PRIVILEGE

MR. LANGLOIS (MÉGANTIC)—APPEARANCES ON C.B.C. OF QUEBEC SEPARATIST

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from an answer given by the Secretary of State, to be found on page 13205 of Hansard for Monday, February 20, 1967. The answer was directed to the hon. member for Lapointe, who had inquired about the number of invitations extended by the C.B.C. to different persons across the country to speak on political topics. My question of privilege has to do with persons to whom such invitations have been extended.

Looking at the answer given by the Secretary of State we find the name of Mr. Bourgault, leader of the Ralliement pour l'Independance nationale in Quebec, appearing four times under C.B.C. radio programs and five times on television or nine times in all, while cabinet ministers, men responsible for the country's administration, are listed as "nil". The name of the Minister of Justice is listed as "nil" under the radio column and "nil" under the television column.

I strongly object to the way in which the C.B.C. has proceeded to place Mr. Bourgault, a known separatist, in a category equal to, if not above, that of cabinet ministers of this country; I object to the use of the C.B.C. for the purpose of getting a subversive message, a revolutionary message across to the people of this country; and I for one, as a member of parliament and as a Canadian of the Dominion of Canada, am certainly not willing to sit back without making a protest in these circumstances.

The second part of my question of privilege also relates to the C.B.C. and to the nature of some of the programs which are produced——for instance the program "Aujourd'hui" which is subversive, revolutionary and undesirable, particularly at this time when the situation is so tense in the country. I feel that the said program is perverted and abnormal, that it is presented not only to bring up problems still more difficult than those we are faced with, but also to brainwash the Canadian people, particularly the population of the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I move:

[English]

That this subject matter be referred to the standing committee on films, broadcasting and the arts for immediate investigation, and that the said committee report back to this house before the end of the present session.

Mr. Speaker: Before submitting the motion suggested by the hon. member for Mégantic the Chair has to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I have listened to the argument put forth by the hon. member for Mégantic, and I must tell him that I have no hesitation whatever in reaching the conclusion that there is no question of privilege at all in what he has raised. He may have a grievance, but I do not think the subject matter goes beyond the nature of a grievance. It cannot be accepted as a question of privilege.

As the assistant deputy minister from 1957 to 1962, he was responsible for co-ordinating the implementation of programs for the management and utilization of fish, fur and timber resources in the forested area of Saskatchewan. Many of the people dependent on these resources are Indians and Métis, and programming for resource use gave primacy to the needs of these people. During the period from 1950 to 1962, it was necessary to visit many native communities throughout the forest and precambrian areas of Saskatchewan, and he therefore attended meetings with trappers and fishermen and discussed problems about resource utilization. Mr. Young was chairman, from 1953 to 1957, of the northern advisory committee, a provincial interdepartmental group, whose purpose was to effect co-ordination in planning and program development for the native residents of northern Saskatchewan.

5. His duties and responsibilities are: He is responsible for the planning and development of a variety of programs designed to improve the economic well being of the Indians of Canada; the examining of the budget for Indian economic development and assessing it in the light of objectives and goals; surveillance of the implementation of the economic development budget; liaison with federal and provincial agencies; supervision of a headquarters staff and functional and technical supervision to a field staff. Return tabled.

TOTAL FEDERAL HEALTH ASSISTANCE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 2,496—Mr. Irvine:

What was the total amount of all grants, subsidies or other monetary assistance in any form from all federal departments in each of the years 1960 to 1966 inclusive for (a) the mentally retarded (b) the blind (c) the deaf (d) the mute (e) mentally ill (f) crippled children?

Return tabled.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): On a question of privilege I should like to ask when my question No. 2,239, which is dated November 29, will be answered. I protest about the delay, because it is now nearly three months since this was first placed on the order paper. I know from my own experience as minister of agriculture for some three years that it could have been answered within a week by the Department of Agriculture without any difficulty whatever. In spite of that it has been nearly three months since I put the question on the order paper. I can only conclude that this minister is paying no attention to members' questions and making no effort to answer them in a reasonable length of time.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to call the attention of the government to question No. 2,168, which has been on the order paper since November 10 last.

It is a relatively simple question and although it has been on the order paper for almost four months, I have not yet received an answer. Therefore, I wonder whether the government could not answer such a simple question, at least before this session is over.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for papers No. 208 is acceptable to the government and the papers are being tabled immediately.

I ask, sir, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

STUDEBAKER CORPORATION—INDEBTEDNESS FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, the guardian of our financial interests. I should like to ask him whether his attention has been drawn to the castigation of his department by the Auditor General, as recorded on page 64 of the report, regarding the case of the Studebaker Corporation which apparently received such consideration in 1965 and 1966. The report states that this manufacturer is in debt to the crown for customs duties estimated at $2.4 million.

I ask the minister why no action has been taken. What action does the government now intend to take? Is the minister aware that the Auditor General stated that the procedures followed are "not adequate to protect the revenues properly accruing to the crown"?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Of course I have looked at the Auditor General's report. I have asked for a thorough investigation and comments on the report as submitted by the Auditor General. I believe these would probably be too lengthy to read on orders of the day when I have received them. I suggest, therefore, to my right hon. friend that if he will put a question on the order paper I will answer it as soon as possible with the lengthy explanation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My experience with the C.B.C., Mr. Speaker, has not been that questions get answered. However, I ask the minister this. How does he justify the delay of over a year when he told parliament the matter was being looked into in view of the general statement made by the Auditor General indicating a gross neglect of duty on his part as minister?

Mr. Benson: The comments of the Auditor General do not indicate any neglect of duty on anybody's part in this particular matter. Information which was not available at the time the Auditor General submitted his report is now available. I will be pleased to supply the information to my right hon. friend as soon as I have obtained it in suitable form from my department.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the lack of time on orders of the day to get answers to questions regarding the auto pact, will the Prime Minister not agree to submit the auto pact to the scrutiny of a standing committee of the house so that all information in respect of this pact can be obtained?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to look into that matter. I cannot answer it definitely at the present time. We have to get through some important legislation before this house prorogues. Whether there will be an opportunity to discuss this pact I do not know, but there certainly will be an opportunity when we discuss the estimates in the resumed session.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I feel this matter is of great urgency at this time when thousands of Canadians are being laid off. I think we should find sufficient time to look into this situation, in view of the fact that we are looking into everything else through royal commissions and standing committees.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the suggestion that this situation arises out of the operation of the auto pact. My hon. friend probably is aware of what is going on in Washington, where attacks are being made on that government because this particular agreement is said to be too favourable to Canada.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware that within a matter of just a few weeks ago Dafew Metal Stampings Limited of Scarboro has gone out of business as a result of the auto pact, and that 82 employees have lost their jobs permanently?

Mr. Pearson: I am also aware that many thousands of jobs have been given to Canadians as a result of this agreement.

Mr. Starr: Where; in Windsor?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition quite rightly asked the Minister of National Revenue whether the Studebaker Company had paid its bill of $2.4 million. Surely the minister must be aware whether or not they have paid this bill. All this house wants to know is whether the bill has been paid; yes or no.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege. The hon. member knows the rule.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INTERVIEWS WITH PRESIDENTS OF STUDENT ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. I should like to ask him whether his attention has been drawn to the statement made by the president of the Canadian Union of Students to the effect that over the past 15 years successive presidents of that organization have been interviewed by the R.C.M.P. for the purpose of soliciting information gained by N.F.C.U.S. observers at international student meetings, particularly those in eastern Europe. Has his attention also been called to the fact that all five of the men who have held the position of president of the Canadian Union of Students have said they were similarly solicited, and that one of them said he was offered a bottle of rye whiskey?

I should like to ask the minister whether he will undertake to have an investigation made of these allegations to see whether they are true. If he finds they are correct, will he undertake to report back to the house to the effect that these practices are being discontinued?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in reply perhaps I may be permitted to say that I am advised the R.C.M.P. does not supply funds to students or student organizations for the purpose of inducing them to act on behalf of the R.C.M.P.

I wish to emphasize that the activities of the R.C.M.P. are limited to counterespionage. Obviously it is not possible for the R.C.M.P., which is charged with the responsibility for national security, to carry out its responsibilities unless members of that force are able to ask questions of people who have relevant information. The R.C.M.P. have openly interviewed people from all walks of life, including students.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Would the Solicitor General also be prepared to advise the Canadian Union of Students that since the R.C.M.P. is one of the arms of government and is vitally responsible in the maintenance of law and order in this country, co-operation with the R.C.M.P. is co-operation with the government and the citizens of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INVITATIONS TO PERSONS INVOLVED IN SEPARATIST ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Is it the intention of the government or the Prime Minister to advise the C.B.C. or to recommend to the C.B.C. that it should abstain from extending further invitations to persons directly or indirectly affiliated with any separatist activity in the country?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will bring my hon. friend's observations to the attention of the C.B.C.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell us if he intends to use the C.B.C. to prevent ideas from circulating in Canada, or would he not rather leave the C.B.C. free to allow those who have ideas to express them?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

TRADE

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MEETING RESPECTING LATIN AMERICAN COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Because of the number of existing trade agreements that will be involved, could the minister tell the house whether Canada has been invited to send an observer to the mid-April meeting in Uruguay designed to set up a common market of 19 Latin American nations.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES—REQUEST FOR LANDING RIGHTS AT CALGARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a wire from the mayor of the city of Calgary requesting an early discussion on Canadian Pacific Airlines' request for landing rights at Calgary and informing the minister of the grave concern of the Calgary Chamber of Commerce at the delay in settling this matter? Also, can the minister state when he will be prepared to meet the mayor of Calgary to discuss this matter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received the message. I really do not believe that much useful purpose would be served by having a repetition of representations that were made to me by the mayor of Calgary a few weeks ago. I understand his impatience, and hope he will not have to be impatient very much longer.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister certain that the mayor has no further matters to put before him than the representations which were made some weeks ago; and would he not be prepared to meet the mayor?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister of Transport aware of the fact that he is disagreeing with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who yesterday implied that repetition was needed?

URANIUM

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING SALE TO FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister any information to pass on to the house regarding conversations with the government of France leading to possible future orders for uranium from this country?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing new to report. The government is keeping in close contact with the French government, as are the uranium producers. As far as I know, there are no active negotiations at the moment.

EXPO '67

OBJECTIONS BY AUDITOR GENERAL AS TO FINANCING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does the minister intend to introduce legislation during the present session to eliminate the objections raised by the Auditor General with regard to the financing of Expo '67?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, sir, because such legislation in this session is not necessary.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister satisfied himself that the recently announced preview of Expo '67 for some 7,000 V.I.P.'s will not place unnecessary additional burdens on the taxpayers of this nation?

Mr. Winters: Yes, I am satisfied on that point, Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

REPORTED CHANGE IN TARIFF ON MILITARY EQUIPMENT PURCHASED ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be the day of the Minister of National Revenue, or perhaps this question should be addressed to the Minister of Defence Production. Has their attention been drawn to an editorial in the Financial Post to the effect that on November 24, almost three months ago, the federal government made a change in the ground rules affecting hundreds of companies, whereby certain reductions were made in connection with importations of defence products. No notice was given to the trade. Why did this failure take place? What justification is there that orders made by the government, so important to business and employment in Canada, should have been kept under cover until finally revealed three months after the order in council was passed?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman has indicated there was an order in council passed which was discussed with those involved in the industry before its passage. The order in council having been passed it was, as usual, published in the official gazette of Canada. I have not with me today the page number of the gazette for the month of November, but I will be glad to provide it to the right hon. gentleman so he can read it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can also read what was stated by the Financial Post.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, you don't like the truth over there.

Mr. McIlraith: We would like you to obey the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is just another example of the attitude of ministers when they are on the ropes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question. I cannot understand this unseemly noise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the right hon. gentleman ask his question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question to the minister is whether it is a fact that companies active in defence business were not told of this, nor was the Canadian Manufacturers Association; and that this took place over a period of three months to the detriment of Canadians because of the failure of the government.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of publishing the order in council in the Canada Gazette was to draw it to the attention of those who had an interest, and I assume that those people would have taken the trouble to read the very precise terms of the order in council, which was published in extenso.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is the amount of purchases required for a full remission of the customs duties involved?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is obviously out of order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—MAINTENANCE OF CANADIAN COMMITMENTS UNDER UNIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns a military matter, a subject in which he is intensely interested. In view of recent evidence given to the defence committee and particularly that by General Moncel, former vice chief of staff, will the minister explain how Canada's commitments toward NATO will be maintained under the proposed plan of unification which is being put forward by the Minister of National Defence for unknown reasons?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is a well known rule of this house—

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I cannot accept this question. It is much too broad and general.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was going to point out that the hon. gentleman, who is an authority on the rules of this house—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this is a point of order. As I was saying, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre knows perfectly well that it is not in order to ask a question about a statement made in committee while that committee is sitting concurrently with the session of this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the point of order is not well taken; it is simply a point of disorder.

Mr. Speaker: I had stated other reasons why the question was out of order.

Mr. Churchill: May I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs which I think may be acceptable to him. Will he appear before the defence committee and explain how the proposed unification will affect adversely, as was stated, our commitments to NATO?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be glad to assist the hon. gentleman by helping him to phrase his question a little better.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED SURCHARGES ON CARGOES TO VANCOUVER FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can report to the house any progress in the negotiations aimed at the rescission of the surcharges proposed by Japan and the shipping conferences in San Francisco, which would be disastrous to the port of Vancouver. The matter is urgent, inasmuch as the deadline by which the increased rates are otherwise to come into effect is March 1.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and see what progress I can report at an early date. The period for negotiations is still open.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—POSSIBLE DISCONTINUANCE OF EXPRESS AND FREIGHT OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Transport arises as a result of representations I have received and meetings I have had with unions in my area. May I ask the minister if it is the intention of the Canadian National Railways to make further cut-backs in employment and service in the town of North Sydney by discontinuing their express and freight operations in that town?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I hope not, but I will make inquiries.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member may want to discuss this in the adjournment debate.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to deal with this very important question at the first opportunity on the late, late show.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST OF PROVINCES FOR CONFERENCE IN CENTENNIAL YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask him whether, in view of the desire expressed recently by a large number of the provinces to hold a constitutional conference, the Prime Minister will accede to their request by arranging such a conference in our centennial year and calling it the centennial family conference.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Some provinces have also indicated that this would not be the proper time to hold a constitutional conference. Naturally until there is unanimity on this matter, and until preparatory work is done, there would not be much value in holding that kind of conference.

Mr. Starr: In view of press reports that the majority of the provinces have agreed, will the Prime Minister tell us which of the provinces have not agreed?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, because some of the reports I have received are confidential, naturally I have to give careful consideration to minority rights in this matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister is not yet ready to call a centennial family conference, will his government consider bringing in during this session legislation on family planning?

FINANCE

REPORTED GRANTING OF INTEREST FREE LOAN TO INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

We learn from an official source that the government has just granted an $11,850,000 loan to India. I would therefore ask the minister this: If interest free loans are made to foreign countries and loans bearing interest are secured from foreign countries, how does he expect to balance the external affairs budget?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that this is not a question but an argument.

WATER RESOURCES

PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION IN PROPOSED U.S. CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and deals with the next international conference on water and fisheries in Washington. Does the Canadian government intend to invite the provinces to be represented on the five-member delegation Canada is entitled to, since they have offshore jurisdiction and the use of water falls within their jurisdiction?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to accept all the comments of the hon. member. The federal government also has responsibilities where our waters are concerned, for fish live in them, ships navigate them. Fisheries and navigation, to mention only those, are fields of federal jurisdiction.

As to who will be the members of the Canadian delegation to be sent to Washington, the matter is now being studied jointly by Ottawa and the provinces.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

REPORTS BY FORD MOTOR COMPANY RESPECTING DEFECTIVE AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, it was reported today that massive defects in Ford motor vehicles were reported to the United States government. I wish to ask the Minister of Industry whether the Ford Motor Company of Canada have made similar reports to him regarding defective Canadian vehicles on the road at this time.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure to what particular reports the hon. gentleman is referring, but the Ford Motor Company of Canada in addition to notifying the purchasers of cars with real or suspected defects also notifies the government.

COAL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the other day I put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and in his absence it was answered by the Prime Minister. My question concerned negotiations concerning coal shipments to Japan. I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to report on that matter.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations have been going on for three years. The parties to the negotiations are members of two private industries, the coal industry of Canada and the steel industry of Japan. The Dominion Coal Board is fully informed on the negotiations, but on a confidential basis; I think it would be improper for me to report on them.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works concerning what is doubtless the greatest undertaking in which his department is engaged. Since he replied to my question on February 8 has the minister or his department received another or fuller report from Mr. O. J. McCulloch on the Northumberland strait crossing? If so, has such report prompted any consideration of changes in design or scheduling of this important project?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall the precise date on which Mr. O. J. McCulloch forwarded his report to the Department of Public Works, but that date was disclosed in the answer to the written question given in this house. Whatever the date was, whether before or after the 8th, the report is now being studied to see whether any changes in the plans for construction of the crossing are warranted.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STEPS TO SETTLE WHARFAGE DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of the letter he tabled yesterday appointing Dr. T. G. How to look into the administration of small vessel harbours on the British Columbia coast. Will the minister suspend the operation of the side wharfage section of the government wharves and piers regulations until the report by Dr. How has been submitted?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether it is usual to suspend the operation of a law while an investigation is carried out.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question. Would the minister at least agree not to extend the application of the side wharfage regulations to those places to which heretofore they had not applied, until this report is received?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the minister in any event would have power to do anything of this kind, sir.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INTERNAL INFORMATION PUBLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister table in the house the new internal information publications issued on his authority for the purpose of counteracting criticism of his policies?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no such instruction of any kind, but I would be very pleased to have the deputy minister of national defence, to whom the information services of the defence department report, appear before the committee within the next few days to reassure my hon. friend that no such information is given out; nor would we contemplate such a thing under any circumstances.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister telling the house that there is no such publication as one dealing with internal information for the forces?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Speaker; there is indeed. The director of internal information reports to the director of information services who reports to the deputy minister, and as I say I should like the deputy minister to come before the committee and explain to my hon. friend why it is essential for the forces to receive accurate information and not have to rely on some of the things they read in the newspapers attributed to my hon. friend.

Mr. Churchill: A further supplementary question. Have the members of the forces not read the minister's speech of December 7 which was sent out in a red cover?

Mr. Hellyer: I certainly hope so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of mines. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house what progress has been made to date by the special group set up to study Fundy tidal power; and could the minister tell us when we might expect to receive a report and some recommendations?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the engineering committee of the board met recently I think in Montreal, to interview different engineering companies and to ascertain what each of them could contribute to assist the study being undertaken of the Bay of Fundy tides. These applications are now being studied and in the coming days there will be a meeting of the full board to examine the recommendations made by the committee.

AGRICULTURE

CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST FOR NATIONAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether the government has received a brief from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, with particular reference to their request that the federal government convene a national agricultural conference. I want to ask the minister whether the government is giving favourable consideration to convening such conference with a view to focusing attention on the problems of the agricultural industry, and finding some solutions.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government has received the brief from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and we had a very useful and informative meeting with them this morning. All the suggestions made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in their brief, including that respecting a national conference on agricultural goals, will receive the very serious consideration of the government.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I also ask the minister when we may expect the report of the investigation which is being carried on into the price of farm machinery. When does the minister expect to be able to make a report to the house and to table the correspondence he has had with the farm implement companies?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I expect to be able to report to the house on this subject very soon.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to the first question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Now that the minister has had ample time to study the memorandum of the Manitoba government requesting a national conference on agriculture, has he made any reply to the government of Manitoba and, if so, would he table his reply in this house?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, we received a communication at an earlier date. I take it that tabling my reply and the original letter would have to be subject to the usual rules with respect to correspondence passing between federal and provincial governments.

Establishment of Immigration Appeal Board

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

• (3:20 p.m.)

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.—Mr. Marchand—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening clause 7 of the bill was under consideration. Clause 6 was allowed to stand, clauses 2, 3, 4 and 5 having been agreed to. Does the committee wish to continue with clause 6 or clause 7?

Mr. Marchand: I wish to move an amendment to clause 6. I have no French translation, though I shall obtain it during the discussion.

I move:

That clause 6 of Bill C-220 be amended by striking out lines 39 to 41 on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

Sittings. (2) The Board may sit at such places in Canada as it sees fit.

Quorum. (3) The Chairman and not less than two other members, or the Vice-Chairman and not less than two other members if at least one of such persons is a person described in subsection 7 of section 3, constitute a quorum of the Board.

Hon. members will understand that to mean, I think, that one of the lawyers or barristers attached to the board will have to be part of the quorum.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think this meets the objections raised yesterday, particularly with respect to the board's sitting anywhere in Canada. I hope the board will seek the opportunity to suit the convenience of appellants in many parts of Canada. The amendment also meets the point I have taken that a legally trained person on the board should always form part of the quorum. This amendment is quite acceptable.

Mr. Lewis: I merely want to say that I hope the minister's response to this request, though not a major one is an augury of how he will deal with other amendments put forward. I am glad the amendment is before the committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Greene.]

On clause 7—Court of record.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On this clause I wish to raise two issues. One of them I dealt with briefly when speaking on second reading, the question of what normally will be the type of appeal. Is it the intention that the appeal shall generally be an appeal on the record, or that it shall be a hearing de novo?

I believe generally an appeal on the record would be less than satisfactory. Usually the appellant—the applicant for entry into Canada—at the time of the hearing before the special inquiry officer has little advice; often he may not be represented, and frequently he may not have had the opportunity to consider how best to present his case. An appeal on the record therefore would be less than satisfactory.

If the appeal is to be by way of a hearing de novo, is it to be a hearing de novo in all cases, or is that to be left to the discretion of the appellant or the board? On what basis is this to be determined? How will it be determined under what procedure an appeal shall be heard? Nothing in the bill deals with this matter.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member whether clause 10 is not relevant?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Which part of clause 10?

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Lewis: It seems to me that that clause sets out the hearing procedure in general and as to the taking of evidence, in particular. It states that the board can act on the record as presented to it or take other evidence if it sees fit. I may have misread this, but it seems to me that the clause proposes that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It seems to me that clause 10 relates to what the board shall do after a hearing of an appeal by one of its members, and not to what that member hearing the appeal shall do.

Mr. Marchand: I propose to amend clause 10. If the hon. member wants to relate clause 7 to clause 10, perhaps he prefers to have clause 7 stand until the amendment to clause 10 is moved.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Could I finish my comments about clause 7? I have dealt with the first matter that I think the minister should consider.

Next, I am concerned about subclause 2 (c), which reads as follows:

(c) receive such additional information as it may consider credible or trustworthy and necessary for dealing with the subject matter before it.

When does the board receive this? Is it at the hearing, subsequent to the hearing, or at some later date? In other words, how and when is additional information to come into the possession of the board? Also is it to be genuine evidence, or hearsay evidence, or anything that, in the imagination of the board, may be considered relevant? Is this additional information to be made known to the appellant? Must it be made known to him before the hearing or at the time of the hearing? The broad way this subclause is drafted shows to me that there is here a great potential for abuse.

No time limit is set out in the clause. If the board is able to receive additional information it may consider credible or trustworthy subsequent to a hearing, I think the appellant's hands are completely tied. These are the broadest powers I have ever seen, in the rights of a board, to receive information. I have grave doubts about this. Abuses might arise as a result of this clause. I should like to hear the minister's comments.

Mr. Marchand: It is clear from reading the bill that we want to constitute a board that will be independent and will have a status comparable to that of the ordinary courts. I think this board will have to use its discretionary powers about procedure, if procedure is not established in the law. I think most of the time, the board will proceed de novo. It might decide to proceed in some other way. It is provided in the amendment, which I hope will be accepted, that a member can report to the board and the board can decide on the report of the member who shall have been authorized to hear evidence. We want the board to have this power, and to exercise its discretionary power as it sees fit. I do not think we could foresee all cases. We should consider this board as a major board, with the responsibilities of a court.

I do not believe that all procedural details governing the ordinary courts are included in the regulations concerning those courts. For example the courts need not necessarily render judgments in writing. They do that however, and those judgments usually are accepted without complaint. This is the same kind of situation and we hope the procedure will follow the same lines as in the normal courts.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The minister has made a comparison with the courts, but clearly the courts have no such power as exists under subclause 2(c). The rules of evidence would in no circumstances permit a court to receive the type of "additional information" which is here mentioned. I would ask the minister this: Is the "additional information" to be received at the hearing or outside the hearing? Will it be made known to the appellant? Will it be introduced after the hearing is all over, when the appellant may not have an opportunity to meet it at all? This is where the possible evil of this paragraph may lie. There is no limitation whatever placed upon it. This additional information might change the whole context of the evidence which was before the board. I think the appellant should have the right to know what is the case against him, and it should be made clear that there will be no opportunity for additional information to be brought forward in any circumstances after the hearing has been closed.

Mr. Marchand: The board is a court of record and I understand that if any information is given to it the appellant must have a copy, and it must be done during the hearing and not after. This is the whole spirit of the bill. I do not think we can gather, from reading this measure, that the board will decide these matters on the basis of documents which will not be produced during the hearing, outside the knowledge of one of the parties.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That might be the spirit of the bill but assuredly it is not the letter.

Mr. Brewin: I should like to support the hon. member for Carleton. The trouble is that although this board is called a court of record it does, in fact, exercise the power of appeal from an administrative decision. It deals with all sorts of questions which are not strictly dealt with by the courts. It is my submission that the utmost importance attaches to making it clear that this appeal board will not act merely upon additional information which may be given to it later.

It is this kind of procedure, the hearing of reports not disclosed in the records, which has vitiated the appeals heard to date by the present appeal board. I suggest this subclause 2(c) is altogether unnecessary. The board is more or less an administrative tribunal and it will have authority to receive information other than evidence in a court. It should not be given express authority to receive additional information, which implies that this is received other than in the normal course of hearings.

Mr. Orlikow: I wish to raise a subject which was dealt with yesterday by several hon. members. I raise it today partly because I was unable to be here yesterday. I speak with some hesitation because, unlike the hon. member for Carleton and my hon. friend from Greenwood, I am not a member of the legal profession. It seems to me that if this board is to be considered as a court, people who appear before it must have the right to be told the reasons for the denial of their application. If for example the board only has before it a statement from the Minister of Justice or from the R.C.M.P. to the effect that the applicant cannot be permitted to stay in Canada because he is a security risk, the hearing, in my opinion is reduced to an exercise in futility. I join with my hon. friend from York South who said yesterday that we do not expect the department or the security agencies of the government to divulge their sources of information.

Mr. Lewis: You are dealing with a separate question.

Mr. Orlikow: My hon. friend says I am dealing with a separate question. It may be. But I do think that a person who appeals should have the right to know precisely the reasons for which action is taken. If he cannot answer the accusations made against him, the court is really not a court at all—it can only be called a kangaroo court. If this is not the proper clause I can only hope that in some other clause we shall give people the right to obtain the information which is supplied to the board by the government, so that a man will be in a position to make an explanation of the circumstances and defend himself against charges made against him by some government agency.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand the minister will be dealing with clause 10 later, and that it may have some reference to clause 7. May I point out to him that subclause 2(a) provides that a summons may be issued to a person requiring him to appear. He may also bring with him certain documents. The reference is obviously to a situation where the board is sitting and witnesses appear before it. Then, subclause 2(b) provides for the administration of oaths and the examination of persons upon oath or otherwise. This obviously covers the entire gamut of the situation where evidence, documentary and oral, is heard by the board.

Plainly, then, subclause 2(c) must refer to some other kind of proceeding. It must have in mind hearsay evidence, evidence obtained outside the hearings from documents or even in the course of mere discussion. The board or any of its members would be quite free to obtain information from any other person by way of documents or otherwise and that information could be taken into account in reaching a decision.

The minister may tell us that this cannot happen. But our experience is that whenever powers are given those powers will be used, even if they were not provided intentionally. I think the minister should make it perfectly plain that this "additional information" will be information which the person concerned will have the opportunity of meeting. I believe this could be done very easily by way of an amendment.

Mr. Marchand: I am not in disagreement with anything that has been said, and if there is no objection on technical grounds I will try to meet the submissions of hon. members in this regard. So I will ask that clause 7 stand.

I do not believe an amendment is necessary because this board is really, to a certain extent, administering the law. Of course the board will receive some reports and these reports will have to be communicated to the appellant or his lawyer. This is normal. If that is not the situation under this provision, then it is not what I intended and if something can be added without destroying the purpose of the law I am ready to do it.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to add a word while the minister considers the point. I am not trying to lecture him, but I notice he considers that this is a court of record. It is a tribunal set up by statute. As the minister knows, it has no more jurisdiction than that which the statute sets out. It does not have what we call the inherent jurisdiction of courts. It is limited by what this statute says it can do. This explains the anxiety of some of us that a statute set out very carefully the limitation of its powers, as well as the extent of its powers. Even though you call it a court of record, it is not. It is a statutory tribunal which cannot go outside the limits of the statute, but can go the entire direction that the statute permits it. Therefore the definition of terms is of extreme importance. I support the request for a change in clause 7(2)(c) and the minister's suggestion that the section stand.

Mr. Marchand: We will come back to it.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree now that clause 7 shall stand?

Clause stands.

On clause 8—Board may make rules.

Mr. McCleave: I wonder if I may ask two questions of the minister at this point? Under the rule making provision, would definite circuits be set up for the board in places in Canada outside of Ottawa? Would this be part of the purpose of this particular section?

Mr. Marchand: No, Mr. Chairman, I think the board can sit anywhere in Canada, according to clause 6 which we have just passed. Now of course the board is going to make regulations. The only thing clause 8 does is to empower the board to make these regulations, provided they are approved.

Mr. McCleave: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I did not understand that an amendment had in fact been passed to clause 6. I apologize to the committee for that. Will the board have sufficient flexibility to sit, not at regular intervals, but immediately when a case should be determined without causing the appellant to wait perhaps an unnecessarily long time? This was a criticism I heard directed at this bill some time ago by a person who nominally supports the government, that perhaps our approach in parliament was wrong. Will people not be forced to wait unnecessarily long before their cases are heard?

Mr. Marchand: Clause 6, which was adopted, indicates that the board may sit at such places in Canada as it sees fit. The board will therefore sit wherever it desires. I do not feel we can fix by statute the place where it shall sit or the circumstances under which it shall sit. I believe this should be up to the board to decide.

Mr. McCleave: Yes, but on the other hand the board is not limited to definite sittings at definite times. There is this flexibility as a result of the amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On clause 10—Hearing and determination by one or more members.

Mr. Marchand: I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Industry to move this amendment, Mr. Chairman, which reads as follows:

That bill C-220 be amended by striking out clause 10 and substituting therefor the following:

10. (1) The Chairman of the Board may direct that evidence relating to an appeal under this act be received, in whole or in part, by a member of the board and that member has and may exercise all of the powers of the board in relation to the hearing of an appeal.

(2) A member by whom evidence relating to an appeal under this act has been received pursuant to subsection (1) shall make a report thereon to the board and a copy of the report shall be provided to each of the parties to the appeal.

(3) After receiving any report made under subsection (2), and after holding a rehearing, in whole or in part, of the appeal if in its discretion the board deems it advisable to do so, the board shall determine the appeal.

I believe this takes into account the points that were mentioned yesterday. A member sitting alone will not be entitled to make a judgment. He will have to report to the board, which will decide the matter. This is the first point. The second point is that the report will be given to the appellant.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This represents a considerable improvement, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drury: I so move.

Mr. Lewis: I just want to say briefly that I am pleased the minister has reworded clause 10. This amendment meets the points I made yesterday and which I think were made by others as well. I appreciate very much the minister's consideration of these points. The new section, in so far as it deals with these matters, seems to me to meet the case.

Mr. Brewin: I want to propose a further amendment to clause 10, Mr. Chairman, but it does not in any way detract from the amendment the minister has already introduced. The effect of my amendment would be to add a new subclause (5) which would read as follows:

(5) The board shall at the request of the appellant or of the minister give reasons for its disposition of an appeal.

I wondered whether it was appropriate to move this amendment to clause 10 or whether it might more appropriately come under clause 14. However, I noticed that clause 14 deals only with appeals under clauses 11 and 12, and clause 17 deals with a different type of appeal, an appeal by a sponsor. The principle I want to establish in this amendment is applicable to all types of appeals. The proposed amendment deals with a matter that has already been discussed by my colleague the hon. member for York South.

The purpose of this is to ensure that when this board decides cases it shall, if either the department, the minister or the appellant so desires, furnish reasons for its decision. I think it is an essential principle, not only for this tribunal but for all tribunals dealing with administrative matters. I have discussed the question with the minister and with the deputy minister. They have suggested to me that a court of record would, without the indication of such a clause and as a matter of general practice, give reasons for its judgment.

Well, I have had a great deal of experience, if I may say so, both in courts of record and in other tribunals, and quite frequently no reasons are given. The present Immigration Appeal Board habitually gives no reasons. The result of this is not only a feeling of injustice by the aggrieved party, but the failure to build up a system of jurisprudence as it were, a system of principle, upon which decisions of this tribunal are based. It may very well be said you could leave that up to this court of record. I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that despite the advice the minister may have received from other sources it is not a fact that courts of record automatically give reasons, whether they are asked for them or not.

There is another point involved in this. By a later clause the bill purports to grant a right of appeal on matters of law to the Supreme Court of Canada, but this right of appeal can be rendered absolutely valueless because an appellate tribunal such as the Supreme Court of Canada cannot possibly determine whether any points of law are involved or whether they are erroneous or sound, without seeing the reasons. There may be many cases in which the only reasons which need be given are short ones such as: According to our previous decision in such and such a case this appeal is dismissed, or allowed, as the case may be. Perhaps the reasons would not have to be elaborate, but unless the basis for the decision is made available, then half the purpose of the whole bill could be destroyed.

I am not proposing something that is unique in this field of immigration. Those who have studied administrative tribunals and appeals therefrom in other fields are beginning to insist that this be the practice in order to make the system work with justice and fairness and in a way which is consistent, so that you do not have one decision by one board constituted in one way today and a totally different series of decisions when boards are differently constituted in the future.

I do not believe that in principle the minister has any objection to my amendment. I think his only objection is, as he says, that it is not necessary. I beg to differ with him. If it is not necessary, then no possible harm can be done by making sure that in cases where one party or the other desires reasons they shall in fact be made available. By doing this we would strike at what has been such a hopeless situation under the present immigration appeals system, where consistently nobody knows why a particular case has been disposed of in a certain way. They cannot, therefore, either complain about it, ask for a rehearing, or understand for the future the principle supposed to have been involved.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, as I mentioned before, it is not an objection in principle. I agree that it should be so. If it were not so, I would be seriously disappointed because then it would not be the court which we intend it to be. I do not know of any court which by law or statute is compelled to render a written decision. We presume the board will do this, because as the hon. member mentioned it is a court of record and it is our understanding that the board will give reasons.

This court or board may have several hundreds of cases before it and probably many of them will not deserve any written decision. Possibly the applicant himself will not insist on having a decision or possibly he may not desire for personal reasons to have a decision. So, I do not see why we should compel the board to do so. Even if this suggested amendment were acceptable—and I do not believe it is—clause 10 is the clause which deals with the proposition that the chairman of the board may authorize a member of the board to make an inquiry, and report to the board. I think it should be placed somewhere else. I am neither a lawyer nor a technician, but it would hurt my good sense to include it in this clause. I do not believe this would be the proper place.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I would be quite happy if this matter were placed in a separate clause. I agree with the minister that it would more properly come under clause 14, which deals with the disposition of the appeal by the board, but the difficulty in this regard is that clause 14 refers only to appeals under sections 11 and 12. It is my view that the amendment I have proposed should apply in addition to appeals under clause 17 by sponsors. It could be placed in a separate clause and I would be happy if the minister would give consideration to this.

With regard to what he said about hundreds of cases, and perhaps that the appellant may not wish reasons, this is precisely why it should be only at the request of the appellant or the minister. At some stage or another the minister may desire to have the reasons. It is only at the request of one of the parties that the board would be required to furnish reasons for its decision. The reasons of course could be delivered orally at the hearing or in writing after the hearing.

