of these matters to a judicial tribunal, instead of the House of Commons itself dealing with them. But I am still further surprised at the right hon. gentleman. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) has told us that this Bill is introduced to carry out a pledge to the electors, to carry out a pledge to this House. I am here to-night to say to the Prime Minister and to his Postmaster General, that this Bill and the manner of its introduction into the House, is a flagrant violation of the terms of a distinct promise made to this House by the right hon. gentleman when he was leader of the opposition here. That is a pretty strong statement, but it is a statement which is borne out by the facts. How was this Bill arranged? Who drew it up? Was it drawn by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), or by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), assisted by their colleagues? Where was it conceived, where was it constructed? It was either constructed in a party caucus or in a party council, and I say to the Prime Minister that when he did that, and took that means of framing this Bill, he gave the falsehood to a declaration of principle which he made in this House not later than eight years ago. Very fortunately, we have here the resolution which was moved by the right hon. gentleman himself, in 1892, when the late Sir John Thompson moved the second reading of the Redistribution Bill. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) then was dealing on broad lines. He wanted the Conservative party in the House of Commons, then having a large majority, to forget its partyism, to adopt broad principles, to be generous for fair Canada, to let partisanship go and let Canada be on top. Here is what the right hon. gentleman proposed, and here is what the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), and the minister without portfolio (Mr. Sutherland), and all the leading Liberals voted for. I fancy that the stranger who sat in the galleries and saw these gentlemen voting for that resolution, would have been still more surprised when he heard of the manner in which this Bill was constructed, which this parliament is asked to adopt in the session of 1900. Here is the resolution which was moved by the Prime Minister:

Resolved, that Bill (No. 76), intituled 'An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons,' be referred to a conference or a committee, to be composed of both political parties, to agree upon the lines or principle upon which a Redistribution Bill should be drawn for presentation to this House.

That was a sacred promise given to the House, as to the policy of the right hon. gentleman and his supporters—the most direct promise that could be given; and here on the division list are the names of the gentlemen who supported it. Did the right hon. gentleman carry that pledge out? Was that committee or that conference called before this measure was introduced into the House of Commons, in order that partnership might be done away with? Not at all. The right hon. gentleman forgot it as he has forgotten other promises with regard to matters of public policy, and this Bill is a party Bill. Would the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) like to see the resolution I have quoted? I shall be glad to send it to him, because he voted for it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is quite aside from the point we are discussing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Customs can see very much more clearly than I can.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The House can see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, let us see how far aside I am from the point. A Redistribution Bill is introduced by the government in 1892, and the leader of the opposition proposes that the Bill shall be referred to a conference of both parties. I say that to be consistent the Prime Minister when he introduced this Bill should have done the same thing, and the Minister of Customs, with that clear intelligence which is cheered on the other side of the House, says that is quite aside from the mark. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing that the clear-sightedness of the hon. gentleman and myself, on that point at least, should go to the judgment of the House. Now, I thought that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) chose a very unfortunate moment in which to utter a prophecy which he made to the House this afternoon. He prophesied that if the Conservative party got into power, the House would find them adopting the strongest party tactics in the construction of a redistribution measure.

Mr. GIBSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend says 'Hear, hear;' but no sooner was the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries on his seat than the leader of the opposition rose to propose a motion, the adoption of which would for ever remove this party strife-stirring subject from the confines of the House of Commons, and place it where no party strife would be stirred as the redistribution would be done each ten years as the constitution requires. Well, Sir, what else did we find this afternoon? We found in the speech of my hon. friend for East Prince (Mr. Bell) an argument why this Bill should be dropped. That hon. gentleman declared that an injustice was done in Prince Edward Island. It is true, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries disagreed with him on that point. But supposing the statement of the hon. member for East Prince is correct. Here, we will say, is an injustice being done to Prince Edward Island by the Bill of 1892, in so far as the representation of that island in the House of Commons is concerned; and here is a Bill dealing with the representation of this Dominion in the House of Commons, and the hon. gentleman is absolutely unable to move an amendment which meets the case of that province. He is estopped by reason of the fact that the constitution proposed only to redistribute at each decennial census period. No better argument has been offered in this House, it appears to me, to show that this is not the time to introduce such a Bill, that it is not opportune, that the constitution never intended that a Bill of this kind should be introduced between the decennial periods. The right hon. leader of the government has said that the chief objection of this side of the House is that this parliament has not the power to pass such a Bill. The hon. gentleman is at fault again.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says 'Hear, hear.' I have not heard on this side of the House the contention that this parliament had not the power to pass the Bill. This parliament, I think, undoubtedly has the power to pass the Bill.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman surely can see that there is a difference between having the power to pass the Bill and this being the right time to pass the Bill. What this side of the House has contended, and is still contending, is that there is a time under the law when a Redistribution Act may properly be passed, namely, after each decennial census when indeed it has to be passed; and that no government unless it is anxious to obtain a party advantage, will pass such a Bill as this only one year previous to the decennial census period, when another Bill dealing with the same subject must necessarily be passed. That is the point that has been emphasized on this side of the House, and I venture to say that parliament has never before witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of a government legislating upon a subject so close to the time when they will be compelled, under the constitution of the country, to legislate upon it again. The Prime Minister, when he was dealing with this subject on another occasion, referred to the only matter with regard to which parliament had delegated its powers to the courts, that was, the trial of election petitions. Now, I do not think there could be two subjects more closely allied than the trial of election petitions and the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons. They are both questions upon which party majorities are likely to support and favour their friends. We know something of the history of the trial of election petitions in this House. No matter which party happened to be in power, nobody who lost by the decision was satisfied, I fancy, with the result. That subject was removed, and very wisely removed, from the House of Commons to the courts. Since that time we have had very little fault found with the decision of the judges in regard to contested election matters; and I venture to say that if the resolution moved to-night by the leader of the opposition were adopted, we should find in future years that instead of this everlasting bickering, disputing and quarrelling over the readjustment of constituencies, everybody would be as satisfied as they are to-day with the decisions of the courts upon contested election matters. Why will hon. gentlemen not adopt this resolution? There can be only one reason, that is, that they are anxious to pass this Bill—why? In order to gain a party advantage in the contest which must soon be upon this country. There is no other possible reason. No harm could come to any one by the adoption of the resolution. We all have perfect confidence in the judges of Canada. We all have perfect confidence in the chief justices of the various provinces of the Canadian confederation. We have that confidence to such an extent that we are not only willing to leave them to decide between individual and individual, or corporation and corporation, but between political parties, as well, confident that they will have due regard for the great national interests of this Dominion, and I repeat that the refusal of the government to adopt this amendment can only be due to one reason, namely, that they desire to get a party advantage in their next appeal to the constituencies. That may be a good reason for hard and fast party partisans, such as the right hon. gentleman and his followers, but I see before me, on the other side, men who are not elected as hard and fast party men. I see the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Pettet), the hon. member for West Bruce (Mr. Tolmie), the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and also the hon. member for Albert, N.B. (Mr. Lewis), and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), men who were elected on independent platforms, who pledged themselves not to be hard and fast, hide-bound party supporters, but to vote for what they believed to be in the best interests of the country. I want to ask these hon. gentlemen to-night whether they think they are serving their independent friends or keeping their independence pledges when they refuse to support a resolution which has for its object the removal of this very vexed question altogether from the arena of politics and the placing of it in hands which will do justice to both sides. There can be only one reason for opposing this amendment, and that is party advantage. These hon. gentlemen opposite have all the time claimed that they have no desire to make party advantage by this Bill, but only to remedy an injustice. They have now an opportunity of showing that they do not desire to make party advantage, and they can show this by adopting this amendment, and thus taking the matter entirely out of politics and placing it in the hands of the judiciary.

The right hon. gentleman gave us no reference to the conferences which were held when the last redistribution took place in the House of Commons in England. On a previous occasion, however, he discussed at very great length, and so did the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies), the beautiful proceedings, as they termed them, which took place in the House of Commons of England when that Redistribution Bill was introduced. After conferences had been held and a committee formed, that Bill was introduced as a result of the labours of that committee, acceptable to both parties. Will the right hon. First Minister permit me just to leave a thought with him? I would like to submit to the House that 'this redistribution should not take place according to the whim or fancy or the selfishness or the arbitrariness' I fancy that must refer to my hon. friend the Postmaster General—'whoever that majority may be, but that it should be carried on a fixed, determined and well-understood principle, to be applied on this and all other similar occasions.' That is the purpose of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, namely, that no longer a mere majority shall control, that no longer a self-interested majority shall control, that no longer an arbitrary majority shall control, but that fair-play and fixed principles shall be the rule, and the redistribution be done in that fair spirit and upon those fixed principles. These are the words spoken by the right hon. gentleman himself in the session of 1892, and I commend them now to himself, as well as to the members of his government and those hon. gentlemen who support him.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I agree with the right hon. leader of the government that there seems to have been some progress made in the direction of fairness by hon. gentlemen on the other side. They have profited somewhat by the education we have been endeavouring to give them, and are reaching by degrees, though rather slow degrees, to something like fairness in the measures they propose. I agree with the right hon. leader of the government that a very great change seems to have taken place in their opinion since last session, with reference to this Bill, which they now seek to wipe out of existence by this amendment. We do know—and the denial of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) does not alter the fact—that last year it was argued by a higher authority in the party opposite than that hon. gentleman—one whose opinions, it is true, have in times past been set aside by his followers, but who, after all, is recognized as more the leader of the party than the hon. member for Haldimand—it was argued strongly that we had not the legal or constitutional right to introduce this Bill, and the right hon. leader of the government is perfectly justified in drawing attention to the present change of front. This amendment was probably placed in that hon. gentleman's hands by the one who has just spoken, and to whom, if I am rightly informed, is due the credit, along with the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), of drafting this resolution. Although I cannot speak by the book, yet from the manner in which the hon. member for Haldimand defends the amendment, I have no doubt that he is the one who suggested it or had a good deal to do with the drafting of it. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the inconsistencies of the right hon. leader of the government and his party in connection with the question of redistribution, but I think he will find that in all the resolutions proposed by this side of the House, on that subject, the leader of the government did take the ground that it was not desirable that a party should take advantage of its numerical strength to pass a Bill arbitrary and unjust in its provisions, and he will find nothing in the Bill now submitted to the House, and which the hon. gentleman is seeking to wipe out of existence by his amendment, contrary to that principle. On the contrary, it embodies that as its fundamental principle.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the only object for the introduction of this Bill by the government is to take party advantage. But no gentleman on the other side has been able to point out wherein we seek party advantage. To say that there is party advantage in this Bill is equivalent to a declaration from the man who says it that he knows that the present state of things is iniquitous and unfair. That is necessarily involved, because if it is right and just that these constituencies as now adjusted should remain as they are, the judges will do what is right and fair in the readjustment, and these hon. gentlemen opposite need not be afraid. But the hon. gentleman says, and thinks he makes a great point of it, that we seek to gain party advantage, and he tells the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), and others, who were elected on independent platforms, that they assume a vast responsibility if they vote down this proposition of the leader of the opposition to refer this matter to the judges and remove these questions from the arena of party strife. But I think he has given these hon. gentlemen the best reason possible for voting down the resolution. Why? Because this resolution, while declaring that reference to the judges is the only fair and right principle, proposes that the application of that principle shall be postponed for a year or two, while the Bill which the resolution is intended to defeat says: We will give it effect to-night so far as this House is concerned.

As to the proposition made in 1892, the resolution that was introduced by the leader of the government was in connection with a Redistribution Bill properly so called, and with a redistribution as required under the Act after the decennial census. This Bill is not a Redistribution Bill in that sense; it is a Bill to repeal the iniquitous law that was put on the statute-book in 1882, and virtually renewed in 1892, and that has remained ever since against the protests of the Liberal party and the Liberal government. The amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition is no amendment to the Bill. Whatever virtue is in it will be a subject for consideration at the proper time, and I am not called upon to express an opinion with reference to it. But it has nothing to do with this Bill, which is not a Redistribution Bill as required by the constitution after taking the census, but simply to repeal the Gerrymander Act of 1882 and 1892. And now that we propose to repeal one of those infamous gerrymander Acts, hon. gentlemen opposite, by this declaration say that the matter ought to be left to the judges, thus declaring, in effect, that they are cognizant that the majority who sat in the House in 1882 and 1892, by virtue of mere party strength passed unjust and unfair measures. That being the case, our contention is fully established that this Act is simply to repeal the worst features of a measure infamous in its nature. If there is any strength in the argument of the hon. member for Haldimand, it goes to prove that.

We were told by the hon. leader of the opposition that the Senate were quite within their rights when they threw out this Bill. And he spoke of the English House of Peers and the powers they exercise. Well, I venture to say now, as I said the other night, that if the House of Lords in England were to throw out a measure that had been introduced in the House of Commons after it had been pronounced upon by the people in a general election, and if that Bill were introduced at a second session after by-election after by-election had been held in which almost without exception on this principle had been endorsed by the people at the polls, and the House of Lords were again to throw it out, the British government would not hesitate to use the reserve power in their hands to create enough new peers to give effect to the will of the people as expressed by their representatives. But the hon. gentleman says that the proposition for joint vote would change the relative positions of the provinces, and would be a violation of the Confederation Act. I suppose he would not argue that that would apply to the creation of new peers in the House of Lords. And I suppose that if we were allowed to indulge in the creation of new peers, as long as the proportion of representation of the various parts of the Dominion were maintained there would be no violation of the constitution or of the forms of the Upper Chamber. The resolution that has been moved simply indicates to me, that while the leader of the opposition, last year, in a shameless manner it seemed to me, if that be a parliamentary expression.—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I take it back if it is not parliamentary. I do not wish to use any expressions that are too strong. But I do say that the House witnessed an extraordinary scene last year when it saw the hon. the leader of the opposition in this House, a leader of the minority of the people's representatives, able, from his place in the House, to address senators sitting in the gallery of this House, and virtually give them instructions to cast out the Bill passed by the people's representatives. That was a scheme which I trust will not be repeated. We remember that he stated in the early part of this debate, when this Bill was first introduced: We do not intend to debate this Bill, and I ask my friends not to pay any attention to it whatever; if you will simply read my speech of last year you will see all that is necessary to be said in reference to it. Why was that? If you read his speech of last year you will see what he said, that he wound up his speech by virtually addressing the members of the other Chamber sitting in this gallery and telling them what they were to do with that Bill. Sir, is it possible that word has been brought to him by the messengers of his party? Has there been anything like a conference with the members of that judicial body who are supposed to do what is just and right, and have they given the hon. gentleman to understand that they do not consider it consistent with their dignity, with the importance of their House, with their consciences, in fact, a second time to reject this Bill simply because last year the leader of the opposition told them to do so? Have they told him that he must give them some kind of a herring to draw across the trail? Have some of his friends suggested to him, has the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), perhaps, suggested to him, that the best way to do it would be to work in something that looked like a judicial rearrangement of the boundaries and all that, and providing that this shall not take place for two or three years from now, something that will give the members of the Upper House a peg upon which they may hang their coats? I can imagine that something of that kind has transpired. At any rate, we find the hon. gentleman abandoning every position they took last year. We do not find them now addressing the members of the Senate, we find them introducing a resolution which they declare, in the words of the member for Haldimand, is for ever to take these vexed questions out of the party arena. The independent members of the House are appealed to, and are asked to vote for this righteous principle that they have introduced: whereas, if they vote for this amendment it will have the effect of wiping out this Bill, which proposes to give immediate effect to this righteous principle instead of waiting two years to do it. I leave the question for the consideration of the House.

Of course, as to the merits of the Bill there is no use going over that again. No man can stand up and defend these Bills of 1882 and 1892 that we seek to repeal by the present Bill: no man with any sense of shame will stand up and defend them. If there is, then, on the statute-book Acts so iniquitous that men dare not defend them, and if there is before the House a proposition to repeal those Acts, and in repealing them to do no injustice to any one, to leave the arrangement to three of the highest judges in the land, where is the gentleman who will take the ground that he would be justified in casting out this Bill? Why, Sir, they talk about representation having regard to population as one of the things they will ask the judges to consider when they propose this Bill of theirs. Very well, we also require here that the judges have some regard to the population of the county, we propose that it shall be done in such a way that the judges will do substantial justice. That is precisely what is required of the judges under the Bill that we have before us. Therefore, any gentleman who is in favour of that principle, who believes that it would be a good thing in a redistribution, when we come to consider the necessity for a redistribution, then he can support it. But, in the meantime, we are considering, not a Redistribution Bill but a Bill repealing some of the iniquitous clauses of the Bills that were passed in 1882 and 1892, that shackled the free expression of the people of this country. All we ask is that this Bill shall be given effect to, and that these judges shall enter upon their work at once, and that entering upon their work, they shall discharge it in the fair and impartial spirit that has ever characterized our judges. They will enter upon it not shackled, not bound, not in any shape controlled by this government, otherwise than is laid down in clause (b). But when they have regard to population within county bounds, they are not to disregard county bounds, as was done by hon. gentlemen under their specious plea of representation by population.

I pointed out the other night, as a sample of their work, one case which I will only mention on this occasion. The county of Oxford, that had about 49,000 souls, and could have been divided into two ridings, with just about the proper unit, they gerrymandered in this fashion: They took one Liberal township out of North Perth and threw it into Oxford, another out of South Perth and threw that into Oxford. Then they went into South Brant and took out two townships and threw them into Oxford, making an addition of a little over 9,000 in the population. Then they took out of the county of Oxford the township of Blenheim and put it into North Brant, and they took out the township of Dereham and put it into North Norfolk, thus overturning a whole chain of townships, which resulted in what? Not in equalizing the population, because there was just a difference of eight between the population they put in and the population they took out. Hon. gentlemen can see from this example—and that is only one of many similar iniquities in those Bills—how great is the necessity of the Bill that we have introduced remedying these glaring defects. We ask the House to remedy those defects and those iniquities, and to carry out the will of the people of this country. When this Bill is assented to, I for one am not prepared to assume that another Chamber receiving it for the second time will throw it out for the second time; I am not prepared to say that they will assume the responsibility of placing themselves in a position of saying that this parliament shall not give effect to a Bill remedying the injustice and the grievances that have existed from 1882 down to the present time.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to argue that we should not do anything until after another census has been taken. Sir, that consideration does not enter into this question at all. This Bill was introduced at the earliest possible moment that we were able in order to give effect to the will of the people, and if it has been delayed, it is because we had not power to deal with it. Now that the power is in our hands we propose to act, and it is no reason at all that because we are within a year or two of taking the census, when a redistribution of the various provinces must take place, we should not, meanwhile, repeal those unjust clauses that I have mentioned, and remove from the statute-book that which has been a blot upon it from 1882 down to the present time. I quite agree with what the leader of the government has said, that whatever virtue there may be in the amendment of the hon. gentleman, this is not the proper time to discuss it. The amendment does not at all touch the main principle of the Bill, because the Bill proposes to repeal an Act of this parliament that is to be found on the statute-book of Canada, that has existed up to the present time with reference to the representation in this House of certain portions of the province of Ontario and of the province of Quebec, and of some other constituencies. The proper time to consider this amendment will be when a redistribution will have to be made; but, in the meantime, I hope the House will not entertain the proposition which this amendment involves of wiping out this whole Bill, because the Bill calls for immediate action to remedy an existing evil, and suggests that certain measures shall be taken with reference to an entirely different matter to the subject of the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), who has just taken his seat, has addressed the House in his usual style. He has accustomed himself so much to mistaking sound and fury for good solid argument, that he believes he is making an impression on the House and the country. I view the statements made by the hon. Minister of Customs and by his leader, the right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), as showing that they are very much nonplussed in the first place, by the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and that, in the second place, they are very angry that the hon. leader of the opposition should have proposed such an amendment. Whatever virtues they may have claimed for themselves, whatever credit they may have taken, we can see in this House, and in this country, that they have been guided and actuated in this infamous gerrymander Bill by only one motive, a motive repeated time and again by the hon. Minister of Customs. What was that? He said: We are going to undo the work of 1882 and 1892. The work of 1882 was no gerrymander; it was a righteous redistribution of seats in the province of Ontario, and the proof of that lies in the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot point to a single hon. member on the other side of the House, who occupied a seat before 1882 who was dispossessed of his seat by the redistribution of that year. Every one of these hon. members retained his seat. They gained six seats in the province of Ontario as a result of this redistribution which we made to our political disadvantage. The hon. Minister of Customs had the hardihood to-night to challenge any hon. gentleman to point out where there is any party advantage in this Bill. Does it not seem, from beginning to end, with party advantage? Does he not know himself, and we have repeated it in this House over and over again, that he proposes to take the county of Brant, with 33,000 people—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Wrong.

Mr. WALLACE. With 33,000 people, which he dishonestly calls 36,500, as I shall prove to the House, and proposes to give that 33,000 people two members, or one for each 16,500 people, while, for the city of Toronto, with 225,000 people, or more, he proposes five members, or one for every 45,000 people in the Conservative city of Toronto, and one for every 16,500 people in the Liberal county of Brant. But, he says, that there are 36,500 people in the county of Brant. A more dishonest statement, politically, never was made in this House. What have they done? There are 3,500 Indians in that constituency; they had the franchise under the Dominion Franchise Act; they have taken that franchise away from every one of these men. There is not a man who has a vote, but, for the purpose of counting the population, they include the whole of these Indians. The hon. Minister of Customs says that this is an honest presentation of the case. He had the hardihood to get up and justify that course. There never was a more flagrant attempt to mislead the House than to count in these 3,500 Indians, who were disfranchised by the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are not permitted to vote, who had the right of the franchise, and, we know, and the hon. Minister of Customs knows, because I have heard him make the statement in this House, that they exercised their franchise intelligently, that they are an intelligent community, but, they have been deprived of their vote, and, notwithstanding this, the hon. gentleman counts them, in order to show that there are 36,500 people in that constituency.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Will the hon. gentleman permit me a word?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), is not willing to extend that courtesy to others.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), imputes to me dishonesty; I know he does not mean it offensively, because I count in the Indian population, and he says that it is not fair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Political dishonesty.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Even political dishonesty should not be charged against me, because I did not count them at all. It was the men appointed by the Conservative government who counted them in 1891, and the Conservative government that published the census which counts them.

Mr. WALLACE. This is the excuse, this is the reason, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), gives. Because we took a census in 1891 we counted them. The House and the country are aware of the fact that the local legislature took away the right to vote. The hon. Minister of Customs, endorsing that action and bringing in a Franchise Bill, dishonestly, politically, tells us that it was because they counted them in the census. That just exposes the wrong-doing of the hon. gentleman. But, Mr. Speaker, he says further, that there is no party advantage in this Bill. I say that from beginning to end every clause in it has a party advantage.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How about the county of Norfolk?

Mr. WALLACE. They have not disturbed every constituency, but wherever they have disturbed a constituency they have done it for a party advantage, and I will challenge the hon. gentleman to name a constituency that he proposes to change in which I cannot point out a party advantage for the Liberals. Take the county of Simcoe, take the city of Toronto, to which I have alluded, and I say that there are flagrant cases of which the case of the county of Brant is a counterpart. Why should the city of Toronto be disfranchised? Hon. gentlemen tell us that the Conservative party did not give the full representation that the city of Toronto is entitled to. This shows that the Conservative party did not want to take a party advantage, because if they had done so, they could have given Toronto far more members and done it upon the principle of the people being represented according to their numbers. They were urged to do so. Now, another point in regard to that. They followed the principle of representation by population, although the hon. Postmaster General in his speech on this Bill pooh poohed the idea that such a principle should guide them at all. This is the principle that guides so far as the provinces are concerned, it is the principle that should guide so far as the electoral districts are concerned, so far as it can possibly be done. If you ignore that you will have the door open for every kind of wrong-doing; you will have the door open for the hon. Minister of Customs to get back to Brant. He said to us to-night that they have been preaching this principle throughout the country. They have. I suppose there has not been a session of parliament that we have not listened to the speech that we heard twice delivered in this session already, by the hon. Minister of Customs. You cannot go over this country and meet the hon. minister on any public platform, but he harangues his audience with this old story, and this old misrepresentation of the facts of the case. He says: The people gave us orders; they gave us commands. What orders did they give them? There were two other hon. gentlemen who made this their stock in trade, their political capital throughout this country. The hon. gentleman who formerly represented Bothwell, now the hon. Minister of

Mr. WALLACE.

Justice (Mr. Mills), and the hon. Minister of Customs. What happened? They say that they preached this doctrine. The people did not believe them, or, for other more cogent reasons, they left both of these hon. gentlemen at home at the last election. They were either tired of their preaching, or they did not believe them, and both of these hon. gentlemen were left out in the cold. The hon. Minister of Customs got a temporary refuge in the north riding of Grey by means that we know, on this side of the House, were the most reprehensible. By a system of corruption, by bribery, by personation, by fraud and by forgery, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) got his seat. We know the whole history of it. We know where the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was and how long he was there. We know that he was in the back room of an hotel in Owen Sound day after day, and night after night, while we were fighting the battle on the public platform. He was not on the stump as we were but he was negotiating in close touch with the vilest of the earth; with those men who have been shown to have been guilty of all kinds of villanies.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What part of the hotel were you in?

Mr. WALLACE. What do you ask?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What part of the hotel were you in when you saw the Postmaster General?

Mr. WALLACE. I can tell the minister (Mr. Paterson) that I was not where the Postmaster General and his gang were, and I ask if the Minister of Customs can say the same thing. Was he fraternizing with the gang? Well, whether he was or not he got the benefit of their villainy, and he sits in the House of Commons to-day by virtue of the rascalities practised in North Grey at that election. But, Sir, the Minister of Customs has received notice to quit. We have had another election in the north riding of Grey, and the minister knows he is not any longer wanted in that county. He does not think he will run there. Things are not looking well for him, and so he wants to cut out for himself a nice little constituency in the county of Brant, and consequently he supports this iniquitous Bill. That is the reason you see him on every occasion shouting out in the House: We are going to have the iniquities of the Bill of 1882 repealed. Well, Sir, that was not an iniquitous Bill. It was a fair Redistribution Bill, and the results of the elections held since prove it. A gerrymander Bill is that by which a minority of the voters get a majority of the representation. But in every election held since 1882, the Conservative party had a majority of votes, and did not have a majority of members corresponding to that majority of votes. This shows that the Act of 1882 was not a gerrymander, and it shows further, that the majority of the electors were in favour of the Conservative party. But the Minister of Customs says: Oh, we will observe the sacred doctrine of county boundaries. Well, Sir, there never was such a flagrant attempt to mislead the people as is found in that declaration. Where are the county boundaries adhered to? Will the Postmaster General or the Minister of Customs tell me where they are adhered to? What is the state of affairs in the county of Carleton? Why, there are two townships of Carleton in the constituency of Russell, two other townships in the constituency of North Lanark, and the balance is in the county of Carleton. Therefore, this one county is in three different electoral districts. There you have a violation of every principle upon which this Bill is said to be constructed. Then, gentlemen opposite say: West Toronto had two members, and we are going to abolish that and we will make single constituencies in the cities. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) asked the Postmaster General on what principle they were doing that, and he could not tell. It was pointed out that the cities of Ottawa and Hamilton have two members each and that they are not divided. The Postmaster General was unable to tell why the government should do that in West Toronto and not do it in Ottawa and Hamilton. He was obliged to confess that he ignored the principles that he laid down. The Minister of Customs told us to-night, that if the English House of Lords received the opinion of the electors after rejecting a Bill, then when it came up for consideration the next time they would reverse their decision if it was not in accord with the opinion of the House of Commons. He attempted to cite this as a parallel case. Well, there is no parallel whatever between the two. In the first place, there would have to be a general election in the interim to ascertain the will of the people, and if that general election showed that the will of the people favoured the House of Commons, then the House of Lords might give way. The Minister of Customs tells us that although we have not had a general election since, we have had by-elections.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There was a general election.

Mr. WALLACE. There was no general election since this Bill was introduced in 1899.

Mr. BENNETT. There was one in Manitoba.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, yes, there was one in Manitoba, and they say there is going to be one in Ontario, and if there is a general election in Ontario these gentlemen across the floor will hitch themselves to the machines, because they dare not go into an election without it. The Minister of Customs tells us that the by-elections demonstrated public opinion. Do not we know from the evidence of the election courts that every one of these by-elections were carried by fraud? Do not we know the minister's own case? He knows it a great deal better than we do. He knows particulars about which we would be delighted if he would unbosom himself to the House and told us them. He knows all about the election in North Grey. It is clear to every one that the North Grey election and the other elections which were won by hon. gentlemen opposite were not won honestly, and instead of these gentlemen boasting about carrying these elections, they ought to hang down their heads in shame as honest men would do. The Minister of Customs says: that the only difference between the Bill and the amendment is that our amendment goes into force some two or three years hence and their Bill would go into force right off. There is a greater difference than that. Their Bill while it professes to give the judges the power, actually ties the hands of the judges, shackles them and perpetrates the iniquity of saying that the county of Brant shall have two members and the city of Toronto five, and the city of Ottawa two, and so on; but the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition will give full power to these judges to divide all the constituencies as they see fit. More than that, under the amendment the judges will have before them the information necessary for them to proceed with their duties, and that is an important matter. That is a vital point in the premises. It is useless at the present time to proceed on the basis of a census that is nine years old. The movement of population has been very great during these nine or ten years. The just and the fair and the honourable principles of redistribution is to take cognizance of this movement of the population, but the judges are absolutely precluded under this Bill from doing anything of the kind. It takes this vexed question out of the hands of parliament and leaves it to a judicial tribunal. It is true, the hon. the First Minister boasted to-day that he was doing so, and insinuated that that was always his policy. Why, Sir, a few years ago, in regard to the proposal to have judges do this work, the right hon. gentleman said:

In some quarters the suggestion has been made that the duty of redistribution should be referred to a commission of judges specially appointed; in other words, the parliament should divest itself of its powers in this most important particular. Sir, I am bound to say at once that this is a proposition which my friends and I would not favour either upon this or any other subject. I am bound to say that we would not entrust to any this duty and privilege which properly belongs to parliament. Moreover, this proposition implies a singular want of confidence in parliamentary institutions. It implies that in a matter of this kind the majority would never be able to rise above the low temptations of strengthening themselves at the expense of their opponents.

He was entirely opposed to the judges doing the work. We propose now that it should be left entirely to the judges, not only in the province of Ontario, but in every province of the Dominion, and I have no doubt that is the true policy. As the leader of the opposition pointed out, everything indicates the probability of the Conservative party having control of the redistribution two or three years hence; but we are not anxious to have a political advantage from the fact, as we were not in 1882 or 1892. Therefore we are willing to-day to remove the whole subject from the political arena and refer it to the judges. We have been told by the Minister of Customs that last year we opposed the judges intervening. What we did last year was not to oppose the judges intervening in the broad and proper way, as is proposed in the amendment to-night; but we objected to pretending that the judges were regulating this matter when it was regulated by the government themselves, and the judges were simply registering their decrees; for that is all the power they place in the hands of the judges. Now, Sir, in the resolution proposed to-night there are two important features. The first is that the judges are to recognize the vital principle of representation by population, that the same number of people anywhere in this Dominion shall have the same representation in parliament as nearly as that can be accomplished, and the second is that they are to recognize, so far as it can be done while keeping the principle of representation by population in the forefront, the principle of county or municipal boundaries. This will have the effect of giving a fair representation to the people. It will change many of the political boundaries of to-day. It will upset many of the constituencies. But, if it is going to be fair and equitable representation, every loyal citizen of the country will bow to it. I have no hope, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite will consent to that. They prefer to follow the Mowat gerrymander of Ontario, as iniquitous a scheme as was ever planned, to rob the Conservatives of their franchise in every portion of the province, and to give a political advantage to the Liberal party. Why they made up the county of Dufferin out of four or five other counties which were pretty evenly divided, making a Tory hive of the county of Dufferin, giving it 1,400 or 1,500 of a Conservative majority, and leaving the other four or five constituencies strongly Liberal. They carried out the same principle all over the province, and that principle is embodied in the Bill before the House, though not so thoroughly or completely. But this Bill is equally wrong, because it proposes to disturb the constituencies to-day, although one year from the 1st of April next a census will be taken giving the basis on which the representation must immediately afterwards be readjusted. What is this done for? It is for the purpose of giving the party in power a political advantage in the general election that must soon come on, because these gentlemen are afraid to meet the constituencies that elected them in 1896. They know that they have failed in their pledges to the people, they are afraid to meet the people they met in 1896, and they are proposing by this Bill to have the constituencies gerrymandered to suit themselves in the hope of being again returned to power. But, Sir, I have faith in the good, sound sense of the Canadian people. I have faith in the wisdom and the justice of the Senate doing their duty.

Mr. WALLACE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. We have had from the Postmaster General, the Minister of Customs and other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, veiled threats against the Senate, that if they ventured to do what they felt to be their duty, and not what these gentlemen want them to do, what dire calamities will happen to the Senate. We were told last year that hon. gentlemen opposite were going to have a Bill to abolish the Senate or to readjust the conditions between this House and the Senate; but their courage has failed them, because they know that in this matter and others that have come before the Senate, that body has nobly done its duty and nobly justified its existence as a great power in the legislation of this country, as it will continue to be, notwithstanding the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have listened with a good deal of amusement to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), who has just taken his seat. I know his constituency pretty well. I know the vote that was cast for him at the last general election, and he knows perfectly well that if this Bill passed, and he were sent back to West York by itself, with Parkdale in the city of Toronto taken off, he would be relegated to the town where he has lived for many years, to stay there. He knows that perfectly well, and he is labouring very hard to defeat this Bill. The hon. gentleman yells very loudly about the principle of representation by population. The hon. gentleman has a history as a member of parliament. Let me read a resolution which the hon. gentleman is on record as having voted against. In 1892, when the question of redistribution was before the House, the late Mr. McCarthy moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be resolved: that the redistribution of the seats of the members of this House, should, as far as practicable, be based on equality of population, due regard being had to the community of interests existing in localities, a full and fair expression of public opinion, and the permanence and stability of constituencies.

My hon. friend's name I find recorded against that resolution. I find the name of 'Wallace' in the noes. I also find the name of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who spoke so strongly this afternoon in support of the principle of representation by population being the guiding star of the government, in opposition to this amendment. I can understand why the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is so determined in his opposition to this Bill, but it is amusing to notice how quickly these hon. gentlemen can turn round. In 1882 and 1891 they argued strenuously that the redistribution of seats should be made by themselves, and opposed every effort of ours to appoint either a commission of judges or some other independent commission to do the work. They claimed the power to do it themselves, and they did it. They tied the hands of Reformers behind their backs, and want us to go again before the electors with our hands still tied, and are very much chagrined because we are determined to get rid of this infamous law, one of the most unjust ever introduced into this House, and which has led to more acrimony and ill-feeling and bitterness than any other. These hon. gentlemen are placing their whole confidence in the Senate. They propose to hang on to the Senate coat-tails. The hon. member for West York has a great deal more confidence in the Senate than he has in the people. He believes that the Senate will stand by him and reject the Bill again, as it did last year, notwithstanding the fact that forty-five constituencies have been appealed to since the general elections, and out of these forty-five, the government have carried forty-two. Could anything show more clearly that the country is behind the leader of the government? It is interesting and amusing to watch the courtesy and attention which our hon. friends opposite are paying to the senators just now. They doff their hats now whenever they meet a senator. They know that unless the Senate stands by them, the vicious gerrymander of 1882 is going to be abolished. Let me refer to what an hon. gentleman, who once sat in this House, a man of high character and great ability, whom hon. gentlemen opposite held in the highest respect for years, a distinguished member of the bar, as well as of this House, said with reference to the gerrymander Bill of 1882. I am now referring to the late lamented Mr. Dalton McCarthy. I heard that hon. gentleman declare in this House that one of the acts of his life he was ashamed of was his vote for the gerrymander Act of 1882.

Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that this Bill does not give representation by population, but we do not pretend that it does. What we are seeking to do is simply to abolish the vicious gerrymander Acts of 1882 and 1891. We do not propose to redistribute any further than is absolutely necessary to undo the wrong that these hon. gentlemen did, and many of them will, in their cooler moments, admit that the Acts of 1882 and 1891 committed gross injustice. Take my own riding, they took the township of Wallace out of the county of Perth and put it into the county of Wellington, simply for the purpose of trying to bring about my defeat. What they did in my county they did also in the county of Frontenac. They also gerrymandered the Hon. David Mills out of this House, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and many others. There was no honesty or fair-play about that Act, and if, in addressing this House concerning it, we have shown a good deal of heat and indignation, we have had good cause. We have been suffering under the harrow of this abominable Act for eighteen years, so that it is no wonder we sometimes have given vent to expressions which it would have been better we had not used.

What does the hon. leader of the opposition propose? I frankly confess that a commission of judges might be looked upon as a very fair means of redistributing the constituencies. But is it fair that the hon. leader of the opposition should claim the right to name the judges? Is the government of the day to be deprived of that right? The hon. leader of the opposition claims the right to suggest how the redistribution shall be made and who shall make it. In this he is arrogating to himself a function of the government, and surely cannot expect that the government is going to abnegate one of the functions in his favour. I shall be glad indeed to see some proper, fair and decent arrangement come to whereby redistribution would be made without any further gerrymanders. I know that it is not the intention of the leader of this government to gerrymander. He is not made of the metal to gerrymander. His followers are not pressing him for a gerrymander—there is not one of them who wants it. What we want is to undo the vicious Acts of 1882 and 1892. And the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) knows in his own heart that this Bill of 1882 was one of the most abominably wicked things that he ever lent his countenance to. No man who has any fair-play in his constitution, no man who is built with any honesty, will get up in this House and advocate the abominable Bill passed in 1882, which was designed to tie the hands of Reformers behind their backs. If the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) was subjected to the injustice that we have been subjected to for years, would he quietly endure it? He certainly would not. Now that he is asked to part with the advantage he has enjoyed for eighteen years, he rages like a bear. But he need not fear. A man of his distinguished ability, popularity and eloquence, will surely be able to find a seat. I am sure that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) loves him so much that he will gladly resign and give him his seat. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will not be able to keep West York—that is very true. But after all, if in his sober sensible moments he considers the matter, I cannot but believe that there is honesty enough in him to confess that the Bill of 1882 was an unrighteous Act, and we have the right to undo it. The amendment that the leader of the opposition has moved, I contend, is no amendment at all. It does not touch this Bill. This Bill is simply designed to right a wrong that has existed for years. When the census is taken, it will be time enough to discuss by what authority the readjustment is to be made. If it is decided to do it by the judges, I for one, will not object. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that my constituency should be readjusted by a commission of judges, and am ready to take whatever they believe should fairly constitute the riding I represent. I believe that every Reformer would be ready to adopt the method proposed. But that does not touch the evil that now exists; there is no other way to reach that evil than by the course now proposed.

The hon. member for West York called the attention of the House to a number of irregularities in connection with the representation, and pointed out that representation by population is not considered by this Bill. I wish to read to the House some of their constituencies in 1892. Take eight constituencies east of Toronto:

Lennox.....	14,902
Brockville	15,855
Prince Edward.....	18,892
Frontenac	13,445
Grenville South....	12,931
Leeds and Grenville.....	13,523
Northumberland West..	14,947
Peterborough West.....	15,808

Here we have eight constituencies with a total population of 120,330, or an average of 15,308. Now, let us take eight constituencies west of Toronto. As most of the constituencies I have already referred to are Conservative constituencies, so those that I now read are Liberal constituencies:

Essex North....	31,523
Essex South.....	24,022
Kent.....	31,434
Bothwell.....	25,595
Oxford North.....	26,131
Perth North....	28,909
Waterloo North	25,325
Waterloo South.....	25,148

In these eight constituencies there are 218,087 people, or an average of 27,011 to each constituency, as against 15,038 in those previously referred to. Now, I would like to ask the hon. member for West York why it was that in the redistribution of 1892, the government of that day left these constituencies in that condition? The reason was simply that the gerrymander of 1882 was so perfect in its operation that they could not make any change to their own advantage. The hon. member for West York laughs. He knows that what I say is true. He wishes to keep the law as it is in order that the Conservative party may reap the advantage of it once more in a general election. But they need not think either to blind the eyes of hon. gentlemen on this side, or to blind the eyes of the people by professing now that they are anxious to leave the whole matter to a commission of judges, and let the distribution take place in that way.

Now, they say that under this Bill the judges are shackled, and they call this a gerrymander Bill. I do not see how any man of common decency can rise and declare this to be a gerrymander Bill. It does not bear any of the marks of the gerrymander. We are going back to the condition of things before there was a gerrymander, to the condition of things that existed before 1882. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) shakes his head. That hon. gentleman knows that up to 1882 county boundaries were respected. He was one of the old followers of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, and he knows that Sir John was one of the great advocates for retaining county boundaries when the redistribution of 1872 was made. He gave his reasons for it. He said that the people of the county found who were their men of ability, first electing them councillors, then reeves, and then wardens, so the best men in the county were brought to the top and eventually elected as members of parliament. But when, in 1882, his followers began to see that an advantage could be had by a gerrymander, they got him to swallow himself, to discard the principles he had advocated in 1872. And so the gerrymander Act of 1882 was prepared, and Sir John A. Macdonald was urged and pressed by deputations to make this, that or the other change. Deputations came from all parts of Ontario, and every constituency was arranged and rearranged in the effort to secure a party advantage. One day a township was put into a county, the next day somebody objected, and it was taken out; and so they were pitchforked back and forth like pawns on a chessboard. We did not know one day what the next day would bring forth. I remember it very well. Townships were thrown back and forward with an eye of making the best possible use of them, or else for the purpose of hiving townships that were likely to vote against the government. That was the course they adopted. Now, I say it is time that work should be undone, and we want to undo it. I say here that if the Senate persist in interfering with the representation of this House, still some means will be found for the purpose of bringing about a repeal of that iniquity. We are bound not to drop the Bill, we shall force it through this House, and every means possible will be adopted to bring about a repeal of these abominable and iniquitous Acts. There are men in the Senate who know perfectly well that the Act of 1882 was a grossly fraudulent Act, one that never should have been passed. They know that, and yet there are men who are dishonest enough still to stand up and swallow an Act that is so discreditable to them, and to interfere with the rights of the members of this House. We have no desire to be on bad terms with the Senate, but they must not interfere in matters that we consider they have no right to interfere with. If they do so, they may bring about a collision that may possibly hurt them. It is hard to tell what may happen. I have no desire to threaten them, but I say that we are bound to stick to this Bill, and to bring about a readjustment of the condition of things established in 1882 and 1892; and if they persist in retaining those Acts on the statute-book, then we should have to consider very seriously what other steps to take. We do not want anything but justice, but we are bound to have justice if there is any possible means of getting it.

Mr. CRAIG. We have listened to some rather peculiar speeches here to-night on this question. I am not at all surprised at anything that the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) may say; but I was surprised to hear the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) talk as he did about the Senate. Perhaps he hardly knew what he was saying, he was talking very fast, and I will just remind him of what he said. I noticed that he referred to the Senate as a body supposed to act judicially. He said that this amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition, was no doubt framed on this side to give the Senate some excuse for defeating the Bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, I consider remarks of that kind are nothing but insulting to the Senate. For a member of the government to say that the Senate, a body that stands so high in this country, requires some excuse to be made for them by members of the opposition in order that they may defeat a Bill of this kind, I consider is an insult to the Senate, and I don't think that a remark of that kind should be made in this House. He went on to say that he considered there was nothing in the argument used on this side, that as a census will shortly be taken, and a new redistribution will have to be made, therefore, this Bill should not be passed. Well, it just occurred to me when he made that remark, that if he were in opposition, and we were proposing a Bill of this kind, there is no gentleman would use that reason more loudly and more strongly than himself.

Now, with reference to the member for North Wellington, a great part of his speech was really in abuse of the Senate. I will just mention a very few remarks that he made about the Senate. He said the Conservative party were going to hang on to the Senate in this matter. He said the Senate were going to stigmatize their record.

An hon. MEMBER. What did he mean by that?

Mr. CRAIG. I don't know, I suppose he meant something offensive. He said also that the Senate were partisans; that the members of the opposition showed every kindness and courtesy to the Senate. At the close of his speech he said that the Senate must not interfere in matters that the government side thought they had no right to interfere with. Now, Sir, if these remarks were made by a member of the government we might attach some importance to them, but we need attach very little importance to them, when coming from the member for North Wellington, who latterly seems to speak with very great emphasis on every occasion when he has an opportunity of defending the government, he cannot find words strong enough to defend them; and therefore we must make a great deal of allowance. I do not know why he should be so energetic in his defence of the government on every occasion. I do not know why it is that he is almost the only man outside of the government on that side who does defend the government latterly, but he seems to be the chosen man to do this. I say that if any other member made remarks of this kind about the Senate, we might be very much surprised, and the Senate themselves might consider the matter seriously. But I will just suggest to the Senate, if I might be allowed to do so, that considering who made these remarks, the best thing to do is to pay no attention to them; and I have no doubt that that is just what they will do.

The member for North Wellington commenced by saying that he was very much amused at the member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Well, I am sure that the member for West York has no objection to affording all the amusement possible. The member for North Wellington often looks as if he needed something to amuse him. He went on to remark that the member for West York would be defeated if this Bill passed. I would like to know how he reconciles that statement with the statement made by the Minister of Customs, who challenged any member on this side of the House to point out any member of this parliament who would be injured by this Bill, and here the hon. member for North Wellington says that if this Bill passes the member for West York will be defeated. Now, if the government could accomplish the defeat of the member for West York by passing this Bill, they would be doing a great deal for themselves. But, I do not think that the member for North Wellington is right. But, he shows, that in his opinion, this Bill is designed for party purposes, and he thinks if it passed, it would accomplish a party purpose in the defeat of the member for West York.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is designed to do justice.

Mr. CRAIG. If he considers it justice to defeat the member for West York, then I do not know what his views are on a great many questions. He went on to say that this Bill had been endorsed by the people, because, out of forty-five by-elections the government had carried forty-three. I do not admit that that is any argument at all. I might say that many of these elections were carried by means not entirely creditable to members on the government side of the House, but I am not going to say anything about that at all. The party in power, as a rule, carries all the by-elections. I look back to 1891 and 1892, when the Conservative party was in power. They came in with a majority of about 25, and after a couple of years, they carried enough by-elections to have a majority of 60 in this House. Yet, when they went to the country they were defeated. I think the same thing will follow in this case. These gentlemen have been carrying these by-elections, we admit, but we do not admit that because they carried them, the people have endorsed all their programme, and all the schemes which they promised to support in this parliament. The hon. member went on to say that the object of this Bill is to undo the wrong done by the Conservative party. Well, of course, if we were to take the hon. member for North Wellington as a judge, I do not suppose the Conservative party ever did anything right. I have never heard him admit that anything they did was right, and of course, they would try to undo anything that has been done by the Conservative party. I do not pretend to know anything about the Bill of 1882, because I have never studied the Bill, but, I have heard it said by men who have studied the Bill that it was not the outrageous Bill that the hon. member claims it to be. I have heard it said by men whose opinion I would just as readily take as that of the hon. gentleman, that it was not a measure especially in the party interest. I do not think that the hon. member is a good judge in matters of party, or that he is competent to give an unprejudiced opinion. I have not heard him give one in this House yet. I think there are a great many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House whose opinion I would take a great deal sooner than I would take his. I think he is a very strong partisan, and I do not think that his saying that a great wrong was done is any evidence to show that a great wrong was really done.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. McCarthy said so.

Mr. CRAIG. It is all very well to say that Mr. McCarthy said so. Mr. McCarthy said so after he had left the Conservative party, but, when he belonged to the Conservative party he did not say so. Mr. McCarthy, himself, prepared the Bill of 1882, and then turned around after he left the Conservative party, and said so. I do not want to discuss him because he is dead, but I do not accept him as an authority on that question any more than I accept the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. McMULLEN. You accepted him as an authority on equal rights.

Mr. CRAIG. No, I did not accept him as an authority on equal rights altogether. Why should I accept him as an authority on equal rights when he came down to my constituency twice before the election and did all he could to defeat me on the equal rights question. The hon. member for North Wellington went on to say that he had no doubt that there were members on this side of the House honest enough to confess that that Bill was wrong. I do not know about this, Mr. Speaker, but I do say that it would be a very good treat to hon. members on this side of the House to hear the hon. member for North Wellington confess that anything done by the Liberal party was wrong. I do not know whether we have honesty enough to confess when we do anything wrong, but I do know that we have never heard that hon. gentleman confess any wrong that has been done by the Liberal party. He went on to say that the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills), was defeated in consequence of the Bill of 1882. I do not know how that was, because the hon. Minister of Justice sat in this House after 1882 until 1896. I do not know how the hon. gentleman can argue that the hon. Minister of Justice was defeated as the result of the Bill passed in 1882. He was here until 1896, fourteen years after the Bill passed, and how can the hon. member get up and say that his defeat was the result of a Bill, when he sat here fourteen years after that Bill was passed? The hon. member for North Wellington tells the hon. leader of the opposition and hon. members on this side of the House that they want to govern the country now, although they are in opposition. He says that the Liberal party ought to govern the country, and he appeals to us not to try by means of this amendment in which, he says, we want to name judges, fix the method of redistribution, and do everything. What about the members of the Liberal party when they were in opposition? I have heard them many times bring in amendments saying how things ought to be done. They wanted to govern the country then. I admit that we do want to govern the country, and I think we could govern the country a great deal better than it is governed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. In this matter we are not asking to govern the country; we are asking a very simple thing. We are asking the other side of the House to agree to a fair proposition, a proposition which they can hardly say a word against, which they cannot find fault with and to which, they tell us, at some future time, they will agree. They say this because they think the proposition will meet with the approval of the country. This is a matter which ought to be taken out of the control of party and settled by the judges. They say that they are not willing to do it now. The hon. member for North Wellington took very high ground in regard to the right hon. leader of the government and the members of the Liberal party when he said it was not the intention of the leader of the government to gerrymander, and that no member of the Liberal party had any desire that he should gerrymander. This is a very interesting statement to have made in this House on such very good authority as the hon. member from North Wellington. If the hon. gentleman were less of partisan than he is, if he knew the meaning of the word gerrymander, if he could realize that the Liberal party could possibly do anything wrong, then, I might be willing to accept his statement. That statement comes from an hon. member on the other side of the House who has never admitted any wrong done by the Liberal party, and who stands up and says that they have no intention to gerrymander. That is to say that when they bring in a Bill here, no matter what that Bill may be, we do wrong to say that it is a gerrymander. What is a gerrymander? It is a redistribution of the constituencies to gain a party advantage. The hon. gentleman has admitted, as I mentioned a few moments ago, that if this Bill were passed they would gain a most important party advantage. The hon. gentleman admitted, that, if this Bill were passed, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) could not be elected to a seat in this House, but, that he would have to look for another seat somewhere else, and that they would carry his seat. Not only that, but they intend to wipe out the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) as well. Yet, they talk about this not being a gerrymander. Further than that, what did we find the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) saying the other night? The government agreed to change this Bill, and accepted the amendments proposed. They were proposing to give a member to a city with 40,000 population and another member to a county with 14,000 population.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). That is not so. There was no gerrymander, no party advantage in that.

Mr. CLARKE. Why was the change made in the Bill?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It was not on account of any party advantage.

Mr. CRAIG. The hon. member for St. John objected to it anyway. He thought it was a gerrymander. If he thought it was fair why did you not leave it the way it was. I do not pretend to know the reason why it was done. I suppose the member of the government who got that change made knew why it was done, and I suppose it would have remained as it was proposed in the Bill if it had not been for the protest of the hon. member for St. John. It is absurd for the hon. member for North Wellington to get up here and say that the hon. members on that side of the House are so pure that they would not think of having a gerrymander. They used to talk this way in old times when the elections were on. The Toronto Globe not very long ago, within a year, or so, said that neither party at that time could say: 'I am holier than thou.' The Globe had to admit that they were just as bad as they said the Conservative party were. The Conservative party did not admit that they were as bad as they were charged by the Globe, but the Globe said: We must admit that we are just as bad. It is absurd for the hon. member for North Wellington to get up in this House and say that the leader of the government would not condescend to gerrymander, and that no hon. member on the other side of the House would ask him to gerrymander; that is to say, they would not ask him to redistribute in order to gain a party advantage. The people of the country will not believe any such thing, and nobody in the House except the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) believes it—I even doubt if he believes it himself. The hon. gentleman told us that there were eight constituencies east of Toronto that had an average population of 15,000 each, and he cited this to show how badly the Conservative party did the work in 1882, and remarked that they did not change it in 1892. Let me ask him: Why does not this Bill rectify that wrong? If the object of the Bill is to rectify wrongs, why does it not do so in this case? That it does not do so shows that the argument of gentlemen opposite falls to the ground. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) went on to say that he did not know how any man of ordinary decency could call this a gerrymander, and in the same breath he brags that it will gerrymander the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) out of the House. I think, Sir, I have replied to all the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) that are worth replying to, and I shall now state a few reasons why I am opposed to the measure. One great reason given by the Liberal party for introducing this Bill is that they promised it. Well, Sir, that need not be any reason; they need not trouble their conscience about that. They have made a great many promises they did not carry out. They promised a free trade tariff, they promised they would respect the independence of parliament, they promised economy, and they have broken every one of these promises. A great deal is sought to be made out of the fact that the judges have something to do in this matter, and the Postmaster General told us:

On this occasion as last year the government have adopted a departure which is the first instance in which any parliament in Canada has voluntarily transferred to a judicial tribunal the distribution of the seats. That principle will meet with the approbation of the people of this country as it met with the approval of an overwhelming majority of the House last session.

That kind of language seems very plausible on the face of it, and the people of the country might be deluded if we were not here to point out the facts. Why, the judges are limited in a great many ways by this Bill, and the powers given them under this Bill do not compare with the powers given them by the amendment submitted by the leader of the opposition. We find that the judges are limited to counties that will have more than one electoral district. In fact, they will only have to deal with the city of Toronto and sixteen counties in Ontario. The judges are told not to divide that according to the population; the Bill simply tells them: You must make three electoral districts out of that county, or two, as the case may be. The government tells them what to do. Now, that is a very simple matter, and I do not see why they should require judges to do it. I am not sorry, however, that they propose to have the judges do it, but I maintain that the judges are limited and confined in their action. The crucial point of the whole question is that the judges are bound to take the census of 1891. I contend that, under such circumstances, the judges are not able to do substantial justice, and that when you limit them to a census ten years old you take it out of their power to do substantial justice. They cannot take into account the increase of population, and that very provision takes away from the judges the power to do a great deal of good which they might otherwise do. Anyhow, why should we make these great changes on the census of 1891, when another general redistribution must be made after the census of 1901. That is a question which the government is not able to answer. It is all very well for gentlemen opposite to stand up in this House and say that great wrongs were done to the people—I presume they mean to the Liberal party—by the Redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892. I can very well imagine that the people of the country will object to having these constituencies disturbed to-day and then having them disturbed again in two years hence when the general Redistribution Bill must be brought down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Would that necessarily follow?

Mr. CRAIG. I do not say it must follow in all cases, but it may follow, and in some cases it must follow. I am satisfied that the people of the country will contend that they do not want all these changes made in the constituencies in the short space of two years. I have no doubt in my mind that the sole reason why the government want to make the changes, is to help them in the approaching elections. They might as well admit that fact because everybody knows it. They want to make these changes before the elections in order, if possible, to help them out of their difficulties. They seem to be afraid to appeal to the same constituencies as they appealed to 1896. I might discuss the reasons why they are afraid. I might show that they have broken their promises. I might show that they have been extravagant and not economical, but it is unnecessary for me to show that, because the people of the country know it. It does seem to me that the sole reason the government wish to pass this Bill is not to redress the wrongs done to the people of this country, but to make some provision to try and hold themselves in power. The Minister of Customs and the hon. member for North Wellington tell us that they do not want to gain a party advantage by the Bill, but every one knows that that statement is absurd, and every one knows, too, that they would drop the Bill in a moment if they did not think they were going to benefit by it. The people of the country do not believe so much in the purity of intention and the high-mindedness of the government as they do that hon. gentlemen opposite want this Bill to gain an advantage for themselves. They are afraid that if they do not make these changes before the elections come off they will not have the opportunity after the election, because then the redistribution will be done by the Conservative party. No objection is made to the principle of the amendment of the leader of the opposition on the other side of the House, but it is said that it does not apply in the present case, because it proposes that the commission shall not be appointed till after the census is taken. Well, we hold that this is a good opportunity to commit both parties to this principle. The Conservative party are willing to be committed to it, and we ask the Liberal party if they are not willing to be committed to it also, and to remove this whole matter from party strife. I am sure of one thing, that the country generally will approve of an amendment of this kind. The Premier says that the Conservative leader should do so-and-so if he were consistent; he says that this amendment is not consistent with the previous record of the Conservative leader. Well, I do not know that the leader of the government should make any charge of that kind against the leader of the opposition. I do not know that consistency is such a shining virtue in the leader of the government. I have heard a great many things said by the leader of the government when in opposition which he will not say to-day, which he has not carried out to-day. I have heard members on that side of the House say that $38,000,000 was a most extravagant sum for this country to spend, and yet they turn around and defend $51,000,000 or $52,000,000, or more. I do not think the leader of the government need twit the leader of the opposition about consistency. Apart from all that, is it a crime for a man to be inconsistent, to change his opinion after a few years, and adopt a plan that would be better for all parties? If the leader of the opposition proposed something worse he might be charged with inconsistency; but if he has proposed something which is admitted on all hands to be better than has been proposed hitherto, why charge him with inconsistency? There is nothing in that charge at all. The leader of the government says that this amendment does not apply in this case. Well, I intend to close by saying that we want to make it apply in this case, and if the leader of the government will accept this amendment, it will apply.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Will you add it to the Bill as an additional clause or clauses?

Mr. CRAIG. What we want is this. We want the House not to postpone this matter, but to lay down the principle now that we believe that no readjustment should be made except in the way proposed, and that it should not be made till after the census is taken. That is a sound view, and I guarantee that if there were no parties in this House, no man here would controvert that view; but when there is a party advantage to be gained, we do not expect hon. gentlemen opposite to adopt it. We expect them to stick to this Bill, and to use all possible means to secure its passage, not simply through this House, for we know they can do that, but through the Senate.

We have heard of some of those means to-night. We have heard the Senate accused of being a partisan body. Such means will not work. I do not undertake to prognosticate what the Senate will do; but I have confidence that the Senate will do what it believes to be in the best interest of this country.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this matter to-night, and would not have done so had not the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) referred to the independent members. I expressed my views last session on this subject, and I do not want to reiterate what I said then, for I am tired hearing the same things repeated so often in this House. I must say that listening to the debate on this subject both last session and this session, particularly this session, I have been impressed by the half-hearted manner in which hon. members of the opposition have entered into it. They have not seemed to me to speak as if they were really in earnest, or they would have gone into it with more vim. The hon. member for Haldimand went into it pretty strongly, as he generally does into any subject he discusses. He appeared to think that he had some strong grounds, and I think he had grounds for a good, strong talk on this amendment. Some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have asked what petitions have been presented from corporations or other bodies asking for this measure. I answer, as I did last year, that 175,000 members of the Patron organization asked for it.

Mr. BERGERON. Where is the Patron organization now?

Mr. ROGERS. Here is one of them.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Last of the Mohicans.

Mr. ROGERS. The platform of the Patrons asked for:

Conformity of electoral districts to county boundaries as constituted for municipal purposes, as far as the principle of representation by population will allow.

That plank of the platform of the Patrons was never disputed by anybody in the election contest. It is quite evident that it was felt all through this country that a grievous wrong had been committed, or that plank would never have been there. I must say that in the eastern part of the province of Ontario we did not feel the wrong so much as the people in the western part, where they were very much disturbed about it. The press never denounced that plank in our platform. The great Mail newspaper, when it was a great paper, standing for independence in this country, stood by that platform. The great Star, when it was an independent paper, never denounced it, but said that it was the best platform ever put before the people of this country. Surely that is mandate enough from the people. The farmers did not like to be pitchforked from one county to another. They resented it as an insult. They could not see why one township should be taken out of one county because it was Conservative, and taken from another county because that county was Grit. They felt that this was equivalent to saying that they had no intelligence of their own. I often wondered why gentlemen went into those constituencies and talked to the farmers if they believed they were so strongly Tory or Grit. They never dared to insult a city constituency in that way, by taking a ward from one constituency and putting it into another because it was Grit or Tory. I am very proud to say that they did not attempt such a thing in the eastern part of Ontario. They knew the people there would not stand it. It was done in one instance by the Ontario government, which took a township from my county and added it to the city of Kingston; and many votes were lost to the Reform party by that insult, and the people never ceased to agitate until it was put back again.

That only corroborates what I have just said that the people resented the injustice and hoisted the authors of this infamous law with their own petard. I do not wonder at it, and if anything like a gerrymander were being attempted now, I would oppose it most strongly. I know that the feeling of the country is very strong against this method of gerrymandering, whether it be practiced by Conservative or Liberals or in Dominion or local politics. It may be asked why the independent members vote for this Bill. We do so because we came to this House pledged to vote for a measure that would abolish the gerrymander Act. That was one of the planks in our platform, and now that the government have brought in this legislation, we would be derelict in our duty were we to vote against it. I am pleased to see the wording of the resolution proposed by the opposition, and if this Bill were not on the same lines, I would not give it my support. But it is, and I hope the time will soon come when both sides will agree that this question of redistribution should be left to the decision of an independent commission of judges. It is said that the Senate will throw out this Bill. Well, I do not like to make any threats, but that august body is not in the best of grace with the farmers, and should it take the course suggested, it will sink still lower in their opinion. It has been said that the cities have not a fair representation. I cannot see on what grounds that claim is made, and I do hope that in the next elections one of the issues will be that the cities will not be given the same representation according to population as the rural constituencies. The cities enjoy representation which the rural district have not. They have their boards of trade, and their members and their trade unions and other organizations, and my experience is that really the principal duties of members from the cities is to introduce delegations that wait upon the government urging something to be done that will advance the interests of these great centres of population. You hardly ever see a deputation to the government from the rural constituencies. They depend entirely upon their members, and, in many instances, their members do not do their duty very well. Many members who represent rural constituencies live in the cities, and many senators as well, so that the cities in this respect have really double representation. It has been also urged that representation should be increased. Well, Mr. Speaker, the feeling of the country is very strong against any increase in our present number of members. The feeling is very strong that we have too many as it is. Instead of increasing the number of members, it would be a popular act for the government to decrease it. I am well aware that that cannot be done without amending our constitution, but the time will come when a change must take place, because, as the country grows, you cannot continue having our representation based on that of Quebec. If the members of this House were reduced in number one-third, it would be much better for the country. I feel it my bounden duty to support this Bill as it is, and my people would consider me derelict in my duty if I did not.

Mr. OSLER. I very seldom, Mr. Speaker, listen to a debate in this House without being sincerely thankful that I was not a member of it before 1896, because if one were to believe half what is said on the one side and the other, those members who were in the House previous to 1896, must, to say the least, have been a pretty bad lot; and I think it would be only fair to have a little placard put on the members who have come in since then, so as to show that they are not so black as those who were here before, and it would, I think, be a very good departure if we were to enact the rule that no wickedness should be referred to that was more than ten years old. I am one of these who came in after this wicked gerrymander Act and I must say that I cannot see any reason for the Bill we are now discussing. As I listened to the magnificent thunder of the hon. Minister of Customs, I could not help thinking that if he were only in China he would get the highest salary paid in that empire, because they pay a man there according to the noise and thunder he makes, and there was plenty of noise, if there was nothing else, in the hon. minister's reply.

What is the reason given for this Bill which was introduced, not immediately after the general elections, but last year for the first time? The reason given is the necessity of remedying the alleged iniquity of the old gerrymander Act. But the Bill now introduced is not based on any principle. It is not based on representation by population or on county boundaries. It is simply intended, as far as I can make out, for party purposes. I cannot see that it has any other object. It seems to me that that was very well shown when, on the objection of the hon. member for St. John, the government at once wiped out a particular clause affecting his constituency. It was further shown by the remark of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who said that the opposition of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to this Bill was easily understood, since, if it became law, he would be wiped out of parliamentary existence.

It is urged that the government, by this Bill, wish to fulfil an ante-election promise. In that case it would be the only one they have ever attempted to fulfil. They promised free trade, and have adopted protection up to the hilt. They promised economy and have been wildly extravagant. They promised purity of elections, and in my humble judgment, they have in every case endeavoured to shield the men who are a conspicuous disgrace to their country as guilty of having stolen constituencies. I cannot see that this Bill has any other object than party advantage. The Senate threw it out last year, and the country approved of their action. To bring in a Bill of this character a year before the general elections, and a year before the census, shows simply a desire to handicap the opposition and give to government a most unfair advantage.

Mr. HEYD. Mr. Speaker, my hon friend (Mr. Osler), who has just sat down, congratulates himself that he was not a member of this House before 1896, as those who were in the House before that time evidently were a bad lot. He will have an opportunity to-night of either disapproving or approving of their conduct in 1882 or 1892. If he approves of what they did, by voting against the Bill that is before the House, he is just as bad as they who first originated the measure that this Bill is intended to repeal. We have heard a great deal said to-night in this debate and have had allusions made to peculiar speeches. Well, it is a peculiar question that we are speaking about. There is a peculiar amendment now before the House. There would be nothing peculiar about it had it been introduced in 1882, when our friends on the other side had the power to enforce it. Had they proposed it then, we could have regarded their proposition as being honestly made; had they introduced it even in 1892, we might have regarded it as an honest attempt to remedy an injustice that they had perpetrated ten years before. But, when they had the power they failed to bring forward such a resolution, and now that they are powerless to put it in force, they introduce it in the form of an amendment. It looks to me very much like a confession of weakness on their part. It would never have emanated from that side, if they had the power to enforce it; but they think if they can induce the House to adopt that amendment, they can cripple the government that will be in power after the people give their mandate in the next election. They feel, from their experience in 1896, and from the subsequent by-elections, that they will not have the power to redistribute the constituencies of this country, and they would like to spike the guns of the present government so as to prevent us from using the kind of material that they so successfully used in 1892 and 1882. We have heard also a great deal about purity of elections. I hope that when a general election comes on, we shall have purity of election. They accuse hon. members on this side of improperly gaining their seats. Why, Sir, I gained my present seat through the corruption of the Conservative party, and am a standing testimony to the fact that the Conservative party in South Brant were corrupt. The gentleman who was elected before me was unseated by the courts. He was a Conservative, and I was elected to succeed him. It is amusing to hear the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite justifying the gerrymander of 1882 and 1892, and proving it to be an honest attempt on the part of the then government to do justice to the people of the country. It is amusing even, to listen to the speeches of our friends on this side, dealing with one after the other of flagrant instances of violations of the first principles of honesty and justice. What is the use of wasting so much time in trying to prove or disprove a matter of that kind, when we have the evidence before us, of one who took a principle part of the scheme of 1882? We have the testimony of one of the malefactors who took part in arranging affairs then, and if his testimony is to be believed, it is not necessary for the friends on this side to waste time trying to convince our friends on the other side of the impropriety of their conduct, or the country at large, who require no more convincing, that the object of the gerrymander of 1882 and 1892, was to secure a return of the Conservative party to power. I have in my hand what is said to be a confession of one who took part in the gerrymander of 1882. I do not know the gentleman myself. But the paper he is connected with, gives his statement an air of reliability. And, it appears in the Montreal Herald, and reproduced in the Toronto Globe, papers that are responsible, so that if they are guilty of libel against some of the most eminent men of this country, they can be made to suffer for it. These newspapers being responsible for any statement they made against the character of any individual, it strikes me that if these statements were untrue, an attempt would be made to disprove them. John Hague, editor of the Journal of Commerce, in a signed article in the Montreal Herald, writes as follows :

On the 15th of September, 1881, I received a note from a member of the Senate, who represented the government of Sir John Macdonald in Toronto, asking me to call upon him at a certain hour. I was informed that in compliance with the constitution the government proposed to rearrange the constituencies of Ontario.

I do not need to read the whole of this article, but only those portions pertinent to the matter engaging our attention.

I was informed that what the government wished to effect was a rearrangement of the electoral districts, so far as possible recognizing a common unit of representation. This, however, was to be made sufficiently elastic to allow the grouping of different sections of the districts so as to detach Conservative voters from places where they were in excess of the needs for a majority and the attachment of such voters to districts where the new accession would turn the scale at an election in favour of a Conservative candidate where a Liberal one had hitherto been returned. Electoral districts which were hopelessly Liberal were, if possible, to be abolished, or the constituencies so arranged as to put the Liberal voters all together in one district, especially where they could be drawn away from a district where they menaced the Conservative candidate. The process was afterwards called 'hiving,' which is quite appropriate, though while the work was being done for the Act of 1882 this word was never used.

He prepares the chart.

After making a colossal chart I took each electoral district and its surroundings in hand and wrote upon each the number polled for each party at the two previous elections, the total number of electors, with the majority in each case. I coloured each district so as to show at a glance its political complexion. I then made a thorough study of the official returns of the two last elections, and took out hundreds of statistics for comparison and readjustment. Some of the districts were most difficult to alter so as to secure the results desired. It was said the configuration of some of those represented nothing on earth, in the heavens, or the waters under the heavens. Quite true, they simply represented an effort to fix the boundaries of electoral districts according to two rules : first, on the principle of equal representation to equal numbers of voters ; second, on the principle that electoral districts should be arranged to serve the interests of the party in power when they are rearranged. These rule do not work well together, hence the highly eccentric shapes of some of the districts on the chart I have constructed. When nearly complete it was taken down to Ottawa.

Now, to do this work, he says :

I was assigned to a room close to that of the Minister of the Interior. Into that room I was instructed to prohibit the entrance of any one, even of a cabinet minister, unless brought in by the senator. I remember the petty rage of one minister to whom I refused admission. One day the hon. Mr. Aikens, the Minister of Inland Revenue, came in and saw the chart, upon which he made no comment. His silence elicited the remark : 'Why, Aikens, I am surprised at a strait-laced fellow like you being in such company,' to which Mr. Aikens gave his usual placid smile. One by one several members were consulted as to the changes made in their districts, amongst others being the late J. C. Ryckert, Col. O'Brien and Mr. Mackenzie Bowell. The latter made a little fuss over some feature, but it passed off. When the final touch was put to my chart it was shown to Sir John Macdonald. After closely examining the work done on the boundaries, the statistics written on the face of the map and the schedule I wrote on its side, showing the result of the changes, Sir John exclaimed : 'That takes a great load off my shoulders.' The gerrymander Act, as it was called, was simply the chart I had constructed, expressed in legal language. The changes were estimated to have given an absolute gain to the Conservative party of four seats, and a better fighting chance in a number of others.

I remember remarking at the time that all such arrangements proceeded on the very doubtful assumption that future elections would proceed on the same lines as past ones, and that each party in the future would command the same support, no more and no less, than it had previously done. On my saying this to Sir John, he said : 'Quite true, but constituencies are governed a good deal by tradition, and Grits are very conservative in sticking to their party.'

Mr. BERGERON. Who wrote that ?

Mr. HEYD. Mr. John Hague, the editor of the Journal of Commerce.

Mr. BERGERON. He is dead.

Mr. HEYD. His statements are living, and the men are living, and they do not apparently deny it. I never knew a Conservative yet to be engaged in anything discreditable that he did not deny it. That has been my experience. Now, the Herald still lives, and it goes on to say :

In the department is a large map, measuring about six by ten feet, and representing the province of Ontario and the Quebec counties of Ottawa and Pontiac. The map itself is a well-finished one, prepared by the draughtsman of the Post Office Department in 1891, and representing the counties as they exist municipally. Over this are carefully drawn the lines of the constituencies as gerrymandered by the Act of 1882. The work is finished with a nicety of detail. Each township, town and village is there, with the voting strength of the two parties marked in blue characters. The available vote and the actual vote polled are each marked. Then follows the Conservative vote, marked (c), and the Reform vote, marked (r). Altogether the chart is a most ingeniously contrived and neatly executed piece of political machinery, evidently designed for use in the gerrymander of 1892, when an attempt was made to make the work of the sweeping gerrymander of 1882 more complete by calling into requisition the surgical knife to supplement the axe used in hacking to pieces the county organizations, in order to stifle the electorate and 'hive the Grits.'

Mr. BERGERON. What is the date of that paper ?

Mr. HEYD. I couldn't tell you.

Mr. BERGERON. I think it is taken from the Hansard of last year, it was read last year by somebody.

Mr. HEYD. Well, it is a good thing, and we can afford to repeat it, because a great many statements are repeated more than twice in this House of less importance. Now, I want to allude very briefly to the death-bed repentance of our friends on the other side.

Mr. BERGERON. That was denied on the other side.

Mr. HEYD. Their death-bed repentance always will be denied, because they never repent, they only profess to repent. They introduce an amendment to-night which professes a change of a degenerate heart. Still we believe in conversions when they are accompanied by restitution. The way for our friends on the other side to convince us of the honesty of their motive is to restore to the people of this country the constituencies that they stole, and after having made restitution we will believe in their repentance, and that they are sincere in offering this resolution. My own opinion is, and I have already expressed it, that the government are altogether too honest in dealing with our friends on the other side. I believe if I had the power that I am satisfied the present government will receive from the people when they once more appeal to them, I would give our friends on the other side a little bit of their own medicine, and after an application of it, such as the Acts of 1882 and 1892, it would not require thirty Grits to assist them in filling that side of the House, because there would only be practically a Grit House here.

Mr. HENDERSON. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that after having listened year after year to hon. gentlemen on your right with reference to the iniquities of the Redistribution Bill of 1882, I am surprised beyond measure to find that the sole object of that Bill was to enable the Conservatives to gain four seats. It seems to me that the iniquity and viciousness of that Act must have been greatly magnified. They tell us that it is a vicious Act, and that their object at present is to undo that vicious Act. If that is the sole object of the government to-day, why should they go further and interfere with constituencies like that of Welling, which to-day has the same boundaries as it had at the time of confederation? Why should they interfere with a constituency like Cardwell that was created by the fathers of confederation? I say that if their sole object is to undo what they call the vicious Act of 1882, they should not go beyond the legislation of 1882; certainly they should not interfere with the legislation that was enacted at the time of confederation and approved by both political parties in this country. Whilst we have heard a great deal about this viciousness and iniquity perpetrated in 1882, it is seldom indeed that we hear of any particular act specified. True, we have heard of two or three to-night. We are told that an iniquity was perpetrated in 1882, inasmuch as the constituency of West York was not gerrymandered, and that the hon. member who now sits for that constituency is permitted to retain his seat in the House, it being a fact that the constituency remains almost as it was at the time of confederation. We are told that if the new Bill becomes law the hon. member for West York will no longer be a member of this House.

Then we have heard frequently the complaint with regard to the riding of North Wellington. We have been told that it is some 75 miles long, and so narrow that the hon. gentleman could step over it. Well, that is rather a misleading statement when we understand that at the extreme east end of his riding there is a triangular township so narrow at the one end, running to a point, that I am sure a gentleman of less capacity than the hon. member for North Wellington would have no difficulty in stepping over it, he would simply require to step over a point. He tells us that his riding is composed of parts of three different counties. I am sure that is also misleading. The Redistribution Bill of 1882 did not create the riding of North Wellington out of three counties, but the Ontario government after that riding had been created, made a new county, gerrymandered three counties and made another county for their purposes, which included a portion of the riding of North Wellington. As the hon. gentleman now says, it had the effect of putting his riding into three different judicial counties. I say that the Bill of 1882 was not responsible for that, the Ontario government alone being responsible for the difficulty that he complains of. Now, we have been told that another of the vicious acts of the Redistribution Bill of 1882 was to gerrymander out of existence the riding of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, then Sir Richard Cartwright. My answer to that is that Sir Richard Cartwright did not own the riding in the county of Huron. In 1878 he was defeated, as we all remember, in the riding now held by my hon. friend to my right. Being defeated he looked around the country and borrowed a constituency in the county of Huron. He succeeded in getting the sitting member to resign in order that he might find a seat in this House. So that, as a matter of fact, he did not hold a riding in the county of Huron; he simply had borrowed one, and when the lease expired, another hon. gentleman living in that riding claimed the right to represent it, and he was obliged to go elsewhere. He went to Centre Wellington, where he was met by our friends and rightly so. He made a strong appeal to Centre Wellington, but he was driven back, at the point of the bayonet, forced to retire and go elsewhere to seek a constituency. After that he returned to the county of Huron, and succeeded in getting another hon. gentleman, who now sits in this House, to resign for him. So, I contend that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had no right to claim that he was gerrymandered out of his constituency. As I said before, the constituency was simply a borrowed one, and when the lease expired, he was compelled, by his own political friends, to surrender it to the hon. gentleman who claimed it. I wish to state briefly the reasons why I support the resolution which has been moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper). I do so because I believe the adoption of the principle contained in that resolution will remove forever this question from the political arena. It has been said here to-night that there are two vexed questions that should not come up in this House. One is the question which has been relegated to the courts of this country, the trying of contested elections. This, I believe, is another one. If the Bill before the House passes into law, we will simply have a continuation, year after year, of the difficulty that we have had in the past. Only a portion of the province of Ontario is dealt with this year, and next year, perhaps, we may have a Bill dealing with the remaining portion of the province of Ontario. Then, the province of Quebec will have to be dealt with by a similar Bill, and all the other provinces throughout the Dominion, so that year after year we will have this vexed question brought up in this House. I approve of the resolution proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, because it will, once and for all time, remove this question from the arena of party politics. I approve of it also because it will prevent the provincial legislatures from interfering with the franchise of this House. We know that in Ontario, as well as in the other provinces, they have power to create new counties. They have done so in Ontario, and I have no doubt they have done, or will do, the same thing in other provinces. They will change the boundaries of counties, or create new counties. If they do so, under the provisions of the Redistribution Bill proposed by the hon. Postmaster General, an interference will be had with the rights of this House, and we will be handing over to the provincial governments the right to say what shall be the size and extent of the constituencies to be represented by hon. gentlemen in this House. I approve of the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition because it adopts, first, the principle of population and of convenience. I approve of it strongly for that reason. I have so expressed myself before, and I feel it now more strongly than ever I have done. I believe that representation by population should be a very strong factor in dealing with the representation of this House, that the convenience of the people ought to be considered and that constituencies should be arranged so that the people would be as nearly together as possible who are represented by the same member in this House. At the same time while it does adopt the principle of representation by population and the principle of the convenience of the people, in electing their representatives, by reason of the closer community with each other, it does not overlook the principle of county boundaries. I am not at all wedded to the principle of county boundaries. I am prepared, at all times, to go beyond the limits of county boundaries so long as I can secure constituencies that are fair, containing an equality of population, and where the people are living together in communities closely allied to each other so that they will be better represented by the members whom they send to this House. Then, I approve of the resolution proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition because it takes the legal course of postponing action until the time has arrived when a Redistribution Bill can be legally passed. This, I consider, is a strong reason, and I know that with me it is a very strong factor in enabling me to decide the course I should pursue on this occasion.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, at the risk of losing the good opinion of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I am impelled to rise in my place in the House and say that the Bill under discussion is nothing else than a gerrymander Bill of the very worst kind. As far as the Bill affects Ontario, it is intended to do the government as much good as possible and to do the opposition as much harm as possible. The hon. member for North Wellington says that the government were compelled to introduce this measure because they felt constrained to redeem the pledges they had made to the people when they appealed to them during the campaign of 1896. When that appeal was made, Mr. Speaker, and when previous discussions took place in this House on the question of the representation of the people in parliament, hon. gentlemen opposite made certain statements and laid down certain principles which they are departing from in this Bill. If they were honest in endeavouring to redeem their pledges they should attempt, at least, to carry out in the provisions of this Bill the principles which they declared again and again, ad nauseam, were sound and correct principles of representation. Now, it is claimed as a virtue for this measure, that it restores county boundaries. This is a most misleading assertion. County boundaries are restored in certain portions of the province of Ontario where the government hope to obtain an advantage by so doing. County boundaries are not restored in other portions of Ontario, because the government cannot see that it can gain any political advantage by making a change. If the principle of county boundaries is a sound one it should be applied to the whole province of Ontario. The principle of county boundaries is only applied to the province of Ontario from the county of Ontario westward. The counties in Ontario east of that county remain as they were under the gerrymander of 1892. Why is that, Mr. Speaker? In my humble judgment, it is because the government made substantial gains in the constituencies in the eastern part of the province during the election of 1896, and so they leave that portion of the province, which is over-represented, according to their statements, just as it was prior to the last general elections. They claimed support, too, Mr. Speaker, because they approved of the principle of representation by population. But, when the opportunity is offered, by being entrusted with the administration of public affairs, to give effect, in the passage of a Redistribution Bill, to the principle of representation by population, they ignore that principle altogether. They have made no attempt to adhere to it, and in carving constituencies in the western part of the province of Ontario, they have entirely ignored the principle of representation by population.

If it was a sound and good policy, if it was in accordance with the principles supported by hon. gentlemen opposite, that county boundaries should be restored in the province of Ontario, I ask these hon. gentlemen why the counties of Russell, Carleton, Leeds and Grenville, Lanark, Addington and Peterborough, are allowed to remain as they were under the Redistribution Acts passed in 1882 and 1892? If the principle is a sound one, why not apply it to the whole of the province of Ontario, and not to a particular part of the province? Again, Mr. Speaker, it was claimed by hon. gentlemen opposite that it was a vicious principle to have two-member constituencies, and yet hon. gentlemen have perpetuated that principle in this Bill. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who can find no fault with this Bill, made certain declarations in this House when the Bill of 1892 was under consideration, and in the course of his remarks, the hon. gentleman is reported to have said (Hansard of 1892, vol. ii, page 3566):

When we were readjusting the representation we should have made all single constituencies. Wherever it was convenient for the government to keep double constituencies, so that they could elect two men of the same political stripe to support them they have kept these constituencies in existence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the House if that is not exactly the principle which has been adopted by this government, and yet the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) has not a fault to find with the provisions of the Bill, and he challenges any person who can lay any claim to decency to rise in his place and oppose it. Why does the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) support this Bill, which continues these same two-member constituencies? Why wipe out the two-member constituency which existed in Toronto, while it allows the two-member constituencies to remain in Hamilton, in Ottawa, in Pictou, in Cape Breton, in Halifax city and county, and in St. John city and county? The government did make an attempt to adhere to their principles as far as they affected St. John city and county. But the other day, when the representative of St. John objected to the division, the government restored that city and county as one constituency returning two members. The government went even further than that. The representation of Prince Edward Island consisted of five members, each representing a single constituency, but the government abolished that arrangement of constituencies and introduced the principle of two-member constituencies, which they again and again denounced in this House as a vicious principle. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) declared last session that the Bill was so fair and so just that it would meet with the unanimous approval of the people of the country. He said:

Let me express the hope that this Bill will become law, because I believe it is a fair Bill in itself, and bears the word justice written on the face of it.

The hon. gentleman's conception of what justice means to-day differs a great deal from his conception of what justice meant when he made speeches in this House again and again in days gone by, against the principle of two-member constituencies, and in favour of the restoration of county boundaries; for he is found supporting a Bill now which ignores the principles for which he then contended. If there was one thing more than another in the Bill of 1892 which was found fault with by hon. gentlemen opposite, it was the injustice which they claimed was done to western Ontario, by not giving it the representation which its population entitled it to. What has been done by this Bill to give western Ontario that measure of justice which hon. gentlemen opposite declared it was entitled to? Nothing whatever. Three constituencies have been wiped out, and only three new ones created. Is that fair? My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) referred to two of these constituencies, one of which has been wiped out altogether, and the other has been gerrymandered into a different constituency, although since confederation it had retained the same divisions and the same townships. If western Ontario is under-represented, if it was not given that representation in this House that its population entitled it to, surely hon. gentlemen opposite are now bound to do justice to that portion of the province? But, Sir, no attempt has been made under the provisions of this Bill to right the wrong which they claimed existed in the case of western Ontario. One gentleman opposite made reference to three or four constituencies having a very small population and which were represented by Conservatives, and he compared them with constituencies having a larger population in western Ontario which were represented by Liberals. Let me draw attention to some constituencies with a small population which are not changed by this Bill. The constituency of Frontenac, with a population of 13,445, has the smallest population of any constituency in Ontario. The city of Kingston, connected with the county of Frontenac, has a population of 19,263, and under the census of 1891, these two constituencies have an aggregate population of 32,708, and yet they are represented by two gentlemen on the floor of this House. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) expressed his satisfaction with this Bill because he said it carried out the desires of the Patron organization. Well, surely the Patrons of this country desire that the principle of representation by population should not be so completely ignored as it is under this Bill? Surely the Patrons of the province of Ontario are men of sufficient intelligence to know that the franchise being broadened out now until it is practically manhood franchise, the same number of men in one part of the province of Ontario are entitled to equal representation with the same number of men living in another part of the province? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) could not, if he tried, find fault with this Bill, because it gives to the county of Frontenac, which has the smallest population of any constituency in the province, one representative in this House. The city of Kingston and the county of Frontenac, with a joint population of 32,708, have two members in this House, while the Bill gives to the great rural constituency of Algoma, with a population of 40,000, only one representative. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) tells us he supports the measure because it restores county boundaries. He referred to the fact that there was such dissatisfaction in his own county because the township of Kingston had been taken from it, and attached to the city of Kingston, that the government of Ontario were compelled to restore the township of Kingston to the county of Frontenac. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) drew the attention of the House to the cause which prompted the Ontario government to restore the township of Kingston to the county of Frontenac. The government of Ontario never hesitated to depart from the principle of county boundaries, where they could benefit themselves by doing so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They even cut townships in two.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes, they put one part of a township in one electoral division and another part in another, and so long as they could gain a political advantage, they never bothered about county boundaries. The Ontario government allowed the township of Kingston to be attached to the city of Kingston until they found the experiment was a dangerous one, and did not inure to their advantage. It was only because a Conservative carried the city of Kingston with the township of Kingston attached that they made the change and restored the township to the county of Frontenac. The sense of fair-play of the hon. gentleman who represents the Patrons in the House of Commons, is I presume so just, so accurate, and so fine that he is prepared to leave the people of the province of Ontario who reside in the city of Toronto with one representative to 36,000 or 40,000 of the population while the people of Frontenac and the city of Kingston get two representatives for 32,708. That is the sense of justice of the hon. member for Frontenac, and that is one of the reasons, I suppose, why he supports this Bill so heartily. I have heard statements made in this House as to the injustice that was done to the Liberals of Ontario by the Bills of 1882 and 1892; but I must say that I have not been able to satisfy myself, by an examination of the population of the different constituencies, and the returns made by those constituencies to this House, that such injustice as is complained of was done under those measures. In the Bill before us to-day, there are fifty-one constituencies of the province of Ontario affected. These constituencies have a population of 1,254,554. Their unit of representation is therefore 24,600, and they are represented in this House by thirty-one Liberals and twenty Conservatives. The unit of representation for the Liberals is 22,186; the unit of representation for the Conservatives is 28,338. The twenty Conservatives represent a population of 566,767, while the thirty-one Liberals represent a population of 687,787; and yet these constituencies are claimed—in the form into which they were changed by the Acts of 1882 and 1892—to have been gerrymandered and carved out of all kind of shape for the purpose of giving a party advantage to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Why, Sir, it is found on an examination of the figures that each Conservative who represents one of these twenty constituencies represents 6,152 more of a population on the average than each Liberal who represents one of the thirty-one Liberal constituencies, and yet the assertion is made again and again by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Bills of 1882 and 1892 permitted gross injustice and stifled public opinion by the way in which the constituencies were gerrymandered! I think that these figures show that on the principle of representation by population the Liberal party were dealt with equitably and fairly in the constituencies which are now being carved up in the hope that hon. gentleman opposite may obtain some party advantage. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are thirty-three constituencies in eastern Ontario which are not affected by this measure. These constituencies, according to the census of 1891, contain a population of 646,997, so that the unit of representation in them is 19,606. One of the principal objections made by hon. gentlemen opposite to the Bill of 1892, so far as the province of Ontario was concerned, was that a great injustice was done to the constituencies in the western part of the province by the over-representation of the constituencies in the eastern part; and I point now to the fact that in the thirty-three constituencies in eastern Ontario not affected by the Bill, the unit of population is 19,606, while in the fifty-one constituencies in western Ontario, which they have interfered with, the unit of representation is 24,600. They have not attempted to do justice to the western part of the province of Ontario, if the late government did not do justice to it in its Redistribution Bills, and they have allowed the statements which they made time and again as to the over-representation of eastern Ontario to fall to the ground by not remedying the wrongs they then complained of. In every paragraph and in every line of this Bill, as far as it affects the province of Ontario, the hand of the designing and clever politician can be seen. No principle is adhered to, either as to county boundaries, as to representation by population, or as to single constituencies. County boundaries are restored where it suits hon. gentlemen opposite to restore them. The unit of representation is adhered to as far as it suits hon. gentlemen opposite to adhere to it. The principle of single constituencies as against double constituencies is adhered to as far as it suits hon. gentlemen opposite to adhere to it. But where the government hope to gain an advantage every profession they made in this House with regard to previous Bills has been cast to the winds. If the representation which the government have from eastern Ontario in this House were not substantially larger than it was in the previous parliaments, the constituencies of eastern Ontario would have been deprived of some of the representation they now have; but it is because the government made substantial gains in the last election in this part of the province that they have left those constituencies as they were. With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) finds fault with my colleague from West Toronto (Mr. Osler) for supporting it, because he says that by doing so he is condoning the evils of the previous measures. I cannot see how any member of this House who desires to see the subdivision of the provinces removed from the political arena, can object to the amendment made by the leader of the opposition. If that is admitted, the time of the parliament of Canada will not be taken up as it has been again and again for weeks and months in the past in disputing over this question of the division of constituencies and the representation of the people in this House; and if hon. gentlemen opposite have such confidence as they profess to have in the honour and integrity of the judiciary of the country, they can surely have no objection to appoint the chief justices of the different provinces to make the subdivisions for them. For these reasons I shall support the amendment most cordially, and I hope that it will receive, though I doubt it, the support of a majority of the members of this House.

Mr. TISDALE. As hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) have seen fit to attack the redistribution of 1892 so strongly, and as other branches of this subject have been fully discussed on both sides of the House, I propose to detain the House for a short time to say a few words in regard to the redistribution of 1892. I am especially surprised that the Minister of Customs should attack that measure, because I say without fear of contradiction that the redistribution, it effected, was as fair as it was possible to make it, and was perfectly equal in its political effect. It was felt, and it is beyond question, that Toronto was entitled to at least one additional member. It was felt also that Nipissing, where there were thousands of people without representation, should be represented, and, therefore, to make two new constituencies it became necessary to abolish two old ones. What did we do? We took Niagara Peninsula and we made Lincoln County for my hon. friend who now represents it, that if he had not got that help, he would not have had a seat in the House in 1896, because if the constituency remained as it was before then, he would have been defeated. We put Monk with Haldimand and made it stronger Conservative and we abolished Haldimand held by a Conservative and North Wentworth held by a Reformer. We put the township of Walpole in South Norfolk, which equalized the population, because South Norfolk only had 17,000 before, and we made it 22,000. Walpole was, and is a Reform township, and it gave a majority against me in 1896. If a fairer Redistribution Bill could have been made, as far as Ontario is concerned, I would like to know how. If, therefore, hon. gentlemen opposite cannot find stronger arguments to attack the Redistribution Act of 1892, I only hope they will pass a Bill that will be as fair, when the opportunity is given them. We have heard many reasons urged in support of the changes now proposed, but no one can contend that this Bill, with the facts baldly stated, can show as fair a redistribution as the Act of 1892, with regard to the province of Ontario.

Mr. GIBSON. In reply to the hon. gentleman's remarks concerning the riding I have the honour to represent, I must say that if they would give me the county of Lincoln as it is, I am willing to take my chances. But the townships of Grimsby and Caistor were put out of Lincoln to suit Mr. Ryckert, when he was a member of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That does not affect the fairness of the Bill of 1892.

Mr. GIBSON. Oh yes it does.

House divided on amendment of Sir Charles Tupper.

Amendment negatived.

Motion (Mr. Mulock) agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House adjourns, I would ask the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), what business he proposes to take up to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We will take up Bills.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like also to ask, if the Minister of Finance has any announcement to make as to the probable time of the budget.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). No; announcement will be made very shortly.

Mr. FOSTER. I would also like to know if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), has his report ready?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will call his attention to it.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 9, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Restigouche and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 74) respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company, Limited.—(Mr. Domville.)

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Quebec Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Brown.)

Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the Canadian Loan and Investment Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.—(Mr. Roddick, by Mr. Clancy.)

Bill (No. 78) to amend the Gas Inspection Act.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

Bill (No. 79) to amend the General Inspection Act, so as to provide a grade for flax seed.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

THE AUER LIGHT.

Mr. GIBSON moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Patent Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. GIBSON. The object of this Bill is to enable gas companies and others interested in the products of gas to compel the Auer Light Company to sell their product at a reasonable price.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that this is not a private Bill, but an amendment to the Patent Act, and it requires notice.

Mr. GIBSON. I will give notice of it.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR AND THE MOUNTED POLICE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 80) respecting the members of the North-west Mounted Police force on active service in South Africa. He said: The object of this Bill is to apply the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act and the provisions of the Mounted Police Pension Act to members of the Mounted Police force who are now in South Africa, notwithstanding their absence.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. A. MARTIN (P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture if he has made provision for the representation of all the provinces at Paris, and particularly what appointment is to be made from Prince Edward Island. If so, what are the names?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The whole of the staff to the Paris exposition has not yet been selected. In making a choice of those who are to represent Canada, I have been guided by people of expert knowledge in certain classes or branches of the exhibition, so that those we appoint will be able to give explanations with regard to the Canadian exhibits. I have also been guided by an attempt to have all parts of the Dominion represented, so that those requiring information with regard to any portion may be referred to some individual of our staff from that part of the country. Up to the present there have been no appointments from Prince Edward Island.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In connection with the rumours that the Minister of Public Works is about to leave his duties in Parliament and go to Paris for the purpose of taking a position in connection with the exposition, I think the time has arrived when it is extremely desirable that the government should take the House into its confidence in reference to the proposed arrangements. It is well known that this exhibition is going to involve the expenditure of a large sum. That I do not at all complain of, although I am sorry that, from present appearances, the exposition is not likely to be so important as we thought it would. The position that the hon. Minister of Public Works is going to occupy in connection with it, and the fact that another officer holding a high position of the public service will be allowed to leave his duties and discharge those devolving on him there, make it very desirable this matter should go a little beyond the newspaper paragraphs and rumours, and the House informed what the government propose to do.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The hon. gentleman has been informed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture that the arrangements are not completed, but are in process of completion. It is expected they will be completed in a few days, and then full announcements will be made.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 18), further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. DAVIN. I would call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that he threw out the suggestion the other day that we should consult the Deputy Minister of the Interior. I have submitted a clause to him, but have not yet heard from him. Probably it would be as well to defer until Tuesday going into committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let the motion stand.

EXPENSES OF CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 59) to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee thereon.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FOSTER. It was understood that we should take up the items and have explanations upon them. The first item I find is that of pay. With reference to the pay of the first contingent, I have looked over the papers brought down, and do not find amongst them any authorization to pay the difference between the Imperial and the Canadian rates. It is laid down in the Militia order 211, October 14, that they are to be paid at the rate fixed for the Canadian infantry in the militia regulations for the permanent corps, to the date of their embarkation, and then to be paid at the British rates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, this is providing a sum to make up the difference, as I understand it, between the Canadian and British rates of pay after the troops have embarked for South Africa.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). When they have entered the Imperial service.

Mr. FOSTER. But I cannot find any authorization, either by the order in council, or in the militia orders, providing for payment of that kind. I should think that that could not be done simply by a militia order which was not authorized by order in council. What does the hon. Minister say on that point?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There has been no payment of the difference made since the arrival in South Africa; and the authority is contained in the Act that is now being passed.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the only authorization and the only pay that is now being made is the pay at 40 cents per day. That has been paid to them according to the militia order 211?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And no payment as between the 40 and 50 cents has been made to them up to the present time?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. None.

Mr. FOSTER. And no other authority has been given either by order in council or by militia orders?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Just on the other point—does it require an order in council, or can the minister provide by a militia order for the payments of them at any special rate, as, for instance, he seems to have done with regard to fixing the rate at that of the permanent corps?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We have the authority already by order in council establishing the permanent corps rate. But if we were paying any rate not specially provided for in the Act or by some order in council, we should have to have some special order in council.

Mr. FOSTER. But is not your authority simply the authority for the payment of the permanent corps?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you consider the volunteers legally on the basis of the permanent corps, so that you can pay them under the general order, or are they not volunteers? As I understand it, the permanent corps are the soldiers at the schools. Is not that correct?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, unless the minister has authority from the council, it seems to me he cannot pay simply by a militia order any number of soldiers who are not in any of the permanent corps?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That point may be well taken, but I think that the 50 cents a day, the amount named in the Militia Act, we would have authority to pay. I may explain a point which I did not explain the other night. The reason why we considered the first contingent part of the permanent force was this—we were sending a regiment to South Africa recruited from all parts of Canada, without any special name, not any part of the strength of the militia of Canada. And, in case that regiment should win laurels—take colours from the enemy or win distinction of any kind—it was thought advisable that the regiment should have a home, so that when they returned these things might be stored and kept as mementoes. So, the idea was suggested, and I thought it was a good one, to make this contingent a part of the permanent force of Canada. That is the reason we took the course we did with reference to the name. As to the question of pay, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) raised, I was advised that we had power to do what has been done. The question did not come before me in quite the form in which he has presented it. It may be necessary to have an order in council.

Mr. FOSTER. It is rather important that this matter should be settled. I would like to have the attention of the legal officer of the government, as well as of the Minister of Militia. I am not a militiaman, but as I understand it we have two different branches of the service. We have what we call volunteers, and we have what we call a permanent force, each of them established by law. Our volunteers are volunteers by virtue of a certain enactment, and the permanent corps are a permanent corps by virtue of a certain enactment. You are not able to transfer from one to the other as an entity or in regard to remuneration by mere order of the Militia Department, I take it. The volunteers, as I understand it, when they are out, are paid at the rate of 50 cents per day; the permanent corps are paid at the rate of 40 cents per day. Are these volunteers who have gone to South Africa part of the permanent corps or are they volunteers? If you consider them a permanent corps, by virtue of what authority do you do so? It cannot be that by mere act of the department you can double the permanent force whenever you please. I do not think there is any authority for that.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. minister will see where he stands in this respect, if my premises are sound. He is bound, if he has the authority here to treat these as volunteers, to pay them the legal pay of volunteers—50 cents per day, and he had no authority, by mere militia order, as I understand it, to make their pay 40 cents per day and he had no authority, as I understand it, to say that 1,000 or 2,000 or 2,500, when they were enrolled should be a permanent force—that is, he could not do it by militia order. So, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has not taken all the steps to give this contingent a proper legal standing in respect to these matters. If they are to be looked upon as volunteers under the Act, then he had not the right to fix their pay at 40 cents, because the law says that the volunteers shall have 50 cents.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Payment has not yet been made under the clause. Let me call my hon. friend's (Mr. Foster's) attention to the third section of the Bill. I think that subsection (d) would make it clear. I would ask if my hon. friend does not think that gives the necessary power for the future, whatever may have been the status in the past?

Mr. FOSTER. Clause 3 reads as follows:

The word 'expenditure' in this Act includes—

(a) Expenses of every kind in connection with the raising, enrolling, arming, equipping, provisioning, despatching and transporting of the said contingents up to the time of their arrival at the place of debarkation in South Africa;

(b) The payment of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men composing the said contingents up to the time of such debarkation, at the rates authorized by the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence;

(c) All separation allowances paid to the wives and children of the married non-commissioned officers and men;

And so on. That is legislation which has not yet passed; and my point was with reference to what has preceded that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But we have not paid yet.

Mr. FOSTER. My point is as to the pay under the preceding law and regulations. First, as to what footing these are on: Are they to be a permanent force, or are they volunteers? Once you decide they are volunteers—I think that must be the decision—then the law fixes the remuneration at 50 cents. So that up to the time this legislation takes effect, the Minister of Militia and Defence is bound to pay them on the basis of volunteers, that is, 50 cents a day. I have not looked up the law, but I think there must be some definite basis laid down in the law as to the rate of pay of the volunteers, and the rate of the permanent force.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It appears to me that this question is a very important one. I take it, the position is that this entire force that has gone to South Africa are volunteers; they have not been sent there as a permanent force by the government, but they have been permitted to volunteer. That is my understanding of the position. The government have arranged and agreed that they should have the same rate of pay they had before, and consequently any balance between that which they receive from the Imperial government, and the amount that they were receiving as a portion of the permanent force, should be provided by parliament. In the next place, do the mounted police stand in precisely the same category? The mounted police are in the employ of the government, and are receiving a certain amount of pay. The same arrangements have been made with them, they have been allowed to volunteer their services by the government, in South Africa, and the government undertake to see that their pay is not decreased, that they should have the same amount they would have received if they had been discharging their duties in the mounted police. Then, you have a third class, parties who are neither in the permanent corps or in the mounted police, but private citizens, who have also volunteered; and the intention of the government, as I understand it, is to provide that they should receive the same amount of pay as the others. I understand that many of these private citizens who have gone to South Africa have given up positions worth five times the amount they will receive in the the force. I am sure the government will not allow them to suffer any more than they would the permanent corps or the mounted police. It seems to me that there should be no question about it, that the government are bound to take such action, whether by orders in council, or department regulation of the Militia Department, or by Act of Parliament if necessary, as will remove all possible doubt as to their power to pay these sums which it is intended to pay to the various parties. It appears to me that in a Bill of this kind, there should be no question, that the government should take such steps as will assure them the authority for making the payment of every dollar of this money that is required to carry out the engagements which the government have made.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think there is any practical difference between us. The ex-Minister of Finance did suggest that, perhaps, it was necessary to have had an order in council, rather than a regulation of the Department of Militia, to enable us properly to make these payments; possibly there is something in that. But as to the practical question, there is no doubt that the intention is that these men shall receive the sum of 50 cents per day; that is certainly the intention of all of us. Of course if there be a shadow of doubt about it, that doubt must be removed, but so far we have not had any reason to doubt. But it is only right that it should be looked into, so that there should be no doubt that the intention of the government and parliament shall be carried out.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Finance tells us that the payment of the volunteers is to be 50 cents and all charges of maintenance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We make no deductions.

Mr. WALLACE. That the volunteers and privates receive 50 cents a day in addition to all the clothing, maintenance and all the other expenses?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Clothing, maintenance, and so forth, while he is in South Africa, of course, all come under the charge of the Imperial service. That question is not raised at all. He will receive 50 cents a day, part of which he will receive from the Imperial government, and the balance from the Treasury of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And that is independent of maintenance and other expenses?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We do not deal with the question of maintenance, that is dealt with by the Imperial regulations.

Mr. WALLACE. The reason I mentioned that point is, that the English soldier, I think, gets a shilling per day, but there are some deductions from that amount for maintenance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There will be no deduction here as between the Imperial pay and the 50 cents.

Mr. WALLACE. Therefore, if 6d. were deducted for maintenance, there would be 12 cents coming to him from the Imperial government; and then I understand the balance of the 50 cents, 38 cents, would be made up by the government of Canada—or whatever the balance of the 50 cents might be. I would like to have an answer from the minister on that point.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I was looking at the law. Would the hon. gentleman state his point again?

Mr. WALLACE. The British government pays the British soldier a shilling per day, say 24 cents. I am told that under the English regulations, a portion of that is deducted for maintenance. If that be the case, it would be the same with our volunteers going over there, that same amount would be deducted from them for maintenance, because they are placed, so far as the British government is concerned, on precisely the same footing as the regular soldier enlisted in the British army. Now, suppose 6d. were deducted for maintenance, that would leave 12 cents in cash to be paid the Canadian volunteer by the British government. Now, I want to understand if the Canadian government will make up what is required to bring the pay up to 50 cents per day, for the Canadian volunteer, in addition to all maintenance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think there is any deduction from the British soldier, for maintenance.

Mr. WALLACE. I am told there is.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I must contradict my hon. friend. I am afraid I am not well up in military matters, but my impression is that the British soldier receives a shilling a day over and above maintenance.

Mr. WALLACE. The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Adolphe Caron), tells me differently, so does the member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior). But if it be so, do we understand that the Canadian volunteer and private gets the 50 cents a day, in addition to all living expenses, clothing and other things, the same as if he were in Canada? That is a proposition easily stated and easily understood, and we would like an answer from the minister on that subject.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to say in connection with this matter that the indefinite language used in subsection 3, of section (d), was complained of when the resolution was introduced. I think it might be very well considered in connection with the point raised by my hon. friend. At that time, I pointed out that there was no information before the House as to what the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence were, and I understood that when the Bill was introduced, there would be a definite statement of the amount to be paid. If that were done, it seems to me, that it would remove the difficulty which has been suggested by my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace). There should be a definite sum stated. I think the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us, at that time, that there would be a definite amount of money mentioned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not necessarily in the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Well, it must be mentioned somewhere; it must exist somewhere so that parliament can have access to it, and know what it is dealing with. If it is not to be mentioned in the Bill, then, I think, it should exist in some order or regulation of the Department of Militia and Defence, which should be laid before the House so that we would have some information as to what we were doing. I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance that the Bill should be amended in that way. There is another suggestion I would like to make, and it is in regard to the difficulty as to the payments which will be made before this Bill goes into effect. The only difficulty is that the Bill is not made applicable to payments that shall be made before the Act goes into operation. If you provide in the Bill that the whole Act shall relate, not only to payments made after it goes into operation, but before the Act goes into operation. I think you will remove the difficulty. The difficulty is that the Act only applies to payments made after it goes into operation; therefore, it will not cover payments which have been made in the past and which will be made before the Act receives the assent of His Excellency the Governor General.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This Bill legalizes these payments.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). No; it does not, as far as I can see; at least, so far as section 3 is concerned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Section 1 covers these payments.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) is right, but, if he is right, I do not see that there is any difficulty at all. If the Bill applies to payments made before it goes into operation, there will be no difficulty; otherwise, it should be made applicable to these payments.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This does not fix the pay expressly, but I agree that it should be fixed, and that parliament should legislate in the light of a fixed amount. Under the regulation of the Militia Department, it expresses the pay of the permanent force, which we all agreed was a mistake and did not carry out our intention. I agree that the regulation should be amended before this Bill passes this House. That can be done very quickly, and we will then be legalizing the rate of pay which is provided in the regulation laid before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have one word or two in answer to one question, so that we can understand the position of the force. I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence on what footing these Canadians are at present and have been from the time they were enrolled. Do the department and the government consider them as part of the permanent force, or militia on active service? That is a fair, plain question. Let us know where we are.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Mr. Chairman, I explained a few moments ago, the reason why this regiment of volunteers for service in South Africa was given the name it was given. It was so that it might have a home, a regimental headquarters. It was not intended, nor did it increase the strength of the militia of Canada at all; in fact, the difficulty as to whether this force was a part of the militia of Canada is overcome by the making of a special contract with these men. They were not all, by any means, militiamen; they were taken from all parts of the community; they were volunteers, and a special contract was made with them for service in South Africa, on certain conditions and at certain rates, so that they are certainly not part of the active militia of Canada.

Mr. PRIOR. Were they not all sworn as militia regiments on service?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, not at all. They were sworn under a special oath and agreement made with these men, and not at all the oath under which our men are sworn into the militia.

Mr. WALLACE. What was the length of time?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Six months, or one year, if required.

Mr. McNEILL. I understand the Minister of Militia and Defence to say that these men are absolutely volunteers?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the hon. minister give an answer to the question of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In reference to that point, I would say that I was not aware of what the hon. gentleman had stated, but my view of the object of this Bill is that parliament intends to give power to pay the volunteers who have gone out to South Africa, the difference between the amount they will receive from the British government and our Canadian pay.

Mr. McNEILL. The amount in cash?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not say cash, because I think the committee will agree with me that if our volunteers are receiving 24 cents a day, with the advantage they are getting of the right to a pension, the same as British soldiers, they are probably getting the full extent of the 24 cents, and Canada should only be called upon to pay the difference in money.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the hon. minister be kind enough to tell us under what authority the men were sworn? He says that they are not militiamen, that they are not members of the permanent force; are they sworn under the Militia Act, or under what authority have you sworn them?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We have authority, I presume, in this country, and the right to recruit men here for service in South Africa for the British government. I do not think it requires any special Act or authority to do that. A special contract was made with these men, just the same as my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart), I presume, could make an arrangement with the British government, with the consent of the government of this country, that he would send men forward, making a special arrangement with them to serve the Imperial government in South Africa. They were not sent forward as militiamen. We simply expedited their going, and we made a contract with them which we thought was necessary and proper.

Mr. HAGGART. They are Imperial volunteers sworn in under the Imperial Act?

Mr. McNEILL. In regard to this other matter that the hon. minister was in the act of explaining, from what fell from my hon. friend, is the committee given to understand that, suppose, for example, the 24 cents were to be taken up in maintenance, the government would hold themselves responsible for the payment of only 25 cents or 26 cents, not of 50 cents ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not understand that the men find their own living. I understand that they get the 24 cents and their rations besides. I never heard of any such suggestion as that.

Mr. McNEILL. I am putting a supposititious case. I am assuming that the statement made by the late Minister of Militia (Sir Adolphe Caron) is correct, and that there is a large deduction made from the shilling a day, for maintenance. Suppose that statement be correct, are our volunteers in South Africa to have an amount provided by this government, which will bring their pay up to 50 cents a day, clear of all deductions. That is to say, suppose that certain deductions from the 24 cents a day are made by the Imperial authorities, will this government provide that the Canadians shall receive 50 cents a day, clear. Now, that is a very simple question for the minister to answer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is based on an alleged statement made by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), who has not taken the responsibility of guaranteeing that statement to the House.

Mr. McNEILL. And suppose that the hon. member for Three Rivers never made such a statement, we are entitled to have an answer to that question from the government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The government has decided, and I think wisely, that the members of the permanent force and of the mounted police, as well as the other volunteers should receive 50 cents a day in South Africa, exactly the same as if they were volunteers on active service in Canada. The Canadian volunteer on active service here, is maintained in every way by the government, and in addition to that he gets 50 cents a day clear. The government have wisely decided that the position of that volunteer shall not be any worse because he is on service in South Africa, rather than in Canada. Now, the point raised at the present time is a new one. The Canadian government assumed that the British government would pay a shilling a day to each volunteer, and so the Canadian government proposed to pay the difference between the shilling a day and the 50 cents a day. It appears now that we have been labouring under a misapprehension, because the pay of a shilling a day by the Imperial government is subject to certain deductions, and in fact only amounts to about eight pence a day.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Less than that ; about four pence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, we will say, for the sake of illustration, that it amounts to eight pence ; but whether it amounts to eight pence or six pence or four pence, it will be seen at once that this government should keep good faith with the volunteers who are serving in South Africa, they will require to contribute a larger amount than if the Imperial pay of a shilling a day was not subject to any deductions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the point before us now, and I am sure it is perfectly understood by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I submit that we ought not to allow ourselves to drift into hypothetical discussions. We ought find out exactly what the facts of the case are, and then we will be in a position to consider the matter properly. We will find out what the facts are, and we will discuss the matter in the light of knowledge before the Bill is passed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have correctly interpreted the intentions of the government I believe.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We certainly expected to give them the extra 25 cents a day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. You certainly intended that they should receive 50 cents a day without any reduction whatever.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Quite so, but we understood that an extra 25 cents a day would cover the amount.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We trust that when the facts are ascertained the government will take such measures as will absolutely secure to each volunteer 50 cents a day without any deduction.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We will get the facts.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). My information is that while there are deductions in time of peace, there are no such deductions in time of war in the British army. However, I will look into the matter.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The deductions are what are called necessaries in the men's kit, and the British soldier as a matter of fact never gets more net pay than about four pence a day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps those deductions may not be made during war.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I do not know how that might be.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no doubt that these deductions are made in time of peace, but I have never had to deal with these matters in time of war, so I do not know how that may be. It seems clear that we wish to pay our Canadian volunteers in South Africa 50 cents a day free from all deductions, and we should take precautions to ensure that. If these deductions from the Imperial pay materially reduce the shilling per day, of course, our government would have to make provision to pay a larger amount.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Militia stated in reply to a question from this side of the House, that it was an advantage to the Canadian volunteers to be placed on the same basis as the British soldier, because they would be given the Imperial allowances for pension and so on. I do not think that a man who enlists for twelve months as does the Canadian volunteer would profit anything from those allowances that would be worth consideration. The Minister of Finance explicitly stated the other night, that the pay of the Canadian soldier would be made up to him so as to amount to 50 cents a day. That is all we want. We simply want the promise of the Minister of Finance carried out, that the Canadian volunteer, no matter what deductions shall be made by the British army regulations, shall get 50 cents a day cash in addition to his maintenance, clothing and other necessaries. That is the whole question, and that is a question that I think can be decided now, when the government have this Bill under consideration. Instead of waiting for further information about any matter, let the government simply implement the promise which was made by the Finance Minister explicitly and without any reservation.

Mr. McNEILL. We are not asking the Finance Minister or the government to legislate in the dark or on a hypothesis. We are simply asking that they shall declare that there shall be no deduction made in the cash payment of 50 cents a day to our volunteers.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Before we deal with the question of deductions, we must know what they are and what they are for, and I think it would be a mistake to deal with that question in the dark, for that is what it amounts to. I stated the other night that the intention and the desire of the government was that the minimum pay to the soldier should be 50 cents a day, and I certainly understood that that was over and above his maintenance; but if there are deductions, and these are for things which the soldier in Canada would be obliged to pay for out of his 50 cents a day, let us ascertain what they are. It is easy to find out before we arrive at a later stage of the Bill. The desire of the government is to deal with the soldiers in a liberal and generous spirit.

Mr. FOSTER. That is satisfactory as far as it goes, but what is the reason the Militia Department do not know this?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They do know it.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the reason that after they have been working on this matter for three months or more and have matured their legislation and brought it down to the House, and it has been here a week or more, the Minister of Militia cannot tell exactly what is the usage, so that this matter shall be made clear? It seems to me that that is the first thing the Militia Department is for. I am quite sure that if the Finance Minister were bringing down a Bill of his own, and a question arose as to interest or percentages or brokerages payable on the English market, he would have the knowledge and would be able to say exactly what it was. What is the reason the Militia Department have not the information in regard to this matter, but we have to wait until we get the exact facts? As the Minister of Finance says, they can easily be obtained, and, so far as that section goes, we cannot legislate until we ascertain the basis on which we are legislating. There is another point which I wanted to mention, that is, as to the status of these men. I do not know yet what they are; but I gather from what the Minister of Militia has said that they are not of the permanent corps, and that they do not belong to the militia force. It seems to me that under the Militia Act you have power to pay to only one or other of these classes of soldiers; but you have been paying to a body or troop or company of men who belong neither to the militia nor to the permanent force. Then, under what authority have you been paying, for the last two months or more a large sum of money to a set of men who, you yourselves say, have no legal status as though they belonged to permanent corps? You say that they are simply Imperial volunteers. Then, if you have just been recruiting for the Imperial army, you must look to the Imperial authorities for the pay of the soldiers until you get some authority to pay them. But you have had no authority to pay, either by order in council or by legislation. That is what puzzles me now. How has the Minister of Militia drawn his money up to the present time, and by what authority has he been paying a force which has no entity at all, so far as our enactments are concerned?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think my hon. friend has been quite fair to the Minister of Militia. The minister stated positively that his information was that there were no deductions in time of war, and therefore the remarks of the hon.

ex-Minister of Finance are the result of misunderstanding. But as the hon. gentlemen opposite say that this may be a mistake, we think, in deference to them, that we should look into the matter further. With regard to the status of the soldiers, I do not think we are called upon to worry ourselves whether they belong to the permanent force or to the militia, under the Militia Act. When they are enrolled it may be necessary for us to consider the Militia Act; but for the purposes of this Bill we are not bound to consider them as belonging either to the permanent force or to the militia. It is sufficient for us to know that they are soldiers of Her Majesty serving in South Africa. Where did we get the authority to pay them? Nowhere except in a Governor General's warrant; and we are coming here to-day to get the House to legalize and confirm every step that we have taken. I do not think my hon. friend is correct when he says that we are bound to give a definition of these forces. I do not think it is necessary that they should be regarded as either of the militia or the permanent force of Canada. They are soldiers of Her Majesty, serving in South Africa, and subject in all respects to the Imperial regulations, and in this Act we are taking all the power necessary to pay them.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think my hon. friend has quite understood the point I took. I am not saying that you cannot provide in this enactment what you please with reference to the pay. Nor am I saying that you ought to give them a name. My point is that the Minister of Militia, without any warrant by legislation or by order in council that I can find, has undertaken to pay a body of men who are not legally recognized in the statutes of Canada either as militiamen or as men of the permanent force. He has undertaken to pay these men a certain sum of money per day—under what authority? He has no order in council for it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No legal authority, unless you consider the Governor General's warrant to be that.

Mr. FOSTER. You can consider the Governor General's warrant as appropriating a certain amount of money in gross for certain expenses; but surely there is no authority for the Minister of Militia to say that 50 cents or 40 cents or 20 cents a day shall be paid to a certain set of men whom he calls into existence. If there is any authority at all under a Governor General's warrant, that must be further carried out by an order in council as to details, and I find no order in council authorizing that. My hon. friend sees the point?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not see the point quite as the hon. gentleman does, because I do not see that an order in council gives any more legality to the payment than an order of the Militia Department. An order in council is no more effective than an order from the department, unless it is founded on a statute. I can only repeat what the Finance Minister has said with regard to this matter. We are coming here for authority to sanction what the minister has done, and the only question is that we should clearly understand what he has done and the amount he is going to pay. It is understood that we are to pay 50 cents instead of 40 cents, which was inadvertently placed in the resolution, and the order of the minister will be made to conform to the understanding of the House. By subsection 'd.' we get the authority of this Act to pay it, and this section will be our authority for what has been done and what will be done in future. Regulations either have been made or will be made prescribing that 50 cents per day shall be their pay, and if there are no abatements made in times of war, there is no question to be raised at all. These men are not a permanent corps under our statutes. They are not mounted police or volunteers, and therefore it might be argued that there is no statute authorizing any payment to be made to them. That is why the Bill is introduced—because there is no legal authority to justify paying them.

Mr. McNEILL. The payments have been made?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. They have been made on the basis of the permanent force?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. That is to say, 10 cents less than the sum intended?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. Have you any authority in this Bill to make good the difference?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. When the regulations provide 50 cents, the difference of 10 cents will be paid.

Mr. McNEILL. You will have authority to pay the difference then?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Mr. BOURASSA. This discussion shows, what I have always contended, that the government has been outside the law from beginning to end, and have come to this parliament asking us to bring them within the law. In other words, after the man is hanged, we are asking for a trial.

When the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) asked under what authority the Minister of Militia had acted, that hon. gentleman replied that he had acted under the broad law, if I understood him rightly, that Canada was supplying volunteers to the British army. I would like to know if it is to be the policy of this government that whenever a war breaks out, we are to supply any quantity of men and any amount of money, on Governor General's warrants, and incur any amount of expenditure in buying rifles and equipment, and then come to parliament and ask parliament to vote this expenditure simply because it is done for Great Britain. I am ready to do my share for Great Britain, but I think a little more respect should be paid to parliament.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is unnecessarily distressing himself about this. The government have done nothing in this matter except what they always do when they issue Governor General's warrants.

Mr. BOURASSA. As I understand it, Governor General's warrants are resorted to only in matters within the ordinary province of government, such as work generally authorized by parliament, and concerning which expedition is necessary.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They are not necessarily restricted to that at all. If the hon. gentleman will look at the statutes, he will find that the words used are 'unforeseen expenses,' which will include this, as well as a great many things dealt with by such warrants in the past. There does not seem to be any legal difficulty in the situation at all. These men were enrolled under the Imperial statute, and have become part of the British army, but inasmuch as Canada wanted to do something for the empire at a critical time, the government undertook to provide for their transportation to Africa and a portion of their pay. In order to do that, they resorted to Governor General's warrants, depending on parliamentary sanction afterwards. Therefore, they have not proceeded outside the law one iota more than in any other case of Governor General's warrants.

There is one thing I would like to suggest to the Minister of Finance. He says that this Act is an Act of indemnification which provides on the face of it for payments made in the past. Such is the case in section 1, so far as the $850,000 is concerned, but if the hon. gentleman will look at section 2, he will find that such is not the case. Therefore, such portions of the $1,150,000 provided by section 2, as may be paid before this Bill becomes law, will not have the warrant of this Act, and I would suggest, as a matter of precaution, and in order to have the thing done legally and properly, that there should be a little change in the second section so as to make it conform with section 1.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If we had expended the total sum of $850,000 provided in the first section, the suggestion of the hon. gentleman would have greater force, but I understand that we have not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The point is this. Will you or will you not, before this Act comes into operation, require to expend any portion of this $1,250,000. If you think that you may, you ought to insert this provision regarding indemnification in subsection 2.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We presume that the Act will be assented to quickly, otherwise the hon. gentleman's criticism would have more weight.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not desire to open up the very large question which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has referred to, but I do not wish to allow, for a second or third time, one remark of his to pass without entering my protest, and that remark is this, that this expenditure is made for Great Britain. I desire to say that this expenditure is not made for Great Britain alone, but just as much for Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. The title of the Bill is somewhat misleading. It is 'to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.' From that I took the idea that this was to provide simply for their expenses in South Africa, but when we come to the preamble, I see that the Bill is to provide for expenses incurred as well before the volunteers got to South Africa.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The words in the preamble: 'For the purpose of equipping and forwarding,' seem to me to cover the ground.

Mr. FOSTER. The words should be 'equipping, paying and forwarding.' Otherwise you will have no legal basis for paying the volunteers from the time of their enrolment until they leave Canada.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have no objection to inserting that word in order to make the intention beyond doubt.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Bill as drawn covers that point. If the first section had been confined to the language of the preamble alone, the hon. gentleman's point would be well taken. But the next clause provides for payment of expenditure incurred or to be incurred. Part of the expenditure incurred has been the paying of the men as explained by the Minister of Militia.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, your preamble ought to conform with the section.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no objection.

Mr. INGRAM. We have had placed in our hands an estimate up to June 30th, 1900, for this service. I wish to ask an explanation, with respect to the purchasing of horses. I find that 1,210 horses have been purchased. It says that all the returns are not in, but the average price paid for horses, was $135, which, for 1,210, would amount to $163,350. Again, I find, for the transport of 1,210 horses from different parts of the Dominion to Halifax, care and maintenance, to the date of sailing, $25 per horse, a total of $30,250. Below that I find another item for the cost of transport of troops, horses and supplies, to the port of embarkation, $94,250. I would like to learn something of the mode by which the government purchased these horses, who were authorized to purchase them, and whether a limit of price was set, beyond which they were not to go in paying for horses, and how does it come that under these different headings, there seem to be two charges for transport for these horses. Either this is mixed, or I am.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Most of the horses were brought first to Toronto. One of the regiments was formed there, under the command, temporarily, of Colonel Kittson, the commandant of the Royal Military College. So, there were certain charges in connection with bringing horses to Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. Where from ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. From different parts of Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. The horses were bought in Ontario ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes. Then, there were the freight charges from Toronto to Halifax, which would be a separate railway charge, then, of course, there would be the rate from Halifax to South Africa. With regard to the squadrons which were recruited in the North-west, the horses were bought in different parts of the North-west Territories, and brought together, I think, at Regina, and then were brought to Ottawa, and rested here for a short time, and then on to Halifax. In the same way the transport was divided, I suppose, into two parts, the first prior to their assembling, and after that from the point at which they assembled in the first instance to Halifax, the point of embarkation.

Now, with regard to the purchase of horses, I can only say that it was done under the orders of the Major General commanding the forces absolutely. The only orders, were the orders which were published, and which have been laid on the Table of the House. I understand that the horses were purchased in the open market. On the strength of the publication of the orders, certain horse dealers, or anybody, who saw fit, got together horses which might be considered suitable and brought them to certain centres, before boards appointed by the Major General commanding, consisting of Colonel Kittson, veterinary officers, the permanent corps officer at Toronto, and, I think at Kingston, and in the North-west, the veterinary officers of the North-west Mounted Police. The horses were brought to this board, or in some cases, the board went out and saw the horses at certain points and purchased them at what they considered to be their value. So far as I am personally concerned, I know nothing whatever about the men from whom they were purchased, or whether good value was got or not. I believe, though, that, on the average, the horses were very suitable for the purpose that they were purchased, at a fair valuation, and that the country got value for the money paid.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. minister has not said whether the government instructed those who bought the horses not to go beyond a certain limit.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The limit was $150 in Ontario, and in the North-west Territories, it was lower. The average price paid, in the North-west, was $87.

Mr. INGRAM. After the horses were decided upon and purchased to the satisfaction of the officers whom the government appointed, were any horses rejected, and others subjected ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think there were a few horses found unfit to be sent forward. There were more horses purchased than were necessary to be sent out. Or rather, as we were sending to South Africa, a certain number of our own horses—I mean the horses owned by the permanent force—new horses had to be purchased to be substituted for these.

Mr. INGRAM. Would the hon. gentleman say by whose authority they were thrown out, or objected to ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. By the board at Halifax. There were several horses that were sick—pneumonia—and quite a number of horses had to be left behind at Halifax. Most of them or all of them have recovered.

Mr. INGRAM. After the horses had been bought at Toronto, or these other centres where they were assembled for the purpose of being inspected by this board, did anybody take the responsibility of rejecting these horses and buying others in their places ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. INGRAM. Any member of the board ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to know if these horses were purchased by commission ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. SPROULE. The parties who purchased, were sent out as agents of the government ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The government had no agents.

Mr. SPROULE. If they were not purchased on commission, some person, either an agent of the government, or some private individual, must have purchased them and handed them over to the government. Which way was it ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There were no commissions paid. I tried to explain the matter. The militia order, under which these horses were purchased, was published in all the newspapers, as public news, and immediately those who were interested presented themselves to the board, or to Colonel Kittson, and offered to bring horses, either their own or others that they would assemble ; and Colonel Kittson advised them he was prepared to look at the horses, and any horses that were suitable, and were offered at a right price, he would purchase. But there was no one appointed agent of the government, and I understand from Colonel Kittson, with whom I talked the matter over afterwards, that no one else purchased horses for him, or for the government. Of course, people were asked to bring their horses forward, so that they might be examined, and those who were found suitable at the price, were purchased.

Mr. BERGERON. Where was Col. Kittson located ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. At Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. It must have been Col. Kittson, then, who purchased ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Col. Kittson was the officer who organized the regiment at Toronto, and he purchased the horses there, he is responsible. In the North-west, Col. Herchmer was the officer.

Mr. SPROULE. I have been informed that from $45 to $65 was all that could be paid to the farmers for horses for which the government, it seems, are charged $135. Some of them must have cost the government over $135, and some below, because this is the average. There was no need of looking at horses while they could only pay for them $45 to $65. So it seems that some person has been making a little side haul out of it, otherwise they have been disseminating false information, which is not only detrimental to the country, but to the farmers.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I can only say that if the hon. gentleman will acquaint me with the name of any one who made a statement of that kind, I will be very glad indeed to have it. He had no authority from the government to make it.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the party had any authority directly from the government.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, nor indirectly.

Mr. SPROULE. But he must have had from some authorized agent of the government, or otherwise he would not make a gratuitous statement not founded on fact. I made the statement in the House nearly a month ago that such was the case, and I made it within a few days of hearing the statement made to me that $45 to $65 was the highest amount the government would pay for horses. I said to this man : If you expect to get horses of the class that are required for this purpose for any such money, certainly you will not get them in Ontario, because no man in Ontario that has horses suitable for that purpose would sell them for anything like that money.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I can only say that authority was given to pay as high as $150 ; there was no restriction whatever so far as the eastern provinces are concerned. The matter was under the control of the general commanding officer, and specially under the control of Col. Kittson, an honourable officer, who was assisted by Mr. Hall, of Toronto, the permanent force veterinarian, who, I believe, is a thoroughly honest and respectable man. They have been assisted by an officer of the permanent force, Capt. Pierce, of Toronto, who is now in South Africa, and who, I believe, is a thoroughly honourable gentleman. These were the men who had absolute control of the purchase of horses, without any restriction whatever except that they were not to go beyond the maximum of $150. The hon. gentleman says he made this statement in the House before ; I could not have been here, for I did not hear it. If there has been anything of the kind suggested or rightly inferred in the remarks that he has made, I would like very much to be placed in possession of a little more detailed information, so that I can pursue the matter, and I promise I will do it to the fullest extent. I cannot believe that my hon. friend's information is correct, unless he says he knows it himself.

Mr. SPROULE. I say the statement was made to myself. I understood the government were paying up to $140 and $150, and I was asked to give information to several parties who wished to bring their horses out, but this party made the statement to me that they could not go above $45 to $65. Then, following that I noticed in one of the Toronto papers, a statement that the horses could not be got in Canada, that there was not a supply of the right quality, and the purchasers were obliged to go to the United States or elsewhere. Well, I said, if these are the prices that are being paid, I do not wonder that they cannot get the horses, because you cannot pick up horses of that quality for anything like that money. But when I had that statement from the party who was buying on the market at the time—not an agent of the government, because I do not think he was, but he was buying them for that purpose—when I had that statement from him, and when I saw the other statement in the Toronto paper, that the supply of horses could not be got in Canada, I thought it was a great injustice to the farmers of Canada, because many horses in our section of the country worth $150 could be found. But our farmers would never pretend to bring out horses of this quality and sell them for $45 to $60.

Mr. DAVIN. Could the minister tell us where the horses have been bought?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Every horse has been bought in Canada, they are all Canadian horses.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to ask the minister if the rate of pay set down in the schedule placed before the House, of 75 cents a day for mounted men, is the rate that is being paid the whole body of mounted police?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is the North-west mounted police rate.

Mr. OLIVER. It says here that each man of the mounted rifles gets 75 cents a day. I want to know if they get 75 cents a day now, and will they get 75 cents a day?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With reference to the local purchase of horses, it has been stated publicly, that although they were purchased in Canada, a number of them were brought out from Montana.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That may refer to Lord Strath-cona's horses, with which we have nothing to do.

Mr. BERGERON. Do I understand that all the horses bought in eastern Canada were bought through Col. Kittson, and at Toronto?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. BERGERON. That would explain the question asked by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule). Col. Kittson could not be everywhere, somebody must have brought horses to him from the different provinces. I understand some were bought in Quebec and some in the maritime provinces. Did their owners go up to Toronto to see Col. Kittson, or did he go down himself to buy the horses?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. At Montreal, the purchase of horses was under the direction of the district officer commanding there, I think his name is Gordon, and a number of officers under him; the same at Halifax and St. John. But by far the largest number of horses were purchased under Col. Kittson. Of course, a certain number were purchased at other points, but they were all purchased under the direction of Col. Kittson, and other officers of the Militia Department.

Mr. BERGERON. So it might happen without the knowledge of the government that what the member for Grey complained of was true, that some horses were bought for $65 for which the government paid $150?

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The statement of the member for Grey is easily explained. Some private individual, wishing to speculate in horses, went into his neighbourhood and offered to buy a certain number at $40 to $65, with the intention of taking them to Toronto, and take his chances of selling them to the government. It was purely a matter of private speculation.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not what I wanted to get at. Either there was information given to the public that horses were wanted at the city of Toronto, or there was not. Now, if proper information had been given in the way of an advertisement, you could have attracted there hundreds and hundreds of horses of that quality, direct from the owners. But if there was no information given, except an order to some of the militia authorities of Toronto, and they went around amongst a few of their own friends and picked them up, I do not wonder they are charged at the prices we see to-day, and yet the farmers only get the small price for them that I have stated. It was for the purpose of bringing out that information that I asked the question the other day. I also wish to know if the hon. minister will tell us how many horses were picked at Toronto, and if there were any advertisements put in the papers that these horses were wanted and would be purchased if brought in there?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not know how many horses were purchased there; I cannot tell the hon. gentleman now, as I do not remember. The largest number were purchased in the neighbourhood of Toronto. In regard to advertisements, I think I have said, two or three times, that the Militia Order calling for horses was published in all the newspapers. I am not aware that the government put any advertisements in the newspapers. But I am told that parties, who are dealing in horses, advertised for horses to be brought to certain points on their own responsibility, and that they brought those horses to Toronto, or that the members of the board inspected the horses at some point outside of Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. I can hardly believe that these advertisements could be very numerous, or that they were published very widely, because we live in a country up there where the public are a reading public, the people take the papers; certainly, I never saw such an advertisement, and I am quite sure that hundreds—I might say thousands of people were about the same.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I saw, myself, the statements in the Globe and the Mail and Empire that horses were being purchased for the South African contingent, and I saw the words of the militia general order copied into these papers.

Mr. INGRAM. Would the hon. minister say whether the name of the person from whom they bought each horse was kept by the department, and the amount paid for each horse?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The amount paid for each one?

Mr. INGRAM. Was there any record kept of the name and the amount paid for each one?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think so.

Mr. INGRAM. I suppose that return can be brought down to this House.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, certainly.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. In Manitoba the advertisement calling for these horses was published in the daily papers for weeks; it was known within the time, and every one had an opportunity of seeing it.

Mr. SPROULE. I saw a kind of advertisement saying that the government wanted a certain class of horse, a horse between 15½ and 16 hands high, which would weigh between 1,150 and 1,250 pounds, but it did not give the information that if the horses were brought to any particular place there would be an individual at that place to inspect and purchase them. Following that a short time, there was another item saying that the class of horses required could not be got in Canada, or that very few of them could be got in Canada, and that they were very scarce.

Mr. ROCHE. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I had a question on the Order paper in which I asked the Minister of Militia how many saddles they had ordered, from whom were they purchased, were they bought by tender and were they purchased in Canada. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence replied that 300 saddles had been purchased from Adams Brothers of Toronto, and that they were made in Canada. I had information to the effect that other saddles were ordered, and I put another question on the paper as to how many saddles were ordered by the Militia Department for either the Canadian government or the Imperial government, or for Lord Strathcona, to which I received much the same reply, that 300 saddles, costing $37.50 each had been purchased from Adams Brothers, of Toronto. Is it not a fact that 2,000, or more, saddles were ordered by the War Department, or the Imperial government, through the Militia Department? I am informed that such is the case.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Saddles have been ordered for the Imperial government through the government of Canada, and have been purchased from several firms in Canada. One firm in the North-west Territories got an order, repurchased saddles from the United States, and very nearly destroyed the business which this government had been able to secure for manufacturers in Canada, by sending to Great Britain as Canadian saddles, saddles which had been purchased in the United States. We were unaware of the fact until we heard of it from the War Office, when an explanation was asked from the War Office why we sent American saddles as if they were Canadian saddles. Inquiry was made into the matter and it was ascertained that this purchase in the United States was made. I do not know that I should name the firm.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The question asked by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) the other day, I do not think is a question that we are called upon to answer here. The public of Canada is at no expense for saddles purchased, either for Lord Strathcona or the Imperial government. The Imperial government has asked this government to purchase a great many supplies of different kinds for use in South Africa. The government is very glad to do it, and Canadian manufacturers get the benefit of it. But I do not know that it is the business of this House, or any one in it, to ask questions as to what Lord Strathcona paid for his saddles, or as to what the Imperial government paid for its saddles, provided this government is at no expense in the matter.

Mr. ROCHE. I would like to tell the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence that if he thinks no member of this House had a right to ask this question, he, most assuredly, had no right to give an incorrect reply. He did not give the reply he has given here to-day. On the contrary, his reply was that 300 saddles had been purchased. His statement to-day is a direct contradiction of the facts.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Not at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) has no right to make such a statement, and I am sure he does not wish to misrepresent me. I was not here the other day, and I did not read the answer myself, but I prepared it. The answer simply referred to saddles purchased by the government.

Mr. ROCHE. No.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes; the rest of the question was not answered. The hon. gentleman's question referred to three different branches, and a reply was given to the first only. I do not know whether my hon. friend, who gave the answer, explained that the latter parts of the question could not be answered or not, but it was my intention to have so stated, and it was clear from the answer that the answer only applied to that portion of the question as to the purchase of saddles for Canada.

Mr. ROCHE. It is only right that I should give the hon. minister the information I have in my possession, and upon which I based these questions. I am not going to vouch for the accuracy of this, although it comes from a very reliable source. I have no objection to giving the hon. minister the name of the company from whom it comes—the Great West Saddle Company of Winnipeg. This is what the writer says:

I might say with regard to the saddle contract with the government that I certainly feel very much disappointed in the way they used me. I was the party, who, in the early stage of the war drew the British government's attention to Canada for war supplies in the saddlery line. I wrote a letter to Lord Strathcona and sent him my catalogues, etc., and asked him to put me in touch with the war department. Later on, I received a letter saying that the Imperial government had sent me on an order for about 2,000 cavalry United States standard pattern saddles but that it had been sent through the Minister of Militia at Ottawa. In due course, I received a telegram from the Minister of Militia asking me on how short a time I could furnish 1,000 saddles to be delivered in Southampton, to which I replied that I could do so in forty days, but I was informed that they would have to be delivered in thirty-five days that would give us about two weeks to produce the goods and about three weeks to get them there, they holding the order back nearly a week on me which resulted in our only undertaking to deliver 500 saddles, which we delivered on time, although it required a great effort on our part to accomplish it. When you consider that none of these military goods are kept in stock either in the United States or in Canada and everything had to be made out of raw material. However, after receiving notice of the order for 2,000 saddles I certainly expected that if there was an extension of time that I would be able to go back to Ottawa and get the balance of the order sent to me. On my arrival I found that the balance had been given away to political friends of the government. Some of it had been given to French houses in Quebec who never saw a military saddle or equipment before and did not know anything about what was necessary along that line. I am informed that the material that they are produced of is anything but satisfactory and that it will be dangerous and may be fatal to the British army if put in the field. While in our case the inspectors have reported to the government that everything we produced was equal and in most cases superior to the government sealed patterns. They, of course, raise some objections to us giving part of the contract to the United States, but on account of none of the goods being produced in Canada it was impossible to get them in Canada especially on such a short notice, and as time was the essence of the contract we had to sub-let part of it in order to be in time, although I had all arrangements made to produce the balance of the contract in my own factory here. However, I find that the political friends to whom they gave the balance of the contract, although they had ample time to produce the goods they had so much business to do that they have sub-let a portion of their order in the United States. This would especially apply to the contract let in Toronto. I was in Chicago on my way home and was told there that Adams Bros. of Toronto had so many orders and were so busy that they had Kipper & Son, of Chicago, Ortmayer & Son, of Chicago, Lanz, Owen & Co., of Chicago, and Perkins, Campbell & Co., of Cincinnati, working on their order so that if the question ever comes up you can name the parties who had the contract from Adams Bros., of Toronto, although they had ample time to manufacture the goods in Canada providing they did not get more than their share of what was going. We could easily have made 500 saddles here in our own premises in place of having them going to the States had we not been robbed of our contract and time been given us to make them as it was given to the Toronto people. The Toronto people, I presume, did what they could, but they had the run of the whole of the orders, and they took what they could manufacture themselves and all they could sub-let in the United States.

That is the information I received, and upon which I placed these questions upon the Order paper.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. What number of saddles have been purchased by the government either for the Canadian government, for the British government, or for Lord Strathcona, since July 1, 1899 ?