The minister says he does not know of any other cases where a court is compelled to give reasons. The hon. member for York South pointed out that although this is a court of record it is a statutory tribunal with the powers given to it by statute, no more and no less. If the minister does not think that clause 10 is the right place to have this provision, I would be glad to withdraw it, if it can be included in some other place.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion to the hon. member for Greenwood. I am in agreement with the amendment he has advanced. It seems to me that the appropriate place for his amendment would be in a new subclause (3) of clause 7, which has been allowed to stand. His amendment might be moved when we are considering that clause.

There is one other point I should like to mention to the hon. member for Greenwood. In the way in which he has drafted his amendment is it not possible that he is depriving the board of the right to give reasons on its own initiative? It seems to me that his draftsmanship may mean that the reasons can be given only when the appellant or the minister asks for them. I think this would be unfortunate.

I would suggest that if the hon. member proposes to move his amendment, it should read:

> The board may, and at the request of the appellant or of the minister shall, give reasons for its disposition of an appeal.

Mr. Brewin: I am very grateful to the hon. member for Carleton, and I think his suggestion is a good one. I am very glad to accept it. It was not my intention to say that the board might not give reasons whenever it saw fit to do so. I should be glad to have discussion as to where the amendment should appear. I do not care where it comes in, so long as the principle is established.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, if the house would approve clause 10 as it stands amended, we could immediately revert to clause 7, and I would be ready to accept this amendment to create a new subclause 7 (2) (d).

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think it would be better to have a separate subclause (3). I do not believe it could be subclause (2) (d).

The Chairman: Order. If I read the amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood correctly, it is a second amendment. That being so, the only amendment before the committee at the moment is the amendment proposed by the Minister of Industry. Perhaps it might be proper at this time to deal with his amendment and then deal with the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood later. I might point out to members of the committee that I am not sure we are following the proper procedure here. It might be the better procedure to put the further amendment to clause 10 in the original bill, as being part of the bill, and then institute the new clause proposed by the minister. There appears, however, to be some general acceptance of this particular amendment and perhaps we might proceed as has been suggested.

Is the amendment to clause 10 moved by the Minister of Industry agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Drury) agreed to.

Clause 10 as amended agreed to.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, may we revert to clause 7, which was allowed to stand?

The Chairmon: Does the committee agree to revert to clause 7?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 7—Court of record.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, it is proposed by the Minister of Agriculture that clause

7(2)(c) be amended by adding at the beginning the words "during a hearing".

Mr. Greene: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this was the suggestion I made privately to the parliamentary secretary, which I understand he has taken up with the law officers. Having made the suggestion initially, the amendment is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, is it appropriate now for me to move as an amendment to clause 7 as amended a further subclause (3) which would read, as suggested by the hon. member for—

The Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps I could suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood that we first deal with the amendment moved by the Minister of Agriculture. Then I would hear the hon. member on the amendment which he would like to propose. The Minister of Agriculture moves:

That subclause (2) (c) of clause 7 be amended by adding at the beginning thereof the words "during a hearing"

Does the committee agree to the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move a further amendment to clause 7:

That clause 7 as amended be further amended by adding thereto subclause (3) reading as follows: "The board may, and at the request of the appellant or the minister shall, give reasons for its disposition of the appeal."

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a point in connection with this amendment. Maybe I have misread this provision, but would it not be possible under certain circumstances that the person who wants to be a citizen would be in the position of a respondent and the minister would be the appellant? That is to say, should the phrasing be "the appellant or of the minister", or should it be something broader? This is the question I want to ask the mover of the amendment.

Mr. Brewin: The hon. member for Halifax may be right, Mr. Chairman, but I think on reflection that only two types of appeal are possible, one by an individual who is then described as an appellant, and one by the minister. But perhaps the point the hon. member makes is that the minister might appeal and the individual might be the respondent, and as such might like to see the reasons for the decision.

Mr. McCleave: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: Perhaps there is a point in what the hon. member says.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member for Greenwood may be assuming that the minister is never going to appeal.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could solve the dilemma since I created it. Instead of the words "appellant or of the minister" should we not say "or either one of the parties to the appeal"? Would that not solve the problem?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is correct. May I move it formally. I move as a subamendment:

That the words "the appellant or of the minister" be deleted and the words "of either party" be substituted therefor.

The subclause would then read:

The board may, and at the request of either party shall, give reasons for its disposition of the appeal.

If you will give a moment, Mr. Chairman, I will write it out.

The Chairman: May I suggest to the hon. member for York South that perhaps the proper thing for him and the hon. member for Greenwood to do would be to get together and redraft the amendment.

Mr. Lewis: With pleasure, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Marchand: I think we should say "either of the parties to the appeal", Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Brewin: We are all agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I may suggest that the hon. member for Greenwood be permitted to withdraw the wording that he gave originally and substitute for it wording as follows:

The board may, and at the request of either of the parties to the appeal shall, give reasons for its disposition of the appeal.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South is writing out just that wording. Everybody seems to be agreeable, and I am certainly agreeable to withdrawing my original amendment and substituting this new one. There was some confusion in the matter and I should like to ask for the withdrawal of my previous amendment. I now suggest the following amendment:

That clause 7 of Bill C-220 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:

"3. The board may and at request of either of the parties to the appeal shall give reasons for its disposition of the appeal."

The Chairman: Is there agreement in the committee to the withdrawal of the amendment originally suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Brewin) withdrawn.

Mr. Brewin: I now move in substitution the amendment in the terms I have just suggested.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Brewin) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 11—Appeal on question of law or fact.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment but I am not sure whether the minister would agree that this is the proper place for it. It covers all appeals under clauses 11, 12 and 17.

What I am concerned about is the provision in the bill which would require the minister to give the appellant the grounds on which the rejection of his application was originally based. However, it seems to me now that my amendment would be more appropriate under clause 19. I thought I should mention it at this stage, since clause 11 is the first clause dealing with the right of appeal.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, may I make it clear that even if I agree with the hon. member that the proper clause under which this amendment should be moved is clause 19, I would not like the hon. gentleman to believe that I am ready to agree to his amendment under clause 19.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has not yet heard the arguments.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to put a question to the minister which relates to the debate we had yesterday. It was a very good debate and I am sorry that I could not stay to hear the minister's reply when he closed the debate. However, I understand from reading Hansard that he substantiated the position taken by his parliamentary secretary and intimated in no uncertain terms that in hearing an appeal the board would have the right to base its decision on humanitarian grounds, regardless of the regulations contained in the act. This is what I understood from his speech, and if I am wrong he can correct me.

The point I should like to raise refers to the following words in clause 11: "on any ground of appeal that involves a question of law or fact or mixed law and fact". What question of fact can be involved in an appeal? The only question of fact which can be considered by the board is whether or not there has been a failure to comply with a section of the act, and subject to that a deportation order may be made.

Mr. Marchand: May I tell the hon. member that I wish to amend clause 15, and this may satisfy his objection.

Mr. Baldwin: I am quite agreeable to that.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—Disposition of appeal.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, last evening I gave notice of my intention to move an amendment to clause 14. The minister has indicated that he intends to move an amendment to clause 15. He also said that he was in general agreement with the amendment which I proposed to clause 14. Could he indicate at this time whether I should go ahead and move my amendment, or wait until he indicates his intention with regard to clause 15? This might avoid additional debate.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that we stand clause 14 so that we could first deal with my amendment to clause 15, which may solve the problem with regard to clause 14.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we stand clause 14?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 14 stands.

On clause 15—Execution of order.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, moves the following amendment:

That clause 15 of Bill C-220 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 26 to 29 on page 5 and substituting therefor the following:

"(ii) the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations that in the opinion of the board warrant the granting of special relief, the Board may direct that the execution of the order of deportation be stayed, or may quash the order, or quash the order and direct the grant of entry or landing to the person against whom the order was made."

(b) by striking out line 32 on page 5 and substituting therefor the following:

"stayed, it shall allow the person concerned to come into or remain in"

(c) by striking out lines 45 to 49 on page 5 and substituting therefor the following:

"(a) has been stayed pursuant to paragraph (a) of subsection (1), the board may at any time thereafter quash the order; or

(b) has been stayed pursuant to paragraph (b) of subsection (1), the board may at any time thereafter"

The effect of this amendment would be to broaden the authority of the board in view of the present more restricted wording of clause 15 (1) (b) (ii) which reads: "the existence of other exceptional circumstances". So we introduce here the concept of humanitarian and compassionate grounds. This point was stressed yesterday by many hon. members, and as far as this question is concerned I presume that the new wording is more satisfying than the present wording of the bill.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Greene: I so move.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think that in this amendment the minister has substantially met the representations which we on this side of the house made in relation to this matter. I think this is a very considerable advance and is a worth-while amendment which, in substance, meets what we have in mind. I would be prepared, as I am sure would my colleagues, to accept this amendment, and under the circumstances I will not proceed with the proposed amendment to clause 14.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I imagine that the minister and his advisers spent a great deal of time, into the night, preparing these amendments and I congratulate them upon the result and express our appreciation, even though the minister spent some sleepless hours. What he has produced is a very worthwhile change.

Mr. Marchand: Perhaps I will gain a few hours tonight.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

[Mr. Marchand.]

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Greene) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we now revert to clause 14?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 14—Disposition of appeal.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I am just wondering whether the objections of the hon. member for Peace River have been met.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This goes beyond the power of staying, and relates to the specific power of quashing an order. It meets my point precisely.

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We shall now consider clause 16.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Appeal from refusal to approve application.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move:

That clause 17 of Bill C-220 be amended

(a) by striking out line 13 on page 6 and substituting therefor the following:

"17. A person who has made application"; and

(b) by striking out lines 22 to 24 on page 6 and substituting therefor the following:

"this section may be taken only by such persons and in respect of such classes of relatives referred to in the regulations as may be defined by order of the governor in council".

The purpose of the amendment is to modify the first line of clause 17, which restricted to Canadian citizens the right of appeal in cases of sponsorship. The governor in council will now have the authority not only to determine the classes of relatives for which this right of appeal will exist, but at the same time will have authority to determine the person who may take an appeal. This means that not only Canadian citizens but eventually even landed immigrants could exercise this right of appeal.

There is no doubt that this amendment would leave all of the powers in the hands of the governor in council. But as I have said, Mr. Chairman, we did intend to do this, which is why we inserted clause 17. However we do not want to be pushed too fast in this direction, because we should like to know what will be the exact consequences of granting such right of appeal. Therefore the governor in council is given the authority to make regulations and to experiment, as it were, first of all with one particular class, and then extend the provisions of the clause to classes other than Canadian citizens and even to landed immigrants.

Mr. Greene: I so move.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that I cannot greet this amendment with the enthusiasm with which I greeted the last one. I must take the attitude that this is a sophistical amendment. What it does is to purport to give in the first part—and with that I agree—and then to take away or to give the potential of taking away in the second part. The first part of the amendment extends rights which heretofore have been confined, in the clause as drafted, to Canadian citizens. This amendment would extend the clause to any landed immigrant, in which proposal we concur. The first part of the amendment we will certainly support.

In the second part of the amendment the minister has potentially reduced the first part of the amendment to an absolute nullity. He has given the right to go behind this parliament into the secrecy of the cabinet chamber and to say no, landed immigrants will not have the right to make an application. I think that this is unsatisfactory.

In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, the minister has taken, and insists upon taking, the right to say that the classes of relatives shall be those only as defined by the governor in council. The committee has no means whatever of knowing to what classes of relatives the governor in council will extend this right, and in my view the amendment is totally unsatisfactory in this respect.

As a third ground I confess to my disappointment that the minister has not included in this amendment the same principle enshrined within his amendment to clause 15. If this amendment were carried we would have strict, immediate application. What some of us were seeking to achieve was to bring into this clause the humanitarian and compassionate considerations to which the minister agreed in relation to clause 15.

I would urge the minister at this stage, if he will, to amend this clause by including the very words he has just asked the house to adopt in clause 15. If he were to insert in line 21 the words "or the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations that in the opinion of the board warrant the granting of a special relief", he would then give the discretionary power for which some of us on this side are asking.

In the manner in which this amendment is drafted it is unsatisfactory. It is giving with one hand and taking away, or potentially taking away, with the other. It does not import into this clause any of the compassionate or humanitarian considerations which might lead to the granting of relief. I submit that the minister is being inconsistent. If he is prepared to do this in clause 15, there is no reason whatever why he should not do it in clause 17. I hope the minister will not dig his heels in but will give the matter further consideration.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word along the lines of the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton. I have an additional suggestion deriving from some of the minister's remarks last night which appear to me to have validity and to deserve consideration by the committee. I hope we shall find some way of voting separately on the two points in the minister's present amendment. I would support the first amendment. However, I have the same objection to the second amendment as I had, and as the hon. member for Carleton and others expressed, against the original wording.

I am sorry to say to the minister that nothing he said last night on this point or anything he added today convinces one that his position is right. Again it seems to me that he is stating the position out of fear that this appeal tribunal might take over some of the functions of the department. Really, I do not know what is worrying him. I do not know why he should ask this committee to give the governor in council the authority which, in effect, would enable it to limit the class of persons who may appeal, just as narrowly as the minister may decide. I cannot for the life of me see how he can ask us to support that. The minister takes unto himself a different authority, in a sense, from that under the original wording.

Under the original words the minister could limit the area in which appeals may be made to such classes of relations as may be referred to. In the present wording it is not only the classes of relations, but it is also the classes of sponsors, if the words "by such persons" mean anything.

The minister takes unto himself and unto his colleagues in the cabinet the right by order in council to decide who in fact will be able to appeal. He may decide to limit the right of appeal to a very narrow sector. Why should that be, Mr. Chairman? Why, if he has given the right of appeal, should it not be available to every person falling within the general words of the earlier part of clause 17? The minister will have to produce more cogent reasons than he has to this point, before my colleagues and I can support the second part of his proposed amendment.

I mention the second point, that the appeal board should be able to deal with an appeal by a sponsor on its merits, rather than merely being able to consider the technicalities and whether they have been met. I was impressed to some extent by the minister's plea last night that this is not the place to give the appeal board the power to go beyond the confines of the law, to make decisions on humanitarian and other grounds which may be outside the actual law. That sort of thing requires a change in the substantive law itself. I think there is much logic in that.

At the appropriate time we wish to move an amendment. Perhaps I could read it to the minister now, or mention it to him, to see whether he might not consider it favourably. We would move that we import into clause 17 language the minister has introduced into clause 15, but that instead of giving the board authority to make the final decision the board have authority to recommend to the minister, that he might make the final decision. That occurred to me in response to the appeal the minister made last night.

I appreciate that one of the purposes of the separate appeal tribunal is to reduce the onerous duties in the field of discretion attached to the minister. Those duties come into play after an appeal has been heard. Under the present legislation you go from the appeal tribunal to the minister. I appreciate that the whole idea of this bill is to make the decision of the appeal board final. But I would much rather take a crack at an idea and give the appellant the opportunity to place his case before the board. That case should include human and compassionate considerations which moved him to appeal. If the board, this independent tribunal, considers his appeal, his pleas, his grounds, then, to maintain the power in the minister to administer the act and to maintain in him the authority to make special exceptions, rather than having the board make the exceptions, I should be ready to agree that instead of the board making the final decision, it recommend the matter to the minister.

We have a proposal to change that clause. I shall read it, in the hope that the minister may think it worth considering. Our proposal is in language to this effect: that in an appeal under this clause the board may also take certain things into account—and may I stress here the word "also". The wording I am suggesting is not wording which says "notwithstanding the act and the regulations." The board has to consider the act and the regulations in the first place. We should like the clause to say that the board may also take into account the existence of compassionate or humanitarian considerations that in the opinion of the board warrant the granting of special relief, and that it may make such written recommendation thereon to the minister as it deems desirable, advisable or just—I do not care what adjective is used.

Summarizing, I add my words to the appeal of the hon. member for Carleton. I am sure that appeal will be repeated by others. I ask the minister not to be adamant about seeking the power to narrow the area of the right of appeal. The minister has a board of seven members. The amended clause 7 gives the chairman of the board the right to have the hearing taken by one member only, so far as evidence is concerned. There is no reason to assume that the board will have too heavy a load if everyone who is a sponsor, a citizen or landed immigrant—whoever makes the application—has the right to appeal.

I hope the minister considers this carefully because this is an important question. I am trying to be as unprovoking as I can be. I feel more strongly about this than the mildness of my words suggests. I do not see how the minister can ask parliament to give him a blank cheque to say who shall and who shall not have the right of appeal. This is what this new amendment directs us to do. It establishes the general right of appeal and then says that the minister shall determine—because the governor in council means "on the advice of the minister"—who shall have the right to appeal. He asks us to give him a blank cheque in that area. I do not think he should do that.

I appeal to him to import into this clause the right of the board to consider compassionate and humanitarian pleas, and to consider them on their merits. Personally, I should not mind were the board given authority to make the decision or order. It ought to be able to decide on the basis of all the circumstances of the case. But if the minister still feels that that authority should not be given to the board, that exceptions should not be made by this board, but should be made, as formerly, by the minister under his discretionary powers, I am quite prepared to agree that the board, instead of making the final decision, recommend to the minister on the basis of all the evidence it has received.

If the minister does these two things, the right of appeal by a sponsor will have real meaning to the people concerned. In every case with which I have had to deal, the people concerned are usually emotionally involved. These cases affect their future and the future of their relatives and all these things are terribly important to them. I am sure the minister is as aware of this as I am. I do not think it is possible to meet a situation involving such real human concern by an amendment such as the minister is proposing, unless there is the power to consider factors other than the technical grounds of an appeal.

Mr. Brewin: I should like to reinforce the appeal which has been made to the minister with respect to clause 17. There are two parts involved. The first question is: Who has the right of appeal? I would point out to the minister that there are two sides to this matter of sponsorship. Who can sponsor? This is decided at the present time by the regulations. The regulations set out the relationships which are permitted, the financial circumstances, and so on. The other question is: Who may be sponsored? The two go together.

In either case the minister, or the governor in council, by making regulations specifies the classes of people who may be sponsored and lays down the general rules, and it is my suggestion that all those who are named as potential sponsors should have the right to go to the appeal tribunal and say: We have been ruled out, although we comply with the general regulations laid down. There is no reason whatever why the governor in council in addition to setting out the rules of sponsorship should tell one class of sponsors that they have no right of appeal.

On this question of the right of appeal, may I remind the minister and the department that sponsorship is itself based upon compassionate grounds, upon relationships. We have two streams of immigrants, as the minister well knows—those we allow to enter on economic grounds because of the contribution they are likely to make to this country, and those who are allowed to come in on compassionate or family grounds. The regulations necessarily spell out in some detail the conditions of entry.

For example, a person may be allowed to sponsor a grandmother, but in order not to extend the category too far an age limit is imposed—she must be over 65, or over 70. Or certain financial conditions may be imposed. But it is precisely considerations of this kind which cannot finally be dealt with in accordance with rigid rules. If, in the other field, when an order of deportation has actually been made, the appeal board is given the right to make orders on what might be called compassionate or discretionary grounds, then in respect to appeals by sponsors there is no reason why the board should not be entitled to take into account the very situations which I know the minister will have taken into account in the past when making discretionary orders with respect to these sponsored immigrants.

I think the minister has shown a laudable willingness to accept suggestions in this field. I would say to him that those who are affected by this measure will feel their rights are infinitely better safeguarded if they are not subject to what could be an arbitrary limitation.

The minister, through the governor in council, confers certain rights. Let those rights be subject to appeal, irrespective of who the sponsors are. If this is done the appeal board will become a more generous and worthwhile recognition of the human problems involved in these cases.

Mr. Roxburgh: Last night I spoke briefly on this matter urging that the board should be able to act in certain of these cases on compassionate grounds. The minister must have a reason for the position he is taking and I would like him to tell the committee what that reason is.

Even if the power to take into account other than strictly legal considerations were used only sparingly it would give the people concerned greater confidence in the government and in this parliament. After all, notwithstanding the law and the regulations now in effect, a number of cases have in the past been determined on compassionate grounds. As I say, I should like the minister to tell us the reason for his objection to the course suggested; I am sure he must have a very good one.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Marchand: There is a good reason. It is because I am convinced this authority already exists under clause 17.

What we are dealing with here, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, is sponsored, not unsponsored, immigrants who have to meet the requirements of the law. The very essence of sponsorship is compassion and humanitarian reasons. These immigrants are not accepted into Canada because of their qualifications but because they are relatives of Canadian citizens or landed immigrants. Clause 15 was modified because in cases of deportation you may be dealing with people who do not meet the requirements of the law and who are not sponsored immigrants. We therefore added the reference to compassion and humanitarian grounds.

This board has all of the powers that the minister and the department have right now under the Immigration Act. This means the board can do anything I can do, as minister. They can exercise all the powers that I exercise under section 8 of the Immigration Act. As the hon. member mentioned a few minutes ago, sponsorship is related essentially to compassionate and humanitarian reasons. It is for this reason I do not believe we have to mention these things.

If it will facilitate the passage of the bill, if everybody would be happy, I have no objection to adding humanitarian and compassionate grounds in the clause. However, I firmly object to removing from the authority of the governor in council the establishment of classes. I believe we are conducting an experiment, not because we have been pushed to do so but because we wanted to try to give immigrants new rights. We want to see exactly what the consequences of our policy will be. We have initiated this provision of course with the intention of applying it. We do not want this law only to have it on the statute books. I believe the house should accept clause 17, even if we modify it in the way mentioned a few minutes ago.

In so far as the rest of the clause is concerned, I think we should make this experiment. We are not taking any rights away from the immigrants. They will still have the right to sponsor their relatives. The only thing we add is the right to appeal against a decision, and at the beginning we want this right to be regulated by the governor in council so that we will know exactly the impact on our policy. This is something which has never been tried anywhere else.

[Mr. Roxburgh.]

If an amendment is proposed to add these two words, I have no objection. I do not believe it is necessary. However, in view of the atmosphere in the committee this afternoon, I do not think I am in a position to refuse to put in these words, particularly since I have said I believe they are there now in spirit. I would object to another amendment concerning the powers of the board.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If I were convinced that the minister is right and the board under this clause 17 has the complete powers of the minister, I would not press the matter. I am afraid I am unable to convince myself of that. I think the board here is confined to a legalistic approach and cannot, under clause 17, exercise the discretionary authority the minister has. I am concerned about the situation of a person who comes squarely within one of the prohibited classes under section 6, for example a diseased person who may be the last member of the family in the native land. I do not believe such person could be admitted as a sponsored immigrant under the legislation as it now stands. It is for that reason, and since the minister has invited it, I should like to suggest the following as an amendment:

> That clause 17 be further amended by adding thereto after the word "application" in lines 20 and 21 thereof the following:
> "or that there exist compassionate or humanitarian considerations that in the opinion of the board warrant the granting of special relief"

I have given a copy of this proposal to the parliamentary secretary, and perhaps the minister has had an opportunity to consider it. Without doubt, this amendment would meet the type of problem which some of us have in mind.

Mr. Orlikow: I rise to express some considerable surprise that the minister would be so adamant in his feeling that he and his department must retain the right until some later date to define the classes of relatives for whom an appeal may or may not be made. Yesterday and today the minister has been so reasonable, so compassionate, in accepting amendments designed to broaden the bill. I do not know why he now reverts to an attitude which we have seen so often in the past, that this right of the governor in council must be retained.

I am certain the minister is aware of the discussions which the special joint committee dealing with the white paper on immigration has been having. I am sure he must be aware of the fact the most persistent and vocal critics of the government's white paper in respect of the whole problem of immigration are the members of his own party, the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Essex West. They have been most persistent. When I say "persistent" I am putting it mildly. They have been the most vocal critics of the whole approach as enunciated in the white paper.

It seems to me that the only purpose of the last part of the amendment which the minister is moving now is again to give the department, at some future date, the right to restrict. It does give the right to restrict the type of person who may appeal. I wonder what the reason is. If a person in Canada has the right to sponsor the admission to Canada of somebody, that means he is a citizen of Canada or a landed immigrant. He makes an application to bring in a relative because he believes that person comes within the class of persons permitted to come to Canada as sponsored immigrants. If the application is turned down and if that person wants to appeal to the board which is being set up under this bill, why should the governor in council want to restrict the classes for whom appeals can be made? It makes no sense. It seems to me the minister is going right back to the kind of departmental authoritarianism which gives the department the right to do things without explanation, to which so many members on both sides of the house have objected in the past.

Let me say one more thing before I sit down. If I could be sure that this minister would be the minister forever and that this deputy minister would be the deputy minister forever, I would not be so worried. I am sure I speak not only for myself but for many members, although not all members, of this house may have had individual cases. When I say that, let me add that although not every case I have taken to the minister or the deputy minister has been settled in the way in which I would have liked it to be settled, very freely and honestly I would have to say that I cannot remember a case, even when the request had been turned down, in respect of which I did not feel that there were at least reasonable doubts.

Mr. Chairman, we have had long experience with other ministers and other deputy ministers. I can remember a minister who once made the statement—and I am paraphrasing—that he was a good deal more in sympathy with persons born in Canada than with persons who were born in other countries. I can remember another minister of this department who once had in mind introducing regulations which many members of parliament, particularly those from the Toronto-Hamilton area, felt were directed almost exclusively against potential immigrants from Italy.

I am not saying that such is the intent in respect of this amendment. I am not saying that this minister has this kind of desire or that he would think along these lines. What I am saying is that if we pass the amendment as proposed by the minister it will give some minister in the future the opportunity to do by regulation, by order in council, what the government and the members of this house would not want him to do as a matter of policy. Therefore, as I say, I cannot understand the desire of the minister to have this right of limitation, which I think is unnecessary. While I do not desire to prolong the debate, I must say to the minister that this request which he is making, it seems to me, requires a good deal more explanation than we have had up until now.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, by this clause we are not restricting any rights; we are creating new rights.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the minister that what he is saying is only partly true. It is true that in the first part of the clause he is creating new rights on the one hand and then in the latter part of the clause he is giving himself, or a future minister, the right, on the other hand, to take away those rights. This is what we are objecting to.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, had it not been our intention to give those rights to certain categories of immigrants or Canadian citizens, it would have been silly to write this into clause 17. It is there because we intend to do it. I think members of the house should be aware that we are introducing something new and very important. Someone stated a few moments ago that under the present law a landed immigrant has the right to sponsor. Formally speaking, this is not true; he has the right to apply. In this clause we are creating the right not only to apply but to sponsor directly, even if the department does not agree. That means there is not only the right to apply, but also the right to sponsor. This is new, and we desire this. If we did not, I do not see why we would have included it here.

This is something new and we wish to apply it gradually so that we will know exactly where we are going. Although some hon. members may assume that this is the case, I do not think there is any reason for them to believe that we do not intend to give these rights. Nobody pushed us into this. We created this clause because we believe in the right of appeal. We know that eventually those rights of appeal probably will be extended to all immigrants and Canadian citizens. This is what will happen. If one should look at the evolution of this law I think he would find, even so far as the regulations are concerned, that the trend has been not to restrict the classes of persons who could be sponsored but rather to widen or enlarge the grounds.

Outside the law there is something else which exists in this country; that is, democracy and pressure on the government. As has been apparent, even some members on this side of the house are interested in this clause being really practical and having an influence on our immigration policy. What we are asking—which I think is only reasonable—is that under this clause we have the opportunity to apply this new provision gradually so that we know exactly what impact it will have.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, the minister said we are assuming that he does not intend to apply this clause. We are not making any such assumption. He has told us that he does not intend to apply it in all cases; he has been quite frank with members of the committee. He is saying, in effect, that it is his intention not to give this right of appeal to everybody to whom the first amendment to this clause normally would make it applicable. That is what he is telling us. I suspect—and if my suspicion is wrong the minister can correct me—that despite the fact that the minister's present amendment has extended the right to the non-citizen who may apply to sponsor an immigrant, when his regulation appears, nevertheless, it will limit it to citizens.

Mr. Marchand: This may happen.

Mr. Lewis: Exactly, Mr. Chairman; it may happen. I have the suspicion that this is exactly what will happen. So, we have the first amendment which broadens the area to include landed immigrants who are not citizens as well as citizens and then the minister takes unto himself the right to pass an amendment limiting it to citizens. The minister says that he wishes this so that he can experiment with it and gain experience. I am not being hypocritical when I say to him that I fully appreciate and sympathize with his view. He is entering into a new field and wants to be sure exactly what the result will be when this law is in the hands of the new appeal tribunal. But, Mr. Chairman, with equal force I should like to say that I do not see the logic in his taking the position that he will obtain the experience if he limits it to a certain class. One can only gain the proper experience if every class makes the appeal. Then one would be able to judge the result and the working of the appeal tribunal in respect of every class of relative and every class of sponsor.

If a change should be found desirable, then after a year or two if it were found that the appeal tribunal should not function in this way, the minister or his successor could bring recommended changes before parliament. If he did this in a year or two from now, then he would be able to tell the house exactly what his experience has been, the reason for the required contracting of the area of appeal, and what changes this experience has suggested are necessary. Now, however, he has no reason at all except a desire arbitrarily to decide which classes will have the right tomorrow, a desire arbitrarily to decide whether to increase or decrease the number the day after tomorrow and arbitrarily decide when, if ever, what sponsor may have the right to appeal.

I can well understand that it is necessary with a new tribunal, a new idea, a new avenue, to watch it carefully and make sure it works well. But I urge the minister to consider the logic—at least it seems to me logical —that the only way he can really find out is if everyone, who in the general terms of the first words of the clause has a right to appeal, is given the opportunity to exercise that right. Then the minister will see what happens in every case and will have experience on which to base a conclusion that this kind of case is suitable for appeal and that kind of case is not suitable. Then he can come back to this house and say, on the basis of that experience—and he can outline it to us—"I believe that changes of the following order are required in the law." If they are reasonable changes based on that experience, I would hope that members of all parties in the house would co-operate with him in making those changes.

I think all of us who took part in the debate yesterday, from both sides of the house, have shown that we are not trying to put the minister on the spot or make political capital out of anything that has been produced. There has been on the minister's side above all an attitude today in the amendments which he has produced, except for this last one, which shows a consideration for the suggestions made that one cannot but admire and respect, and I do.

So this is not an argument that too often occurs on the floor of this house, for which all of us are often responsible, where one takes a stance for purposes other than the merits of the law. We are urging the minister to reconsider this question because we are convinced that on the basis of what he is trying to accomplish he is doing himself—I do not mean this in a personal sense, but in that of the department—and the law a discredit by insisting on retaining this power.

I do not know what else I can do except urge him that the only way he will have adequate experience is to permit everyone who has the right under the opening words of the clause to exercise it if they wish to do so, and afterwards the minister will have actual case histories that may show a requirement for change. Let him then come back to the house and ask for those changes to me made. If his request is based on that experience, I cannot imagine members of this house refusing him those changes. Otherwise I do not think it is possible for those of us who feel strongly about this matter to accept the position he has stated.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I think I should state now that it is the intention of the department to extend this right as soon as possible to all Canadians and all non-citizens in Canada including, of course, landed immigrants. This is our intention; this is what we want to achieve. I agree that it looks like discrimination to give certain rights to one group of citizens and refuse those rights to another group. But I think we have to carry out this experiment. I do not think that in order to ascertain the value of the experiment it is necessary to cover all classes at the beginning, because even if there is a legal difference between a landed immigrant and a Canadian citizen the process of sponsorship is exactly the same. We will gain exactly the same experience with the first group as if we were covering all groups.

So I would state that is is our intention to extend this provision to all Canadians and landed immigrants, but I think we need to know exactly how this measure will proceed and what kind of obstacles we will meet. We ask for this gradual application of clause 17. I believe there is nothing that would justify anybody in the house believing that this is not our aim and is not what we intend achieving, because in the past year I believe we have indicated that we are applying this law in the spirit to which I have referred.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to speak again on this question; I have repeated my argument several times already. The minister remains adamant on the matter and that is his right, as it is our right to try to get him to change his mind. I wonder whether it would not be more appropriate, and I would be surprised if the rules do not permit this to be done, to divide the amendment before the committee into its two separate parts and vote on each one of those parts separately, rather than voting on the entire amendment. The amendment contains two quite separate and disparate parts which are not related one to the other at all.

Mr. Marchand: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the two parts are related. In the clause as it now stands we refer to "Canadian citizen". It may be suggested that we are not adding anything, but I think we are making a change in deleting the expression "Canadian citizen" and replacing it with "person", because this means that the governor in council will have much more power than under the clause as it now stands. Both parts are related, because in the first part we determine which persons can sponsor and have the right of appeal, and the other part deals with the classes of persons. I think it is a unit and we should vote on it as one amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to open a lengthy procedural argument, and I am sure the committee generally feels that way. But I would remind the Chair of citation 200, paragraph (4) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

> A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

That citation refers to "the house", but one does not need to take any time to argue the point that the rules that apply in the house apply also in committee. Furthermore, I would point out that the amendment which has been moved from the government side in its very structure admits that there are two parts to it. There is an (a) part and a (b) part. The (a) part calls for striking out line 13 on page 6 and substituting a different line, and the (b) part calls for striking out lines 22 to 24 on page 6 and substituting different wording in those three or four lines.

Even though there are changes being made in the same clause of the bill, they are not only made in different parts of it but one could be passed and the other defeated one way or the other, and the clause as amended would still make sense. I submit, therefore, that they are two districts propositions, to use the language of Beauchesne's citation 200, paragraph (4), and therefore that Your Honour should agree to the request that they be treated as two different motions and voted on separately.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I wish to comment on what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, namely that there are two distinct propositions embodied in the amendment proposed by the minister. It is obvious that the two parts are directly related to each other. The first part of the amendment, which permits additional classes of people to make appeals, necessitated a consequent change toward the end of the paragraph, and therefore one part is directly related to the other. I suggest therefore that if the hon. member is advancing his argument on the basis that there are two separate parts to the amendment, then his argument falls, on that ground alone.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to speak on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but I want to add one new point on the general question of the amendment.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood will permit me to make a few comments on the point of order before he proceeds with his remarks on the amendment.

I recognize the validity of citation 200 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition as given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It reads as follows:

(4) A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

I should also like to refer hon. members to May's Seventeenth Edition, page 407 where the following citation is to be found:

The house does not recognize the right of individual members to insist on the division of motions moved in committee of the whole house,

[Mr. Knowles.]

It appears to me that there is one motion before the Chair and I will rule that the amendment be considered as one motion before the committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, in that case I move the following sub-amendment to the amendment before the house.

I move that the amendment be amended by deleting part (b) thereof.

The Chairman: The Chair considers that the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for York South is quite in order.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak on the amendment and I will try not to repeat what has been said already. I want to suggest to the house that no self-respecting legislature would grant a right of appeal which is to exist at the suffrance of an entirely different body. Without knowing to whom this right of appeal is given we are told by the minister that there are some limitations, the extent of which is not put before us. I know that in these days it is a quite common practice for legislatures and parliaments to legislate in a form which delegates to other bodies, such as the governor in council, the right to fill in the legislation. However, here we are given, in the nature of a legal right, the right to appeal. To give this right to one authority, and in the same breath say that someone else will have the right to define who shall have the right of appeal, is a monstrous anomaly. This is bad legislation, quite apart from the merits of this particular matter.

It would be irresponsible for the house to say to a group of people, "We are giving you the right of appeal," and at the same time to say "We are giving it to whomsoever the governor in council chooses to confer this right." I submit that this would be a very poor form of legislation and I support the amendment of the hon. member for York South.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? The question is on the sub-amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Lewis) negatived: yeas, 8; nays, 27.

Amendment (Mr. Greene) agreed to: yeas, 31; nays 4.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I now put to the committee the following amendment which I mentioned earlier:

That the clause be further amended by adding thereto, after the word "application" in lines 20 and 21 thereof the following: "or that there exist compassionate or humanitarian considerations that in the opinion of the board warrant the granting of special relief".

The Chairman: Is there agreement to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Carleton?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to

Clause as amended agreed to

Clause 18 agreed to.

On clause 19—Notice of appeal.

● (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to indicate that as the bill now stands there is no requirement that the appellant be given information on which he can base his appeal. I do not think the right of appeal will mean anything unless the appellant knows on what he is going to appeal to the board. I have copies of a proposed amendment, Mr. Chairman. I move:

That clause 19 of Bill C-220 be amended by designating the present clause as subclause (1), and by adding immediately thereafter a new subclause (1), and by adding immediately thereafter a new subclause (2) as follows:

"(2) Every appellant under section 11 and section 17 shall be provided by the minister with particulars of the grounds on which the deportation order or refusal to approve an application for admission was based in such manner as is prescribed by the rules of the board".

One hon. member has already spoken to this concept, Mr. Chairman, so I do not think I should take the time of the committee any further.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I do not object in principle to the amendment before the house. On the other hand, we tried last night to move an amendment strictly in accordance with the wishes of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). In the face of a great many objections, we finally realized that the best place for such an amendment is in the Immigration Act itself which governs the activity of immigration officers, since they will have to comply with that requirement or the minister may become subject thereto under the Immigration Act.

Now, I cannot dispute the merit of the proposition itself, since I am in agreement. The only thing I can do, if the house rejects this amendment, is to give the undertaking that, as soon as the legislation becomes operative, all immigration officers affected by this clause will be required through regulations to make the report and to give reasons to the appellant. And as soon as the Immigration Act is introduced in the house, it will be up to the house to move the amendment to have it incorporated in the act.

This is purely a technical problem but I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, that clause 19 be left as is and that, through our regulations, the officers be required to give reasons, or that I give them myself to the party making an appeal. I solemnly undertake to do this as soon as the legislation is passed. And as soon as the general legislation is introduced in the house, I shall support an amendment in accordance with the one the hon. member for York South has just moved.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the minister for his very clear and unequivocal undertaking that the purpose of the amendment I have just moved will in fact be carried out by his department, but with very great respect I do not see any technical objection to the amendment. I did appreciate in drafting the amendment some of the points that might arise—I do not say I realized all of the points—with regard to inquiry officers and other officers of the department, as well as the terms of the Immigration Act and regulations which control them. This is why the amendment does not seek to have the report of the inquiry officer or any other officer of the department given to the appellant. It is also why the amendment asks that the minister provide the grounds.

From my little knowledge of the Immigration Act I cannot see where a technical problem arises on this point. Therefore I am wondering whether the minister would allow the clause to stand. I did understand him to say that he is not arguing against the merits of the amendment but is in agreement with it; it is purely this technical difficulty that he said he stumbled upon last night. I do not know whether the minister and his advisers considered this particular approach of laying this duty upon the minister rather than automatically requiring the furnishing of some departmental document. Perhaps this question was not considered, and if this is the case would the minister consider standing clause 19 so as to give the matter some further thought. Because we are not going to pass the bill today; it is now twenty minutes to six.

Mr. Marchand: We may.

Mr. Lewis: I can assure the minister that he will not. Therefore would he ask his advisers whether they could look at this particular approach or at some similar approach—I have no pride of authorship at all—instead of rejecting the amendment at this stage.

If the minister finds on further consideration that there is an insuperable technical barrier, then we will have to be satisfied with his very genuine and unequivocal undertaking, which I am prepared to accept without any reservation at all. However, I would much rather see the amendment incorporated into the law if the technical difficulty about which the minister spoke can be overcome. Therefore would he agree to allow this clause to stand and to have his advisers look at this particular approach to the problem to see whether a solution can be found?

Mr. Marchand: If the hon. member for York South or the other members of the committee are not satisfied with the undertaking I gave, but would prefer to allow the clause to stand and so insist, then I will not oppose this. I do not think there is any problem about allowing the clause to stand until we deal with the other clauses of the bill, and we may find a solution. If hon. members insist on taking this course I will not object.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to members of the committee for taking up time but I am anxious that there shall be no misunderstanding. I accept the minister's undertaking. As I have said, it was given in unequivocal language and I have not the slightest doubt in the world that he will carry it out. The only reason I would prefer to see this provision incorporated in the law is that people outside the house read the law; they do not necessarily read Hansard. Furthermore, it completes the sense of the law. I do not doubt the minister's undertaking but I think it would be preferable to incorporate the provision in the law.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 19 and the amendment thereto stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 20—Hearing of appeal.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the minister might agree to stand clause 20 until we have dealt with clause 21. If the committee were to provide that the board should be the body to determine upon security or criminal intelligence reports, I think there would need to be an amendment to this clause. I gave notice of a potential amendment to this clause last night and we really could not intelligently discuss the clause now until we have dealt with the principle contained in clause 21.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 20 stands?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 21—Certificate of minister and Solicitor General.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I now move the amendment of which I gave notice last evening. I move:

• (5:40 p.m.)

That Clause 21 (1) be amended by striking out all the words in line 5 to 10 inclusive and substituting therefor the following:

"if the Board finds, on the basis of security or criminal intelligence reports filed with them, which reports the board shall keep secret but the existence of which it shall disclose to the appellant, it would be contrary to the national interest to stay the execution of the order, continue or renew the stay or render the decision, as the case may be"

and that Clause 21 (2) be struck out.

Sir, this was argued at some length last evening, on clause 2. I have little to add. This amendment is in accordance with the report of Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C. He suggested that security and criminal intelligence documents be put before the board. The minister has chosen the other course, of having a certificate executed by himself and by the Solicitor General. I venture to suggest that that is not sufficient under the circumstances. Reports should be laid before the tribunal, that the tribunal may assess their validity.

This is perhaps the most difficult field for any minister of manpower and immigration to deal with. The Secretary of State is involved also in citizenship matters with a security connotation. As I said last night, I hope that the Max Mackenzie royal commission takes a good and hard look at this whole field.

The proposal put forward in the amendment is a better interim proposal than the one advanced by the minister in the clause as drafted. I can see no objection to it; indeed I think it is essential that a person should know that the grounds advanced against him are based on security or criminal intelligence. I do not suggest that reports should be revealed; to do so would undoubtedly be prejudicial to the interests and possibly to the safety of the state. I do suggest that the appellant should know about the existence of such reports and that they are the grounds for action against him If he knows about them he will have the opportunity to produce evidence showing that such reports perhaps are erroneous. There have been, and there will be again, cases of mistaken identity. I know of instances myself where grave injustice has been done because of mistaken identity.

I shall not argue the matter further. Members on all sides of the house expressed their views last night. I think the minister can accept the amendment without in any way prejudicing the safety or interests of the state. No member of this house seeks to do anything through any amendment which would be prejudicial to the state. I submit this amendment provides a reasonable interim solution until the royal commission on security reports.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, the most vexed problem in the whole field of immigration is reconciling the contrary requirements of justice to the individual and the security of the state. The hon. member for Carleton has produced his solution. When the minister dealt with this matter yesterday he said this on page 13311 of Hansard:

> When we discuss the bill clause by clause, if a workable suggestion is made in this connection, guaranteeing what we want to guarantee, I will be the first to accept it. However, it is not easy to do so at the present time.

Of course it is not easy, but that is no reason for not dealing with a problem. I know that an amendment is before the committee and that it would not be in order at this time for me to move another amendment. I wish to tell the committee that after the amendment of the hon. member for Carleton has been dealt with I wish to move an amendment. Perhaps I could read it to the committee so that the committee may consider it. My amendment, Mr. Chairman, suggests that if the minister by certificate says that the order for deportation or refusal of admission is a matter that affects the security of Canada, and it would be contrary to the interests of Canada to disclose the source of information justifying such order or refusal, then the board may conduct the hearing of the appeal in camera, in respect of such evidence, in the absence of the accused or his counsel; but the board may direct that the minister shall furnish to the board and the appellant particulars of the allegations without disclosing the source thereof.

The hon. member for York South discussed this matter. He said that in wartime, when dealing with matters of security, the defence of Canada regulations originally provided for people to be interned on order of the Minister of Justice. There was no basis for internment except the minister's order, if he thought it necessary for the security of the state in wartime. Many of German or Japanese origin were deprived of their liberty, not by the normal process of law, but by direction of the minister. Through experience, and because of the possibility of injustices arising, the Defence of Canada Regulations were changed to provide the right of appeal. That right would be exercised by a tribunal similar to the immigration appeal board proposed by this legislation. That tribunal travelled around the country. Later it was found possible, not to disclose evidence on which the internment was based but to furnish particulars of the grounds for interning, without giving the source. Those particulars gave to the interned person or his counsel or lawyer, as the case might be, not a detailed source of security information, but the substance of the case to be made against him.

At the present time as the minister and other hon. members know, people are refused admission to Canada, sometimes on security grounds and sometimes, not because they belong to subversive organizations, but because they do not meet the regulations. No information is given to these people. The purpose of our amendment is to make certain that there is a fundamental right, bringing with it a fundamental sense of justice to those concerned with appeals. This sense of justice is taken away if you say: "Because somebody says this is a security matter you have no right of appeal." I submit that my proposal, based on experience in security matters at a time of greater national emergency that we now face in any sense, provides a reasonable compromise. It gives people in all cases the right to appeal. It does not take this right away from them simply because someone has issued a certificate. And it provides that the source of the information shall not be disclosed.

This security business has been pushed much too far in regard to immigration policy. I would remind the minister and his department that in Western Europe, where problems of security might be thought to be of greater concern than they are here, literally thousands of people have been permitted to immigrate from behind the iron curtain, from such countries as Yugoslavia and Poland, without this bogey of security being raised against them. They have gone to France, to West Germany and other countries to join the labour force there, and they have done valuable work. I said that people came in their thousands. I should have said in their tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands.

The parliamentary secretary will recall that just a week ago he and I were in Toronto serving on the special committee which is dealing with the subject of immigration. A number of people appeared before us and I wish to mention particularly the representatives of the Canadian Polish Congress. These are people, every one of them, who are as determinedly anti-communist as anyone in this chamber or in Canada. They are determined there will be no subversion in Canada. Moreover they are people with particular knowledge of conditions in Europe. They told us we were way out of date in our security measures with respect to immigration. They said that if we allowed applicants to come in, 99 per cent of them would be "with us". It would be necessary to exclude those who might be thought to present a danger as saboteurs or spies, but it would be wrong to exclude the large mass of these people on security grounds because it was not possible to get a security report on them or because they came from some country, such as Italy, where there was a substantial communist party with which they might have been connected. I believe it is wrong to say to all these people that they cannot come in and that they will not be told the reasons alleged against them. We know that even in this country there have been cases of mistaken identity.

It is my submission that here we have the core of the problem of giving a fair hearing to would-be immigrants. This legislation in general is admirable legislation, but if we take the whole question of security out of it and say that a particular group of people shall have no rights at all, we are destroying the good effect of whatever we are doing in this bill. I realize that this whole question of security is now being considered by Mr. Mackenzie and the other commissioners. Nevertheless I appeal to the minister to take a serious look at the amendment which I am suggesting. It fully guarantees the non-disclosure of sources, while at the same time permitting those concerned to enjoy the rights conferred by this bill, without any surrender of national security. This right of appeal will only be a half right, or no right at all, if some of the people are denied it by the mere issue of a certificate.

I see it is nearly six o'clock. I would be glad to furnish the minister and other hon. members who are interested with copies of my proposed amendment. I do not believe I can move it at this particular stage.

An hon. Member: Can the hon. member produce the amendment?

Mr. Brewin: I have it right here.

Mr. Marchand: Is the hon. member moving it or simply making a suggestion at this stage?

Mr. Brewin: I understand that the hon. member for Carleton has proposed an amendment and I think it would be out of order if I were to move mine, now. The minister could perhaps treat it as a suggestion subject to any alteration he might propose.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The only comment I have to make is this: I hope the hon. gentleman is not inferring that my amendment will be defeated.

Mr. Brewin: I do not know; I am not a prophet.

Mr. Marchand: I think the points which have been raised cannot be dealt with in this bill. Reference has been made to the situation of prospective immigrants from countries behind the iron curtain who cannot apply to come to Canada. I think the solution to this problem must be found within the general policy and administration of the department not within this bill. We are working on this and I hope that I can announce to the house in the near future that we have overcome certain difficulties in this connection.

We are aware of this problem and we probably share the opinions of the hon. member with regard to it, but we have to devise ways and means of processing the applications of prospective immigrants from behind the iron curtain in the same way as other applications are processed. If we were dealing only with these cases, I think a solution would be easy. But we are not. We are dealing with cases where evidence is produced by the R.C.M.P. or by other agencies concerning not only people who are termed subversive elements, but concerning criminals. I am not talking, here, in terms of the security of the state alone; I am thinking of the security of individuals.

I emphasize that there are no halfway measures possible when producing evidence before a board. If we introduced any of those elements which are proposed by the amendment and by the suggested amendment, no lawyer would be satisfied with them. I do not think anyone would be satisfied with a general statement to the effect that one man was a criminal or that another was a security risk to Canada. Everybody would feel frustrated. Everybody would like to have more details. They will insist on having the names, and from that moment on I believe we would be placing some individuals in a very dangerous position. I do not see how we can be satisfied, and I would not be satisfied if I were a lawyer appearing before the board, if I were to have only half of the evidence.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: Half is better than none.

Mr. Marchand: No, it is not better; it may be worse. It might be very misleading. I think if I were to accept these amendments, I would be in favour of opening the case and giving all the information. I do not believe we are going to achieve what is aimed at by these amendments. So, Mr. Chairman, I know it is not a comfortable position, and everybody understands I am sure, but I believe we have to wait for the recommendations from the royal commission on security. It is not wise to bring such amendments until we have those recommendations, and I think the ministers should bear sole responsibility for the decision.

I have been here for nearly a year, and there are not many cases. There have been some cases of applications from behind the iron curtain. This is not the way to solve the problem. We hope we will find a solution very soon. So far as the real criminals or the real subversive elements are concerned, there are very few of them. When it is stated in this house that this bill will be useless if it remains as it is, then I say that is an exaggeration. I think it would be useless for some people to make the efforts they are making if that were going to be the result.

We are not taking away any rights from anybody. Who can come before this board? The sponsor who wants to sponsor somebody, and the man who has been ordered deported. The man who has been ordered deported is generally neither a Canadian nor a landed immigrant. He of course is a human being. He has a moral right to ask to come to Canada, but he has no legal right. He cannot say, "You are depriving me of a right I have." He has a moral right; there is no doubt of that, and I could make an argument on that ground which would be well founded.

We are concerned with a Canadian citizen or a landed immigrant who asks to sponsor somebody. We do not deny him any rights. The sponsor has a right to ask if this man can come to Canada. If we have any information on our file and we were to reveal that information it would be revealed not to the prospective sponsor but to the appellant and to probably the 10 or 12 people in the court. I tell you that in some cases this would be dangerous for the security of the state. I am less sensitive about that aspect because I think we can protect ourselves. However, I believe the security of some individuals can be placed in real danger.

So, Mr. Chairman, I believe there are only two ways of accomplishing this purpose. Either we treat these cases exactly like the others and we produce all the evidence to the lawyers or interested parties, or we refuse to do so and put the responsibility on the minister for seeing that the file is not revealed. I do not believe there is a middle way. I think we should wait for the inquiry to make its recommendations and perhaps we will find some solution. I do not see any solution in the amendments or suggestions before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question.

Amendment (Mr. Bell, Carleton) negatived: Yeas, 14; nays, 27.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Mr. Brewin: I have a further amendment, Mr. Chairman, but I call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

GOVERNORS GENERAL OF CANADA

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ANNUITY UPON RETIREMENT

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-265, to provide for the payment of a retiring annuity to the Governor General of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

HATE LITERATURE

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That this house do unite with the Senate in the appointment of a special joint committee to study and report upon amendments to the Criminal Code relating to the dissemination of varieties of "hate propaganda" in Canada as set out in Bill S-49, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code";

That 12 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by this house at a later date, be members of the said committee; and that standing order 67(1) be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have the power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That a message be sent to the Senate informing that house that the House of Commons do unite with the Senate for the above purposes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government house leader to withhold this motion for today.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it being six o'clock would the house leader indicate what the order of business will be for tomorrow and perhaps the balance of the week?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we propose continuing with the measure before the house this afternoon, namely item No. 83 on today's order paper. Then we will deal with items 100, 133, 126, 127, 120, 116, 130 and 119. There may be some necessity to vary the sequence of calling the items, but if there is I will be in touch with the house leaders of the other parties before that necessity arises.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that item No. 130 will probably be dealt with fairly rapidly, will the government house leader consider bringing it forward for consideration immediately after we finish with the immigration bill?

Mr. McIlraith: I will consider that suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I would not want to give a firm answer at the moment, but we are very anxious to get this item through as soon as possible. I believe there will be very little debate on it, and it will be brought forward as soon as possible.

It being fifteen minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 23, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF COSTS, AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that the house do go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:—

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the training of adults wishing to undertake occupational training; to authorize the entering into of contracts with provinces and employers to provide for the payment of the costs incurred in providing occupational training to those adults and to authorize the payment of charges for tuition or otherwise for the training of adults in occupational training courses not operated by a province or an employer; to authorize the payment of training allowances to certain adults undertaking occupational training; to authorize agreements with the provinces respecting research in respect of occupational training and the making of loans to provinces to assist in the purchase or construction of occupational training facilities; to authorize transitional agreements and arrangements with the provinces related to the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act; and to provide further for other related and incidental matters.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

STUDEBAKER CORPORATION—INDEBTEDNESS FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister now in a position to advise the house whether the former Studebaker Car Manufacturing Company of Canada has paid its indebtedness to the crown for customs duties, estimated to be $2.4 million?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the rule which has been followed by ministers of national revenue in the past is that in the House of Commons we do not comment on the tax affairs of individuals or corporations. However, I indicated to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that in the near future I would give an explanation of this particular comment which appeared in the Auditor General's report, and I intend to do that. It is not quite ready at the present time.

Mr. Hales: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the minister advise the house concerning the results of his departmental audit which I referred to him on November 3, November 8 and again on November 18, at which time he said he would report to the house concerning the investigation. When may the house expect this report?

Mr. Benson: Soon.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to the Studebaker company, and in view of the fact that the Auditor General has stated in his report that the company owes this money to the government, does the minister not think it would be fair for him to say whether they have or have not paid?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General did not mention the Studebaker corporation in his report.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister undertook to make an investigation through the Department of Justice as to whether the Studebaker company ought to pay on the Volkswagen cars which they brought in, is the minister going to report to the house whether the company is liable, how much it is liable for, and what steps he has taken to compel the company to pay? Surely the house is entitled to this information.

Mr. Benson: The normal procedure would be to make an assessment, if an assessment were warranted, against a taxpayer. The taxpayer, if he chose to do so, then could appeal the matter and it mould become public knowledge. Ordinary assessments made against taxpayers, however, are not indicated to the House of Commons.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Douglas: As a result of the investigation which the minister undertook to make is he now in a position to say whether Studebaker is liable for any amount of money by virtue of the Volkswagen cars which were brought into Canada under the auto agreement?

Mr. Benson: Not at this point.

Mr. Starr: I have a further supplementary question. In view of the report of the Auditor General that the company involved is one which ceased operation on March 17, 1966, could the minister tell me what other company ceased operation on March 17, 1966?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: Ask the Auditor General.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTESTS RESPECTING PROGRAM "TIREZ AU CLAIR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State of Canada.

Having listened to the last two broadcasts of "Tirez au Clair", it seems obvious to me that the producer has only one purpose: to make propaganda for socialism. Could the minister tell the house whether she intends to take appropriate action to subdue the socialist army which controls our national radio broadcasting system?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is definitely out of order in its present form.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): May I ask a supplementary question, in due form?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since the question is out of order, a supplementary question cannot be asked.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I frame the question in such a way as to make it acceptable?

Mr. Speaker: I shall be glad to recognize the hon. member in a few minutes.

[Mr. Benson.]

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is it his intention to accede to the request of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers for the immediate appointment of a board of arbitrators, as provided for in the Railway Operations Act and as urged in a recent telegram to the minister?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member has asked this question because it gives me an opportunity to correct an erroneous impression that seems to be in the minds of some people at least, as I gather from a news report that was brought to my attention just before the house convened.

There has been no refusal on the part of the Minister of Labour to set up any board of arbitration. What happened was that parliament directed that first there should be mediation. There were four groups of unions involved. One group withdrew from the mediation process after it had been in progress for several weeks. That is the group referred to in the wire mentioned by my hon. friend. The three other groups proceeded with the mediation. I would say that the bargaining committees for 75,000 of the 118,000 or 119,000 workers involved have accepted by overwhelming votes the settlements worked out under the guidance of the mediator. Representatives of one of the other union groups met with me earlier this week, and we had what I think was a useful discussion.

The fourth group, the C.B. of R.T., who withdrew from the mediation have requested arbitration, but until you know whether you are going to arbitrate for one group or more it is very difficult—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. minister. I appreciate that he is anxious to give to the hon. member all the information at his command, but the answer should perhaps be briefer. It appears to the Chair that such a statement should be made on motions rather than in answer to a question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

THE VATICAN—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether an appointment to the Vatican, having ambassadorial status or the equivalent, is imminent.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will realize that this question was answered by the Prime Minister a few weeks ago. There has been no change.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is Acting Prime Minister today.

My question refers to the statements made the day before yesterday by the Quebec premier when he expressed the wish that the committee instructed to consider reforms to our Canadian constitution be set up again.

Would the minister ask the federal officials who will study the constitutional reforms to expedite their work as much as possible, so that we may set up our own parliamentary committee to look into the constitution?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that this matter is constantly being looked into by the federal government and that there is no delay so far as we are concerned.

OIL

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of his statement yesterday regarding the possibility of increased oil exports to the United States, has the minister anything he can pass on to the house as to the immediate prospects of increased shipments of oil to that market?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker. I can only say that negotiations are proceeding with the United States on this subject.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY B.C. PREMIER RESPECTING FEDERAL AID TO HYDRO PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the honourable and most patient Minister of Finance based on a statement made by the premier of British Columbia in the British Columbia legislature on February 21, to the following effect:

> That the federal government is withholding no strings attached financial aid from hydro projects in British Columbia in an effort to obtain part ownership of British Columbia's water and power resources.

My question is whether in view of the constitutional implications involved, this statement is a correct reflection of federal government policy.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the young, amiable and handsome member who has just asked the question that the statement made by the premier of British Columbia is, so far as I know, without foundation. I would categorize it as both absurd and without foundation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MCKINNON INDUSTRIES—TAB PAYMENTS FOR WORKERS LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Monday and Tuesday of this week the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked a series of questions in connection with the lay-off of some 900-odd workers at McKinnon Industries Limited in St. Catharines. Among the questions asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam were whether the union concerned had been able to secure the names of those certified by the adjustment assistance board and whether the board would be arranging a meeting with the union.

The facts are that the union applied to the board some time ago for certification of certain workers laid off at McKinnon Industries.

Following an investigation the board found that there were a variety of reasons for the lay-offs, but that, in their opinion, out of the total of 900 or more who were laid off, some 395 jobs had been affected as a result of the operation of the automotive agreement.

On Monday of this week the union sent me a telegram, the one referred to in the questions by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, drawing attention to the fact that of the 900 or so workers who had been laid off, 255 male workers who had been certified by the adjustment assistance board had already returned to work. The union found this rather confusing.

As I stated in the house on Tuesday, I immediately informed the board of the contents of the telegram and I asked for a report. The board met on Tuesday of this week, and since that meeting, my information is that in determining the number of workers laid off in this dispute the board had named the 395 employees who had the most seniority at the time of what is sometimes called the "bumping process" which had been proceeded with in September of last year but which had not been completed. They have had to take another look at it. It seems that the bumping process has now been completed, and that a later date than September 9 should have been used.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a brief question and hope to get a brief answer. I want to ask the minister whether the union has been able to get the names of those certified because, as the minister will understand, it is not easy to deal with the situation unless they have the names.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer this question briefly. The trouble with my previous long statement was that it answered three or four questions. I will say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam that in order to ensure that the certifications will apply to workers, the secretary of the board has been asked to get in touch with the union representatives.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry. I wish to ask if he can tell us whether all the motor car companies in Canada are using the same formula in applying the auto pact.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure of the import of that question. I can say, however, that all the motor car manufacturers in Canada are subject to the same rules, regulations and order in council.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister is not sure, would he not agree that the auto pact should be referred to a standing committee of the house so we may be able to ascertain the true facts?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—USE OF ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that ships on the St. Lawrence cannot count on the services of Canadian icebreakers, does the minister intend to table in the house a copy of the instructions given to the icebreakers in operation on the St. Lawrence and does he propose to set up an inquiry on the role of the icebreakers and their efficiency in assisting ships on the St. Lawrence?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will give most careful consideration to the hon. gentleman's request.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED SURCHARGE ON CARGOES TO VANCOUVER FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he could report progress on the negotiations regarding the proposed surcharges on shipping into the port of Vancouver. The minister was good enough to say he would take the question as notice. Is he in a position today to give an answer to my inquiry?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The National Harbours Board and the department have been in direct communication with the trans-Pacific freight conference of Japan directly and through our embassy in Tokyo with respect to the announcement of the intended 15 per cent surcharges on freight rates to the port of Vancouver.

Their attention has been drawn to the marked improvement in operating conditions in that port, which are being restored to normal. The conference recognizes that conditions have considerably improved, and it is hoped that the threat of surcharges has been removed.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has answered, as I understand it, with regard to the proposed surcharge by the Japanese conference. I understand a similar surcharge has been proposed by the conference working out of San Francisco. Does the minister's reply extend also to that proposed increase?

Mr. Winters: That one is under protest, Mr. Speaker, and I express the hope the same answer will apply. I am not certain on that point as yet.

TRADE

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MEETING RESPECTING LATIN AMERICAN COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke about a meeting in April in Uruguay designed to set up a common market for 19 Latin American nations. The question was about Canada's participation. I understand that a tentative meeting is being called for next April by 20 American republics which are members of the Organization of American States. Among the subjects which may be discussed is a proposal that the still developing Latin American free trade association be converted into a Latin American common market as rapidly as possible. Canada is not a member of the Latin American free trade association, and is not involved in the April meeting.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF CANADIAN COMMITMENTS UNDER NATO AND NORAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker, if I could get his attention. Yesterday I framed a question in the rather confused style of the minister's answers, and I made a mistake. Today I want to put it in my own style. Is it the government's intention to reduce our commitments to NATO and NORAD and make the peace keeping activities under the United Nations the main effort of our armed forces?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Why not?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO POSSESSION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SET BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): My question is for the Secretary of State. I wonder if she would be kind enough to answer certain rumours that are going around by advising the house whether she has one of those infamous colour television sets, either in her office or her apartment?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Sure; I have one in my office, as any minister responsible for the C.B.C. has always had.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question on this subject was put on the order paper and answered.

WOMEN

PROPOSED B.C. LEGISLATION PERMITTING WORK IN MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for our Secretary of State for External Affairs which arises out of his having ratified last fall, on behalf of Canada, an I.L.O. convention having to do with the prohibition of women working in mines. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware that a bill which will allow women to work in mines has been introduced into the legislature of British Columbia. If so, can he tell us whether this proposed legislation in any way contravenes the international convention?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member asks a question which is clearly out of order. For one thing he is asking for an expression of opinion on a legal matter, and that cannot be done on orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE LEGISLATION TO PROTECT CANADIAN INVESTMENT ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. Is the government considering legislation to insure Canadian companies in developing countries against loss through nationalization, revolution or any other political development under their governments?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. There has been a suggestion that something might be done under the provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, but no new legislation is being contemplated.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

SUGGESTED RELEASE OF COMMISSION STAFF TO OVERCOME TRANSLATION BACKLOG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there is an estimated two million word backlog of English-French translation in government work, representing about six man years of labour, is the government giving any consideration to the early termination of the activities of the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, which compounds this problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked includes an inference, and cannot properly be asked at this time.

Mr. Crouse: I wish to rephrase my question to the Acting Prime Minister, and ask him whether he will give consideration to releasing the staff now engaged by the B and B commission in order to shorten the delay which presently exists in the translation of government documents, and speed up the process of government.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether orders have been transmitted for the return of the hon. member for Leeds from his world-wide trip.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): I know the hon. gentleman is envious both of the opportunity which has been given to the hon. member for Leeds and of the distinguished way in which he is carrying on his activities.

Mr. Winkler: I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister what is the fee for joining the J. R. Matheson appreciation organization.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PROCEDURE

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the leader of the house with reference to the special committee on the procedure of the House of Commons. The motion setting up this committee was passed on January 25. Can the hon. gentleman say when the personnel who are to serve on the committee will be named, and can he tell us what are the government's intentions for this committee during the remainder of this session?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): I hope the persons who are to serve on this committee will be designated today. As to the plans of the committee, I cannot very well speak on the committee's behalf.

PROPOSED IMPORTATION OF VESSEL FOR USE AS FLOATING HOTEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I believe my question should be directed to the Minister of National Revenue inasmuch as it relates to customs matters. Has any application been made to bring a ship called the Florida into Montreal harbour from its present berth at Tampa, Florida some time around March 1 to be used as a floating hotel for visitors to Expo? In view of the fact that the Florida is built of wood to the extent of some 25 per cent and is similar in construction to the Yarmouth Castle, which burned and caused the loss of so many lives, will the use of this vessel be permitted for the purpose intended?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Since I do not think there is any immediate urgency about this question I suggest it be placed on the order paper.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING BREATHALIZER TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I had wished to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In his absence his parliamentary secretary might take it as notice. Having in mind the recommendation of the committee on justice and legal affairs with regard to mandatory breathalizer tests for drinking drivers, is the minister considering such a provision?

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration—Mr. Marchand—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose yesterday clause 21 of the bill was under consideration. Clause 19, with an amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South, and clause 20 were allowed to stand.

On clause 21—Certificate of minister and Solicitor General.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I wonder whether the hon. member for Greenwood would permit me just a moment in which to raise a matter arising from the deliberations of the joint special committee on immigration sitting today in Montreal.

I am advised that this committee, in a resolution moved by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and passed unanimously, asked this house and the committee of the whole not to proceed further with the legislation now under consideration until the special committee has completed the hearing of the evidence in Montreal, much of which apparently relates to this particular bill. Could the leader of the house or the minister indicate the attitude of the government toward this unanimous request in a resolution moved by a junior minister, the hon. member for Parkdale? This is a request to which I am sure serious attention should be paid, particularly if, as indicated, evidence is being taken in relation to the bill before us.

Mr. Marchand: I heard about this resolution which was adopted in Montreal this morning. As to the suggested procedure itself, I am not very happy about it. A committee sitting outside Ottawa is asking the house to hold up an important piece of legislation. The committee knew this question has been under consideration since Monday, and if this matter was of such importance to the special committee members it would have been possible for them to have been here yesterday.

Nevertheless, though I do not agree with the procedure, I am ready to hold up clause 1 of the bill so the members of the committee may be given an opportunity to communicate their views to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Starr: But suppose it was the intention of the committee to propose amendments to certain clauses in this bill which have not yet been passed. If these clauses are carried there will be no opportunity for the hon. members concerned to give effect to their proposals.

Mr. Marchand: Most of the clauses have been adopted now. There are only a couple of clauses which remain to be passed, so I do not see the purpose of postponing altogether the discussion in committee.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, in moving today the amendment to which I referred yesterday I will not repeat what I said at that time. I have here copies of the amendment I propose to move, which proposes to delete the present clause.

The Chairman: Order. May I ask the hon. member for Greenwood whether he now is referring to clause 21?

Mr. Brewin: Yes, I am.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, the proposal in my amendment of which I gave notice yesterday is to delete present clause 21. As the committee will know, this clause in effect provides for the removal of security cases from the jurisdiction of the appeal board when the minister and the Solicitor General file a certificate asking that that be done. The amendment I propose simply provides that in fact there shall be an appeal in these cases as in other cases, but that the evidence and the sources of information in security cases should not be revealed. On the other hand, however, the appeal board may require that particulars as to the reasons for which the would be immigrant is being excluded be furnished by the department.

In any sort of proceeding it is an elementary and fundamental rule of justice that the case against a man should be set out with reasonable particularity so he shall have the opportunity to meet the case against him. I may say that as long ago as 1930 Chief Justice Duff of the Supreme Court of Canada said this rule was applicable to immigration proceedings. The Canadian Bill of Rights passed by this parliament speaks of a right to a fair hearing. It has been made perfectly clear that a fair hearing involves some degree of knowledge of the case which is made against the person concerned.

In his remarks yesterday dealing with what I have said about this, the minister spoke of the fact that I referred to immigrant applicants who came from behind the iron curtain. This is perfectly true; I did refer to them. I sought to point out the very great loss to Canada which could result from the application of security requirements which in my view are outdated, and which have brought about the exclusion of many persons from countries such as Poland and Yugoslavia.

I pointed out that this situation does not prevail in other western democratic countries such as France and Germany, which have imported labour in substantial numbers from behind the iron curtain who have made a very large economic contribution to the prosperity of those countries. I referred to this merely as an indication of my view that security precautions, even though they may be necessary in some cases, sometimes are given an importance far beyond what they deserve or beyond what is required.

The cases I have in mind in respect of this amendment are not primarily the cases of people who come from behind the iron curtain. I am thinking of people from all over the world, particularly from countries like Italy and Greece whose names presumably appear on the political lists in the countries from which they come. Personally I know that in many of these cases the information when investigated, turns out to be flimsy and inadequate. Unless these people have the right of appeal and have the right to know the substance of the case made against them, then the people who are most deserving of consideration by this house in dealing with the matter of immigration appeals will be excluded from the application of the legislation.

The minister spoke of the immigrant or the sponsor having no rights. I am sorry the minister is engaged at the moment; perhaps he will have an opportunity to look at my remarks later. I should like to say to him that this statement that they have no rights is a misconception; it is not a sound statement. In the past we have conferred and no doubt in future we in this parliament will confer statutory rights on people who wish to come to Canada. We confer those rights largely for our own benefit; we wish them to have a fair hearing.

Again, if the minister were to doubt my statement on this matter I would refer him to the Supreme Court of Canada case of Leon Ba Chai in respect of which Chief Justice Taschereau, speaking of the Supreme Court of Canada, clearly stated that the father of a would be immigrant who sought to bring his child to Canada had a clear right to a fair hearing in accordance with the law.

We are now trying to expand this right by giving a right of appeal. We should give that right full scope by making sure the right of appeal is available to those who need it most; that is, the cases involving so-called security reasons. I notice the minister is disengaged now, and perhaps the house will forgive me if I repeat what I said a moment ago. If the minister will look at the Leon Ba Chai case he will find that no less a person than Chief Justice Taschereau clearly stated there is a statutory right for a sponsor to have a fair hearing concerning the right of the person to be in this country.

So it is not correct, as the minister has repeatedly said, to say that no such right exists. No doubt other ministers have said this, and I do not blame the minister for saying it. These are rights which do not exist unless we as members of parliament have in fact conferred these rights on such people.

In dealing with this problem the minister says there is no half way house. He says you either must have a full hearing in which all evidence and all sources of material are disclosed in these security cases, or no appeal at all. I should like to say to the minister with all respect that someone has given him some very bad advice. So far as I am concerned I am prepared to say that no one with any practical experience in these matters could possibly say it is not of great value to have what he considers to be a half way house, if you cannot have the full particulars made available, so as to enable the person involved to present his case in the way he could not otherwise present it.

As the Minister of Transport is aware, I was involved in these matters long before I became a member of this house. I can say without the slightest shadow of a doubt that the provision of particulars is a valuable right and one which enables an applicant to know the sort of case he must meet. Justice perhaps cannot be done perfectly in that way, but some degree of justice can be done. I should like to say to the minister—I am afraid this is repetition, but it does not seem to have sunk in too well—that this very right was provided during the war under the defence of Canada regulations in internment cases.