2. From whom were they purchased ?

3. What were the prices paid ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. (Mr. Borden). 1. 300 regimental cavalry saddles for Canadian government. 2. Adams Bros. 3. $37.50.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. How many saddles have been purchased or contracted for by the Militia Department since July 1, 1899 ? 2. From whom were they purchased or contracted for ? 3. Were they, or are they, being made in Canada ? 4. Were they purchased or contracted for by tender ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA (Mr. Borden). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows : 1. 300. 2. Adams Bros., Toronto. 3. Yes. 4. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That answered that part of the question.

Mr. ROCHE. There was a portion of the question which the minister did not reply to, and it is because of the insufficiency of the reply that I brought the matter up to-day to find out how many saddles were purchased for the Imperial government. I would like to hear the defence of the Minister of Militia against these charges, which as I say I know nothing about except through this correspondence.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I have already stated that an order was given to a firm in Canada for saddles for the British government. The firm by whom the letter was written which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) has read, was given an order in good faith for 500 saddles, to be finished and forwarded within a certain time. That firm undertook to deliver these saddles, Canadian made, within the time. Well, not a single one of these saddles, I am informed, was made in Canada. That firm went across to three different cities in the United States and purchased every single saddle, and these saddles were sent forward, as we believe, as Canadian saddles. We were taken very severely to task by the War Office some time afterwards, because we had appeared to be a party to an imposition played upon that office. I do not think that any one would be very much surprised if the Department of Militia did not feel justified in continuing to give orders to a firm of that kind.

Mr. PUTTEE. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia to tell us plainly, if it is the Great West Saddlery Company that is referred to in this matter, of which E. F. Hutchings is president ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. PUTTEE. If that be so, I would state that it is the largest saddlery firm in the west, and has its headquarters at Winnipeg. They have ample accommodation there for making all these saddles, but we know in Winnipeg that when they got this order from the government, they immediately sent across the border to Chicago and St. Louis to purchase these saddles which were to be used by the British troops in South Africa. At the present time that firm has all its employees locked out, claiming that stoppage was necessary on account of overstock. Fancy that firm coming to this government and asking for favours, and asking for a chance of supplying the goods, and at the same time locking out their unfortunate employees in the city of Winnipeg, in the middle of winter. I am glad to hear the explanation that it is that firm, because I do not think they are entitled to any sympathy from this House.

Mr. TAYLOR. No wonder Canadians are locked out when this government has jobbed out the work that the Great Northwest Saddlery Company could have done in this country. The supply of these saddles was jobbed out to Adams & Co. of Toronto, who is having them all built now in Chicago. I know something about it, and I can tell the Minister of Militia some facts in reference to it. I say that Mr. Hutchings, who is the president of this company, was the first to address a letter to Lord Strathcona, and he has a letter from Lord Strathcona saying that an order has been sent to the Minister of Militia of Canada asking them to purchase 2,000 saddles from him.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no such order.

Mr. TAYLOR. He has Lord Strathcona's letter for it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I cannot help that. We know what we have got.

Mr. TAYLOR. Here is what he says in his letter :

I wrote a letter to Lord Strathcona and sent him my catalogues, etc., and asked him to put me in touch with the War Department. Later on, I received a letter saying that the Imperial government had sent me on an order for about 2,000 cavalry United States standard pattern saddles, but that it had been sent through the Minister of Militia at Ottawa.

There is the order from the British government to the Canadian government.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that Lord Strathcona wrote to the gentleman named, to say that we had been instructed to order from his firm ?

Mr. TAYLOR. That is what he says Lord Strathcona wrote him.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is not what he says there. Read it again and you will see your mistake.

Mr. TAYLOR (reading) :

Later on, I received a letter saying that the Imperial government had sent me on an order for about 2,000 cavalry United States standard pattern saddles, but that it had been sent through the Minister of Militia at Ottawa.

I say that I am right, and that this government telegraphed him to come down and take the contract.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) that we were not restricted to order from anybody. But we offered them 1,000 saddles and they declined, but said they would make 500, and then they bought the 500 in the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR. To set this point at rest, let the minister bring down the correspondence between the government and Lord Strathcona, and if he does not we will have to move for it. I take as much stock in Mr. Hutchings' statement as I take in the statement of any man in Manitoba or outside of it. Mr. Hutchings had only two weeks. The government gave instructions to purchase from him, but they limited him to that time.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The limit was fixed by the Imperial government.

Mr. TAYLOR. He could not make 500 saddles in two weeks, but he made as many as he could in his own establishment, and he purchased the balance in the United States. Adams Bros., who got the order for the 1,500, had them made in these three houses in Chicago, and one in Cincinnati, and the government is accepting them. I want to draw the minister's attention to another matter. He has bought 14 light spring wagons, at $180 each. I want to know if these were purchased by tender, and who built them, because it is possible to get an excellent spring wagon in this country for $60.

Mr. DOBELL. I should like to say one word in defence of the saddles made in the province of Quebec. I learn that they were the very best saddles made, and superior to the standard required. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got the information to lead him to say that they were very inferior. The first 500 were made in the province of Quebec, and I understand that another 500 are being made there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where were they made ?

Mr. DOBELL. In Montreal.

Mr. BERGERON. By what firm ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The firm of Hector Lamontagne & Co. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), made a sneering remark that the saddles were made by a French firm. I do not know what the political complexion of Lamontagne & Co. is. My impression is that they are Conservatives. At any rate, I know that the leading man of the firm, Mr. Laurendeau, is a Conservative, and I have it from the department, that the saddles are the best saddles that have been made.

Mr. ROCHE. I would like to ask the hon. minister, if Mr. Adams, the late Liberal M. P.P. for Brandon, is a member of this Toronto firm ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not aware.

Mr. ROCHE. Well, he is.

Mr. PUTTEE. I wish to say, in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor), that I do not mean to say that the winnipeg firm put those men out, because they had not work for them, because I believe the fact is otherwise. I believe they were locked out, because they assert the right, which I believe this government should reserve to any Canadian citizen, to belong to any organization he chooses. That was the reason they were locked out, and not because of any overstocking. I want to ask the minister, if Mr. Hutchings' Company made a single saddle, or, if they did not get 250 from Chicago, and 250 from St. Louis, and only supplied 500 to the Imperial government ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am informed that the saddles were purchased in St. Louis and Chicago.

Mr. TAYLOR. How many in each case ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not know.

Mr. TAYLOR. The department ought to know, and my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee), will not say that Mr. Hutchings will write what is not true, and he writes here that he did make a large quantity of the 500, and purchased the balance.

Mr. GIBSON. How many did he make ?

Mr. TAYLOR. He does not say how many. He made all he could.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Maybe that is none.

Mr. TAYLOR. And he says that he could have made the other 1,500, made by Adams & Company, in the time given to them, but that he was limited to two weeks.

Mr. DOMVILLE. He could get them made in Chicago.

Mr. TAYLOR. Adams is getting them made in Chicago, and I will tell the minister another thing. Had this Winnipeg concern been given the contract, no doubt those workmen would have been at work, no matter what the wages were. I would like to know whether the wagons were purchased by tender or not, and from whom they were purchased?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before we come to the wagons, I wish to ask what length of time intervened between the receipt of the order from the Imperial government, and the communication the hon. minister sent to the manufacturers?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I telegraphed the same day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Can the hon. minister inform me what length of time was given to manufacture the number required?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The time given by the Imperial government, whatever that was.

Mr. INGRAM. Did the department limit the Winnipeg firm to any particular time?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I did not see the orders, but I understand that the time was fixed by the Imperial government. The time was short, and the department communicated by telegraph with the firm referred to, and other firms, and no firm in Canada would undertake the contract. They were fair enough to say that it was impossible to do the work in the time. This Winnipeg firm undertook to do it, but failed to do it, and bought the saddles in the United States, without consulting us.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. minister tell us the names of the manufacturers who were communicated with?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Lamontagne & Company, Borbridge in Ottawa, Adams Brothers, in Toronto, and the Winnipeg firm—four firms in all, I think.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are other firms who would undertake this work.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What firms are they?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman, being a newspaper man, would know where saddles are bought. Being a medical man, I do not know. Was an extension of time granted by the Imperial government for the delivery of these goods?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was that communicated to the different companies?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes, up to the time we discovered that the British government had been imposed upon, and since then we have not offered any more orders to that firm.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We are told that Adams Brothers are getting the saddles manufactured in Chicago.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not aware of that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. minister tell me how he became aware that the goods supplied by the Winnipeg firm, were made in the United States?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We were so informed by the Imperial government, and then we ascertained from the firm, that they had purchased the saddles there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Were instructions given to that firm that these saddles were to be manufactured in Canada.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We supposed that we were buying Canadian saddles. When we found that they had been manufactured in the United States, we never gave that firm another order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the hon. gentleman know whether the saddles supplied by Adams Brothers, have been inspected as to their nationality?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I suppose they have.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Canadian government, having been rapped over the knuckles with regard to the Winnipeg men, surely they would see whether the saddles of the Toronto firm were made in Canada.

Mr. BRITTON. Perhaps it was a slip.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) is wiser than the rest of us, and it may not have been a slip. Or it may have been a deliberate slip to befriend somebody. Can the hon. minister say if any inquiry has been made to ascertain whether these saddles are being manufactured now in Canada or Chicago?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. We have no reason to believe that they are not made in Canada. They were inspected at the factory in which they were made.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The others were inspected too?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. In New York,

Mr. MONTAGUE. And these are inspected during the process of making?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Well, immediately after they were made at the factory.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish that there should be any misunderstanding about this pay of 75 cents per day for the mounted men. I hold here the militia order for the formation of the Strathcona contingent, dated 1st February. It gives the pay of a private, according to length of service, 50 cents to 75 cents. In the statement before us, it is 75 cents.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My notion of what should be done, and is being done, is this. The North-west mounted police rates of pay are the rates adopted because they are the highest. A North-west mounted policeman, when enrolled, gets 50 cents per day, and for every year of service he gets five cents additional. So that at the end of five years, he gets 75 cents. A good many men, who have served five years, were enrolled, and these men will receive the whole 75 cents, but it was not intended that a man who had not served the five years should receive 75 cents.

Mr. OLIVER. I certainly understood, when this statement was put in my hands, that the Canadian mounted rifles were to get 75 cents per day. But if some of them are only to get 50 cents per day, I wish to enter my protest. A civilian who has left his ordinary occupation by reason of his loyalty, sacrifices a great deal more than does a mounted policeman, and should get the same pay. The distinction is most invidious and uncalled for. A man who comes in as an expert mounted man from the western country, is certainly worth more pay by reason of the knowledge he has acquired, and which cannot be had for money in any other part of the country or in any other circumstances. You enlist these men as mounted rifles in the west because they are as good as the mounted policemen. They are good rifle shots, good riders and able to find their way about the country. They are possibly better men than the mounted police. It is a most invidious and improper distinction, to pay one man who has made a greater sacrifice and is possibly a better man, 50 cents per day, and pay the other 75 cents. I wish to enter my solemn protest against this distinction.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand that in the case of the second contingent, the cowboy will only get 50 cents, whereas the man from the mounted police will get 75 cents?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Not unless he has had five years' service.

Mr. DAVIN. Then, some mounted policemen will get 75 cents, and others who have not completed their five years will get less, but in no case will a civilian get more than 50 cents?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. I think that is most unjust and should be reconsidered. If you talk with Col. Steele, who is here now, he will tell you that if there is any difference for scouting purposes on the veldt, between a mounted policeman and a well-seasoned man off the range, it will be in favour of the experienced cow-boy. Any number of policemen in the west will tell you the same. Conversing one day with Col. Herchmer about that second contingent, he told me that positively the best man was the man off the range. It is not just or desirable that this distinction should be made.

Mr. BERGERON. Before we leave this subject, I wish to call the attention of the committee to another question, and that is the question of the blankets, and that may throw some light on the saddles. Le Soleil said, when its editor got converted to the idea of sending a contingent, that it would be a very good thing for Canada, because people would sell hay and provisions and make money out of the poor fellows who are going to shed their blood in South Africa. And if we will go into the details, we will find that the friends of the government got their share, and that is why no tenders were invited. We have an example of this in the horse business, when the government paid at the rate of $150 per horse, which some of their friends got for $50 to $60, and made the difference.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the government had agents and that somebody, some friends of the government, in connection with the purchase of horses, and with the connivance or knowledge of the government, made a sum per horse?

Mr. BERGERON. I did not say that at all. I give the hon. gentleman credit for too much intelligence to charge him with doing anything of the kind in such a way, but I say that when it was advertised that some horses were wanted, and the government would pay as much as $150, without the knowledge or connivance of my hon. friend, a man might buy a horse for $60 or $70 and sell it for $150.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The whole world knew it. No people were selected. It was published in every newspaper in every city in the country.

Mr. BERGERON. But I want only to show the loose way in which it was done. When it was known that the government would pay $150, there was nothing to prevent a man buying a horse for $60 or $70 and going to Col. Kittson and selling it for $150, without my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) knowing anything about it. But Lord Strathcona does not buy his horses that way. He is not a government. He took one man, as I understand it, Dr. McEachren, and charged him with the buying of the horses; and if I am correctly informed, these horses cost between $70 and $80, and they are good horses for the purpose.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The horses we purchased in the North-west cost us, on the average, $87.

Mr. BERGERON. Lord Strathcona's agent bought them where he could get them at the same price throughout the North-west. Now, we have had the horses and the saddles spoken of, and my hon. friend has been obliged to say that he was deceived by people with whom he had a contract for saddles and who had bought saddles from the United States, and his attention was called to the fact by the War Office in England. Now, I wish to say a word or two about the blankets. I have asked two or three times in this House for information on this subject, and I must say that the members of the opposition, the representatives of the people on this side are not treated as they should be by the government. I have not been able to get proper information from the government on this subject. The last series of questions that I asked, I got this information: In answer to the question how many blankets were bought, I was told that the number was 4,400. I asked from whom they were bought, and I was told they were bought from W. C. Caldwell, M.P., from Lanark, 2,000—

An hon. MEMBER. A friend of the government.

Mr. BERGERON. My impression is that he must be, but I do not know. Then 2,000 were bought from Messrs. Garneau & Son of Quebec. These are friends of the government, and they are not manufacturers.

Mr. TALBOT. Are they a good firm?

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, they are a good firm. The Westport Woollen Company, of Westport, supplied 400 blankets. I do not know about these people. I have nothing to say against Mr. Caldwell or against Messrs. Garneau & Son. They may be very good men and may have given good value. But I want to say that if the government had called for tenders, if they had done for the public what they would have done for themselves, if they had done what a good respectable merchant would do, they could have bought these blankets at a cheaper price than they paid for them. I say that these blankets were made in factories that were not called upon to tender. Half of them, if not more, were made in the woollen mills of Beauharnois. But were those manufacturers called upon to tender? No. Friends of the government were called upon—two or three firms, probably—and a contract was made with them; then these contractors went to the manufacturers, got the goods, and made money out of the transaction, and the people of the country are called upon to pay for them. An answer from my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) on this question may throw some light on all the rest of these transactions in supplies. All this has been done through friends of the government for the benefit of friends of the government, and the country has been paying more than they would have paid if the government, in a proper way, had called for tenders from the manufacturers.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Bergeron) will be glad to know that we advertised, calling for tenders, for some weeks, and that we received tenders from a large number of manufacturers and others. We have had a good deal to do with supplies, and we require every man to send in a sample of what he proposes to furnish, with the price. We submitted these samples to our inspector without his knowing who the parties were who had tendered, and we accepted what they said were the best value for the money.

Mr. BERGERON. What are the names of the inspectors?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Mr. Robertson, of the Department of Militia, is one of the men, and he has several competent assistants.

Mr. BERGERON. Was any tender asked for from the woollen mills of Beauharnois, or was any received from them?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The call for tenders was advertised in the public press.

Mr. BERGERON. Well, will my hon. friend explain the difference in price paid for blankets for the two contingents. For the first contingent the price was $1.40, and for the second $1.60.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to ask the minister if there is any provision for supplementing the pay of the Strathcona contingent when in South Africa, or in what position is that contingent to be?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) will understand that that is a matter with which we have absolutely nothing to do. All that the Militia Department is doing in that connection is to facilitate in every way we can the splendid work that Lord Strathcona is doing. He is defraying every cent of the expense, and the matter is entirely in his own hands; and I would be the last one to suggest or dictate, unless he should ask my advice, what he should do for the men after they reach South Africa.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to say that I look at the matter in a different light from the hon. minister. These men are citizens of this country, and about 160 of them are residents of the constituency I represent. They are volunteers who are going to South Africa for the credit of the country. I understand that Lord Strathcona's intention in the matter is that he pays a certain amount of the expenses of a Canadian contingent—which is entirely to the credit of Lord Strathcona. I am asking, for information, what amount are they to be paid after they get to South Africa? Has Lord Strathcona arranged to pay them the same scale as we have arranged to pay the members of the first and second contingents, or is he landing them in South Africa and turning them over to the Imperial government to get the Imperial rate of pay? I understand the hon. minister to say that these men are enlisted, that Lord Strathcona equips them—and he is doing it lavishly, highly to his credit—he transports them to South Africa and they then serve as a Canadian corps at Imperial rates of pay. If that is so they are, therefore, at a discount in the matter as compared with our other Canadian contingents. Now, I think that is entirely unfair. I think it puts Lord Strathcona in a very unfortunate position, and it puts the men who are serving on this corps in a very unfortunate position. I take the liberty of calling the attention of the House and the country to the desirability, if the House and the country are to do credit to themselves, of taking some measures to supplement the Imperial pay in the case of the Strathcona contingent, as in the case of the other contingents. Otherwise it would be putting Lord Strathcona in an improper position, one in which he would not desire to be placed, for it certainly would not reflect credit upon him to have the corps which bears his name and represents the expenditure of about a million dollars on his part, serving on any different conditions in this respect from the other Canadian contingents.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am satisfied that Lord Strathcona would be the last one to suggest that the corps which was formed by him, and which bears his name, and for whom he has provided so liberally, should receive one copper from any other source. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) is fortunate enough to have 150 of his constituents in that corps, he is to be congratulated. They are lucky men, and the hon. gentleman may depend upon it that whatever is right and fair, aye, and generous and liberal, will be done by Lord Strathcona; and I think that it is not right for us to touch the question at all.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure that what the hon. gentleman has just said is true, and that Lord Strathcona's corps will be treated in the most generous manner by him. However, I understood from the Minister of Militia and Defence a moment ago that the understanding was that Lord Strathcona was not to have done anything more than send them to South Africa.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I did not say that.

Mr. McNEILL. Then I misunderstood my hon. friend—and I think my hon. friend opposite also understood him in that sense. Now, I think I may venture to say, without being misinterpreted in any way, that I do think that in this matter of the pay of our troops in South Africa the government ought to be not only just but generous. I do not think that the government are really just with regard to the second contingent, and in saying this I do not wish to imply in any way that it is done deliberately. From what I have been able to gather in the course of the discussion, I take it that these men who have gone out from the range are at least as valuable as the men who have served in the mounted police even for five years; and if that be the case, I do think we ought to avoid anything like a cheeseparating policy in reference to the payment of the men who are taking their lives in their hands to uphold the honour of Canada and the integrity of the empire. I think the government ought to pay these men as much at least as the best paid men in the mounted police. I do not see upon what grounds any distinction should be made between them, if it be true, as is alleged upon evidence that has not been controverted, that these men are as valuable or more valuable than the mounted policemen are. They are volunteers without in any sense being professionals, and I think from that point of view they ought to have, if possible, even more generous treatment; and also because of the principle which the government themselves have laid down. They have laid down the principle that the permanent corps are not to receive as high a rate of pay as the volunteers; and if that be the case in regard to the infantry, I think it ought also to be the case with regard to these men. The right hon. gentleman seems rather to dissent. But that is the principle that has been laid down by his government, that the permanent corps, who are to a certain extent professionals, do not receive as high a rate of pay as the others, who are mere volunteers. Well, let that apply to this case also; these men should in that case receive even more than the mounted police; but they are receiving less for some reason, which at all events has not been explained to the committee. I will venture to refer once more to another matter, and that is to the pay that is being given to our volunteers who went out in the first contingent. I do say once more, though it may be without avail, that for a great country like Canada to save 25 cents upon the pay of these men who are going out to fight our battles for us, is not worthy of us. I think these men who are going out to the front to fight ought to receive just as much from Canada as if they were serving Canada in our own country; and whatever the Imperial authorities may give them ought to go to them in addition. I do not think that we ought to save money out of this business in paying these boys of ours. A good deal has been said about the precedent. I am not afraid of the precedent at all, I think it is a good one. I think in a case of this kind we should be willing to pay our men to go to the front to fight our battles in a foreign country just as much as we would pay them if they were serving here in this country on any ordinary occasion. I am not afraid of that precedent. I think it is a very proper one, and one that I would again respectfully urge upon the consideration of my right hon. friend and of the government.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I dissented a moment ago from the assertion of my hon. friend, and he noted my dissent. My dissent was addressed to the statement he made that the man taken off the ranch is a better man than the mounted policeman. I do not accept that at all.

Mr. McNEILL. What I intended to say was that he was as good if not better.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would not even accept that; I do not think that a man off the ranch is as good as a mounted policeman, certainly not better, in my estimation, not so good, although I do not say this in any disparagement at all of the man from the ranch. The member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) stated that the man from the ranch had the advantage of having an educated eye, that he could see an object for a longer distance than the mounted policeman. I do not believe them. The man who has been in the mounted police for years, who has been accustomed to roam the prairie, must have his eye just as well trained as the ranchman. Moreover, the mounted police have a great advantage in having been subjected to discipline for years. He has the advantage of understanding military rules, he is a trained soldier already. He has been drilled and can go into battle immediately, he requires no further drill. These are advantages not to be despised, and in this respect I think the mounted policeman has all the qualities of a good soldier. He is a good rider, accustomed to the saddle, he has been accustomed to discipline, he has been accustomed to restraint; for years he has been patrolling the prairie, and has obtained an education which makes him a most valuable man, more valuable, in my opinion, than the ranchman. I do not say that in any disparagement at all of any other man; but if we are to make any distinction, although I do not like to make any, I think the advantage ought to be in favour of the mounted policeman.

Mr. McNEILL. Of course, the same argument would apply to the permanent force. The permanent force have greater perfection of drill than the ordinary volunteer would have; and on the same principle, the members of the permanent force ought to have the larger pay.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The permanent force receives certain allowances which the active militia do not receive. For instance, in the matter of clothing, the underclothing and a great many things are given to the permanent force; so that really the pay as compared with the pay of the active militia is fully more than 50 cents a day.

Mr. McNEILL. Does my hon. friend speak of the clothing of those men at the front? Are those at the front not equally treated in that respect?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Certainly, those who have now gone out.

Mr. McNEILL. Then my hon. friend's argument will apply in this case.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry to have to dissent from the the position taken by the Premier that the mounted policeman is necessarily superior for the purpose of a campaign in South Africa, to the ranchman. Speaking as an expert, and as one representing the largest portion of the mounted rifles who are going to South Africa, I am compelled to say, that the ranchman is certainly the more expert scout of the two. Where the policeman has the advantage in drill and discipline, the other man has the advantage in being probably the more expert rider, and the better man to find his way around the prairie. The advantages of the one are counterbalanced by the advantages of the other. Both combined make an excellent force; and it is an invidious and improper distinction to give the one man less pay than the other, particularly when you remember that all those who now enlist as civilians on the force, or a large number of them, are ex-policemen, who have served their time in the force, and who have all the drill and discipline, and who, I suppose, would naturally be required to enlist at the lower rate of pay. As to the remark of the hon. Minister of Finance, that the constituency which I represent, myself and the members of Strathcona's Horse, should be thankful for being under the unsolicited patronage of Lord Strathcona, we are prepared to accept to the full, all the conditions that should be attached to it, but we want to know what the conditions are. Do we expect Lord Strathcona to supplement his magnificent gift of equipment and transport to South Africa, by a further gift towards the maintenance and pay of this force in South Africa? If we do, very good. I am perfectly satisfied that any promise given by Lord Strathcona, will be made good. But, so far as I know, there has been no suggestion, that, once these men are landed in South Africa, they are anything else but a Canadian contingent serving in the Canadian army. Our responsibilities commence where his cease, and as soon as they land in South Africa, if we discharge that responsibility by throwing the burden on Lord Strathcona, it will be unfair for us to do so.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My point was that we should not at present interfere in any way with the arrangements respecting the pay of the force organized by Lord Strathcona. It would be a mistake for us to assume that he has any intention of doing otherwise than what is just, and fair, and liberal, and handsome. If it should turn out that there is anything else expected of us, we will have time to consider the matter. It may be necessary, but, my judgment is, that Lord Strathcona would not be pleased, at the present time, to have any hon. member raise that question.

It being six o'clock, the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS.

LA BANQUE JACQUES CARTIER.

Mr. BRODEUR moved second reading of Bill (No. 67) respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier, and to change its name to Banque Provinciale du Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON. This seems to me to be a very extraordinary name for this bank, and I would like an explanation of it.

Mr. BRODEUR. The Bill simply proposes to change the name of the bank. The idea of the Bill is to strengthen the bank, which has had some misfortunes, and those interested think it is well the name should be changed.

Mr. HENDERSON. My idea was to get the literal translation of the new name into English.

Mr. BRODEUR. The translation would be 'The Provincial Bank of Canada.'

Mr. HENDERSON. That seems to be a peculiar name.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. WALLACE. At a previous stage, I made some objection to the latter part of this clause, which provides that:

The amount which would be payable to each such officer, non-commissioned officer or man to be placed to his credit and to be applied in such manner as the Governor in council determines for the benefit of those dependent on him, or, if not so applied, to be paid to him or his representatives at the close of his period of service.

I cannot understand why a volunteer, like any other man earning money, should not have the disposal of it himself. But, according to this, the government are to ascertain whether he has some one dependent upon him; and if so, they are to determine to what extent they will interfere with his liberty as to the control and management of his own money. That is a task which I apprehend the government are not fitted to assume. Here are volunteers from every portion of this Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and what facilities have the Department of Militia or the government for ascertaining the personal circumstances of every one of the 2,500 members of these corps? The government surely cannot pretend to undertake a task so much out of their reach. They would have to make all sorts of inquiries about every man, whether married or not. I think, in the first place the volunteer will ordinarily resent such interference in his affairs, and in the next place, the government cannot accomplish what they undertake to do. Moreover, there is a great patriotic fund being raised to assist every member of a family belonging to a volunteer who needs assistance. I am informed that to-day assistance is being freely and readily granted by a committee which has made inquiries into those cases where assistance is necessary. They do not inquire into the case of every one of the 2,500, because that would be an impossible task for them as for the government; but the cases which are brought to their notice, which may be 5 per cent or 10 per cent, or not more than 2 per cent of the whole, are investigated, and the result is that the dependents of the soldiers who have gone away will not be left in want. That work is being well done. I presume, by those who have the control and management of this large patriotic fund, which it is said will amount to $250,000, and which has already reached about $160,000. I think, therefore, this division of the Bill is objectionable, in the first place, because it interferes with the freedom of one who is entitled to the money for the services he has rendered; and, in the second place, because the government are assuming a task which they cannot properly perform. Then, subsection (b) says:

The payment of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men composing the said contingents up to the time of such debarkation, at the rates authorized by the regulations and orders of the Department of Militia and Defence.

I think it was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Halifax that the government should state specifically in the Bill the exact amount, so that there would be no misunderstanding at any later stage of the proceedings.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) suggested two forms in which it might be done—one by being expressed in the Bill, and the other by being expressed in the regulation before the House, so that the House might know what was intended. The latter was the intention of the Bill, but the amended regulation has not been laid on the Table. We intend to leave the Bill in committee, so that we may place the regulation on the Table before passing the Bill.

With regard to the difference in pay, in the first place we had some reason for believing that the payment of a separate rate to our Canadian soldiers over that paid to British soldiers might cause some embarrassment, and we did not think the Imperial authorities would be pleased to have us pay our men a higher rate than the British soldiers were receiving who were fighting with them side by side. Nevertheless, as we desired to make provision for paying the larger sum, we adopted the policy of placing this money to the credit of the soldiers, to be accumulated during their absence, and applied for their benefit. We assume, so far as the needs of the soldiers are concerned, that they will be met in a liberal way under the regulations of the British government applying to troops in the field, and that, therefore, no injustice could result from our carrying out the wish of the Imperial government not to pay the men, but to place the amount to their credit, so that they would ultimately get the benefit of it. Then the question arose that perhaps these men left wives or other dependents in Canada who, although to some extent provided for by the separation allowance, would need this money. We provided that in such a case this money might be taken from the fund and applied to the benefit of the families of these men.

We do not anticipate that much will be paid under that provision, but that practically the money will accumulate for the benefit of the soldier and be paid to him on his return, or to his legal representatives should he fall in the field.

Mr. WALLACE. That may be a proper idea, and I do not object to it so much, but I may say that I have read letters in the public press stating that everything was wonderfully dear out in Africa, that the soldiers had to pay high prices for any little luxuries, and it might be that it would be necessary for them to have more money.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Why more necessary for them than for the British soldiers?

Mr. WALLACE. Because a British soldier may be accustomed to live in a more economical way, his pay, of course, being only a shilling a day. And if our soldiers should prefer to have the money and use it in buying little luxuries, which otherwise they might be precluded from having, I do not see why it could not be paid them. I suppose that a large portion of those men have money of their own and are spending it in South Africa. We are told that when they arrived at Cape Town they gave themselves little spreads and were taken for millionaires; and it is possible these boys may desire to have a little money to spend as they go along. They are not going out to make money, and do not desire to come back with their pockets full of money accumulated from their savings.

But the Bill does not carry out just the idea that the hon. Minister of Finance has given. He said that if cases came under the notice of the government of dependents of these soldiers who required assistance, the government would take his money and spend it on them. But the Bill goes further and places an obligation more widespread in its character upon the government. What does it say?

The amount which will be payable to each such officer, non-commissioned officer or man to be placed to his credit and to be applied in such manner as the Governor in Council determines for the benefit of those dependent on him, or if not so applied to be paid to him or his representatives at the close of his period of service.

As the Governor in Council determines.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the case of their dependents.

Mr. WALLACE. They must make inquiries, if they assume the obligation to do this. They cannot do it without making an investigation into the circumstances of these 2,500 men, which would be a task quite impossible. If the Bill said that any soldier who wished his pay to be given to his wife or mother or anybody else dependent on him, the government would undertake that duty, that might be a judicious proviso.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The case might arise in which a soldier would not have an opportunity of giving such instructions. Supposing a case were brought to the notice of the government in which there was need of further assistance, we have this money, which we can use, and if we had to wait for instructions from a soldier in Africa we would not be able to make use of it. This, of course, would be an exceptional case, because provision is made to some extent for those dependent on the soldiers.

Mr. WOOD. In almost every centre a fund is being raised to provide for the dependents of the soldiers who have gone to the field, and the government have also created a fund for this same purpose. And, therefore, to keep the pay of these soldiers until they return, if they do return, is a wise precaution, I think, on the part of the government. The various centres will take care that those dependent upon them have all necessaries to keep them in the absence of their bread-winners. So, the course the government are pursuing is best in the interest of the soldiers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Referring to a remark of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I desire to say but a word. That hon. gentleman stated—and he is absolutely correct—that in the British army it is looked upon as very injurious that there should be any difference in pay. I can well understand that the British authorities might have said: Canada can be as generous as she wishes to be to her men, but we have a rule that applies to the whole British army, and we want all men paid alike. But if that applies in this case it should apply to what we were discussing this afternoon, section (b). Canada should pay every Canadian exactly the same rate of pay—according to rank, of course, which is always understood. I do not believe in paying 75 cents to one class of men and 50 cents to another. I do not for a moment pretend to be a military expert, but I believe that one of the most disheartening things in any service is that one man should receive more pay than another. They are comrades on the field of battle, they are fighting the same battle under the same flag; and if one man were made to feel that because he wears a brown uniform or because he wears a blue uniform he is getting even 10 cents more than another man, it unsettles the very foundations of discipline.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron)—I wish only to understand him—to say that, regardless of the different branches of the service, there must be uniform pay, whether infantry, cavalry or artillery?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No, I made a distinction.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You made the distinction as between officers and men.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No one who understands the British service will contend that all branches are paid the same. There are the scientific corps, the engineers, the artillery, the cavalry, the infantry—these branches are treated differently so far as pay is concerned; but the pay of every man in these different branches of the service is absolutely the same.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman is aware, also, that men who have served a certain number of years get extra pay. And if I am not mistaken—the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong, because as ex-Minister of Militia he is acquainted with these matters—certain corps, for instance, the Guards, receive higher pay than other foot soldiers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No; I do not believe there is any distinction in the regular pay.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think the Guards get more, but I will not contradict the hon. gentleman.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am open to conviction, of course; I am speaking from memory, and I have long forgotten what I learned in the days when I was at the head of the militia. However, I have not failed in the interest I take in these matters. I was saying that I do not believe that any distinction should be made. I have already stated to-day, and I repeat it, that the British soldier has about four pence per day to spend out of the shilling that is granted to him as pay. I would not be positive, and I am open to conviction on that point, but I believe that during the period of war, the nation looks after the soldier's supplies without drawing upon his pay.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no deduction in time of war.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am quite prepared to admit that. You are sending out from Canada such men as the members of the mounted police. I am prepared to give my testimony to the value and worth of the mounted police. In 1883, they proved that no better men could be found for the work that was to be done. But is it not a peculiarity that should be overcome by the generosity of Canada that they should get 75 cents a day and the other men should get 50 cents a day. Whatever it is made, it should be the same all round. Why should Strathcona's Horse receive less than the others? They are as good men as you can put in any field; as scouts, I believe, they are unequalled in the world. While we are considering this Bill, Canada should be prepared to recognize all the Canadians who are going out there and should pay all equally, according to their rank, and according to the corps to which they belong.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And, perhaps, according to their length of service.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not believe that that is considered, so far as the war pay is concerned, but I may be wrong.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was about to say on the question of the varying rates of pay in the Canadian mounted rifles, my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), whom I do not see in his place, raised the question this afternoon. My hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) is following it up, suggesting that inequalities of pay are open to objection. Though there is, apparently and theoretically, a good reason for it, the matter is worthy of consideration. The Bill will remain in committee, and the point raised by my hon. friend from Alberta and discussed by others will receive consideration. I would not like the discussion to proceed as though this point has been finally determined. The question raised this afternoon as to deductions has been inquired into, and it has been ascertained in time of war no deductions whatever are made, though they are in time of peace.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. minister (Mr. Borden) said there were no deductions and they were given a shilling a day.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He said there was no deductions in time of war. Hansard will establish that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The question was put to me by an hon. gentleman, and I said I would not be positive whether the deductions applied in time of war. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) collected the information, which he should have had before he came down to parliament with his Bill, and now he has found out that I was right, and that in time of peace there are deductions. Fortunately, for himself, in time of war, as he has ascertained, these deductions do not apply.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Since our appropriations and the whole discussion relates to the time of war, and not to the time of peace, I am afraid my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron's) criticism based upon what occurs in time of peace were hardly applicable.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. member for Three Rivers, as we know, is a walking encyclopedia on military matters; and I cannot but think that it was unworthy of such a high authority as he to criticise in so severe a manner one of ordinary pretensions like myself. However, I want to set the hon. gentleman right. We were discussing a question of war, the rate which we knew our soldiers were to receive in South Africa was the rate payable in time of war, there was nothing else in consideration but a time of war. I knew that the rate was only one shilling a day, and I did not suppose any hon. gentleman in this House would bring up the rates that were paid in time of peace. As the discussion went on, I pointed out that there were deductions in time of peace, but in time of war there were no deductions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend will excuse me, if I misunderstood him. I did not understand him to be talking about war.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There was nothing else to talk about.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But, he said there were no deductions, and that the English soldiers were receiving a shilling a day.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not going to discuss the question now, as to whether a member of the North-west mounted police should be paid at the same rate as the ordinary volunteer; but I do feel that whatever was promised to these men when they enlisted, should be paid to them in full; we should keep perfect good faith with the men who have gone out to South Africa. If they were promised 50 cents a day, they must receive 50 cents a day; if they were promised 75 cents, then this parliament must pay them 75 cents. But it seems to me, that there is some misunderstanding yet, as to what the pay of the Mounted Police really is. We have been talking about it as if it were 75 cents per day. Now, I find on examining the form of application, for a man who wants to become a member of the North-west mounted police, that he signs an agreement to accept from the government 50 cents a day, for the first year: 50 cents a day, and 5 cents extra, for good conduct, the second year; 5 cents and 10 cents extra, for good conduct the third year; 50 cents and 15 cents, for the fourth year; and 50 cents, and 20 cents, for the fifth year. In no instance during the five years, does he receive 75 cents. And, if the men who have gone out to South Africa are only one year, two year, three year, four year, or five year men, none of them will get 75 cents, unless some special regulation is made by the department, to give them more than they contracted for, when they became members of the force.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. How about the six year men, or beyond five?

Mr. HENDERSON. We have no assurance that these men are to be six year men. In order to entitle them to 75 cents, they must serve more than five years, but I am not aware that the government have made any arrangement by which a man is to receive more pay after five years, than he receives for the fifth year. The contract is only made for five years, and the rate of allowance is made for five years. I will be very glad indeed, if the Minister of Militia and Defence could satisfy the House on this question, and give an assurance that the pay will be, all round, 75 cents.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, states that a schedule or regulation will be laid on the Table, which would become a part of this Bill.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A regulation to which it will refer.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Exactly, and the matter might perhaps be left over, as the Bill will remain in the committee stage until it is further considered, and until this regulation is laid on the Table of the House. But, the hon. gentleman will see that the statement I made about the pay of the North-west mounted police is correct. I stated this afternoon, but he may not have been in the House, the pay of the North-west mounted Police on entering the service, is 50 cents, and for each additional year, up to five years, and including the fifth year, five cents a year more. The maximum is 75 cents.

Mr. HENDERSON. 70 cents.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The first year, 50 cents, and for each of the five years—

Mr. HENDERSON. No, for each of the four years, I would remind the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Then if he is correct, I am wrong; but I was informed by Mr. White, of the North-west mounted police, that the statement which I made this afternoon is correct. I did not verify it myself.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it is plain. As the man receives only 50 cents the first year, and receives no good conduct money at all, until the end of one year, there is only four years that he can be entitled to that extra five cents. No later than yesterday I examined this statement, and I find that the highest rate of pay a man can receive in the North-west mounted police force, is 70 cents a day. I was afraid that perhaps the minister had overlooked that fact, and that on account of the misunderstanding, the men would receive less than they were really promised, or, at any rate, less than the House was given to understand. I am glad that the Minister of Finance has undertaken to see that a regulation will be provided by which these men will be paid the 75 cents.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that, I said we would bring the regulation down and give the matter consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister has not given me the information, that he promised me early in the day, in respect to the wagons that were purchased at $180, and if tenders were called for?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. If I did not answer the hon. gentleman, it was because other speakers intervened, and I had not an opportunity. As a matter of fact, we asked for tenders from several manufacturers of wagons and agricultural implements. We had to bring them to Ottawa, because the carriages or wagons were of a special type needed for transport work in South Africa. These firms were the Ottawa Car Company, the Massey-Harris Company, and the Bain Company, of Paris. I can only say to the hon. gentleman, that everything was done by the officers in the Militia Department to see that a proper kind of wagon was made, and that the price paid was a reasonable price. All due precautions were taken and due examination made. We were dealing with thoroughly reputable people, and, I believe that good value was obtained by the country for the money. They were duly inspected before being taken over from the hands of the manufacturer.

Mr. TAYLOR. Did you call for tenders further than inviting one or two firms to see what they would build a wagon for such and such a style?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There were no public tenders.

Mr. TAYLOR. I must say that I think $180 for a transport wagon is an outrageous price, I do not care who built it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Did you see the wagon?

Mr. TAYLOR. No, I did not.

Mr. WOOD. An express wagon is very valuable.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know what they are, I have built many of them.

Mr. WOOD. They cost more than an ordinary wagon.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know what the best express wagon can be turned out for.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The roads are very rough out there.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that, and I know you cannot put $180 into an express wagon. You could nickel-plate it, and put on rubber tires, and then build it for $120. I think there is a job in the bargain.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to say a word with respect to some suggestion respecting the pay of these men, particularly the men from the west. It has been said by some gentlemen from the west that the men who have been enlisted from the west are very valuable scouts, are quite as good as the mounted police. I do not wish to say anything that would reflect for one moment upon the value of the men who have been recruited in the west. I think they are a very capable lot of men, but, if what has fallen from the hon. Minister of Finance is intended as a suggestion that men from the west, who have not had five years service in the mounted police, are to be paid at a higher rate than men from the maritime provinces, I propose, with all the vigour I can, to protest against that. I venture to think that men who have gone from my own province, are, at least, as capable as any men who have gone from any province of Canada, not excepting the North-west Territories. I am happy to say that among them is Capt. Stairs, who has already been mentioned for conspicuous gallantry at the attack which resulted in the surrender of one of the Boer armies. I do not suppose anything of the kind is going to be done, because it would be manifestly unfair.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. With the view of giving the matter more consideration, I propose to move that the committee rise and not report the Bill to-night.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is rather unfortunate that the idea should be brought up of differences, or preferences as between one class of men and another. I notice by the printed statements before the House that mounted men and artillery men are listed at 75 cents a day for privates, while infantry men are listed at 50 cents per day for privates. It is not a question between western men and eastern men, but it is a question between the different arms of the service. I suppose that the printed form that is put into the hands of members of the House is put there with due regard to the circumstances and conditions, and as indicating the intention of the government in the matter. There are mounted rifles from the east as well as from the west; there are artillery men from the east and not from the west at all. Their pay is 75 cents. The mounted men from the west, is, above all things, an expert, and with all due deference to every other branch of the service, is a man who is recognized to be the most valuable of the British army in South Africa at the present time, to such an extent that this class of man is receiving, in South Africa, $2.50 per day for special services and for special qualification. As I said before, the same class of man, not the mounted policeman—

An hon. MEMBER. A private?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, not the mounted policeman, but the scout, received $2.50 a day during the North-west rebellion, serving alongside, and in the same force as the mounted policeman who only received 75 cents a day, and was considered to be worth the money, or he would not have received it. These men appeared to the government to be worth the money for they were paid this amount.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member (Mr. Oliver) was absent when I made a remark having reference to the point which was raised this afternoon as to the apparent inequality in the pay between the different members of the Canadian mounted rifles. I desired that the Bill should remain in committee as there were one or two other points that might be considered. The matter is worth consideration, and we shall ask that the Bill shall remain in committee. In the meantime the scale will be brought down after final consideration, and for the present we would not have it assumed that there has been any decision reached.

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to say a word or two in regard to the pay of these men. It has been stated that North-west mounted police ought to get 75 cents a day, and that the ordinary volunteer, who as a man, has gone to the war as his equal, ought to have, in the ranks, 50 cents a day. It seems to me it should not matter whether he is a mounted policeman, or an artillery man, or an engineer—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) does not state the proposition quite correctly. That was not advocated, but, on the other side of the House it was stated by some hon. gentlemen that a mounted policeman, who had spent five years, or more, in the ranks, should be entitled to what the regulations entitled him to receive—75 cents a day, and the question was raised as to whether a raw man coming in should be placed on a level with him.

Mr. PRIOR. I quite understand that, but my contention is, that this is a new corps altogether, and whether a man has been five or ten years in the police, they are all volunteers, either cowboys, or policemen, or farmers or prospectors in the North-west Territories, and they ought all to be on the same footing. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) said truly that rough riders from the west, whether farmers or anything else, were experts; that this was their business. There is no doubt that in the regular service an engineer is paid a higher rate, and an artillery man is paid higher than a man of the line. But all these men are going to South Africa in the same class. I think it would be subversive of discipline to send certain men away in these contingents at a higher rate of pay than others of the same rank. They ought all to be considered equal and get the same pay. I cannot see any reason why, because a man is in the mounted police, he should be paid more for the service he will render in South Africa than any other man. He may be a better rider, and have more discipline, but when they are there they will all be about equal. The mounted policeman may have a better chance of rising from the ranks, but I think that it would be a great injustice to the young fellows who have joined to put a man because he has been in the North-west mounted police, or a member of the permanent corps, on a higher rate of pay than the ordinary recruit.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. At an earlier stage of the discussion an hon. gentleman opposite suggested the insertion of the word 'payment,' but, if he will look at subsection (b) he will find that the word 'expenditure' is defined as including the payment of the officers, non-commissioned officers and so on, so that I do not think it is necessary to make an insertion of the word 'payment' as suggested. I think the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), made the suggestion, but I do not think it is necessary. I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence if he will be good enough to furnish us with a list of those from whom horses were purchased, and the prices. I do not mean now; I understand he can get it at some future time.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am quite prepared to do so.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance what conclusion, if any, has been reached in regard to the amount of the separation allowance which was left an open question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That question was left to be dealt with by the government. In the resolution the words which restricted them were struck out, and the matter was left to be dealt with by the government. It has not yet been dealt with, but we propose to leave the Bill in committee and not to report it to-night. I do not propose to ask the committee to adopt the preamble, but to reserve that.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPPLY.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to say that I have given notice that I would propose an amendment, when the government moves that the House do resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) proposes to move the amendment of which he has given notice on the Order paper, I wish to say to him that the Prime Minister cannot be in the House this evening, and I know he would like to be present when that amendment is moved. If it would suit the convenience of the hon. gentleman, I would like if he would leave it over until we go into supply on Tuesday.

Mr. BOURASSA. Do I understand that the House will go into supply on Tuesday next?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In all probability.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Or at an early date.

Mr. BOURASSA. In that case, I will defer proposing the amendment until then.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Marine and Fisheries, including $1,900 to W. J. Stewart and $1,300 to B. H. Fraser.....$56,190

Mr. DAVIN. What is the explanation of that increase of $1,105?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The increase is chiefly for the technical officers of the department. These officers do not come under the Civil Service Act, and are not entitled to what is called the statutory increase. Mr. Stewart, who is chief of the hydrographic survey, receives $1,800, and it is proposed to give him an increase of $100. Mr. Stewart entered the service in 1884. He was a graduate of the Royal Military College. He entered at the small salary of $600, and in 1885 it was increased by $200, in 1886 by $100, in 1887 by $100, in 1888 by $100, in 1889 by $150, in 1891 by $100, in 1893 by $400, when he took Commander Boulton's place at the head of the survey. He got a small increase of $50 in 1895, and $100 in 1897, and it is now proposed to give him $100 extra. He is at the head of the hydrographic survey, and is a gentleman of whom I cannot speak too highly. I am sure every one will unite in saying that the increase is well deserved. Mr. B. H. Fraser is the next technical officer. He entered the service as draughtsman in Col. Anderson's department in 1894, at a salary of $800. In 1895 he was increased to $1,000, and has had no increase since. He is reported to me by Col. Anderson, chief engineer, to be an exceedingly good officer. I am told, although there is no record in the department of it, that he was promised in 1896, that he would have two or three hundred dollars of an increase, and he has represented once or twice that he has not been fairly dealt with.

Mr. PRIOR. Promised by whom?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was promised by my predecessor at the head of the department. In consideration of the report made by Col. Anderson on his excellent qualifications, I recommended to my colleagues an addition of $200 to his salary, making it $1,300. The engineers in my department are paid much less salaries than are paid the engineers in other departments, and I think I might be justified in asking for a still larger increase. We give an increase of $50 to Mr. Anderson. Mr. O'Hanly, who is a draughtsman in the department, receives $800, and we propose to give him $850. Mr. J. F. Fraser, who is another engineer in the department, has been receiving $725, and it is proposed to give him $850. Mr. Fraser last year was taken away from the interior service, and was placed in charge of the St. Lawrence service. He did excellent work there last summer, and during this winter he has been superintending the expenditure of money voted by parliament last year for the erection of bait freezers all around the coasts, and has given very great satisfaction.

Mr. PRIOR. Is that the gentleman who made the report on the lakes?

Mr. DAVIN.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This is his son, the old gentleman is not in my department.

Mr. PRIOR. He is good stock, then.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have had $600 voted for a number of years to fill a vacancy in the department, and we have not been able to get any young gentleman to accept it at $600. The government determined some years ago that the preference would be given to a Royal Military College graduate, and although I have applied time and again to the Royal Military College asking for a young gentleman to take this place at $600 a year, I could not get one. I have to ask parliament to make this vote $700, in the hope that that may induce some Royal Military College graduate to accept it.

Mr. SPROULE. What are they now doing in the Hydrographic survey?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Stewart, Mr. Anderson and young Mr. Tyrwhitt are the only officers in the hydrographic survey. But I would prefer if the hon. gentleman will allow me to make my statement on the hydrographical surveys when I come to my estimates on that subject. With regard to the other branch of the department, it is proposed to promote Mr. Kent, who is at the head office second-class, to be a first-class clerk, and to give him $50 increase. Mr. McClenaghan, who is at the head of the third-class, is promoted to be a second-class clerk at $1,100. $50 increase is given to several third-class clerks, and $30 to Mr. Kelly, one of the messengers.

Ocean and river service..... $201,000

Mr. TAYLOR. As the ex-Minister of Finance is not here to-night, and I do not think he had any idea that the estimates were going to be taken up, I think it would be advisable not to take up such large items as this. If you can take some small items, it would be as well to deal with them, but this is an important one, and will be sure to cause discussion.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would suggest that in that case we might reserve the first item, but the rest are the usual votes.

Mr. DAVIN. And is it understood that all may be discussed under that item?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Certainly, that is always allowed.

Rewards for saving life, including life-saving stations $8,000

Mr. PRIOR. What is the cause of this increase of $1,000?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There has been an additional life-saving station established at Grand Manan in New Brunswick.

Mr. PRIOR. Might I ask the hon. minister whether his attention has been called to the case of some men who saved several lives from a vessel which was wrecked on the west coast of Vancouver Island three or four months ago? I forget the name of the vessel.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In the absence of names, I could not tell my hon. friend; but the principle which is always followed when a matter of that kind is brought to the attention of the department, is to refer it to Captain McElhinney, the Nautical Adviser of the department, for investigation and report, and whatever he reports is adopted. We are always very liberal in meritorious cases.

Mr. PRIOR. Perhaps the minister will promise that if the matter is brought to his notice, he will give it his attention.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will.

Tidal services, including salaries of assistant clerks beyond $400 per annum, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act $7,200

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may explain that last year we had a vote for $4,400, and there was a supplementary vote of $2,066 to pay for technical officers. Provision is being made next year for British Columbia tide tables, extending the tidal information, and the extra sum is necessary for that.

Mr. PRIOR. I may be allowed to say that British Columbians as a whole feel very glad that the Minister has seen fit to send such a man as Mr. Dennison to British Columbia. We feel the greatest confidence in him, and I am sure the service will be of the greatest advantage to the department.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps the hon. minister can tell us what is expected to be accomplished in the tidal surveys.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman turns to my report, which was laid on the Table some days ago, he will see in it the report of Mr. Bell Dawson, who is a man of a good deal of experience, and who has established tidal survey stations on the Bay of Fundy, along the Island of Anticosti, in the Straits of Belle Isle, and up the River St. Lawrence. The observations at these tidal stations are very carefully tabulated, and sent to the hydrographical office in England; and from the information obtained, circulars are issued to the different harbours, shipping masters and officers, and it is believed that these tidal reports are of great service to the shipping interest. Several items of information are given at great length by Mr. Bell Dawson, and I am sure my hon. friend would read some of them with great interest. I would not care to take up the time of the committee with going over them to-night.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Can the hon. minister tell us whether there are any tidal stations on the southern coast of Nova Scotia, west of Halifax? I remember that an investigation into the loss of a steamer—I forget her name—was held at Yarmouth, and I think some evidence was given as to the possible effect of the tidal currents in sending that steamer ashore. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has a recollection of that investigation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have a very vivid recollection of it. In reply to the first question, I may say that we have three tidal surveys—Yarmouth, Westport and Digby. A special investigation was held into the wreck of the vessel he refers to by Commander Spain and two other officers, and the reason given for the wreck was the failure on the part of the captain to take the necessary soundings by the lead, and I take this opportunity of stating that a large majority of the wrecks which have taken place are reported by the investigating officers to be due to the fact that the commanding officers did not use the lead as captains in the old times used to do.

Mr. CLANCY. I see that there is a very considerable increase in this item, some $2,800. We should have an explanation of that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thought I had explained it. We have extended the working of the tidal system to British Columbia. We have sent out Mr. Dennison to take charge of the system there, and my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Prior) admits that we could not have made a better choice. The additional expenditure is for the necessary work to be done in British Columbia. This is only the beginning. Over that enormously large coast, there must, not only in the tidal service but the ocean and river navigation, be large increases from year to year. We are spending $1,200 this year for the tidal surveys in British Columbia alone.

Mr. WALLACE. This item contains the words 'including salaries of assistant clerks beyond $400 per annum, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.' This proposes to violate the Civil Service Act. Let us know the particulars.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are tide gauges established at Halifax, the Gut of Canso, Belle Isle, Anticosti, and different places along the coast of St. Lawrence and the south-east of Nova Scotia, also in the Bay of Fundy at Yarmouth, Digby, Weymouth and St. John. These tide gauges all have to be closely looked after.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the object?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. To ascertain the rise and fall of the tide. An accurate account is kept by the person in charge from day to day.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that the whole thing?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Twice a day the rise and fall of the tide at each place has to be taken. Last year we took a supplementary vote of $2,600, which provided for two clerks. In that vote there is provision for two clerks, Mr. Angus and Mr. Hayden, who receive $600.

Mr. WALLACE. Where are they stationed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. With Mr. Dawson, in the department. As the returns come in, they are received by Mr. Dawson, tabulated and forwarded to the hydrographic office in England, and there marked upon the charts.

Mr. WALLACE. What staff had you at headquarters here before?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The same last year as this.

Mr. WALLACE. But previous to last year.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think there was anybody but Mr. Dawson, and he made bitter complaint that he had two or three years work in arrears. There was no use having tide surveys sent to the department and simply pigeon-holed. Unless they are tabulated and forwarded and made use of, it is so much money thrown away.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the benefit of it? They were pigeon-holed for two or three years.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There was no benefit then, but now all over the Dominion tables are issued by Mr. Dawson, showing mariners what time the tide is high and low and half high at every port, so that the mariner knows exactly what the stage of the tide is at a certain hour.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for West York asks, what is the good of this. Not only does the gentleman who looks after the tiding gauge mark this down on a map, but he also keeps the readings of the barometer, and in time these experts will be able to make out tables showing how the storms come and where they generate. They will be able to do this by the rise and fall of the tide and the reading of the barometer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think also that knowing the exact rise and fall of the tide at a great many places is supposed to be of assistance in determining the direction and strength of the tidal currents and matters of this kind.

Winter mail service.....$2,000

Mr. WALLACE. Where is this performed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Between Capes Tormentine and Traverse, in the Straits of Northumberland.

Mr. WALLACE. How has it been going this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have had no ice sufficient to necessitate the boats going on, but I suppose they will go on in a week or two now. They generally run a couple of months, but so far this year the service has been performed admirably by our steamers.

Salaries and allowances of lightkeepers..$220,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This vote is never challenged, but the minister is very properly called on to give full explanation. Hon. gentlemen will see that this year we are asking a small increase, due to the establishment of a number of new lights in British Columbia and other places. There are nine in Ontario, twelve in British Columbia, two in Prince Edward Island, five in Quebec, ten in Nova Scotia, two in Manitoba, two in New Brunswick, one on the Newfoundland coast called 'Flower Island light.' These are all new lights.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Has the hon. minister at hand a list of the lighthouses in Quebec, showing where they are located?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There are five in Quebec. They are very small, as a rule. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron), is probably aware that we had to resurvey the river between Montreal and Quebec, and we had to put a number of new lights along there to meet the needs of the traffic.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman has the information at hand, I would like to know where the lighthouses in Quebec have been located?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Most of these are merely lights on poles, at the end of a wharf. One is on an island, opposite Berthier. The salaries of most of them is only $75 or thereabouts.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). There are thirty new lights, I think.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, there are 42.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). And the increase is only $3,000 for the salaries for the new service. They must be very small.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As a rule they are. Flower Island light, in the Straits of Belle Isle, is a very large one. But, as a rule, the others are small lights on a pole, on the end of a wharf, or a little tower light. We will not pay more than $75 or $100 a year. For the larger ones, the salary is $300 and upwards a year.

Mr. PRIOR. Would the hon. minister please read the list of new lights in British Columbia?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is Pointer Island, Dryad Point, Brochie's Ledge, at the mouth of Victoria harbour. A beacon is lighted there.

Mr. PRIOR. That is not finished.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I informed my hon. friend (Mr. Prior), that we had a 30-day oil lamp there. This will be replaced with something better, when we get the electric cable laid. This I cannot do for some little time, as the manufacturers of the cable are so overburdened with orders, that they cannot finish it. In the meantime, the 30-day light will have to do. Then there are a number of beacons besides.

Mr. PRIOR. In answer to a question I asked, I understood the hon. minister to say, that the present light was satisfactory.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not wish to be understood as saying, it was as satisfactory as I would like to have it. I gave the hon. gentleman the report that we had satisfactorily established that light.

Mr. PRIOR. But the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, Captain Gaudin, has stated over his own signature, in the press, I believe, that he has assurance from sea-faring men, that the light is satisfactory. Now, I have a document in my desk, signed by the captain and mates of the steamer that runs from Victoria and Vancouver, that it is not satisfactory. It is all right in fair weather, but in rough weather they cannot see it at any distance, and they are very anxious that the proper light should be put there. There is great necessity for a fog signal on that beacon. If the hon. gentleman could see his way to establishing that, it would be a great aid to navigation. While I am on my feet, I would like to call attention to the case that occurred at Egg Island lighthouse, north of Vancouver Island. It seems that this lighthouse is a long distance from land, and in an isolated position, as most of these lighthouses are. Some time ago, it was noted by steamers on the way to and from Alaska, that for one or two days there was no light, and the fact was reported. The government steamer was sent up, and it was found that the lighthouse keeper was ill. He had no companion there, except a small boy. They were taken off, and somebody else was put in the man's place, I believe. I do not think it is right to allow a man to be in a position like that with a child. Suppose the man had been taken ill and died, the boy would have been left there to die a miserable death by starvation. If they have an unmarried man attending to one of these lights, they should put another man with him. A married man could be accompanied by his wife. The lighthouse keeper should have with him some grown person; he should not be allowed to be there with only a child for a companion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I quite approve of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior), has said. I was not aware that the man was a single man when he went there. The understanding with the department was that no man should be sent to one of these outlying stations unless he was a married man and had his wife and family, or, at any rate, his wife with him. Peremptory orders were given that, in no instance, is a single man to take charge of such a light by himself. These lights are away from civilization, almost. If we cannot get a married man, the country will have to provide for the expense of two men, for we will not have one man there by himself, and run the risk of such a condition of things as the case the hon. gentleman refers to, when we had to send the steamer to take the man and boy off.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand the hon. minister to say, that many of these lights are simply on poles, on the end of a wharf.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I referred to the St. Lawrence. We were talking about the five in Quebec.

Mr. TAYLOR. Are the wharfs owned by the government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, these lights are for the assistance of navigation.

Mr. TAYLOR. And, have the government wharfingers there to collect fees?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think we had better have a full detailed statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I gave the names.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman gave the number for the province, but not the localities. Could he give the list for Ontario?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think I have the list of them all here. There are nine in Ontario, most of them on the Lake of the Woods. I cannot tell offhand, the names of them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. minister might bring down a list for the different provinces.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will do so, cheerfully.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is ten o'clock, and the ex-Minister of Finance is not here. I think we had better not go on with the estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I desire to draw attention to what I have referred to in the House before, and that is the salaries of the light-keepers in the portion of Prince Edward Island, in King's County, in which the light-keepers are compelled to keep lights running all winter on account of the winter service. There are lighthouse-keepers at Cape Bear, Panmure and Georgetown Harbour. These men do not get a salary commensurate with the work they have to do in maintaining the lights all the year round. There are other lights on the island that have only to be kept during the season of navigation, and the keepers get as much, and in some cases a larger amount than these men receive. I think the minister should allow these men a larger sum than they at present receive, because I think there services the whole year round should be better paid than the services of a man who only keeps a light during the season of navigation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says. My impression was that we had considered it in fixing the salaries allowed to these gentlemen. However, the point is well taken, that, considering that they have to keep their lights going in winter as well as in summer, they should be paid a larger salary than those light-keepers who only have to keep their lights going in the summer. I will look carefully into the matter.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I understood the hon. gentleman would bring down the list before the item was passed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; I have it here:

New range lights were established to mark dredged channel through Barre & Boulard at the dangerous Richelieu rapids in the river above Quebec. Two range lights were established to mark the axis of the channel across Ste. Croix bar, the point between Quebec and Montreal where there is now the least water in the channel.

The lightship maintained at the upper end of the Traverse of St. Roch has been replaced by a light shown from a permanent pier built up from the river bed. This is considered a very great improvement, not only because it insures the fixity of position of the light, but also because it can be maintained when ice is running in the spring and fall, at times when it is impossible to place a lightship on the station. This light in one with the light on the Stone Pillar leads to the outer end of the narrow portion of the Tranverse.

A gas buoy was established on St. Thomas bank below Quebec, to mark the outer edge of a wide flat dreaded by deep draught vessels.

A powerful revolving light has been established in Flower Island on the south shore of the Strait of Belle Isle to guard a salient point in that narrow passage.

These are the five I speak of in the province of Quebec.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Except the gas buoys.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Only one was put up last year.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It would not cost much to attend the gas buoys.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A gas buoy will cost about $3,000 a year. This gas buoy was served by the steamer Druid, which goes up and down the river. It has a gas tank on board, and supplies the buoy every three or four weeks.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that most of the increase was for the purpose of paying the services of the attendants of the new lights.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is in this vote. We will come to the construction vote directly. This vote is for the payment of services.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the minister stated there were five lights.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. One of them gas.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think it is impossible to go on with these items in the absence of the ex-Minister of Finance, who did not expect the estimates would be taken up to-night. There is an increase of $83,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I was only asking for the $220,000 for lights and coast service, and for maintenance.

Mr. TAYLOR. On every item that we have discussed so far there is an increase. I purpose moving that these items be reduced to the amount they were last year. Some members of the government have gone through the country this year saying that the opposition did not question any vote. The fact is that we questioned every vote, and because we did not divide the House, the leader of the government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the opposition only voted against a paltry few. I purpose dividing the House on every item where there is an increase.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. All right, I hope you will carry that out.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will so far as I am concerned.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I would suggest that my hon. friend had better carry it out when his votes can be recorded. We are now in committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am glad the hon. gentleman has avowed his intention, because it is well for us to know where we stand. I am not so sure that my hon. friend who is leading the opposition will fully concur in the policy the member for Leeds has laid down that there shall be no new lights built, that every dollar of money wanted for the construction of a light he will vote against. Here we have the whole shipping interest of Montreal and Quebec clamouring for the construction of a lighthouse on Belle Isle Straits, in order that the shipping property may be protected and guided safely through these straits. We have the whole of these interests pointing out the great necessity of this light, and when we have come forward and built it we have the thanks of all the mariners who sail through these straits for the increased aid that we are providing for navigation, and that will reduce the abnormal rates of insurance which are now bearing so enormously upon the shipping interests of Montreal, and indirectly upon the farmers who ship produce to the old country. If it is the policy of the opposition that there shall be no new aids to navigation, and that for all time to come we are to remain in the rut where they left us, I for one will welcome that challenge.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not say what the hon. gentleman puts into my mouth. I said that last year the government took more money for performing the same service than the late Conservative government, and this year there is a still further increase. This is the case notwithstanding the fact that they are not doing any new work.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Forty-two new lights.

Mr. TAYLOR. Salaries and allowances of lighthouse keepers, increase $3,000. The hon. gentleman tells us that this is for running a lantern put on a wharf.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Even that cannot be done without paying for it.

Mr. TAYLOR. You have political friends to whom you want to give jobs; they light a lantern, run it up on a pole, and are paid in that way for it. I propose to oppose every increase, and to divide the House, if it takes all summer, simply because the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce took the dirty mean advantage—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR—of saying that we did not divide the House upon expenditures, and that we practically consented to them because we did not divide the House. The House will be divided, so far as I am concerned, on every item where there is an increase for doing a service which can be done with less money. I am in favour of doing everything necessary to improve the navigation of Canada, and for improving the harbour of Montreal. Works that are for the benefit of the country and the farmers, such as these, will receive my support, as they will that of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not going to object to new works or improvements that are necessary, but I want them to be done on a business basis. When we come to the item that is allowed to stand, I will point out that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has purchased flour at $7 a barrel, and other commodities at two or three prices to pay political friends. I think we will make better time by accepting the proposition that the committee rise and report progress.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I would suggest that we pass this item, as I have given all the information.

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has misunderstood my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor). My hon. friend has not been objecting to any new lights that are necessary in the interest of the development of the trade of this country, or necessary to make the St. Lawrence as safe a route as it is possible to make it. I recognize the truth of what the hon. minister has said that, in doing so, we are saving money to the commercial community by reducing the underwriters charges upon shipments sent to Canada and from Canada to England. I am prepared to say that it is imperative upon every Canadian to lend a helping hand towards the development of the St. Lawrence route, and to favour the establishment of such lighthouses, or fog horns, or anything else, as may be necessary to make the St. Lawrence route a route that will be in the interest of trade and commerce. We depend upon the St. Lawrence route, the great artery of this continent, and it requires only the ingenuity of the human mind to make it as absolutely safe as any route you can find in any part of the world. But my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) is right in his criticisms. I have asked the hon. minister to be good enough to give us the list of the different lighthouses, and to tell us what works have been undertaken. If, as the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has said, it is merely a question of hanging a lantern on the end of a pole at the end of a wharf, that cannot cost much money after the lantern has been bought. I asked the hon. minister about the gas buoys for the reason that I knew they were charged from the ship belonging to the government, and there is no other way of doing it. The tank, naturally, is under the control of the government, and the gas is served out to the various buoys. I agree, in so far as the hon. gentleman's policy goes with everything that can make the St. Lawrence a safe route and adequate to the needs of trade and commerce. I will never object to any expenditure that may be incurred for this purpose, but even then, we must know what the expenditure is.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. member for South Leeds did not at all criticize it in a hostile spirit, but he wanted to get information. Who is the man, in any House of Commons, or any representative assembly, who can express an opinion upon a proposition that is made by the government without knowing exactly what the government propose to do? I think that these different items should be held over. I do not think that we are gaining any time by not doing so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have brought down all the information, but if the hon. gentleman wishes it to stand over and go over it again, I have no objection at all.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think we will save time by allowing these items to stand for the present.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. All right.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), knows that I do not interfere to prevent the work of the House, but I think it will save time if we adopt this suggestion.

Mr. CLANCY. I quite understand that the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies), is willing to adopt the suggestion that has been made, but I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to his very adroit moves in the shifting of his argument. If the hon. gentleman should have very close criticism, probably, what they consider somewhat ungenerous criticism, they must ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), to answer for that in this country. If hon. members of this House followed the rule laid down by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce when he spoke in the city of Toronto, and in other parts of Canada, I think it would be a fair thing to do, because, that hon. gentleman made a declaration that only the paltry sum of $32,000 had been objected to, declaring thereby, that the whole opposition had given their assent to every other item as being proper. Do I misunderstand what the hon. gentleman said, when I make that statement? If I do, I wish to be corrected.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy), had better read what I said, if he has not done so already.

Mr. CLANCY. I have done so already, and if the hon. gentleman does not assent to what I say now, we may wait, and I will read it to him.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That will be better.

Mr. CLANCY. It does seem to me that it is an unfair thing to say, that the opposition must divide the House in every case, in order to prove that they were unwilling that every item or portion of an item shall pass. We always know the difficulty in criticising expenditures, because some portion of an item may be quite commendable, while another portion may be objectionable. The pith of the whole matter is, that hon. gentlemen themselves, when they were in opposition, did not pursue the course that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce laid down for the opposition here, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how many items he, or his friends, objected to, or divided the House upon, when they were crying out that the expenditure was enormous, and that the people were being bled white? I can find years, when that hon. gentleman and his friends never objected to a single item. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), has given warning, and if the opposition take advantage of that to criticise, in a fair manner, not objecting to an item with the mere object of offering factious opposition to it, hon. gentlemen need not be surprised. After what the hon. gentleman has said, every item should undergo close criticism, and if it is not commendable, on all grounds, objection should be taken, and the House divided, even if it does occupy a good deal of time.

Committee rose and reported progress.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 12, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Accident and Guarantee Company of Canada.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Crown Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. Burnett.)

Bill (No. 83) respecting the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Bethune.)

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. Bethune.)

GOVERNMENT SYSTEM OF TELE- GRAPHS.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 85) for the establishment of a government system of telegraphs.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. CASEY. I hear calls of 'explain,' and it is, perhaps, not surprising that an explanation should be asked for the introduction of a Bill of this nature by a private member. I have, however, drafted this Bill so that, in my experience and judgment, it does not call for the expenditure of public money, but is simply a Bill to authorize the government to do certain things when public money has been provided by parliament for the purpose, and it remains in the power of parliament to grant or refuse the moneys required. I realize, however, that it is hardly likely that a Bill looking to such a great change in our ordinary business will become law until taken up by some government. In the meantime, a discussion upon this subject must partake more of an educational than a practical character. To put it briefly, this Bill authorizes the government, when money is provided by parliament, to establish a system of national telegraphs throughout Canada, that system to be established either by construction of new lines, or by the purchase of existing lines, or their expropriation under the ordinary principles of expropriation by government for public purposes. It goes without saying that no injustice could be done to any existing line through its expropriation by the government. The government would have to pay a fair value for the property, to be decided by arbitration in the ordinary way, and I need not go into that question at any length at this stage of the Bill.

I am more concerned to show the House and the country that there is reason in the public interest for proposing this great change. Telegraphs, like railways, highways, and the supply of water and light in municipalities, and many other things which might be mentioned, partake of the nature of monopolies. They have been called natural monopolies, for when one organization for this purpose is in possession, it almost necessarily excludes others from the same territory. It has long been held by the best thinkers that monopolies of this sort should be in the hands of the people themselves. It has been held that what may now be a monopoly, tending to secure private profit at the public expense as it belongs to a corporation, would not be a monopoly but a public privilege were it in the hands of the people, as represented in the government of the country. That this applies emphatically, in public opinion, to the supply of light and water by municipalities—

An hon. MEMBER. And gas.

Mr. CASEY. And gas—has been shown in many cases by successful attempts to municipalize these supplies. I am aware, in regard to the supply of gas that an exception has to be made in any municipality in favour of any legislative assembly that may hold its meetings within the municipality, as my hon. friend evidently meant to suggest by his interruption. But I refer to illuminating gas, which has been treated in many municipalities as a thing to be supplied by the public to the public.

I am aware that most of the arguments for nationalizing our telegraph system would apply equally well to the case of railways; and I am not at all afraid of considering that question in due time. But it must be admitted that the question of nationalizing the railways of Canada would be an immensely greater question, involving greater expense and greater change of business methods than would be involved in the nationalizing of our telegraphs. It is, perhaps, wiser to begin with the less extensive and less glaring change and to nationalize the telegraph lines in the first instance.

What, Sir, are the inconveniences arising from the private ownership of telegraphs? In the first place, there is undue cost of communication. When a natural monopoly of this kind is operated for the profit of private individuals, it is to be expected that those private individuals combined in a corporation should try to make as much money out of it as they possibly can, and should keep up the rates for the sake of keeping up the dividends. If the stock of the company is watered to keep the dividends from looking too big in the first place, another tax on the public becomes necessary to supply dividends on the watered stock. When a competing company enters the field, there may be for the time the advantage of competition, but competition of this kind invariably leads to pooling or some form of agreement by which the rates are not lowered to the public nor the dividends lowered to the shareholders. Then, again, there is the objection to private ownership of these public privileges that discrimination is indulged in. As we know that the railway companies discriminate in favour of certain customers as against others, we know that the telegraph companies discriminate in favour of certain customers against others. In saying this, I do not refer so much to private telegrams, because the rate for these is more nearly fixed; but I refer particularly to the charge for supplying matter for publication in the newspapers—press despatches. I do not think I am wrong in stating that the larger newspaper concerns of this country are able to obtain better rates on their press despatches than the smaller, though, perhaps equally important, newspapers. There is a discrimination in this respect, and I think it is unfair.

The Bill which I have the honour to introduce, then, provides that under the proposed government ownership of telegraph lines, all rates shall be uniform and without discrimination all over Canada. It provides a uniform rate of ten cents per message of ten words and ten cents per hundred words on press despatches. These figures seem to me to be about fair and right. The particular figure might be subject to revision after the receipt of further information on a subject; but the Bill would, at all events, provide a maximum rate beyond which the government would not be allowed to charge.

So much for the theoretical side of the question. In practice the telegraph system has been admitted, for years past, in the old country and various other British communities, to be a proper part of the governmental machinery. It is just about thirty years since the telegraphs were nationalized in Great Britain. At a subsequent time they were nationalized in the Australasian colonies and New Zealand. The result in all these cases has been a great improvement in the convenience afforded to the public and a great reduction in the rates paid for telegrams, and, consequently, a vastly increased business for the telegraph system. As an illustration, I will quote from the report of the British Postmaster General on the telegraphic business of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The figures I have here cover the period from the years 1870-1 to 1898-9, the first mentioned being the year when the telegraphs came under control of the government. In 1870-1, the telegrams for the whole of the British Islands were 9,850,000 in number; and for 1898-9 they were 87,043,000. So, in thirty years, the telegraphic business for Great Britain and Ireland had increased nearly ten times, being utterly out of proportion to the increase of population in the country in the same time. The inference is inevitable that this great increase has been brought about by the increased facilities offered to the public and the cheaper rates that accompanied these facilities. As a matter of fact, practically every post office in the United Kingdom and Ireland is a telegraph office, and the machinery for distributing is equally as good as that for receiving. I have no figures at hand for the Australasian colonies or New Zealand, but there is no doubt that the system of government management has been a success, both from the point of view of public convenience and from the point of view of the public treasury. It is worth knowing that in England the saving of money to government on telegraphing has been very considerable. Last year the amount of work performed by the postal telegraph department for other government departments was worth £55,749—considerably over a quarter of a million dollars. This is entered in the accounts as if paid, but, of course, money paid by one department to another is not lost to the government, and consequently, this represents a saving of a quarter of a million dollars to the government for telegraphic work. Our government pays out large sums for telegraphic work; if it were done through another department of the government it is easy to understand what a large saving it would be.

There is one other point which I wish to make. I desire not to take up too much time in introducing the Bill, but we do not know when the second reading will come on, and I wish to say something material about it on the present occasion. In Canada we have already a considerable extent of government telegraph lines down in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, I don't remember the mileage, but it is very considerable, including a number of submarine cables. We have in the far North-west, a line partly completed, which will ultimately extend from Ashcroft all the way to the Yukon, and which should be opened, I am told, some time during the current year—2,000 miles in extent. This is a very considerable line to start with. There is no doubt at all that that line administered by the government will give a much better service and cheaper rates than if it was in the hands of a private corporation, holding a monopoly. But our present telegraphic system in the gulf is certainly not sufficient. There is no doubt that in the interests of navigation, it will have to be extended further down the gulf to all the coasts on which shipwrecks may take place, to all the points on which vessels may be sighted on their entry into the gulf and the river St. Lawrence; and it may be necessary to lay a cable from the Island of Anticosti, all the way to the Straits of Belle Isle, to avoid trouble from ice, and other difficulties of that kind. We remember in the case of one of the late wrecks, I think that of the Scotsman, great complaint was made of want of telegraphic communication, which lack of communication it was stated, resulted in serious inconvenience to persons and perhaps, to the loss of property. I would recommend these considerations to the House, and especially to the government, and hope to have some fuller particulars to lay before you, if the Bill comes to a second reading.

Mr. B. D. McLELLAN (West Prince). I desire to say, that I hope the provisions of the Bill introduced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), will be carried into effect, even if it will have no other effect than to remedy the hardships under which we labour in Prince Edward Island in respect to telegraphs. The difference between the cost of sending a telegram from here to Halifax, and from here to Charlottetown, which is about the same distance, is something like 150 per cent. Of course, a part of this is due to the fact, that we have a short cable across from the mainland to the island; but the discrepancy is too great, and as the present company have a monopoly there is hardly any remedy for it, except, that since they receive a subsidy of some $2,000 from the Dominion government, I trust the government will exert their influence upon the company to get them to act more fairly towards the people of our province. Apart from the exorbitant cost of sending telegrams to Prince Edward Island, we are labouring under another disadvantage, with respect to our telegraphic system. The main office at Charlottetown is closed every evening at 8 o'clock, and is not open in the morning, I think, until 8 or 9 o'clock. I do not know that there is any other part of Canada in which a system of that kind obtains. I think that if the government can use their influence with the company, either by wiping out the subsidy, which is being granted to them, or by pointing out to them the great wrongs under which the people of Prince Edward Island are labouring, they will do a great favour to the people of that province. We have one morning paper in Charlottetown, and when it is known that the office closes at 8 o'clock in the evening, the House will readily see that no important news can be received for that paper for its issue next morning; and during a time like this, when the war news is so important and so interesting to all Canadians, it is a case where the company if they cannot be compelled to keep their offices open later at night, and earlier in the morning, should be remonstrated with by the government. I think the main office at Charlottetown, at all events, and also the office at Summerside, which is the chief town of Prince county, should be kept open until 11 or 12 o'clock at night. I do not think that such a demand on the company would be unreasonable, and certainly it would be a great boon to the people of Prince Edward Island, by enabling them to receive the news up to date. The House will see that at the present time we are unable to receive news up to date, we are about 24 hours late in getting the news in the morning paper. Of course, it does not make so much difference with the evening papers, but the news in the morning paper, which goes out in the early trains all over the province, is just 24 hours later than it would be under different arrangements. Besides this inconvenience, we are paying at least 100 per cent more for telegrams sent down to that province than we ought to pay. The cable is a short one, only about 7 or 8 miles in length, and it does not add very materially to the cost of the whole system, and there is no good reason why we should be charged so much for our telegrams, as we are under the present arrangement. I hope, therefore, that the government will look into this matter, as I believe they will, and perhaps have already done, and try and induce the company to give us better accommodation and lower rates.

Mr. A. MARTIN (P.E.I.) I am entirely in accord with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, but I doubt whether the Bill proposed by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), will remedy this grievance. The telegraphic communication between Prince Edward Island, and the mainland, by the terms of union with Prince Edward Island, had to be maintained by the government of Canada, and if the treatment which the people of Prince Edward Island have received in the past is a fair indication of what they would receive under the Bill introduced by the hon. member, I do not think that I should support it for one minute. As the hon. member for West Prince has pointed, the rates between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, are nearly 100 per cent, at least 50 per cent, more than over the same distance in any other part of Canada. That is a service which Canada had guaranteed Prince Edward Island, and there is no doubt but it is far from giving satisfaction.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, it provides a maximum charge.

Mr. MARTIN. That would be all right; but at present the government has the telegraphic communication between the mainland and the island, under its control, and in place of lowering the rates, they are higher than on any other route. If there would be no better results from the operation of this Bill than from the operation of government control over telegraphic communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, I predict for it that, instead of lowering the rates, they will be raised. While I hope that the government will take steps to lower the rates and give accommodation required, I do not think that this Bill will have that effect, if we may judge from the example I have given.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman is in error in assuming that the government has control of telegraphic communication across the Straits of Northumberland. Telegraphic communication across the Straits of Northumberland is in the hands of the Anglo-American Telegraph Company, a company established many years ago. The government, under the terms of union, subsidized the existing telegraph company; but the government have no control over the rates, unless they choose to withdraw the subsidy, and build a new line altogether.

Mr. MARTIN. Increase the subsidy.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That would not give us the relief we are seeking. The hon. member for West Prince (Mr. McLellan) has put the case in a nutshell when he has said that the grievances that the people suffer there are two, one, in respect to the rates charged by this monopoly, and the other in respect to the absurd hour at which they choose to close their offices. Hon. members would hardly believe it when I tell them, that, during the whole of the last three or four months, when everybody was seeking for news, all over the Dominion for news in reference to the war in South Africa, the Anglo-American Company closed their offices in Prince Edward Island at 8 o'clock in the evening. The matter has become an intolerable nuisance, and the people do not propose to submit to it without finding a remedy. These are the evils which always grow out of monopolies. This company was established in 1853, and it had a certain monopoly granted to it, but that monopoly does not extend to the laying of a line between Prince Edward Island and the continent of America. It does extend to the laying of a line between Prince Edward Island, England and Europe, but not to the laying of a line between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of America, although the company sedulously seeks to create the impression everywhere that such a monopoly does not exist. I have given my attention to the whole matter very closely, and I find that such a monopoly does not exist. In 1895 the Board of Trade of the maritime provinces brought this matter very fully to the notice of the late government, but nothing was done except a mere report by the then Minister of Public Works that the superintendent of telegraphs thought things were not so very bad. The Board of Trade of the maritime provinces were not very well satisfied with the manner in which their memorial was treated and the matter has been brought up again several times. The government had its attention again called to the matter more than a year ago when the Board of Trade of Charlottetown submitted a memorial pointing out the grievances under which they laboured. I wrote to the general manager of the company at Charlottetown, pointing out to him that it was utterly impossible for him to imagine that such hours as were observed and that such excessive charges could be tolerated by the people. As the hon. member for West Prince has pointed out, if I wished to telegraph to Halifax I could send a telegram for 25 cents, but, if I wished to telegraph to Charlottetown it would cost me 50 cents. The rates are almost prohibitory. Now, I hope that something will come from the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) in the direction of remedying these grievances such as the hon. member for West Prince spoke of just now. Correspondence was carried on with the general manager of the company in Charlottetown for some time, and I saw that he had no power to provide the remedy that was required. He was merely the agent to carry out the instructions of the general manager who lives in London. I have drawn the attention of the general manager in London to the matter, and I expressed to him my personal opinion that some prompt remedy would have to be provided; otherwise the government would not continue to pay the subsidy to the line which they have been paying. If they would keep their main offices open—I do not ask that all the offices throughout Prince Edward Island should be kept open—so as to give us telegraphic communication up to 11 or 12 o'clock at night and enable the morning papers to publish the news of the war the following morning, something would be done, and if they would make an arrangement with the North American Telegraph Co., or the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which we could have the telegraph charges reduced one-half, it would be more satisfactory. Unless something is done in this direction action will have to be taken on the line of my hon. friend's Bill, and it may be that the government will be forced to build a line of their own, as they have built a line to Anticosti, or they will be compelled to expropriate the property of the company paying them a reasonable sum for their property. They have a monopoly, and, as with all monopolies, grievances that have borne heavily on the people have grown out of it. It is time that it should be put a stop to, and as far as my influence goes I will use it in that direction. I am very glad my hon. friend's motion has come before the House, because it has given me an opportunity of making this statement. I am awaiting the reply of the general manager in London to the communication that I addressed to him.

Mr. CASEY. What about the Gulf Telegraph?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Gulf Telegraph is a matter that is in charge of the Department of Public Works, but, I can say that the line is being pushed along on the north side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and a vote is asked in the House this year of $10,000 to carry it on down to the farthestmost part of Labrador and to the Straits of Belle Isle. I had a statement, made to me by the chief engineer of my department in reference to the question of making direct communication with the lighthouse at Belle Isle. Complaints were made, when the Scotsman was wrecked very lately, that there were no means of communicating with Montreal and Quebec to ask for assistance. That is true, but it is doubted very much by the officers of my department whether a cable can be laid across the straits between Labrador and Belle Isle owing to the enormous depth of the water and to the irregular bottom caused by the Arctic stream and the icebergs which come down. It has been suggested that we should lay a cable line from Anticosti to Belle Isle through the Straits of Belle Isle. It is possible that that may be more feasible. The chief engineer of my department does not desire to commit himself to any project because he is considering very carefully the adoption of a telegraph according to the Marconi system which he thinks might be feasible, but, he thinks it is a little premature to come to a conclusion yet as improvements are being made every few months of a more or less important character upon it. Therefore, the matter is being carefully considered, and I may say to my hon. friend that we fully appreciate the great importance of getting telegraph communication with Belle Isle lighthouse so that ships, being unfortunately, wrecked, may have relief at the earliest possible moment. In regard to the lighthouse at Belle Isle we have there now the finest siren in America.

Mr. J. H. BELL (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, we are to have reasonable service, as I understand it, and in consideration of that we give $2,000 of a subsidy annually. In whose discretion is it to say whether that service is performed in a reasonable way? If it is within the discretion of the Dominion government, cannot they bring pressure to bear to compel them to improve that service or withdraw the subsidy?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The words 'reasonable service' are not in the terms of union at all. They simply say that the Dominion government shall maintain telegraphic communication. They have maintained telegraphic communication. That subsidy of $2,000 has been paid to the Anglo-American Telegraph Co. ever since confederation.

Mr. BERGERON. By the Dominion government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there a monopoly?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a monopoly, but it is only a partial one. The monopoly does not extend to a line between the continent of America and the island. It was granted in 1853 and it prevents a line being laid between Prince Edward Island and any island surrounding the coast of the continent of America, or between Europe and Prince Edward Island, but it does not extend to the continent itself. So that, in that respect, there is no monopoly. There is nothing to prevent a line being built from the continent of America, or from the province of Nova Scotia to Prince Edward Island; but, we cannot build a line from Cape Breton or Newfoundland to the Island.

Mr. FOSTER. You may build a line from New Brunswick?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We can build a line from

New Brunswick across to the Cape, where the line now exists, and which is the most natural place to build a line.

Mr. A. C. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, in order to show the perfect unanimity of opinion with respect to the deficiencies of the telegraph system of Prince Edward Island, I wish to corroborate the statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). In consideration of the possible adoption of the Marconi system, it would be an excellent place for the government to try that system across the Straits of Northumberland, a distance of eight or nine miles, particularly as I am given to understand that the Marconi system has proved a success for at least that distance. Were the government to establish the Marconi system it would very soon bring the Anglo-American Telegraph Company to time, and cause them to consider the false position in which they have placed the people of Prince Edward Island, for a great many years. I may say that the monopoly referred to was granted by the local government of Prince Edward Island before confederation, and at the time of confederation it was arranged that a subsidy should be paid in future by the Dominion government. That subsidy has been paid ever since and the impression has prevailed generally that the monopoly granted to the Anglo-American system prevented the construction of any other line of telegraphs, or the laying of any cable between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I am pleased to hear from the Minister of Marine that under a proper interpretation of that monopoly clause, we have the privilege of putting down another cable between Prince Edward Island and the continent of America. If that be the case, then there is no reason why another cable should not be put down, either by the government or by one of the enterprising companies which have lines through the lower provinces. I think it would be well for the government to turn their attention to that matter, and see if they cannot interest these other companies in an establishment of another line to Prince Edward Island. The present telegraph system in that province is altogether behind the age, and as has been very properly remarked by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and by the other gentlemen who have spoken, we get the news there twenty-four hours behind every other part of the Dominion of Canada. As a matter of fact, the Prince Edward Island telegraph system is altogether obsolete, and anything which the government can do towards the breaking of that odious telegraph monopoly which now exists would be much appreciated by the people of my province.

Mr. J. GUNION RUTHERFORD (Macdonald). I have listened with great pleasure to the hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island, but I would like the House to understand that they are not the only people in the Dominion who suffer from a telegraph monopoly. A very large section of north-western Canada is at the mercy of a telegraph monopoly, and it is not a very uncommon thing in the portion of the Dominion I come from, for a man to telegraph his people that he is coming home and to arrive there twenty-four hours before the telegram. I remember when I was a boy, the occasion of the taking over of the telegraph system of Great Britain by the Imperial government, and any one who recollects the expense of telegraphing before the government ownership, and the cheapness and despatch which have existed since, will realize that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has much to recommend it. I trust that this matter will be dealt with seriously, and that we will soon see the abolition of the present telegraph monopolies, which are not at all necessary in Canada, but which are a great drawback to the free and rapid interchange of communication between the various portions of the Dominion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) I mention again the matter of the returns which have been ordered by the House, and which have not yet been brought down. I am in a still worse position than when I made the inquiry the other day, because I have lost my memorandum and have not got my returns. Can the First Minister hunt up one or the other?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have the memorandum, and I think before the day is over I may be able to place the return on the Table.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). In the absence of the Minister of the Interior, and in the absence of the acting minister (Mr. Sutherland), I wish to ask the Prime Minister about the Order of the House passed on the 26th of February for the order in council appointing Mr. Girouard as registrar in the Yukon. It is a very short return, and I am surprised it is not down yet.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think I shall have it before the sitting is over.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assinibola). On the 7th of February an Order of the House was passed for copies of all correspondence between any officer of the Interior Department and any officer of the North-west mounted police, respecting the giving of contracts for supplies for the North-west mounted police since the 23rd of June, 1896. The Prime Minister promised this return on Friday.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have ascertained that it will take some time to prepare that report, but we may have it in the course of this week.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) I would ask the Prime Minister: When does he intend to bring down the return to an Order of the House passed on the 12th of February for the correspondence between the Dominion government and the British Columbia government, with respect to the offer of the government of British Columbia to send a contingent to South Africa?

The PRIME MINISTER. I shall make a note of that.

ORFORD COPPER COMPANY.

Mr. McINNES (for Mr. Belcourt) moved second reading of Bill (No. 53) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Orford Copper Company.

Mr. A. T. WOOD (Hamilton). Mr. Speaker, if the promoter of this Bill does not consider it worth while to look after it, I think it is a Bill which should not occupy the time of this House. It is for the purpose of reviving a patent which has long expired—a patent which was obtained seven or eight years ago, and which expired within two years for non-usage. As the House knows, the patent law requires every patent obtained in Canada to be used within two years. This patent has never been used; not a pound of nickel has been refined under it; and now these people come and ask us to revive what has been extinct for seven years. The reason they are doing so is that a large establishment has been built in the city of Hamilton for the purpose of refining nickel and other metals, and they think that that establishment may possibly have to fall back upon the use of this process. If they do, I think they have a perfect right to use a process which has not been used in Canada for seven years, which, in fact, has never been used in Canada. These people, after allowing the thing to stand for seven years, are now asking this House to revive their patent. I have here a letter from a gentleman largely interested in the Hamilton enterprise:

The Orford Copper Company of New York is the company which refines all the mattes produced by the Canadian Copper Company at Sudbury. Robert M. Thompson is the president and principal owner of this company. The process used by this company in the refining of these mattes was some seven years ago patented in Canada. The process, of course, has never been used in Canada, and the patent has, I am told, expired both by limitation and for non-user. The Orford Company, through their Ottawa attorneys, Gormully & Orde, are before parliament asking for an Act authorizing the revival and extension of this patent. You will see a notice of such application in the 'Canada Gazette.'

Burke and McIntosh are interested with Thompson in all this matter.

They all say that no refining can be done in Canada, that none will be done, and they refuse to do any. Burke and McIntosh tell the Ontario government that no other process than this one of Thompson's is of any avail or of any use, that it is the only process by which the Sudbury mattes can be refined.

This process is now free to the use of any one desiring to use it. Why should the patent be revived for the sole purpose of preventing it being used, when the parties seeking such renewal openly declare that it will never be used in Canada. I am told that the process was already twenty years old when it was patented in Canada.

It is very important, Mr. Wood, that you should prevent the passage of this Act and the revival and extension of the life of this patent. If by any unforeseen cause or accident the wet process of Dr. Hoepfner should fail, then it is very important that Thompson's fire process, which is now free, should remain free to be used by any one.

The course of Burke, McIntosh and Thompson in connection with the refining and manufacturing of nickel in Ontario has certainly not been such as to warrant a renewal of this patent for the sole purpose of preventing any refining being done in Ontario and to make the policy of the government a failure.

I earnestly hope that you will lose no time in putting a stop to this proceeding. Of course, there is every likelihood of the success of the Hoepfner process, but should it fail or not to do all that is expected of it, then it is most important that this Thompson process should remain free to fall back upon. Let me urge this upon you as you are in a position to prevent the success of this effort to beat the Hamilton enterprise.

I write you both at Hamilton and Ottawa.

Yours truly,

S. J. RITCHIE.

It is of the utmost importance that this Bill should be thrown out, because if, by any unforeseen circumstances, the process under which the Hamilton industry is going on, should fail, it is very important that the Thompson Fire Process should remain free, and that the people of Hamilton, who have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in refining works, should have it to fall back upon.

I would, therefore, move that the Bill be not now read the second time to-day, but that it be read the second time this time six months.

Mr. FLINT. The question raised by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), is very important. I presume that very few hon. members have studied this Bill, or have any idea as to its scope, and would, no doubt, like to have an opportunity given the mover of this Bill, who is not now present, of explaining it. I would, therefore, move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. LARIVIERE. Last session we passed two similar Bills, for which I felt rather diffident in voting. But, at the same time, I think that the proper place for the examination of these Bills, is the Private Bills Committee. In that committee, all the objections should be stated and looked into, and, if necessary, evidence taken. In justice to both parties, the Bill should be allowed to pass the second reading, and be sent to the committee, where a proper investigation could be made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in saying that the Private Bills Committee passed two Bills last session of a somewhat anagalous character. That committee did not pass the preambles of those Bills, until sworn evidence was brought before it to establish the correctness of the statements made in the preambles. It has been too largely the practice to assume that everything is correct which is stated in the preamble of a Bill, or to accept the statement of the solicitor; and we have lately adopted the practice of requiring testimony under oath, to establish the facts. I do not see much difference in the recital in the preamble of this Bill and those we passed last session, although I have not had the opportunity of examining them very critically. In the Private Bills Committee, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood), would have the opportunity of establishing the statement he makes, that this patent ought not to be renewed, because the process has never been used in Canada, and never will be. That is a substantive statement, and, no doubt, the committee would be glad to hear evidence on that point.

Mr. WOOD. I should not have moved the rejection of this Bill now, but for the fact that the gentleman who is in charge of it, does not care two straws about it, and knows nothing about it.

Mr. WOOD.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be better to allow the debate to be adjourned, and hear what the hon. gentleman, who has the Bill in charge, does know about it. I think he will have to give very good reasons either here, or in the committee, before the Bill is allowed to pass. It does not seem quite right to bowl it out in his absence, and not hear what he has to say.

Motion (Mr. Flint), to adjourn debate, agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

POSTMASTER AT LOTBINIERE.

Mr. FORTIER asked :

Whether the late Maxime Lemay, postmaster of Lotbinière, in the county of Lotbinière:

1. Has, or has not, been replaced
2. If he has been replaced, by whom?
3. What is the date of the appointment?
4. By whom was the appointment recommended?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. The successor to the late Maxime Lemay, postmaster at Lotbinière, has been appointed. 2. Ernest Filteau is the name of his successor. 3. Mr. Filteau was appointed on the 1st December last. 4. It is not usual to answer this question.

APPLICANTS FROM QUEBEC TO SERVE IN AFRICA.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What are the names of the officers, subaltern officers and others, of the province of Quebec, who have made application to the Militia Department, or to the persons authorized to receive such applications, to serve in South Africa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Commissions and ordinary enlistments—Patterson, Capt. C. E. A., (85th Batt.) Montreal; Forrest, Lt.-Col. W. H., Quebec; Leprohon, Lt. E. T., (65th Batt.) IMPORTATION OF POSTERS ANNOUNCING WOODBRIDGE FAIR.

Mr. CASEY (by Mr. McMillan) asked:

1. What amount of customs duty was paid on certain posters, printed by Messrs. Hennegan & Company, in Cincinnati, in the United States, announcing the holding of the fair at Woodbridge, in the county of York, on October 17 and 18, 1899, and having printed thereon the name of N. C. Wallace, M.P., as treasurer, George F. Wallace as president, and T. F. Wallace as secretary?

2. Are there establishments in Canada where such posters could have been printed? If so, how many?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The Department of Customs is informed by the collector of customs at Toronto, that certain posters advertising the Woodbridge Fair, were imported from Hennigan & Co., of Cincinnati, in September, 1899, and duly entered. As invoices are not made public, it is not deemed advisable to state the amount of duty paid, but I would say, the proper duties payable thereon, were paid. The department is further informed, that the assistant appraiser, who examined the goods, does not recollect whether the names mentioned in the question, were printed on such posters. There are lithographic establishments in Canada, but as I have not seen any of the posters, I express no opinion in reference to question No. 2.

ARMOURY AT SUSSEX, N.B.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Davis) asked :

If it is the intention to commence the building of the armoury at Sussex, N.B., for the use of the 8th Hussars, in the early spring of this year?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Yes; it is the intention to commence the building of the armoury for the use of the 8th Hussars, during the coming spring.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. L. V. LABELLE, OF ST. JACQUES L'ACHIGAN.

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

Is Mr. L. V. Labelle, of St. Jacques l'Achigan, County Montcalm, still in the service of the government, and what is his salary? Has he sent in a report to government in relation to the experiments in tobacco-growing at the Model Farm at St. Jacques? How many acres had he under cultivation? What has been the yield per acre? How many kinds of tobacco has he planted; what are the names of the several kinds, and the kind best adapted to the soil? To whom does the revenue from the farm belong? How much has been expended up to date? How many persons have been employed on the farm to date?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I am not in a position yet to give all the information asked for in this question, but I can say, that my department made arrangements with L. V. Labelle, of St. Jacques l'Achigan, to carry out certain experiments in tobacco culture during last season, that he has reported, by letter, from time to time, the results of these experiments, but he has not yet made any formal report, giving his final conclusion. Therefore, I cannot give the details asked for in this question.

Mr. BERGERON. Does he draw a salary?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He is to be paid a lump sum for carrying on these experiments. The crop belongs, naturally, to him, I cannot inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dugas), how many persons have been employed, or how much money has been expended; in fact, I do not control the expenditure.

BENNETT-DAWSON TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Has the Minister of Public Works seen the following despatch from Vancouver:

'Some comment is made in the city over the fact that Mr. Charleson, superintending the construction of the all-Canadian telegraph line, shipped north by the 'Amur' to-day for his men on construction work flour bought in Ottawa and shipped out here at a cost of 50 cents a barrel more than he could have bought here for, stoves and sleighs he could have saved the freight upon, horses he could have saved money on by buying them here, and so on down the list. Some 300 men applied here for work on the construction, but the seventeen who went north on the 'Amur' were principally French Canadians from the east.'

Is it a fact that Mr. Charleson took or sent flour, stoves, sleighs, horses, &c., &c., from here to British Columbia this year besides what had been obtained from Messrs. Kelly, Douglas & Co., of Vancouver, last year and held over?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). On behalf of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), I beg to say: The Minister of Public Works does not think he should consider communications of this character, evidently inspired by desire to raise race hatred; but he may state that fifteen of the men taken from here by Mr. Charleson, are English-speaking. It is not to the department's knowledge that he took horses or sleighs from the east; however, in view of the circumstances of the case, and the success which attended his management of the construction of the Bennett-Dawson telegraph line, the minister has allowed him to use his own discretion in regard to the purchase of supplies, and the engagement of men.

TELEGRAPH LINE FROM DAWSON TO CIRCLE CITY.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

Has the Minister of Public Works seen a despatch from Vancouver to the eastern papers in regard to Mr. Charleson, and which contains the following:

'He says the government has also instructed him to build a fifty mile line from Dawson to Circle City, to connect with a line built from St. Michael to Circle City by an American company.'

Is it true that the government contemplates building a telegraph line from Dawson City to Circle City? If so, what proportion of said line will the United States be asked to pay for or build? Is there any great necessity for such a line? If so, why?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). No such instructions have been given to Mr. Charleson, as there is at present no vote out of which the cost of this construction could be defrayed.

EXPENDITURE ON MILITIA AND ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Davis) asked :

What was the total amount, by years, expended for the militia during the years 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899? What was the pay of headquarters and district staff officers for same period, by years? What was the expenditure by years, for same period for Royal Military College? What was the amount collected from cadets at the Royal Military College for same period, by years?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The answer is as follows :

—	1890-1.	1891-2.	1892-3.	1893-4.	1894-5.	1895-6.	1896-7.	1897-8.	1898-9.

SOPERTON POST OFFICE.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked :

Has there been a post office called Soperton, in the county of Leeds? If so, in what year was said office established? Has said office been closed? If so, for what reason?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Soperton post office, in the county of Leeds, was established in June, 1871. On the 10th of March, 1880, it was closed for want of a postmaster, and remained closed until July, 1884. It was again closed on the 1st of March, 1900. In view of the fact that the cost of the mail service to that office was $62.60, and the postmaster's salary $16, amounting in all to $78.60, and the revenue was but $5 per year, or about one and one-third cents per day, it was not considered necessary in the public interest to keep the office open; it was, moreover, within two and a half, three and four miles of the Delta, Oak Leaf and Plum Hollow post offices, respectively.

I.C.R.—DAMAGE FROM SNOW FENCES.

Mr. TALBOT asked :

1. Is the Minister of Railways and Canals aware that several claims for indemnity for damage caused by the snow fences along the line of the Intercolonial Railway have been repeatedly, and for several years back, transmitted to his department and to the authorities at Moncton, by farmers of the parish of St. Charles, Bellechasse?

2. Is he aware that an inquiry was held three years ago by the assistant engineer, Mr. McGrath?

3. Has he taken cognizance of the report of the said inquiry?

4. If so, has the minister decided to indemnify the parties interested for the destruction of their orchards, for increase of work on public roads, &c., and when does he purpose to do it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, I am aware that claims have been presented from time to time for damages alleged to have been caused by snow fences. 2. Yes, I am aware that the matter was inquired into upon the ground by Mr. McGrath, assistant engineer, upon instructions from me. 3. Yes, I have taken cognizance of the report. 4. No, I have not decided to indemnify the claimants, as I am not yet satisfied that the government is liable; I am making further inquiry in order that I may reach a decision one way or the other.

WINTER ROAD TO THE YUKON.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. What expenditure has been made of moneys voted last session for the construction of a winter road to the Yukon?

2. What work has been carried out by the Public Works Department on the winter road, how many miles were completed, and between what points?

3. What work is it proposed shall be done during the coming summer between Carmack's Point on Lewes River and White Horse Rapids to secure an overland trail or road between these points, avoiding the dangerous portions of the Lewes River, Thirty-Mile River and Lake LaBarge, securing a permanent route which can be availed of not only during the winter but during the period when the ice is forming in the fall, and breaking in the spring, when the river cannot be travelled upon?

4. What is the cost per mile of work done? What is the estimated cost per mile of the proposed future work?

5. What post houses were erected on the route for the shelter of travellers?

6. Was a report made by the surveyor in charge of the work, and of what nature?

7. Was this surveyor recalled, and for what purpose?

8. Is the government aware that an available route between Carmack's and the Tahkina River exists, and has any survey been made between that river and the White Horse Rapids?

9. What work has been done up to date to improve the river between White Horse Rapids and Dawson, (a) at the outlet of Fifty-Mile River into Lake LaBarge; (b) on Thirty-Mile River; (c) at Five Finger Rapids; (d) at Rink Rapids; (e) at or near Hellgate, some twenty miles above Fort Selkirk?

10. Will all the necessary work be completed prior to the opening of navigation?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. \$17,225.37. 2. 110 miles built from Lake LaBarge, towards Dawson, to Hutchiku, as follows:—7 miles from mouth of Takhina River to Lake LaBarge; 99 miles, Lake LaBarge to Hutchiku; 2 miles, LaBarge Station to telegraph office; 1 mile, from Nordenskiöld to Mounted Police Station at Tantalus; $\frac{1}{4}$ -mile, Carmack's Landing to Trail. 3. Not yet decided. 4. About \$150 a mile, future cost about the same. 5. One post house at Nordenskiöld. 6. Yes, a report and plan of the work done of operations during the season. 7. The work was suspended at the commencement of severe weather and close of navigation. 8. The government examined an alternate route, which was found not to be as good nor as short as the one adopted. 9. (a) None, survey was made; (b) Four stationary beacons have been placed at the foot of Lake LaBarge at the entrance to Thirty-mile River; (c) Blasting rock and removing boulders to make the channel 35 feet wider; (d) Boulders removed and survey of Rink Rapids made, and a good channel found, which only requires two beacon piers to be made safe at all times; (e) An examination has been made by which it is ascertained that a sum of \$18,000 will be required to build shear dams to confine the waters in the west channel. 10. No.

WOOD ISLAND, P.E.I., BREAKWATER.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

1. Has the government received a petition from the residents of Wood Island, in the province of Prince Edward Island, praying for the dredging of the harbour or extension of the breakwater theret? If so, what does the government propose to do for the improvement of the harbour at Wood Island, and when will the work be commenced?

2. How many petitions praying for those improvements has the government received from the residents of Wood Island since June 30, 1896?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. Yes, petitions were received. To the second question, it is suggested that the question be repeated at a later period.

DUTY ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Mills) asked:

1. Have any petitions or representations been made to the government praying for an increase of the duty on agricultural implements; and if so, from whom?

2. Does the government intend to comply with the prayer of the petitions?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is not deemed expedient to make any statement in this matter in advance of the budget.

SHEIK'S ISLAND DAM—PAYMENT TO MR. SNETSINGER, M.P.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked:

Is there an opinion on file in the Department of Justice advising against the payment to J.

G. Snetsinger, Esq., M.P., of any amount in respect of a claim for compensation or damages for a mill property or water power at or near Sheik's Dam, on the Cornwall Canal, on the ground that the said J. G. Snetsinger, Esq., M.P., was not the owner of the said property? Was the property in respect of which the said opinion was given (if such was given) the same property for which on the 7th inst. the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated that $20,000 had been allowed the said J. G. Snetsinger, Esq., M.P.?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Snetsinger was the owner of a grist-mill constructed on a portion, nearly two acres, of the bed of the River St. Lawrence, between Moulinette and Sheik's Island, which had been leased to him by the Ontario government. The mill was a four-story building, and contained new roller machinery, in good condition, and with the latest improvements. On the utilization of this channel for the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal by the construction of dams at the head and foot of the island, the site of the property was submerged, in 1893; thereupon Mr. Snetsinger claimed $42,000 as compensation, of which $20,000 were for the water power and land, $12,000 for the mill and machinery, and $10,000 for damages to loss of business. Finally, however, he agreed to accept the appraisement of the government valuator of $12,000, covering all claims except that for the water power and land, as to his legal right to which the department had doubts, and this amount, with interest, was paid him, the principal in 1897, and the interest (on advice from the Department of Justice and on a special vote of parliament), in 1898. As to the question of the water power and mill site, the department took considerable pains to ascertain the legal rights of Mr. Snetsinger. On referring the matter to the Department of Justice, it obtained the opinion, in December, 1893, that as the federal government had always contended that the St. Lawrence River, so far as it remained ungranted at the date of confederation, belongs to Canada, and as Mr. Snetsinger's title was a lease from the province of Ontario, his claim for loss of water power and the land on which the mill was built, could not be admitted. Subsequently, however, on the 16th June, 1899—

Mr. BERGERON. A change of government.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No; a change of opinion.

Mr. BERGERON. Both. A change of government and a change of opinion.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No, it was the same officer. Subsequently, however, on the 16th of June, 1899, the Department of Justice advised further, stating that since their previous letter of 1893, the Privy Council had decided that rivers were not transferred by the British North America Act to the Dominion, but only river improvements, and that, therefore, if Mr. Snetsinger had a good title from the province, he would be entitled to compensation. In view of this opinion, an appraisal was made by two valuers, who fixed the sum of $8,000 as reasonable compensation, and on a further report from the Department of Justice, in October, 1899, this amount, with interest, was paid, and a full release taken in January last.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that all ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That will stand muster, I guess, anywhere.

I.C.R.—ST. CHARLES BRANCH.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

1. When was the St. Charles Branch Railway first let, and what was the amount of the several tenders for its construction?

2. Who was the lowest tenderer, and amount of his tender? What was paid for the original right of way, and what was paid for terminal accommodations?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The first contract for the construction of the St. Charles Branch was awarded in July, 1882. The central section is about 4½ miles. The tenders for the central section were on schedule prices, as per sheet attached, marked 'A.' The eastern section is about 8½ miles. The tenders for the eastern section were for bulk sums, as follows:—

David Aikman	$68,000
R. T. Cooke and C. Jones	59,800
Larkin, Connolly & Co	50,700
T. J. Czray	32,000
M. J. Hogan	31,000
Simon Peters	Informal

2. M. J. Hogan was the lowest tenderer. The amount of his tender for the eastern section was $31,000, but the amount of his tender for the central section cannot be given, as it was on schedule prices. The cost of land and damages to 31st January, 1900, is $949,432.26. It is impossible to give the amount paid for terminal accommodations, as it was not kept separately.

The Tenders for the Central Section were on Schedule prices, as follows:—

BELFAST AND MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. How much, if any, has been expended by the government from June 30 last to date, on the construction of the proposed Belfast and Murray Harbour Railway, in the province of Prince Edward Island?

2. What amount, for the same period, has been expended on survey and location?

3. What amount has been expended for right of way for the said period?

4. What is the total amount expended for survey and location?

5. How many miles have been surveyed and located?

6. Does the government intend to proceed with the survey of the cross line from Cardigan, passing at or near Montague Bridge and Caledonia, as proposed by the late government in 1896?

7. How many miles is it proposed to place under construction during the remainder of the fiscal year?

8. Has the government purchased any material required for construction?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. $12,693.20. 2. $3,031.37. 3. $2,864.54. 4. $9,938.19. 5. There have been 11½ miles surveyed and located. 6. The government have not yet decided as regards proceeding with the survey of the cross line from Cardigan. 7. The placing under construction before the 30th June next, of any further distance, beyond the 11½ miles, now under contract, will depend upon the department obtaining the information necessary to enable it to do so. 8. No materials have been purchased for construction.

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

Mr. CLARKE (by Mr. Mills), asked :

Are any negotiations now in progress between the government of Canada and the United States looking to the resumption of the meetings of the Joint Commission appointed to adjust all differences between Canada and the United States?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No such negotiations are now in progress.

CAP AUX CORBEAUX PIER WORKS.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron), asked :

1. At what date was the contract with Viau, Lachance and Hamel for work on the pier at Cap aux Corbeaux, Bay St. Paul, County of Charlevoix, to terminate, under the terms of the said contract?

2. Is the work now completed?

3. If so, since when?

4. If not, when is the work to be finished, and how many men are now employed thereon by the contractors?

5. How long has Joseph Tremblay, of Bay St. Paul, been employed by the government in superintending the execution of the said contract?

6. Is he still in the employment of the government?

7. If so, in what capacity?

8. What salary have the government paid him up to this date?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. To terminate on 25th September, 1899. 2. Nearing completion. 3. Nearing completion. 4. Nearing completion. Do not know how many men at present employed by contractors. 5. Since 11th January, 1899. 6. Yes. 7. As inspector. 8. $2 per day.

DREDGING AT TORONTO.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

How much has been paid W. A. Phin for dredging at Toronto? Were tenders asked for the work at Toronto before it was awarded to the said W. A. Phin? Is there a contract with the said W. A. Phin? If so, what are the terms of said contract? If not, what are the terms and conditions upon which the said work has been done?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. $24,490.60 since 1st July, 1896. 2. No tenders were asked for. Arrangements were made with Mr. W. H. Phin, to do the dredging at $8 per hour of actual work, not more than ten hours in a working day, a minimum of 600 cubic yards to be removed each working day, which gives a maximum price of 13½ cents per yard. It was not deemed to be in the public interest to ask for public tenders, as the work done by the hour system was found to be cheaper.

NORTH SHORE TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What is the total amount received, up to date, by L. P. de Courval in connection with the construction of the telegraph line on the north shore of the St. Lawrence?

2. Is there anything owing to the said L. P. de Courval in connection with the said work?

3. If so, what is the sum so owing?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Total amount paid, $37,431.50. 2. Nothing. 3. Nothing.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. How far and to what point has the telegraph line been constructed on the north shore of the St. Lawrence?

2. To what point do the government intend to carry the said line?

3. When is the said telegraph line to be completed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. 1. 231 miles from Pointe aux Esquimaux east, or 60 miles east of Grand Romaine. 2. To Chateau Bay, 320 miles east of Grand Romaine. 3. Probably in July next.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Have the government appointed an inspector of the work of constructing the telegraph line on the north shore of the St. Lawrence?

2. If so, what is his name?
3. Was Napoléon A. Comeau at any time inspector of the said work?
4. If so, up to what date?
5. Was he dismissed and on what grounds?
6. Was P. A. Perron appointed in place of the said Comeau?
7. What are the qualifications of the said Perron, and by whom was he recommended?
8. Is the government aware that the said Perron, in the discharge of his duties, accepted all the camps and bridges which had been rejected as unacceptable by the said Comeau?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. 1. Yes. 2. P. A. Perron. 3. N. A. Comeau made two special inspections as to progress of work. 4. No time specified for such special inspection. 5. No, he is still agent at Godbout River. 6. Mr. Perron was appointed regular inspector. 7. The preliminary survey was made by Mr. Perron, a surveyor by profession, who prepared the plan and laid out route, and was, therefore, considered most competent to supervise construction. The minister takes the responsibility of Perron's appointment, who was recommended to him by persons in whom he has confidence. 8. Some incompleting camps and bridges were refused by Mr. Comeau, but being afterwards properly completed, were accepted by Mr. Perron.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. What is the name of the party who holds the contract this year for the construction of the telegraph line on the north shore of the St. Lawrence?
2. Were tenders asked for in connection with the construction of the said line?
3. If so, how many tenders were received, and what are the names of the parties who tendered?
4. How, and from whom were the said tenders asked for?
5. What was the amount of each tender?
6. If the lowest tender was not accepted, what was the reason?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. F. X. Gendreau. 2. Yes. 3. Four. Two from L. P. Decourval, R. Bickerdike and Lemoine, Russell & Fortin. 4. By public advertisement, on 5th July. 5. L. P. Decourval, $105 per mile. L. P. Decourval, $140 per mile. R. Bickerdike, $174 per mile. Lemoine, Russell & Fortin, $230 per mile. 6. Lowest tender was not accepted, as Mr. Decourval represented he had made a mistake and asked to withdraw, and replace first tender by second ; as second tender was too high, an offer from F. X. Gendreau, to do the work for $125 a mile, which was represented by the Superintendent of Telegraph Service as fair value for the work, was accepted, by order in council of August 8, 1899.

PAY OF THE PERMANENT CORPS.

Mr. GILMOUR asked :

By what authority is the pay of the permanent corps only 40 cents per day, when section 59 of the Militia Act says the pay of the militia private is 50 cents?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). By order in council of June 11, 1879, passed by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir A. P. Caron being Minister of Militia and Defence, the rates of pay of permanent corps were reduced from 50 cents to 45 cents per diem ; and by regulations and orders for the Militia of Canada, approved by the Governor General in council, on December 17, 1883, Sir A. P. Caron still being Minister of Militia and Defence, the rates of pay were fixed at 40 cents per diem.

WHARF AT PERIBONKA.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Is the government aware that, during the summer of 1898, one Edouard, or Edmond, Niquette was instructed in writing by Mr. Blais, one of the engineers employed by the Department of Public Works, to get out the timber required for the construction of a wharf at Peribonka, in the Lake St. John region?
2. Is the government aware that the said Niquette made and delivered the said timber, and that the same was accepted?
3. Is the government aware that there still remains due to the said Niquette a balance of $24.25 on said timber?
4. If so, do the government know for what reason the said balance has not been paid?
5. What is the reason?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Vouchers in possession of the department show that accounts were rendered in favour of Mr. Edouard Niquette, as follows :—

810 pds. d'épinette rouge, 7 pces. rond à 3c.....	$24 30
479 pds. d'épinette rouge, 10 pces. rond à 5c.....	23 95
	$48 25

This sum was sent to the paymaster, was tendered by him to Mr. Niquette, who declined to accept, as he claimed it was not in full payment. The account is certified by the foreman and resident engineer. The latter has been wired for more definite information.

MAILS FROM MOVILLE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

1. Did the ss. 'Lake Huron,' which sailed from Moville on Sunday, December 21, 1899, carry Her Majesty's mails under contract with the government of Canada?
2. On what day, and how did she arrive at the port of Halifax, N.S.?
1. Did the ss. 'Lake Ontario,' which sailed from Moville on Sunday, December 14, 1899, carry Her Majesty's mails under contract with the government of Canada?
2. On what day, and how did she arrive at the port of Halifax, N.S.?

1. Did the ss. 'Ashante,' which sailed from Moville on Friday, December 8, 1899, carry Her Majesty's mails under contract with the government of Canada?

2. On what day, and how did she arrive at the port of Halifax, N.S.?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). With respect to these three questions, there must be some mistake by Mr. Casgrain, as there were no sailings from Moville on or near the dates given by him.

EXPENDITURE AT TADOUSAC WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What is the amount of money expended upon the wharf at Tadousac from July 1, 1896, to February 1, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). $3,668.86.

EXPENDITURE AT CHICOUTIMI WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What is the amount expended on the wharf at Chicoutimi, in the county of Chicoutimi, between July 1, 1896, and February 1, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). $13,282.50.

EXPENDITURE AT ST. ALEXIS WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What is the amount spent on the wharf at St. Alexis, county of Chicoutimi, from July, 1896, to February 1, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). $8,086.06.

EXPENDITURE AT BERGERONNES.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What is the amount of money expended at Bergeronnes, in the county of Saguenay, from July 1, 1896, to February 1, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). $401.26.

EXPENDITURE AT STE. ANNE WHARF.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Bergeron) asked :

What is the amount spent on the wharf at Ste. Anne, in the county of Chicoutimi, between July 1, 1896, and February 1, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). $10,171.60.

POSTAL CONTRACTS, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Has the Postmaster General taken any action in connection with the transaction referred to in the following extract from the supplementary report of the Post Office Department for 1896 ?

Battleford and Onion Lake, Battleford and Saskatoon, Qu'Appelle and Qu'Appelle Station, Qu'Appelle and Wishart, Saskatchewan Landing and Swift Current.

The contracts for these services were awarded without tender to Messrs. Leeson & Scott at the following rates: Battleford and Onion Lake, $1,762.20 per annum; Battleford and Saskatoon, $7,049.20 per annum; Qu'Appelle and Qu'Appelle Station, $650 per annum; Qu'Appelle and Wishart, $1,664 per annum; and Saskatchewan Landing and Swift Current, $740 per annum. The total amount paid under these contracts is $11,865.40 per annum.

In the beginning of 1893 an offer was received for the Battleford and Saskatoon service, which cost $7,049.20 per annum, at the rate of $5,000 and the inspector reported that the gentleman making the offer was competent to undertake the service; but, notwithstanding this offer, the contract was not only allowed to run on until its expiration on October 31, 1894, but was renewed for a further term of four years from that date.

The contracts were cancelled by the present government in view of the facts adduced, and of the numerous representations that the cost would be much reduced if the services were thrown open to public competition. As the contracts for some of the services have not yet been entered into, it would be premature to give the exact results of the tendering, but it may be stated that there will be a saving of over $7,500 per annum, or $30,000 for the term on these five services.

(Correspondence.)

Prince Albert, February 22, 1893.

Sir,—Referring to communications from your department addressed to me, and dated December 28, 1892, and January 20, 1893, in which the names of contractors and rate paid for mail service between Battleford and Saskatoon are given, and the statement made that the question of putting the existing service up for tender will receive consideration by the Postmaster General, I beg to submit for the Postmaster General's consideration this proposal with reference to the mail service between Battleford and Saskatoon. I will agree to deliver mails at Battleford within 30 hours after receipt of them at Saskatoon, and will deliver mails from Battleford within 30 hours after receipt there; at Saskatoon, to connect with trains on the Prince Albert branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway twice per week during the summer months, say from April 1 to November 1; and for balance of year—winter months—November 1 to April 18, will agree to deliver mails at points named within forty-eight hours after receipt, or at times and hours to be named by the Postmaster General—for the sum of $5,000 per year.

By this arrangement, the time occupied between receipt and delivery of mails at these points would be materially lessened, and an annual saving to the Post Office Department of the sum of $2,049.20 would thereby be effected.

Should this proposal meet with the favourable consideration of the Postmaster General, I am prepared to, and will, deposit any reasonable sum at the Imperial Bank, Prince Albert, as security that I will enter into a contract and fulfil the terms thereof based on the proposal I have made.

I have the honour, &c.,
C. R. STOVEL.

Sir A. P. Caron,
Postmaster General, Ottawa.

House of Commons, Ottawa, March 4, 1893.

My dear Sir Adolphe,—Stovel tells me he has put in an offer to convey the Battleford mails at a price which will effect a saving to the government of $2,000 a year.

I hope you may be able to meet his wishes or put up the work to tender.

Yours truly,

D. H. MACDOWALL.

Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron, K.C.M.G.

(Inclosure.)

Prince Albert, February 27, 1893.

Dear Sir,—I am writing to advise you that by last mail I forwarded to the hon. the Postmaster General a communication respecting the mail service between Battleford and Saskatoon, and therein submitted a proposal as follows: That I would agree to deliver mails at Battleford from Saskatoon, and at Saskatoon from Battleford, twice per week, within the space of thirty hours in summer and forty-eight hours in winter, or within hours named by the Postmaster General, for the sum of $5,000 per year. The rate paid for the same service at present is $7,049.20 per year. So that were my proposal accepted, a clear saving of the sum of $2,049.20 would be effected. The present contractors are non-residents of the district in which the service is carried on, and it would seem but just that the residents of the district should have opportunity of enjoying the benefits arising from the expenditures of public moneys in their district. In view of the fact that acceptance of the proposal I have submitted would reduce the cost of this service by over $2,000, and lessen the time now occupied in the delivery of mails at points named, and believing that with your personal knowledge of the subject you can convince the Postmaster General of the desirability of a change, I take the liberty of asking you to be kind enough to see the minister and urge his favourable consideration of my offer.

Yours respectfully,

C. R. STOVEL.

D. H. Macdowall, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Winnipeg, Man., April 15, 1893.

Sir,—I return herewith the letter from C. R. Stovel, of Prince Albert, in which he offers to perform a semi-weekly service between Battleford and Saskatoon, making the trip each way in thirty hours in summer and forty-eight hours in winter, for $5,000 per annum.

* * * * *

Regarding the standing of Mr. Stovel, the postmaster of Prince Albert, in a letter dated the 10th ulto., informed me as follows:

'Mr. Stovel is quite capable of conducting such a service, and also there appears to be no doubt as to his responsibility. I think you may safely conclude that he is well qualified in every respect.'

As stated in my report alluded to, I consider the compensation paid Messrs. Leeson & Scott liberal, but they have given a most excellent service over long routes and often under great difficulties.

There is no doubt that other parties would undertake these services at less than is now paid, and if it should be decided to terminate the existing contracts, I would recommend that tenders should be publicly invited for new contracts.

I have the honour, &c.,
W. W. McLEOD,
Post Office Inspector.

Banff, Alberta, Can., August 27, 1894.

My dear Colonel,—Mr. George Leeson, of Calgary, has been here to see me and he says that there is a possibility that the mail contracts at present held by Leeson & Scott, are likely to be thrown open for competition. I hope this is not so. These men have given such perfect satisfaction to the department for so many years and are so thoroughly reliable, I think it is against the interest of the service and all concerned that any change be made. In my opinion, matters should be allowed to continue as they are; it is my wish they should be, and I hope you will see your way clear to meet my request. I am writing you in the absence of the Postmaster General, and because you are aware of my knowledge of these men and their splendid mail service.

Yours faithfully,

T. MAYNE DALY.

Lt.-Col. White,
Deputy Postmaster General.

(Private.)

Calgary, N.W.T., September 4, 1894.

My dear Colonel,—I write you in the interest of Messrs. Leeson & Scott, who are mail contractors in the North-west, and have had such contracts for some years.

Being a resident of the North-west for a length of time, I have a personal knowledge of the manner in which these gentlemen have performed their contracts, and must say that none of the contractors having contracts with the government in the Dominion have performed their duties with greater satisfaction to the public than these gentlemen. They are thoroughly reliable in every respect and have, as usual, made their preparations for the continuance of their contracts with the government for the coming winter by putting up hay for their teams, as well as purchasing other provender. They have also recently expended $1,000 in new conveyances, relying upon their contracts being continued as usual.

I would just say that the senior partner, Mr. Leeson, has been one of the strongest supporters of the government in Alberta, and I am quite positive the government will not be benefited by a discontinuance of their contracts with Messrs. Leeson & Scott.

Personally, I should like very much to have their contracts continued, and hope you will see your way clear in the interest of the public to continue the service which has given so much satisfaction in the past.

Ever faithfully,

D. W. DAVIS, M.P.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The contracts for the several services mentioned which were all in the hands of one contracting firm, Messrs. Leeson & Scott, were put up to tender without change in the condition of services and by letting the contracts to the lowest tenderer, the following results were obtained:—

Name of Service.	Price per annum under former contract.	Price per annum, result of ten- ders.
Battleford and Onion Lake..	$ 1,762 20	$ 370 00
Battleford and Saskatoon ...	7,049 20	1,976 00
Qu'Appelle and Qu'Appelle Station	650 00	440 00
Qu'Appelle and Wishart	1,664 00	460 00
Saskatchewan Landing and Swift Current	740 00	260 00
	$11,865 40	$3,506 00

A saving of $8,359.40 for each of the four years of the term. A total saving of $33,437.60. The new contracts went into operation on the 1st of July, 1897.

POSTAL CONTRACTS—HOCKLEY AND MONO CENTRE, N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIS. There is some mistake in this question, which is numbered 41 on the Orders of the Day. One of the letters in connection with the matter to which the question relates—a letter written by Mr. J. S. Lee—has not been published. I gave it in with the rest, and I find the others on the Order paper entered properly, but for some unaccountable reason this letter—which was the most important of the lot—was left out.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Better let the question stand and have it properly entered on the Order paper.

Question allowed to stand.

MAIL CONTRACTS—KAMOURASKA AND ST. PASCAL.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Whether the mail-carrier carrying the mail between Kamouraska, St. Pascal and the St. Pascal Station, was bound, during the past summer, under the terms of his contract, to exchange mails at St. Pascal, with the mail clerk on the express going west at 20.30?

2. Whether the said mail-carrier was bound, under his contract, to exchange mails at St. Pascal, with the mail clerk on the maritime express going west at 9.24, from September 5 to October 1 last?

3. Whether the said mail-carrier was bound, under his contract, during the period between June 1 and October 31 last, to exchange mails with the mail-clerk on the maritime express, going east at 3.26?

4. If so, was the said mail-carrier granted exemption from performing the said services, and why?

5. Is it the intention of the government to provide a remedy in the premises?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg to reply : 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. 4. No exemption from performing the said service was granted by the Postmaster General. If such exemption has been granted it is without the knowledge of the department. 5. Answered by No. 4.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Is the government aware that the French translation of the report of the Auditor General for the year ending June 30, 1899, has not yet been printed and distributed?

2. When will the said translation be published and distributed?

3. What is the cause of the delay in the printing and distribution of the said translation?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Yes. 2. As soon after the translation is completed as the changes can be made in the standing type. The type is kept standing as set for the English edition. 3. The prime cause is that the translation is not completed. So far as it has been supplied it is in type.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. CASGRAIN (by Mr. Taylor) asked :

1. Whether the government have taken cognizance of the proclamation published in the 'Official Gazette' of Quebec, of February 24 last, promulgating the Act 62 Vic., cap. 29, intitled: 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the constitution of the Superior Court,' the purpose whereof is to raise the number of the judges of the said court from thirty-one to thirty-four?

2. Is it the intention of the government to give effect to the said Act by taking a vote for the salaries of the three additional judges?

3. Have the government taken cognizance of the statistics of the Superior Court published in the Quebec 'Official Gazette' of February 24 last, page 544?

4. Is the government aware that, as shown by the said statistics, fourteen of the judges of the Superior Court rendered, during the year 1899, less than thirty-five judgments each, in contested cases, in their several districts, and that six of them rendered, during the said period, less than twenty-one judgments?

5. Is the government aware that according to the said statistics, excepting as to the districts of Quebec and Montreal, there were rendered, in the twenty rural districts, during the said year, only an average of twenty-nine judgments per district, in cases contested in the said Superior Court?

6. Is the government aware that of the thirty-one judges of the said Superior Court, at least eighteen have not, in their several districts, two months' work during the year?

7. Has the government had, since last session, any conference, communication or correspondence with the Executive Council of the province of Quebec, or with the Attorney General, or any of the members of the said Executive Council, in relation to the reorganization of the courts of the said province?

8. Rather than increase the number of judges of the said Superior Court, is it not the intention of the government to communicate or correspond or otherwise come to an understanding with the Executive Council of the said province as to a reorganization of the said courts?

9. Is it not true that, under the circumstances, an increase of the number of judges of the said court would be a useless expenditure, in no way justified by the requirements of the service, and which would have no practical result but the rewarding of certain supporters of the present government?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). To the first eight questions, the answer is: That the government have taken cognizance of the proclamation published in the Official Gazette of Quebec on the 24th of February last, promulgating the Act 62 Viet., chapter 29, the object of which is to raise the number of the judges of the Superior Court by providing for the appointment of three new judges to reside and to act in the district of Montreal; the government consider that they have no option in this matter, but that they are bound to give effect to that Act, unless they were satisfied that the provincial legislature has acted improvidently. Before taking action, the government have had several communications with the provincial government, represented by the Attorney General for the province. The latter has strongly remonstrated that unequal distribution of judicial work cannot be avoided, owing to the unequal distribution of population over the vast extent of territory of the province; that to concentrate all judges in the cities and to leave the rural districts without any residential representative of the judicial authority would be a still greater evil; that all these different aspects of the question were carefully considered by the local legislature, which passed the above Act, without any recorded dissenting voice. To the ninth question: It is not true that under the above circumstances an increase of the number of the judges of the Superior Court would be a useless expenditure, and it is an unjustified and gratuitous insinuation that the appointment of such judges would have no practical result but to reward the supporters of the government. If such, indeed, were the opinion of the hon. member and his friends, it would have been their duty, at least, to have that opinion affirmed by the legislature of Quebec, which alone, according to the dispositions of the British North America Act, has the control and the responsibility of the judicial organization of the province.

TRI-WEEKLY MAIL SERVICE AT IRIS.

Mr. MARTIN asked:

1. Has the Postmaster General received a petition from the inhabitants of Iris, in the province of Prince Edward Island, praying for a tri-weekly mail service?

2. If so, is it the intention of the government to give petitioners the mail service asked for?

Mr. CASGRAIN.

3. Has the Postmaster General made an estimate of the cost such an additional service would entail?

4. If so, what is the sum per trip?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). An application from a number of the patrons of Iris post office for a tri-weekly service was received at the department on the 5th February ultimo, and referred to the inspector at Charlottetown for report. His report has not yet been received.

GOVERNMENT EXPROPRIATION OF TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. CASEY (by Mr. McMillan) asked:

Whether it is the intention of the government to take steps for the expropriation of the telegraph lines of Canada, with a view of taking charge of and managing the telegraph system in connection with the post office service or otherwise?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The question is of such a broad character that the hon. gentleman cannot expect an answer to-day.

THE EASTERN EXTENSION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. CASEY (by Mr. McMillan) asked:

Whether, in view of the threatened concession by certain Australian governments to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, it is the intention of the government to take any, and if so, what steps looking to the modification of the terms of the Pacific Cable Act of 1899?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). As I mentioned in speaking on this subject a few days ago, we are not yet aware of any concessions having been actually made, and it is hoped that none will be made that will involve any change in the compact made between the respective governments. At all events, until such change is made it would be premature to indicate what course might be necessary to take. That will entirely depend upon the nature of the concessions.

Mr. CASEY (by Mr. McMillan) asked:

Has any concession been granted by any Australian colony to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company? If so, what is the nature of such concession? Has the Canadian government consented to any such concession? Has the Imperial government consented to any such concession?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In view of what I stated a moment ago and the other day, it is scarcely necessary for me to answer this question. But I observe that one portion of it is: 'Has the Canadian government consented to any such concessions?' I need hardly say that the Canadian government has consented to no concession; and this government has reason to believe that the Imperial government has not consented to any such concession; and further that the Imperial government has substantially adopted the same attitude as the Canadian government in regard to these matters.

EXPENSES, &c., OF PROHIBITION COMMISSION.

Mr. FLINT (by Mr. Bethune) asked :

What was the date of the appointment by the late government of the commission to inquire into the subject of prohibition? Who were the commissioners? How much was paid for salary to each commissioner? How much was paid for travelling and other expenses to each commissioner? What was the total amount paid for salary, travelling and other expenses of the commissioners? How much was paid for printing? What was the total cost to the country for salaries and allowances to commissioners, printing and all other expenses?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The date of the appointment of the commission to inquire into the subject of prohibition was 14th March, 1892. The commissioners were Sir Joseph Hickson, Judge McDonald, Messrs. E. F. Clarke and G. A. Gigault, and Rev. Joseph McLeod. The amount paid for salary to each commissioner was :

To Sir Joseph Hickson.....	$1,920
To Judge McDonald	2,200
To Mr. Clarke	1,420
To Mr. Gigault	1,460
To Rev. Mr. McLeod	6,775

The amount paid for travelling and other expenses to each commissioner was :

To Sir Joseph Hickson	$ 302 81
To Judge McDonald	1,618 25
To Mr. Clarke	1,038 67
To Mr. Gigault	914 11
To Rev. Mr. McLeod	3,197 52

The total amount paid for salary, travelling and other expenses of the commissioners was $20,846.36. The amount paid for printing was $33,038.19. The total cost for salaries and allowances to commissioners, printing and all other expenses, was $87,003.10.

ADDITIONS TO RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked :

What additions have been made to the railway mail service of Canada since the 1st day of July, 1896?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mu- lock). Since the 1st July, 1896, 1,553 miles of additional railway track have been used by the department for mail service, and the yearly mileage increased by 1,820,181 miles. Frequency of mail service increased on the following railways since 1st July, 1896 :

ARMY POSTAL CORPS.

Mr. McMULLEN (by Mr. Britton) asked :

(a) Are any officers of the Post Office Department at present serving in the Imperial Army Corps in South Africa? (b) If so, what are their names and their positions in the Canadian postal service? (c) When were they appointed and at whose instance? (d) Are they at present on duty in South Africa? (e) If so, in what capacity?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). (a) Yes. (b) W. R. Ecclestone, 3rd class clerk in the Hamilton post office; J. Lallier, 3rd class railway mail clerk in the Montreal district; T. B. Bedell, 3rd class railway mail clerk in the New Brunswick district; K. A. Murray, 3rd class railway mail clerk in the London district; R. Johnston, 3rd class railway mail clerk in the Manitoba district. (c) The dates of appointment are as follows: W. R. Ecclestone, 10th May, 1875; J. Lallier, 22nd June, 1898; T. B. Bedell, 28th April, 1894; K. A. Murray, 28th November, 1898; R. Johnston, 2nd March, 1895. They were appointed at the instance of the Postmaster General. (d) and (e) Yes, as members of the Army Postal Corps.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER—HIGH COMMISSIONER IN LONDON.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Davis) asked :

1. When was Sir Charles Tupper appointed High Commissioner for Canada in London?
2. At what salary was he appointed?
3. How long did he fill the position?
4. What sums were paid him each year as such High Commissioner?
5. What sums were paid by way of allowances for travelling and other personal expenses?
6. Did the government supply him with house rent free? If so, what was the cost of such house?
7. Who paid the taxes and rates for the house?
8. If the government paid any of the taxes and rates for the house or for Sir Charles Tupper, how much was so paid by the government?
9. Was any deduction made from the salary of the said Sir Charles Tupper when, in 1887 and 1891, he absented himself from his duties as High Commissioner and came to Canada and took part in such campaign?
10. If he drew pay from the government as High Commissioner in London whilst he was in part in Canada on party political campaign work, is it the intention of the government to take steps to recover the amount, if the same could be recovered?
11. What was the total sum paid by the government to Sir Charles Tupper for his salary allowances of all kinds as High Commissioner at London?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to this question, not that I am unwilling to have any portion of it answered, but because the question is in violation of the rules of the House. Section 9 of the question reads,

Mr. MULOCK.

'When, in 1887 and 1891, he absented himself from his duties as High Commissioner and came to Canada and took part in such campaign.' In this there is a statement of fact, and, under the rules of the House, statements of facts are not allowed in questions. I do not say that it is an accurate statement of fact, but it is a pretended statement of fact, and is in violation of the rule. Again, in section 10, it says, 'While he was in part in Canada'—whatever that may mean—'on party political campaign work, is it the intention of the government to take any steps to recover the amount, if the same could be recovered?' I think my right hon. friend will agree with me that both of these are in violation of the rules, and that a question cannot be put in the way in which this one stands on the paper.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The rule of the House is that a question shall not include any controversial matter. Whether this matter is controversial or not, I am willing to leave to Mr. Speaker.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the rules exclude statements of fact.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have forgotten the exact wording, but I believe it is intended to exclude any controversial matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it is not a question of controversy. The rules of the House, as I understand, prohibit any statement of fact in a question.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am willing to leave it to Mr. Speaker, and the question may stand.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have it from the Speaker now.

The PRIME MINISTER. If Mr. Speaker is ready, I am quite willing.

Mr. SPEAKER. Without having had an opportunity to consider the matter, I may say that it seems to me that it would not impair the efficiency of the question to strike out the last part of the 9th paragraph, 'and came to Canada and took part in such campaign.' I do not see that it is essential to the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If you observe, Mr. Speaker, it says, 'he absented himself from his duty as High Commissioner.' That is certainly a statement of fact, and a statement of fact is not permitted in a question under the rules. It is not a question whether the statement is true or not, but whether a statement of facts is admissible at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would like to have Mr. Speaker take the matter into consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER. Leave the matter over and I will look into it.

SEED GRAIN INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia) moved :

That the seed grain indebtedness in the North-west and Manitoba should be dealt with in a comprehensive manner, and so as to do justice, give relief and meet necessities, should necessities be found to exist,

He said : We have had the question of dealing with the seed grain indebtedness in Manitoba and the North-west Territories frequently before parliament. We had an Act passed last session, and it is because that Act is unsatisfactory that I bring the matter for a second time this session before parliament. And now I should like and try to interest the House at large, not only the members of the government and not only the representative of the Minister of the Interior in this question, because I wish to bring to bear upon the government the opinion of the House. I wish to convince the House that there is an injustice to be redressed, and, convincing them of that, I shall thereby bring pressure upon the government. Although the member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has been mentioned as the representative of the Minister of the Interior, the Prime Minister is apparently taking charge of that department before the House, and I venture to say that if the Prime Minister will give this question his attention, his sense of fairness will convince him that it is necessary to deal with the matter.

The facts simply stated are these : In certain years after a succession of difficulties had attended the career of the North-west farmer, it was found necessary to lend to him and to his Manitoba brother grain for seeding purposes, and this grain the government of the day loaned him under certain conditions. The borrower was made the primary debtor, and he had to go security for two other borrowers, so that everybody who borrowed seed grain went security for two others. In that way, you have a large number of farmers in the North-west and Manitoba who owe for seed grain, and each of whom is responsible for the borrowings of seed grain of two other persons. These primary debtors may be divided into three classes. There is first the man who has got his patent ; then there is the man who has not his patent but is living on his homestead and working it ; and then there is the man who has abandoned his homestead and gone away, whether we know not. Now, in regard to these bondsmen of the first class, that is the men who have got their patents, they are relieved by the Act of last session, so that you have only to deal with the two classes of homesteads that the bondsmen are liable for—there is the homestead on which the settler lives and which he works and for which, no doubt, at some future time, he intends to get his patent ; and there is the homestead that has been abandoned. Now, let me direct the attention of the Prime Minister first to the case of the homesteads that have been abandoned. He will find that the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories in 1898—I think it was in 1898—petitioned the government to entirely write off as a bad debt the lien against the abandoned homestead. The assembly argued that it was inimical to the interests of the country, that it was bad for immigration, bad for progress, and unjust, that you should have the even numbered section with from ten to sixty dollars against it. So that a man who wants to settle there, is told, when he comes to the land office : Yes, you can get an entry, but there is $60, or $40, or $15, or $10 for seed grain against this land, and you not only have to pay the $10 entrance fee, but you will have to clear this off or be sued. Here comes the inconsistency in regard to the policy that was adopted by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), last year. He has relieved the bondsmen for the homestead which is patented, but in regard to those abandoned homesteads, the seed-grain lien is filed against the land, and has to be met by the incoming settler, while the hon. minister holds the bondsmen for it at the same time. I say, that, speaking as a general thing, the land is worth the money. If he is going to hold the land for the money, he should get rid of the bondsmen altogether. From a general point of view, I hold with the North-west assembly, that the land should not be bound, but, of course, the the right hon. Prime Minister would say to me : That would look as if you wanted us to write off the debt altogether, as if you wanted to make the government regard this as a merchant regards a bad debt, and write it off. In order to avoid that construction and to meet the argument of those who would press that and to meet the view that you do not want to pauperise anybody, I suggested, in 1898, and again last year, that the whole thing be handed to the North-west government. It only amounts to a little over $100,000, and I would suggest that it be handed over to the North-west government, with the direction to collect the debt, from the primary debtor, either in cash or in kind.

Mr. CLARKE. How long has this debt been incurred ?

Mr. DAVIN. The first debt was incurred a considerable time ago.

Mr. WALLACE. What would be the object of doing that ?

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace), asks what would be the object of doing that ? The object of doing it would be that, to begin with, it would place in the hands of the local government the collection of that, the lending of which was deemed, as I know, by the late Sir John Thompson, and the government of that day, to have properly rested, if they had had the means, in the hands of the local government. Therefore, to begin, it is a local government matter.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. For whose benefit is the hon. gentleman proposing that they should collect it?

Mr. DAVIN. I propose that they should collect it for the benefit of the local government. It would really be a present, if you look at it in that way, to the local government.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What advantage would that be to the farmers?

Mr. DAVIN. The advantage which it would be to the farmers, if the local government had to collect it, would be that in the case of any farmer, and there yet may be some, in the North-west Territories, notwithstanding that we have had a succession of years of prosperity, who, owing to various causes, cannot afford to make even this small payment, and the local government could do what this government could not do—and here is where the advantage to the farmers would come in—it could say to any farmer, who could not conveniently pay cash: We will take it out in statute labour, and the farmer can give statute labour instead of cash. I hope that explanation will be satisfactory to the hon. Postmaster General. I am glad to see that the hon. Postmaster General, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as well as the right hon. Prime Minister, are giving their attention to this subject, because I am convinced that, if they will give a half hour's serious consideration to the Bill of last session, which concedes the principle of relieving those men, who are bondsmen for homesteads that have been patented, they will acknowledge the justice of my argument. The Bill of last session has relieved those men who are bondsmen for homesteads that have been patented, and it leaves the bondsmen who are bondsmen for homesteads, the patent for which has not been taken out, to bear this responsibility, and a man can remain indefinitely without taking out his patent and leave these people with this claim against them. Then, there is this further position: Let us suppose a case. Now, I hope the hon. Postmaster General will give me his undivided attention, because I do not think his brain will get very much light or instruction from the source it is turning to now.

Mr. DAVIS. It will not get much from yours.

Mr. DAVIN. I will tell the hon. Postmaster General, that he had better trust to his own lights. If he trusts to his own lights I think he will do better.

Mr. DAVIS. He should trust to his own lights, because he will not get any light from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin).

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to that boor from Saskatchewan, and I would ask you to keep him in order, or, if not, I will take the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis), in hand, and bring my whip down on his back, and make him rear so that he will not know where he is. Six o'clock.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. DAVIN. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Sir.—

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a point of order. Before you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who had the floor made use of some unparliamentary language in reference to myself, which I think he should be called on to withdraw.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not think the point of order can be raised at this time, but nevertheless, I will, out of the boundless generosity of my heart, say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) is not boor. I said he was a boor; I say now he is not a boor.

Mr. DAVIS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) must withdraw the expression.

Mr. DAVIN. I have.

Mr. DAVIS. He has not withdrawn the expression. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know how I can—

Mr. SPEAKER. The simplest way is to withdraw the expression on its merits.

Mr. DAVIN. Why of course I do, but I thought I did. Did I not tell you, Sir, that I am after dinner and in the most boundless condition of philanthropy—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is pretty plain we cannot preserve the decorum of the House except by observing the ordinary rules.

Mr. DAVIN. I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and I need hardly tell you that I am the very last man in the world to contravene the authority of the Chair. I always try to observe the rules of the House, and I may say on this general question, that order cannot be preserved in any House, if, as you know, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen will, without the permission of the member who has the floor, interrupt him. And, when a gentleman persists in doing it, and doing it offensively—I am now speaking generally—the only possible way is to do what you do in a public meeting: come down on the interrupter. You know, Mr. Speaker, how very ineffective it is to apply to you and to say: Won't you protect me? However, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the farmers of the North-west Territories. Since I left here to-day at six o'clock, something like this has been said to me: Why do you bother yourself about this seed grain business and the North-west farmers; you told us they were prosperous. why then ask the government to relieve them of a just debt? There is no class of men in the empire more to be envied than the North-west farmers; they have good crops, they have a grateful land, they have good houses, and good barns, and why then ask parliament to relieve them of this seed grain debt. That is the language addressed to me since I left this House at six o'clock by a Liberal for whom I have very great respect, and I am not sure that there may not be some of my Conservative friends who hold similar views.

Now, Sir, my answer is this. First; what I ask is just. If the demand is just it should be complied with whether those for whom the demand is made are prosperous or not. But Sir, in the second place, although these men are prosperous now, they were not always so. They had to face hard years, and some of them have only just got clear of their liabilities and $10 or $20 or $30 or $40 is as sweet to them as to other people. Then look how vexatious it is. I have here a letter from Stony Beach which I will read, and I will ask the attention of the ministerial benches to it:

Stony Beach, Sept. 19, 1900.

N. F. Davin, M.P.

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly see why people cannot get their patent for their land? We understood that there was an Act passed some time ago relieving bondsmen, but it appears that Mr. Sifton has not attended to his business. Several others have applied for their patents, and are told they cannot get them because they owe seed grain indebtedness. I did not get any seed grain, but I am bondsman for another, and cannot receive a patent. Trusting you will get this matter settled at once,

I remain, yours truly,

PETER FLETCHER.

Here is a man who never had any seed grain at all himself, and although the Act was passed, and it has been trumpeted through the North-west as giving relief to the bondsmen, this man applies and vexatiously he is told that he cannot get his patent.

Mr. CLANCY. Although he was only a bondsman.

Mr. DAVIN. He cannot get it. But, Mr. Speaker, I have another view and a larger view. I hold that the surest way to make a nation prosperous is to make the farmers prosperous. The farmers on the frontiers of the world, even more than the farmers in the heart of England, or in the heart of France, or in the heart of Germany, the farmers on the frontiers of the world are the greatest benefactors humanity has. Talk of the millionaire philanthropist who, having been too sharp for his competitor, gives largely to great institutions from his superfluous winnings. A frontier farmer leaves him far behind, for without him the majority of mankind would starve. Try to fancy. Mr. Speaker, what would take place if the farmers on the frontier struck for one year, and determined to raise food only for themselves. At the end of that year our cities, palaces, universities, theatres, newspapers, parliaments and stores would be vacant and silent, and the world would become a vast graveyard. There are to-day 517,000,000 bread-eaters in the world. There is an increase, it is calculated by statisticians, of 5,000,000 every year, mainly from birth, partly because rice and rye-eaters are becoming wheat-eaters. The average annual consumption of each person is $4\frac{1}{2}$ bushels. The bread-eating world therefore requires a little more than 2,300,000,000 bushels a year. When the wheat fields produce this, we have prosperity; less than this, suffering and starvation. In 1897, the world's total product of wheat was 2,226,745,000 bushels, less by 73,255,000 bushels than the world needed. The countries where the crop was light suffered, and in India you had a famine. Everywhere were high prices. In 1898 the world had an enormous crop—2,879,942,000 bushels, more than would have been sufficient by 653,924,000 bushels. There was plenty of food and great prosperity. Great Britain, with her 39,000,000 people, eats her entire crop in thirteen weeks. For nine months she looks to Central Russia, India, Argentina, Canada and the republic below the line. She looks to the frontier farmers in all these places. If Great Britain could be completely blockaded for three months, her population would be extinguished by starvation. The same is true of all western Europe. There are five countries in Europe which produce more wheat than they can use: Russia, Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria and Roumania. In 1898 the farmers of the United States and Canada grew over 808,000,000 bushels of grain, one-fourth of the world's production; those of Europe, 1,548,881,000 bushels, or more than half; Asia, 421,000,000 bushels; South Africa, 72,000,000 bushels, Africa, 44,000,000 bushels; Australia, 35,000,000 bushels. Last year the farmers of the United States and Canada produced 648,500,000 bushels. We had to take the flour for 80,000,000 people out of this, $4\frac{1}{2}$ bushels to each, which gives 373,000,000 bushels; seed for 50,000,000 acres, 75,000,000 bushels; a total requirement for this continent of 448,000,000 bushels, leaving 200,500,000 bushels for export, either crude or in flour; about one-third going abroad in flour. Last year the United Kingdom imported about 108,000,000 bushels of wheat and about 200,000,000 bushels of flour, of which we supplied only about one-fifth. We could supply the whole quantity in the North-west; and I want to have it known that no more independent or prosperous life could be selected by a sensible man than that which the North-west farmer leads; and, considering him in all his importance, I say he must get justice. Instead of getting the little end, he must get the big end. He must be treated with fairness; on his life the life of the world depends; on him depends its prosperity. Why should not he, the first to handle the wheat, the man who brings it into existence, get as much out of it as those who handle it subsequently? As a fact, we know that there is not a single employment into which a man enters out of which he does not get more percentage for the capital he puts in than the farmer does. Now, I want to do everything that can possibly be done for the North-west farmer; and I want in the smallest particular to press his just claims upon the attention of the government. Look at what takes place when a railway has a claim. A railway has a contract with the government, and there is some difference as to the character of the rock or the soil or the sand. The matter goes to arbitration, and in nearly every case the railway gets the better of the government. But the farmer is regarded too often as a person whose claims can be ignored. Now, Sir, I want just to give you an idea of how this farmer has developed Manitoba and the North-west. If you go back some thirteen years, how much did Manitoba and the North-west produce for export? Only about 4,000,000 bushels. In 1887 we produced 10,000,000 bushels. Then came hard years, in 1888 and 1889, when the amount we had for export fell to about 4,000,000 each year. In 1890, we exported 10,000,000 bushels, and ever since then we have made steady progress until last year we exported some 30,000,000 bushels. That means that the country has been developed, that the customers of our manufacturers in the east have grown prosperous there, and that the country is on the high road to be what I have always contended it was meant to be, the backbone of Canada, its stay and support. Therefore I say that the fact that there are farmers who are prosperous in the North-west Territories is no reason why, as this Liberal contended, we should ignore their claims. The fact that in the face of great difficulties and the new problems presented by soil and climate, they have secured prosperity, is a reason why, if in the smallest particular they have a just claim, that just claim should be listened to. Now, what has happened? Last year the Minister of the Interior, in consequence of urgent pressure placed on him by myself, said, as you will find by going to Hansard, that he was going to deal with this question. In the early part of Hansard you will find that he would not give me a promise that he would deal with it; but towards the end, in the third volume, you will find that he said he was going to deal with it; and when he introduced his Bill, he said that it dealt with the bondsmen alone. Let me read the clause which makes the body of that Bill, and I would ask the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), who is a lawyer, to this:

The Governor General in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories, in every case where, upon inquiry, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that land owned by or entered as a homestead by the primary debtor, is liable and is, in the opinion of the said minister, sufficient security for the sum owed by the primary debtor.

Are not 160 acres of land in any part of the North-west Territories good for some $15 or $20 or $30 due for seed grain? If so, why be guilty of the vexatious legislation which declares to one class of bondsmen: We acknowledged that you should be relieved; and to another set of bondsmen: We will not relieve you, not because there is really any difference between the original contract you entered into and that entered in the former case, but because the men that you are security for have never taken out their patents. If there was good reason why the sureties in the one case should be relieved, the same reason holds good with regard to the other sureties. I cannot see any difference between the two. Now, what I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman would be a compromise. Keep your claim against the primary debtor, keep your claim against the homestead if you like, but carry out the principle of your legislation of last year. Make a slight change, and let it read this way:

The Governor General in Council may discharge from liability persons liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure the payment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories.

That would be enough; let it rest that way. Both the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Marine will see that there is no difference whatever between the two sets of bondsmen. They both give their bonds, but one man gets his patent, and the other refuses to get it. The bondsman of the man who gets his patent is relieved by this legislation, but the bondsman for the man who does not is not relieved. The law is quite inconsistent in its application, and the right hon. gentleman will see, from the letter of Mr. Fletcher, which I have read, coming from Stony Creek, how vexatious it seems to the writer of that letter, and I can say that there are dozens of such men. I will not lower the debate by making a political argument, but if I were thinking of politics I should pray for nothing so much as that the right hon. gentleman should refuse the plea that I am making, because that would make votes for the opposition. So that, if I were thinking of politics, I would simply make a prefatory appeal and let the thing go. I would not press it at all, and would throw up my hat when I saw the right hon. gentleman reject my plea for justice to those bondsmen who are still vexed by this unrighteous exception. Remember now that until the interpretation was put on the Act of last session by the Department of the Interior, the opinion prevailed that the bondsmen were relieved by that Act, as you will see by the way the letter reads :

Will you kindly see why people cannot get their patent for their land. We understood that there was an Act passed some time ago relieving bondsmen, but it appears that Mr. Sifton has not attended to his business.

I could not do a bigger stroke of work for the present government than to strongly impress on them the need of acting in the premises. With regard to the suggestion that I made that the debt of the primary debtor should be handed over to the North-west government, I will just call the attention of the hon. Postmaster General, who seems interested in that question, to what a former Minister of the Interior said in 1895, when the item was up in the estimates. He said :

Although the government were opposed to the granting of seed, the case was put in such strong light that they came to the conclusion that although they did not desire to follow the precedents created of giving seed grain to the people, under the circumstances they were fully justified.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I had to press the matter in the strongest way on the government of the day to get them to give the seed grain, and many a telegram I had to send them, for they were most unwilling to give it. But let me go on with my quotation :

So far as I am personally concerned, I may say that I am opposed to the government being called upon to make grants similar to these, because I think the people in the Territories should deal with these matters the same as they do in Manitoba—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Whose words are those ?

Mr. DAVIN. The words of a former Minister of the Interior, in 1895.

—because I think the people in the Territories should deal with these matters the same as they do in Manitoba, and if aid is given to them that it should be given by the local assembly, or by the municipalities.

I know that that was strongly the view of the late Sir John Thompson in regard to a cognate question. He then tells how they gave the seed grain, and what guarantees were required. Besides making that declaration he had to give a bond and two sureties. This is the declaration the primary debtor had to make :

It was only given to those who made the declaration, in the first place, 'that the applicant had so many acres under cultivation, that he had lost his crop in consequence of drought, prairie fires or other natural cause, or cause beyond his control, and did not possess the grain requisite to sow—number of acres, and that he required for that purpose—bushels of wheat, which he agreed should be sown during the present season on the quarter-section specified.'

I wish to call attention, because I would like to have the whole case before the government, to the resolution that was passed by the North-west council. The North-west council passed the following resolution, on the 20th April, 1899 :—

That whereas certain abandoned lands in the Territories are encumbered by liens executed by persons formerly holding such lands as homesteads in favour of the government of Canada, to secure the payment of the cost of seed grain supplied to such persons: and whereas, without amendment to the Dominion Lands Act, such liens must be paid by the parties subsequently making homestead entries for such lands.

Then there are considerations given which it is not necessary to read. I will just read the conclusion :

Therefore, be it resolved, that in the opinion of this House, the Dominion Lands Act should be so amended as to provide for the cancellation of all lands encumbering lands, and homestead entries for which lands have been or may hereafter be cancelled.

I remember that in the debate that took place in the local assembly, it was strongly insisted upon that these liens were a bar to immigration into the Territories. Now, I do not think it necessary for me to read what the Minister of the Interior said when introducing this Bill. It will be remembered that he said he was introducing a Bill to deal with the question of seed grain. I asked if it dealt only with the bondsmen. He answered it deals only with the bondsmen. He did not say that it dealt only with a special class of bondsmen ; and the impression was left on the House, and got out through the country, that all bondsmen were dealt with. Now, let me put this argument to the government : It will be seen by that resolution passed by the House, that the lien is against the homestead, it is against the 160 acres ; and if a man is coming in, and wants to enter on a homestead against which there is a lien for seed grain, he is asked, not merely for $10. but for the amount for the seed grain besides. Well, then, if you keep this interpretation which has been put on the Act by the department, and if you keep the wording of your Act such as to bear that interpretation, where is the sense of saying: We will relieve the bondsmen? You relieve those homesteads, the homesteaders on which have taken out their patent, but you do not relieve the homesteads, the homesteaders on which work, grow crops, but have not taken out their patents. You have your claim against your homesteader, you can take him into court, and recover, and you have the claim against his land. Having relieved the bondsman in one case, why not in the other? I do not see any sense in it, I confess. I hope the government will deal with this question, as the resolution suggests, in a comprehensive manner. I hope they will deal with the class of bondsmen that are at present suffering under a sense of grievance. Take this man Fletcher—he is a homesteader, and never borrowed any seed grain. He was one of the men, who in that day, went hand in hand with the government to secure seed grain for people to continue the great experiment which has resulted so magnificently for the North-west and for Canada. Does he deserve to be tormented in this way, when he wants to get his patent? On the contrary, the fact that he joined hand in hand with the government and kept the men there to continue the great experiment, gives him a claim for consideration, instead of being subjected to vexation, as he claims to have been. I hope that in any case, the government will deal with the bondsmen, and, I confess, I do not see why they should not deal with the primary debtor. I, therefore, move the resolution, seconded by Mr. Clancy.

Mr. THOMAS O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), who has just taken his seat, has gone into this question at some length. I do not propose to follow him to Russia, the United States, Asia, Australia, or the other places into which he made excursions during his address, but shall deal with the question at once. What he wants, as I understand, is that the abandoned homesteads should be released from any liability against them, so that a person wanting a homestead could take it up, free from this liability. Then, as I understand it, he wants the bondsmen for parties who have not taken out their patents to be relieved.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis), will allow me, I want the bondsmen who have given bonds for the homesteaders, who have not yet taken out their patents, to be relieved.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me, following out the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Davin's), con-

tion, that if the government would relieve the bondsmen of parties who have not yet taken out their patents, these parties might abandon their homesteads, and if the government is to free abandoned homesteads of liabilities, it would not be able to collect at all. This seed grain was given four or five years ago. Now, as every person knows, a party taking up a homestead in the North-west has only to live on the homestead six months a year for three years, to enable him to take out a patent. Therefore, any one who was a homesteader at the time the seed grain was given out five years ago, and received seed grain, is entitled to a patent at the present time. As I understand the administration of the Act passed last year, the minister is prepared, when any party who has gone security for another, for a certain amount of seed grain, calls his attention, by letter or otherwise, to the fact that the party for whom the bondsmen went security, has not taken out his patent, the minister will see to it, that the patent is taken out; and the moment the patent is taken out the lien can be placed on the land of the primary debtor, and the bondsmen released. So, I think there is no trouble about the working of the Act. As to the abandoned homesteads, we do not require any legislation to relieve this class of homesteads, because this can be done by departmental regulation—the minister can relieve them at any time. For the matter of that, when a party has entered a homestead and abandoned it, all his interests and the title to the soil reverts to the Crown. I do not see how the government can hold a lien against their own property. It seems to me that the moment it reverts to the government, it is relieved from all liability. Now, with regard to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), said about the North-west government taking over all these liabilities against the western farmers, I do not see what reason the North-west government would have for taking over these liens. They would not take them over as part of their subsidy; and if the government propose to hand over all these liens to the North-west government for collection, or, in other words, if they propose to make a present to the North-west government of all this money outstanding in the North-west Territories—I do not see why it would not be as well for the government to make it a present to the farmers, and clean the whole thing up.

I claim that there has been an injustice done to the parties who have gone security for their fellow-farmers in the North-west Territories. I think it was an absurd idea for the late government to adopt the system they did in regard to this matter; and I am sorry my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), who was a member of the House at that time, and a supporter of the government of the day, did not see to it, that the government, when giving seed grain to the farmers of the North-west, should adopt a better system than that of taking security from three homesteads, for six or seven dollars, as was done in many cases. Therefore, I do not see how many hon. gentlemen can blame this government for taking this question up and trying to solve it as they have done. But in the meantime I say it was unfair to the parties who went security for their neighbours in the North-west Territories for this reason: If any man went security or endorsed a note, he would expect that note would be collected when it became due, and that after three or four months he would be relieved of his liability. But in this case the government has done nothing to collect this money from the primary debtor, although as a matter of fact many a man went security for his neighbour when his neighbour was in a position to pay that money back, and was in good circumstances. But to-day, by a turn in the wheel of fortune, he may have lost his money and therefore the party who has gone security in the first place has to pay this liability, which he would not have had to do if the government had collected the debt. Now four or five years have elapsed since this grain was given out, and I think something should be done to relieve all the bondholders in the North-west Territories. I think it might be done in this way: I think that all the patents should be issued to parties who have lived sufficiently long on their land to earn the patents. My hon. friend read a letter from some party at Stony Beach who complained that he was not able to get his patent. Now, as a matter of fact, any person in the North-west Territories who has earned his patent can get it at the present time. The patent is issued by the Department of the Interior subject to the seed grain lien; but any person who applies for his patent will get it and the lien is registered on the patent. Therefore, there can be no cause of complaint from any person on that ground. But in the meantime I think something should be done to issue all the patents to parties who are entitled to them. I do not see why people should not take out patents when they are entitled to them; I do not see why the government should not issue patents after they have been earned: if that were done the minister then would be in a position to relieve all the bondsmen in the North-west Territories with the exception of parties who went security for people who had no land. I do not know what the member for West Assiniboia expects to do with these parties. You have either to collect every payment or relinquish the claim entirely. But I suppose there are very few cases of that kind. I think the Act as it stands now is all that is required to relieve all these parties, with the exception of those who have no land at all, and as they are very few in number it might be just as well to wipe the whole thing off the books, and thus relieve the bondsmen who went security for these parties. As the member for West Assiniboia says, the pioneers who went into that country have done a great deal to build it up, that country is going to be the backbone of Canada, and the pioneers who have gone out there and stood the brunt should be treated with a certain amount of consideration; and if the most of the money is collected, what is left might fairly be wiped off the books.

MR. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). I have listened with great interest to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Those of us who do not live in that western country cannot be expected to know the details of this question as well as those hon. gentlemen who do live there. But whatever the wisdom or feasibility of advancing seed grains to the farmers at that time on the security given, it seems to me we have not to consider that at the present time. We can hardly lay down a hard and fast rule with that new country which we might apply to this eastern country. It seems to me that a short way to clear up what must be a drawback in a large sense to have men hampered even by small obligations that are not their own, would be for all time to relieve those who became security for their neighbours. I suppose it was thought necessary at that time to have some security. I suppose that a good many have paid during the interval; a considerable time has since elapsed, and we have now reached a period when these debts are pretty well settled, either by being paid or the parties having ceased to occupy the lands, and who, therefore, can no longer be regarded as affording any security. Now whether the bargain has been a good or a bad one, it seems to me the government can well step in. Canada has a purse large enough to assume the bad debts of the country rather than unload them on persons who are innocent in one sense, and who went security for their neighbours at that time in order to relieve them from great distress or the prospect of great distress. It seems to me that the matter is so plain that the government should not hesitate to relieve every man who became responsible for his neighbour. If a man has gone away, why, as a matter of equity and justice,—I am putting aside the question of the binding nature of the bargain—why should we hold the man for a single hour now upon old claims that may have attached to individuals who are no longer any security, but who have gone away? For my part, I would have no hesitation in supporting a measure that would give the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) full power to relieve every man in that country who is responsible on a bond. Some may say: Why relieve a man from a bad bargain? I say this is an exceptional case. I need hardly point out to the hon. gentlemen opposite the laxity that always follows a matter that is of public concern ; it is never pressed in that way, and men may well turn to the government and say : Had you pressed the collection of that claim with the diligence you should have done—and that applies to both governments—we would have been relieved. But you have not done so, and why keep that responsibility hanging over our heads ? I think it would be an act of justice, and certainly it would be an act of grace, not to deal with these men on such hard lines as we might under other circumstances.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If this question, which has been brought up once more by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is to be determined by the ordinary laws of contract, there can be no difficulty at all in dealing with it. But if all the laws, and rules, and regulations which apply to contracts are to be discarded, we should find ourselves landed in a great many difficulties. The question is a simple one, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) knows perfectly well that the government in this matter is not a free agent. We have to be guided by the rules and regulations ; we have to execute a contract entered into by the government of Canada with certain parties in the North-west under certain conditions. Some few years ago the government found it advisable to make an advance of seed grain to settlers who were in unfortunate circumstances at the moment. The government made the advances amounting to small sums, I understand to $8 or $10 each man, in some cases perhaps as high as $20. But for so small a sum the former government were not satisfied to take the responsibility of the debtor alone and to take a lien upon his homestead ; but they exacted that two friends of the debtor should go security for him. Now I think it might be said with some force that this was quite an unnecessary precaution ; such, however, was the action of the government at that time. They had every consideration which, in my judgment, was sufficient. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) simply asked the government, so far as the contract entered into with the bondsmen is concerned, that the government should release the lien given by them before the debt, for which they had given security, had been discharged. That is altogether contrary to the regulations and to sound regulation. There may be, however, some reason why the government should be as lenient as possible. There is reason, I think, that we should do all we can to facilitate the acquisition of the land by the settler, and this was the object of the Act passed last year. That Act was to enable the government to give a discharge to the bondsmen, though the debt for which he became a bondsman was not discharged. It reads in this way :

Mr. CLANCY.

The Governor General in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories in every case where, upon inquiry, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that land owned by, or entered as a homestead by, the primary debtor is liable and is in the opinion of the said minister sufficient security for the sum owed by the primary debtor.

In other words, the government is authorized to discharge the bondsman though the debt had not been discharged, if, in the opinion of the Minister of the Interior, the primary debtor is responsible for the debt. That seems reasonable enough, and upon that statute the hon. Minister of the Interior had rules and regulations passed and approved by order in council to guide the agents, not to leave this matter in the hands of arbitrary officials, but to have these matters settled by rules and regulations which can be applied to everybody. An order in council was passed on the 27th of October last, and reads as follows :

Whereas by the Act 62-63 Victoria, chapter 18, it is provided the Governor General in Council may discharge from liabilities all persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories in every case where, upon inquiry, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that land owned by, or entered as a homestead by, the primary debtor is liable and is in the opinion of the minister sufficient security for the sum owed by the primary debtor ;

And whereas it is in the public interest that immediate effect be given to such provisions ;

Therefore, His Excellency, by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada is pleased to grant and does hereby grant authority to the Minister of the Interior to execute releases of the sureties upon any bonds of the class above referred to :—

First: In which the primary debtor has already secured a patent for his land and the bond from which the sureties are to be discharged is either the only encumbrance against such land, or, where there are other encumbrances affecting the land such bond takes priority of all other of such encumbrances except such of them only as may be in favour of the Crown.

Here is the first case ; if the bondsman is able to show to the satisfaction of the minister that, though the debt has not been discharged, still that the primary debtor has obtained a patent and that there is no encumbrance, except the encumbrance of the Crown, or if any other encumbrances, no encumbrance with priority over that of the Crown, he can obtain his own patent and have a discharge of the debt for which he is bondsman.

Second: In which, although letters patent have not yet issued for the land of the primary debtor, he has applied for and established his right under the provisions in that behalf contained in the 'Dominion Lands Act' and its amendments to a certificate of recommendation for patent, and in which the bond from the sureties are to be discharged is either the only encumbrance against such lands, or, where there are other encumbrances affecting the land, such bond takes propriety of all other of such encumbrances except such of them only as may be in favour of the Crown.

That is to say, if the bondsman can show to the minister that, though the debt has not been discharged, and though the primary debtor has not obtained his patent, still, if he can then obtain his patent, he can obtain the discharge of his debt.

Third: In any other case in which the letters patent for the land which is held by the primary debtor as a homestead, have not been applied for, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that such land is liable to the bond from which the sureties thereto desire to be released and discharged, and is in the opinion of the said minister sufficient security for the sum owed upon such bond by the primary debtor.

Again, under the third condition, if the primary debtor has not obtained his patent, if he is not in a position to obtain the certificate for the issue of his patent, if it can be shown to the satisfaction of the minister that the land is sufficient security for the debt, the bondsman can obtain his discharge. Well, I submit, to my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and to the sense of justice, equity and fairness of hon. members of this House, that these propositions are very liberal; in fact, we could not do more than, I think, the hon. Minister of the Interior has done, unless, as suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for West Assiniboia, we are ready to remit the debt altogether. But, if we do not do that, if we say that a man who has obtained an advance of seed grain from the government, should discharge the liability which he has incurred, I think the provisions which have been made for the relief of bondsmen are as ample and sufficient as can be. The hon. member for Bothwell takes an interest such as I do myself in the North-west Territories; he is not in the North-west Territories, neither am I. But, in the interest of colonization, we all desire that the North-west Territories shall be settled and that the men who have gone security shall be able to acquire their title. The hon. member for West Assiniboia has quoted a letter from a settler, who asks: What is the matter? We were told that we should obtain a discharge from these debts. I am a bondsman; I have gone security for one of my neighbours and I cannot obtain my patent. I have simply to answer this gentleman, Mr. Fletcher, that he can obtain a discharge of the bond which he incurred some few years ago for a friend if he can show one of three things: first, that the mortgage incurred by his friend has been discharged. Of course, he would be discharged himself then. But, supposing the mortgage has not been discharged, if the debt is still due by the primary debtor, if he can show that the primary debtor has obtained a patent for his homestead and that this is the first encumbrance upon it, then he can have his discharge. If he cannot show that, but if he can show that though the patent is not issued he has obtained the certificate for the issue of his patent, and there is no encumbrance, or if there is, there is no encumbrance that has priority over the Crown, he can obtain his discharge. If he cannot show that the patent is issued or that the debtor is entitled to his patent, if he can show that the homestead of the primary debtor is sufficient security for the debt, then he can obtain his discharge.

Mr. CLANCY. What does the right hon. gentleman propose to do in a case where they have abandoned the land, gone away and left the responsibility on the shoulders of the bondsmen, which has arisen out of the laxity of those in authority in collecting the bond in the past?

The PRIME MINISTER. That is covered by the third clause:

Third: In any other case in which the letters patent for the land which is held by the primary debtor as a homestead, have not been applied for, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that such land is liable to the bond from which the sureties thereto desire to be released and discharged, and is in the opinion of the said minister sufficient security for the sum owed upon such bond by the primary debtor.

In such a case the bondsman can obtain his release. I think the hon. Minister of the Interior has given a good deal of attention to the matter and has been very generous and very careful to come to the rescue of the bondsman who has done a friendly act towards his neighbour and who should not be oppressed for his act of charity. I do not admit the construction placed, a moment ago, by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, upon the action of the government, that such a man is harassed and oppressed. A man is not harassed and oppressed by his creditors when he is asked to discharge a bond which he has entered into. That is not harassing, that is not tyranny, that is not injustice, that is not unfairness towards any one, and no man can complain if he is simply asked to discharge the bond to which he has put his hand. We could have said to the bondsmen: So long as the debt is there you cannot obtain release, pay yourself as you have undertaken to do, and wait until your debtor pays you. But the government said: It will not withhold your patent until the debt is discharged, but the moment you can show us in any way, that the debt is sufficiently secured by the homestead upon which it is applied, then the bondsmen can obtain their discharge and have their patents. I have not the knowledge which gentlemen coming from the North-west have upon this matter, and I speak with some diffidence upon it, but I see my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), rather favours the view that we should be very lenient and give a discharge not only to the bondsmen, but to the debtors also. That view has been advocated already by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). In his opinion, we should do one of three things. First of all, we should discharge the bondsmen in any case; then we should discharge the debtor himself, and if we did not do either one of these two, we should at all events hand over the debt to the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories. I am not prepared to admit this proposition at the present moment, but, speaking in the absence of the minister, I would propose the adjournment of this debate, with a view of conferring with the officers of the department, to ascertain what are their present views upon this question. If the sum be a limited one, it may be, that the government would feel warranted in taking some action, but if it be a large sum, we are not, of course, at liberty, to deal without due consideration with this matter, concerning a property, for which, after all, we are merely trustees. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). The hon. gentleman who followed me (Mr. Davis) thought that I should have taken care, when the seed grain was got, that this arrangement, in regard to the bondsmen was not entered into. I may say, that at that time, there was great difficulty in getting the seed grain from the government. I have read the language of the then Minister of the Interior, in which he held strongly—and it was also held by the Prime Minister of that day, and held at an earlier period by Sir John Thompson—that it was a matter entirely for the local government of the Territories, to deal with, and, the local government not having money to deal with it, I was very glad to get the seed grain under the conditions imposed. These bondsmen who came to the rescue, really conferred a great obligation upon the North-west, and upon the government of Canada. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), has spoken of this as a contract, and he argued that we should apply the strict rules, binding men who have contracted. Well, Sir, that has not been done in the case of these bondsmen who have already been relieved by legislation, and, why apply one law to one set of men, and another law to another set? I think, Sir, it is very likely from what the right hon. gentleman has said, that we will get this relief after all. He says that he may do something, if it turns out that the sum is a small one. I may tell the Prime Minister, that the sum is, after all, a very small sum. The whole amount is only $133,000, and a large part of that is put outside consideration at the present time by the legislation of last year, because that legislation removes all the indebtedness for which the bondsmen were liable in the cases of those who got their patents. The statement was made broadly by some person, that none of these men were refused their patents. Well, there is the case of Mr. Fletcher, the case of Mr. Bradshaw, in Moosejaw, and the case of Mr. Bell, at Balgonie. These are names that occur to me, but as you see, Mr. Fletcher refers to several others. Now, it is quite clear that the order in council passed by the Minister of the Interior, is not carried out.

The PRIME MINISTER. Do you say it is not carried out?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. How is that?

Mr. DAVIN. If it is acted on, why should Mr. Fletcher be refused his patent until he pays the seed grain debt on another man's homestead? You may say: All he has to do is to show that the 160 acres is worth $8, or $10, or $15. Does any man doubt that any 160 acres in the North-west Territories, especially in the portion of the North-west Territories, where Mr. Fletcher lives, is not worth $8, or $10, or $15?

The PRIME MINISTER. It may be encumbered.

Mr. DAVIN. No land, where a man has not got his patent, can be encumbered. The only party that could encumber land where no patent is issued, is the government of Canada. The right hon. gentleman appears to doubt that, but I can tell him it is so.

The PRIME MINISTER. It can be encumbered with the consent of the minister, and in fact, many of the homesteads are encumbered with the consent of the minister.

Mr. DAVIN. That is the government of Canada, practically. I thought the right hon. gentleman was referring to ordinary encumbrances. Now, I think the right hon. gentleman will find, if he inquires of Mr. Smart, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, that the department has interpreted that Act very narrowly. I think he will find that the words of the order in council, are to my mind, more liberal than the administration of the Act. I do not know the particulars of the Fletcher case, but I know the Balgonie, and the Moosejaw cases, and I know that in neither of these, is there any encumbrance upon the homestead, except the seed grain. I, therefore, say that the administration of the Act by the department, is not as liberal as these regulations provide for. Except in one or two cases that might occur where, with the consent of the Crown, some company had been able to have a lien on the land, it will be found that if these regulations are carried out in the spirit they should be, that all I contend for, in regard to the bondsmen, would be attained. Therefore, why not relieve us altogether from this strict construction that deputy ministers are apt to put on Acts. The tendency of the man that has been even for a short time a deputy minister, is to interpret a statute and to interpret an order in council for the government against the settler. That is the bureaucratic tendency. They manage their departments precisely on the principle that a green grocer would manage his store behind his counter, thinking that anything he can gain for his shop, is a gain anyway. That should not be the idea at all, in managing a department of the government. The way to manage a department is to do the best for the development of every portion of the country. In that way you get wealth through the country at large. I think I see a very strong reason for believing that the right hon. gentleman intends to yield to my prayer, in regard to the bondsmen, and, therefore, I will not oppose the motion for the adjournment.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (Eastern Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take up the time of the House with any further discussion on this subject; but it is a subject that engages the attention of all the members from the North-west Territories. Scarcely a week passes without my receiving letters from settlers wanting to be relieved of the position of security for the indebtedness of other parties. I believe the late government made a great mistake in ever granting seed grain at all. It was a mistaken kindness, which has not proved to be a kindness, but which in many cases has settled burdens on people that they find it difficult to remove. I could instance cases in my own locality where parties who received seed grain had to pay double the amount for the seed that their neighbours paid for it at the same period. Then, I believe the late government made a mistake in demanding excessive security. A quarter section, or 160 acres, ought to be sufficient security for any amount owed to the government for seed grain. I felt last session that perhaps it would be a prudent thing to strike off the securities altogether, and depend on the quarter sections; but I found, on a closer examination of the question, that there were a number of cases that would not be met by such legislation, and I concluded that the safer way was to leave these cases largely to the discretion of the Minister of the Interior, which was done by the legislation of last session. I am not in favour of striking out the indebtedness, even in special cases, because that would be an injustice to the honest settler who has paid his indebtedness; and if this were done, the Minister of the Interior would be swamped with appeals from the honest people of the North-west Territories. As far as I can see at the present moment, I do not think legislation could be adopted to cover all the peculiar cases that would be sure to arise. If a settler wishes his deed, he can get it with the indebtedness registered against him. The question comes to this: Can this or any government afford to enter into legal proceedings to compel the settler to pay his indebtedness at a given time? This is a course that probably no government would care to take. We wish to give them all encouragement rather than saddle them with additional burdens and anxieties. Personally, then, I think that the legislation that was granted last session will meet the large majority of cases; and where special difficulties arise, they must be left largely to the discretion of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). Mr. Speaker, after the promise that has been made by the right hon. the Prime Minister that he will look into this matter, I hope that I may be allowed to refer to another matter of a similar character in the province of Manitoba. Of course, I may not be authorized to speak on this question, but the cases are similar. There is still in Manitoba a balance unpaid for seed grain advanced 24 years ago. That balance is in the neighbourhood of $25,000. This amount is due by parties who never contracted the indebtedness, and who purchased the land without knowing that it was so encumbered. I do not ask my right hon. friend to wipe out this indebtedness; but I would ask that the interest that is being exacted by the government should be reduced to a reasonable rate. Six per cent is charged on the liability, so that the amount of the indebtedness is now more than double what it was originally. In the case of the Mennonites, to whom the government advanced some $60,000 or $70,000 in former years, the interest was reduced to three per cent, and I would ask the government to reduce the interest on this indebtedness in Manitoba to the same rate at the most, thus treating the people who are responsible for the payment of that indebtedness with the same liberality with which the Mennonites had been treated.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is one of those cases which this government has fallen heir to, amongst the numerous other difficulties which have come to them from the bungling and incapacity of the late government. During the three years and a half that this government have been in power, I believe they have had to meet and deal with more cases of this kind of irregularity than any other government ever fell heir to.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I am sorry to have to inform the hon. gentleman that for the case I refer to hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is not the case before the House, and that is not the case that I intended to deal with. I do not know anything about that; but I see a very great difficulty in the way of the government releasing these securities. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), what position would the government be in? I suppose a great many of these settlers who obtained seed grain from the government have been frugal and industrious, and have paid their indebtedness; but a few of them have not paid; and if the government were to release them, would they not be liable to be called upon to repay the men who have paid their indebtedness? I do not see how the government can get out of that. Surely the government, if it releases those who have not been industrious, but who have neglected their payments and let them run for years, ought to recognize merit and industry on the part of those who have kept their agreement with the government. Therefore, I see in the course advocated by some hon. gentlemen a very great difficulty, one which it will be hard to meet, and other people will have reason to complain of the course taken by the government. It seems to me that under the order in council, passed in October last, there should be no difficulty whatever in settlers getting rid of the obligations they entered upon.

Mr. CLANCY. The statement is not made that persons should be relieved who can pay. It is not proposed that the primary debtor shall be relieved, but the persons who, from friendship or otherwise, became bondsmen. If, therefore, there is any title or security in the land, it remains just as before.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understood that it was urged that they should be relieved altogether. That is one of the propositions advanced, I think, by the hon. member for West Assiniboia.

Mr. LARIVIERE. It would be accepted, but is not asked for.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In that course I see very grave difficulties. The order in council passed in October last, seems to me sufficient to meet all objections. I have not understood from this discussion that the government are oppressing or harassing any of these men. They are dealing very generously with them, and I have no doubt, will deal, as they always deal, very generously and honestly with the people of this country. I do not think that any further action is required. The matter is in the hands of a competent, able and careful minister—

Mr. DAVIN. He is going away.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He is leaving a good substitute behind him, one who will carry out his wishes in this regard in every particular, and I think, therefore, that the matter will be settled in a way that will commend itself to the settlers, and also be satisfactory to the people of this country.

I have in my mind now certain friends of mine who got seed grain from the government and who long ago paid for it. It is only right, if the others are relieved, that these should be relieved also, and this would open a door that would bring great trouble on the government, and I do not know that we would be dealing fairly with the other people.

Mr. INGRAM. I do not intend to delay the House on this question, but what I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. First Minister to is this, that so far we have been only able to deal with three notices of motion—I am referring to those notices which have been discussed—and each one of those has been placed over the head of public bills and orders. If this motion of the right hon. gentleman be assented to, this notice of motion will also be placed in that position. We have some thirty-five public Bills that have not yet been touched, and are not likely to be for several weeks to come, and I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion to adjourn the debate and let this matter be settled now, one way or the other, and thus give a better chance to public bills.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman could have followed the debate very closely or he would not have made this suggestion. The question is one of no small importance.

Mr. INGRAM. I quite agree in that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is desirable that it should be settled on a basis of sound equity and not hurriedly or in the heat of parliamentary debate, or in the absence of the necessary information. The Prime Minister has said that he will take the opportunity of consulting with the permanent head of the Interior Department, after having heard the statement made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia. I did think myself, when the hon. gentleman rose to make his motion this afternoon, that he had a good substantial case to present to the House, and I frankly confess that I was disappointed, and came to the conclusion expressed so clearly by my hon. friend from East Assinibola (Mr. Douglas) a moment ago, namely, that the farmers of the North-west are not suing in 'forma pauperis,' that they are not seeking for charity, but for justice tempered with equity.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Nothing else, and I fancy it is rather a reproach against them to deal with their case as if they were a lot of paupers seeking to be relieved from honest obligations. I am quite sure they seek no such thing. There may be, and I believe are, grievances. Had it not been for the action taken by the hon. Minister of the Interior last year, and the statute he had passed enabling him to do justice, many grievances of a very serious character would exist, and these farmers would have had good ground for complaint.

Mr. DAVIN. I had to press him two years to do it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am not speaking about how the hon. gentleman had to press or not, but of facts as they are to-day. What I wish to call attention to is this, that the Act of last session confers ample powers on the Minister of the Interior to remedy all those grievances and injustices, and the only question before the House is whether proper steps have been taken to carry out effectively the powers vested in the minister by this Act. Has the minister laid upon his oars and done nothing? Not at all. He came before council in October, 1899, with a report based upon the statute we passed last session, and asked the council to define the circumstances under which he could grant relief to the different sureties who had become liable for the debts of these primary debtors. And an order in council was passed authorizing the minister to release the sureties:

First, when the primary debtor had secured his patent. Second, when, although letters patent have not yet issued for the land of the primary debtor, he has applied for and established his right, under the provisions in that behalf contained in the Dominion Lands Act, and its amendments to a certificate or recommendation for patent.

In such case, he is to be in the same position as if the patent had been obtained, and irrespective of the value of the land, if the bond forms a lien upon it, the surety has to be discharged.

And, thirdly, whether he has or has not a right to a patent or has or has not applied for a patent, if he is a possessor of a piece of land and that land is in itself sufficient security—

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman read the third clause.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am going to read it.

Mr. CLANCY. Suppose there is no security, what about the bondsmen?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am pointing out to my hon. friend that the primary debtor could not have got the advance unless he had a claim to certain lands. The first two clauses deal with the cases (a) where he has a patent, and (b) where he has established his right to a patent. In those two cases, irrespective of the value of the land, the surety is entitled to be discharged on application to the Minister of the Interior. In the third case:

In any other case in which the letters patent for the land which is held by the primary debtor as a homestead, have not been applied for, it is shown to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior that such land is liable to the bond from which the sureties thereto desire to be released and discharged, and is, in the opinion of the said minister sufficient security for the sum owed upon such bond by the primary debtor.

My hon. friend seems to discover something which he approves of, that sufficient security is mentioned in this clause. He does not want the surety discharged unless the primary debtor has land offering sufficient security in the opinion of the minister to discharge the debt. But if there is sufficient security, the surety who has joined the bond will be discharged at once.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) will see that my contention has been that where there is absolutely no security where the party may have gone away, it is unfair to hold the person who became security, no matter what the circumstances at the time of the loan. If there is no security he ought to be discharged, and if there is security the country is safe from loss.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) looks at the statute and the order in council based upon the statute, he will see that the absence of the primary debtor has nothing to do with the release of the surety. The hon. gentleman relied on that point a good deal, but, as it does not matter whether the primary debtor is living on the land or has left the country and gone to the United States, that does not affect the right of the security to be discharged. That which does affect his right is the question whether the land the primary debtor originally possessed and on which he gave his bond, though he had no patent to it and had no right to a patent, is sufficiently valuable, in the opinion of the minister to pay the debt. I do not think that, in equity any broader or more generous provision for the release of these sureties could be made than has been made under these regulations which have been read to the House. And I must say that after they were read, no fault could be found with them. No fault has been found with them. No suggestion has been made that any wider or more equitable order in council could be made than was made in October last at the instance of the Minister of the Interior. The only suggestion that we have before us is one concerning which I speak with diffidence, not knowing the local circumstance, the suggestion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that we should transfer the entire indebtedness to the North-west Territories government.

Mr. DAVIN. That was not what I said. Will the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) allow me to explain?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly, I have no wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin).

Mr. DAVIN. My suggestion is to first get rid of the bonded indebtedness, then, in regard to the claim on the primary debtor, transfer that to the North-west government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Well, I understand the hon. gentleman a little differently from what I did before. He asks now that no matter what the circumstances are, whether the land of the primary debtor offers security or not, we are to make a present of this account of these people. Now, they do not ask that.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think they should be put in the position of suing here in forma pauperis. I do not believe that the gentlemen who signed these bonds ask to be relieved, except under circumstances which leave sufficient assets in the hands of the government to defray the debt, and in that case they have a right to be relieved. The question is whether the land—whether it is abandoned or not—is sufficiently valuable to pay the debt. If so, we look to the land and relieve the surety. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) in his present proposal asks that the surety should be discharged irrespective of any question whether there are any assets left or not. As to the primary debtors, the proposition is made that we should hand these men over bound hand and foot to the North-west Territories government. But we do not know that that is a proposition that these men themselves will approve of. Why should we hand them over? This government and parliament is quite capable of dealing with those who have entered into contracts with them, without transferring them to third parties who may not deal with them as generously as we will.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. minister allow me?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly; let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), explain.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sure the hon. Minister does not wish to misrepresent me. My proposition as stated in 1898, in 1899, and again this year, is to transfer the debt of the primary debtor to the North-west government, with instructions to collect it either in cash, or, if any farmer wishes to pay it so, in the form of statute labour.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If it is to be collected in cash, we can collect it as well as they can. We are not asking to collect it in cash. We ask it to be a lien upon the land until the party who owns the land or is entitled to it sees fit to pay it off; and, in the meantime, as the order in council provides, release the bondsmen in every case where, in the opinion of the minister, the lands of the primary debtor offer sufficient security for the payment of the debt. Nothing could be more broad, more generous or more equitable than the proposition of the Minister of the Interior based on the statute of last year. I am opposed to the proposal of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin); and I think that, under all circumstances the Prime Minister's proposal, which seemed to me to meet with general approval on both sides, should be carried out, and that he should have an opportunity of conferring with the permanent heads of the department in the light of facts brought out in this debate as to whether the government would go at any time further than they have gone.

Mr. BYRON M. BRITTON (Kingston). The suggestion presented by my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), is one that ought to weigh with members of this House, in considering the proposals before us. We have had a full debate on this question, but if the debate is adjourned, the question will stand in the way of the Bills on the Order paper, without any real good being accomplished. A full discussion has taken place, and the best thing that could be done, as the government has promised to look into the matter, would be for the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), to withdraw the motion, and await the result of the investigation that has been promised, with a view of doing anything that can be done, with justice, in relieving these Manitoba farmers. Before resuming my seat, I wish to say a word or two upon the motion itself. No one, it seems to me, can object to the words of the motion, if every one could be his own interpreter of what it is 'to do justice, to give relief and meet the necessities, should necessities be found to exist.' We could all agree upon this set of words. But when it comes down to particulars, just such as the hon. member (Mr. Davin), has given, we find that the order in council meets all the difficulties of any single case. Of course, if we are to consider the suggestion to release these sureties from all their indebtedness, simply to give a general release, without any consideration at all or without payment by anybody, that is a separate proposition. But I submit to the House, that the order in council is warranted by the terms of the Act passed last session, and under the order in council, interpreting the Act of last session, every single case of grievance can be dealt with by the Minister of the Interior. Now, further, what is the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), with reference to this Act. He suggests that it should stop after these words :

The Governor in Council may discharge from liability persons who are liable to the Crown as sureties upon bonds given to secure repayment for seed grain furnished by the Crown to persons in the North-west Territories.

It might be argued perhaps, with some success that the 'may' in that case means 'must,' and that, therefore, all these persons must be relieved without looking into the matter at all. Then, what will be the result, unless the minister deals with it on some definite basis, such as provided in the section of the Act of last year? If he were asked to deal with it by a political opponent and did not do so, it would be argued that it was because the redress was not asked for a supporter of the government; if, on the other hand, it was a supporter of the government, who was presenting the case, and if the minister dealt with it, some hon. gentleman might say that he dealt with it, and relieved him from his indebtedness, because he was a supporter of the government. At all events, whatever might be said against the government refusing to give relief in the case of an opponent, or granting relief in case of a supporter, it would be a wrong thing to pass a statute without allowing the minister to deal with cases of this kind, and without stating the ground on which the case might be dealt with. I submit that such legislation would not be in the interest of any parties who would be affected by it, and it would be dangerous legislation to pass. One word with reference to the cases of those who have become sureties, and who have paid their indebtedness as such sureties. Now, no government could withstand an application made by any such surety to refund the amount to him, if, under similar circumstances, there was a release of any other surety. If a surety under precisely similar circumstances was released, then another surety who had paid, must necessarily have a claim that could not be resisted by the government. The door would be open to difficulties of that kind, if any such legislation was passed, as is asked for. Now, we have got the whole matter before us. Isolated cases of hardship are provided for by the Act of last session. I do not think that any one reading the Act of last year, will say that the words 'Owned by or entered as a homestead' affects the question where the man has absconded or not. He entered it as homestead land. He may have made some improvement on it, but after he has abandoned the land it becomes the property of the Crown. The improvements that he has made upon it are in that case sufficient security; and these words cover the case, whether a man has left the country or not. So the case where a patent is issued, and the case where the land is entered as homestead land, both come within the words of the statute.

Motion (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 13, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Thousand Island Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 87) respecting the Manitoba and North-west Railway Company.—(Mr. Roche.)

Bill (No. 88) to incorporate the Ste. Mary's River and Railway Colonization Company.—(Mr. Oliver, by Mr. Douglas.)

PAYMENTS TO THE LEADER COMPANY OF REGINA.

Mr. THOMAS O. DAVIS moved :

That a return to an Order of the House of Commons, dated February 12, 1900, containing a statement of sums paid to the 'Leader' Company, Ltd., of Regina, N.W.T., in the years 1894 and 1895, be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the acting Minister of the Interior to a return ordered on the 14th of February with regard to grants of land near the White Horse Rapids, Yukon. I trust the hon. gentleman will see that the papers are brought down, as it is now a month since they were asked for.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will inquire about it.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I desire to ask the right hon. the Premier if the return that he promised on Monday in reference to the Fox Bay settlers will be brought down soon?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) I will lay it on the Table before the end of the sitting.

COMMISSIONER CLUTE'S REPORT.

Mr. W. W. B. McINNES (Vancouver). I desire to ask if Mr. Clute has yet made his report on the Siocan labour question, and if he has, if it will be laid on the Table at once?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot inform my hon. friend (Mr. McInnes) at this moment.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McNEILL.

Mr. ALEXANDER McNEILL (North Bruce). I rise to call attention to a matter of privilege. In the Globe of Friday last, I find the following statement:

Mr. McNeill also rose to speak, amid loud cries of 'order' from the Liberals. Mr. McNeill said these cries were raised to give the government time to prepare their business. Mr. Speaker called him to order for this, but he continued to speak, and finally he was compelled to resume his seat by the Speaker. By the permission of the House he then spoke.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in calling attention to this matter, I do not wish to blame the reporter for these statements. I think it is only fair for me to say that my experience of the reporting for the Globe in this House is that that reporting has been eminently fair—on the whole, I have found it eminently fair. But I think it is only due to myself that I should put myself right with regard to this matter. I did not continue speaking, Mr. Speaker, when you called me to order. On the contrary, when you called me to order, I immediately withdrew the expression I had made use of. I then said that I supposed I must assume that the interruptions were made for the purpose of facilitating business. You again called me to order for this statement, and I withdrew the words. But, owing to the noise that was being made on the other side, you, Sir, apparently did not hear my withdrawal; in fact, the noise was so great, that, though I was sitting close to the Hansard reporter, I find he did not hear me either. But my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), who was sitting beside me, heard me at the time and interjected a remark at the time I made the withdrawal. I wish to put myself right, because I feel very sensitive in reference to this matter. I am quite satisfied that if we are to retain the respect of the country we must conduct our proceedings in this House in an orderly manner; and I am quite satisfied that, in order that we shall conduct our proceedings in an orderly manner, it is absolutely necessary that the authority of the Chair should be maintained. I desire to say that nothing could be further from my thoughts, and nothing was further from my action, than any indication of disrespect for the Chair on that occasion.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DAVIN.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call attention to the report of yesterday's proceedings in this morning's papers. It concludes as follows:

Subsequently, the member for Saskatchewan encountered Mr. Davin in the corridor, and a rather one-sided wordy duel raged there for a few minutes. The incident caused quite a commotion.

I may say, Sir, that I did not meet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) in the corridor, and did not see him until I saw him here at eight o'clock. And there could be no wordy altercation between us, as, outside of this Chamber, I do not exchange courtesies with the hon. member.

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called. I would like to ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he is able to state to the House the arrangements that have been made in regard to the exposition at Paris. It is, I believe, known to the House that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has left for Paris, with a number of other persons; and it is stated that he goes there as the representative of Canada at this exhibition about to be held in Paris. I think that, under the circumstances, the House has a right to know, two hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches having left the House, what the position now is in regard to that matter.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), is not in his seat at this moment, as he could give to my hon. friend all the information he is entitled to on this subject. But in his absence I can give to my hon. friend the information which more immediately concerns the case which he has stated. The government have come to the conclusion that they would appoint my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, as chief commissioner for Canada, to the Paris Exhibition; he goes there, of course, without any salary. We have come to this conclusion rather reluctantly, because we had hoped to have his services during the present session. But it is well known to all the members of this House, that the hon. Mr. Tarte is in bad health; in fact his health is in such a condition, that his friends have pressed upon him the advisability of taking a rest. We have thought that a change of labour, such as he is going to undertake, will give him some rest for the present. These are the reasons which have led us to the conclusion to appoint him to represent Canada at Paris, and we feel satisfied that he is quite able to discharge the duties of the position.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 18), further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

(In the Committee.)

The PRIME MINISTER. When we last had this Bill before the committee, we reserved clause 3, a part of the old Bill, which we propose to amend, by the following words:

Subsection 5 of clause 44 of said Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the words, 'in which case the patent may issue in the name of the settler, even if he is not a British subject.'

I explained the last time that we had this Bill before us the meaning of this legislation. A number of settlers who are not British subjects, have left the country, and their homesteads are left in abeyance. They have given liens upon the homesteads, and these liens cannot be enforced because the patent has to go to a British subject. The object of this legislation is to provide that in such a case, the patent may issue to the settler, though he is not a British subject; it is to enable certain parties, who have liens upon a few homesteads in the North-west, to get their patents and be able to get their advances. This legislation affects only a few settlers. There are a certain number of gentlemen, whose names I will give, who had made advances to these homestead holders:

List of lands against which are registered statutory liens in favour of Sir A. T. Galt (since deceased), acting as trustee for the Russian Jews and Mansion House Committee, London, Eng. Sir A. T. Galt was succeeded in this matter by Mr. Hyman Miller, of the firm of Miller, Morse & Co., Winnipeg, and Mr. Alfred B. Benjamin, of Toronto, who is now also dead, his death having taken place recently.

These parties who made the advances have not been able to recover them, because a homestead patent cannot be issued to a settler who is a foreigner; and it is for the purpose of enabling these creditors to get their money, that this legislation has been introduced, it has been introduced at their request. I will now answer a criticism made the other day, by my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). He thought that if we gave this permission, a large number of Doukhobors, Galicians and other foreigners, could give a mortgage, and thereby, after a certain time, these lands would come into the possession of foreigners. My answer is simply this: There is no danger to be apprehended upon this score, because the holders of the homesteads cannot give a lien upon their property, except after consultation with, and permission from the Department of the Interior, and so far no foreigner has obtained permission from the Department of the Interior, to obtain a lien upon any homestead held by an alien. It is not the policy of the department to favour homestead holders giving a lien; still less is it the policy to favour an alien. I may say that the department has no particular object to serve in this matter. This legislation was introduced to remedy an evil that exists to-day; and if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with the legislation, I am quite ready to let it drop. But, I think he and the House generally, will come to the conclusion that they ought to let it pass.

Mr. DAVIN. Has the hon. gentleman made any calculation of the extent of land thus affected, or the number of acres that will thus be transferred to aliens?

The PRIME MINISTER. There are 15 settlers, according to a list before me. My hon. friend stated when this Bill was last before the House, that if we allowed aliens to give a lien on their homestead, and if they afterwards left the country, with this legislation in force, the homestead might pass into the hands of a foreigner, instead of British subjects. That point struck me at the time as having some force. I consulted the authorities of the department, and am told that the danger does not exist in reality, because the owner of the homestead is not allowed to give a mortgage indiscriminately. According to the law at present, he cannot record a homestead lien against his homestead, except after application to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. FOSTER. What change does this make?

The PRIME MINISTER. I think about 1882, a certain number of Russian Jews were brought into the country, and they had advances from a foreign committee, represented by Sir A. P. Galt. These Jews have left the country, but the homesteads are there. The lien is recorded against the homestead, but it cannot be enforced, because the patent cannot go to a homesteader who is an alien. The object is to permit the homestead to be given to that alien, so that the creditors can enforce their lien. When this passes, it becomes a general provision.

Mr. FOSTER. The law still remains that a lien cannot be given without permission of the department?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes. The minister is empowered to give the lien.

Mr. FOSTER. Under this legislation, in every such case where a lien is given, it can be realized by the foreigner?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what the effect of the legislation would be?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. My right hon. friend sees that it makes it as wide as you can make it. Legislation may be general, and have no conditions attached; this legislation has simply the condition attached that the minister must give his consent. The right hon. gentleman says that it is not the policy of the government to give consent in such cases indiscriminately or generally, but it is left entirely in the hands of the minister who may do so or not. The door is wide opened to the foreigner realizing on the lien, and if it is so in sixteen or twenty cases it may be so in two hundred cases, and of course, pressure will be brought to bear on the minister to give his consent. The minister is authorized by law to give it, the minister gives it, and then, minister or no minister, the foreigner can realize in every case in which a lien is given. It is opening the door very wide, to, really, the possession of homesteads by realizing on the liens by people who are aliens and foreigners.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is not the policy of the department to favour homesteaders giving liens, first of all, to British subjects, and still less is it their policy to favour the giving of liens to foreigners. It will happen in very few cases, and so far, the Doukhobors and the Galicians have not been allowed to give a single lien to any foreign company or to any alien. This is the policy of the government, and it is a policy which will commend itself to all parties, and which the government will endeavour to carry out. I am not particular about the clause, although I think it will serve a good purpose without incurring any danger.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I know the land very well to which this relates, and I have no doubt that the contention of the solicitor of the department is correct that the land is lying there perfectly useless. If there is no danger in this clause being acted on in such a way as to enable large quantities of land to be put into the hands of aliens, I am inclined to think that it would be useful legislation.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that, in dealing with amendments of this kind, it would be far better to re-enact the whole subsection or section, as the case may be. I have looked at some of the authorities on the question of drafting statutes, and I find this rule laid down everywhere. There are many reasons for this. In the first place, not twelve men in this House will otherwise have any adequate understanding of what is being done. Those who can send out, get the revised statutes and have them before them, will have some idea of the legislation which is being enacted, but the remainder of the House will have no idea whatever. When you say that you amend a section of the statute by inserting a word in the fourth line and striking out a word in the eighth line, and so forth, it is impossible, without the revised statutes before you, to follow such amendments. Eventually, you will get the statutes into the same condition as those of the province of Nova Scotia which my hon. colleague (Mr. Russell) described as being in the condition that Mr. Burdett said a New England barn was in—shingled, shangled and shungled. All the authorities are in favour of re-enacting the whole section, or subsection, as the case may be, because, then, you have the whole matter distinctly before the House. I think it would add very much to the information on the subject in the possession of the House if that rule were followed. It has been followed very often in Bills that come from the Department of Justice, but these two Bills, which have come from the Department of the Interior, seem to have been very badly drafted; in fact, they do not seem to have been drafted by a person who has taken any pains to inquire into modern methods of drafting statutes.

Mr. DAVIN. It would be a very useful thing if we had a Consolidated Dominion Lands Act, because, the number of amendments there are, especially to clause 38 and 44. Before the Bill is reported, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question. When this Bill was before the committee last week, I suggested a clause which was voted down, which would effect the purpose in regard to the bondsmen for seed grain, that, yesterday, I was seeking to impress upon the attention of the government and the House. The right hon. gentleman on that occasion, said that he intended to consult the deputy head of the Department of the Interior. I would like to ask whether he has had an opportunity of discussing this question with the deputy head?

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry to say that I have not had an opportunity of discussing the question with the deputy head. I discussed it with the law clerk of the department. We have come to no conclusion on the matter yet.

Bill reported; read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY—THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the disadvantage of my present position at this juncture. I come rather late in the session to give explanations that were expected at the opening. The subject which I have to treat has already excited much discussion, taking from it a good deal of the interest which would otherwise be attached to it. Then, I know my position is not popular, at least, at the present. But, Sir, all these disadvantages and inconveniences affect me in no way. Waiting for the ultimate results of the policy that has been adopted, I feel that I can stand the fair and impartial judgment of my fellow-citizens of all origins in this respect, of those, at least, who think that one may be, at the same time, a loyal British subject, a thorough Canadian and a constitutional Liberal. I have already given to the House the reasons why I did not propose this motion on a previous occasion. I shall now enter upon the merits of the case without any further introduction.

It has been often stated that the intervention of Canada in the South African war originated in the motion which was adopted in this House in the month of July last. It has been even asserted that the adoption of that resolution gave a mandate to the government allowing—nay, compelling them to give armed help to Great Britain when war was declared. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) gave us a little of the inside history which preceded the introduction of that motion. He told us that its adoption had been urged upon parliament by a representative of the Transvaal Uitlanders. If the hon. gentleman had described that representative as the agent of the South African Chartered Company, or, in other words, as Mr. Cecil Rhodes's agent, sent here by Mr. Chamberlain—I think he would have come closer to the reality. To any one who has followed the course of the Colonial Secretary on this question, the motion adopted last session bears the unmistakable evidence of Mr. Chamberlain's inspiration. That reference to the suzerainty of Her Majesty over the Transvaal is sufficient to cause us to understand where the motion comes from. I have already explained to the House how Mr. Chamberlain, alone amongst all British statesmen, restored that suzerainty out of his own free will and imagination thirteen years after it had been abolished by the British government. Another proof of the origin of the motion is the discreet but straight approval of Mr. Chamberlain's policy which is contained in the motion. But, Sir, whatever opinion we might have of the purpose underlying the motion and of its real author, I do not see how it can be asserted that it implied our intention to go to war in South Africa. That contention, if made by the government, would deprive them at once of one of their few excuses for not having called parliament, and for having taken public money without the authorization of the representatives of the people on the pretense that it was an unforeseen emergency. If we meant going to war in July, how could war in October be unforeseen? I find in the Toronto Globe of October 7th last, a straight refutation of that contention. It says:

The fact that the case of the Uitlanders did come before parliament at its last session, and that parliament adopted resolutions of sympathy with the Uitlanders, does not dispose of the question of parliamentary sanction for the raising of a force for South Africa. . . . There was nothing said, so far as we can see, which indicated an intention of authorizing the government to act without the consent of parliament.

Then the article goes on with the argument that so far Canada had taken part in no Imperial war, and it adds:

. . . . It is competent for us, of course, to take a new departure in that respect; but it is a very great question indeed whether a government should take that departure without consulting the representatives of the people. And certainly nothing was said in parliament which would warrant such a step.

There was another reason why we did not expect or mean war at that time. The South African Republic had made repeated offers to submit the whole difficulty to arbitration. And both before and after refusing these offers Mr. Chamberlain accepted them a couple of times. The very day that our parliament adopted that motion of sympathy with the Transvaal Uitlanders, the Colonial Secretary instructed Sir Alfred Milner to invite President Kruger to appoint delegates to a commission of arbitration. Moreover, the Hague conference had about closed its meetings. It had not been successful in all its aims; but one principle at least was emphatically proclaimed, thanks to the great influence of the British representative, Lord Pauncefoot, and that was the principle of arbitration in all international disputes which did not involve the honour of states—this certainly was one of those cases which could be submitted to arbitration. The differences between Great Britain and the United States over the Venezuela affair were just about to be settled by arbitration; and at the same moment we ourselves were and are still seeking for arbitration to settle our differences with the United States over the Alaskan boundary matter. Who could have thought at the last session of this parliament, that Mr. Chamberlain would go back on his own words and refuse arbitration with the South African Republic? A thorough British Liberal such as I am, I would not have believed for my part that we accepted arbitration when we had to deal with great nations, but that we refused or repudiated arbitration when we had to deal with small states.

Moreover, it was not the first time that this parliament had adopted resolutions of that kind without ever thinking of enforcing them by armed sanction. In 1882, a motion was passed unanimously by this House favouring the adoption of Home Rule for Ireland; and, if I remember well, it brought back from the British government a reply, the plain translation of which was: Mind your own business. In 1886, Mr. Blake moved a similar resolution which did not meet with the same unanimous support. References were then made to the reply of the British government of 1882. Mr. Blake contended—and rightly too—that all British citizens in any part of the empire had the right of petition and remonstrance to the Crown. But, Sir John Thompson replied that, true as Mr. Blake's theory was, yet, the Home Rule question was a bone of contention between the two political parties of England, and that we should avoid playing into the hands of the one or the other of these parties. Mr. Blake's motion passed, only after it had been amended in that sense. In 1891, another Home Rule resolution was introduced by Mr. Devlin but never pressed to a vote in this House. I give all this to show that the much-talked-of Imperialistic feeling, that feeling of solidarity; or, as I would put it, that feeling of intermixture between all British self-governing countries has not yet been very conspicuous, at least so far as the Irish question is concerned. However, on none of these occasions did any one ever think that, should the Home Rule question bring rebellion or war in any part of the United Kingdom or of the British Empire, we had the intention of upholding by armed force the principle we had laid down in these resolutions. Oh! but I am mistaken! Some one did propose going to war. A member of the Canadian government at the time did offer to give armed help to the people of Ulster should they rebel against the British Crown. I think it was the then Controller of Customs, and now plain member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who offered that armed help against the Crown of England. I fully understand the present Imperialistic zeal of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace). He wants to make up for his past disloyalty. But he should have more indulgence for the feelings of honest citizens, who, having no such crime to expiate, do not propose to follow him in his pilgrimage towards the Mecca of Imperialism. The case of the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) was then brought to the attention of the House; it gave rise to a debate in which several members, amongst whom, I believe, the then hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), a namesake of the present member for that constituency (Mr. Maclean) declared, that the Canadian parliament had enough to do with Canadian affairs and should not any more get mixed up with Irish or other outside questions. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am not the huge Britisher that the present member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is, but I have never been the puny Canadian that his predecessor (Mr. Maclean) was. At least I am referring to his predecessor, for although I have been told it is the same gentleman who represented East York then as now, I cannot believe it when I read the speech he made in the House then, and when I read the pro-British Imperialistic articles he writes now in the Toronto World. I cannot believe it is the same gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER. It is the very same man.

Mr. BOURASSA. Is it really? Oh! what a scandal! What a conversion! As the Latin proverb says: "In medio stat virtus," and although I do not pose as the virtue in that sense, I prefer to remain where I am. I believe with Mr. Blake, that we have the right in this parliament, or outside of it, to express our sympathy with any class or any group of our fellow-British citizens seeking for redress in any part of the world. But I believe also with Sir John Thompson, that we should avoid playing into the hands of any political party in England. And I confess frankly, I felt humiliated as a Liberal of the British school, when I read Mr. Chamberlain's famous Leicester speech, which called for so many explanations and rejoinders from the British press, and even from colleagues of the Colonial Secretary. I felt humiliated, I repeat, when I read that Mr. Chamberlain boasted of having with him, against the Liberal party of England, not only the majority of the British people, but also the unanimous support of all British colonies.

For my part, Sir, I would have voted against any motion of incense to Mr. Chamberlain, but in favour of any motion of sympathy for the Transvaal Uitlanders in their struggle for the redress of real grievances; just as I would have voted for any motion in favour of Home Rule for Ireland. But what this country was not prepared to do for the Irish tenants, claiming humane treatment, bearable taxation and self-government in their native land, a part of the United Kingdom, I was still less ready to do for men of all countries going of their own free will on a foreign soil to seek gold and build fortunes.

After parliament was prorogued, events went on, until it came to the point where the Prime Minister declared that Canada was not at war with the South African Republic; that our Militia Act forbade the sending of our troops outside of Canada unless her territory was threatened; and, moreover, that parliament was sovereign in the matter, and that, without the sanction of parliament, the government could do nothing. I think this is a fair résumé of the position taken by the right hon. gentleman in his often-quoted interview with the Globe. The leader of the opposition took issue with the Prime Minister. In a telegram which did not reach its destination, but which was published broadcast, the hon. gentleman advised the government to send troops right at once and not to mind parliament. The two attitudes were clearly defined and quite illustrative of the old differences between Toryism and Liberalism, both in England and here. I need not say where my sympathy stood. Ten days later the government gave up, and decided to send troops.

Am I to be termed a disloyal British subject, a traitor to my party, because I did not chose to follow the government in their course and remained where my and their leader was ten days previous, standing on law and constitution, as well as on the soundest traditions of the Liberal party, both British and Canadian? I contended from the start that parliament should have been called before such an important step was taken, and it is my contention still. I was laughed at by several papers and big and small men. The Winnipeg Free Press said that the Labelle people should leave me at home so that I could study constitutional laws. Another sheet excused me of my ignorance of the constitution on the ground that I was a French Canadian. I must say, however, that my contention was ably presented and frankly admitted to be true and commendable by the Toronto Globe, the Hamilton Times, the Woodstock Sentinel, the Toronto Weekly Sun, La Patrie, Le Monde Canadien, the Quebec Telegraph, the Pionner of Sherbrooke, and a number of other papers, English and French, Conservative and Liberal. I had the testimony of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who admitted that the course of the government, technically speaking, was unjustifiable. Of course, the hon. gentleman approved of the government's action on sentimental and religious grounds. But on those grounds I think I can differ with the hon. gentleman without being taxed with too much self-confidence. On the legal ground, I fully acknowledge his great superiority, and the more willingly, too, that he sides with me. Then I had the testimony of the Prime Minister himself, who said that his government was out of law; but, of course, perhaps, he, too, being a French Canadian, does not understand the constitution. I have found also my entire justification in the remarkable speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), which contained so many truths in so few words. But the hon. gentleman is not free from suspicion. I heard him say once in this House that England owed more to Canada than Canada to England. I am only surprised that he has not yet been denounced as a secret agent of Mr. Kruger.

I have heard also the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) say, at a meeting at St. Jérôme, that parliament should have been called; but he also belongs to the 'moccasin' element, and, therefore, might not be considered a proper authority on constitutional matters. But how could I doubt any longer that my position was impregnable when I read the following words coming from the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace), who said to a reporter of the Montreal Gazette, on the 21st of December:

I am in favour of summoning parliament immediately. In fact, parliament should have been summoned long ago to take the voice of the nation on this question.

Surely this will not be called a 'moccasin' opinion.

Let us examine briefly the excuses which have been given for not calling parliament in this case.

First, it is said that now, thanks to the terms of Mr. Chamberlain's demand for troops, the restrictions of our Militia Act were avoided. That the letter was avoided. I admit. But even then the restrictions of our Militia Act are not in the letter. There is no special article of the law which prohibits the sending of our militia outside of Canada. But that restriction is laid at the bottom of its spirit. I had prepared a somewhat complete record to prove that the spirit of our various Militia Acts, including the present one, was to provide for the defence of Canada, and not to go beyond this country. And this was done, not only with the consent but under the inspiration of British military and colonial authorities. At that time of old, selfish Little England and Little Canada policies, they believed, in England as well as here, in the sound principle of decentralization and complete self-government, which has built up the British Empire. But all reasonable men, I think, admit the fact—I spare the argument to the House. I will simply remind the House that the Militia Bill of 1862 was rejected by parliament on the ground that England was more interested to preserve Canada as her colony than Canada was to be British; that Great Britain could cause war to Canada, and that Canada could not and would not cause war to England. The same spirit fought to a less degree against the Bills of 1863 and 1868; but they passed anyhow, without any one intimating that Canada could be called to other wars than those which might threaten her territory. The diffidence of Lower Canadians especially had been greatly removed by the repeated assurances of Sir George Etienne Cartier, that the Canadian militia was organized for the defence of Canada and for that purpose only.

When the Bill of 1862 was introduced by Sir George Cartier, one of the members of that school of loyalty which the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) has already alluded to, Sir Hector Langevin, said that one of the reasons why Canada should have a militia was that Canada was before long to become an independent country, and should organize its territorial defence.

Now, great stress is laid upon the fact that instead of sending 2,000 enlisted men, the government enlisted 2,000 men and sent them to South Africa. I confess the distinction is too fine for my rude peasant's intellect. Oh! but they say: We don't pay the men in Africa; they are incorporated in the British army and receive British pay. That distinction is quite wiped out now that it has been decided to make up the difference between British and Canadian pay. I was taxed with miserable niggardness, because I proposed to strike off that difference and leave our volunteers on the same footing as British soldiers. But none the less that same difference, let it be large or small, was given as a reason for avoiding the Militia Act, and not calling parliament. If the difference was so small, when I proposed to suppress it, how could it be so big as to authorize the government to accomplish what they admitted to be an illegality, which they would not have dared to do, but for that same small difference? The only difference which exists now between our present expedition, and the sending of a regular Canadian corps, lies in the British pay, that is in a smaller amount than that which I wanted to strike off.

Whilst I am on the money question, I wish to refer now to the argument that to call parliament would have been too expensive. My hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin), has already refuted that argument. Like him, I believe that most members who boast so much of their loyalty and patriotism, would have readily come here without incurring to this country the expenditure of a regular session. They who are ready to tax this country by the millions, and to call upon the farmers and labourers of Canada to bear the burden of militarism, would have gladly sacrificed a little of their time to consider the problems in which we have been involved without knowing either the terms or the results of those problems. But, supposing, it would have meant the cost of an extra session, what is that compared with the broad constitutional questions raised by the action of the government? At a time when we are so swelled with enormous Imperialistic ideas, when we are ready to conquer the whole of this little planet, land and water, and are beginning to think a little of hoisting the British flag in the moon. I think that was a rather petty Canadian point of view to take. Just imagine Cartier, Macdonald, Brown, and all the Little Canadians who made confederation, preparing the proposed National Charter of Canada by private letters, and sending it by mail to the Colonial Office, in order to save to this country the cost of the Quebec conference and of a trip to London!

Then, we are given the excuse of unforeseen emergency. I quite admit that the government may be forced, in cases of urgent necessity, to have recourse to such means of financial action, as special warrants—provided always, it is for an expenditure within their ordinary province. But here comes a grave question like war; the government is led to an action which constitutes a new departure in the policy of the country, and which involves a deep constitutional revolution—according, at least, to numerous authorities, including the Colonial Secretary, the Governor General of Canada, ministers of the Crown, both in England and here. Surely nobody will seriously pretend that that is one of those ordinary cases of unforeseen emergency upon which special warrants are issued every year: the burning of a post office, canal repairs, accidents on the Intercolonial Railway, or even, a contract like the Mann & Mackenzie affair!

There is nowadays a decided tendency throughout countries ruled by parliamentary institutions, of exaggerating the power of the executive. At the origin, the cabinet was a mere group of personal advisers to the Crown. The two great powers were the Sovereign and parliament. Gradually, the strength of the cabinet became increased at the expense of both the Crown and parliament. To a certain extent that was a good move, the executive powers being thus put in the hands of men responsible to parliament. But we should be careful not to go to the other extreme, and let the cabinet take, at the same time, the place of both the Crown and of parliament. We should not allow our ministers to forget that they are but the executive committee of parliament; we should not allow them to discount too largely the subserviency of a partisan majority and adopt, by orders in council, measures of the deepest importance, which should not be initiated without the actual participation of parliament.

Now, was this a case of urgent necessity? Where was the necessity? And where the urgency?

As regards the necessity, I need not repeat all the arguments that have been fully given to this House, proving that our troops were not needed in South Africa. British authorities expected only 500 men from Canada. Shall any one pretend that the fate of British arms relied upon those 500 men? Shall any one pretend, that even now, the presence or the absence of our 2,000 soldiers can change the course of events? The Prime Minister himself, in his speech at Sherbrooke as well as in this House, has properly refused to slander the British army, by saying that Great Britain needed our help. And a terrible slander it would be, to pretend, that a country of 40,000,000 of people, with an available army of over 600,000 men, and an annual income of over 100,000,000 pounds sterling, required our help to crush down two puny countries, the whole Boer population of which, according to all authorities, including the member for North Norfolk, is inferior to that of the city of Montreal. And this disposes, I think, of the sentimental argument, that when fire is at our mother's house, it is no time for fine theories and red-tape. I think this pretty sentence is taken from a letter of my good friend, the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt), and I take this occasion to beg his pardon for not having replied to it sooner. The clang of arms, the sound of drums and trumpets, were so deafening that I hardly heard his sweet and sympathetic voice at the time.

The only indication of urgency that I can find, is in Mr. Chamberlain's despatch, dated October 3rd, and received here a few days after—Mr. Chamberlain's messages do not seem to travel any quicker than those of the hon. leader of the opposition. I am afraid that the wires are not yet up to the new movement. The despatch asked the soldiers to sail not later than October 31st. There were at that time, and for months after, thousands and thousands of English regulars not yet started from England. I cannot agree with the idea that Mr. Chamberlain's wishes or orders are a sufficient ground for building an argument of urgency contradicted by fact. Could not our government have explained to Mr. Chamberlain, as did Mr. Lyne, the Premier of New South Wales, that this is a constitutional country, and that the troops would sail as soon as parliament authorized their enlistment? If there was then, if there is now, no necessity for Canadian troops in South Africa, how could it have been so urgent to send them not later than October 31st?

But the plea of urgent necessity has been still more clearly disposed of by Mr. Chamberlain, by several of his colleagues, as well as by our government, and I may say, by all the public men and all the newspaper writers who favoured or opposed the sending of those troops. They disposed of it when they proclaimed that this great display of Imperial militarism is not intended for the purpose of this war, but is being organized to give an example and a warning to the world. I am free to admit that there is an element of grandeur in this argument; but could not this example and this warning have been given just as well a month later? In our case, would they not have been as striking and as profitable with the sanction of parliament, as when signified by order in council?

Of course, the lesson is, I think, two-sided. It has given to this war a significance which is not deprived of danger for the prestige of the future empire. You may give to the lesson the meaning you like, but the world to which you give it may interpret that lesson the way it likes. There is no doubt as to the final results of this war; but its beginnings have been slow and arduous; and that world which you defy boasts at the idea that the two little Boer republics have checked for four months 'a vaster empire than has been.'

But whatever may be the result of the lesson for Great Britain in her relations with other peoples, its actual consequence for Canada is a straight accusation against the government, for not having called parliament. If they intended really to give a lesson and a warning, they meant the lesson to be fruitful and the warning to be serious. What is the consequence? If we send 2,000 men, and spend $2,000,000 to fight two nations, aggregating a population of 250,000 souls, how many men shall we send, and how many millions shall we expend to fight a first-class power or a coalition of powers? And it is, no doubt, to first-class powers and to possible coalitions, that the lesson and the warning were intended to be given. If we judged proper to share in the teaching, it must mean that we are ready to share in the action when the time comes of applying the lesson.

Then, it is the starting point of a new policy which opens a serious point of view on the future of this country. The point of view may be glorious for those who aspire after military honours. It may inspire to rhetoricians fine sounding periods or lyric stanzas to lyric rhymers. But it prepares a gloomy future for the farming and labouring classes of this country. It threatens them with the unbearable burden with which are crushed the peasantry and the working masses of European nations. It is that burden which Little Englanders and Little Canadians had heretofore spared to England and to Canada. No wonder that this government hesitated before opening the door on such a dark unknown! But would it not have been advisable to pause somewhat longer and to let the people know the possible consequences before pushing us towards that unknown by a mere order in council?

Of course, I am met here by the 'no precedent' clause contained in the order in council. I am free to say that this clause is the only thing which I can approve of in the whole course of the government; but I am afraid it is a frail barrier to oppose to the current of noisy militarism which is carrying us all over British possessions. It is that fear which I expressed in my letter to the Prime Minister when I said: 'The precedent, Sir, is the accomplished fact.'

Let us see now in what way the action of the government was interpreted by those who approved of it, as well as by those who condemned it.

I had prepared a whole bunch of quotations taken from newspapers and periodicals to prove that the almost unanimous voice of the press, British, Canadian and foreign, interpreted the government's action the same way as I did. We heard a few feeble voices to the contrary coming from Liberal papers in Quebec anxious to cool down the anxiety of the people.

The London Outlook, to my mind, summed up the whole situation in the clearest and shortest way—just four words :

This is Imperial Federation.

I spare the other quotations to the House ; the comments of the press are well known to all of us. But we should not minimize their importance ; it is upon the voice of the press as an expression of public opinion, that the government based their action ; the interpretation of such action by the same voice must have some weight.

I will devote some attention, however, to the interpretation given to the action of the government by the Colonial Secretary, and by the representatives of the British government in Canada.

We see in the official correspondence brought before the House that a copy of the order in council deciding the despatch of our troops was sent to Mr. Chamberlain. He has surely read it, and therefore read these lines :

Especially as such an expenditure, under such circumstances, cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practices, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

What did the Colonial Secretary reply on date November 15, last :

The desire thus exhibited to share in the risks and burdens of the empire has been welcomed, not only as a proof of the staunch loyalty of the Dominion and of its sympathy with the policy pursued by Her Majesty's government in South Africa, but also as an expression of that growing feeling of the unity and solidarity of the empire which has marked the relations of the mother country with the colonies during recent years.

Mind you, there was nothing said in the order in council about sharing in the burdens of the empire, about unity and solidarity. Take off the diplomatic ornaments of these two statements ; put them in plain English and tell me if they do not read as follows : ' We send you those men, but we do not promise to do it again in the future.' Mark my words, I do not say : ' We shall not do it'—but simply : ' We do not promise to do it.' And the reply : ' I accept it as a proof that you are ready to do it again and every time.'

I say, Sir, that under diplomatic reticences and fine forms of language, this is the most insolent message that a Canadian government has received from Downing Street since the time the Duke of Newcastle asked from the Macdonald-Sicotte government, to put the militia expenditure above parliament's action. But at that epoch of Little Canadianism we knew how to reply to colonial secretaries, and the reply of the Canadian government contained such an assertion of self-government that it brought back from the noble Duke the most exquisite apologies and explicit pledges to not try it again. I regret that Mr. Chamberlain has not been made to understand that when the Canadian government speaks, it means exactly what it says and not what Mr. Chamberlain or any other Colonial Secretary may choose to mean.

Now, what about representatives of the Crown here. At the departure of the first contingent at Quebec, four speeches were made—four remarkable speeches, as the Montreal Star put it. I leave aside the speeches made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Militia. The point I wish to make now is the earnestness of Imperial authorities in the matter. What did General Hutton say ?

This is in its way a matter of satisfaction, but, gentlemen, what, after all, is the contribution of 1,000 men to the requirements of a great empire? This is, numerically, nothing; and what Canada has to look to, if she is to fulfil her role as a portion, and one of the greatest portions of the great confederation of the mother country and her colonies, called the British Empire, is that the time may come when not 1,000 men, but 50,000 or 100,000 may be required to maintain the unity, the integrity, nay, the very existence of our empire.

On other occasions, the Major General had spoken of organizing this country on a military footing, of arming 50,000 men for peace and 100,000 for war. He neglected to say if he intended waiting for parliament's authorization. Street gossips, which generally lie, but sometimes say the truth, went as far as to whisper that the gallant officer boasted of having smashed a government in Australia and of being ready to do the same here. Fortunately for the government and for the ratepayers of Canada, that bellicose warrior will now exert his military spirit against the Boers.

What did His Excellency the Governor General say on the same occasion :

Canada has freely made her offerings of this military contingent to the old country, and in so doing has accepted the difficulties which she knows must follow.

The people of Canada have no desire to consider the quibbles of colonial responsibility. What they have done is to insist that their loyal offers should be made known, and they heartily rejoiced when they were graciously accepted.

The day before, His Excellency gave a dinner at the Citadel, where he is reported by the Quebec Chronicle as having said :

This contingent is the first present which Canada gives in the great Imperial cause. It is a new departure, and the future is full of possibilities. The present expression of Imperial union was more expressive than any written constitution could be. The sending of these troops may raise the question of Imperial federation; he was not here to discuss that question. He has always been opposed to written constitution. He would prefer to trust the feelings of the heart.

I have compared this report with those of the Toronto Globe, of the Montreal Gazette, and of the Montreal Star, and they are almost identical.

It is not my intention to make remarks that would show any disrespect towards the representative of the Crown—even should the rules of this House not forbid me doing so. I have the greatest consideration for His Excellency, not only because he represents here the noble woman whom every true Britisher is proud to call the Queen; I admire also the gallant soldier that has already given proofs of his bravery.

But public men and newspapers have used those words in order to support their contention and attain their political ends. They have given to His Excellency's words a significance which neither he nor we can accept as the true expression of his thought. Of course, if His Excellency meant, when he said that he was opposed to written constitution, that Great Britain was far better without a written constitution, I fully agree with him. But in this country we have a written constitution. And that constitution is not only the legal form of our government; it is also a solemn and sacred compact between the various provinces of British North America. It was framed with great care and solicitude by the best men of those provinces. Those men belonged to different religious creeds, to different races, to different political parties. They united their efforts and their good-will to frame that document, in order to put a stop to dangerous rivalries, and to offer to the world the comforting and glorious spectacle of a broad, united and free nation, devoted to the Crown of England. That charter was accepted by the representative bodies of each and every party concerned. It was ratified by the parliament of Great Britain, and sanctioned by the regal seal.

Of course, like all human deeds, it is not an ideal work. It may need reforms and additions. But as long as it stands, it stands as it is, to be respected by all citizens, high or low, rich or poor—by those who have charge of its application as well as by those who have to submit to it. A too rigid interpretation of it might properly be called colonial quibbles, a too loose interpretation might become a crime against the nation. And when it will require amendment, it will not be done by correspondence between Downing Street and Rideau Hall—that time has passed long ago—but by the free and independent action of both the Canadian and the British parliaments and approved by the people of Canada.

The day after the departure of the first contingent, His Excellency was present at the Hallowe'en concert in Montreal. A gentleman named Mr. Donald MacMaster, a lawyer by profession, I believe, presented his compliments to His Excellency, and found the occasion proper to give vent to his legal science. He ventured the opinion that according to our Militia Act, the Governor General of Canada could command our militia in person and send it wherever and whenever it pleases him. The report does not say what His Excellency thought of the learned barrister's advice. But knowing, as we all do, the unbounded respect that all our governors have had for the last fifty years towards representative institutions, I am sure that His Excellency had of that advice the same opinion as I have myself: That it is a Tory interpretation of the law. At the time of Charles I, the King was the King, without and above parliament. But the unfortunate monarch, and all his successors to come, were made to understand that parliament meant the government of the people, by the people and for the people. And in these days of ours, the King, or the Queen, or the Governor General, everywhere their august names appear on statute-books, should always read: The Governor General, or the Queen, or the King 'through their advisers'—that is, through the executive committee of parliament, responsible itself to the people. Scientific interpreters of the law should never forget that.

When the 'no precedent' clause has been so totally neglected, forgotten, or even contradicted by the highest authorities, I think, Sir, it is about time that it should be recalled by parliament to the memory of those authorities, and it is what I shall ask the House to do to-night.

Now, a word about the famous argument that public opinion demanded this action. My hon. friend from Laprairie and Naperville (Mr. Monet) has shown pretty conclusively that public opinion was not so unanimous as many people think, or rather say. The member for St. James Division, Montreal (Mr. Desmarais) has completed the evidence in his eloquent address, which, I am sure, the English-speaking members of this House regret deeply not to have understood.

Without referring to a past debate, I may be permitted to say that those two speeches have built up an irrefragable testimony that the almost unanimous voice of the press in the province of Quebec, representing all shades of public opinion—from the old Rouge element to the deepest Bleue school now quartered at Three Rivers—spoke in unmistakable terms against the participation of Canada in the Transvaal war, and more especially against the imperialistic movement. I need not add anything to that evidence.

Of course, newspapers change like times and men. The servile organs of both parties have been made to bring their voice to the right tune; but there are still several newspapers which resist energetically the jingo movement or give way to it most reluctantly. And those papers are not confined to the province of Quebec. Take the Toronto Weekly Sun; take the Country and Citizen, organ of the trades' unions; take La Vérité of Quebec; take the Westminster of Toronto, the Presbyterian organ; take Le Pionnier, organ of one of the most distinguished Conservative members of the Quebec legislative assembly, Mr. Chycoine; take Le Monde Canadien, organ Hon. Mr. Nantel, Commissioner of Public Works in the late Conservative administration of Quebec, and still member for Terrebonne in the legislature; take even to a less degree, La Patrie of Montreal, the Daily Sentinel of Woodstock, the Quebec Telegraph, the Hamilton Times, the Toronto Star, and even the Toronto Globe. Surely, all those papers represent something of public opinion. It may be objected that most of them, those especially that share more completely the views I am expressing, have a limited circulation, and therefore represent a much smaller portion of public opinion than the great dailies. Do not judge a man by his looks and do not appreciate the influence of a newspaper by its circulation. Why, Sir, if such an absurd theory was accepted, of gauging public opinion by the circulation of newspapers, this government should walk out of power without delay; for the two papers which have by far the largest circulation in Canada, La Presse and the Montreal Star, are both opposed to this government. It should not be forgotten that people buy those papers, the latter especially, for news, cartoons and sensational reports. Whoever thought of reading the Montreal Star for an idea or a principle? Just as well to study Chinese with a German grammar and a French dictionary. And then, there are two kinds of public opinion: There is the opinion of the men who talk and crow, and there is the opinion of those who think, who study, who work and who pay. That opinion may be heard later on when millions upon millions will have accumulated in the budget for war purposes in Africa, Asia, Oceania and everywhere else, especially if the party which is ruling now in England remains at the head of affairs. I hope for the future of this country, that the time is not far off when the Little Englanders who have made England what she is, will have come back to power in England.

But, supposing the wave of public opinion would flow in any direction, does it follow that a government must of necessity give way to the current?

It is true that under democratic institutions, we are the servants of the people, but we must also inform and instruct the people. And there lies the difference between sound democracy and unprincipled demagoguery. The charge I make against this government is not so much that they acceded at last to what they call public opinion, but that they neglected, through their organs and their supporters, to enlighten public opinion.

The South African problem was a question entirely foreign to Canada, in right as well as in fact. Who, but a few specialists and scholars, knew anything about the Transvaal some few months ago? The newspapers that I have already named published several articles—some very good and some half-hearted—against Canada's intervention. But for weeks and for months the yellow press, headed by the Montreal Star, were filling their columns with inflamed articles and reproductions from the jingo press of England—whilst the counterpart so ably presented in Great Britain by the sound Liberal organs was never or very little given by our English Liberal papers. War arguments were given for all classes of opinion. The Montreal Star, the Toronto News, and others of their kind went as far as appealing to French Canadians and to Irish Catholics on religious grounds, telling them with a deluge of crocodile tears how badly Catholics were treated by the Boers. It is very amusing to compare those devout sermons with the official documents. Take, for example, the report of the Bloemfontein Conference which filled nine compact columns, small text, of the London Times. The sittings lasted five or six days; many questions were treated: The franchise, the representation in the Volksraad, the conscription laws, the dynamite monopoly, the gold taxes—but not a word of ill-treatment of Catholics. Fortunately for the Roman Catholic Uitlanders, some good Canadian Tories thought of them. No doubt, when the war is over, the British government will send for Mr. Dalby, or perhaps for the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to act as special commissioners for the redress of Roman Catholic grievances in the Transvaal.

I am only surprised that, after the almost one-sided frantic campaign of the press, to which our people have been subjected, the display of jingoism was not far stronger. It can be explained only by the assertion I have already made that largely circulated papers, covered with cartoons and big headings, have less influence with the people than with members of parliament or of governments.

A good little paper—neither French nor French Canadian—an English paper published in Ontario, the Bobcaygeon Independent, painted the situation in a most picturesque and striking way, the very day the order in council was adopted. It said:

The public mind is in a dangerous state. Nervous spasms are perceptible, and this time it is the Tory press that, for political purposes, is playing with the public nerves. A hullabaloo is being raised about sending a little army to fight the Boers. Mr. Laurier says that any one who is anxious to get himself perforated with Boer bullets is welcome to go, but so far as the government incurring the expense of sending an army to Africa, it is quite impossible for it to be done without the sanction of the people's representatives. Mr. Laurier speaks perfectly good sense. . . . Canada, at the present moment, is in urgent need of a cooling douse, or it will be in the throes of a military hysteric, from the effects of which it will not recover for many years. If Mr. Laurier is the statesman that he is credited with being, he will hold a block of ice to the back of Canada's neck, and no matter how vigorously she may kick and claw, hold firm.

But granting, for the sake of argument—which I do not otherwise—that the Montreal Star and its crew of noisy imitators represented public opinion, are we to be told that in a free British constitutional commonwealth, governments may or must act upon newspaper articles and cartoons? I know that in the new policy, inaugurated by Mr. Chamberlain in England, and in Canada by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), parliaments are going to be reduced to the condition of smoking concerts where the representatives of the people will be called to applaud or to hiss a varied programme of acrobatic performances, accompanied with deafening war chants and coon songs, which will be given by the actors engaged for the season by the editors of yellow papers. But until we are ripe for that ideal form of government, I claim that the only medium through which the executive can act in important matters is the sovereign parliament of the nation duly assembled in session. And when an important change is to be made in the constitution it must be sanctioned by the people itself.

Is that doctrine wrong and unworthy of a true British citizen and disloyal to the noble Crown under which the British nation enjoys its freedom of government? If it is, let this Liberal government and the Liberal majority of this House declare it to-night by opposing this motion. But I say that should they adopt such a course, they would lose every right to call themselves Liberals. They might retain the label, but it would be a fallacious sign; they would have renounced the very principle upon which British Liberalism was founded, trample down the principles upon which Canadian Liberalism is based, and for which fought so long the political ancestors of the men who have received from the people the right to govern this country for five years. I am not alone to talk, and far less alone to think as I do now. On November 4. the Toronto Globe published an article on the 'Future of Canada,' which to my mind is the best justification of my attitude. In fact, after having read it, I wrote to the editor of the Globe, and had he been present at some of my meetings in Labelle, I would charge him with plagiarism. The article is a long one; I shall content myself with reading the most remarkable passages:

If a government to-day usurps the powers of parliament the effect may be felt after the present situation has passed into history. Every Canadian who desires the honour and prosperity of his country is interested in the power and independence of parliament and in the freedom of its discussions. One of the most serious dangers which threatens the parliamentary system here, as in Great Britain, is the tendency to increase the strength of the executive at the expense of parliament. . . . It would be dangerous, too, to allow the government to fall into the habit of acting on expressions of public opinion. It may be said that to-day those expressions are so hearty and spontaneous that there is no danger of straining the constitution. But all of us, Liberals and Conservatives, can conceive of an unscrupulous government—on the other side of politics, of course—making a very cunning and dangerous use of the power to act upon public opinion as expressed in newspapers and public meetings. 'Suffer not the old kings under any name.' Parliament is the place for the discussion, the place where great public questions can be decided with effective guarantees of freedom and order. . . . Loyalty to the Queen does not mean loyalty to Gladstone or Salisbury to Chamberlain or Morley, to men who may be removed by the people at the polls, or to the Liberal or Conservative party of Great Britain. Our ministers must look for their instructions, not to ministers at Westminster, but to the parliament of Canada, of which they are a committee, and to which alone they are responsible.

I cannot believe that public opinion so irregularly manifested, could be the only, or even the main motive which forced this government to such sudden change of policy. What happened between the 3rd and the 13th of October? A despatch was received from Mr. Chamberlain. We have now—or at least we are supposed to have now—the whole correspondence between the British and the colonial authorities, and what do we find? We find that no offers were made by Canada to Great Britain, any more than by Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia. In fact, only two governments, or two parliaments of the self-governing colonies, had made offers, namely, New Zealand and Queensland, and we will see later on, what happened there afterwards. In Canada, a private offer was made by Colonel Hughes, and transmitted to the British government, and politely declined by Mr. Chamberlain; a further evidence that help was not needed. Then, a despatch is sent to the Canadian government by Mr. Chamberlain, accepting offers that had never been made, giving the regulations for enlistment, the date of embarkation, &c. &c. A strange system of correspondence, indeed, by which the reply is sent before the letter was written, but I suppose all this forms part of the new policy and new diplomacy. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), has termed that strange document an invitation to send troops. Well, Sir, I have made up my mind that I will not be put on the next list for decorations, and, therefore, I go one better than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte), and I say that this is a demand for troops. I admit that the word 'demand' is not actually there, but there are fine ways of doing things in these days of new policy and new diplomacy. After the agent of Downing Street has extorted from parliament a rushed expression of opinion; the public press—the reptile press, I should say—is set at work; the feelings of the people are aroused; private offers are sought for, and refused, and then a letter is sent to the Canadian government, after having been published in the London papers, accepting offers that had never been made, and putting the date so short, that it left no time for calling parliament. It left no time even for due reflection, and, therefore, the government was placed between the alternatives of immediate and complete obedience; or of refusing the demand at the risk of being accused of disloyalty, and high treason, and of being painted throughout the British Empire as a traitor government. I say, Sir, that this policy may be new in form, but it is the same old spirit of government from Downing Street; and I, for one, do not want any more of it. And, when the Canadian government sent their deed of obedience containing the restrictions upon which they could tell the people of Canada that they had preserved the independence of parliament, no care whatever was taken of those restrictions. The Canadian order in council is mixed up with the other documents, making the offers of the Australian colonies, with the sanction of parliament. And the same interpretation is given to the whole thing. That is the first step towards Imperial federation.

Now, in order to better judge of the organization of the whole scheme, it is well to study a little how it worked in the other self-governing colonies. We have now the correspondence between the British and the colonial authorities, and, what do we find? First, no offers from Crown colonies were accepted—these were pretty sure to be easily got at any time. What was wanted were offers from the self-governing colonies—not private offers, mind you. Private offers had been accepted at the time of the Nile expedition; but this time they were refused. They were refused from Canada; they were refused also from Victoria and New South Wales. What was wanted, was not men or troops, but what was wanted was a direct committal from the government of every self-governing British colony, to supply arms every time they would be required by the British government. There are other facts not contained in the correspondence, but which I have looked for from different sources, connected with the sending of the Australian contingents, and which are worth while being known in this country. I need not say how different our position is from the position of New Zealand, and the other Australian colonies. First, these colonies have never been involved in any wars, whilst Canada has been involved, through bad British policy, in two expensive wars with the United States. Second, the Australian colonies may be easily attacked by various European countries, whilst outside of the United States we cannot be attacked, and I think the navy of England would be a far smaller protection for us, than it would be for Australia. I know that the Australian colonies have contributed to a certain extent to the British navy, but, if I am well informed, that contribution is confined to a certain appropriation for the building of ships, which cannot go out of Australian waters, or at least that can be used only for the defence of Australia. Now, that is an important consideration. That contribution of Australia is, to my mind, nothing compared with the heavy sacrifices we have imposed on ourselves, in the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in the help that we are ready to give to the Pacific cable for the benefit of Imperial defence. Finally, Australia has a great deal of commercial intercourse with South Africa. The Transvaal Uitlanders, for which this war is supposed to be raging, include a fair proportion of Australians, and, therefore, from every point of view, Australia is far more interested in this war than Canada can possibly be. Let us see how some of the Australian colonies dealt with the question. When the Transvaal imbroglio began to be acute, the first offer was made, not by the New Zealand government, as often stated, but by the Queensland government, under date July 11th last. When it came for ratification by the Queensland parliament, three months later, a hot discussion took place, and Mr. Drake, the leader of the opposition said:

That the Defence Force Act clearly laid down that the Queenstown defence force could not be sent beyond Australia for active service.

A resolution was moved censuring the government, for having made the offer, without the authorization of parliament, and in this, in spite of the fact that the offer had been made subject to the authorization of parliament. This vote of censure was moved, and it was defeated only by 11 of a majority, the vote standing 39 to 28, and three or four supporters of the government stood up and said, that although they blamed the government and were in favour of the motion of censure, their only fear was—perhaps it is a fear that is to be found in this House tonight—their only fear was that the government would go out of power, and so they voted against the motion of censure. Therefore, we may fairly say that, in Queensland, the majority of the representatives of the people was against participation in this war.

In New Zealand, the offer was made by parliament itself in September, five members only voting against it. The reason given by the Prime Minister in favour of the measure is worth while being noted:

'The movement,' he said, 'was a step towards a federated empire.'

In New South Wales and Victoria, the governors, Lord Beauchamp and Lord Brassey, seem to have headed the movement. They communicated to the home government private offers which, like the private offers made here, were acknowledged with great politeness by Mr. Chamberlain, but not acted upon. The governments of those two colonies made no offers. From South Australia, no offers whatever, either private or official, were made, and the attitude of parliament later on proved what was the sentiment of the people there. Nevertheless, on the 3rd of October, Mr. Chamberlain accepted gratefully from those three colonies offers that had not been made officially by two of them, and not made at all by one of them. That despatch bears the same date as the despatch sent here. The people were surprised there, just as here, at the form of the letter. Strange to say, that despatch was not sent to Tasmania and Western Australia, which had yet made no offers either. In fact, they seem to be the only two colonies where things were conducted regularly. That is probably the reason why they have been treated with absolute decency. Perhaps, also, Mr. Chamberlain was duly informed that it was not required to put the screws on there. In fact, they are the only colonies where the offers of the legislatures seem to have passed without trouble. Anyhow, the offers were not made by the governments, but by the parliaments, and they were then accepted by the Colonial Office, in exactly the same terms as were accepted the offers that we had not made;—with the exception that Tasmania considered it was a sufficient evidence of loyalty to send 80 men instead of a full unit of 125, and told it plainly to Mr. Chamberlain.

In Victoria and New South Wales, things did not go by themselves. Sir George Turner, Premier of Victoria, as well as Mr. Lyne, Premier of New South Wales, were charged, like our own government, with hesitancy. Sir George Turner said, on October 2 :

There is one thing to be borne in mind, and that is, that the empire is not menaced in the slightest degree, and she cannot, therefore, be in need of assistance. . . . Meanwhile, I take it, all that is wanted is to demonstrate that we stand solid with the mother country in this affair; and to make a suitable demonstration, 200 men will serve the purpose as well as 2,000.

Mr. Lyne said the same day that :

He had received many letters suggesting that he was disloyal for not rushing into the public prints at this juncture, saying that he would spend a lot of government money in sending troops to the Transvaal. . . . The Major General was at present discussing it in conference with the officers commanding in the other colonies. In his opinion, if a contingent were sent, it should be an Australian contingent, and no

Australian colony should send troops on its own account.

Appreciating these statements, the Argus, of Melbourne, says in a somewhat melancholic tone :

Sir George Turner does not appear to be at all enthusiastic upon the subject, but he is eagerness compared with Mr. Lyne, who with his doubts and his delays, is practically throwing as much cold water as possible upon the movement.

This does not seem to have troubled the Premier of New South Wales, for a few days afterwards he added that he was 'unwilling to commit his colony to any course until parliament has met.' It is remarkable that Mr. Lyne, though representing probably the most loyal colony, the only colony that had previously contributed to the British army, always reserved the rights of parliament. All his messages contained those words : 'Subject to the approval of parliament.'

As you may have noticed also, Mr. Lyne speaks of a conference of commandants. There, as here, Majors General, as well as Governors General, took a most active hand in the game. Their idea was to organize one large Australian contingent, but they failed in their purpose, because, as they said themselves, the views of the various colonies were not at all unanimous, either on the question of principle, or on the extension to be given to its application.

Finally, the vote passed in the parliaments of Victoria and New South Wales by large majorities, but not without a strong and bitter opposition from the labour representatives. I offer to the great loyalists of this House, who denounce as traitors my friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet) and myself, an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Assembly at Sydney, not by a French Canadian, but, I believe, by a born Englishman, Mr. Holman :

When my country is fighting in a just cause, I will be ready to applaud her, but this is the most iniquitous war that Great Britain has ever undertaken, and I hope England will be defeated.

In the Victoria legislature, Mr. Murray accused England of going to war 'for giving a franchise to the Uitlanders which she did not confer on her own subjects.'

But it was in South Australia that the struggle was the fiercest. The government endeavoured to rush the proposition through the assembly, but the opposition carried an adjournment of the House with the casting vote of the Speaker. I do not offer this to you, Sir, as a precedent, should this House be placed in a similar position. The discussion went on for some days. One of the members said he would rather 'take up arms for the Boers than for the money-grabbing Uitlanders.' The proposition was carried by 6 of a majority, whilst in the legislative council it passed, thanks only to the casting vote of the Speaker.

Now, what about offers of a second contingent? At the beginning of November, just about the same day—strange coincidence—that Lord Minto telegraphed to Mr. Chamberlain, that his government was offering a second contingent, Mr. Lyne started a similar movement in Australia. It was met with approval by Sir George Turner. But the replies from Queensland and South Australia were rather cold. Mr. Dickson, Premier of Queensland, wired:

We have already sufficiently shown our loyalty without doing anything more at present.

The Treasurer of South Australia replied, in the name of his government:

We think our loyalty has been as fully demonstrated by the action already taken as it would be by the despatch of a further contingent, for which no need has yet arisen. We therefore do not favour the suggested action.

Those two governments had enough, I believe, with their recent experience in their respective parliaments.

I think I have shown quite conclusively how false, how utterly false, is the legend of the great enthusiasm displayed in all the other colonies. It is true that messages from Governors General frequently speak of that enthusiasm, of patriotic feelings, and all that. But speeches and votes from responsible representatives of the people are, to my mind, more indicative of the popular feeling than messages from Governors. Our great patriots here are much mistaken, even from their imperialistic point of view, when they say that Canada stood behind the other colonies. If our government came last in offering the first contingent, they came first in offering the second, and they came first, last and alone in offering, equipping and sending both contingents without the participation and the consent of parliament.

I think I have succeeded also in showing the most extraordinary manner in which the Colonial Secretary conducted the whole thing, and with what zeal he was seconded by the representatives of the British government in every colony. Should the secret correspondence between Downing Street and the Governors of all the colonies be made public, strange things would come to light. But there are sufficient indications to assert that Mr. Chamberlain has taken advantage of an outburst of patriotic feeling all over British possessions to push ahead his long cherished scheme of colonial participation in Imperial wars, or, if you prefer, of a military federation of Great Britain and her colonies.

That our government hesitated, I admit, and I approve of its hesitation. No doubt, the leaders of the party and the political heirs of the great men that have fought so long for the conquest and preservation of complete self-government, did not gladly enter the new movement. The Prime Minister, in spite of the 'no precedent' clause contained in the order in council, did not deny that the new movement existed, and that we were, more or less, carried away by it. But he said that Canada should always preserve her independence of action and judge each case on its merits.

I applaud to those words, and I know that the right hon. gentleman is sincere when he utters them. They are in conformity with the principles that he upheld all his life long. But how shall he resist the influence of Downing Street? He was sincere, too, when he said, on the 3rd of October, that he would not participate in this war, and ten days later his government decided to participate. And then, governments change. If the right hon. gentleman was not able to resist, shall another be better able to resist?

But supposing we really judge of each case, how shall the case be entered and the judgment rendered? Shall it be treated in the same way as the present one? Shall the merits of the case be entered a Friday afternoon and decided without pleas, the next Monday morning, by a judgment dictated by an agent of Downing Street? And shall the judgment be executed during the recess by an order in council at the cost of several millions taken without authorization from the public chest of the country—leaving to parliament but to ratify the whole thing after it is done?

Are these to be the terms upon which Great Britain and her self-governing colonies are going to enter into that glorious alliance of free nations closely united for the purposes of peace and war? I claim, Sir, that such terms are equally unworthy of the parent and of the offspring. I claim they are an insult to the intelligence, to the character and to the loyalty of the free British citizens who have made of Canada the jewel of the British Crown.

It is not my intention to treat, at any length, that question of Imperialism. It is a big question which cannot be decided in the high-handed way in which the disciples of the yellow press in this House would like to settle it. For my part, my opinion on this point is pretty much that of Mr. Morley—and I might add of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I do not like the word 'empire.' It has a sound of Cæsarism, of Napoleonism, of military domination, of sword rule, which is most disagreeable to my British Liberal ear. Besides it threatens us with the burden of militarism, the greatest evil of modern European countries. What has made the wonderful development of the United States? What has attracted to them millions of European farmers and labourers, flying conscription and war taxes? It is the fact that the United States was a country free from those burdens and from the constant rivalries which are keeping suspended over Europe a constant menace of war. The United States are pretty well filled up now, with capital and population; and they are becoming a military country too. We would just have been ready to take their place as a population and capital-importing country. But, if before we are fully grown up, we put on our shoulders the yoke of militarism, which is proving too heavy for nations enjoying the plenitude of their manhood, we put a stop to our progress; and I claim that it is not the best service we can render either to ourselves, to England, or to what you call the empire.

There is an argument frequently made in favour of our participation in British wars which I want to meet just now. It is, that we have come to the period of our national life where we should give back to England a little of what she has done for us. I was taxed with being a selfish grabber, ready to take everything and to give nothing. One of the Ottawa printed sheets even said on this ground that it was not my loyalty that was questioned, but my sense of honour. As far as past accounts are concerned, I do not think it is the proper time to make a calculation. I cannot say, for my part, what result I would find—though I think I would not be far from agreeing with the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that England owes more to Canada than Canada to England. But I know this much, that since Canada is a British colony, she has never involved Great Britain in any conflict, whilst she has been thrown into two wars with the United States and her territory made the theatre of hostilities, thanks to a British policy which was bitterly denounced by the greatest British statesmen. We were threatened with another conflict during the secession war, thanks to depredations committed by British vessels; and when the quarrel was settled, the damages were paid a good deal at our expense. At least, Sir John Macdonald said so, as recorded in black and white in his biography and letters.

On boundary matters, a good share of our territory was abandoned to the United States, and the British diplomat who signed the instrument is reported as having said that he would not quarrel for a few degrees of latitude, more or less. We do not know yet what the changes of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty will make us sacrifice on the altar of Imperialism. But we know that the settlement of the French shore question in Newfoundland, a constant menace to peace in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, is postponed for the sake of Greater Britain. British Columbians complain about Chinese and Japanese invasion—but they have been advised by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) not to interfere with Japan until Mr. Chamberlain's African war is over.

We are told that Great Britain saved the United States from a European coalition during their war with Spain—and that, as a result, the United States are now neutral in South Africa; and that they have granted a fair settlement of the Venezuelan and Samoan questions through arbitration. We have made our little display of friendship during that war. At the request of the Colonial Office, we have allowed American gunboats to pass through our canals and rivers contrary to existing treaties. We have also constituted ourselves the policemen of Mr. McKinley and expelled Spanish officials who had come to this country to seek refuge. But, strange to say, the gratitude of the neighbour Republic, so conspicuous towards her Imperial sister, cannot be brought to the point, not of granting us favours—we ask for none—but of simply consenting to the interpretation of an existing treaty by an impartial tribunal.

But, reply the Imperialists, what is all that compared to what England is constantly doing for our protection? She taxes her own people, in order to keep an army and a navy for our protection. We are a heavy burden to her and it would be a disgraceful shame to refuse her our own help.

I deny that we are a burden to the empire. I say that if to-morrow Canada was dis severed from the Crown of England, if to-morrow Canada became a portion of that great republic which lies to the south of us, England could not reduce her army by a man nor her navy by a ship. She would want more soldiers and sailors and ironclads than she has to-day in order to maintain her prestige. I say, if this great continent was closed, as closed it would be to the ships of England, under the circumstances I have named, if they had no harbour in which to run or a place where they can obtain a ton of coal or a spar, instead of England being strengthened, she would be enormously weakened. Her power in the Pacific, her possessions in India and China would be imperilled, and her prestige as a nation entirely changed. Instead of relieving her from any charge for diplomatic services, or her army or her navy, it would impose greater burdens upon the taxpayers of Great Britain than at present. I deny that we are a burden. There is not a pound of British money spent in the Dominion of Canada, from end to end, for any Canadian purpose.

The words I have just quoted are not mine. They have fallen from lips whose loyalty or loyalism, or Imperialism cannot be questioned. They were uttered a little over six years ago, by an ex-minister of the Crown, a baronet, a Grand Cross of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, a member of the Imperial Federation League. He was then High Commissioner of Canada in England, he is now the leader of the opposition in this House, his name is Sir Charles Tupper.

Moreover, I contend that we have largely contributed to the Imperial defence—more than all the other colonies put together. I contend also that the best way to contribute to that defence is not by sending our men, the best of our blood, to the four corners of the world, but by fortifying our own territory ; by developing our own resources ; by keeping our population, and by bringing in foreign immigration. I am glad to find, in the speech just quoted, that the same eminent authority fully agrees with me on all those points. The quotation is rather lengthy, but it is so eloquent and convincing that I cannot really cut it short :

I have a word or two more to say with reference to the defence of the empire. They say: Why should Canada, with her enormous mercantile marine, her sails whitening every sea, not contribute from her resources to the defence of the empire? I say she does. I say Canada is discharging that duty nobly and well. No person holds more strongly than I do the unquestionable duty of every British subject, wherever he may be found, to contribute to the support of the defence of this great empire. If you are going to strengthen a fortification, what would you strengthen? The strongest or the weakest part? Of course, the weakest. Where is the weakest part? Is it in England, in the United Kingdom, or Canada, or Australia? No person can question that if England was engaged in war with any great power in the world, they would strike, not in its strongest but weakest part, and therefore, if you wish to strengthen the defences of the empire, to increase the power to resist invasion, the best way to accomplish this, I have no hesitation in saying, is by looking after Canada. Those who say that Canada contributes nothing to the defence of the empire must be very ignorant of facts, at all events, and I would recommend them to peruse a little of that very interesting literature contained in blue-books.

Then, after having reminded the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and other great public works that we have performed to the amount of $180,000,000 and which he considered a direct contribution to Imperial defence, the hon. gentleman adds :

But some might answer that this work was not done for that purpose, but for commercial purposes. So much stronger our claim. The greatest, the most important, the most vital question in connection with the defence of Canada, which means the defence of one of the most important sections of the great empire, is to people it. This railway, although a commercial line, opens up this magnificent future granary of the world for settlement by stout hearts and strong arms, not only from Great Britain, but by the best men from Scandinavia and Germany and Iceland, to become settlers and as brave defenders of British institutions as native-born Canadians.

Then the hon. gentleman counts in what we expend yearly on our militia and North-west mounted police, bringing the whole thing, in his estimation, to an annual expenditure of $10,000,000. And he concludes as follows :

Is not this assisting in the defence of the empire? There is no way of contributing better to this object than in this practical manner in which we are spending annually $10,000,000 for services of the most vital importance alike to Canada and Great Britain. I do not intend to detain you any longer than to say I am quite sure it was only right for me to seize an opportunity—the only one I have had in Canada—to say something upon this question of Imperial federation, and of pointing out what, in my judgment, is the fallacy and the mistaken policy of those who have adopted the line of advocating the unity of the empire upon a basis calculated, in my judgment, not to promote that unity, but to destroy it.

With the exception of Mr. Morley, who told Mr. Chamberlain that he was taking the proper means to ruin the empire, no other British or Canadian statesman has hitherto more conclusively condemned the new movement than the hon. gentleman who is now following and supporting, and even endeavouring to lead that movement in Canada.

Of course, I fully realize the difference of times and circumstances. In 1893, Sir Charles Tupper was safeguarding the interests of Canada in London ; in 1900, he is the leader of a wrecked party, fishing for votes in Canada.

I should be allowed, however, to agree with the High Commissioner without being denounced as a French rebel by the Tory leader.

To the convincing arguments of the hon. gentleman, I add this one which is but the illustration of his theory : Should the new movement succeed, should this action of ours be a precedent, we may be placed face to face with a situation like this : Suppose Great Britain at war with a first-rate power, France, Germany or Russia ; we supply 10,000, 20,000 or 50,000 men, equipped and armed. Whilst they are engaged going to Paris, or Berlin, or St. Petersburg—which may take nearly as long as going to Pretoria—a difficulty arises between the United States and England ; and war is declared. I ask the loudest Imperialists : Where would be the British flag in North America ?

I do not deny it, the new movement appears to me as a huge megalomaniac frenzy completely foreign to all British traditions. What has made Great Britain what she is ? What has attached to her all her great colonies, if not a policy of peace, of industry, of trade, of complete military and political decentralization—leaving to each colony, the right and power to develop its own resources according to its peculiar situation ?

Oh ! but times change ! Yes, times change, —and men also, by what I can see. But, changes of life, national or individual, must be quiet, progressive, and especially must be in strict conformity with the temperament of the individual or of the nation.

For my part, I still believe in the men and in the policy that made of England the classical land of peace and of liberty. They will stand higher in the annals of history than the noisy, ambitious dominators who want to make England share in the land-grabbing practiced by other nations.

As far as Canada is concerned, I still believe in the men and in the policy that made of her a united country under our confederated system.

I do not ask for independence now, nor at any period within ordinary foresight. Not that independence is not, to my mind, the most legitimate and natural aim to which any colony should tend. But we are not yet enough imbued with the real British liberal spirit of self-government. And this whole question confirms me strongly in that opinion. Should the constitution of our country be left entirely in the hands of our political parties as presently constituted, I am afraid they would play with it, 'a greater football game than has been.'

I was asked where I stood? The reply is short and straight. I stand on the constitution of my country as it is, and I say to those who are not satisfied with it: If you want a change, tell frankly what you want. Do not come in a moment of popular frenzy and try to set fire at the corner of the house.

Mr. Chamberlain and his frantic disciples, and his unconscious followers, both English and Canadian, are leading us towards a constitutional revolution, the consequences of which no man can calculate.

I have said elsewhere, and I repeat here: My objections to any change in our relations with Great Britain, are neither stubborn nor unreasonable. I am open to conviction. But I insist on this point: That we must know exactly where we are now, and whither we are led. Before any change is made, we must be shown distinctly what we are asked to give up, and what we are offered in return. And, even this parliament—and far less its executive committee—have no right to commit the future of this country, without ascertaining exactly what is the true feeling of the people.

I want to be well understood, on this question of popular sanction. I do not mean that it would be sufficient for any political party to enunciate vague ideas on Imperialism, and, being returned to power on its general policy, claim that it is authorized by the people to operate a deep change in our constitutional system, and in our colonial status.

Clear propositions must be laid before parliament and thoroughly discussed, and when the terms are agreed upon, a plebiscite must be taken upon the question, free from all other political issues.

And, our present constitution being an agreement between the various provinces of British North America, a majority of the people of each province must decide in favour of the new system, before it becomes law.

Now, a great many eloquent words have been thrown to the four winds, praising the British rule and its good effect. With most of those utterances I fully agree.

But, there have been two kinds of British rule for the colonies: The military rule, and the constitutional rule. The British constitutional rule, applied to the colonies, is the best that ever existed. The British military rule, has been no better than the similar rule of other European powers. I refer, of course, to modern times only. Soldiers are, after all, pretty much the same under all flags. They are tamed by the sword and they believe the sword to be the best method of ruling. The military rule, even when applied by civilians and governments, has produced greater disasters, perhaps, to Great Britain than to other nations; because of the scattering of British possessions under all skies, and because also of the strong instinct of individual liberty which characterizes the Anglo-Norman, as well as the Scotch and the Irish. The military rule kept India fomenting rebellion for a century; the military rule has lost to England the thirteen American colonies; it sowed and germinated the kernel of the South African problem. The Transvaal and Orange Republics were conceived in hatred at Schlachter's Nek, when in 1815, five Dutch leaders were hanged by order of the British military governor of Cape Colony. The substitution of constitutional rule by the broad and wise men, now called Little Englanders, cured the wounds made by the sword in Cape Colony and Natal. It made of rebel Dutch, loyal subjects of the British Crown; but it could not tame the old Afrikaners who had crossed the Vaal, during the great trek and before the introduction of the new system. The rule of the sword shall have to be applied again all over South Africa. Old wounds will reopen. Let us wait for the result.

In Canada, we had also a military rule for some time; then a mixture of both rules was tried, or, if you prefer, a constitutional system dominated by the sword; a system by which the representatives of the people were allowed to act just as far as the sword would permit. That could not work. It brought disaffection and rebellion in a country where the most striking examples of loyalty had been given by a conquered foreign population. At last, after a struggle of fifty years, British statesmen were brought to understand that Canadians of all origin were a proud people, a people worthy of freedom, and well able to look after its own interests. We were granted complete self-government. Peace was restored; loyalty to the Crown was solidly re-established; and the love of all Canadians was acquired for ever to British constitutional rule, which they had fought so long to obtain.

But, I tell you here and now, do not try to unsheath the old sword. Do not bring back the old military rule under a new name, and remember those remarkable words contained in the instructions given by Lord Grey to Lord Elgin, when this model of constitutional governors came to Canada :

It cannot be too distinctly acknowledged that it is neither possible nor desirable to carry on the government of any of the British provinces in North America in opposition to the opinion of its inhabitants.

You may say my advice is not very authoritative. I admit, my voice is weak ; my authority is naught ; but I tell the truth, all the same, and those who would close their eyes and shut their ears, would prepare a sad awakening to themselves and to their country. Do not judge of the feelings of the people by the speeches of three or four mayors and by resolutions adopted in a few political clubs.

I regret to be now obliged to weary the House with a few personal explanations ; not that I consider my personality of any importance whatever in the matter ; but I owe it to my dignity as a man, I owe to the free citizens who have put their confidence in me and returned me to this House on this very question—to dispel the misinterpretations which have been placed upon my conduct.

I have already stated that I was absent when that Transvaal resolution was rushed through a thin House, one Monday morning of last session, almost without discussion. The moment I was back I told the leader of the government what I thought of it : my apprehension that it was some fine scheme of Mr. Chamberlain to take advantage of this South African crisis in order to drag Canada where she had always refused to go, that is, to active participation in Imperial wars. And there and then I told the right hon. gentleman that should he, during recess and in the advent of war, consent to give way to Mr. Chamberlain's pressure, I would protest publicly and take the best means possible to make my protest good.

When, later on, I saw that some Liberal organs which had theretofore opposed the idea of intervention were giving way, I came to Ottawa and renewed my protest with my leader. That was the very day the right hon. Prime Minister made his declaration in the Globe. When I read that statement I was almost reassured. Then came in the same paper the announcement that the government had decided to send a contingent. I came straight to Ottawa and met the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), and for the third time told the Prime Minister that I could not support the government in that policy. That was the day before the order in council was adopted, and mark my words, Sir, the first time I ever spoke to the Minister of Public Works on the matter. It amuses me greatly when I hear of the domination to which I have been subjected by the hon. gentleman. I do not deny my personal friendship for the hon. minister—neither have I reason to deny that most of his opinions, though not all of them, as expressed publicly on this question, were quite akin to my own convictions. But as a matter of fact, the Minister of Public Works was absent in Paris, La Patrie, which is considered by many people as his organ, had not yet written one line on the matter, when I had discussed the question with the Prime Minister and expressed to him the same views that I hold now.

But moreover, those who think I was influenced by the Minister of Public Works during all that crisis, or at any moment of it, simply prove that they do not know either of us. The very thing which makes our mutual sympathy is a peculiar disposition of temperament common to both of us, but which renders it impossible, even for the Minister of Public Works, to rule me in any way : I mean an unbounded love for freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of action.

The Montreal Star, the bluffing organ par excellence, called my action a 'bluff,' and insinuated that it was inspired by the Minister of Public Works. The leader of the opposition has thought fit and not unworthy of his high political situation, to pick up that accusation and to brandish it in this House with his usual accompaniments of thundering drums. When I was introduced in this House, I even heard the word 'put up job' whispered in the neighbourhood of the 'kopje' where the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) usually sets his short-range carbine. Unfortunately for the hon. gentleman and for his leader, though they have plenty of ammunition, their powder is too smoky and too gassy, and unlike the Boer shooters, they adjust their spy-glasses the wrong way, and sometimes their bullets strike the rock and fly back on them. If I were wicked, I could apply to those hon. gentlemen the French proverb. 'On ne parle pas de corde dans la maison d'un pendu'—the free translation of which would be, in their case : 'Do not talk treason in a nest of traitors.' Being not an ex-minister of the Crown, nor an ex-High Commissioner, nor the leader of a great party, nor an aspiring leader ; being only a free citizen and a modest member of this House, I disdain that kind of personal argument. I let fall where it should lie the vile accusation of 'put up job,' and I simply declare on my word of honour as a man that the course I have taken, I took it of my own free will, because I thought it was my duty to take it. If I did wrong, I deserve the whole blame. If I did right, I claim the whole merit. 'Mon verre n'est pas grand mais je bois dans mon verre.'

Now, I have been asked by many, including the Minister of Public Works : Why did you resign instead of keeping your seat and expressing your opinion in parliament ? My reply is this : Had we been treated in this country like every other British self-governing country has been treated, I would not have had recourse to such extreme means of asserting my views. In Great Britain, where the government have the right to declare war or to accept a declaration of war, they did not dare expend one pound on armaments without summoning parliament. In New Zealand, in all the Australasian colonies, parliaments were consulted. We were the only exception. And the reason given for not calling parliament was that public opinion was so unanimous that the government could legitimately anticipate the sanction of parliament. This theory I could not accept. I resigned so as to consult that portion of the public opinion which I represented in this House. I imposed upon myself the burden of a by-election in a county where it requires 800 miles of a drive to come in contact with the whole population. I did it, so as to be able to sound the opinion of my constituents on that very question without having it coupled with other political issues. Should I have waited for the general elections, some electors might have voted for me because they favoured some other article of my programme; others because they preferred me to any Tory, though bad I may be.

I went to them straight on this issue and told them: 'I do not come here to discuss party politics. You have elected me for five years as a Liberal, and this I am still. When the next general elections come, you will judge me and judge the government on their administrative policy. To-day I have resigned and I come before you to get your opinion on this question, and on this question alone. Are you in favour of participating in this war, or in any war without at least being consulted through your representatives? If so, vote against me; if not, vote for me.' In other words, I took a plebiscite in my county. And instead of coming here to give you my own opinion, presuming the approval of my constituents on a question which had never been submitted to them, I come here to give you the direct answer of four or five thousand loyal subjects of Her Majesty.

It has been said that this was not an argument. My good friend, the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) has written something of the kind in the letter to which I have already referred. Of course, I do not know much of my friend's constituents. He does not seem to have a very high opinion of their judgment—unless he believes the people of Labelle to be very much inferior to those of Ottawa; but I would like him to understand that the people of Labelle are very independent, and perhaps it is the reason I like them and they do not hate me. I wish to be straight with them, as they have been with me.

I could boast, of course, of representing on this question, the unanimity of my constituents. Technically it is true. But really I know it is not. A certain group of Liberals and a certain group of Conservatives did their best to secure a Chamberlainist candidate against me: They rapped at many doors between Montreal and Ottawa; they found some patriots ready to start on an Imperialist campaign, provided they would be supplied with convincing arguments; not to corrupt the people, but to console themselves after a crushing defeat. None were ready to make a fight on mere principle.

I have heard the two leaders of this House, and especially the leader of the opposition, denouncing each other for not having opposed me. The Country and Citizen of Toronto, organ of the labouring classes, that I am glad to count amongst the constant supporters of my views on this matter, struck the right key; if neither party fought me, it is because they thought they would risk a good deal to attain a poor result.

In order to show that the electors who have sent me here are not so simple-minded as my friend from Ottawa believes them to be, I will point a fact to the House. At my first meeting at Papineauville, two days after my resignation, the mover of the resolution approving of my course, was a Conservative who fought me at the last general elections. Before moving the resolution he told me: 'Mind you, I was against you in 1896, I will oppose you at the next general elections, but this time I am with you.' I could quote hundreds of names of intelligent men who took the same stand. When it became evident that I would be offered no opposition, people were anxious to express their opinion in one way or another. Within a few days my nomination paper was signed by nearly a thousand names. I know of two or three parishes where all the electors came and signed the paper—some from eight or ten miles distant: in fact, in some places I had more names on the paper than I had votes in 1896.

I think this is an expression of public opinion quite as conclusive as articles from the Montreal Star. And I venture to say that should the same process of testing public opinion have been applied in most of the constituencies of the province of Quebec, the reply would have been similar.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, just a word now about my introduction in this House by the Minister of Public Works, which the leader of the opposition has characterized as one of the greatest scandals of parliamentary history. What would have become of the touchy conscience of the hon. gentleman, had he been present in the British Commons when Lord Macaulay, being a member of the government, fought the slavery Bill, introduced by the government as a straight government measure?

Lord Macaulay's attitude and speech were the cause of a vote against the government which was defeated by only seven of a majority, and the real cause of the Bill being defeated in the House of Lords; and still the government of which he was a member refused to accept his resignation.

When I came to Ottawa to take for the second time my oath of fidelity to the Crown, I wanted to present myself alone, and to give my qualifications to the House without any help. But I was told that this could not be done. I vainly endeavoured to seduce the rigid interpreters of parliamentary procedure by asking them to attach to my eccentric introduction a 'no precedent' clause. Just at that moment I happened to meet the Minister of Public Works, who told me: 'Why, I am ready to introduce you. You resigned against my advice; but I am a partisan of freedom; I will introduce you on that ground.' I found the argument quite good. I did not stop to think how far it could scandalize the virginal virtues of the blushing maidens who are coquetting to your left, Mr. Speaker. I beg their pardon here and now, and, I assure them, this is the whole and candid explanation of that great scandal.

Now, I was reproached because of having come to this side of the House instead of joining the other side. I have received many lessons of logic since I have come to parliament—but I must be desperately obtuse for I confess I cannot understand the argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Why should I have gone to the other side? Is it because the leader of the opposition preached all over the land that the Liberals did not go far enough in the direction in which I refused to follow them? Is it because the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) wanted to send 5,000 French Canadians to South Africa?

Mr. BERGERON. I never said that.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am glad the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) goes back on the report of his speech. Is it because the rank and file of the Tory press denounced the government as half traitors and myself as a double traitor?

It is true that on the question of expenditure the two leaders have met half way, or as my friend from Laprairie and Napierville would say, have divided between themselves the apple of sin. But that does not make an archangel of the hon. leader of the opposition and clear him of his long career. The very hesitancy which he has bitterly reproached as a crime to the government would be sufficient to prevent me from falling into the lion's den. That hesitancy is just what would give me some indulgence for the government. When a man hesitates before misdoing, it is a sign that he has still some conscience.

Because I condemn the men who have committed a sin, shall I throw my lot with men born and fed in the sin. Because I charge the government with having perpetrated an act of Toryism, shall I go and put myself under the very yoke of Toryism?

There are men on your left, Mr. Speaker, for whom I have great esteem and respect; as there are men on this side, for whom I have not the same sympathy as I feel for others. In other words, there are Liberals to your left and Tories to your right—giving to those words a much broader meaning than they usually have under the narrow party label. But the domineering element of the opposition is the essence of the worst kind of Toryism. I heard the other day my esteemed friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) castigate in a few words the member for West York. I heard some time previous the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) lecture with his usual tact and keenness those people who talk despicably of moccasin government. That shows clearly the difference between what I call the Liberals and the Tories to your left. I would have no objection to work hand-in-hand with the liberal-hearted Conservatives of all origins and creeds, but I have the deepest born antipathy for Tories dyed in the wool. I am a Liberal of the British school. I am a disciple of Burke, Fox, Bright, Gladstone, and of the other Little Englanders who made Great Britain and her possessions what they are, and I will not desert the ranks of their true followers because Mr. Chamberlain, or other renegade Radicals might choose in their megalomaniac ambition to call those great men blunderers. It may be said that Gladstone changed his mind on many questions. Yes, he did. But—and this was the mark of his genius, as well as of his born Liberalism—all his changes were from the narrower to the broader. In church matters, in state affairs, in sociology, all his changes were a constant progress towards Liberalism. A Liberal I was born, and a Liberal I will die. A Liberal I shall remain, even through waves of Toryism which might swamp for a moment the fields of Liberalism. And no king, governor or minister, even in my own party, and no blind crowd can force me to be anything else.

In my letter to the Prime Minister, and in all my speeches in Labelle, as well as in my private utterances, I said that I still supported the present administration on its general policy, because I still believed it was a good one. Therefore, on general grounds, my natural place was here in my old seat.

In fact, I may say, that I am the only man entitled to occupy his old seat in this House, with my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet), and perhaps a few others whom we shall hear from to-night, because I am the only man who is upholding the same principles and preaching the same doctrine that I held six months ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not applaud so much. They should not forget the doctrine which their leader himself has preached so eloquently and so strongly on many previous occasions. Besides my hon. friend from Laprairie and the other hon. gentlemen who are going to vote with us to-night, no party in this House has the right to laugh at the expense of their opponents.

On this special question I condemn the action of the government; and I have come here to tell them that my constituents approve of my course, and have given me a mandate to warn them, in a friendly spirit, against any future attempt to pass over the constitution and to commit the future of this country without the full knowledge and consent of parliament and of the people.

Now, a word to the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), or rather to those—and they are quite numerous—who entertain the idea which he has expressed a couple of times, especially once here in Ottawa. The hon. gentleman was reported as saying that Papineau had smashed the constitution, and that if I could I would do the same. Elsewhere he was reported as saying that the Liberals, from Papineau down, had no principles. First, to hear the member for Beauharnois talking principles makes upon me about the same impression that I would feel listening to selections from 'Faust' or 'Il Trovatore' executed by a choir of deaf mutes. But when he accuses me of being led by hereditary tendencies, I plead guilty to the charge, and I will take this occasion—the first and the last I will choose to do it—to inflict upon this House a short page of family history. I do it because it is, to my mind, quite illustrative of the development of British institutions in French Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. Hon. gentlemen opposite, especially their hon. leader, who is so much inclined to mix up the history of Canada and a good chapter of the history of the empire with his own biography, should easily pardon me this abuse of the patience of the House.

In 1776, when Montgomery and Arnold were besieging Quebec, where General Carleton was imprisoned with his little army, important messages came to Montreal addressed to the general. Two young French Canadians offered to go and deliver those despatches. They drove, but mostly walked, the sixty leagues, that separated the two cities. They passed through the American forces and the very few disaffected districts between the two cities. After a great display of skill and courage, having had to pass within gunshot of the lines of the investing army, they entered Quebec. They delivered their messages to the governor, and then served as free volunteers until the siege was raised. One of those young men was the great-grandfather of our present Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Mr. Lamothe, whose nomination the Ottawa Citizen denounced to the vindication of the anti-moccasins. The other was my great-grandfather; his name was Joseph Papineau.

In 1791, when parliamentary institutions were granted to Lower Canada, Joseph Papineau was elected as a representative of the people. He had fought for the Crown when the Crown was assailed by foreign foes. He fought against the Crown as long as the Crown stood against the people. He died fifty years later, what he had been all his life long: A loyal subject of the Crown of England, and a faithful defender of the Canadian people.

In 1812, a young French Canadian lawyer, a member of the legislative assembly of Quebec, abandoned his legal and parliamentary occupations to go and fight for the British flag, once more assailed by Anglo-Saxons. He served during the whole campaign. When the honour of the British flag was out of danger, thanks a good deal to his compatriots, he went back to parliament; and for twenty-five years, he fought for the rights of the people against the representatives of the Crown. His name was Louis Joseph Papineau. He was the son of Joseph Papineau, and I have no reason to blush in saying that my mother was his daughter.

In 1837, a large meeting was held at St. Charles. Papineau was there to meet thousands and thousands of British citizens who wanted to get their rights of British citizenship. He appealed to them on the ground of the constitution, and begged of them to avoid all riotous agitation. An English Protestant, Dr. Nelson, interrupted him, and said: 'I differ with Mr. Papineau. The time has passed for peaceful means; take your spoons and forks, melt them and make bullets.' The feelings of the people were aroused by fifty years of tyranny offered to them as a reward for eighty years of staunch loyalty. They listened to the inflammatory words of the English rebel and disregarded the constitutional appeals of the loyal Frenchman.