I was involved in a good many internment cases where the appeal board gave particulars to counsel for the parties, which enabled them to present their cases and on many occasions gain their clients' liberty. The minister says no lawyer would be satisfied to have what he calls this half remedy that I have suggested. I say to him this is really not so. Of course the lawyer would prefer to have the whole of the evidence, but it just is not the fact that if he cannot get the whole of the evidence he would not desire, in order to be able to protect his client, to have these particulars placed before him. The question is, can this be done without endangering the security of the state? It is necessary for a fair hearing of the appeal, and I suggest it can very well be done, as was done in my experience of internment cases.

During the course of his remarks the minister said he thought I was exaggerating when I suggested that half the value of this excellent bill—and I say it is excellent in its general purport—conferring these rights of appeal was taken away when the benefits of the legislation were denied in security cases. From my experience in this field, and it is very, very considerable, nearly half the cases involved are security cases or at least are assumed to be security cases, because no reasons whatsoever are given for the refusal to admit. I see the minister shaking his head. I can assure him without the slightest doubt if I can assure him of anything at all, that the right proposed in the amendment which I now put before the committee is one that would be valuable and helpful to those concerned, and could be granted without endangering in any way the security sources from which some of this information comes.

If the minister does not choose to accept this amendment now I can assure him that he will continue to be plagued until this matter is cleared up and this right is made available to those people who are very often victimized because of mistaken identity, some error in their youth or some misconceived political views of some police authorities who are often not too well qualified to hold such views. Again I plead with the minister to give serious consideration to this amendment.

I now move the amendment, Mr. Chairman. I do not think I need repeat the wording.

Mr. Marchand: I think the hon. member moved it last night.

Mr. Brewin: No, I did not move it last night. I will read the amendment. I move:

That Bill C-220 be amended by striking out section 21 thereof and substituting the following:

21. If a certificate is signed by the minister that in his opinion the basis for the order of deportation or the refusal of admission in appeal before the board is a matter which affects the security of Canada and that it would be contrary to the interest of Canada to disclose the sources of information justifying such order or refusal, then the board may conduct the hearing of the appeal in camera and, in respect to such evidence, in the absence of the accused or his counsel, but the board may direct that the minister shall furnish to the board and the appellant particulars of the allegations without disclosing the source thereof.

The Chairman: Order. May I say at the outset that I am going to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood. Perhaps today I should make further reference to the rules and practice in committee respecting the deletion of a whole clause and substituting another therefor. May I read from May's seventeenth edition, page 550:

An amendment to leave out a clause is not in order, as the proper course is to vote against the clause standing part of the bill. Consequently it is out of order to propose to leave out the only effective words of a clause, or the words upon which the rest of the clause is dependent, or to offer any other amendment which is equivalent to a direct negative of the clause.

This principle has also been applied in the case of a clause substituting a new section for a section in an existing act of parliament when an amendment is offered to leave out all the words of the new section and insert another new section instead thereof . . .

Furthermore, an amendment may not be moved to insert words at the beginning of a clause with a view to bringing forward an alternative scheme to that contained in the clause, or to leave out the whole substance of a clause in order to insert different provisions, or to substitute in effect a new draft for an existing clause.

I might say to the hon. member for Greenwood that my consideration of this particular point in our procedures has not gone far enough for me to be able to say that this ruling should be rigidly applied, but I point out to hon. members of the committee the procedure which is being gradually adopted. However, in this case I am going to accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I do not have much to add to what I have already said on this clause. I just want to refer to a few examples given by the hon. member for Greenwood. The hon. member spoke of what is happening in France and Germany concerning the emigration of people coming from behind the iron curtain. I think he is right. But I do not believe that either in Germany or France immigrants have 10 per cent of the rights given to immigrants to Canada. Also, they are on the continent, and it is very easy to send them back home. Here in Canada it is another matter. So if the hon. member wants to have the type of legislation that France and Germany have in respect of immigrants, I do not think we will gain anything. Therefore I do not believe the comparison is just. If in France they believe a man is a danger to the security of the state he is just not allowed to enter that country, or he is deported right away without any appeal or any right. This is the situation, and I do not think we can compare it with the situation in Canada.

The hon. member mentioned that 50 per cent of the cases in which he was involved were security cases. I think he included in this figure prospective immigrants from behind the iron curtain who are not allowed into Canada. I am not speaking of sponsored immigrants but non-sponsored immigrants. The hon. member qualified those cases as security cases. Of course they are refused in accordance with our general security policy, but they are not refused on security grounds, formally speaking. Therefore if the hon. member includes these people in his figure I understand his argument; but I do not think they are security cases in the sense of "security" as it applies in this provision.

Let us forget about communists and speak of extreme right wing elements coming here from France; persons involved in violence in Algeria, for example. Of course we receive reports on such people, and we are in no position to give out this information; otherwise the system would be useless. So all we can say to this man is that his application is rejected in accordance with such and such section of the Immigration Act. We cannot go further than that; otherwise I think he would be deprived of the information on which the case was judged. Therefore in the present state of affairs I think it would be best to adopt the clause as it now stands in the bill and after we have received the report of the royal commission on security we will be better able to find new procedures to deal with those cases. However, in the meantime it would surely not be wise to accept the proposed amendment.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, it has become quite clear that the minister's mind is closed on this subject. In fact I may say, with all due respect to the minister, that he has not even bothered to read the amendment which was put before him.

Mr. Marchand: Yes, I did.

Mr. Lewis: If he had read it he would not have made the remarks he did. The problem on this issue, ever since second reading of the bill a couple of days ago, is that the minister and his advisers have closed their minds completely and if any suggestion is made to them, no matter how reasonable or practicable, they will not look at it. If he is in that mood, then nothing anyone can say will change his mind.

This is not a matter of the number of people affected even though my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood, mentioned the figure of 50 per cent. I do not personally care whether one or 1,000 persons are affected. The point is that a basic principle is involved, one with which I am sure the minister and the Solicitor General agree. I do not understand the minister's logic when he says over and over again that it is right, proper and not frustrating to give the appellant no information at all but there is something vicious about giving him part of the information. I invite the minister to look at this amendment carefully. What the amendment proposes is that in a security case—and according to the amendment the minister will determine what is a security case—(a) the board will conduct the hearing in camera; (b) the board will hear the evidence against the accused in the presence of the accused and his counsel and, (c) nevertheless the board may direct that the minister shall furnish to the board and the appellant the particulars of the allegations without disclosing the sources thereof.

What would be the effect in practice of this suggested procedure? The effect would be that the minister would provide a certificate saying that the case in question was a security matter and that a disclosure of the sources of information would be against the national interest. At that point the minister would provide the board and the appellant with a general statement as to the grounds on which the deportation order or the refusal of the application for admission was based. The statement may say: You were in Algeria between such and such years and you were guilty of acts of violence, or it may say, you were engaged in acts of robbery or other such acts in such and such a country during those years, and no more than that. The statement may say: You were a member of the Communist party in country A between such and such years. I say to the minister that while this information may not be adequate in an ordinary court hearing it would at least enable the person concerned to produce evidence to meet that allegation, if he can.

The amendment says that if the board so determines it can hold a hearing in camera and it can hear the officer of the department or the officer of the R.C.M.P. in the absence of the accused. It seems to me, after having read Hansard, that perhaps the minister did not understand the reference which I made in an earlier speech. I would therefore like to draw to his attention again my own personal experience, because this is the way in which we learn about these things. As I previously informed the house, about a year ago a client of mine, a certain employee of a government corporation, was refused certain rights in an alleged security matter. A royal commission of inquiry was appointed consisting of one person and certain information was provided to him similar to the particulars suggested in this amendment. Neither the person concerned nor I as his counsel were present when the commissioner heard the evidence against my client. The commissioner then asked him questions which were obviously based on the information he had received. My client was able to give answers and to persuade the commissioner that the allegation that he was a security risk was incorrect, and the commissioner so informed the Minister of Justice. Thereafter the man regained the rights which he had lost.

I say to the minister that on the basis of that experience, the experience of my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood, during the war before the internee appeal tribunals, and on the basis of experiences that I could cite to him for the next several hours, this kind of procedure is of value. It does not give the appellant the normal rights of a hearing, but we agree with the minister that these are abnormal circumstances and that normal rights cannot apply. We merely plead with the minister to apply that abnormal right which, however, would adequately protect the security of Canada and would give the person concerned a chance to be heard and to make his case. This is what this amendment is about.

When the minister says to me, as he did the other day, that he knows I would not be satisfied with this information, I say to him that at least I would know the limits of the information I can receive, if this amendment is adopted, and whether I like it or not would make no more difference than under the minister's proposal which would provide me with no information at all. However, I hope to be a member of parliament for a good many years and therefore I will not be acting in these cases, but if I did I would know what the law says.

What is the virtue of denying me all information and making me incapable of doing anything at all as against giving me some information on which I may be able to do something? I cannot follow the minister's logic. My hon. friend suggests that perhaps there is none. However, I do not follow the logic that it is better to give no information than some information. As far as this amendment is concerned, I suppose that if the minister gave a certain amount of information he could still argue that in the circumstances of the case this was all he could give.

Let me point out to him again, because I am certain he has not read the amendment carefully, that what this amendment says is not that he must give information to the appellant in every case but that the board may direct that the minister shall furnish particulars to the board and the appellant. Therefore he can argue with the board as to precisely what particulars should be given. Under this amendment he will have a great deal of leeway to control the situation with respect to the extent of information which it is safe to put before the appellant. Of course the board must be trusted with protecting national security as carefully as would the minister or any other member of this house.

As I said, I rose to my feet this time with much greater frustration than the minister would have felt if he had agreed to provide part of the information, because quite a few speeches have been made on this subject. I believe the hon. member for Carleton made two or three speeches, the hon. member for Peace River has spoken, I have spoken for the fourth time on this subject, and my colleagues have also done so on two or three occasions. If we cannot persuade the minister, then I guess we cannot persuade him. If a majority of the committee is of the same opinion, then the will of the minister will prevail. However, I say to him that the really desirable purposes of this bill are somewhat tarnished. I am not going to say that they are half spoiled or anything like that because he would be right in accusing me of exaggeration. However, the purposes are tarnished by leaving in the bill a totally undemocratic and indefensible position. When a practical suggestion is made to him that defends Canada's security and at the same time makes some step toward justice in these security cases, it seems to me he ought not to have his mind as closed as it appears to be.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Before a vote is taken on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood, perhaps I should make my views clear. With the general objectives that the hon. gentleman seeks to achieve I have not the slightest quarrel. Indeed, I uphold them enthusiastically. However, in so far as the procedures and techniques which this amendment would import are concerned, I have the gravest reservations. This field, as I have indicated earlier, is one over which I have agonized on many occasions. The view we take was clearly set forth in the amendment which we moved yesterday and which was voted down at six o'clock last night.

In our view these security and criminal intellegence reports should be laid before the board. The validity of them should be tested by the board. These reports must be kept secret, though the existence of such reports should be made known to the appellant. The views which we expressed at that time did not meet with the approval of the committee, so we are confronted with this amendment which has a number of weaknesses in its techniques and procedures.

[Mr. Lewis.]

I point out that, in the first instance, Mr. Chairman, it deals not at all with criminal intelligence. It sets aside completely clause 21 which deals with both security and criminal intelligence and substitutes nothing whatever for the procedures to be adopted with relation to criminal intelligence reports. I believe that in this day at least this may be equally as important as the reports with relation to security. As the minister pointed out yesterday, this may be dangerous for the individuals involved. If the committee adopted this amendment we would have to go further and make some provision for reports on criminal intelligence.

There is another objection to the draftsmanship of this amendment and that is the use of the word "particulars". In my view, sir, that is a term of art well understood by members of the bar and by solicitors. A demand for particulars is provided for under the Judicature Act, and under the rules of practice must be responded to with genuine particulars. There is a wide field of jurisprudence in that regard which the Supreme Court of Canada undoubtedly would import in any interpretation of this clause.

There will always be a barrister sitting as a member of the board, so I venture to suggest the board would import into the interpretation of this amendment all the law relating to a reply to a demand for particulars. I doubt that particulars, in the form given in civil cases in the law courts of this country, could conceivably be given to an appellant without disclosing the sources. If this is done I think you would dry up all possible sources.

I reiterate that with the general objective of the democratization of the procedure for dealing with security cases we on this side are in full accord. However, the particular manner in which this objective is sought to be achieved is one which does not commend itself to us. We believe it to be deficient as compared with the proposal we made yesterday.

Mr. Marchand: I do not want to be repetitious, although I know that is inevitable at this stage, but I believe the hon. member for York South stated that we are denying the right of appeal under clause 21 to certain categories of immigrants or sponsored immigrants. This is not true. They still have the right of appeal to the board on legal grounds. In this case the board will not be in a position to exercise the discretion given to it under clause 15. However, the legality of the order may be contested and there may be a hearing.

If the hon. member for York South reads the clause carefully, I think he will find that board is restricted but the right of appeal still exists.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister what the legal grounds might be with which the board could deal in these cases?

Mr. Marchand: I have no example to give, but perhaps the order for deportation may be against the law; it may not be well founded and it could be contested before the board.

Mr. Lewis: I suppose the minister is referring to details such as the wrong person signing the order or no inquiry having been held. This really would not get us very far.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I have read the amendment moved by the New Democratic Party. It suggests that in certain cases which, under the bill, would be simply settled by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Justice and Attorney General (Mr. Cardin), it will be possible just the same to hold a confidential investigation in camera, and it will not be required to make public all the particulars on which either minister based his decision.

I listened closely as always to the statements of our friends of the New Democratic Party. I must say that, on several occasions, I had to change my mind after hearing certain interventions of our N.D.P. friends, who usually take the trouble to provide the house with a great deal of information.

A while ago, I was listening to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) say that a basic principle was involved and that he could not believe that the minister was logical. This is rather strange, but it proves that truth is not transcendent, that it is not the same for all, for I too, believe there is a basic principle involved. But it does not seem to be the same that is proclaimed by the hon. member for York South.

Nor can I believe that the attitude of our friends of the New Democratic Party is logical. I understand that some of them have had unfortunate experiences during the last war. It will be recalled that censurable and, from many points of view, unfortunate things have been done.

However, it must be admitted that, in the history of a country such as ours, crises occur and such things do happen. But the basic principle here, as I see it, is to determine how best we can protect the common good. And, in order to protect the common good—I am taking an extreme case here, because I do not think it can ever occur—suppose some injustice had to be committed—as I said before, I am carrying matters to extremes—such as, for instance, handing down a decision having an adverse effect upon the personal lives of 150 immigrants per year, because they are considered as risks. The government would still be justified in taking such action, because I feel that any Canadian government, of whatever political colour, must make such decisions, after the necessary investigations, in order to preserve the common good.

I must admit that I am concerned by the position taken by our friends of the New Democratic Party. I understand that it stems from their basic philosophy, namely the protection of the individuals, of human person. This helps us to understand their attitude, to a certain extent.

But I wonder whether they do not carry this concern, this solicitude for the human person too far, and even to the detriment of the commonweal, when, one after the other, they take in the house, the defence of certain habitual criminals, certain individuals who are obvious risks from the viewpoint of security. In certain cases, they even put pressure on these people who seemed satisfied with the situation imposed on them by the government, but who, under the pressure exerted by our friends of the New Democratic Party, make appeals which are rather unexplainable.

I wonder whether that justifies them in discrediting by certain statements and certain actions, the important role of our police force, and sometimes the role of the judicature—I am thinking about the judges appointed to royal commissions for instance.

I submit that the majority of Canadians want the government to have enough leeway to discharge its responsibilities, that is to protect the common good and to prohibit under this legislation, entry into our country, or to prevent someone from staying here any longer because that person, even if not guilty of treason or any violation of the security of the state, is suspected of such activity. On the other hand, I think that the Canadian people should get the benefit of the doubt, but not those exceptional cases.

If that amendment were accepted, we would achieve the opposite purpose. That would bog down the appeal board, because we know that most of those individuals, who are a security risk, usually have the means to retain the services of learned lawyers, counsel and financiers in order to prosecute their claims to a final conclusion. The board, therefore, will be hampered and will have to investigate such cases most of the time, while deserving cases will have to wait months and months before they can come up for consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the minister should stand firm on this point. The solicitor general and he should rely on the advice of the R.C.M.P. and all the other bodies which investigate such cases. In my opinion, they should take a strong and energetic position, thus meeting the wishes of most Canadians who are concerned about those serious cases.

There are several of them but I will give as an example that of some trouble-makers who were the instigators of some separatist movements in the province of Quebec and who are in jail right now, at least some of them. It was discovered that those people had immigrated to Canada under an Immigration Act which was too generous. If some teeth had been left in, it might have been possible to prevent those trouble-makers from coming here. I am thinking of one case which my hon. friends will recall. It deals with a man called Ramsay who, at about this time last year, entered Canada and confessed over the public radio network that he had been responsible for the racial troubles in Los Angeles, that he had been one of the agents in at least half a dozen revolutions in half a dozen countries. He also admitted that he was a trouble-maker and that, upon his arrival here, he had contacted the leaders of the most anarchic separatist movements in the province of Quebec. He was here and he could be heard over the public radio network Mr. Chairman.

However, I think the minister of immigration and the Solicitor General must have sufficient authority, without having to waste the time of their officials or their own time dealing with considerations or concerns related to the common good of the majority of Canadians. The minister should have enough authority to be able to say: No, that person shall not enter. Anyway, that should only be the exception, since there are a great number of desirable people in every country of the world who would like to enter Canada. Their applications should keep all immigration services busy. In my opinion, these services should be granted all the time they need, enabling as many as possible to enter. I am not particularly concerned with immigrants from behind the iron curtain, but I nevertheless feel that the responsible minister should be able to exercise discretionary powers without having to waste their time with a lot of legal red tape, and God knows how much smart lawyers can think up.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the minister to take a firm stand and I repeat that, in so doing, he will be living up to the expectations of most Canadians, who are worried by the ease with which certain considerations can cause dissension in our midst.

[English]

Amendment (Mr. Brewin) negatived: Yeas, 7; nays, 24.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 21 carry?

Mr. Marchand: I should like to propose an amendment to this clause consequential upon that which was made to clause 15. In clause 15 we gave the board authority not only to stay an order of deportation, or an order refusing admission, but to quash such orders. I think we should make the same amendment to clause 21. I will therefore ask one of my colleagues to move:

That clause 21 of Bill C-220 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 42 to 44 on page 7 and substituting therefor the following: "15, stay the execution of a deportation order or thereafter continue or renew the stay, quash a deportation order, or direct the grant of entry or landing to any person, or"

(b) by striking out lines 9 and 10 on page 8 and substituting therefor the following: "interest for the Board to take such action."

Mr. Pickersgill: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Marchand: With the permission of the committee I should like to revert to clause 19 which was allowed to stand yesterday. The hon. member for York South moved an amendment. As I stated at the time, I am in perfect agreement with the principle involved. I mentioned that I wished to instruct the officers who would have to follow this procedure, but he prefers to have an amendment to include this in the law. What I had in mind probably would have gone further. If the hon. member for York South is prepared to modify his amendment I am ready to support it. I should like to read what I wish to propose:

That clause 19 of Bill C-220 be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:

Grounds of order or refusal

(2) Every appellant under section 11 or 17 shall be advised by the minister of the grounds on which the deportation order was made or the refusal to approve the application for admission into Canada was based.

If the hon. member does not agree to the modification then I will not move this as an amendment.

Mr. Lewis: It seems to me that this serves the purpose I had in mind. Since the minister and his advisers have changed the wording, I am sure there is good reason for this. I am quite happy with the amendment the minister has proposed. The only matter of substance which has been left out is the suggestion that the board would prescribe the manner of giving this information. I do not think that is necessary. I am quite prepared to accept the proposal the minister has made. I do not care who moves the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member be allowed to withdraw his amendment and then move this one.

Mr. Lewis: I am not sure whether I formally moved my amendment.

The Chairman: As found on page 13363 of Hansard the hon. member for York South said:

I have copies of a proposed amendment, Mr. Chairman. I move:—

If it is the wish of the hon. member for York South to withdraw his amendment, this can be done with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. Lewis: It will facilitate matters if I withdraw it. I therefore withdraw the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Lewis) withdrawn.

Mr. Lewis: At this time I should like to move the amendment which has been proposed by the minister.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it would be possible to revert to clauses 3 and 6. I have amendments I should like to propose to these clauses.

The Chairman: Clauses 3 and 6 have been disposed of by the committee. It would be possible, with the unanimous consent of the committee, for the minister to revert to these clauses.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps the minister would tell us what he wishes to propose.

Mr. Marchand: We have taken from the members of the board the power to sit alone in order to decide cases. We are afraid that too many cases will have to be decided by the board itself and therefore possibly it would be wise to foresee in this legislation the need to increase the number of members from seven to nine in order to have three panels. This is the purpose of the two amendments I wish to present.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think there would be unanimous consent to revert to clauses 3 and 6.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 3—Board established.

Mr. Marchand: There is one other point I should mention, the addition of a vice-chairman. If there are to be three panels I think we must have a chairman and two vice-chairmen. The amendment to clause 3 reads as follows.

(a) by striking out line 2 on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

"Immigration Appeal Board consisting of not less than seven nor more than nine members to"

(b) by striking out lines 12 and 13 on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

"One of the members to be chairman of the board and two of the members to be vice-chairmen of the board."

(c) by striking out line 15 on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

"of the chairman, a vice-chairman or any other member or"

(d) by striking out lines 21 and 22 on page 2 and substituting therefor the following:

Mr. Marchand: The amendment to clause 6 reads as follows:

That subclause 3 of clause 6 of Bill C-220 as added by amendment to clause 6, be amended by striking out the words "or the vice-chairman", and substituting therefor the following: "or one of the vice-chairmen"

On clause 20—Hearing of appeal.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I indicated that when clause 20 was called I would be moving an amendment. That amendment, however, was consequent upon the amendment I moved to clause 21. The amendment to clause 21 having been rejected by the committee, there is no point in proceeding with the amendment to clause 20.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 22—Jurisdiction of board.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In respect of this clause, would the minister indicate what the provisions are which are covered in lines 19 and 20 by the words "except as provided in the Immigration Act". To what does that refer?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I would have to inquire into this.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the minister would make the explanation on clause 1 that would be agreeable to me.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on a question which is related in principle to this clause as it deals with the exclusive jurisdiction of the board and appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada. My question of principle is related to members of this house of the legal profession who deal repeatedly with these problems for their constituents. My attention was first drawn to this situation by being informed that a former Conservative member of the house charged constituents for representations he made on their behalf to the minister, the board or the officials of the department. I was later informed by a couple of my Liberal friends that possibly one or two members on the government side of the house had indulged in this practice.

I remember the hon. member for Danforth, a man of the highest integrity who unfortunately is ill at this time, telling me this story. One of his constituents telephoned him to ask him to make representations to the appropriate authorities in connection with the entry into Canada of a sponsored immigrant. He took the matter up immediately by telephone. The department telephoned him later and said they had looked into the matter and this person was eligible to enter Canada. The hon. member for Danforth informed his constituent of this. His constituent said, "Sir, I am quite willing to pay the usual fee." Which I understand can be up to $500 for this service. Of course the hon. member advised him at once that he would not accept any fee at all.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He mentioned two parties. I was wondering whether he knew of any lawyers in any other party who had performed similar acts?

Mr. Herridge: I will come to that later in my remarks, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member can use his imagination. I have discussed this matter with members of all parties. I shall always give great credit to the Leader of the official Opposition for his stand on this question. He informed me that when he was elected to this house he advised all his legal partners that they were on no account to bring any matter to the attention of the federal government or any of its agencies because he had been elected for that purpose and would not charge a cent. While I differ sharply with the hon. gentleman on some questions, I give him great credit for this stand.

As a result of this information and other inquiries I made I introduced a private bill which is now on the order paper, an act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act in order to prevent this abuse occurring in the future. Mr. Maurice Western commented on my bill in the following manner:

> To impose on members of the Canadian parliament a restraint accepted 300 years ago by the British parliament seems neither radical, nor revolutionary, nor avant-garde.

I do not have the opportunity to discuss that bill now but I shall do so at a later date. I have been concerned about this problem and have engaged in a great deal of correspondence on the matter. Before my bill was drafted I consulted two retired judges of the Supreme Court and got in touch with people in Great Britain and the United States. The bill was actually drafted by persons who are very concerned about this problem. However, Mr. Chairman, I shall have to deal with my bill when it comes before the house.

I want to ask the minister two questions at this point, because it is a matter of importance and principle. Does the minister consider that it is proper for members of parliament who are also members of the legal profession to make representations to him, to the board or to the officials of his department and charge their constituents for this service? My second question is: Would the minister inform the committee whether the lay members of the house are just as effective in making representations to him and will be as effective in making representations to the board we are proposing, or to the officials of the department, as the members of the legal profession in this house? Those are the questions I should like answered.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I think that if a member of the legal profession makes representations in this house he acts as a member of parliament and should not charge anything for the representations he makes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marchand: I say that because he is just fulfilling his duty as the representative of his riding.

Mr. Lewis: Or anyone else.

Mr. Marchand: Yes, or anyone else.

Mr. Lewis: Even those outside a member's riding.

Mr. Marchand: Yes. If a member of the legal profession has to do more than that professionally I presume he is entitled to remuneration for it. I think it is normal for a member of parliament to make representations to the department and if somebody charges for so doing I think it is morally wrong.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has asked me whether non-lawyers are as efficient as lawyers. As far as I am concerned I make no difference between the two, and I know non-lawyers who are much more efficient than lawyers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I listened very intently to what has been said and to the question put to the minister. I think it is most unfair that the record should be left with the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West specifically referring to members of two parties without mentioning anyone else in the house. I think he scrupulously avoided mentioning anyone else, knowing very well that there are others to whom this applies. I also think it reflects upon those who are members of the legal profession if the hon. member does not specifically name these people. If they are not named, a cloud will hang over the heads of all those who are members of parliament and also members of the legal profession. I believe the hon. member should have gone further than he did. Whether or not he did so purposely, what he said will give the public the impression that those engaged in this type of practice exist only in the Liberal and Conservative parties. I do not believe that is right, and it is not true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Chairman, that is the very reason I asked the question I did, to which the hon. member for Kootenay West did not reply although he said he would. I am sure everybody in the house agrees with what the hon. member and the minister said. I certainly do. We are all for it. But as the hon. member for Ontario has just said, it is most unfair and is just not right to leave this matter in the air. The hon. member for Kootenay West should name the men he has in mind. If he would like the names of members of other parties, perhaps that information can be supplied to him.

Mr. Starr: Supply it. Let us get the record straight.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I think the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Ontario is well founded. But if I heard the hon. member for Kootenay West aright, he was speaking of members of past parliaments and was not making reference to present members.

Mr. Ricard: Let him give the information.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member for Kootenay West can speak for himself, of course. I presume that the remarks made by the hon. member for Ontario and the hon. member for Norfolk were intended to indicate that the hon. member for Kootenay West had referred to members of certain other parties and had not referred to members of this party. I understood that the hon. member for Kootenay West was referring to members of past parliaments. It is a simple fact, which can be readily verified, that only very recently have there been members of the legal profession in the party to which I belong. I refer, of course, to members of my party who have become members of parliament. As far as I am concerned I am not claiming any particular virtues in regard to moral behaviour for the party to which I belong. If the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West are considered in that context, which is what I understood—

An hon. Member: Let him speak for himself.

Mr. Barnett: —I think it will be realized that he was merely making a statement in accordance with what I consider to be the unfortunate circumstance that in previous years this party has not been fortunate enough to have elected to the House of Commons people who belong to the legal profession. Those of us who do not belong to that profession are occasionally inclined to make references that its members may not like. Nevertheless most of us recognize that it has in its ranks some of the finest citizens of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the questions that were raised by the hon. member for Norfolk and the hon. member for Ontario with regard to members of our party who are members of the legal profession I would say that I do not have any direct evidence at the present time. I forgot to mention that when I was discussing this question two or three years ago I also discussed it with the Minister of Public Works who assured me that his practice was identical with that followed by the Leader of the official Opposition. I am mentioning this now because I overlooked it in speaking previously. I am raising this matter because I think it is one of serious concern. It does concern many Canadians and I have had much correspondence on it. I trust that even this limited debate will prevent any member of the house who is a member of the legal profession charging anyone for representation in the future.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. A moment ago he mentioned that the Leader of the official Opposition had made a rule in this respect and that the same rule had been made by a minister on the government side. Can he say whether the same rule was made by the leader of his party?

Mr. Herridge: I have no knowledge of that, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member for Ontario is enjoying himself at the present time.

Mr. Starr: Answer the question.

Mr. Herridge: We have not had any formal caucus ruling on this point. However, the hon. member for Ontario misunderstood me. The Leader of the official Opposition told me that he informed all his law partners at the time he was elected that they were not to deal with any matter within the jurisdiction of the federal government or any agency thereof because he was elected for that purpose and it was his duty to do it without fee. I raised this matter because I hoped it would cause hon. members on all sides of the house to consider it and to make certain that we all comply with what has become a tradition in the mother of parliaments.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, may I now answer the hon. member for Carleton? According to the information I have the reference to the Immigration Act in clause 22 is necessary in order to ensure that the functions of the special inquiry officer under the act are not affected.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 23 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 28.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, there is a new clause which I should like to introduce at this stage. It is numbered clause 28. The reason for introducing this clause is that in clause 30 we have established that an inquiry officer can reopen an inquiry and modify his first judgment. A consequential amendment was therefore necessary. It reads as follows:

That Bill C-220 be amended by renumbering clauses 28 to 33 as clauses 29 to 34, respectively and by adding the following clause immediately after clause 27:

"28. Section 29 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

29. An inquiry may be reopened by a Special Inquiry Officer for the hearing and receiving of any additional evidence or testimony and a Special Inquiry Officer has authority, after hearing such additional evidence or testimony, to confirm, amend or reverse the decision previously rendered."

Mr. Pickersgill: I so move.

Mr. Marchand: If the board has the authority to order this inquiry, then of course the special inquiry officer should have the authority to carry on the inquiry under the conditions which are set down.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As I understand it, all the amendment does is to strike out the words in the existing section 29: "or by order of the minister or by majority decision of an immigration appeal board". The minister nods his head so I believe the answer is yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: This concerns another clause, Mr. Chairman.

Clauses 29 and 30 agreed to.

On clause 31—Regulations respecting procedure, duties, etc.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, what is the change here?

Mr. Lewis: To take out the words "and appeals".

Mr. Marchand: The purpose of the clause is to extend the provision of the Immigration Act respecting proof of documents arising out of proceedings under the immigration appeal board.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think the minister is on the wrong clause. I believe the hon. member for York South was correct that all this new clause does is to strike out the words "and appeals".

Mr. Lewis: There is a special appeal tribunal which will make the rules and therefore the board no longer keeps the authority to make rules with regard to appeals. I believe that is all the section does.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 32 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I understand the minister intends to stand this clause. If so, I hope he will not inhibit any of his colleagues, in particular the hon. member for Parkdale who is one of his distinguished supporters, who holds the office of parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and who has taken the lead in Montreal today in an attack on this legislation. I hope the minister will feel that the hon. member for Parkdale should have complete freedom of action to open up any of the clauses of the bill in order to try to improve the legislation. It is clear that a considerable number of members on the opposite side are totally dissatisfied with the legislation as it is. I am sure the minister with the flexibility he has shown, will give them ample opportunity to deal with the matter.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Marchand: We will have to wait to hear what the hon. member for Parkdale has to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the senior minister in the house at the present time, notwithstanding the entirely commendable effort of the hon. member for Carleton to suggest there is something appropriate about the procedure we have agreed to adopt and with which I reluctantly agreed, I must say I hope this will never be cited as a precedent. I do not see how our parliamentary system is going to work at all if committees of the house are going to tell the house, or even the committee of the whole, how it should carry on its procedures. Without reflecting in any way upon the committee, because it is sitting and we know we cannot talk about its proceedings, I want to say that I believe all of us agree that parliament is paramount over its own committees. It is not suitable for a committee, no matter how important what it is doing may be, to delay the business of the committee of the whole or of the house. I am not speaking as a member of the government but I am speaking as one of the senior members of this house in point of years if not in point of years of service.

When I say I think the minister was right in accepting the blandishments of the hon. member for Carleton, I would point out also that I do not believe the hon. member for Carleton believes in his heart any more than I do that this is a proper procedure. I think we ought to have it on the record that we do not want this to happen again.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the Acting Prime Minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am not the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the Minister of Transport indicating that the hon. member for Parkdale is in the doghouse?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I am merely suggesting that at times all of us in this house share in doing things and we do not always think of all their implications when we do them. I do not believe I have ever been very sensitive when my conduct has been criticized. I do not believe I have ever hesitated to apologize to the house when I thought I had done anything that was in any way a reflection upon the house. Therefore I do not believe we should fail to note circumstances that are not good for parliament, regardless of what their origin may be. I have the highest respect for the hon. member for Parkdale as a member of the house and as a member of a group of people who have contributed many of the immigrants to this country who are among our best citizens. I do not think anyone misunderstands the exceptional interest of the hon. member for Parkdale in this measure. However, this does not alter the principle, and it was with the principle only that I was dealing.

Mr. Orlikow: Nobody could disagree with the remarks of the Minister of Transport in respect of the primacy of this house to transact the business of the house. I am speaking as a member of the house who happens to be a member of the joint committee which is dealing with the white paper on immigration. I could not go to Montreal today because of other business. However, I believe the difficulty in which we are has arisen as a result of the lack of co-ordination of the business of the house and the business of the committee.

After all, the members of the special joint committee dealing with the white paper on immigration are from all the parties and they are the members most interested in the question of immigration. I know that in our party my colleague the member for Greenwood and I generally lead any discussion having to do with immigration, and we are on that committee. The same situation applies to members of the official opposition and the government. Some time ago the committee made arrangements to hear members of important national organizations in Montreal.

It is true that the terms of reference of that committee do not cover this bill. They are looking into the white paper on immigration. As I said a few minutes ago, many of the members of the committee are the members who are most interested in the whole question of immigration. For the house to be dealing with an important bill on immigration when the members of the house who are on that committee dealing with another aspect of immigration are absent seems to me to be somewhat ludicrous. I do not question the remarks of the Minister of Transport or the principle he has enunciated—

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question? Having said what he has said, could he explain to the house how it happens that the committee went away knowing this bill was coming before the house and, by coincidence, on the day it was expected it would come before the house?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, the house leader should really ask that question of the chairman of the committee who, of course, is a member of his own party. As an ordinary member of that committee I think I could give him the explanation he would get. The decision to hold the meeting in Toronto last week and in Montreal this week was made a month ago. Arrangements were made to hear important national organizations. These organizations were informed that if they wanted to make representations they could make them in Toronto last week. I am speaking from memory, but I believe the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and a number of other organizations were heard in Toronto. I understand, for example, that the Canadian Jewish Congress made representations in Montreal yesterday. These arrangements were made months ago, so if there is a conflict the conflict is over there.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit another question? Would he mind clearing up for us the proposition he now appears to have in mind, that national organizations making representations to committees of parliament should do so in places other than the capital of the country?

Mr. Orlikow: This was a committee decision, Mr. Chairman. The agricultural committee has been making a tour from Vancouver to Ottawa and the joint committee on consumer affairs has split into two sections for hearings outside Ottawa. This is a decision of which the government approved, I am sure, or these committees would not be travelling. I see the Minister of Transport shaking his head. I do not know how a committee gets the money to pay for its travel if the government does not approve. This is what has happened, and if the government did not approve of these hearings being held outside of Ottawa, as they have been, they would not have been held. I do not think any member of the house would question the Minister of Transport's statement that the business of the house is decided by the House of Commons. It was unfortunate that there was a foul-up in communication between the government house leader and the committees. This is a situation about which we are all sorry.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to quarrel with the hon. gentleman about the particular instance. I think I was very careful not to talk about particular instances beyond saying that I thought my hon. friend, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, had been wise to accede to this particular request on this occasion. I was seeking to underline that in acceding on this particular occasion I hoped we would do everything we could to avoid repetition. I know that once something has happened someone will always cite it as a precedent. I was trying to make this look as bad a precedent as any precedent ever was. I do not think, if we ever start acknowledging the primacy of standing or select committees over the primacy of the house and the committee of the whole, that we shall have parliamentary government very much longer. I am old fashioned enough to think that our system of parliamentary government is better than any other system that has yet been devised anywhere, including some countries whose governments in many ways I admire very much.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Barnett: We all think that way.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say two brief words. First, I wish to support the procedural position the Minister of Transport has taken. It is a clear rule of this house that our committees can deal only with matters the house refers to them. We are not bound, therefore, to be influenced by obiter dicta of committees pronounced on things we did not refer to them. The Minister of Transport is perfectly right in suggesting that this is not the kind of procedure that should be followed in future.