This is the history of the men from whom I have taken my double sentiment of loyalty to the Crown against foreign intrusion, and of loyalty to the people against Crown or faction abuses. I repeat I have no reason to be ashamed of it. And many men who enjoy now our free political institutions and even abuse them, owe them to those men they call traitors and unprincipled agitators.

Sir, I have no intention to proclaim once more the loyalty of the French Canadians who virtually saved Canada to England on two different occasions, and at times when they were most unfairly treated by British officials. That has been stated frequently in this House and during this session. Our history is there. Those who refuse to read it or to understand it simply prove that they lack all good faith or that they are completely devoid of any sense of comprehension. It is useless to try and convince them.

But I have read somewhere—I think in the Toronto News, a statement which I want to contradict here and now. It is that in 1776 and 1812 the French Canadians were not led to action by their loyalty but simply because they wanted to preserve their property. That is rather a pretty bad reflection upon our American friends and dearest kinsmen. It would mean that they were nothing but barbarians, totally ignorant of the most elementary rules of warfare between civilized peoples. Fortunately, it is completely refuted by history. In 1775-6, especially, the American army occupied Montreal and a good portion of Lower Canada, and far from making any depredation, they did everything possible to induce the French Canadians to join them. They promised free government to the leaders; they respected private property; they bought farm products at a high price. The remarkable faithfulness of French loyalty was made only more striking by the very few individuals who gave way to American seductions. As the member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), and the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin), said very properly on a previous occasion, the Catholic clergy was a tremendous factor during both those periods of 1776 and 1812 by strengthening the loyalty of the people through the highest moral and religious motives. There was also, I admit, that remarkable characteristic of our people, which rulers of this country should never forget; I mean their innate reluctance to throw themselves into the unknown. They are easily contented with what they have, and do not care to leave it without knowing exactly what is offered to them in return.

Now, if we speak of national property, I wish to remind this House that no part of Canada would have better profited by annexation to the United States than the province of Quebec. Had we joined the union in 1776, Montreal and Quebec would be now rivals of New York and Boston; our marvelous water powers would be in full activity; the St. Lawrence would be the great transportation water route between Europe and America; our rural districts would be the feeders of the great north-eastern cities. It may be said: But your people would have been swamped. Well, first, we would have kept the million of our countrymen who are now across the borders; and then we are not so easy to swamp as many people think. We follow to the letter the Biblical advice: 'Crescite et multiplicamini.' We have a remarkable disposition for living on good terms with others, and it comes from this fact:

Mr. BOURASSA.

Though deeply attached to our convictions, we have the greatest toleration for other people's convictions; without losing our language we learn quite easily to talk our neighbour's language. The result is that, as a rule, English-speaking people who live with us have no idea of finding fault with our remaining French. I am sure that should the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) come and reside in Quebec, it would not take two years before he would resign his pontificate in the Orange Association to become 'marguillier' of one of our good parishes and the president of a St. Jean Baptiste Society.

Anyhow, I insist on this point, that, from a purely material point of view, it would have been far better for us to have become Americans. I am glad we did not do it, because I prefer British institutions as we conquered them, to American institutions. And so long as Great Britain is faithful to her word, given to us after eighty years of hard struggle, I want to be and our people want to be faithful to our own word. But let the good faith be equal on both sides! Of course, I realize how hard it is for some people to understand a point of honour like this. It must be utterly inconceivable for the political descendants of the happy family compact and oligarchic rulers—of those great loyalists who shot and hanged honest Canadians, both French and English, who did not want to be treated as political helots on their native soil. Those same loyalists were the men who rotten-egged the representative of the Crown when he wanted to give in practice, as well as by law, equal justice to all classes and nationalities; they were also the only agitators for annexation to the United States when they found out that the public chest was no more to be confounded with their private purse. From those high-hearted and broad-minded patriots was born the loyal Tory-Imperialist party.

I have now to say something of the parliamentary significance of my proposition, and to meet beforehand the objection that it implies a vote of want of confidence in the government.

Not pretending to be an authority on matters of procedure, I will not venture wearying the House with a course of parliamentary law. I will just select from the annals of this House, a debate where the question was fully treated by high authorities of both parties. The lesson should be the more fruitful, that most of the teachers are still members of this House, or have reached the serene regions of the Upper House—which, I hope, shall not be considered as a nullification of their science.

I have alluded already to the debate raised in this House in 1893, by the rebel, anti-British speech of the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace). On that occasion, Mr. Dawson, member for Algoma, moved in amendment to the government's proposition of going into supply, a motion which termed itself 'severest censure' of Mr. Wallace's action and speech.

The first supporter of the government to speak on the motion, was Mr. Kenny, member for Halifax. He repudiated the sentiments expressed by the Controller of Customs, but declared he would not vote for the motion, as he considered it a motion of want of confidence in the government.

Mr. Mills, member for Bothwell, now Minister of Justice, and therefore the legal adviser of the present government, replied as follows to Mr. Kenny :

I think the hon. member for Halifax, in referring to this motion as a motion of want of confidence in the government, takes a wholly erroneous view. . . . It is quite true, Sir, that a government may treat any motion, even a motion for the adjournment of the House, as a motion of want of confidence; but no government is obliged to treat an ordinary motion as a motion of want of confidence; and, so far as I know, no government has hitherto treated as such a motion in amendment to go into supply. Why, Sir, let me refer the House to a motion which I myself made two or three years ago on going into supply, with reference to the distribution of public moneys for the construction of public works. The leader of the House, on that occasion, the late Prime Minister, Sir John Macdonald, accepted that motion and supported it in opposition to the government's own proposition to go into supply. Let me refer to another case. A few years ago, on the proposal to go into supply, the late member for Niagara, Mr. Plumb, moved a motion on the subject of the boundary award, and the government supported that motion against their own proposition to go into supply.

Mr. Foster, Minister of Finance, and leader of the House, replied to Mr. Mills, fought the motion, which he called 'a mischievous party motion, meant simply to embarrass the government,' but did not call it directly a motion of want of confidence. Sir Richard Cartwright followed him, and referring to Mr. Mills' remarks, he said :

As my hon. friend pointed out, there are numerous cases when the government have chosen to accept motions on going into Committee of Supply; and he might have added to the motions to which he alluded a motion moved by myself, defining the authority of the Committee of Public Accounts, and which was accepted by the then leader of the House, and allowed to pass, although it was moved on going into Committee of Supply.

Mr. Costigan, Secretary of State, though not agreeing with all the terms of Mr. Dawson's motion, said the following words, which, I think, apply very properly to my motion :

The motion that has been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, is one of principle. . . . I say that the question of allegiance and obedience to the laws and constitution is one that affects every portion of the people, and our laws and constitution must be observed and respected. Holding these opinions, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. Curran, Solicitor General, therefore a member of the government, though not of the cabinet, supported also the motion. Sir Hector Langevin said :

Now, it is a well known fact that such motions are not necessarily votes of non-confidence. On the contrary, very often these amendments are carried by the House, and the government does not consider that they should resign, but proceed with supply as soon as the amendment is disposed of. I have seen that repeatedly, and I have even seen the late leader of the government, Sir John Macdonald, on several occasions, accept a motion of that kind, and have it carried in the House, showing that such a motion is not a vote of non-confidence.

Sir Adolphe Caron, Postmaster General, though opposing the motion, said :

I know myself of amendments which were moved on going into supply which certainly our late lamented leader, Sir John Macdonald accepted, or without accepting, did not consider as a direct vote of want of confidence. But I fail to recollect a single instance where Sir John Macdonald, when leading the House, would not consider an amendment to supply censuring a member of the government, as a direct attack against the government.

So much so, that before the vote was taken, Mr. Kenny explained to the House that, seeing a member of the cabinet, and another member of the government supporting the motion, he could no more think that it implied want of confidence, and he voted for the amendment.

I think, Sir, that my case is a far clearer one than that which I have just quoted. In the former case, the motion in amendment to the ministerial proposition to go into supply was, as stated by the Postmaster General, a direct vote of censure against one member of the government. It was, nevertheless, supported by two members and several friends of the government on account of the principle of respect to law and constitution contained therein.

In the present instance, my motion implies no direct blame or censure upon the government. It is the ratification by parliament of the principles laid down in their order in council of October last, and re-asserted, though in a milder way, in their public statement of the same date. What does the order in council say ?

Such an expenditure, under such circumstances, cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

And what comment did the hon. Minister of Finance put upon that reservation in the official statement he made the same day in the name of the cabinet :

The sending of the contingent to the Transvaal involved not only the expenditure of considerable money, but the taking of an important step that had not been contemplated by parliament, and which might possibly be regarded as a precedent, when in a matter of so much consequence precedents ought not hastily to be established. Hence the first view that prevailed was that parliament should be summoned to confirm the action which was proposed.

What did La Patrie, which is often called the organ of the Minister of Public Works, add to the ministerial statement :

The resolution to which Sir Wilfrid and his colleagues have come, does not commit this country to any action in the future. I think I know that this point has been settled in such a way as to leave no doubt in the public mind.

The Prime Minister himself, at the opening of this session, stated that he intended preserving the legislative independence and freedom of action of this country.

If the government were sincere, as undoubtedly they were, when they gave the assurance, both to the Colonial Secretary and to the Canadian people, that they did not intend creating a precedent, and committing this country to any future action, they cannot refuse to support my motion.

It may be objected, that my motion is useless, that it is a simple repetition of what the government themselves have stated. Suppose it would be useless, there could be no objection on the part of the government to let it pass without opposition. But, I claim that, far from being useless, it deserves the favourable consideration of the House.

As I have stated on a previous occasion, the action of the government is a double one. It contains a question of fact which is the sending of Canadian volunteers to South Africa, and a question of right which is the sovereignty of parliament and of the people as regards any constitutional change which may bring our participation in Imperial wars. The government consented to the fact with the intention, of course, of having that fact ratified by parliament—but also under the explicit reservation of constitutional principles which they considered to be under the exclusive power of parliament. They said themselves that they would not have consented to the action without that reservation. They asked us the other day to ratify their action. I now ask the House to sanction the reservation, and to uphold the principles which the government themselves asserted in their order in council, as well as in their official declaration. My motion is the natural consequence of those documents, as well as the completion of the Bill, adopted by this House to ratify the unauthorized expenditure of the government. You have sanctioned the fact, now sanction the right.

But, there is another reason for making my motion, not only useful, but absolutely imperative. It comes from the grave facts which I have put before the House. The whole of the reptile press, as well as a large portion of the decent newspapers of England and Canada, Liberal, Conservative, and Independent ; and I may say the unanimity of the foreign press, have entirely overlooked the reservation made by the government in their order in council. Either approving or condemning, they have given to the government's action, the same interpretation as that which I gave myself, and that is : The accomplished fact makes the precedent. But what is still graver and gives far more strength to my contention, is that the British government, through the official medium of the Colonial Secretary, at whose request we acted, has given to that action the same significance. He has accepted the sending of our troops as a proof of our willingness to do it again, and he has ignored entirely the reservation made by the Canadian government and finally the same interpretation seems to have been given by the head of our executive committee, by the representative of the Crown in Canada. So that to-day, not only is the doubt of which La Patrie spoke is still existing in the public mind, but the overwhelming conviction is that a precedent has been created.

In presence of such facts, should this House refuse to sanction the reservation made by the government in their Order in Council and refuse to adopt my motion, it would mean that we reject that reservation and accept the general and official interpretation put upon the ministerial action. Such a course, on the part of the government, would constitute the loudest stultification of themselves. On our part, it would be the most emphatic and humiliating admission of subserviency that a free representative body could give. It would bring us back to the time of the Long Parliament.

I freely confess that should my motion be adopted, it would greatly minimize the best of my argument, which is that the accomplished fact constitutes a precedent, notwithstanding all the reservations that could be made.

But this I do not mind. I have not taken my course to gain notoriety or popularity. My only aim is to get an assertion by this House of the soundest and oldest principles of representative government. I simply ask that this House shall affirm that Canada is a free country, that Canada is a country ready to meet Great Britain on a fair proposition, if Great Britain tells us that she requires our help. Then, if new propositions have to be laid down touching the policy that is going to govern this country, neither the Colonial Secretary, nor any member of a British government, nor any representative of the Imperial government in this country has the right to say what shall be the course of a free people. It is our duty, as a free parliament, representing the free opinion of the people, to say what is to be the policy of the people. I am not going to pass judgment on the action of the government ; I have not voted against their resolution, at the expense of what was called my logic. I have been accused of coming back to the fold and of accepting again the yoke of the government. I do not mind that, because I wanted to give to the government a proof of my good faith. I do not mind the money that is asked, but I ask you to repeat here what was declared in the order in council, and to tell the British government that this is a free parliament elected by the free opinion of the people. Therefore, I think my position is a right one, and should it be accepted by this House at the expense of the views I have already given, at the expense of the stand I have taken in my county, I do not mind. I feel that I will be amply rewarded if I secure a declaration that there is still in existence the true British spirit of self-government and liberty, and therefore, I move: That all the words after that be struck out and that the following be inserted:

That this House insists on the principle of the sovereignty and the independence of parliament as the basis of British institutions and the safeguard of the civil and political liberties of British citizens, and refuses consequently to consider the action of the government in relation to the South African war as a precedent which should commit this country to any action in the future.

That this House further declares that it opposes any change in the political and military relations which exist at present between Canada and Great Britain unless such change is initiated by the sovereign will of parliament and sanctioned by the people of Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have listened to every word uttered by my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) with very deep and close attention, an attention all the closer, all the deeper, and having known my hon. friend for many years, almost since his infancy, being an admirer of his brilliant talents, entertaining for him a warm personal friendship, I feel, all the more keenly, the regret of having to differ from him. My hon. friend is young and enthusiastic; he is at that age, that happy age, where the pride of cherished theories far outweighs, and indeed usually makes light of all considerations of practical reality. But, I may be permitted to observe to my hon. friend, at once, that, since his object was to vindicate those constitutional principles which, in his opinion, should have guided and inspired the government when they came to the conclusion that it was their duty to send a military contingent to Africa, it would have been far more in accordance with the fitness of things that he should have moved his amendment either upon the address, when the whole subject was debated at length, or, upon the motion presented to the House by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in order to make good the expenditure incurred for that object. Then, my hon. friend, would have presented to this House a real and live issue, a concrete motion which could have been discussed and debated, affirmed or denied, or amended to some practical purpose; whereas, he now offers us, not a practical motion, but an academic, abstract and rigid motion which can be debated, which can be affirmed or denied, but, which cannot be amended and which, by the rules of this House, has either to be swallowed whole or rejected whole. My hon. friend, in the course of his very able and eloquent speech has taken the House into his confidence as to the relations which have existed between him and me upon this subject. He has informed the House, and truly informed the House, that he was not present when I offered the motion to the House, I think, on the 31st of July, or the 1st of August last, of sympathy with the Uitlanders, and he has said that if he had been present in the House at that time he would have opposed the motion. He has informed the House also, that, at that time, and later on, he repeatedly warned me that if we were to incur any military expenditure he would oppose all such action of the government. My hon. friend will permit me to say that I have always respected his convictions, that although I differ from his views, I have too much of respect, and I may say without hesitation, of admiration for him not to allow him the full liberty which he claimed. My hon. friend informed me more than once that he wanted to move an amendment to the policy of the government in order to affirm his convictions. The hon. gentleman will agree with me if I go a little farther in the confidence to which he has invited the House, and if I say that I represented to my hon. friend, that, if he felt bound in the discharge of the duty which he owed to himself to bring in an amendment, he should more properly do it either upon the address, or upon the resolutions of the hon. Minister of Finance, because, if my hon. friend had offered his motion upon the address, or upon the motion of the hon. Minister of Finance, that motion, then, might have been subject to the amendment. I do not find fault with the principles involved in the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa). I am not prepared, however, to accept the whole language of it. Neither am I prepared to accept the opportunity of it, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) had moved his motion as I suggested to him, as an amendment to the address, or as an amendment to the resolution providing for the South African expenditure, it would have been possible for me to have offered an amendment to his amendment, embodying the principle invoked by him, but embodying them in my own language, or in language which would have been more suited to the House; in language less harsh, if my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) will permit me to say so; in language which, I believe, would have rallied around the amendment the unanimous opinion of this House. My hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) in the exercise of his own judgment and in the exercise of his right, chose, on the contrary, to select his own language and to import into the House his resolution in the manner in which he has. The hon. gentleman must not be surprised, that although I agree with him in many things, I must tell him at once that I cannot adopt his motion. If I have come to this conclusion, it is not because I find fault with the principles enunciated in this amendment, but I challenge altogether the opportunity or the raison d'être of this motion. It is not sufficient that the principles involved in a motion submitted to the House, should be incontrovertible for the House to adopt that motion. There must be the opportunity, and the raison d'être for it. If my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa), or any member of this House, were to propose as an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply, that two and two make four, or that there are twelve months in the year, or that it is the duty of a good Christian to observe the ten commandments, no one would be disposed to controvert any of these propositions, but no one would feel disposed, on the other hand, to place any of these propositions on the records of the House. The reason why I feel bound to oppose the amendment is not so much because of the terms of the motion itself as because of the arguments with which he has supported it. My hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) asserted in his argument that because of the action the government took, we have practically violated the terms which the constitution lays down. Let me repeat to the House the first proposition set forth by the hon. gentleman in his motion :

That this House insists on the principle of the sovereignty and the independence of parliament as the basis of British institutions and the safeguard of the civil and political liberties of British citizens, and refuses consequently to consider the action of the government in relation to the South African war as a precedent which should commit this country to any action in the future.

Sir, when we determined to send the first military contingent to Africa, we passed an order in council, in which we stated that we did not intend our action to be construed as a precedent. We were, in so doing, abundantly cautious. We were not bound to make any such declaration, because I contend, against the argument of my hon. friend, that in the action which we took, we did not violate the independence of parliament, nor did we not violate any principle of the British constitution. The whole argument upon which he has based this motion, and the principle which he has there laid down, that by our act and by our conduct we have violated the principles of the British constitution, is founded on the basis that we incurred this expenditure before we had obtained the sanction of parliament. Now, Sir, I am prepared here and now to take issue with my hon. friend upon this very point. I am prepared to state now that this course which we adopted, and as to which we declared we would not make it a precedent, was a course well within the understood terms of the British constitution. Let me call the attention of the House and of my hon. friend to the standard authority upon these matters. I am proud to say that that standard authority is a Canadian, the late Mr. Alpheus Todd. His work is acknowledged as being the work par excellence which truly lays down the doctrine of parliamentary government in England. I call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) to page 15 of the second volume of the last edition of Todd. After having laid down the well known elementary principle that no expenditure is to be incurred unless with the previous sanction of parliament, he goes on to say that there are several exceptions, and this is the language to which I call the attention of the hon. gentleman :

It is therefore erroneous to suppose that the government can be absolutely prevented from any misapplication or expenditure in excess of the parliamentary grants.

Here is however the main point :

It is therefore erroneous to suppose that the government can be absolutely prevented from any misapplication or expenditure in excess of the parliamentary grants. Even were it possible to do so, it would not be politic to restrain the government from expending money, under any circumstances, without the previous authority of parliament. In the words of Mr. Macaulay (secretary to the board of audit), 'cases may constantly arise, in so complicated a system of government as ours, where it becomes the duty of the executive authorities, in the exercise of their discretionary powers, boldly to set aside the requirements of the legislature, trusting to the good sense of parliament, when all the facts of the case shall have been explained, to acquit them of all blame; and it would be, not a public advantage, but a public calamity, if the government were to be deprived of the means of so exercising their discretionary authority.' To the same effect, we have a declaration by a committee of the House of Commons that 'in special emergencies expenditure unauthorized by parliament becomes absolutely essential. In all such cases the executive must take the responsibility of sanctioning whatever immediate urgency requires; and it has never been found that parliament exhibited any reluctance to supply the means of meeting such expenditure.'

Here is the law well recognized in England, here is the principle laid down, together with a series of precedents to that effect. Todd quotes several precedents, but I will content myself with two. The first one is :

At the commencement of the French revolutionary war, Mr. Pitt advanced enormous sums, amounting to upwards of £1,200,000, to the Emperor of Germany, to aid in the defence of the general interests of Europe, without the previous sanction of parliament. Upon the attention of the House of Commons being directed to this affair, it was proposed to pass a vote of censure on the minister, but his friends interposed, and induced the House to agree to an amendment, declaring that the proceeding in question, though not to be drawn into precedent, but upon occasion of special necessity, was, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, a justifiable and proper exercise of the discretion vested in His Majesty's ministers by a former vote of credit.

But, my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) may say, that there had been a vote of credit to carry on the war and that the vote had only been exceeded. Well, the principle is the same. Let me call attention to another case which occurred in 1867, and which is quoted by Todd :

On February 18, 1867, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a vote of £45,721 to defray the cost of buying the Blacas collection of coins and antiquities for the British Museum. Ministers had, in the previous autumn, assumed the responsibility of this purchase, in order to secure this unique and valuable collection for the nation. Under the circumstances, the vote was agreed to without opposition.

I could also call attention to another very remarkable precedent. I could point to the government of Mr. Disraeli purchasing the whole stock of the Khedive in the Suez Canal, and doing this without the authority or the vote of parliament. Mr. Disraeli's action was approved by the British parliament at the following session. Now, Sir, there were British Liberals in these days in the Imperial parliament, and there are British Liberals to-day in this parliament also. There were Liberals who had not the label on their breasts and the badge on their necks, but the principle in their hearts, just as much as any Liberals have them to-day. There was Fox in the time of Pitt, and Gladstone and Bright in the time of Disraeli, who held that parliament could sanction the expenditure of money by the government in certain emergencies. It is true that in circumstances of that kind the government has to take a very great risk in its hands and upon its shoulders : it has to take the risk of the approval of its course by parliament. In the matter in question, had we not ample justification for believing that our course would be ratified by parliament ? As soon as parliament met, we submitted our action to it ; we laid before it everything that we had done. Our action stood the fire of a long discussion, and the principle of it was approved unanimously by this House. The resolution introduced by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, to cover the expenditure incurred in sending the contingents to Africa, has received the unanimous sanction of this House. What avails it, then, to say to-day that we had not behind us the force of public opinion, that we were not to be guided solely by the voice of the press ? Public opinion has more than one means of expressing itself. There is not only the press, but there is what is heard on the street and in private conversation, and what one can feel in the air. We knew that public opinion was with us. It is true that my hon. friend has stated on another occasion, I believe, that it is a weak thing to be guided by public opinion. Well, Sir, if public opinion were to ask something against one's honour or one's sense of right, or one's sense of dignity, it would be a weak thing indeed to follow public opinion ; but if the voice of the people asks for a thing that is right and honourable, how would it then be a weak thing to follow the voice of public opinion ? Under such circumstances, it would be a wicked and a criminal thing not to follow the voice of public opinion. I put this question to my hon. friend : what would be the condition of this country to-day if we had refused to obey the voice of public opinion ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. It is only too true, Sir, that if we had refused at that time to do what was in my judgment our imperative duty, a most dangerous agitation would have arisen—an agitation which according to all human probability would have ended in a cleavage in the population of this country upon racial lines. A greater calamity could never take place in Canada. My hon. friend and I have long been on terms of intimacy. He has long been a political friend and supporter of mine. He knows as well as any man in this House knows that if there is anything to which I have given my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust which they have placed in my hands ; but never shall I deviate from that line of policy. Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of prestige, loss of popularity, or loss of power, I feel that I am in the right, and I know that a time will come when every man, my hon. friend himself included, will render me full justice on that score. But, Sir, I understand much better now than I did before what is the reason which has impelled my hon. friend to take the position which he has taken. My hon. friend is opposed to the war ; he thinks it is unjust. I do not blame him for holding this view. We are a British country and a free country, and every man in it has the right to express his opinion. My hon. friend has the same right to believe that the war is unjust that Mr. John Morley, Mr. Courtney and many other Liberals in England have to hold the same belief. But if my hon. friend is of the opinion that the war is unjust, for my part I am just as fully convinced in my heart and conscience that there never was a juster war on the part of England than that war. I am fully convinced that there never was a more unjust war on the part of any man than the war that is now being carried on by President Kruger and the people of the Transvaal. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying this. For President Kruger personally I have the most unbounded admiration. He is a stern patriot, and that he believes himself to be in the right I do not question; but if you examine his conduct and his policy in the light of what is already history, you cannot but come to the conclusion that in this matter he has been the worst enemy of his own country. What are the facts with regard to that? It is just as well that we should have it out as I have it on my own mind. It is easy to understand the position taken by President Kruger. The whole ground of the dispute has been that President Kruger has refused to give the Uitlanders the right of suffrage—political and civil rights. He seems to believe that if he gives the right of suffrage to the Uitlanders, they will outland him. But, Sir, President Kruger is not in a position to maintain that argument. He opened this country to a foreign population; he sold them lands and took their money; more than that, he invited them to his territory. Even if he had not invited them, he virtually agreed to adopt the same policy that has been adopted by the American nation and by the Canadian nation as well. At the opening of this century, the American people opened their vast territory to all the nations of the earth, and granted citizenship to all who came, giving them perfect and absolute equality with themselves. We in Canada for the last forty years have been doing the same thing. We have opened our country to the immigrants of the world, we have invited them to come, and as soon as they come, by conforming to the laws they obtain full citizenship, and every right we ourselves enjoy we cheerfully give to them. Well, Sir, was it not fair and right, and is it not the rule of the civilization of the nineteenth century, that if a young nation opens its doors to foreign immigration, an implied obligation rests upon that nation to give to the immigrants the same rights of citizenship which its own people enjoy? There is more. On this occasion, I assert without hesitation that President Kruger himself invited the foreign element into the Transvaal. Let me quote from a book published some time ago by Mr. Fitzpatrick and entitled, 'The Transvaal From Within.' It is a strongly partisan book, I admit, but here is a statement which I have never seen contradicted anywhere. At page 57, Mr. Fitzpatrick says:

In 1884, Messrs. Kruger and Smit proceeded to Europe to endeavour to raise funds, which were badly needed, and also to obtain some modifications of the convention. The attempt to raise funds through the parties in Holland to whom the railway concession had just been granted failed, but the delegates were more fortunate in their other negotiations. They negotiated the London convention, which fixed certain hitherto undefined boundaries; and in that document no reference was made to the suzerainty of Great Britain. They also secured the consent of the British government to the alteration of the title of the country. Instead of the Transvaal State it became once more the 'South African Republic.' During this visit there occurred an incident which provides the answer to Mr. Kruger's oft-too oft-repeated remark that 'the Uitlanders were never asked to settle in the Transvaal, and are not wanted there.' Messrs. Kruger and Smit were staying at the Albermarle Hotel, where they found themselves, after some weeks delay, in the uncomfortable position of being unable to pay their hotel bill. In their extremity they applied to one Baron Grant, at that time a bright particular star in the stock exchange firmament. Baron Grant was largely interested in the gold concessions of Lydenburg, and he was willing to assist, but on terms. And the quid pro quo which he asked was some public assurance of good-will, protection and encouragement to British settlers in the Transvaal, Mr. Kruger responded on behalf of the republic by publishing in the London press the cordial invitation and welcome and the promise of rights and protection to all who would come, so frequently quoted against him of late.

I have never seen this contradicted, and I ask, in the face of this invitation by President Kruger, could there be any justification for the policy afterwards adopted by him of refusing these peoples who had come to the Transvaal at his invitation, the right of suffrage and practically making helots of them.

I am not going into the particulars of the policy of the Transvaal Republic, but let me give a single circumstance which is to be found in the last Statesmen's Year Book. The policy of the population of the Transvaal is 245,397 souls, and the revenue exacted from that population is £4,480,218 sterling, or $24,401,000—very nearly $100 of taxation per head. Let me compare this with the taxation of the very foremost nations of the world—England, France and the United States. The taxation of the United States is about $7 or $8 per head, of England about $12 per head, and of France about $20 per head. But in the Transvaal, the population is taxed to the tune of $100 per head, the bulk of which is borne by the Uitlanders. That population has to bear almost the whole of that taxation, and yet is denied every vestige of representation. That being the case, we must admit that the quarrel of England was just when she insisted that her British subjects in the Transvaal should at least have the rights of citizenship when willing to submit to the laws. I believe that her quarrel was just, and public opinion in this country being anxious that we should take part in the war, we thought it our duty to satisfy public opinion by sending our military contingent, relying confidently upon parliament ratifying our course.

My hon. friend has submitted a second proposition. It is this :

That this House further declares that it opposes any change in the political and military relations which exist at present between Canada and Great Britain, unless such change is initiated by the sovereign will of parliament and sanctioned by the people of Canada.

I have nothing to say against that proposition. If the relations between Great Britain and Canada are to be changed, they can only be changed by the will and with the consent of the people. I am not going to say that the will of the people should be ascertained by a plebiscite, for I believe the well known methods of the British constitution are more appropriate.

But the argument of my hon. friend is that by taking the position we did, we have changed the relations, civil and military, which now exist between Great Britain and Canada. I altogether repudiate that doctrine, and I cannot conceive upon what argument it can be based. I listened carefully to my hon. friend, and I admired him in many ways, but I did not understand the argument upon which he based his doctrine that by sending a military contingent to South Africa, we have changed the political relations existing between Great Britain and Canada. He went further. He asserted, and still more insinuated than asserted, that in doing what we did, we had been dictated to by Downing Street, that we had been compelled to act by the strong hand of Mr. Chamberlain. He rather insinuated also that in passing the resolution we passed last session, expressing our sympathy with the Uitlanders, we were rather coerced by the will of Mr. Chamberlain. He rather insinuated that the resolution which we then introduced had been framed by an agent of Mr. Chamberlain. Well, Sir, the fact is that nobody saw that resolution except the hon. leader of the opposition, who received it from me after it had been adopted by Council.

My hon. friend also said that as far back as July last when we introduced that resolution, Mr. Chamberlain was preparing for war. Now, I ask my hon. friend how he can utter such language in the face of events well known. Why, it will be to the eternal glory of England that war found her absolutely unprepared. Mr. Kruger had been preparing for years for war, buying ammunition and artillery, accumulating provisions, importing European officers, and drilling his people; and when the time came when he thought he was ready he issued his insolent ultimatum, calling upon England to give up her possessions in South Africa. England was found absolutely unprepared. She had hardly a few thousand men in the land, and consequently had to submit to the humiliation of successive defeats. I ask how is it possible, in face of such a condition of things, to say that Mr. Chamberlain had been preparing for war?

No, Sir, we were not forced by England, we were not forced by Mr. Chamberlain or by Downing Street, and I cannot conceive what my hon. friend meant when he said that the future of this country was not to be pledged by this government. When and where did we pledge the future of this country? We acted in the full independence of our sovereign power. What we did, we did of our own free will, but I am not to answer for the consequences or for what will take place in the future. My hon. friend says the consequence is that we will be called on to take part in other wars. I have only this to answer to my hon. friend, that if it should be the will of the people of Canada, at any future period to take part in any war of England, the people of Canada will have to have their way. Let me repeat to my hon. friend the maxim which he quoted this afternoon as embodying his views of freedom and which he took from the despatch of Lord Grey to Lord Elgin: 'It must be remembered that the government of the British Colonies in North America cannot be carried on in opposition to the will of the people.' That was the doctrine in 1847, it holds good in 1900, and will be the language of freedom used so long as we have free parliamentary institutions in Canada.

But I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that if as a consequence of our action to-day, the doctrine were to be admitted that Canada should take part in all the wars of Great Britain and contribute to the military expenditure of the empire, I agree with him that we should revise the conditions of things existing between us and Great Britain. If we were to be compelled to take part in all the wars of Great Britain, I have no hesitation in saying that I agree with my hon. friend that, sharing the burden, we should also share the responsibility. Under that condition of things, which does not exist, we should have the right to say to Great Britain: If you want us to help you, call us to your councils; if you want us to take part in wars let us share not only the burdens but the responsibilities and duties as well. But there is no occasion to examine this contingency this day. My hon. friend forgets one thing which is essential to this discussion, that we did not use our powers as a government to go into that war. We have a Militia Act in this country, we have a force composed of the standing militia and of volunteers. We did not call upon the standing militia or upon volunteers; we compelled no man to go to South Africa. We did not do what we did in 1885, when we had to put down the rebellion in the North-west. Then, we used the power vested in us by the law. The government called for volunteers and the volunteers were forced to go. They went willingly, of course, but if they had not gone willingly they would have been compelled by their oath to obey the command of the government. But in this case we did nothing of that kind. We simply provided the machinery and expenses for the two thousand young men who wanted to go and give their lives for the honour of their country and the flag they love. My hon. friend found fault with us this afternoon, because instead of sending five hundred we sent two thousand. Again I ask my hon. friend, what would be the condition of Canada if we had denied to those young men who wanted to serve their Queen in South Africa this privilege that they claimed from us? If we had said: Only five hundred of you shall go, what would have been the condition of this country to-day? And, did we do any thing wrong after all, and can my hon. friend complain of our action when we simply put it in the power of these young men who wanted to go and give their lives in order to promote what was to them a sacred cause, to go to the front. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if ever there was an occasion when we should have no voice of dissent in this House, it is the present occasion.

I greatly admired the speech of my hon. friend, though I am far from sharing his views. But I call upon him to remember that he belongs to a patriotic family, as he said to us to-day; I call upon him to remember that the liberties which we enjoy are largely due to his own family. But if we have liberties on one side, would he not accept some duties on the other side? Would he not accept some obligations on the other side? Shall the sacrifice be all on the one side and none on the other, the obligation all on one side and none on the other? We were not compelled to do what we did; but if we chose to be generous, to do a little more than we were bound to do, where is the man living who would find fault with us for that action?

My hon. friend dreads the consequences of our action in sending out a military contingent to South Africa. Let me tell him from the bottom of my heart that my bosom is full of the hopes I entertain of the beneficial results which will accrue from that action. When our young volunteers sailed from our shores to join the British army in South Africa, great were our expectations that they would display on those distant battlefields the same courage which had been displayed by their fathers when fighting against one another in the last century. Perhaps in more than one breast, there was a fugitive sense of uneasiness at the thought that the first facing of musketry by raw recruits is always a severe trial. But when the telegraph brought us the information that such was the good impression made by our volunteers that the commander in chief had placed them at the post of honour, in the first rank, side by side with that famous corps, the Gordon Highlanders; when we heard that they had justified fully the confidence placed in them, that they had charged like veterans, that their conduct was heroic and had won for them the encomiums of the commander in chief and the unstinted admiration of their comrades of those famous troops, who had faced death upon a hundred battlefields in all parts of the world—is there a man whose bosom did not swell with pride, the noblest of all pride, the pride of pure patriotism, the pride of the consciousness of our rising strength, the pride of the consciousness that that day the fact had been revealed to the world that a new power had arisen in the west.

Nor is that all. The work of union and harmony between the different elements of this country is not yet complete. We know by the unfortunate occurrences that took place only last week that there is much yet to do in that way. But there is no bond of union so strong as the bond created by dangers shared in common. To-day there are men in South Africa representing the two branches of the Canadian family, fighting side by side for the honour of Canada. Already some of them have fallen, giving to the glory of their country the last full measure of devotion. Their dead bodies have been laid in the same grave, there to rest to the end of time in that last fraternal embrace. Can we not hope—I ask my hon. friend himself—that in that grave shall be buried the last vestiges of our former antagonism? If such shall be the result, if we can indulge that hope, if we can believe that in that grave shall be for ever buried all our past divisions, the sending of the contingents would be the greatest service ever rendered to Canada since confederation. These are the motives, which guided us; these are the thoughts which inspired us; they ought to commend the heart and mind of my hon. friend, knowing him as I know him, and in my judgment, they should induce him not to press further this motion.

Mr. DOMINIQUE MONET (Laprairie and Napierville). Although my views on this question of the Transvaal war are already well known in this House, and although those views have been only shared by two or three hon. members, and although I do not hope for a single moment that these views will prevail any more in this debate than in the previous debate that took place in this House, nevertheless, I feel in duty bound to rise, this time, not to recriminate against my friends of the government, not to indict or to charge anybody, but to pray, to entreat my friends of the government to pause a little in order that we may see whether it is not expedient in the best interests of Canada to stop in this course of military imperialism in which they have so far led Canada. What is past is past: let us now look to the future. The misdeed of the government has been condoned by the almost unanimous vote of this House. It is a settled question, as far as this House is concerned, and the only appeal that can now be made, is before the electorate of the country. I may appear a little wearisome in rising to speak upon this question, which involves the same principles that were involved in the first debate that took place in this House, but, since I delivered the few remarks I made the other day, I have learned a very gratifying thing. I have learned, that, in this House, when an hon. gentleman is honestly speaking his own thought, his own mind, he is entitled to the respect and regard of every citizen of this country. I may, in particular, thank the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure), and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), for the kind manner in which they received the speech that I made, although it was in opposition to their own views. I have received numbers of letters of congratulation from different sections of this country, saying, that, after all, I had spoken the language of a Canadian. This title of Canadian satisfies my pride and ambition. I am a Canadian; I am not French, I am not English, but I am Canadian, not for the sake of France, nor for the sake of England, but, I am a Canadian, loving this country, because it is the land of our forefathers, who were Canadians. I love this land because it has been opened up and developed by our own forefathers, Canadians, whose labours and blood have made her what she is to-day, the finest, as she is the freest colony, in the world. But, it is because I want to defend inch by inch the bulwark of our political liberties, the bulwark of our political freedom, from any further encroachment, that I rise again to support and second the motion of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). As a matter of fact, it embodies the very essence of the Liberal democratic school to which I belong. In this motion lies the very fundamental principle of responsible government. It indicates that after God, the sovereign will of the people is the source of all authority and of all legislative action. Here is the motion which I have seconded :

That this House insists on the principle of the sovereignty and the independence of parliament as the basis of British institutions and the safeguard of the civil and political liberties of British citizens, and refuses consequently to consider the action of the government in relation to the South African war as a precedent which should commit this country to any action in the future.

That this House further declares that it opposes any change in the political and military relations which exist at present between Canada and Great Britain unless such change is initiated by the sovereign will of parliament and sanctioned by the people of Canada.

There are three different things in this motion. First, it takes for granted, that our constitution has been violated by the order in council of the 14th of October last; second, it states that this violation of the law must not be regarded as a precedent, and third, it indicates the constitutional way in which our military relations with England are to be changed, if they are to be changed. Let me examine the three different features of this motion, in order to see whether there is anything in them to which any Liberal of this House could not give his consent. The first part of the motion takes it for granted that our constitution has been violated. Is this assumption right or is it wrong? I told you, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks, that I did not want to recriminate against my hon. friends of the government. Upon the first occasion on which I spoke to the question, I did it, for I wanted to protest against the humiliating position we had been placed in, and I was charged with having built my argument only out of the reasonings of Liberals. I thought it a very natural thing, being a Liberal, as I claim I am, to prefer to build Liberal arguments with quotations from the statements of Liberal members of this House. It seems to me that everything is upside down in this House. The other day, the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), himself, admitted that he was without the law when he passed the order in council of the 14th of October last. The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who is there to criticise the government for any wrong-doing, did what? Instead of calling the government to duty, he wrote to the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, a telegram, or a letter, saying that if the right hon. gentleman was only willing to do a little more than he was disposed to do, he would join hands with him on the floor of the House. An expenditure of over $2,000,000 has been incurred by the order in council of the 14th of October last, and this expenditure was incurred without the consent of parliament. Is there, in this country, a law clearer than that one, in the constitution, in the British North America Act, which says that every cent of expenditure by this government must be, not ratified, but decided upon by the House of Commons itself. I said that everything seems to be upside down in this House. I listened with very much attention this evening to the right hon. leader of the government. He claims that he was not without the law; he claims that he was not without the constitution. What does he say to uphold his own reasoning? He says that there are some cases of emergency in England that would permit a government to appropriate a certain amount of money without consent of parliament. I admit that, in this country, we have the very same permission, but under such circumstances as make it urgently and immediately necessary. Will my right hon. friend claim to-day that the sending of the contingents was necessary for Canada? Will he claim that it was necessary for England? He did not claim that when the first debate took place on the floor of this House, and he could not claim it any more to-night. The hon. leader of the opposition has committed quite a mistake, because, instead of calling upon the leader of the government to do his duty, he has offered to join hands with him. Instead of the hon. leader of the opposition saying: I am ready to back your action on the floor of the House, what would we have seen here to-day if he had opposed the government?

I have no doubt that we would have listened to a very similar debate to that which took place on the floor of the House in 1896. Gentlemen opposite told us then that the constitution was violated, but they are silent to-day, and I think I can easily show very plainly that the constitution is violated to-day much more than it was violated in 1896, when the Governor General's warrants were taken to pay the salaries justly due to officials. The ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) was the mover of a certain resolution in 1896 censuring the government for asking for a Governor General's warrant during the recess, not for a gratuity as to-day, but to pay some officials salaries. Mr. Foster said:

At the beginning of the discussion I will read the clause in the Audit Act which gives that authority. It is this: 'If, when parliament is not in session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof'—

I call the attention of the House to these very words. They are not a mere interpretation of the law, as the quotations made by the Prime Minister in his speech, but they are the actual words of the statute. They are:

— or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then, upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent.

Said the Minister of Finance:

These are the conditions sequent which never can have force and operate unless the conditions have place.

I will not speak, Sir, of the sending of the first contingent, but let me examine the circumstances surrounding the sending of the second contingent in order that we may once for all see whether it was an urgent necessity. The second contingent was offered to England more than four weeks before the contingent was ordered to depart. Was not this sufficient time in which to summon parliament and to have the matter decided by parliament itself? I do not see what reasoning any one in this House can bring against that argument. It is the argument brought out by hon. gentlemen opposite in a somewhat similar case, but not exactly a similar case, because there was good reason not to follow the parliamentary procedure in 1896, for the money was actually due to the civil servants of this country. There was nothing to be paid as a gratuity, and so it was a mere technicality to exact from the Liberal government then that they should have it decided by the House of Commons. I take it that I do not split hairs, and I do not stick to procedure no more in parliament than before a court of justice, when the right is not affected by the procedure. But when the right is affected by the procedure, and when the procedure is so urgent that if we do not follow it you are led to perpetrate an injustice instead of vindicating the law, then I say that procedure is a very important thing. The ex-Minister of Finance, in the course of his speech further said:

They both lay down the vital necessity of keeping the principle of parliamentary control, and keeping it intact; they both agree that the nature of the circumstances should be, as I have detailed, something that was unforeseen and not provided for, and that the mere necessity of an expenditure is not ground upon which a Governor General's warrant can be issued; and they agree in all their remarks in condemnation of a practice which contravenes and goes contrary to those well-understood and forcibly expressed principles which govern this matter.

Now, the very same hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has listened to this debate. He made quite a nice speech on the floor of this House on the address, and everything was all right to him, even from the constitutional point of view, although the very same gentleman argued very forcibly against what had been done by the Liberals in 1896. Mr. Foster said moreover:

As I said at first, it is the duty of every representative sitting in this House, no matter what his party views may be, to guard jealously the principle of parliamentary control, which is the outcome of centuries of trouble, which is essential to good and responsible government, and which we cannot allow to be violated and go back to our constituents and tell them that we have performed our duty. The question is not introduced with any other wish than to prevent the growth of a method of getting appropriations by what I must call a usurpation of power by the executive, such as has commenced within a few weeks of the accession to power of a new Liberal government; because if that usurpation is condoned in this case, you give the government a warrant in the future to nullify the power of this parliament over appropriations, and you strike a blow at the principles of parliamentary government.

The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden), who has been silent so far in this debate, made quite a strong speech on the very same question in 1896. He said:

That is the logical result of the argument of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I think it is not an argument which can commend itself to the members of the legal profession in this House; because if the government, after coming down to parliament with estimates, and having had those estimates refused by parliament, can proceed, by means of Governor General's warrant, to deal with the expenditures for the ordinary services of this country, then, as has been well said by the hon. member for York, parliamentary government in this country has indeed degenerated into a farce.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is now in his seat, and I suppose he is too serious a lawyer and too grave a man to wish to be an actor in what he calls a farce.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That vote had been brought before parliament and rejected; in this case it had not.

Mr. MONET. I beg your pardon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In that case, parliament had been asked to vote supplies, and then the government had proceeded to deal with the same matter by Governor General's warrant, which is an entirely different case from this.

Mr. MONET. What is the practical difference?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will tell the hon. gentleman if he permits me. In that case you could not in any sense of the word say that the expenditure was unforeseen. The statute uses the word 'unforeseen.' In the 1896 case, it was foreseen, but here it is unforeseen.

Mr. MONET. Well, I do not see any practical difference from the explanation which has been given by the hon. member. We all know the circumstances under which the estimates had been refused by the House in the first session of 1896; parliament expired by the efflux of time. I suppose my hon. friend wants to say now that because these estimates had been foreseen, but had been refused, that the government had no right to pay the salaries due to officials. It seems to me that that is not a very serious argument for my hon. friend to make, because if you say that the expenditure was unforeseen then what would he say to-day when some hon. gentlemen in this House, and perhaps he is one of them, say that this war was foreseen and that we were morally bound to assist in it in consequence of the resolution passed by parliament last July. It seems to me that his argument will disappear as soon as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) reflects on that. But the hon. member (Mr. Borden) said further:

It is a bad omen for this country that such should be the case, because a precedent of this kind is apt to be extended under circumstances which render it even more dangerous than it is at present. It may be, as hon. gentlemen have said, that this money has been applied properly for public services; it may be that, although they have gone beyond both the letter and the spirit of the statutes, there is no actual misfeasance. It may be that they have not violated their duty as trustees, but if a precedent like this is to be put before parliament, although the hon. gentleman disclaims that it should be used as a precedent, how do we know what may be the circumstances under which it should be used hereafter.

Another hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), said this:

You may be sure the money will be rightly spent, because we are an honest government, say the Liberals. It may be very well for them to say this, and to tell us that there is no danger; but I say there is danger in every violation of the constitution, even though it is a small violation, because bad precedents are always dangerous.

The hon. member for Pictou, (Sir C. H. Tupper), on the same occasion, referring to Mr. Foster, said:

The hon. gentleman went very briefly into that, but the invariable practice since the time of William III. in England has been not to spend a dollar except under the express provisions of the Appropriation Act. The clause that has given rise to this discussion, the clause of this statute that has been brought to your attention, Sir, to-day, has been frequently called a most peculiar provision. It was not intended to give great scope to the executive. It is not to be found in the English system. There is not in England a case where the executive can spend money that has not been appropriated by parliament. You may have in your mind the case of the army and navy and the government of a great empire, and the contingencies unforeseen and unprovided for nearly every session, but parliament has considered all that in the government of the mother country, and parliament there has declared that notwithstanding all that, there shall not be taken one farthing for any of these expenditures if the Appropriation Act—not a general statute or Audit Act such as we have here—does not make provision for these very purposes. And they take civil contingencies and the army and navy contingencies, and after having put in a list of the principal items that they can foresee, they put in a liberal amount for unforeseen or unprovided expenditure in connection with those important services, and the money is taken from no other source and no other way.

The hon. leader of the opposition a few days ago claimed that he knew full well the public opinion of this country; but it appears that he does not know the opinion even of his own family; for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper was of the opinion that under such circumstances the constitution had been violated, while the hon. leader of the opposition says that it is absurd to claim that the constitution has been violated under the present circumstances. Another hon. member whom I am glad to see in his seat, the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), on the same occasion said this:

The hon. member for South Oxford said that an ounce of common sense was worth a ton of precedents; but I apprehend, in this parliament, when we are commencing another term, that if the government of this country, a new government, has taken upon itself an utterly unconstitutional position and adopted an unconstitutional course, it behooves every man who is anxious for the welfare of this country and for the dignity of this parliament and for its efficiency, to present here the true claims of the constitution, of which we are all proud and which we all revere, and within whose bounds we roam, and be prepared to defend that constitution.

Again, he said :

The only excuse that can be given is that the government was in the woods and had to get out, and many hon. gentlemen seem to think that there was no alternative. I have shown that there was a constitutional alternative, that these hon. gentlemen who admitted that if there was a constitutional alternative the government was bound to take it, must condemn the course of the government as an invasion of the constitution, as overriding the control of parliament in a high-handed way, as a wanton breaking in of the very walls and citadel of our constitution, and as a course that deserves the condemnation of parliament, and such as will have the condemnation of the country.

My hon. friend says that such a violation of the constitution deserves the condemnation of the country. Well, what will become of him in his own riding, where his majority is just one vote, because he has condoned this violation of the law to-day, as I suppose he is prepared to condone it a second time by his vote to-night? The hon. gentleman said further :

What is the marginal note to the clause in question? It is 'accidents during recess.' So that a state of things which comprises asking votes for all the departments and for running the whole civil business of the country was foreseen by the ministry, which should have been allowed to provide for it; and you may just as well attempt to compress all the continent into a nutshell as to attempt to bring within four corners the extraordinary action of the government in the present instance. It is a course that cannot in any way be justified from the point of view of constitutional precedent, or from the point of view of that common sense which some hon. gentlemen would enthrone above constitutional usage.

Where is the common sense of the hon gentleman to-day? Has it been locked up in that nutshell of which he spoke in his speech of 1896? I do not see why he did not rise on this occasion and repeat that speech.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the law as thus interpreted by hon. gentlemen opposite in the speeches I have quoted is and always has been the law of this country. The question that remains to be put is this: Is this law that has been violated so important that we should stop and say, as the order in council says, let it not be done again. The question of precedent can present itself in two different ways. It can present itself, first, in regard to the unconstitutional way in which our participation in the Transvaal war has been forced upon Canada. In the second place, it can present itself by this question: Will this contribution of Canada to this war be a precedent for Canada contributing to any future war of Great Britain outside of Canada? I have said that I do not wish to be a hair splitter. I hope I shall not be considered either as a speculative reasoner. Speculative reasons stand opposite to practical reasons. Then, let us see what are the practical consequences of this action of the government if it is to serve as a precedent. If the procedure authorized by the order in council of the 14th of October last is to be followed as a precedent, we have no longer responsible government in this country. An expenditure of $2,000,000 has been incurred by the order in council of the 14th of October last without the sanction of parliament. If that procedure is to be followed in the first future war of Great Britain against another foreign power, any government, either Tory or Liberal, can do the same thing that this government has done. Now, let us suppose that instead of having war with a small population like that of the Transvaal, England should have to wage war against France, Germany or Russia. Taking the present contribution as a basis for the force that Canada would morally or directly feel bound to contribute to England in that war, any government would feel justified, not in sending 2,000 men and spending $2,000,000, as we have done this year, but it would feel justified in sending 25,000, 50,000 or perhaps 100,000 men, or as many Canadians as are wanted for this war. These 2,000 men are to cost Canada $2,000,000, and certainly 25,000 or 50,000 or 100,000 men would cost from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. I ask whether the action we are now called upon to approve will not be a precedent and a justification for any other government sending 25,000 men without consulting parliament, and for those who absolve to-day this government, how will they oppose without inconsistency, any government who will now do the same? In such a case, we would simply be called upon to do what we are called on to do to-day, namely, ratify what has been done. Is this responsible government? I may be told that even if our government, without the sanction of parliament, should spend $25,000,000 on a foreign war, which we were not obliged to take part in at all, we have nevertheless responsible government, because that government is always accountable to the House and the people. I am ready to take issue with any hon. gentleman on this very ground. Can we be said to have responsible government, if the House of Commons is to be called on simply to ratify what the government has done? I say no. Even if we had a large majority of this House opposed to the action of the government, that majority would have no power to undo what has been done. Parliament is simply to be called on to ratify what has been done already, there is no remedy. Take this very war and Canada's contribution as an illustration. We are committed to that expenditure of $2,000,000, a contract has been entered into without the sanction of parliament, and partly executed, and a certain amount of money has already been paid for the equipment and transportation of the soldiers to South Africa. Where is the human power in this House that could bring back that money to the treasury? The money has gone, the contract has been entered into and partly executed, and it is out of our power to undo what has been done. We are bound like slaves to do what the masters have done. I may be told that responsible government nevertheless exists, because the government may be turned out of office if they do wrong. That is what the Prime Minister has said: We have taken a great risk. That argument, Mr. Speaker, is a very poor one. There has not been a government since confederation that has been put out of power by its own ministerial partisans for any wrong-doing. A government can always rely on the support of its party men. Can you quote me a single instance where a government has been defeated since confederation by a vote of this House, when that government has had a majority in the House? Take the case of the Pacific scandal, the Governor General had to take the whip of authority into his own hands and dismiss his ministers. The House would not do it. Take the case of the Wellington Bridge, the McGreevy-Langevin scandal, and other scandals, and in every such case the government has always been upheld by its own party.

The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) exclaimed the other day: Are we going to bolt? Never did an interruption spring so straight from the heart of a good ministerialist. Are we going to bolt? If we do, farewell to power and all its sweets and blessings. If we bolt, we good Liberals are going to bring back to power these hon. gentlemen who have been sentenced by the will of the people, not to five years of the cool shades of opposition, but to the cool shades of opposition for life. Are we going to bolt? If we do, we are going to bring back to power men like the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), who declared at a banquet in St. John that he would have been glad if 5,000 Canadians had left Canada for the front. If we do, we are going to bring back to power the Conservatives, and we are Liberals. No, I understand too well the false position in which Liberals are placed to-day. I know that we are between the devil and the deep sea—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. MONET. I think the devil is at your left, Mr. Speaker, and the deep sea is between the two sides of the House. I think I have shown pretty conclusively that it is false to say we have responsible government, because the government is responsible to the House. Why, the advantage of responsible government for us consists specially in this, that the 200 members of this House living in their own constituencies are certainly in a better position to know the wishes and wants of their own constituents than the eighteen ministers who are always at the capital. But another strong reason is this, that the members of this House are not only jointly responsible for the actions of the government, but are also personally responsible to their own constituents. If, when a certain expenditure is incurred, I am to be held responsible for it by my constituents, I am entitled to the right to vote for that expenditure or against it before it is incurred. If I am deprived of that right, then I ought not to be held responsible. What would be the result of our voting to-day against what has been done? It was a mere mockery that the House was called to ratify the $2,000,000 expenditure. We could not help ratifying it. The money already spent and the blood shed in South Africa can never be replaced.

This resolution states further that if our military and political relations with Great Britain are to be changed, the will of the people should be ascertained by a vote of this parliament, subsequently approved by a kind of plebiscite or vote of the people.

The right hon. First Minister has quoted Mr. Todd to show that the government acted within the law when it sent the Canadian contingent to South Africa. Let me quote the very same authority against that doctrine, and he ought to be as good an authority when I quote him as when the right hon. gentleman quotes him. This constitutional writer says, on page 1852 of Parliamentary Government in England, 'that parliament is the voice of the people and the House of Commons the legitimate organ of the people.' Well, if parliament is the legitimate organ of the people, this strikes a blow at the argument of my right hon. friend this evening, because he did not call parliament. He took the press for the organ of the people. This motion very legitimately asks that parliament should be consulted when we are going to change our military relations. And not only parliament, but the people also should be consulted. I am democratic enough to say that I have great confidence in public opinion. But there are two different public opinions. There is one public opinion which is aroused by appeals to passion and obeys to first evil impulse; but there is another public opinion as enlightened by the public men and statesmen of the country. The spirit of British institutions is this, that the government represents a certain phase of public opinion and the opposition represents another, and every case has to be stated in a general election to the people, and the people are called upon to select the better view. I have confidence in public opinion, as enlightened by disinterested public men. Our Canadian history is full of glorious examples of this statesmanship. In the province of Ontario, for twenty-five years the fanatics have arrayed an army against the rights of the Catholic minority. There was a strong wave of public opinion in the province of Ontario against the rights of that minority. For twenty-five years these passions have been appealed to by the Tories of Ontario against the man whom they call the 'little old man,' and who is the present Lieutenant-Governor of this province. But 'the little old man,' for this quarter of a century, held in check all the armies of the fanatics of Ontario. Sir, when the question of the political execution of Riel was brought before this House, hon. members heard the famous indictment of the right hon. leader of the present government against the then Conservative government. The passion of fanaticisms in Ontario rose to such an extent that the hon. gentleman was challenged with a declaration that he would not dare to go before a public meeting in Toronto and repeat what he had said on the floor of this House. He was sure that he was right in his contention and was not afraid of the wave of public opinion. He went to Toronto. He went safe and he came back safe. He went a silver-tongued orator, and he came back the most powerful and successful orator of the country.

Mr. Speaker, if Richard Cobden had waited for a wave of public opinion before introducing the measure to repeal the corn laws in the House of Commons, that law which has made England the richest country in the world, would still be in the pigeon-hole of the Board of Trade of Manchester. If the anti-slavery agitators had waited to be helped by public opinion among coloured men, many of the coloured men, who are represented by some of their own race in the congress of the United States, would still be vile merchandise in that country. There has always been two kinds of public opinions, even in remote history. Who does not know that case of Scipio, called Africanus, because of his famous victory over Hannibal, the greatest of Rome's foes. When the famous saviour of Rome was accused by jealous enemies and brought to be tried before the public, he showed himself to the multitude and had only to say: Fellow-citizens, this is the anniversary of the battle of Zama; let us go to the Capitol and thank the gods that I have saved Rome from her most terrible enemy. If the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had stood by his interview in the Globe, if he had told the people of this country that we were not bound by law to do anything, and he would not force contributions from Canada to any foreign war, he would have been in the right, and, going to the country in general election on another 23rd of June, he could have said to the multitude: This is the anniversary of the day when, in 1896, I put out of power those Tories who plundered public resources for eighteen years—and I am sure the electorate would have sent him back to the capital as Premier.

I have only one word to add. My hon. friend from Labelle has said that the rights and liberties he is upholding have been always considered the sacred heritage of the English-speaking members of this House. I ask those English-speaking members to support my hon. friend's motion in the name of English constitutional history, for since 1711, by declaration passed unanimously in the House of Commons, it has been considered, not only a misdemeanour, but a crime to appropriate a single penny of public money for any other purpose than that for which it has been voted. To the Irish members of this House I appeal to support the motion of my hon. friend from Labelle in the name of the efforts their fellow-countrymen are making to recover responsible government in Ireland which they had kept even after the treaty of Limerick. To the French Canadians of this House, I appeal for support for this motion, in the name of our Canadian forefathers, who fought for over half a century for the liberties which we have been enjoying so long and with the loss of which we are now threatened. As my last word, let me quote an extract from the famous speech of Victor Hugo to those who were then disposed to displace the republic with another empire:

(Translation.)

O ye, Imperialists! What are you striving after? Are you aiming at destroying the Republic? I warn you here that you have there a big undertaking on your hands. Have you seriously considered the matter? When a workingman has worked for eighteen hours. . . . When a nation has worked for eighteen centuries. . . . And when, finally, they have received their reward, woe to the man who tries to despoil that workingman of his salary and that nation of its Republic. . . .

Sir, when the language of la belle France rises to such a height of eloquence, it is not possible to translate it into any foreign language. But, I leave these words with the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who understands French, praying him to believe that at the next general election, perhaps there will be more people of this country than he thinks who, by their votes, will take that very language of Victor Hugo.

Mr. CHARLES ANGERS (Charlevoix). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, although I am opposed, on principle, to Imperial federation, under any shape, still I felt disposed to give the government the benefit of such extenuating circumstances as are invoked in order to vindicate the policy of sending the Canadian contingents to South Africa. I quite realize that the government had to face a very critical state of affairs. And, weak as they proved themselves to be under those circumstances, still, compared with the hon. gentlemen opposite, who would have gone much further in the same direction, I failed to see how I could oppose the resolutions under consideration. Our volunteers have reached South Africa, on the strength of a pledge given them by the Crown. We are now asked to vote a sum of $2,000,000 to defray the expenditure incurred in connection with the sending of those contingents, and even were it in my power to do so, I do not think it would be advisable to disallow and nullify such a pledge. Moreover, in the face of a House the great majority of which does not, apparently at least, share in my views, I think it would have availed very little to propose a motion of want of confidence, which would have received the support of four or five members, all told, out of a House of 213 members. Still, I reserved for myself the right of registering my protest, at the proper time, against the resolution now before the House. But if we cannot undo what has been done in that connection, it is none the less our duty to safeguard the future, to the best of our ability.

The order in council providing for the sending of the first contingent contains a rider which has given rise to considerable debate. It is stated in the order in council that the action taken by the government cannot be construed as a precedent for future action. In my opinion, that clause was quite a sufficient barrier to oppose to any such future action, but it has been swept away by the action of the government in sending out a second contingent, and by the noisy militarism and the jingoist statements made later on.

Moreover, in Great Britain, they seem to be satisfied that the action taken by the Dominion government meets with general approval here, and that, whenever requested to do so, we will be ready to take part in the future wars of the empire, even by a mere order in council, and this, too, in defiance of the constitution which governs us. It seems therefore highly desirable that parliament, in the exercise of its sovereignty, should declare that the action taken in regard to the despatch of those troops should not be construed into an acceptance of a military federation or any other new departure from our settled policy, without their being first consulted. It is also highly desirable that parliament should declare that, in regard to any future war of the empire, and the sending of our troops out of the country, parliament, and even the electorate, shall have to be consulted, and will decide as to whether we will participate in any such war. In other words, I think that before going any further in the direction of Imperialism, the proper thing for parliament to do, when the war excitement has subsided, when there has been a little cooling off in public opinion, and the jingoistic feeling has worn off the minds of the people, would be to appeal to the electorate, in order to ascertain the feeling of the people in the different provinces. For, as you know very well, Sir, this new departure from our settled policy may disturb our whole political organization, and it would be unwise materially to alter the compact entered into at confederation, without first having such change sanctioned by the interested parties.

The motion of my hon. friend from Labelle affords us an opportunity of re-asserting those principles, thereby regaining as much as possible of the lost ground. Now, the government challenges the opportunity or the raison d'être of this motion, and declares that it cannot adopt it. I think, on the contrary, that there is opportunity for such a motion, as I will show later on.

I think it my duty to support the motion, and I beg the indulgence of the House while stating as fully as I can my views on the question.

Until about six months ago, Sir, it had never occurred to anybody in this country that it was our duty, and in our interest, to take part in the wars of the empire, outside of Canada, and yet, to-day, 2,000 of our fellow-countrymen are fighting and shedding their blood on the battlefields of South Africa, and our contribution to the war will probably amount to three or four millions of dollars. And in so doing, I hesitate not to say, that we have taken a bold step towards the military federation of the empire. And perhaps you will agree with me, Sir, if I say that in a matter of such moment, and considering that this new departure from the beaten path might disturb our whole political organization, the government have not acted the part of prudence in taking such a hasty action. And I may further say that I do not view without a feeling of alarm a position so pregnant with serious consequences, and one calculated to retard our progress and our development as a people; and this, I think, calls for our most serious consideration. We have just entered upon a very slippery path, but it is not yet too late to retrace our steps, to rein up, as it were, and to stop in our downward course. It is all very well to allow ourselves to be carried away by a feeling of loyalty; but let us consider a little whether we were bound to give the evidence of loyalty demanded of us by Mr. Chamberlain, and whether it was in our own interest to yield to his demands in that respect. Yielding to the promptings of our hearts in such a matter, would betray a sad ignorance of the traditions and ways of British diplomacy, which is much more practical than sentimental. The fact is that we are playing for a great stake, as the question now is no longer whether we are to contribute once for all to the defence of the empire, but whether we shall take part in all the wars of the empire, thus pledging our future. We have very readily taken the first step in the direction in which Mr. Chamberlain would lead us away. Do not let us fancy for a moment that he will now allow us to go back.

Now, what are the consequences of this new departure from our past policy? Have we not good reason to fear less it might involve us in all the wars in which Mr. Chamberlain, or any other Colonial Secretary, may engage, in the future? We are now threatened with a heavy war expenditure, at the very time when we need all our resources for the development of our growing country. Does not this new policy imply also that our young men will be forced to enlist, in order to go and fight England's battles in every quarter of the globe, at a time when we are incurring heavy expenditures for inducing foreigners to come and settle down in our midst and develop the country?

But, Sir, what have we been told here to-day by the government? 'We did not pledge,' they said, 'the future of the country. What we did, we did of our own free will, and as to taking part at any future period in any war England may be engaged in, we will decide the question on its merits and contribute to the military expenditure of the empire as we think fit.' This is, to my mind, taking an altogether erroneous view of the position; it is sheer illusion. You have driven the first wedge into the constitution, and, as we all know from experience, the stability of the whole fabric is impaired, when, under the plea of an imaginary urgency, we could not decline contributing to a war which, at the outset, seemed quite insignificant, and which to a great many people appeared to be unjust, how, I ask, shall we be able to offer a stronger and more efficacious opposition than we did at first? As I have said, it is high time for us to retrace our steps; let us, then, rein up; let us recover the lost ground, or else we shall have, in the future, to wage war at the request and for the benefit of the empire. For, we cannot dissemble the fact that this direct or indirect invitation by the Colonial Office to send troops, and all those offers, provoked through the governors or other agencies, are not to be looked upon as mere accidents. They constitute the first step in a well matured scheme to bring about Imperial federation; they constitute, as it were, the first instalment of patriotism paid by the colonies.

There is no doubt an element of grandeur in that huge scheme, the ultimate object of which is British predominance throughout the whole world. But, Sir, if we look a little closer into the matter, we may easily find out that, even in the opinion of eminent and patriotic British statesmen, such a scheme would be fraught with danger and would prove unpracticable, on three different grounds. First, that federation would add new fuel to the pride and self-love of the British people, and would tend to develop beyond all measure their love of conquest. As England became a menace to the rest of the world, the great powers would enter into a coalition to crush her. Besides, how could this huge machinery be set in motion and made to work permanently, clogged as it would be by a conflict of imperial and colonial interests, the more so as the colonies, having no adequate representation, would have to engage in wars they would disapprove of, without having it in their power to prevent or control them. Another objection is that, while thus contributing under those conditions to the wars of the empire, outside of their own territory, the colonies would often be the losers by it, a fact they would soon find out to their own cost. As a result, this huge and unwieldy machinery would soon break to pieces, and the empire, through an inordinate desire of expansion, would be considerably curtailed. Selfishness, Sir, always holds a large place in political schemes. People are apt to forget that the motto: 'The colonies for the colonies,' still holds good and underlies the whole policy of the colonies. And the moment the dream of Imperialism, having assumed a definite shape, appeared in the eyes of the colonies too burdensome a charge, British connection in several cases would be severed. Those are the reasons why, in my view, the scheme of Imperial federation would prove injurious both to Great Britain and to several of her colonies.

But in order the better to understand the burdens we would be loaded with in the future, should we persevere in the course we have entered upon, let us figure it out a little. Where we are called on now to contribute over 2,000 men and from three to four million dollars, when Great Britain, with a population of 40,000,000 inhabitants and her immense resources wishes to crush down two puny peoples with a population of about 300,000 people, what would happen if she had to face a first-class power? Within the last fifty years, Great Britain has been engaged in no less than 30 wars in the different quarters of the world. Other wars, and very likely more serious wars, will no doubt follow this war. The dream of a vaster empire, will no doubt whet the appetite of the people and bring about fresh difficulties. Mr. Chamberlain's quarrelsome temper and his restlessness will, no doubt, prompt him to pick up some new quarrel, like the Fashoda affair, or to discover some fresh 'casus belli,' manufactured out of the cartoons published by the Paris papers.

At all events, the government thought it their duty, by their order in council of October 13 last, to accept the invitation of the Colonial Office and thus to sanction the principle of our participation in the wars of the empire. The government, no doubt, assumed a great responsibility when they took such an important step without consulting parliament. That action was such a flagrant violation of the constitution that nobody undertook to deny it.

It is not to be inferred therefrom that I would have approved of the sending out of troops by a vote of parliament, since I am opposed to Imperial federation under any shape and to all that may lead to it. I would rather the government had declined accepting the invitation of the Colonial Office, even if they had had to suffer from their action.

Too much stress cannot be laid, no doubt, on the importance of that elementary principle of parliamentary government, that no expenditure is to be incurred unless with the previous sanction of parliament, except in cases of unforeseen emergency. But, from another point of view, I find the order in council still more regrettable. As a matter of fact, the action taken by the government is nothing more nor less than a formal adhesion to Mr. Chamberlain's Imperialistic policy; and that is no doubt the construction he puts upon it, as he declared a few years ago that the colonies would shrink before no sacrifice, to secure the success of his policy.

But the government, with the almost unanimous approval of this House, invokes the plea of urgency and the unmistakable expression of public opinion. For my part, Sir, I fail to understand what they mean here by urgency. Why, they cannot possibly mean to say that Great Britain, with her 40,000,000 inhabitants and with unlimited resources, needed the assistance of our volunteers to enable her to crush down the small Boer nation, aggregating about 300,000 people, more or less. At all events, it is a spectacle truly illustrative of the triumph of might over right, in this so-called century of progress and enlightenment, that such a military force has to be sent out to crush down a puny people! Here, again, practical business sense prevails over the cause of the chivalrous, and forebodes more success than glory. But, then, Sir, if there was no necessity, there was no urgency, except that the government were anxious to satisfy Mr. Chamberlain that we were willing to co-operate in the carrying out of his favourite scheme, the military federation of the empire. No wonder that, under the influences of that excitement which was prevailing throughout the country, and which accounts for the fact of their having covered much ground within such a limited time, they failed to grasp the full meaning, or rather the futility of that plea of urgency. Public opinion, they thought, was so loud and so unanimous that there was no other alternative for the government but to give way to it.

Sir, I know that a great deal of deference should be paid, under democratic institutions, to public opinion, still I do not think it ought to be accepted as an infallible guide, more especially, when the popular mind is in a fever and party spirit is raging in the land. By how many futile causes is not public opinion liable to be influenced? And when it goes astray, is it not the duty of prudent and far-sighted statesmen to resist it, instead of giving way to it. If my memory serves me right, we Liberals always did oppose Imperial federation. Is it not our duty, then, to oppose whatever may lead us to it? Statesmanship, I think, is not summed up in the opportunism of the men who try to make political capital out of everything. There are principles, Sir, to uphold which it is necessary for statesmen to battle hard and even to fall on the field! Now, under the circumstances, I think that the government, while standing on the constitution, and invoking the desirability of not wantonly committing themselves to a new policy and taking a new departure, under the pressure of public opinion, swayed as it was by enthusiasm, and without parliament having first been consulted, the government, I say, could have opposed a strong and reasonable line of defence and resistance to the onslaught of public opinion. By appealing to the public press, and the good sense of the masses, I think they could have successfully withstood that current of jingoism, combined with party spirit and the lust of power. For my part, I have too much respect for the practical good sense of my English-speaking fellow-countrymen not to believe that they will come later on to realize, when their enthusiasm has cooled off, that they have everything to lose by participating in the wars of the empire.

Unfortunately, there was no serious attempt at checking the spreading of that jingoist movement throughout the country. Too few people, even among our English-speaking fellow-countrymen, have dared to think aloud. Through jingoism, and for the purpose of making political capital, almost everybody did give way, under the pressure brought to bear upon public opinion.

Now, Sir, what happened in the Australian colonies, when those who deprecated any participation in the wars of the empire, were bold enough to speak out their mind. There are colonies where British blood flows as warm and devotion to the mother country is as intense as it is here, and yet, the expression of opinion against participation in the war was very strong.

Moreover, what evidence is there of the consensus of public opinion? Is it to be found in the campaign of the public press? But, Sir, the public prints are not the medium through which public opinion is conveyed to the Executive, under the constitution which governs us. What guarantee of good faith and moral certainty does the public press afford us? Is it not nowadays more than ever the courtesan par excellence, and is it, after all, so very hard to secure its services, at a given juncture?

Moreover, this expression of public opinion was not so unanimous as they pretend. Without taking the time of the House in hunting up through the files of the papers published in the English-speaking provinces for expressions of opinion against our participation in the wars of the empire, let me recall here the formal protest registered by Goldwin Smith and Principal Grant, men whose ability and clear-sightedness are beyond question. But besides, it is not right and proper, in order to form a proper estimate of the true feelings of the people of Canada, to make allowance for the jingoistic statements of the ultras who declare that they are disposed to contribute to the wars of Great Britain to our very last dollar, to our very last man, so as to remove from the mind of the mother country any suspicion as to our loyalty. For, if I understand aright, it is on the feelings given expression to that they take ground to jump to the conclusion that there is an almost unanimous consent of opinion in this country in favour of our participation in the Transvaal war? But the House will agree with me that it was only a small minority who could make their voices heard on that question. Now, if out of that small minority, we make allowance for all those who were led to giving expression to their feelings through party interest, through fear and on the spur of the moment, what is there left as an adequate expression of public opinion? Let us take, for instance, the hon. leader of the opposition, who, more than any one else, has contributed to agitate public opinion. Would it be fair, if you wish to know what he thinks in the bottom of his soul, and to probe his innermost thoughts, would it be fair, I say, to take too literally his inflamed speeches on the question? If we bear in mind that the hon. gentleman opposed Joseph Howe, when the latter started his imperialistic campaign in 1866; and that he declared that it was no concern of ours to go fighting around the world the battles of the empire; that he gave it to understand, but a few months ago, that the only reasonable and practicable means for us to give military aid to the empire was by fortifying and developing Canada, as we had done so far; further, that he wanted, in 1885 Great Britain to bear the whole expenditure of the contingent which General Laurie had proposed to enlist; when, I say, one bears all this in mind, one cannot help wondering how suddenly the hon. gentleman has abjured such dispassionate and moderate views, and has turned into such a thunderbolt of war. Very likely the hon. gentleman, when it occurred to him that by stirring up a certain current of opinion, he could demolish a French Canadian Prime Minister, was satisfied that it was Imperial federation that he should advocate for the moment, reserving to himself later on to resume a less bellicose attitude.

Mr. ANGERS.

I only referred to those facts to show that sometimes the most patriotic speeches happen to prove very little.

Prior to enforcing the prohibition of the sale and manufacture of intoxicating drinks throughout the Dominion, the government thought it proper, although public sentiment had proved to be favourable to that scheme in the different provinces, through a duly registered vote at the polls—to refer the matter to the people by means of a plebiscite. Now, why should the opportunity of a similar step be challenged, when the question at issue is more important? But even supposing that there was a perfect consensus of opinion throughout the English-speaking provinces in favour of the action taken by the government, it is none the less true, as a matter of fact, that there was no such unanimity in the Dominion at large, the dissentient voice being that of the people of the province of Quebec. Without lacking loyalty, the people of that province have still a vivid recollection of all the struggles they had to go through and of the price they had to pay for the conquest of the liberties they now enjoy. Satisfied as they are that the constitution is their safeguard of those liberties, they are adverse to any change in the political conditions of the country, and they do not want to embark in any new venture which might prove a fruitful source of disappointment. They do not want the ties which bind them to the empire to be drawn closer, except from a commercial standpoint. Participating in the wars of Great Britain would, in their opinion, prove injurious to the best interests of Canada. Even an Imperial federation, involving a right to representation in the British parliament would not appeal with any greater force to their patriotism. The province of Quebec was a contracting party to the pact of confederation. Had not the people of that province an incontrovertible right to have their voice heard, before any attempt at disturbing our political organization was made?

As to the merits of the war, I have little to say. The justice or the injustice of this war is, to my mind, a matter which calls for serious consideration. To participate in a national spoliation is by no means such a glorious undertaking. The tears and the curses of a whole nation which is being crushed down, while defending its freedom, are a dreadful anathema.

To tell you the truth, Sir, I have my misgivings about this our first participation in the wars of the British Empire. For my part, this in an unjust, an oppressive, a stupid war, and one the consequences of which are to be dreaded by the empire. Had the English people been given an opportunity of having their voice heard, I am satisfied that the humanitarian and reasonable policy invoked by Mr. Gladstone in 1881, after the Majuba Hill disaster, would again have been successfully carried out. Had it not been for that dream of a greater empire, so fondly cherished by Messrs. Chamberlain and Rhodes; had it not been for the bait of the Transvaal gold mines, the richest mines of the world, and for other matters of a purely private and material character, the spirits of conciliation would have prevailed over the voice of strife; but, unfortunately, statesmanship and diplomacy, owing to the above causes, were thwarted in their action, and instead of those differences being submitted to a tribunal of arbitration, as proposed by president Kruger, a course which would probably have averted the actual conflict, war was declared. As to the stand I take on this question, I may say it is grounded upon the opinion of a large portion of the English people and of impartial and clear-sighted men like Messrs. Morley Bryce, Sir Edward Clarke and the Hon. Edward Blake; and further, upon the almost unanimous opinion of the civilized world which condemns and stigmatizes this war.

The motion praying for peace, which was brought down in the English House of Commons, has been the object of many strictures. An hon. gentleman whom we all admire and respect, the Hon. Edward Blake deemed it his duty to give his support to that motion. For my part, Sir, I do not understand the reason why that motion was so severely reflected upon. If this war is unjust, no matter how distasteful such a course might prove to human pride, there still would remain something to be gained from putting a stop to the conflict. For, if the Boers, as they believe, are battling for a just and holy cause, the cause of freedom, and if the armies of Great Britain succeed in crushing them down, shall Great Britain derive much benefit from it? Unforeseen difficulties might crop up, which would greatly curtail, nay, even do away altogether with the profits in sight. Nations, no more than individuals, cannot prosper or build up anything durable upon injustice. But, now, as to our participating in such a war, as I said, we were in no way bound to give such a proof of our loyalty. On what ground could Great Britain question our loyalty? Is it not above suspicion? That appeal to our loyalty was only a flimsy pretense under which to disguise the secret move of the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Chamberlain, who was aiming at securing our adhesion to his pet scheme, Imperialism.

Our constitution, Sir, is a gift from Great Britain. Nowhere does it impose upon us any participation in England's wars. How, I ask, while we stand within those limits, could our loyalty be suspected?

In this connection, Sir, I may here refer to the charge of disloyalty brought against the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, and I invite the attention of my fellow-countrymen to the fact that those accusations, are the work of tory newspapers and of tory gentlemen in this House, followers of the hon. leader of the opposition. I need not, Sir, take up the time of this House in confuting such lies.

The French Canadians have learned how to reconcile their loyalty to England with their undying love for France. Our loyalty, Sir, has stood the test of over a hundred years. In 1775, the French Canadians remained true to England, in spite of the alluring offers of the revolted Britishers in New England; in spite of the still more insidious offers of Lafayette and d'Estaing, who had come over from France to help the young American republic. And if you bear in mind, Sir, that this occurred just a few years after the cession of New France to Great Britain, at a time when the hearts of our ancestors were still bleeding at the remembrance of their old mother country, you may infer therefrom what it meant to them to remain true to England. Again in 1812, the French Canadians showed their loyalty to Great Britain, and sealed it with their blood, when three hundred of them, under the command of Colonel de Salaberry repelled the efforts of the American invaders, at Chateauguay, one of the most brilliant feats of arms recorded in our history. Had the French Canadians not remained loyal to Great Britain, Canada, the brightest gem of the empire, would long have been lost to her. Besides, do we not give daily instances of our loyalty, through our faithful compliance with the laws and our respect for the constitution which governs us?

As to those who outrage our feelings, let me refer them to what Lord Dufferin said in 1878, in a speech delivered at Quebec, about the loyalty of the French Canadians:

I am well aware that in none of our colonies, not even in Great Britain, are there to be found more devoted subjects than the French Canadians.

The bad citizens, are those fanatics who through lack of patriotism are trying to arouse religious and national animosities in this country.

Now, Sir, to come back to the motion now before us, I say this: that the principles embodied in that motion are incontrovertible, and I think it is desirable that we should affirm them. The order in council passed on October 13 last, constituted a violation of the prerogatives of parliament inasmuch as a large expenditure was incurred without the previous sanction of parliament. Further, inasmuch as an important step was taken by the executive towards Imperial federation, without consulting parliament.

Let us affirm here the sovereignty of parliament, so as to avoid the repetition of similar abuses in the future. Let us be positive, and let us realize, if we can, what would be the consequences if, every time Great Britain was involved in a war, the government in power, either Liberal or Conservative, by a mere order in council, undertook to contribute to that war.

The government, after full consideration of the matter, and no doubt, in their honest conviction, deemed it proper and desirable to embody in that order in council a clause stating that they did not intend their action to be taken as a precedent. It was on good ground that the government added that rider to the order in council, that this should not be drawn into a precedent, because, for any unbiassed mind, the sending of those contingents obviously means an endorsement of the Imperial policy, the more so as Great Britain stood in no need of such assistance, and required no such proof of our loyalty.

But what became of that clause, later on, as events succeeded each other? I do not think it would be unfair to pretend that it has now a very restricted meaning and that it is a very frail barrier to oppose to militarism. Four weeks later, without being at all called upon to do so, when Mr. Chamberlain had asked only for 500 men and we had sent over 1,000 to South Africa, did not the government of their own free will, decide to send out another contingent of 1,000 men? Have they not just decided to send 100 men to take the places of those who fell on the battlefields? And should as many men fall to-morrow on the field, according to the principle laid down, they should also be replaced, I presume, by a new batch of volunteers. It will thus be seen, from what is being done under this new policy, that the rider in question amounts to very little, as a safeguard.

Now, Sir, if to all that I have already said I were to add all the opinions expressed in this House, in the public prints and elsewhere, and were I to quote, for instance, that notable expression of opinion from the hon. Minister of the Militia and Defence, at Halifax, namely, that: 'The sending of those contingents really constitutes a precedent and we mean to stick to it': would not all that look like a strong current of Imperialism, apparently implying our unanimous consent to Canada participating in all the wars of England in the future whenever the Colonial Office deemed it fit to invite our co-operation?

Why, Sir, the impression now prevailing in Great Britain is that we are ready to take part in all their wars to come. And, should you require any further evidence, you need only glance over the public prints; you need only peruse Mr. Chamberlain's statement, 'that he is now satisfied that all the colonies are ready to share in the risks and burdens of the empire'; you need only recall what Mr. Wyndham stated, a few days ago, 'that, owing to the position taken by the colonies, the defence of the empire is no longer a matter for anxiety.'

Now, Sir, is it not highly desirable that such an impression should not be allowed to prevail abroad, and that we should let it be understood that we do not wish to go any further in the same direction without more mature consideration of the matter. And the means for us to do so is, that parliament declare, by the motion now before us, that nothing that has been done or said so far should be drawn into a precedent.

Before resuming my seat, Sir, and to sum up, I say this: that, owing to the critical position we are in, owing to the important interests at stake, and in view of such changes in our social and political conditions as might disturb our political organization, it is only fair and desirable that the voice of the people should be heard. As soon as the present enthusiasm shall have worn off the minds of the people and we shall have realized the cost of the war, then will be the time to put the question to the electorate. As each province was a contracting party to the constitution which governs us, each province will have a right to freely express its opinion. And here, again, the motion now before us contains all that is required to that effect, as it declares that 'it opposes any change in the political and military relations which exist at present between Canada and Great Britain, unless such change is initiated by the sovereign will of parliament and sanctioned by the people of Canada.'

This motion, therefore, contains those constitutional principles which underlie our representative system, and which it is highly desirable that we should reassert here. In this motion is also embodied the principle which the government wished to safeguard in its order in council, by inserting a rider which has now lost nearly all its efficacy, for the reasons I have already referred to. And although it is with reluctance that I have to abandon my party on this question, still, I think it my duty to do so and to vote in favour of the motion.

Mr. L. A. CHAUVIN (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I think, members of this House are not open to blame, when they invoke the constitution and the rights of parliament with regard to the sending of the Canadian contingents to South Africa.

The right hon. gentleman has confessed that, from a constitutional standpoint, his action was debatable, and the government, in the order in council passed on October 14, 1899, deemed it expedient to declare that their action in connection with the expenditure incurred for this war cannot be regarded as a departure from the principles of constitutional government nor construed as a precedent. Here is what is stated, page 29 of the correspondence laid on the Table, in connection with the sending of the military contingents to South Africa :

The Prime Minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament, especially as such an expenditure under such circumstances cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

I congratulate the government upon having inserted that rider in their order in council; but I would still more warmly congratulate them, had they not violated the same.

I do not know who it was who said that treaties were framed to be infringed upon; and I might, on good ground, apply the same to the government of the day, and say that their orders in council are no sooner framed than violated.

But if the government deemed it proper to insert that order in their order in council, in order to allay the alarms of public opinion, I hold that parliament has still stronger grounds for declaring that the action of the cabinet was a serious blow struck at the independence and sovereignty of parliament, and that, in the future, such changes as might be made in the political and military relations existing between Canada and Great Britain should be initiated by parliament itself and sanctioned by the people of Canada. But they object that the constitution is not at stake in the present juncture and the right hon. Prime Minister declared that we had acted in the full independence of our sovereign power.

The colleagues of the right hon. gentleman and all the English-speaking members of this House vie with each other in crying out to the Prime Minister: 'Offer still more troops to Great Britain, and contribute still more to the expenditure in connection with the wars of the empire!' Why, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, the other day, at Halifax, upon the occasion of the departure of the second contingent, was heard to scoff at the 'no precedent' clause, embodied in the order in council passed by the government of which he is a member. And after that, the right hon. Prime Minister and his followers who have been returned here by a majority of the Quebec electorate, will come down and tell us here and before the country that the Manitoba school question is settled and that the constitution is safe!

Sir, I hesitate not to say that, with regard to the expenditure incurred for the contingents sent out to South Africa, as well as in connection with the school question, the Liberal party have put in the scales of the balance on one side of the constitution, and in the other, power. The constitution was weighed and proved to be lighter than power and the love of power has turned the scales.

When the Manitoba school question was under their consideration, the government appealed to the spirit of conciliation, and when the question of sending contingents of volunteers to South Africa was debated, they appealed to public opinion, and in both cases, they laid aside and discarded the action and intervention of parliament, who is the only sovereign judge in such matters. The government of the day, Sir, will be held responsible by our future historians for the violation of the constitution with regard to both these questions; and I hope that, at the next elections, the electorate of this Dominion will also hold them responsible for the same.

Now, the Liberal press, more particularly in the province of Quebec, upbraids the Conservative party for having in their ranks fanatics belonging to another province, and for being controlled by them. Why, Sir, they talk of our being under the control of fanatics, but let me ask them why it is, that being so free of such a pest and having in their ranks only independent men, as they pretend, they cannot redeem the pledges given the Quebec electorate in 1896, and how is it that, of late, they have not acted upon the suggestions of La Patrie, with regard to the calling of parliament and the participation of Canada in the wars of the empire?

That the alliance entered into between Lafontaine and Baldwin, and later on confirmed by Morin, Cartier and other leaders of the Conservative party, has at times been more or less violently sprained. I will not attempt to deny, and the wonder is that the patience of the allies from the province of Quebec was not altogether exhausted. But, on the other hand, I cannot but loudly proclaim here, in these days when political felony is rampant, that the leaders of the Conservative party in whose hands were placed the flag and the honourable traditions of our party for safe-keeping, from Baldwin down to Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper, never failed to affirm in their programmes and in their speeches the doctrine of equal rights for both the French and the English elements in the Conservative party, on the ground of constitutional, religious and national freedom.

I cannot pass over in silence the fact that, during the last electoral campaign, our present leader did take on the school question a position for which the electorate of the province of Quebec Conservatives as well as Liberals, are greatly indebted to him. On the other hand, I cannot but assume on the question at issue such an independent attitude as I promised to adopt in this House, on all the questions in which the province of Quebec is interested.

The right. hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) found fault with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) for not having moved his amendment either upon the address, when that subject was debated at length, or upon the motion presented to the House by the hon. the Minister of Finance, in order to make good the expenditure incurred for sending a military contingent to South Africa. I am free to say that, from the standpoint of parliamentary procedure, that objection seems to be well taken. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman could not do otherwise than bringing down his proposition during the present session. He owed it to his constituents, he owed it to the country and he owed it to the respect which he rightly professes for the constitution. But I must express here my surprise at hearing the right hon. Prime Minister upbraiding the hon. member for Labelle, after having himself declared, as well as his followers, on all the hustings in the province of Quebec, that we were to blame on this side of the House for not having proposed to parliament motions of censure of want of confidence against the government, for not having redeemed the pledges given to the electorate on the Manitoba school question.

The hon. member for Labelle deserves credit for the courage he has shown in bringing up his amendment; and in this he has evinced more courage than several other hon. gentlemen would have dared to show under similar circumstances. I do not hesitate to assume the risk attached to his action, being given the actual feeling of the House.

This proposition blames the government for not having summoned parliament previous to sending out the military contingent to South Africa. I willingly give it my support, and to borrow Montaigne's remark—supposing that the amendment is defeated—'there are defeats which are more glorious than certain victories.'

House divided on the amendment (Mr. Bourassa).

Amendment negatived.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, the House would not wish me to proceed with the original motion for supply, and, I therefore ask the leave of the House to withdraw the motion.

Motion (Mr. Fielding) withdrawn.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any of those returns coming down yet. There are a number of them that are very short, and it is simply carelessness that they are not down. There is one, for instance, from the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), and all he has to do is to ask his officers to put the papers together. It is in reference to those who were invited, or appointed to take the staff course at Kingston.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Foster), got one of the papers the other day.

Mr. FOSTER. I am thankful for small mercies.

The PRIME MINISTER. I believe they will come down to-morrow. I am pressing for them.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 89)—from the Senate—to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

Bill (No. 90)—from the Senate—respecting the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories.—(Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

Bill (No. 91) respecting the Oshawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Hurley.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Royal Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. EVARISTE TALBOT.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is Mr. Evariste Talbot, of Fraserville, F.Q., in the employment of the government?
2. If so, what is the position held by the said Talbot?
3. What is his salary?

4. What are his duties and functions?
5. What is the name of the person whom he has replaced in the said position?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Can my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) give us any particulars as to the department he is employed in? We cannot find him by the name of Talbot.

Mr. CASGRAIN. In the Railway Department.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let the question stand.

EXPORT OF CHEESE TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

How many pounds of cheese were exported from Canada to Great Britain in each year from July 1, 1896, until the present time?

As I have the figures here for the last six months they seem very large.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There ought to be no excuse for a mistake. They are all published in the book already issued and in the hands of members.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. All except for the last six months. And it is with reference to that period that I say the figures are very large.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the minister say they are not correct?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not say that, but they appear to be very large, and I will inquire about them again.

EXPORT OF BACON FROM CANADA TO GREAT BRITAIN.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER AS HIGH COMMISSIONER IN LONDON.

Mr. DOMVILLE asked :

1. When was Sir Charles Tupper appointed High Commissioner for Canada in London?
2. At what salary was he appointed?
3. How long did he fill the position?
4. What sums were paid him each year as such High Commissioner?
5. What sums were paid him by way of allowances for travelling and other personal expenses?
6. Did the government supply him with house rent free? If so, what was the cost of such house?
7. Who paid the taxes and rates for the house?
8. If the government paid any of the taxes and rates for the house or for Sir Charles Tupper, how much was so paid by the government?
9. Was any deduction made from the salary of the said Sir Charles Tupper when, in 1887 and 1891, he came to Canada?
10. If he drew pay from the government as High Commissioner in London whilst he was in Canada, is it the intention of the government to take any steps to recover the amount, if the same could be recovered?
11. What was the total sum paid by the government to Sir Charles Tupper for salary and allowances of all kinds as High Commissioner in London?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). 1, 2 and 3. Sir Charles Tupper was appointed High Commissioner 24th May, 1884, at the statutory salary of $10,000 a year. He filled the position until 26th January, 1887, when he was appointed Minister of Finance. He was re-appointed 24th May, 1888, and filled the position until 14th January, 1896. 4. Sir Charles Tupper was paid at the rate of $10,000 a year while he was High Commissioner as above indicated. The total amount so paid was $103,172.03. 5. $23,830.34. 6. The government bought a house for the use of the High Commissioner. Such house cost, with the furniture, $42,702.50. 7. The government. 8. $8,914.74. 9. No deduction was made from the salary of Sir Charles Tupper when he was High Commissioner. 10. The question has not been considered. 11. $127,002.37.

BRITISH WEST INDIES—IMPORTS OF FLOUR.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

How many barrels of flour are imported yearly into the British West Indies?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is not possible to give the exact figures called for, for reason that many of the West Indian islands do not publish statistics showing details of imports and exports ; but as the principal islands do publish such, a close approximation can be easily arrived at, which (taking the last published figures as far as they go) would be about as follows : Trinidad, 169,672 barrels ; Jamaica, 134,800 barrels ; Barbados, 67,691 barrels ; Granada, 22,916 barrels ; the Islands of St. Vincent and St. Lucia (which together with Granada form what is termed the Windward Islands) can be estimated on the basis of population, which is about double that of Granada, at 45,000 barrels ; Leeward Islands at 50,000 barrels ; Bahama at 30,000 barrels ; various minor islands at about 20,000 barrels ; giving a total of, say 540,000 barrels ; to this might be added British Guiana, which although not in the West Indies is usually grouped with them, the imports into which last year were 177,731 barrels ; or a gross total of 718,000 barrels. Inasmuch as the imports of flour into the islands is, with the exception of the small quantity from Canada, exclusively from the United States, the figures can be checked by the exports from the United States, which for the past four years show an average in round numbers of 530,000 barrels to the British West Indies, which probably includes Bermuda, not taken into account above, and an average of 177,489 barrels into British Guiana, or a total from the United States of 707,489 barrels.

CANADIAN EXPORTS OF FLOUR.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

How many barrels of flour have been exported from Canada yearly since July, 1893, and to what countries?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). They are as follows :

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES—CANADA AND WEST INDIES.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the government to take steps to improve transportation facilities between Canada and the British West Indies? If so, what steps?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Steps have been taken in connection with the Imperial government for a faster and a better service between Canada and the West Indian Islands, full details of which, with copy of the contract entered into, were laid before the House at its last session, and the contract was approved by resolution of the House on the 5th of August, 1899. Vide Votes and Proceedings, No. 97. This improved service takes effect from the 1st of July next.

ST. THOMAS POSTMASTER.

Mr. McMILLAN asked :

1. Has Mr. W. H. Ingram, postmaster at St. Thomas, been suspended?

2. If so, why?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply, I beg to say : 1. Yes. 2. On account of his inefficient management of the post office.

Mr. PATERSON.

MILES OF RAILWAY IN OPERATION.

Mr. BELL (East Prince) asked :

How many miles of railways are in operation in the Territories and in each province of Canada? Is it the intention of the government to extend the government system of railways westerly beyond the city of Montreal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The following is a statement of the number of miles of railway in operation in the Territories and British Columbia :

	Miles.
Ontario	6,779
Quebec	3,312
New Brunswick	1,420
Nova Scotia	909
Prince Edward Island	210
Manitoba	1,563
British Columbia	1,129
North-west Territories	1,928

17,250

The above mileage is taken from the Railway Statistics. 2. It has not been decided to extend the government system of railways westerly beyond the city of Montreal.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

How many acres of land, since July 1, 1896, were granted in aid of railway construction in Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia? To what companies was such aid granted, and how much to each company? Have the various companies earned all the lands so granted in aid of such railways? If not, how much has been earned, and by what companies? Have the patents been issued to the various companies entitled thereto?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No railway company has been subsidized by a land grant by the Dominion since the 1st July, 1896.

MONEY SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) asked :

What amount of money was voted by parliament and paid in aid of railways in Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, between July 1, 1879, and July 1, 1896, and to what companies respectively?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). In reply to the hon. member, I beg to say: The amount of money voted by parliament and paid in aid of railways in Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, between the first day of July, 1879, and the first day of July, 1896, is as follows :

	Amount voted.	Amount paid.
Manitoba—
Canadian Pacific Ry.Co..	$ 3,017,500	$ 3,017,500
North-west Territories—
Canadian Pacific Ry. Co..	7,382,500	7,382,500
Manitoba and North-west- ern Ry.	320,000
British Columbia—
Canadian Pacific Ry. Co..	5,035,000	5,035,000
Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. —Revelstoke to Arrow Lake	80,000	28,000
Columbia and Kootenay Ry....	112,000	88,800

Shuswap and Okanagan Ry.....	163,200	163,200
For a line from junction of Elk and Kootenay rivers to Coal Creek, 34 miles	108,800
For a line from Abbots- ford station, on the Mission branch of the Canadian Pacific Ry. to the town of Chilliwack.	67,200
Total	$17,157,800	$16,582,760

LEGAL QUALIFICATIONS OF A SENATOR.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

1. Is a person required, by law, to be possessed of any property in order to be qualified legally to occupy the position of a member of the Senate of Canada? If so, what are the property qualifications required by the law?

2. Are there any members of the Senate of Canada not possessed of the property qualifications required by law? If so, what are their names?

3. Is a person appointed to the Senate required, at any time or times, to make oath as to his property qualification to the Senate? If so, when?

4. Has each member of the Senate made oath as to the possession of the necessary qualification?

5. What is the effect on the seat of a Senator of his not having the necessary property qualification? If the effect is to render him liable to forfeit his seat in the Senate, what is the procedure necessary in order to establish his having forfeited such seat?

6. Is a member of the Senate required to possess residential qualification for the Senate? If so, what is the nature of such residential qualification?

7. What, if any, members of the Senate do not possess the required residential qualification?

8. What is the effect on a member's seat if he has ceased to possess the necessary residential qualification?

9. What is the procedure necessary to determine whether a member of the Senate may have ceased to be entitled to his seat in the Senate because of residential qualification?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. Yes. A senator must be seized of freehold property to the value of $4,000 over and above all encumbrances thereon. His real and personal property shall altogether be worth $4,000 over and above his debts and liabilities. See sec. 17 of B.N.A. Act. 2. If there are any members of the Senate not possessed of property qualifications the government is not aware of the fact. 3. Yes, a declaration as to property qualification is made at the beginning of each parliament. 4. Yes, each member of the Senate has made the declaration. 5. If a senator has not the necessary qualification he is liable to forfeit his seat in the Senate. The procedure is an inquiry by a committee appointed by the Senate. 6. He should be a resident in the province for which he is appointed, and in the case of Quebec, he must have his real property qualification in the electoral division for which he is appointed. 7. A committee of the Senate is the proper tribunal to inquire into the question of the residential qualifications of a senator. 8. The question is determined by report of the committee of the Senate. 9. A committee appointed by the Senate.

REVISION OF DOMINION STATUTES.

Mr. COWAN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the government to provide for a revision of the Dominion statutes, and if so, when?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That is under consideration.

EASTERN HARBOUR AND PORT HASTINGS MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

What plan did the Postmaster General adopt in connection with, and what was the amount of the reduction in the cost of the mail service referred to in the following extract from the supplementary report of the Post Office Department for 1896?

Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings Mail Service.

In this case a determined and, as it proved, successful effort appears to have been made to give the contract to the then contractor with a considerable advance in the amount paid. There were three services included under the contract, the routes of which, in length 101, 60, and 18 miles, had nothing in common which would justify combining them under one arrangement. The late member of parliament for Victoria County, N.S., brought this fact to the attention of the department while tenders for the present contract were being invited, but, beyond acknowledging it, no attention was paid to his letter. The scheme involved, first, the retention of the three services under one contract; second, the opening of the tenders at a date so close to the date on which the contract was to commence that anybody but the contractor would have great difficulty in entering upon the service on such short notice; and, third, that the surety bond should be raised from $7,000 to $13,000, an amount higher by some thousands of dollars than is required in any other case, although there are contracts of double the annual value of the one in question.

When the tenders were opened, the contractor was found to be the fourth on the list, and accordingly the four lowest were sent to the inspector with instructions to him to ascertain how far the sureties offered satisfied the requirement of the $13,000 bond. The inspector reported that the two lowest tenderers were fully qualified to enter upon the service, but that they and the third tenderer all wished to withdraw. No effort was made to hold the tenderers to the obligations they had incurred, and the contract was awarded to the old contractor at the rate of his tender.

The present government had inquiry instituted as to how the service could be re-arranged, having regard to both efficiency and economy, and a plan has been adopted which will be a great improvement on the former arrangement, and which, according to careful estimates, will make a reduction in the cost of over $4,000 per annum.

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, August 16, 1895.

No. 974.

Sir,—I have the honour to submit a complete list of all mail contracts in this division, about to expire on December 31 next.

* * * * *
Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings.
* * * * *

H. A. Archibald, contractor; length of routes, 101, 60 and 18 miles; service, daily over each of these routes; cost, $7,475.88.

I have no changes to suggest in the mode of performing any of these services, and beg to submit herewith, for your approval, copies of the notices I would propose to issue inviting tenders for new contracts for them, to commence January 1, 1896.

I have, &c.,
CHARLES J. MACDONALD,
Post Office Inspector.

Mr. DAVIS.

Approval of Notices.
Post Office Department,
Mail Service Branch,
Ottawa, August 22, 1895.

No. 831B.
(Memorandum for the Post Office Inspector at Halifax.)

The Postmaster General having had under his consideration the inspector's report No. 974 of August 16, 1895, has approved of the notices inclosed therein inviting tenders for the mail services hereafter mentioned.

Date of notices, September 13, 1895.

Date for the reception of tenders, November 1, 1895.

Date of new contracts, January 1, 1896.

Names of services: Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings.

The inspector will please be so good as to issue these notices accordingly.

WM. SMITH,
For Superintendent.

*Though described on the books of the department as the Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings mail service, this service includes the conveyance of the mails over three routes, viz: between Port Hastings and Eastern Harbour, a distance of 101 miles; between Port Hastings and Baddeck, a distance of 60 miles; and between Mabou and Whycomagh, a distance of 18 miles.

Ottawa, September 7, 1895.

My dear Colonel White,—In the matter of H. A. Archibald's contract for carrying mails in Cape Breton, I should feel obliged if you will not advertise for tenders until I have an opportunity of speaking to you on this subject. Please make a note of this, and oblige.

Yours faithfully,
CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Ottawa, Sept. 13, 1895.

My dear Sir Charles,—In accordance with the recommendation you make in your letter of the 7th inst., I have authorized that the notices advertising the Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings mail service be withdrawn.

Yours faithfully,
ADOLPHE P. CARON.

The Honourable
Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, K.C.M.G.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, September 17, 1895.

My dear Col. White,—Will you kindly bring to the favourable attention of the Postmaster General the following proposition in regard to the contract for carrying the mails in Cape Breton, at present performed by H. A. Archibald, of Port Hastings.

1. That the department advertise contract as a whole. This is the manner in which it was formerly put up to tender.

2. That your department do not call for tenders sooner than six weeks before the contract is to be awarded, or six weeks before the expiration of the present contract.

3. That four days be allowed to parties to whom the contract may be awarded, to complete arrangements and furnish securities. This was the time allowed Mr. Finn, the late contractor.

4. That the amount of security to be given should be made $13,000. This will prevent irresponsible persons from tendering.

I am told that all previous contractors on this route have failed to give satisfaction to the public, and were involved, having heavy judgments rolled up against them, finally having to abandon the business on account of the small consideration paid.

Will you kindly let me know whether my wishes in this respect can be met.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Ottawa, September 19, 1895.

My dear Sir Charles,—With reference to your letter of the 17th inst., respecting the mode of advertising the contract held by Mr. H. A. Archibald for the conveyance of mails between Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings, I beg to say that I will have much pleasure in carrying out your wishes, and tenders will be invited in the manner you suggest.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE P. CARON.

The Honourable

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, K.C.M.G.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, September 19, 1895.

No. 18B.

Sir,—With reference to departmental letter No. 831B of the 22nd ulto., conveying to you the Postmaster General's approval of the notices submitted in your report No. 974 of the 10th ulto., for the mail service between Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings, and to a subsequent letter, No. 974B, of the 13th inst., instructing you to withdraw these notices, I am now to instruct you to invite tenders for this service, so as to include the whole service performed by Mr. Archibald in one contract. That the tenders be issued either six weeks before the contract is awarded or six weeks before the expiration of the present contract, allowing four days to complete arrangements and furnish securities, and that the penalty of the bond be not less than $13,000. You will be so good as to prepare notices in this sense and submit them for the approval of the Postmaster General.

I am, &c.,

ARTHUR LINDSAY.

Halifax, September 24, 1895.

No. 11.

Sir,—In accordance with the instructions contained in your letter of the 19th inst., No. 18B, I have the honour to submit herewith for your approval a copy of the advertisement to be issued for the mail service between Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings.

As it is not clearly understood from your letter how you wish these notices dated, I have left all dates blank.

I shall be glad to have your further instructions in the matter.

I have the honour, &c.,

CHAS. J. MACDONALD,

P. O. Inspector.

Approval of Notices.

Post Office Department,

Mail Service Branch,

Ottawa, Sept. 28, 1895.

(Memorandum for the Post Office Inspector at Halifax.)

The Postmaster General having had under his consideration the Inspector's report No. 11 of the 24th inst., has approved of the notice inclosed therein inviting tenders for the mail service hereafter mentioned.

Date of notice, October 1, 1895; date of reception of tenders, November 15, 1895; date of new contract, January 1, 1896; name of service, Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings.

The inspector will please be so good as to issue these notices accordingly.

Halifax, October 8, 1895.

No. 23.

Sir,—I have the honour to report that your letter, No. 62B, dated September 28, conveying to me your approval of the notices inviting tenders for the Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings mail contract, did not reach me in time for the notices to be dated October 1. I have accordingly, in issuing, dated them 'October 7,' and made the date for reception of tenders 'November 22.'

I inclose a copy herein for your information,

I have the honour, &c.,

CHAS. J. MACDONALD,

Post Office Inspector.

The Honourable

The Postmaster General, &c., &c.,

Ottawa.

Baddeck, N.S., October 14, 1895.

My dear Sir,—I noticed in the post office today a notice calling for tenders for the conveyance of Her Majesty's mail between Hawkesbury and Grand Etang, and Baddeck and Whycomagh and Mabou. I am not going to say anything about the necessity of a daily mail between all these places as they have been established for a number of years, but what I sincerely and honestly protest against is having all those contracts joined in one. What connection is there between them or what reason is there for joining them all in one? I have looked into it and carefully considered it, and find none whatever. I reside in the county of Victoria, in the town of Baddeck, and the route between Baddeck and Hawkesbury runs through a portion of the county, and I would ask that it be separated from the others. I see no reason why it and the Grand Etang route should be joined in one contract, as they go in different directions. A little reflection will convince you that few people down here can afford to run and operate so long a distance as 190 miles on short notice, only a few can do so. I also think that upon consideration of this matter you will find that money can be saved by putting up the tenders separately.

I have no interest in this matter save that of the public, and to give a fair chance to competition.

I hope you will reconsider the decision arrived at and put up the Baddeck and Hawkesbury tender separately.

I am yours truly,

JNO. A. McDONALD.

Sir A. P. Caron, K.C.M.G., P.C.,
Postmaster General.

Ottawa, October 19, 1895.

My dear Mr. McDonald,—I am in receipt of yours of the 14th inst., asking that the various mail routes comprehended under the contract known as the Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings contract be put up to tender separately. In reply, I beg to say that the matter will have the attention of the department.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPHE P. CARON.

J. A. McDonald, Esq., M.P.,
Baddeck, N.S.

Ottawa, October 16, 1895.

My dear Colonel White,—With this I send you a letter and inclosure which I have just received from Mr. H. A. Archibald, of Port Hastings. I am sorry to observe that your Halifax office does not seem to have followed the instructions which you intimated to me would be given as regards the length of time for advertising, and also the time allowed after the tenders are opened to prepare for the service. Please return inclosures.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Lt.-Col. Wm. White,
Deputy Postmaster General.

(Inclosure.)

Port Hastings, October 15, 1895.

My dear Sir,—I see my contracts are advertised twelve weeks and one day before the new service begins, and giving a new beginner thirty-nine days to prepare. I did expect that the government would only advertise six weeks, and give four or five days to the new beginner to get ready, but as it is now, every advantage will be taken by Grits to have it in their hands before the elections come on.

There is only one good thing, and that is the $13,000 security. This may bother some men of straw; and I will face the affair as best I possibly can. About the time the tenders are opened I will go to Ottawa or send some person. On November 19 our municipal elections come off in this district. I will not likely have opposition, but I am interested in adjoining districts, and if the fight will be looking serious, it will be hard for me to leave. In any case, I will write you as regards the tender later on.

Yours very truly,

H. A. ARCHIBALD.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

P.S.—I send a copy of the notices.

Ottawa, October 25, 1895.

My dear Sir Charles,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, respecting the dates of advertising and receiving of tenders for the mail service between Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings.

In reply, I beg to state that the inspector has evidently followed the terms of the statute, which requires that six weeks' notice be given of the advertising of all contracts for amounts exceeding $200 per annum. When the tenders come in, I will take care that no time is lost in closing the matter.

Yours faithfully,

WM. WHITE.

The Hon. Sir Charles H. Tupper, K.C.M.G., Minister of Justice, Ottawa.

Mr. DAVIS.

Memorandum for the Post Office Inspector at Halifax:

Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings—

Hector McKinnon	$ 8,474 00
John J. McNeil	8,750 00
John W. Reynolds	9,474 00
H. A. Archibald	10,099 00

Before awarding the contract the inspector will please make strict inquiry as to the financial standing of the sureties in each case, and as to whether the party tendering is of full age and legally capable of entering into a contract and of carrying on the service in a satisfactory manner.

ARTHUR LINDSAY,
Superintendent.

Post Office Inspector's Office,

No. 106. Halifax, 30th December, 1895.

Sir,—With reference to your letter, No. 265B, of the 26th November, inclosing four tenders for the mail service between Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings, I have the honour to inclose herewith the telegrams from the first and second tenderers, Hector McKinnon and J. J. McNeill, and a letter from the third tenderer, each stating his inability to enter into a contract.

I may say that McKinnon is not himself in a position to perform the service, and the parties who signed his tender are not good for the amount of the bond required. I, however, gave him an opportunity to furnish satisfactory security, and he submitted the names of two parties who were quite good for the amount of security asked. Under these circumstances, I accepted his tender and sent him contracts for signature. These contracts have not been returned, and on Saturday I received his telegram stating his inability to perform the service.

The second tenderer, John J. McNeill, is competent to perform the service, and the sureties submitted by him in his tender are, in my opinion, good for the amount of the bond required. He, however, asks leave to withdraw his offer.

J. W. Reynolds, the third tenderer, who also asks to withdraw, is not, in my opinion, competent to perform the service, nor are the sureties submitted by him good for the amount of the bond required.

The fourth tenderer, H. A. Archibald, who is the present contractor, is well equipped for the service, and the sureties submitted by him are good.

I shall be glad to have your further instructions in the matter.

In the meantime, I will make a temporary arrangement for the service for the month of January.

I have, &c.,
CHAS. J. MACDONALD,
Post Office Inspector.

The Honourable

The Postmaster General.

Port Hastings, 24th December, 1895.

Dear Sir,—In reference to my tender for the mail services from Port Hastings to Eastern Harbour, &c., so far I have not heard to whom the contract has been awarded. I find that my figures were entirely too low, and therefore beg leave to state that I must decline the contract should I be so favoured.

I remain, &c.,

Owing to my miscalculation in figuring my tender for mail contract, I hereby withdraw it.
JOHN J. McNEILL.

(Telegram.)

Port Hastings, C.B., 28th Dec., 1895.
To Charles J. Macdonald,
P.O. Inspector,
Halifax, N.S.

I find my tender for mail contract so low that it is impossible to get good security, and I will not be able to go on with the contract.

HECTOR McKINNON.

(Telegram.)

Port Hastings, C.B., 28th Dec., 1895.
Sir A. P. Caron,
Postmaster General.

My tender being so low, I am not able to get security or go on with the contract.

HECTOR McKINNON.

(Clause 2, Section 57, Post Office Act.)

If, after the acceptance of a tender and notification thereof to the tenderer, he fails to enter into an obligation within the time prescribed by the Postmaster General, with good and sufficient securities for the performance of the service, the Postmaster General shall proceed to contract with some other person for the performance of the said service, and may forthwith cause the difference between the amount contained in the tender and the amount for which he has contracted for the performance of the said service, for the whole period thereof, to be charged up against the said tenderer and his surety or sureties, and the same may be immediately recovered in an action of debt, in the name of the Postmaster General, against the tenderer and his sureties, or any of them, and when recovered shall form part of the postal revenue.

Ottawa, January 2, 1896.

My dear Col. White,—Mr. H. A. Archibald wires me the following: 'Kindly expedite contract. Inspector wires me continue month of January at former rates.'

What may I say?

Yours faithfully,
CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Lt.-Col. Wm. White,
Deputy Postmaster General.

Ottawa, January 8, 1896.

To the Post Office Inspector, Halifax.

With reference to his report, No. 106, of the 30th ult., stating the result of his inquiries as to the tenderers for the Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings mail service, and asking approval of a temporary agreement for the month of January with the present contractor at the former rate, the inspector is requested to say why, since Mr. Archibald's tender has been accepted, a regular contract should not be made at the rate of his tender from January 1 next.

ARTHUR LINDSAY,
Superintendent.

(Telegram.)

Halifax, January 10, 1896.

Referring to your memo. of 8th, no authority received here for acceptance Archibald's tender, Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings. Please advise.

CHARLES J. MACDONALD.

Arthur Lindsay,
Superintendent Mail Service Branch,
Ottawa.

Ottawa, January 11, 1896.

To the Post Office Inspector at Halifax:

With reference to his telegram of to-day's date, stating that he has not yet been authorized to accept Mr. H. A. Archibald's tender for the Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings mail service, the inspector will please follow the usual practice in such cases. If all tenders lower than Mr. Archibald's have been withdrawn, the contract should be put in his hands at the rate of his tender, subject to the approval of the Postmaster General.

ARTHUR LINDSAY,
Superintendent.

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, January 11, 1896.

No. 124.

Sir,—I have the honour to report that, in accordance with the instructions contained in your memo. of the 8th inst. and telegram of yesterday's date, I have accepted the tender of Mr. H. A. Archibald for the mail service between Eastern Harbour and Port Hastings, &c., the contract to date from the 1st instant.

I return herewith the tenders of Messrs. Hector McKinnon, John J. McNeill and John W. Reynolds, which were withdrawn.

I have the honour, &c.,

CHARLES J. MACDONALD,
Post Office Inspector.

The Honourable
The Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). When these services were brought to his attention, the Postmaster General, convinced that the arrangements were not the most advantageous that could be made, caused inquiry to be made into the whole service in that part of Inverness County, and having put the arrangements up for tender, was able to give a greatly improved service with a much reduced expenditure. The section between Baddeck and Port Hastings, ran parallel with the Intercolonial Railway, and it was broken up and the railway utilized for the service of the offices adjacent to it. An important section of the country on the east side of Lake Ainslie, which, till then, had only a tri-weekly service, was given a daily service. The long route, 101 miles in length, between Port Hastings and Eastern Harbour, was divided into three parts, so that persons of modest means could tender for it. The result as regards the service, is as follows:

Of the 64 offices affected, under the old arrangement, 38 had daily mails, 13 tri-weekly, and 13 semi-weekly; under the present arrangement, 54 have daily, 5 tri-weekly, and 5 semi-weekly; that is, 16 more offices now have daily mail services than had it under the former arrangement. The financial result is that the former cost of the services was $11,582.45 a year, while the present cost is $7,073.14 a year, showing a saving for the contract term of $18,037.24.

Mr. DAVIS.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. McMULLEN asked:

1. When was the Dominion Franchise Act passed?
2. How many times was its operation suspended?
3. How many times was the voters' list revised under its provision?
4. How many officials of all kinds were required to carry out its provisions?
5. What was the cost to the public treasury of each revision?
6. What was the total cost to the public treasury of the revision of the lists under said Act?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). 1. The Dominion Franchise Act was assented to on July 20th, 1885. 2. Its operation was suspended eight times—In 1887, by 50-51 Vic., chap. 5; in 1888, by 51 Vic., chap. 9; in 1890, by 53 Vic., chap. 8; in 1892, by 55-56 Vic., chap. 12; in 1893, by 56 Vic., chap. 10; in 1895, by 58-59 Vic., chap. 12; in 1896, by 59 Vic., chap. 6; and in 1897, by 60-61 Vic., chap. 12. The Act was repealed by 61 Vic., chap. 14. 3. The voters' list was revised four times; in 1886, in 1889, in 1891, and in 1894. 4. For the revision of 1886, there were 170 revising officers; for 1889, 172 revising officers; for 1891, 171 revising officers; and for 1894, 176 revising officers. There were clerks and bailiffs and other officials, the number of whom cannot be readily ascertained. 5. The cost to the public treasury of each revision, was as follows:

1896	$416,043 23
Partial revision, 1897.....	2,070 39
1889	236,356 03
1891	226,748 65
1894-95	243,554 28
Other expenditures, not chargeable to any particular revision	31,589 31
	$1,156,361 89
Less, proceeds of sale of voters' lists.	15,044 90

6. Total amount chargeable to Franchise Act to June 30, 1897.....$1,141,316 99

ARBITRATORS ON TRENT VALLEY CANAL DAMAGES.

Mr. McMULLEN asked:

1. Who have been the arbitrators to fix the damages arising from the construction of the Trent Valley Canal?
2. When were they appointed?
3. How much have they each been paid each year for their services, and how much for their expenses as such arbitrators?
4. How many days each year have they each been paid for, and at what rate?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen), to move for a return with respect to this matter, as there is a great deal of detail in the answer.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What was the total amount of Governor General's warrants issued in each of the years beginning with July 1, 1884, down to the present time?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The amount of Governor General's warrants, from 1884-5 to 28th February, 1900, is as follows :

Year.	Amount.
1884-85	$ 761,342 19
1885-86	3,743,066 18
1886-87	2,146,744 68
1887-88	1,332,394 71
1888-89	905,623 81
1889-90	1,236,652 34
1890-91	1,298,376 38
1891-92	141,059 70
1892-93	308,674 00
1893-94	220,531 73
1894-95	81,000 00
1895-96	34,500 00
1896-97	1,201,971 40
1897-98	372,400 00
1898-99	797,060 00
1899-1900	952,000 00

ADDITIONS TO PUBLIC DEBT SINCE 1894.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What was the total amount added to the public debt of Canada in each year of the years from June 30, 1894, down to the present time?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The additions to the public debt for the years referred to, are as follows :

June 30, 1894.....	$4,501,989
" 1895.....	6,891,897
" 1896.....	5,422,505
" 1897.....	3,041,163
" 1898.....	2,417,802
" 1899.....	2,317,047

EXPENDITURE BY PRESENT GOVERNMENT ON CANALS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What amount has the present government expended in completion of the canal system of Canada.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The present government have expended in completion of the canal system of Canada, $11,050,128.37.

Mr. WILSON. Up to what time ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is up to our last payment.

Mr. WILSON. When was that ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is up to date.

Mr. BLAIR.

MOORE & MACDOWALL TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Has any action been taken by the government to compel the persons holding the Moore & Macdowall timber limits, near Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, to operate a saw-mill in accordance with the regulations under which the said timber limits are held? If not, is it the intention of the government to enforce compliance with the said regulations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On the 20th April, 1899, Mr. George Burn, representing the Bank of Ottawa, which now holds the Moore & Macdowall timber limits near Prince Albert, was notified that the mill on these limits must be put in operation. The department has no report as to whether any action has been taken to comply with this notification, but under the terms of the licenses, the holders thereof have twelve months from the date of notification within which to commence operations.

PACIFIC CABLE RETURN.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock) laid on the Table of the House :

Return to an address of the House of Commons dated February 26, 1900, for copies of all correspondence with the Imperial government and the colonies respecting the Pacific Cable.

He said : I observe that the backing of this return states that it is a return of all the correspondence, which should have been qualified to the extent of saying that it is a return of the correspondence that the government feels at liberty at this moment to bring down.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he would be good enough to allow us to run through the unopposed motions in order to facilitate the business.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No; I do not propose to do so, in view of the advantage which was taken of my courtesy when a similar favour was granted the other day. I do not propose to do so to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not the slightest idea to what the right hon. gentleman refers. I believe this is the first time in the history of parliament, so far as I am aware, that the courtesy that I have asked has been refused, and as this is a very important matter in regard to the business of the House, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman to explain.

The PRIME MINISTER. The last time, when I granted a similar request, which was made in the absence of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), we went over the unopposed motions, and when we reached the motion of my hon. friend for Halifax (Mr. Borden), in regard to the elections in West Huron and Brockville, I asked that the motion should stand. The following day fault was found with us because we did not allow this motion to go on at that time, and after having extended the courtesy of taking unopposed motions which are made for the production of papers, the charge was made that we were unwilling to proceed with the business of the House. I came to the conclusion that if a similar request should be made I should not grant it.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Mr. Speaker, in order to put myself right, I shall end the remarks that I have to make with a motion. I do not think it needs any excuse for making a motion for the adjournment of the House after the language which we have just heard from the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads this House. This House is composed of independent members, who are sent up by their different constituencies to represent them here. In the carrying out of their duty hon. members, from the different constituencies, have been in the habit, since there was a parliament in this country, which is their perfect constitutional right, of pursuing inquiries. Now, there are two ways by which you can pursue inquiries in this House; you may ask questions for information which the government must answer. No government can live in this House, or in this country, no government can live in Great Britain, no government can live in any constitutionally governed country which refuses to answer legitimate questions put by hon. members on either side of the House for information. It is no mere courtesy that is granted to an independent member of this House, it is a right, it is a precious privilege that the right hon. First Minister has no right to refuse. Beside the putting of questions there is the other way of getting information, the old constitutional right, and it is by putting motions before the House in proper order, giving proper notice, and, after they are put on the Order paper, taking them up in their proper rotation. It is no courtesy when any government replies to these motions, debates them, and when the Order of the House is given, brings down, as servants should bring down to their masters, what they are ordered by their masters to bring down. When the master orders his servant to bring down information, the servant has no right to stand up and say that it is a matter of courtesy to give his master that information. What have we to-day? We have an old Liberal, from the English school, boasted of from Dan to Beersheba as being such a kind of Liberal, violating every principle of the independence of parliament and constitutional usage, as he has been doing for a few days of late in reference to the rights of members on both sides of this House. I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, as you are an old parliamentarian and have been a member of this House for many years, if you ever, in your experience in this House, witnessed such a gross and partial abuse of the privileges of the House as has been witnessed during these few days past in the answers that hon. gentlemen opposite, who constitute the ministry, are giving to questions which are put upon the Notice paper, questions which, in many cases, are prompted by themselves and put upon the Notice paper for their own purposes. We have seen it to-day. Here is an hon. gentleman who gets up and asks, in cold blood, for the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to do what? To read him out a list of the number of pounds of butter which have been exported from this country for ten or fifteen years, year by year, and an hon. minister stands up and bravely does it. If we ask for like information we are told to put the request in the shape of a motion and get a return. The hon. minister who answers the question and the hon. member who asks it, knows, because they are both, presumably, intelligent people, that in the documents which have been brought down to the House compiled by the civil servants of this country, signed by the hon. minister's own hand, placed in the archives of this country and distributed to the members of this House, in parallel columns, these same columns of figures appear with the exact information which they have given to-day. To-day they have taken up an hour of the time of the House in simply standing up and reading over answers to questions giving information, all of which, with the exception of that relating to the last six months of 1899, is in the documents which have been placed before the House and which have been published under the hands of the hon. ministers themselves. Then, an hon. minister violates all the rights of private correspondence, rummages through the drawers of his predecessor, comes down before the House, in a manner unparalleled in the history of this parliament, causes questions to be raised out of the pages of his supplementary report, prepares a controversial answer and gives this to the House, as he did the other day in answer to a question, drawing a parallel between one year and another so as to show what occurred under the Conservative government and what occurred under Liberal government. This is high politics; it is the standard of hon. gentlemen who pursue such a course. I congratulate them upon the high, the fine ideals which they have set up to guide them in parliamentary practice and parliamentary government in this country. When hon.

members of this House ask, as I did myself, for information which is not difficult to get, which is quite easy to get, what do we find? The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden) got up the other day and read four or five closely printed pages in answer to a question, because it suited him to do so. But, when I asked for three or four simple returns, which one of his officers could put together in five minutes by searching over the files and orders and putting a clip through the papers and bringing them down to the House, I have not been able, in four weeks, to get an answer. When I to-day asked two simple questions, which any hon. minister ought to be ready to answer at once, not asking for a detail of ten or fifteen years, I am told that I must wait. But, the right hon. gentleman can read column after column in reply to a question put by one of his own adherents. Put for what purpose? Put in order that that adherent may have a little document ready-made to send as a fly-sheet through the country as a campaign document, and have it done at the expense of the civil service if you please, and without any cost of elbow grease or brain matter to himself, by hunting it up on his own account. Hour after hour for the last three or four days we have had this sort of thing here. I can tell the Prime Minister that if he continues that, then on this side of the House we propose to give them enough of it in the matter of questions. They will find from this time out, the Order paper well filled with questions on a parallel to those which have been asked from the other side, and I invite the Prime Minister to rise in his place and tell us that he is not going to give us the courtesy of a reply. Let him attempt it, and parliamentary government in this House, so long as I have the voice and physical power, will be at pretty close quarters for some time to come.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going behind the bush to put questions on the paper as though I meant them as a definite plea for information, or the like of that. I tell the Prime Minister that we have just as good a right on this side of the House to have the civil servants work out answers to our questions as his side of the House has. We propose on this side of the House to have the same treatment accorded us as is accorded those on the other side, or we will know the reason why. I have to ask the Prime Minister to-day for returns that were ordered by the House last session of parliament, and which have not yet been brought down. They are not very extensive or very elaborate returns, but, with one single exception, no answer has been given to them yet. Members on this side are estopped from getting information in any way. If they put a question on the Order paper they are told to put it in the shape of a motion, and if they make a motion and are lucky enough to have it passed, then they have to wait for weeks and years before the answer is brought down. The other day the right hon. gentleman got into a fit of bad humour which does not sit well on him—the Prime Minister is much more engaging when he is in good humour than when he is in bad, and he has made a kind of reputation for himself as being sunny and smiling, so that it is a pity he should get into one of these little pets once in a while and spoil both his reputation and his countenance. Was there any reason why he should get out of humour the other day? We simply stated that when you have the Order paper filled it is absolutely impossible for any member of this House who puts on a motion for a return, three or four weeks after the opening of a session; absolutely impossible for him to reach it, if the rule is laid down that we will not take up the unopposed motions. Why? Because a number of gentlemen put on debatable motions, and as at present, all that is left is a half day on Wednesday and a day on Monday, and these debatable motions take up all the time. Ever since my entry into this House in 1882, there has been an unwritten law which has never been violated to my knowledge, that we should go through the unopposed motions which simply ask for information, in order to allow the government to have a chance to answer the independent members with reference to them. Adopt the other rule laid down by the Prime Minister to-day, and he makes it absolutely impossible for any independent member of this House to get a return. Why, because if ten men will put down ten debatable motions on the first day of the session; motions like that of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and like that which we have been discussing for several days; it is absolutely prohibitive for any single unopposed return being obtained by an Order of the House. Has any Prime Minister up to this day, enunciated a different doctrine? Has it remained for a Liberal of the Liberals to announce the doctrine that he is going to squeeze out the members of this House from obtaining information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the right hon. gentleman has done that to-day, and he has done an unenviable thing for his own reputation, and for the good name of this House, and for constitutional and parliamentary government in this country. He has now set the precedent, and he says he will stand by it; that he will not allow any unopposed motions to pass. He shuts out the independent members of this House from asking for proper information, which ought to be given, and which would be given by any government which is not afraid to give information.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The Prime Minister announces to the members of this side of the House, that we shall not get information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is it.

Mr. FOSTER. His high mightiness has none to compare with him now. This democrat to the hilt, this Liberal of the Liberals, has become a Grand Vizier, an autocrat of all the Russias. Worse and worse; when he allows any poor miserable member of this House to get information it is pure courtesy on the part of the Prime Minister, and if you do not carry yourself just rightly, you insult His Majesty, and he will not give you that courtesy again, Sir. What an unenviable position for a grown man to take! What an unenviable position for the Premier of this country to take! Why; is the man in his dotage; or is a certain infantile residuum coming to the front in those his mature days—

Mr. SPEAKER. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) to confine his attention to something like parliamentary language.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to know, Sir, in what have I offended?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not going to be put down unless I know what for.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am simply in the judgment of the House when I say, that from the moment the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) commenced, he has been skirting a line of debate that must inevitably lead this House into a bitter discussion.

Mr. COCHRANE. Let us have it then.

Mr. FOSTER. What rule of order have I offended in that?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have to say this: That when a man descends to the statement which has just emanated from the hon. member (Mr. Foster), I do feel that it is undignified.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I be permitted to say, that since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have never known the Speaker to interfere unless he rose to show what rule of order has been violated. I wait now, Mr. Speaker, to learn why my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has been called to order. Why has he been called to order, when he merely used language that did not in any way approach being so offensive, as that which we are accustomed to hear from gentlemen on the other side of the House. If the Chair is going to preserve the order of this House, it will have to be by the assumption of a strictly independent and impartial spirit, by which, when a member is called to order on one side or the other, the rule of the House which has been violated shall be pointed out. If that is not done, then the Chair takes upon itself a most invidious duty, which, in my judgment, has never been taken by any Speaker, of saying how the debate shall be conducted between the two sides of the House. We must have something besides the personal opinion of the Speaker. We must have a rule of order violated and pointed to in order to have the intervention of the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have just to remark that there are offences against decency and propriety which perhaps do not come exactly within the technical rules of the House, and it is the right of the Speaker to point out if a member forgets himself in that way; and if the hon. gentleman who is thus appealed to cannot understand the Speaker's action, it is not the fault of the Speaker, but the fault of the hon. gentleman himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say one word? And that is, that you yourself witnessed an hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches sit silent without making the slightest attempt to call the attention of the Chair, as became his duty—I refer to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright)—when an hon. member behind him declared that he was prepared to show that another hon. member of this House had violated every one of the ten commandments. Instead of making any such attempt, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was leading the House at the time, turned round, and I believe incited the hon. member behind him to use that language.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, I call the hon. gentleman to order. He is making a statement which is absolutely without the smallest particle of foundation in fact, and he knows it perfectly well. As to the occasion to which he has alluded, all I can say is, that I think probably it was in his interest that the hon. member behind me did not go into any detail as to which of the commandments he had violated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to order. I say that this is as indecent a spectacle as I have ever witnessed in this House—a minister of the Crown standing up here, and backing up the most indecent assault ever made on a member of the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is no point of order before the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think not. When I called the attention of the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), I did it because I felt that he was pursuing—I will not say a line of argument, but a line of statement that was sure to lead to a bitter discussion. It was for that reason that I drew his attention to it. If he chooses to exercise his right, he is at liberty to do so; but I think the House has a right to protect itself, and I am in the judgment of the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I point out—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that the hon. member for York be allowed to proceed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I merely wished to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the government pursued a line of policy that was bound to lead to irregularity.

Mr. FOSTER. After this little diversion which does not seem to amount to much—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And this is the gentleman who, the other day, was deeply pained because some one mentioned that his conduct had been impertinent, and appealed to the Speaker for a ruling that that was unparliamentary.

Mr. FOSTER. I did that in the interest of the Minister of Railways and Canals. I know the hon. gentleman's irascibility, and I know that he has sometimes an ungovernable temper. If he has any latitude at all, he is very apt to forget himself; and when he went beyond the rules of order and used toward me the word impertinent, his own moral and spiritual health was threatened, and I am sure that my hon. friend ought to be thankful to me for keeping him out of the ways of temptation. It is not a very nice return that he makes for that service. Now, Mr. Speaker, every member of this House will have to be the judge of his own method of approaching any question and expressing his sentiments upon it. There are certain well-defined rules of order laid down by our parliamentary authorities, and it is without doubt the duty of the Speaker to prevent any violation of those rules, and to warn a member when in the heat of discussion he may either knowingly or unwittingly violate them; and whenever the Speaker of this House calls me to order and shows me the rule I have violated, I shall bow to his decision. I was proceeding to question the strength of the position of the right hon. gentleman in shutting off all successful attempts in this House for the rest of this session to get beyond the first four or five motions on the Order paper, upon which there are probably near a hundred, and to prevent any man getting the information which he has a right to have on his own behalf or on behalf of the constituents whom he represents. I was pointing out that the right hon. gentleman has taken the hitherto unheard-of position that to take first the unopposed motions is a personal courtesy, that that courtesy has been abused, and that therefore he intends to sit down upon the House and not grant it any more. Let us find how the courtesy was abused. Following the line which has been followed ever since this House has been a House, at the request of the leader of the opposition the other day, the right hon. gentleman agreed to go through the unopposed motions. When we came to the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), with reference to the Huron and Brockville elections, my hon. friend did not wish to discuss that motion. What he wanted to do was to have it passed without discussion, in order that the committee might get at its work. If my hon. friend felt that he could forego any advantage that there might be in a party sense from prefacing that motion with a discussion, in which a great many things could have been said that would not have been to the advantage and the credit of hon. gentlemen opposite, that was magnanimous on his part. He was willing to forego that, for what purpose? Because he wanted to test the Prime Minister or the Prime Minister's expression. Everywhere throughout this country where he spoke during last summer, what was one of his boasts? He said: 'Talk about scandals; talk about charges. I have one answer to that: there never is a charge made in parliament for which we do not grant a committee of inquiry.' The right hon. gentleman floated on that large-winged declaration of his high above the heads of the good people of this province of Ontario, as a paragon of what was fair and just and right in parliamentary procedure: 'Make your charge, you shall have your committee—that is my policy, that is my plan.' Well, Sir, here is a question that was brought up last year as a matter of privilege, when a committee was granted to my hon. friend on the express pretension that there should be the fullest and freest inquiry into the matter. The right hon. leader of the government agreed that it should be sent and sent at once to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It was sent there. The right hon. gentleman gained great glory to himself for promptly putting before the proper committee the charge regarding a most important question, as to how the public officers of this government had discharged their trust with reference to the taking and counting of the people's ballots. Is there any more important question that could be brought before this House or the country? Is there anything that ought to be more strictly guarded? Is there anything which is more proper for a prompt and full inquiry? The hon. gentleman thought not last year when he sent it to the Privileges and Elections Committee. It went to that committee. I am not going to say a word as to how it was managed there, but it is known to every one that that committee discovered grave evils. It is well known that the evidence, so far as it went, showed a state of affairs that is not at all creditable, and a mode of procedure by officers of the government which was not at all to the credit of these officers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I do not think the hon. gentleman is justified in making that statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I make that statement and take the responsibility of making it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You may make the statement and take the responsibility, but you cannot give any evidence to support it.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the statement and take the responsibility, and I will not at present do anything less or more than that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—

Mr. FOSTER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to wait until I get through. The investigation went on, and was not more than half concluded, when parliament rose, and what did the committee do? The committee reported the evidence as far as it was taken. It reported upon certain facts that were elicited, and the understanding was that it was an unfinished inquiry which was to be taken up when the House came together in the succeeding session. No one else had any other idea, the country had no other idea, and nothing has since transpired to make that question less important. On the contrary, many things have since transpired which have added to its importance. In the interval between last session and this, the officers in the province of Ontario, appointed by Liberal ministers of the same stripe and political faith as my right hon. friend—officers appointed by his own right-hand men, as he declared them to be when the provincial elections were going on—officers appointed by those men and sworn to do their duty, did what? They did everything but what they should have done. They stole ballots, they switched ballots, they destroyed ballots, they took the people's will, as it was given on the individual ballot, and absolutely abstracted it, and prevented that will being shown, and this they did in poll after poll. This was done by the right-hand friends of the right hon. gentleman, it was done by the very same machine, and in furtherance of the very same machine methods that my right hon. friend, and the Postmaster General, used in the Dominion elections in West Huron and Brockville. The machine was the same, the game was the same, the men who were working the machine, were the same in both elections. Will my right hon. friend dare stand up and say that he approves of the actions of those officers of the local government in Elgin and the Hurons and Waterloo, and these other constituencies? Why, it smelt so to heaven, that the Prime Minister of Ontario had to leave his Premiership and get out of the government. Why, it became so rank that the man who to-day is Premier of that government, actually stood up some months ago and declared—and drew to himself glory from the declaration—that he had appointed a commission of judges to look into the whole matter, although on the very night when he made that statement and promise, he knew, and had known for weeks, that every ballot had been burnt long before. He knew it, and did not say a word about it. He gave the promise to the ear, and led the people of this country to believe for months, that at last a righteous Liberal had got to work in high office in the province of Ontario, and meant to have a thorough investigation. All this shows that there ought to be a full and fair investigation into this matter of the Brockville and Huron elections. Why did my right hon. friend change? When my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), brought that matter up as a question of privilege this session, why did not my right hon. friend send it immediately to the same committee, with instructions to make a full and fair inquiry? One reason was given—not the true one, I venture to say—by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and that it was that it cost nearly $10,000 to take the evidence last year. How parsimonious the hon. gentleman has become! Sitting at his right is a Postmaster General, who allowed postage enough on partisan literature outside of the session of parliament to the extra sessional speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to pay for the whole cost for this investigation over and over. Fear of expenditure of money is not the reason. These hon. gentlemen are not afraid of money being expended on commissions. Why, then, did the right hon. gentleman not send this matter to the committee on the question of privilege? What did he fear for West Huron? What did he fear for Brockville? Had fresh news come to the right hon. gentleman's ear? One would think so, for he took a technical objection and ruled my hon. friend out on the question of privilege.

There was only one recourse left to my hon. friend from Halifax, and that was to put his motion on the Order paper. He got it on as soon as he could. It occupies the first place it possibly could. Then would it not have been right and proper for the right hon. gentleman now, after he had vindicated the rules of procedure, after he had made my hon. friend give notice, and take his turn—would it not have been fair, if he wanted to facilitate an investigation, to allow my hon. friend's motion to pass, when we came to it, so that the matter might go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is what my hon. friend wanted, and that is what the right hon. gentleman refused. And when reproached with inconsistency, his honour took fire, his dignity was infringed upon, and he declared that he had given a courtesy which had been abused, and he would never do it again. That declaration is tantamount to what? It is tantamount to telling this House and country, it is tantamount to telling the machine and this country, that they have nothing to hope for in the one case, and nothing to fear in the other. My hon. friend from Halifax has nothing to hope for. He cannot reach that motion this year. The decision has gone out. My right hon. friend refuses to allow us to pass the unopposed motions, and he seals the impossibility of our reaching this motion by declaring that every man must go on with his motion, or it will be dropped. That means that the twelve or fourteen motions which precede my hon. friend's, will take up the rest of the session, and by this course, the right hon. First Minister has effectually burked any possible attempt of my hon. friend to get an investigation on before the committee. The right hon. gentleman may plume himself for having done a clever thing, but I doubt if his followers think it is the best thing to have done. I doubt if the country will think it is. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Borden), has evidence fresh and new, in addition to what was before the committee last year, which he is prepared to submit to the committee. My right hon. friend interposes his dignity and ideas of courtesy and the technical rules of this House, and declares, in fact, that my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), shall not have an opportunity of going on with the investigation. I do not care what you know, he says; I do not care what damning proof you can bring, you shall not have a chance to bring the case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections; we want to go to the country, and we do not want to have your investigation on before we go to the country. As to courtesy, I asservate here most definitely that I am led to suspect that there is a recrudescence of more boyish days, as a matter of fact, in my hon. friend at this moment when he takes the extraordinary position, that it is a matter of courtesy and he will refuse it, or when he takes that still more grievously wrong stand—in my opinion—that he will actually shut off every member of this parliament from getting a motion for a return if he happens to be later than the eighth or tenth on the order paper, that is the position the right hon.

gentleman has taken to-day; and that is the reason I raised the question and used the language I did. His conduct is unexampled, and you cannot characterize it in proper terms unless you use language which will leave no doubt of what you feel. I warn my hon. friend that he is taking a position which will not redound to his own advantage or to the advantage of his party or to good government in this country. The constituency of West Huron reeked with corrupt practices, it was filled with machine methods. Honest men who put their ballots in for a certain candidate swore that their ballots were not counted unless they were counted for the man for whom they did not vote. We have to-day sitting in this House two gentlemen who, I believe, would not sit here if the truth were brought out with reference to these two elections, and if they obeyed the voice of the people in that respect. For, though my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) stated this time that we had no right to press it, if it had gone over the period when the courts could interfere, he stated the exact opposite in 1892, as was read by my hon. friend from Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney)—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) permit me?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not make such contradictory statements. I said the reference made by this House last year was expressly moved by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), not to inquire into the validity of the election or the right of the hon. gentleman to his seat, but solely and only into the conduct of the officers employed to conduct that election. And when the committee met, the very first question which they had to discuss was whether their decision might effect the seat of the hon. member in this House. Because if it could affect the seat of a member of this House, by the statute law of the land, over which we have no control, we were prohibited from allowing the witnesses to state for whom they voted. And when we came to decide, taking time and discussing it among ourselves, the committee decided unanimously, so far as my recollection goes—I do not remember a dissenting voice at the close, except a protest from the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who, if I remember well, said that he did not quite agree with them—the committee determined that our decision could not affect the position of the member, that under the terms of the reference made to us by this House our decision could not affect the seat of the member. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) was, perhaps, inclined to say it could.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may be wrong, but I think that was the position taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell).

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). My recollection is that he did not think it would affect the seat, but where he differed with the committee was as to allowing questions to be put as to how a witness voted.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think I remember what I heard—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I will go on with my speech.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will allow me to make the statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I am ready to go on.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But my hon. friend will surely permit me—

Mr. FOSTER. I am thoroughly rested now, and I wish to go on. I will not wait.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will measure out to the hon. gentleman again the same measure that he gives me now.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) has given me to drink of that bitter cup several times, and I want him to taste a little of it that he may know its flavour. Now, I will leave my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the record and to the tender mercies of the hon. member for Kent and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), and I will make this one statement, which I think even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will not contradict—if the investigation of the committee proves that legally these two gentlemen who now sit in this House did not have a majority of votes, I think too much of these gentlemen to think that they would remain here for one hour—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The reference would not permit that to be shown.

Mr. McMULLEN. You have a better opinion of them than you had of Baird.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a better opinion of these two gentlemen, though I may not know them so well. Now, what I say is this—that on this question which, as I believe, is most important, the right hon. gentleman has taken two wrong positions—first, in saying that we are entitled to none of these things except by courtesy, and, second, in interposing himself a second time, and now most effectively, against any attempt on the part of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) to get his motion carried and to have the investigation go on. What is the only conclusion to be reached from the facts? It is that what the right hon. gentleman welcomed last year he avoids this year. He welcomed it last year because he thought it was right to have the investigation; he avoids it and prohibits it this year, why? Because he fears the result of the investigation. Now, I admit no courtesy with reference to a member's right to have his motion passed for information, and I dissent entirely from the position which my right hon. friend has taken with reference to this inquiry. I move the adjournment of the House.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I do not intend to be drawn from the dignity which I owe to myself and to the House by the extraordinary exhibition we have had from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who has just taken his seat. I must say to the hon. gentleman at once, and he should know it, that I do not indulge in personalities—I never did, and I do not intend to begin now. I leave that to the small men; I choose to act as a man grown. I leave these methods to the hon. gentleman, and he is welcome to all the benefits he can derive from them. No doubt he has a good reason to believe for himself that it is the best he can do for himself and for his party. I have only to say that I disagree with everything that has been said by the hon. gentleman. As to the position I have taken in this matter, I have only to say that every man in this House is the equal of the other; every member has the right to bring in any motion he pleases. All cannot be served at the same time, so every man must take his turn. Here is the Order paper showing that there are about fifty or sixty notices of motion, some of which are debatable, while some are not. Some are for the production of papers simply. If we are to follow the rule of the House every man will have to await his turn. There is no gainsaying that position. If a man has to wait for his turn, he loses no right; he takes his chance like everybody else. To-day, on coming to the notices of motion, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) asked that we should take the unopposed motions. What do we understand by 'unopposed motions'? The hon. gentleman has defined it. What we understand by an unopposed motion is a motion for the production of papers which a member thinks he may require for the discussion of some question later on. That is well understood. In the same way, a few nights ago, we were asked to take the unopposed motions. I agreed, as I have always agreed upon previous occasions. But we came to the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) for a committee of inquiry. That is not what we understand to be an unopposed motion, that is not a motion for the production of papers. It could not fairly be treated as an unopposed motion, and I asked that it be allowed to stand. Because I took that position the whole of the opposition, on the following day, said that I had refused investigation. I thought if that were to be the way, after granting this courtesy, I would not extend the same courtesy again, and, so long as I occupy the position I do, I shall not extend that courtesy again unless it is understood that we will take only unopposed motions, motions for papers and nothing else. This is the position I take, and it is the position I stand by at the present time. As to everything that has been said by the hon. gentleman, the question of the investigation in regard to Huron and Brockville has nothing at all to do with the present matter. This shall be treated at the proper moment. I have only this to say to the hon. gentleman: I have a sense of my own responsibility, I have a sense of the duty which I owe to the House as the leader of the House, and I intend to maintain my own notion of that duty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has given as a reason why we are not to deal with unopposed motions to-day the fact that some lack of courtesy was exhibited to him from this side of the House last week. Now, the right hon. gentleman knows well enough that any such act of discourtesy, as he has seen fit to term it, was simply a protest on this side of the House by reason of the fact that the right hon. gentleman had taken a position in regard to this motion which I am bringing to the attention of the House, which could only have one result, and that was the result of preventing any further inquiry into this matter. My right hon. friend must not suppose that we are quite fools on this side of the House, or that we cannot see through a little manoeuvre of that kind. This matter was dealt with last year as a matter of privilege. It was brought up in this House as a matter of privilege, and when it was brought up this year again, I took the position that it should be dealt with as a matter of privilege. I venture to say that no hon. member of the government will deny that statement. I was compelled by the action which the government took in regard to this matter to place this upon the motion paper as an ordinary motion. What had I to expect in regard to the action which hon. gentlemen opposite would take upon this matter? What was said to me by the right hon. gentleman who leads this House when I brought the matter up last year? Perhaps my right hon. friend has forgotten what he said the other day. I will take the opportunity of refreshing his memory and showing how different his attitude in regard to this matter, before the investigation began, is, from his attitude in regard to it after the investigation had been partly completed. Last year the right hon. gentleman said:

With regard to the West Huron election, I am free to say, at once, that having heard the statement that the hon. gentleman has made, and which I understand he is prepared to substantiate upon his standing as a member of this House, he has made a prima facie case which, I say, without any hesitation, must go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Then, he continued as follows:

With regard to the Brockville election, I must say that, in my estimation, the case which he has made out is very, very weak, if indeed he has made out a case at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Let us see whether hon. gentlemen will say hear, hear, when I read what follows:

But such is the sanctity of the ballot, such is the sanctity of the rights of the people which they must exercise, whenever they are called upon at the polls, that though, in my opinion, speaking here in behalf of the government, the case made out in regard to Brockville is more than weak, still the government will not offer any objection to the case also being referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

That was the attitude of the right hon. gentleman last year. Then, he continued further in the same high-minded manner, in concluding his speech:

If any one has contravened the law, it is fair and right that this should be investigated, and that we should know now henceforth and forever, that the will of the people must be expressed as the people wish to express it, however severe the consequences may be on one side or the other.

I made my motion this year, having regard to the attitude that the right hon. gentleman had exhibited to this House last year. I expected that the right hon. gentleman would come, himself, to this House and ask that this matter be at once referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is the only course that you could expect from the right hon. gentleman having regard to his statement the year before, and having regard to what had been brought out before that committee. But, when I made my motion, in good faith, it was met by objections raised on behalf of the government. I was still more astonished, after having been willing to deal with this matter as an unopposed motion, because there could be nothing to discuss in it. The right hon. gentleman sat in his place in this House and took a position that prevented this motion from being here passed upon at all. The right hon. gentleman did two things. In the first place, he served notice upon every hon. gentleman who had a motion on the Order paper that if he did not bring it up and discuss it, the first time it was reached it would be dropped. Then, we have the next part of the programme. Although I was willing that my motion should be dealt with as an unopposed motion, the right hon. gentleman who had exhibited all this zeal and anxiety for the sanctity of the ballot last year, called out 'stand.' Last year we were taunted in the House and elsewhere with the fact that this motion was not made early enough, and with the fact that we had not brought it up at the commencement of the session. This year when I endeavoured to bring it up at the commencement of the session, and was willing that it should be dealt with as an unopposed motion the right hon. gentleman takes a course which can have only one result, namely, to prevent this matter being reached at all, and then he sets up some slight to his dignity to prevent it being reached in the ordinary way in which we are to deal with notices of motion. Now, the right hon. gentleman says that this should not be dealt with as an unopposed motion. I would like to know why. Will any hon. gentleman quote any authority to show why this should not be dealt as an unopposed motion?

Mr. BRITTON. We intend to oppose it, and therefore it cannot be dealt with as an unopposed motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRITTON. I had not quite finished my sentence.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) understands that if the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) does not choose to give up the floor, the hon. member (Mr. Britton), has no right to speak.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What does the hon. gentleman wish to say?

Mr. BRITTON. I only intended to say that I, for one, as an independent member of this House, intended to oppose the motion as to Brockville. That is what I meant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) said we intended to oppose it.

Mr. BRITTON. I can only speak for myself.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) somewhat distinguished himself on one or two occasions by letting the cat out of the bag, and now he is doing it afresh. Of course, you are going to oppose the motion. We understand that, but we want to make it plain. We want you to take the true position in regard to this, and the hon. gentleman has taken the right and the manly position. 'We are going to oppose it.' Last year we were going to have this investigation, we were going to maintain the sanctity of the ballot, we were going, although the case was weak, to send it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That was the attitude last year which was greeted with loud and prolonged cheers from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when the right hon. gentleman announced it. But, this year, things are different. Seventy, eighty or ninety witnesses have been examined before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and startling facts have been disclosed. Forty-three men have sworn before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that they deposited ballots for Robert McLean at the polling place in which Donald Cummings was presiding officer, and thirty ballots marked for Robert McLean came out of that ballot box, and no more. Therefore, our attitude is to be different this year from what it was last year. This year we intend to oppose it, although last year we were maintaining the sanctity of the ballot; so say the government. A gentleman by the name of James Farr presided at another poll. 118 men voted at that poll, but 123 ballots came out of the ballot box, and twenty-two of these ballots can readily be distinguished from the other ballots, and Mr. James Farr has stated to witness after witness, that he tampered with the ballots on that occasion. He could not be found for the purpose of bringing him before that committee, although at the very time when the committee was trying to get him, he was in communication with Mr. James Vance, one of the Liberal organizers for the province of Ontario. And so they say, therefore, we do not want an investigation this year; therefore, they say, we will oppose an investigation this year, because, perchance James Farr might be brought before the committee.

Mr. SPROULE. He had a ticket-of-leave last year, and they might renew it this year.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That statement is from a gentleman who occupied a great deal of time before that committee in the interests of the party of which he is so distinguished a member.

Mr. TAYLOR. Leading counsel for the government.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Ninety-eight ballots came out of a box at a polling place where Mr. Donald Cummings was the presiding officer, and of those, a number of the ballots which were marked for Mr. Holmes, the Liberal candidate at the election, were proved by an expert, whose evidence was not contradicted in the slightest degree, to be of different paper from all the good ballots which were deposited in that box, and of different paper also from the ninety-eight stubs from which they purported to be taken. There were ninety-eight stubs from which ballots had been taken; there were the remaining ballots which had not been used, and these were all one class of paper. A certain number of the ballots deposited for Mr. Holmes were of the same quality of paper as the ballots deposited for Mr. McLean, but some twenty ballots which were marked for Mr. Holmes, were of an absolutely different kind of paper, and could never have been taken from these stubs.

Mr. TAYLOR. And a different sized ballot.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And with different marks, marks which could readily distinguish them, even to an unpracticed eye, from the good ballots, which were deposited by the electors on that occasion. Further than that, Mr. Donald Cummings, and Mr. James Farr, both violated the law, by putting the counterfoils in their pockets, instead of destroying them. Mr. Cummings himself admitted it and witness after witness proved it, so far as Mr. Farr is concerned. Now, these are only a tithe of the grave irregularities, which were shown by the voluminous evidence given before that committee to have been practiced by officers of this House. Then, there is the report of the committee—a report from which my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton), did not dissent; he did not take enough interest in it to be there, and I assume, if he had been there, he would not have dissented, because, it was assented to by my hon. colleague from Halifax (Mr. Russell), who took a leading part before that committee. This report states: That the proceedings of that committee are incomplete, that several witnesses who appeared before that committee, and whom it was intended to examine, could not be examined for want of time, and the committee therefore report:

The evidence given by the witnesses who were examined that the House may take such action thereon, and as to continuing and completing the inquiry and investigation as may be deemed best, and the committee recommend that the evidence and exhibits be printed for the use of members of the House.

Under circumstances of that kind, is it a wonder—having regard to the attitude that was taken by the leader of the House last year, and taken also by his party, who greeted his remarks with applause—having regard to that, is it any wonder that we should expect to have these proceedings expedited this year? If this matter cannot be dealt with as a matter of privilege, why cannot it be dealt with as an unopposed motion? There are English authorities. There is a most elementary rule with regard to such a matter. There are English authorities and there are Canadian authorities quoted in Sir John Bourinot's book, to show that a question of this kind is referred back as a matter of course. Three or four instances are given in Sir John Bourinot's book, where it has been done in the English House of Commons. One instance, at least, is given, where it has been done in the Canadian Senate, and twice last year in this very House, it was done. The evidence taken before a committee in the previous year, the Committee on Public Accounts, with regard to a certain expenditure of public money in Manitoba, respecting these very election matters, was referred back and was not opposed, and the committee dealt with that matter embodying the evidence taken during the session of 1898, as well as the evidence taken in the session of 1899. There is nothing to discuss about this matter, so far as our position is concerned. Will any gentleman on the other side, tell me what there is to discuss about it, and why should it not be dealt with as an unopposed motion? It cannot be dealt with properly in any other way, except as an unopposed motion, unless hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to take a different attitude towards the question this year from that which the Prime Minister announced last year.

Now, Sir, having regard to the investigation, which has been held and which is still incomplete; having regard to the attitude which the right hon. gentleman and his followers took last year, I say that we had a right to expect different treatment with regard to this motion, from that which we have experienced; and I say that the right hon. gentleman was altogether too sensitive when he treated the protests from this side of the House as an insult to his dignity. I do not think that his dignity should be so easily ruffled. I point out that the course which has been pursued by the right hon. gentleman, and his friends during this session, is altogether a different course from that which they pursued last session, and a course which cannot commend itself to the judgment of any fair-minded man, who has any regard for the dignity of this House.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), is trying to make a mountain out of a mole hill. Does he not know that even if the government should consent to allow unopposed motions to pass, there is nothing to prevent any individual member of this House from getting up and saying that he wants to discuss the motion on the Order paper, and that prevents its being proceeded with as an unopposed motion. In the face of that, how does the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden), expect to have his motion called until the proper time arrives. Why should he put the responsibility on the right hon. the Prime Minister, when he and the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), well know, that unopposed motions can only be called with the unanimous consent of the House, and that any one member can prevent them being proceeded with.

The ex-Finance Minister this afternoon tried to show that all the wickedness, all the irregularities, and all the ballot stuffing in the country were directly chargeable to the Reform party. The hon. gentleman did not apparently remember that when he sat on this side of the House, Mr. Baird, who was wrongfully returned as the member for Kings, N.B., by sixty of a majority, held his seat here session after session, and the ex-Finance Minister, while a member of the cabinet, supported him in doing so, and tried in every way to prevent any investigation that would result in putting Mr. Baird out; and that gentleman held the seat to the end of the term, notwithstanding the fact that he was in a minority of sixty. Take another case. The ex-Finance Minister was in this House in the session of 1896, when Mr. McGillivray was returned as the member for North Ontario, and occupied a seat in the House during the whole session without having any right to it. A recount was held, and it was found that twenty-one ballots for Mr. Graham, the Liberal candidate, had been extracted, and twenty-one for Mr. McGillivray put in; and Mr. McGillivray, being evidently ashamed of it, eventually resigned. In another case, while the ex-Finance Minister was a member of the cabinet, Dr. Landerkin was returned for South Grey by a majority of forty-six. During the time that elapsed from the return of the ballots by the deputy returning officers, and the receipt of the boxes by the returning officer, twenty-six ballots for Dr. Landerkin were taken out of seven polling subdivisions, and twenty-six marked for his opponent, Mr. Blyth, were substituted in order to put Dr. Landerkin out of the seat. If there is any party in this country that originated tampering with ballot boxes, and that has had a monopoly of that business, that party sits on the other side of the House at the present time. They were the men who instructed the deputy returning officers to perpetrate these crimes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, they were. Mr. Birmingham was the man who telegraphed to Macdonald, Manitoba, during the election of 1896, that Freeborn was a good man, and he was the man who went there from Ontario and taught the men who perpetrated the crime the way to do it. The ex-Finance Minister will get up and declare that in Ontario, and Ontario alone, all the corruption is to be found. The hon. gentleman knows the inner secrets of the wickedness that was perpetrated by members of his own party long before any Reformer knew anything about such things. They are the men who introduced the system, who educated their deputy returning officers; and if anything of the kind was ever practised by any Reformer, I am sorry for it. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that in every election now held where Reformers are successful, that result is obtained by manipulation of the ballots. They lived a long time by the practice of that kind of iniquity, and now their chickens are coming home to roost. They know that we carry the elections fairly and honestly.

With regard to the West Huron case, hon. gentlemen opposite were allowed unlimited privileges. They subpoenaed men from the riding until the whole corridor upstairs was filled with them, and every chair that could be found was occupied by a witness. Day after day these men were examined. The ex-Minister of Finance said to-day that wickedness, irregularity and corruption had been proved against the deputy returning officers. It is unfair to that staff of officers for him to dare to make that statement, in face of the evidence that was taken. Not a single deputy returning officer was proved guilty of one wrong act; and yet the hon. gentleman has the daring to get up and attempt to blacken the characters of these men who honestly endeavoured to discharge their duty. With regard to the charge that a large amount of money had been spent, there was nothing proved. As for the Brockville election, I as a member of this House am prepared to say that I do not want to stand in the way, or to support any government that would stand in the way of a full and fair investigation wherever there is a prima facie case that will justify an investigation.

Mr. MILLS. You are doing it now.

Mr. McMULLEN. But I am prepared to oppose, as long as I hold a seat in this House, a fishing investigation in any constituency. We never asked for such investigations when we sat on that side of the House; if we had done so, we would never have got them. We had to make out a prima facie case before any investigation was granted. After our experience of the West Huron case, which ended without any impurity or irregularity being proved, and in the face of the very limited, flimsy charges which are offered as a basis for an investigation, if the government chose to take the stand that they would not grant it, I say they would be perfectly justified. But at the same time, wherever a prima facie case is made out, I do not wish to stand in the way of an investigation. But the ex-Finance Minister tried to make out that the First Minister was going to balk this investigation by the course he has taken with regard to unopposed motions. The hon. gentleman knows that in making that statement he was trying to place upon the shoulders of the First Minister a responsibility which he had no right to place upon him, because he knew that if the man who sits for Brockville simply rose in his seat and declared his intention of speaking on that resolution, the hon. member for Halifax could not go on with it.

In the next place, the hon. gentleman should have proceeded earlier with his motion, but instead he frittered away the time at his disposal and allowed two or three weeks of the session to pass before doing anything. And then, when he finds that he is fettered by the rules of the House, he turns around and charges the government with obstruction. The whole responsibility rests at the hon. gentleman's own door. The hon. gentleman has no right to expect that other members of this House will forego their right to speak on his resolution or to take any other course they consider proper, because he wishes to have a special privilege granted him.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before I refer more directly to what I regard as a gross violation of the privileges of members of this House, I wish to answer a few of the statements made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). That hon. gentleman charges the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) with having delayed putting his motion on the paper, but surely he must be aware of the fact, if he is so well informed as he pretends, that the hon. member for Halifax put his notice on the paper the very first day after the committees were appointed. It would have been useless for him to have put his notice on the paper sooner, because the committee could not commence its work until appointed. The hon. member for Halifax, therefore, availed himself, at the earliest possible moment he could, of his right to put this motion on the paper and provide work for that committee.

The hon. member for North Wellington next said that in presenting a case before the House for inquiry, the hon. gentleman who presents it was obliged to make out a prima facie case before his motion would be accepted. But this is just what was done. The right hon. leader of the government acknowledged last year that a prima facie case had been made out, and, therefore, consented to have this matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Then, the hon. member for North Wellington proceeded to treat this case to a number of arguments in order to prove that the course taken by the hon. member for Halifax was not the proper one. He tried to justify the wrong-doing in West Huron and Brockville by saying that the Conservatives had done worse when they were in power. He said that because the Conservatives had done certain things in Manitoba and in South Grey, they should not now complain if their chickens were coming home to roost. But does the hon. gentleman in all seriousness pretend that two wrongs will make a right? Does he mean to say that even if wrong had been done by the Conservatives, that justified wrong-doing by the Reformers? Why, there was not a member of this House who indulged in more forcible declamations against the alleged wrong-doings of the late government than the hon. gentleman. No one tried harder to ferret out these things, either by investigation or other means, and have punishment meted out to those who did them, than the hon. gentleman who is to-day endeavouring to prevent an investigation into and an exposure of the very evils which he formerly waxed so bitter in denouncing.

I wish to deal with another phase of the question. What are the reasons that induce us to put a notice of motion upon the Notice paper? One reason is our desire to lay before the House and the country certain information with regard to certain questions that may be engaging public attention at the time, or with regard to certain lines of policy in which the government are engaged or to which we desire to draw their attention. Another object is to obtain information which we can use in the discussions of certain questions. A third reason is this. When we appoint a committee to do a certain work, it is necessary for this House to clothe that committee with the power to do it, and to refer to that committee the papers or data or information necessary for it to go on with the work. We have a committee appointed every year on Privileges and Elections. To that committee we assign certain rights and duties, and when we refer certain work to it, within the scope of those rights and duties, that committee is bound to do that work. For the purpose of enabling that committee to do the work, we must put in its possession certain information and data or otherwise it could not proceed. It cannot begin the work referred to it until parliament puts the papers in its possession, and to do this we have to put a notice on the motion paper to which the House must give its assent. That is the only means of putting that committee in possession of the data that will enable it to go on and do the work which parliament has instructed it to perform. But that committee is to-day prevented doing its work by the tactics adopted by the right hon. First Minister. They have endeavoured to burke the inquiry by making it impossible for us to reach that motion to have the papers referred to a committee. I say we violate one of the fundamental principles of parliamentary government in not allowing this committee to do the work that parliament has instructed it to do, in making it impossible for this committee to have these papers referred to it, and in not clothing the committee with authority to do the work that parliament instructed them to do. This is prevented, because the motion cannot pass, the papers cannot be referred to this committee, and the committee cannot be given authority to call the witnesses that could not be examined last year owing to the close of the session. And, because it could not be done, no lengthy report was made. It was left an open question, so that it could be gone on with this year. What does the report say?—

Your committee under the order of reference made on the 9th day of July, 1899, have partially inquired into and investigated the conduct of the returning officer and of certain of the deputy returning officers at the last election for the electoral district of the west riding of the county of Huron.

That in so doing they have heard the testimony of ninety-nine witnesses, and have submitted interrogatories for the examination of the county court judge of the county of Huron of four witnesses; that twenty-five sittings have been held for the purpose of taking evidence, covering seventeen days and comprising seventeen morning sessions and eight afternoon sessions; that the committee determined to hold the last session for the examination of witnesses on Monday, the 7th day of August, 1899, and for that reason nine witnesses then in attendance for the purpose of giving evidence were discharged without examination; twelve witnesses also failed to attend and the attendance of three was countermanded. The proceedings of the committee being thus incomplete the committee do not feel warranted in reporting any conclusions.

Your committee therefore report herewith the evidence given by the witnesses who were examined that the House may take such action thereon and as to continuing and completing the inquiry and investigation as may be deemed best, and they recommend that the said evidence and exhibits be printed for the use of the members of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of that report, the work of that committee is printed and is now before the House. Because that report is incomplete, the House has never dealt with it. It was understood that the work would go on during the present session, and that the witnesses would be examined whom it was necessary to examine, and all the information laid before the House in connection with this election to enable the House to discharge its duty. The completion of the committee's work was prevented by the fact that the session came to a close. We have now begun a new session, a session in which it was understood the work of the committee would be gone on with and completed. We on this side have endeavoured, in the discharge of our duty, to take up this work and refer the papers to the committee, which is one of the standing committees of the House, and is intended for such work as this. But we are prevented from setting that committee to work by the Prime Minister who sees fit to avail himself of one of the rules of the House. In doing so, he does what has never been done in this House before. It has been the invariable rule to allow notices that are not of a controversial character intended for the bringing down of papers for the information of the House to be dealt with. The Premier has refused to follow this practice in this case, taking advantage of a technicality. We want the people of Canada to know that fact, to know that the fundamental principles of parliamentary government are being violated to an extent that will make parliamentary government a farce. While we appoint a committee we do not put it in their power to do the work that parliament has assigned to it and that parliament has instructed them to do.

We very naturally inquire why the treatment of this matter is so different this year from what it was last year. The House must understand, and the country will understand, that before information was brought out last year, it was hoped that nothing would be learned to show the disgraceful state of things in that election. But that information was brought out; it is in possession of the House and the country knows it. And, because it was of such a disgraceful character, it is desired to burke further inquiry, and to prevent any further information of such a character being laid before the House and the country. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) declared that there was not a single wrong act shown to have been committed by any officer in that election. Need I remind the hon. gentleman of the fact that Mr. Cummings, a deputy returning officer, swore that he had put the stubs of the ballot papers in his pocket. For what purpose? To take them home and burn them, he said. The hon. member for Halifax asked him: Why did you not burn them where you were? Mr. Cummings was playing the part of a smart Aleck witness, and he replied: How could I burn them without a stove in the house. He was asked at what time in the year the election was held, and replied that it was held in February. Is it possible, he was asked then, that you carry on an election in February and have not means to warm the house in which the polling is held? Was there not a stove? Yes, he admitted, there was a stove and a fire. But that is the way he evaded the question. But the hon. member for North Wellington says this officer did not do a wrong act. Does the hon. gentleman know what the law calls upon him to do? Those stubs should have been destroyed in the presence of the scrutineers who were there to see that everything was done as it should be done. He took them home, to burn them ostensibly, but we say for a very much worse purpose, and we are justified in coming to that conclusion with the evidence before us. A number of the witnesses that were required to come before the committee were on ticket-of-leave. They were sent out of the country. Sent out of the country by whom? By friends of the government. Who supplied them with money to pay their board? Friends of the government. Who were these men? The same men who were engaged in the nefarious work in West Elgin, the same men who were engaged in similar work in East Elgin—

Mr. BERGERON. Friends of the government.

Mr. SPROULE. Friends of the government every time. There were the same men in South Ontario and the same men in Brockville, engineered and controlled, I honestly believe, and supplied with money, by the organizer of the party to keep them out of the country. The committee was not allowed to do part of its work because these witnesses were not in the country, and they remained out of the country until the session was over. Then they turned up in Toronto, and they made no secret of it that they were kept out of the country because it was deemed wise to have them there. Who were they? The same men who perpetrated the iniquity that was brought to light in connection with several by-elections in Ontario. And the same crowd of men were in every one of them; the same supporters of the government were in every one of them. Sometimes they were found closetted with ministers of the Crown, and sometimes with men high up in the confidence of the party. They were doing the same scandalous work, and they were sent out of the country when it was over. Look at Bole up at the Sault. When men were hauled up you found that the administration of justice was paralyzed because the Crown attorney would not prosecute. One culprit was bailed out; then that man went out of the country, and bondsmen who went bail were allowed to go. There was the case of Linklater and others, and they remained out of the country for months. I say that this work was done by the same crowd of men all along the line, yet, to-day, we are prevented from bringing forward the evidence which it is absolutely necessary to bring in support of the charges made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), who asks that this case shall be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He is prevented from proceeding with the case in regard to which the right hon. Prime Minister said, last year, that there was a prima facie case made out, and the hon. member for Halifax made out more than a prima facie case after he had brought his witnesses before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I want the country to know that we, on this side of the House; I want the electors of Canada to know that we are prevented from investigating this case. I want the country to know that hon. gentlemen opposite will not allow the inquiry to proceed into the operations of this machine, into the dastardly, contemptible, illegal and dishonest work of the men who did these things in the interest of the government, which would bring out information that would land some of these men in penitentiary. They happen to be their friends. We had better cease the practice of appointing the Privileges and Elections Committee to do certain work, if we do not allow them to do that work because we are afraid of the disclosures that it will make. If we are not going to enable that committee to do its work we are only making parliamentary government a farce, and we had better never appoint the committee at all. I can only tell the right hon. Prime Minister and his friends, that, although they may prevent us reaching that notice of motion and referring these papers to the committee that was appointed to do this work, although they may take advantage of the rules of parliament to prevent an investigation, the electors of Canada will hold them to account, and they will visit upon them condign punishment when they have an opportunity to go to the polls again and record their votes for, or against, such conduct as we have witnessed to-day. I am surprised at the right hon. gentleman because of the course he has taken in connection with this matter. He pretended that his dignity was hurt by what he was pleased to call a want of courtesy on the part of the opposition. The opposition extended no discourtesy to him; the opposition desire to avail themselves of the right of every hon. member to secure that information which is necessary to be brought here to enable them to do the work that the people have sent them here to do. There was no discourtesy to him, but he has availed himself of it to work up a little tempest in a teapot in order to justify the unjustifiable course he has taken which prevents this question going back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to enable it to go on with the inquiry, which, if gone on with would bring out information which, in my judgment, would relieve him of two of his supporters in this House and open up two constituencies where elections would be required to be held before they were honestly represented by men chosen by the honest vote of the people.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—INSURANCE OF CONTINGENTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of speaking on this motion, but, with your kind permission, I desire to make an announcement that seems to be required. It will be remembered that an insurance was effected, to the extent of $1,000,000, on the lives and limbs of the members of the first contingent. The government have, I think, very wisely agreed to allow recruits to be sent for the purpose of taking the places of those who have fallen by death, or who, being severely wounded are unable to maintain their places in the force. The question arises as to the position of the parties who are to take their places. As they are to sail tomorrow, I was very anxious that the press should have the statement that I find that it will not be possible that the insurance, to the extent of $1,000,000, shall apply to those who go as recruits. The information I have, is :

The insurance company which placed a policy of $1,000,000 insurance on the members of the first Canadian contingent have intimated that the insurance covers the original members only, and not the new members.

I think the original contingent numbered some 1,054, who are covered to the extent of $1,000,000. I am anxious that the parties sailing to-morrow should not go away under the impression that this insurance is extended to them. I therefore, ask the consent of the House to make this announcement.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

THE CAPTURE OF BLOEMFONTEIN.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is the hour for private Bills.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, before the House takes up the private Bills, I would like to inquire from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), whom, I presume, is leading the House to-night, if, before the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) left for Paris, he placed some person in charge of the British flag that is generally hoisted on these buildings? Early this afternoon we received notice from the War Office that Bloemfontein, the capitol of the Orange Free State, had the British flag flying over it, and I think we in Canada should recognize that great victory by hoisting the British flag over our capitol here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The news was not received until too late to hoist the flag to-night, but the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) will represent the Minister of Public Works, who will take good care of that matter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). For the comfort of my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor), I must take any blame, if blame there be, for the non-hoisting of the flag to-night. About ten minutes to six, while sitting at my desk here, I received the news that the British troops were flying the Union Jack over Bloemfontein, and it naturally occurred to me that we should do the same thing here. I only entered upon my duties as acting minister to-day, so that although the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is still in the country, I hope he will not blame him.

Mr. TAYLOR. I blame the Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Well, blame me if you like. However, I at once sent for the caretaker, Mr. Dubé, and asked him what was the method of flying the flag. He informed me that according to a very old rule the flag was taken down at sundown, and was safely stowed away for the night. It was then ten minutes to six, and I asked Mr. Dubé if it were sundown, and he said he thought it was. I asked him if he could possibly fly the flag before sundown, but he said he could not. It appears that the flag every night is put away under lock and key. Mr. Tarte, you will see, has taken precautions to have it well cared for, when it is not in actual use. Mr. Dubé told me it would not be possible for him to get the flag to fly it before sundown, and when I left the House at six o'clock, I observed that all the other flags in the city had been taken down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS. When Ladysmith was captured the flag was put up at half-past eight at night. So far as the information about the surrender of Bloemfontein is concerned, there was a telegram here at four o'clock, which I saw, announcing it.

Mr. SPEAKER. This whole discussion is, of course, out of order, as this is the hour for private Bills, and we are intruding on it, but, considering the subject, I thought it better to allow the discussion to go on thus far.

THE ORFORD COPPER COMPANY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McInnes for the second reading of Bill (No. 53) an Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Orford Copper Company, and the motion of Mr. Wood in amendment, 'That the Bill be read a second time this day six months.'

Mr. WOOD. I would ask the hon. gentleman to explain the Bill.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) intimated at the close of the debate on the last occasion, that he rather wished to withdraw the amendment in the face of the fact then stated, that the recitals in the preamble were similar to those in a Bill of like character passed last year. I understood he would withdraw the amendment in order that we might make inquiry into it before the Private Bills Committee, where those facts or any further representation based on them could be considered.

Mr. WOOD. I am willing to withdraw, but I wish to make an arrangement with the promoter of the Bill to allow it to stand, because I expect to leave on Saturday to be gone for a week, and I do not want this Bill to go through committee in my absence. If the promoter will undertake to allow the matter to stand until I come back. I have not the slightest hesitation to withdraw my resolution.

Mr. BELCOURT. There is no reason why this Bill should not be referred to the committee. We can refer to the committee, and if my hon. friend is not present when the Bill is called, I shall not press it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think this is a Bill which should not pass this House. I believe that the reasons which were given by the hon. member (Mr. Wood) when the Bill was last before us are sufficient to cause the House to hesitate a very great deal before it gives the Bill even a stage. There can be no question that we have done this kind of thing in the past, but we made a mistake when we did it, and if a mistake was made last year or the year before, in reviving a patent which had lapsed by reason of the carelessness of the man or the corporation who owned the patent, it is no reason why we should repeat that mistake. We might do it on the grounds of charity, because sometimes a poor person might hold a patent and not be able to make the necessary expenditure upon it. But this patent was owned by a company, and they never attempted to do anything with it in any way, shape or form. They allowed it to lapse for a time, but immediately that a new process is likely to be begun in the city of Hamilton—a process which is as yet untried and in connection with the trying of which a very large expenditure of capital, subscribed by private individuals, is about to be made—then these people who allowed their patent to lapse and to be absolutely off the slate for years—

Mr. COWAN. How many years?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think for seven years, the hon. member for Hamilton said.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is not the statement in the preamble.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the statement made to the House by the hon. member for Hamilton. At any rate for a number of years, there was no attempt to revive it. This parliament never was asked to revive it. There is no pretense now that the patent is likely to be used; but it is intended to be kept as a stumbling-block, in the hope at some later day, if possible, of forcing its purchase by people who are investing their own private money in a great industry in the city of Hamilton. I think this parliament should refuse to read the Bill, or to put it off. There is no sort of justification for it. If this patent is revived, what we shall do, will be to possibly place in the hands of the individuals, who control it, and who allowed it to lapse, and never did anything with it, a means, at some future stage in the history of that big industry in the city of Hamilton, of scoring them and obtaining funds from them for the use of this patent.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the Bill before us contains a preamble, which recites that in the year 1893, a patent was obtained for a period of eighteen years, and the fee paid for six years; that the six years elapsed on the 17th of November, 1899; that prior to the expiration of the first term of six years, the said company duly instructed its said attorneys to renew the said letters patent in due course and to apply for and obtain the said certificate of payment of such additional fee; that by an oversight of the managing clerk of the said attorneys the date of the expiration of the said first term of six years was inadvertently overlooked, but such oversight was discovered within eight days after the date of such expiration, and immediately thereupon the said attorneys made application to pay the said fee. What is before the House, is the statement that there was a delay of eight days in paying for the renewal of the application. Last session, rightly or wrongly, we passed two Bills of a similar character. They went before the Miscellaneous Bills Committee, and were subjected to a very severe scrutiny. That committee now requires that all these statements shall be proved on oath; and I suggest that the facts being prima facie such as would permit the Bill to pass, whether it would not be fair and reasonable to allow it to go before the committee. If the promoters fail to prove the facts as stated, it will have to be thrown out. If they do prove them, then it will have to be considered on its merits.

Mr. SPROULE. While I agree with a good deal of what the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), has said, I think this is not the place to get at the facts. The Private Bills Committee is the place where the evidence can be brought and the information obtained which is not available to this House, and which is necessary to satisfy us whether it would be proper to renew this patent or not. There is something suspicious about it when we are informed that an effort is being made to revive this patent at a time when another company is likely to take advantage of the process. That of itself is enough to make us move with great caution. We have heretofore revived patents of a similar character; but that has only been done after careful scrutiny and after bringing before the committee sufficient evidence to justify the committee in doing so. In this case, I think no great harm would be done by allowing the Bill to be read a second time and referred to the committee; but that committee should proceed with great caution, and satisfy themselves that this company is entitled to a renewal of the patent before it is renewed; because the conduct of the company would seem to suggest that they are inclined to play, as many have done before, the game of dog in the manger, by not either using the patent themselves, nor allowing others to take advantage of it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would suggest to the minister that the Bill be allowed to stand on the Order paper until the Minister of Agriculture ascertains whether the statements made in the preamble are correct or not. If he finds that they are correct, then there will be no objection to refer it to the committee. But if the statements made are found to be not true, it should not be advanced a further stage.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think the House should pursue the course suggested by the hon. gentleman. The effect of that would be to constitute the Minister of Agriculture a final authority as to whether or not the facts alleged in the preamble of this Bill, and like Bills, be correct or not. I do not think that is an arrangement which would be convenient or desirable in any sense. This House must needs deal with the Bill upon the assumption, at this stage, at all events, that the facts alleged in the preamble are correct; and assuming that they are correct, hon. members must judge whether or not a case has been made out which would justify the House in passing the Bill, to a second reading. There are no means of ascertaining whether those facts are correct or not, except by having the persons interested brought before the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, to give evidence on that question. Then the committee will be in a position to deal with the measure. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not well disposed towards reviving letters patent which have lapsed. As a general rule, I do not think it is a course we ought to adopt. At the same time, I am prepared to acknowledge that there may be cases in which we should be fully justified in reviving a patent, and I think the House must deal with each case as it comes before it, after the facts have been satisfactorily ascertained. I am disposed to agree with very much that has been said by the hon. member for Haldimand; but I do not think that we ought to deal with this present motion upon any other basis than that the facts alleged in the preamble are correct. Assuming that they are correct, then it would be for the House to say whether the Bill should not be advanced a further stage, and be referred to the committee. But if the view of hon. members present is that the facts stated, even if fully substantiated, are not sufficient to justify the passage of the Bill, then it would be very proper to refuse a second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BELCOURT. The facts mentioned in the preamble have to be proved before the committee, and if not proved the Bill will be thrown out.

Mr. SPROULE.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Supposing they are proved, they may not make out a case.

Mr. BELCOURT. Then when the Bill comes up for the third reading, the House can reject it, if it does not approve of it. I do not see why it should not be referred to the committee. Otherwise we will be simply rendering a judgment without trial. Let the measure be investigated in the Private Bills Committee, and I will undertake not to press the Bill in that committee when my hon. friend is absent.

Mr. TAYLOR. Might I ask where the hon. gentleman is going to make his proof otherwise than at the patent office? The record there states the date the patent was issued.

Mr. BELCOURT. There are many things in the preamble which will have to be established altogether outside the commissioner of patents.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the statement of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), supported by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), is correct, namely, that the patent lapsed several years ago, although, according to the preamble, it only lapsed about eight days ago, the record in the patent office will show which statement is correct.

Mr. BELCOURT. That is not the only fact to be established. There are others that cannot be established anywhere than before the committee.

Mr. WOOD. So far as I am concerned, on the understanding that this Bill will not be pressed in the committee in my absence, which will be about a couple of weeks, I am quite willing that we should go to the committee. I have evidence to show that the patent lapsed seven years ago, and will prove that in the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know why this Bill should go to the committee if the patent expired six or seven years ago, and the Bill represents that it only expired a few days ago. That is good reason why it should not go to the committee. I shall vote for the six months hoist.

Mr. CHARLTON. This would be irregular and unfair. We have our regularly constituted machinery for dealing with these matters. The Committee on Private Bills is charged with the duty of examining into the character of these Bills, and that committee is the regular channel through which we derive our information. We would be departing from parliamentary usage if we were to take any other course except a reference of this Bill to the Private Bills Committee. We have the pledge made by the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge that he will not press it in the absence of the hon. member for Hamilton, and we have the fact that the hon. member for Hamilton is satisfied with that arrangement, and under the circumstances it would be irregular and improper to adopt any other course than to refer this Bill to the Private Bills Committee, and let that committee examine into the facts and report.

Motion withdrawn ; and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Merchants' Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to 'The Royal Bank of Canada'—(Mr. Russell.)

Bill (No. 73) respecting the Restigouche and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. McAlister.)

Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the Canadian Loan and Investment Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.—(Mr. Quinn.)

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. Hurley.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). The debate on the motion to adjourn, presented by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), seems to have taken a wide range, and I suppose there is practically no limit to the range it may take. I desire to say a few words on behalf of that portion of the members of this House who have business to transact here, and who have taken the regular course to secure attention to that business, by placing their notices of motions and the Bills they have in charge upon the Orders of the Day. We have the Orders of the Day as our chart to guide us in the transactions of business. It is supposed, if we attend to parliamentary procedure and practices, that we shall pursue the order of business laid down on this Order paper. But, recently, we have paid very little attention to the order. In a great majority of cases, we might as well have had no guide to direct us as to the business we were to transact. A large portion of our time has been taken up with the discussion of questions that have been raised upon motions to adjourn, questions that have been in this way sprung upon the House without notice, and have been debated at great length, and often in a spirit the reverse of dignified, the reverse of parliamentary, as was the case to some extent with the discussion this afternoon. Now, I might instance my own case as one in which the rights of a private member, in my opinion have been infringed upon by the course that this House has pursued. I had a notice on the Order paper which stood as the first order for to-day. I have expected to reach that notice for several days. It was reasonable to suppose that it would be reached and discussed to-day. But the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster), rises and commences an assault upon the Premier and the government, and informs yourself, Sir, and the House, that he will conclude with a motion. He proceeds to make what I must say was an intemperate assault, and to use language the reverse of dignified, the reverse of parliamentary. He abused the Premier or spoke of him in the coarsest and most unparliamentary manner—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, he did. I would term his manner coarse and unparliamentary.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and would ask your ruling on the hon. member's (Mr. Charlton's) words. I submit that the hon. member has no right to say of another hon. member that he has used coarse and unparliamentary language, for your own decision to-day was that the language was not unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think no member has the right to apply the term 'unparliamentary' to what the House accepted at the time. As to characterizing it otherwise, I think the same freedom must be allowed as in other cases.

Mr. DAVIN. 'Unparliamentary' was out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think so.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of course, I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker ; and I bow to it with this remark—that if the language used by the hon. member for York this afternoon was parliamentary, then, that kind of parliamentary usage will reduce this House to the condition of a beer garden in a very short time.

The abuse of the privilege of bringing up questions on motion to adjourn is becoming a very serious abuse in this House. The time wasted already this session has been a very important item. This abuse disarranges the course of business so that members have no means of judging when a given order of business will be reached ; it is a matter of chance rather than a matter of calculation as to when we shall do anything. I think it is high time that the rights of members who have business to transact, and who have this Order paper to indicate to them at what time they will probably have the privilege of bringing that business before the House should be in some measure respected. There is a rule in the Ontario assembly that motions to adjourn shall not be discussed by any member at greater length of than half an hour. Some usage of that kind should be followed here; it would curtail the discussion that can be indulged in by members who choose to rise and commence an assault on somebody or a disquisition about something, informing the speaker that, in due time, when he gets through his diatribe, he will move the adjournment of the House. The grievance of the hon. member (Mr. Foster) who made this motion this afternoon was that a course had been adopted that was calculated to deprive members of the right to proceed with business. He attacked the government because the Premier had chosen to adhere to the rules of the House without making an exception in application of those rules asked for by the leader of the opposition. The hon. member who made this attack upon the government, and who said he did so because the action of the government was impeding business and preventing a private member from reaching a motion, was himself guilty of the very offence that he charged upon the government. He was guilty of wasting practically an entire day by the course he took, and was delaying legitimate business, delaying the reaching of the very motion he was condemning the government for not permitting him to reach, and putting the reaching of that motion a day later under any circumstances than it otherwise would have been. He was guilty of the very offence he was charging on the government, and guilty of that offence without justification for the purpose, in my opinion, of raising a discussion that might possibly result in advantage to the opposition. Now, the whole of that matter with regard to the contest in Brockville and the contest in West Huron was discussed by the opposition as though they were in possession of a verdict, and of the outcome of an investigation when they had neither one nor the other. The whole thing was premature, the whole thing was unparliamentary. I repeat that we are falling into bad usages in the manner of conducting the business of this House, usages that are in violation of all precedents and all parliamentary rules, that are a waste of time, and ought to be discountenanced by every respectable member of this House without reference to party. For, we are all interested in maintaining the dignity of this House, I understand. I do not think there are any hon. members on either side who wish to bring this House into a position where it will be an object of contempt to the country. I do not suppose there is any hon. member who desires the House to occupy an undignified position in the eyes of the country, but, it is exactly what will be the result of the conduct that is indulged in, in this House. It will lose—I may say, that, to a very great extent, it has already lost the respect of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, it has largely lost its own respect, that is, the respect of the more respectable members of this House.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is fast losing it since 1896.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) state what he means by the more respectable members of the House?

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I suppose, there are different grades of respectability in churches, in the House of Commons and everywhere else, and there are some members who have a keener sense of propriety and a greater desire to pursue respectable and proper conduct than others. All the members of the House of Commons are respectable, but there are different degrees, different grades of respectability, and some grades of respectability are more apparent in the case of some hon. members than in that of others, although I do not deny its being possessed, to a certain extent, by all. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that this House is losing the attention of the country.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, and to some extent, it is losing the respect of the country. The country looks on and sees the unjustifiable waste of time, day after day, when we ought to be attending to the legitimate business of the House, a waste of time in order to advance the purposes of some individual or clique or party. This course is taken in violation of what all men know are the proper rules of debate, the proper rules by which a grave deliberative assembly, such as this Canadian House of Commons, representing half a continent of 6,000,000 people, should be guided. Now, Mr. Speaker, a little more progress in the direction we have been making progress in, will bring this House into a condition that will be a very undesirable one. I can realize a very marked contrast, in my own mind, between the Canadian House of Commons of 1900 and the Canadian House of Commons of twenty-five years ago. I believe that the first and the second parliaments of Canada lived nearer to the rules that should be adopted and followed by a legislative assembly than the present House does.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe that the debates were more pertinent, briefer, that there was less padding and a less manifestation of party spirit and bad temper, that there was more dignity in the conduct of debates and the proceedings of the House in every respect, that there was a higher grade, a higher level, and instead of advancing in this respect, I am sorry to say, the course that we are pursuing does inevitably lead to deterioration. I am sorry to say it, and I think it is a matter that should receive the attention of every hon. member. I do not get up to speak as a Liberal, or a supporter of the government side of the House, I do not get up to denounce the opposition. I do not say that the disposition to do what is not consistent with a higher ideal of parliamentary conduct is confined to any one side of the House, but I say that all the members of the House should endeavour to secure the conduct of the business of the House in a manner which will reflect credit upon the House, which will advance the business of the House and which will secure for the House, in the estimation of the country, respect and attention. Respect for ourselves should demand and secure a more dignified course in the transaction of the business that is placed before us, and if we are to continue this mode of doing things, this lamentable waste of time, the result will be that we will fritter away from two to four months of our time. When hon. members are tired out and desire to go home, there is a great mass of business remaining on the Order paper, a great number of important measures to receive attention, there is not time to give them proper attention, and the result is that measures of the most important character are forced through with scarcely any consideration at all. The time that ought to have been devoted to a full and fair consideration of these measures has been fooled away, as this day has been fooled away, and as other days have been fooled away during this session. We had, this afternoon, on the part of the deputy leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), the gentleman who sprung this discussion and who is responsible for this waste of time, the bold, bald threat that the business of the House would be blocked, that we would have more obstruction, that we would have more difficulty than we have hitherto experienced in transacting the business of the House. If this is the spirit that actuates the first lieutenant of the opposition, if this is the spirit that actuates any considerable number of the members of the opposition, if there is permitted to exist in this House a spirit that undertakes to dictate the conduct of the opposition in this House in a purely obstructive sense, it is a most lamentable condition of affairs, and I say that it is time to alter our course, to adopt new standards, as individual members of the House, irrespective of party considerations, and to decide whether we are to condone, whether we are going to aid and promote the continuance of this kind of tactics, which, I hold, has been, in a measure, the disgrace of this House during this session.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House has listened with a great deal of interest and edification to the speech which has fallen from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Nothing could be more interesting to this House, nothing more worthy of its attention, than to discuss its demeanour and efficiency. I am glad that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was not in the House a few moments ago when one of his foremost followers declared that the conduct, the demeanour and the dignity of the House have fallen so low under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman that twenty-five years ago, when this country, generally, was not as advanced as it is to-day, it was far ahead of what it is now, under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must ask the permission of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) to set him right. I attributed none of the features I condemned to the management of the right hon. leader of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. It is no point of order. My hon. friend took his cue of dignity from the right hon. gentleman, and nobody has a better right to talk about dignity than the Prime Minister, because, I say, with truth, that nobody can assume an air of dignity better than the right hon. gentleman. But, what is the good of dignity and of demeanour, if, beneath that dignity and demeanour there is no real manliness of public character? What have we seen here to-day? When my hon. and learned friend here (Mr. Borden, Halifax) pleads for an opportunity of making an inquiry into the scandals connected with the Brockville and West Huron elections, the right hon. gentleman first blocks him by stating that he is going to go on the line of red tape, of parliamentary etiquette, and then falls back on a declaration about his own dignity. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you have ever seen the picture Dignity and Impudence? I will say here, with all deference to the right hon. gentleman, that where a Prime Minister, in the face of such scandals as were revealed here last year, before the whole country and before parliament, puts up his thin screen of dignity to block inquiry, impudence and dignity go very close together. We have had, in the history of this country, and in the history of all countries, specimens of dignity and of politeness where there was not much solidity of character. The exquisite urbanity of Charles II. has passed into a proverb, but the epitaph on Charles II. was:

Here lies our mutton-eating king,
Whose word no man relies on;
He never said a foolish thing,
He never did a wise one.

I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman is fond of mutton, but I do know that he very seldom fails to say just the right thing. I wish I could add that he never failed to do the right thing. He never fails to say the right thing; he never succeeds in doing it; and certainly to-day he failed to do the right thing, when my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked for the opportunity of doing that which is the great privilege of a member of parliament. Why, Sir, what is the meaning of this parliament where we are speaking? What is its great function? It is not only the great consult, but it is the great inquest of the nation, and we are here to inquire into and to probe everything. I say here, Mr. Speaker, that not one of the many things that during these last four years have disfigured that government, and disfigured the reputation of that Prime Minister; not one of them will do more damage to the government or impress the country more forcibly than when it goes abroad that when an hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Borden) wishes to pursue an inquiry that was not completed last year, an inquiry that showed there was a corpus delicti of the gravest sort, the right hon. gentleman should get up and say: My dignity won't allow it. Dignity! What place has dignity in that connection? What is he doing? He is shielding rascals from exposure. That is all very fine for dignity. I do not like to use the comparison that rises to my mind when I hear these lip professions of dignity, and then whispering to the rascals behind: Never fear, I will shield you; I will throw around you the weight of my high position; I will—

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is imputing conduct to the leader of the government in the highest degree dishonourable. He is asserting that the leader of the government tells his followers in the rear that he will protect them in their rascality.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that such is not parliamentary language.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows what I was referring to. I was referring to these rascals that were exposed before a committee of which I am a member. I was referring to rascals that hon. and learned gentlemen in this House did everything they could to shield, doing everything they could to prevent that inquiry from being effective. And what did they do at last? Although we had nine witnesses there ready to be examined, they went back without being examined, because those gentlemen opposite would not sit of an evening. The hon. and learned member from Halifax (Mr. Russell), a strong lawyer from whom I would have expected something better, he threw all his ingenuity, and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) threw all his pettifogging in the way of anything like an inquiry.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Order. I ask you if it is parliamentary, Mr. Speaker, to accuse an hon. member of this House, a learned gentleman at the bar, of being guilty of pettifogging. I appeal to you, Sir, is that parliamentary?

Mr. SPEAKER. My impression is that it is not parliamentary to apply the term pettifogging to the action of a committee of this House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It was applied to one member of that committee.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I can withdraw it. He threw all what in him is not pettifogging, and that is not a great deal. Now, Sir, there was another gentleman in the history of England, Chesterfield. He was the pink of politeness, but he had not a character that we would think a great deal of. Then we come to Beau Brummel, and then to George IV., the finest gentleman in Europe. But we need not go to Thackeray's Four Georges to apprehend how much real respect he was entitled to at our hands, and after all, Mr. Speaker, when we are to judge the character of public men, that they can bow gracefully is not enough; we want from them such demeanour going to the root of action as will enable us to respect them. I agree with my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that this House has fallen within the last four years, and it has fallen because my right hon. friend, who is, I admit, in so many ways a charming man, has not weight enough to keep his followers behind him in order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) accused the hon. member from York (Mr. Foster) of having said he would block the business of the House. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) said nothing of the kind. He (Mr. Foster) said that if the Prime Minister would allow his followers to weigh down the Order paper with questions such as have disfigured it from day to day, and which, as my hon. friend says, has disgraced it; then the ex-Finance Minister said that two could play at that game. If, Sir, the opposition wishes to resort to that sort of warfare, it would be an extraordinary thing if we could not bring something more like powder and shot, than these poor wretched volleys of soap suds that have come there in the shape of questions from day to day. And if we have to resort to it, it will not be soap suds we will send across the House, but we will send dum dum bullets that will explode in the bosoms of hon. gentlemen opposite and we will expose the mean heart that lurks beneath the star.

Mr. WOOD. That is more Boer like.

Mr. DAVIN. I love the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) under all conditions, except when he tries to be witty, and then he loses for me that perennial interest and that abiding beauty that are his chief characteristics.

Mr. WOOD. There are two of us.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say with all respect that I have had myself a great deal of parliamentary experience. I am now getting to be one of the old members of this House. I occupied a more elevated, and, I was going to say—but I will not say it, out of respect to my brethren of the hour—I was going to say the more dignified position of a seat in the reporters' gallery in the House of Commons in England. I say that the man who sits in the reporters' gallery—especially in England—one session is equal to a session and a half of a member sitting in the House, because for one reason he is more there. Therefore, sitting there for seven years is equivalent to sitting in the House for ten years. I may say to you, Mr. Speaker, with great respect, that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) transgressed no parliamentary etiquette here to-day. What he was indulging in is what is called invective. You know, Sir, that so great an authority as Mr. Disraeli, afterwards Lord Beaconsfield, said: that invective is the great ornament of debate, and without invective our debates here would be very flavourless. If those gentlemen opposite, who sometimes indulge in that sort of thing which has distressed the soul of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to such an extent that all the dignity in his soul is withered under the blighting influence of what he sees around him; if those gentlemen opposite would seek sometimes to indulge in invective instead of whatever indescribable thing they resort to, it would add greatly to the interest of our debates. Now, what was my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) saying when he was stopped? He was using language that attributed puerility or boyishness to the Prime Minister. And what did he mean? He meant moral boyishness. He said it because he considered that the reason given by the Prime Minister for not acceding to the request of my hon. and learned friend, was not a masculine or a manly reason, that it was consequently puerile, and he used strong language to express that opinion, and showed himself indignant—and we all felt his indignation—why? Because, Sir, the right hon. gentleman who is at the head of this parliament, and who is the keeper of its honour and efficiency, had pledged himself to a policy which reduces by 50 per cent—aye, by ninety per cent—its efficiency, as the great inquest of the nation. Why, then, should not a leading man on this side be indignant and vehement, and express his indignation, when the right hon. gentleman had taken a stand lamentable in regard to this parliament—and lamentable, I dare aver, as to the estimate the people of Canada will form of my right hon. friend?

Now, Sir, I want to ask the attention of the House for one minute to what occurred last session. We had in that committee room a meeting. Only five polls were investigated. The principal polls investigated, were No. 4 of the township of Colborne, and No. 3 of the township of Goderich. Daniel Cummings was the deputy at No. 4. There were 125 ballots to the ballot pad; 98 voted; there were none spoiled; and 27 were unused. 68 were marked for Holmes, and 30 for McLean; majority, 38. But of the 68 marked for Holmes, 14 were bogus—14 different from the 34 and 27, printed on different paper. An expert proved that the 14 were bogus; but it needed no expert, for any man with half an eye, had only to look at them to see that they were bogus. But we had before the committee an expert, Mr. Harvey, whose evidence I have before me, and this man had with him an instrument called a micrometer, which he applied to measuring the ballots in the ballot pad, the ballot papers and the counterfoils. He measured these 14, and what did he say?

Q. And you have already given us the thickness of these ballots, 3—1 to 14. As a paper-maker you are familiar with all the processes of paper-making, are you not? A. Yes.

Q. Is it possible, I ask you, that these fourteen ballots came out of these stubs? A. No, sir.

Q. It is absolutely impossible? A. Absolutely.

Then, later on, he was asked:

Q. You are positive, then, that not one of these ballots of series three, including one to fourteen and all between, could have come off these stubs? A. It is impossible.

Not only were these 14 shown to be bogus from their measurements, but they bore the initials of the deputy in ink, whereas the remaining 84 bore his initials in pencil. I was a member of that committee, and was present, though I took no further part than that of a juror or judge. But my hon. friend from Halifax, who conducted the case, assisted by Mr. Powell, showed by cumulative demonstration, that this man Cummings, instead of destroying the counterfoils, as he was bound to do by his written directions, was accustomed to put them into his right-hand pocket. What he did do, it is clear, was to put the counterfoil into his right-hand pocket, and out of an inside pocket take a ballot marked for Holmes.

Mr. BRITTON. There is not a word of that in the evidence.

Mr. DAVIN. There is not a word of that in the evidence? Have I said there is?

Mr. BRITTON. It is just made up by yourself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I will not trouble you, Mr. Speaker, to call the hon. gentleman to order; I will brush him aside myself. What I say is that it is a plain inference. How did these bogus ballots get into the ballot box? This is the natural surmise, that when he put the counterfoil into his right-hand pocket, he took out of another pocket the bogus ballot that he wanted to put into the box. Forty-one men who were brought before the committee swore that they had marked ballots for McLean. Two other voters, who were ill had sworn to the same effect before the county judge of Huron. Therefore, the real vote was 54 for Holmes, and 44 for McLean, 14 having been stolen, and this having been done with the deputy's connivance. Now, take poll No. 3, in the township of Goderich, where James Farr was deputy returning officer. Farr, like Cummings, put the counterfoils in his pocket instead of destroying them. 118 men voted. 123 ballots came out of the box. You can see that no ordinary commonplace Conservative could do that. It required a conjuror, one of those fellows who can bring any quantity of ribbons out of his mouth, or one of those Chinese conjurors who bring out of a box what they do not put into it.

Mr. WOOD. Was he not a Conservative ?

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, no, he was not. He was proved to have been a Liberal. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose he were a Conservative, he would have been a Conservative who had left the ranks of Conservatism, like the present Minister of Public Works, and others of that ilk in the present ministry, and who show themselves more demoralized than the worst of the Liberals. Of the 123 ballots, 72 were for Holmes, 40 were for McLean, 10 had no mark, and 1 was rejected. The ballot box must, therefore, have been stuffed to the extent of 5 ballots, at least. All the ballots marked for McLean were initialled, several for Holmes were not initialled, and 22 of an entirely different appearance from the remaining ballots marked for Holmes, different from all marked for McLean, and different from the unused ballots—22 obviously bogus. Fifty-five men solemnly averred or swore that they had voted for McLean at this poll, although only 40 ballots of the 55 were found for him. Of the 55, 35 were examined, and nine were present waiting to be examined, but the Liberal members would not sit in the evenings.

What about Farr ? We ought to pause when we speak about Farr. He and several others, Cap. Sullivan and Dan Ferguson, the slugger and the plugger, are dear to the last acquisition to this ministry, the hon. gentleman from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland)—very dear to his heart on various accounts. These gentlemen had one prominent amongst them, and that was Farr. And what was his history ? I was present at the meeting of the committee when it was proved that just a day after my hon. friend from Halifax had moved in this House for a committee, Farr threw up a good situation in Toronto and went in to hiding. He admitted to witnesses that he was hiding, and he also admitted that he had voted himself twenty-two times at this election, that he had been furnished with a ticket and promised money to make himself scarce. He told four witnesses that he was in trouble over West Huron, and that whilst in hiding he was visited by, and did visit Mr. James Vance, the lieutenant of the Liberal organizer of the province of Ontario. Farr called on Vance, and Vance had a telegram from Ottawa : ' Keep Farr low.' This is what Farr told a witness who was examined in the committee. Farr also declared to the poll clerk, on the day of the election, with the candour that seems to distinguish all these gentlemen, that he had put ' thirteen damned good ballots into the box.' I read the other day, and I hope it will be brought forward in this discussion, a letter from one of the officers of the Ontario government who is mixed up in the West Elgin fraud, which surpasses in candour even this avowal, and I hope that my hon. friend who has this letter in his possession will read it. It is a fine piece of scoundrelly, ballot thieving literature. A scrutineer standing near Farr, picked up a ballot from McLean, initialled by Farr. Farr snatched it and tore it up into pieces, and said it was nothing. That was the act of a guilty man. Goderich polling booth No. 2 was on the same street, immediately opposite No. 3, where Farr presided. At No. 2, Colborne, two ballots for Holmes were found to be forged.

With such revelations brought out last session in the committee, and with the declaration of my hon. friend, that he has fresh evidence, and can probe these things still further, can any one be astonished that my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister, felt indignant when the Prime Minister took the position that he would do all he could to block the inquiry any further ? What does it mean ? It means this. It means that here we have a number of criminals worse than the majority of men in any penitentiary, for these criminals are striking at the life of free institutions. These ballot pluggers and thieves are worse than any criminals in the penitentiaries. My hon. friend from Halifax wants to get at them, and here comes dignity in its most attractive and powerful garb, the voice of the Prime Minister, who says : ' Stand back ; you must not touch one of these ; you must not inquire ; we will not help you to inquire.' That is a very serious stand to take. I say it destroys the efficiency of parliament. Talk about some little defect in parliamentary demeanour, talk about some little looseness of language, talk about some violent invectives—why none of these things, not the most violent invective heard within the walls of any parliament, could do such harm to the morale of parliament as for the Prime Minister to declare that he was going to stand by ruffians of this description and shield them from discovery. I would to God that a man would arise at this hour who would put into words that could not die, the shame, the rage, the scorn, the contempt, which every man who loves free institutions, must feel in our having a Prime Minister who seemed at one time capable of much better things, but who, under the influence of the sluggers and pluggers and the FARRS in politics—FARRS not in name, but in act—who have climbed close to the seat of power, has sunk so low that he will stand up here and declare in a brazen manner that his dignity stands in the way of allowing an inquiry into this rescaldom of Brockville and Huron.

Mr. B. M. BRITTON (Kingston). While I am much obliged to the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) for having raised a point of order when my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made a reference to me, I still am of the opinion that there is really no necessity to raise a point of order with reference to anything that hon. gentlemen may say. A man who is only capable of getting off some lines of poetry and of stringing phrases together without one particle of logic behind them, and who has not the slightest hesitation in garbling evidence as he quotes it—

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is attributing misconduct to me. No hon. member has a right to charge another with garbling evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that is a term which should not be used.

Mr. BRITTON. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that I bow to your decision, but I think it is quite proper to say of the hon. gentleman that he misquotes the evidence.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I did not.

Mr. BRITTON. He has not only done that in this case, but does so when ever he addresses the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is quite out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is your point of order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is that the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) has charged the hon. member for Assiniboia with constantly misquoting evidence.

The PRIME MINISTER. By exaggerating it.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no harm in saying that I exaggerate, but the hon. gentleman has not the right to say that I misquote. I quoted two parts of the evidence, and will send it over to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman to have gone on and qualified his statement by using the word 'exaggeration,' but there is no doubt that the charge of misquoting is one which an hon. member ought not to apply to another.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not know whether this will be unparliamentary or not—

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a point of order, Sir. You have ruled that the hon. member for Kingston is out of order, and yet he has not withdrawn the expression.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman is clearly under the necessity of taking back what he said.

Mr. BRITTON. I did not say—

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), will allow the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), to make his statement—

Mr. MILLS. I think I may raise a point of order at any time. My point of order is that you, Mr. Speaker, have ruled, as I understand it, that the hon. member (Mr. Britton), should not say that another hon. gentleman in this House has misquoted. The hon. member for Kingston has not withdrawn that.

Mr. SPEAKER. He has not had an opportunity, for the moment he got on his feet, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), rose.

Mr. MILLS. He was going on to speak.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not know whether it would be unparliamentary to use the language with reference to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Before resuming his speech, the hon. gentleman must withdraw the unparliamentary words he has used.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), is right. The term 'misquote' as applied to an hon. member across the floor, should not be used.

Mr. BRITTON. Then, if I used the word 'misquote' and if it is unparliamentary, I withdraw it. I can only say that there is such a degree of exaggeration in the hon. gentleman's remark, that a person listening who is not so logical or so clear sighted as the hon. gentleman thinks himself to be, might be led to think that he was misquoting. That is all I have to say in that respect. I shall not say what I intended to say with regard to the hon. gentleman, as it is, I suppose within the knowledge of almost every member of this House, what his leader stated of him once, and I intended to ask if it was unparliamentary to repeat the words applied by his revered leader to the hon. gentleman. But, I shall not do that, but shall leave it to those gentlemen who remember it to apply the term to him.

Now, it is not my intention to enter on this debate at any particular length. I interjected a word this afternoon, and, because of the word I used, perhaps improperly, I am forced to go a little further into the facts than I otherwise would. When I spoke this afternoon, I said we intended to oppose this motion. It was stated that I did so, and I believe I did. I only wish to say that, in using the word 'we,' if it implied in any way, shape or form, that there was any concerted action in this matter, or that I was taking the advice of any one, it was quite a mistake. I am responsible and am willing to take all the responsibility for the statement, that I intended to oppose the motion. I have no right to use the editorial 'we,' nor have I ever occupied a position to entitle me to say 'we,' as a minister of the gospel sometimes does. As it was taken up by the hon. gentlemen opposite, I used the word 'we' improperly. I intended to refer purely and simply to myself. I made up my mind independently, and after consideration of the whole matter referred to the committee, the report of which is before the House, that there was no prima facie case in reference to Brockville, I think that any person who will calmly and coolly read the statement which was made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), at that time, should be willing at least to admit that there was no prima facie case made out in reference to Brockville. So far as what took place in Huron, and what took place in Brockville was concerned, I may say, I knew nothing about the matter in either constituency. I was not present at either of the elections, had no interest in any of the electors—in no way was I connected with the elections or interested in them. Therefore, I knew nothing about it, except what was stated by the hon. member for Halifax, when he introduced this matter. Without having the statutes before me, and without having the election cases at hand, but simply taking the hon. gentleman's statement, I came to the conclusion that there seemed to be a prima facie case made out in reference to West Huron; or, at all events in a matter of that kind, I would be willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, in favour of an investigation. But, I felt quite certain the other way, with reference to Brockville, and, when we come to the details, I will explain why I thought so then, and why I think so still. And, so, when this matter was likely to come up this year, I was prepared so far as I was concerned, to take the whole responsibility of objecting to the Brockville case going to the committee; and, I was prepared to give my reasons for it as best I could, as I intend to do now. When the case came up in reference to West Huron, it went to the committee. I suppose I should be out of order if I were to speak of what took place in the committee, apart from the report which is before the House. But it appears from the evidence that has been placed before the House, that every facility was given to the hon. gentleman who had

in charge the prosecution of the case. He was allowed to say what witnesses he wanted and to any number; he was allowed to say when the witnesses were to come, how they were to be dealt with, when they came, in reference to giving their evidence, and, in every respect, he had every facility given him to conduct his case. I am not certain, but I understand, that there were 99 witnesses. What is the result of that investigation? I ask hon. gentlemen just for a moment to come away from the charges that have been made in the newspapers, that have been made in this House to-day by the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and others, and see what was referred to that committee, and see how the evidence bears on the charges made by these persons. The charges were in reference to the officers of the government in connection with that election. That would mean returning officer and the deputy returning officers. It means those officers and nobody else. It has no connection with any charges of bribery that might be made against outside parties; it has nothing to do with malpractice, charges of which are so easy to make and so difficult to prove; it has to do with the conduct of the officers in connection with that election. Now, what has been shown in connection with that? The hon. member for West Assiniboia says, with reference to the man Cummings, in the township of Colborne, that there were fourteen votes shown not to have been given for Holmes, though they were counted for Holmes. Now, that charge was against the deputy returning officer. That deputy returning officer had a character given to him by nearly all the witnesses called. It is true that forty-three men, if my memory serves me, came up and swore that they voted for McLean, and it is equally true, that only thirty votes—I believe that was the number—were counted for him. The election as won by Mr. Holmes. Mr. McLean was disappointed in the result in the township of Colborne. He set himself to make an inquiry to find out what was the matter in the township of Colborne, and he went to people whom, he would naturally expect, would vote for him and asked them if they had voted for him. Hon. gentlemen who know anything of human nature, know that amongst persons who are voters in any constituency, there are many men who vote one way and talk another. These men had promised to vote for Mr. McLean, and they were generally looked upon as Conservative voters. There was disappointment when Mr. McLean did not get the normal number of Conservative votes in that township. He sets to work to make an inquiry, and gets statements from these men, that they did, as a matter of fact, vote for Mr. McLean. The next step is to get declarations from these persons, and three persons set themselves to do that. Their names were mentioned, Mr. Hays, the candidate himself, and Mr. Beck, who was a former candidate in the local elections. These men get declarations from forty-three persons that they actually did vote for Mr. McLean. Having made the statement that they voted for him, having made declarations that they voted for him, it would not be very surprising that these men would come down here and, before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, make the statement that they had voted for him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) to say that these men came down here and committed perjury?

Mr. BRITTON. Yes, some of them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How many?

Mr. BRITTON. I do not know how many, nor do you.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I say that none of them did.

Mr. BRITTON. I know you say so, but let me come to the position that I was coming to. We have the fact that these men stated that they voted for McLean, that they made their declarations that they voted for McLean, and that before there was anything in reference to a committee of this House to investigate this matter. These statements were merely given to satisfy Mr. McLean and to put these men right with him. This is the statement we have.

Mr. CLANCY. What proof is that of perjury?

Mr. BRITTON. I am coming to that. These men come down to this election committee. They are brought face to face with the statements that they made in the riding, their declarations are flaunted in their faces and they are asked if these declarations are true. They were simply men, and some were not very honest men. They were put between these two facts: here is the declaration you made, here is the statement you made to Mr. McLean and we have brought you before the committee to say whether you voted for Mr. McLean. I do not care what hon. gentlemen may say in reference to these ballots. We have this charge made against the deputy returning officer, Mr. Cummings. We have a certificate of character given, nearly, by every one—by every one who was asked the question, so far as I remember, by the persons who were called as witnesses. He was an elderly man, who had acted many times as deputy returning officer in the constituency, and always had an honourable record. He was not the kind of man who would be up to tricks or to the practice of election frauds. We have the statement that he gave a ballot to the voter as he came up, that the voter marked the ballot, that the voter handed the ballot back to him and that he put it into the box. Now, then, we are driven to this position: The deputy returning officer is a sworn officer, he has a good record, he has a certificate of character by the different witnesses, called on behalf of the prosecution in this matter, he comes and tells the committee that the very ballots he gave out were the ballots put into the box by these different men. We are driven to ask: Whom are we going to believe? It is not fifteen persons against Mr. Cummings; it is one individual man against Mr. Cummings. There is no cumulative evidence, in fact, it is not thirteen oaths against Mr. Cummings, oath; it is simply one individual man against Mr. Cummings on this question of fact. You have a charge against Mr. Cummings as the deputy returning officer, you have a certificate as to his character, you have his appearance before the committee, a man not likely to do wrong, and as between Mr. Cummings and every one of these others, who had a motive for making a false statement in regard to whom he voted for, I would give my verdict, as one of the jury, that my hon. friend spoke about, in favour of believing Mr. Cummings instead of believing these men. What farther have we got? We have, as clerk of the deputy returning officer, a sworn man, and we have a scrutineer for Mr. Holmes and one for Mr. McLean. Everything that was done in the room was done in their presence, and they could keep a watch on the proceedings. So, I say that the assumption would rather be that there can be no wrong-doing attached to Mr. Cummings. You are investigating a charge against the deputy returning officer; you say that he had a package of ballots printed on different paper, but I want to tell the House that never, until to-night, did I hear it suggested, even by gentlemen connected with the prosecution, that he had two pockets in his coat, one of which contained ballots marked for Mr. Holmes, which he slipped out and substituted for ballots which he gave to voters as they came out. How could he do that in the sight of the ordinary scrutineers and of the ordinary voters? By not one of the voters was there any such charge made. It would have required a greater amount of legerdemain and slight-of-hand than Mr. Cummings possessed to accomplish any such trick as that. There was no one who saw that man, who was a hard-handed farmer, of good reputation, and an honest life up to that time, who had never been accustomed to tricks of any kind, would think of his committing any such fraud, and it is impossible to conceive how he could have substituted any such fraudulent ballots for good ballots and put them into the box. Nearly every one of these voters who came before the committee said that they saw the identical ballot put into the box that was given to him by the deputy returning officer after he had marked it. Of course, naturally, voters will take an interest in that, and, therefore, they had every reason and every opportunity to detect fraud, if fraud was committed. If you only want a charge against the deputy returning officer, and if it has been proved, as hon. gentlemen contend, what more do they want? There is the charge against the deputy returning officer? If the evidence proves it against him go on and punish him. That is all there is about it. What more can you do if you have the evidence. I am now simply dealing with the case of Mr. Cummings. If this evidence shows that he has substituted fraudulent ballots for genuine ones, then, the Act provides for his punishment, and you may go on and punish him. But, the hon. gentlemen do not want that; they did not want it at first. They wanted to go through the country and get these declarations, not because they wanted an investigation, but because they wanted to raise a cry in the newspapers, to talk in parliament and all over the country of suspected frauds which they knew they were not able to prove, and which they knew they could not prove if they went into the courts. There is not a single one of these charges made by my hon. friend, that is not made the subject of a special section of the Election Act, under which there is a special tribunal to try it, and where the witnesses, if they know the facts, can testify to them. There you can have a fair trial before a learned judge, who can see whether the persons who ask questions are pettifoggers, or whether in asking questions they have a sincere desire to elicit truth. My hon. friend did not want such an investigation as that, he wanted an investigation that would not investigate, but that would simply give an opportunity for garbling and exaggerating the evidence, and using it improperly as has been done in this House. For the sake of argument I will admit that what you say has been established against Mr. Cummings. That is, that thirteen persons had sworn they voted for McLean and that the votes were not counted. But, if you cannot get at the bottom of it, what is the use of talking any more about it. If you can get at the bottom of it, what can you do this session that you did not do last session in reference to it? If the allegation with regard to the township of Colborne is correct, then go on and punish your man. If you look at the charges that are made and read the evidence printed, you will find that nothing else than what I have stated has been proved with regard to the township of Colborne. With reference to No. 3, Goderich poll, I am prepared to admit that James Farr was not a person of good habits. He had bad political connections. He had been up to that time with the Conservative party, and if he knew enough to learn, he had an opportunity of seeing how that sort of work was done. On that occasion James Farr was the worse of liquor. The most that can be said about his case is that there were five more ballots in the box than were on the pad. If you want to make that direct charge against Farr, then you can go to a court and establish it, and punish him as the law directs. But this evidence in reference to Farr shows there is something behind the scenes which we do not quite understand altogether, because one witness told us that Farr not only boasted beforehand that he intended to vote for McLean, but that he actually showed the ballot marked for McLean and that he actually put that ballot in the box and that it was counted for McLean. That is proven by their own witness. I admit that Farr is not a reputable character. I admit that he was under the influence of liquor, and that he afterwards cleared off somewhere and told stories to different people in reference to what had taken place at that election. I say that it was unfair to have Farr's statements brought up in that committee, except as against himself, because it was the worst kind of evidence as against anybody else. There is not a lawyer in this House who will say that the statements of Farr made to this one and the other, when he was in a maudlin state—or even if you could catch him perfectly sober—are statements that could be used against any one but himself. If they wanted to use these statements against himself, why did they not lay a specific charge against him, so that he might be defended if any one was ready to defend him. It is evident that these gentlemen wanted only to get just as much tittle-tattle as any one would say, all over the country in reference to it, and so they brought in witnesses to say as to what Farr had said at one time or another, and which witnesses Farr afterwards contradicted in a sworn declaration published in the newspapers. I do not say that that declaration should be relied on, but it has at least just as much force and effect as any other statement made by Farr. At all events, the result of all his statements is, that they cannot be relied upon in a solemn investigation before a committee of this House. If hon. gentlemen opposite say that this investigation is not finished—then, speaking for myself, and I have no authority to speak for any one else—I did not intend to say in interjecting a remark to-day that if the committee thought they had any new evidence that would complete that investigation, the matter would not be placed in a different light. But, they had the opportunity to make charges, and there is not a member of the committee that will venture to say that in the evidence presented he would ask judge or jury to condemn Donald Cummings. If such evidence is not good before a judge, why should they want to send it before a committee of this House? Why should they ask to have the matter sent back to the committee, when, as to one man, they have all the evidence they could possibly have, and as to the other, they have not yet made a specific charge. It seems to me that the West Huron case ought not to be further investigated unless on the ground that there is something unfinished, and that they want to supplement something that has been done. In that case the question might be considered. Years ago parliament recognized that a committee of this House was not the place to investigate election frauds; and so certain offences were created by statute and the mode of trial was prescribed, and penalties by fine and imprisonment provided. If persons are proved to be guilty, the Election Act provides a short and sharp and decisive way of dealing with them. I do not say that parliament has divested itself of the right to investigate matters concerning elections. I do not think it has. But I do say that it seems useless to go to an Election Committee with every election matter, no matter how trifling. I hold that it should not go to the Election Committee unless something for the public good is to result from its going there. I do not suppose that any gentleman present will contradict me when I say that at the time the statement was made by the hon. member (Mr. Borden) in this House, no one supposed that the seat of the hon. member (Mr. Holmes) was affected by this matter. The question is not whether parliament could deal with the matter under certain given circumstances, but whether under these charges the seat of the hon. member for West Huron was in danger. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), admits that it was not in danger, except in this way, that if such frauds were established before the committee, we must admit that the member does not hold his seat properly, and therefore he should have honour enough to resign. But where a charge is made against a deputy returning officer, and the charge is not sustained, and the simple result is that you are to believe that thirteen or fourteen persons are telling the truth, even then only the majority of the hon. member is affected. There was, in fact, no one who thought for a moment that the hon. member's seat was in danger, and so I suppose the greatest possible latitude was given in the committee. When a man's right to his seat is affected, surely the rules with regard to the admissibility of evidence ought to be followed; surely there ought to be a greater degree of strictness observed than was the case in the committee at that time. But every kind of looseness was allowed in its proceedings. No matter what objections were raised, they were not pressed, and the evidence was given just as if no objections had been raised. What was said about the proceedings of the committee. It is worth while to read what appeared in the Toronto Star of the 14th of August, in the form of an interview with a Queen's counsel in Toronto, who is very familiar with election matters. This is the report of the interview:

You have had some experience in elections and parliamentary law?

Yes, parliamentary law is an entertaining historical and legal study and election cases give an experience.

Have you formed any opinions on the recent disclosures re West Huron before the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Yes. If the newspaper headings to the reports are true and can be established against the parties, no punishment can be too severe. The alleged acts are scandalous.

Don't you consider the evidence overwhelming?

Well, I have read the reports given in the newspapers of both political parties, and I regret to say that some of the facts brought out are startling, but they have been so garnished and confused with such a mass of hearsay and illegitimate evidence that if given before a jury, no true verdict could be rendered. Some members of the committee appear to have played havoc with the commonest rules of evidence, and made justice play tragedy or comedy like a marionette, according to the political instincts of some of the actors. Grave charges of criminal wrong-doing have been made against election officials and others without regard to the most elementary principles of legal procedure. Lord Holt once said it was abominable to try a man behind his back; and our highest court has held that whenever a party is to be affected in person, character or property by any proceedings analogous to a judicial proceeding, the courts, unless shut out by the most absolute and unequivocal words of the laws, invariably apply the sound English rule that no man shall be tried or condemned unheard.

These officials and others may have been guilty of the grossest wrong-doing, and it is hoped by justice-respecting men that if they have indulged in ballot-stuffing or other outrageous frauds on the freedom of election, they will be placed in the criminal docks. But the proceedings show they are being tried without notice of the charges, and witnesses have been called to flood the record with a diarrhoea of hearsay and illegitimate evidence which no judge would sanction.

In fact, the case reminds me of the Dreyfus trial. Public officials, if criminal in their trust, should not be tried differently from ordinary criminals. At an ordinary trial, if the acts or credibility of a witness are impeached, he must have notice of the impeachment, so as to explain or defend himself before evidence against him can be heard. In this case the committee has been plaintiff, but has called upon no defendants to meet its charges.

But hadn't the accused notice through the newspaper reports of the charges against him?

The law has not yet made newspaper reporters or publishers its auxiliaries, or officers of the courts, to notify alleged wrong-doers, and when the law says that a party impeached for a wrongful act must have an opportunity of being heard, that does not mean the opportunity which an ordinary witness has who is called up on the spur of the moment, and who is subject to cross-examination: but it means an opportunity of being heard when he has had a fair warning of the charges, and is asked to meet it, and be heard in person.

Would you consider the Committee on Privileges and Elections a judicial tribunal?

Certainly, and more truly so than any other committee. It is clothed with judicial power to investigate matters affecting parliamentary elections: to administer oaths; to find, on evidence, persons guilty of offence against the election law, and also any who may be guilty of a breach of the privilege of parliament. In the English parliament are many instances of its jurisdiction, where the accused party has been notified, or, as in the journals of early times, 'sent for as delinquent,' to answer his accusers. These powers imply judicial functions which should be administered according to a judicial and not a partisan instinct, or for political effect.

May not the committee proceed as a grand jury?

Yes, if it proceeds according to the law affecting grand juries. They hear the complainant's evidence in secret, so as to determine whether the party charged should be placed on trial. But whatever witnesses state in the secrecy of the grand jury room is never published in newspapers.

The parties who are proved to have acted illegally can attend next session and make their defence or contradict the witnesses.

Doesn't the question presume that after a man has been baptized with a sprinkle of infamy, and christened 'criminal,' he may possibly prove at some future time that the person who had christened him had misnamed him, and that the sprinkle he gave was foul, not a pure one? Such would be a travesty of and a crime against common justice.

But the committee tried to effect service of subpoenas on some of the parties, but they evaded service.

Then the committee could have formulated specific charges and ordered substitutional service, which, when effected, would have given the committee jurisdiction over these parties. Why this procedure was not adopted is not explained. But as against the member and the electorate, the committee have played battledore and shuttlecock with evidence, apparently not for judicial purposes. One elementary rule is that admissions of an officer or agent made after the employment has ceased are inadmissible except against himself. Another declares that voting by ballot is secret—the rule similar in object to that which prevents a woman giving evidence which would bastardize her offspring. It is absolute as regards the legal voter, but not as regards an unqualified person. These have been disregarded. It is unfortunate, in the public interest, that the committee should have weakened public faith in its impartiality by allowing spurious and illegitimate evidence to usurp the authority and right of what is the legitimate and recognized offspring of justice. Occasional displays of political fireworks in parliamentary committees are not beneficial in the public interest.

That was the statement made by this Queen's counsel, and I think that in substance it correctly defines the principles applicable to the case.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. gentleman say who the Queen's counsel is?

Mr. BRITTON. It does not say; but I dare say a good many persons know who it is. I am sure I had no other desire than to elicit the truth in the cross-examination of witnesses. When those witnesses came forward and swore to certain things, I wanted to know whether they were telling the truth or whether their evidence could be broken down in any way. I asked questions, which my hon. friends would admit were pertinent, with reference to that, and there was no attempt on the part of anybody to obstruct in the slightest degree, but what was the result? We were stigmatized as obstructionists all over the country. Charges were stated as if proved. It was said to-day by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), that the money of the government, no doubt, went to supply men who were working for the Liberal party in that constituency. The infamous machine was there, he said. But all that was simply talk without any evidence to warrant it. As to the evidence with regard to the West Huron case, I have given it to-day fairly, and there is none that would be taken before any jury to condemn one of these men.

When we come to Brockville, the case is weak to a degree. There were two charges made—one against the returning officer, and the other the deputy returning officer. The first charge is that ballots similar to the initialled ballots were in the hands of the workers for the Liberal party in that constituency. The charge is not that the returning officer was guilty of furnishing these ballots to irresponsible parties, but if it means anything, it means that these ballots were put into the hands of unauthorized parties for some fraudulent purpose. Well, what is the evidence? A ballot was picked up in the street by a boy who saw a man throw it away, and that ballot had X opposite Mr. Comstock's name. The conclusion is drawn, that for some reason or other, the ballot had been secured, but was not used, and some other ballot was used in its place. But, is it not just as likely that some man had cut from a newspaper in the town of Brockville, a printed invitation to the electors, and then finding it was of no use, threw it away.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Comstock offered $50 to get it back.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think he did.

Mr. TAYLOR. I can prove it.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not think he made any such offer, and I do not see what good the ballot could have been to him. And, if the man who threw that ballot away had got it for a fraudulent purpose, why did he throw it away? All you have is evidence to the effect, that some boy saw a man throw something away, which he thought was a ballot, and he picked it up. But, suppose it was a fraudulent ballot marked for Mr. Comstock. There is the man who threw it away, and you have a specific charge that can be made in the courts against him, for having that fraudulent ballot. Why do you not go to the courts, and enter a charge against that man, if he is known? And, if he is not known, what is the object of your going to the committee with such evidence. Then, we are told that another ballot was presented by a Liberal worker to a voter, who was asked to use it, and the voter did not see fit to use it, but placed it in the hands of a gentleman who is prepared to produce it. Do hon. gentlemen opposite argue seriously that every one of these little things, these little irregularities, or call them crimes, if you like, is to be the subject of a serious investigation by a parliamentary committee, when we have an express statute governing such cases? Here are specific charges, and the courts are open, and hon. gentlemen opposite are within the time to bring them before the court. Let them go to work and make out their complaint, and have it ventilated by a judge.

We are told that official ballots were in the hands of Liberal workers in almost every polling subdivision, and were used, but if you have proof that they were used, you ought to be able to tell the time and place and the person who used them. But, because these hon. gentlemen cannot do this, they make a generally worded charge to cover all sorts of alleged frauds, of which they have no evidence. But, if they know of any persons who had these ballots and used them, let them lay their charge before the courts and have these persons punished. The law is clear. Any one who, without authority, supplies ballot paper to any person, is guilty of a misdemeanour. The taking of such a ballot out of a polling station, constitutes a misdemeanour, and renders the guilty person liable to a fine of $200, according to section 48, of the Election Act. But, these are offences which should be tried before the court, before an impartial judge and jury, and not before a tribunal composed of members so partial as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

Another charge, too trifling almost, to mention, is that a deputy returning officer refused to seal the box. But, that is also punishable under the Election Act, by a penalty. It is not suggested that any harm came from this, but even if harm did come, it is punishable under a distinct section of the Act.

Mr. INGRAM. What section of the Act deals with that?

Mr. BRITTON. Section 105. It is as follows:

Every officer and clerk who is guilty of any wilful misfeasance or any wilful act or omission in violation of this Act shall forfeit to any person aggrieved by such misfeasance, act or omission a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, in addition to the amount of all actual damages thereby occasioned to such person.

Every returning officer, deputy returning officer, election clerk or poll clerk who refuses or neglects to perform any of the obligations or formalities required of him by this Act, shall, for each such refusal or neglect, forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars to any person who sues for the same.

That, besides other clauses which makes certain omissions and misfeasances penal, are directly in force in reference to every one of these charges that my hon. friend makes. The other charge is that one of the poll clerks or somebody in connection with the election, was in the employ of Mr. Comstock. It is not suggested that this man had done any wrong. And, in any case, he is not disqualified by law. I should think, for my part, that it would not be proper for such a man to act in such a capacity, and I do not think Mr. Comstock would wish it; but I suppose his attention was not called to the matter. But as it is not charged that he did anything wrong, and as the fact of his being employed by the candidate does not disqualify him, there is nothing to be investigated.

Now, here are these trifling charges in reference to Brockville, which we are informed are not true, and to take up the time of the House and the committee with them, it seems to me is mere trifling with parliament, and more particularly so in view to two things that occurred that I have already mentioned. One man who was charged with doing one of the specific things complained of by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) was brought up, tried and honourably acquitted.

Mr. TAYLOR. By a Grit jury.

Mr. BRITTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) pardon.

Mr. TAYLOR. You made the statement—

Mr. BRITTON. No, the statement is not correct; it is absolutely incorrect. There were seven, or at least five, Conservatives on the jury.

Mr. TAYLOR. There were two.

Mr. BRITTON. That is not correct. I challenge the correctness of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) statement.

Mr. TAYLOR. I can give the names.

Mr. BRITTON. You cannot do anything of the kind. You know better. This man was tried and honourably acquitted. Then, another man who was charged with one of the specific offences that my hon. friend brings before the House, was brought up from time to time, and the case was adjourned, and finally it was dismissed without the charge being pressed against him. Because of these two things, I say there is additional ground to justify me in the position I took, and took on my individual responsibility, that the case ought not to go to a committee. But, further than that, section 117 gives a year to try this matter.

I invite hon. gentlemen opposite, I challenge them; and I am authorized by the sitting member to say that he is prepared to give the money, if it is necessary, to bring the witnesses to try any charges that they have got and that they are prepared to bring before the proper court. Now, the time is still open to them. They have a Conservative judge there. Of course, there is no politics with the judges. If a man takes a judicial office he forgets what party he belonged to.

Mr. MILLS. You will have to change a good deal.

Mr. BRITTON. Maybe so, but I shall not have to change as much as you will. There can be no pretense that would stand in the way of making charges of this kind. I know it would be the same if the judge were a Liberal; but I mention the fact that he is a Conservative to show that if my hon. friends have evidence such as they pretend to have, and if they wish to get at the truth and not mere kudos for the party, they have only to bring their charges before the court, and they need not lack for an opportunity to have all the witnesses that can support their case.

I think I was perfectly justified in making the remarks I did, and if you will take it as the first person singular instead of the first person plural, I think I was justified in saying that, under the circumstances, I would be opposed to sending this case of Brockville to a committee for the investigation of these trifling charges, when there is a court open where they can be investigated and where a man who is charged can have a lawyer to defend him, and cannot be bulldozed by persons who are, perhaps, too much inclined to do that sort of thing in an election committee, but where the whole matter can be investigated and punishment meted out to any person who is found guilty.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) a question. Does he think he has displayed good taste in discussing a question that was decided in this House last year, of sending the Brockville case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, especially before that committee had taken a word of evidence on the case?

Mr. BRITTON. I think it was very proper, after what had taken place in this House, to discuss it and defend the position I took, and particularly as circumstances have occurred since the reference was made to the committee which have a direct bearing on the case. Such things as I have referred to, the conduct of the newspapers in discussing this matter, the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite on the hustings, and the fact that two men had been brought up on these specific charges and both discharged, make it quite proper, in my opinion, to discuss it.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. ANDREW B. INGRAM (East Elgin). I rise to say a few words on this question, because the name of the county I have the honour to represent in this House has been dragged in frequently during the last session or two in connection with the election frauds that have been committed in that county, and because certain persons who appeared before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House during last session were associated with elections which took place in the county of Elgin. Previous to to-day I have been very much pleased with the manner in which the right hon. leader of this government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) viewed this very serious question of election frauds in Brockville and Huron. Last session I heard him say that he was willing, yes, eager, to investigate these charges and have the men who committed these crimes brought to justice, if they could be brought to justice. Now, as I understand it, a day or two ago, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) asked, as a matter of privilege, to move for certain papers to be brought down in order that the election committee might be again brought together and these documents again placed before them to further investigate the charges, the investigation not having been concluded, and the continuance of it having been promised this session. I have read the resolution as moved by the hon. member for Halifax, and I see nothing wrong in it. To-day, I was much surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman refuse to extend the courtesy which has always been extended in this House during every session I have had the honour of a seat in it, of allowing a motion which was unopposed to be brought before the House. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) drew a comparison between the resolution he has on the paper and the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax). Why, Sir, we heard my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) to-day, say that he would move his motion and that he did not intend to have any discussion on it. He was satisfied with simply having that motion carried with the view of sending these papers to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On the other hand, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had a motion on the paper that would have raised a great deal of discussion; therefore, there was no fair comparison between the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). Then, if the courtesy that was asked by the hon. member for Halifax had been granted, what would have been the result? It would have been that, instead of taking up all the afternoon and keeping the House until this late hour of the night, discussing this election question, we would have been discussing other questions and proceeding with the business of the House. I do not wish to dwell upon this question from any partisan standpoint. I would call to the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister, and of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, the importance of framing some law to bring men who commit election crimes in this country to justice. It is our duty to do it, and in doing that, I am sure, we will be promoting the welfare of the people of this country. I may say further that when this question was before the Privileges and Elections Committee, I attended very frequently, and I noticed the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) questioning certain witnesses there, and I must say that he did it in a very judicial way. But I found a desire on one hand, to prevent anything coming out that would appear to make these parties guilty of crime. On the other hand, I found an earnest desire on the part of my hon. friend here (Mr. Borden, Halifax) to bring that information out and, if possible, to expose any fraud that might have been committed. No fault can be found with the hon. gentleman for the way in which he chose to conduct the affairs of that committee from his standpoint. In moving his motion in this House, the hon. gentleman moved it as a question of privilege as, when the committee rose at the last session of parliament the proceedings of that committee had not been completed. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) asks the question across the floor of the House, why hon. gentlemen on this side do not prosecute Mr. Cummings for having these counterfoils in his pocket. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the examination of Mr. Cummings was not finished before the committee? Therefore, I say it would be quite improper to bring a man before the courts before his examination had been completed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was he not discharged?

Mr. INGRAM. He was not discharged. The hon. member for Kingston says that no fraud has been committed in the case of Brockville, and, he asks: Would any person naturally suppose that there was anything wrong because of the picking up of a ballot on the street cut from a newspaper? It is most remarkable that these ballots are picked up in every city, every county and every riding where the machine operated and where elections occurred. We have had them in West Elgin. We picked them up there after the machine had left the place. I am bound to say, Sir, that if it had not been for gentlemen who occupy positions similar to that, which I understand, the hon. member for Kingston sometimes occupies, that of Crown prosecutor, we would be in a position to show, not only in Elgin County, but in every election that occurred in Ontario, that there were two sets of ballots used. That applies, not only to elections held under the provincial government, but, under the Dominion government as well. I say that this is one of the chief reasons why the hon. member for Kingston objects to the Brockville case being brought before the committee. As to the carrying out of justice by the courts of this province, I have here two cases in which parts of the machine have been brought before the courts namely, Mr. Bole, of Sault Ste. Marie fame, and Mr. Cahill. I find that the county crown attorney of Elgin had been instructed to prosecute these men on these charges:

1. Unlawfully taking ballot box from R. N. Stafford, under section 329, Criminal Code.
2. Wilfully making erasure, etc., in poll book under section 503 of Criminal Code.
3. Wilfully destroying ballot papers under section 503, Criminal Code.
4. Without due authority supplying ballot paper.
5. Without due authority taking the ballot box, etc., under section 191, Ontario Election Act).

The warrant was issued on the 3rd of May, 1891. Bole was arrested at Sault on the 6th May, 1899, arraigned at Bismarck before J. C. Schliehauf, J.P., on the 9th May, hearing at Sheddon, May 16th, 1899. Here is where I am going to show the crookedness of this whole business, in which, at least, the Ontario government had a hand in the way of withholding information that was of very great assistance, from the court. After giving instructions to their county crown attorney to proceed in the case, they, themselves, were guilty of withholding the evidence which prevented this trial from going on. I understand, as a layman, that if there are any written documents anywhere that can be produced in court, these written documents must be produced in preference to oral evidence. We know that, sometime during the month of April, the poll books, the ballot papers and all the documents in respect to that election were burned. Now, Sir, why did they withhold this information? Simply because the lawyers in the case, who were defending the prisoner, could say that the poll books had certain signatures and that they wanted these documents to be produced in this court. If they are not produced, we object to this case going on, and, as a matter of fact, owing to that, this case did not proceed. It has been clearly proven that the Ontario government, at least, were hand in glove with this machine, and that they did everything in their power to screen them, and that the courts of Ontario have been used for the purpose of screening these very same men. We are in this position in this House. We, as Conservatives, have the right to ask the right hon. Prime Minister, and we have the right to insist that he will carry out the promise made last session that this election committee shall be allowed to continue the investigation of these charges. We are obliged to ask for that because we find that the way in which they are carrying out justice in Ontario it is simply a farce, and we have no other means by which we can get at these criminals than through the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House. Some hon. gentleman may rise in his place and say that the Ontario government have appointed a commission composed of respectable judges of the province of Ontario to investigate the charges in connection with West Elgin. What did they do? They did precisely the same thing as this government did. They confined the inquiry to the deputy returning officers and the poll clerks. The inquiry ordered by this House was:

For the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and the several deputy returning officers at and in connection with each of the said elections respectively.

That is precisely the same line they are pursuing in the province of Ontario. We say that is not broad enough. I understand that last year at the committee certain objections were made by gentlemen opposite, and the authority of Sir John Bourinot was called into question to define what rights members had before a committee of this House. That authority lays down:

It is a clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from the order of reference.

Now, the order of reference was:

For the purpose of inquiring into and investigating the conduct of the respective returning officers and the several deputy returning officers at and in connection with each of the said elections respectively.

It is quite clear that the commission given to the judges in the province of Ontario is exactly in line with the proposition laid down before this House. I am not going to say that the respected judges of this country on that commission, declined to carry out to the fullest extent the instructions given them by the government of Ontario, but I do say that it is a farce for the Ontario government to confine their inquiry strictly to the deputy returning officers and the poll clerks, without permitting such men as Bole, Hoppen, Cahill, Preston, Smith, Grant and the others connected with the machine, to be brought before the commission, in order that they might be shown up. When the West Elgin election case was brought before the court the elected member saw that he was going to get into a difficulty and he made a confession. He had imported several strange deputy returning officers into the county, and when this confession was presented to the trial judges, one of them said it was sufficient to unseat the member. The other judge held that they should proceed with more evidence, and so they did proceed to the extent of simply bringing the returning officer before them, who declared to the fact that these strange deputy returning officers acted, and as a consequence the elected member was unseated. But what followed? The very men who, according to the confession of Macnish committed these crimes, were allowed to go free, and now a commission is appointed by the Ontario government—

Mr. BRITTON. What has that to do with this?

Mr. INGRAM. It is precisely the same machine here as there. This is the invitation that was sent out by the Ontario commission:

On February 19, 1900, P. P. Hamilton, acting secretary of the commissioners who were appointed by the Ontario government to investigate the West Elgin election frauds, sent a letter to Dr. Guest, president of the West Elgin Conservative Association, inviting him to furnish the commissioners with any information he could in the matter. Mr. S. Price sent an answer, declining to take part in the affair, and gave his reasons for doing so. The following is the correspondence:

The Notice.

To Dr. Frederick Guest (Shedden P.O), the president of the Conservative Association of the electoral division of West Elgin:

Please take notice as follows:

His Honour Judge Barron, His Honour Judge McTavish and His Honour Judge Morgan, the commissioners appointed by royal commission, dated the 31st day of January, 1900, will hold a sitting of the said commission at the court-house in the city of St. Thomas, in the county of Elgin, on Thursday, the 1st day of March, 1900, at the hour of two o'clock, afternoon, and will then proceed with the inquiry directed by the commission issued to them, and will hear evidence relating thereto.

All persons having charges to make against officials and persons within the scope of the commission, or having information in their possession which is material to be known and will assist the commissioners in their investigation, are requested to furnish particulars thereof in writing as soon as possible to George H. Watson, Q.C., Toronto, senior counsel for the Crown, for the purpose of enabling such counsel to prepare and produce evidence thereof before the commissioners.

Dated Court-house, Stratford, Monday, 19th of February, 1900.

(Sgd.) P. P. HAMILTON,

Acting Secretary to the Commissioners.

Now, before I read the reply to this, I want to ask any hon. gentleman in this House, I care not whether he be Conservative or Liberal, is it in his interests that a certain number of men should be called into constituency after constituency for the purpose of using illegal and corrupt means to secure the election of the candidates they support. I say as a Conservative that such a thing should be stopped, and I say that no obstacle should be placed in the way, by this government or by the Ontario government, or by any other government, of bringing out all the information necessary to show up these corrupt men. Here is the reply:

P. P. Hamilton, Esq., secretary West Elgin Commission, St. Thomas:

Dear Sir,—The notice which you sent to Dr. Guest, president of the West Elgin Liberal-Conservative Association, who is at present absent taking a post graduate medical course in New York, has been forwarded by him to me, with instructions to say he declines on behalf of the association to take any part in the proceedings of the so-called investigation, for the following, among other reasons:

Having in view the facts certified to by Mr. Macnish (then a government member of the Assembly, continuing to possess the close confidence and support of the government, and nominated and supported as their candidate), and the facts found by the election trial judges, it is clear that the commission was designed, not to disclose, but to suppress the truth, designed, in fact, to establish falsehood in the garb of truth. And the manner in which it has been determined to conduct the proceedings is well calculated to carry out that design.

The very matters to which the investigation appears to be confined, as indicated in your notice (I am not aware that the commission has ever been published), are the matters in which the documents alleged to have been destroyed at the government building in Toronto are most essential—the scope of the commission, in fact, being apparently limited to just that branch of the West Elgin election matters in which the incontrovertible evidence could be, and apparently has been, most effectively removed by destruction of the documents.

Men who are guilty of or connected with the frauds cannot be expected to scruple about swearing themselves clear, and the absence of the election documents alleged to have been destroyed, and the immunity from cross-examination, enable and encourage them to do so, when it would not otherwise be possible. In fact, the narrowness of the commission and the one-sided manner in which it is proposed to adduce evidence thereunder must render the proceeding a mere farce; and to substitute such a semblance of inquiry for a thorough investigation of what are known as the West Elgin election frauds is regarded by intelligent persons generally as but an attempt to perpetrate a fresh fraud upon the people of Ontario.

How the people could have any confidence in an investigation of this nature, conducted by the counsel who are in charge thereof, or how any one possessing confidential information against delinquents can be expected to trust it to Mr. R. A. Grant, is impossible to imagine. Indeed, it is wholly incomprehensible how Mr. Grant could be faithful to the duties of his present position without being false to his former and present clients and friends.

In existing circumstances, the public interest most imperatively demands that active and effective steps should at once be taken to bring to justice the criminals already exposed and known to have been guilty of ballot frauds and rascalities, two at least of whom, after having been thrust into the hands of government officials whose sworn duty it is to prosecute and punish them, have by the misconduct and connivance of these and other government officials, and of members of the government itself, been allowed, and in fact, assisted to escape and remain unpunished. Rather than sending forth a bound and shackled commission—crippled and shut off from all the avenues by means of which truthful information might reasonably be expected to enter—under pretense of desiring to disclose further frauds and misconduct, the government would be acting more in consonance with the requirements of the situation to have instituted a proper and effective inquiry into the official misconduct which has led to such prostitution of the regular course of criminal justice, and secured immunity from prosecution and punishment (which some of the culprits have not been slow to boast of) to election criminals whose rascalities are already not only exposed, but notorious. Either real or pretended efforts to discover additional frauds or misconduct are idle and futile while known frauds and misconduct remain unpunished and unrebuked by existing authorities.

It is the present government of Ontario and its members who are more than suspected of the guilt and responsibility for what has occurred, and no investigation short of an inquiry into their connection therewith will satisfy the people of Ontario.

A thorough investigation such as justice demands, and the people of the province desire, would include not merely the conduct of the returning officer, deputies and poll-clerks, but also an inquiry into the following, amongst other matters

1. Who were the 'men working on behalf of the Liberal party who sent into the constituency the large number of persons, some of whom, we believe, used fraudulent and corrupt means to secure the election of the government candidate,' as Mr. Macnish admits and certifies over his own signature.

2. Who designed and planned the sending into the riding from all points of the compass the men who were for weeks located at the principal centres therein, operating on behalf of that candidate? Who paid for their services and their disbursements?

3. Who signed and arranged that six of those persons, without authority, should be intrusted with the sacredness of the ballot-box? Who were engaged in carrying out that design and in arranging with Mr. Macnish to sign the written requests to Sheriff Brown to appoint 'the bearers' D. R. O., which show him to have been a party to the conspiracy, bringing the guilt one step nearer to the government itself.

4. At whose instance or suggestion did Mr. Macnish send for W. T. R. Preston to manage the campaign? What led Preston to send for Duncan Bole and Capt. Sullivan, and Sullivan to send for Cahill? And how did Preston come to be rewarded with an extremely lucrative office immediately after the campaign?

5. Who 'brought into the riding the large number of persons for the express purpose of personating legitimate voters, who, assisted by some of Mr. Macnish's local supporters, did personate qualified voters in voting for him?' as Mr. Macnish certifies was done.

6. Who were the 'agents of Mr. Macnish who concealed at their homes some of these strangers, who there paid large sums of money to electors to induce them to vote for him,' as Mr. Macnish certifies was the fact.

7. Who supplied the substitute ballots used by Bole and others in carrying out the 'nefarious manipulation' of the ballots and stealing the votes of honest electors?

8. Why did the government not prosecute the men who were shown to have committed the old-fashioned crimes of forgery, perjury and personation, and many other frauds which, if committed otherwise than in the interest and for the benefit of the government and its supporters, would have been ferreted out and punished by the officials charged with that duty?

9. What part did Mr. R. A. Grant, now employed by the government as one of the counsel to present the evidence before the commissioners, take to protect some of the chief perpetrators of the said frauds, and at whose instance did he act in so doing?

10. At whose instance did the government officials of Elgin and others impede and delay and finally burk the ordinary course of criminal justice in the cases of Bole and Cahill, and what are the particulars of their conduct in so doing?

11. How many of the strangers connected with and taking part in the campaign in question were government officials; and how many of these and of the government officials who connived at the escape of Bole and Cahill are still in the employ or pay of the government?

12. Why did the Clerk of the Crown or the Attorney General's department of the government, not notify the Elgin County Crown Attorney, or the private prosecutor in the Bole and Cahill prosecutions, or the judges or petitioner's solicitors in the election protest, of the alleged destruction of the West Elgin ballots and documents, instead of concealing it, when fully aware that the fact was so vital a factor in connection with those proceedings, and when the information would, in fact, have removed the sole barrier and excuse alleged by both the local officials and defence for not prosecuting Cahill upon evidence which the Crown Attorney himself declared in open court to be 'overwhelming.'

A commission designed to disclose the truth and get at the bottom of the West Elgin frauds would include all these questions and others, and would provide machinery for cross-examination of witnesses, and otherwise necessary for bringing out the whole truth. And on behalf of the association the president would undertake, with such a commission, to adduce evidence upon which satisfactory answers to such questions could be based.

But he cannot consent to be in any way a party to the proceedings of a commission designed and well calculated to suppress the truth and further deceive the people.

(Sgd.) SAMUEL PRICE.

Vice-President West Elgin Liberal-Conservative Association.

St. Thomas, March 1, 1900.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have in my possession the shorthand notes taken when the commission received this lengthy document. They considered that document carefully all evening, and they made a reply to the effect that the Conservatives of Elgin county did not wish to take any action or any part in the proceedings at all. How any person could make a statement of that kind, or how the public press of Ontario could make a statement of that kind, is more than I can fathom. Here are the shorthand notes :

Shorthand report of the remarks made by the chairman of the West Elgin Commission (County Judge Barron) upon the letter received by the secretary of the commission in reply to a letter sent by him to the president of the West Elgin Conservative Association notifying the latter that the commission would sit at St. Thomas and that all persons having charges or information were requested to send particulars in writing to the council conducting the commission.

After adjournment last night we were handed by the secretary a communication signed by Mr. Samuel Price as Vice-President of the Conservative Association of the West Riding of Elgin. It is a very long document and we have not had time yet to see what it contains, but the purport of it was to the effect that he desired to abstain from taking any part in the work of the commission. If it contains anything we can hang a peg on in the way of proceeding we will certainly take advantage of it.

These are the remarks of the chairman on a document that says that if the commission would broaden the scope of the inquiry, the Conservatives would be prepared to prove all the things stated in that document; and that is the reason why they declined to join in such a farce. My innocent friend from Kingston spoke of Mr. Cummings not being able to put the counterfoils into his pocket, and abstract from his pocket marked ballots to be put in the box for Mr. Holmes. Has he not read of the way they conduct elections nowadays? A gentleman like him who is in the courts more or less every day, surely takes notice of what takes place in the other courts of the province of Ontario in regard to elections. Does he not know of these sharp men who have been brought in for the purpose of manipulating ballots, as they did in Waterloo, under the training of instructors like the famous Tom Lewis of London? He was also in West Huron, and probably in Brockville as well.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Tell us about South Ontario.

Mr. INGRAM. And very likely he was in South Ontario too.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Eighteen Tories in jail now.

Mr. BENNETT. That is not true.

Mr. INGRAM. I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that eighty-five voters of the village of Sheldon, where Duncan Bole was deputy returning officer, made their affidavits that they had voted for McDiarmid, and that when the ballots were counted there were only forty-two for Macnish. Every one knows Mr. Bole to be a very slick gentleman, and what did he do? The returning officer, as stated in the legislature of Ontario, swore that Bole had no authority to act as a deputy returning officer, but he did act. The scrutineers on both sides of politics had been accustomed for years to have honest returning officers, and that remark applies to both Reformers and Conservatives. This man said: You know there is more or less swearing of electors when they come to the polls. Now, judging by this country around here, judging by the residents of this village, I can only say that I believe no man will present himself here, who has not the authority or the right to vote, and I would be very glad indeed, if you men will agree among yourselves to have as little friction as possible and give no trouble or annoyance, by swearing any of these men. He was so extremely fair, nice and candid, that these men thought he was honesty itself, and they went to their corners of the room and allowed him to sit at the ballot box unobserved. What did he do? He took the ballots from the parties coming to vote. None of the scrutineers saw him do anything wrong, and if they came before an election committee, and were asked: Did you see anything wrong? They would have to reply: No. Bole acted fairly and squarely, as far as we know. But the result shows that he did not. It shows that he either took the ballots given him and put them in his pocket, instead of into the box, or put them into the box, and then took them out at night and substituted for them the other set of ballots, which R. A. Grant, the nephew of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), went up to manipulate at the Sault Ste Marie, where he had a hole-and-corner meeting with Bole and the gentleman who printed these ballots and fixed the thing up there. Mr. Bole had frequent occasion to go out, and a quantity of burnt paper was found distributed around the place to which he made these frequent visits. That was pretty strong evidence that he had burnt the ballots which the electors had honestly marked for the candidate of their choice. How do I prove that? I prove it in this way. At that very polling subdivision, the friends of McDiarmid, who was a Conservative candidate, said that at the very most Macnish could not possibly get more than five of a majority, but that the chances were as much in their favour, and the result was liable to be even. What followed? The result showed eighty-five of a majority for Macnish at that poll, but in the following election, McDiarmid got eleven of a majority at the same poll. This is pretty clear proof that in the first election the ballot box was stuffed.

I want to further draw attention to this fact, that the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite took every means possible to prevent men belonging to the place, acting as deputy returning officers, but brought in strangers for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, tell us about Manitoba.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, I read the proceedings in Manitoba, and was pleased with the course taken by Mr. Sifton, and by the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. I was delighted at the promptness with which they were bound to investigate the election frauds that took place in Manitoba, and the charge made against the deputy returning officer of manipulating the ballots. I read over carefully the evidence at that trial, and I found that only one person had been found guilty. And why was he found guilty? Because he was trying to play both political parties for money, and the jury had no faith in him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is that the man that Mr. Birmingham said was a good man in North Bruce?

Mr. INGRAM. I understand from a telegram, that Mr. Birmingham was asked what kind of a man he was, and he said he was a good man.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In North Bruce?

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, and I have no doubt that Mr. Birmingham was in good faith when he sent this reply, but it turned out afterwards, that the man was the very opposite, and he was rightly punished.

The point I want to make is this. I do not want to justify wrong-doing to-day by wrong-doing in the past. That is the course that hon. gentlemen opposite take. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for North Wellington say that because certain things had been done in Manitoba or anywhere else, that justified frauds in Huron and Brockville. He in fact resorted to the argument: You are another, and on that argument, justified the refusal to allow us to investigate this matter. But if elections are being conducted not only in this House, but in the local House, as these have been, it is high time for both Conservatives and Reformers to stamp out these frauds. Because I have occupied a seat in this House for some years, and have introduced legislation to amend the Election Act, the Liberal press has said that if any one knew how an election ought to be managed, I should, from my practical experience, thus insinuating that any elections in which I have been interested, were conducted on improper lines. Let me say, that if I owe my election to anything, it is to having done what I thought was fair and honest, as between my opponents and myself. I have taken every chance I could to manipulate the voters' lists, by seeing that the names of those who would vote in my favour were entered, but that was my right, as it is the right of every candidate for public life. I have been charged with conniving at the personation, and marking of ballots, and so on, but I challenge any man to show one instance in which any supporter of mine has ever been charged with any such offence with the slightest particle of proof to support it. But, on the other hand, I can show that the very men who are crying out 'stinking fish' against me, were employing personators and ballot box stuffers to such an extent that several of their tools were arrested and put in jail, but owing to the loose way in which justice was carried out in the courts, these men escaped. It does not lie in the mouths of any of these gentlemen to make any charge of corrupt practices against me. If I have introduced legislation to amend our election law, it is because it is a fact well known to every one in this House, that our present law does not supply the proper machinery to prevent the unscrupulous advanced methods now used to gain elections.

Let me say, that, while fault has been found with the hon. member for Halifax for asking a privilege which is not granted to others, I think that the case he has made out, amply justifies the course he has taken, and I think we ought all to have a deep interest in seeing that a proper investigation be had, and punishment meted out to those who deserve it. And I must say that I am rather surprised that my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton), who took a very active part in the committee last year, should be the only one in this House to rise and object to this motion to refer the Brockville case to the Privileges and Elections Committee, and especially the Brockville charges, when it is a well known fact to any man who takes part in elections, that the Brockville election was anything but a pure election.

Mr. BRITTON. Make your charges.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) says, 'make your charges'; but I have already stated the reason why they have not been made.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I wish to say a word in reply to the statement of the hon. member for Kingston a few nights ago when discussing the Brockville election, that seven of the jurors in the Empey case were Conservatives. The hon. gentleman has repeated that this evening. I will read to him the names of the jurors who served in that case and will ask him to call off the Conservatives.

Mr. BRITTON. I do not know them at all.

Mr. MILLS. Then, why did you contradict?

Mr. BRITTON. I have reliable authority from Brockville. I did not say positively that there were seven, but I thought that was the number.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman made the statement the other night and to-night.

Mr. BRITTON. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. Here is a report of the case 'Queen vs. Empey':

At the assizes Wednesday afternoon this case was called, and after a number of jurors had been peremptorily challenged by the defence, the following jurors were sworn, namely: W. Robert Drown, George Dunbar, Silas Coolidge, John Henry Polk, Benjamin J. Horton, Robert Hollister, James L. Ferguson, Jos. W. Grant, Robert Marks, William Barber, Albert Kelly and Jos. Eward. Five of the regular panel, who were said to be Conservatives, were challenged by the counsel for the defendants. The Crown counsel did not challenge any juror.

Mr. INGRAM.

The Crown counsel was a Grit. There are two Conservatives on that jury, Mr. Polk and Mr. Ferguson. That is a statement of the facts.

Mr. BRITTON. Were not they honest men?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. BRITTON. Did not they concur in the verdict?

Mr. TAYLOR. Wait until I give the evidence. The hon. gentleman says there was no evidence. The Queen's counsel who manipulated the case was Mr. Biggs. Hon. gentlemen here know Mr. Biggs—a part of a machine. He was sent down to run the business. Mr. Watson, Q.C., was counsel for the defence. Here is the evidence of the returning officer himself:

Fred. W. Fulford—Was deputy returning officer, polling subdivision No. 3, West ward. During polling hours in the forenoon Empey came in, and he approached me and I asked him if he wanted to vote. When my clerk recorded his name the poll clerk gave me the number which was opposite Empey's name on the voter's list. I put this number on the counterfoil of the ballot. Empey then went into the compartment and shortly afterwards returned, handing me a paper which I now identify as being like the disputed ballot. I spoke to the defendant and said the paper returned by him was not the one I gave him and that the initials were not mine, and that the number on the counterfoil was not on the counterfoil of the paper returned by Empey to me.

There is the evidence of the deputy returning officer, who swore that they were not his initials. Notwithstanding that fact—

Mr. BRITTON. The jury did not believe him, that is all.

Mr. TAYLOR. Never mind the jury. Mr. Watson, the counsel for the defence, insisted that there was no case to go to the jury, and Mr. Biggs did not oppose it; but the judge ruled that there was a case and sent it to the jury. After having been locked up for a while, these two Conservatives consented to the verdict. I saw one of them afterwards—

Mr. BRITTON. Poor innocent men.

Mr. TAYLOR. There were ten against two on the jury.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Were they not sworn?

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Kingston said it was a Tory jury. There were two against ten, and they united and brought in a verdict of 'not guilty'; and there is the sworn evidence of the deputy returning officer that this man came with a ballot that he knew to be fraudulent, that was not the one he gave him, and he would not take it.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire only to protest against such expressions as are used when hon. members speak of Grit juries and Tory juries. The hon. member for Kingston spoke in a proper way about the judges being true to their oath of office. It seems to me that to speak of Grit juries and Tory juries is to hurl an insult against the citizens of this country, I do not care who says it. I believe that men on the jury have as much regard for their oath as has a judge on the bench.

Mr. JAS. CLANCY (Bothwell). I had not intended to say anything until the hon. member who leads the House (Sir Louis Davies) applauded so loudly the sentiments of the Patron gentleman who represents Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), who has become so wonderfully pious as to be shocked by remarks made in this House. Was he shocked when the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) charged men who came down here to give evidence in the West Huron case with being a set of perjurers. I find that these men in cases stated that they had signed a document, no more. I was surprised at the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) using the argument he did. A layman might be excused for using such an argument, but even in him it would be a lame one. He said they were perjurers because they were induced to sign that declaration that they had done so and so, and in order to follow up the position they had taken, they came here and deliberately perjured themselves. God forbid that he should ever be a judge in this country—and I understand that he has aspirations—when he uses such logic. A more disgraceful statement was never made in this House than when that hon. gentleman used his privilege as a member to stand up here to hurl the charge against men who have no means of defending themselves, that they came here a set of perjurers. I think the hon. gentleman has not done himself much credit, nor has he done much to benefit his own case.

Mr. BRITTON. As a matter of privilege, I think I have the right to say a word. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has entirely misinterpreted what I said. I said that the deputy returning officer had sworn on one side, and certain persons had sworn on the other, and members of the committee were left to judge between the two whose statement was true. I said they may have committed perjury—

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) said they were perjurers.

Mr. BRITTON. No.

Mr. CLANCY. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Britton) was permitted to make a statement, I have the right to say a word. I say that my statement of the hon. gentleman's words was substantially correct, and I will leave it to the recollection of hon. members and to Hansard to-morrow whether he did or did not make the statement referred to.

Motion (Mr. Foster) to adjourn, negatived.

FERTILIZERS ACT AMENDMENT, 1890.

Mr. FLINT moved the second reading of Bill (No 2) to amend the Fertilizer Act, 1890.—(Mr. Domville.)

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Mr. Speaker, I feel a good deal of interest in this Bill as it is in connection with the Department of Inland Revenue. I have considered the Bill and its conditions at different times with my hon. friend (Mr. Domville) who introduces the Bill, and we agreed, ultimately, that after it passed its second reading, it would be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE moved that Bill (No. 2) to amend the Fertilizers Act, 1890, (Mr. Domville) be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am requested by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) to give notice, that, when the House is again moved into Committee of Supply, he will propose an amendment in respect to the preferential tariff.

Mr. SPROULE. What will be taken up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am in hopes that the Bill to provide for the payment of the troops will be taken up first.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. gentleman say when the budget speech will be delivered?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot, in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) say anything definite to-night.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 15, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 93) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Service Railroad Tie-plate Company of Canada, Limited.—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Schomberg and Aurora Railway Company.—(Mr. Lan-derkin.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that Bill (No. 36) respecting the Arrowhead and Kootenay Railway Company be withdrawn, and that the fees paid thereon be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation, in accordance with the recommendation of the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. EVARISTE TALBOT.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is Mr. Evariste Talbot, of Fraserville, P.Q., in the employment of the government?
2. If so, what is the position held by the said Talbot?
3. What is his salary?
4. What are his duties and functions?
5. What is the name of the person whom he has replaced in the said position?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, he is. 2. He is freight agent at Rivière du Loup. 3. Mr. Talbot's salary is $55 a month. 4. He has charge of the receiving, forwarding and delivering of freight at Rivière du Loup, and the keeping of the accounts in connection therewith. 5. His predecessor was H. T. Roy, who resigned and left the service.
Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

MAIL SERVICE EAST OF BERSIMIS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

Has the hon. Postmaster General, or the government, issued any order or instructions in pursuance of which no books, newspapers, parcels, &c., are carried by mail between Quebec and Bersimis, or places east of Bersimis?

2. Is the government aware that the officials of the post office at Quebec refuse to transmit, by the mails sent to Bersimis and points east thereof, any books, newspapers or parcels?

3. Is it the intention of the government to apply a remedy in this matter?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. This is a winter service by dog train. In the month of April, 1898, in consequence of grave abuses in the way of the intentional overloading of the mails east of Bersimis with useless mail matter by persons desirous of embarrassing the mail contractor in the performance of a difficult service, orders were given to limit the winter mail to letters. In October of the same year this order was withdrawn, on the understanding that a watch would be kept by officers of the department to prevent a renewal of the abuses mentioned. 2. The government is not aware that books, newspapers and parcels are refused transmission to Bersimis and points east by the officers of the Quebec post office. The very latest instructions given on the subject, under date of 20th December, were that the service was not to be unduly curtailed. 3. The government is not aware that at present there is any condition of affairs requiring a remedy.

CANADA AND MANCHESTER STEAMSHIP LINE.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

What amount, by way of subsidy, has been paid for the establishment and maintenance of a line of steamers sailing between Canada and the city of Manchester in Great Britain? What has been the value of the products of Canada carried by such line of steamers to Manchester?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The amount of subsidy paid for services to the 30th of June last was $26,000. No account has been rendered and nothing has been paid since that date; the service, however, is being continued. There is no possible means of knowing the value of the products of Canada carried by such line of steamers to Manchester.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. CASEY (by Mr. Gibson) asked :

Is the government aware whether the following news item is founded on fact?

(From our own correspondent.)

London, Eng., Office of the 'Globe,' 222-225 Strand, W.C., March 9.

I learn on excellent authority that Mr. Chamberlain has strongly protested to the Australian governments against granting concessions to the Eastern Extension Company at present, asking them to postpone the matter until they have learned what the Pacific Cable Board has to propose. The Eastern Company's Australian campaign was very skilfully conceived and carried out, but it is probable that they will build the African cable in any event without concessions regarding the Australian land lines.'

2. If the Pacific Cable Board recommends that tenders be called for, is there at present any legislative authority for doing so, and for letting a contract for the construction of the cable?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). With reference to the first part of the question, the government is not at liberty at the present moment to lay before parliament any communications as to the action of the Imperial government in connection with this question. The second part of the question I think I have answered before, to the effect that the Imperial government has not, so far as we know, acquired the necessary legislative authority. Some governments have—the Canadian, the government of New South Wales, and, I think, the governments of several other Australian colonies.

THE ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

During what years was Major General Cameron (son-in-law of Sir Charles Tupper) the head of the Royal Military College at Kingston?

When did his connection with the college cease?

How many cadets were in attendance at said college during each year that Major General Cameron was in charge?

Who succeeded Major General Cameron?

How many cadets have been in attendance at the college each year since Major General Cameron's official connection therewith ceased?

Is it the intention of the government to re-instate Major General Cameron? If not, why not?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask that the question stand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to the abuse that has been made of the privilege to ask questions. Here is a statement of fact entirely irrelevant to the subject of the question and not intended to be relevant, but intended simply to serve a personal object. It is a matter of no importance to me, but it is an abuse of the rules of the House that will lead to a great deal of unpleasantness if permitted.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter about which any member has a perfect right to ask a question. It is a question concerning a public servant connected with an important military institution of this Dominion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me entirely. I have no objection whatever to this question, but the statement of fact in it, 'son-in-law of Sir Charles Tupper,' is, I claim, an abuse and a violation of the rules of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. The point taken by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) is upon a question of parliamentary procedure, and in my opinion it is well taken. The rule is that there should be no qualification of a question that is asked.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite willing to withdraw that portion of the question, in accordance with the desire of the right hon. leader of the government.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

On the question,

Is the government aware that the late Hon. Senator Temple, of Fredericton, N.B., a Conservative, drew for mileage $162.40, whereas Hon. Senator David Wark, also of Fredericton, but a Liberal, draws but $116?

That the Hon. Senator David MacKeen, of Halifax, a Conservative, draws for mileage $192.60, and that Hon. Senator Almon, Conservative, draws for mileage $192.60, whereas the Liberal member for Halifax, Dr. Russell, draws but $175, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, 1897-8?

What explanation can the government give?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to draw the attention of my right hon. friend to some statements of fact in this question. I take no exception to the question itself, but the statements of fact in it, namely, that Senator Temple was a Conservative, that Senator David Wark is a Liberal, that Senator MacKeen is a Conservative, that Senator Almon is a Conservative, and that Dr. Russell is the Liberal member for Halifax, are not relevant to the question, and are contrary to the rules of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that the hon. member who wishes to ask this question is not in the House, and, therefore, I ask that the question be allowed to stand.

ALBERTON-KILDARE MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Has a new contractor been employed by the government for carrying the mails between Alberton and Kildare, in the province of Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, what is his name?
3. What is the amount of his contract?
4. Did he get it by tender?
5. Was his the lowest tender?
6. How many tenders were received?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. The mails are now being temporarily carried at the rate of $98 per annum by Mr. W. B. White, whose contract for this service terminated on the 31st of December, 1899, but from the 1st proximo, a new contractor will be employed. 2. William Clark. 3. $90 per annum. 4. Two offers for this service were received by the department, one from the present contractor, Mr. W. D. White, at $98, and the other from Mr. Wm. Clark, at $90, which was accepted. 5. Answered by No. 4. 6. Same.

LYTTON-LILLOOET MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked :

1. Were not tenders called for, to be in by January 19 last, for a mail service twice per week, between Lytton and Lillooet, B.C. (distance about forty miles), to be commenced on February 1 last?

2. Who tendered for this service and what was the amount of each tender?
3. To whom has the contract been awarded?
4. If not awarded, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). With a view of establishing this service, if possible, tenders were called for a mail service twice a week between Lytton and Lillooet, for the purpose of ascertaining the cost, said tenders being due to be opened on the 19th of January last. As the question of establishing the service is still under consideration, none of the tenders have been accepted, and, therefore, information regarding them cannot be given at present.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF MR. JUSTICE CHOQUETTE.

Mr. DUGAS asked :

What sum or sums of money has been paid for travelling expenses to the Hon. Mr. Justice P. A. Choquette, from the date of his appointment as one of the justices of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, up to the present date?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The sums paid to Mr. Justice Choquette for travelling expenses were, in 1898-9, $546 ; in 1899-1900, $282.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

EXPORTS OF CHEESE FROM CANADA TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

How many pounds of cheese were exported from Canada to Great Britain in each year from July 1, 1890, to June 30, 1896, and the value of the same each year?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). In reply, I beg to say :

Fiscal Year.	Lbs.	Value.
1891	117,151,931	$10,406,466
1892	127,843,632	12,495,506
1893	141,892,232	14,107,360
1894	163,253,033	16,218,131
1895	155,501,945	15,086,222
1896	168,901,381	14,251,790

EXPORTS OF CATTLE FROM CANADA TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

How many cattle, and of what value, were exported from Canada to Great Britain from July 1, 1890, to June 30, 1899?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 930,732 cattle, valued at $64,263,707.

THE PROHIBITION COMMISSION.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the amount paid per day to the commissioners appointed to inquire into the subject of prohibition? What was the number of days served upon the commission by each commissioner? What commissioners sat on the commission at their meetings in the United States of America, and for how many days each? What was the mileage travelled by each commissioner, and for which travelling expenses were paid?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The amount paid, per day, to each of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the subject of prohibition, was $10. The number of days served on the commission by each member, was :

	Days.
Sir Joseph Hickson.....	192
Judge McDonald....	220
Mr. Clarke	142
Mr. Gigault	146
Rev. Dr. McLeod	677½

The commissioners who sat on the commission at their meetings in the United States of America, and the number of days each sat, were :

	Days.
Sir Joseph Hickson.....	15
Judge McDonald	19
Mr. Clarke	10
Mr. Gigault	25
Rev. Dr. McLeod	32

The vouchers do not show the mileage travelled.

POST OFFICE AT PONTBRIAND, MEGANTIC.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked :

1. Have petitions and complaints been laid before the Postmaster General in relation to the post office at Pontbriand, in the county of Megantic?

2. Is the Postmaster General aware that the said post office is located in an utterly unsuitable locality, not at all central and six arpents distant from any dwelling?

3. Is it the intention of the government to grant the prayer of the said petitions and place the post office in the vicinity of the church?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. A petition was sent to the department by the assistant postmaster of Pontbriand who stated that he had had it signed by the principal inhabitants, asking that he, the assistant postmaster, should be made postmaster. Other communications to the same effect were received from him. 2. The Postmaster General is not aware that the office is situated in an unsuitable locality. So far as the department is aware, the office is at present situated about 200 yards from the store in which it was formerly kept. 3. The department is not aware of any present necessity for changing the site of the post office.

HILTON KEITH, INDIAN AGENT AT CARLTON.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

When did Hilton Keith cease to be an officer of the Indian Department? What was his position at the time? Was he subsequently employed in connection with treaty payments to certain Indians? Did he resign, or was he deprived of his position?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Mr. Hilton Keith ceased to be an officer of the Indian Department on the 15th October, 1898. 2. The position he held at the time, was that of Indian agent at the Carlton agency. 3. He was not, subsequent to the date at which he ceased to be an officer of the Indian Department, employed in connection with treaty payments to any Indians. 4. He resigned.

CLERKS AND LETTER CARRIERS IN VANCOUVER.

Mr. PRIOR (by Mr. Earle) asked :

1. Has any increase been made in the provisional allowance given to the post office clerks and letter carriers of the Vancouver post office?

2. If so, how much, and for what reason?

3. Has said increase (if any) been given to the clerks and letter carriers of the Victoria post office?

4. If not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I beg to reply : 1. Yes. 2. $5 a month to every employee whose salary is not greater than $800 a year. In consequence of the increased cost of living in the city of Vancouver. 3. No. 4. There has been no report of the officers showing the same conditions as led to the increase in Vancouver.

APPEAL CASES HEARD BY SUPREME COURT.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked :

1. How many appeal cases have been heard by the Supreme Court in each year since July 1, 1895?

2. For how many days in each of said years has said court sat hearing appeal cases?

3. How many days in each of said years has each judge of the Supreme Court sat hearing appeal cases?

4. How many hours per day, when in session, does the Supreme Court sit hearing appeal cases?

5. How many hours has the Supreme Court sat, hearing appeal cases for the year between March 1, 1899, and March 1, 1900?

6. How many hours did each judge sit during such years?

7. What is the salary of each of said judges?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In reply to the first question, I beg to say :

July 1, 1895, to July 1, 1896	72
“ 1896, “ 1897	77
“ 1897, “ 1898	81
“ 1898, “ 1899	89

In reply to the seventh question :

The Right Hon. the Chief Justice	$8,000
Hon. Mr. Justice Taschereau	7,000
Hon. Mr. Justice Gwynne	7,000
Hon. Mr. Justice Sedgewick	7,000
Hon. Mr. Justice King	7,000
Hon. Mr. Justice Girouard	7,000

It should be pointed out that the return called for does not by any means cover a statement of the entire business disposed of by the court. Some cases are settled before they are inscribed; very many are inscribed for hearing, but are settled before being heard; all applications in chambers. None of these are included in the above report.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Montmorancy). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the government to certain returns moved for a long time ago by me, and not yet laid on the Table. Three of them are asked for from the Department of Public Works. The first is a statement of the amounts paid to persons working on Roberval Pier, which was ordered on the 30th March, 1898. The next is a return of the instructions for correspondence, &c., in relation to the construction of wharfs at Mistassini and St. Methode (Tekouabe), which was ordered on the 18th April, 1898, and another for copies of instructions issued to J. B. Charboneau, chief carpenter at the Mistassini and St. Methode wharfs, ordered on the 18th April, 1898. There was also a return from the Department of Railways and Canals ordered, on 30th March, 1898, for copies of tenders received for railway ties and lumber supplied to the Intercolonial Railway, in the province of Quebec. I would request that these returns be brought down as soon as possible, as they are urgently required.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

ADJOURNMENT—FOX BAY SETTLERS.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to a return that has been laid on the Table, and, as perhaps, this will necessitate some discussion I will conclude my remarks with a motion. On the 19th February, I moved the following motion, which was passed by the House :

Copies of all correspondence, reports, telegrams or papers which have passed between the government, or any member thereof, and the president of the Montreal Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, or any member of the missionary committee of that church, who was approached to investigate the grievances of the Methodist Fox Bay settlers of the Island of Anticosti.

Any clerk in the department, in one hour, could have prepared the return that has been brought down. After waiting a reasonable time, I inquired of the right hon. Prime Minister when I might expect the return. As the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), who was very much interested in this matter, was about leaving the country, I wished to have the return before he left. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), informed me that on the following Monday, he would probably lay the return on the Table. Monday came, but the return was not laid on the Table. On Monday the Minister of Public Works left the capital for a foreign country. On Tuesday night the return was laid on the Table. But the return brought down, is not in accordance with the resolution. I find, on reading the return carefully, that more papers have been abstracted from the file than have been laid before the House. Yesterday the Prime Minister informed the House the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), and the members of the House generally, that, for the balance of the session, unopposed motions could not be moved, so members need not expect any returns. But those who have had their motions passed are treated as badly or worse; for, even though the returns are ordered by the House—in this case not only the correspondence with the government, but with any member thereof—being ordered—the government give only what papers they see fit. I desire to refer to some of the papers that should be here. In the first place, I have here a letter from Mr. Stobo, chairman of the Evangelical Alliance of Quebec, written to Mr. Tarte. This letter is not in the return, although it is written to a member of the government, and the motion calls for the correspondence that passed, not only with the government but with any member of it. Mr. Stobo's letter reads as follows :

The Hon. J. I. Tarte, M.P.

Hon. and dear Sir,—I am not one of those who believe you to be as black as you are painted by your political opponents, for I know from experience that you have many good qualities, and as a rule where race and religion comes in, act from a sense of fairness. I found it so in the ancient capital. But if you are guilty of making the following statement on the floor of the House of Commons, you have seriously endangered your good name, as possessed of a spirit of fairness, and you are prejudging a case, now in the courts, and which may have to be handled by the home government.

Much had been made out of the alleged attempt at M. Menier to dismiss a colony of Methodists at Fox Bay. To begin with, he wished to inform the House that among the twenty families in this step on the part of the proprietor of the island, were both French Canadians and Irishmen. Those acquainted with the facts were aware that the men in question were professional wreckers, would deceive the master of a ship into danger to possess themselves of the resulting plunder. The question so far as he was able to see, seems to be whether M. Menier, who bought the island from an English syndicate, cannot own and control the property because he is a Frenchman.

Now, Sir, as to your alleged facts: 1. There are not twenty families, but only thirteen, at Fox Bay, all of them British Canadians, except one, a French Canadian, married to a Protestant woman, and the whole company numbers sixty persons, most of them born on the island, the parents coming from Channel, Newfoundland, at the invitation of Capt. Forsyth, and have been residents since 1873, or for twenty-seven years have had undisturbed occupation of their homes. 2. They are not professional wreckers as you say, but fishermen, God-fearing men, and persons of probity, and adherents of the Methodist Church of Canada. You have no right, Sir, even for party ends to destroy a people's reputation, and the chance will now be given you to prove in open court, the statement that you have now made in parliament, and had sent forth to the world, that the Fox Bay settlers are men who lure ships into danger for the sake of the resulting spoils.

You, Sir, have appealed to the Pope about the absolution which has existed in Quebec in the matter of politics, these poor people, in Anticosti, have only appealed against the absolution of M. Menier, as to his conditions of occupations, as no one can quit the island without his permission, or land there, no one can trade with the outside world or the outside world trade with the settlers except through M. Menier. In the latter a Halifax merchant has resisted M. Menier and won in the courts. He has not absolute control of the island, and its business, but to his chagrin must subject himself to the laws of the free soil of Canada.

The 'Patrie,' and now yourself, have been the first to introduce the racial and religious difficulty into this wretched bit of business soon to have a public hearing in the courts. No person in his senses would object to have Frenchmen owning land in the Dominion, so long as that land was controlled in accordance with the spirit and genius of the free people (democratic in government). But if M. Menier would do here, as he might be allowed to do in France, then we British Canadians have a right to object, and raise legal difficulties, both as to the administration and possession. Now, Sir, it can be proven that Mr. Commettant, the soi-disant governor of the island, gave the settlers to understand that their form of worship would not be agreeable to their superiors, and at a time when they were holding a prayer-meeting. If M. Menier is the legal proprietor of the island, which is a matter in dispute in more quarters than one, we acknowledge that he has a right to remove obnoxious persons if he go legally about it. But he has no right to tear down buildings and banish their owners without compensation. Three years more occupation would have given them an indisputable title to their homes, but now they have to fight for their possessions and make appeals to all fair-minded, patriotic people, men who love civil and religious liberty, the very thing that the French Canadian Liberals profess to have been fighting for of late years.