The other thing I wish to say is that the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North is one this parliament will have to think about much more—the efficient, useful functioning of our committees. I was glad to hear from the house leader today that the personnel of the standing committee on procedure are to be appointed shortly and that the committee will begin work. He is aware, as I am, of the abortive efforts in the past to arrange for committee meetings when the house is not sitting. We must come to some kind of arrangement of that sort so that the committees may do a proper job on matters we refer to them. I suggest that today's incident illustrates that.

At the risk of being told that I am trying to be on both sides of the fence, let me say that I think this is an unfortunate precedent. We must not follow it. I also think we must look hard at the arrangements we make for our committees. The more this parliament goes on the more the work load piles up for us and the more important it becomes for us to use our committees. Let us use them, not abuse them.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I agree with the inference to be drawn from the question posed by the Minister of Public Works, but this matter ought to have been raised, I suggest, when the motion for concurrence in the committee's report was before the house.

Mr. Knowles: There probably will not be any such motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, this is a fine opportunity, I think, to deal precisely with the efficiency of committees, as so appropriately pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Committees are not always efficient precisely because they are not given the necessary leeway to become efficient. I would have another example to show that the case confronting us today is not the only one, but happens regularly.

For instance, while the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs was sitting, the debate was going on in the House of Commons on the mini-budget, that was brought forward recently. Thus, the members most interested in financial matters had to attend the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and, at the same time, they had to sit in the House of Commons, where the mini-budget was being dealt with.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, this is a fine opportunity, since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) know that I have asked for several years, in this house, for a complete reform of everything that concerns the creation of committees, so as to enable them to work more efficiently.

An example: when the committee meets in Montreal to study the white paper on immigration—the minister himself does not have the gift of ubiquity, and even if one credits him with all sorts of talents he cannot be in two places at once—the minister is not present at the meeting in Montreal. In fact, he has to be in the house to pilot another immigration bill.

Therefore, I think it would be useful for the ministers to note that committee work is not always done efficiently, because the rules concerning committees are not designed to allow them to work efficiently and to the full.

I think this example is an excellent illustration of an idea I expressed some years ago, which is that if committee work is to proceed efficiently, committee rules must be reformed to allow them to reach a high level of performance and efficiency.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, although I may seem to be presumptuous in rising to take part in this discussion, I feel we should immediately proceed with the amendment to this bill because it hardly seems proper for the committees to communicate with the house through press and radio. It seems to me that they should normally communicate through reports duly tabled during regular sittings of the house and that this is the proper way officially to inform the house of their decisions.

Second, Mr. Chairman, I am given to understand that this is a kind of pilot bill and that we are experimenting and we will probably be given the opportunity to revise it or to amend it next year. I am also given to understand that there will be, in the near future, a more comprehensive piece of legislation covering the whole immigration field.

In this case, I believe we should not delay, although I understand that the minister has given his consent which indicates considerable goodwill on his part, for his position will be greatly admired. For the reasons I have mentioned, I feel we should proceed immediately.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to adjourn discussion on clause 1?

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

RESEARCH

PROVISION FOR GRANTS TO CORPORATIONS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The house in committee on Bill C-252, to provide general incentives to industry for the expansion of scientific research and development in Canada and to effect certain related amendments to the Income Tax Act—Mr. Drury—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I point out to the committee that long statements have already been made, first at the resolution stage and subsequently on second reading. The bill was referred to the committee on industry, research and energy development and in the course of two very long and productive sessions it was studies in extenso and some amendments were made. The legislation we now have before us represents the original bill as amended by the committee and I hope that in its present form it will commend itself to hon. members for expeditious treatment.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's remarks. As he has said, the committee on industry, research and energy development spent a considerable time on this bill. Although I am a member of that committee I was unfortunately unable to attend the meetings because I am chairman of another committee. There are one or two questions which I should like to ask at this time.

The first is: If a United States subsidiary operating in Canada is given a grant under this legislation is there anything in the bill which would prevent such subsidiary using the money to develop a product which could be made by the head office of the company in the United States and sold in the United States or possibly in some other country? I want to be assured that Canada does not propose to subsidize research by a subsidiary of a United States company with the parent company then proceeding to manufacture the product of that research in the United States. I believe we should insist, if possible, that in cases in which we make a grant for the development of a product that product will be manufactured here in Canada.

I realize we are dealing with a complicated bill and that many of its clauses deal with difficult questions. One of the major problems lies in reaching a good definition of what actually constitutes research. I believe that the benefits proposed by this legislation are already available under section 72 of the Income Tax Act. It seems to me that here we are proposing to make grants available before the research has been done. Under the Income Tax Act allowances made for research are made only after the research has been completed. In this case we are putting the cart before the horse and making grants before we know that the research will be carried out successfully and what results will be forthcoming. For this reason I am not at all sure I agree with the bill in its present form.

Another question comes to mind. Will these grants be made available to government corporations? Will concerns such as Polymer or Atomic Energy of Canada be eligible for grants under this measure? I should also like to know what is intended in cases which are the reverse of those I outlined a few moments ago. What will happen when a grant is made to a Canadian company which has a subsidiary in the United States? Would the subsidiary of the Canadian company qualify for a grant under this bill?

I think the motive behind this legislation is good. The idea is not new but it is being put forward in a new way. We are proceeding along lines different from those indicated in section 72 of the Income Tax Act. These questions may be answered as we study the bill clause by clause but the minister may wish to make a few general remarks before we leave clause 2 to assure the Canadian taxpayers and the committee that we are putting this money to proper use, that it will be well spent and spent for the purpose for which it is intended.

Personally, I would prefer that these grants be made only after the research and development work has been done. In my view this would be preferable to making a grant and saying: Here is your money, see what you can do with it. Suppose the money is spent without satisfactory results. The project fades away. Is there any provision for the return of whatever was provided by way of a grant?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree that the question of scientific research with which the bill before us purports to deal is one which concerns not only members of the House of Commons but the scientific community and industry as a whole throughout Canada. We are concerned because we know that Canada has been doing so little in this field compared with other modern industrialized countries.

Speaking on this subject about two weeks ago I compared government expeditures in the field of scientific research in Canada with government expenditures of other countries in this area. I pointed out that the United States government was spending approximately 3 per cent of its gross national product on research and development while Canada was spending less than 1 per cent. In his introductory remarks while moving the second reading of the bill the minister confirmed what I said with respect to government expenditures on research and told the house that the same disparity was to be found in expenditures by the private sector. On

December 20 as reported at page 11433 of Hansard, the minister said:

> Looking at the structure of our over-all scientific activity we find that industry performed only 36 per cent of the national total as contrasted with 63 per cent for Britain and 74 per cent in the United States. This anomaly in allocation of effort would indicate that insufficient emphasis is being placed on the practical exploitation of science and technology.

A little later he stated:

> It would appear that a target almost three times the current figure is required to bring Canada more nearly into line with comparable industrialized countries. The attainment of this target within a reasonable period of time would require a virtual doubling of the previous long-term growth rate for industrial research and development.

• (5:00 p.m.)

It seems to me, to judge from the speeches the minister has made on this subject, that he has formed an opinion as to the reasons for Canada's backwardness so far as expenditure on research is concerned. The reasons are not hard to find. So far as industry is concerned our present situation has arisen because such a large percentage of Canadian industry is owned by foreign investors, many of them in the United States, who tend, as they have tended in the past, to do their research at their head offices or in research centres outside this country. This is true not only of United States companies but of international concerns such as Shell Oil. It is also caused by the fact that companies and industries in Canada which are not foreign owned tend to be smaller and do not have the necessary financial resources to expand scientific and research development.

Since 1962 we have had a whole series of programs. We have had financial incentives and we have had tax rebates. We have had proposals for direct grants. It seems to me the reason we have had changes almost every year is simply that we have not given the basic and detailed consideration to the problem which is required. Also, we have not evolved a program which will meet our needs. I am not suggesting that such a program can be evolved in one week, one month or one year. What I am suggesting is that it is necessary to consult with the best brains and with those persons who are most highly trained in this field. We need to evolve a program so that in five or ten years' time we will attain the goal we want to attain. It seems to me that we will not achieve this aim if we have changes from year to year. I suggest that if we are to have changes from year to year we will inhibit the desire and the ability of Canadian industries to become involved in research.

Research

In making some notes along this line I came across an article which I presume the minister must have seen. It appeared in yesterday's Globe and Mail. The title of the article is "Is Ottawa Helping Or Hindering Development? A Wrench In the Research Machinery". The article goes into detail. I do not intend to read all of it into the record. It is based on an interview with Dr. J. J. Green, director of research for Litton System (Canada) Limited. I should like to read a couple of paragraphs which I think summarize fairly what Dr. Green thinks of this bill. He says:

> The Canadian government appears to be taking away with one hand tax incentives to industry that it has been giving with the other.
> Dr. Greene say that Bill C-252, now before the House of Commons, will reduce the tax advantage certain companies gained through research and development in previous years.

The article continues:

> This means that the rewards are only for companies whose yearly expenditures are rising steeply, Dr. Green says. A company doing a fair level of research and development that did not increase in any one year would get nothing.
> Dr. Green said in an interview, that schemes to encourage research in industry that have been initiated by the government during the past three or four years have had good response. Despite the encouraging results, the government proposes to change the basis on which these incentives rest.
> The courrent interpretation of the proposed regulations is that they will be less favourable than the old regulations to industries that originally expanded their research and development capabilities—the very companies the government was first trying to encourage, Dr. Green says.

I could go on and on but I think the first two paragraphs indicate the fact that here is a research director of a company who feels that industrial research is being inhibited by the changes from year to year so that no company can make long-term plans. The minister and the country have had a great deal of advice about what we ought to do. I have here a report of a speech made by Dr. J. H. Chapman, deputy superintendent of the federal defence research telecommunications establishment, in which he said:

> —the United States has been able to establish an industry of discovery because it has developed close links between the industrial and academic communities.

The articles goes on to say that the United States is calling for a national science policy. This was in May of 1965. The Ontario Research Foundation more than a year ago recommended the sitting up of a series of co-operative institutes to serve various fields of industry under the over-all direction of a crown corporation. They point out the need for high level co-ordination to prevent wasteful duplication of effort among the associations. They propose that the cost of these institutes be split 50-50 between government and industry. They point out that Canada has limited funds to expend on industrial technology and every dollar must count.

The Ontario Research Foundation suggests that the associations themselves should recognize that Canada already has adequate facilities for basic research and should concentrate on meeting the need for ways of applying new knowledge more effectively. At the University of British Columbia they are discussing the setting up of research parks. The Financial Post of March 19 reports as follows:

> Although primarily sponsored by the provincial government, the B.C. Research Council has been supported financially by many private corporations which have called upon it to carry out scientific and engineering projects which they were unable to do themselves.

The point I am endeavouring to make is that I believe this bill does not go far enough. The fact that the minister is bringing in another proposal this year, as he did last year and the year before, is an indication that the minister and the government still have not worked out a long-range policy. I suggest to the minister that the government must play a much more important role than it has in the past. It must not only encourage industries to do more research and development than they have in the past but also must work out methods, through financial incentives and tax rebates, to help them do this.

I should like to see the industries do research in co-operation with the National Research Council and other government agencies. Industry should also consult with the universities which finally, after many years, are now beginning to do a great deal more research and a great deal more training in the post-graduate field than they ever have done in the past. I believe the government should try to work out programs under which small businesses and industries can do research. They simply do not have the funds to do it on their own. They should be encouraged to work together in fields of research in which they have common purposes.

What I am trying to say is that there is a need to rationalize the research which is being done by industry and that the government should devise methods, which I do not see in this bill, to bring together individual companies in a particular industry so that they can all benefit by doing research together. If they benefit, certainly the country as a whole will benefit. When I read this bill and compare it with the study done for the Economic Council in December, 1965, entitled "Program To Encourage Research And Development In Canadian Industry", it seems fairly obvious to me that the general principles worked out in that study have not been adopted by the government and certainly are not included in the provisions of the bill which the minister is proposing today.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, my contribution to this debate will be a very limited one, particularly since the hon. member for Winnipeg North has made most of the points I would have made. As he said, there is not sufficient research being done in Canada, particularly by companies which for the most part are controlled outside the country. I should like to commend the minister for bringing forward Bill No. C-252, because it differs in at least one fundamental aspect from the present legislation. I believe this point was touched on briefly by the hon. member for Wellington South. In the past young firms, particularly those not in a profitable position or not making any real profit after paying taxes, have not benefited from the tax incentive that has been available to other firms doing research. It is quite conceivable that during the years 1962 to 1966 certain companies engaged in research were unable to take advantage of the financial incentives of the government in view of the fact that they were operating at a loss.

I believe that Bill No. C-252, by substituting direct grants for tax rebates, makes it possible for the Minister of Industry to help finance industrial research in those companies which are still in their formative years and are not yet in a position to generate a net profit. I believe that in this particular instance the language in the bill is an improvement. I am sure the minister will wish to elaborate a little further on this subject.

There is, of course, another feature in this bill to which I believe the hon. member for Wellington South referred. I have only had an opportunity to read the bill once and I must admit that I did not attend the hearings of the committee. I understand, however, that the bill is designed to prod big business particularly to accelerate the research it is doing and invest more money in research.

There has been a tendency on the part of big companies to carry on year in and year out at the same fixed rate of investment in research, secure in the knowledge that a good portion of the cost of this research would be borne by the federal government. In the existing regulations there is very little if any incentive, other than the incentive, of course, to discover something of importance, to induce these companies to accelerate or increase their annual expenditure in the field of research. I imagine that this bill may go a long way toward encouraging companies to plan long-range research programs on an accelerated basis and with increased expenditures from year to year so that they make take full advantage of the provisions of this legislation.

Like the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, I have been a member of the food and drug committee for three and a half years. In that committee I have tried to be as objective as possible. It is a very difficult committee for a layman. But I have been made aware, by practically every brief presented to that committee by well established firms and relatively new and smaller firms, of the amount of research that these firms are undertaking and indeed must undertake if, according to their briefs, they are to continue to be vigorous and profitable. In other words, the drug industry claims I think with a certain amount of justification, that their industry perhaps more than any other depends upon the fruits of basic and applied research.

I think this industry can make a very excellent case for the amount of money it spends on an international level. But as I listened to their witnesses and experts and read their briefs I found they made only a very pathetic case for the amount of money they spend in this country on applied and basic research. If time permitted and if that committee was not in the midst of preparing its report to the house, I would discuss this in a little more depth. For instance, I would have pointed out to hon. members the experience in Australia where, because of incentives and inducements by the government of that country, the pharmaceutical industry has become a very vigorous exporter of products made there. By reason of the fact that we are situated so close to the United States I suppose the subsidiaries in this country of such companies have not found it profitable to carry out as much research or manufacturing here as I think they should have done. I can only hope that the Minister of Industry will take note of my remarks and see whether in the future some way cannot be found to make

I hope through incentives and inducements but if necessary through punitive action, these international firms in the pharmaceutical industry, spend a little more of their research dollars right here in Canada.

When they present the balance sheets of their operations in this country they include a very healthy expenditure under the term "research and development." If the Canadian taxpayer is expected to pay for that research and development every time he swallows an aspirin or other pill, I think a little more of the research should be carried out in this country. Some of these industries, particularly in the pharmaceutical field, have been good, corporate Canadian citizens, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce likes to evaluate a company. They hire thousands of employees and spend millions of dollars in this country on wages and materials. But I think they are too prone to depend upon research facilities situated in such countries as Switzerland, the United States, England and Germany.

In this modern world where communications are so sophisticated I do not think there is any reason why research, particularly in the pharmaceutical industry, should not become more diversified and originate in Canada. There are exceptions, of course. I would not want to resume my seat and leave the impression that I have been making a blanket condemnation of the pharmaceutical industry in so far as research is concerned because there are firms such as Ayerst McKenna and Harrison Ltd. which are undertaking research in this country. This firm is carrying out research in the Montreal area for its parent company. I believe there are companies located in Sheridan Park, Toronto, which are increasing their research facilities. I understand that the pharmaceutical industry in Toronto and Montreal in particular is investing more money in research facilities and therefore helping to prevent the brain drain with which we are very familiar.

Nevertheless, Mr. Minister, I am one who is not satisfied with the amount of research carried out in this country by this industry. I have never believed in curing a nose-bleed by cutting off one's head, and I do not believe this is the approach that should be taken with respect to the pharmaceutical industry. I doubt that there is time to discuss the industry in general, but I think it should be made aware of the fact that while we recognize the necessity of international research and realize that in most instances the average Canadian is able to take advantage of the fruits of international research, more research should be carried out in Canada.

We realize also that in most instances the average Canadian is able to take advantage of the fruits of international research by the constant introduction of new medicines and new drugs. Nevertheless we deserve from these firms a greater share of their research dollar, particularly in view of the fact that a respectable amount of money goes out of this country to subsidize and help support international research facilities which exist in Pearl River, in the United States and at Basle, Switzerland.

There is a particular clause in this bill on which I will say a few words. It helps to achieve what I think is a desirable aim, namely, that the pharmaceutical industry, perhaps more than any other industry because it is so research-oriented, should do much more to spend in Canada some of the dollars which Canadian taxpayers pay for its products.

I want to commend the minister for the real increase in the field of research since 1962. I have never had an opportunity to speak in the House of Commons on legislation sponsored by the present Minister of Industry, perhaps because of the fact that for geographical reasons my interests are not centred on the auto pact but on other matters. However, I have been rather impressed by the performance of the minister who, perhaps more than any other minister of the government, has shown a willingness to try out new ideas and approaches. I could mention many of them but the chairman might rule me out of order. One of them is the auto pact which, although controversial, was an attempt to introduce a new approach to a vexing problem. Although it has resulted in much labour unrest and disruption it has also resulted in a significant sum of money, $200 million, accruing to this country. I am rather pleased that research should fall into the orbit of the Minister of Industry who, ever since I have been here, has shown no reluctance to try out new ways and means. This should be the new spirit in Canada because, after all, we are an extremely young nation.

I would have liked to spend a little time talking about the "brain drain", as we like to call it.

I should also like to commend to hon. members an article in today's Globe and Mail entitled "New Grants For University Research" because I think the program is ancillary to the present bill. The article refers to a new basic approach by the National Research Council and it is a very encouraging ancillary measure in respect of the bill before us. In other words, it seems that through the National Research Council grants will be made available for university research.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, this has been an area in which action has been woefully lacking. The percentage of our gross national product devoted to basic and applied research in no way compares with that of countries like the United States and Australia, but I think that we are at least moving in the right direction. I read in the Financial Post that at present the rate of acceleration is such that by 1970-71 we will have reached the desirable goal set by the Economic Council and will be in line with other affluent nations.

In this connection I commend to the attention of hon. members a paper written by Roger Gaudry, rector of the University of Montreal, concerning the brain drain. I think it is an important paper because it erases some of the misconceptions under which many of us have laboured about the well known fact that so many of our well trained scientists and researchers leave Canada to go to the United States. According to Dr. Gaudry, based on information that he has acquired from Washington, from the Department of Labour here in Ottawa and from other available statistics, from 1956 to 1961 Canada lost to the United States an average of 212 scientists and 1,028 engineers per year, making a total average of 1,240 trained personnel. Expressed as a ratio of the 1959 output of science and engineering graduates, Canada lost on the average 12.5 per cent of its output of scientists and—this is staggering—48 per cent of its output of engineers.

However, to my surprise, and perhaps to the surprise of Dr. Gaudry, because of immigration from Europe we have actually ended up with an over-all gain. According to recent figures that have been made available to me by the research division of the Department of Labour many Canadian trained personnel are now coming back to Canada. However, Dr. Gaudry made the very valid point that this is no reason to feel complacent. We should not be complacent about the fact that we are training university students who leave Canada to go to the United States, simply because we offset this loss by replacing them with new Canadians. This type of compensation is bound to dry up as opportunities for work arise in the countries from which these people come and as their governments emphasize the necessity of keeping their professional people at home.

However, Dr. Gaudry made another valid point, namely, that the only way in which Canada can remain prosperous, in spite of the fact that it is situated next to an industrial giant, is to have something a little different to sell. We cannot succeed on the basis of price alone. We must have something uniquely Canadian to sell in the field of industry, and the best way to ensure that our products are wanted throughout the world and to make certain that our exports increase from year to year is to increase our support of industrial research so that we can come up with products that are really Canadian and not facsimiles of something developed in the United States or Great Britain.

I am sure that because of the abundance of our national resources there are particular areas to which our research should be directed. Our patent system will have a lot to do with it, and I would take a dim view of anyone who would want to destroy that system.

I agree with previous speakers that perhaps this bill is not the end to all our problems in the field of research, but I think it is a very helpful step forward because it forces the large companies not only to maintain their present research facilities but to spend more money from year to year thus accelerating their efforts. Second, through the medium of this bill some financial compensation will now be made available to those firms which, for taxation reasons, in previous years were unable to take advantage of the tax incentives.

I once again ask the Minister of Industry to take note of my remarks, and I also hope that the pharmaceutical industry will do so. While I commend it for what it has already done in the field of research I hope it will continue and increase its efforts. I have received a note from the other side of the house which says, "Sit down, you are holding up the bill." On the strength of that premise I will sit down in the hope that we will proceed with the committee stage.

Clause agreed to.

Research

On clause 3—Scientific research and development grant authorized.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Hales: This clause deals with whether or not the grants given are likely to result in benefits to Canada. Does the minister feel that this wording gives proper protection to the Canadian taxpayer who will be putting up these grants? In referring to the minister the clause reads in part as follows:

—and such other information as the minister considers relevant, is satisfied that the expenditure was made in respect of scientific research and development that is likely to result in benefit to Canada if it is successful.

Here we have ministerial discretion. He decides whether the expenditure is going to result in benefit to Canada. The hon. member for Verdun referred to pharmaceutical companies. Suppose one of these companies receives a grant to develop a certain kind of drug. Suppose the Canadian branch of the company develops the drug but it is then decided that it would be cheaper to manufacture it in the United States.

What about a situation where we have free trade? Suppose General Motors of Oshawa received a grant to do some scientific research. Having developed the research to a point where it was successful, it could decide to manufacture the product in the United States and ship it back into Canada duty free. Does the minister not feel that this provision is too wide and that there should be some reference to the fact that products resulting from the grants must be manufactured in Canada?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, this subject was discussed at some length in the committee. I am sorry the hon. member for Wellington South did not have the opportunity of being there. The object of this bill is to encourage industrial research in Canada in the expectation and hope it will improve Canadian industrial technology and consequently raise the standard of living. We specify in the bill that in order to qualify for a grant the applicant must have carried out research in Canada. The grants are payable only in retrospect, that is, after the research has been carried out and some auditing has been done of the quantum of research. In addition, before the grant is paid there will be insistence vis-à-vis the grantee that the grantee is free to exploit the outcome of the research, if it is successful, in Canada.

I do not believe one can have a bill such as this, designed to encourage research, and state in advance in relation to a program that may take five years to bring to fruition that whatever the result of this research may be it will be exploited exclusively in Canada or that if a product is the outcome it will be manufactured in Canada. It may be uneconomic to manufacture in Canada by reason of the scale of production, technological difficulties, lack of proper machinery and so on. This would mean that one would be discouraging or closing off the advancement of a number of avenues for research in Canada which may otherwise be attractive. Consequently you would be doing what the hon. member for Winnipeg North mentioned, taking away with one hand what you are giving with another.

We make provision in the bill for the assurance that the grantee is not inhibited by law, by corporate agreement or by corporate policy from exploiting the results of the research in Canada. Indeed, if he is free to do so and it is economic to exploit the research in Canada, it is obviously in his interests to exploit it in Canada. We expect this to follow as a consequence. If it is uneconomic to exploit the research in Canada, it does not make any general sense to insist that uneconomic things be done in this country merely for the sake of having them done in the country.

Mr. Hales: I agree with the minister that the provision of grants for research in Canada would help prevent the drain of research people from our country. However, I feel that the grants provision should dovetail with a provision that the product resulting from the research should be manufactured in Canada. Does the minister deny that General Motors could conduct research in one of its Canadian plants, produce a product, and then manufacture it in the United States and ship it back to Canada duty free? Does the minister agree this could actually happen?

Mr. Drury: Perhaps I should make a distinction between research and development. Since the hon. member is talking about research, I might refer him to page 401 of the evidence of the standing committee on industry, research and energy development. There is an indication there that the definition of research adopted by the O.E.C.D. will be the general basis of the definition of research which we will employ in Canada in deciding what research would qualify for grants.

There is a second stage of exploiting research, namely, the development of products or processes. In respect of this part of the operation the federal government provides another program called the program for the advancement of industrial technology in Canada. This particular program is related to the production of specific products and financial assistance or incentives are provided only to the manufacturer who manufactures in Canada. If a manufacturer wishes to develop a product, assistance will be available if he agrees to manufacture in Canada.

Going back to a previous suggestion; to make a good deal of research does not lead to any precise or identifiable product, it is difficult, therefore, to say in advance, we will assist you in doing research provided you undertake in advance to manufacture in Canada any of the products arising from this research. Let me take an instance analogous to the one mentioned by my hon. friend. Let us say that Canadian General Electric out of its research operations developed an engine which it would manufacture in the United States and bring back to Canada. If as a consequence of research in Canada by Canadian General Electric in the field of gas turbine engines it became possible to manufacture very large gas turbine engines more successfully and more cheaply than had hitherto been the case, it would not make much economic sense to insist that Canadian General Electric manufacture these engines in Canada rather than elsewhere because we have not the capacity, the technology nor the market to sustain the production of very large gas turbine engines.

If Canadian General Electric knew in advance that the outcome of all the research it did would be available only and exclusively for exploitation in Canada this would, as I think the hon. member would agree, inhibit it from doing a great deal of research it might otherwise be prepared to do in this country. It would prefer not to have the restrictions and inhibitions of the Canadian environment. It would be better if it could do research work, which it would be free to exploit anywhere, in the United States rather than Canada.

Mr. Orlikow: I want to deal precisely with the question of research and where that research is done. The minister has made a valid point when he says it might not be practical to insist that the product developed in Canada as a result of this type of research program must be produced in Canada. It may be, as the minister says, that the scale of sales in Canada would be too small. There might not be a market. If the product were produced in the United States under licence there would be a market and the venture would be profitable.

In our group we are concerned about the principle that grants or tax concessions made by the government to companies for research be only for research done in Canada. In clause 3, subclause 1, line 33 of the original bill it was spelled out that the expenditure should be in Canada. I do not know what discussion there was in the committee but in the amended bill we are considering the words "in Canada" have been taken out.

Mr. Drury: Might I answer the question? The hon. gentleman referred to clause 2—

Mr. Orlikow: No.

Mr. Drury: Subclause 3(c) of clause 2?

Mr. Orlikow: No.

Mr. Drury: This is the clause defining expenditures which qualify, and the words "in Canada" appear in line 27.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I am rising at the request of my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo South, who was on the committee and attended the meetings. He is not satisfied that the bill makes crystal clear that the research must be done in Canada. He has asked me to move an amendment. I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 3 be amended by inserting therein in line 33 immediately after the word "expenditures" the words "in Canada".

It may be, as the minister says, that this is covered in other clauses but my colleague feels that this matter should be spelled out clearly in this subclause. The purpose of the amendment is to make clear that the research the government supports is research done in Canada. The amendment restores the words which were in the clause when the bill was before us on first reading.

Mr. Drury: I suggest that this amendment does no harm but it is redundant and repetitive and quite unnecessary. Clause 3(1) refers to "expenditures on scientific research and development in a fiscal period." There is no geographic connotation in that clause. If the hon. member will refer to clause 2 (3) (c) he will see the definition of expenditures qualifying for scientific research and development. It is made quite clear that reference in this bill to expenditures on or for scientific research and development includes only expenditures incurred for and wholly attributable to the prosecution of or the provision of facilities for the prosecution of scientific research and development in Canada. Whenever in the bill there is reference to expenditures for scientific research and development, those references mean only research carried on in Canada. To repeat "expenditures on scientific research and development in Canada" in the following clause is quite unnecessary. I have asked the officials of the Department of Justice about this and they would prefer not to clutter the statute with redundancies.

Mr. Barnett: I am puzzled about the point the minister has been making in regard to the wording of subclause 1 of clause 3. Some of the clauses in the reprinted bill, as reported by the standing committee, differ from the original bill. The explanatory note in the reprinted version says that the amendments made by the committee are marked with a line. In the light of what the minister has said I wonder how the change in subclause 1 was made? That subclause is not marked as having been dealt with in the standing committee. Was this correction made by the minister or by the law officers? How did this change come about? How did the deletion of the words "in Canada" take place?

Mr. Drury: If the hon. gentlemen will refer to the minutes of the committee proceedings he will see the discussion on this point and the adoption by the committee of this particular amendment. I suggest that perhaps the printers have failed to sideline subclause 1. That is the only omission.

Mr. Hales: I think we would be agreeable if the minister could assure the committee that grants will not be given for research done outside Canada. Does this wording assure the committee that no grants will be made for research outside Canada?

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: I can give an unequivocal assurance that no grants will be made in respect of research carried on outside Canada. There is one qualification, and this is an area which may be in doubt. The point was raised in the committee. It concerns research carried out on the high seas. It is unlikely that any transaction will take place or that any expenditures would be made on the high seas, but it might be said that expenditures incurred in a Canadian ship on the high seas would not be expenditures incurred on research in Canada within the strict reading of that phrase. But I can give an assurance hat no grants will be made in respect of research carried on in any other national territory.

Mr. Orlikow: In the light of the assurance given by the minister I am prepared to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Barnett: With particular reference to clause 3, subclause 2 I should like an assurance from the minister on a particular point. I refer to the proviso that no expenditure shall qualify unless the minister is satisfied that the scientific research and development in respect of which the expenditure is made is likely to result in benefit to Canada if it is successful. Will this cover research for purposes likely to improve the welfare of the community as a whole or will the research be restricted solely to increased productivity in the material field? For example, does this "benefit to Canada" phrase cover applications which have to do with research in the field of control and elimination of air pollution, water pollution and soil pollution? I mention these three fields specifically because, as the minister will probably recall, an amendment was made to the Income Tax Act to provide for incentives to corporations to undertake expenditure on water pollution control. But no provision was made for similar incentives to deal with air pollution and soil pollution. Is the phrase "benefit to Canada" broad enough to include this ancillary research which might not be regarded by industry as increasing the volume of goods produced?

Mr. Drury: Research work in order to qualify. need not be related to a particular commercial product or process. Indeed, by definition research frequently cannot be so related. If the hon. member will refer to O.E.C.D. definition of research he will see that the kind of research to which he has referred would qualify for a grant.

Mr. Hales: When a grant is made, who decides whether it is likely to result in benefit to Canada?

Mr. Drury: As the hon. gentleman can read here, it is the minister. In practice the Department of Industry will lay down certain rules to determine benefit, the most important of which will be that the company undertaking the research and applying for the grant shall be free to exploit in Canada the results or the fruits of their particular research.

Mr. Hales: I will not move an amendment to this clause but I wish to raise most strenuous objection to it on the ground, first, that there is too much ministerial discretion written into it. I think this is the sloppiest drafting we have seen in any act and I feel also that there is nothing here to cover the point I raised previously. We are making research grants to Canadian companies or to United States subsidiaries in Canada to develop products which may not be made in Canada. I still believe we should stipulate that grants should be made only in cases where the product would be manufactured here in Canada. Despite what the minister has said I still think there are enough firms in Canada able to make use of all the research money available and which would be ready to meet this condition. As I say, I wish to record my objection to this clause though I do not propose to hold up the passage of the bill.

On clause 4—Amount of grant.

Mr. Orlikow: I had intended to move the same kind of amendment to clause 4, subclauses 1 and 2, to restore the words "in Canada" which were in the original draft of the bill. If the minister would give the same assurance as he gave earlier that the research referred to in these subclauses must be carried out in Canada I would be perfectly willing to forgo moving the amendment.

Mr. Drury: I can give that assurance, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Orlikow: I am sorry. I misplaced one of my notes. I wanted to add a new subclause to clause 4. I do not intend to make a long speech about it. I should like to move the following amendment:

That clause 4 be amended by adding thereto a new subsection (5) as follows:

(5) Where the research is done for or on behalf of the applicant by an approved association, university, college, research institute or other similar institution, the phrase "25 per cent" where it appears in subsections (1) and (2) shall be read as "50 per cent".

• (6:00 p.m.)

I think the purpose of this bill is quite clear. As I indicated in my remarks on clause 2, the feeling of our group is that because of the organization of industry in this country and the number of branch plants in important sections of our economy we are not likely to get from industries the kind of research all of us would like to have. Therefore, in order that small industries may be able to participate and do their share we propose that they be encouraged to do so by subcontracting research they cannot do themselves to one of the institutions I have mentioned, a research institute, a university and so on. This is the purpose of the amendment.

The Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to private members' business I do now leave the chair.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, papers; private bills and public bills.

Mr. McNulty: Mr. Speaker, by consent may we stand notices of motions Nos. 145, 137, 128 and 200 and take notice of motion No. 201?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES RESPECTING BASE LINES

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Barnett:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all notes and other communications exchanged between Canada and the United States of America since the enactment by parliament on July 16, 1964, of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act having to do with the issuance by the Governor in Council of one or more lists of geographical co-ordinates of points from which base lines may be determined in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this motion is one that has held the attention of members from coastal constituencies and others for some years now, and in fact interest in our territorial sea predates by many years the enactment of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. The motion before us seeks to have certain papers tabled and made public, namely, documents, letters, etc., exchange between the Canadian government and the government of the United States with regard to Canada taking action through the governor in council under law of this parliament to establish geographical co-ordinates from which straight base lines would be drawn and from which would be measured our territorial sea and our fishing zones.

I realize that on a motion such as this we are normally confined to discussing the possibility and necessity or otherwise of tabling the documents and it is not a motion dealing with the substance of the matter at all. But in this instance I think to reason for the production of the documents one must touch upon the subject matter and relate some historical events in so far as the subject matter is concerned. This was recognized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and Mr. Speaker on the last day this motion was debated. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said in part, as reported on page 12860 of Hansard for February 9 last:

However, I understand the interest of the two hon. gentlemen and other members of this house in the substance of the proposition, and therefore I have not raised a point of order.

This means that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, knowledgeable as he is about the intimate workings of parliament, realized the necessity of discussing the substance of this matter. When I say that Mr. Speaker at least, condoned that approach I mean he did so by not intervening and by recognizing the overriding importance of being able to look at the substance of the question in order to reason whether the documents should be produced. This is what I hope to do this evening.

My colleague the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), as a member from British Columbia and one who is very interested in this and many other fishing matters, gave a very laudable and commendable outline of the subject in his opening remarks. The hon. member pointed out very clearly the degree to which the government has been negligent in this matter in not carrying out the responsibilities which parliament gave it. I should like to quote further the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because I think they reveal an attitude which should not have as much scope and force in the determinations of government as it has. As reported at page 12860 of Hansard the minister said:

I do understand, however, the impatience of hon. gentlemen.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs was referring to impatience over the delay in the governor in council proclaiming the geographical co-ordinates. He said:

I share that impatience, and so does the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) who has toiled arduously during the past two and a half years in an effort to implement the full provisions of the bill.

I do not have the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act before me but in it the responsibility is given to the governor in council to proclaim either in whole or in part the geographical co-ordinates for Canada. We wonder why there has been such arduous toil for two and a half years in order to implement these geographical co-ordinates. What are the difficulties? I can understand that there might be some difficulties when a number of other countries have historic fishing rights and make claim to the right to fish within the 12-mile limit, whether it be one that follows the convolutions of the coast or a straight line. I can understand the difficulties when there are a number of nations making this claim, because this is the case on the Atlantic coast. I can understand those difficulties when there is a desire by the government of Canada to have those nations phase out their historic fishing rights so that after a certain period of time they will no longer have the right to fish within the 12-mile zone.