Hon. Sir, you are reported to have said when you made your maritime tour, that 'M. Menier ought to be compensated by the Dominion for the improvements he has made at (Soleil), English Bay.' It will be time enough to do that when they become Dominion property, and not till then.

Hon. Sir, you will now have to face one of the largest denominations of Protestants in the Dominion of Canada, in making proof of your statement that the Fox Bay settlers are professional wreckers and Methodists. If you desire to know the character of the men you traduce, I refer you to Capt. Forsyth, Montreal, under whose auspices settlement was made in 1873; Mr. R. I. Hart, merchant, Halifax, who has done business with them for years; Mr. H. Budden, Quebec, who has also done business for them, and the Rev. T. Griffith, M.A., Ph. D., Quebec, president of the Montreal Methodist Conference.

Hon. Sir, I am afraid that you have started a controversy which will not speedily down by your heated statement of March 28th, on the floor of the House. Had any British Canadians made a like statement in the House about the French Canadians there would have been a general howl throughout the whole province of Quebec. The question, remember, is not, 'Can a Frenchman own and administer land in the province of Quebec,' but, 'Can land be administered contrary to the spirit and laws of the country?' It was a gross violation of law that brought Anticosti into public notice, and the present legal proceedings taken, forced.

(Signed) EDWARD J. STOBO,

Secretary of the Quebec Evangelical Alliance, and Treasurer of the Fox Bay Settlers' Legal Defence Fund.

Quebec, March 31, 1899.

Now, there is nothing of that in the return brought down. The next thing I find in the report is a telegram dated November 8th, from Mr. Alexander Mills, to the Premier. It is not on file, but, before I deal with that, I just want to read a resolution of the conference, held at Brockville last year, in reference to this matter:

Moved by the Rev. T. G. Williams, D.D., seconded by the Rev. W. Jackson, D.D., and unanimously adopted:

That this conference hereby expresses its regret that our brethren, members of the Methodist Church within the bonds of the Montreal Conference residing on the Island of Anticosti have—by the veiled expression 'natural and fair inference'—been accused of one of the most heinous crimes of ancient or modern times, viz.:—that of luring vessels upon rocky coasts, that the wreckers might profit by the loss of property of others, even though this loss is almost certain to involve the sacrifice of human life. And inasmuch as the awful crime has been indignantly denied, and proof of the alleged crime demanded by the persons accused, and inasmuch as the attempt to reply to the challenge for proof is not only irrelevant, but entirely inconclusive, which served to exhibit openly the weakness and utter groundlessness of the charge made by a minister of the Crown on the floor of the House of Commons.

We do not hesitate to characterize these accusations against Methodists, and named as members of our church by the Hon. Israel Tarte as unjust and untrue, and affirm that a gross insult has been offered our church by the Minister of Public Works.

And further we hold that in view of his failure to prove that the accused have been guilty of this heinous crime, not only against Christianity, but also against the sentiment of all who are not hopelessly sunk in barbarism, the Hon. Israel Tarte is bound to retract his words and apologize for them as publicly as he made his unproven charge against the members of a church which holds a proud eminence among the law-abiding citizens of our Dominion, and upon which Hon. Mr. Tarte has with such audacity cast an unprovoked insult. And inasmuch as during the months which have elapsed since he uttered what we consider a base slander, no apology has been offered, nor any retraction has been made, we now beg to call the attention of the brethren of our church throughout the Dominion to this matter, and ask that they join with us in demanding an apology for his gross attack on our beloved Methodism, and to which we here, will not tamely submit, no matter by what spirit it may be inspired, or from what source it may come.

President of Conference.

REV. S. J. HUGHES, M.A., Perth, Ont.,
Secretary of Conference.

Montreal conference of the Methodist Church, held in Brockville, Ont., June, 1899.

The conference then appointed a committee, composed of two or three gentlemen, to deal with the matter. They wrote a letter on the 13th of June, as follows :

The Toronto Conference of the Methodist Church,

Owen Sound, June 13th, 1899.

REV. EBER CRUMMY,

Corresponding Secretary of Montreal Conference,

Dear Sir and Brother,—In reply to your communication to our conference, regarding the Anticosti affair, I inclose herewith the report of the committee appointed by this conference on the matter referred to, which report was most heartily endorsed by our conference.

Yours most sincerely,

(Sgd.) J. D. FITZPATRICK,
Cor. Secretary.

This committee met and made the following report :

Mr. TAYLOR.

REPORT RE ANTICOSTI METHODISTS.

Your committee to whom was referred the communication from Montreal conference, beg leave to report as follows :

The Hon. J. Israel Tarte having on the 20th of March last, in his place in the House of Commons, made the following statement, namely :

'Mr. Menier found at Fox Bay about twenty families who had settled there. Those of us in the province of Quebec who know what is going on, are amused at the reports that have been spread abroad. It is said, that all those who have been settled there are Methodists, and they are going to be expelled on account of their faith. I may say that my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Angers) is acting as counsel in the case, and he will bear me out in what I am going to say. There are some people of the Protestant faith on the island, and I may add, that, among those whom my hon. friend opposite characterized as persecuted Methodists are a couple of French Canadians and a couple of Irishmen, and, perhaps, they may not be the best of the lot. Everybody who lives in the province of Quebec knows that nearly all those who live on that island are professional wreckers—

He left room to except the two Irishmen and the two Frenchmen.

—people who deceive the captain of a ship in order that the vessel might be wrecked, and that they might steal everything on board.'

The above statement having been challenged by the authorities of the Montreal conference under whose jurisdiction this island lies.

We, therefore, consider that the Hon. Mr. Tarte should either substantiate the charges he has made or withdraw the same as publicly as he has made them.

Secondly, That this matter be referred to the conference special committee to take any action that they may think necessary in the premises.

Respectfully submitted.

(Sgd.) H. S. MATTHEWS,
Chairman.

ALEX. MILLS,
Secretary.

Owen Sound, June 12th, 1899.

On the 12th of February last, I put the following question to the government :

Did the president of the Montreal conference of the Methodist Church in Canada write a letter to the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, or did the missionary committee of the said church, appointed to inquire into the grievances of the Fox Bay settlers on the Island of Anticosti, pass a resolution, and send a copy of the same to the said Hon. J. Israel Tarte, demanding a public retraction and apology of the following statement made by him in this House on the 28th day of March, 1899, and recorded at page 575 of the 'Hansard' of 1899, as follows :—'Everybody who lives in the province of Quebec knows that nearly all those who live on that island are professional wreckers, people who deceive the captain of the ship in order that the vessel might be wrecked, that they might steal everything that is on board? If so, has the Hon. Mr. Tarte made the apology? If not, is it his intention to do so?

The hon. Minister of Public Works made the following reply, which I, as a Methodist, refuse to accept as an apology, and I am sure, that the Methodist Church in Canada refuse to accept it as a full and ample apology. We find nothing in the record brought down to substantiate the statement of the minister that he did give an answer. Here is what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) said in this House :

Although I do not see very clearly what the hon. gentleman has to do with this matter, which is personal to me, I take great pleasure in saying that whatever misunderstanding may have existed as to the words I have uttered in the House in reference to the Fox Bay settlers, I have reason to hope has been explained away. Statements that have been lately put before me have convinced me that I have been unwillingly unjust towards the Fox Bay settlers, and I have written to that effect to their representatives.

We have the statement here that he wrote a letter to the committee, but there is nothing amongst these papers to show whether he did or not, or what kind of a letter he did write. He told us in the House that he was unwillingly unjust to these people, and that is all the apology he makes for having accused them of being wreckers and practically murderers. On the 8th November, Mr. Mills, one of the gentlemen appointed, sent the following telegram to Sir Wilfrid Laurier at Ottawa :

Leave Rimouski Tuesday morning, am leaving here to-night, in Quebec Monday, and go to Rimouski Monday night, wired you at three o'clock to-day.

That telegram is not on file here. On the 14th November, Mr. Mills again wires the Prime Minister :

Received wire Thursday that you would meet me Saturday, from Quebec. No word yet, please wire me.

Mr. Mills says in this communication that he received a wire from the Prime Minister, but that wire is not included amongst the documents brought down. In a letter from Mr. Mills to the Prime Minister, on the 30th November, he makes this statement :

Allow me to thank you kindly for the excellent accommodation provided us, and the personal interest which you took in our welfare by wiring, sending Mr. Jones to Rimouski, &c.

There is no record on the file as to what that telegram, referred to here, contains. Further on in the same letter, he says :

We cannot speak too highly of the skill and care with which Captain May and his crew conducted the trip, which, as intimated in your letter, is a very risky one at this time of the year.

Mr. Mills here says that he received a letter from the Prime Minister, but there is no copy of that letter on the file. At page 24, Mr. Mills makes a personal report to the Prime Minister, in which he says :

The proposition of your government, as indicated in your letter to the Hon. Mr. Marchand (which he read to us on the 20th inst.) was laid before the Fox Bay settlers, and, after explanation by us, and full consideration, they voluntarily signed the document of which the enclosed is a certified copy. I hold the original undertaking.

In that report Mr. Mills makes the statement that the Prime Minister wrote a letter to Mr. Marchand, the Premier of Quebec, which was the basis of the proposition to be laid before the Fox Bay settlers, and yet there is no copy of that letter on the file. Mr. Mills also says :

I inclose you a copy of the agreement that we got the Fox Bay settlers to sign.

There is no copy of that document on file. He says further :

We went very carefully into the condition and circumstances of the Fox Bay people, and found that the facts as reported to you on the 3rd inst., are substantially correct.

He evidently made a report of the facts on the 3rd instant, but there is nothing of that report on the file. Further on in his report, he says :

You will see that clause (c) in relation to 'aiding these people to establish themselves in their new homes' was of necessity made very indefinite. We discussed that question with Mr. Marchand in Quebec.

Mr. Mills says in his letter that clause (c) of this agreement was of necessity made very indefinite, and yet that agreement is not on file. He concludes by saying :

There are a good many things in connection with the case on which I would report verbally, but I would not care to write about them.

No doubt, Mr. Mills is a strong political friend of the Prime Minister and his party. Mr. Mills was secretary of this committee and he makes this verbal report to the Prime Minister personally, and in it he refers to a number of documents that ought to be included in this return, but which are not. At page 26, of the return, Mr. Mills writes to the Prime Minister from Toronto, under date December 22 :

Referring to yours of the 2nd inst.

Mr. Mills again refers to another letter which he received from the Prime Minister, but that letter of the Prime Minister is not on file. At page 29, Mr. Mills again writes Sir Wilfrid Laurier :

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 26th inst., as follows : 'I will be glad to see you on Wednesday next.'

The telegram is not brought down, the receipt of which is here acknowledged. What is the use of a member of this House getting an order for papers dealing with a most important question affecting a portion of the community in this country, when the papers are mutilated before they are brought down to this House. It is our right to have all the correspondence, and we should have it. We want the agreement made with these people, a copy of which was sent to the government, as Mr. Mills states. We want also the apology the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), says he has written. He (Mr. Tarte) has left the country refusing to make a public apology in this House, and refusing to express his regret that he charged these respectable people with a crime of which they were never guilty. When this committee went to Anticosti they found that in the Admiralty Court a record is kept of every wreck that has taken place on the Island of Anticosti, or at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, and they found in that record that an inquiry had been made into every case and a verdict given pointing out the cause of the accident, and that no charge or no suspicion was cast upon these people of being connected with any wreck. I understand that the government, wanting no doubt to help Mr. Menier, has agreed to give these people lands in the North-west, and some arrangement was evidently made to that effect which is embodied in the agreement that these people signed for the committee who went there. We have a letter sent to Mr. Marchand by Mr. Mills, which is given in this return, although the order of the House did not call for it, but there is a letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Marchand which is not given. Why was not that agreement between the committee and the Fox Bay settlers brought down? Mr. Mills writes to Mr. Marchand, as follows:—

Toronto, Can., Nov. 4, 1899.

The Honourable F. G. Marchand, Premier, Province of Quebec,
Quebec, Que.

(Re Menier and Fox Bay Settlers, Anticosti.)

My dear Sir,—Allow me to express to you my sincere gratitude for the kind and courteous manner in which you have received me on both occasions on which I have been in Quebec in connection with this case; and allow me also to thank you kindly for the assistance which you and the officials of your government have given me in my efforts to find out the facts of the case.

As you said that—until you consulted your colleagues—you could not give an answer to my suggestion looking to an amicable arrangement of the whole difficulty, and as there was no certainty that your colleagues would be in Quebec until next week, I came to Montreal, met our eastern committee, and, with Rev. Dr. Williams and Dr. Griffith, interviewed Sir Wilfrid Laurier at Ottawa, and explained the whole situation to him. I may say that our interview with Sir Wilfrid was very satisfactory.

Referring to the ejectment suits, Mr. Justice Gagné rendered judgment in the eleven cases on October 31, granting Mr. Menier possession of the property occupied by the Fox Bay settlers on his (Mr. Menier's) own terms without any hearing on the part of the defendants. These judgments are, I am advised, executory on November 7, instant.

After full consideration of the whole matter and consultation with Mr. Cook, our counsel in Quebec, I have decided to report to the committee of the Methodist Mission Board, who authorized me to go to Quebec, that it will not be wise for us to intervene in the law-suits as they now stand, and that—in so far as we are concerned—Mr. Menier can take his own course and execute the default judgments obtained by him, if he chooses to take the responsibility.

Had those who are now interesting themselves as friends of the Fox Bay settlers intervened a year ago, they might have taken a course which it is impossible for them as the actions stand at the present time.

The report was published in the newspapers over a year ago that the Quebec government had taken up the defence of these people, retained counsel and undertaken to pay the costs of their defence. In consequence of this report, no active steps were taken by friends of the Fox Bay people to help them, believing that they were safe in the hands of the government of which you have the honour to be First Minister.

Perchance it might be said 'the government is not responsible for newspaper reports.' My answer—in so far as the people I represent are concerned—is this:

On August 12, 1898, the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, communicated with His Excellency the Governor General of our Dominion, and asked for a report on the statement published in the London papers in the summer of 1898, as to the state of affairs which then existed in the Island of Anticosti and amongst these was the statement that 'Mr. Menier had ordered the settlers at Fox Bay to leave the place occupied by them for over twenty-five years within twenty-four hours.'

The Dominion government referred the matter to the Quebec government for report.

The Quebec government, through its Assistant Attorney General and Secretary, reported, amongst other things, the following: 'In order that they (Fox Bay people) might obtain fair-play and be sure of having their rights properly tested before the court, the government undertook to pay their costs.' Whereas, the fact is, that your government agreed to contribute a sum not to exceed $300, towards the defence of the actions. This was, we find, the only money available for the defence of eleven actions and it didn't pay nearly all disbursements.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Fitzpatrick, on receipt of this statement, reported to the Dominion cabinet for transmission to the Colonial Secretary, as follows:

'Soon after the arrival of the constables at Anticosti, the settlers, of their own free will, accepted certain terms proposed by the agent of the proprietor, and an agreement embodying these propositions was signed by the interested parties. The constables, therefore, returned to Quebec. However, the agreement referred to, did not effect a satisfactory settlement of the difficulties between Mr. Menier and the Fox Bay settlers. The proprietor, therefore, has taken the ordinary proceedings of the court in order to obtain a judicial finding determining his rights. These actions, which are now pending in the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, for the district of Saguenay, are contested by Fox Bay settlers. These Fox Bay settlers are poor, and the government of Quebec, in order to have full justice done to them, has retained counsel to act on their behalf, and has undertaken to bear all the costs of their defence.'

These reports were sent to Mr. Chamberlain, and published in the press, and our people, believing that they were safe in the hands of the Quebec government, did not interfere.

The result is, judgment rendered to expel these people from the island without a hearing and they are now at the mercy of the plaintiff and his counsel.

We came into the case for the first time about the middle of October of this year, and our position has been one of inquiry for information, and negotiation for settlement only, entirely outside the merits of the litigation. We have not interfered with the litigation at all. I think that you will agree with me that these people and the pending legal proceedings are now in a most unfortunate position, and all I ask your government to do, at present, is to use your good offices to relieve these people, in part at least, in the unfortunate condition in which they are now placed.

1. By implementing the assurance given by your Assistant Attorney General to Mr. Chamberlain, through the Dominion government, that the Quebec government would pay all the costs of the defence, thus leaving intact the money paid into court by Mr. Menier.

2. By granting substantial aid to the Fox Bay people to remove and settle in the new home that may be selected for them.

As there have been so many conflicting and even contradictory statements, concerning this whole matter, it was suggested to me by your Assistant Attorney General that it might be advisable to proceed to Anticosti, ascertain the facts, and find just how far these people are prepared to stand by the statements made by affirmation and otherwise. If this suggestion is carried out, I think it will be advisable that your Assistant Attorney General accompany Rev. Mr. Griffith and myself to the island, so that your government may know from the report of their own representatives, both the nature of the inquiry and the results that are reached. Such a course may be all the more necessary if Mr. Menier's representatives proceed at once to enforce the order for ejection. It would be exceedingly unfortunate if such steps were taken at the present time as are calculated to further inflame the feelings of the people; and I feel assured that by such a visit as I have proposed, undesirable complications can be averted. It is possible that transportations for the parties named may be provided, but I think it would not be unreasonable if the Quebec government should meet the incidental expenses connected with the journey.

A prompt reply in regard to the proposed visit to the island will greatly oblige.

We have retained Mr. William Cook, Q.C., to represent us in Quebec, and I shall be glad if you can confer with him in reference to any step that you or your government can take to better the condition of the unfortunate people.

You are at liberty to lay this before your counsel. Kindly convey my respect to the Hon. Mr. Duffy.

Yours truly,
(Signed) ALEXANDER MILLS.

In addition to this there was a letter sent by the Prime Minister to Mr. Marchand, which laid the basis of a settlement, if a settlement has been made; but there is nothing in the return to show any basis of settlement, further than that the government made arrangements for free transport for the committee to go down there, and Mr. Mills's own private report to the Prime Minister as to how the matter was settled. These are all the papers we are favoured with. I wanted to have an ample apology made by the Minister of Public Works either in the House or in writing; but he has done neither. He has made the apology which I have read, but which cannot be accepted as an apology at all, because he has not expressed regret for the statements he made. Although he received from the conference, which met in Brockville last June, the letter, a copy of which I have read, he made no reply to it; if he did, I have not been furnished with a copy of it. This return is barren of information. The government cannot expect to get on with business if they treat members of the opposition in this way. When we ask questions, they give us such answers as they see fit; and when we move for a return, they abstract such documents as they think may be injurious to themselves, and give us the balance. These documents prove on every page that there were others originally on file, because every telegram refers to some communication of which there is no copy here, and I would ask the right hon. First Minister to supplement the return at an early day, and give me all the correspondence that took place between the government or any member thereof and the committee appointed to inquire into this matter. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn, seconded by Mr. Casgrain.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that this motion of my hon. friend is altogether contrary to the rules of the House. A motion to adjourn should not be made except on a question of urgency or of immediate importance. The question brought up by my hon. friend is not urgent in any way. Although he is within his rights in bringing it up, the proper time to do so is on the motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply. I call upon hon. members of the opposition to adhere to the well-understood rules of the House in this respect. With regard to the complaint made by the hon. gentleman that the record is incomplete and that documents have been extracted from it, it is utterly unfounded. Let the hon. gentleman call at my department whenever he chooses, and I will instruct the clerk of the council to let him go through the whole file and ascertain for himself what there is in it. It may be that certain private telegrams addressed to Mr. Mills are not on the file. I did not put on the file the telegram from Mr. Mills asking for an interview. There is also a letter of mine to Mr. Marchand, the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, which is not in this return, but I do not know that the order called upon me to bring down any letters addressed by me to Mr. Marchand. The order simply calls for the production of all correspondence exchanged between the government or any member thereof and the committee appointed by the Methodist Church. There was no mention of correspondence between myself and Mr. Marchand, although I would not have any objection to bring down all the correspondence between Mr. Marchand and myself on this painful subject.

It is true that the return does not contain a letter of the Minister of Public Works to the committee of the Methodist Church. But that was, I understand, a letter of apology addressed by my hon. colleague to that committee. Surely my hon. friend did not expect such a letter to be filed in the archives of the Public Works Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman knows anything of the nature of the apology sent by the hon. Minister of Public Works?

The PRIME MINISTER. That has no relevancy at all to the subject in hand. I do not know, and I do not see why an apology sent on account of words spoken on the floor of the House should have anything to do with the Department of Public Works and be put on file in that department. That was altogether a personal matter affecting, not the department, but the Hon. Mr. Tarte personally, which was not expected to be filed on record in the department. I thought that everything had been brought down. The correspondence of the conference of the Methodist Church was carried on simply with myself, and I was not aware that any other correspondence had been carried on with any other member of the government. I brought down whatever there was in my department.

With regard to the apology of Mr. Tarte, with which the hon. gentleman is not satisfied, let me read it to the House. It will be found on page 309 of the Hansard of February 12:

Although I do not see very clearly what the hon. gentleman had to do with this question, which is personal to me, I take great pleasure in saying that whatever misunderstanding may have existed as to the words I have uttered in the House in reference to the Fox Bay settlers, I have reason to hope has been explained away. Statements that have been lately put before me have convinced me that I have been unwillingly unjust towards the Fox Bay settlers.

If this is not an apology, I would like to know what is.

And I have written to that effect to their representatives.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The Hon. Mr. Tarte said in this House on the 12th of February, more than a month ago, that he had written to the representatives of the Fox Bay settlers that he had been unjust towards them. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not satisfied with that apology. He may not be satisfied with it, but, at all events, we have not heard a word so far from the representatives of the Fox Bay settlers that they were not satisfied. Surely if the apology tendered by the Minister of Public Works, more than a month ago, to the friends of the Fox Bay settlers, had not been satisfactory to them, we would have heard from them before to-day. But, whether or not the apology was sufficient is a question which may be left to the representatives of the settlers and which ought not so much to concern after all the hon. member for South Leeds. If they are satisfied, he can very well afford to be satisfied also, whatever may be the tenderness of his conscience on this matter.

To come back to this vexed question, everybody remembers that Mr. Tarte said on the floor of this House, I think last session, that the Fox Bay settlers were wreckers. I do not know that on that occasion he referred particularly, or referred at all, to their religion, and I doubt very much if he knew then that they belonged to the Methodist persuasion. But, whatever may have been the language of the minister at that time, he admitted frankly that he had since received information which convinced him that he had been unwillingly unjust towards these people. If he had, it was quite right and proper that the reparation of the injustice should be as public as the injury itself. The words in the first place had been uttered on the floor of this House, and the reparation was made also on the floor of this House; and what more could the hon. minister have done, under the circumstances, than admit frankly that he had been unwillingly unjust. I do not think that I should pursue this subject any further.

The hon. gentleman has introduced matter which is altogether foreign to the purpose he had in hand, which was to obtain more information. I have only to say that, so far as I am concerned, I repudiate this statement that documents have been abstracted from the files. I invite him once more to come to my department, and I will refer him to the clerk, and the whole file will be put before him, and if he finds anything left out I will be very much surprised. Nothing, I am sure, has been left out, except, perhaps, one document, and that is a copy of the agreement with the Fox Bay settlers, and I am surprised that it should have been left out. That document is referred to by Mr. Mills, a friend of the settlers, who was appointed secretary of the committee to look after their interests. I do not know if I have what the hon. gentleman calls an agreement or not, but my impression is I have, and if it has been omitted, the omission has been altogether unwilling. There is nothing to hide in that document. Last fall, a committee of the Methodist Church undertook to visit the Fox Bay settlers to see in what way their unfortunate situation could be improved. The government facilitated their visit in every way. A committee of the Methodist Church and a representative of the Quebec government, and if I remember right, one of their own officers, accompanied them to Rimouski, and I think to Anticosti also. They visited the Fox Bay settlers, and these settlers, acting on the advice of their friends, came to the conclusion that they would take up lands in the North-west Territories and settle there. They signed a document to that effect, and my impression is that that document is in my department, and I thought it had been brought down. But there is nothing whatever to hide. Let the hon. gentleman come and look for himself, and everything he finds will be brought down if not brought down already.

ADJOURNMENT—I.C.R.—DISMISSAL OF MR. ARCHIBALD.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Without pursuing that further, I would like to call the attention of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a difficulty I found last year and the year before. I find instance after instance in which the order of the House has not been carefully carried out. I think it should be a point of honour with the government and every minister to attend scrupulously to the order of the House when it has been made. Here is an ample, and a very glaring one, all the more glaring because it has been brought up in the House half a dozen times. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) was asked for the report of the commissioner who was appointed to take evidence in the case of Mr. Archibald, who was dismissed from the engineership of the I.C.R. He was asked for the order in council, the report of the commissioner, all letters and the evidence. Well, after a long while, the return was handed down, supposed to comply with the order. But, when it was looked at, it was found that there was none of the evidence. The orders in council were there, the report of the commissioner was there, Mr. Archibald's letter was there—but there was nothing of the evidence taken before the commissioner. That fact was brought to the attention of the minister, and he seemed very much surprised, and said the return should be complete, that there must be some error. Again he was reminded that the return was not complete. After a time my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) again asked for the return of the papers and noted the omission. And after the session ended, he made a diligent search again, because the minister said the evidence must be down, that there must be some mistake. But the hon. member for Halifax did not succeed in finding the evidence, and this session again he brought the subject up. The minister stated that he thought the evidence must be before the House, that, at any rate, it ought to be. I have taken the trouble to look the matter up myself. I find the return is numbered 21E, and everything is there with the exception of the evidence—which was the material part. Now, it is a little annoying, when you go to the trouble of getting these returns and think you have the documents before you only to find that they are not there and that you will probably be left for months longer without them. This I give as an illustration. It is a particularly aggravating case. Mr. Archibald has had attacks directed against him on account of a telegram with reference to shingles, with reference to which the minister himself was good enough to say in the House—where, of course, Mr. Archibald could not be present to reply—that that was the way they had of referring to voters who were to be sent along on the I.C.R. Now, Mr. Archibald obliged the newspapers that made that statement to retract it, under threat of proceedings against them. But he could not do that with the minister; the only way he could set himself right with the minister would be to have the evidence brought down. Mr. Archibald himself, as I understand, having testified with reference to this matter. Now, I would ask the right hon. gentleman to call the attention of his colleague to this case.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). On the 26th of February, an order was made for copies of advertisements for the terms calling for tenders for printing for the North-west Territories government from 1890 to 1899, inclusive—and so on. I would be glad if the right hon. Prime Minister would make a note of it. Also, on the 14th of February an order was passed for a return showing the amount paid each year for the government of the North-west Territories, namely, from 1889 to 1899, inclusive, and so on.

Motion (Mr. Taylor) to adjourn, negatived.

CELEBRATION OF ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Mr. M. J. F. QUINN (St. Ann's, Montreal). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the government to a piece of news, very welcome to a portion of the Canadian people and to a very important portion of the British Empire, which reached us a very few days ago—that it is the intention of Her Majesty to visit Ireland within a very short time, and also that Her Majesty has granted that gracious privilege to the troops belonging to the British army throughout the world of wearing on St. Patrick's Day the shamrock. I wish also to draw the attention of the government to the fact that the Lord Mayor of London has directed that the Irish flag shall float from the Mansion House on the 17th of March. I need not say, Mr. Speaker, the depth of feeling and gratitude with which the Irish people not only in Ireland, but throughout all the British possessions, have received and do welcome this news. For years we have been looking for some recognition, and at times we have almost despaired; we thought that the government of England had neglected Ireland and had forgotten to mark it out, as other portions of the British Empire have been marked out, by having a royal residence in Ireland. But this gracious act on the part of Her Majesty, which I think is spontaneous and not suggested by any government or any political party, goes very far to bring the hearts of the Irish people into cordial touch and sympathy with Her Majesty the Queen. There is nothing, in my opinion, that has been done for many years that is so likely to bring around the throne of Great Britain the loyal sentiments, the heartfelt gratitude of the Irish people, as the action of Her Majesty on this occasion has done and will do, I am sure, in the future. I see that this government has not taken notice of the matter by granting permission, for example, to our militiamen throughout the Dominion to take part in the celebration on the 17th of March, which is only a few days away, or by ordering the Irish flag, or the British ensign, or the Canadian flag to be permitted to appear on public buildings throughout the Dominion on that date. I rise simply to ask if some steps will be taken by the government in order that these two things may be granted. Now, I am sure the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knows that St. Patrick's Day is pretty generally celebrated in many parts of the Dominion. He knows also that in very many of the large cities, where there are members of the militia, many of them would be glad to take part in the celebration if it were not for the fact that they are prevented by the militia general orders. It requires that some steps should be taken in order to grant them this privilege. I would ask simply, if the government think well of it, that a general order be issued, without which it cannot be done, granting the privilege to militiamen—not ordering them but permitting those who may wish to do so to take part in the celebration on this occasion; and that throughout Canada also, on the 17th of March, the public buildings may be decorated by the Irish flag or the British standard floating from the top of these buildings. I need not call attention to the fact that Her Majesty's action is in grateful remembrance on the part of Her Majesty of the loyalty and undying courage displayed by the Irish troops in the Transvaal war. I am perfectly satisfied, that, should the permission be granted to the volunteers of Canada to turn out on the 17th of March, there are very few indeed who would not feel stirred in their sentiment as to turn out in honour of the loyal Irishmen who shed their blood for Her Majesty in the Transvaal. I do not wish to say anything more, but merely to make the suggestion, and to ask that some steps be taken to reach the end which I have in view.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I must express my regret that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Ann's (Mr. Quinn), gave me no intimation at all of the question which he intended to put to me. If he had done so, I would have endeavoured to make it possible to give him an answer. I appreciate, however, the sentiments which inspire him, in his present utterances, and I agree with him, that the action taken by Her Majesty, will probably have a great effect in reconciling the difficulties which have existed for many generations in Ireland. There is no race in the world which is more amenable to an act of kindness than the Irish race. In regard to the practical suggestion made by the member for Montreal, St. Ann's, I must refer it to the Department of Militia and Defence. The hon. gentleman says that we should fly the Irish flag on the public buildings. I am afraid that our stock of Irish flags is scant. At all events, we can have the shamrock. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will be most happy to convey his suggestion to the Department of Militia and Defence.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—THE CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 59), to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Chairman, when this Bill was last before the House, in committee, it was reserved in order that consideration might be given to the point that was raised by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), in regard to the pay of the Canadian mounted rifles. In the schedule of pay, as first submitted, the amount was stated to be 75 cents a day, but, in the course of the discussion, attention was drawn to the fact that the members of the North-west mounted police are not paid 75 cents a day, but that there is a sliding scale, beginning with 50 cents a day, and running up to 70 or 75 cents a day, an increase of 5 cents a year. The hon. member for Alberta suggested that the inequality of pay ought to be considered, and that, though there was a difference in the rates of pay for the members of the police force, varying in accordance with their terms of service, yet, as respects this particular force, it was perhaps not desirable that there should be two rates of pay. That point having been considered, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), who is not present, has authorized me to state that he has concluded that the rate of 75 cents per day as first mentioned, should be a fixed rate, and that there should not be the sliding scale which was the subject of discussion. To remove any doubt on that point, I propose to ask the committee to add to the Bill a schedule, showing the rates of pay of the several arms of the service. Instead of a sliding scale of from 50 cents to 75 cents a day, as was talked of, it is proposed that the maximum pay of 75 cents, shall be the pay for the Canadian mounted rifles. Otherwise, there has been no change, except a change in the form of the Bill for convenience. I had hoped that I would have had the Bill ready for distribution amongst members; I have an advance copy, but, before the Bill goes to its third reading, the schedule will be in the hands of hon. members. I think the only point in which there was a change, is the one I have mentioned in regard to the schedule. The House will likely have it, I hope, before the Bill passes the committee, but, at all events, before I propose the third reading, the Bill, in its amended and corrected form, will be before the House. The only change in the substance of the Bill, is as to the question of 75 cents a day, but we attach a schedule to the Bill, giving the various rates of pay of the service.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding), if the government has come to any conclusion in reference to the separation allowance. The hon. gentleman will remember the discussion we had upon that point.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, the matter has been considered, and, we have concluded that the separation allowance, all things considered, should stand as it is at present.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), a question. As I understand it, the 75 cents a day applies to the mounted troops?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. To the whole of the mounted rifles.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. To the mounted troops?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. To the cavalry?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance, if there is to be any deduction made from the 50 cents a day which the Canadian troops receive in Canada?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no change in that respect. There has been no change whatever from the original policy of the government. There have been no deductions in the sense in which the word was used in the former debate—no deductions for rations—but the difference will be made up between the Imperial rate of pay and the Canadian rate of pay so that the rate will be 50 cents a day in the case of infantry.

Mr. McNEILL. Not including deductions?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. McNeill), raised the point as to whether there were deductions for maintenance. The government are satisfied that, in war times, there are no deductions made for maintenance. The troops will receive 24 cents a day from the Imperial government, and 26 cents a day from the Canadian government, making together 50 cents a day.

Mr. McNEILL. There will be a deduction of 24 cents a day from the 50 cents a day that our men would get in Canada?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, there will be no deduction from anything whatever on the part of the Canadian government.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not understand my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). I understand that if these men were serving in Canada, they would be paid 50 cents a day?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. I also understand the Minister of Finance to say, and he will correct me if I am wrong, that the Canadian government will not pay these men, who have gone to South Africa, 50 cents a day, but 26 cents a day? Is that right?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Canadian troops serving in Canada, would receive 50 cents a day. Canadian troops, serving in Africa, will receive 50 cents a day, but they will receive part of it from the Imperial government, and the balance from the Canadian government.

Mr. McNEILL. We save 24 cents a day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, we do not save anything; we are spending $2,000,000, and we are not saving anything.

Mr. McNEILL. You save that much out of the pay.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We do not save anything.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not quite understand my hon. friend. These men, if they were serving in this country, would be paid 50 cents a day each. But, when they have gone to fight for us in South Africa, we are not going to give them 50 cents a day each, but we are going to give them 26 cents a day each.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No.

Mr. McNEILL. We, the Canadian people through the government, are going to give each of these men 26 cents a day, as I understand it, while they are serving in South Africa, and the balance is to be paid by the Imperial authorities. Is that correct?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will answer my hon. friend when he is through. I will not answer him while he is on his feet.

Mr. McNEILL. That, I understand, is the position. I regret very much, that, on an occasion of this kind, we should be in the position of saving 24 cents out of the 50 cents that we otherwise would pay.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am sorry my hon. friend is not able to adopt a larger 'we.' I would have thought better things of him. The larger 'we' is a matter of the whole empire. When these soldiers were serving the empire in Canada, they were receiving 50 cents a day. Now that they are serving the empire in South Africa, they are still going to receive 50 cents a day.

Mr. McNEILL. So far as the larger 'we' is concerned, it is a very small 'we' in a matter of this kind.

Mr. FOSTER. A wee 'we.'

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, a very wee 'we.'

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid my hon. friend the Finance Minister is an absent-minded beggar to-day. What I want to know is, is the cost to Canada twenty-six cents a day to each soldier, as far as pay is concerned, after the troops reach South Africa?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is correct. The Imperial pay makes up the rest.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any reduction made on the twenty-four cents a day which the Canadian soldier receives from the Imperial government?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We are informed that there are no deductions of any kind in time of war. In time of peace there are deductions for services which it is thought the canteen can do for the men better than they can do themselves, but in time of war each soldier receives a full shilling a day.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I saw in some letters from the front that there was a deduction of three pence a day or a week for hair cutting or shaving.

Mr. McNEILL.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The deputy minister informs me that if there were a deduction at all for that purpose, it would be three pence a month.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is not much of a shave.

Mr. McNEILL. Are the mounted police in Canada paid seventy-five cents a day?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is the maximum. They re-engage after five years' service at seventy-five cents a day.

Mr. McNEILL. What are the Imperial cavalry allowed per day?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. One shilling and two pence, or four cents more than is paid the infantry.

Mr. McNEILL. And that would be deducted from the seventy-five cents to be paid the Canadian mounted troops?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) is very fond of that word deduction. We will deduct nothing. Our mounted soldier will get the Imperial pay of one shilling and two pence, and he will get the balance from us to make up the seventy-five cents.

Mr. FOSTER. We understand that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the preamble of the Bill be adopted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to draw the attention of the government to a statement made in this House by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) on a very important branch of this subject. He said:

I beg to tell that hon. gentleman that when Canada sends her sons to the front, Canada becomes responsible and will know how to redeem that responsibility to the widows and orphans of the brave men who may fall in this conflict. We do not propose to shift that duty on to the shoulders of any insurance company, and I may remind the House that, with the full concurrence of his council, my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) gave that assurance to the last contingent that sailed from Canada. Sir, I have no fear that the Canadian people will shrink from that duty. The success of the contributions to the patriotic fund is a clear proof that they are ready and willing to do their part. I am glad to see that individuals contribute generously out of their means to so good a cause, but I repeat that there is a right way and a wrong way of doing these things. I say that the government have chosen the right way, and I say again that the brave men in the front need have no fear, if it should please Providence that they should remain on the soil of Africa, that their widows and little ones will not be the wards and the care of the state and the wards and care of every true and honest-minded Canadian.

I wish to ask, how it is proposed to implement that very gratifying assurance which the minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) has given to the House and to the country, and which he says had been formally pledged to the second contingent before they left? How is it proposed to provide for the widows and orphans of those who fall, and how is it proposed to provide for those who may return disabled from earning a livelihood?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. This Bill does not deal with the question of any allowance to the widows and children of those of our brave sons who fall on the field. Whatever may be fair and reasonable in that way, will be a matter for further consideration, but it is not covered by this Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. Has the hon. gentleman any idea of how much the private soldiers in the New Zealand and Australian contingents are paid per day?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot tell.

Mr. INGRAM. When this Bill was before the House the other day, I took occasion to ask some questions with respect to the horses purchased, as provided for in the estimates which had been placed in our hands. I find that the report of those proceedings in the Toronto Star entirely misrepresented the statement I made. So far as the Toronto Star is concerned, I would have taken no notice of it at all, were it not that its report was copied in a local paper in my constituency, and I wish to say here and now that the statement made by the Toronto Star is entirely untrue—there is not a word of truth in it—with reference to what I said on that occasion.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the preamble passes, I wish to make one remark. I have not spoken at all in reference to the policy of the government in sending the contingents; but there has been one statement persistently made in this House, on the other side especially, which I think should not be allowed to go unchallenged; and this is, perhaps, the most convenient time to refer to it. It has been said over and over again, and with a great deal of emphasis, that the course of the government on this occasion is something that was never contemplated before, and an entirely new departure on the part of Canada. I wish to say in the most emphatic way that that statement is absolutely incorrect. The policy which has been carried out by the government was laid down and endorsed by this House in a resolution adopted on the 5th of February, 1896, declaring in the most solemn manner that in case need arose the Dominion of Canada was prepared to make as substantial sacrifices in defence of the honour and integrity of the empire as any other portion of Her Majesty's dominions. These are the very words in which that resolution was framed. It was seconded by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and supported by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and hon. members on this side of the House, both French and English, and was carried by the House unanimously and by acclamation. I will read, for the information of those who may not have been in the House at the time, some words that were uttered in regard to the resolution:

We wish the people of England and of Ireland and of Scotland, to know that the people of Canada are no mere fair-weather friends. We want our kinsmen in Australasia, some of whom we welcomed here so recently, to know that we are with them in this issue heart and hand; and we want the whole world to know that, come what may, in whatever part of the empire they may happen to reside, the British people are one people, animated by one spirit and determined to stand together as one man in defence of their common rights and in the maintenance of their common interests. Sir, we desire peace before all. We regard war with horror. But we are prepared to accept it with all its consequences, come from what quarter it may, if it be necessary to do so in order to defend the honour and integrity of our own empire.

These words were spoken by the mover of the resolution. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries used these words, speaking of the mother country:

The hearts of her children have gone out to the great, lone, isolated mother, and we to-day but do our duty when we pledge ourselves solemnly in parliament that if the occasion arises we are prepared to make material sacrifices for the integrity of the empire.

Again, in another passage, he said:

Sir, the resolution which we are asked to pass, the national pledge which we are asked to give here is a small step, perhaps, but it is one step at least, in that direction.

That is, in the direction of Imperial federation. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

I am not myself in the habit of advocating loud professions of loyalty, nor do I believe to any very great extent in those loud professions of loyalty. But there is a time for all things, and I am of opinion that now is a very proper time indeed for some such expression as my hon. friend the member for North Bruce proposes to place on our journals.

The right hon. leader of the government himself spoke in favour of the resolution, as well as a number of other members of the House; and I venture to say that if, under the circumstances which arose last year, we had done anything else than we did do, we would simply have stultified ourselves in the eyes of the world. We declared what our policy was in regard to such a matter as solemnly as it was possible for the representatives of the people to do, and it is quite contrary to the fact to suggest that this is a new departure. I recollect very well that our friend Dr. Welton, who was in the House at that time, said that it was one of the most solemn occasions which he ever remembered. He felt that he was taking part in one of the most solemn events that he had ever been concerned in. I thought it well, therefore, to call the attention of the House to the mistake that has been made in suggesting that the present policy of the government is a new departure in any sense of the word whatever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want, not to prolong this discussion, but merely to draw the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to the fact that in the debate to which my hon. friend has referred—and I think my hon. friend has not quite done him justice—he will find the most ample justification for everything that has been done; because on that occasion he used these strong and appropriate words:

But if the day should come—which God forbid—if the day should ever come—which I again say God forbid—when England should have to repel foes, I am quite sure that all British subjects, all over the world, would be only too glad to give to her what help they could—all British subjects all over the world, not only British subjects of her own blood, but British subjects who are not of her own blood, but who have received from her the inestimable blessing of freedom.

The case could not have been better put, and I think this language affords the most ample justification for everything the government has done in this matter.

Mr. McNEILL. I would just add to what I have already said, that the occasion of the moving of the resolution and the debate thereon and the declaration of policy on the part of the representatives of the people of Canada, was a cable message which had been sent by the German Emperor to Mr. Kruger in reference to this very South African question.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). If my hon. friend will permit me, I think it was the Venezuela matter.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend is not quite correct. It was after the message had been sent by the Emperor of Germany to Mr. Kruger, and after the flying squadron had been called out, that notice was given of this resolution.

Mr. SPROULE. When this Bill was last under consideration, the hon. Minister of Finance promised to give us a list of the parties from whom horses have been purchased and the prices.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is certainly inaccurate. It was the Minister of Militia who made the promise, but he did not say that the return would be brought before the Bill was read the third time, but as soon as it could be obtained. I went myself to the department, and was assured that the list was a very long one, which it would take considerable time to prepare.

Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. SPROULE. I am quite sure that I remarked at the time that if this information was not before the House before the third reading, it would be of no practical value, and the hon. minister promised to bring it down before the Bill was passed. I do not know why it should be such a lengthy task to prepare this information. It is only a matter of copying the names and prices.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman will turn up Hansard, he will find that the promise of the Minister of Militia was that the information would be brought down, and my hon. friend did not ask to have it brought down before the Bill was read the third time.

Mr. SPROULE. I am quite sure that I asked for the information to be down before the third reading. It was not available at the time, and we were put off with the statement that it would be before the House on the third reading.

Mr. MACLEAN. What will be the rate of pay for the men enlisting now for garrison work at Halifax? Will it be the same as the South African troops?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not know that that matter has been finally dealt with, but probably they will get the infantry pay of active militia.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will they get more pay in Halifax than the contingent in South Africa?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think so.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will they get as much?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Probably the same.

Mr. MACLEAN. The South African contingents may get less pay than the men doing garrison duty at Halifax?

Mr. BERGERON. Would the hon. gentleman find out what pay is received by the soldiers of New Zealand and Australia?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There may be some books giving the information, and we will endeavour to find it out.

Mr. BERGERON. I am speaking of those who are fighting in South Africa to-day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They only get the Imperial pay from the Imperial government, but whether the colonial governments are supplementing that I am not prepared to say.

Mr. BERGERON. Would it be an extraordinary thing to communicate with the government and find out?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It would not be, if necessary, but the point has not been raised before.

Mr. BERGERON. It would not be a matter of much expense, and would be interesting in view of the present discussion.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to make some observations on a matter closely connected with the question of supply upon which, in my judgment, it is expedient that a clear expression of the opinion of the House should be once for all recorded. I allude to the preferential feature of the present tariff policy of the country. Expressions have, from time to time, been made use of on this subject by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, which have indicated their disapproval of this feature of the tariff, but I am not aware that any hon. gentleman has ever distinctly advocated its repeal. Such expressions, however, have a manifest tendency to unsettle the public mind upon a question on which I think it desirable that the mind of the country should be clearly understood to be entirely and permanently at rest. I propose, therefore, before closing, to offer a resolution upon the subject. But inasmuch as this particular branch of the tariff question is so interwoven with the more general question of tariff legislation, I shall ask the indulgence of the House for a few preliminary references to the more general aspects of the matter before dealing more specifically with the immediate subject of my resolution. So many things have happened during the few years that have elapsed since the present administration assumed control of the public business of the country, such immense strides have been made in the commercial advancement and development of the Dominion, and such momentous departures have been taken in the general policy of the country, that it may almost require some effort on the part of hon. gentlemen to recall the situation as it existed a few years ago.

The present government acceded to power under conditions which pledged them to a certain line of procedure with respect to the fiscal policy of the country; but nothing has been more persistently, and I might almost say, nothing has been more wilfully misrepresented, than the nature of those conditions and the scope of those pledges. No accusation is more commonly made against the administration than that they have failed to fulfil the promises with respect to the tariff upon the faith of which they secured the suffrages of the electors of Canada. This is, in fact, the campaign stock-in-trade of our friends on the other side of the House, and will, no doubt, be the campaign cry, or one of the numerous and conflicting campaign cries, with which they will be endeavouring in a year or two to arouse a prosperous and contented electorate to vote against the government of the day. This charge, in various forms of statement, but with an unvarying degree of vehemence, will be made as it has been made, by the campaign orators and newspapers of the Conservative opposition. Strong terms will be used, as strong terms have been used, to describe the conduct of the Liberal party, and the Liberal government in respect to this matter. 'Perfidy' and 'turpitude,' if I mistake not, were among the elegant expressions made use of in this House in a recent debate, by an hon. and distinguished gentleman, who, a short time ago, was lecturing the press of the country upon the duty of moderation, and 'sweet reasonableness,' in their discussion of public questions and in their comments upon the character and conduct of public men. I certainly do not wish to express anything but sincere admiration for the excellent advice that was given upon the occasion to which I refer; but, I think it would be a still more admirable thing, if somewhat of the angelic temper, the cultivation of which was so earnestly commended by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) to the gentlemen of the press, were occasionally imported into the hon. member's own discussions of public questions and public men. But, better still that the moderation and graciousness of spirit that were so eloquently commended in the Toronto speech of that hon. gentleman, would be a reasonably fair adherence to the facts of the case in stating the position and proceedings of his political opponents.

The charge against the present government, so far as it relates to this question, is in substance that they promised the country free trade, and have, on the contrary, adhered to the fiscal policy of their predecessors.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite, say, 'Hear, hear.' It shows there can be no difference between us on that point. Now, Sir, I absolutely and emphatically deny both branches of the charge and, I propose in a few sentences, to dispose of it, as I think I shall be able to do very briefly, once for all. The policy with which the leader of the government went to the country, was not presented to the electorate of Canada, during the election campaign of 1896, by any responsible member of the Liberal party, as a policy of fiscal revolution. The records of the campaign will speak for themselves, and I propose to produce and present those records in such a way as to satisfy any reasonable listener, that the policy outlined by the leaders of the Liberal party, during the campaign, was precisely the policy that they carried into effect when they secured the reins of power in their hands.

Mr. MACLEAN. How about the Cobden medal?

Mr. RUSSELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), asks a question which it is not important that I should answer. I know nothing about it, and it has nothing to do with the subject I am discussing. The present leader of the government addressed a large and important meeting of electors in the city of Montreal, towards the end of December, 1895, when the campaign was in full progress. Speaking of the tariff in force at that time, he said, using words which have since been fulfilled to the letter, by his Minister of Finance, 'We must have a decrease and a reform in that tariff.' Now, Sir, the tariff has been reformed, and the duties have been decreased in exact and literal fulfilment of the promise then made on behalf of the Liberal party.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) say if the pledge given by the Premier in the city of Montreal previous to the elections, that coal and iron should be free, has been redeemed?

Mr. TAYLOR. And the Minister of Finance said the same.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), show where the Minister of Finance said that?

Mr. TAYLOR. At the same meeting.

Mr. MILLS. And he said the same, at Annapolis, about cotton and coal oil.

Mr. RUSSELL. But, as if to guard against any possible misunderstanding of the fiscal policy, which he would pursue if entrusted with power in this country, Mr. Laurier proceeded to say to his Montreal audience:

You are told that the policy of the Liberal party is free trade as they have it in England. . . . Much as I admire England, however, I am bound to say that it is not possible for us under the present condition of things to have free trade at the present time as they have it in England. Free trade must come gradually in Canada. It must come after thirty or forty years, perhaps more, as my friend, Mr. Ross, has stated.

These were the words in which the hon. leader of the government, then Mr. Laurier, expounded the trade policy, with which the Liberal party went before the electors of this country, in 1896. But, this was not the only pronouncement that was made upon the question. Everybody knows that Sir Oliver Mowat joined forces with Mr. Laurier in the federal arena, in March, 1896. In so doing, he published a letter containing a clear and comprehensive statement of the terms on which he accepted the alliance with the federal leader, and was prepared to join forces with him in the federal campaign. His letter might well stand as a declaration of the policy of the Liberal party on the various subjects with which it dealt. It was, in fact, such a declaration, and was accepted as such by the Liberal party, throughout the Dominion and by the Conservative party as well. What did he say with respect to the tariff? I use his own words:

We are, I believe, at one with respect to the tariff. I think with you that the introduction of the protective system was a mistake on the part of our people, so you, like myself, are a Reformer and not a revolutionist, and you recognize the necessity of legislation on the tariff being gradual and cautious. Adopting that policy, I am glad that you see your way in the meantime to changes which would be a relief to our farmers, and at the same time will not injuriously affect, but rather benefit manufacturers and their workmen. A government owes a duty to all classes of the people. I quite see that one difficulty in legislation on the subject is the fact that considerable capital has been invested in manufactures on the faith that a system which our people have unfortunately sanctioned for eighteen years, would not be abrogated hastily or without due regard to the interests which have arisen under that system. I quite see also that the difficulty of legislation is greatly enhanced by the enormous debt which the present government has created during the last eighteen years and the large revenue which is needed for the payment of the annual charges incidental to the debt.

Now, Sir, I submit, without any misgiving whatever, that if any historian were desiring to write the fiscal history of this country under the administration of my right hon. friend, the leader of the government, and were searching for suitable terms in which to describe the actual proceedings of the government, with respect to the tariff, he could not possibly find more appropriate and truthful terms in which to describe that which has actually taken place, than the very terms which were used before the election by these two eminent leaders of the Liberal party, to define the policy which they intended to carry out, if the power should be given to them, as it was happily given to them by the people of this country, to frame a tariff policy for the Dominion. They did not promise free trade as it was in England. The right hon. gentleman who leads the government, distinctly told his hearers and the electors of this country, that free trade as there understood, might not be feasible in this country for many years to come. They did not promise to revolutionize the tariff—they distinctly and emphatically repudiated such an idea. They did promise to reform the tariff, and they did promise to decrease the duties, and both these promises have been observed and fulfilled to the letter.

I could continue to quote from the speeches and writings of prominent and representative Liberals during the whole period of the campaign and in all parts of the country to the same effect as the passages I have read from the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Oliver Mowat. They would only serve to corroborate my statement that while the Liberal party deplored the introduction of the protective system and adhered to the principles of free trade, as set forth in the platform of the Liberal party in 1893, they did not propose to revolutionize the fiscal policy to which the country has been so many years committed, or to pursue the ideal of sound political economy without regard to the practical necessities created by the long-continued prevalence of an unsound system.

I will not detain the House with any unnecessary amplification of the evidence on this point, but will proceed without further delay to refer to the manner in which the government did actually redeem the promises they had made to the electors in respect to this subject. And here again it will be necessary to dwell somewhat particularly upon the condition of things which confronted the government on their accession to power in 1896. I have no doubt that what everybody anticipated at that time, certainly what I myself anticipated, was a reduction of the tariff on a uniform scale, or, to speak more exactly, a reduction that would be applicable in the same degree to importations from all parts of the world. I never dreamed of anything else, although I must confess that I had my own misgivings as to the acceptance which any proposal would meet with in this country at that date, which, however economically beneficial it might be to ourselves, would run counter to the feelings that had been aroused in this country by the unreasonable and wholly unjustifiable temper and attitude of our republican neighbours. Hon. members will recall the fact that shortly before the election of 1896 the great American republic had been spilling for a war with our own mother country; that a perfect hurricane of insane passion had swept over the land; that every newspaper in the union, with a very few notable exceptions, had fallen into line behind President Cleveland and Secretary Olney; that even the religious papers clamoured for war, and some of them clamoured more fiercely and more unrighteously than their secular contemporaries; that the Senate of the United States:

That Senate guerdon of the few

Where Clay once flashed and Webster's clouded brow

Brooded those bolts that all the horizon knew.

The Senate and the House of Representatives were practically unanimous in the determination to break the peace of the world with a war which would have been the most cruel and wanton and disastrous in the whole melancholy history of human strife and wickedness. Had this war broken out, which practically the whole effective public opinion of the United States seemed to favour, the people of Canada would have been the first to have been involved and the ones to suffer the most. But the people of Canada, in this crisis, stood ready to resist the threatened aggression of their neighbours with the same unfaltering fortitude with which they now stand by the side of their fellow-colonists in resisting aggression on the other side of the world, and not only resisting aggression but carrying the war into Africa. Happily in this case the conflict was averted by wise and sane diplomacy on the part of our own country, and by a happy return of the good sense and good feeling to our republican neighbours. But the remembrance of an event such as this does not easily pass out of the human mind. It has happily been effaced to a very considerable degree by events of more recent occurrence, and the time may come, as I confidently believe it will, when we will be only too happy to forget it altogether, but the event had not passed out of the minds of the people of Canada at the time of the general elections in 1896, nor had it been forgotten before our friends on the other side of the boundary passed their new tariff measure, innocently entitled 'a Bill to provide a revenue for the government and to encourage the industries of the United States; but which was interpreted by many people in this country, I would like to think incorrectly so interpreted, as being specially directed against the interests of the Dominion. This measure was reported from the Ways and Means Committee to the House of Representatives on the 15th day of March, 1897, and reached its final stage in the Senate on April 1st, 1897. The tariff Bill by which our own fiscal policy was settled, was not introduced in this House until the 22nd day of the same month, or, by a remarkable coincidence, I believe, the resolution was actually introduced on the morning of St. George's Day, April 23rd, 1897—a most appropriate day for such a significant act to be performed by this parliament.

Now, I admit at once that the feelings aroused in Canada by the unreasonable hostility of the United States to the mother country and the unfriendly tariff legislation effected by the Dingley Bill, together with other unfriendly proceedings without number which seemed to have been taken for the express purpose of annoying and exasperating the people of this country, would not afford any logical justification for a refusal to adjust our own tariff in the manner best suited to our own material welfare, even although such a readjustment might involve concessions which would seem to be favourable to the trade of the United States. All this is perfectly true and logical, but there are forces in human nature which are stronger than the force of logic. I have no doubt it is good Christian doctrine when you are smitten on the one cheek to turn the other cheek to the smiter, but nations have not yet in their intercourse with one another attained to this height of altruism. Of this, at all events, I am perfectly convinced, that in the summer of 1897 any policy that would have held out any tariff reductions in favour of the people of the United States beyond what were imperatively called for in the interest of the people of Canada, would have been summarily condemned by the voice of the people of this country. The government was then in this position—they were pledged to effect a considerable reduction in the tariff charges levied upon the people. Our importations were chiefly from the United States, and, therefore, any tariff reduction effected on uniform lines must have caused a larger remission of duties upon goods coming into this country from the United States than it would have upon goods coming from England. For the first ten years, or thereabouts, of confederation, the importations from Great Britain largely exceeded those from the United States, beginning in the first year of confederation with 58 per cent from England against only 36 per cent from the United States, the balance being from the rest of the world. Gradually the relations changed, until Great Britain and the United States stood upon an equality in 1876. Then followed a period of fluctuating fortunes for a series of years until 1882, the last year in which Great Britain had the advantage over the United States, from which time forward the relative amount, as well as the absolute volume of our importations from the United States gradually increased, until 1896, when we were importing twice as much from them as we were from Great Britain. Manifestly as I have said, any very considerable reduction of duties, if uniformly made, must have been open to a very plausible, however fallacious, contention that its effect was to confer a benefit upon the United States. Now, the people of Canada had at that time no desire to confer any benefits upon the United States. They were not conscious of any wish to retaliate upon them. Such a course would have been futile and foolish. But there was in the public mind of Canada a very distinct and positive unwillingness to do them any service beyond what it was absolutely impossible to avoid doing them in the effort to do the best thing possible for ourselves.

On the other hand, there were the strongest possible motives, both of sentiment and self-interest which impelled us to seek for a closer commercial connection with the mother country. The days were gone by when the leading organ of a great party reflecting, as was generally assumed, the feeling of a great party leader, could reply to a criticism of his tariff policy as involving a danger to our British connection by saying, 'then so much *the worse for British connection'; or when a leading member of a great political party—

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) point out the authority on which he bases his assertion that that was a statement made by Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not say that it was a statement made by him.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, made by the leader of a government.

Mr. RUSSELL. I said no such thing. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) did not hear me correctly. I said it was a statement which was made in a leading organ of public opinion of this country which was supposed to reflect the views of the leader of the government.

Mr. McNEILL. It was repudiated by Sir John A. Macdonald on the floor of this House. That was written by Farrer.

Mr. RUSSELL. It was repudiated many years after. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) say that a minister of the Crown in this country did not make a greatly similar statement when he taunted the mother country with having been driven out of the markets of the civilized world and obliged to force her wares upon savages at the point of the bayonet. If any such statement as that was made by a responsible minister of the Crown in Canada, the time had gone by when such a statement could be repeated.

Mr. GIBSON. Who made that statement?

Mr. RUSSELL. It was made by a Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in the late government. Sir, the time had also gone by in the old country when the leader of a great political party could refer to the colonies as Lord Beaconsfield once spoke of them, as 'a millstone about the neck of the mother country.' The genuineness of the sense of kinship between the people of Canada and those of the motherland, had been demonstrated by the events of 1895 and its force had been intensified beyond all conception by the presence of a common danger and the prospect of a possible community of suffering and loss. The time had become specially opportune for giving practical expression to the feelings of loyalty and devotion to the Crown and government of England, which had always animated the people of Canada of all political shades, but which, I am sorry to say, the Conservative party had sought on more than one occasion, as they have been attempting within the past few months, to take under their exclusive patronage and protection. It is surely a most striking commentary, and, to our friends on the other side of the House, it should be a most humiliating commentary on the assumptions of superior loyalty in which they have always indulged, that while they had been for years and years mouthing their loyalty and palavering over the question of preferential trade, it remained for a Liberal government to take the first effective step towards the commercial unification of the empire, and by the spirit in which that movement was conceived, by the manner in which it was executed, and if I may say so, by the magnetic personality of the man by whom it was announced to the British public, to accomplish at a single stroke a change in the relations of Canada to the motherland, which at once attracted the attention of the whole world and gave to us a position such as this country never before commanded, either in the councils of the empire, or in the estimation of enlightened public opinion throughout the world. Speaking as a Nova Scotian, it was a great happiness to me to hear the Prime Minister at Halifax attributing a leading share of the credit of this epoch-making movement to my life-long friend and brilliant fellow-countryman, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). We have had empire-builders in other portions of the British dominions who have gone about their work on different lines and by methods which have yet to be tested, which, perhaps, I should say are this very day being tested as by fire, by the agony and bloodshed of disastrous and desolating wars. I think we may be allowed to congratulate ourselves that in this part of the world, in our more peaceful and happy quarter of the globe we are permitted to pursue other and happier methods of consolidating the power of England.

Peace hath her victories,
No less renowned than war.

And it will be a bright page in Canadian history that will record the achievements of an administration by which through pacific and conciliatory methods two great sections of our people whose relations had been strained to the breaking point were drawn together for the common good of their common country and then signalized their union by an act which has done more than any one single step that ever was taken in this country to draw together the motherland and her greatest colonial dependency.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I was about saying, when the House rose at six o'clock, that the problem of the commercial unification of the empire was not a new one. It had been wrestled with by previous governments, and written about and talked about for years by the hon. members on the other side of the House. It was open to the government to pursue the methods so long and so fruitlessly employed by the hon. leader of the opposition, the huckstering methods which Mr. Fitzpatrick, the historian of the South African troubles, from whose volume the right hon. leader of the government read an evening or two ago, finds to be the distinguishing characteristic of the diplomacy of Mr. Kruger. The government might have wasted valuable time in still continuing to pursue the Howard Vincent will-o'-the-wisp into the bogs and swamps in which the leader of the opposition lost himself. They might have taken up the impracticable and illusory schemes and theories of preferential trade, embodied in the resolutions of the Ottawa conference. Had they pursued this course there can be no doubt that their efforts would have met with the same results. The day may come when the people of England will be ready to reverse the fiscal policy that has made them great and prosperous beyond greatness and prosperity of any other people on the face of the habitable globe, which has enabled the forty millions in two small islands that seem hardly more than a speck upon the map, to control the markets of the world, and dominate so great a part of the earth's habitable surface. That time has not yet come, and there is no appearance, whatever, that it is anywhere on the way. The answer to such a proposal, had we wasted time with the renewal of it, would undoubtedly have been the same for our government as it was when the Marquis of Ripon, writing to the Colonial Governors in June, 1895, with reference to the trade proposals of the Ottawa conference of 1894, after subjecting them to a thorough and statesmanlike investigation, and surveying the whole question, said :

A consideration of these practical difficulties and of the more immediate results above indicated, of a system of mutual tariff discrimination, has convinced Her Majesty's government that even if its consequences were confined to the limits of the empire, and even if it were not followed by changes of fiscal policy on the part of foreign powers unfavourable to this country, its general economic results would not be beneficial to the empire.

That this conclusive and emphatic despatch of the Marquis of Ripon represented the mature and final opinion on both sides of politics in the mother country as to all preferential tariff proposals of kindred nature to that of the leader of the opposition, there can be no manner of doubt ; and there would be no doubt whatever, had it not been for some occurrences of a later date from which it has been sought to be established, that there were overtures, not from the British government, but from leading public men in Britain, looking towards a tariff arrangement, involving discrimination by the mother country in favour of the products of Canada. It has been said, for instance, that Mr. Chamberlain was favourable to a scheme for the commercial consolidation of the empire on the basis of mutual discriminatory tariffs, as proposed by the leader of the opposition, and further, that an offer of this kind was made to the Premier in England, by the Duke of Devonshire, on the occasion of the celebration of the Queen's diamond jubilee.

The grounds upon which this myth reposes, so far as it relates to Mr. Chamberlain I have never been able to discover. I have listened, with a great deal of attention, and a very large degree of sympathy, to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), on this subject, and have waited earnestly, as one who watched for the morning, to hear something read from the speeches of the Colonial Secretary, that would hold out a ray of hope for some feasible scheme for the preferential entry of our products into the Imperial market. He tells me I will find it in Mr. Chamberlain's speech of March 25, 1896, at the meeting of the Canada Club. Well, I have searched for it there, searched for it diligently, but searched in vain. So far from finding any toleration in that speech of the proposal to put a tax on the food and raw materials going into the English market from this country in return for any concession that had thus far been suggested by any of the advocates of preferential trade, in this country, I find Mr. Chamberlain, referring to the proposal to place a discriminatory duty against the products of foreign countries going into Great Britain, using such words as these :

Whatever may be the result of imposing such a duty as to which, if I had time, I could discourse for many minutes, whatever may be the actual result, the tendency is to increase the cost of living, which would intensify the pressure upon the working classes of this country, and it would also have a tendency to increase the cost of production, which would put us, of course, in a worse position than now in competition with foreign countries in neutral markets.

It seems that, while Mr. Chamberlain was delivering these words to the Canada Club, he was interrupted, and in answer to the interruption, he said :

I see no use in shutting my eyes to the consequences of this proposition.

I can find no support in this speech of Mr. Chamberlain before the Canada Club for any preferential trade proposal such as the hon. member for North Bruce and the hon. leader of the opposition have advocated, and I can only wonder at the amount of misdirected ingenuity which these two hon. gentlemen have more than once employed in this House in the effort to pump into Mr. Chamberlain's speech a meaning that really is not there, and can, by no fair method of exegesis be extracted from it.

Then I am asked to read his speech on the Commercial Union of the Empire before the Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire in London, in June, 1896. Be it so. We find him dealing there expressly with the proposal which found expression at the great conference at Ottawa in 1894.

'It is the very reverse,' he says, 'in spirit, at any rate, of the proposal I have just been considering, for whereas the first proposal requires that the colonies should abandon their system in favour of ours, this proposal requires that we should abandon our system in favour of theirs, and it is in effect that while the colonies should be left absolutely free to impose what protective duties they please, both on foreign countries and upon British commerce, they should be required to make a small diminution in favour of British trade, in return for which we are expected to change our whole fiscal system and impose duties on food and raw material. Well, I express again my own opinion when I say that there is not the slightest chance that in any reasonable time this country or the parliament of this country would adopt so one-sided an agreement. (Cheers.) The foreign trade of this country is so large and the foreign trade of the colonies is comparatively so small that a small preference given to us upon that foreign trade by the colonies would make so trifling a difference—would be so small a benefit to the total volume of our trade—that I do not believe the working classes of this country would consent to make a revolutionary change for what they would think to be an infinitesimal gain.'

In neither one of these speeches does Mr. Chamberlain give the slightest degree of countenance to any one of the various proposals that have been put forward from this side of the water for a scheme of preferential trade saving as his opinion is summed up in the fourth in number of the four propositions which he lays down to the Canada Club. He said :

My third proposition is that the suggestions which have hitherto been made to us, although we know them to have been made in good part, are, when considered from the point of view of British interests, not sufficiently favourable to be considered by this country.

He has examined them all and condemned them all, and I am convinced that any hon. member who will read those two speeches in a fair and candid spirit, and then read the comments of the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Bruce will be utterly amazed that Mr. Chamberlain's evident meaning by any process of deliberate hair-splitting and special pleading, such as his words have been subjected to by the hon. leader of the opposition, or by any such transcendental method of interpretation as they have undergone at the hands of the amiable mystic from North Bruce, could by any possibility have been so perverted and practically misrepresented as it has been by those two hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Chamberlain presented his own alternative to the proposals that he was unable to adopt, the proposal of a Zollverein :

My fourth proposition is that a true Zollverein for the empire, that a free trade established throughout the empire, although it would involve the imposition of duties against foreign countries, and would be in that respect a derogation from the high principles of free trade, and from the practice of the United Kingdom up to the present time, would still be a proper subject for discussion and might probably lead to a satisfactory arrangement if the colonies on their part were willing to consider it.

This was as far as Mr. Chamberlain in either of these speeches was willing to go. He admits that we could not imitate exactly the German Zollverein because we are not as they are conterminous countries. Moreover, we all of us require revenue and so long as we administer our revenues independently of one another, we are under the necessity of raising a part of it from customs. There must, therefore, be exceptions from the rule of free trade throughout the empire, in the case of articles that are chiefly taxed for revenue, such, for instance, in England as spirits and tobacco. Now, it is out of this infinitesimally small concession that the hon. member for North Bruce and the hon. leader of the opposition build up their case so far as it rests upon any foundation laid by Mr. Chamberlain, but it must be obvious that to carry out Mr. Chamberlain's idea would absolutely reverse everything that has been done in this country for the past twenty years, not to speak of other colonies where they are not even so near the confines of the protectionist wilderness as we are ourselves. Mr. Chamberlain's policy could not be adopted without revolutionizing the tariff of Canada. We have always had a tariff here that afforded incidental protection. We have never had an exclusively revenue tariff. But no duties could be permitted under Mr. Chamberlain's proposal that were not 'strictly revenue duties.' 'Protection must disappear.' The same articles which would yield a strictly revenue duty in one part of the empire, would, obviously, if taxed in another portion, give occasion for the operation of the protective principle. Mr. Chamberlain would not allow that. 'The duties must be revenue duties and not protective duties in the sense of protecting the products of one part of the empire against those of another part.'

Now, for my own part, I do not at all despair of Mr. Chamberlain's proposal. The day may come, as I strongly hope it will, when Mr. Chamberlain's Zollverein will be a feasible proposal and in the meantime it is no bad thing to dream about. In matters like these, as Mr. Chamberlain most wisely and justly said on another occasion, when speaking of the policy of Egyptian statesmen as to the recovery of the Sudan, 'Every nation has two politics, it has a practical and present policy, it has a future and ideal policy.' I have no misgiving in committing myself to the policy of Mr. Chamberlain's Zollverein as a future and ideal policy, a thing altogether outside of the range of practical politics, but an excellent theme for the political dreamer. Even as a day dream, however, Mr. Chamberlain spoke of the Zollverein only for himself. He did not profess to speak for his colleagues. The most that he hoped for was to provoke discussion, and in that he certainly succeeded, as, to do him justice, he generally does succeed. Probably there is no more discussion-provoking speaker in the empire than Mr. Chamberlain, and on this question if it was discussion he was looking for he must have been gratified to his heart's content. It was well for his peace of mind that he valued discussion more than approval, for I doubt if there was one serious and sensible statesman in the country that was prepared to second his proposal.

On the morning after Mr. Chamberlain had made his speech to the Canada Club, the Times contained the following editorial remarks :

If we seriously think of giving advantages to the colonies, such as those mentioned by Mr. Chamberlain, in consideration of their abandonment of protective duties against British goods, we are by no means sure that the masses in this country will be prepared for such an object, to tax foreign foodstuffs and foreign raw materials. The decided opposition of the presidents of the Chambers of Commerce of Liverpool and Manchester to the resolution in favour of an Imperial Zollverein, as well as to the amendment in favour of differential duties hardly bears out Mr. Chamberlain's belief that the ascendancy of free trade orthodoxy has been broken. Until the great centres of trade and industrial activity in this country are decidedly in favour of a change, the existing fiscal policy of the country will undoubtedly be maintained. It is for public opinion to decide a matter which involves very grave questions, both of Imperial security and of commercial development.

This chilling reception of the Zollverein proposal was a bad enough beginning, but further reflection on the subject deepened the outspoken skepticism of the press into positive denial. More than twelve months after this the Manchester Guardian regarded it as 'hardly comprehensible that Mr. Chamberlain should actually have made such an amazing proposal.' His own colleagues are not with him on this question, the Duke of Devonshire threw cold water on the scheme as long ago as last December. Mr. James Lowther, the arch protectionist, declared roundly a few days later that any such notion as free trade within the empire should be relegated to the limbo from which it could never return—and Mr. Chamberlain surely cannot think that any but a small minority of the people of this country would put even a small customs tax upon corn for the sake of such a fantastic and misleading dream as his Zollverein is commonly admitted to be.' The Times was, if possible, still more emphatic. It referred to the Zollverein proposal as 'a scheme which had been already published, discussed and dismissed from the present range of practical politics.' It proceeded to demonstrate for the twentieth time the utter impossibility of the people of England ever consenting to hamper a trade amounting to 525,000,000 pounds sterling for the sake of obtaining a preference on thirty-eight millions, and concluded a thorough and candid review of Mr. Chamberlain's alleged proposal with the following paragraph, which would seem to set at rest for many years the proposal of an Imperial Zollverein between Great Britain and her colonies, with a customs tariff against the rest of the world.

The value of the discussion between Mr. Chamberlain and the Colonial Premiers, out of which it is sought to make capital in Canada, consists not in the formulation of any at present impracticable scheme, but in clearing the ground of other futile proposals which have been too long allowed to confuse the public mind. The action of Canada has done much, and the conference of Colonial Premiers has done more, to dispose finally of the misconception that any preference which could be offered to this country upon colonial foreign trade should render it for one moment worth our while to entertain proposals for the imposition of corresponding duties on our side.

So far then as Mr. Chamberlain is concerned, this is our position. He has himself emphatically condemned every proposal for preferential trade propounded by the hon. member for North Bruce and the hon. leader of the opposition, and his own alternative proposal of a Zollverein, which neither of those hon. members would be willing to touch with a ten-foot pole, has been dismissed by the public opinion of England as a 'fantastic and misleading dream.'

As to the statement that the Duke of Devonshire actually offered a preferential arrangement to the Prime Minister on the occasion of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee in London, this was so utterly improbable in advance that it must have seemed incredible at the time to anybody who knew the sentiments of the Duke of Devonshire and knew moreover how sagacious and sensible a statesman he had always been. To this contention, the coup de grace was given last session by the correspondence read in this House by the Postmaster General. I will take the liberty of reading this once more, familiar though it may be to hon. members, for the purpose of disposing once for all of this preposterous and incredible statement:

Privy Council Office,
2nd May, 1899.

My dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 1st April.

The best answer I can give to your inquiries is to inclose you a copy of the report of the speeches made on the various occasions in the summer of 1897, when I had the pleasure of meeting the Colonial Premiers in my capacity as President of the British Empire League.

I do not think that in any of those speeches you will find anything to suggest the view of my opinion on the question of the policy of granting preferential trade to the colonies, which appears to have been held by Sir Charles Tupper and by some of the journals in this country which seek to attribute what they term 'protectionist heresies' to members of the Unionist party.

It was, no doubt, my speech at Liverpool on the 12th June, 1897, which was referred to by Sir Charles Tupper, and my admission that free trade had not done for us all that was once expected, may have been commented on by free traders or opposition journals.

But, while I congratulated Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Dominion of Canada on the offer which had been made to admit British goods at reduced rates, as compared with those on the goods of other nations, as an important step in the direction of Imperial unity, I had no authority to offer, and did not offer, to Canada a preference in British markets.

You are at liberty to make what use you please of this letter.

Believe me, my dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

(Signed.) DEVONSHIRE.

The Hon. Mr. Mulock.

Now, Sir, I do not think it is incumbent upon me to occupy any longer time in justifying the course of the government in abandoning the utterly impracticable and illusory proposals with which their predecessors had been so uselessly and so fruitlessly engaged for many years. For my own part, I must confess that to my mind the proposition that the people of England, or, to speak more accurately, the inhabitants of the British Islands, who have been bearing practically unaided from century to century the whole weight of the Imperial burden, sustaining the cost of the army and navy of the empire, giving the colonies the benefit of their consular service in all parts of the world, protecting our commerce on every sea, and in every clime, and holding themselves ready to defend our very firesides, if necessary, from desecration by any foe from what corner of the world wherever he might come, should be still further called upon to tax their very food, and hamper the commerce which is the life blood in their arteries—cloak and dissemble this proposition, I say, under whatsoever disguise of rhetorical artifice you may, it is nothing else to my mind but the counsel of intense and egregious selfishness. Nobody has ever questioned the desirability of such an arrangement if it could be obtained. To use the strong language of the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, the Canadian who would refuse such a proposition would be an idiot. But it is one thing to be willing to accept such a benefit if offered to us. It is an entirely different thing to demand it from the overburdened taxpayers of the mother country. The government, at all events, were wise in determining that the time had come when it was the plain duty of this country to make some return to the motherland for the many benefits that she had conferred upon us, and to seek to draw closer the ties that united us to our kindred beyond the sea. They did not begin by bargaining and huckstering in the spirit of Paul Kruger and the hon. leader of the opposition. They made an offer from the good-will and loyalty of the people of this country. Had they been influenced by pure selfishness alone, they would have acted none otherwise than as they did, acting from the spirit of loyalty and devotion which animated the breasts of the people of Canada—for they knew the temper of the English people, and realized that with all the intense practicality of the English temperament, there is no people on the face of the earth more easily kindled to a responsive sentiment of kindness and good-will than the mighty races that inhabit the British Isles.

The government determined, and wisely determined, to abandon the bargaining process and act in the spirit of that proverbial wisdom which tells us 'there is that scattereth and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet but it tendeth to poverty.' They made an unconditional and unsolicited concession to the trade of the mother country which was instantly and instinctively hailed by the people of England as one of the greatest events that had ever happened in the history of Greater Britain. I do not surely need to recall the chorus of acclaim with which this movement was greeted by the press of the mother country without exception, or the glowing periods in which the poet who has best expressed the feelings and aspirations of Greater Britain welcomed the loyal and patriotic action of this government. I do not need to recite the glowing verses of Kipling in which he welcomed this movement. If I refer to these evidences of English sentiment at all, it is only to contrast them with the smallness and pettiness of spirit displayed on our own side of the water, and in our own Dominion. While all England was rejoicing over the spirit of affection and loyalty that animated the people of Canada, and welcoming the practical and tangible evidence of their good-will that the action of the government afforded the leader of the opposition and his fidus Achates, if I may be permitted to employ this adjective as applicable to the relations between the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) and the hon. leader of the opposition without an apology to the shade of Achates, were going over the land endeavouring by every possible device to rub off the bloom, to persuade the people of England to look their gift-horse in the mouth and see if by some possible process of discounting our good intentions, they might not discover that our gift was something different from what in good faith we intended it to be and they in equally good faith accepted it as being. First of all, they told the people of England that it was really no preference to them, that it was a concession to all the world, that it was not really a preferential tariff, that it called itself a reciprocal tariff only, that it could not be a preferential tariff because of the existence of certain treaties, the German and Belgian treaties, to wit, which prevented the Dominion from making any trade concession to the mother country without at the same time extending it to Germany and Belgium, and certain other treaties containing the favoured-nation clause, which would prevent the Dominion from extending any concession to Belgium and Germany which was not at the same time extended to every nation having the benefit of the favoured-nation clause. Now, Sir, this is all true in a certain sense. It is one of the most dangerous kinds of lie, because it is true in a certain sense.

For a lie that is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.

Let me examine for a moment the contentions thus put forward.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have told us that the government blundered into the preferential tariff; that they were mistaken, as to the grounds upon which they introduced their policy in 1897; that they were unaware of the effect of these German and Belgian treaties, and of the fact that they could not in the face of these treaties adopt the policy embodied in the reciprocal tariff resolution of that year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. I cannot bring myself to believe that the hon. leader of the opposition, who says 'hear, hear,' could have any faith in the contention he was putting forward. I think he is deceiving himself about that. Does the hon. leader of the opposition believe, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who sits beside him, believe, or, does the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) believe that the government of this country were unaware of what every editor in this Dominion was perfectly aware of, of what every public man was perfectly aware of, and of what almost every school-boy of ten in the country was aware of? The government was fully aware of the existence of these treaties, and of the contention that had been made as to their effect in denuding this parliament of the plenary authority which it had been supposed to possess, subject only to the veto of the Crown, to legislate upon the subject of the tariff. They did hope, and not without reason, that they might be able to drive a coach and six through the treaties by so framing their tariff resolution that while practically confining the operation to the mother country they might in point of law make it not strictly an offer of preferential terms to the mother country, but an offer to reduce the tariff in favour of any country whose tariff should be as favourable to this country as the terms of the re-reciprocal tariff embodied in the resolution. They were well aware of the contention which might be made that even in such a form the strict reading of the letter of these unfortunate treaties might be held to prevent the extension of the preference to the motherland. But they did not, because of this knowledge, fold their arms or abandon the struggle in despair as they had been counselled to do by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Why, Sir, what would have happened had they adopted the views of those hon. gentlemen and abandoned their reciprocal tariff resolution, as those hon. gentlemen argued they ought to do? Would not those treaties still have continued to this hour to bind the hands of parliament, to denude us of legislative authority over our own tariff, to hamper and restrict this House in one of the very primary and fundamental functions of a House of Commons, that of determining where and when and how the incidence of taxation shall fall upon the people within the scope of its authority? The government wisely declined to be advised by those hon. gentlemen. They said, on the contrary, to the hon. leader of the opposition, 'Grant all that you urge as to these unlucky treaties which seem to give you such an infinite amount of happiness, while they are a bewilderment and an eyesore to every patriotic and self-respecting Canadian, we propose to ignore them; we did not make them, and we propose to argue that we are not bound by them. The spirit of these treaties is to oppose a preference. We propose to comply with the spirit of the treaties. We will give no preference. The very nations that plead the treaties can come in under our tariff if they choose. We well know that they will not do so, and that our tariff concession will, therefore, enure to the benefit of the motherland alone, as we intend that it shall do, but that is her merit and her fortune. Germany and Belgium cannot complain if they do not wish to avail themselves of the concession. The letter of the treaties may possibly be read so as to oppose even this method of dealing with the matter. What if it does? Must we sit still for ever and remain bound hand and foot by treaties in the making of which we were not consulted, which nobody seems to be able to account for, and which may have been the sublime achievement of some understrapper or routinist in the foreign or colonial office in the days of ignorance that God winked at? Such a policy may be good enough for the leader of the opposition—it is not good enough for us. We will first argue the question with the home government, and if our legal argument fails, as fail it may, we shall take the bull by the horns and call for the denunciation of the treaties that stand in the way of our carrying out the policy on which we have resolved.'

Mr. RUSSELL.

The question was argued, argued with consummate ingenuity, as every hon. member must recognize who heard the argument of the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) in this House. I could not myself agree in the conclusions for which that hon. gentleman was contending as a matter of legal interpretation, but I do not withhold my admiration for the ingenuity with which his positions were taken and the arguments by which they were supported, and I have said I think more than once in this House that it was the duty of the hon. gentleman to urge as he did everything that could be said in favour of those positions. I repeat what I have said already in this House more than once, that no jot or tittle of the constitutional authority of this parliament, and more particularly no jot or tittle of the authority of this House of Commons, over the taxation of the people of this country should be surrendered without a struggle up to the very last ditch, and I think, Sir, that it was a most ungracious and wholly unnecessary task which my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Borden, Halifax) imposed upon himself when he undertook to argue the cause of our opponents and plead for the further continuance of the enthrallment of the parliament of Canada.

The legal argument based on the literal reading of the treaties I believe prevailed, although I have noticed a statement of the London Times, of a couple of years ago, that the question was never pressed to a conclusion. In a country as scrupulous as England is in the observance of its treaties it was to be expected that in a case of ambiguity, the construction most favourable to its opponents would be the one to be adopted. But what followed? Those treaties which had stood for forty or fifty years, which had been the subject of public complaint in England, for many years, which had been urged by Lord Ripon, among other reasons, why the proposals of the Ottawa conference could not possibly be carried out, which has been formally assailed by the friends of Imperial federation as far back as 1891, which hon. gentlemen opposite have been vainly endeavouring, for many years, to get rid of, but which had been allowed to stand in the way until they were taken in hand by the present government, and would still have continued to stand in the way down to this hour, had the methods of a former administration been pursued—those unlucky and embarrassing treaties were brought to an end in August, 1896 by the action of the British government, on the resolution of the conference of Premiers, based upon the action of the Liberal government of Canada. If there is a man in Canada, or anywhere else, who attributes the denunciation of these treaties to anything else but the action of the government of Canada, he is either to be pitied for his ignorance and simplicity, or else condemned for the violence and blindness of his partisanship, which prevents him from seeing the facts as they are seen and understood by every public man in Great Britain. It was the bold, the patriotic and loyal action of this Chamber, which created the public feeling in England, that made the denunciation of the treaties possible, and, but for that action of this House of Commons in 1897, those treaties would have continued down to this very hour to restrict the powers of the Canadian parliament. I know the effort that has been made by the hon. leader of the opposition to minimize the importance of the action of Canada, as a factor in the matter. I know well, the unworthy quibble by which the hon. gentleman has sought to attribute the denunciation of the treaties to the action of the conference of Premiers, and not to the action of the Canadian government, if it is not unparliamentary to use the expression, and if it is I withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, no ; it does not matter.

Mr. RUSSELL. Well, let us admit that the conference of the Premiers was the occasion ; the action of the Canadian government was, nevertheless, the efficient cause of the whole movement. I do not ask that my word should be taken for this. It is the calm verdict of impartial history that I am presenting to the House. Several months after the event, in the course of a careful historical review of the events of the Jubilee year, the London Times in giving the history of the colonies for 1897, used the following words :

The Dominion parliament met on March 28, and on St. George's Day, April 23, a tariff Bill was introduced, of which the effect was speedily felt throughout the empire. The principal feature of the Bill was that it adopted one tariff as the general tariff of the Dominion and another preferential tariff for those countries which showed a desire to trade with Canada upon terms of reciprocal commercial advantage. Whatever the duties imposed by the general tariff, the duties of the preferential tariff should be reduced in proportion to them for one year by 12½ per cent and after one year, by 25 per cent. As Great Britain and the British colony of New South Wales were at the time of the introduction of the tariff the only communities trading on the required terms with Canada, the tariff Bill became in effect a Bill for the preferential treatment of British trade. The Bill, which was received with enthusiasm in this country, gave rise to a keen discussion as to the power of the colonial government under the existing treaties of Britain with Germany and Belgium to extend to the mother country any commercial advantage which was not given to those countries, and to all others having a claim to the most favoured-nation treatment. Legal authorities in this country were understood to hold the view that the treaties did, as a matter of fact, preclude all British colonies from giving to Great Britain preferential advantage over most-favoured foreign nations, and to that extent constituted an interference with the fiscal freedom of the empire. The theory of the matter was not put to the test of authoritative decision. In recognition of the strong public feeling which existed on the subject, the treaties were denounced in July, and an irksome barrier to the possible commercial union of the empire was thus, on the initiative of Canada, removed.

Sir, I think that these calm and wise words, not of debate and controversy, but, of sober and reflective history, will serve to set at rest two important points upon which both the leader of the opposition, and the Apostle of militant Imperialism, in this House (Mr. McNeill), have spent many hours in the endeavour to mystify and mislead the House and country. They make it clear that the tariff resolution of St. George's Day, 1897, although, in terms reciprocal and open to all the world, was meant in good faith for a preference to the mother country, and would have, in fact, operated as such a preference, but for those unfortunate treaties which were none of our making, and secondly, that the denunciation of those treaties was due to the initiative of the Canadian government and parliament.

When, therefore, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), says that the government merely stumbled into the British preference, he only shows how hopelessly even a well-meaning, high-minded, and truly patriotic man, can be so blinded by the scales of partisanship, as not to actually see the merits of the case. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill), used the following words in this House :

The government became involved, from day to day, in the meshes of the favoured-nation clauses, and lay absolutely helpless until Mr. Chamberlain came to their relief, and pointed out how they could honourably escape by changing their reciprocal tariff into an offer of a preference to the mother country alone.

Surely the hon. gentleman well knew when he was uttering those words, that under the interpretation of German and Belgian treaties, for which he and his friends so strenuously and unpatriotically contended, there could be no preference to the mother country alone. After those treaties ceased to stand in the way, it did not need any advice from Mr. Chamberlain, or from anybody else, to indicate the path. The way was plain. All that the government had to do was what they had desired to do from the first, but had been prevented from doing effectually, by the presence of those unfortunate treaties. When the ground was cleared by the denunciation of the treaties, the government's policy was embodied in the tariff resolution of 1898, under which the preference was absolutely restricted to the mother country and her West Indian colonies.

I propose, now, to inquire into the practical question, what has been the operation of this provision of the tariff? Has it fulfilled the expectations with which it was adopted? Has it led, by its direct effect, to an increase in the importations of this country from Great Britain? And has it still further, by its indirect, but effective operation, by the sentiments it has aroused in the old land, by the interest in Canada, which it has evoked among the people of England, by the advancement of Canada, if I may descend to so commonplace, but eminently practical and important a view of the matter, has it, I say, had the effect of stimulating the importations from this country and promoting the exchange of commodities between England and Canada? It will be shown in this debate that in every one of these respects the policy of the government has succeeded beyond the expectations of its most sanguine advocates—but, before passing to this, I must pause for a moment, to refer to some of the criticisms that have been made by hon. members on the other side of the House.

I suppose that if there is one hon. member in this House, who should be competent by virtue of his special training to advance any criticisms to which this preferential policy was justly subject, it would be the hon. member for West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace), who formerly held the position of Controller of Customs, under the late administration. He has made substantially two criticisms of this preferential tariff; first, that taken as a whole the tariff legislation of the present government, greatly favours the trade of the United States with this country; and, secondly, that the effect of the preferential tariff was nullified to a large degree in advance, by the fact, that before making the reduction of 25 per cent from the general tariff in favour of importations from Great Britain, we first increased the rates of duty on many of the articles to which it would apply, so that the first reduction of twelve and a half per cent, left the duty higher than it was before we touched it at all, and the second reduction left it little, if any lower than it was at the outset. Now, I think the hon. member (Mr. Wallace), will certainly not complain that I have understated the effect of his contentions. Possibly, I may have even overstated them. I have endeavoured to present them fairly, and I shall examine them as fairly and candidly as I have stated them.

First then as to the argument that we have by our general tariff legislation given 'an enormous preference' to the United States. I am using the very words which were used by the hon. member for West York in presenting this contention. Well, Sir, to begin with, I think this contention must have given a fearful shock to the nerves of the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance. What have they been telling the people of Canada on every hustings? Have they not been calling upon the electors of Canada to hurl the Liberal government from place and the Liberal party from power because they have not reduced the tariff as they promised to do, because they have practically left it where it stood when they assumed the reins of power? Has not the hon. leader of the opposition with a voice of thunder proclaimed to the country that the burdens of the people have been left just as they stood when his government left office, and has not the ex-Minister of Finance relaxed his severity to the extent of a smile and a joke as he called upon the old-time Liberal to behold the manner in which his leaders had trifled with their promise that they would reduce the tariff, and in so doing lighten the taxation of the people of Canada? How can these hon. gentlemen any longer contend that the duties have not been materially reduced, when the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) demonstrates to his own satisfaction—and I suppose to theirs as well, for they heartily applauded his argument, and have never yet dissented from his conclusion—that the reductions made by the government amount to 'an enormous preference' to the United States? How can it be possible that an enormous preference to the United States or any other nation can be brought about by a tariff reform that leaves the tariff substantially as high as it was before? I leave those hon. members to reconcile their conflicting contentions as best they may.

I agree for my own part with so much of the statement of the hon. member for West York as involves the admission that the tariff has been reduced, not to a degree that can properly be called enormous but to a degree that has very materially lightened the burdens upon the consumers of articles imported from the United States. But how, I would ask, in the name of common-sense does that reduction give any preference to the United States as against Great Britain? The hon. gentleman's argument proceeds upon the assumption that we do not and did not import from Great Britain any appreciable quantity of the commodities to which the reductions apply which constitute the enormous preference of which he complains. Well, Sir, if Britain never did and does not now compete with the United States in supplying us with those articles, how, I ask again, can she be prejudiced in any way by the fact that we have reduced the duties on those articles coming into this country? If we had imported any of them from Great Britain, and in so far as we did and still do import them from Great Britain, whatever reductions in the tariff we made for the United States we made the same reduction for Great Britain as well; and we did still more, for we said that the British exporter should not only have the same reduction that was accorded to the United States.

but should have still further the benefit of the preferential reduction of 25 per cent. I repeat, then, if Great Britain never was a competitor with the United States in these commodities, 'cedit quaestio.' If she was or could by any possibility be a competitor, then she will compete in the future, and under the operation of the preferential tariff at an enormous advantage over the United States as compared with the position in which she stood under the legislation of the Conservative government.

As to the second contention to which I have referred, I venture to suggest that it is founded upon a palpable fallacy. The hon. gentleman enumerated a variety of articles, linen goods principally, such as handkerchiefs, towels, napkins, and he even came down to braids, cords, fringes and tassels, upon which the general tariff has been increased from 25 or 30 to 30 or 35 per cent. These are articles, he says, which we import chiefly, if not exclusively, from Great Britain, and the tariff upon them was raised before the preferential rate was applied.

Now, what does this contention amount to? If the United States could not compete with England in regard to these articles under a general tariff averaging 25 or 30 per cent, would they be any better able to compete even if the tariff had simply been raised to an average of 30 or 35 per cent? The answer is obvious. The general increase in the tariff could give no advantage to the United States. It must have left them just where they were before, at the very worst, although I do not even admit that it would have that effect. But certainly the increase of the general tariff, coupled with the preferential reduction in favour of Great Britain, must operate to the yet greater advantage of the old country on those lines on which, even without that advantage, she was able to drive the United States from the Canadian market. In other words, if as the hon. member is obliged to concede—for it is the very basis of his own argument—the United States have not been able to compete with England in these lines of goods, under the Conservative tariff which obliged them to compete on even terms with Great Britain, they must surely be still more heavily handicapped in their competition with the mother country under a tariff which obliges them to overcome the obstacle of a customs impost, 33½ per cent higher than that levied on the goods of the British competitor.

Coming now to the actual operation of the preferential tariff, the statistics of the question make the matter so clear that a very few moments will suffice to tell the story. We will take the period of ten years, beginning with 1890, and contrast the last two years during which the preferential tariff has been in force with the first eight years during which there was no preference. These eight years, I ought to say, include the fiscal year in which the preferential tariff was adopted. There were only two months of that year during which the tariff was in operation, and we may therefore without substantial error consider the whole year as coming within the first division of the period that I have selected. Now, during those eight years when there was no preferential tariff, the United States in the matter of dutiable goods held their own in our markets. In respect of our total imports from the United States, they more than held their own, having increased their exportations to us from fifty-two millions in 1890 to sixty-one millions in 1897. How was it with our importations from Great Britain? Our total importations from Great Britain had fallen off from over forty-three million dollars in 1890, to less than thirty million dollars in 1897. What happened then? The preferential tariff came into force, and our importation of dutiable goods from Great Britain, which was less than twenty and a quarter millions of dollars in 1897, became twenty-two and a half millions in 1898, while the first instalment of the preferential tariff was in force, and twenty-seven and a half million dollars for 1899 under the full operation of the preferential tariff as it stands to-day. The increase of 1898 over 1897 was thus 11½ per cent, and of 1898 over the next previous year just double that ratio, or 22 per cent. During the past year, the latest for which the full returns are available, the increase in the importation of dutiable goods from the United States was only 17 per cent, against 22 per cent increase in the importation of dutiable goods from Great Britain. I do not know what better evidence than this could be desired of the tendency and operation of the preferential tariff, or what better answer than this could be given to the contention of the hon. member for West York that the effect of the government's policy has been to give 'an enormous preference' to the United States, and his suggestion—for it was rather this than a square and explicit statement—that it has given a check to the importation of goods from the old country? Not only has it operated relatively against importations from the United States, which had been holding their own for the series of years I have taken, not only has it arrested the decline of importations from Great Britain, but it has turned that declension into an increase, and has mightily promoted the trade between the colony and the mother country.

I regret that I have not been able in fewer words to present this theme for the consideration of the House. I consider it one of the most important that has been or could be brought to the attention of the House. The adoption of the preferential tariff apart altogether from its incalculable effects upon the material interests of the Dominion, has been attended with momentous consequences in the evolution of British policy. It is an event not in the history of Canada alone, but in the history of Greater Britain, an act, and by no means the least important in the mighty drama which begins when a small band of sea rovers from the shores of the North Sea strike their keels upon the little gravel-spit of Ebbsfleet in the beginning of our island story to lay the foundations of an empire whose continued growth and permanent security furnish as yet the world's best hope of enduring peace and expanding civilization. I therefore ask the House to come to a resolution :

That this House regards the principles of British preference in the Canadian customs tariff as one which in its application has already resulted, and will, in an increasing measure, continue to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and which has already aided in welding, and must still more firmly weld together the ties which now bind them, and desires to express its emphatic approval of such British preference having been granted by the parliament of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that the House has listened with deep interest to the very interesting essay which has been read to us to-night by the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I regret to say that the fallacies contained in the statements made by the hon. gentleman are hardly to be excused in one who did not choose to adopt the usual mode of addressing this House, but the more professorial one of reading his lecture, as he is accustomed to do in the law school at Halifax. I may say that I listened with a good deal of surprise to the statements made by the hon. gentleman. There was a celebrated statesman in the United States of America, who, on account of his not being of very great stature and being, like the hon. the junior member for Halifax, a very great logician, became known as the little giant; and I must say that the little giant in the United States of America never exhibited greater audacity than did the junior member for Halifax when he undertook to tell this House and country that this government had redeemed its pledges. A more astounding statement could not have fallen from the lips of any hon. gentleman in this House. It would be bad enough in the backwoods on a platform for the hon. gentleman to venture on a statement of that kind, but in the face of this House, in the face of hon. gentlemen on both sides, to have made such an allegation, displayed more temerity and audacity than wisdom.

The hon. gentleman denied in toto that the Liberal party went to the country pledged to free trade. That was the first statement he ventured to make. Does the hon. gentleman ignore the platform of 1893? Does he forget that the Liberal party of this Dominion held a convention in the city of

Mr. RUSSELL.

Ottawa, representing every province and every section of the country, and there solemnly formulated a policy and platform? They had been floating about for years on a variety of extraordinary and antagonistic platforms; they declared themselves one day out and out free traders, and then went to a general election and asked the people to adopt the highest protective tariff in the world, that of the United States. The leaders of the Liberal party all over the country urged upon the people to adopt the tariff of the United States and apply it to the mother country, thus proposing to tax and discriminate against the mother country in favour of the United States. After that election was over, the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government, declared that he was ready to consecrate the rest of his life to secure the adoption of that policy as the only salvation for Canada. But the patriotic and loyal people of this country, Conservatives and Liberals, would have none of it; the greatest man the Liberal party ever had in its ranks, the Hon. Edward Blake, denounced it as one which would lead not only to commercial subjugation to the United States, but to the destruction of British institutions in this country, and under these circumstances the hon. gentleman knows that the Liberal party found it necessary to reconsider their position and abandon that disloyal policy. What, then, did they do? They assembled in Ottawa and devised a new programme. They declared they had now come to the conclusion to formulate a policy upon which the Liberal party would take a stand before the people. That was as late as 1893. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that platform? Does he mean to tell me that he or any other man on that side, with that policy on the records of the country would dare to say to the people of this country that the government have been true to the principles they then propounded and the policy they then laid down? The hon. gentleman at that time was not the leader of the Liberal party in the maritime provinces. There was a gentleman who was recognized at the time as occupying that position. That gentleman took a prominent part in the convention, and when it closed he went down to the maritime provinces to give the ultimate result of all the various policies they had been engaged in concocting and devising as a means of securing power in this country, and to declare the policy that they had actually decided to stand or fall by. I refer to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies). Whatever is the position to-day, nobody will doubt or question my statement that he was then the recognized leader of the party in the maritime provinces. After the convention had risen he went down to the maritime provinces, and, at a meeting in Annapolis, N.S., he announced the Liberal policy. He said :

Well, gentlemen, I need say no more. Whatever doubts or difficulties there might have been about our trade policy in times past—

That was his way of burying that unrestricted free trade which so nearly buried him.

Whatever doubts or difficulties there may have been about our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. To-day the people stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be won between free trade and protection.

Does the hon. gentleman deny that to be an exposition, not only by one man but by the whole party assembled, of the policy that they were prepared to stand or fall by? I ask the hon. gentleman if that was not the policy they went to the country with in 1896? When and where was that revoked? When and where were the people of this country told that the platform adopted in 1893 had ceased to be the platform of the party? I dare say the hon. gentleman has heard of the traveller in the Rocky Mountains, who wished to see the scenery through which the train was passing, got out upon the platform. The conductor came and said: 'You cannot stand here; you must go into the car.' Said the traveller: 'I want to see the scenery.' 'I cannot help it,' said the conductor. 'You cannot stand here.' 'Is not this platform made to stand on?' 'No,' was the reply, 'this platform is not made to stand on, it is made to get in on.' That appears to be the sort of platform hon. gentlemen have had. They have never had a platform to stand on, but they had a platform to get in on, and they have changed it day by day as the necessities of the party seemed to require.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. At any rate, it was a little fresher than that story.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) says that that is a stale story. I have no doubt that it is one to which he listens with great pain, because he knows the application is so perfect that it would bear to be told a thousand times, as long as the Liberal party can find a man with the audacity to tell this House and this country that they have fulfilled the pledges they made to the people. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) went further and said:

A 17½ or 20 per cent tariff was high enough to give protection to the manufacturer. If it were not, the manufacturer should go down.

Will the hon. gentleman tell me that, with that as the platform agreed upon by the whole Liberal party in 1893, any casual word uttered in the city of Montreal a short time before the election of 1896 would in any way modify it? But why would not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell), when he was giving the speech of so distinguished a man as the Prime Minister of Canada, repeat what he did say? Why did he garble the statement of policy?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is there any violation of order in that, Mr. Speaker? I do not say that he deliberately garbled; it may have been for want of time. I say that any man—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Any man who reads a part of what is said and not the whole of that which bears directly on the question, garbles what he reads. It may not be intentional—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I submit for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, the question whether the word 'garble,' as applied to an hon. member is parliamentary. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) will withdraw it; he knows it is not parliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would be well advised to withdraw that expression.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should be sorry, Mr. Speaker, to lose time in discussing that question; and if you hold that it was not garbled, I shall say you will hold what no member on either side of the House will hold after I read the statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are told—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Withdraw.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I quite bow to your decision, and I will leave the House to judge whether I made an inaccurate statement, though it may have been unparliamentary. Now, what did the hon. Prime Minister say on the 22nd January, 1896, shortly before the last election:

We are told that we must not destroy the manufactures of Montreal. I say that we are not going to destroy the industries of Montreal. I contend, on the contrary, that the application of the ideas that we defend will inaugurate an era of prosperity such as Montreal has not known since the inauguration of the national policy. The present system raises a maximum of taxation, not only on the consumer, but also on the producer. They have a tax on iron, which is a raw material of every industry. The tax on coal, which is also a raw material of every industry, is 60 cents a ton. Although I have not the latest quotations of coal, I am sure that this tax is equivalent to 40 per cent. Now, I am asked, What are you going to do? I have just told you what we are going to do. We are going to have a tariff for revenue, and we are going to abolish completely the duties on raw material.

There was as solemn a pledge as a man could give. No person is more delighted than I am that the right hon. gentleman did not carry out his policy. The country had a great escape when he abandoned the policy he had announced. But I say that no man ever stated in stronger, clearer, more emphatic terms what his policy was going to be. I ask him, are the taxes on iron removed? Are the taxes on coal removed? The hon. gentleman knows that the statement made shortly before the election, made in confirmation and in accordance with the statements in the platform adopted in 1893, were violated, were abandoned. And yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) dared tell this House that they had redeemed this policy, that they have carried out the policy with which they went to the people of this country.

I am not going into a very lengthy disquisition on that subject, because the story is a very old one. It has been discussed a very great deal in this House, discussed by gentlemen infinitely better able to discuss it than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) who has just taken his seat—and I think the hon. gentleman himself will admit it. My colleague the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), in the presence of this House, last session, examined all these reductions of every kind, examined them critically and in a masterly manner that challenged contradiction, and proved that the total reduction of the tariff of this country was 71-100 of one per cent. What does the hon. gentleman think of that? I illustrated this when I was out west, and found myself surrounded by a great many sporting men, although I do not know much of that kind of thing myself. I said: What would you think, suppose Sir Wilfrid Laurier and I were to have a horse race, that you were assembled on the grand stand to witness the race, that it was to be a race between the national policy horse and the free trade horse, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, decked out in his jockey colours, all ready for the race, and your humble servant, although not quite so light a weight, was prepared to mount the national policy steed. I went to the stable, where I had expected to find my horse groomed, led out and ready for me to mount, but, instead, I found that the stall was empty. I came out, a little excited, although I am not usually very easily excited, as you know, Mr. Speaker, to find out what had become of the horse, and, to my astonishment, I found my friend, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, mounted upon my horse, ready for the race. I said: My dear Sir Wilfrid, what does all this mean? There is a terrible mistake here. You have my horse. That is not the old broken-kneed, spavined, ringboned, broken-winded free trade horse, that threw you and your party in 1887. It is not your horse at all; you have my horse. Not at all, he said, it is my horse. Your horse? How dare you say it is your horse? Well said he, I admit frankly, that this horse's head and neck, chest, legs and body are very much like your horse, but if you will put a tape over this horse, from the tip of his nose to the end of his tail, you will find that he is just 71-100 of an inch shorter than your horse. I found that skin on the last joint of the tail of the national policy horse had been simply scraped off, and that we gave him the policy under which, thank God, this country is prospering, and the premier would have been unhorsed long before to-day, had they dared to carry out the promises and pledges which they made to this country, and which they trampled beneath their feet; that would not only have ruined this country, but which would have meant disaster to themselves. How dare any hon. gentleman in this House venture to stand up and claim that this was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? The hon. gentleman says: We have denounced them for adopting this protectionist policy. It is not true. We thank Providence that they had not the courage of their own opinions, that they did not attempt to carry out their free trade policy, which would, undoubtedly, have ruined this country. But, while they have not done that, we say that we are in a position to charge them, as a party, with a failure to redeem their promises and pledges, upon which they went before the people. For eighteen long years, they denounced the national policy, and declared that they would remove every vestige of protection, just as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), declared, that every vestige of protection would be removed by resorting to a 14, or at the highest, a 20 per cent tariff. The charge I make against these hon. gentlemen is of having obtained the confidence of the people, by false pretenses, of having for eighteen long years declared that when they got power, they would trample the hydra-headed monster of protection beneath their feet, that they would cut off the head and tail of the monster, that they would trample its body under foot, and that every vestige of protection would be removed from the tariff. I invite the hon. gentleman to reconsider these facts, and I think he will not be inclined to take such a course as he has taken to-day. Does he want the evidence that the protectionist tariff is in full force, that the changes that have been made are utterly insignificant and infinitesimal, that the great, leading, fundamental features of the national policy which have made Canada what it is to-day, have been continued in violation of their own pledges? Instead of having every element of protection removed from the tariff, as a proof to the contrary, as a proof that the tariff is completely protective, we have a board of gentlemen engaged in the manufacturing industries in the great city of Toronty, the great seat of national industries—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. One of the great seats of national industries in this country—we have that board dissolved. Its members came together the other day, and said: We are formed as a body for the purpose of educating public opinion on the question of the value of a protective policy in order to maintain the great manufacturing industries of Canada, but the time has come, when, we may disband, because both of the parties of Canada are alike agreed in the adoption of a protective policy, and it is unnecessary that we should continue an institution of this character. I do not want to detain the House, but I have in my hand a statement by the president of that association, which has been in existence for twenty-five years. The president, stating what their object is, says:

It is now felt that it is not a political issue; both parties admitting that protection is here to stay.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), who, I regret deeply to hear, is in a precarious state of health, told us here in this House, and on the platform, in Toronto, that he had been called in, and was practically the father of the present tariff. Every person knows that he is not only a great manufacturer, but, one of the ablest men in Canada in reference to these questions. What did we hear from an hon. minister of the Crown, a few days ago? I hold in my hand an extract from a speech delivered by one of the members of the government. I refer to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and what does he tell the people of Manitoba? Does he tell them that they have carried out their pledges and promises? No, Sir, but he apologizes, and how does he explain it? He was at Brandon on the 4th of March, and I am reading what he said from the report of the Winnipeg Free Press, his own paper:

A delegation had come to Ottawa representing millions of dollars and thousands of people and more power to affect constituencies than was to be found in the whole of Manitoba. They said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if in twelve months your government do not do us justice and protect us by putting a duty on lumber we will support Sir Charles Tupper. He had been called in and was obliged to state to his leader that when such legislation was passed he might as well get his resignation ready.

I may tell you that this is the sole principle the hon. gentleman recognizes. What did the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), tell us two years ago in this House? He told us that when the Conservative party were fighting the battles of protection in 1877, in this House, when it became palpable that it was the only means that could rescue the country from sinking, as it was sinking, into a most deplorable condition, when the government had agreed and determined to adopt our views, and make a large increase in the tariff, he said that a brigade of maritime members, headed by Mr. Alfred Jones, put in their appearance before the government and told them that if they did not abandon that policy of increasing duties and of protection, they would walk across the floor of the House, and turn them out. They did then just what they are doing now. When they came into power, and when they found out that the policy they had advocated for years, would destroy them, if they carried it into effect, they without hesitation, abandoned it.

Mr. WOOD. And the leader of the opposition abandoned his position the very same day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend (Mr. Wood) may know what that interruption means, but I do not, and I do not think there is any other man in this House who does. I would be rather pleased if he could explain what he means.

Mr. WOOD. I will explain, if you have no objection. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party expected to get the 20 per cent tariff at that time. It was well understood—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOOD. It was well understood in this House that Sir Charles Tupper, then the financial critic of the opposition, came down with a speech prepared to pitch into the government for increasing the taxation of the people, and because Sir Richard Cartwright did not touch the tariff, Sir Charles Tupper asked at twenty minutes past five o'clock to call it six o'clock, because he was so taken back that he was not prepared to criticise the government. At eight o'clock, when he came back to the House and made his speech, he pitched into the government for not taking into consideration the manufacturing interests of the country. That is why I made that statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) never in his life made a statement so utterly at variance with the facts as the statement that he has made now. What happened was this, and I do not hesitate to tell the House. The statement was made years ago, and I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood) has forgotten it, or he would not speak as he has done just now. I ascertained what the government were going to do. I ascertained they were going to make a large increase in the tariff, as we had been demanding of them in the interests of the country, and I went down to Sir John Macdonald and I said to him: Well, Sir John, from a party point of view I have bad news for you. He asked me what it was, and I told him: Sir Richard Cartwright has a tariff prepared—just as he admitted two years ago he had—giving a very considerable and substantial increase of protection to the industries of Canada. I continued: From a party point of view, it is very injurious to us because I am satisfied that the country would condemn the free trade policy of the Mackenzie government—an election was about to take place very soon. I said to Sir John: There is only one course that, in the interests of the country and in the interests of what is fair and just, we can pursue, and the moment that Cartwright sits down I intend to get up and highly commend him for having come to the rescue of the country and adopted the policy we had demanded. Sir John Macdonald replied: You are perfectly right; there is only one course to take, and that is to give a hearty and instantaneous support to him. But, Sir Richard Cartwright did not know that, and, threatened with the loss of power, and threatened with being turned out of office by those who disapproved of his tariff, he tore up his tariff and let the country go to—I will not say where.

Mr. MACLEAN. To the father of all evil.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I do not like to use that term. Sir, the Liberal government are in the same position now that they were then. When they came into power and found that their policy was opposed to the public sentiment of this country, they abandoned it, but they abandoned it at a great sacrifice. They did it at the sacrifice of everything that is essential to the character, and standing, and position of public men. In doing so they admitted that for twenty years they had been denouncing our policy as ruinous to the country, but that when it came to a question of adopting that policy or going out of office (which they secured by a fluke) they did not hesitate to do what they did in 1877—they did not hesitate to abandon their policy in order to hang on to office. Nobody knows that better than the hon. member (Mr. Russell) who has just resumed his seat. He has had a good deal to say about the preferential resolution of 1897, and he has read a good deal of history connected with this subject, but unfortunately he has read it upside down. The facts are too recent for people to forget. If, as in a recent case, he could go back for thirty-four years and bring something up that related to the long forgotten past, he might make some impression, but the facts in this case are but of yesterday and his statements will not go. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) knows that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) never made a more correct statement than when he asserted that this government blundered into the preferential trade policy. And how did they blunder into it? Was there any preferential trade for England in the policy of this government, brought down in 1897? Let me read the resolution and let us see where a preference for England comes in:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which they apply, articles, whether the growth, produce or manufacture of said countries, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada or taken out of warehouse for consumption at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in schedule D.

That was their policy in 1897, but is that their policy now? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) knows that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said in 1897, that this was a policy that was open to the United States as to any other country; that it was open to all the world, and that all any country in the world had to do was to meet the terms in order to gain all the advantages that policy conferred. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) want proof that the Liberal preferential policy of 1897 was as unlike the Liberal policy of 1898 as day is unlike night? Let me give him the proofs. In 1897 the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) went to England and the Cobden Club gave him their gold medal. On what terms did they give him that medal? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) cannot be ignorant of the fact that they said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier: We are here to do you this honour because you have refused to give any preference to any particular country, and we would not be here to do this only that we find the policy that you have adopted is an open policy alike available to every country in the world. That is why they gave him the Cobden medal. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) talked about the Belgian and German treaties. He knows well that I have given to this House authority higher, and better, and stronger, than any he can give as to how these treaties were denounced. I have given the evidence of the statement made in the Imperial House of Commons by the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain as to how that was done. I think that is as good an authority as is the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and I have it corroborated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who, in a speech at Sheffield, England, sustained the statement which I have made here and which Mr. Chamberlain made on the floor of the English House of Commons. The denunciation of these treaties was not a new question. It had been agitated for years. True, it was not agitated for the purpose it is used for now. It was agitated with a broader purpose and on the recognized ground advanced by the United Empire Trade League, and by all those gentlemen in England, who, having studied the great question of how best to promote the unity of this great empire, had come to the conclusion that there was no means by which it could be done better than by the adoption of an inter-Imperial preferential trade that would be alike beneficial to England and to all the outlying portions of the empire. It was in connection with that policy that it was urged upon the British government that those treaties should be abrogated, because they stood in the way of the adoption of such a policy. The hon. gentleman knows right well that when the Minister of Finance first brought down his resolution, I told him that he could not get the Governor General to sign the Bill as he had introduced it; the Governor General's instruction would prevent him assenting to the Bill unless it contained a provision for the recognition of the most favoured-nation treaties. A day came when the Minister of Finance showed that he was willing to be taught something.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am afraid my hon. friend differs from me in that respect.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all. I am delighted to learn even from the Minister of Finance, and when he gives me an idea that is worth anything, I shall take it with the greatest pleasure in the world. But I am merely stating facts which this learned professor of the law did not know, or cannot deny if he did know them. I told the Minister of Finance that the Governor General could not sign the Bill unless he put a clause in it providing for the obligation of those treaties; but when the Bill was passed, there was not a line of that kind in it. The Premier said that no country in the world would have any advantage from the preferential tariff except England; but we reminded him that he was entirely ignorant of the history of the whole question; and what happened? Why, Sir, the Minister of Customs spent the whole summer in sending out orders in council, letting in one country after another, whose tariff was lower than that of Canada, and who, therefore, claimed that they were entitled to come in; and England was almost the only country in the world which was practically excluded from the benefits of the preference. Was that blundering or not? The hon. gentleman knows that there never was a series of more palpable blunders. He knows that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) declared with all the authority of his great legal acumen that there was no doubt at all that those treaties did not stand in the way, and I believe he had his expenses paid to England for the purpose of enlightening the Crown officers of the British government on that subject; but he found, just as the Minister of Finance found, that he could not get his Bill through at all unless he changed it as we advised him to change it. He found that our knowledge of constitutional law was sound, and that without the abrogation of those treaties, England was practically almost the only country in the world that could not take advantage of that preferential trade. How can this hon. gentleman, if he has any regard for logic or for historical facts, stand up in this House and say that my hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) was not right when he said that into the preferential tariff they had blundered? Mr. Chamberlain told the Premiers of the colonies: 'Gentlemen, if you are all agreed on this subject, I will take into my favourable consideration the serious question of abrogating these treaties.' But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) has spent a good deal of his time this evening in pouring all the contempt and ridicule he could command on the head of the Prime Minister of this country. What does he think of that? Was that his intention, or was it sheer stupidity, or did he fail to turn over some leaf that would have given us some explanation on that point? He says this story of preferential trade was a delusive myth—a thing that had never had anything in it; and he spent an hour or half an hour of the time of this House in treating with contempt anybody who would entertain such a proposition. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Chamberlain, at the congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the empire in London, delivered a great and remarkable speech, and what was the text of that speech? It was the report carried to London by Mr. Osler, a member of this House, from the board of trade of Toronto, pointing out the grounds on which Canada would press the question of inter-Imperial trade. Mr. Chamberlain said that in that resolution he found the basis of dealing with this question in a way that would solve the difficulty, and enable this great boon for the unity of the empire to be obtained. Now, what about the Duke of Devonshire?

Mr. WOOD. Would the hon. gentleman allow me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must ask the hon. gentleman, who, I am sorry to say, gets a little excited on occasions such as this, to allow me to go on.

Mr. WOOD. I am not excited. I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member who has the floor declines to allow the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) to interrupt him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I took my seat before when the hon. gentleman rose, and allowed him to expose himself sufficiently for one night. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), not satisfied with the laborious efforts over the midnight oil, which, I suppose, have occupied his attention for six months, read us an old letter which was read on the floor of this House a year ago by Mr. Mulock. What does that letter say? Does it contradict the statement I made? Not at all. No person pretends for a single moment that the Duke of Devonshire, on the occasion on which he met the colonial Premiers at Liverpool, proposed a cut-and-dried system which the Imperial government were ready to adopt. The matter had not reached that stage. What I want the hon. gentleman to answer is this: Why did Sir Wilfrid Laurier drag in by the head and shoulders the question of what they had done for Canada if there was no suggestion in the speech of the Duke of Devonshire that Her Majesty's government were open to hear proposals from the colonies in regard to the unity of the empire? How did the Duke of Devonshire preface that statement? He prefaced it by exposing the utter fallacies of free trade as held by the Cobden school, and brought down upon himself the hostility and the severe criticism of all the ultra free trade journals in England, which declared that he was evidently ready to turn his back on free trade in order to take up this question of inter-Imperial trade with the colonies. If I was mistaken as to what he meant, I was not mistaken alone: Sir Wilfrid Laurier made the same mistake. He took the statement made by the Duke of Devonshire as an invitation to discuss that question. All the other Premiers took the question up, and showed that they regarded the statement of the Duke of Devonshire on that occasion as an invitation to say whether they were prepared to go into that question of Imperial trade. There was the fact, that this subject had been ably argued by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and was brought forward by the Duke of Devonshire in such a way that every Premier who responded to him took the question up and stated what they were prepared to do. There was one exception to those who accepted the proposition, and that exception, unfortunately, was the last man among the Premiers to do so. That was the Premier of Canada, who had obtained his election on a solemn pledge and declaration given to the people of this country that he was as favourable to the policy of inter-Imperial trade as Sir Charles Tupper, and that if he obtained power, the first use he would make of it would be to send a commission to England to negotiate with Lord Salisbury for inter-Imperial trade. And yet, Sir, knowing what the First Minister had done, is there any means by which he could have treated with greater contempt the statements made by his leader. These statements, for reasons never explained to Canada, the hon. gentleman's leader found it convenient to change. He who was sent to bless remained to curse, and did all he could to convince the British government that they would be wasting their time if they were to offer Canada preferential trade. What did the right hon. gentleman then say? Did he go as far as the hon. member has gone to-night? Not at all. He said to the people of England: Protection has been a curse to Canada, and it will be a curse to you if you adopt it, and you cannot give us preferential trade without adopting it.

The hon. gentleman took a good deal of time in attempting to cast ridicule on the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and myself, but only succeeded in making himself ridiculous. If you want a complete contradiction of everything the hon. gentleman has said to-night on this question, you will find it in the speech reported in the Globe newspaper, delivered by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then plain Mr. Laurier, in London, Ont., when asking the suffrages of the people of Canada. The right hon. gentleman then said:

But I want to point out to you, my fellow-countrymen, upon this occasion, that, in addition to the many reasons which we had up to the present time, there is now another reason which must strongly appeal to the sense of the Canadian people at large—preferential trade.

The right hon. gentleman had read Mr. Chamberlain's remarks, and had evidently studied them. Did he then tell the people in London, Ont., that preferential trade was a myth and a delusion, an 'ignus fatuus' which it was no use persuading? Not at all. He said:

That is a new idea of having within the British Empire preferential trade with all parts of that empire. Goods of English make would be admitted free to this country, and our goods would be admitted free to England, as they are now, but in addition to that we would have for our goods a preference which would not be given to the goods of another nation.

Now, the statesmen of Great Britain have thought that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development. What is that? That there shall be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies. That practical statesman, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the empire a new step taken, which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations. What would be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken? We sell our goods in England. We send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada, if the wheat, cheese and butter, which we would send to England should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense.

The hon. gentleman seems to be so entirely ignorant of everything that has taken place on this subject, that to prevent his making a further exhibition of his ignorance, I will read to him further what his right hon. leader said:

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But, sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return. What is it she would expect? England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it; but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff, pure and simple. These are the conditions on which we can have that boon.

Upon whom then falls the hon. gentleman's contempt and ridicule when talking about this myth and delusion which we are labouring under. It must fall on the head of the leader of this House more than anybody else. No other man has described that boon in clearer, stronger and more emphatic terms, or has proved more conclusively that all that was required to obtain it was not that we shall adopt a Zollverein or a common tariff throughout the empire, but that we should simply abandon a protective tariff and adopt the revenue tariff to which he stood pledged. And on another occasion he declared :

I would be in a far better position to obtain this boon for Canada than Sir Charles Tupper, because his is a protective tariff, whereas mine is a revenue tariff, pure and simple, and Mr. Chamberlain says that is all that is necessary in order to obtain it.

I need not waste more time on that subject. Let me now refer briefly to the hon. gentleman's laboured argument about the United States of America. He went into a long dissertation to show that we were on the eve of war, and that it was impossible for this government to extend any benefit or advantage to the United States. Does he not know that history is repeating itself. Does he not know that when the Liberal party came into power in five years, the imports from England fell, under Liberal rule and a very low tariff, thirty-seven and a half million dollars. And no such disadvantage resulted to the American trade. Does he not know that the Liberal convention in 1893 declared that one of the first things they would destroy, when they came into power, was the discrimination of the Conservative policy in favour of the United States against England? Does he not know that the hon. Minister of Marine (Sir Louis Davies) had the temerity and folly to stand upon a public platform, after the present tariff had been adopted, and tell the Chamber of Commerce in England that the policy of the late government discriminated against England in favour of the United States, and that his government would take care to change all that. Well, they have changed the position of things, and changed it with a vengeance. They have shown that whatever preference they propose to give to England, they have given tenfold to the United States, under their tariff. And yet the hon. gentleman laboured on through a mass of figures, which neither he nor anybody else could understand, to prove that we had shown a very determined front against the United States and in favour of Great Britain. Has the hon. gentleman taken the trouble to look at the figures in connection with this question of preferential trade? He told us that half a lie is worse than a whole one, because we may be tempted to believe half a lie. Well, was there half a lie told to the people of England, when they were told that this government was going to act upon a policy of giving a substantial preference by a reduction of at first 12½ per cent, and then 25 per cent on our tariff in favour of English goods. Was there a man in England, was there a journalist in England, who supposed that before they took off the 12½ per cent, they would sit down and put it on, over and above the highest tariff that ever existed in this country? If there is such a thing as half a lie being worse than a whole one, this is an instance of it. It was a complete illusion. The people of England were deluded and expressed a degree of pleasure that they would not have expressed, if they had understood the question as it actually existed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell), knows that his laboured argument, that whatever comes from the United States, the increased tariff gives a still better advantage to England, is also a delusion, because the class of imports that we get from the United States, do not come from England. Let me show the hon. gentleman what this wonderful preferential tariff that has constituted the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the great empire-builder, has done. Would it have been surprising, with such a magnificent expansion of Canadian trade, as has taken place, that our trade with England should have increased? Is there any person who would suppose the contrary? Every person knows that what enables a country to carry on a great trade is to have great exports, and secure a large return of money to be expended in purchasing goods. Would not any person suppose that the splendid expansion of trade, the tremendous increase of our exports and the gigantic strides in advance made by our imports, would have led, without a preferential tariff at all, to greatly increased trade with England? We had a trade with England, fluctuating somewhat, and not what was desired, but still of considerable volume. Let me give the hon. gentleman the figures that will show what a delusion has been practised upon the people of England as well as on a good many people in this country, in connection with this matter. I take the imports from Great Britain, for the three years preceding the change of government. Every person knows, that when the government changed hands, we were just emerging from a condition of great depression. A wave of depression had swept all over the world, but Canada had suffered less, under the national policy, and the administration of affairs by a Conservative government, than almost any other part of the world. But, bordering for three thousand miles on a country like the United States, in which the depression was so great that in three years, 600 banks had gone down, millions of people were impoverished, who had been well off, and poverty stalked through the land, it was impossible for Canada to wholly escape the effects of that depression. The hard times had seriously affected Great Britain, actually prostrated the great Australasian colonies, and brought about the worst condition of commercial affairs known in the United States for many years. During those three years of depression, from 1894 to 1896, inclusive, our average imports from Great Britain amounted to $34,276,249. The preferential tariff came in. The hon. gentleman said it was in operation for two years. Suppose it was only one. Take the last year, and they have the benefit of that. Why, Sir, the startling fact appears, that in 1897, 1898 and 1899, there was an average importation from Great Britain of only $32,991,076, a decrease of no less than $1,285,173. Notwithstanding the preferential tariff, and notwithstanding the enormous expansion and development of Canadian trade, there is a loss of trade with Great Britain of 3.90 per cent in three years. Now turn to the other side. I do not intend to go fully into this subject, but the few figures I shall give, are an interesting commentary upon the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. gentleman told us that this government were not disposed to look upon the United States with favour, or to give them any benefits, seeing that they had given us none, and had put up their tariff, as to almost wholly exclude our products from their country, that this government would turn its face to England, and its back to the United States. And, how did they do it? I have shown you, that in three years the reduction of imports from Great Britain, amounted to over a million and a quarter a year. The imports from the United States from 1897 to 1899, inclusive, have been, on the average, $77,787,236. On the other hand, in 1894, 1895 and 1896, those imports amounted to $55,414,215, or an average annual increase, since the hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, of no less than $22,375,051, or over 40 per cent. Does the hon. gentleman think that any person in England, reading these figures, will come to the conclusion that this great empire-builder, at the head of affairs, has done anything gigantic for the mother country, against the United States, upon whom, we were told, they were not going to bestow any favour whatever?

Now, I think I have noticed most of the observations of the hon. gentleman, except this—that they were not going to go into any bargaining. Why, Sir, the whole world has been engaged in a bargaining process, on these matters. The ablest men, the men of the highest rank in the House of Lords, and the House of Commons in England, who have examined this subject for years with the greatest attention, have declared that in their judgment, there is nothing that will contribute to increase the power and prosperity of the British Empire to a greater extent than this policy of inter-Imperial preferential trade. Why? Has not the mother country learned within the last few months, what it is to have great outlying possessions like Canada, Australia and South Africa? Has not that lesson come home in a manner, that, perhaps, it has never come home before? How is it brought about? It is brought about by the progress, the prosperity and the development of these great outlying possessions of the mother country. Is there any means by which that great progress, that great prosperity, can be better maintained than by the adoption of such a policy? Take Canada, for instance, holding, as we do, the great remaining grainery of the world on this northern continent of North America, with a promise such as you cannot find in any other country under the British flag. Imagine what it would be for England, the adoption of a policy of inter-Imperial preferential trade, such as Mr. Chamberlain has given his imprimatur to in the strongest manner that a public man could and no man has studied the subject with greater care and more attention than he has. We would have had it to-day if the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had redeemed the solemn pledge that he gave to the people of Canada when he went to England. There is nothing more certain than that was all that was necessary. On that great occasion, when the heart of the empire was open, when the right hon. gentleman was surrounded by the representatives of all the great outlying portions of the realm, ready to do everything that could be done to promote the progress and prosperity of the empire, such a result could have been achieved. Suppose that even a 5 per cent duty were imposed upon the products of foreign countries, as the right hon. gentleman pointed out in such glowing terms to the people of London, when he was asking their suffrages, not after he had obtained his desire, and how tremendous are the possibilities? Who will doubt it, when we know that every acre of land in this country, every product of the soil would obtain, at once, an increased value, that men coming with capital or agricultural skill to America would be induced under such a policy to settle on the north, instead of the south of the boundary line. Millions of capital would be brought into the country, hundreds of thousands of the best immigrants that can be found would seek Canada, would settle here and would find a more profitable market in Mark Lane, the great wheat market of the world, for their products. That is the position that we would occupy under such a policy. Yet, my right hon. friend can do nothing but pour a shower of contempt on every person who will waste time in putting forth such a contention. There is no more vital or important question to the people of Canada. Notwithstanding what has been done by the man who was bound, as solemnly as a man can be bound, to sustain and support it, the day is not far distant, and old as I am, I trust and hope and believe that I may yet live to see that policy introduced into this country which will not only build up this great portion of the empire more than any other policy can build it up, but, will, at the same time, give to the empire an expansion of its trade that never will be realized under this impotent trade policy that has been pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not intend to take up more of the time of the House; I shall have an opportunity in the budget debate, which, I suppose, will be looked for at no distant day, and which has been rather anticipated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), of discussing this subject with more deliberation. I think that the least we might have expected from the hon. gentleman, who was afraid to have any hon. member get up and criticise the essay which he was going to read to the House, was that he would have given the same notice that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) gave on an important matter, of the resolution that he proposed to move on going into Committee of Supply. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) has shown great courage, great bravery, gigantic boldness by undertaking to take upon his shoulders the labour of showing that this government have fulfilled their pledges to the people and to the country, in which he has most signally failed, but, he has not shown such courage in hiding this resolution until the last moment when he was obliged to disclose it before taking his seat.

Mr. G. R. MAXWELL (Burrard). Mr. Speaker, I rise, with unbounded pleasure, to second the resolution which has been so ably proposed to the House by the hon. and learned junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I do not intend to follow the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) in his remarks, as I wish to discuss this question from my own point of view, and to state my views as fully and as lucidly as I can in this matter. One thing was very noticeable in connection with the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition, and that was that he failed to state whether he was going to vote for this resolution or whether he was going to oppose it. Before discussing the main part of the resolution, it may not be amiss to consider a few points which naturally lead up to it, and which are, I think, very closely related to it. We all profess to have a deep, true interest in the welfare and prosperity of the British Empire. I am willing to confess, or to state, that I believe that confession or profession is honest and sincere. But, there are other ways than by supplying soldiers to the battlefield by which we can maintain the unity and integrity of the British Empire. Most nations depend for their success upon their trade relations and Great Britain, perhaps more than any other nation to-day, depends for her stability upon her trade success in the markets of the world. If she could be defeated in this respect, if she could be driven from these markets, or, if after she has got possession of these markets, she could be expelled from them, then, she would gradually shrivel up and become puny and insignificant. Every well wisher, therefore, of the empire, if he is a leal man, must be deeply interested, and interested in a very practical way in the magnificent efforts which Great Britain has ever put forth, not only to gain control of the markets of the world, but, also to maintain her supremacy and her stability by her hold upon these markets. Loyalty to the British Empire used to be one of the principal planks in the Conservative platform, and I must confess that it was a very successful portion of that platform. Notwithstanding the vagaries of some statesmen, the heart of Canada has always been sound in this respect. On every platform and at every meeting, in season and out of season, Conservatives made the welkin ring with noisy demonstrations of loyalty to the mother country. Liberals, on the other hand, more rational, I suppose, or, perhaps, acting from the belief that this was a mask to hide hypocrisy, allowed their opponents to do almost all the shouting and I do not doubt that when the echo of this shouting reached the other side of the sea, our venerable mother almost came to the conclusion that the only men who were loyal, on this side, or who were devoted to the empire, were the members who now grace Her Majesty's loyal opposition. But one fine morning the British public received an awful shock as to the loyalty of her professed friends. I need not rehearse here this evening the how or the why this policy of protection entered into the policy of the Conservative party; suffice it to say, that it was adopted and it became the reigning genius, or demon, of this land, but when the mother country saw herself practically shut out of the House of her daughter, she was struck with amazement. I need not assure this House that that policy was deprecated and highly condemned on the other side of the Atlantic, and while not much was said by our mother—because she has always been a wise mother and harsh words would only have intensified the feeling—yet the adoption of that policy was regarded as an unfriendly act, and one which showed a species of loyalty that was in truth one of the most virulent forms of disloyalty.

I can imagine Britain saying to herself as she saw that obstruction raised against her: Are these my friends who raise this monstrous wall to impede my progress; is this my return for all that I have done and suffered for them; is this my reward for throwing over them my shield of loving protection, and, for giving them the grandest country perhaps on God's earth; are these my friends? If these are all the friends which I have in Canada, then all I can say is: Save me from such friends. Let us not deceive ourselves; that policy, and I speak whereof I know, that policy was regarded as a fatal blow to the harmonious relationship which had formerly existed between the two countries, for by that policy Canadian Conservative statesmen declared without a blush of shame, that they were prepared to extract from the mother country everything they could possibly get from her, and in return, as showing their magnificent magnanimity, that they were prepared to place the mother country among those who were strangers and foreigners to us. In other words that policy struck the old country people as the embodiment of ingratitude, the very incarnation of human selfishness. Of course we still prated about loyalty, but if there is one thing more than another which Britons admire it is deeds not words; and while we prated and prated about our loyalty to the mother country, our kinsmen on the other side were tempted to exclaim again and again: For Heaven's sake stop this prattling about loyalty, give us some tangible token of it, for such a token is worth more to us than bushels of idle, meaningless and canting talk. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying, Mr. Speaker, that as this protective policy developed on this side, dissatisfaction grew more and more on the other side.

Now, what are we to think of a leading Conservative statesman, one who was a burning and a shining light in the Conservative party, the party of loyalists; one who was one of the strongest defenders of this inhumane policy, I ask what are we to think of the senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) uttering such words as these:

What is the policy of the motherland to-day? Driven from the civilized markets of the world; steadily and every year finding their output to these markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy and millions on their army, to force their wares, and their goods and their merchandise, into the uncivilized markets of the world, which they are endeavouring to occupy, to settle up, driven there by the deadly effect upon them of the tremendous competition coming from the protected nations in the rest of the world.

I ask, what effect would such language have upon the minds of our kinsmen across the sea. Is there any loyalty in these words? Could the mother country believe that there was loyalty where these words were hatched:

Mr. MAXWELL.

Driven from the civilized markets of the world. Yes, and if that statement be true, the Conservative party helped to drive her from these markets.

Spending millions and millions on navy and army to force their wares, their goods and their merchandise on ignorant savages.

What a character is that to give to the grand old mother, whom to-day, under a Liberal administration in Canada, we are supporting with our blood and treasure. Again I say, if that statement is true, the Conservative party is largely responsible for helping, at least, to drive her among these savages. Mr. Speaker, I ask again, were such words conducive to maintain the unity of the empire and to bring these two nations closer to each other? Could, or would, Englishmen like such words as these, and could the party which by their silence adopted these words—because I have never heard any denunciation of them—could the party which by their silence adopted these words as a true description of the trade policy of Great Britain; could they expect to receive from that country, which they had so miserably misrepresented, any concessions which would pander to or develop in them more and more of the spirit of selfishness which was dominating their minds. I trow not. Sir, if I am in order, I would characterize these words as almost brutal in their frankness, and it is to me no wonder that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who now leads a government of new ideas, was constrained to rise from his seat and to declare:

I never yet heard the fair name of the great nation so slandered and insulted—at least, I never heard the name of England so insulted by a man of English blood.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we speak of Great Britain as our mother; and that is true. We represent ourselves (that is Canada) as her daughter; and that is true. Every man that has ever thought a noble thought, knows that between the mother and the daughter exists the most tender, the most affectionate, the most loving and the most sublime of human relations. In the name of common sense, in the name of those names which beautify and sanctify all human existence, what kind of policy is that for a great party to adopt which drives the mother from the daughter's door, and compels her to herd and associate with strangers? Are we human? If so, then we must act as an affectionate daughter would act, not by repulsing but by attracting, not by driving away, but by bringing the grand life of the noble mother nearer and closer to her own life as a nation. Now, two things are quite evident to me. First, that this protective policy was no policy for us to adopt, so far, at least, as the mother country was concerned; and secondly, that if the estrangement which took place as the result of the adoption of this policy was to be removed, then new statesmen must get control of the council board of the nation, and by a new policy, a policy touched and fringed with affection and gratitude, must undo what had unfortunately been done. Now, as a sign of what was coming, and what I rejoice to say has come, I read the motion which was moved in this House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies):

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

This motion, moved so far back as 1892, was what I might call daughterly in its proposed treatment of the mother country. It is a motion which I believe should have passed this House with perfect unanimity; and yet, as showing the height and depth, the length and breadth of our devotion and loyalty to the mother country, it was supported only by the Liberal party. To use a word which is often on the lips of the hon. leader of the opposition, it was overwhelmingly defeated by the Conservative party. But, though defeated, it presaged the dawn of a new policy which is to-day reaching its meridian splendour. Again, in 1893, Mr. Dalton McCarthy, a name which, I think, will be long revered in this House, moved a resolution which, among other things, contained this important declaration:

That in the opinion of this House, the tariff ought to be at once amended in respect of the matters herein indicated, and also by the substantial reduction of customs duties in favour of the United Kingdom, in whose markets all Canadian products are admitted duty free.

That also was defeated by the Conservative party, but the fact that such a motion had been brought forward by one who had been largely instrumental in framing the tariff that had been so unjust to Great Britain, set the people thinking, and I know no one who did more, as if in the way of amends, to stir up the people—or to prepare the people to change the policy of the Conservative party—than this lamented statesman. In spite of these indications, which showed that a change was brewing, that the people wanted to be fair and just to the motherland, the Conservative party buried their heads in the sand, until at last the people drove them from power and office, to make way for men

Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand; and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet.

Their masterly wisdom soon became apparent. On the 22nd of April, 1897, a day and year which, I think, will be ever memorable in the history of the Canadian people, the Finance Minister submitted this resolution to this House:

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff.

The reduction was to be one-eighth of the duty mentioned in schedule A for one year, while the following year it was to be further reduced to one-fourth upon all articles imported from Great Britain or from any other country which would deal favourably with us. That was significant of a tremendous change, both in our trade relations and in our social or national relations with the mother country. It was almost a complete wheel-about; for, whereas, our protective policy was leading us further and further away from the old land—in fact, meant turning our backs to her—this portended a right-about-face policy, which will ultimately bring us more and more in accord with each other. Every new policy has its difficulties, its lions in the way, and these have to be overcome before its success can be completed; and this new policy had the Belgian and German treaties to surmount. I need not rehearse how these for a short time prevented the mother country from enjoying the munificent offer of the Canadian people. Suffice it to say, that rather than lose what the Canadian people through her statesmen offered, the British government denounced these treaties—a magnificent tribute to the new statesmanship which was now guiding the destinies of Canada; and to-day, as the result, Britain is enjoying a privilege unsought for, but not the less appreciated, that will ultimately revolutionize our trade relations with each other.

Now, one would have thought that a policy such as this, especially in a land where we have had so many lip professions of loyalty, would have been hailed with perfect unanimity, and that the Conservative party especially would, because of its evident intention to benefit the mother country, have supported the preferential tariff with all their old-time vigour and enthusiasm. To me at least the opposition of Her Majesty's loyal opposition came as a great surprise. From the first moment of its inception down to the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition to-night, this policy has, in some way, been denounced, misinterpreted and slighted. It is well that the people should know this; and we must, Sir, take some pains to show the people where a great party stands on such a vital question as this. The hon. leader of the opposition has, Sir, opposed it with all his wonderful vigour and ability. On April 26, 1897, referring to this policy, he said:

I did not suppose it possible, whether in one section of the empire or another, for a great parliament such as that which the Dominion of Canada possesses, to have presented for its consideration a Bill of such an entirely and unconstitutional nature.

Again, in the same speech, he said :

There is a feeling amongst all our people of intense satisfaction at the very suggestion of anything that will draw more closely together the mother country and this great Dominion. That feeling is abused, Sir. It is taken advantage of by hon. gentlemen opposite, who, instead of dealing in a statesmanlike manner with this great question of the unity of the empire, drawing this great Dominion and the mother country more closely together, take the means of defeating and preventing any such thing from being done.