In respect of the Atlantic coast there may be an argument for such protraction because there are a number of countries concerned in this question, some of whom have treaty fishing rights. That matter was dealt with at length by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni before the committee and in this house on a previous occasion. Portugal, France, Spain, Denmark and other countries, I believe, claim these historic fishing rights.

My concern here is with the substance of this matter in so far as the Pacific coast is concerned. On the Pacific coast only one country claims to have historic fishing rights within the 12-mile limit and the area about which the Fisheries Association, the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union and everybody in the fishing industry in British Columbia has a unanimous opinion. Queen Charlotte Sound, Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance fall within the area they claim should be inside the straight base lines. Only one country, the United States, claims historic fishing rights within this area.

The United States' claims have been recognized because the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), at the meeting in Hyannis Port with the late President Kennedy to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred in his remarks of February 9, guaranteed to President Kennedy that he need have no fear about the historic fishing rights of the United States within the area which would be encompassed by our 12-mile fishing zone. The Prime Minister said we would recognize those rights. This information was given to the Senate, to the house and to the committee on marine and fisheries which was then considering the territorial sea and fishing zones bill. This information was given to us on a number of occasions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud). These ministers said that Canada would recognize that historic fishery, namely, the bottom fishery of United States fishermen in the area which would be within the 12-mile fishing zone as contemplated.

This being the case, and there being no indication that the government intended to ask the United States to phase out its fishing operation in that area off the Pacific coast—in other words, we would recognize in perpetuity their historic right—what is the subject of negotiations with the United States in this respect? The only thing which can be the subject of negotiations is the location of the geographical co-ordinates. The responsibility for setting those geographical co-ordinates has been given to the governor in council, but we are presumably negotiating the location of the straight base lines and the geographical co-ordinates with the United States of America. I submit it is none of the blessed business of the United States of America where those straight base lines and geographical co-ordinates are drawn. It is a determination that Canada, as a sovereign state unto itself, should make.

When the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was progressing through the house there were great declarations that Canada would be firm and resolute and would make a unilateral declaration and decision on this matter. It was said that it was commendable for a country such as Canada to be able to make this sort of declaration in the face of world conditions at that time, a time before the United States decided to take action with respect to the 12-mile limit and a time of conflict between Iceland and Great Britain on the subject of fishing zones and the territorial sea.

In the light of those firm determinations and expressions by the government, we cannot help but wonder what is the purpose of the negotiations. I think that without even seeing the correspondence we must come to the conclusion that the United States government wants these geographic co-ordinates and straight base lines to be as close as possible to the mainland of the west coast of Canada, as opposed to the position which the government took before the marine and fisheries committee, namely, that the geographical co-ordinates would be as far seaward as possible. In other words, it was said that the geographical co-ordinates would follow the brief presented to the committee by the Fisheries Association.

The brief of that association had in it a map or chart of the west coast and the Atlantic coast. The chart of the west coast indicated that the geographical co-ordinates and the straight base lines would proceed from a point on the international boundary in Juan de Fuca Strait, off the west coast of Vancouver Island, in a direct line from the northwestern tip of Vancouver Island near Cape Scott, or the outermost island off Cape Scott, thence to the southwestern tip of the Queen Charlotte Islands close to Cape St. James, thence along the west coast of the Queen Charlotte Islands to Langara or North Island and up to the international boundary which runs between British Columbia and Alaska. The Canadian government endorsed the position taken in the brief of the Fisheries Association. These geographical co-ordinates represented the hope of everyone involved in the fishing industry in British Columbia. It was the expectation of members of the committee that these geographical co-ordinates would be implemented.

We were told that there was no intention of asking the United States to phase out the historic fishery in that area. It was only intended to make the United States subject to our various fishery regulations, and what could be more reasonable than that? If we are only negotiating with the United States the application of Canadian fishery regulations to foreign fishing vessels operating inside our territorial sea and fishing zones, then I submit this should not be the subject of negotiations. If that is so, then what is being negotiated? Obviously what is being discussed is how far toward our coast the United States authorities can drive our own base lines. I submit that what the United States wants to do, for military or pseudo-military reasons or just to satisfy its massive ego, is to have as much of Queen Charlotte Sound, Hecate Strait and Dixon Entrance as possible, an area which I thought was Canadian territory dating as far back as 1903 when a British tribunal made the decision regarding the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska.

I suggest that what the United States wants to do is to have as much as possible of what we now consider to be Canadian waters, even though we have no base lines drawn to enclose them, declared as international waters and outside of our fishery zone. I hope that the government is not negotiating away the concept and understanding which we have had on the west coast for many years about what are considered to be Canadian waters. It seems to me that the only prospect in sight is an adulteration or dilution of the position which the government took so firmly before the fisheries committee when the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was being considered. We attempted in that committee to spell out the geographic co-ordinates on the west coast and to have the base lines follow the position agreed to by everyone in the fishing industry in British Columbia, namely, to include those waters I have just mentioned, Hecate Strait, Dixon Entrance and Queen Charlotte Sound. However, we relented in the committee on the basis of the understanding given by responsible ministers of the crown that there would be no delay in proclaiming the geographic co-ordinates.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said unequivocally, without hesitation and in clear language—I must say that is a remarkable distinction for him—that the geographic co-ordinates would be declared before the end of 1964. With that understanding members of the committee accepted the government's word and relented. Subsequently we have found that for the last two and a half or three years there has been a continuous exchange of proposals. Two or three times the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Fisheries, whichever one happened to deal with the subject at the time, said that they were awaiting the reaction of the United States government to proposals made by the Canadian government. It is preposterous that such a situation should arise, that when the parliament of Canada has given to the governor in council authority to declare geographic co-ordinates and the governor in council has agreed to make proposals about where those co-ordinates should be the government should be making proposals to a foreign country about what we should do within our own territory. In other words, we are permitting the United States of America to decide where those geographic co-ordinates are going to be and what will be the fishing zones and the territorial sea of Canada on the west coast. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said with respect to this matter—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. I regret very much that I must interrupt the hon. member for Skeena as his time has expired. Does he have the consent of hon. members to continue beyond his allotted time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: I do not desire to do so particularly because there is so much to say about this subject that I could very easily be bemoaning the delay and procrastination when His Excellency's messenger knocks at the door. However, so as not to trespass upon the good grace of the house I will end with a quotation dealing with the relationship between Canada and the United States. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said the following, as recorded on page 12861 of Hansard:

> I believe that we should hear from the United States within the course of the next few days. When this reply reaches us we will have a better appreciation of when we can begin to establish co-ordinates and straight base lines, and when we may take other steps to further the objective we have in mind.

In other words, the minister said that everything rests upon the United States. This has been the answer we have received every time questions have been put to cabinet ministers. Time after time we have been told that all we have to do is to wait for the United States to reply to us, wait for them to tell us what they want, wait for them to agree or disagree with something we have proposed, and then we will know what to do. This is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said just two weeks ago. It is a regrettable state of affairs when we allow a foreign country, which we have already agreed will have a perpetual right to fish within our fishing zones, to proceed to decide where our geographic co-ordinates will be. I would have thought this would be something that our government would be proud to do in its own sovereign way and declare for the benefit of all Canadians without having to report to the United States government and ask that government to decide what the Canadian government will do.

Mr. Richard Cashin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to listen to the remarks of the hon. members for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and Skeena (Mr. Howard). The hon. member for Skeena pointed out to us that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) recognized the particular interest of certain hon. members in discussing the subject matter of the 12-mile limit. However, at the same time the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out quite clearly to the house that the issue before us at this time is not whether the government has made progress in these negotiations but whether the house should be given the documents which have been exchanged between the government of Canada and other governments. While I well recognize the concern and the impatience of the hon. member in this matter, I think it must be clearly understood that the course of action which is advocated in this motion is one that would be most irresponsible and in fact would not be in keeping with the custom so far as such documents are concerned.

On the first day this matter was discussed, February 9, the minister cited a number of cases which pointed out the absolute necessity of the government not making public the documents in question. To do so, without consulting the other countries involved, would be an irresponsible act and, in fact, would serve no useful purpose. Before dealing with the motion before the house at this time, namely whether or not these documents should be produced, I want to reiterate that ample evidence has already been introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), and supported in a very reasonable speech by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), that this would be an unjustifiable course of action.

I should like to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) as recorded on page 12856 of Hansard:

> While there may be times when I would readily agree that the kind of documents asked for in this motion could be properly considered as privileged and it might not be in the public interest to table them in the house, nevertheless I feel that under the particular set of circumstances prevailing in this case the general rule has in effect ceased to apply.

The hon. member and his colleagues have failed this afternoon to produce one iota of evidence to support in a technical or legal way the reasoning behind that statement. They have pointed out that there was impatience as a result of the fact that the ultimate question has not been resolved. I would not want to say this until I have had an opportunity of rereading the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), but I think he might have been a little unfair to the minister when he said he was impatient. In my opinion, impatience is a state of mind, which I think is legitimate and understandable, when one is confronted with a difficult or complex situation. Then, I think one is apt to experience impatience. However, if one has that experience that does not mean the impatience is the result of procrastination or undue delay.

I should like to point out to the house that, notwithstanding the vital interest of the two members in question as well as my own interest and concern in this matter, I think they are being somewhat unrealistic. The hon. member for Skeena has said, if I recall correctly, that it was difficult for him to understand the situation. I find it difficult myself, having regard for the intellect and knowledge of the hon. member for Skeena, to comprehend the difficulties which he is having. I feel it should be apparent to him, perhaps more so than to many other members because of his experience in the house and his knowledge of this field, that when a country is engaged in international negotiations, by their very nature those negotiations are more intricate and more sensitive than any other negotiations that may take place within the country itself.

I think many of us have experienced impatience with things on the domestic scene; yet we know that government, in dealing with domestic problems, has a variety of matters to take into consideration such as legal claims or alleged legal claims or the interests of various groups. There is often a period of time between the date when the government decides on a particular course of action and the date when the desirable end is achieved. If these difficulties are experienced in the domestic field, then I think that is ample prima facie evidence that generally when one is engaged in international negotiations there is more involved. It may well be that in most cases such negotiations are more difficult and the desirable end is more difficult to achieve.

I should like to point out further to both hon. members that since 1964 when the legislation to which they have referred was introduced, we have, as a country, made progress in dealing with this matter. The hon. gentleman has talked at great length about the area that he represents. He made no mention in his speech of the effect that the legislation has had to date on foreign fleets. I am referring specifically to the operations of the Russians on the Atlantic coast, with which I am more familiar than I am with the Pacific coast.

Progress has been made, too, with regard to the Norwegian sealing operation in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In the two and a half years which have passed since the introduction of this legislation, there have been other developments which, while they might not appear at this time to be of great consequence, are of such an order as to suggest to me that they are of significance. I refer to the action which the United States has taken with regard to this problem, something which they did not seem either anxious or willing to do a few years ago.

There is one other matter I should like to mention while dealing with the over-all problem. I believe the hon. member for Skeena is off the point when he suggests that this is a matter of a foreign country dictating to another country the extent to which that country may exercise its jurisdiction. I remind the hon. member again that in the field of international relations Canada has certain responsibilities with regard to the International Court. I should like to think that the successful solution of this problem will be one that will stand the test of international law.

Again I say that all of us, particularly those of us who represent coastal regions, are very anxious that at the earliest possible date as much progress as is possible should be made. At the same time, while expressing this understandable impatience, we ought to keep what is involved in a proper perspective. I do feel the hon. member for Skeena is somewhat over-simplifying the problem. Again I say that while the hon. member who introduced this motion may have wished to express his views on the merits of the question, nevertheless he could not have been acting in a completely responsible manner because if the motion were to carry I suggest we would tend to jeopardize rather than assist the negotiatoins in which our constituents have such a great interest.

In view of the precedents cited by the minister, I believe all hon. members will recognize that it would be an unwise and irresponsible course of action to adopt this motion. I feel we have no course but to defeat it, and in so defeating it I think we will be rendering more assistance to the cause of achieving a desirable solution to this problem than if we were to carry the motion.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Paliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am always impressed by the eloquence of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who can speak on labour, northern affairs, Indian affairs and the problems of fishing rights with equal facility. I do not say that sarcastically. I commend the hon. member. I can only commend to new members of the house that they take advantage of the private members hour to the same extent that the hon. member for Skeena through the years has taken advantage of it, that they speak as he speaks, and develop that eloquence which I envy.

Mr. Barnett: Flattery will get you nowhere.

Mr. Mackasey: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you were mesmerized by the hon. members' eloquence. Your Honour permitted the debate to centre around the 12-mile limit and the treaty—why the treaty has not been finalized and why co-ordinates have not been established—rather than on the issue of whether certain documents exchanged between the United States and Canada should be made available to members of the house. I suspect Your Honour was indulgent because there has not been enough opportunity to discuss this important piece of legislation in the last year or so.

Coming from the city of Verdun, I confess that my interest is not as devoted or developed as is the interest of the hon. member for Skeena. If I were to take a point 12 miles from my home area I might wind up somewhere in the next county.

Periodically the problem arises in this house as to the desirability of producing certain papers. There is a lack of clear definition of what is a privileged document and what is not. The process of having members of the house decide whether a document is or is not privileged by majority is not democratic, it seems to me. A forward step we ought to take would be to devise definite rules to guide members of the House of Commons as to what documents are or are not privileged. To decide whether documents should be made public by the process of one party out voting the other parties, is undemocratic, I suspect. If we look at it closely, I suspect we shall see that this further restricts the freedom of the average member in the house. I know the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) shares my viewpoint.

As I have said before, we can only go by precedent in deciding whether a document is privileged. There are no guide lines. This matter ought to concern the special committee that will look into procedural reform. Other countries have specific norms to follow, and it is time we had some rule of thumb to decide these matters other than a straight majority of the house, or a vote.

In England there is a tendency to consider all documents privileged. With few exceptions, in England they consider all documents privileged. Hon. members interested in doing a little research in the library will find that in England privileged documents cover almost all documents issued by the government. They include for instance transactions between the government and private contractors. As an observer of the English scene it seems to me that the concept of privilege over there restricts the basic rights of the average member of parliament. The rights of the average citizen are indirectly infringed upon. At the other extreme we have the situation in Sweden.

The time has come, I think, for a special committee of the house objectively to look at the question of documents. That committee could investigate the English and Swedish systems, to see which one is better suited to our parliamentary system.

In passing may I say that our committees have given backbenchers an opportunity to take an active part in affairs. The committees system has removed much of the frustration which might otherwise ensue. One effect of the committees, it seems to me, has been to curtail the importance and prestige of the House of Commons. In the final analysis the House of Commons protects us against an undemocratic system of government. We must find ways and means of best using the committee system and at the same time restoring and maintaining the image of the House of Commons. A committee ought to settle this question about documents, and make some recommendations. Those problems ought to be decided objectively, and the minority parties not constantly penalized for their lack of members. However, I do not say that that is the situation here.

I expect most hon. members know about the Swedish system in which, contrary to the English system, with a few exceptions, all documents are considered public. In the main cities of Sweden the government has set up reading rooms in city halls and libraries, where many documents considered privileged in Canada, and certainly in England, are available to the public. It is not uncommon to see in the evening, or on a Saturday morning, political science students, newspapermen, interested senior citizens and others poring over those documents in reading rooms scattered throughout Sweden. Every person can be familiar with the every day workings of his government or parliament. This does much to alleviate the burden on an ombudsman in a country where this enlightened official operates.

The solution to our difficulties in Canada must lie, I think, in a happy medium. In a country such as ours, where the press in unbridled, there are occasions when, if documents were made available weekly or daily, too much might be read into them, particularly by people who are subjective and not objective.

I know this would not be the case in this instance. I am sure that is these documents were made available to the hon. member for Skeena and his partner they would be put to very objective use—the hon. members are really interested in finding out why it should take so much time to finalize a piece of legislation which is highly desirable to the fishing industry of this country.

I must not be tempted to enter upon a discussion as to the desirability of a 12-mile limit and the desirability of a speedy settlement with the United States. I must stick to the issue before us, which is whether or not these documents exchanged between the Canadian government and the United States are to be considered as privileged. I will admit I have no means of knowing whether or not they are privileged. I must take the word of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) for that. Luckily, my hon. friend has such a wonderful reputation in all parts of the house that I am sure all hon. members will accept such an assurance from him without question.

My impression is that the hon. members who raised this matter were interested not so much in the production of these papers as they were in the opportunity to discuss this whole subject at length, in an effort to ascertain why a solution to this vexing problem has not so far been reached.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member for Verdun permit a question? He has just referred to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in glowing terms and of course he sits considerably closer to that hon. gentleman than I do. Perhaps he could tell us whether the minister has heard from the United States on this subject matter as he suggested when he spoke on February 9. He said, then, that he expected to do so within the next few days.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member is an extremely experienced politician. He knows that I am only a babe in the woods in that sphere of activity. But even I know better than to speculate on whether or not the Secretary of State for External Affairs did have the meetings to which he referred on February 9. If the minister said that such a meeting would take place, I am sure he did so with the best of intentions.

The hon. member who asked this question might not be as close to the minister as I am but he has sat in this house for a considerable time and he knows that my hon. friend has a great reputation for conciseness and veracity, and if he made such a statement I am sure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be the last to question it.

I do know that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, with the basic honesty which usually permeates everything he says in this house, began his own comments on this subject, as reported at page 12858 of Hansard, by saying that in normal circumstances the papers to which he is referring would have to be considered privileged. Then he went on to say that because of abnormal and particular circumstances—I am paraphrasing his words—an exception should be made in this case.

Obviously the hon. member admits that in normal circumstances these papers are privileged. As I listened to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) I failed to find anything in his eloquent remarks which persuaded me that there was anything extraordinary about this particular situation which would make the tabling of these papers desirable.

The question before us is not whether the co-ordinates should have been determined three months, six months or a year ago. This is a complex matter, as the former minister of fisheries rightly pointed out during his participation in the debate not long ago. The real question is whether or not these papers are privileged. I can only repeat that in the opinion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs they are privileged documents. They embody correspondence between the governments of two countries and I am afraid that even in the most ideal of circumstances the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have to obtain permission from the United States before there could be any question of tabling them.

I believe both members of the New Democratic Party have done service to the house by emphasizing once again the lack of guidance from which the house suffers when approaching such problems. I repeat my desire that you in your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, might recommend to the appropriate authorities that at the first opportunity in the next session a special committee be set up to go into the whole question of the production of papers, so that we might have guide lines as to what should be considered privileged and what should not.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call it seven o'clock, and in view of the fact that a message will be coming shortly from another place, I might perhaps underline the principle to which the hon. member for Skeena has referred. When we have before the house a motion for the production of papers the one thing upon which the debate should be based in the feasibility or otherwise of producing these documents. A great deal of latitude has been allowed in this connection because of the special circumstances to which the hon. member for Skeena has referred—circumstances which were mentioned also by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But I would remind hon. members that the principle is still there, that we should not stray from it, and the fact that much of this debate has taken place on the substance of the motion rather than on the feasibility of producing the documents in question should not be considered as a precedent for the future.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (7:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting employer and employee relations in the Public Service of Canada.
An Act respecting employment in the Public Service of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The house will now resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

RESEARCH

PROVISION FOR GRANTS TO CORPORATIONS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-252, to provide general incentives to industry for the expansion of scientific research and development in Canada and to effect certain related amendments to the Income Tax Act—Mr. Drury—Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole to consider Bill C-252. It being after seven o'clock, the sitting will be suspended until eight o'clock.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that we take the full hour and return at 8.15.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: The sitting will be suspended until 8.15.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8.15 p.m.

The Chairman: Before the committee suspended its sitting at six o'clock it was discussing clause 4 of the bill to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North moved the following amendment:

That clause 4 be amended by adding thereto a new subsection (5), as follows:
(5) Where the research is done for or on behalf of the applicant by an approved association, university, college, research institute or other similar institution, the phrase "25 per cent" where it appears in subsections (1) and (2) shall be read as "50 per cent".

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I commend the efforts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North in trying to get more research done by research associations, in universities and in similar institutions. However, perhaps there are some objections to the technique that he has proposed to bring this about. I might say in the first place that federal government support for research in universities and other non-profit organizations is provided through a number of channels other than this bill. Perhaps the best known one is the National Research Council, and in this connection I will refer the hon. gentleman to the current issue of the Globe and Mail which, at page 25, attempts to summarize the past performance and anticipates the vastly increased performance of the N.R.C. in this matter of support for universities, and a new technique which they are proposing to adopt to achieve this. I think that as a means of providing for increased research efforts in these non-profit organizations such as universities or research institutes the other channels or vehicles are more satisfactory than this bill.

Second, the Department of Industry has recently inaugurated a new program which is called, support of industrial research institutes. We are now starting in two universities, as an initial step, to organize non-profit research institutes which will encourage and engage in self-sustaining research with industry, with a view both to bringing the industrial community closer to the university in the research field and of providing a focus for having research done with facilities which, as the hon. gentleman pointed out, small businesses cannot afford.

It would be the hope that by meeting some elements of the administrative costs of these new institutes there could be a considerable increase in industrial research done by universities in universities, with facilities of a calibre which small businesses themselves could not afford. I think probably this is a better approach than the one suggested in this amendment.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I do think that there would be a danger, were this amendment adopted, that large corporations now engaged in research on their own account with their own facilities, would quite obviously quickly organize this same research under an institute of some description and thereby double the federal grant without changing the quantum or nature of the research at all. I do not believe one would want to encourage this kind of manoeuvre.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I have some doubt myself about whether the amendment, proposing as it does to increase substantially the charge on the exchequer, raising it to 50 per cent of the expenditures from the proposed 25 per cent, is in order.

Mr. Orlikow: I will not make any comment on the last suggestion of the minister. The Chair will, of course, have to decide whether or not my amendment is in order.

With reference to the earlier comments of the minister, however, I should like to say it is not my thought or that of my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo South, who could not be here today but who drafted the substance of this amendment, that this amendment could be the only method the government would use to encourage industry, small and large, to place research in the various universities. I am happy to have the report of the minister on the steps that have been taken to this end. I have said, as have many others much more competent and knowledgeable than I am, that research, both basic and applied in government, in universities and in private industry, is woefully inadequate.

I suggest to the minister that if my amendment is in order, then it is one more tool which the government can use to encourage industry to aid more research. I do not accept the minister's suggestion that industry could use this method to set up some kind of institute which would do the research an industry has been doing, just because the industry could get increased grants or tax concessions. As I understand it, no university will work with an industry in research if the industry requires that the results of the research shall be the property of the industry.

I am told for example that International Nickel has a very fine program of post-graduate research fellowships under which there is written into the details of the agreement that any discoveries which are made as a result of the research done by these research fellows shall not be the property of the company, but shall accrue to the university. I do not believe therefore that factor is an important one. Unless you rule that my amendment is not in order, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the minister that what my colleague the hon. member for Waterloo South has drafted will be one more useful tool for the government to help scientific research.

Mr. Kindt: I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. In so far as scientific research is concerned, I should like him to indicate whether he is thinking of fundamental research or applied research. There is a vast difference between these two. I am very much of the opinion that in so far as industry in this country is concerned, applied research is the most important—that is, taking the end product of scientific research and applying it to industry. The minister is laughing, but I want him to explain this.

Mr. Drury: I am very sorry the hon. member for Macleod was not in the house before the dinner hour when this question was examined. I refer him to page 401 of the evidence of the committee, to which I referred before, for the definition of research. I will not take the time to read it again.

Mr. Kindt: Can the minister tell me where on this page that is explained?

Mr. Drury: Page 401, line 7, beginning with the words: "That is correct. The current definition of the O.E.C.D. is ..." and continuing for the balance of the page.

Mr. Kindt: Let me ask the minister this: Will he elaborate briefly on the (b) clause which says applied research is work undertaken for the advancement of scientific knowledge with a specific practical application in view. Now, is the thought to have all scientific research oriented to later application or will it be fundamental research pushing back the frontiers of knowledge. I think that is covered in paragraph (a).

To what extent are you going to place the emphasis on each type of research? Is it going to be left entirely to industry to come along and take the end products of research, as has been the case over the years, or has the minister in mind making research applicable to industry? Will it be left to industrialists to take the end products of research and apply them to industry, as is done now?

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: The purpose of the bill is to allow the greatest freedom possible to corporations to increase their research activities, whether in the field of fundamental research, applied research, or development, as defined on the page to which we refer. The decision as to emphasis, direction and quantum will remain entirely with the applicant for a grant, the corporation doing the research, without direction from the government.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, did not the Minister of Industry raise a point of order?

The Chairman: I do not know whether the Minister of Industry a few minutes ago raised a point of order, but I was under the impression that he mentioned that there were financial implications in the amendment. Having read the resolution preceding the bill I now read from Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 250, subclause 3, beginning half way down the paragraph:

> The constitutional principle which vests in the Crown the sole responsibility of incurring national expenditure forbids an increase by the Commons of a sum demanded on behalf of the Crown for the service of the state. This principle, however, is apparently disregarded when the recommendation of the Crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms, places no limitation on the amount of expenditure to be authorized by the resolution.

I shall also read subparagraph (4):

> (4) The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the House with the Governor General's recommendation upon which a Committee of the Whole is set up cannot be amended. Amendments will only be in order if they fall within the terms of the resolution. The procedure in committee on those resolutions follows in principle the procedure of the Committee of Supply, and amendments are out of order if they are proposed with a view to substituting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation.

Citation 251, subclause 1, reads as follows:

> It may happen that the resolution sanctions some expenditure without fixing the maximum amount to be spent. If, for instance, the resolution recommends that adequate salaries be paid a newly constituted body and the amounts of the salaries are fixed in the bill based on that resolution, the committee on the bill has the right to increase those amounts, because, in doing so, it does not go beyond the scope of the royal recommendation.

It is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, from the financial point of view, does not go beyond the scope of the resolution.

Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Orlikow) negatived: yeas, 22; nays, 27.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Minister may obtain and give advice.

Mr. Barnett: I wish to ask the minister one or two questions on clause 12. So far as I can discover this clause did not receive detailed attention in committee. It has to do with the minister seeking advice from different quarters. The only department specifically mentioned is, under paragraph (b), the Department of Trade and Commerce, from which advice may be sought for a specific purpose.

As I understand subclause (a), it gives the minister power to seek advice whether any specific activity constitutes scientific research and development. I presume that research and development will have to come within the meaning of the definition the minister gave earlier. He spoke of standards, and of what constituted research, and said that the standing committee had outlined these matters. The minister also spoke about these matters for the benefit of the hon. member for Macleod.

My question is this: Why is the minister limited to the Department of Trade and Commerce in seeking advice whether research and development from any activity is likely to result and be of benefit to Canada? My question in part arises from a question I asked before the dinner recess. Advice whether research into the fields of air, water and soil pollution are likely to be of benefit to Canada is not, I suggest, obtainable particularly from the Department of Trade and Commerce. Usually when questions about pollution arise in the house, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources answers. That minister has said that he is prepared to answer questions with respect to water pollution. Recently he suggested that matters dealing with air pollution lie within the purview of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Grafftey: Where is the question?

Mr. Barnett: Really, my question is on this point: Why is this advice, whether research is likely to result in benefit, limited to that obtainable from the Department of Trade and Commerce? Would the minister not consider the advisability of expanding this provision, so that other departments might be mentioned? Other departments have particular interests in questions as to whether certain fields of research can be to the benefit of Canada. What is the minister's reaction to this suggestion?

Mr. Drury: I think the observation just made is a very useful one. The drafting of 12 (b) indicates clearly the significance which would be given to the phrase "of benefit to Canada". The test which was to be applied and which had to be satisfied was that the corporations engaging in research would be free from any kind of external inhibition against exploiting the research in Canada, whether this be an economic law of another jurisdiction outside Canada, whether it be an agreement between the company doing research in Canada and some foreign company outside Canada, or whether it be a matter of corporate policy in a parent-subsidiary relationship. It was felt that the best source of this information would be the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) do not limit the minister in his search for advice to those particular departments. The object of the provision is rather to place an obligation upon those departments to provide advice. They do not limit the minister to those particular sources for the information he may require. If a question should arise as to whether pollution research of a particular nature is likely to be beneficial, there is nothing here to inhibit the seeking of advice from the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or, indeed, from any other department.

Mr. Barnett: Having heard that explanation from the minister I will not press my suggestion that the clause be amended. Perhaps we might serve notice on him that we shall expect him to seek that advice at appropriate times, and perhaps on some other occasion we may be suggesting to the other ministers whom he has named that they should proffer advice to the Minister of Industry from time to time.

Mr. Lewis: I had intended to raise another question in relation to clause 12. When I originally read it I could not understand why it was there at all. It seemed obvious that one department of government has the duty as well as the right to consult other departments of government. Then I read clause 13 and thought that perhaps those who had drafted the bill had put in clause 12 to make it possible for employees to obtain information in a way which might otherwise not be permitted, and that clause 12 was there to make sense of clause 13. Otherwise I do not see why it should be provided in legislation that the minister may obtain advice from one department or another. Surely, that is understood, and there is no need for legislation to permit him to do so.

Then I read the following clause and it occurred to me that perhaps it was the content of clause 13 which gave those who had drafted this bill reason for inserting clause 12. If this is the case I suggest to the minister that his answer to the question asked by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni is not adequate. If the minister removes any inhibition about obtaining the information he requires from the departments mentioned in clause 12 he obviously does not remove it with regard to any department which is not mentioned in clause 12. Therefore there is, obviously, sense in what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said, namely that there are other ministries in possession of advice of value to the minister with regard to whether a particular piece of research is of benefit to Canada, and should not those other ministries also be mentioned in order that the exculpatory clause, if I may use a technical word, clause 13, would apply to those ministries as well as to those mentioned?

If I understand the clauses correctly and if there is this relationship between clauses 12 and 13 the minister might well consider whether he ought not to amend clause 12.

Mr. Drury: I thank the hon. member for providing that exposition. He is correct in his analysis but I think he has gone slightly awry in his conclusion.

Mr. Lewis: It is better to be half right than not right at all.

Mr. Drury: It is better than being half pregnant, as they say. The kind of information which is being talked about in clauses 11 and 12 is information which comes under the heading generally of privileged information—it is privileged in relation to income tax matters or commercial security or commercial privacy. The kind of information which one would seek from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in relation, say, to the usefulness of work on pollution would be more in the public domain than would be the information we have in mind here—corporate agreements, income tax returns and that kind of thing. While I do not endorse the adjective "exculpatory", it does impose a special regime on this special type of information and enables it to be transmitted between those concerned without destroying the privilege.

Mr. Barnett: I would be interested to know what the minister has in mind with respect to the use of the recently established Science Council of Canada to influence the general approach to be taken under this bill. Will the council be called upon for advice with regard to the direction to be followed as a result of this legislation?

Mr. Drury: This is not a bill to launch a government-directed program of research. This is an incentive offered by the government in a purely objective way to encourage a substantial increase in industrial research in Canada. The initiative with respect to the type, amount and location of the research is left entirely to the applicant for a grant. It will not be directed.

As far as the Science Council is concerned, one would hope it would make known to those corporations within its sphere of influence the advantages of the incentives offered by this bill and perhaps suggest to corporations that they should operate to take advantage of these incentives.

It is neither the purpose of the bill nor the function of the Department of Industry to indicate to individual corporations the kind of research they should or should not be engaged in as a consequence of this statute.

Mr. Barnett: If I understand the minister correctly, he is suggesting that the flow of information would be from the Science Council to industries and that the industries then would approach the government under the terms of this bill for the appropriate assistance which it provides.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a further question in connection with subclause (b) of clause 12, where it is stated that the minister may obtain the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A great many firms are engaged in research into and manufacture of fertilizer, insecticides and so on. Would the Department of Agriculture not be the department which would be contacted when inquiries are required concerning matters of this nature? They have their own research facilities and would know more about this than would the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am wondering also whether fertilizer and insecticide companies, or others engaged in these operations, would be eligible for grants under this legislation. Would they not come under the definition "aiding industrial research"?

Mr. Drury: There are several parts to the hon. member's question. First, corporations engaged in the research and production of insecticides, fertilizers and other aids to agriculture would qualify for these incentives. Second, I can assure members of the committee that the Minister of Industry will seek advice wherever it can be best obtained. There is nothing in this clause which inhibits or deters the minister from seeking advice wherever it can be best obtained. As the hon. member for York South pointed out, there were special reasons for naming these departments, and they relate to clause 13. In response to the third question, certainly the advice of the Department of Agriculture would be sought when questions arise in respect of which this department has a particular expertise which is of interest.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have just a couple of questions on this clause. In Kootenay West COMINCO is very interested in research related to the pollution of the Columbia river. There also is an interest in research with regard to the pollution of another river near Kimberley in the riding represented by the hon. member for Kootenay East. If they could prove they were doing something for the general advantage of Canada, would they under this legislation be entitled to a grant for this type of research. Also in my constituency we have a few farm corporations. In some circumstances they have extensive holdings and are doing certain research in respect of fish farming, fur farming on their properties and the provision of humane traps in respect of trapping operations on these properties. If a farm corporation could prove that the work they are undertaking is to the general advantage of the people of Canada, would they come under the terms of this bill?

Mr. Drury: In so far as the Twin River research on pollution is concerned, the answer is yes. The kind of work COMINCO is doing would qualify. In so far as the incorporated farmers are concerned, it may be a little more complicated. There might be some difficulty in deciding what is research and what is production for profit. I would not attempt to say that one biological process would qualify for a research grant and that another biological process would not. I hope we will have people who understand these things sufficiently to say whether the particular operation or particular things being gone will qualify under this definition of research. In this regard it will not be the Minister of Industry alone who will decide. He will seek the advice both of hon. members and the various departments of government which have special knowledge in this field.

Mr. Hales: With regard to clause 12(b) the minister stated he would feel free to consult with any department or agency of government. Why then is it necessary to include in clause 12(b) the words "obtain the advice of the Department of Trade and Commerce on whether any particular scientific research and development is likely to result in benefit to Canada"? Why would the Department of Trade and Commerce be the only department that would be asked to say whether it is of benefit to Canada? I am wondering why the words should not be "obtain the advice of any department". Would the minister see fit to change that?

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Drury: As I explained earlier, clauses 11, 12 and 13 really should be read together. The hon. member for Wellington South will note that under clause 13 the information which is obtained as a consequence of being provided under 11 or 12 is privileged. The type of information particularly obtainable from the Department of Trade and Commerce relates to corporate arrangements of an economic character between subsidiaries in Canada and parents abroad, or vice versa. The Department of Trade and Commerce, as I believe the hon. gentleman knows, is charged with administration of guide lines. As a consequence of this, that department is the repository of, and has received from corporations doing business in Canada, a considerable amount of confidential information.

The Department of Trade and Commerce receives this information on the ground that it will not be published. The purpose of clause 12 is to authorize the Department of Trade and Commerce to disclose this privileged information to the Minister of Industry in order that he may be able to make a determination concerning the appropriateness of a grant under this legislation. Clause 13 makes quite clear that such information received by the Minister of Industry is in itself privileged.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have had no experience in criminal law even in respect of the smallest offence. I wonder whether the minister would tell me who decides whether an offence of the type referred to in subclause (1) (a) is an indictable offence? It is not often that one sees a provision in which it says that if you commit a certain offence you are guilty either of an indictable offence subject to certain consequences or you are guilty of an offence liable to summary conviction in certain circumstances. What is the criterion for making that decision, and who will make it?

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I suppose I should appeal to my colleague, the Solicitor General, who is here. All I can say is that clause 15 represents the gestation of the Department of Justice, for which I must accept responsibility but plead inability to explain it.

Mr. Lewis: It is either a gestation or an abortion.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate why there is in subclause 3 the time limitation of five years. Were it not for this subclause, what would be the time limit?