In other words, he means that this preferential tariff, as presented to the mother country, will prevent the unity of the empire, and the drawing closer together of both countries. Will any one tell me how an offer such as we have made will prevent these things? To me the reverse is the case. All through this speech there is raised one objection after another, and these are pressed with all the eloquence of which the hon. gentleman is master; so that, I am safe in saying that if he had had the power he would have strangled this policy at its birth. He says :

The industries of Canada, built up at such enormous cost, industries which have made Canada what it is to-day, industries that represent an enormous amount of capital invested, industries that have enriched Canada by the progress and prosperity she has enjoyed while they have been in operation—these industries will become paralyzed again when exposed to a reduction of 25 per cent on the general tariff, and one after another will succumb.

What a wail, what a jeremaid! Have we not been told over and over again, that the government had raised the general tariff, and that the preferential tariff was no advantage to the mother country. And, yet we are told, that exposed to this very tariff, which contains no advantage, our industries will one after the other succumb. Have we not been told by this self-same gentleman, that the preferential tariff was a deception, that the British people were gulled by it, that there was nothing in it for them, and yet we are told, that exposed to a deception our industries will die one by one. There is surely something wrong with the reasoning here. But, I have no time to reconcile the hon. leader of the opposition with himself. But, mark his words, Sir: 'Exposed to this reduction of 25 per cent, our industries will succumb, one by one.' Is that true? Has that prophesy, for a prophesy it is, come true? Nay, far from it. Our industries have been exposed to it, and instead of succumbing, as stated by the hon. gentleman, that they would, every man knows, who knows anything, that they are less likely to die to-day, than at any previous time in their history. Looking at their increased activity, and their marvellous growth, one can only say, that the exposure has done them good.

I now turn to the hon. ex-Finance Minister, and find that he gave this policy no support. In his own trenchant way, he tried to hack it to pieces. His great concern was the recognition of the Belgian and German treaties. He says :

These treaties are strong and abiding, they were made by Britain, the mother power, for herself and her colonies, and so long as they remain, that is not a well-grounded loyalty which will refuse to be bound by them.

Even loyalty is shunted in here to do service. But, after he has pressed the point, that loyalty means loyalty to treaties, and that we will not be loyal unless we recognize these treaties, then he drives in his wedge about bringing our industries into competition with those of other nations from whom we get no benefit. Now, why instead of quibbling about loyalty in a matter like this, did he not say: 'If these treaties stand in the way—and they stood in the way—let us get rid of them, so that the mother country may receive what she richly deserves from our hands?' No, no, that would have recognized the loyalty of the new policy, and so he keeps pegging away about our duty to recognize the rights of the treaty of Belgium and Germany to enter our markets on the same footing as the mother country. And, then, when he would make us loyal, according to his notions of loyalty—which are small and contracted—he shows the great crime this country is committing in letting the products of these countries into the markets of Canada. What is the meaning of this specious pleading and reasoning? Why, Sir, it is too thin to escape notice. The meaning of it is simply that he may, so far as he is able, prevent us from showing our loyalty in a more tangible way, than by a slavish adherence to treaties that were blocks in the way, preventing the mother country and her colonies from drawing closer together. Put in other words, he wanted to kill the preferential tariff. And it shows that when his loyalty is called upon to do something for the mother country, it vanishes like the witches in Macbeth, into thin air.

The member for West Assiniboia was very strong in his opposition to the preferential tariff. On April 27, 1897, he said :

I am opposed to this resolution, because, I hold, it is a dangerous resolution. When I oppose this proposal because it makes concessions for nothing. I may say frankly, whether I am accused of disloyalty or not, that I would object to give this preferential advantage even to Great Britain for nothing. Another objection is that this proposition destroys all chances of ever securing a preferential arrangement with Great Britain.

On April 14, 1898, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), expressed himself thus :

Where do we find ourselves? We find ourselves brought face to face with the arrangement with Great Britain and Great Britain alone, which will seriously damage and impair some of your manufacturing interests.

And so I might go quoting member after member on the opposition side of this House, and each in his own way—manifests his opposition to this proposal. Sometimes it is the manufacturing interests; sometimes it is the Belgium and German treaties; sometimes it is this, and sometimes it is that, but, all through there is united front in opposition to giving the mother country a preference in our markets. I am tempted, Sir, to ask the question: Why this opposition? and in attempting to answer that question, we are brought face to face with the pet policy, or scheme, of the Conservative party. Again and again, in reading these old speeches, you come across sentences like these: 'We have given a preference to Great Britain, but Great Britain has given no preference to us.' So speaks the ex-Finance Minister: 'What I object to in the preferential tariff, is, that it is one-sided.' So says the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig). What sticks in the throat of the Conservative party, is, you have given away something for nothing. Is that strange in the conduct of a true daughter to a true mother? I must confess that that is a strange cry, or moan, or complaint, to come from a daughter. To me, the very thought of it is dishonourable to us, and, therefore, unworthy of us. Something for nothing! My goodness, what a cry is that to raise towards her, who gave us this magnificent Dominion, and who has been fostering us, caring for us, shielding us, all through these years. Something for nothing! Now, under great heaven, is that strange, is that unprecedented, is that unnatural, on the part of a daughter to a mother? We continually hear these hon. gentlemen, in these days, dwelling with wonderful unctuousness upon the interests of the motherland. But is it unnatural on the part of a daughter to give her mother something for nothing? Sometimes the daughter herself does something that causes sorrow to the mother country, just as we did when we adopted a protective policy, and you can imagine a daughter conscious of a mother's kindness, devotion and love, and conscious of having done something to hurt that love and kindness, trying to give that mother some token that will be a beautiful example of her daughter's affection and regard. Is that unnatural on the part of a daughter? Are we to be continually speaking about the motherland and continually referring to ourselves as the daughter of that grand old mother, and expurgate from our relations with the motherland all that is daughterly and affectionate? Something for nothing! Why, it seems hardly possible that any one in Canada could be so insensate as to utter such a miserable argument as this. Something for nothing! Yes, in a sense that is true. We have given her something for nothing; but in a deeper sense, it is not true. She has in the past, and she is now, giving us something for something. She is giving us her heart to-day as she has never done before; and when Canada has the heart of the mother country, all that that directs, controls and can give, will be at the disposal of Canada. See how it works. The illustration which the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), gives us, is to the point: 'A few years ago to his knowledge, it was the practice of British importers to have Canadian goods marked as 'American,' for the reason that Canadian goods were not popular in the British market—that was due to the Conservative policy—but within the last year or two so great is the interest in everything Canadian, he has been advised to mark his goods 'Canadian,' and now his goods are being sold under that name. I saw the other day in the newspapers of a firm—a Canadian firm, writing to an old country firm for some goods similar to what they had received before. In the meantime the goods had gone up in price, but the old country manufacturer let them have the goods at the old price—because, he said, we are all proud of what Canada has done. Sir, that is what this preferential tariff has done and is doing. It has almost revolutionized the feelings of our kinsmen on the other side, and it has made them to realize that we care far more for them than the policy of iron-bound protection disclosed, that in short, we realized our obligations, and even at this late period were willing, and anxiously willing to make some contribution to the welfare of the British people. But this brings us, Sir, to the pet scheme of the Conservative party. What is it? In a short form, it may be expressed as something for something. In other words, we, your daughter, will only give you a preference in our markets—if you give us a preference in your markets. How was Britain to give us this preference? By making the loaf of the British working-man dearer than it is to-day. We are told that this is what the Conservative party has been working for, and that the action of the Canadian parliament, or rather the Liberal party, has for ever prevented this from becoming an accomplished fact. The words of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) on this point are wise:

If the British people are prepared to tax the grain of foreign nations and admit Canadian grain free, no doubt it would be a very material advantage to Canada. I am not one of those who say that it will never be done. I know that some gentlemen think it is so unreasonable that it will never be done. I am willing to believe that it is possible.

Mr. Speaker, Britain to-day believes in free trade. She reached that policy through great suffering. Both parties, Liberal and Conservative, are wedded to that principle, for she has tried both and found protection a sham, a delusion, and a snare. If we are to wait till the British people be educated to the point of going back to protection—before this preference is given us—why, every man of us now in this House will be dead, and slumbering in our graves. The present Finance Minister says: I am willing to believe that it is possible, but how possible? Not by demanding the pound of flesh, not by demanding a quid pro quo, and not by saying, I'll give you something if you give me ten thousand times more than I am giving you. The heart of a nation is pretty much like the heart of an individual. Harden the heart, and that is what our protection policy did to the heart of the mother country, and you will not get anything. But touch the heart by some striking manifestation of good-will, by some sign of gratitude, by some munificent free-will offering, such as our preferential tariff, and if the British people can be constrained to give us such a preference, they will only be induced to give us such through the impulse of a love born of gracious deeds.

I have shown this House, Sir, how the Conservative party received this new policy towards the mother country, now let us see how it was received in the motherland. The Colonial Secretary, the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, in an official despatch to His Excellency the Governor General, says:

I desire to add, in conclusion, that the action of the Dominion government and parliament in this matter, although, unfortunately, its full effect will be temporarily postponed, has been warmly welcomed and appreciated by Her Majesty's government and the people of this country as a measure which cannot fail to result in material benefit to the mother country and to Canada, and to weld together still more firmly the ties which now unite them.

Mr. Speaker, we have been assured again and again that we have humbugged the British people, and that this government has never seriously considered how to promote the unity of the empire. We were assured by the leader of the opposition to-night that Mr. Chamberlain is a statesman of the first magnitude, and we are assured by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain that this government of ours, by this preferential tariff, has done something to promote the material interests of the motherland, and to promote the unity of the empire by the only force that can do it, and that is by the potent power of love. Mr. Cecil Rhodes—no mean character in these days—in the course of a conversation, spoke warmly of the service Canada had rendered to the empire by compelling (I add through kindness) the British government to clear the German and Belgian treaties out of the way of future inter-imperial co-operation.

If we had listened to the siren voice of the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), these treaties would have been in existence still, and would still be blocking the way to the unity of the empire.

A special cable appeared in the Montreal Star, and read as follows:

The budget of the Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, Canada, attracts a good deal of at-attention. I heard a Conservative member of parliament say this morning: 'Our members jaw, jaw, jaw, and do little but jaw about the unity of the empire; but Canada keeps on doing, doing, doing.'

Mr. MAXWELL.

At a meeting of the Federated Association of Boot and Shoe Manufacturers of Great Britain, it was resolved to record its appreciation of the:

—change in the Canadian government's commercial policy, which has, by the establishment of a preferential tariff for British goods, largely increased the trade between Great Britain and Canada. This meeting recommends—

I commend this to those in this House who characterize this policy as something for nothing.

This meeting recommends boot manufacturers to give a preferential consideration to the leather imported from Canada.

From an interview published in the Montreal Herald, I cull the following with reference to canned goods. Mr. Innes, the name of the gentleman being interviewed, said:

'They give the preference to Canadian goods, and are learning to trust us as to quality.'

'Do you think that the strong Imperial sentiment fostered by this government has helped your sales at all in Great Britain?'

'I do, most certainly,' was the reply; 'and I may say that we have sold thousands of dollars' worth of canned apples this past season through a happy idea in having the labels engraved so as to convey that sentiment.'

The following was cabled to Sir Wilfrid Laurier by Sir Howard Vincent, M.P., one of the leading statesmen in the old country, and a Conservative also. It is an astonishing thing about this whole business that almost every Conservative statesman in the old country is against Conservative statesmen in this country. Sir Howard Vincent is one of the leading Conservative members of the British House of Commons:

The United Empire League in motherland, Australia, Africa and Oceania affectionately salutes Greater Britain in Canada, and confidently expresses the undying gratitude of the British race of to-day and for ever to their brothers throughout the vast Dominion, for their patriotic and filial inauguration of preferential trade between British kith and kin in this the first minute of freedom from restraining treaties. May this preferential trade grow and grow into the complete commercial federation of British peoples and possessions the whole world over, to the honour of our sovereign, the glory of the English name, and the increasing welfare of all in Britain and Greater Britain.

How does that compare with the speeches we have had from the other side of the House? And yet we are asked to believe that we befooled the United Empire Trade League. Why, the mere thought of such a thing is enough to make angels weep.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the date of these extracts?

Mr. MAXWELL. I did not take the trouble to get the dates.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The date of the telegram from Sir Howard Vincent is the 1st of July, 1898.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Sir Howard Vincent's cablegram was sent fifteen months after the tariff was brought down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before any figures were brought down?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He is not half so stupid as you think he is.

Mr. MAXWELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has no consolation in that respect at all. These testimonies, I must confess, Sir, are most gratifying, but these are not the only evidences we have in favour of this preference. The press of England was also befooled—if we are to believe the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. The fooling must have been marvellous—due, no doubt, to the marvellous hypnotic powers possessed by the government—for the fooling extends everywhere. The founts of public opinion in the old land have all been tampered with, for the utterances of England's leaders clash with the complaints of men on this side who realize in their inmost souls that they have been politically dished by this new policy. Take the London Times, what does it say? It says:

This new departure is most gratifying to all who desire to see the empire knitted more closely together, and that it is the most remarkable step yet made towards the fiscal confederation of the empire.

The Daily News, the great organ of the Liberal party in the mother country, is also 'stage struck,' for it said:

The new policy is advantageous and likely to lead to development in the direction of free trade. The new Canadian tariff is not avowedly and in terms a measure for the benefit of Great Britain—that was written in 1897—but England will profit more than any other nation. As free traders we rejoice—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is that the case?

Mr. MAXWELL. That is perfectly true. That man knows what he is talking about.

—in this consequence of the Dingley tariff; as patriots, we welcome this significant display of attachment from the greatest of our colonies, and as Liberals we congratulate the leader of the Liberal party of the Dominion.

With all due deference to my hon. friends, these words appear to me to indicate great rationality, and are evidently written by a man who knows what he is talking about. There is another very interesting statement made by the London correspondent of the New York Times with regard to this policy:

For the first time in my experience, England and the English are regarding Canadians and the Dominion with affectionate enthusiasm. When the net benefits to England of the Premier's tariff come to be figured up, I do not know that they will bulk very large; but the spirit of preference for the mother country directly appeals to the imagination here. Englishmen have always been particularly sore on this point of her colonies rearing protection walls against British trade, and nobody can blame them for it. This change, therefore, will make Mr. Laurier, when he comes, the most conspicuous and popular of all the visiting Premiers of the empire.

I might go on multiplying these extracts, but sufficient is given to show that the press of the old land knew the significance of this move, and with a unanimity seldom ever seen, praise and laud it to the skies. It was at this moment, when the air was full of affectionate enthusiasm in the old land for Canada, that her poets began to see new visions and dream new dreams. The preferential tariff gave inspiration, and Kipling eclipsed himself in that poem which will stand for all time as a noble tribute to a noble nation—our Canada. Let me quote a few verses:

I called my chiefs to council,
In the din of a troubled year,
For the sake of a sign ye could not see,
And a word ye would not hear.
This is our message and answer,
This is the path we chose,
For we be also a people,
Said our Lady of the Snows,

Carry the word to my sisters,
To the queens of the east and south:
I have proved faith in the heritage
By more than the word of mouth.
They that are wise may follow,
Ere the world's war trumpet blows,
But I, I am the first in the battle,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

A nation spoke to a nation,
A queen sent word to a throne:
Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own.
The gates are mine to open,
As the gates are mine to close;
And I abide by my mother's house,
Said our Lady of the Snows.

Another man, befogged, say our friends of the Conservative party, but in spite of his hallucination, he strikes with convincing clearness the difference between the old policy and the new, and when he grandly makes Canada say: 'And I abide by my mother's house,' he reveals what is the gist, the meaning of our policy as shaped in the preferential tariff. The London correspondent of the New York Times said, that this new policy would make our great leader in London the most conspicuous and popular of all the visiting premiers of the empire. His prophecy came true. On that occasion, perhaps one of the most momentous which the world has ever known, in that throng, perhaps the largest, strangest and greatest the world has ever seen, one man was singled out for a people's praise and honour, and that man was our gifted Premier. There are two ways by which a man may receive the homage of men. His worth is one way, his work another. The worth of our Premier was not known to the British people, it is hardly known even in Canada, where he is best known, but his work was known, as manifested in this tariff. Touched by that policy, which was a tribute of gratitude, the British people gave our Premier such a reception as gladdened the heart of every Canadian, and by that reception crowned the praises of all that this move on our part was regarded by all, from the Queen on the throne to the humblest merchant in the old land, as a permanent contribution to the unity of the empire and a striking act of devotion on the part of a wise young daughter to a mother, venerable with years and radiant with imperishable glory. Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words of what I may call the value of the preferential tariff to Great Britain. I quote from the Mail and Empire, a paper which best reflects the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite :

The so-called British preference is an imposture on Great Britain—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Who said that ?

Mr. MAXWELL. The Mail and Empire.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. What date ?

Mr. MAXWELL. I did not take the date; I did not think it would be asked for.

The so-called British preference is an imposture on Great Britain, and owing to the flourish of trumpets with which it was introduced, is a dishonour to us.

Very strong language, but that is its usual way of talking. I call to your remembrance, Sir, that one of the strong arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite was, that in this preference we were giving the mother country something for nothing, and now the organ of the Conservative party declares that the British preference is an imposture on Great Britain. I can't reconcile irreconcilable statements, but there is the noticeable feature about all their contentions, and that is marked hostility to anything seemingly in favour of Great Britain. The quibbles which have been invented are amazing, and all to minimize the importance of one step in our daughterly relations with the mother country. One thing was evident to every honest lover of the empire, and that was our trade relations were in a very sickly condition, and the discredit belonged to the daughter. We were to blame by our adoption of protection for these unhealthy relations. We caused them. Why, Sir, in 1893, our imports were over forty-three millions, while in 1897, they were only about twenty-nine and a half millions. A big falling off, you say. Yes, and with all our talk about loyalty we were gradually severing one of the main ties by which the two nations can remain united. Cut that tie and all our slobbering gush won't amount to a hill of beans. We humbugged the old country—at least we tried it for 18 years—talking protection on the one hand and loyalty on the other, but the shrewd Saxon mother saw that it was humbug, pure unadulterated humbug, 'an imposture on Great Britain,' to use the words of the Mail and Empire, and now there must be no more humbugging. We must give a preference, a real honest preference to the mother country in our markets. Yes, but hon. gentlemen say, the British preference is of no value, because it is only sufficient to meet the increased cost of goods from Great Britain, as compared with the cost of goods from the States. What have we here—why, the remarkable confession, that under the old protective policy of the Conservative party, Great Britain was bound to lose in the struggle for our trade. If to-day the getting a preference of 25 per cent over her competitors she is unable to compete, how would she compete against this competitor without the 25 per cent. But we claim the preference is of value to Great Britain. Let me illustrate. I shall read a short article which is important on this point, and for the benefit of the hon. gentleman who wants something recent, this is of recent date :

Mr. MAXWELL.

The Tariff Preference.

It has been asserted by Conservative leaders on the stump, and by Conservative journals, that the preference accorded to Britain by the Canadian tariff is useless in the way of favouring British trade. These opponents of the government would be satisfied with no tariff arrangement that would not carry a British preference for Canadian products as a quid pro quo. They have been told repeatedly, on the highest authority, that this is not possible; and as they would refuse to grant a preference without securing one in return, their attitude simply means that if they were replaced in power they would remove the preferential feature from the tariff. They would place British goods again on a level with those of foreign countries.

I want to ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they are prepared to do away with this preferential tariff. I would like to get some statement from some important member of the Conservative party here, and as soon as we possibly can, as to what may be the policy of the Conservative party on this question should it again be returned to power, which heaven forbid. The people of this country want to know what would be the policy of the Conservative party on that.

An hon. MEMBER. They won't tell us.

Mr. MAXWELL. We will try and make them tell us, if we can. The article goes on to say :

It is probably to make this programme appear less obnoxious to the people that the Conservative spokesmen come forward with the very silly contention that the preference has been of no benefit to British trade. The very figures they quote in support of their assertion are, in fact, sufficient to refute it, for these figures show that while imports of British goods into Canada declined steadily for years, they have been increasing steadily and rapidly since the tariff preference was established.

In regard to this matter, Mr. Stapleton Caldecott, the well known Toronto merchant and importer, furnishes some interesting information in the following letter to the Toronto 'Globe': 'I have just read your admirable article upon British preference in the tariff on imported goods, and I can from present experience amply confirm what you say of its happy effect upon inducing the importation of British in preference to foreign goods. I am largely concerned in the importation of wool, silk and cotton fabrics. In wool it induces the importation of British woollens and dress fabrics to a remarkable extent, giving to Yorkshire in particular a great leverage over foreign manufacturers, the difference in duty being 25 per cent less than the duty paid upon German and French wool fabrics. In cotton goods this also applies, and it has quite changed the importation of cotton shoe laces from German to English goods, or, rather, I should say, English goods which had almost disappeared from this market can now readily compete against German-made goods. In silks it has fostered the importation of English silks to a remarkable extent, as I know from my every-day experience. French and Swiss silks, as also Japanese, will always be used in Canada, but in the surah makes of silks, the preference given to British manufactures has induced a specially large importation of these goods since the new tariff came into force, and this can readily be proven to be because of the preference in favour of British manufacturers.

Such words coming from a business man are worth more than a bushel of criticisms coming from men who are more anxious to promote the interests of their party than they are to recognize the worth of legislation which they have not initiated. To some extent I can substantiate this. I had in my house at Vancouver the representative of a large firm in Belfast, Ireland, who told me that under the preferential tariff they were permitted to do business in Canada for the first time in eighteen years, and I know he received large orders in our city. I know, further, in my own city—a city which has been growing marvellously during the last three years, there is a growing demand for British goods. I ask the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Hibbert Tupper) if that is not so. I am sorry the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is not here, I am sorry in a way that he is not discharging his duties as he ought to do. He seems to me to have far more interest in local politics than he has in Dominion politics, for which he is paid to some extent, and which he is supposed to represent in this House. I say, I am sorry he is not here. I read a quotation from his speech this evening, about England being driven from the markets of the civilized world. I am glad to assure this House, however, that he is trying to make some amends. He is beginning himself to import from British markets; I do not know whether it is because he cannot get good enough goods in Canada, or because he cannot find tailors in Canada skilful enough to make clothing for his manly form; but, I know, that he is importing his clothing from Great Britain, and that he is anxious to get the full advantage of the preferential tariff. But we must go to figures for the crowning confirmation of this point. In 1890, our imports from Great Britain amounted to $43,320,241. In 1897, they dropped down to $29,412,188, that was a bad drop—a most unsatisfactory drop—and one well fitted to make us pause and think. In 1899, however, these have risen up to the healthy figure of $37,060,123. In other words, in 1897-8, the first full year when the preference of the one-eighth was in force, the trade increased over the year 1896-7, at the rate of 10 per cent; in 1898-9, when the full preference of one-fourth was in force, the increase over 1897-8, was at the rate of 14 per cent; and in 1898-9 over 1896-7 at the rate of 26 per cent. To put it in another way, if the preferential tariff had not been in force, Great Britain, in her importations, would have paid $1,683,288.45 in customs duties more than she did. Look at it, then, any way you please, you have this fact impressed again and again, that British importations are increasing, instead of decreasing, and that the motherland is getting a substantial preference in our markets.

And, what is the value of the tariff to Canada? For one thing, we are getting cheaper goods, and that is a boon to our working classes. Twenty-five per cent means a benefit to the consumer; and no amount of quibbling can change, or twist, or contort that fact. Even if it were true, that the American manufacturer holds his ground under this tariff, he can only do so by lowering the price of his goods to the point at which these goods can be supplied by the British manufacturer; and, that again, enables the Canadian merchant to buy cheaper and sell cheaper. Sir, it is hardly fair to criticise the infant days of a new policy: because it does not, or cannot accomplish all we desire it to accomplish. Do not condemn the child, because he has not the strength of a man. So far it has accomplished something, and we expect that it will do yet greater things in the days that are coming. We are nearer the heart of the mother to-day, than we have been for a long, long time. The evidences of such are all around us. We are bearing her load to-day upon our young shoulders, and by God's help, we will bear it well. In no part of the empire is the struggle in which Britain is engaged watched more closely than in Canada. In a sense all things have become new; the old has passed away. Our admiration is unbounded, for her strength is as strong as ever, and her right hand has not forgot her cunning. Her magnificent exertions to-day remind me of a poem by Gerald Massey, which runs thus:

There she sits in her island home,
Peerless among her peers;
And humanity oft to her arms doth come,
To ease its poor heart of tears.
Old England still throbs with the muffled fire
Of a past she can never forget;
And again shall she banner the world up higher,
For there's life in the old land yet.

They would mock at her now, who of old lookt forth

In their fear, as they heard her afar;
But loud will your wail be, O kings of the earth !
When the old land goes down to war.

The avalanche trembles, half launcht and half riven;

Her voice will in motion set;
O ring out the tidings, ye winds of heaven !
There's life in the old land yet.

The old nursing mother's not hoary yet,
There is sap in her Saxon tree ;—
Lo ! she lifteth a bosom of glory yet,
Thro' her mists, to the land and the sea,
Fair as the Queen of Love, fresh from the foam,
Or a star in a dark cloud set;

Ye may blazen her shame, ye may leap at her name,

But there's life in the old land yet.

Let the storm burst, it will find the old land
Ready-ripe for a rough red fray;
She will fight as she fought when she took her stand,

For the right in the olden day.
Ay, rouse the old royal soul, Europe's best hope
Is her sword-edge by victory set.
She shall dash freedom's foes adown Death's bloody slope;

For there's life in the old land yet.

These are burning words—words which rouse the patriotic fire in every Canadian bosom. In response we are helping her to fight her battles. This preferential tariff as it now stands—and if not perfect, we must make it more perfect, as time discloses its imperfections—is helping, and will help her, to fight her great trade battles. Grand it is to think, that we stand side by side with her in her battles in South Africa ; but to me, it is grander still—yea, it is the grandest thought of all—that we are with her in all that makes her strong and great. Our life in her life, and her life in our life, will yet make the world to realize as it has never done, 'that there's life in the old land yet.'

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, as we are pretty well overcome with the poetic fervour of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and as the hour is getting late, I move that the debate be now adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not think it would be reasonable to expect the hon. gentleman to go on tonight. He is quite unequal to the occasion, and I am willing that the debate should be adjourned.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, I am ready to go on. I protest against the insinuation that we are not prepared to go on. I am moving the adjournment of the debate at the request of an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

Mr. MAXWELL.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 16, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 95) respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 96) respecting the Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Talbot.)

Bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Portage du Fort and French River Railway Company.—(Mr. Mackie.)

PRIVILEGE—INDIAN AGENT KEITH.

Mr. N. F. DAVIN (West Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. On the 12th of February, the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) made the following statement :

Now, the less that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), or any other hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, says about that, the better it will be for themselves. In one case there was one Indian agent by the name of Keith. Why was he dismissed? The reason was that the clergy petitioned the government to have that man dismissed from the position of Indian agent.

I have in my hand the following question, which I asked yesterday :

When did Hilton Keith cease to be an officer of the Indian Department? What was his position at the time? Was he subsequently employed in connection with treaty payments to certain Indians? Did he resign, or was he deprived of his position?

The answer given by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), acting Minister of the Interior, was as follows :

In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. Mr. Hilton Keith ceased to be an officer of the Indian Department on the 15th October, 1898. 2. The position he held at the time was that of Indian agent at the Carlton agency. 3. He was not, subsequent to the date at which he ceased to be an officer of the Indian Department, employed in connection with treaty payments to any Indians. 4. He resigned.

The answer of the acting Minister of the Interior in reply to the hon. gentleman was : I beg to say that Mr. Hilton Keith ceased to be an officer of the Indian Department on the 15th of October, 1898. He resigned, so that the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), in regard to an important matter affecting a prominent citizen of this country, and concerning which the House was deeply concerned to know the facts, deceived the House. I do not say intentionally, but you can put your own construction upon it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—UN-OPPOSED MOTIONS.

Mr. G. E. FOSTER (York, N.B.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to move the adjournment of the House. I shall not take up very much of the time of the House myself, and if some hon. gentlemen think that when this matter was discussed before, I spoke with some warmth, I hope they will not deceive themselves in that respect at present, although I hope that I shall speak with equal earnestness.

I rise to make a second protest from this side of the House, on behalf of the opposition, on my own behalf and that of every fair-minded member of this House, on whatever side he sits—a protest as strong and earnest as I can make it—against the position taken by the right hon. gentleman who leads the government, and the government which he leads, with reference to the obtaining of information by members of this House, and I shall continue to make my remonstrance as strongly and as vigorously as I possibly can, until this present embargo—an embargo unheard of up to this time in the annals of parliament, an embargo which is just as outrageous, as unheard of—shall have been removed. There are but two ways in which you can get information in this House. One is by putting a question to a minister, and it is entirely within the discretion of the minister himself, as to whether the answer he gives will convey any information at all or not, so that this means of obtaining information is a limited and imperfect one at the best. Such, however, is not at all the case with the second method of getting information, namely; by putting on the paper a notice of motion, for a return, which motion will come up in its regular order, and then, when granted, relying upon the minister carrying out the order of the House and bringing down the information called for. I think I can say, that since we have had a parliament in Canada, the second method of obtaining information has been very freely exercised, and very carefully guarded by the members and the different ministers, who from time to time have had the direction of affairs in this House. There are two sets of motion which are put on the Order paper. One you may call the academic, and I do not attach the term as a stigma, but to mark the distinction. Such, for instance, would be the notice which stands in the name of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), with reference to the practice of delivering speeches in this House and deprecating the making of long speeches. That is a matter which is causing a good deal of hilarity, I see, to the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sutherland), at present. But, a motion like that is what we may call an academic one, and, these academic questions give rise to a good deal of discussion and long discussions, in the House, and a large portion of the time of the House is taken up by different members giving their views on the abstract questions raised, in the expectation that some time or other their ideas may fructify in a way of governmental action, or the enactment of a law. But, the other class of notices of motion is for an entirely different purpose. These are to get information, and nine-tenths of those notices are not for the sake of discussion at all. Sometimes a member may choose to open up a subject, when he calls for the papers, but as a general rule, that is not done, and I appeal to the record in my own instance, for proof of this statement. I think I can say, that, since I have been on this side of the House, there is not one instance in which I have attempted to discuss a motion of that kind made by myself, until I have got the papers and information. Such motions are merely perfunctory, so far as debate is concerned. They do not give rise to any debate, or at the most, a short debate, and are intended merely to obtain information. If you will take up the Notice paper, you will find that this session as in every session, there is quite a proportion of what I may call academic notices of motion, resolutions which will produce lengthy discussion with reference to some principle such as I have indicated in the case of the hon. member for North Norfolk. The practice, therefore, has grown up in this House, and has prevailed in it ever since I have been a member, of allowing the unopposed motions to pass, before taking up the others. I do not believe that there can be cited one instance in which the leader of the government refused to carry out that practice and allow members their privilege, until the right hon. gentleman did so the other day. But in what position are we now? How is a member to do his duty in this House? He cannot go into a minister's office, he has not the keys of the department, he has no right to rummage in the archives. He is absolutely at the mercy of the Prime Minister to-day, as to whether he will get one iota of information from this time until the end of the session. And it is a mercy which, so far as the Prime Minister is concerned, we have no doubt, will not be exercised; because he has stated, not once but twice, that he does not intend to allow it during the remainder of the session. Now, I will state my own position. I want information about certain questions and have put my motions on the Order paper. I am under the disability of coming behind these first academic resolutions, which will have to be debated. The government itself shears from the private members their time, and, as the session goes on, more of their time, so that greater prominence proportionately is given to the academic questions, and one's chance of reaching a motion calling for information grows less as the session goes on, down to the vanishing point. Dozens of other members in this House are in that position—members on both sides. For instance, I wish to know something with reference to a very important matter—the railway subsidy payments. You have the Auditor General of this Dominion, an official of parliament, stating in his report that he finds that it is practically impossible to exercise any auditing power over the expenditure in railway subsidies under the present system, as to the scale of payments which has been adopted by the Minister of Railways and Canals. This House ought to have a chance to discuss that matter. So far as I know, there is but one instance of a road that has been brought under the operation of that Subsidy Bill. I have a notice of motion for, return of reports of the engineers sent to ascertain the cost basis of the subsidy to be paid to the Restigouche Railroad Company for the first ten miles of its line, and the reports and orders in council relating to the payment of the same. That road has been paid more than $3,200 a mile on a certain statement as to basis of cost; and if you will read the Auditor General's report you will see that he says that the basis is very unsatisfactory. I want the engineer's report on that subject, and here is my motion for a return. And can I get it? No; it is absolutely and physically impossible to reach it under the embargo put on our proceedings by the leader of the House. Therefore, I am shorn of my power; I cannot do my duty as a representative of my constituents, I cannot do my duty to the general public. And what is it, I ask? To proceed upon imagination or hearsay? Do I ask grace, mercy or favour? No, Sir, I ask information as it exists in the department, and I cannot get it under that embargo. There is another thing I would like to discuss—the gold claims in the Yukon, which, to-day, I do not hesitate to say are in a most anomalous and unsatisfactory condition. I have a notice here calling for, return showing the number of gold claims in the Yukon which have been given in compensation for claims alleged to have been lost through mistakes of officials or otherwise, with all papers, correspondence, reports and orders in connection therewith and any regulations or instructions in relation thereto. Will any hon. gentleman say that that is not an important matter? What facts have so far been brought out? Why, that at the mere whim of the minister, it is possible for a man to have a gold claim given him. If a man comes up and satisfies the minister that he had a prospective claim, and that he lost it, because of some mistake of an official in getting out the forms, the minister may say: Very well, I will give you another gold claim instead of it. Does not everybody believe and know that that is a most important thing? I wish to get information upon this subject, and so do other members of the House; but an embargo is laid upon us, and it is absolutely and physically impossible that we can get that information. I have nearly a dozen motions on the paper.

Mr. FOSTER.

I am personal in speaking of this matter, because I am speaking for myself. But other members are in exactly the same position, and argument applies with equal force in their favour. Now, what is the reason that this embargo has been put on? Is it right that members should have the greatest facilities for securing information? Is it the constitutional practice in a British-governed country that they should have information? Without doubt these two things are true. Why, then, is this embargo put on? If it is an outrage to put such an embargo on under general circumstances, it comes mighty near, Mr. Speaker, to being a crime under the present circumstances. Why? Because the evident purpose is to keep back a motion which impugns the government officials in dealing with the dearest right of the people of this country, the right to have their ballots counted as they put them into the ballot boxes. Strip off all evasion—and it does not take any great acumen or brilliancy of mind to pierce through it—and the whole affair means: We are not going to let you get at Mr. Borden's notice and so get this question before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That is why I say that if it is an outrage under ordinary circumstances, it comes very close to being criminal under present circumstances.

That is all I have to say. I make my protest as strongly as I can. I make it to men sitting opposite to me, and who have echoed in their hearts every word I have said, so far as the right is concerned. I say it is un-British that we should be put under an embargo of that kind, at the whim of any man, I do not care whom he is, because, by accident or otherwise, he happens to lead a government for the time being, what right has he, what moral right, what parliamentary right, what right in the government of a free people, to put an embargo of that kind, by his own whim, upon members on both sides of the House? I shall continue to make my protest as long as I am a member of this House until this outrageous and unheard-of embargo is raised, and members are allowed full opportunity to obtain the information they have a right to obtain.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would once more appeal, not to the passions, but to the common sense of the House on this question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has spoken as though I had violated every rule of the House. I place myself in the judgment of the House that I have not violated a single rule, either the spirit or the letter thereof. The hon. gentleman is angry, because I have refused, as leader of the House, to grant him a privilege. Now, if I refuse a privilege to a man, I do not invade that man's rights. What reason has he to ask of me a privilege? What reason has he to complain if I say we will abide by the rules of the House? He said my conduct was un-British. Is it un-British to stand by the rules of the House, which have been made the rules by the consent of all ?

Mr. FOSTER. Refusal of fair-play is un-British.

The PRIME MINISTER. I shall have great pleasure in discussing the question of fair-play with the hon. gentleman, and appealing on that ground even to his own followers. We have been in the habit of going through the Order paper and passing unopposed motions. What do we mean by 'unopposed motions,' I ask the hon. gentleman himself? But I already have his definition. In the light of the impassioned speech he has made, unopposed motions refer to motions, such as he has placed himself on the Order paper, calling for the production of papers and nothing else—calling for the production of papers to be placed on the Table of the House so that they may be the basis of discussion at a later period. That is what we understand by unopposed motions. Understanding this rule that unopposed motions are motions for the production of papers, at a late sitting of the House, I was asked that we should go through the unopposed motions. I granted the request willingly. We did the same thing upon another day ; we took up motions for the production of papers—

Mr. BERGERON. No, no ; that was not granted.

The PRIME MINISTER. Every unopposed motion which was not debatable was granted.

Mr. BERGERON. No, I have one here which my right hon. friend will remember.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not an unopposed motion. What we understand by an unopposed motion is a motion that is not debatable. The motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is debatable.

Mr. BERGERON. No, it is not a debatable motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that because it is not debatable by him it is not debatable by us ? My hon. friend has a motion on the paper, and, if, I, myself, or some other person, have some observation to offer upon it, the hon. gentleman says : No, I do not think it is debatable ; I do not want to discuss it, and, therefore, it is not a debatable motion. Again I appeal to the sense of fair-play of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster). The motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) was not a motion for the production of papers. It was not one of those motions, which, we understand, are unopposed motions. It was a motion which, in its character, was debatable. It never came within the category intended to be treated as unopposed motions, and because that motion was not of that character, I said, 'Stand.' On the following day I was attacked on the ground that I had refused to allow this motion to be passed. If I refused to allow that motion to be passed I was strictly within my rights ; it was not an unopposed motion, it was not a motion for the production of papers, yet, I was accused and attacked because I said that we would follow the rules of the House. If that be considered fair-play, if that is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) calls British, I do not understand the word British in the same way, I do not understand fair-play in the same way. Therefore, when an hon. gentleman asks us the same thing again, and if the same accusations are repeated against us, we shall stand by the rules of the House, and we stand by the rules of the House to-day. Is there any want of fair-play because we stand by the rules of the House ? What are the rules for ? The rules of the House are for the hon. gentleman, as for myself. Every man in this House stands upon an equal footing. There are sixty or seventy notices of motion on the Order paper to-day ; every one must be taken in its turn, one must be taken at a time, and the others must wait for their turn. Therefore, what right has the hon. gentleman to fly into a passion and to assail us in the manner in which he has when there is not the slightest cause whatever for it? What is the use of appealing to passions and trying to represent that we are arbitrary ? How can we be arbitrary so long as we stand by the rules and orders of this House ? Here is the Order paper ; every hon. member of this House, who has a notice on the paper, has it called in its turn and because we do that, the hon. gentleman flies into a passion and charges that we are violating all the rules of parliamentary government, that we are refusing fair-play to himself and to other hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, if the hon. gentleman wants to have fair-play in this House, there are rules which provide for that, and we will follow these rules. That is what we call fair-play, but if the hon. gentleman wants to lay aside these rules, for the convenience of the House, he shall always find me ready to do that, but, not if, when that privilege is extended, it is abused, as it has been for some time past. If the hon. gentleman is willing to say unopposed motions for the production of papers shall be taken, I shall always be ready to do that, but this term 'unopposed motion' does not apply to the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden).

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

The PRIME MINISTER. No, it does not ; it is not a motion of that character, and that is the reason I stated that the objection was made and that the request of the hon. gentleman could not be granted. I stated to the House the reasons which actuated me. The hon. gentleman was pleased to say that it was by an accident that I have been placed here. It is a misfortune, perhaps, but at all events, I cannot help that. He cannot help it, for he has done his best to prevent it, and he will do it again. He will succeed or fail, but, at all events, so long as I am here and so long as I stand by the rules of the House, I do not think that anybody will have reason to complain. Let me say one word more, and in saying it I do not think that I claim any undue privilege for myself; I have endeavoured, so far as it was in my power, to act courteously towards every hon. member of this House. I have endeavoured to meet the convenience of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I shall always be ready to do so. But, certainly, I have a right to expect that, when hon. gentlemen ask for a departure from the rules of the House, it shall not be made a weapon of attack against me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am quite certain, from the mode in which the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has addressed it, on the present occasion, that he feels the gravity of the position, and I am not without hope that I may be able to suggest a modus vivendi. I may say that the point raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who sits at my left, is a most important one, as every hon. member in the House must see. I will admit, for argument's sake, that the right hon. gentleman had reason to take exception to the complaint that was made when the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) was reached, and he said that it was to stand. I will, for the sake of argument, admit that the right hon. leader of the House is only standing on his rights when he says that it is for every hon. member of the House, on either side, to say if he wishes to debate a motion, whether the mover says that it should be debated or not. But I do not think the right hon. gentleman will want to take the position that because any person in this House has raised a question upon a subject in which, there is no doubt, a good deal of feeling, it is desirable that every hon. member in this House should be punished, or that he should maintain a position which has never been maintained by any of his predecessors in this House. He admits, himself, that the invariable practice has been, from time immemorial, since this parliament was a parliament, that, for the purpose of facilitating the passage of motions on which there is no desire on the part of the mover, or, on the part of any hon. member of the House, to introduce a debate, to allow that motion to pass, and he will admit that it is most undesirable that anything should stand in the way of securing a large amount of information, that every person wishes should be brought before the House, by preventing motions being reached in order that papers may be brought down. I am quite sure that there will be no difference of opinion on that question. I am bound to admit that, notwithstanding all that has been said, it was within the right of the right hon. gentleman to cause the motion to stand for discussion if he considered it was necessary, and that it is not for the mover or any other hon. member of the House to interpose his decision against that, because it is the invariable right of every hon. member on either side of the House to say: I want to discuss that motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) need not go any further. I am quite satisfied the moment it is understood that the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) is not of that character. If it is not to be considered as an unopposed motion, I will be quite willing to go through the usual process.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am extremely glad to hear that, because I think it removes an obstacle to the proper conduct of the business of this House, and I shall not say another word.

The PRIME MINISTER. After the explanation of the hon. gentleman, the moment it is agreed that the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) is not to be considered as one of those unopposed motions, I shall be glad on Monday next to go through the usual process.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on this subject. I call attention to the fact that these motions to adjourn the House so frequently, made on private members days, have taken away from private members a great part of their privileges in this House. Hon. gentlemen in this House have placed on the Order paper a large number of motions, some of which are of an academic character, and some, if they pass the House, are supposed to be followed by returns being brought down. I point out to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) that the reaching and the discussion of these motions is constantly delayed by the habit of members moving the adjournment of the House. Some hon. gentlemen, more anxious about matters personal to themselves than they are about the conduct of public business, take up the time of the House by discussing their peculiar grievances on a motion to adjourn, and we all know that had they abstained from doing this, motions would have been reached long ago which have not been reached yet. I have watched this carefully, because I have a notice of motion seventeen or eighteen numbers down the list which I am very anxious to have brought before the House. Inquiry is frequently made by persons interested in this motion as to why it is not proceeded with, and those who are not acquainted with the rules of the House sometimes attach blame to the member in whose name the motion is, for not pressing it forward. Although a motion to adjourn the House is strictly parliamentary, it is quite apparent to all that the right has been exercised to an unwarrantable degree during this and the last session. The true purpose of such a motion is, that matters of great importance and of immediate urgency might be discussed, but during the last session or two some members have fallen into the bad habit of discussing everything beneath the sun under the guise of a motion to adjourn. It would appear that if any hon. gentleman is so disposed, he can move the adjournment in order to discuss his pet grievance or his pet hobby. The hon. gentleman for Halifax (Mr. Borden) has an important motion on the Order paper which some members on this side of the House intend to discuss, and the House has been treated to complaint after complaint with regard to the elections in West Huron and Brockville, and every detail in connection with them has been raked up at great length by hon. gentlemen opposite, who make a great outcry if those who object to some of their arguments desire to place another view before the House. I desire to intimate, Sir, that if this principle of moving to adjourn the House is to be adopted in season and out of season, and if the time allotted to private members is to be wasted by gentlemen opposite, I will undertake later on to bring up some of what may be called my own hobbies, in similar fashion, and take up the time of the House discussing them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FLINT. I do not see why hon. gentlemen opposite should have the right to monopolize the entire time of parliament discussing every matter they can think of under the cover of this motion to adjourn. I quite agree with many of the points laid down by the hon. member (Mr. Foster) in reference to passing these unopposed motions for papers which are required in the discussion of various matters that come before us, but I do think that the time is rapidly approaching when some modus vivendi should be established, or some new rule adopted to prevent the abuse of the motion to adjourn. I believe a committee from both sides of the House could, without unduly hampering the fair discussion of matters of urgent importance, agree on a rule which would prevent a great deal of the time of the House being wasted. I trust that hon. gentlemen of both sides of the House will combine to restrict as much as possible, this line of discussion, in order to give myself and my colleagues who have important notices of motion on the Order paper, an opportunity to discuss them and to amend them if necessary, earlier in the session.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). This is, perhaps, one of the most important questions that has come before the House for years. I have been a member of this House for a long time, and my interpretation of the rule is, that when a member puts a notice on the Order paper, it merely gives him priority of discussion for that question. It certifies that on a certain day, when that motion is reached, he has a right of priority to discuss it, but it does no more. We cannot discuss the question at all on a motion to adjourn, nor can we bring it up as an amendment in going into supply. When the motion is called on the Order paper, if a member of the government or any member in the House, says 'stand,' there is no opportunity for discussing it, and so the members of the opposition are completely estopped from taking any means to bring that matter before the House. For my part, I would like to have the opinion of the House as to what the proper procedure would be. As I have said, a motion on the Order paper gives the member the right of priority, and when it is reached, any member may insist that he should go on with it, and if the member does not proceed the motion is dropped. The practice grew up in the House of taking unopposed motions, and this motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden) is literally an unopposed motion or should be, at all events. It is a reference to the committee of a matter which was before the House last session, upon which evidence was taken, and no one would have imagined that it was a question upon which there would be any discussion. But what position was my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) in? He was prevented from going on with his motion; he could not drop it; he could not discuss it on adjournment, nor in any other way. Surely, if that is the rule of the House, the rule should be changed. But, Sir, I have been in the House for nearly thirty years, and I have always seen the unopposed motions passed as a matter of course, or otherwise, of course, our rules would be a farce. Otherwise it is in the power of any member of the House, and especially the ministry, to prevent a discussion of any subject, by asking that any question which they do not wish to discuss, or which they wish to oppose, be allowed to stand. If that is the interpretation to be put upon the rules of the House, it is time those rules were changed, or that a universal consensus of opinion were arrived at that unopposed motions should pass as a matter of course.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). With a great deal of what the hon. gentleman says, who has just spoken, I fully concur. I think he has to a great extent correctly stated the rules of the House, and I agree with him, that they may require revision. But, we are not now discussing the question of a revision of the rules; we are discussing the rules as they exist to-day, and the question, what are unopposed motions? Neither the leader of the government, nor the leader of the opposition has any more right, with respect to notices of motion, than any other individual member. When a motion is made by a member of the House, any other member has a right to discuss it. Unopposed motions are not merely motions relating to the production of papers, but motions which by unanimous consent, will be carried, whether they are for the production of papers or for the discussion of academic questions. If any member desires to discuss a motion when it is moved, he may desire it to stand. The fact that it relates to the production of papers has nothing to do with the question. Unopposed motions are simple motions which, by the unanimous consent of the House, are allowed to pass.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is quite right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In the particular case under discussion, my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton), has intimated that he proposes to discuss the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), so far as it relates to the Brockville election; therefore, it ceases to be an unopposed motion, and it must take its place on the Order paper along with the other notices. The hon. member for Halifax has no more rights with regard to that motion, than any other member of this House, with regard to a notice which he may have on the paper. Each member may think that his own motion is of greater importance than others; but, each must submit to the rules, or obtain the unanimous consent of the House to the rules being set aside. That is, I think, a fair statement of the case, and I submit to the House, that, not only was the right hon. leader of the government in his right, but that, if he attempted to say to the House, 'I will allow this motion, and I will not allow that,' he would be usurping powers which do not belong to him.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody asked him to do that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. As the leader of the House, he has more responsibility than private members, but as to saying that he will, or will not allow a particular motion to be made, he has no more power than any other member, however humble he may be.

Mr. NICHOLAS FLOOD DAVIN (West Assiniboia). I am very glad the Prime Minister has abandoned a punitive policy, the principle of which was borrowed from a savage and bygone age. The principle behind the policy of the right hon. gentleman was this, that because one member of the opposition offended, the whole opposition, and for that matter, all members of the House who might have unopposed notices of motion on the Notice paper would be punished. The right hon. gentleman having reflected and slept over the matter, has come to the civilized standpoint which is habitual to him, and has abandoned the savage standpoint that belonged to the policy of William I., and the Irish pale. But, Sir, I am going to deal for one moment with a more important question, which has been lost sight of for a moment. The right hon. gentleman has discussed the rules, and he has dwelt on the importance of carrying them out. He has talked of privilege, but what is beneath rule and privilege and procedure of this House? Is it not to secure efficiency? Is it not to make this House as complete an inquest of the nation as possible, to enable us to inquire into everything especially into everything connected with the government? Let me read to the right hon. gentleman what he himself said, speaking in one of the most important towns of this Dominion:

We are charged with corruption. Well, to all these charges of corruption the government of to-day have one answer: whenever a charge is brought we will grant an inquiry. That is the only answer we have to give.

Now, Sir, if there is anything in the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax), it is a charge of corruption; and what does the right hon. gentleman do? Does he facilitate inquiry? No; what he does is to put up the rules and the etiquette of the House as a barrier against inquiry. I say it is the duty of the leader of the House and the duty of the government to facilitate inquiry in every possible way. Anybody in this House who says this is an opposed motion, in the usual sense of that term, is really not talking by the book. We know that in grain and principle, it is an unopposed motion, and I appeal to the right hon. gentleman, as he is in his best mood to-day, to fall back on his own best traditions, and to say, 'Here I will use my authority with my party, and with the ebullient member for Kingston, and when this motion is arrived at, if the hon. member for Halifax moves it, I will see that nobody will say one word against it, and then it will pass, and we shall have an inquiry.' I assure the right hon. gentleman that, be the time near, or be it far—and very far it cannot be—when he goes to the country, he will be in a much better position before the country, if he does that, than if he places us in the position to say, 'There stands the Prime Minister; he is a very graceful character, a charming man, a most lovable person naturally, but he has sold himself to the Tartes and the Sutherlands.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Who says 'ah'? Or, was it 'ba'? Or, was it 'bray'?

Mr. GIBSON. It was only the echo.

Mr. DAVIN. It is my obese friend. I thought that cry came from a ventrical region, and I see that it came from an hon. member of this House, who is very powerful in all directions, especially the ventrical. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say that the right hon. gentleman will stand better before the country if he does not put such a weapon as that into our hands, because he is not a guiltless man. We took him at his word. He said that, if there was a charge of corruption, he would throw wide open the doors of inquiry, but when we came to the inquiry, he himself slammed those doors in our face, and barred and bolted them.

Motion (Mr. Foster) to adjourn negatived.

SUCCESSOR TO GENERAL HUTTON.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the right hon. leader of the government whether he can inform this House if his government has appointed an Imperial officer as successor to General Hutton in command of the Canadian militia?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give any information to my hon. friend to-day.

P. E. I. MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Queen's, P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the government to the fact that no mails have been received from the province of Prince Edward Island since the 10th of this month, and I am informed that the new boat, the Minto, has been floating helplessly in the gulf since last Monday.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The steamer Minto left on Monday, but got caught in the ice and did not reach Pictou until yesterday. On Wednesday, a telegram came that she was in the ice, and the Stanley was at once ordered to be put in commission to take her place. The mails have been landed at Pictou and are on their way up.

Mr. MARTIN. Has the Cape route been put in operation so that the mails could come that way? Have any orders been given to have the mails forwarded by the Cape, or what has become of the Stanley, which is yet an efficient boat, and is tied up at the wharf in Georgetown?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman could not have caught my reply. The Stanley has been in Georgetown all winter, with her officers and engineers on board, and the fires banked, ready to take the place of the Minto in case of accident. On Thursday, within half an hour after the news came that the Minto was in the ice, orders were telegraphed to put the Stanley in commission, and she was ready to start this morning. But the Minto has reached Pictou and landed her mails, and is now returning to Georgetown.

SUPPLY—PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to again go into Committee of Supply, and the motion of Mr. Russell in amendment thereto.

Mr. W. H. MONTAGUE (Haldimand). I wish, for a short time, to discuss the motion which has been put in your hands, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and seconded by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). The mover and seconder of this motion both gave us yesterday afternoon well written and well read exercises, to which I am sorry a larger number of members did not take the privilege of listening. I am afraid, Sir, that I am not prepared to present to the House an equally well-written and well-conducted essay upon the subject which these gentlemen introduced to your attention. I hope that Hansard got every word of the statements which the hon. gentleman from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Burrard gave to the House; but if Hansard is in fault, I am sure that the notes which these hon. gentlemen have are sufficiently voluminous and complete to supply anything that may be lacking in the correctness and completeness of the Hansard report.

We are becoming accustomed to rather extraordinary parliamentary usage under hon. gentlemen opposite, but I think we may all agree that we had yesterday one of the most extraordinary spectacles yet exhibited, so far as parliamentary procedure is concerned, when we had a Minister of Finance of the present government moving that this House go into Committee of Supply, and one of his own supporters, and a very prominent supporter—evidently after very careful consideration, I am not going to say collusion—moving that instead of going into committee to grant supplies for the public service, this House should pause in its proceedings to express an opinion upon a policy which hon. gentlemen opposite placed upon our statute-books some three years ago. It appears to me there can be only one reason why that motion was placed in the hands of the junior member for Halifax, and why such exceedingly great care was taken in the presentation of the reasons for its adoption, and that must be this, that the case for that policy of the present government is so very weak that it requires a special debate and a special motion to impress its importance and value upon the attention of this House and the country.

There may have been another reason why the government were particularly anxious. It may be that the government were particularly anxious to give the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell) an opportunity of declaiming to the House some fine patriotic poetry, which he did in the later stages of his speech—poetry which was so stirring in itself and so stirringly presented, that the Minister of Railways dropped off, under its influence, into a peaceful slumber, from which he was only awakened by the voice of the hon. member for Burrard declaiming later on: Behold, old things have passed away, and all things have become new. The Minister of Railways, evidently thinking that this was the announcement of the result of the general elections soon to take place, started up from his slumber and anxiously lent his ear to the carefully rounded phrases of the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Burrard, however, evidently was not referring to events about to happen, but I fancy that he glanced around this House and referred to events which have happened, and if he referred to events which have happened within the circle of his own party and the circle of that party's dealing with public policies and issues, no truer words were ever spoken in this parliament.

Why, Sir, he glanced around for a moment and looked for those men, who only a few years ago, wept over the fate of the poor, downtrodden, highly-taxed farmers of the province of Ontario and the North-west; and lo and behold, each one of these gentlemen was either gone or dumb. He looked for the gentleman who, only a few years ago, declared that we were spendthrifts, that we were robbers, when we spent thirty-eight millions of public money; but he had gone and was resting peacefully and happily under the conviction that we were economists when we were spending fifty millions. He looked around for the gentleman who once voted for a Bill introduced by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), declaring it to be against the independence of parliament for a member of this House to accept an office of emolument under the Crown; and he found that a large number had gone to take those offices, and still a larger number of those who remained were waiting for the chance. He looked around for the gentleman who, a few years ago, with his hand on his heart and a tear in his voice, declared that just so sure as the sun of springtime should break the fetters that bound the river Ottawa, just so sure would unrestricted reciprocity prosper and become triumphant in this country, and so far as he was concerned he was willing to live and die by it—and he found the hon. gentleman living by entirely other means. He looked around for a reciprocity treaty and found on his desk a bill of $34,600 for a pleasure excursion to Quebec and Washington, but no reciprocity treaty, although these gentlemen declared that it would soon be secured provided the electors of Canada would place them in office. He looked around also for the anti-Imperialists of other days, he looked around for the men who sneered at the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) as the member for the empire, and he found that the anti-Imperialists had gone and that the Liberal party in Canada, at least as represented in parliament, has become still louder in their professions of Imperialistic ideas than we ever dared to be when we were on that side of the House.

Well, Sir, the hon. member for Burrard, and the hon. member for Halifax, are somewhat new to the House. This is their first parliament, and if they dreamed that they were endorsing the past Liberal members and Liberal leaders in this House by pronouncing so strongly in favour of Imperialistic policy, they were entirely mistaken. I can tell the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Burrard that in the old days the Imperial Federation League used to meet in one of the small committee rooms of the House of Commons, and I can tell them that it was a surprise in those days to find a member of the Liberal party at any of those meetings. But we turned up at a meeting of the United Empire League in the railway committee room of the House of Commons, and there was scarcely room for the Conservative members who found in their hearts to come in, because of the large number of those not new Liberals, but new Imperialists, who find it profitable in these days to float on the current of popular Imperialistic policy. Why, Sir, I remember only a few years ago when the foremost advocate of inter-Imperial trade paid a visit to the House of Commons of Canada. I refer to a gentleman who time and time again in the Imperial House moved motions on this question. He was a guest there, and was given a banquet in the restaurant below; and I remember that on that occasion only one member of the Liberal party saw fit to lend his encouragement or pay us the compliment of his presence at that banquet—and he at the end, felt it necessary to privately make excuse for his presence there. I may tell the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Burrard that when they were talking of the leader of this government being an empire-builder, it is not so many years past that the Prime Minister, when the American Senate had rejected a treaty which Grover Cleveland declared was a fair and honourable settlement of the fisheries questions that were in dispute, and when having rejected it, the Americans threatened retaliation—though what they should retaliate against us upon no one ever understood—when that bull of retaliation was threatened against Canada, the gentleman who is now called an empire-builder stood up in the city of St. Thomas and declared that the United States were right and that Canada and Great Britain were wrong, and that their conduct towards the United States in connection with the fisheries question had been vexatious and harassing. And I might tell these hon. gentlemen a fact which they already know, I fancy, that, within sound of their voices, when they were talking of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House as empire-builders, when they were boasting loudly of their Imperialistic spirit, and moving and seconding a motion of compliment to the government on its so-called preferential trade, was a very distinguished gentleman who, only a short time ago, addressing an American audience, proposed his policy to them and declared that the result of that policy would be to turn over to the people of the United States the trade of half a continent. And that hon. gentleman is now classed with the Imperialists whom these hon. gentlemen are supporting in this debate.

We welcome, Sir, the change from anti-Imperialism to Imperialism. We find no fault with it. We are delighted and Canada is delighted. We are told by some who are ungenerous, I think, that it will only last as long as hon. gentlemen opposite are in power. I do not believe that. Hon. gentlemen during eighteen years of opposition learned one lesson at least—learned it well and by severe experience—that Canada will not support any policy that is not Canadian and British, and that it will not support any party that does not favour a Canadian and British policy. The special work of the hon. member for Halifax was to dilate upon the beauties of the so-called preferential tariff. And I am sorry that before he had well begun he made a few statements which were calculated to injure him in our good opinion, and to lessen our confidence in the fairness of his judgment on the questions he was about to discuss. He began by saying that the Liberal party, as regards the tariff of this country, had carried out their promises to the electors. I must conclude, Sir, that that was a 'lapsus linguae' on the part of the hon. gentleman. I do not think that the hon. member for Halifax believes any such statement as that, and I believe still less that the people of the province of Nova Scotia, from which the hon. gentleman comes, believe it. And I think that his colleagues, one of the gentlemen whom he supports, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) can tell him this is not believed by the people of the province of Prince Edward Island, whose opinion has in some measure and to some extent, been recently expressed upon that question. If the hon. Minister of the Interior were here I think he would tell him, so far as the people of Manitoba are concerned, that they have no confidence in the statement which the hon. gentleman has made as regards the tariff of this country. I do not intend to deal at length with that question, except to give a few figures, if the hon. gentleman will permit me to do so. Unfortunately, they are figures which have been given in this House before, but, they must be given as long as the statements which they contradict are made, and improperly made, in this House. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, was, as we all know, the destruction of protection. Now, let us see whether these promises have been carried out. The rate per cent upon dutiable goods imported into Canada, in 1896 was 29·94, in 1899, it was 28·74, a decrease of one and one-fifth per cent, the former figures representing what we called protection, the latter figures representing what the hon. gentleman declares to be the destruction of protection. On dutiable and free goods, taking them altogether, in 1896, the rate was 18·28 per cent; in 1899, it was 16·57 per cent, or 1·71 per cent of a decrease, the difference representing the difference between the two tariffs. I am quite aware that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), declares that it is a most fallacious system to take averages, such as percentages like these, and base an argument for comparative purposes upon them. I am not disposed to dispute with the hon. gentleman upon that point, because, I think it is useless to dispute with an hon. gentleman, who, in this House, only a few years ago, called us extravagant, called us robbers, called us wasteful, when we spent $38,000,000, and who, in bad health, travelled all the way to Toronto to say that he and his colleagues were statesmen and economists when they spent $50,000,000 of the people's money. I want to ask the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), whether, in view of these facts, in view of these statements, he will persist in his assertion, that the government of Canada have carried out their policy in regard to the destruction of protection? Is the hon. gentleman himself satisfied? If the hon. gentleman is satisfied, are his constituents satisfied, are the people of Nova Scotia satisfied? If the hon. gentleman will not answer, let me ask the hon. members from the province of Manitoba and from the North-west Territories, whether there is one of them who will stand up in this House and say that the Liberal party of Canada have carried out their promises in regard to the reduction of taxation in this country. The hon. gentlemen ought to know, and they will know, I fancy, in very good time, that there is not a farmer in the Dominion of Canada, with an unbiassed mind, with a mind that the light of the facts has clearly shone on, who will say that the burden of taxation, which rested upon him, has been lightened by the conduct, or by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Prime Minister smiles, a smile of dissent. Will he tell me an article on which the farmers of Canada, to-day, pay less taxes than they did when hon. gentlemen, upon this side of the House, were in power? I have talked with farmers upon both sides of politics, and I have yet to find a Liberal farmer, who will say that the Liberal party of Canada, by their tariff of 1897, have lightened the burden of taxation, under which he, to use the words of hon. gentlemen opposite, groaned previous to the accession of these hon. gentlemen to office.

Mr. WOOD. What about binder twine ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. What about binder twine ? I thank my dear friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood), for that.

Mr. WOOD. What about barbed wire ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Barbed wire, my hon. friend (Mr. Wood), says, but binder twine is the chief thing that disturbs the hon. gentleman's happy meditations. How much less has the farmer paid for his binder twine than he paid in 1896 ?

Mr. WOOD. There is no duty on it, at any rate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no duty on it. It is true there is no duty upon it, but, there is a combine, supported and aided and abetted and kept together by the action of the government of Canada, for the benefit of hardware merchants, such as the hon. gentleman opposite. Perhaps my hon. friend had better ask : What about coal oil ? I do not intend to go into these individual things, but I want to tell my hon. friend that if he and his colleagues go to meet the farmers in the province of Ontario, and in the other provinces of this Dominion, they will find that they are ready to declare, and are anxious to declare, that the policy of these hon. gentlemen is a humbug, a delusion and a snare, and no one knows it better than the hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, no one knows it better than their colleagues from the North-west. We had him, the other day, when he was discussing the question of the lumber duty, as the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), last night showed, stating that a delegation came before the government that had more influence than half a dozen provinces of Manitoba, and that he had to resign, or allow his colleagues to do as they wished. He did not resign, and the people of the North-west Territories have suffered just the same, if they did suffer, as in days gone by. The history of the preferential trade movement, it appears to me, divides itself into two periods ; the first one is up to the remarkable speech of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in March, 1896, and the second period is from that time on. What is the history of that movement up to the time to which I have referred ? A large amount of public opinion was being created and stirred in the colonies and at home, stirred in the colonies by such men as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who was sneered and jeered at, time and time again, in this House ; stirred by such men as the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy, who, at one time, paid a great deal of attention to that subject ; it was stirred at home, by such men as Colonel Howard Vincent, whose visit to the capital of Canada, I have already referred to, and stirred at home by the present hon. leader of the opposition, as by no other man, as hon. gentlemen will find when he visited all the great centres of population, of trade and commerce in the mother country, and pointed out to the people the falseness of their position, and the value to Canada and the empire that would result from the adoption of preferential trade between the colonies and the motherland. I do not need to go over all the agencies that were at work, but, I want to say, that, in all that period, from the inception of the movement up to the year 1896, there is not a line on record of any work being done by a member of the Liberal party, or by the Liberal party itself. Whoever else did it, the Liberal party did not do it. They made no speeches upon the subject ; they addressed no meetings on the subject, they moved no resolutions on the subject, except a motion in 1892, which I shall refer to, and which, Mr. Chamberlain in his celebrated speech at the Canada Club dinner, did not think worth while referring to, when he came to discuss the subject of Imperial and colonial trade. Well, Sir, in 1896, the period closed with that great speech of Mr. Chamberlain at the Canada Club dinner. A very great deal of discussion has taken place as to what was said and as to what was not said in that speech. I had the pleasure of sitting very close to Mr. Chamberlain when he was speaking ; I had the pleasure of listening to every word of that speech, and not only that, but I had the pleasure of discussing the question with Mr. Chamberlain, both before and after this speech had been made. First of all, the hon. member (Mr. Russell) says that no proposition was made by Mr. Chamberlain as representing the Imperial government ; but Mr. Chamberlain specifically said that while it was not the duty of Her Majesty's government to make a proposition, it was the pleasure of Her Majesty's government—as I know it was the pleasure of Mr. Chamberlain—to consider, and to seriously consider, any propositions which might come from the colonies with regard to greater freedom of trade between the colonies and the motherland. What did Mr. Chamberlain mean ? I know what Mr. Chamberlain meant ; I know the purpose of his speech ; and the purpose of that speech was to put the subject of Imperial and colonial trade, from an official source, into the public mind in Great Britain. The purpose of that great speech was to open the question up for discussion in the higher field of politics in the old country, and the purpose was further, to lay the foundation for a work which would eventually complete the building up of that Imperial and colonial trade advocated by Sir Charles Tupper, and advocated by Howard Vincent and others in the old country. Now, what was the foundation of that speech of Mr. Chamberlain's? Was it the resolution moved by Sir Louis Davies in 1892, which looked to some sort of a half-way or one-sided preference such as we have at the present time? No, Sir; Mr. Chamberlain never mentioned that resolution, but when he wanted a text for his speech, he went to the resolution and the speech of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and he quoted them both, giving them the stamp of his approval. No gentleman in this House will say that there are any two opinions with regard to what was meant time and time again by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) when he discussed that subject in this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chamberlain was criticised, it is true, but Mr. Chamberlain said he was not afraid of criticism if only the colonies would stand to his back, and Greater Britain could be aroused to the importance of that question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then we come to the second period. Mr. Chamberlain had not been idle after his speech at the Canada Club banquet. He made several addresses on the subject. Strength was gathering around the movement, and there can be no doubt that the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to whose mind, to whose heart, that subject of Imperial and colonial trade was most dear, looked upon the coming jubilee as a time when great things would result from the policy which he had launched at the Canada Club dinner in 1896. We had our Prime Minister of Canada go to these jubilee ceremonies, and I fancy the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain expected a hearty support from him. Well, Sir, what support was he given? The Prime Minister of Canada, the leader of a government pledged to support Imperial and colonial trade; pledged before the electors of Canada to get it more quickly than Sir Charles Tupper could possibly get it, pledged to it as a great boon to Canada; the Prime Minister of this country stood up, when he had only been a few hours on the soil of the motherland, and kicked completely over the work which Mr. Chamberlain and others had been doing for years. Why, the New York press, when it came to report the incident, said:

Now came a dramatic turn in the history of this movement.

And what was the dramatic turn? It was that Mr. Laurier stood up and said: We have given you a preference and we want nothing in return; we do not come with it as the price of something we wish to receive; we give it to you as a present. And then, said the New York press, and it said it to its happiness:

Then was killed the question of Imperial and colonial trade, which Mr. Chamberlain has been supporting in the heart of the empire, and which others have been supporting abroad.

But, Sir, Mr. Chamberlain was not satisfied even then, and at the conference of colonial Premiers he brought the question up once more. He discussed it with the Prime Ministers of those various colonies, and he said to them: If you want to have a commission to inquire into the why and the wherefore and the how, that this object can be attained to the advantage of both the colonies and the empire, Her Majesty's government will be most happy to take part in that commission and to undertake that work. Where is the voice of the Prime Minister of Canada asking that that commission should be appointed and that that work should be undertaken? Surely nothing less would have been expected of him than that he would have said, as a Prime Minister of Canada pledged to the support of that policy in the campaign of 1896; nothing less could have been asked of him than that he should have stood up for Canada and said: Let us have a commission to investigate the subject and to see whether it can be worked out upon a practical plan, if possible, and if we can we want it for the Dominion of Canada. But, there was the statement which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had made after he had landed in Liverpool; there was his statement: We give you this preference; we give it to you freely, and we ask and we expect nothing in return.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) has referred to all this movement as a beautiful dream, as a day dream, as a myth, as a charming myth, as a will-o'-the-wisp, in the labyrinthian pursuit of which the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) had many a time lost his way. Well, Sir, if it was a dream, a myth, and a charming myth, and a will-o'-the-wisp, it was a myth, and a charming myth, and a will-o'-the-wisp that attracted the attention of a man equal in intellect to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell); I mean the Right Hon. Jos. Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And, Sir, it was a day dream, and a beautiful dream, and a charming myth and a will-o'-the-wisp that that Secretary of State for the Colonies thought sufficiently important to invite the assembled Prime Ministers of the colonies to discuss, and to try and work into practical shape. And, if it was a beautiful dream, and a charming myth, why did the present Prime Minister say, in 1896, that it would be a boon to Canada, and why did he promise, if he came into power, to secure it for this country in right short time? Does the hon. member (Mr. Russell) see that in so describing this great policy, he is casting a slur, not only upon the Prime Minister of Canada, but a slur upon him who, I venture to say in the judgment of this House, is the livest, is the ablest, and the most up-to-date Secretary of State for the Colonies that Her Majesty's government has ever included among the members of any cabinet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, Sir, what is the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell)? It is a resolution that asks us to assert three things. First, it asks us to say that the working of this so-called preferential trade of hon. gentlemen opposite has been satisfactory and advantageous to Great Britain and Canada—and that is asking us to go a long way. Second, he asks us to say: That it has welded the empire and Canada into one, and, third, he asks us to express our approval of the plan on which this preference has been granted. The real purpose is not particularly to get the opinion of this House, but the real purpose is to make campaign literature with which to go to the country to try and convince the people of Canada, that these gentlemen with their one-sided policy have got a real preferential trade with the motherland, which every one in this House and in the country knows they have not.

As to its being satisfactory to Canada, on what ground does the hon. member for Halifax ask us to say that? Has this half-way, one-sided Imperial preference done anything for Canada? Will the hon. gentleman tell us of a dollar of taxation that it has saved to anybody? Will he tell us of a single settler whom it has placed on the fields of the North-west Territories, which would be filled to overflowing to-morrow with hardy toilers if we had the proper preferential trade with the mother country. Will he tell us of one individual who has gone there as the result of that policy? Will he tell us of any way in which this half-hearted, one-sided preferential tariff has provided a market for our products? There is not a gentleman in this House who would dare to stand up and say that as a result of this policy the market for Canadian agricultural products has been widened to the extent of one single dollar. Why then does the hon. member for Halifax ask us to say that it has operated satisfactorily for this Dominion? I think I heard it stated by the hon. member for Burrard last night that it had largely increased our trade in bacon, pork and hams; and we had a letter read, which had been written to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), stating that because of the reductions which had been made in favour of Great Britain, the sincerity of which I shall discuss a little later, the people of Great Britain were now going to use Canadian flour. Was ever a more ridiculous statement made in this House? The hon. member for Burrard and the hon. member for Kent would have us believe that the English people are going to prefer Canadian products because we put up the taxes against Great Britain 25 per cent, and then took them down 25 per cent. We had the Prime Minister declaring last session that as a result of their policy $2,000,000 worth of eggs had been sold to Great Britain. Last night we had the declaration of the hon. member for Burrard that not only had the policy increased our trade, but that it had set aflame the poetic genius of Great Britain, and as a consequence we had magnificent patriotic odes written by British poets to bind the different parts of the empire together. Well, if we can only prove that it has set aflame the poetic souls of Great Britain, and that it has caused the sale of $2,000,000 worth of eggs, I would be inclined to withdraw my objection to this motion; but what are the facts with regard to the trade in agricultural products in the markets of Great Britain? The fact is that this increase is the result of the policy pursued by the government which departed from office on the 20th of June, 1896. It is the result of the care we took in cultivating that market; and how did we find the sympathies of hon. gentlemen opposite on those occasions? Where were the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), when we were trying to increase the market of Great Britain for Canadian products? They were shouting with all their power of a great market of 60,000,000 people to the south of us, from which we had been shut out, and to enter which they were willing almost to sacrifice our nationality, the control of our tariff and the control of our territory. I adopt the words of the hon. member for Burrard, and I tell him that as for this preferential clause of the tariff being an advantage to Canada, it is a myth, a delusion, a snare; and the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution and the hon. gentleman who seconded it are only trying to make the delusion greater and to impress the humbug more fully on the electors of Canada, by moving this resolution and by placing on Hansard the speeches to which we listened yesterday.

What are the advantages of this clause to Great Britain? If there are none to Canada, we are asked to say, 'Oh, there are great advantages to Great Britain.' We pointed out last year and in 1898, that the clause was not calculated to give any advantage to the trade of Great Britain. We were told then that we were speculating, and speculating with sinister motives. To-day we are no longer called speculators with regard to facts, because we have the returns brought down by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), which show what we stated in 1898 and 1899, that this policy is a delusion so far as any increase of British trade in this country is concerned. Let me give the hon. gentleman some figures culled from the reports of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The imports last year were : From England, $37,000,000 ; from the United States, $93,000,000 ; increase from Great Britain over previous year, $4,500,000 ; increase from the United States over previous year, $14,400,000. Compared with the last year that the Conservative party were in office, there has been an increase in the imports from Great Britain of $4,000,000, and an increase in the imports from the United States of $35,000,000. In other words, under the preferential tariff that was to increase the imports from Great Britain to Canada, we have nearly nine times as large an increase of the imports from the United States as we have of the imports from Great Britain. Let us see what were the imports for home consumption from various countries since 1896 : From Belgium, 151 per cent ; from South America, 107 per cent ; from Switzerland, 76 per cent ; from Holland, 67 per cent ; from the United States, 59 per cent ; from Italy, 52 per cent ; from Spain, 48 per cent ; from Portugal, 39 per cent ; from France, 38 per cent ; from Germany, 24 per cent ; and from Great Britain, 12 per cent. Will the hon. member for Halifax, in the face of these figures, ask us to say that these preferential clauses have worked advantageously with respect to the importations from Great Britain ? These figures show the actual situation, and they show that the whole thing is a sham, a delusion and a snare.

I remember how in 1891 hon. gentlemen opposite made the country ring with charges that we were discriminating against Great Britain. I remember how the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) stood up in this House and in the greatest passion made that charge against us, because we were buying more raw materials from the United States than from Great Britain, claiming that the average tariff against Great Britain was greater than that against the United States. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I will turn up his speech for him. He challenged our loyalty, and gave us a scolding that made this House ring. What is the government doing of which the hon. gentleman is a member ? On the goods imported from the United States last year the average tariff was 12½ per cent. From Great Britain it is 18.8-10th per cent. Let us see what the actual figures are ? In 1896, we got $29,000,000 worth of free goods from the United States and $9,000,000 from Great Britain. In 1899, we got $48,000,000 of free goods from the United States and $10,000,000 from Great Britain. The increase of free goods from the United States has been in that time $19,162,964, and from Great Britain a little over three-quarters of a million.

But these hon. gentlemen say : Look at the press comments on what this has done for Great Britain. We had article after article read by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) last night from the London press, from the London Times, and all the great journals in England, complimenting this government on giving a preference to the motherland in the markets of Canada. I asked the hon. gentleman what was the date of these articles, but he did not give the date. He will find that the dates correspond with the time when these resolutions were introduced and when the Imperial government did not think they were humbug. I ask the hon. gentleman to give us now the opinion of the London press upon the trade figures which are published, and as to which the London press are dumb and critical. But while the English press is dumb, there is a class of newspapers that is jubilant, and that class is the United States journals. You can scarcely take up a leading United States journal which to-day is not laughing at this Imperial colonial preferential trade. These journals say : They may have as much Imperial colonial preferential trade as they like, but our trade with Canada is swelling and that is all we care about. If the hon. gentleman will change his resolution and ask us to say that it has been advantageous to the people of the United States, we could vote for it, but to say that it has been advantageous to the people of Great Britain is utterly at variance with the facts and figures which they themselves give.

We are asked by the hon. gentleman to say that this policy has been one of the main factors in welding the empire together. Oh, how the hon. gentleman dilated upon that. The very announcement of it, he said, stirred the heart of the empire, and gave Canada a position that she never before occupied in the Imperial mind. He says it gave Great Britain a new idea of the colonies, that were once looked down upon, in the Imperial mind. Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman that if we had to depend upon this policy to weld the empire together, the empire would be sadly apart. Sir, what is it that has changed the sentiment in Great Britain with regard to the colonies ? It is the success of the colonies themselves ; it is the success of such grand schemes as that of confederation, which tied these colonies together in a great empire upon this side ; it was the construction of such magnificent public work as the Canadian Pacific Railway—a colonial but an Imperial highway also, against which these hon. gentlemen kicked and rebelled with all their might ; it was the construction of our great canals, and the rejection, emphatic rejection, of such policies as these hon. gentlemen supported in 1891, when they proposed to cut adrift practically from the empire by discriminating against her. It was the rejection of such policies as that which raised Canada to its present high position in the Imperial mind ; it was the declaration in 1896 by this parliament—and I had the privilege of reading a telegram announcing that declaration to a London audience myself, and that audience nearly went wild with enthusiasm over it—it was the declaration of this parliament that no matter what might be the dangers to the empire, Canada would stand by her side in the forefront of the battle, and it was the implementing of this offer in 1899 and in 1900—an implementing made slowly when it ought to have been made rapidly—it is all these things that have cemented Canada to the empire, that have made its heart beat in unison with ours; and I tell the hon. member for Burrard and the hon. member for Halifax that the fall of one brave Canadian lad in front of the trenches at Modder River has done more to cement the empire together than the operation of this policy could do in a thousand years.

I am sorry that the Prime Minister is not here at the moment, and I was sorry he was not here last night. He declared himself a nation builder, but last night he was called an empire builder. I want to pause for a moment just to see what the hon. gentleman has done in the way of empire building. In what way has he been an empire builder? Was it in waiting until seven other colonies had offered their assistance to the motherland? Was it raising constitutional reasons and saying we had no power to spend the money to send these men to help the mother country? Was it in declaring in his order in council that the sending of the first contingent should not be taken as a precedent? Is it by such actions that the Prime Minister is to be regarded as an empire builder, or is it the support he has given the lines of public policy during his long years of public life, every one of which has been shown to be wrong as the years went by.

I want to say just another word. The hon. gentleman himself claims to be the builder of a nation. He has told us that Canada was a mere collection of scattered provinces, but he woke up one morning, after he got over in the old country, to find that we were a nation. For my part—and I am sure this House agrees in the opinion—I do not believe that nations are built in a single day. They come of long paths of difficulty, through floods of affliction, through fires of trial, they come up slowly and are the growth of wise public policy and labour. The men who dropped politics in 1865-6 helped to build our nation; the men who built the Canadian Pacific Railway helped to build the Canadian nation; the men who instituted the national policy helped to make the Canadian nation, and that help was so important that when these men came into power, after opposing that policy for eighteen long years, they feared to remove a stone of that structure because they knew that if they did so they would be kicked out of power. And where is the hon.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was Finance Minister in the Mackenzie administration? Where is all his abuse of the manufacturers, as 'robbers great and robbers small?' What has become of his cry that the farmers were being bled white? He has closed his shop where he once dispensed unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union, and has put up a sign: Closed until the Imperial procession goes by.

We are asked to declare that this one-sided preferential policy is a wise one. I am not prepared to say that it is the wisest policy in regard to this matter that could be adopted. I am not prepared to say that Great Britain ever asked for any such thing—she never asked for it. We were told last night in a voice almost of tears, that it was just the thing for a daughter to make such a present to her mother, that it was a generous thing, that it was a humane thing, that it was a filial thing for a daughter to make such a gift to her mother; and we were asked to believe that it was in pure sympathy, for all Great Britain had done for us, that we, as a loving, filial and obedient daughter, should hold out our hand and present this boon to Great Britain. Why, were we asked to do it? Because of the good things that England has ever done for us? What has she ever done for us? 'We owe nothing to the old country, unless it be Christian forgiveness for her mismanagement of our affairs. I tell the hon. gentleman, if he wants to know it, that England owes more to Canada, than Canada owes to England.'

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Trade and Commerce recognizes it in a moment. He has said it—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am ready to prove it anywhere.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, we have the pair—we have the hon. member for Burrard, who, with tears running down his cheeks, told us that this was in return for all we owe to Great Britain, because of her goodness to us, because she had done so much for us; and one of the members who offered it, I mean the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), said that the only thing we owe to Great Britain is Christian forgiveness for having mismanaged our affairs. It cannot be that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, ever presented it for that reason, because he surely would not present such a great boon as this when England had never given anything to us. Well, what was the reason? We got nothing in return for it, so it cannot be for that reason. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows the reason,—it was to catch the popular breeze, to do something in the hope of gaining the support of the loyal people of Canada.

Now, I feel that I have already detained the House too long, but, I wish to say a few words more before I resume my seat. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell), asks us what we, on this side, ever did for the motherland. Oh, he says you jawed, and jawed, and jawed, and jawed.

Mr. MAXWELL. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell), takes it back. He said some people jawed, and jawed, and jawed, and jawed.

Mr. MAXWELL. I did not say that at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I tell the hon. gentleman, that Canada has done a good deal for the motherland. I agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in that regard, but, I will not go so far as he has gone in the statement which he has made to-day, and which the Prime Minister the other day tried to get him not to make. What have we done for the motherland? We refused to discriminate against her, even when she asked us to do it. We built our great continental highway, which, as I say, is an Imperial, as well as a colonial highway. We have extended our hand in the time of threatened trouble, and in the hour of actual trouble, we have sent our assistance. This is the outcome of Imperial pride, a manifestation of the spirit of Imperial and colonial attachment. But it is a separate thing entirely from trade. I learned one lesson from the hon. gentlemen opposite, when, for a great number of years, they sat on this side. That lesson was that sentiment was one thing, and trade another thing. And, I want the hon. gentlemen to carry that out now, Sir. I express the sentiments of this House, and I believe, even of members of the government; I express the sentiments of ninety-nine hundredths of the people of Canada, when I say that we would pay our last dollar and send our last man to defend the honour of the British flag. But, when it comes to a matter of trade, we have as much right to ask a quid pro quo from John Bull, as we have to ask it from any other party on earth. While we are willing to join in all these great Imperial projects, while we are willing to lend our strength and support to the empire, we must not forget that we are a struggling people, and that we are along side a great, strong and progressive nation, and that we have to protect our own trade, we have to protect the labour of our own people. I say that the proper policy for this parliament to pursue and the proper policy for the government to pursue, is to adopt the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition, I think in the year 1897, which looks to the opening up of negotiations between this country and the motherland, letting them know, that if they will give us a preference in their markets, we will give them a large preference in our markets. In other words, this is a matter of business. When it is a matter of sentiment, when it is a matter of empire, we stand by them as closely and as warmly as places nearest the Throne. But, when it comes to business—why, business is business, as I have the authority of a member of the government for saying. In closing, I wish to say, that we on this side enter most loyally and heartily into every project which looks to the upbuilding of the empire; and, we only ask that, in dealing with matters of trade, the rights of Canadian labour, the rights of Canadian capital, the rights of Canadian enterprise, shall be protected; and if we open our markets to any other country, we expect an opening in their markets. It is true, as hon. gentlemen opposite have told us, in the resolution that Great Britain has opened her markets to us. She has opened her markets to every one. The Transvaal Republic had as free a field in the markets of Great Britain as Canada. She has abused it. We have not abused it. But, we have had no special terms in the markets of Great Britain. She has only given us what she has given to the world. And, as we are here, trying to build up a nation on the northern half of this continent, it becomes the government of Canada, and it becomes the Liberal party of Canada, so long as they are in power, to deal with a business matter in a business way.

Mr. JAMES McMULLEN (North Wellington). The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), has indulged in generalities. In the statements he has made of Mr. Chamberlain's utterances, and the deductions which he draws from what Mr. Chamberlain says, he never quoted a single word that Mr. Chamberlain uttered. My hon. friend (Mr. Russell), in his address last night quoted from statements of Mr. Chamberlain and other prominent men, on this important question. But, the hon. member for Haldimand, in the address that he has just delivered, did not give us a single extract to back up the statements that he made. He dealt with generalities only. He made a few remarks with regard to the down-trodden farmers of this country. Mr. Speaker, the farmers of this country did suffer for many years under the policy adopted and carried out by hon. gentlemen opposite. They are a pretty hard class to educate, but eventually they did get their eyes opened, and saw and realized that the national policy, which was supposed to be the cure for all their troubles, and, which, they were told, would make them rich, instead of making them rich had, year by year, made them poorer. The best evidence of that is, that to-day, there is not a farmer in Canada, I care not whether he is a Conservative or a Reformer, that will not openly and frankly admit that his financial position to-day is greatly improved as compared with what it was under the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. There is not a man in Canada to-day, from the little urchin who sells his papers on the corner of the street for a cent apiece, to the man who counts his millions in his office, but is ready to admit and to declare that the condition of Canada is very much better than it was under hon. gentlemen opposite. In regard to this question of the preferential tariff, hon. gentlemen opposite feel pained because they are forced to realize the difficulty they have to overcome when they go before the electorate of this country, because of the position they have taken upon this question. The people have reaped a very considerable advantage from the adoption of the preferential tariff. I challenge my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) to go into a wholesale house in the city of Toronto, in the city of Montreal, or in any wholesale town in this Dominion and get into quiet conversation with the merchants of this country. I will venture to predict that he will not find a Tory, however pronounced, but will, quietly and secretly admit that the preferential tariff has been a decided advantage to the trade of this country, and that the people to-day are reaping the benefit of that tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite realize that they have lost the golden opportunity which they had for eighteen years. During all that time they never dared to handle, with a master hand, the great question of securing better and closer trade relations with Great Britain, than, at that time, existed. They lost their opportunity, but it has been taken by the present government. My hon. friend says that we got nothing in return. I deny that statement; I claim that there is not a Canadian who enters the British market, but is given a warmer welcome than ever before in the history of this country. There is not a Canadian who has any produce to sell but who finds, when he enters the English market, that the hearts of Englishmen are opened to him, and that there is a feeling of kindness and cordiality which he never realized before. I know it; I know men who have gone into the English market with commodities from Canada to sell, and I know that, in every case, to-day, Canadian products receive priority over those of any other country, the commodity being equally good. Take the increases in the exports from our shores for the last number of years, take the enormous increases that have taken place recently in the exports of this country, and you will come to the conclusion at once that there is a decided improvement in our trade with Great Britain, and that the general returns received by the people of Canada are more satisfactory, more along the line that will secure an extension of trade than ever they have been before in the history of the country. I say that it is a very great boon, and the people of the country are reaping that advantage to-day. In addition to that the sending of the contingent that has gone to South Africa from this country has intensified the feeling of kindness and cordiality of the English people towards the people of Canada, and that action is one that will tend to improve our trade conditions and will create a feeling of kindness and cordiality in the minds of people throughout Great Britain that never existed under the national policy. Never, in the history of this country, did a more unfortunate day dawn for the kindly intercourse of trade between Canada and Great Britain than the day when the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), who sits, now, in his seat, introduced the measure of protection into Canada. There was not a chamber of commerce, there was not a board of trade, there was not an iron-mongers' association, that did not, in their meetings, pronounce themselves in the most pointed terms, in opposition to the tariff which was proposed to be put in force in Canada. It was a step that was intended to administer a slap in the face to the people of England. Yet, that policy was continued for eighteen years. They kept on, from year to year raising the tariff. What was the declaration of that tariff? The declaration was that we want to shut out every portion and every pound of English goods from Canada that we can.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Under the tariff, that these hon. gentlemen adopted and maintained for years, they declared that they wanted to make the people of Canada manufacture every dollar's worth of goods and shut out all the British goods that they possibly could. Was that a tariff that was likely to create a kindly feeling in English hearts towards the people of Canada? No, it was a tariff to estrange the feelings of Englishmen and to produce resentment in the English mind. When the present government came in power they introduced a preferential tariff; they turned the face of Canada to England and the face of England to Canada, so that we should trade with the friends of Canada rather than with the enemies of Canada. It was an unfortunate period when that policy was inaugurated, and which continued for eighteen years. It has been changed now, and I repeat that the face of Canada is turned towards England, that the smiles of Canada and desires of the colony are towards the motherland, that the face of England is looking towards Canada, and that the great motherland is smiling upon us as it has not done for a quarter of a century. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has spoken about honest government. The people of this country have been sickened and nauseated by the corruption and debauchery that characterized the administration of the affairs of this country for eighteen years. The people are not so exacting in regard to the amount that a government will spend, but they are exacting, and they are going to be exacting in regard to the measure of honesty that characterizes that expenditure. Hon. gentlemen opposite spent $36,000,000, and they say it has run up to $54,000,000. The people will not grumble, and there is no complaint about increased taxation, so long as the money is honestly expended. If there is any one thing which is an indisputable fact it is, that the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches are endeavouring to honestly administer the affairs of this country. They have been subjected to criticism, day after day, they have been subjected to investigation, they have been subjected to charges, yet, up to the present time, and they have occupied those benches for four years, they have never been proved guilty of one single act that was wrong. This is the kind of government that the people want. They are not so particular in regard to the expenditure. What they want is an honest return for their taxes, and they are getting it now. When I used to sit upon the other side of the House, year after year, from session to session, we were investigating scandals, we were unearthing wrong-doing, we were disclosing acts that were a disgrace to any country. What was the result? The people were long suffering, they endured it a long time, but, in 1896, they took the bit in their teeth and turned out of office the men whose administration was so characterized by wrong-doing that they had forfeited their claim upon the further confidence of the people, and new men were put in their places. These men have proven worthy of their trust. I say to the men who occupy the Treasury benches to-day that they shall have my support as long as they conduct the affairs of this country honestly. But, Sir, the very moment it can be proved that they are guilty of a Pacific scandal, of a Curran Bridge scandal, of a Printing Bureau scandal, or a Langevin Block scandal, this government cannot have my support any longer. The people of this country want honest government, and they are getting it now, and they appreciate that fact. My hon. friend (Mr. Montague) has declared that this government did not carry out their pledges. Sir, there never has been a government in Canada which has fulfilled so many of the promises they made to the electors as the government that now occupies the Treasury benches during the four years they have been in power. We promised we would abolish the abominable Franchise Act that cost this country such a vast and useless expenditure, and it has been abolished. We promised that we would reduce the duties and we have done it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) admitted that there had been a small reduction, but let me tell him that the reduction is very considerable. In 1896, the taxation was 18·26 per cent, in 1897 it was 17·87 per cent, and in 1898 it was 16·95. Had the Foster tariff been kept in operation, last year, then there would have been collected by it out of the pockets of the people of this country $27,282,000, while under the Fielding tariff, there was only collected $25,382,000, or a saving of $2,000,000 to the people of this country, amounting to forty cents per head of the population. This government has changed the tariff, and the tariff is now heading in the right direction. I can remember that when the Conservatives were adjusting the tariff the corridors around this Chamber were crowded with men from all parts of Canada seeking increases and increases of duty all the time. These men are not to be found in the corridors of the House to-day. Any of them that come begging here at all come to ask that they be tenderly dealt with. They say: Don't reduce the tariff too far; we are now struggling. That is a very different picture from what it used to be when the Tories were in power, when these people came here demanding increases of duty, and when the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) opened his ears to their demands and gave them all they wanted. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) talked about binder twine, and I must say that gentlemen opposite are hard-pressed for a grievance when they have to come to binder twine to make a charge against the government. These gentlemen opposite know well that the increase in the price of binder twine was on account of the raw material becoming scarce owing to the Spanish war.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, they know that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. You may say no, if you like, but you cannot get up in your places and prove your 'no.' We know that because the manila, the raw material for the manufacture of binder twine, could not be obtained during the war with Spain, the inevitable result followed that the manufactured article increased in price. That is the true explanation of the increased price of binder twine. I tell these gentlemen opposite that they cannot blind the farmers of this country into the belief that the government is responsible for the increased price of binder twine. The farmers were humbugged for eighteen years, but they have got their eyes opened now, and the Conservatives cannot humbug them any longer.

The other night the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) told us that the Prime Minister had stolen his horse. He said that he and the Premier were going to run a race, and when he came to mount his horse he found the Prime Minister had taken it for himself. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) meant, of course, the national policy horse. Allow me to tell him that when he stabled that horse in 1896, the old nag was knee-sprung, and foundered, and ring-boned and spavined, but under the magnificent treatment of the financial veterinarian, Mr. Fielding, that horse has been cured of all its diseases. My friends opposite rode the old horse and brought it under the wire at the rate of three or four million dollars a year deficit, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has taken him under the wire gallantly with a surplus of three or four million dollars every year for the past four years. He has cured the old animal, and it is a good thing for the country that he did. If the leader of the opposition has lost his horse, the country has found out that it would be a blessing to Canada if he had lost that horse years before 1896. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) complained that the country was not experiencing the increased population that was anticipated. Well, we are perfectly willing to compare the record of the immigration department now, with the record of that department under the rule of the Conservative government. Is it to be wondered that when we sat on the opposite side of the House we advocated the absolute necessity of retrenchment in the expenditure, in face of the fact that our population was fleeing to the United States? But, Sir, a new era has come; the tide has turned; and in place of Canadians going to the United States, thousands of citizens from the United States are returning to cultivate our fertile fields in Canada and to engage in our industries; so that, we now see the dawn of a more hopeful future. Under the wise and prudent administration of my esteemed friend the Prime Minister, prosperity will undoubtedly crown the future of our country, and ensure to us a measure of success that we have never experienced in the past. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) has commented upon the fact that we have increased our imports from the United States during the past two years. Allow me to tell you that that very thing is a grand evidence of the prosperity of the country, for the simple reason that nearly 90 per cent of what we import from the United States is raw material. We take our raw material from there, and we increase its value in the process of manufacture, and our people get the benefit of that increase. In Canada we do not grow manila, we do not grow corn to a large extent, we have not our coal areas just at the points where we want them, we do not grow a quality of tobacco that suits the taste of the majority of our people, and so we have to import the raw material. And so it is in many other lines. The result is that our people have been given labour, that labour has increased the value of the goods, and they are satisfied. We have not the complaints now that we had years ago. Go to the different factories in the country, and inquire of the artisans and mechanics, and you will find that there has not been for twenty years such a spirit of contentment among them as prevails to-day. Every mechanic in the country is employed, his home is comfortable and his children are well clad, and a feeling of general confidence and satisfaction prevails that has never prevailed before, and why? Because they realize that under the application of the tariff, as now adjusted, and under the able statesmanship displayed by the government in power, they are progressing and getting better off.

Now, to come to the question of preferential trade. There has been accomplished by the adoption of that policy a grand stroke of statesmanship on behalf of the people of this country. As I said before, hon. gentlemen opposite missed their opportunity; they did not venture to strike promptly to secure for Canada the privileges she would have secured under the application of that principle. They say the present government committed a great blunder in 1896, and I wish to heaven that they had blundered ten years ago. If blunders bring about such advantages, I say, in the name of Heaven, let us have more of them. The British preference has done good, and I hope the government will go on and increase it. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in averaging the present tariff, never give credit for the reductions given by the application of the British preference; and consequently they try to blind the eyes of the people by saying that there has been a reduction in the tariff of only 74-100 of 1 per cent. As to that, the business men of this country are the best judges, and they know that this tariff, as compared with the old one, gives them very decided advantages indeed. Let me give you a few items to prove this. For instance, take iron and steel. Under the old tariff the duty on scrap was $4 a ton, while under the new tariff it is $1 a ton. Under the old tariff the duty on pig iron was $4 a ton; under the new it is $2.50. On rolled iron and steel, the duty under the old tariff was 35 per cent, or $10 per ton; under the new it is $7 per ton, and on British goods $5.25. You can go through the whole list, and in every item you will find a corresponding reduction. Hon. gentlemen opposite will have great difficulty, when they go before the business men of this country, in persuading them that there has been no reduction. It is pretty hard to persuade a man that the tariff has not been changed in his favour when he is getting for $1 what he used to pay $4 for, and when he is getting for $5.25 what he used to pay $10 for. The fact is demonstrated to every business man when he finds that on all the articles he requires there has been a decided reduction, and that he is very much better off than he was before.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SUPPLY—PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McMULLEN. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had spent a few moments trying to point out the decided advantage which the preferential clause in our tariff has been to Canada. I think that any one, on reviewing the history of this country during the time that tariff has been in force, could not fail to come to the conclusion that under the operations of that tariff the relations between Canada and the mother country are infinitely better and more cordial than they ever were before. I was rather surprised at the course taken by the hon. leader of the opposition. If there is any man in this country who should congratulate the present government upon the effects of that new departure, it is that hon. gentleman. He had the privilege—and I do not deny for a moment that it was to Canada's advantage—of discharging for a number of years—the distinguished duties of High Commissioner in England. He had the opportunity of interviewing and being in close conversation with the highest dignitaries of the realm. He rubbed sleeves, I may say, with royalty every day in the year. He has come back to us after a number of years bespangled with honours, he and a distinguished member of his own family—and in place of appreciating the honour done him by supporting the action of the government and recognizing the honour we have done to the mother country and to ourselves, he opposes that tariff and the manner in which it was brought into existence. He should be the first to congratulate the government of this country on that noble and patriotic achievement. I am sorry that he has not chosen to take that course rather than the course he has outlined for himself as shown by the speeches made by him in this House.

Now, the hon. leader of the opposition is very fond of finding fault with this government and saying they have not fulfilled their pledges. If there is any man in this House or any man in this country who should hesitate to challenge any government for not fulfilling its pledges, it is the leader of the opposition. In 1878, the Conservative party came into power, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) being Finance Minister at that time. He had declared that an expenditure of $24,000,000 was altogether too high for the people of this country at that time, and it ought to be reduced to $22,500,000. The debt of this country was at that time $140,000,000. When the Canadian Pacific Railway resolutions were before this House, the hon. gentleman declared that the receipts from lands and other sources in the North-west would be so great that within ten years the country would have recouped to it every dollar of the large sum expended for the road, and the debt would be reduced to one hundred million dollars. And what was the result? Instead of the debt being reduced to $140,000,000, it was increased to $253,000,000; the annual expenditure, in place of being reduced to $22,500,000, was actually increased to over $40,000,000. Now, this is the history of the hon. gentlemen opposite, as outlined in the record of their leader. But we have a right to refer to the promises made by the hon. gentleman in the election of 1896. The hon. gentleman complains of the increased debt and increased expenditure. These points may be regarded as a little aside from the question before the House, but the leader of the opposition opened this line of discussion, and we must deal with the points he has brought forward. What were the promises he made in 1896? He promised he would build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the British Pacific and Vancouver Inland Railway in British Columbia, a line of railway to Hudson's Bay—he promised that in Manitoba—to extend the Manitoba and North-western, to improve St. Andrew's Rapids, to build the Rainy River Road, to virtually gridiron Prince Edward Island with branch roads, to make a net work of new local roads in all the older provinces, to build the Quebec Bridge, to renew the guarantee to the Chignecto Ship Railway, and to put a fast line of steamers on the Atlantic. At the same time there were hawked about by parties in close connection with the government of that day promises of all kinds with regard to the building of roads. What would have been the result if the hon. gentleman had got into power? In place of the debt of this country being increased by the very moderate sum it has been, we should have had an enormous increase, if the hon. gentleman made any attempt to carry out the promises he made. He finds fault and his followers find fault with the increased debt.

I ask leave of the House to draw attention to this point for a moment. It cannot be referred to too often. I have here a statement of the debt since 1878. I shall not give the different increases during that period; but we will take the five years up to 1896, when the present opposition were in power. We find that in these five years, they increased the debt by $20,688,397, or an average increase each year of $4,137,679. Under the present government, notwithstanding the fact that they have carried out enormous undertakings, spending between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000 to build a canal system and other public works, the increase by years has been as follows:

1897	$3,111,163
1898	2,417,802
1899	1,100,100

This shows a continuous decrease and makes it clear that if the present government remain in power, in a very short time, in place of an increase there will be a continuous decrease of the debt. The net result is this: Taking the eighteen years of the Conservative government, we find that they increased the debt an average of $6,563,075 a year. In the last three years, the average increase has been $2,186,321. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the present government promised to reduce the debt. I think this is virtually a reduction as compared with the great increases under the previous government. Under that government there was a continuous increase, the average for every year of the administration being six and a half millions, while under this government it is only about two millions, and this, notwithstanding that they have carried out as great public works—and, we might say greater—than the amount ordinarily carried on by the recent government for many years. Virtually this is a reduction of the debt by about four and a half millions a year. Now, take the matter of taxation, and how does it compare? In 1896, the average taxation was 18.26 per cent; in 1897, 17.87 per cent; in 1898, 16.95 per cent; and in 1899, 16.70 per cent. There has been a continuous reduction in taxation every year. During the time that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power the tendency was the other way, but during the time that the present government have been in power the reduction in taxation has been continuous. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that free trade was promised to the people of Canada. I challenge that statement; I never heard it made by any member of the cabinet. I heard our leader say that it would be well that our tariff should point in the direction of free trade, and it does to-day. Every reduction in taxation is pointing in the direction of free trade. You would fancy, to hear these gentlemen talk, that the country should put off a protective system, or a revenue tariff system and adopt free trade next day. They say that you ought to adopt the principle of free trade and put on our free trade suit the next morning. That is a fallacy. Take England herself. How long did it take England to carry out the principle of free trade? It took her over forty years. In 1842 the duty was lowered on 750 articles. In 1844, the duty was abolished on wool; in 1845, the duty was abolished on 430 articles, the raw materials of manufacturers; in 1846, the Corn Laws were repealed; in 1853, the duty was repealed on 123 articles; in 1860, the duty was abolished on butter, cheese, tallow, etc.; in 1861, the duty was abolished on paper; in 1866, the duty was abolished on timber; in 1870, the duty was lowered on sugar; in 1873, it was again lowered on sugar, and in 1880, it was abolished. So that it took England over forty years to reach the goal of free trade. Yet, hon. gentlemen say that this government, or some members of it, or some person authorized to speak for it, had promised to clothe this country in a free trade suit the next morning after the election was over. There was no such promise given. But, I say, that the tendency of the tariff, as it is at present, is in the direction of freer trade, of lower duties, and that it plainly indicates that in place of imposing higher taxes on the people, it is actually reducing them. I have pointed out what the additions to the debt have been, and I have told the House that the amount expended on public works contracted for by the old government is something like $11,300,000, which shows clearly that there has been prudent, careful and statesmanlike management of the affairs of this country. I do not desire to go, at any length, into the further consideration of this question. I simply want to add that I sincerely regret that we are not likely to have a unanimous vote in this House in favour of the resolution which is now presented. I had hoped that hon. gentlemen opposite, as a matter of justice, as a matter that they felt was prudent on their own part, would have joined with the government and with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and would have made a pronouncement in regard to the preferential tariff that would have satisfied England, that would have satisfied those that are near to us in the south, that would have satisfied other portions of the empire, that this question of preferential consideration for the mother country has become a settled policy now, and, that whoever may be in power in future, whether it be a Conservative or a Liberal government, the mother country can depend upon Canada giving her an advantage in her market such as she enjoys to-day. It certainly would have told well in Canada's favour, and I am sorry that hon. gentlemen have indicated by their speeches, particularly the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), that this is not to be their course. In my humble judgment it would have been a prudent part for hon. gentlemen to have taken. In view of the fact that we will have the budget before very long, and that many of the questions that have been brought up in this discussion by the hon. leader of the opposition may have to be touched upon again, I shall not proceed further. I considered it my duty to offer these few remarks in favour of a policy that, in my humble opinion, has been of such advantage to this country, and I earnestly hope that it will become the permanent policy of the country. I do not think that if hon. gentlemen opposite were to-morrow returned to the Treasury benches, of which I do not think there is the slightest ghost of a chance, they would dare to turn back and to lay violent hands upon that policy which has been established by the present government.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, were it not for the great importance of the question which has been brought to the notice of the House by the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), I think, that, at this time, I should not have risen in my place to take part in this discussion, but, like the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) who has just taken his seat, would have waited for the budget speech before discussing this very important question. However, the question is before us and we desire to investigate it, to answer the statements made by the hon. gentlemen on your right with which, I need not tell you that we, on this side of the House, cannot agree. However, there are some things that have been said in this debate in regard to which I think the House is quite unanimous. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, congratulated the House and the country on the great prosperity that prevails in Canada at the present time. We join heartily with the hon. gentleman in congratulating the country on the great measure of prosperity that has prevailed in Canada for the last few years. We do that with the greater pleasure because, largely, I may say almost mainly, that prosperity, so far as it could be brought about by legislation, is due to the legislation that was put upon the statute-books of the country by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. In 1878, our great leader, Sir John Macdonald, inaugurated the national policy. Under that policy Canada prospered and became great for years and years. In 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1893 very serious attacks indeed were made by hon. gentlemen on your right on that policy, and an agitation arose in the country which endeavoured to persuade the people that times would be better if something like unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade, or free trade as they have it in England, was adopted as the policy of the country. The minds of the people became somewhat unsettled, and so urgent were the appeals of hon. gentlemen opposite, so strong were their denun-ciations of the national policy, that the people became alarmed, capital was withdrawn from profitable investment, business, to a large extent ceased to become profitable from the fear that hon. gentlemen might some day attain the Treasury benches and that the whole fiscal policy of the country would be turned over. It is no wonder that during these years, periods of depression did prevail, but after the elections of 1896, when fortune favoured hon. gentlemen to your right, and when they brought their tariff down to the House, and the country became aware that instead of unrestricted reciprocity, instead of continental free trade, instead of free trade as they have it in England, instead of protection being wiped out, the national policy was still maintained by this government, then the country was rejoiced, and I am proud to join with the hon. gentlemen in congratulating Canada on the prosperity that prevails to-day. I am proud to join with him in that congratulation, because the Conservative party of this country have the right to claim to be the authors of the policy which prevails to-day, and under which that prosperity reigns. If hon. gentlemen opposite do not give us credit for it, the people of the country do. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), digressed from the question before the House, and, although, I would have preferred to adhere to a discussion of the preferential tariff, and, as to whether or not it was of material benefit to the mother country, and more especially to Canada, yet I shall have to digress a little in order to answer my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), told us that the government have kept the pledges which they made to the people, and he instanced the Franchise Bill as a fulfilled pledge. Well, these gentlemen opposite have not repealed the Franchise Act in toto, because that great item of expense which was complained of more than any other, the expense of printing the voters' lists in Ottawa, has still to be incurred. And, may I ask what kind of a Bill have they substituted for the Franchise Act? Why, we need only refer to the fact that the important city of Winnipeg remained unrepresented in this House for twelve months, because the present law was so defective. Hon. gentlemen opposite have very little reason indeed, to be proud of their legislation with regard to the franchise. The hon. gentleman from North Wellington told us that the government had redeemed their pledge to reduce the taxation, and he gave us figures to show that from 1896 to 1899, they had cut down the taxation by two millions of dollars. Let him go back to the year 1892, and he will find that the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), in five minutes struck three and a half million dollars off the taxation of Canada by removing sugar duties, and even if this government have reduced the taxation two million dollars in three years, they have not a great deal to boast of. But, Sir, have they reduced the taxation? The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), set forth a most extraordinary theory, when he stated, that the increase of the debt of Canada was practically a reduction of that debt, and I presume he applies the same principle to the taxation of the country. Now, if the increase of the public debt is practically a reduction of it, then the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), must admit that the Conservative party during their eighteen years of power, reduced the public debt of Canada by $115,000,000. That is the logical sequence of his argument. However, that is not the true result because the reasoning of the hon. gentleman is absolutely unsound. Let us see how the Liberal government have reduced taxation? In 1896, when they came to power, the per capita taxation was $8.14, and in 1899, the taxation has been increased to $9.40 per head of the population. That is a peculiar way of reducing taxation. And how have they redeemed their pledge to decrease the expenditure? Why, instead of an annual expenditure of $38,000,000, condemned by Liberals when in opposition, it is now $51,000,000 a year, an increase of $13,000,000, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), unblushingly tells us that the expenditure has been reduced. His contention in this respect can only be explained on the extraordinary theory of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), that the increase of the national debt was practically a reduction of it. Sir, the increase of the public debt since the Liberals came into power is anywhere between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000.

One of the most solemn pledges which the Liberals gave, was that they would exterminate the principle of protection. It does not require much effort to prove beyond cavil, that they have not redeemed that pledge. Why, instead of a reduction in the tariff, we have many increases, and in order to illustrate that point, I will simply deal, at the present moment, with one or two items, because when the budget is brought down, we will have a better opportunity of discussing this question in detail. In cotton goods alone, we bought from the United States last year $894,000 worth, and a duty amounting to $44,700 more was paid on them, under the Fielding tariff, than would have been paid had the tariff of 1894 remained in force. Had the Foster tariff instead of the Fielding tariff been in operation last year, the people of Canada, on imports from United States, would have paid $1,243 less duty than they did pay on gray cotton, $1,122 less duty on cotton handkerchiefs, $322 less on cotton bats, $953 less duty on sheets and quilts, and $5,060 less duty on cotton clothing. Of course the contention is that this is offset by the fact that these cotton goods, when imported from Great Britain, come in at a reduced duty.

Mr. HENDERSON.

I challenge that statement. There is no doubt a so-called preferential rate of 25 per cent, but who gets the benefit of that? Does one fraction of a cent find its way into the pockets of the consumer? I say no. It is an utter impossibility that any one purchasing a yard of gray cotton, for instance, or even ten or twenty yards, can get the advantage of any small reduction in the duty. The advantage of the reduction either finds its way into the pockets of the manufacturer in Great Britain or into the pockets of the importer. Most assuredly not one cent of it finds its way into the pockets of the consumers of this country. Every business man engaged in selling goods in Canada to-day knows it to be a fact that prices can not be reduced to the consumer simply because there is a reduction in the duty, the reduction on a single item being so small. Therefore, so far as cotton goods are concerned, the great consuming classes of this country get no benefit whatever from the preferential tariff. It is of material value, I admit, to the cotton lords of Great Britain, the millionaires who manufacture cotton goods participate in the profits to the extent of what is taken out of our treasury; it may be divided between the manufacturers and the importers; but I repeat, as a practical business man, that the consumers of this country get no benefit whatever from the reductions, and therefore it is of no material benefit to the people of this country.

While dealing with this question, let us see how far British goods get the advantage of this preference. In examining the imports from the various countries of the world which send goods to Canada, I am surprised beyond measure to find the very small increase in the imports from Great Britain, showing that as a matter of fact the people of Great Britain do not attempt to push their wares in Canada. Instead of selling their goods at a lower price, and giving Canadians the benefit of the reduction of duty, they simply increase their profits by taking advantage of that reduction for their own benefit. A buyer of goods from Canada going to Great Britain to buy cotton goods, for example, is asked how much he can get them for in the United States. In the case of an article that costs $10 in the United States, it would cost $13.50 brought into Canada. The British manufacturer tells the Canadian buyer that if he buys from him he can have the article for $13.25, giving him some little inducement to buy in Great Britain instead of in the United States. If Canada obtained the benefit of the 25 per cent reduction in duty there would surely be some increased trade with Great Britain. But such is not the case. An increase of three or four millions would only be what we would expect from the increased prosperity of the country; but beyond that we find there is nothing at all to lead us to the conclusion that the people of Great Britain are pushing their wares to any great extent in Canada. We find that the increase of imports in 1899 over the imports in 1896 from Belgium was 151 per cent, from South America 107 per cent, from Switzerland 71 per cent, from Holland 67 per cent, from the United States 59 per cent, from Italy 72 per cent, from Spain 48 per cent, from Portugal 39 per cent, from France 38 per cent, from Germany 34 per cent, and from Great Britain only 12½ per cent, the smallest of all the chief countries in the world with the exception of China and Japan, from which the increase was only 4 per cent. Is it not humiliating to the people of Canada to find that China and Japan are the only countries whose increase of trade with us during the last three years is less than that of Great Britain itself? The West Indies did not take advantage of the preferential tariff. In fact, there was a reduction in the trade with the West Indies between 1896 and 1899 to the extent of 28 per cent. There was also a reduction in the case of Newfoundland to the extent of 4 per cent. The imports from Great Britain in the years 1898 and 1899 we know not only include British manufactures, but also large quantities of foreign goods which are brought into England for the purpose of being exported to Canada: which is permitted when the value of these foreign goods is enhanced in Great Britain by 25 per cent: and we have every reason to believe that a considerable amount of the increased trade, if not the whole of it, during the last two years between Great Britain and Canada has been brought about by the efforts of foreign countries to get their goods into this country and to save thereby a portion of the duty. The British imports into Canada in 1899 were less than those of any other year from 1880 down to 1895, or less than the average of five years prior to the change of government. With such a history as this before us, I fail to see that we at any rate on this side of the House, whatever hon. gentlemen on the government side may do, will be able to give an honest vote and say that the preferential tariff has been of material benefit to the mother country. I grant that it has been a material benefit to a few cotton lords or a few manufacturers, but as to being a benefit to the country as a whole, we lack evidence.

Now, Sir, we are told that hon. gentlemen opposite have kept their pledges, inasmuch as they have preserved the independence of parliament. Well, Sir, I scarcely understand the meaning of the term independence of parliament if these hon. gentlemen can get up and honestly say that that pledge has been maintained. I find a list of hon. gentlemen who were members of this House a few years ago, but who suddenly disappeared, some of them, I have no doubt, with their commissions in their pockets, though some of them possibly did not receive their commissions until they had resigned their seats. At any rate, we find that the independence of parliament has been violated by the retiring of Mr. Béchard of St. John's to a senatorship, Mr. King of Sunbury and Queen's to a senatorship, Mr. Forbes, a former member of this House, to a judgeship, Mr. Devlin to an immigrant agency, Mr. Lavergne of Drummond and Arthabaska to a judgeship, Mr. Fiset of Rimouski to a senatorship, Mr. M. C. Cameron of West Huron to a governorship, Mr. Lister of West Lambton to a judgeship, Mr. Choquette of Montmagny to a judgeship, Mr. Yeo of East Prince to a senatorship, Mr. Rinfret of Lotbinière to a revenue inspectorship, and Mr. Beausoleil, of Berthier, to the postmastership of Montreal. Will hon. gentlemen rise in their places and tell the country that the pledge which they made to the people to maintain the independence of parliament has been honestly kept?

They also told us that purity of elections was one of the planks in their platform. I really do not care to refer to that question, we have heard so much of it during the last few days in this House, and have read so much about it in the reports of the Toronto legislature, but when we think of the frauds that have been perpetrated on the people, it is difficult to understand how hon. gentlemen opposite can have the effrontery to get up and declare that their pledge with regard to purity of elections has been kept. Why are we voting $2,000,000 of money to send the best and brightest of our young men to South Africa, but to maintain the purity of elections, but to insist that the franchise be given to every man who is entitled to it? And yet, in this parliament and in the Ontario legislature, the electorate of this country are unscrupulously robbed of their legitimate votes. It is somewhat surprising that we should spend so much money and blood in order to secure to the electorate of South Africa their rights and yet trample under our feet these same rights in this Dominion, and more especially in the province of Ontario.

Another plank in the Liberal platform was the abolition of railway subsidies, yet we find that the only difference between now and former days is that under this government railway bonuses and subsidies are doubled.

Then, we were to have an honest, economical, and a business administration. As regards economy, all that I require to prove the utter failure of the government to keep that pledge is to point to the fact that the expenditure of this country has gone up, since they took office, by leaps and bounds. From about $38,000,000 a year complained of, it has reached the enormous sum of $51,000,000. On this question of expenditure, hon. gentlemen opposite were explicit in 1896. Mr. John Charlton said that the Liberal party, if in power, would at once reduce public expenditure to the extent of $5,000,000 per annum without impairing the efficiency of the service. Have they done that? They have not. They admit their inability to do it. They admit, in fact, that they are not the business administration which they claimed to be since they have been unable to carry out their own pledges. Sir Louis Davies—then Mr. Davies—was very plain on this point. He said: 'Several million dollars may be lopped off the present expenditure without injury to the service.' Yet, we find instead of $38,000,000 complained of, it is $51,000,000, and the hon. gentleman is quite ready to see it increased to any amount, provided he is only kept in office. The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. McMullen) was one of those who never ceased urging economy. He was, perhaps, the greatest economist then in the House, and we fully expected to see the expenditure reduced to $30,000,000 as soon as his party came into power. That hon. gentleman, however, was not given a seat on the Treasury benches, and, consequently, no doubt does not consider himself bound to see that his pledge is redeemed. Mr. McMullen said:

If we do not give reciprocity in three years and reduce the expenditure to $35,000,000, turn us out.

Well, they have not given us reciprocity in three years, and they have not brought the expenditure down to $35,000,000, and neither of those pledges having been kept. I am under the impression that the hon. gentleman's alternative is very likely to be acted on.

The right hon. First Minister, when on the platform in Toronto, was most explicit on this question. He said:

Has the expenditure gone down? No, it has gone up. It has gone up $2,000,000, $3,000,000, $5,000,000, and more, until it is now about $38,000,000, and the Conservatives do not shrink from it, but swallow it.

I must say that if the Conservatives swallowed $38,000,000 without hesitation, the right hon. gentleman and his party are considerably more adept in that line, since they swallowed $50,000,000 without a grimace. The right hon. gentleman also said:

If we get into power, we will follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie.

I believe that is one of the pledges that will be acted on. They have got into power, and will, no doubt, follow the example of Mr. Mackenzie by retiring into private life at the end of five years.

The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) was also very plain on this question. He was going to reduce the annual expenditure of the country by some $4,000,000.

I submit that until these hon. gentlemen can come a little nearer the accomplishment of their pledges, they should cease their boasting, because it only draws public attention to the fact that they have not made the least effort to redeem the pledges they gave the electorate in 1896.

They told us that this was to be a business administration. I submit that no administration can call itself a business administration which makes no attempt whatever to carry out the pledges and promises it gave the people.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me did not follow at all closely the subject before the House, but endeavoured to draw a herring across the path by introducing matter quite foreign to the question, and he fell back on his old boasting of how the tariff had been reduced and the people benefited. Before sitting down, I just wish to instance a few of the cases in which the tariff was reduced, because there was some attempt made to reduce it. We know that the principles these hon. gentlemen acted on was to reduce the tariff on things that came from the United States and increase it on those that came from Great Britain. On table cutlery, for instance, a good deal of which comes from the United States, they gave us a reduction of 2½ per cent; on saws, 2½ per cent; on locks, a reduction of 2½ per cent; on trifling articles, such as curry combs, they condescended to give a reduction of 2½ per cent. As a matter of fact, nearly all the reductions given by the government were on articles that were of insignificant importance, articles that do not come into general use with the people, articles that were seldom bought by the people, and on which the saving to the people would amount to almost nothing. But, articles of importance and of general use, articles that would cost a considerable sum of money, were allowed to remain where they were. For example, the farmer who had been told over and over again, that his binder would be reduced in duty, if not placed on the free list, finds that under the new tariff, there is no reduction whatever. The duty was twenty per cent before, and it is twenty per cent now. But the farmer is comforted by the Minister of Finance, who tells him that he has made reaping hooks 10 per cent lower—as if the farmer was going to go back to the customs of olden times, and destroy the industry of my hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), by cutting his grain with a reaping hook, instead of a binder. There is no reduction on the plough. The government could not afford to do that, because some friends of hon. gentlemen opposite make ploughs. But they take about 3 per cent off the shovel, and tell the farmer he can dig his summer fallow with a shovel. When he goes to rake his hay, the farmer is reminded that he expected a reduction in the duty on his sulky rake, which costs a considerable sum of money. But the government refused this reduction. However, they think that the farmer must be satisfied somehow. There is a little hand rake, which costs about 7 cents, and they allow him 10 per cent on that. And, in the case of the mower, it is the same way. This is an article required by every farmer. The government says: Our friends cannot be allowed a reduction of duty on mowers, but we will allow a reduction on the old scythe and snath, that was cast aside forty years ago. The duty on these they reduced 10 per cent. What signifies a reduction of duty on a scythe and snath, when a farmer does not want to buy them. Then, they tell us, they have reduced the duty on wind-mills. There may be something in that, but the farmers do not grind their corn with a wind-mill. Then there are some articles that the farmers do not often buy. They reduced the duty, for instance, on post-hole diggers. How many post-hole diggers do you find in a township in the province of Ontario? You will not find them in the hands of one farmer in a hundred. The government knew that by this reduction, they would not hurt the revenue. Then, there are potato diggers. I do not suppose there is one farmer in fifty who owns a potato digger. They use the same plough that they plough the land with, and gather the potatoes by hand.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Oh, oh.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the way they do in the county of Huron. I undertake to say that the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me, cannot find in his whole riding ten potato diggers. But, by taking the duty off post-hole diggers and potato diggers, the government seem to think they have done a great deal for the industrial classes of this country—just as if a farmer lived by digging potatoes and post holes. There are other articles, but I need not go into details; the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), knows all about them. But he made an attempt to cover this matter up, and informed the House and through the House, the country, that the government had made enormous reductions, that they had reduced the duties by two million dollars. But, he knew that a few years ago the Conservative Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), reduced the duties by three and a half millions in one year, in one day, in one speech. Yet, it took two years to reduce the duties by two millions of dollars under this government. What are the chief items of that two millions of dollars? Corn was put on the free list, making a very considerable part of the whole reduction. Where is the advantage in free corn to the farmers of this country? None whatever. Putting corn on the free list, simply destroys the market for the farmer's coarse grain, and injures him rather than helps him. The abolition of the duty on corn was for the benefit of the people of the United States, not for the benefit of the people of Canada.

It enables the people of the United States to make a market in this country for a very large quantity of surplus corn. I might go on by the hour, pointing out the iniquities of this preferential tariff, but the question is so well understood in the country that the people do not require to be reminded of it. The fact is, the farming community, throughout the province of Ontario, at any rate, know that everything they have to buy at the present time is dearer and everything they have to sell is cheaper.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). No.

Mr. HENDERSON. I tell the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that a day is coming when he will find that I am right, and he is wrong. That is the opinion, not only of the Conservative farmers, but of the Liberal farmers throughout the province of Ontario. The farmers of this country are no fools; they are not going to be put off with a 10 per cent reduction on a scythe, when when they were promised and expected a reduction on the mower, they are not going to be put off with a little reduction on an obsolete hand rake, that was put aside years ago, when the implement that they are using now, is left as it was. The farmers of this country see through the game, and, I misjudge them, if they do not resent the insult thrown upon them by this government—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What are the articles the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) wants reductions on?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not speaking about the articles there should be reductions on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not the question. The hon. gentlemen say 'hear, hear,' but what I am dealing with is the violation of their pledges by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and their attempt to humbug the people of this country. I am a protectionist, I believe in the principle of protection. The difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and myself is that I am a protectionist of my own free will, and they are protectionists by force of circumstances. An hon. gentleman sitting on that side now, told me within a few months after their tariff came down, that if they had done anything else, they would have been out of power in two years. They realized that. They understood perfectly well that if they had abolished the protective principle, they would have had to face the electors of this country and answer for it at the end of their term. Consequently, they were compelled to adopt that principle, and I say that it is a good thing for the country that they had the business capacity to see what the voice of the people was. I do not wish to detain the House any longer. I hope to have the opportunity at a later date, when the budget comes down, if there is to be a budget, and we hope there will be, of discussing this question further. I hope to have the opportunity of placing some of these matters before the House and the country, in a more connected and a more extended form.

Mr. ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Kent. Ont.) Mr. Speaker, I think it would be very difficult for any one to understand the question that is now before the House by listening to the speech of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), because, instead of discussing the question before the House, he has wandered through some of his old campaign speeches, and he has touched on almost everything except the subject before the House. He dismissed the question of preferential trade with the remark that he believed the people of this country thoroughly understood it. I quite agree with this opinion; I believe that the people understand some of the benefits that have resulted to this country from the adoption of this policy which has made the name of Canada ring throughout the British Empire. Not only do I believe that they understand it, but I believe that they approve of that policy as they have shown in some thirty-six elections that have taken place. Out of these thirty-six elections there have been only three Conservatives returned. The hon. gentleman, taking his cue from the leader of the opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), from the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), and from the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), has taken credit to the party which he represents for all the virtues possessed by the human race. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues do not give credit to this government for knowing anything that is good. All the good that this country enjoys at the present time, all the prosperity, is due entirely to them and to their policy. They seem to arrogate to themselves all the virtues and to say that they are the only persons fit to govern the country. They say that they are, alone, possessed of the genius of government. Looking over the history of this country for the last twenty-five years, it is strange, it is amazing, that any hon. gentleman should get up in this House and have the assurance to make the statements that have been made here to-day. If you look at the history of the country for the last twenty-five years, during eighteen of which the administration was in the hands of these men who possess the genius of government, who are the only ones fit to rule the country, these eminent statesmen who pretend that they have all the instincts of government, you will agree with me that no government ever made a more lamentable failure to administer the affairs of the country than these hon. gentlemen made. What was the state of affairs in 1896? It has been stated, very freely, here to-day, but, perhaps, a brief repetition of it will not be out of place. In the first place, we find that the trade and commerce of this country were going forward only at a snail's pace. During the eighteen years that they were in power they only increased the foreign trade of the country by about $3,500,000 a year, or, in the whole eighteen years during which they ruled over this country, the foreign trade of Canada only increased by $67,000,000 all told. The finances of the country were in a low state. We had year after year deficits, until in the last three years of their administration, these deficits amounted to about $7,000,000. The public debt of this country, as has been stated here to-day, was going up by leaps and bounds. It increased, during the whole eighteen years that they ruled over the country, at the rate of $6,500,000 a year. Manufactures were at a standstill, our great railways were almost paralyzed, our merchant vessels were tied up at the wharfs for want of trade; the farmers were depressed and in a very bad state financially, the mechanics and artisans were looking in vain for work, our immigration was going from us instead of coming to us, and the population was almost at a standstill. This was the state of affairs in 1896, when this government came into power, and I say that the record they have made during the three and a half years that they have been in power has been most gratifying indeed. This is principally due to the businesslike way in which they have managed the affairs of the country. It is largely due to this very preferential tariff that we are discussing here to-night that I know this House will approve of and that the country will approve of by an overwhelming majority. Let any man look into the affairs of this country to-day and contrast the conditions with the state of affairs that existed in 1896. I do not wonder that the hon. gentlemen get up and with hesitating voices and uncertain sound, ramble and depart from the question, because the question is one that is not very profitable for them to discuss. We should not censure them too severely, because I pity the opposition. They have so little to complain of, they have so little ground to stand on. Without any policy, without any line of action, without any faults to find, without any scandals to exploit, they are in a helpless way indeed, and we ought to make them every allowance and give them every latitude, because the present state of the country is very gratifying. To-day, instead of having a deficit of $7,000,000, we have a surplus of nearly $7,000,000 in the Treasury. Instead of our foreign trade increasing at the rate of $3,500,000 a year it has been going up by leaps and bounds, and it has increased in three years far more than it did in the whole eighteen years that they were in power. Our foreign trade, when this government came into power, was only $239,000,000. It rose to $257,000,000 next year, it rose again from $257,000,000 to $304,000,000 in the following year, and if it goes on at the same rate of increase as has been taking place during the eight months of this present year, the foreign trade of the country will be nearly $400,000,000 on the 30th of June. Instead of $239,000,000, the actual figures show that during the first eight months of this year the foreign trade of Canada has been over $250,000,000, so that we have actually done more business for eight months of this year than we did for the whole twelve months of the year 1896, when the Conservatives were in power. The hon. gentleman from Halton (Mr. Henderson) told us—and I particularly noted his words—that this government increased the annual expenditure from $38,000,000 to $51,000,000. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) if he adheres to that statement?

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I would advise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) to study the public accounts before he makes a statement of that kind.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have done so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) wants to mislead the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) must know that the statement he has made is utterly devoid of truth.

Mr. HENDERSON. I quite understand that the statement the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) is making now, is quite devoid of truth.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) point to the public accounts to justify his statement?

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no use of these hon. gentlemen playing upon words and dividing up the expenditure. We are talking about the expenditure of the country. They may hide part of it away in capital account if they like, but do not imagine that the people of Canada are so silly as not to understand that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I find from the public accounts that the $38,000,000 expended by the Conservative government was only the yearly expenditure on the consolidated revenue account, but if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) calculates the whole expenditure he will find that the Conservatives got away with about $44,000,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. In what year was it $44,000,000?

Mr. CAMPBELL. In 1895.

Mr. FOSTER. Look at it again.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Look at it yourself, I have made the statement, and I can prove it. The expenditure of the Conservative government on the consolidated revenue account was about $38,000,000, and our expenditure for the same service last year was $41,000,000, and not $51,000,000, as stated by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). Why did not the hon. gentleman make his comparison fairly and honestly. I admit that $41,000,000 is quite an expenditure, and if we could not show that that expenditure was justifiable in the public interest, then these gentlemen opposite would have cause to complain. But what do we find when we come to examine the nature of that expenditure? We find that $2,000,000 is included in that, for the opening up and development of the Yukon, a service for which the Conservatives only spent ten or fifteen thousand a year. Deduct that expenditure of $2,000,000 on account of the Yukon, and you have the Liberal expenditure reduced to $39,000,000 a year, or about the same as it was in 1896. But let us consider the matter further. It is a well-known fact that during the last few years the Conservative government were in power they spent nothing on drilling the militia. What is the use of having a militia at all unless we prepare them for the duties that may devolve upon them. This government has wisely spent large sums for the drilling and perfecting of the militia force of Canada, as compared with which the Conservative government spent nothing during the last years they were in office. Let me point out that although we have spent $2,000,000 in developing the Yukon, yet the people of Canada do not pay one single farthing of that because the revenue we get from the Yukon territory is somewhat more than we expend on it. That, therefore, is a wise expenditure. It is an expenditure which redounds to the benefit of the whole country, and as a matter of fact it costs the people of eastern Canada not one cent. We have in other ways vastly increased the resources of this country. We have expended large sums of money to bring the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal, and that money was well expended, and a return for every dollar of it comes back into the treasury. Look at the past history of the Intercolonial Railway. During the eighteen years that the Conservative guided the ship of state that railway instead of paying its expenses consumed all its receipts, and $250,000 a year more besides to keep it running. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), saw the necessity of extending that road to the great metropolis of the Dominion, and instead of the Intercolonial Railway having a deficit of $250,000 a year, as was the case during the Tory regime, last fiscal year the Intercolonial Railway not only paid its working expenses, but it yielded a revenue of $62,000 as well, to the treasury of this country. I believe, Sir, that when the public accounts are closed this year the returns will be still better, and the Intercolonial Railway will show a respectable surplus on the right side. Therefore, although our annual expenditure is a little more than in 1896, yet taking service for service, our expenditure is less to-day than it was under the late government. Take the Post Office Department as an example. There was a deficit of $700,000 in the management of that department when the Conservatives were in power. But what a change has been effected there! Since 1896, we have increased the mail mileage by 2,000,000 miles, or, in other words, the mails are carried now about 33,000,000 miles every year, as against 30,000,000 miles in 1896. Since the Liberals came into power, we have opened up over 500 new post offices. In 1896 there were 9,011 post offices in Canada, while to-day there are 9,570, but notwithstanding that increase in mail mileage and in the number of post offices, the expenses of management under the economic rule of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) were $62,000 less in 1899 than they were in 1896. So we might go on through all the different departments, and you will find that taking service for service the expenditure under this government is less than it was under the late government. But there never was a government that was called upon to face such enormous tasks as this government. New questions have constantly arisen commanding the best attention of parliament. The trade of the country has enormously increased, the country has grown larger, and it necessarily costs more to run it. You cannot do a business of $400,000,000 for the same money that you did a business of $239,000,000 for. The country has become a great and prosperous country; railways have been spreading everywhere; our foreign trade has gone up by leaps and bounds; and, consequently, it costs more to run the country than it did before.

Now, I want to say a word in reference to the public debt of this country. Under the late government the public debt increased $6,500,000 a year. It increased from $140,000,000 in 1878 to $258,000,000 in 1896. In the last five years the public debt has gone up about $7,000,000 a year in round numbers, but what have we to show for that?

Mr. CLANCY. Nothing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has my hon. friend not studied the public accounts? Has he been deaf, or has he listened to the debates in the House? Surely my hon. friend knows better than that. We have spent $11,000,000 odd on our canals alone in the last four years. We have spent $3,500,000 in opening up the Kootenay country with the Crow's

Mr. CAMPBELL.

Nest Pass Railway, a measure that passed through this House unanimously. We have voted large sums for the aid of agriculture. We have carried on an elaborate and very profitable system of cold storage, which has enormously increased the wealth of the farmers of this country. That money has been well expended, for it is bringing back to our people far more in results than the money expended. The people of this country do not care whether we spend $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year so long as they get value for their money. To spend $1,000 if you get back $1,500 for it is a wise investment. But what the people complained of under the late government was that their money was wasted in transactions which did not bring a profit to the country. Take, for instance, the construction of the works at Quebec, which cost $3,000,000, although it was shown in the committee of this House that $1,000,000 of that money was wasted and stolen. Take the Curran Bridge in Montreal, where $450,000 was wasted and stolen. Take the Tay Canal, on which $476,000 was spent, although the total receipts from that canal are only $126 a year. That was the kind of expenditure the people of this country objected to; but all the expenditures which this government has made have been wise expenditures, which redound to the credit of the government and the credit of the country.

With regard to the preferential tariff, the result has shown that it has conferred the greatest possible benefits upon Canada. I can scarcely speak about that measure in moderate terms. It is the one thing that is drawing England and her colonies closer and closer together. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) said that it had not done any good to the people of this country, and that it was of no benefit to England, because he pointed out that our imports from Holland, Italy and some other countries had gone up a little faster than our imports from England. From Holland we import only $500,000 all told, and from Italy, about $400,000. But take the history of our imports from England for a number of years back. Under the policy inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite our trade with England was going down year after year until our imports had gone down in a few years from $52,000,000 to some $29,500,000 in 1896-7. The preferential tariff came into force, and immediately there was a change. Our imports from Great Britain began to go up. In one year they went up to $32,500,000; last year they went up to $37,000,000, and the indications are that this year they will amount to $45,000,000. When a new tariff is brought into force, you cannot expect to get the full benefit of it immediately; it takes some time to get the manufacturers to adapt their machinery to the changed conditions; but the good feeling that is engendered by that 25 per cent preference given to British goods is bringing about the results that we all desired. It is true, our importations from the United States have increased considerably, perhaps a little faster than those from England. What does that show? It shows that as our raw materials come largely from the United States, the beneficial results that flow from the tariff inaugurated by this government have enabled our manufacturers all over this fair Dominion to extend their business and run their factories night and day. In the great city of Toronto, the Massey-Harris Company alone spent $258,000 last year in enlarging their establishment; and go into almost any town or city in this Dominion, and you will find the chimneys that were formerly smokeless belching forth their smoke day and night, and thousands of mechanics busily employed who formerly sought work in vain. I believe all our raw cotton comes from the United States. Our corn comes from the United States, and although I represent a county that largely produces corn, yet I say that the placing of corn on the free list has been one of the great blessings to this country. It has enormously increased the manufacture of bacon and hams. The farmers of this country are getting more for their peas, their barley and their oats this year than they ever got before. They are getting more this year than ever before.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is not so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is, and the House knows it. In the city of Toronto peas were selling from 65 to 67 cents a bushel last fall, and you can buy corn at 38 to 40 cents a bushel. Do you not suppose that the farmers know their own business? Do you suppose that they would sell peas and barley and buy American corn if it did not pay them? They are doing this and making money by it, and that is one of the reasons why they are so prosperous to-day. Last year our exports of bacon amounted to no less than 111,000,000 pounds, and our exports of cheese were no less than 189,000,000 pounds, valued at nearly $17,000,000. Our exports of butter last year were over 20,000,000 pounds, and valued at nearly $4,000,000. These heavy exports were due largely to the fact that our farmers were able to get their raw material cheap. They could get their corn in free, and could sell their barley, peas and oats, and make money by buying corn to take their place. It has been a good thing for our farmers that they have been able to prosecute their manufactures to such an extent through being enabled by our present tariff to get cheap food.

I cannot forbear expressing my surprise that the hon. leader of the opposition should oppose a motion of this kind. I do not see how any one can question the fact that this preferential policy has been the means of bringing closer together Canada and the mother country. It has done more in this respect than any other legislation we have ever placed on our statutes. These gentlemen opposite have been howling about their loyalty for the past eighteen years, but in all that time they never did anything. They talked about loyalty but never did a single act to bring this country closer to the empire. The present government, however, gave to old England a preference in our markets, and have made the name of Canada resound throughout the world. The action which Canada has taken in this respect has done more to build up this country and to cement together the various colonies of the empire than anything that has been accomplished since confederation, and I am glad to know that the example we have set has been followed by some, and is about to be followed by other colonies. I believe that this preferential tariff will commend itself to the majority of this House, and I am sure that the people of this country will approve of the course this government has taken. The policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, if it means anything, means that if they come into power, this preferential tariff will be repealed. Pretty loyalists they are to talk about loyalty, and then repeal the preference which we have given Great Britain. I am sure that the House will approve by a very large majority the policy of this government and support the motion made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and when the time comes for appealing to the country, I am confident that from one end of Canada to the other that policy will be supported by an enormous majority of the people.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Campbell), has treated the House to a number of assertions utterly unsupported by either facts or figures. When he did venture to quote figures, he did so at random, and they will be searched for in vain in any parliamentary return. I do not propose to deal with his statements at any great length, but wish briefly to refer to one of the last assertions he made. What was it? He said that the large increase in our exports of butter, cheese and bacon, is due to the action of the government in putting corn on the free list. Well, if that be the case, you would naturally expect to find that in those localities where the production of bacon has increased the most, the consumption of corn has been the greatest. But in reality that is not the case. Take my own section of country, there has been in that section a rapid development in these three lines, but I do not know of any farmer who uses a pound of corn to feed to his hogs except perhaps just in the middle of summer when other feed is scarce. The same remark will apply to the increased production of cheese and butter. That is due altogether to causes over which the policy of this government has practically no control. It is due to the splendid provision which was made before the present government came into office for giving instructions to the farmers, and the provisions for cold storage, and the educational work carried on during many years by commissioners whom we sent to England to study the requirements of the markets there, and who came back and instructed our farmers what they should provide for that market. The results of work such as this could not be seen in one or two years, but must extend over a number of years. The late government were for several years carrying on that work of education. Of that there can be no question, because it is a matter of record, and the farmers of this country know it quite as well as any hon. member in this House. The fruits of that work could not be seen in the first year or the second or third, but any one who will take the trouble to look up the trade and navigation returns will see that year after year our trade was increasing. This was due to the educational work being carried on and to the provisions made for the better transportation of the products of the farm to the markets of the old world, and about the time the late government left office they had in a measure perfected those various lines, and the people were beginning to reap the advantage of their work. The increase in that trade is therefore not due to any change in the tariff or to anything the present government has done, but to the very valuable work done by their predecessors.

We are sometimes told that it was this government which established the system of cold storage. Why, Sir, the whole cold storage system was outlined and started and in process of development before the present government came into power. All that they have done since has been to endeavour to perfect this system, and in my judgment they have proceeded at a very slow rate. We were told in triumphant tones last year that what they had done had resulted very much to the benefit of the farmers in taking their fruit to the other side. But we find there was a falling off this year, that the cold storage was not exactly what was required for the benefit of the fruit-growers. There is a great deal to be learned and a great deal to be done before we reach the stage of perfection that will give the farmer the benefit he ought to have from cold storage. When the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) said that the development of these three lines is due to anything the present government has done, he is misleading the people, wittingly or unwittingly, and he is doing a great injustice to his predecessors and unfairly representing the situation to the people.

We had yesterday afternoon what was to my mind one of the strangest spectacles I have witnessed in this House for many years—a prominent supporter of the government rising in his place, when the motion was made by the Minister of Finance, that the House resolve itself in Committee of Supply, and moving an amendment. A motion of amendment to supply is usually regarded as a motion of want of confidence in the government. Do the government so regard it in this case? I am inclined to think they will accept it, under the circumstances. The government, I have no hesitation in saying, by prearranged action, put up one of their own supporters to move that the House do not resolve itself in Committee of Supply, but that a motion in amendment be adopted. And what was the character of it? It was a gushing eulogium upon the government for giving preferential trade to the mother country. They had affirmed that principle two or three times in this House, and their followers had spoken in favour of it at great length. We thought that no more time of the House would be wasted in moving motions in favour of it. But, they are not tired of talking about it yet, and one of their supporters is put up to eulogize the government for what they have done. And for what reason? According to the motion, because they did give a preferential tariff to the mother country, and because it is of some special advantage to Canada and of some special advantage to Great Britain. In what respect, we naturally ask ourselves, has it been of advantage to Canada? The statement of hon. gentlemen opposite is that it has reduced the duties on goods coming into Canada. But, as has been stated by previous speakers, before they reduced the tariff by the preferential clause, they increased the tariff on these same articles. Reducing it by preference, they left it practically where it was before. Consequently, it has not done much good to Canada. On the other hand, in my judgment, it has done substantial injustice and harm to Canada. It has prevented Canada from getting what otherwise, I believe, she could have got a substantial advantage for her goods in the British market as compared with other countries that had not given Great Britain preferential treatment. Had we succeeded in getting England to give us a preference in her market in return for the advantage we would give her, see what an advantage it would be to the farmer, the artisan and the labourer of this Dominion. It would have been of substantial advantage to Canada, but, instead, we have the very reverse. What this House should do, and what this country, I believe, will do, when it has an opportunity, is to pass a vote of censure upon the government for giving so much to England and getting nothing in return.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) will move it here first.

Mr. SPROULE. Perhaps the hon. minister will have an opportunity of expressing his opinion upon it and giving his vote upon it, if they do not break down and go to the country too soon, as the indications are now that they will.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I venture to predict that my hon. friend will not move it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has not proved up to the present that he is a prophet or the son of a prophet; and I am afraid that if his reputation in that regard depended upon his present prediction, he might find himself in an awkward predicament in the future. I say, had we succeeded in arranging trade relations with the mother country upon the lines suggested by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) we would have done a good thing for the Canadian people and no injustice to England. Then we should have been bringing England and, at any rate, one of her colonies close together in trade relations to their mutual advantage.

Now, how far is this so-called preference an advantage to England? I remember that for several years, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), endeavoured to convince this House and the people of the country that the policy known as the national policy discriminated against the mother country; and the argument they offered to prove it was that each year we were importing less from the mother country than before it was brought into force and importing more from the United States. Therefore, said these hon. gentlemen, we were discriminating against the mother country. By the same parity of reasoning, applied to the tariff of 1896, what do we find? From the time this tariff was introduced our trade with the United States has been growing greater and our trade with the mother country is going down—what we import from Great Britain is growing less and what we import from the United States is growing more.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman does not mean that, surely?

Mr. SPROULE. I do, distinctly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That our importations from the mother country are going down?

Mr. SPROULE. I say, compared with our trade with the United States. There can be no doubt of it. Our trade with the United States is going up largely every year, while with the mother country there is a reduction rather than an increase.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, no.

Mr. SPROULE. Except our exportations to the mother country, where we find our natural market. If these hon. gentlemen succeeded in proving that the trade relations between Canada and the mother country under the national policy were injurious to England, then, this tariff is injurious to England, in even a greater degree. If the other tariff discriminates against England, this also discriminates against England to a larger extent than the other. This is a tariff that has neither been advantageous to Canada nor to the mother country. I say it is distinctly disadvantageous to both. I quite believe that it has brought the colonies closer to the mother country. There is a national sentiment, which is being created by it, that is distinctly in advance of anything we have had heretofore. I agree with the hon. gentleman that to some extent that is the case. I believe it has tended to awaken towards us feelings of sympathy in England, and that the people of England have become better acquainted with the people of Canada, than they have been heretofore. They have a substantial reason for that. We gave the people of England a valuable consideration for which we got nothing in return. We could do that with any nation in the world if we generously give away what belonged to the people of Canada. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), said: I may be allowed to elaborate a little on this question. We are sometimes told that the present government have not fulfilled the promises they made to the people before they came into power. He said, that, subsequently, they had carried out every plank in the platform that they had laid down to the people of the country, before they were elected to power, he said: I know of no government that has ever lived in Canada, that has been so successful or so correct in carrying out the principles which they propounded to the electors of the country, as the present government. I asked myself: What were these promises? Let me ask the people of this country, and the hon. members of this House, whether that statement is absolutely correct or not. I know that in dealing with this question, I am only dealing with subjects that have been dealt with by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House more at length than I intend to do, and who have supported their arguments with a greater array of facts and figures than I propose to bring forth tonight, because, I think it would be a waste of the time of the House to go, at length, into points that others have taken up and which have been gone over several times before. What were the promises made to the people of this country? The first was the reduction of taxation. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), has given facts and figures to show that hon. gentlemen opposite did not reduce taxation, but rather increased it. Will the hon. member for Halifax say that plank in the platform was carried out? Will the people of Canada say it was carried out? I am quite sure that they will not, and I say that no hon. gentleman, having any regard for integrity, or intelligence, or honesty, or truthfulness, can fairly stand up and say that that plank of the platform was honestly carried out. Yet, we are told that every plank in the platform was carried out. The second plank was, that they were to reduce the expenditure. The hon. member for Kent, Ont., (Mr. Campbell), said that it is true that they have increased the expenditure from $38,000,000 to $41,000,000, but he asks: Has the expenditure been unwise: will any hon. gentleman show in what particular the government have expended that money foolishly? The hon. member was frank enough to admit that there was an increase in the expenditure, but, we have the word of the hon. member for Halifax for it, that every plank in the platform was carried out. Why did they not decrease the expenditure instead of increasing it? Then, I say, that that plank of the platform was not carried out, that there was a violation of the promise made to the people, because, instead of reducing the expenditure, it was increased at least $3,000,000 over what it was during the last year that their predecessors were in power. The next plank in their platform was, that there was to be no increase in the public debt. The hon. member for Kent, Ont., admitted that they had increased the public debt, but he said that they had not increased it as rapidly as their predecessors. Then, I say, that that plank was not carried out. The statement of the hon. member for Halifax is, that every plank was carried out, that every promise was fulfilled, but I have shown that not one of these three promises was fulfilled. What must the people think when an hon. gentleman stands up, belonging to the other side of the House, and says that the promises made to the people before the elections have been substantially fulfilled. Then, hon. gentlemen were to reduce the cost of agricultural implements to the farmers. Have they done that? How did they reduce the cost? They led the farmers to believe that they would reduce the cost of agricultural implements, by reducing the tariff on agricultural implements. The tariff on agricultural implements is 20 per cent to-day, the same as it was when they came into power. Agricultural implements are not any cheaper than when they came into power, but, in some respects, they are a little dearer. Hon. gentlemen say, it is true, but we reduced the duty on raw material so as to enable the manufacturers to turn out their implements at a lower cost. If they have made a reduction in the cost, they have put it in their own pockets, by way of profit, because, the farmers are getting their implements no cheaper. But, it was said, that the farmers were to get cheaper binder twine when hon. gentlemen came into power. They have been in power for three years, and what is binder twine sold at to-day? Last year binder twine was sold in our country at from 11 cents to 13 cents per pound. I know that I paid 12½ cents a pound for binder twine, and did not get the best quality at that. In 1898, it was from 14 cents to 16 cents per pound. Have hon. gentlemen kept their promise that they would reduce binder twine? In 1897, it was from 8 to 9 cents a pound, while, in 1896, before hon. gentlemen came into power, and before the duty was taken off, it was from 6 cents to 7½ cents a pound. From that time to last year, the price has gone up, although last year, there was a little reduction. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), says that it is true that binder twine has gone up a little, but it was due to the Spanish-American war, which increased the cost of the raw material, so that the price had to be put up. The hon. gentleman, for many years, was an ardent student of the Auditor General's report. I wondered, when he was speaking, if he had looked over that volume for the last three years, because, if he had, and if he had taken the trouble to look at what the cost of the raw material was, he would have seen that the raw material, used in the manufacture of binder twine, that was sold in Canada in 1897, cost, laid down at the penitentiary, 3½ cents a pound. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills), in a pamphlet, which I have before me, states that it cost three-quarters of a cent per pound to make the binder twine. If the raw material was laid down at 3½ cents a pound and it took three-quarters of a cent a pound to manufacture it, how was it that the farmers of Canada paid so much for their binder twine in that year? They paid in 1897, from 8 cents to 9 cents a pound.

Mr. WILSON. How much did it cost to make it?

Mr. SPROULE. Three-quarters of a cent a pound. The raw material cost 3½ cents a pound, and it cost ¾ of a cent a pound to make it. Four and a quarter cents a pound was the cost of this binder twine which was sold to the farmers for 7 cents, 8 cents and 9 cents a pound. Where did the difference go if it did not go to the middlemen, who by virtue of the manner in which the government sold that binder twine, were enabled to control the sale to the farmers, and thereby reap the large profits represented by the margin between 4¼ cents and 9 cents a pound, which the farmers were forced to pay for it. Was that exorbitant price due to the increased cost of raw material, as the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says? Not at all. Was it due to the fact that they had to pay a higher price for raw material because of the difficulty of getting manila and sisal on account of the Spanish-American war? Not at all. Why, Mr. Speaker, let me tell the hon. gentleman that the raw material for the binder twine was laid down at Kingston penitentiary for the year 1898 for 3½ cents a pound, the same exactly as the year before. The cost of manufacture was the same, but the farmers in the year 1898 were compelled to pay from 14 to 16 cents a pound, although that twine only cost 4½ cents. Who got the difference? It certainly was not the farmer, but it was the middleman who was able to operate in that way on account of the manner in which the government sold the binder twine to the monopolists. One of the planks in the Liberal platform was that they would destroy monopolies, but from the day they came into power until the present hour, they have played into the hands of the monopolists who, in turn, bled the farmers and the honest people of Canada. Last year the raw material laid down at Kingston cost 4 cents a pound, as compared with 3½ the year before. Allow ¼ of a cent a pound for manufacture, and that twine cost at Kingston 4½ cents a pound, but in my part of the country the farmers had to pay from 11 to 13 cents a pound for it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). It must be the abolition of the duty that brought about the increased price.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say it was the abolition of the duty that was altogether the cause, but, I say, as I have always said, that it does not follow as a matter of fact that the price of binder twine will be reduced if you take the duty off. If that twine is under a combine in the United States, and if you allow your unscrupulous speculators in Canada to join with that combine, as the government has done by reason of the manner in which they sold the output of the Kingston penitentiary, then these monopolists will run up the price on the poor farmers. Why did not this government do as the Liberal-Conservatives did? Why did they not hold a portion of that twine to sell to any farmer in the country a carload at any season in the year at the same price as it was sold to the man who purchased the whole output. If the government did this, and then, even if every twine factory in the country combined to put up the price, the farmer could, through his agent, order it from the Kingston penitentiary and obtain it at an honest profit over the cost of the raw material and the cost of manufacture. If the government did that last year, does any sane man think that the farmers would have to pay 11 to 13 cents a pound for it, and if the government did that the year before would the farmers have had to pay from 14 to 16 cents a pound for binder twine, which only costs 4½ cents? No. If the government had done as they should have done, the farmers could buy it at 4½ cents a pound at Kingston, the same as Hobbs, of London, and Bates, of Ottawa, bought it. A farmer ordering a carload could have distributed it amongst his neighbours, and then the people of the country would have received a substantial benefit therefrom. Last year the government sold the output of the Kingston penitentiary, and the Ontario government sold the output of the Central prison in such a way that they played deliberately into the hands of the combine, and enabled that combine to extort over $200,000 from the farmers of Canada, and I am within the mark when I place it at that figure. There is the Farmers Binder Twine Company, of Brantford, that was established by the Patrons of Industry ostensibly for the purpose of keeping the cost of binder twine down to a normal price. Up to the time the present government came into power the Brantford factory paid a small dividend upon the money invested, and which I believe was a reasonable profit. But what has occurred since the Liberals attained power? The monopolists to whom the government sold their twine arranged prices with the Brantford factory, and so the Brantford factory the year before last paid a dividend of 60 per cent on its stock, and last year they paid 100 cents on every dollar of stock that a shareholder invested in that factory. Where did that enormous profit come from? Why, it was taken out of the poor farmers of Canada by virtue of the manner in which this government sold the binder twine output of the Kingston penitentiary, and in which their friends in the Ontario government sold the binder twine output of the Central prison.

Mr. McNEILL. Shame.

Mr. SPROULE. This government put it within the power of Hobbs Bros., of London, and H. N. Bate, of Ottawa, and a few others of their friends to make arrangements, so that they controlled the output of binder twine in Kingston, Toronto, Cobourg and Brantford, which means the entire output of the Canadian factories except what was manufactured by the Cordage Company, of Montreal, and I am quite sure that that company joined with them, because they endeavoured to effect a combine years ago in order to make a larger profit on their investment.

Mr. TAYLOR. They are all in the ring.

Mr. SPROULE. That is a sample of the administration of this Liberal government, and in the face of that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has the hardihood to state in this House, that no government ever fulfilled so many of its promises as did this government during the last four years. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) also told us that every promise made by the Liberals out of power had been substantially and literally fulfilled since the Liberals came into power. Let me ask him (Mr. Russell) a few questions. Did they do away with monopolies? Not at all. The fact is that ever since they came into power they have played into the hands of monopolies to the extent of bleeding the farmers of Canada almost white, and in the matter of binder twine alone they bled the farmers to the extent of several hundreds of thousands of dollars inside of a few years. What becomes of the argument of the hon. member for North Wellington when he sees that binder twine was cheaper last year, although it was the only year that the raw material had increased in price? I was amused the other day to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) state, in reply to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), that in the interest of the farmers the government are offering their binder twine now at a very slight profit over cost price. He told us that they sold to the farmers of Canada in lots of less than one ton, at the following prices: 14 cents for manila, 11 cents for mixed manila, and 10 cents for New Zealand; and up to when did they offer the binder twine at these prices? Up to the 20th of March of this year. They offered it to the farmers in winter, when they do not want binder twine, at 14 cents a pound. I was at home a week ago to-morrow, and I went into two hardware stores, and asked them at what price they would sell me binder twine? They said the same as last year—at 11 cents, 12½ cents and 13 cents a pound in five-pound lots, whereas the government offered to sell it in wholesale lots to the farmers of the country at 14 cents a pound in winter, when they do not want it. This is a wonderful thing that they have done for the benefit of the farmers; they will sell them at 14 cents a pound what costs the government exactly 6 cents a pound, so that they are going to make 8 cents a pound out of the farmers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does the hon. gentleman deliberately commit himself to these figures?

Mr. SPROULE. They are the figures the government give, and I take their own figures. If they are wrong, the government are responsible for it, not I; it is their funeral, not mine. What was the cost of the raw material? The Auditor General says 5½ cents a pound laid down at Kingston, and I have the statement of Hon. Mr. Mills in this pamphlet that it costs ¼ cent a pound to make the binder twine; therefore it cost only 6 cents a pound if the Auditor General and Mr. Mills are telling the truth. And the government are magnanimously and generously offering it to the farmers at 14 cents a pound.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the privilege of asking the hon. gentleman a question. I say that the statement he has made is thoroughly misleading; the figures contradict him.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the hon. gentleman's question?

Mr. ROGERS. I ask what authority you have for the price of the raw material this year?

Mr. SPROULE. I have the authority of the Auditor General's Report. Does the hon. gentleman dispute that? It is made up by his own friends. Therefore, if it is wrong, I am not responsible for it; but I believe it is not wrong. I have reason to believe that it is right.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Auditor General's Report does not speak of the cost this year.

Mr. SPROULE. It speaks of the cost last year, and that is what goes into the binder twine used this year; and the government are magnanimously offering to sell to the farmers of Canada binder twine in less than ton lots at 14 cents a pound, which only costs them 6 cents, and that in the winter time, when they do not want it; but after the 20th of March, they will not sell them a pound at any price. I want the farmers of the country to know this. I want to ask how it squares with the statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that this government have substantially carried out every promise they made to the people before they came into power. What about coal oil? Is it cheaper to-day? It is dearer. That is because the government have played into the hands of the combine, the gigantic oil trust, just as they played into the hands of the binder twine combine.

We were also told that if they came into power they would secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States, so that our people would have a market of 60,000,000 people to the south of us. The Prime Minister said distinctly in this House and in the country: 'As soon as we are returned to power, our first duty will be to negotiate a reciprocity treaty that will give you the advantage of that market of 60,000,000 people, and we have good grounds to believe that we can do it, because we are friendly to the United States, we have not exasperated them as our predecessors did.' The people of the country took them at their word, and elected them to power. Where is the reciprocity treaty they promised? We have had excursion after excursion to Washington, one member of the government with a palace car, another with a palace car, a third with a palace car. Every one who went to Washington had to go in a palace car. We have the accounts of their expenses given in the public accounts; and these excursions cost the country a large sum of money. These gentlemen had a good time, feasting, drinking and enjoying themselves; but they came back without a reciprocity treaty. I ask the junior member for Halifax if that promise was carried out; I ask the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), was that promise carried out; I ask the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell); and I ask the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), who is likely to speak after me, if he will kindly direct his attention to that matter for a short time and tell me if that promise was carried out. Have we a reciprocity treaty? No more than we had before these hon. gentlemen came to power.

But they were to get other markets for the people. Have they got any? Not one—east, west, north or south. The people have no other markets than they had before these hon. gentlemen came to power. They have not carried out their promise in that respect.

Now, I want to appeal to one or two hon. gentlemen, because this question applies to them more than to others. The hon. member for North Wellington who is always a very loud denouncer of the late government, said: 'When our party comes to power, one of the first things we will do will be to do away with the superannuation law. It is a great injustice to the people of the country for the government to be superannuating men who are practically in the prime of life and as well able to do their work on the day they were superannuated as at any time in their life. We are paying year after year thousands of dollars of superannuation allowances to men who are walking around the streets of Toronto and Ottawa idle. As soon as our party comes to power we will do away with superannuation.' I ask if they have done it. In three years they superannuated 155 civil servants. I have not had time to collate how much it costs this country a year to pay the superannuation allowances for these men, many of whom are likely to draw them for twenty years hence. I ask the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I ask the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell), did they carry out their promise to do away with the superannuation law? They did not. That law stands on our statutes practically the same to-day, and these gentlemen are superannuating many clerks every year. They are adding to the burden of taxation in that respect to a larger extent every year than their predecessors did, yet they have the audacity to tell the people that they have carried out their pledges.

Then, we were to have no more appointments to office of members of parliament until at least two years after they had ceased to be members. The hon. Postmaster General introduced a Bill to that effect, and supported it by as able an argument as he could. He said it was demoralizing to public life and subversive of the independence of parliament to have hon. members sitting in this House with promises of office in their pockets. Such men could not be independent, and to do away with that vicious practice, he introduced a Bill to make it impossible to appoint any member of parliament to any office of emolument under the Crown until two years after he had ceased to be a member. Every member of the present government supported that measure.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman tell me who did not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know one who did.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has either a very bad memory—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one who did.

Mr. SPROULE. Several members spoke on it and supported it, and if they did not support it by their speeches, I do not know what they did. The hon. minister has made a gratuitous statement not founded on fact.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My statement was that there was no division on that Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say there was, but I say that hon. members of the government supported it and the hon. gentleman said they did not.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who did?

Mr. SPROULE. Several members, but I cannot give their names just now.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman's statement was that there was not a member of the present government, then in opposition, who did not support the Bill. I say that the statement is without any foundation.

Mr. SPROULE. I said that so far as I know that there was not a member who opposed it. Was there one who spoke or said a word against it? Did the hon. Minister of Marine oppose it?

Mr. TAYLOR. He advocated it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not.

Mr. SPROULE. Not one of them raised his voice against it, but to-day they are so much ashamed of their conduct that they are trying to creep out of the small end of the horn by saying that they did not support that Bill. But if they did not speak in its favour, they did not oppose it and supported it by their silence. How many members of parliament have been appointed to office under the government during the past three years? The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) gave the names of thirteen who have been appointed either to offices of emolument under the Crown or to the Senate, and who were members of this House when appointed. This was done in deliberate violation of the principle laid down by the Postmaster General, who is to-day a member of that government, and looked up to by the people of Canada as one who, at least, ought to endeavour to carry out the principle which he advocated before he came to office. Yet, this practice which the Postmaster General said was demoralizing and undermining the freedom and independence of parliament, is being carried on to a greater extent by this government than ever before by its predecessors, and that hon. gentleman has not a word to say either in condemnation of this course or in explanation of his own very strange conduct.

We were promised also purity in elections. The changes were run on that cry on every hustings in this country, and by none was this great principle more upheld than by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). To hear him speak you would have thought that there was nothing in him but what was of the most unsullied purity. You would think that it was utterly impossible for him to do anything wrong; that he could not, under any circumstances, support a party that did anything wrong; and that if there was the slightest scintilla of evidence to show that even his own party had been guilty of electoral corruption, he would be the first to condemn it. But what has that hon. gentleman to say about the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) and the means by which he secured his seat in this House? Did the evidence brought before the Committee on Privileges and Elections show that it was by the exercise of purity that he obtained it? Was it to further purity of elections that so much money was spent in that constituency in order to return its present member? Was it the exercise of purity in elections that enabled the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Comstock) to reach this House? I was in that last election, and I never saw such a demoralization of the people, such corruption practiced, so much money expended and promises of office given since the first day I set my foot in that constituency up to the present. And the hon. member for North Wellington, I believe, was there helping in that election, and he had not then a word to say against the devices there being resorted to. What kind of purity of election did hon. gentlemen opposite practice in North Grey, when they elected the hon. member who is to-day Minister of Customs? Were they living up to their promises then? I took part in that election, and I know that we have about 200 affidavits showing that electors in that constituency were deliberately bought up by means of money furnished by the Reform party and their agents, and some of them were bought three times and paid the cash. We hold affidavits showing the men from whom they got the money, how they were purchased, where they were purchased and the amounts they got to support the hon. member for North Grey, who to-day has a seat in this House by virtue of that kind of purity in elections. I have lived in the county of Grey for forty-five years, and I never saw such a saturnalia of corruption in all the elections in which I have taken part as in that election which returned the hon. Minister of Customs to this House. Who helped him to carry his seat? The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who is now a member of the cabinet. Who else assisted him? W. T. R. Preston, who is now, I was going to say, on ticket of leave, but who is instead receiving a big salary to stay away in England lest he might be brought before the election courts in this country or the parliamentary committee. Cap. Sullivan was another who, it is said, helped in that election, and Sam Hewitt, Linklater, Thomas Lewis and Duncan Bole, some of whom were employees of the local government. We found many employees of both the local and provincial governments in every constituency where elections were going on, helping the government candidates, and yet, there is not a word from the hon. member for North Wellington in condemnation of such nefarious conduct. These are men sitting in this House, supporting the government who were elected. I am convinced, by the most unblushing bribery and corruption ever perpetrated in Canada, and yet, we are unable, on account of the tactics of the government, to inquire into these matters and show to the world the extent of that bribery and corruption. Who were the men that were guilty? Many of them are civil servants, some employed by the local government and some by this. When we wanted to bring them before the courts they could not be found. They had fled the country, like Linklater and Bole, and, therefore, could not be subpoenaed. But when their month's pay comes round and the pay sheets have to be signed, there is no difficulty about their signing the sheets and getting the money. And yet the Attorney General has the unblushing effrontery to declare that these men cannot be found. Does that look like honesty? I say that from the time the present government came into power up to the present, every by-election, at least in the province of Ontario, has been carried, I believe, by the most unblushing corruption that ever was known in this country. If we had been able to bring these cases into court, as I endeavoured to do, we would have left a record which would have been a disgrace to them for all time to come. I ask them, was their promise fulfilled which they made, when they said that if returned to power, they would give the people purity of election? They may call this purity, but we know it by a different name. They were going to exercise economy, and particularly they were going to give no more subsidies to railways. The Patron's platform was no more subsidies to railways, and the Liberals, declaring that to be their platform, also, were ready to take Patron candidates wherever they could find them. But did they stop subsidies for railways? By no means; they increased them, violating not only their own platform, but the platform of the Patrons, a representative of whom is sitting before me now, the gentleman who asked me a question about binder twine. If that hon. gentleman can go back and square his conduct before the Patrons of this country, it will be done by some legerdemain that I and many members in this House know nothing about.

Now, I have only given a few of the promises they made to the people of this country, but I have shown that in every case they have deliberately misled the people, they have refused to carry out the promises they made, and have done the very reverse of what they said they would do. And, now we are asked to pass a motion praising them for carrying out their pledges, to eulogize them for what they did. We sometimes say that whatever there is good in the policy they have carried out, they got from the Conservative party. They pretend that there is great benefit in the preferential tariff, that it is a benefit to Canada, and a benefit to England as well. I would like to ask them where they got that? Would any one of them unbosom himself so far as to tell where they got it? If they will not tell, I will tell where they got it, because I heard it before they came into power. They got it from the late Dalton McCarthy, who laid it down in 1896, and asked the Conservative party to take it up. The Conservatives refused to do so. And the Liberals adopted it, as they adopted from the same source the proposed settlement of the Manitoba school question. And, they take credit for it to-day. It is well for them that Mr. McCarthy is dead. I know from conversations that I had with him, before he met with the unfortunate accident that deprived us of his presence here, that, had he lived he would have stood up publicly and condemned hon. gentlemen opposite for the way they carried out their policy. He admitted himself that it was his policy, and he was the party who gave it to them. If there is any good in it, they are indebted to him for it, and they ought to be generous enough to give credit where credit is due. If they do not, it is only another evidence of petty larceny, so pronounced through their policy in every part of it. I think I have said enough to convince the people of this country that hon. gentlemen opposite have not carried out their platform in any respect. And, we are asked to-day to slobber over them and eulogize them because they gave this preferential tariff, so valuable, they say, to Canada. We are now going to thank them for it, and the people of the country will not thank them. They may get their own supporters, I was going to say servile supporters, and at least they have supported them in everything. They are obliged to get one of their own friends to move a motion thanking themselves and eulogizing themselves for what they have done. They cannot get it from any other source either in the House or in the country. They are a mutual admiration society; if they do not admire themselves, and praise themselves, nobody in this House, or in the country will. They are entitled to all the credit they can get from it. But, when the dissolution of this House comes, whether it be early or whether it is late, when an appeal is made to the great electors of this country, and the people are asked to say either the hon. gentlemen have carried out their promises, or not, I am very much mistaken if they are not told by the people: We do not believe you carried out your promises; you have been weighed in the balance and found wanting; we will turn you from power, and put others in your places, whose policy we approve, and upon whose promises we can depend.

Mr. MACDONALD (East Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the motion is put, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), when we may reasonably expect the budget to be brought down?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). We seemed to be having an interesting parliamentary budget debate, and I think we had better get through with it before we deal with the formal budget. An early announcement will be made.

Mr. PRIOR. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who leads the House, when he expects the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Borden), back ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I understand he will be back to-morrow.

Mr. PRIOR. He will be here the beginning of next week ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 19, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 98) respecting the Yarmouth Steamship Company, Limited.—(Mr. Flint.)

Bill (No. 99) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Miami Cycle and Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 100) respecting the Buffalo Railway Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether he proposes, now that the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain and Canada seem to be at an end, to furnish the House with the information usual in such cases as to the protocols that were laid by either party, and to state to the House in what position the whole matter stands ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am glad to be able to say to my hon. friend that neither the government nor the commissioners consider that the negotiations have come to an end. They are only temporarily suspended, but I am not prepared to say when they shall be reopened. In the meantime, neither am I in a position to state whether the protocols can be laid on the Table, but this is a matter to which my attention has been called and I will be in a position in a few days to give my hon. friend an answer.

CANADIAN TROOPS TO GARRISON ESQUIMALT.

Mr. E. G. PRIOR (Victoria, B.C.) I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia to the following article in to-day's Citizen :

A militia order has been issued directing that the right half of 'A' company of the provincial battalion which is being raised to replace, temporarily, the Leinster Regiment, is to be sent to Victoria, B.C., to assist the Imperial troops in garrisoning Esquimalt.

Is it the intention to garrison Esquimalt with Canadian troops exclusively, or are these troops to be sent only to assist the Imperial troops ? I would also like to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that the Leinster Regiment in Halifax has received marching orders for England or Africa, I do not know which.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Africa.

Mr. PRIOR. But I am told on very good authority that they are going to leave behind all the men under twenty years of age and the men who are physically not fit to proceed on active service, and I would like to ask the hon. minister whether that would not be a good nucleus for a battalion for the repatriation of the 100th Regiment, in which, I know, the hon. minister, like myself, has taken an interest for several years.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. With regard to the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Prior's) first question, I can only say that having returned only this morning to my office, I have no statement to make in respect to the item in the Citizen. To-morrow, I shall be able to give my hon. friend the information. With regard to the repatriation of the 100th Leinster Regiment, I do not care to express an opinion on the point raised by him ; but I can say, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will be very glad to hear it, that the War Office is now seriously considering the question, and, I believe, has strong hopes of being able to carry out in the future, the repatriation of that regiment.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to ask the hon. minister a question in that connection. I understand that recruiting is going on at present to fill the vacancies in the ranks in the first South African contingent. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) is aware that several enthusiastic officers in the militia resigned their commissions to go into the ranks of that contingent.

Mr. PRIOR. There is a question on the Order paper on that subject.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, very well.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. GEORGE E. CASEY (West Elgin). Before you pass to the Orders of the Day, Mr. Speaker, I have to call the attention of the House again to certain matters connected with the Pacific cable, which seem to place the action of some of the parties to the arrangement in a new light, and a light which certainly must give rise to some uneasiness on the part of friends of the cable scheme. I have received through the post to-day a copy of the debates of the Victoria legislature of the 9th of February, containing the debate, of which some inkling was given to us in the telegraphic despatches about that time, as to the concessions asked for by the Eastern Extension Company from the Australasian colonies. Mr. Duffy, who was formerly Postmaster General, and whose name is well known in this country, brought the matter up and discussed it at some length.

I may say there were two propositions before the Victorian assembly and government on the part of the Eastern Extension Company—a first proposition and a subsequent modification of it. The first proposition was that the company should be allowed to land a cable in the colony; not only to land a cable in the colony, but also to open offices of their own in the colony independent of the postal telegraph system operated by the government. Upon that being objected to on certain grounds, which I shall point out later, it was modified into a proposition that they should have no extra facilities of this kind until after the Pacific cable had been laid. Mr. Duffy discussed both these propositions. He said:

I notice, from the press, that the government are negotiating with the Eastern Extension Company, with the view of entering into some agreement with them. As parliament is about to prorogue, that agreement will necessarily be concluded without hon. members having an opportunity of saying anything regarding it. We are told that it is necessary to enter into an agreement. That statement has been made frequently by two sections of the press, and the reason given is, that the present agreements are about to expire. That is absolutely true. Under one of the agreements, we are bound to pay £32,000 a year, and, under the other, we were bound to guarantee the company against loss. I do not know that any great harm will be done to this colony or Australia, if the agreements are allowed to expire. But then we are told also by the press that the company may raise their rate from 4s. 9d. to 8s. a word. Of course, they may. They may take up the cables that have been laid, cut them into pieces and let the babies play with them in the back yards. They are just as likely to do one of these things as the other. The company are remarkably well managed. They know their way about, and they know on which side their bread is buttered as well as any company in the world. As long as they have no fear of competition, they will be prepared to charge the highest price they can claim; but, if there is competition, you may rely upon it that they will deal with their customers, to whom they look for their profits, in the most reasonable manner possible.

Here he comes to notice an aspect of the affair, which, I think, explains the whole situation:

I have mentioned the press in connection with this matter, because the whole agitation in regard to the agreement with the Eastern Extension Company and the Pacific cable has been got up by the press. The 'Argus' said recently, in a burst of delicious frankness,—

That is, the Melbourne Argus.

—that we need not pay any attention to the criticism of the 'Times' on the Transvaal war, because it was all 'newspaper clamour.' Well, I take it, that the agitation against the Pacific cable, and in favour of the Eastern Extension Company, is mere newspaper clamour, and clamour which is not echoed by the House or the great commercial interests on whose behalf the press, or a section of the press, profess to be speaking.

It has been understood for a long time the Eastern Extension Company has entered upon a regular campaign intended to mould and modify the opinions of the Australasian press in a manner best known to Australasian editors and the promoters of great monopolies. And it may be quite possible that the opinions of this section of the press were unduly favourable to the monopoly in consequence of that campaign. Then, Mr. Duffy goes on to speak of the commercial community:

The commercial community, although they are anxious to get their cable messages sent to England as cheaply as possible, are not anxious to throw away a mackerel in order to catch a sprat. They do not desire to lose, for the sake of a small decrease in the present rate for cables, the great Pacific scheme, which will bring about competition, and will result in the rates being permanently and materially lowered. I notice that the modified proposals of the government were placed before the company, and the managers of the company could not agree to them. The directors said they were unheard-of proposals, and that they would never consent to them. Well, I have been accustomed to that sort of thing for years. The company, at the first overtures, are never willing to consent to anything until they are driven to it; but, as soon as they see that they must consent, they consent with a good grace.

It appears, then, that, in the opinion of Mr. Duffy the people of that colony do not desire to do anything that would interfere with the Pacific cable scheme, but that the government and a large number of legislators have been influenced by the clamour in the press to such an extent that it appears to be impossible to defeat the arrangement proposed by the company. Mr. Duffy goes on to speak of the possibility of getting the company to consent to these better terms.

Further on, he refers to the compact that has been entered into with the different colonies, very much in the sense in which it has been referred to in this House :

To show that the prejudice to the Pacific cable does not exist purely in my imagination,—

That is, the prejudice caused by the scheme proposed.

—I will call the attention of the Premier to two telegrams which appear in this morning's 'Argus,' and which, no doubt, he has not had time to see. One of those telegrams is from the Premier of New Zealand. It is addressed to the Postmaster General of Victoria, and it runs as follows :—

'New Zealand considers the acceptance of the Cape cable scheme a breach of faith in connection with the Pacific cable arrangement, seeing that it must reduce the earnings and increase the liabilities of the present cable.'

And the Premier of Canada, which is our other partner in the scheme—a large partner, and one that has not so much interest in the scheme as the Australasian colonies have—telegraphs as follows :—

'Canada strongly objects to the last proposal of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, or any other that will remove the control over the telegraph business from the local government, and give the company a free hand in competing with the Pacific submarine cable.'

While objecting to the Eastern Extension Company have an undue advantage over our local administrations, I still more strongly object—and this is the vital point—to anything being done that will at present jeopardize the construction of the Pacific cable, and I believe that the effect of any proposed arrangement, even the modification, even though that is not so bad as the original proposal—proposed by the government, and under the consideration of the Eastern Extension Company, will, as shown by those telegrams, lead our partners to believe that we are committing a breach of faith towards them.

Well, Sir, it certainly strikes my mind in that way. I do not know whether this government are willing to take the responsibility of saying to the Australian colonies that it would be a breach of faith on their part to enter into any such side bargain ; but I think it is proper to state in this House that it strikes the average man so—that after agreeing to go into a large scheme of this kind, it would be a breach of faith to enter into a side bargain with a competing company. This speaker continues :

Mr. CASEY.

And, believing that, they will not enter into further negotiations with us, so that the whole Pacific cable scheme will fall through, to the great delight, the great joy, and the exceeding great profit of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, but to the great loss of the whole of Australasia. I do not think that any agreement ought to be entered into. I am inclined to think, from my knowledge of past negotiations, and of the company generally, that if we simply keep 'never minding,' as they say in Scotland, it will be best for us in the long run, that a policy of masterly inactivity at this juncture would lead to our getting what we want in the end, namely, the construction of the Pacific cable and the doing away with the monopoly.

Then he goes on to discuss the evils of a telegraphic monopoly generally, and finally states more particularly his objections to both the schemes that have been proposed.

Speaking of the first scheme which would allow the Eastern Extension Company to have competing offices in Australia, Mr. McLean says :

The objection to that was, that if they were brought into direct communication with their customers, it would enable them to enter into secret contracts, and to make arrangements by which they might secure the custom of those people after the Pacific cable had been laid, to the great injury of the Pacific cable, and that it probably might result in effectually blocking the construction of that cable.

I am quoting now from Mr. McLean, who followed Mr. Duffy, and who—I am not very well posted as to the members of the cabinet over there—but it appears from what Mr. McLean says, that he must be a member of the government :

Mr. DUFFY. It would, certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes ; and I believe, with my hon. friend, that it would have that effect. But what is now proposed is an entirely different thing. The present proposal, to which I am very pleased to say, the Eastern Extension Company's representative has consented, subject to the approval of his principals, is that they shall not get any of those facilities until the Pacific cable has been laid. They agree to make the reduction at once, and, as stipulated by Mr. Chamberlain, they agree that any reductions made shall never be increased.

By which I suppose he means that when the price has once been reduced it will never be increased.

As my hon. friend knows, the Imperial government—

I wish to call the especial attention of the House to this extract, for this is what affects the position of the Imperial government in the matter.

As my hon. friend knows, the Imperial government, who were parties to the contract for the laying of the Pacific cable, saw no objection to the granting of the full concession asked for by the Eastern Extension Company, providing they would agree that the cable should be laid in such a way that it would be under the control of British troops, and that the rates, once reduced, should never be increased. Those were the only safeguards that the Imperial government, who are parties to this contract, saw necessary. And that view was adopted by the Premier of New South Wales, which was a party to the contract. The other premiers, with the exception of the Premier of Queensland, favoured the same view.

Now, this is a point to which I wish to call special attention; that on the statement of this member, apparently, of the Victoria government, certainly a member of some conference that had to deal with cable matters, the Imperial government thought the Colonial Office had declared their approval of even the gross breach of faith involved in the first scheme proposed by the Eastern Extension Company. It seems hard to believe that the minister himself who has taken such an apparent interest in colonial development, in the unification of the empire, should agree to a course which would so effectually prevent the realization of this great scheme. But, the assertions made uncontradicted in the Victoria House, must have some weight; the approval may have been given unofficially, casually in some way by the minister. It may have been given through the gentleman, Sir Robert Herbert, who I believe is acting as under-secretary of that department, and who is a director of the Eastern and South African Telegraph Company, the company which was to make direct connection with the proposed Cape and Australia cable. He may have been influencing the opinion of his superior on this matter at a time when the colonial minister's mind was so much taken up with affairs in Africa. I am sure that when the facts are properly brought before the minister, and the importance of this thing insisted upon, we will find that he will not agree to any proposal of that sort. But, the assertion of this responsible statesman in Victoria seems to require some explanation from the Colonial Office. I do not know whether the government have information on that point themselves; if they have, I should ask that the information be given to the House, at the close of these remarks.

Then, Sir, Mr. McLean went on to mention the difficulties they had had in inducing the company to accept the modified proposal referred to. He adds:

But they have now agreed, subject to the approval of their principals, to give us largely reduced rates as soon as the contract is signed, and they are not to get the facilities asked for until the Pacific cable has been laid.

Mr. DUFFY. Canada, New Zealand and Queensland object to that.

Mr. McLEAN. What will the effect of that arrangement be? Hon. members will see that it will place both companies on an absolute equality after the Pacific cable has been laid. It gives the Eastern Extension Company no advantage whatever over the Pacific Cable Company. But when both are laid, both will be on exactly even terms, and the effect of the competition will be to give the public the cheapest possible service. If we give either one party or the other a monopoly, as I infer from my hon. friend he would be disposed to do—I infer that he would be disposed to give the Pacific Cable Company what he would deny to the other companies—

Mr. DUFFY. Oh, no; we cannot do that, under the general telegraph law of the world.

Mr. McLEAN. Then, what does my hon. friend object to, seeing that we give up no facilities until the Pacific cable is laid? If the Pacific cable is never laid, the Eastern Extension Company will never get those facilities, while we will get the reduced rates, under a binding contract that those rates, once reduced, can never be increased.

Later on, he says:

This scheme could not possibly kill the Pacific cable project, but it might possibly prevent it having an undue monopoly or advantage over the other.

Now, it would seem as if Mr. McLean had the idea that the proposed Pacific cable was to be laid by a cable company, a commercial corporation competing with the Eastern Extension Company, and that there was danger of giving them a monopoly for that reason, and danger of the rates being kept unduly high if other companies were not allowed to compete with them. Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine how such an absurdity could have entered the mind of a public man. The Pacific cable is not to be laid by a company at all; it is to be laid by a commission composed of the representatives of the governments interested. It is to be laid and operated, and the rates are to be levied, by a commission, not for the purpose of making money, but, merely, for the purpose of affording the cheapest public service possible. The rates would have to be placed at such a figure as would pay the cost of operation of the cable and the interest on the capital invested, with a trifling margin over, to provide against accidental loss. To speak of the Pacific cable being a monopoly in the ordinary sense of the word, is just about as absurd as to speak of the post office system being a monopoly, since both systems are operated under government control, to provide for the public convenience, the profits arising from them, if there be any, going into the public treasury, and no profits being derived over those necessary for the operation of the scheme. That consideration seems to me to dispose, at once, of any objection on the ground of giving a monopoly to the Pacific cable. It seems to me, on the other hand, that, allowing the company that has hitherto had a monopoly in these regions, to compete with the government scheme, would be just as absurd as allowing a railway company in this country, to compete with the Post Office Department in the carriage of letters, or, in Australia, to compete with the postal system in the carriage of letters. As it is proposed that the governments shall go into the scheme, own the cable and operate it purely in the interest of the public, it can have none of the effects of a private monopoly operating a private enterprise. On the other hand, to allow competition, even prospective competition, may possibly have the effect of killing the whole scheme. I do not know how the government look upon it, or whether it would have that effect in their opinion, but, if this competition were allowed, it seems to me, that it would give ground for asking for the revision of the whole scheme. It ought in that case to be revised in such a way that those parties who are injuring the scheme by any such act as is proposed, should bear a larger proportion of the cost, than they have agreed to at present.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), but, the only point in his remarks that appears to me to call for observation, is the quotation from Mr. McLean's speech, alluding to the action of the Imperial government in respect to this scheme. I am quite of the opinion that the Imperial government are not correctly represented in this report. This paper that the hon. member has read from is the Victoria Hansard, of February 9th, of this year, but, I do not understand that the report is a verbatim copy of the speaker's remarks. But, even assuming it to be so, there has been a very decided change on the face of the question since the 9th of February. If the hon. gentleman's point is that the Imperial government have given their consent to the Australian colonies varying the conditions enforced at the time, I should prefer to reserve judgment until I know distinctly, as we will know, what has transpired between the Imperial government and the Australian colonies. Mr. McLean, I suppose, is a member of that government. He is reported to have said here :

As my hon. friend knows, the Imperial government, who are parties to the contract for the laying of the Pacific cable, saw no objection to the granting of the full concession asked for by the Eastern Extension Company, providing they would agree, &c.

Then :

Those were the only safeguards that the Imperial government, who are parties to this contract, saw necessary.

I entirely question the accuracy of that statement. It is not in harmony with our views as to the attitude of the Imperial government, and, whatever may have been informally expressed at that early date by the Imperial government, or by any other government, I believe there have been decided changes in the situation even since the 9th of February. Since then, a great deal of cable correspondence has taken place between this government, the Imperial government and the Australian government, and without going farther, I can say that the declaration as to the attitude of the Imperial government, is at direct variance with our information as to the views of the Imperial government on this question. As the hon. gentleman is aware that there should be no change in the fundamental conditions existing after the contract was made, we believe the Imperial government are equally anxious with us ; so that, precarious as the situation is, I think that we have the right yet to hope for this scheme being successfully carried out. I do not know that I can add anything at all to my hon. friend's information on the subject. We are not discussing the merits or demerits of the scheme, but, if we were, we hardly could do more than bring friendly advice and pressure to bear on our sister colonies in Australia. They happen to be in a special position. They perhaps feel that cable communication from Australia, directly to the Cape, would be of great importance to them. We cannot quarrel with that view, but we must take exception to anything that will injure this scheme. I think that the extract is an entirely incorrect representation of the views of the Imperial government.

Motion (Mr. Casey) to adjourn, negatived.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RICHARDSON.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Lisgar). Mr. Speaker, before you call the Orders of the Day, I wish to make a personal explanation. I received a telegram from the west stating that a report is being circulated amongst my constituents, that I had, in the House of Commons, made statements reflecting upon the loyalty of the Mennonites. I wish to give that statement an emphatic denial. Inasmuch as I did not participate in the debates in reference to the sending of the Canadian contingents to South Africa, of course, I said nothing of the kind. As I am on my feet, I would like to bear testimony to the loyalty and peace-loving qualities of the Mennonites. There are about 12,000 Mennonites in my constituency, and I do not think that there can be found in the Dominion of Canada to-day, a better, a more independent, a more loyal, or a more industrious class of settlers than they are.

THE LEE-ENFIELD RIFLE.

Mr. OSLER (by Mr. Clarke) asked :

1. On what rifle ranges throughout the country is practice permitted with the Lee-Enfield rifle?
2. How many battalions are armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle?
3. How many are not so armed?
4. What rural corps, if any, are armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle?
5. How many rounds of ammunition per man are issued to the militia for class firing?
6. How many rounds per man are issued free for practice purposes, exclusive of class firing?
7. What financial or other aid is granted to the various regiments for the purpose of rifle practice?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. In Ontario—Leamington, Woodstock, Point Edward, Guelph, Walkerton, Wiarton, St. Thomas, Barrie, Brantford, Dundas, Hamilton, Niagara, Toronto, Picton, township of Pittsburg, Belleville, Campbellford, Peterborough, township of Ernestown, Pembroke, Prescott, Ottawa. In Quebec—Laprairie, Huntingdon, Covey Hill, Odelltown, Hemmingford, Roxham, Aubry, St. Johns, Sweetsburg, Windsor Mills, Richmond, Cookshire, Barnston, Somerset, St. Genevieve de Batiscan. In New Brunswick—Fredericton, Sussex, Baker Brook, Moncton, Chatham. In Nova Scotia—Bedford, Aldershot, Paradise West, Kentville, Canning, Bear River, Nictaux, Digby, Truro, Windsor, and Maccan. In Manitoba—Winnipeg, Virden, Brandon. In British Columbia—Clover Point. In Prince Edward Island—Charlottetown, Little York, Pownal, Souris, Fortune, Cove, Montague. 2. Thirty-four. 3. Fifty-seven. 4. 16th, 41st, and 82nd Battalions. All rural corps undergoing annual training in camp are supplied with the Lee-Enfield for target practice. 5. For each officer and man, 40 rounds of ball and 10 of blank. A further allowance of 10 rounds ball ammunition is issued to each man who has qualified as marksman, to enable him to compete for position of best shot in the battalion. 6. Answered by No. 5. 7. No grants are made to regiments. Rifle Associations recognized by the department, are paid such annual grants as the annual returns show them to be entitled to, according to a fixed scale.

MAILS BETWEEN BENNETT AND DAWSON.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

What has been the time occupied, per trip, in the carriage of mails between Bennett and Dawson during the present winter? What is the length of time occupied in the carriage from Dawson to Ottawa during the winter season?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). During the earlier portions of the months of November and December it will be noticed by the inclosed statement that the time occupied was from 34, 32, 26, and 19 days with a gradual improvement in the time of the service until in the month of February the mails were being carried from Bennett to Dawson in a period of from 6 to 8 days. The difference in the time during the months of November and December and the months of January and February is largely due to the climatic conditions prevailing during the different portions of the year. During the earlier portion of the season that part of the river nearest to Dawson freezes before the portion near Lake Bennett, and it is not possible to employ steamers the whole distance. It has happened that steamers leaving Lake Bennett with the mails have only been able to proceed part of the way and then become jammed in the ice, necessitating the mails being forwarded from that point by dog teams, the procuring of which would necessarily cause delay. It has also happened, particularly last fall, that after the cold weather set in a thaw took place and it was found impossible to operate either by steamer or dog team for days on account of the condition of the trail. The same objection prevails in reference to mails going from Dawson to Bennett, the mails having to be despatched from Dawson by dog teams and then transferred to steamers wherever practicable. 2. Letters have reached Ottawa from Dawson within twenty days.

IMPERIAL ARMY PENSIONS.

Mr. DOMVILLE (by Mr. Ellis) asked :

1. What is the rate of pension allowance in the Imperial army in the case of officers, non-commissioned officers and men in the cavalry, infantry and artillery? Is such allowance fixed by statute? If not, how?

2. What scale of pensions are provided in the case of persons serving in the Canadian militia? Is the same fixed by statute? If not, how is the same determined?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. The rates of pension allowances in the Imperial army in cases of officers, N. C. officers and men in cavalry, infantry, and artillery are to be found in the Royal Warrant for Pay of the Army, 1899, pages 108, etc., 137, etc., 140 etc., 160, etc., 267, etc., 277, etc., and 304, etc. The foregoing is exclusive of the Army Medical Department and the Army Veterinary Department. As regards whether the allowances are fixed by statute, presumably they are approved by Her Majesty in Council. After promulgation in army orders they no doubt have practically the same effect as if embodied in the statutes. 2. The scale of pensions provided in the case of persons serving in the Canadian militia are to be found in the Regulations and Orders 1898, pages 133 to 141. These regulations have been approved by His Excellency in Council, and promulgated in general orders.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I call the attention of the minister to the different mode he has adopted in answering those questions from that followed by his colleagues, who, instead of referring us to the blue-book, which is in every member's hands, go into details and repeat their information from the public documents. The minister (Mr. Borden) has referred us to a source of information which is not available to a great many members.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The book I refer to is to be found in the library and it would probably take me the greater part of the afternoon to read these extracts. I shall send and get the book for the hon. gentleman if he so desires.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—APPLICANTS FOR STAFF COURSE.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What were the ages and military position held by the several applicants for the staff course at the Kingston Royal Military College?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Officers were selected for the staff course at the Royal Military College from the whole militia. Applications were not requested. Two, however, were received as follows : Lieut.-Colonel J. Stacey, 25th Battalion, Commanding Officer, born 13th October, 1858 ; 2nd Lieutenant J. A. Gunn, 2nd Battalion, born 5th August, 1873. The following officers were authorized to undergo the course : Lieut.-Colonel W. E. Hodgins, Reserve of Officers, born 3rd October, 1851 ; Lieut.-Colonel A. Roy, Officer Commanding No. 6 Military District, born 23rd September, 1859 ; Lieut.-Colonel G. E. A. Jones, 8th Battalion, Commanding Officer, born 28th September, 1860 ; Lieut.-Colonel H. McLaren, 13th Battalion, Commanding Officer, born 2nd June, 1847 ; Major G. Galloway, 14th Battalion, born 28th November, 1851 ; Major W. G. Mutton, 2nd Battalion, born 13th May, 1852 ; Major E. Chinic, R.C. R.I., born 15th October, 1858 ; Captain A. E. Carpenter, R.C.R.I., Adjutant, born 2nd September, 1867 ; Captain J. J. Sharples, 8th Battalion, born 9th September, 1874 ; Captain W. S. Smith, 7th Battalion, born 22nd June, 1870 ; Captain E. E. F. Taylor, Governor General's Foot Guards, born 19th December, 1865. The two officers whose names follow, were recommended by the General Officer Commanding to undergo the course, but the authority was not granted by the minister : Lieut.-Colonel W. W. White, Reserve of Officers, born 4th October, 1843 ; Lieut.-Colonel D. McL. Vince, Reserve of Officers, born 20th November, 1848.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. PRIOR asked :

1. Is the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence aware that several officers of the militia holding the rank of captain and lieutenant voluntarily enlisted in the ranks of the South African contingents and went to the front as privates?

2. Is it the intention of the minister to allow these officers to fill vacancies caused by casualties amongst the officers in those contingents, instead of sending other officers from Canada?

3. If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. Not unless recommended in the usual way. 3. The department is not aware of their being recommended by their commanding officers to fill such vacancies.

Mr. BORDEN (King's).

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—MAJOR GENERAL CAMERON.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

1. During what years was Major-General Cameron the head of the Royal Military College at Kingston?

2. When did his connection with the college cease?

3. How many cadets were in attendance at said college during each year that Major-General Cameron was in charge?

4. Who succeeded Major-General Cameron?

5. How many cadets have been in attendance at the college, each year, since Major-General Cameron's official connection therewith ceased?

6. Is it the intention of the government to re-instate Major-General Cameron? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Major-General Cameron was head of the Royal Military College from the 16th August, 1888, until the 25th August, 1896. 2. 25th August, 1896. 3. In 1888, 81 cadets ; in 1889, 76 cadets ; in 1890, 71 cadets ; in 1891, 57 cadets ; in 1892, 66 cadets ; in 1893, 63 cadets ; in 1894, 56 cadets ; in 1895, 59 cadets ; in 1896, 50 cadets. 4. Major Gerald Charles Kittson. 5. In 1897, 57 cadets ; in 1898, 75 cadets ; in 1899, 87 cadets. 6. No.

THE ST. LAWRENCE CANALS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Whether it was the policy of the late government of Canada or of the late Finance Minister of Canada to complete the St. Lawrence canals with all possible despatch, or to pursue a dilatory policy in connection with the work?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am of opinion that the policy of the late government was not to complete the St. Lawrence canals, with all possible despatch, but, was to pursue a dilatory policy in connection with the work.

WEST POINT, P.E.I., WHARF.

Mr. McLELLAN asked :

Have tenders been called for the extension of the West Point, P.E.I., wharf? If so, when? If not, why?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Tenders were called for by public advertisement on Saturday, the 17th instant.

PAY OF PERMANENT CORPS.

Mr. GILMOUR asked :

Under what statutory authority did the government of Sir John Macdonald reduce the pay of the Permanent Corps by order in council?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The authority was contained in 31 Vic., chap. 40, section 63, now reproduced in the Militia Act, 49 Vic., chap. 41, section 81.

CONTRACTS WITH PHILIP VALLIERES

Mr. DUGAS (by Mr. Cleary) asked :

1. Have any contract or contracts for furniture been given since June 23, 1896, by the Department of Public Works or any other department of the government, to Philip Vallières, of Quebec?

2. If so, what is the nature of such contract or contracts?

3. What is the price or consideration of such contract?

4. Were any tenders asked for such contracts? If so, in what manner, and was the said Vallières the lowest tenderer?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). No contract has been made by the Department of Public Works with Philip Vallières of Quebec, since 1896.

MAJOR FOSTER BLISS.

Mr. ROCHE asked :

1. Has Major Foster Bliss been recalled from the Yukon, and if so, why?

2. Is it the intention of the Minister of Militia to send him to South Africa in any position in connection with the Canadian troops there?

3. What positions in the employment of the government of Canada has he held since 1896, and at what salary and allowances?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes, his services not being longer required there. 2. He has gone to South Africa. 3. Deputy Assistant Adjutant General up to 16th December, 1897; salary, $1,800, and staff allowances, $200. Thereafter second class clerk in the Department of Militia and Defence, salary $1,400, up to May, 1898; and then supply officer in the Yukon field force, with pay of his rank as major, viz.: $7.80 per day, no allowances.

MILEAGE OF MAILS.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the extent of the mileage of mails in the years ending June 30, 1890 and 1893, divided into railway, water and ordinary land carriage?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply, I beg to say : The annual mileage for the year ended June 30, 1890, was as follows :

Ordinary land service	12,471,849
Railway service	12,830,045
Water service—
Paid for by department	907,251
By subsidized steamer, department paying a share	94,122
By subsidized steamer, department paying nothing	195,230
	26,498,497

For the year ended June 30, 1893, the mileage was as follows :

Ordinary land service.....	13,501,472
Railway service	15,579,483
Water service—
Paid for by department	1,172,107
By subsidized steamers, department paying a share	22,570

DREDGING AT BERTHIER EN HAUT.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Mills) asked :

What is the name of the dredge which has been employed in the deepening of the channel opposite Berthier en haut ? Who was the engineer ? Who was the craneman ? Who was the fireman ? Who were the deckhands ? Who were the scowmen ? Who were the tug wheelmen ? Who were the firemen ? Who was the watchman ? Who was the carpenter ? Who were the machinists ?

From whom were the supplies purchased ? Were they purchased by tender ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply, I beg to say : The dredge St. Pierre was rented by the department to do the work at Berthier at the rate of $7 per hour. Do not know names of employees, as they were paid by the owners of dredge. Supplies were purchased by owners, the Department of Public Works does not know from whom nor in what manner.

THE PLAINS OF ABRAHAM.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked :

1. Have the government taken any action in relation to the matter of acquiring the Plains of Abraham, so as to prevent this historical ground from being divided up and sold as building lots ?

2. If so, what steps have been taken ?

3. If not, do the government intend taking any such steps ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There have been no formal negotiations for the acquiring of the Plains of Abraham. There has been some informal negotiations, which are still going on. The government would be disposed to buy that property, if it could be bought at any reasonable price.

SYSTEM OF SUBSIDIZING RAILWAYS.

Mr. CAMPBELL (by Mr. McMullen) asked :

1. When was the system of subsidizing railway enterprises begun ?

2. What amount, by way of railway subsidies, was paid each year ?

3. Were the railways, or any of them, required to pay back such subsidies, or render any services to the government in consideration of such subsidies ? If so, what cases ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) to move for a return.

LAND PATENTS AND MINERAL RIGHTS.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

Do patents of lands issued by the Dominion government and the various provincial governments entitle the patentees to all the minerals in the patented lands ? If not, what is excepted from such grants in the case of (a) Dominion government patents ? (b) provincial patents ?

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. (a) All patents for Dominion lands in the North-west Territories entered for prior to the 31st of October, 1887, cover both surface and under rights, which include all mines and minerals, except the precious metals ; and all patents for Dominion lands in the Territories east, of the third meridian, entered for subsequent to that date, reserve to the Crown all mines and minerals. All patents for Dominion lands entered for prior to the 11th of January, 1890, cover both surface and under rights, which include all mines and minerals except the precious metals ; and all patents for lands entered for since that date reserve to the Crown all mines and minerals. All patents for lands in the railway belt in British Columbia reserve to the Crown all mines and minerals ; and, since the 22nd October, 1887, all merchantable timber is also reserved. All patents for ordnance lands cover both surface and under rights, except the precious metals. All patents for Indians lands cover both surface and under rights, except the precious metals. In some cases patents for lands granted in aid of the construction of railways cover only surface rights, while in other cases they cover both surface and under rights, except the precious metals, the rule being to issue the patents in accordance with the practice which obtained at the time the land subsidy was voted by parliament. (b) The government is not in a position to state what is, or is not, covered by land patents issued by any of the provinces.

I.C.R.—MILEAGE MAIN LINE AND BRANCHES.

Mr. FRASER (Lambton) asked :

1. What is the mileage of the main line of the Intercolonial Railway ?

2. What is the mileage of all branch lines of the Intercolonial Railway ?

3. What is the total mileage of the whole Intercolonial Railway system ?

4. What are its various branch lines ?

5. What is the mileage of such branch lines in each province ?

6. What is the cost per mile of each branch line and of the main line ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The mileage of the main line of the Intercolonial Railway is 1,140.11. 2. The mileage of all branches of the Intercolonial Railway is 201.13. 3. The total mileage of the whole Intercolonial Railway system is 1,341.24. 4. Dartmouth to Windsor Junction ; North Sydney Junction to North Sydney ; New Glasgow to Pictou Landing ; Stellarton to Oxford Junction ; Brown's Point to Pictou ; Pugwash Junction to Pugwash ; Painsec Junction to Point du Chene ; Derby Junction to Indiantown ; Dalhousie Branch ; St. Charles to Chaudière Junction ; St. Leonard Junction to Nicolet. In addition to these there are a number of short freight branches.

5. The following is the mileage of the branch lines in :

Nova Scotia.....	120-77
New Brunswick.....	39-77
Quebec.....	40-59
	201-13

6. It is impossible to give the cost per mile of each branch line.

REDISTRIBUTIONS—HIGHEST AND LOWEST POPULATION.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) (by Mr. Calvert) asked :

1. What constituencies (represented by one member each) in each province had the highest and what the lowest population after each decennial redistribution of seats since confederation?

2. What are the names of such constituencies?

3. What were their populations after such redistribution?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will ask my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) to move for a return. It is impossible to give the information in answer to a question.

RAILWAYS SUBSIDIZED BY GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL (by Mr. McMillan) asked:

1. What are the names of the various railways subsidized by the government?

2. What is the amount and nature of such subsidies in each case?

3. What is the amount of operating expenses and earnings of each of the subsidized railways for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I will have to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) to move for a return.

'COMMANDING OFFICER'—TENURE OF COMMAND.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. Was it stated in a general order published in July, 1899, that a misunderstanding has arisen as to what is 'a commanding officer'?

2. Under the Militia Act what is a 'commanding officer,' to which paragraph 31, section IV., part I., Regulations and Orders, 1898, applies?

3. (a.) Is a 'commanding officer' under paragraph 31, section IV., part I., R. & O., 1898, identical with a 'commanding officer' under paragraph 219, section XI., part I., R. & O., 1898?

(b.) Is this paragraph 219 copied from the Queen's Regulations for the (regular) army?

(c.) Does the lieutenant-colonel commanding a regular (British) army battalion come under a rule limiting tenure of command?

(d.) Does a major commanding a regular (British) field artillery battery come under the same rule (c) limiting tenure of command?

4. Is a 'corps' under the provisions of the 'Militia Act' (sections 22 and 23) and the regulations (as amended by general order, dated Ottawa, January 20, 1893) a militia body having a regimental establishment approved by the Governor in Council, submitted to parliament and published in General Orders?

5. (a.) Was W. Arthur Weeks the commanding officer of the Charlottetown Engineer Company on April 3, 1886?

(b.) Is W. Arthur Weeks still the commanding officer of this company?

(c.) Has W. Arthur Weeks had an extension of tenure of command?

6. (a.) Was Neil F. MacNachtan the commanding officer of the Cobourg Garrison Artillery Company, June 2, 1894?

(b.) Is Neil F. MacNachtan still the commanding officer of this company?

(c.) Has Neil F. MacNachtan had an extension of tenure of command?

7. (a.) Was John Davidson the 'commanding officer' of the 11th Field Battery on April 19, 1890?

(b.) Is John Davidson still the commanding officer of this battery?

(c.) Has John Davidson had an extension of tenure of command?

8. (a.) Were the following commanding officers in 1898?

(b.) Had they in 1898 exceeded the regulation tenure of command?

(c.) Were they retained after the regulation tenure of command had expired?

Lt.-Col. King, 7th Field Battery, major, May 31, 1893.

Lt.-Col. Mead, 9th Field Battery, major, December 23, 1887?

Major Vince, Brighton Engineer Company, captain, February 27, 1880.

Major Martineau, No. 1 Company, Lévis G.A., captain, February 12, 1886.

Major Vien, No. 2 Company, Lévis G. A., captain, October 9, 1880.

Captain Ernst, Mahone Bay G. A. Company, captain, November 28, 1890.

Captain Daley, Digby G. A. Company, captain, October 24, 1878.

Captain Jolley, Yarmouth G. A. Company, November 5, 1880.

9. Was the number of guns of a field battery increased from four to six, the number of officers and men, the establishment of a field battery increased in 1896-7?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. The introduction to the amendment to regulations regarding tenure of command in G. O. 67, of July, 1899, reads as follows :

In order to prevent a misunderstanding which has arisen, the following is added to Regulations and Orders, part 1, section iv, paragraph 31.

2. No exact definition of what constitutes a commanding officer is given in the Militia Act. 'Commanding officer,' to which paragraph 31, section 4, part 1, R. and O., 1898, may be interpreted as meaning the officer appointed to the command of a regiment, battalion, brigade division of field artillery, battery of field artillery, independent squadron or troop of cavalry, and company of garrison artillery or infantry. 3. (a) Yes, within relative commands ; (b) No, but similar ; (c) Yes ; (d) No. 4. Yes ; a battery and independent squadron or company which have not a regimental establishment is also a corps. 5. The last question cannot be answered by the department, as it has no data as to quantity of Canadian leaf tobacco grown.

SUMS PAID FOR SUPERANNUATION.

Mr. BERGERON (by Mr. Mills) asked :

What was the amount of money paid for superannuation for the year ending the 30th June, 1896 ? What is the amount of money paid for superannuation on the 1st February, 1890 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The amounts paid for superannuation during the last four years were :

Year ended 30th June, 1896.....	$311,231.79
“ “ 1897.....	307,792.66
“ “ 1898.....	340,185.67
“ “ 1899.....	325,560.47

The amount paid for superannuation from 1st July, 1899, to 1st February, 1900, was $159,459.27, as compared with $162,255.34 for the corresponding period in the fiscal year 1898-9, that is, from 1st July, 1898, to 1st February, 1899.

J. B. CHARLESON'S EXPENDITURE.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked :

Are the government aware that in the expenditure of Mr. J. B. Charleson, as shown by his accounts for $1,494.85 in the Auditor General's Report for 1899, part Q, page 267, the following items appear:

March 25, Hotel Vancouver—Bills of Messrs. J. B. Charleson, Taché, Gobeil, Boyer and Richardson	$193 60
Wine, A. Boyer	3 75
“ J. Gobeil	0 80
“ J. C. Taché.....	4 05
Sundry outlay	119 00
“	457 70
“	303 50

Is it the policy of the government to supply wine to all civil servants when travelling?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). No ; such items are never allowed. These must have been passed through an oversight and a refund shall be ordered to be made. The department is surprised that the Auditor General did not call attention to this when he picked out the items from the accounts. A refund would have been ordered immediately, as the government allows no such charges in any of the bills rendered.

TRIP OF MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS TO MARITIME PROVINCES.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Mills) asked :

Are the government aware that in the expenditure of the Minister of Public Works, amounting to $2,236.82, on his trip to the maritime provinces in 1898, as shown in the Auditor General's Report for 1899, part Q, page 145, that the following items appear:

Paid for laundry	$35 80
" American flag	7 50
" James Bain, Yarmouth, for four-horse team to drive to Weymouth, two days at $10.....	20 00
" Sundry driving	10 50
" Hotels and meals	34 30
" Cabs	68 25
" Doctor	7 00

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Yes, the government is aware that these items appear in the Auditor General's report. Laundry bill was for ship's laundry. The doctor's bill was for services in attending one of the crew who had sprained his ankle in the performance of his duties.

VOLUNTEER COMPANY IN SUMMERSIDE.

Mr. BELL (East Prince)—(by Mr. McLellan) asked :

Has any petition or other application been recently received by the government respecting the proposed organization of a volunteer company in Summerside, P.E.I.? If so, what action does the government propose to take in the matter of such application?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. Yes. 2. The application will receive due consideration when the Regimental Establishments for 1900-1 are under revision.

LAND SUBSIDIES BY ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

How many acres of land have been authorized by order in council to be given to proposed lines of railway in Canada since July 1, 1896, and to what proposed lines?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. None.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE COLLECTED SINCE 1890.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the amount of customs and inland revenue collected in each year, from July 1, 1890, to date?

Mr. MULOCK.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) :

Year.
1890-91	$7,038,847 52
1891-92	8,069,394 61

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES SINCE 1896.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What is the number of miles of railways subsidized each year since July, 1896—the rate per mile, and the total amount, and the province in which the lines are situated?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) desires me to say that that information will have to be obtained upon a motion for a return.

PROHIBITION PLEBISCITE—SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURE.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What was the total cost of taking the plebiscite on prohibition? How many returning officers and poll clerks were appointed for this purpose, and what was paid to each?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) :

206 Returning officers—fees	$17,833 00
206 Election clerks—fees	1,766 00
8,212 Deputy returning officers—fees ..	40,967 00

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MONTAGUE asked :

What is the number of permanent employees at present engaged in the Department of Agriculture? What is the number of temporary employees so engaged?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may say to my hon. friend that this question calls for information that can only properly be obtained on a motion for a return. It is quite impossible to have it covered in a reasonable time to allow an answer to be given. I would be very glad to facilitate the hon. gentleman's acquiring the information if he will move for a return, and I will have it prepared as quickly as possible.

EMPLOYEES ON THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. MONTAGUE asked :

(a) What number of employees were engaged in connection with the Welland Canal and Welland Canal Feeder, whether permanent or temporary employees, during the following years: 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899?

(b) What was the number of the permanent employees in each of the years mentioned?

(c) What was the number of the temporary employees in each of the years mentioned?

(d) What was the total amount of money paid, in each of the years mentioned, to the permanent and temporary employees engaged in connection with the Welland Canal and the Welland Canal Feeder?

(e) What number of employees engaged in connection with the Welland Canal and Welland Canal Feeder on July 1, 1896, have, since that time, been relieved of their duties, with cause of dismissal in each case, and names of the parties dismissed? What men have been appointed to take the places they vacated; what salaries were paid to the men removed from the employment, and what salaries are being paid to those who have been appointed in their places?

VOLUNTEERS FROM ONTARIO.

Mr. CARGILL asked :

What are the names of the men who volunteered from Ontario for service in South Africa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). It is not possible to furnish the names of the men who have volunteered from Ontario for service in South Africa. Some 900 men have been accepted for such service and their names have appeared in the published nominal rolls of N.C. officers and men, excepting the 40 men from Ontario in the reinforcements and a few enlisted in Strathcona's Horse. These names will be published later. Large numbers of men who offered their services were rejected, either because they could not pass the medical examination, or did not satisfy the requirements as to standard, age, etc. Many hundreds more volunteered, but their services were not required. No record has been kept of those who volunteered and were not accepted, except those who applied direct to the department.

NUMBER OF VOLUNTEERS BY PROVINCES.

Mr. CARGILL asked :

What is the total number of volunteers, by provinces, for service in South Africa since the call for the organization of the first contingent?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). It is not possible to furnish the number of volunteers by provinces for service in South Africa since the call for the organization of the first contingent. No record has been kept of those who volunteered and who, owing to their not passing the medical examination, or not satisfying the requirements as to standard, age, etc., were rejected. A great many more were rejected because there were no vacancies for them. No record of their names has been kept, except, of those who applied direct to the Department of Militia and Defence.

Mr. PRIOR. Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether a record has been kept of those who applied to the district officers commanding the districts?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will make inquiry. This answer was handed to me by the Deputy Minister of Militia.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CLAIM FOR KILLING HORSE ON TRACK.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked :

Whether the Minister of Railways is aware that the horses of one LeBlond, were killed at Trois Pistoles, by the cars of the Intercolonial Railway, in 1894? If so, by whom was the inquiry made? Was a report made to the department, and what was the purport of the said report? Was it referred to the Department of Justice, and if so, what was the report of that department on the merits of the claim?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The government is aware that a horse, belonging to one Eugene LeBlond, of Trois Pistoles, was struck by the train on the 23rd October, 1894, and subsequently killed. 2. Inquiry was made by W. B. McKenzie, chief engineer of the Intercolonial Railway. 3. The report has not yet been received by the department. 4. It has not been referred to the Department of Justice.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

What was the amount of expenditure chargeable to Consolidated Revenue Fund for each of the following years, viz.:—Year ending 30th June, 1896; year ending 30th June, 1897; year ending 30th June, 1898; year ending 30th June, 1899?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The amounts chargeable to Consolidated Revenue Fund for the past five years were :

Year ended 30th June, 1895.....	$38,132,005.05
“ “ 1896.....	36,949,142.03
“ “ 1897.....	38,349,759.84
“ “ 1898.....	38,832,525.70
“ “ 1899.....	41,903,500.54

Mr. FOSTER. Why does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) answer more than the question calls for ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I thought it was desirable to give my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain) the figures for the additional year. So long as I give him all that he asks for, I do not think that he can find fault with me for giving this additional information.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) did not think it was desirable in the case of the prohibition commission, because he left out the exact number of days that McLeod was engaged in that service.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was not aware of there being any omission in the answer to the question about the commission. I gave all the information desired by the hon. gentleman. If there was anything more asked for I was not aware of it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman shows himself to be very small.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Speaker, I take exception, and I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark. I think it is quite improper, and I do not think it is creditable to the hon. gentleman or to the House. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to withdraw it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman has the right to make any such observation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) must show ground on which he raises the question of order. At the moment that anything is said in this House, which is not particularly too palatable to an hon. gentleman, he cannot demand its withdrawal unless it violates some rule of order. I think it is incumbent upon my hon. friend to show what rule of the House is violated by the remark which has been made in reference to the personal stature of the hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has a right to make observations in regard to the stature or physical form of an hon. member, and I certainly did not understand him to intend that. But I think the remark of the hon. gentleman was quite improper.

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has violated a well-known rule of this House. It is most distinctly forbidden to make remarks or to raise any debate when any question is answered.

Mr. FOSTER. It is only a few days ago that the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) applied the same criticism to myself, referring to things which were said in this House by a small man.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I stated the other day, when certain personalities had been indulged in, that I never did indulge in personalities, but that I left them to small men. Those were the words I used on that occasion. On the present occasion the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) must admit that he is quite out of order. First of all, he has no right to make any observations upon answers when they are given. The words which the hon. gentleman applied to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance were of a strictly personal character, because he said: You show yourself very small. First of all, he had no right to address my hon. friend personally, and moreover, this was a personal attack. At all events, I suggest to both sides of the House that we should observe that decorum which ought to be observed between gentlemen. Words may be spoken in the heat of debate which are regrettable, but here are words used for which there was no justification whatever. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) not to allow himself to remain under the imputation, but to withdraw the words objected to.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that I was perhaps to blame in allowing the discussion to go on. But it occurred to me that the last remark of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had no bearing on the question under discussion, and I think he should withdraw it. I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me; the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said that I was entirely out of order in making any statement at all in reference to an answer to a question, and I was criticised by the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) because I used the word 'small.' I would like Mr. Speaker and the House to understand exactly the situation, and it is this: It is well understood that when an hon. minister rises to answer questions he is to give what is necessary in order to answer the question asked and nothing more. Now, on two occasions this afternoon, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has gone out of his way for purely partisan purposes, in order to answer what was not asked him at all. He did that in order to show, in regard to the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Casgrain), that if you were to take the year preceding, it would be somewhat to the advantage of his own party and his own side, but, when the question relating to the prohibition plebiscite was being answered, when a one-sided statement was made for the benefit of his own party, when he stated that the Rev. Mr. McLeod was paid $6,000, and when there was a general 'oh' on the other side of the House, because of the large amount as compared with that received by the other commissioners, he had not the fairness to state that Mr. McLeod had been 667 days on the commission, whereas the others had been but a very small number of days on the commission in comparison. It was because of that very marked difference in treating hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that I took occasion to make the remark that the hon. Minister of Finance showed himself rather small in making that discrimination, and I must abide by that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is discussing the merits of the answer. The answer that I read in reference to the prohibition commission was prepared by an officer of the department, and I never discussed it with anybody. I read the answer as it was prepared.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the hon. gentleman simply send this question to his official to prepare the answer, and did he read what the official gave him?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was discussing the question in regard to the prohibition answer that the hon. gentleman takes exception to. I read the answer exactly as it was prepared, and I had no opportunity of consulting with any of the officers in respect to the question. I take the responsibility of saying that it was a fair and correct answer to the question in reference to the commission. As to the other point, I disagree with the hon. gentleman, that we are to answer a question categorically. If we give the information desired by an hon. gentleman I do not think that there is anything improper in giving him additional information, which in no way detracts from the information given. I take the responsibility of saying that this is a proper answer to the question that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) asked, and if it gives an additional year he can take no exception to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think we ought to know whether the hon. Minister of Finance considers it is fair and manly and just to both sides of the House to answer questions in an entirely different way according as the hon. minister may think fit. Interposing something that will agree with the complexion of one party in one case and not in another. In regard to the question answered by the hon. Minister of Miiltia (Mr. Borden), if he had taken the trouble to give the reasons for the answer that he gave in order to give a very strong party complexion to it he would have wiped out the question altogether, and it would prevent such questions being answered in this House at all. We must have fair-play in this House. We have questions asked that are very often of a partisan character, and intended to give information in favour of one side or the other, and we must have some fair rule laid down in reference to the answering of these questions. We must have the answers confined absolutely to a categorical reply to give the information that the question asks, and we must allow it to remain there, or, if hon. gentlemen answer questions from the Treasury benches in any other way they must expect to be criticised as to the character of their answers. The whole difficulty would be avoided if the proper parliamentary practice were adopted of giving simply a categorical answer to the questions, stating the facts. If the members of the government want to bring out something that is not in the question, they can get one of their friends behind them to put a question which will bring it out. I believe the Treasury benches should give impartial answers to these questions, no matter from what side of the House they come, and if they did, then this criticism would be avoided.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say to the hon. the leader of the opposition that the discussion is outside the question now before the Chair. I remarked to the hon. member for York, N.B., (Mr. Foster) that I thought his last expression was personal in its nature, and did not appertain to the discussion. I thought it was an observation that, on sober second thought, he would not make.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am not anxious to press that point, but I would say that I entirely agree with the view of the leader of the opposition, that a question should be answered in the same frank spirit towards members on both sides of the House. I have endeavoured to do that in my department. But, when a question is put which we consider cannot be answered in a fair light by a categorical reply, there is no rule to prevent a minister answering in a manner which he thinks will fully explain the question. If, in answer thereto, we give some information from the public documents, the hon. gentleman who asks the question has no right to complain.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) think that this would be a better course to pursue? When the question for the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was answered as to the prohibition commission, I saw at once how unfair it was, but I did not raise a discussion then, but rather contented myself by putting a question which brought out the other point, so that the two answers taken together would show the whole truth. Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) think it better that a member on his own side of the House should put a supplementary question to bring out what he thinks has been omitted from a question put on this side ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was not conscious that there was anything in my answer which could be taken exception to by hon. gentlemen on the other side.

The PRIME MINISTER. Now that this point has been elucidated, I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will withdraw the expression that has been complained of.

Mr. FOSTER. I have violated no rule of the House, and, consequently, I do not propose to take back any word that I said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, although the matter is a little stale, I must ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the remark that he made, that he left to small men certain things that he did not do himself. The Prime Minister referred to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) as a small man. Well, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is not particularly small, taking either his physical standard or his intellectual standard. If the Prime Minister is going to insist on a withdrawal he had better set a good example to the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is this difference between the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster). If I was personal, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) did not seem to think so. The expression apparently suited him.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not care.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say now that I do not care.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Finance Minister says that he cares, I might consider the question of withdrawal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not care.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I would like the point understood about the manner in which ministers answer questions so that there may be no mistake. Every one knows that the right of answering questions for information is—

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. There is no motion before the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. LARIVIERE. It is settled long ago.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The rule is plain that if a minister thinks a question is asked for an improper partisan purpose, he can answer it just as he pleases.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The answer may not please the person who put the question, and the answer may be criticised, but the time for criticism is not when the question is answered. There are ample opportunities afterwards to criticise any answer which a minister may give. The point to be observed here is that if we are to get on with the business at all, when the minister gives an answer—as he has a right to do in any way he pleases—

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is not correct.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is absolutely correct.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is quite evident that some gentlemen in this House do not understand what the rights of a minister in this parliament are.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I call your attention to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have a question on the paper which I desire answered, as I wish to proceed with the business of the House. The minister is out of order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the business of the House is to be proceeded with it is quite plain we cannot have a discussion every time an answer is given to a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the House will indulge me, I will read the rule as laid down in Bourinot, and give you the reference to the English practice as well, so that it may go on record for the information of hon. gentlemen. At page 384 of Parliamentary Procedure, by Sir John Bourinot, the rule is laid down in this form :

The answer to a question should be brief and distinct, and limited to such explanations as are absolutely necessary to make the reply intelligible, but some latitude is allowed to ministers of the Crown whenever they may find it necessary to extend their remarks with the view of clearly explaining the matter in question.

Bearing on that, permit me to read the next sentence :

When the answer to a question has been given it is irregular to comment upon it, or upon the subject thereby introduced to the House; the necessary consequence of which would be to engage the House in a debate when there was no motion before it at all.

This is the reason assigned by Sir John Bourinot for not permitting a discussion on an answer to a question.

Mr. DAVIN. Therefore, the Minister of Marine was out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let me add as to the English practice, from Denison's and Brand's Decisions from 1857 to 1884 :

A minister, in reply to a question relating to an individual and the action of the police, is allowed to give full particulars illustrating the case.

Considerable indulgence is allowed to a minister in replying to a question relative to his department.

Again :

Great latitude is allowed to a minister in answering a question with a view to making his answer complete.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. While admitting that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is technically right, that you cannot raise a debate on an answer to a question, it will, I think, not be found in the interest of the despatch of business to adhere too closely to that rule. A single observation, for instance, may remove a doubt, and if a member feels aggrieved, it would be better for him to remark on it at the moment than to afterwards move the adjournment of the House, which would, of course, take up more time. Therefore, I say that a rigid adherence to that rule is scarcely desirable.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT WHO ACCEPTED OFFICE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. How many members of the House of Commons have been appointed to and accepted office, in the service of the government of Canada, since June 23, 1896, to the present date ?

2. What are their names ?

3. To what offices have they been appointed ?

4. What are the salaries of each of them ?

5. Have any of the members of the House of Commons been called to the Senate within the same period ?

6. If so, what are their names ?

7. Is it the intention of the government to appoint any other member or members of the said House to any such public office ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The following is the answer to the first six questions : Francis Gordon Forbes, sub-collector of customs, $120 per annum. Mr. Forbes has since been appointed a county court judge.

Mr. WALLACE. At what salary ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have not the salary stated here. Judge Lavergne, judge Superior Court, P.Q., salary, $4,000 a year ; C. R. Devlin, immigration agent to Ireland, salary, $2,000 ; François Langelier, judge Superior Court, P.Q., salary, $4,000 ; M. C. Cameron, Lieutenant Governor North-west Territories (since deceased), salary, $7,000 ; J. F. Lister, judge Court of Appeals, Ontario, salary, $5,000 ; P. A. Choquette, judge Superior Court, P.Q., salary, $4,000 ; C. J.

Rinfret, district inspector of inland revenue, Quebec, salary, $2,500 ; C. Beausoleil, postmaster at Montreal, salary, $4,000. The following members of the House of Commons have been called to the Senate since the 23rd June, 1896 (1) G. C. King ; (2) J. B. R. Fiset ; (3) John Yeo. In answer to the 7th question, I must say to my hon. friend that our relations have always been cordial and friendly, but I do not feel inclined to gratify his very fastidious curiosity.

REVENUE FROM LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has the reduction on postage on letters from 3 to 2 cents produced a diminution in the revenue of the government ? If so, what is the amount of such diminution ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Yes, the reduction of postage on letters from 3 cents to 2 cents has produced a diminution in revenue. The exact amount of such diminution for a fiscal year cannot be readily determined at present time, as the reduction, although in force for two portions of separate fiscal years, has not yet been in force for one complete fiscal year. There is reason to believe that the postal revenue is so increasing that within less than a year it will attain a figure in excess of the rate of revenue prior to such reduction.

FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP LINE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Are negotiations still being carried on by the government, or any member thereof, with a view of establishing between Canada and Great Britain a fast line of steamships ? 2. In the affirmative, what is being done ? 3. When does the government expect that such service will be in operation ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In view of the great disturbance caused by the war to all shipping interests, the matter at present must remain in abeyance.

THE QUEBEC-MONTREAL SHIP CHANNEL.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. What amount has been spent for deepening the ship channel between Quebec and Montreal, up to date ? 2. What amount was spent on said work during the season of 1896 ? 3. What amount has been spent on said work during the last three seasons ? 4. To what depth has the channel been deepened ? 5. What was the lowest depth of water in said channel during the last season of navigation ? 6. Is the work of deepening the said channel nearing completion ? 7. When does the government expect the said work to be completed ? 8. To what depth does the government intend deepening said channel ? 9. From observation to date, is the government able to state that when the deepening will be completed to the extent indicated by the government, there will be sufficient water in the said channel to permit ships drawing from 25 to 27 feet of water to navigate with safety between Quebec and Montreal, during the whole season of navigation, or will it be necessary to do other work besides ordinary work of repair and maintenance, to ensure such safety to navigation ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. The total expenditure by the Quebec harbour commissioners and the Dominion government prior to and since confederation up to December 31, 1899, is $5,389,290.39. 2. Fiscal year 1895-6, $117,393. 3. Fiscal year 1896-7, $106,832.02; fiscal year 1897-8, $177,939.45; fiscal year 1898-9, $385,692.83. These expenditures cover cost of dredging and plant. 4. 27½ feet at ordinary low water. 5. 26 feet 8 inches. 6. Yes, to 27½ feet at extreme low water. 7. In 1902. 8. 27½ feet. 9. The chief engineer is of opinion that when so completed the channel will be sufficient for the purposes mentioned in the question.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY— FREIGHT SERVICE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is the government aware that there exists among the Quebec merchants and traders a great deal of dissatisfaction at the manner in which they are treated by the authorities of the Intercolonial Railway, in the matter of shipping and handling freight by said railway, between Quebec and points on said railway ? 2. Is it the intention of the government to remedy the existing state of things, and give a better freight service to the people of Quebec ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Minister of Railways and Canals has placed the following answer in my hands : 1. The government is not aware that dissatisfaction exists among merchants and traders at the manner in which the Intercolonial Railway authorities ship and handle freight between Quebec and points on said railway. 2. Every effort is being made to handle and ship freight satisfactorily between Quebec and points on said railway and the government will continue the efforts to that end.

ST. JOSEPH DE LEVIS GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. When did the work of enlarging the graving dock at St. Joseph de Lévis begin ? 2. How many men are employed on such work ? 3. Was there any interruption in said work since it began ? 4. If so, what was the cause of said interruption ? 5. When will said work be terminated ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. On 15th October, 1899. 2. Fifty. 3. Yes, from 1st November to 9th of January. 4. The contractor awaiting satisfactory plant. 5. 23rd April, 1901.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

THE I.C.R. STATION AT LEVIS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has the work of enlarging and improving the Intercolonial Railway station at Lévis been begun ? 2. In the affirmative, what has been done ? 3. How much has been paid upon said work up to the 1st March, 1900 ? 4. When will said work be completed ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The work of enlarging and improving the station accommodation at Lévis has been begun. 2. The contract for cribwork and earth filling has been let, and plans and specifications of enlargement of station building have been prepared, and tenders invited therefor, and some land has been purchased. 3. $14,524.21 has been paid for lands, etc., up to 1st March, 1900. 4. It is hoped the work will be completed by 30th June, 1900.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has the subsidy, appropriated during last session for aiding the construction of the Quebec bridge, been paid over to the Quebec Bridge Company, or to anybody, on behalf of said company ? 2. Has the actual construction of such bridge been commenced ? 3. If so, how much of said bridge is built ? 4. Is it the intention of the government to ask parliament to vote a further aid towards the construction of the said bridge, during the present session of parliament ? 5. Did any person or company apply to the government for a transfer to him or them of said subsidy, and if so, on what grounds ? 6. What action did the government take in the matter ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. The subsidy appropriated during last session for aiding the construction of the Quebec Bridge has not been paid over to the Quebec Bridge Company, nor to anybody, on behalf of said company, as construction of such bridge is one of the conditions precedent to payment on subsidy account. 2 and 3. Not aware of the construction of the bridge having been commenced. 4. The government will be prepared, in due season, to announce its intention with regard to subsidies to railways and railway bridges, and does not deem it expedient to make any previous statement as to particular works of that character. 5. No. 6. None.

THE HILLSBOROUGH BRIDGE.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. What amount has been paid since 30th June last, on surveys for the proposed Hillsborough bridge, in the province of Prince Edward Island ? 2. What amount has been paid engineers for the same period, and separately, the amount for ordinary labour ? 3. What amount has been paid for tugs, boats, scows and lighters ? 4. What are names of the owners, and the amount paid each ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Since the 30th June last, $2,383.47 has been paid on surveys for the proposed Hillsborough bridge in the province of Prince Edward Island. 2. The amount paid engineers for the same period is $408.46; for ordinary labour, is $1,975.01. 3. The amount paid for tugs is $5; for boat, $66.20; for scow, $231. 4. George Batt, owner of tug, amount paid, $5; John Quinn, owner of boat, amount paid, $13.93; John Corrigan, owner of boat, amount paid, $27.20; Michael Poor, owner of boat, amount paid, $25.07; John Quinn, owner of scow, amount paid, $231.

BRONTE HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. HENDERSON asked :

1. Has the government decided to place in the estimates this session any sum of money for the improvement of Bronte Harbour? 2. Has the Minister of Public Works informed any person outside of the government that the sum of $5,000 will be placed in the estimates this session for improvement of Bronte Harbour?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. The answer to this question will appear when the supplementary estimates are laid upon the Table. 2. I have no information touching the second part of this question.

BOARD AND NURSING OF GEORGE V. VROOM.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Has any account for the board and nursing of George V. Vroom (in 1899), a seaman of Deep Brook, in the county of Annapolis, been rendered to the Department of Marine and Fisheries? 2. What was the amount, and when was it rendered? 3. Through what local officials was it rendered? 4. Who was the medical doctor? 5. Did he certify to the account? 6. Has said account been paid? 7. If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Yes. 2. $21. November, 1899. 3. The collector of customs, Bear River, N.S. 4. Dr. Lovett. 5. Account certified by the collector of customs, Bear River. 6. Yes. 7. There was delay in paying this account for board owing to official correspondence with the collector of customs, who, instead of providing board for the seaman near the customs house and doctor, allowed him to board at his own home, whereby a heavy medical account was incurred, the doctor having to travel five miles, and making 25 visits.

J. G. TURRIFF AND EDGAR A. CHAPPELL.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. What is the position held by J. G. Turriff? 2. Was he Land Commissioner during the autumn and winter of last year? 3. Was he engaged in political work in connection with the Manitoba election? 4. Has he since his appointment been engaged in any political work? 5. Did he introduce Edgar A. Chappell to the Hon. Mr. Sifton at any time last year? 6. What was the date of the interview? Was Chappell employed in any capacity? 8. If so, how much was he paid? 9. Did Chappell have an interview with Mr. James A. Smart, Deputy Minister of the Interior? 10. Did the Hon. Mr. Sifton write from Regina, giving to any of his officers any directions respecting Edgar A. Chappell?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. 1. Commissioner of Dominion Lands. 2. Yes. 3. No. 4. No. 5. Yes. 6. The exact date cannot be stated, but it was in the summer of 1899. 7. No. 8. The answer to the seventh covers the eighth question. 9. No. 10. The records of the department do not show that the Hon. Mr. Sifton wrote to any of his officers respecting Edgar A. Chappell.

NIAGARA FALLS PARK—OLD FORT ERIE.

Mr. McCLEARY asked :

1. Is it the intention of the government to invest in the commissioners of the Niagara Falls Park the control of the ordnance land, consisting of about seventeen and one-half acres, in which are the ruins of old Fort Erie, as requested by the petitions of the municipal councils and county councils of Welland?

2. Has any application been made by the Buffalo Golf Club (or any one representing them), or any other persons or corporation for the use of or control of the above lands?

3. If so, has the government decided to make such transfer, or has such transfer actually been made?

4. Will the government say in what position the matter stands at present?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply, I beg to say: 1. The matter is under consideration. 2. Yes. 3. No. 4. The land is still leased to the corporation of the village of Fort Erie.

MOOSE MOUNTAIN RESERVE.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether it is intended to sell the Indian Reserve at Moose Mountain?

Whether the parties to whom it is about to be sold are an United States syndicate?

How much an acre is the syndicate to pay?

What is the average price of land at Moose Mountain?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In reply, I beg to say: 1. The question of the sale of 'Pheasant Rump,' and 'Ocean Man' Reserves, is under consideration. 2. Application to purchase the lands, comprised in these reserves, has been made by a number of gentlemen residing in the state of Nebraska; but no decision has been arrived at, with regard to the sale. 3. The price to be put upon these lands, in the event of their being sold, is under consideration. 4. The government has not the information requisite to answer this part of the question.

LABOUR COMMISSION, B.C.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What amount of money has been paid for the commission to examine into labour troubles in British Columbia? To whom has it been paid, distinguishing between payments for services and expenses?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The following amounts have been paid: To R. C. Clute, commissioner, on account of expenses, $1,200. To R. F. Harris, secretary, on account of expenses, $250. To Printing Bureau, for stationery, $23. Total $1,473. Nothing has yet been paid for services.

LOBSTER INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. What amount of money has been expended since July, 1896, on account of investigation into the lobster industry?

2. To what persons has the money been paid, and how much in each case for services and expenses respectively?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). In reply, I beg to say: Total amount expended since July, 1896, $9,564.85. To the following commissioners appointed to investigate and report :

	Expenses.
E. E. Prince	*$845 95
Donald Campbell	$616 00 276 90
Archibald Currie	525 00 175 44
S. E. Gallant	609 00 224 48
H. C. LeVatte	469 00 247 60
R. Lindsay	714 00 431 85
M. H. Nickerson	490 00 223 15
P. J. Sweeney	616 00 263 24
Wm. Whitman	448 00 203 79
Dr. A. McPhail, travel, disbursements and allowances in connection with investigation into cause of discoloration of canned lobsters	2,185 45

*Professor Prince, as chairman of the commission, was responsible for and disbursed for the travelling and all horse-hire and the principal hotel expenses of the various commissioners: hence, the apparent excess of his expenses.

INDIAN TREATY—SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

What has been the total cost to date of the commission for making treaty with the Indians north of the Saskatchewan? To whom has the money been paid, and what amount for services and expenses respectively to each?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The government is not aware of any treaty having been made with the Indians whose habitat could be described as 'North of the Saskatoon.' It is presumed that the hon. gentleman refers to the treaty which was made with the Indians of the district of Athabasca and portions of the country adjacent thereto, and which is known as Treaty No. 8. The total cost of making the treaty was $25,467.20. Payments for services, were made as follows :

Hon. D. Laird, commissioner	$ 744 00
J. A. J. McKenna, commissioner	744 00
Hon. J. H. Ross, commissioner	1,240 00
Rev. A. Lacombe, attaché to commissi. n.	1,060 00
H. S. Young, secretary	626 06
C. H. West, physician	676 00
H. A. Conroy, clerk	393 50
J. W. Martin, clerk	312 80
P. Deschambault, interpreter	370 00

The balance of the expenditure was mainly for transport and supplies. The details will be given in the form of a return, if the same is moved for.

DISMISSALS FROM CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

How many employees have been dismissed or retired from the service of the government on account of alleged partisanship since July 1, 1896, and what is the number for each department? In how many cases was the dismissal or retirement preceded by an official investigation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The answer to this question, in so far as the Department of Indian Affairs is concerned, is that there were twelve employees retired from the service of that department, for political partisanship. No formal investigation was considered necessary in these cases. The answer to this question, in so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, is that six employees were retired from the service of that department, for political partisanship. No formal investigation was considered necessary in these cases.

NEW BRUNSWICK VOLUNTEERS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. McALISTER asked :

(a) How many members of the active militia from New Brunswick volunteered for active service in South Africa?

(b) From what counties did these offers of service come, and how many from each?

(c) What are the names of those who so volunteered?

(d) How many were accepted, and what are their names?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that: The great majority of men who volunteered for service in South Africa, did so in person, and, therefore, there is no record of those who so volunteered and were not accepted. (We have the names of those who applied direct to the department.) A list of the volunteers who were accepted is now being prepared.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE ACT—MONTREAL STAR.

Mr. ETHIER asked :

1. Is the government aware that Mr. George Taylor, M.P., is using his privilege as a member of this House to frank through the mails daily to all parts of Canada thousands of copies of the Montreal 'Star' newspaper?

2. Is the government aware that car-loads of the Montreal 'Star' are being shipped to Ottawa to the said George Taylor, M.P., to be franked by him through the mails to the electors of Canada?

3. Is the government aware that the proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' has organized a staff of his employees to co-operate with the said George Taylor, M.P., to assist in the work of addressing and franking immense quantities of the Montreal 'Star' through the mails?

4. Is the government aware whether the said George Taylor, M.P., in order to more effectually accomplish the work of franking the Montreal 'Star,' has caused facsimiles of his signature to be prepared on stamping machines, and has intrusted the use of such stamping machines to others to be used in franking the Montreal 'Star'?

5. Is the government aware that the reputed proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' is also interested in another paper recently established in Montreal, called 'Le Journal,' issued in the French language, and printed in the office of the Montreal 'Star,' that the Montreal 'Star' is daily denouncing the government because of not having, as it contends gone far enough in aiding Great Britain in connection with the war in South Africa, and is also assailing the government in 'Le Journal' for having rendered any aid to Great Britain in the war; that the Montreal 'Star,' published in English, is being so franked to English-speaking electors by the said George Taylor, M.P., and that 'Le Journal,' published in French, is being distributed amongst French-speaking electors?

6. Is the Postmaster General aware whether the said Montreal 'Star' is sending free from Montreal to the said George Taylor at Ottawa large quantities of the Montreal Daily 'Star,' to be distributed free from Ottawa through the mails? If so, does the government consider it a proper use to make of the mail? If not, what action does the government propose to take in the matter?

7. Does the government intend to adopt any, and if so, what steps, to prevent the said George Taylor, M.P., franking broadcast throughout Canada, at the expense of the whole people, a paper of the character of the Montreal 'Star'? If not, why not?

Mr. CASGRAIN. I rise to a point of order. I beg to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to this question, as containing statements of fact and an imputation injurious, unjust and damaging to the proprietor of a certain paper, not here to defend himself. I would like to call your attention to the references to this point, in Sir John Bourinot's work. At page 383, referring to rule 29, it says, among other things :

In putting such questions, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same.

Then again, a little later on, a ruling of Mr. Speaker Brand, in the English House of Commons, is quoted :

No argumentative matter shall be introduced, and if such argument appears, it is always struck out by the clerks at the table, by the orders of the Speaker.

Then, again at page 384, you will find this statement which is founded on the authority of a decision in the House of Commons in England :

It should not be ironical or convey an imputation.

Then, May's Parliamentary Practice, page 238 :

The purpose of a question is to obtain information, and not to supply it to the House. A question may not contain statements of facts, unless it is necessary to make the question intelligible and can be authenticated ; nor should a question contain argument, inferences, imputations, epithets, or ironical expressions.

Then, further on :

A question cannot be placed upon the notice paper which publishes the name of persons or statements not strictly necessary to render the questions intelligible.

I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, especially to what is stated as to imputations being made in questions. Now, you will see in this question, section 5 :

5. Is the government aware that the reputed proprietor of the Montreal 'Star' is also interested in another paper recently established in Montreal, called 'Le Journal,' issued in the French language, and printed in the office of the Montreal 'Star,' that the Montreal 'Star' is daily denouncing the government because of not having, as it contends gone far enough in aiding Great Britain in connection with the war in South Africa, and is also assailing the government in 'Le Journal' for having rendered any aid to Great Britain in the war ; that the Montreal 'Star,' published in English, is being so franked to English-speaking electors by the said George Taylor, M.P., and that 'Le Journal,' published in French, is being distributed amongst French-speaking electors ?

Now, I take it that the question put upon the Order paper by my hon. friend from Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) is to elicit information as to whether a number of copies of the Montreal Star are being franked by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). The other statement, that concerning Le Journal of Montreal, is altogether irrelevant to this question upon which information is sought. Not only has this question nothing to do with the franking of numbers of the Montreal Star, but it contains an imputation against the proprietors and editors of Le Journal which, if they were here, they could contradict ; because it is not true, it is absolutely false that the Journal is doing what the question imputes. On the contrary, from the first, this newspaper took an attitude which is absolutely different from the attitude attributed in this question. It is unjust to them that this statement of fact should be made when they are not here to contradict it. The imputation is made that they have acted in a disloyal manner. The statement is improper and should not be contained in a question before the House, and especially in relation to a question to which it has no relevancy. Of course, it is put in the form of a question to the government; but I will ask any reasonable man in this House if it would not leave the impression on the mind of the reader that the statement of fact is true. I would ask you, therefore, to rule it out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the House will allow the question to stand, I will look into the facts and see that the question is brought within the rules of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, also to consider question 21, which is very much of the same character.

Mr. SPEAKER. Very well.

MARCONI SYSTEM OF TELEGRAPHING.

Mr. BELL (East Prince)—(by Mr. McLellan) asked:

Has the government given consideration to the 'Marconi' system of telegraphic communication with a view to its being adopted in connection with any parts of the sea-coast telegraphic service? If so, has any, and what conclusion been reached?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I have the following answers from the Public Works Department: 1. Yes. 2. The matter is now under consideration.

LIGHTHOUSES AND AIDS TO NAVIGATION SINCE 1886.

Mr. BELL (East Prince)—(by Mr. McLellan) asked:

1. What lighthouses and aids to navigation have been constructed and added to those previously existing since the year 1896? 2. What is the yearly cost of sail lighthouses and aids to navigation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answer to this question involves reading over more than seven pages of matter, and I think it ought not to be put on Hansard in the form of a question. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Bell, East Prince) to move a motion, and I will bring the information down at the earliest possible time.

CLAIMS FOR FISHING BOUNTY.

Mr. BELL (East Prince)—(by Mr. McLellan) asked:

1. How many claims for fishing bounties were made in the years 1896, 1897, 1898 and 1899? 2. How many of such claims were rejected each year? 3. What was the total amount of such bounties paid during each of said years? 4. What was the value of the fish exported by Canada during each of said years?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. Number of claims received are: In 1896, 15,211; 1897, 14,847; 1898, 14,679; 1899, 13,912. 2. Number of claims rejected: In 1896, 261; 1897, 125; 1898, 160; 1899, 56. 3. Total bounty paid: In 1896, $154,389.77; 1897, $157,504; 1898, $159,459; 1899, the bounty is now being paid, and it is impossible as yet to give the exact amount, but it is thought that the total appropriation of $160,000 will have been paid. 4. The total value of fish, the produce of Canada, as shown in the Trade and Navigation tables: exported in 1896, $10,280,952; 1897, $9,801,516; 1898, $10,000,848; 1899, $9,557,951.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to agree to our running over the Order paper so that we may get rid of the unopposed motions.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Very well.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams, reports of engineers and other papers relating to, or in any way appertaining to the contract between the Public Works Department and Messrs. Brennan and Ramsey, for repairs to the breakwater at Souris East, Prince Edward Island, entered on in the year 1898.—(Mr. McLellan.)

Return showing in detail the engineer's estimate of the work now being done in Toronto Harbour by W. A. Phin; also copies of all correspondence between the Department of Public Works and the said Phin, relating to such work.—(Mr. Clancy.)

Copies of all accounts rendered by Captain S. M. Hatfield, fishery overseer for Yarmouth, and a return showing all amounts paid to him for salary, and all amounts paid to him for travelling expenses in each year since his appointment.—(Mr. Borden, Halifax.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and persons in the province of Prince Edward Island, during the year 1898-9, relative to the removing of the range light from Savage Island to the sandhills at Cascumpec Harbour in that province.—(Mr. Martin.)

Return giving in detail the number of animals killed or injured by trains of the Prince Edward Island Railway between the 1st day of January, 1890, and the 1st day of January, 1900; the names of the persons owning such animals, so far as known; the amount claimed by each of the owners of animals so killed or injured; the amount paid to said owners by the government; also, copies of reports of officials of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and all correspondence relating to said claims.—(Mr. McLellan, P.E.I.)

Copies of all pay-sheets and accounts paid by the government of the Dominion in connection with the construction of the Soulanges Canal, from the 23rd January, 1896, up to date.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams and reports between the government and the provincial government of British Columbia or their agents, since 1st June, 1899, in regard to anti-Chinese and anti-Japanese legislation.—(Mr. Prior.)

Copies of all petitions and representations forwarded to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and of all correspondence, orders in council and memorials, in relation to the incorporation of the pilots between Montreal and Kingston.—(Mr. Talbot.)

RETURN OF POSTAGE ON NEWS-PAPERS.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax) moved for :

Return showing the amount paid to or received by the Post Office Department for postage upon and in respect of each newspaper published in Canada for transmission of the issues of each such newspaper respectively through the mails in Canada, (a) during the year ending December 31, 1899; (b) during the month ending January 31, 1900?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friend to a part of that motion, and ask that it be excised. Last session, it is true, an order of that nature was passed, and in compliance with it the information was brought down to the House. But my attention was afterwards called to that report, and I came to the conclusion that it was not the correct thing to have done, because one newspaper thereby acquired information as to the extent of another newspaper's business. I think information of that kind ought not to be given to the public. My hon. friend will perhaps leave out the names of newspapers; I have no objection to the postage.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think probably I will acquiesce in the suggestion of the hon. gentleman; but in the meantime, perhaps it would be better to let the motion stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

DISMISSAL OF MR. R. K. BRACE, GAS INSPECTOR, P.E.I.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Prince) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams, &c., in the hands of the government or any member or official thereof, relating to the dismissal of Mr. R. K. Brace, as gas inspector in the province of Prince Edward Island, and the appointment of his successor.

He said : I wish to amend this by adding after the word 'telegrams' the words 'petition or petitions and the names attached to them.'

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). There is no objection to the motion, of course, but it had better stand until we know what this amendment means. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) mean petitions for dismissals?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). There never was any petition for dismissal so far as I know.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion stands.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

NEWFOUNDLAND AND CANADA.

Mr. A. MARTIN (East Prince, P.E.I.) moved for :

1. Copies of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and all papers in the hands of the government, or any member or official thereof, relating to the admission of Newfoundland into the confederation of Canada.

2. Also all similar documents relating to any proposals for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations between Newfoundland and Canada.

He said : Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to offer an apology to you or to the House if I make a few remarks in moving for these papers. The growth and development of Canada may well be a matter of just pride and satisfaction to all true Canadians, as it is undoubtedly a subject of admiration to the whole world. The fathers of confederation, the men who planned it, even in their fondest dreams, could hardly anticipate, at the initiation of that great scheme, the gratifying success which crowned their efforts. It is true, Sir, that that success could not have been achieved if the scheme had only embraced the four provinces originally confederated. Those four provinces contained a very large area of land; but it was a very small area compared with the extent of the Dominion of Canada as it exists to-day. It is an accepted truth that no country has ever become either very great or progressive without an extensive seacoast, instance Great Britain, and the addition of the maritime provinces to Quebec and Ontario was a very large element in contributing to the success of the confederation. But, still a great deal more was required to complete confederation, and the prospects of its success became brighter when British Columbia was added to it, even if it was called by a Liberal statesman 'a sea of mountains.' In 1870, Manitoba was added, in 1873, the little province of Prince Edward Island threw in its lot with the other provinces, and finally the North-west Territories joined the union, adding three million square miles to our territory. We hear a great deal about the Liberal party as empire builders, but I do not think any one will seriously question that the right to that title belongs to the statesmen who added those millions of square miles to the Dominion of Canada.

In every sense of the term, they are more justly entitled to be called empire or nation-builders, than any of their successors. Without the addition of this territory, Canada could never hold the position she does to-day. By the entrance of British Columbia into confederation, 383,200 square miles of territory were added to the Dominion. Manitoba brought in 73,906 square miles, and when the North-west Territories were added, the area of Canada was increased to 3,653,946 square miles. I think it goes without saying that the men who were instrumental in thus increasing the bounds of Canada, and making it the nation it has become to-day, are those who are entitled to the credit of being nation, or empire-builders, and I hardly think that any claim to such a title at the present day can seriously be put forward by the government, of the day, and I am proud to say that the credit of adding every foot of territory added to this Dominion belongs to the great Conservative party.

In proposing this motion for the addition of Newfoundland to the confederacy of the empire, I am not proposing a small addition to the territory of Canada. Newfoundland, including Labrador, has an area of 162,200 square miles, and a population of 208,000. That area is nearly as large as that of France, it is larger than the area of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which is 122,098 square miles. It is larger than Italy, which is only 110,623 square miles, and when we contemplate the area of the Dominion, as it is to-day, 3,653,000 square miles, which is one-third of the whole area of the British Empire, we can readily realize the position which Canada has already attained among the nations of the world. The grand total for the British Empire is 11,552,531 square miles, of which Canada has about one-third. France, with her possessions, has only an area of 2,804,939 miles. Germany and her possessions have an area of only 1,228,740 miles; so that we can form an idea by comparison of the position Canada occupies. With her immense areas capable of development, we can offer homes to millions of people besides those we already have here.

The union of Canada to Newfoundland will, beyond doubt, be of mutual advantage to both countries. It would be as advantageous to Newfoundland as to the Dominion. I have here a small work entitled 'An account of Newfoundland, its people, politics, problems and peculiarities.' The writer is Mr. Beckles Wilson, and there is an introduction by Sir William Whiteway. At page 92, the author says:

We stand alone, outside now in all British North America. For our fishing population—and they, of course, form the bulk of our working folk—it would be a great benefit. With the solitary exception of pork, which would still come from the United States, every article of diet for them would come duty free from Canada.

Our average import duties are now 30 per cent. You see what an advantage the abolition of those duties would be.

I agree with the writer; but I think the exception he has made in regard to pork is not well taken, as Canada could supply Newfoundland with all the beef, pork, mutton, etc., her people require; in fact Prince Edward Island alone could furnish the whole of it, and at a cheaper rate, as the duty would be removed.

It is true that in years gone by, there was great antipathy in the minds of the people of Newfoundland against union with Canada. Whether these antipathies were well founded, or merely aroused for party purposes, it is not very easy to find out, but there is a feeling to-day, that with the passing away of the older generation, and the growing up of a younger one, with broader and better ideas, this question will be taken up in the proper spirit, and be satisfactorily settled.

I have here a work by Judge Prowse, containing a history of Newfoundland. I find at page 494 this petition:

The consolidation of British North America is an Imperial as well as a colonial question; it was unfortunate that at this particular juncture of affairs both Canada and Newfoundland had to deal with a moribund Liberal government in England. Had the present enlightened chief of the Colonial Office been at the head of affairs, with his large views of Imperial confederation, Mr. Chamberlain would not have allowed such a favourable opportunity to unite British North America to elude his grasp. All the elder statesmen of Canada have repeatedly declared that the Atlantic terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be in Newfoundland. In these negotiations the railway across our island should have been considered as part of the great Imperial highway.

On this page I find a foot-note by Judge Prowse in regard to a speech made by Sir Charles Tupper, which, I think, I quoted in this House before. But it bears very directly on this question; so I quote it again:

Regarding the admission of Newfoundland as a member of confederation, Sir Charles said he had always attached great importance, and had told Sir John Macdonald, when the question first came up, that the rounding off of the confederation by its entrance, was an all-important one. He did not for a moment wish that the island should be brought into confederation unless it be accomplished on terms that would substantially benefit the people of Newfoundland. He believed that the union would contribute to the happiness and well-being of that people. He had no desire to see them enter the confederation except with their hearty concurrence, and he deeply regretted the collapse of the recent negotiations.

That, in my opinion, is the spirit in which Canada wishes to approach Newfoundland. We believe that union will be mutually beneficial. One of the great benefits to Newfoundland will be that these very fishermen and labourers in that colony, who have to pay excessive prices for every necessary of life, will be able to obtain those necessaries at much reduced rates, and if the advantages of a union with Canada were properly laid before the people there could only be one result. Before I go any further, I must refer to one more of the reasons that go to explain why Newfoundland has not been more anxious to enter confederation with Canada. In this little work 'the Tenth Island,' which is written in racy style, I find at page 90 a statement of the ideas of the people of Newfoundland with regard to the people of Canada. Referring to the ignorance and fanaticism of the fishermen, the writer illustrates it by saying :

If another illustration were wanted, I hardly think a better one could be found than in the superstitious antagonism to confederation with Canada. There are thousands of fishermen and the wives of fishermen on the southern and north-eastern coasts who believe to-day that Canada is a land of demons and monsters, just as the more ignorant Southerners of the States during the civil war believed the Yankees had horns and tails. The most singular legend exists in the bosom of these humble families. They have heard that 'new-born babies are rammed down Canadian cannon,' and that if confederation were brought about, the terrible Canadians would usurp their industries, leaving them to 'bleach their bones on the desert sands of Canada.'

This is a wild picture that this writer, Mr. Beckles Wilson, presents ; but, if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to turn to Judge Prowse's work, 'The History of Newfoundland,' page 495, he will find nearly the same sentiments expressed. I think Canada owes it to herself, if possible, to create a better feeling in the minds of the people of Newfoundland in regard to this Canada of ours. I do not know that the government has done what I would consider its duty in this regard. We have time and again sent missions to the country to the south of us even going on our knees to them to secure reciprocal free trade. But what have we ever done in this respect for our sister colony ? We have never, so far as I know, done anything. Even last summer, $34,000 was spent on a mission to Washington, mainly to obtain reciprocity with the United States, which the Premier described in this House last year as not necessary for the welfare of Canada. That money was as good as squandered. But we have done nothing to obtain reciprocity with the colony nearest to us, probably the most loyal under the British Crown, a colony that has remained true to Great Britain under very serious difficulties and whose trade is mainly in British channels. There has never been any effort to bring Canada and Newfoundland together. If the time and money that have been spent in dealing with the country to the south of us had been spent in educating the people of Newfoundland on the subject of Canada, that colony, in place of being separated from us would now be part of this great Dominion.

Mr. MARTIN.

In speaking on this question a few years ago, I mentioned some of the difficulties and barriers that stood in the way of trade between Canada and Newfoundland. One was that Canada did not offer a sufficient market for the output of Newfoundland, especially in fish. I think that that barrier exists to-day. While our government has provided very liberally for the conveyance of the products of the west to the sea coast, the people of the maritime provinces and Newfoundland are still at a great disadvantage so far as concerns any arrangement made by the government for the transportation of fish, especially fresh fish, from the sea coast to the heart of Canada and to Manitoba and the North-west Territories. That is something that, I think the government of Canada will have to undertake in the interest of the large fishing industry of this country.

If the same market were found in Canada as the people of Newfoundland are now obliged to seek in the United States, I think there would be no hesitation on their part of casting in their lot with us. But the government has been slow to act ; it has done nothing. To win that ancient colony to fulfil the design of the founders of confederation, I think it would be well to offer as many inducements to the people of Newfoundland as possible. The question should not be looked upon as a mere matter of dollars and cents. By taking hold of the transportation of fresh fish the government will also provide a market for the fish of the maritime provinces as well.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we in Canada need something else besides to make us a great country, such a country as would make it desirable for Newfoundland to join, and Canadians would wish it to be. We want a truer patriotic sentiment for Canada. Every one will admit that we want more confidence in our own country. In order to get that confidence we must begin with the education in our schools, teach our children what our country is, how great it is, how great its resources are, and how great the empire of which we form a part. We must have a patrie of which our young suit it. If you want to have a patrie of which you can be proud, you must have a Canadian policy for the mines, a Canadian policy for the fisheries, a Canadian policy for the lumbermen and the agriculturists as well, and we must have a Canadian policy for the labourer and artizan. We must meet American alien labour law by a Canadian alien labour law and enforce it, as our neighbours are enforcing theirs.

The privileges which we Canadians enjoy by birthright are equally shared by the people to the south of us ; but when we cross the line we find a difference existing. The privileges which the Americans enjoy are their own exclusively, which no one else can enjoy ; but, in addition, they also enjoy the privileges given them by Canada.

Why, you hear the wail that goes up from the Yukon miner that Canadians have not their just privileges in their own country, the same as the Americans have in theirs. You also hear the same voice, not so loud, perhaps, going up from the fishermen on the maritime coast. Let me read to you some figures showing the imports of fish from the United States. We know that Canada has the greatest fisheries in the world, and there is no gainsaying the fact that Canada should, at least, supply her own market with all the fish that she requires. But, in place of that, Canada goes to the country to the south of us and imports large quantities of fresh fish every year, although that country has fisheries not nearly so valuable as our own. In 1899, the imports of fresh fish from the United States amounted to $410,458; and the imports from all foreign countries amounted to $593,607. Under the late government we had protection for the agriculturist. His meat was protected, his pork was protected, his farm produce was protected, but, unfortunately, the protection extended to the fishermen is not as much as that extended to the farmers. I agree that the protection given the agriculturist has been a great boon to him, and am only sorry that the present government has undermined it, but the fishermen should be equally protected. Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, the duties which obtain to-day in Canada on some of the principal importations of fish. Mackerel is only one cent a pound, whereas, there are two cents a pound on pork. Why should not mackerel have the same protection as pork? A pound of mackerel is at least equal in value to a pound of pork; but it appears to me that the poor fishermen have no friends, or if they have friends, they do not look after them so well as they do the farmers. There is herring, pickled or salted, one-half cent a pound; fresh salmon, one-half cent a pound; salmon, pickled or salted, one cent a pound; all other fish, pickled or salted, in barrels, one cent a pound; foreign-bought fish, imported otherwise than in barrels, whether fresh, dried, salted or pickled, fifty cents per one hundred pounds. On shelled oysters there is ten cents per gallon. Last year the importations of shelled oysters from the United States amounted to $169,559. Now, the duty on oysters would be only about five or ten per cent, while we have duties ranging from 25 to 30 per cent and 100 per cent on other items which the fisherman consumes. I do not think that this is fair in the interests of the fishermen of the Dominion; I think we ought to do justice to them as well as to the agriculturists and the manufacturer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I note that our trade with Newfoundland is yearly decreasing for the last three or four years. The present government take a great deal of credit for their preferential tariff, but what has that tariff done for Newfoundland, the nearest colony to Canada? How has it affected Newfoundland in promoting trade? I see that, in 1895, our exports to Newfoundland were $2,325,196; in 1896, $1,782,309; in 1897, $1,692,798; in 1898, $2,167,860; in 1899, $1,888,317. That is not a very satisfactory trade. While the trade of Canada has increased by leaps and bounds, as we have often been told, here is a colony right alongside of us, the nearest one to Canada, with which our trade in exports has been yearly decreasing. They have decreased from $2,325,000 to less than $2,000,000. Not only have our exports to that country decreased but our imports from that country have also decreased. They are as is shown by the following statement:

1896.....	551,412
1897.....	452,076
1898.....	464,324
1899.....	527,006

This shows that our imports from Newfoundland have decreased, as well as our exports to that colony. I think the government of the day have shown a great deal of apathy in dealing with this ancient colony of Newfoundland. They have done nothing at all as regards that colony, although they have been trying to increase our trade with foreign countries. There has been a decrease of exports to Germany as a result of the so-called preferential tariff; and Canadian goods are nearly shut out of that country. Here is this colony alongside of us, and yet they do not stretch out a hand to help her. Not only is trade with Newfoundland decreasing, but I am sorry to say that our trade with the West Indies is decreasing as well. It was supposed that their policy of preferential trade would have the effect of stimulating trade between Canada and her sister colonies, but, to show how it is acting in regard to the British possessions in the West Indies, I will read to the House the following statement, showing a decrease of exports from Canada to the West Indies:

1895.....	$3,725,426
1896.....	2,810,817
1897.....	2,643,360
1898.....	2,749,080
1899.....	3,043,963

Here is a decrease, since 1895, in our exports to the West Indies, of three-quarters of a million dollars. It is singular that the decrease in our importations is still more marked, the following statement will show:

1895.....	$4,794,020
1896.....	1,896,426
1897.....	1,678,870
1898.....	1,080,266
1899.....	1,354,939

Our importations from the West Indies have decreased by over $3,000,000 in the space of three or four years. But, perhaps, hon. gentlemen opposite may tell me that they cannot increase our trade, that they cannot do anything to foster trade. I remember, some years ago, when the late government tried to open up trade with Australia, that hon. gentlemen opposite were up in arms. We were told that if the government provided any means of communication between Australia and Canada, the result would be that Canada would be flooded with Australian cheese and beef, but, in place of that, we find that our importations from Australia are not increasing at all, while our exportations to Australia are largely increasing, year by year. We are told the so-called preferential tariff is a British policy; but I have shown that under it trade with Newfoundland and the West Indies has actually decreased. Trade returns show our imports from Great Britain is almost stationary, while foreign countries reap the benefit. Hon. gentlemen may think that this has no direct bearing on the question, but it has this bearing on the question, that, while the government have been spending thousands of dollars in trying to promote an exchange of products with the United States, they have done nothing at all with this colony alongside of us, in which education has almost dispelled the ideas that were prevalent in regard to the people of Canada. I have here some statistics of the trade of Newfoundland with the Dominion, but, I am afraid to detain the House by going over the list. There is this one thing, however, which I am convinced of, and it is that a largely increased trade could be done with Newfoundland, if Newfoundland were in the union. I find in this list, that, last year, in apples alone, Canada sent $33,545 worth to Newfoundland; bacon, hams and sausages, $23,920; butter, $103,110; flour, $1,431,822; fruit dried, $31,835; butter, $20,622; poultry, $27,379; oats and potatoes, $71,466. Grand total, $5,938,334. There is no one article in this list which I have not time to read out in full, but the trade in it, in the event of union, would be largely increased. It is said, that an obstacle in the way of the union of Newfoundland with the Dominion of Canada, is what is known as the French shore difficulty. I find in this work 'The Tenth Island,' page 107, a reference to this very difficulty of the French shore. Canada has assumed the position that it would be premature to do anything in regard to union with Newfoundland until this question had been settled. Here is the way this question is looked at in Newfoundland. In an interview, Captain Delaney says:

We cannot afford to enforce the Bait Act. For one thing, Canada won't help us. Suppose we deny bait to the French, what is to prevent the Canadian selling it to him—coming over to our coasts even, and buying it from our men, and then passing it on for a profit. Our law won't say our fishermen can't sell bait to Canadian fishermen; the only result will be that the profits of the bait business will pass from our hands into the hands of the Canadians.

Mr. MARTIN.

'You won't get Canada to help Newfoundland,' said another man, 'until we get a statesman with more youth and backbone than old Bill Whiteway to ask her to help. As far as I can see at present, she will only help us beat the French if we become a part of the Dominion, and she won't let us join the Dominion until we have settled the French shore question.'

That, Sir, in my opinion, is rather a mercenary view for a great country like Canada to take of the union with Newfoundland. Might we compare it with a matrimonial alliance. Here is the rich suitor Canada, approaching Newfoundland for a union, and Newfoundland is the bride with a rich dowry. There is nothing to prevent the union. The suitor is wealthy, with broad lands; so is the bride. Her dowry is large in mines, lands, minerals, fisheries, but a question arises. There is a dispute about the title to a little corner of the dowry of the bride, and the suitor meanly says: We will delay the publication of the banns until you settle that little difficulty of yours. I assume, Mr. Speaker, that if men in private life would be as mercenary as that in their views of matrimony, there would be a great many bachelors amongst us. The gallant way in which Canada should act would be to come to the rescue of Newfoundland, help her out with her difficulty and do all in her power to promote that union which, in my opinion, must eventually result from this agitation. I have here the Montreal Gazette, one of the great dailies in the province of Quebec, in which is a letter from its special correspondent, and in referring to the death of Sir Frederick Carter, the late Chief Justice of Newfoundland, that correspondent writes:

Since 1869, confederation has been shelved as a political issue. The subject was tabooed. No party or party leader adopted it as a policy. After the bank crash of December, 1894, when the colony was tottering on the brink of bankruptcy from which it was finally saved by the loan which Mr. Bond negotiated, a deputation consisting of Messrs. Bond, Morris, Emerson and Harwood proceeded to Ottawa to negotiate terms of union. What an ignoble failure followed is fresh in the memory of every one. The Canadian ministers who then held the reins are responsible for the failure. The blunder they committed is now generally deplored; but the golden opportunity was lost, though not for ever.

Here is what I want to call special attention to:

There is now a fresh opportunity presenting itself, and if the tide be taken at the flood it will lead on to fortune. The great wave of loyalty and patriotic fervor that is now swelling higher and higher, the feeling in favour of a closer union of all the colonies with the motherland are felt strongly here; and if taken advantage of, and the right leader come to the front, these influences would sweep us into the long-delayed union. It seems to me that the hour has struck, and soon perhaps the man may appear. The old generation who so fiercely opposed confederation are nearly all gone, and the younger generation have wider views and aspirations than their fathers. Had the departed chief justice lived to see a consummation of this union which he fought for thirty years ago, it would have gladdened his heart. The seed he cast upon the waters will be found after many days.

The language of this special correspondent shows that there is a change for the better in the public opinion of Newfoundland with regard to its union with Canada, and he tells us: They are only waiting for the man to appear. We have no information before the House as to what steps the government have taken, or if they have taken any, since they came into power, in regard to this question. I find here on page 93, of this book, an account of an interview between this writer and a leading Newfoundlander. The question came up as to Newfoundland being associated with the United States, and here is the account which the writer gives:

You put political association with the United States out of the question.

Yes, the United States does not come into the discussion at all. There was once a vague sort of talk of annexation and the rest of it, but Mr. Cleveland's war message killed what little there was of that—killed it absolutely. Directly the head of the American Republic held up his fist to old England, and talked war to her—that was enough for even the wildest annexationist we had, and he was really a mild specimen. We remembered our British stock, and you don't hear a whisper of annexation now. We are British stock—English, Irish or Scotch descent; we are more proud of the fact than you in England would believe if I told you, and we mean to remain British to the end.

That shows the truly loyal spirit of the people of Newfoundland. Another question was proposed as follows:

And work out your destiny as part of the Great British federation of North America. On what terms?

Ah, that's the question. You had better ask Sir William Whiteway and his fellow ministers that, or rather perhaps, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues, for it was at Ottawa that negotiations fell through the other day.

This was written in the year 1897, and we have no evidence in any correspondence which was ever brought down to the House whether this government has opened up any negotiations with Newfoundland in regard to the union. But this article would indicate that there had been correspondence for it states:

You had better ask Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues, for it was in Ottawa that the negotiations fell through the other day.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to dwell much longer on this question, I think that I have voiced the sentiment of every member of this House when I say that it would be very desirable to have this great confederation rounded off by adding Newfoundland to it as was first proposed in the year 1867. It is true the Canadian confederation has increased in directions which were not contemplated in 1867, but that ancient colony of Newfoundland is still not a part of the Dominion of Canada, as we all desire it should be. We have to-day reached a period of amalgamation all over the world. In the great confederacy to the south of us we have an instance of amalgamation and concentration. In the Dominion of Canada and in the new Australian confederation we have instances of the same thing; and now, in Africa, as a result of the fierce struggle which has taken place there, we are likely, and more than likely, to see a powerful confederacy arise, extending from Cape Colony to Cairo and cemented by the best blood of all parts of the empire, and in which Canadian soldiers displayed such gallantry and heroism. We in Canada, in establishing this great nation, have not been called upon to undergo the effusion of blood, for which we should be thankful. We have a country which was established in peace, which is to-day the happy home of millions, and which will be the happy home of many millions more in the future. We hope that the people of our country may increase in number, in happiness, and in loyalty to the empire to which we belong, and in the enjoyment of the civil and religious liberties which distinguish the British people in all parts of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I move the motion which you have read to the House.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, before that motion passes, I wish to say a few words upon it—not because I hope to add any light to that which has been thrown upon the subject by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) who has just taken his seat, but because I think it well that members of the House of Commons who have a sentiment on the question should give expression to that sentiment. I have always held that confederation will never be properly rounded off until it takes in Newfoundland. When that is done, our territory will extend as far to the east as it is possible to go, until it is stopped by the briny Atlantic. We shall then have a country extending without a break from ocean to ocean, varied in its soil, in its climate, and in its productions. Although confederation at first consisted of only four provinces—Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—we have been from time to time adding to it, until it now extends westward to the Pacific Ocean. At every stage, when a new province was taken in, we had croakers opposing its addition. That was the case when Manitoba, the North-west Territories, British Columbia, and Prince Edward Island respectively were taken in. So it is to-day whenever there is a rumour afloat that the government is likely to endeavour to secure the union of Newfoundland with Canada. I have never regarded that as a sufficient reason why intelligent statesmen—and I believe that our government, no matter which party is in power, is usually in the main composed of intelligent statesmen—should refrain from grappling with this problem and endeavouring to bring about that desirable end. There have been several periods since confederation which seemed to me especially opportune for dealing successfully with this question, if we only had the right class of men for the time being controlling the destinies of this nation. With the desire of Newfoundland to enter the confederacy, the people representing Canada have nibbled at the problem as a fish would nibble at a bait; but they never seemed to be in earnest, as men are who ever accomplish any great thing in life.

What have been the deterrent influences which have prevented us reaching the fruition of our ambition in this matter? There have appeared to me to be two things—the dispute with regard to the French shore fisheries, which was continued from generation to generation between France and Newfoundland, and the debt of Newfoundland. I have always thought, however, that able men could quite easily overcome these difficulties. It has always seemed to me that the debt of Newfoundland should not be a great obstacle to the bringing into this confederacy of that portion of British North America. It is, comparatively speaking, a small debt, which Canada could handle without any trouble, which, I have no doubt, could be financed without the slightest injury to Canada or the slightest danger of disturbing our credit in the markets of the world. As to the question of the French shore fisheries, I think we can safely rely on the wisdom, the power and the good intentions of England to settle that question in the near future. We know that her aim has been to do so, and that considerable progress has been made in that direction within the last year or two, and I have no doubt whatever that in a short time the problem will be settled to the advantage of Newfoundland, as well as that of Canada and England.

Now, what advantages would accrue to Canada from the proposed union with Newfoundland? As I have said, it would round off this confederation, which will never be complete until Newfoundland is part and parcel of it. The interprovincial trade which would be developed would be in itself a valuable consideration for us. It is true that to some extent we share in that trade to-day, but not by any means to the extent to which we should or would if Newfoundland were part of this confederation. The United States, which may be regarded as a foreign power, is receiving more benefit from the trade of Newfoundland than Canada is. Why is that? Not because Canada could not supply the requirements of the people of Newfoundland quite as well as the people of the United States; not because the people of Newfoundland get any special advantages from the United States which they could not get from Canada; but because the trade with the United States has been carried on for a length of time, and the people of Newfoundland have become more and more associated with the people of the United States in their social and commercial relations, while we have made no special effort to break up that trade or to direct it towards our own country. The statistics which the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Martin) has given to the House show that the trade of Newfoundland is of no mean proportions, when we consider the population and the size of the country—$1,692,000 in one year, $2,167,000 in another year, and $1,188,000 last year. There is no doubt that our trade could be enlarged to a very great extent if Newfoundland were in this confederation. Her wealth in minerals, and fisheries, and the forest would be a great addition to our resources, and she would besides furnish the most valuable recruiting grounds for the naval wants of England, in every part of the world. There is no doubt the hardy fishermen on the coast of Newfoundland, inured to the hardships incident to their calling, and the climate of that country, would prove a most valuable addition to our supply of mariners from which to obtain recruits for our own and the Imperial navy. It is only within the last year, that we have had hints in that direction from English public men, who have declared that Newfoundland and Canada are two of the best recruiting grounds in the world from which England could supply the needs of her navy. And, I have no doubt, whatever, that if Newfoundland were in the confederacy, our trade relations would quickly cement the two countries in a close national union, the same sentiment which pervades the confederation of Canada to-day, would find a responsive echo in Newfoundland, and the two countries become assimilated in sentiment, as well as in material interests.

The acquisition of Newfoundland would also be the means of shortening the sea voyage between Canada and Europe, by giving a terminus to the railway system of our country, much closer to Europe than our present one, and, thus make inter-communication between Canada and Europe much shorter and more pleasant than what it is at present. The shortening of the sea voyage to Europe is a matter of increasing importance, it is one of the great requirements of the day, and one which would be solved by the completion of the railway system of Newfoundland, and the extension of our system eastward to join the railway system of that colony.

We ought not to hesitate making every effort to accomplish this very desirable union, and we should not be deterred by any question of debt, because that, to my mind, is no great obstacle. Neither should we be deterred by the difficulties of the French shore fisheries, because they could be easily settled once the two countries became one. Another important consideration which should not be lost sight of, is the fact that the addition of Newfoundland to the Dominion, would offer a most favourable strategic base of operations, from a military point of view.

From every point of view, therefore, it is of the greatest importance that we should at the earliest possible moment bring Newfoundland into the confederacy. It is sometimes said, that when one party is willing, there seems to be no indication, that the other is desirous of bringing about the union. I do think that a few years ago, when Newfoundland was so anxious to come into the union, if we had had the right class of statesmen at the head of affairs, that union would have been now an accomplished fact. I believe that if the late Sir John Macdonald had been the head of the Canadian government at that time, we would have confederation by bringing Newfoundland into it, and I have always been at a loss to account for the indifference of Canadian statesmen to this very important subject. I thought that the present government, when they took office, would see that the one great chance of their life was to bring about a confederacy between Canada and Newfoundland as soon as possible. I have no doubt that when this is accomplished, it will be an event in the history of Canada, which will redound to the credit of the statesmen who bring it about. We are allowing golden opportunities to pass, but no doubt the day will come when that union will be accomplished by men who are more far-seeing than those who now control the destinies of our country. It is a matter of surprise to me that there has been so little said about this question in this House, and so little written about it in the country. I am confident that if it were seriously taken up by the politicians or statesmen of the day, it is one of the things that would be accomplished without much difficulty. I think it would be the part of wisdom, for every member of this House, who holds views on the lines I have expressed, to give utterance to them in this House, and thus arouse the attention of the public to the importance of this question, and force it on the attention of the public men who for the time being are charged with the destinies of this country. If this were done, I am satisfied that we could force the government to take up this important problem and bring about a solution of it in the near future.

Mr. C. E. KAULBACH (Lunenburg). I have much pleasure in endorsing the remarks of my esteemed friend, the member for Queen's East, P.E.I., (Mr. Martin), and those of my hon. friend, the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), relating to the admission of Newfoundland into the confederation of Canada. On the principle that 'Union is strength,' I have no hesitation in saying that were our sister colony, Newfoundland, placed as she is geographically, at the entrance of our great national and commercial highway—the River St. Lawrence—passing through the very heart of Canada, to become a part and parcel of our great Canadian confederacy, both countries would be materially benefited. It would add to our material strength as an arm of the British Empire, to which we are so proud to belong; and, as our Canadian provinces, under the British North American Act, have grown and prospered, by being confederated from ocean to ocean, under a federal system of government, were Newfoundland associated with us, as I feel she ought to be, her resources of various kinds would be greatly developed, and her trade increased to an immeasurable extent. Besides I can give the assurance, were such to take place, every loyal Canadian would welcome her coming, and give her a cordial reception, as sister would sister, should she feel inclined to unite with us. As this is a subject of vital importance to the maritime provinces and Canada, as a whole, it certainly is not any less so to the interest of our sister colony, Newfoundland, and, therefore, it should be seriously dealt with by the government, and every effort made to bring about a federal union of this colony of Newfoundland with the Dominion of Canada, and press for the consummation of such an event, thereby forming one united, or consolidated whole.

The question of admission of Newfoundland into the confederacy of Canada, might be conveniently discussed at the present time, by political parties on both sides of this House, free of any party predilections or sinister motives, and if received favourably in that spirit, as I claim it should be, I feel no difficulty will be experienced on the part of Newfoundland as well as of Canada in arranging terms on a basis satisfactory and profitable to both. Why should there be any difficulty when we are of one race, of one nationality, and our community of interests so assimilated, that there should really be no friction or difference as to the relations between us? For whilst Newfoundland has her fishing and mineral interest as her chief source of revenue, we have corresponding interests precisely the same, but only to a greater extent, and beside all this we have our valuable farming and lumbering industries to counterbalance, with a population capable of taking a very large percentage of her (Newfoundland) fish products, showing our sister colony, would by such a union, be receiving the greater benefit by the alliance, in that she receives the greater amount of trade from Canadians, for a lesser amount she could give us in return. It has always occurred to me that we, as sister colonies, geographically so near to each other, should be more closely allied, and not have the separation as at present exists, we to be known as Continental British North America or Canada, and our sister colony, only a few miles removed, to be known as Newfoundland. I believe nature had destined us to be one, and, as we are under the same flag, we should be one country and one people.

I must say here, that I did not admire the feeling that prompted Newfoundland some years ago to propose a trade treaty with the United States, known as the 'Bond-Blaine' treaty, when we were giving her as a sister all the encouragement to come into the union with us, and share her lot in common with ourselves, which, had she consented to, would now with us be more happy and prosperous, and be part of a great country under one great confederacy, destined, as I believe we are, to be one of the fairest on God's earth.

We are really almost one now, when we consider the ready means of communication between us, a question of only a few hours by boat from North Sydney, C.B., to Port au Basque, and from thence by rail to St. John's, connecting our extreme east with theirs; but were she one with us, under one confederacy, she would find herself with railways stretching over that island to the various points of interest, and her mineral resources developed wherever they present themselves, which is at present little known beyond the line of the Reid Railway.

So strong am I on the question of the confederacy of our sister colony with Canada, realizing the advantages naturally resulting to each by such a union, that I feel were this government, through the Secretary of State, to communicate with Newfoundland on the question, asking that their government should take action simultaneously with our government, and arrange a deputation with power to negotiate terms, happy results would, I have no doubt, follow as a reward for their labours. I would recommend, at the same time, the expediency of the opposition, as well as the ministerial party, being represented on such delegation with power, as prescribed under section 146 of the British North America Act, and other sections relating thereto, which, I claim, should meet the approval of both political parties in this House, and which, if carried out as suggested, I feel would result satisfactorily.

I may just here state that I am sorry to find a great falling off in the trade between Newfoundland and Canada since 1895, which is not by any means satisfactory, despite the better communication now had with that island. I find in our trade returns the figures of our exports to Newfoundland, and the consumption here of the island colony's produce have been as follows:

	Exported to Newfoundland.	Entered from
1895	$2,325,196	$739,850
1899	1,808,317	527,006

Mr. KAULBACH.

Which falling off, I may say, quite surprised me, and which causes me to feel that our trade with our sister colony, Newfoundland, is not encouraged by this government as it should be. The same can be said as respects our trade with the British West Indies. We find differences of opinion to exist as respects trade between us and that colony, which, to my mind, are not tenable, nor well founded, but which could be removed, were Newfoundland a part of our confederacy, which, as I said already, can be brought about by the appointment of a delegation such as I have suggested.