Mr. Drury: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot answer that question either. I do not know what the normal rule is. I have rather automatically assumed that this is one of the standard provisions that is written into the penal clauses of every statute.

Mr. Lewis: Is it not six months?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think that in the case of a summary conviction the period is a year, but I confess that like my hon. friend from York South I have not been in the criminal courts for a goodly number of years.

Mr. Drury: Perhaps I may take advice on this matter, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I cannot speak with authority on this matter, but reaching back to my experience in the criminal courts I suggest that in the interests of the accused there should be some limitation in respect of the period during which he may be faced with a charge. In the wisdom of the law officers, five years appeared to be an appropriate time after which one could not be charged with an offence.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps someone in the other place will look at this clause.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 16—Application of Act.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, I would like some information from the minister on clause 16. The explanation with regard to this clause probably follows his remarks in connection with clause 12. In the brief presented yesterday to the members of the cabinet by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture—the minister may have been at that meeting —there is the suggestion of a deduction from the farmer of one tenth of one per cent of the final wheat board price for one year, to be used for research into the problems of production, and particularly the utilization of grain. This would include research into new foodstuffs that could be made from grain. Clause 16 provides for the application of the act and says:

> This act is applicable to expenditures on scientific research and development—

I emphasize the word "development"

> —in any fiscal period of a corporation ending in the calendar year 1966 or any subsequent calendar year.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture stressed that the proposed research would be important for western Canada, which means it would also be very important for all of Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether such a research project would be considered to be within the provisions of this act?

Mr. Drury: I am not sure precisely what is proposed, but I think I can say that research and development of new uses of cereal grain or new products made from cereal grain, that is, made by an incorporated company, should qualify for these grants. This is the type of new venture that the bill is designed to encourage.

Mr. Pascoe: This brief says:

> The fund should be administered by a board of western farm organization representatives.

Would they be considered to be a corporation?

Mr. Drury: It would depend on how a board of western farm organization representatives organized themselves. A group of farmers is clearly not a corporation. But with the aid of a good lawyer like the hon. member for York South they could incorporate themselves.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AMENDMENT OF VARIOUS ACTS RESPECTING SALARIES OF OFFICIALS

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-266, to provide for the revision of certain salaries fixed by statute.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is, I think, largely self-explanatory. Its principal purpose is to bring up to date the salaries of certain officers whose remuneration is fixed by statute and cannot be changed except by legislative action. The last occasion on which the salaries in question were changed was in December, 1963, when a special enactment, chapter 41 of the Statutes of Canada 1963, was approved by parliament, covering much the same group of officials as those with whom this present bill is concerned.

The bill now before the house incorporates also one new principle, applicable to some but not all the officers whose salaries will be adjusted by this statute. It seeks the authority of parliament to enable the governor in council to make future salary adjustments of most of the officers covered by this legislation without the requirement of returning to parliament to seek further legislative amendments. Exceptions are made in the case of three officials who bear a special relationship to parliament, the Auditor General, the Chief Electoral Officer and the Representation Commissioner. In these three cases the special relationship which exists between these three officers and parliament suggests that changes in their rate of remuneration should continue to be made only with the express legislative authority of parliament.

In all other cases, however, except that of the Commissioner General for Canadian government participation in Expo '67—which post will disappear at the end of the World Fair or shortly after—there would appear to be justification for asking for a release from the requirement that the executive must come back to parliament and seek legislative amendments, either through an omnibus bill or through a whole series of separate amendments, every time a salary increase appears to be justified.

I trust that hon. members on all sides of the house will agree with the government's proposals for expediting the salary treatment of the officials covered by the bill. The fact that their rates of remuneration have remained frozen since December 1, 1963 and that they can be changed only as a result of legislative action by parliament, now long overdue, indicates the nature of the problem. With the legislative work-load that has faced parliament in recent years, and is likely to continue into the future, there would appear to be little justification for adding to parliament's agenda unnecessarily through bills such as these whose sole purpose is to authorize a periodic increase in the salaries of certain officers of boards, commissions, etc.

Further, it is not fair to the officers concerned, in the view of the government, to ask them to accept the long delays in salary adjustments that arise from the existing legislative requirement, especially in times like the present ones when outside salaries are moving upward with abnormal rapidity, and all other public servants, including all deputy ministers and many other members of commissions, boards, etc. can have their salaries kept current and reasonably up to date by executive action.

Members will wish to know the basis on which the proposed increases have been recommended. When deputy ministers', and other order in council salaries were adjusted last to bring them up to date from December 1, 1963 to December 1, 1965, an increase of 8 per cent was determined as the basis for most of those adjustments. The same percentage has been adopted in most of the cases covered by the legislation. Exceptions to the general rule have been made in a number of cases, notably the Auditor General, the vice chairman of the National Energy Board, and the first vice chairman of the Tariff Board, in recognition of the fact that their existing rates of pay do not reflect adequately the measure of their duties and/or the special responsibilities which they are carrying.

In the case of the Auditor General, the amount of increase has also been set in recognition of the fact that any future salary adjustments in his case will require parliamentary action and can only be considered when the Financial Administration Act is undergoing amendment. The effective date for all increases goes back to December 1965—that is the date of the increase for senior civil servants. I should also add that there are certain restraints placed by the bill on the freedom of the governor in council to make further salary adjustments in future. No authority is given for reductions in salary by action of the governor in council. Safeguards are provided to ensure internal relativity and equality of treatment among all ordinary members within each board and commission.

I will be glad to elaborate on these and other points which may be of interest to hon. members when we reach the clause by clause discussion of the bill. Meanwhile, I hope that the explanations I have given will suffice to satisfy the house that it can give approval in principle to the bill at this stage.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house involves a major change in principle. Heretofore a substantial number of salaries were fixed only by statute and the governor in council had no authority in respect of them. As I understand it, the principle behind that practice was simply to assure the total independence of the members of these boards from the governor in council or from any direct or indirect pressure by the cabinet. In this bill we are making a change and putting it within the authority of the cabinet to increase salaries, although the legislation provides a floor. If the house is aware of this major change in principle and is satisfied that there is not likely to arise as a result thereof any type of direct or indirect pressure upon these public servants, then there could be no complaint. I might have understood it more readily if this had applied right across the board in all statutory salaries, but the minister has indicated that there are exemptions in relation to three cases which he says bear a very special relationship to parliament, namely the Auditor General, the Representation Commissioner and the Chief Electoral Officer. I have some reservations as to whether their intimacy with the work of parliament is of such a nature that it justifies a differentiation from the other categories set forth in the schedule to the bill.

Perhaps the proper time to discuss this with the minister will be in committee of the whole, but I think the minister will have to put before the committee some more cogent reasons than he has already given as to why we should abandon what has been the time honoured procedure of fixing salaries by statute and thereby protecting totally the impartiality and independence of these particular boards and commissions.

I know there are problems which arise by reason of the delay in getting around to the matter, but even those delays can be taken care of when the legislation is made substantially retroactive, as is the case here.

What I would like to put to the minister is this: If the principle of fixing salaries by statute was considered by parliament in the past as a necessary requisite to ensure the impartiality and independence of these boards and commissions from any pressure on the part of the governor in council, what has happened to change that situation? Is the minister asserting that the present cabinet is more enlightened than previous cabinets?

Mr. Benson: Certainly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We know of course that such is not the case and that perhaps we have never seen such an unenlightened cabinet in the history of our confederation.

An important principle is involved because there can be no doubt whatsoever that these boards and commissions must be under no pressure whatever from politicians. I will note in passing that for example a new floor is fixed for the chief commissioner of the Board of Transport Commissioners at a figure of $25,000, whereas the old salary was equal to the salary of the President of the Exchequer Court, and the bill that is forthcoming immediately after this bill will fix the salary of the President of the Exchequer Court at $35,000 and of the Exchequer Court judges at $30,000, which is considerably different from what is mentioned for the Board of Transport Commissioners.

We on this side have these reservations and we propose to examine the minister in some detail in committee of the whole, so that he can explain to us why a change is necessary now over what has been the clear position for so many years in preserving the independence by statutory rates.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, most of what might be said on this legislation can be said when we are in committee of the whole. It is pretty obvious that with my voice tonight I will not make a 40 minute speech on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: It is nice to be applauded in the house once in a while, even if one has to promise a short speech in order to get it.

Mr. Winkler: Few people can ask for it and get it.

Mr. Knowles: I would simply like to say that I think there is a good case for the kind of change that the government is proposing. I recognize, as the hon. member for Carleton has pointed out, that this is a rather striking change because for a long time many of these salaries have been fixed by statute. However, the fact is that throughout the years we have changed this situation one step at a time.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I think there is no more reason for some of these people who are in what are, in effect, administrative positions, to wait for the salary changes, as opposed to deputy ministers and other high ranking officials in the government service. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) has a point which I think is a good one, namely where do we draw the line? Frankly, the thing that appeals to me most about this bill is that the government has left the three officials who are appointed directly by parliament, and who are directly responsible to parliament in the same position they were before, namely that their salaries are fixed by statute and can only be changed by parliament. As has been indicated the three in question are the Auditor General, the Representation Commissioner and the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The Auditor General is not appointed by parliament.

Mr. Knowles: I accept the correction, but he is responsible to parliament.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Indeed.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me there is no question but that an official of that kind, who has that sort of responsibility, should not be in a position to put pressure on the government for an increase in salary without it having to come before parliament.

Some people, of course, may look at some of these salaries and think they are too high when compared with the salaries paid in some walks of life. I think it has to be admitted that with the kind of work and the kind of responsibility that is involved, the government has not gone off the deep end. When we get into committee, I should like to ask a question about the members of the Income Tax Appeal Board, who are in part I of the schedule—that is, their salaries need no longer be fixed by statute but will be fixed by the governor in council. I wonder if the Income Tax Appeal Board is not rather close to a court. It seems to me that just as we leave the salaries of judges to be fixed by statute, the same situation should apply to the members of that board.

As I understand it, the Income Tax Appeal Board is a board to which taxpayers can appeal against the decisions of the Department of National Revenue. It strikes me there is that kind of judicial independence that should be maintained there. However, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to spin this out at length. I think that in principle what the government is asking parliament to do has much to commend it. We shall welcome further comments by the minister on the details when we get into committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 2—Interpretation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I assume the minister is going to make some further comment?

Mr. Benson: I should like to make one or two comments with regard to some questions raised by the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. First of all, the main reason this legislation is presented by the government is that the government thinks it is unfair to statutory officials who have been appointed to have to wait long periods of time in order to get their salaries adjusted.

I do not think, personally, with the protection that is built into clause 4 of this bill, that there is any question of the government threatening the independence of the people involved. I think that their independence will remain as it is and as provided by statute, because clause 4 forbids the government to reduce any salary and compels it to treat everyone at the same level fairly. This will maintain the independence of these boards. I can assure the committee that any time the government was going to raise some of the salaries and chose to leave out any one board, the members of the opposition would not allow this procedure to go unnoticed. There would be therefore adequate protection.

Another question that was raised was the question of the floor for the chairman of the Board of Transport Commissioners. This question was raised at the time we were going to change these salaries, and I believe although I am not sure that it was discussed with the chairman by the Minister of Transport. One of the things that is happening with this particular board is that its situation is changing; there will be a new board. The present chairman, I believe, is the last one who will have the opportunity to move into the Exchequer Court. He presently can become a member of the Exchequer Court, as I understand the situation.

A question was raised with regard to the Income Tax Appeal Board by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He said it had some judicial function. However, it is not a court in the true sense in that it is not conducted the way other courts are. Each of these boards included in the bill has some sort of judicial capacity in its activities. I do not believe the mere fact of being covered in this particular bill will in any way affect the independence of the Income Tax Appeal Board. In addition to that, tomorrow we will have the Carter Commission report and we may see some changes suggested with respect to various matters, perhaps including the Income Tax Appeal Board.

Mr. Knowles: It takes ten years to implement a royal commission report.

Mr. Benson: It does not take this government ten years to implement a report.

If there are any other questions, I would be glad to deal with them as we move along.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It becomes a matter of judgment, whether the new principle in this bill showed he adopted, but I confess I have considerable sympathy for the members of these boards who see deputy ministers and others getting their salaries adjusted with regularity, while they must wait to come to parliament. I believe the new system, imposes a special responsibility upon those who sit in the opposition, during such limited time as we will be sitting on this side of the house, to watch what is done by the government. We must make absolutely certain that these powers now being vested in the governor in council will not be used to reward sycophancy or punish independence.

It would be a most undesirable thing if members of boards who exercised full independence were denied an increase because the government was displeased with them. Now, I recognize when I say that, if the government were displeased they probably would not have any legislation passed and there would be no increase. I have reservations, and I can only say those reservations are such that they impose upon the opposition a special responsibility to watch what is being done by the governor in council in respect of these salaries.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson) referred to certain cases of impartiality such as, for instance, the position of chairman of the Tax Appeal Board and the chairman of the Board of Transport Commissioners. I would also like to mention another case, namely the position of Chief Electoral Officer, the person responsible for the administration of the Canada Elections Act. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing whatsoever against the Chief Electoral Officer. However, I would like to say that, in my opinion, this person has a thankless job to do. I am not against an increase in salary for him, but I would like to make sure that there is no doubt as to the impartiality of this official on behalf of the government.

I would like to point out here a particular case where there is reason to wonder whether the government is not trying to force its decisions upon the population, through its senior officers, in such important areas as the administration of the Canada Elections Act.

In recent years, the act was amended and the Electoral Boundaries Commission was established. This commission has tried to—

[English]

Mr. Benson: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Does he not realize that in this bill the salary of the Chief Electoral Officer is to be determined by parliament? The government in the case of the Chief Electoral Officer, as in the case of the Redistribution Commissioner and the Auditor General, will not have the right to act on salaries.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I realize that. But I note as well that the salary has been increased in that instance, and I want to point out something important, lest I do not have another opportunity to do so.

I shall continue. Two or three years ago, in this house, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) proposed the creation of a redistribution commission to be composed of impartial commissioners appointed by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada and so on and so forth. For days we spoke about the necessity of there being the utmost impartiality in matters dealing with elections.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after those grandiose statements by the Liberal party, I see the Elections Act was not really applied impartially and that it even served political purposes, of which I shall give a specific instance.

In my constituency of Lapointe, there was a returning officer who did a very good job. He was an appointee of the Conservative party, at the time it was in office. I have had the opportunity to deal with that returning officer in the last three elections. One cannot say that I am trying to protect a supporter, for he was appointed by the Conservative party. But he is a competent man who had the necessary qualifications to fulfil his duties well—and I say this, knowing that he may be one of my opponents in politics. He is still young enough, as he has not yet reached 65. And all of a sudden, without any notice to him, and simply because of the new boundaries of the riding, somebody else is appointed in his place. That other man I do not know.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is giving wrong information to the house, because the present returning officer in the present riding of Lapointe is still in office. If the separatist member for Lapointe decided to leave parliament in Ottawa once and for all, the gentleman in question would be the returning officer for his riding.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I will say to the hon. member that he is most definitely wrong because the one who was in office for the 1965 elections was a Mr. J. O. Bradette and that the one who holds the office right now and who sent me copies of the new redistribution of polling stations less than a month ago is a Mr. Bélanger of Kénogami.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, I maintain that the hon. member for Lapointe is not speaking the truth, because the returning officer for the present riding of Lapointe is still the same Mr. Bradette.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, let the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State explain to me how it is that the official correspondence I am now receiving bears the signature of Mr. Bélanger of Kenogami, returning officer. It is not my intention to blame this gentleman, I do not know whether he is efficient or not, I never met him. But I received recently a letter from Mr. Bélanger of Kenogami, insurance broker, notifying me that, from now on, the new polls will be the following, and giving the numbers, and that there will be so many voters in each poll, and he is giving me the whole distribution of polls as regards the next election and he is telling me that he has been appointed to look after the implementation of the Elections Act in the constituency of Lapointe during the next election. Perhaps it would be the other one, if it were a by-election, but at any rate, the one looking after the correspondence, the one who received the order and the necessary amounts to reorganize the distribution of polls in the constituency of Lapointe is not Mr. J. O. Bradette any more, former returning officer in the constituency of Lapointe, but Mr. Bélanger, whose given name I forget; but I have some of his letters in my office and his signature bears the mention "Returning Officer for the constituency of Lapointe". Therefore, should he be usurping such a title, I would like to ask the government to initiate the necessary proceedings.

I do not know him, Mr. Chairman, I am not saying he is not competent, I am not saying he does not have the knowledge he should—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Lapointe; I think he is making remarks about a returning officer in a constituency, when we are dealing with a bill related to the chief electoral officer, which has nothing to do with the appointment or the duties of a returning officer in a constituency. I would therefore ask the hon. member to address himself to the bill we are considering.

Mr. Grégoire: I think you are right, Mr. Chairman, but I was side-tracked by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard). Now, if the hon. member for Bonaventure is prepared to rise and state that Mr. Bradette is still the returning officer for the constituency of Lapointe or that he has been reinstated in that job, in short, if he has not been replaced and there is no question of replacing him, I can assure the house that it will help in bringing this debate to an early conclusion.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I interrupt the hon. member because I do not believe the we can deal with this question at this stage. I should then request the hon. member to limit his remarks to the bill now before us.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, if, as I said, the hon. member for Bonaventure is right, then, the question I am raising as to the impartiality of senior civil servants or the authority that may be exerted by the government over senior civil servants is no longer motivated. So, I say that if I am right, then I shall connect the whole thing to the authority of the government over the senior civil servants listed in the schedule of Bill No. C-266. If I am right, I intend to mention the activities of the government. If I am wrong, obviously, I can no longer mention them. So, Mr. Chairman, I think you will agree with me that I have raised the point, thinking that I was right, in stating that there had been undue influence by the government in the selection of a returning officer precisely—since the government does not appoint them directly—through the chief electoral officer. The chief electoral officer appoints the people suggested to him or dictated to him by the government.

Mr. Béchard: On a point of order. Once again I want to say that the hon. member is ill-informed and that he does not know the act, because returning officers are appointed by order in council and not by the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, if I am not mistaken, returning officers are appointed by the chief electoral officer who follows—

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think this is the proper time to discuss who is responsible for the appointment of returning officers in a constituency. I feel any remarks from either side of the house should deal with the bill now before the committee.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am only referring to Part II of the schedule of Bill No. C-266 where mention is made of the chief electoral officer. I simply wanted to suggest that this senior official appointed by the government should be completely and totally free from any interference on the part of the government.

When I raised that point earlier, the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State told me that the returning officer in my riding had not been changed. If such is the case—I have almost completed my remarks—since I have received letters from an individual who signs as the returning officer for my riding, I shall ask the government to take appropriate action against that person who is usurping rights and taking upon himself duties which are not his. I do not know him and I do not know whether or not he is qualified to carry out those duties. I do know, however, that I received some letters, and if this is an imposture, I shall advise the government to that effect and ask that action be taken. On the other hand, if the hon. member for Bonaventure is right, I shall be pleased to know that a man performing his work efficiently has not been dismissed without any reason.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Limitation on authority to fix salaries.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the President of the Treasury Board would care to tell us how this bill will be handled by the commissioners who are revising the statutes. This bill in its schedule provides amendments to ten different statutes while some of the clauses lay down certain principles.

Mr. Benson: I would hope, and I will request, that the changes in the individual statutes be built into them. I think this would be the proper way to deal with this matter. The clauses which cover all of those statutes will, of course, be included in this statute as well.

Mr. Knowles: That is why I asked my question on clause 4. I can see that it is easy and appropriate to build the ten changes listed in the schedule into the separate acts. But what happens to clause 4? Does it get built into the same ten acts ten different times?

Mr. Benson: Not being an expert on the consolidation of statutes I cannot tell the hon. member exactly how this will be handled but I will bring the problem to the attention of those who consolidate the statutes and I am sure they will do the proper thing in the circumstances. I really do not know what it is.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know whether the commissioners solved the last problem he took to them last year when he put through am omnibus bill of this character?

Mr. Benson: I have not seen what they did but I know this matter was brought to their attention.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Coming into force.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I did not follow the minister when he spoke of the reasons for the choice of this date December 1, 1965. By the time this bill comes into effect, that will be 15 months ago. Have there been any adjustments made to major salaries in that 15-month period and do these salaries take such adjustments into consideration, if any have been made since December 1, 1965?

Mr. Benson: There have been no changes made in the senior order in council appointments since that date. This matter is under review at the present time and the present legislation, among other things, will make it possible for any changes in senior order in council appointments to be applied to those receiving statutory salaries immediately. The last salary change in senior order in council appointments, that is, deputy ministers and so on, was made on December 1, 1965, and is in the same amount as this adjustment.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): So the minister has not built in to these minimum figures anything that has happened since that time.

Mr. Benson: Nothing has happened to the senior order in council appointments. When they are reconsidered, those other salaries will be reconsidered at the same time.

Mr. Barnett: With regard to this retroactive aspect, can the minister in his other capacity tell us what happens with regard to these retroactive payments as far as income tax is concerned?

Mr. Benson: Salaried employees report their incomes on a cash basis. If they received this cash in 1967 it will be taxed in 1967.

Mr. Ballard: I wish to ask a question on the schedule. I should like to point out that the salary increases outlined follow fairly closely a mathematical formula with respect to increases, with the exception of the first, where the chief commissioner under the Canada Grain Act receives a salary increase of $3,500, from $19,000 to $22,500. In the next category, under the Income Tax Act, the salary of the assistant chairman is increased from $19,000 to $20,520, and each of the increases from previous salaries of $19,000 is of a similar amount. I wonder why this increase to $22,500 was made in the case of the grain commissioner? Is this a special case? Who recommended such an increase?

Mr. Benson: I mentioned previously that the over-all increase was 8 per cent and in my opening statement I said there were certain exceptions, and the reasons for those exceptions were explained. Unfortunately I do not have my statement with me now.

Clause agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask a question or two on the schedule. The previous speaker said the increases are more or less on a mathematical basis. Can the minister inform the committee what formula was used in increasing these salaries?

Mr. Benson: In my statement on second reading of this bill I did explain that the basis, generally, was 8 per cent as given to senior order in council appointments, with some exceptions where we were advised that the responsibilities had been increased or changed.

Mr. Herridge: Who is the chairman of the International Boundary Waters Commission and can the minister inform us what are his qualifications to hold this position?

Mr. Benson: Really, this is not within my jurisdiction. I am interested in the salaries of these positions; I am not familiar with the people who occupy all the various positions in the government service. But I will find out for the hon. member and inform him of the name of the chairman and of his qualifications for appointment.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not think anyone doubts the qualifications of Mr. Arnold Heeney, Q.C.

An hon. Member: That is not the one.

Mr. Hales: I should like to make one or two observations about the Auditor General's salary as set forth in this act. The minister no doubt recalls that the third report of the public accounts committee made a recommendation that the salary of the Auditor General should be tied to those of the senior deputy ministers of the various departments.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I shall answer this question. The salary of the Auditor General at this level will be higher than that of the most senior deputy minister in government. The reason we did not tie the Auditor General's salary to any other was that it is felt that the salaries of the Auditor General, the Chief Electoral Officer and the Representation Commissioner should be set by parliament from time to time, because these officials are responsible directly to parliament rather than to the government.

Mr. Hales: This is just the point. The minister has said that these salaries will be set by the executive. As we know, no one except the government can introduce in this house a money bill. Therefore the Auditor General, whom everyone in this house wants to see remain independent and a servant of all of us, should be kept independent. If the salaries of these three officials, including the Auditor General, are tied to the executive, then the executive would have direction over the Auditor General by having the authority to freeze his salary and perhaps force him out of office by means of a salary adjustment.

On the other hand, if his salary were tied in with that of the senior deputy ministers, then any discrimination would have to be against all the senior deputy ministers as a group and it would not be possible to deal with the Auditor General as one person.

My argument is that we are not making the Auditor General independent by fixing his salary in the manner set out in this bill. I should like to bring this to the attention of the minister and the house. The suggestion of the public accounts committee is that the salary of the Auditor General should be tied in with the salaries of senior deputy ministers and should be in an amount not less than the salary of the most senior deputy minister. In that case the Auditor General would have a greater independence than he has under the bill which we have before us.

I think we are making a mistake here. As a matter of fact, the salary of the Auditor General has been revised only twice in a period of 40 years whereas in the same period other statutory salaries were revised four times, and the salaries of other officials were revised eight times. Had the situation existed that his salary would not be less than that of the highest salary paid to a senior deputy minister, this situation could not have prevailed.

I believe the Auditor General has been receiving a salary in an amount less than that received by the senior deputy minister of the crown. I think it is shameful that we have allowed this situation to obtain for as long as it has. The Auditor General should be one of the highest paid servants of parliament, and he has not been. I am very much afraid that we are not providing the independence to which he is entitled in this position.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I have just arrived in the house. There are some things I should like to point out at this time. I do not believe there are sound principles included in this bill. We are being asked to approve of a schedule of salaries to be set by the governor in council. In approving this legislation we will be approving of only the minimum salary. Members of the committee will notice that in every case the salary specified states that it shall not be less than a certain amount. It states that it shall be set by the governor in council. This means the cabinet, does it not, Mr. Chairman? So, the government is asking us to allow the cabinet to create and encourage more patronage in respect of these positions.

I agree with other hon. members who have said that the salary, especially in the case of the Auditor General, should be ample and should be one commensurate with the important duties of the official concerned. I cannot support the bill in the way it appears now, because by doing so I would be condoning any future action the cabinet might take regarding the setting of the actual salaries of these commissioners, civil servants and so on. These should be set by parliament. I see that the minister is shaking his head. I suppose he does not agree with my statement. Nevertheless I warn the house that the object of the government apparently is to get us to allow them to set these salaries.

No doubt some of these commissioners are members of the judiciary, the Tariff Board, the Board of Transport Commissioners, and so on. I do not think any of them should be beholden to this or any government or cabinet in respect of the amount of their salaries. I do not think they should be in a position where they would be expected to express gratitude to the members on the treasury benches. I think it would be wrong to give the cabinet the power to set these salaries.

Parliament sits every year. We sit a year at a time, as is evident from this session. We have a good deal of time in which to deal with these salaries. Let them be set here, and let the amount be the actual salary and not the minimum; let parliament do it. If we were to give the cabinet the power to do this, we would be giving this privilege to one political party, namely the one which is in power at the present time.

Public Service

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, before you rise and report progress, I wonder whether we could not continue with the consideration of this bill, since it is so obviously the wish of almost all the members of the committee that we do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I am ready to accept, Mr. Chairman, that we continue consideration of this bill tonight, but I should like to put a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State concerning clause 1. Of course, I do not have the facts before me now, because the documents are in my office, but the parliamentary secretary was wrong when he stated a moment ago that the returning officer in my riding had not changed; I have facts to the contrary. If he is ready to speak the truth now, I think we could continue tonight.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member—indeed I gave him the correct answer a while ago—if he did not understand exactly what I said, I cannot help it. I said, in answer to the same member, that Mr. Bradette, of the present riding of Lapointe, was still returning officer in the present riding of Lapointe.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, can the parliamentary secretary tell me whether a Mr. Bélanger has been appointed to replace him in the new constituency of Lapointe, under the new Canada Elections Act that was passed two years ago?

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, mention has been made of the present electoral district of Lapointe. He said: his constituency. He does not mean that it is his riding for the next election.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, it can be seen that the parliamentary secretary is always making mental reservations. He very well knows that a new returning officer has been appointed in the electoral district of Lapointe that was changed by the last Canada Elections Act, which will be in force at the next election. I believe the parliamentary secretary should admit that, instead of imagining things that are not true.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Chairman, changing the subject, I should like to say a word or two concerning clause 1. I shall not be long: just a word or two. Clause 1 gives us, quite rightly, a general idea of the whole bill.

Mr. Chairman, I did not object to any of those increases, because the people involved hold important positions, bear heavy responsibilities and must possess the necessary ability.

However, I should like to point out that this legislation indicates that Canada is now going through a period of inflation and increase in the cost of living. The salaries of civil servants must be raised because of the tremendous increase in the cost of living in Canada; I think the government should take steps to stop this continuous increase. Actually, Bill No. C-266 which we are now studying contains the evidence, examples and arguments concerning this increase.

If salaries of public servants are increased, it is because the cost of living has increased. Well, if that is all right for those senior officials, if no objection is raised, this would lead us to think that this would also be good for all the civil servants of Canada. It would probably be good also for all the workers and farmers of Canada.

We are now increasing salaries by $5,000. Certain officials will obtain $5,000 outright in addition to their regular salary. Well, if we are in a position to grant salary increases of $5,000, I wonder whether we could not make sure that Canadian wage-earners get at least $5,000 in wages per year. If an increase of $5,000 per annum is quite acceptable for some high-ranking civil servants, would not a minimum annual salary of $5,000 be equally welcome for the Canadian citizens?

There is a disproportion in the fact that some salaries are increased by $5,000 in some cases, whereas there are some government employees who do not even get a salary of $5,000. In my opinion, all such increases are occasioned by the present rise in the cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, before I resume my seat, I may say that I do not object to such increases, since the government is responsible for the rise in the cost of living, since it raises the taxes and takes various measures to make living in Canada more expensive. The present government is to blame and should be held responsible for such a situation.

If the government sees this need for increased salaries in the case of senior officers, it must also realize that the low wage-earner in Canada also has to face this higher cost of living. The government has a very serious responsibility toward the low wage-earners and those who can only count on their old age pension for a living. It is up to the government to take the necessary steps so that the low wage-earners, the not so well-off Canadians, receive compensation for these mistakes the government has made.

I believe those comments were necessary, Mr. Chairman, because if the government realizes that certain civil servants must be granted increased salaries due to the rising cost of living, it must not go on ignoring the low wage-earners, those Canadian citizens on low income, also have a right to these increases, these adjustments, commensurate with the increase in the cost of living.

The greatest fault, as I said before, lies with the government who has failed to check this increase in the cost of living, to which it has even contributed by raising taxes such as the 1 per cent sales tax and the 11 per cent tax on building materials. The government will never get enough blame for such actions and I am convinced the Canadian people will act accordingly at the next election, because the government did nothing to curb the increase in the cost of living as shown by Bill No. C-266, now before us.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PORTUGAL—REPORTED INTENTION TO EXILE POLITICAL PRISONERS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on February 14 I inquired of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) whether the government intended to make any representations to the government of Portugal about the recent introduction of a decree providing for the exile from metropolitan Portugal of political prisoners. I am glad to have the opportunity to enlarge on the importance of this question. My question arose out of a recent trip taken by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacDonald) and myself to Lisbon when we had the opportunity of interviewing a good many outstanding Portugese lawyers, writers, students and relatives of political prisoners.

It is of course no news that Portugal has for many years—I think about 40 now—been governed by a dictatorship. Nor is it news that Portugal is a police state. What is not perhaps equally well known is that repression is growing worse and not, as in Spain, moderating. This may be, of course, because of increasingly adverse economic conditions which result, in part perhaps, from Portugal's involvement in three colonial wars in Africa.

On September 24 of last year, Mr. Speaker, a new decree was passed by the government of Portugal. It is No. 47216 and the substance of it is that the ministers of justice and overseas can authorize sentences or security measures issued by metropolitan courts—metropolitan courts are the courts in Portugal—or courts of the adjacent islands to be served in prison establishments overseas.

Now, Mr. Speaker, deportation or exile has long been a sinister weapon of dictatorship. This particular decree revives in Portugal, and amongst the many political prisoners and their families, the memories of a notorious concentration camp, the Tarrafal, in the Cape Verde Islands. Many people lost their lives or rotted away in these remote islands, forgotten, and where they could not very well be observed. The effect of this sort of decree is to separate people from their families and from any contact with the civilized world.

That the government of Portugal is ashamed of this sort of decree is obvious from the fact that, although the decree is published in an official gazette, we were shown a newspaper which merely reprinted the decree without any comment, and this was crossed out by the censors so the people generally should not have it published to them.

It may be asked why we in Canada should be concerned. The reason is that we are an ally of Portugal in NATO. Both Canada and Portugal are bound by the treaty to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples founded on the principle of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law. The callous disregard for the rule of law and the reversion to barbarism by coercing political prisoners reflects discredit not only on the particular country but on the whole western alliance which is supposed to be united in preserving certain basic human values. It may be said that the Portuguese authorities will know that Canada looks askance on methods of terrorism, that it would be unnecessary or useless for us to intervene or protest. It may be said the protests would be disregarded. We were assured many times that about the only thing that could influence the government of that country was international concern that was expressed.

Canada, I suggest, should base its protest on the terms of the NATO treaty and upon the universal declaration of human rights. We cannot in Canada shut our eyes to oppression, no matter where it happens to be. We should do something to prevent this infamous decree from being employed. We ought to make a protest that may well influence the government of that country which still desires to be considered civilized.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, (Mr. Martin) in the absence of his parliamentary secretary, I shall say to the hon. member that I have no information which would tend to contradict the reports the hon. member is referring to.

The Canadian attitude to human rights questions is well known. Last December for instance at the United Nations we voted for the covenant on human rights as well as for the convention for elimination of all forms of racial discrimination.

I believe that the United Nations is creating a climate which gives increasing weight to the moral force of world public opinion on human rights. We are contributing in this way to the growth of a situation in which the remedy for the questions raised may eventually be found.

The Portuguese government is fully aware of the views of the Canadian government on human rights questions. I think the hon. member has already received an adequate explanation on that subject from the Secretary of State for External Affairs on a previous date.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—"TIREZ AU CLAIR" PROTESTS RESPECTING PROGRAM

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, further to the question I put this morning with regard to some T.V. producers, I must say it is high time the minister stepped in.

You may object that the minister has nothing to say about the production of programs. I shall retort that it is up to him to protect the public, that it is his duty, a duty he cannot shirk.

I must admit we are pretty well fed up with some of the goings-on over T.V., and generally speaking, the Canadian people feel even more strongly about it than we do.

We have reached the point where we ask: Who is boss in this country of ours? Who makes the laws? Whose duty is it to see that those laws are respected? I ask you those same questions. Are you going to remain silent much longer before such disquieting radio and T.V. performances as we witness? Some T.V. producers seem to be using the network to spread subversive ideas.

During the past few years, this has too often been the case on our screens. Sometimes you have some immigrant from Cuba or other socialist country appearing, trying to make the population believe that the country he has left—probably because he could no longer stand it there—has the best system of government in the world. And the population believes these lies. In the first place, you will note that most of the revolutionary leaders are foreigners.

Later, our Canadian citizens appear on the screen, being granted free time by the authorities, taking pride in the fact that they are militant communists or revolutionary socialists.

They take the authority of running down all authorities with shouts of "Liberty"; they deny any authority; they engage in the most shameful immorality. And that is shown on our screens, in our living rooms. Divorce is a daily pastime. The actors are often homosexuals performing on the stage with naked women in the background. And the feast goes on in an orgy beyond description in which our great alcoholics play their parts. Now, if some honest people—for there happen to be some honest people left in Canada—make the mistake of informing the authorities, our modern scatter-brains call them old-fashioned.

Today, through guilty indifference, if not implicit approval, which I would not dare believe, we are obviously heading toward a revolution. We are in a tower of Babel. Those who should use broadcasting facilities to inform the people have abdicated in favor of revolutionaries.

We say that consciously or not the present government is encouraging that situation —for instance by allowing a man called Bourgeault to talk on eight occasions on television and radio. And what did he have to say? That he is an agnostic, that is to say that he no longer believes in God or the devil and that he wants to lead a country made up of 80 per cent of Roman Catholics and Christians. And some applaud such aberration; it is enough to make one weep, Mr. Speaker.

On another occasion a student or a university professor will tell us that he is an atheist, a communist or a socialist and that only through revolution will Quebec gain her freedom.

Finally, another one comes with his children. He says proudly that he did not have them baptized to leave them free to choose their religion. Can you imagine a two-year old or a five-year old choosing his religion while waiting probably for the day when he will at last be able to choose his father or mother who never got married anyway? What a lovely generation.

Do you really believe it is with such individuals we are going to build a sound and strong society? I am therefore asking the hon. minister, on behalf of the Canadian people, to create as soon as possible a board of inquiry to do the housecleaning work that is needed in the C.B.C. Thank God, there are still several honest workers in the C.B.C., whose most ardent desire is to purge our sound-waves from the filth of society. The general welfare commands the attention of the hon. minister in that field and a delay would but aggravate such a discouraging situation. I am therefore urging him to act and to act quickly.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in Canada, thank God, we still live in a free country, and I hope we will never see the destiny of our country in the hands of a totalitarian and communist régime, as has and still is the unfortunate lot of several countries in the world.

In a free country, Mr. Speaker, all citizens should have freedom of thought and of speech and, like all taxpayers, they should be allowed to use the information media available.

In a free country, Mr. Speaker, the state cannot decently and logically seek to control information media, the press, radio and television. To try to deprive the various political parties or those who wish to express their views in public of these publication and communication media would, in my opinion, be tantamount to depriving the citizens of a free country of the exercise of their freedom.

I think the hon. member himself would be the first to condemn the state, the Canadian government for instance, if a member of his party or himself were to be prevented tomorrow from expressing their views and their policies to the citizens of the province of Quebec or of Canada, as they have done so freely since 1962 and during the previous years.

However, I will admit with the hon. member that liberty does not mean licence and that those are two entirely different things.

I believe that when public order and morals are seriously threatened, something should be done so that, as I said before, we may not be crushed under the dictatorship of a totalitarian government. We want our government to remain democratic and if the ideas spread by state broadcasting tended to upset the established order, I believe that some action would be necessary.

However, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—since, I presume, we want to single out the C.B.C.—is independent of the Canadian government, and belongs to all the taxpayers and the Canadian population. When the corporation was established, directors were appointed, and I believe that, to prevent it from being controlled by the state, its officials can intervene when it seems that certain limits have been exceeded.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—POSSIBLE DISCONTINUANCE OF EXPRESS AND FREIGHT OPERATIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say how pleased I am to see the minister in the house tonight. I apologize for keeping him late. I realize that cabinet ministers are very busy persons. The fact that he is here is I hope an indication of the interest he has in the subject I wish to discuss and the seriousness of it.

Yesterday I posed a question to the minister. It arose out of a meeting I had with union officials and other people from my area, including councillors from Sydney Mines and the town of North Sydney. I asked the minister whether the Canadian National Railways intended to make further cutbacks in employment and service in the town of North Sydney by discontinuing their express and freight operations in that town. The minister said that he hoped not, but would make inquiries. I also hope not.

This matter goes back approximately one year. On February 3 I wrote to Mr. Ralph T. Vaughan, the then secretary of the company, to the effect that at that time there was a rumour that the Canadian National Railways were contemplating the removal of the express office and services from North Sydney, as well as the centralization of this office and service in Sydney. On February 9 I received an interim reply from Mr. Vaughan to the effect that he has asked for information from his regional officers and would write me again. On February 14 I wrote to Mr. Vaughan thanking him for his letter. Again on March 24 I wrote to Mr. Vaughan and stated that I was wondering whether he was in a position to provide me with any additional information. On May 4 I wrote him again—and at this time he was vice president of the company—asking whether he was in a position to provide me with any other information.

Finally, in a letter dated May 19, Mr. Vaughan stated:

> In any event, the situation with respect to the express office at North Sydney is now under active consideration and the regional office at Moncton tells me that a definitive plan has not yet been finalized. The express-freight operations at North Sydney, of course, can be broken down into two main elements, i.e., local traffic and Newfoundland traffic. Express-freight traffic destined for Newfoundland would have to be handled through the terminal facility at that point. It is the handling of the local traffic which is now being carefully studied as to what the best manner and method would be to deal with it. When the plans are completely formulated with regard to the handling of the express-freight local traffic for the Sydney area, we will arrange to inform all concerned of the details. In the meantime, the freight handling offices will remain substantially the same as they are at present and the staff will fluctuate upward or downward in accordance with the volume of traffic.

[Mr. Béchard.]

These letters were written in 1966. Again, on November 28, 1966, I placed a question on the order paper—which sometimes you, sir, tell us to do, and rightly so, although sometimes we find it difficult to obtain a reply, and if we do, often it is rather vague. The reply of the parliamentary secretary to the minister was to the effect that the management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows: A service study is presently being undertaken in this area and no decision will be reached as to the eventual handling of local express freight traffic until the study is completed some time early in the new year. That was November 28, 1966. We are now into 1967.

Again we are hearing the same rumours in the area. Just last Saturday I met with representatives of the C.B. of R.T., the I.L.A., also representatives from the town of Sydney Mines and the town of North Sydney who are concerned about this problem. If this service is discontinued there will be poor service in both these towns and the surrounding areas. It could possibly mean the loss of jobs or the removal of jobs from the area, causing great inconvenience to those concerned. We can hardly afford to lose any more jobs or have any further disruption in the area. Someone might say that if the service is discontinued it will mean a loss of only 15 or 20 jobs, and ask why make such a fuss. But in our area every job is important, even one or two.

Since this government came into office we have seen the loss of 600 to 700 jobs at the Point Edward naval base. Eleven hundred employees have been laid off at the DOSCO steel plant, Sydney within recent months. There is the proposed phasing out of the coal mines, cut-backs in the C.N.R. and the loss of jobs in the C.B.H. national park. In connection with the North Sydney-Newfoundland service of Canadian National, the research and development department of that railway say in an industrial survey of North Sydney, Nova Scotia:

> In the past Canadian National has employed an average of 700 men in the North Sydney-Newfoundland service. With the introduction of the rail car ferries in late 1967 this number will be reduced to 150.

So you can see, Mr. Speaker, that we can ill afford to lose any job. I hope the minister will in his reply assure me, the people concerned with this problem and the representatives of the unions, and the towns concerned that no change will take place and the status quo will remain. We go from one crisis to another, and it would appear that under this government if it is not the mumps, it is the measles.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, with his usual fairness and objectivity, failed to mention the fact that the Coastguard College was established at Point Edward—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): That employs only half dozen at Point Edward.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and industries are going into Point Edward.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Only half a dozen people are employed at the Coastguard College.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has had his say, Mr. Speaker, and I trust he will abide by the rules and let me have mine.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I trust that you will be factual.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no area in Canada with regard to which this government has tried so hard to provide alternatives to certain industries that are declining because of the progress of the times. That progress is not going to be arrested, and it is not the fault of the government that the progress itself may have been stimulated by the activities of a dynamic government.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You are so modest.

Mr. Pickersgill: While I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman's concern about anything that is going to be disturbing to his community, it does seem to me that we in this national forum are entitled to have all the facts placed before us. I would have been much more impressed by what the hon. gentleman said if he had left out the last few words. I am afraid there is very little I can add to the information I have already given on this question. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for not knowing the answer to this question yesterday; I do not run Canadian National Railways, and I hope no government ever does.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: No point of order can be raised at this time. The hon. member should know the rules.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I suggest that the minister stick to the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, as I say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the minister resume his seat for just a moment. I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) that we have these adjournment debates every night and we never have any difficulty. Hon. members who have a question are given the opportunity to speak for seven minutes without interruption, and ministers are entitled to make a three-minute reply without interruption.

Mr. Pickersgill: So far as the question is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the government does not run Canadian National Railways, and I hope no government will ever attempt to do so. All any minister of transport can do is ask the railway for information, which has to be done in any case.

I have information from the C.N.R. which I will read, but it is almost exactly to the same effect as the information which the hon. gentleman already has, that is that the railway is still studying the rationalization of the express freight operations throughout their whole system, and that of course includes the area in question. The railway has assured the government that before any final decision on the rationalization of express freight handling operations in North Sydney is taken there will be full consultation with the unions involved to assure that dislocation is kept to a minimum so far as local employment and also service to their customers is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the minister. The time allotted to him has expired.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WATSON (CHÂTEAUGUAY-HUNTINGDON-LAPRAIRIE)—ACTIVITIES OF U.S. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege, on Monday of this week I asked the Solicitor General a question related to reported activities of the Central Intelligence Agency in some international affiliations of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., and I referred with tongue in cheek to possible infiltration of the New Democratic Party by the C.I.A. through the C.L.C.'s international affiliations.

My question arose out of an article which appeared on the front page of the February 20 issue of the Christian Science Monitor. Last night I was amazed to learn that Claude Jodoin, C.L.C. president, had issued a press release which stated in part:

> The inference made in the House of Commons by Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie) that unions affiliated to the Canadian Labour Congress may have accepted funds from the Central Intelligence Agency for operations in Canada is completely unjustified.

I would like to make it clear that no such inference was contained in my question. Furthermore, I take strong exception to Mr. Jodoin terming my question unjustified. Despite the apparent attitude of the C.L.C. executive, members of unions in my riding, affiliated with the C.L.C. and international branches of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., are most interested in knowing whether the Central Intelligence Agency has infiltrated Canadian unionism through United States internationals.

Mr. Jodoin in effect is saying that I, as a member of parliament, do not have the right to ask this question. This, Mr. Speaker, is an affront to the basic parliamentary privileges of every member of this house.

PROCEDURE

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville) moved:

> That the following members compose the special committee on procedure appointed January 25, 1967: Messrs. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe), Baldwin, Brand, Faulkner, Knowles, Langlois (Mégantic), MacEachen, Nugent, Olson, Richard and Stewart.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Hon. E. J. Benson (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment to provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund, for each fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1972, of provincial revenue equalization payments and post-secondary education adjustment payments, and for each fiscal year commencing on or after the 1st day of April, 1967, of provincial revenue stabilization payments and succession duty payments; to authorize tax collection agreements with provinces and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act to extend for an additional three years the interim period relating to the health grants program.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED SPEECH BY MEMBER FOR DOLLARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer) was reflecting a change in government policy when, in a speech delivered in Montreal recently, he called for an end to United States bombing of North Viet Nam, the eventual departure of United States forces and Canada's recognition of mainland China.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be that members of the house would like to hear the answer which the Secretary of State for External Affairs wishes to give, but I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members that it is not in order to ask questions about statements made outside the house by members. According to practice questions may be asked of the Prime Minister concerning statements made outside the house by cabinet ministers. A member may wish to ascertain whether such a statement reflects government policy; but this does not extend to statements made by individual members.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask, as a matter of information, whether this includes parliamentary secretaries?

Mr. Speaker: I am referring to the rule in Beauchesne which specifically refers to cabinet ministers. The point raised by the hon. member is of interest, but I do not think it applies to this particular case.

Mr. Lambert: On previous occasions the present administration has insisted that parliamentary secretaries speak for the government.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I might rephrase my question and ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether there has been any recent change in government policy with regard to external affairs similar to what I have mentioned.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The question my hon. friend asked was based upon a report which contained a portion of what I said when I spoke to students at McGill University. If my hon. friend will examine that report together with the full speech he will see, of course, that there was no change in government policy.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE EXHAUSTION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS FOR AUTO WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I should like to ask him whether he has received a telegram from Mr. Gordon Lambert, chairman of General Motors U.A.W. council, protesting the depletion of their supplementary unemployment benefit fund before transitional assistance benefit payments are made. I would ask the minister what his reply has been to that protest.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned in reply to a question put to me some weeks ago that further representations had been made by the representatives of the United Automobile Workers to several of my cabinet colleagues and myself. I said we were giving serious consideration to the representations to see whether there should be any further change in the TAB program that was announced last fall. The submissions are still under study. I will be replying to Mr. Lambert later today, but as yet no change has been decided upon. If and when any change of government policy has been decided upon, it will be announced.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware—since he received the telegram he obviously must be—that the supplementary unemployment insurance fund is depleted to about 40 per cent, and that the workers concerned are worried about there being enough in the fund to meet the needs of workers laid off during the period of change over in models? Does the minister contemplate discussions with General Motors to replenish the fund that is being depleted?

Mr. Nicholson: I have nothing to add to my earlier answer, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

STUDEBAKER CORPORATION—INDEBTEDNESS FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the right hon. Leader of the Opposition raised a question with regard to a statement in the Auditor General's report, and I promised to answer it at the first opportunity.

The statements contained in the Auditor General's report to the effect that a certain Canadian vehicle manufacturer had failed to meet the ratio requirement of the motor vehicle tariff order, 1965, and as a result had become indebted to the crown in an estimated amount of $2.4 million were apparently based on information which was available at the time of the preparation of the report. The amount mentioned was in fact a tentative determination. However, further review of the matter on the basis of information which has become available indicates that the manufacturer in question has not failed to meet the ratio requirements and has not, therefore, incurred any indebtedness to the crown in this regard.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the Minister of National Revenue, does he mean by giving this answer that the Auditor General does not know what he is talking about?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not a proper one.

Mr. Benson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that he should not reply to this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was a wholly improper question.

FINANCE

RELEASE OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Can he tell the house definitely whether the report of the royal commission on taxation will be released today; and if so, are there any copies in the hands of the communications media under pre-release restrictions? Third, what arrangement will be made, in the event of the report being tabled, for hon. members to obtain copies at the earliest opportunity today, not next Monday?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to table the report at 6 p.m. tonight at the close of our proceedings. I understand that the chairman of the royal commission has made arrangements to brief the press under security regulations. That is not being done by the government.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will arrangements be made that copies will be available and can be picked up by hon. members after six o'clock?

Mr. Sharp: I will look into these arrangements, Mr. Speaker, and see that this is done.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of his statement yesterday in Toronto that legislation concerning water and air pollution will be brought before the house this year, can he indicate when it may be put on the order paper?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I said I hoped a lot of the things I mentioned would be decided during the year.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he expects it to be this session or the following session?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should think it would have to be in the autumn.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the action taken in the Quebec house yesterday, adopting Premier Johnson's suggestion to reconstitute their parliamentary committee studying the constitution, and in the light of the point of view of other provinces, would the right hon. Prime Minister ask the officials in the federal government who are studying constitutional reform to speed up their work so we can form our own parliamentary committee here in Ottawa to study the constitution?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the interdepartmental work going on in regard to this very important matter will be completed before long and submitted to the government. I think that would be the best time for the constitution of a parliamentary committee before which the government could appear with its recommendations on this matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING DIVORCE, BIRTH CONTROL AND ABORTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and is similar to the one asked by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, having reference to the speech made by the Prime Minister at a gathering of some sort in Toronto last night. Does the answer the Prime Minister gave with respect to air and water pollution also apply with respect to legislation on divorce, birth control and abortion? Will such legislation be placed before parliament this year?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I had these matters in mind particularly since they were the first items I mentioned, namely divorce legislation and amendments to the Criminal Code to deal with the other two matters which my hon. friend mentioned.

Mr. Knowles: Will they be placed before parliament this year?

Mr. Pearson: That is our hope and our intention.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, while we are speaking about the future may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has given consideration to bringing in during this session or early next session legislation dealing with the establishment of the office of ombudsman in the federal government?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into that matter.

[Later:]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a supplementary question in connection with the divorce legislation. Can we be assured that no legislation will be brought before the house until the joint special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons has reported?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we would wish to wait until that report has been received.

TRANSPORT

SECOND FERRY BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Bower (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the jovial, energetic and maritime-oriented Minister of Transport. Has the minister received, and if so will he give favourable consideration to, a representation from the Board of Trade of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, requesting his department to put on, during the coming summer months only, a second ferry which is believed to be available and suitable for the purpose, to supplement the services of the motor vessel Bluenose on the Bar Harbor-Yarmouth run, taking into account that in this peak season the traffic demands for both truck and passenger car transport overwhelm the capacity of the Bluenose which, I might note, is now operating without a deficit.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that questions should not be preceded by speeches, however short, and in view of the fact that the reform he is advocating would only apply next summer I should think perhaps the question might be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Bower: Mr. Speaker, since a lot of planning and many arrangements will have to be made if the supplementary ferry is to be put on, there is some urgency to my request. The urgency of the question also lies in the importance to the maritime provinces of the tourist business, in which I am sure the Minister of Transport is interested.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members are impressed by the forcefulness of the hon. member's representation, but he knows that if he cannot wait for as long as it sometimes takes to get an answer to a question put on the paper he can always discuss this matter in the adjournment debate.

Mr. Bower: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point is that I am sure the minister has got the gist of the question, and in view of its importance he may want to reply even though it was lengthy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SHIPPING

HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SAMBRO LIGHTSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): My question is also for the Minister of Transport, and I will withhold the adjectives until I have received his answer. Will the minister consider accepting the urgent request of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, presented by Robert Cook, its national president, to restore the lightship at Sambro station on the approaches to Halifax harbour, in the light of recent tragedies in that area?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think, sir, I ought to have expert advice before I attempt to answer a question so technical as that. I want to assure the hon. gentleman I will take it into immediate consideration.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): I have a question supplementary to the one asked by the senior member for Halifax related to the tragic loss of 18 lives last Tuesday. Is the minister aware of an exclusive radio broadcast over radio station CHMS, Halifax, last night in which it was brought to light that the Department of Transport was aware of the need for a sound alarm in this area and had so indicated in January, 1965, and was then in the process of proceeding to correct what was an obvious lack of safety devices in that area?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not hear the broadcast, and I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for bringing it to my attention.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, which is related to the questions addressed to him by the members for Halifax. In view of the fact, as I understand it, that there are some technical questions involved in the matter of a lightship versus a radar buoy in this situation, when the minister receives a report on this matter from his technical experts will he make that report available to members generally because of the implications it may have not only for this situation but for other coastal areas?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am flattered by the unexpected attention I seem to be getting, and grateful. I think the suggestion the hon. member has made is quite a reasonable one, or at least it sounds reasonable. I will think it over very carefully.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is he planning a meeting with President Johnson, either in Washington or elsewhere, and have any steps been taken to set up such a meeting?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I am looking forward to seeing the President on the afternoon of March 8.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have another question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I want to say to him that I was very sorry indeed to learn that he has cancelled his Caribbean trip. I want to ask him whether the reason for that cancellation involves an impending cabinet shake-up, including a change in the portfolio of national defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR INSTALLATION OF ESCALATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister taking any action with regard to installing extra escalators at Winnipeg airport, in an endeavour to acquire a reputation for action?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I suggest—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR NEW POLICY RESPECTING LEVEL CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Due to the fact that several tragedies have occurred at railway crossings and that 4,000 Dorion residents have submitted a petition to the government, does the hon. minister intend to adopt a new government assistance policy with a view to eliminating grade-crossings as much as possible and increasing accident prevention measures?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think perhaps because of the very great public interest in this matter, underlined by the tragic accident at Dorion, I should remind the house of an undertaking I gave on behalf of the government when the government received the federation of mayors and municipalities, that the new transport commission would be asked to review fully the policy with respect to level crossings. However, if in the meantime there are any exceptional situations that appear to warrant exceptional action, there will be no hesitation on my part in recommending it to my colleagues and I feel quite sure I would get a sympathetic hearing.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any report to give the house on the investigation into the head-on collision of the Ocean Limited which occurred near Springhill?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I have no report at the moment.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF EASTERN FEED GRAIN BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Could the hon. minister indicate whether the members of the Canadian Feed Grain Board have been appointed?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): No, Mr. Speaker. I answered a similar question about ten days ago. I informed the house at that time that I expected the names of the members of the board would be announced before March 15.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to avoid bringing up the same subject too often, would the minister agree to tabling a list of the names of the members when they are appointed?

Mr. Sauvé: Their names will be made public as soon as they are selected by the government.

NATIONAL SECURITY

CONSIDERATION OF WIRE TAPPING BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I want to ask the Solicitor General. Is the issue of wire tapping one which in the minister's opinion will be investigated by the royal commission on security matters?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to appear disrespectful to the hon. member, but I have no doubt that the commissioners will place a reasonable interpretation upon their terms of reference. It would be highly improper for me to express an opinion on this while the commission is at work.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED INCREASED USE OF WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport who is so co-operative today. Will the minister discuss with the officials of Air Canada the advisability of the full utilization of the repair and maintenance depot at Winnipeg before expanding similar facilities at Dorval?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): That seems a quite reasonable request, sir.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEPS TO PREVENT TIME LOST THROUGH LABOUR DISPUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour. The urgency of my question is related to a public statement made by the Minister of Labour the day before yesterday, when he quoted figures indicating that work stoppages in Canada were twice as frequent in 1966 as in 1965 and that 411,000 workers were involved in 629 strikes and lockouts in 1966, resulting in a time loss of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly pose his question.

Mr. Southam: Can the minister advise the house whether he or the government are taking any steps to prevent a recurrence of this serious situation and the resulting loss to our economy?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that in his preface to the question the hon. gentleman did not read the last paragraph of the press item, which would show that percentagewise there had been a drop. Actually there were, as everyone knows, some unfortunate work stoppages of major magnitude in 1966. There were an unusual number of collective agreements in the private sector as well as in the public sector that came up for renewal in 1966, and I would hope they are now behind us. Certainly at the present time employment is at a very high level, and so is production in factories and works generally across the country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FREEZE ON RELEASE OF TRAINED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Has the downward manpower drop-out curve in the forces levelled off because of a five year freeze on releases from the forces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no such freeze—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member includes an inference or an allegation, and in that form I am wondering whether it is acceptable.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a supplementary question in any event. Because of service requirements has a five year freeze been imposed on the release of graduate pilots?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, when the government of Canada gives training so expensive as that required for pilots, doctors, or any officers given university or post-graduate courses, it is felt that there should be some reasonable return to the people of Canada on that investment. I think this is a general policy which is being developed and which applies to all cases where special training is given, such as under the regular officers training plan.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether this investment was considered when the 500 pilots were forced to leave?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. I regret that I did not sent him notice but I have been harassed this morning with a lot of complimentary telephone calls. If the hon. member for Kootenay West were to receive an invitation to visit Taiwan, would he be able to visit the other points visited by the right hon. gentleman's parliamentary secretary so that the opposition's point of view would be presented in those areas?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): He certainly would, Mr. Speaker—at his own expense.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General as Acting Minister of Justice and ask him whether he would make inquiries with regard to an Ottawa firm the directors of which filed bankruptcy proceedings, yet are basking in the sunny south during the winter months at the expense of the Ottawa public.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not very clear, but if there is urgency to the question and it could be made a little clearer, perhaps it could be put otherwise it should be put on the order paper.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

LOANS, INVESTMENTS AND ADVANCES

L30e. To provide for the purchase, acquisition and holding by the Minister of Finance of securities issued by the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition pursuant to subsection 1 of section 12 of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act and to subsequently dispose thereof, $21,000,000.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, has the minister any statement to make?

Mr. Winters: I have no formal statement to make, Mr. Chairman. This is the amount of money that is required to finance the Canadian corporation for Expo through to the point where it will be self supporting from its own revenue. Under the provisions of section 12 of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act there is power to draw down moneys on a loan basis guaranteed by the government of Canada and the government of Quebec. So far there has been a total of $175 million borrowed against debentures. This amount of $21 million, making a total of $196 million, will see Expo in sufficiently good financial position to support itself until revenues start to flow from the turnstiles and other sources.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house have no intention of causing the least delay in the passing of supplementary estimates with regard to Expo '67.

However, I feel a few comments are necessary and I will only take a few minutes of the time of the committee.

We must remember, Mr. Chairman, that the government is carrying on the work of the Progressive Conservative government, with respect to Expo. In this as in many other endeavours, the present government, is treading a beaten path, in the best interests of Canadians. Our initiatives, while we were in power, continue to have beneficial effects upon the people, and we are happy to see that the government is following in the footsteps of its predecessors, as regards Expo.

Since this is probably our last opportunity to express our views concerning Expo '67, I believe this is the appropriate time to give credit to those concerned. We must admit that the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal owe it to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) for having accepted that Expo '67 be held in the metropolis of Canada. I should also like to mention the contribution of the mayor of the city of Montreal, who co-operated fully. In fact, Mr. Drapeau travelled all over the world playing the part of ambassador; I feel that he also deserves some of the credit due to those responsible for Expo.

Expo '67, Mr. Chairman, is a colossal achievement; it is a monument to science, architecture and engineering. I believe this is the appropriate occasion to recognize the tremendous amount of work done by those who master-minded Expo; this achievement enhances not only their personal reputation, but also the reputation of Canada itself.

The success of Expo will contribute to the success of our country. Expo will play an important part in making the Canadian people known far beyond our borders. I feel it is essential that we concentrate on making a success of this major event in the life of our country, and it is both a privilege and an honour to belong to a country like Canada.

During the next few months, millions of visitors from all over the world will converge upon our country. If my information is correct—and I believe it is—at least 62 countries have already reserved space at this world exhibition. This, I believe, is the greatest number of countries ever to take part in a world exhibition. This sole consideration, I feel, is reason enough for those who are responsible for Expo to take pride in the work accomplished and expect the operation to be an unqualified success.

Mr. Chairman, Expo is not solely the business of the province of Quebec nor of the city of Montreal. Expo '67 is the business of every Canadian; every Canadian should take an active part in it. This event will bring additional income particularly to the province of Quebec and to the city of Montreal and thus, each will contribute to the prosperity of the other.

We have heard certain remarks on the development and the additional amounts earmarked for Expo. There has been some concern over the fact that the funds voted for Expo have been over-spent; to my mind, this is not surprising, since it was surely most difficult to forecast within a thousand or a hundred dollars, the final cost of the development of Expo '67. Anyone with the slightest experience in construction should be aware that there is often a large gap between the estimated and the actual cost. I had a similar experience last year when I had some repairs done to my home and when the bills came in I was not too surprised to discover that my estimate was doubled. If this is true in private enterprise, it should not be surprising to find the same thing in a public undertaking in which three levels of government are involved, particularly when it is realized that the operations have been carried out over a relatively long period of time.

Mr. Chairman, there are many factors contributing to the increase in the final cost of Expo and even if the cost is much higher than the estimate, according to our information, if it is compared to the cost of development of other world fair sites, the comparison is still to Canada's advantage.

Various factors led to an increase in the cost and even to delays in the development of the Expo site and Expo in general, and the government must be blamed for several of them. They had unfavourable repercussions due to a lack of planning or accuracy on the part of the government.

It is a well known fact that strikes delayed the work and increased the cost, and building materials also cost more. The railway strike and the longshoremen's strike in the Montreal harbour not only delayed the work but had other harmful results. And finally, I would not like to put all the responsibility or blame on the shoulders of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) and the Minister of Industry and Defence Production (Mr. Drury), but I must point out that the 11 per cent tax levied by his colleague the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) also had very disastrous results for Expo. Consequently, because of the 11 per cent tax on building materials, the final cost of Expo is greatly increased. The government must take full responsibility for that. Had it not been for that harmful 11 per cent tax whose withdrawal we requested on many occasions, the minister would not have to ask for so much money today. Two months away from the opening of Expo, it would be ill advised to take action which would entail the complete failure of Expo.

I said it and I repeat it: we must do all we can to make sure that Expo '67 will be a big success. The minister must see to that. He is justified to watch closely how public funds are spent.

I do think that the members of my party have full confidence in the minister, as I have. I am sure he will perform his duties with as much care as he can. I ask my colleagues on all sides of the house to say or do nothing that could impede the success of Expo '67, for Canada's image abroad could be eroded.

So let us make Expo '67 our centennial project and let us pool all our efforts and good will so that, through Expo '67, Canada's good name may be echoed in all parts of the globe.

[English]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the minister for clarification. Can the minister give the committee any idea of the receipts received from the sale of advance passports for Expo? Are the receipts from these sales available to the corporation, and have they been taken into account in arriving at the figure before us?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the receipts are of the order of $20 million. That money is available to the corporation and is being taken into account when requesting this additional $21 million in the form of a loan.

Mr. Hales: May I ask a question for clarification. As I understand it, Expo has issued these securities to get money to operate. The Department of Finance has bought these securities and they remain the property of the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government of Canada. These are guaranteed bonds. By whom are they guaranteed?

Mr. Winters: They are guaranteed by the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Hales: Are the guarantees not related to the percentages of money put up by the three partners who went into the Expo operation? Were the loans or moneys put up by the city of Montreal not guaranteed? Do the guarantees apply to the government of Quebec and to the government of Canada; are those guarantees based on the original deal?

Mr. Winters: The same guarantees apply. There is a supplementary, tripartite agreement whereby any surplus or deficit in Expo will be either paid to or borne by the federal government on the basis of 50 per cent, the provincial government on the basis of 37½ per cent, the remaining 12.5 per cent being applicable to the city of Montreal. But, Mr. Chairman, the guarantee is only of the two senior governments.

Mr. Hales: If there is a loss will the loss be shared in those proportions?

Mr. Winters: Yes. The losses will be shared in those proportions under the tripartite agreement.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Pennell moved:

Resolved, that toward making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending the 31st day of March, 1967, the sum of $21,000,000 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Pennell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-271, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1967.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

• (12:00 noon)

On clause 2—$21,000,000 granted for 1966-67.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may we have, from whichever minister has responsibility for this legislation, the assurance that this bill is in the standard form and contains nothing that is not usual in such an appropriation bill.

Miss LaMarsh: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not have a copy of the bill before me, but the bill which was prepared under the aegis of the Solicitor General I think can be safely accepted as being in the proper form. The Solicitor General has stepped out of the chamber for a moment, but he will return shortly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely there must be some minister who has read the bill and who is able to give what are the standard assurances. Here we have a situation where no minister is present who is in charge of the financial arrangements of this government. I say it is contempt of the House of Commons for the government to have here only ministers who are not prepared to answer a question in respect of an appropriation bill which is the very essence of parliamentary democracy. The Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, or somebody who is informed, ready and able to answer the question, should be here.

I think the bill had better stand. I suggest we should rise and report progress until some minister is here who is prepared to answer what is an ordinary question.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, quite obviously I do not have responsibility for this bill. My hon. friend has been a member of this house for some time and, despite the pyrotechnics he is indulging in, he should be aware that there are in the house at present five ministers, two members of the privy council, and half a dozen members on the hon. member's side of the chamber. There is no contempt whatsoever. The five clauses in the bill are clearly of the types which are contained in every such bill. They are easily read and very clear in intent. I suggest to my hon. friend that while we appreciate the histrionics, there is no question but that this bill is in the usual form. I am quite prepared to say it is in that form, and my hon. friend need have no apprehension in that regard.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is not a matter of histrionics. I have been in this house a long time, and I have sat on the other side. I have never known an occasion when an appropriation bill has been presented without this assurance being given by the Minister of Finance, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, or the President of the Treasury Board. If there is no one here who is prepared to give this assurance I am prepared to move that we rise and report progress until there is a minister here who can give us this assurance in respect of a bill, which is vital and fundamental to the powers of the House of Commons.

Miss LaMarsh: I have just given that assurance. Perhaps the hon. member was giving such consideration to what he had in mind and was saying that he did not hear me say that. I gave that assurance. We have another minister here now. Under the administration of which my hon. friend was a member I can remember occasions when there were not five or six ministers in the house.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps the Minister of Public Works would give the assurance.

Miss LaMarsh: I have given it twice.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. lady gave the assurance after confessing that she had not read the bill.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. gentleman is capable of reading the five clauses. He might not have the bill before him, but I have; and the moment I looked at it I realized it was quite safe for me to give that assurance because I noticed that it is in the usual form.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for the Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-267, to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise in the hope that we have passed through the eye of the storm and will be in calmer waters.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I hope the minister has read the bill.

Mr. Pennell: I can give that assurance to the hon. member.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That was the trouble with the earlier bill.

Mr. Pennell: The main purpose of this bill is to revise judicial salaries. The judiciary is such a vital component of our system that any bill dealing with the judiciary is a bill of importance. Salaries of the judiciary have not been revised since August, 1963. The proposed increases are clearly set forth in the bill for those judges for whom parliament has a legislative responsibility under the British North America Act, and require little comment except perhaps to say that an attempt has been made to fix judicial salaries at such a level as will permit the maintenance of the very high standard of our judiciary without at the same time creating any question of doubt that those who do serve in this way do so out of a profound sense of and desire for public service. Percentage or uniform increases are not being proposed. Rather, an attempt has been made to increase salaries where justified in relation to the importance of the duties and responsibilities connected with the judicial office.

In addition to the general increases we are proposing we also are making provision for the payment of an additional salary of $2,000 subject to certain specified conditions. Speaking generally, this additional sum is to be paid to all judges except those who receive from a province any annual or periodic compensation as a judge of a superior or county court. In certain provinces such as British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, judges do receive payments in varying amounts as judges of the superior or county courts. New section 20 of clause 1 will not deprive them of these provincial payments, but if they continue to receive them they will not receive the additional salary provided by parliament. In this way an attempt is being made to equalize the salaries paid to the holders of these important provincial judicial offices. It is not easy, Mr. Speaker, to formulate the criteria by which judicial salaries should be assessed. The government have given the matter sustained consideration and have come to the conclusion that the amounts are on the whole reasonable and fair.

In addition to the salary revisions the bill deals with one or two matters that should be mentioned. We are proposing to broaden the law relating to travelling allowances. In essence, the proposed changes will permit judges to be paid their actual expenses when they travel on official business as judges, whether they travel to hold court, to sit in chambers or for any other official purpose. We are also proposing some estate tax relief for the widows of judges who receive annuities under the act. The proposed new provision is for all practical purposes the same as the one found in the Public Service Superannuation Act as amended in 1960, and the intention is to deal with the tax payable on pensions of judges' widows in the same way as pensions payable to public servants.

Finally, we are proposing to broaden the provisions of the law to make it clear that judges can act as commissioners or arbitrators, etc., if there is either a federal or provincial statute authorizing them to do so, as well as in cases where, as at present, there is proper executive authority from the governor or lieutenant governor in council. However, judges who do undertake these special duties will be permitted to receive only their actual travelling and other expenses while away from their ordinary places of residence, if these expenses are paid by the governments concerned.

It will be seen that judges will still be permitted to engage in extrajudicial duties in proper cases, but that they will not receive anything more for doing so than they would have received had they been performing their ordinary judicial functions. The result will be that judges who do undertake extrajudicial duties cannot be accused of doing so for pecuniary motives or personal gain at the expense of their brother judges who in some cases are required to assume additional judicial burdens as a result.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should give notice that when the house comes to clause 4 I shall seek an amendment for the purpose of clarifying the provisions respecting annuities. The amendment, to put the matter shortly, will clarify the fact that the salary of the judge for the purpose of calculating the annuity includes the amount of any additional salary provided by new section 20 of clause 1.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, next only to freedom of debate in this parliament the independence of the judiciary is the cornerstone of our Canadian democracy and our freedoms. Founded upon the Act of Settlement, the principle of judicial independence is a gift of Britain to the democratic world second only in importance to her gift of parliamentary institutions.

Judicial independence means, in my submission, simply that judicial functions should be performed in an atmosphere in which there is no hope of gain or preferment on the one hand, and no fear of punishment, intimidation, restraint, discipline or retribution on the other. The judge must be in a position where he can fearlessly uphold the law and the cause of justice without being influenced in any way by the effect of his decisions on his own personal career or fortunes. Norman Ward in the fourth edition of Dawson's "The Government of Canada" puts it rather neatly at page 449:

> The judge is placed in a position where he has nothing to lose by doing what is right and little to gain by doing what is wrong; and there is therefore every reason to hope that his best efforts will be devoted to the conscientious performance of his duty.

On the same page the learned author in one short paragraph epitomizes the Canadian concept of the judiciary, and I venture to quote this paragraph:

> The judge will thus usually begin with the twin assets of character and ability, and these become the foundation on which the indirect appeals are based. He is paid a substantial salary, which not only removes some of the obvious temptations, but frees him from financial distractions. The importance of his office is continually stressed; his own rectitude and sense of fairness are invariably assumed; the dignity of the court and the respect accorded his office are rarely, if ever, challenged; his social position is always assured. These efforts to accentuate the eminence of the office are made infinitely more effective by the fortunate regard which the legal profession has for the judiciary and its ingrained habit of regarding a seat on the bench as the crown of a legal career. Thus some of the very men who build up the tradition may be induced to accept judgeships a few years later, influenced to a material degree by the tradition which they themselves have helped to create. Not the least important result of this prestige is its effect on the public, who have come to accept it—and with some justification—at its face value, and who see in judicial independence a greater promise of justice than could be obtained through the application of ordinary political sanctions.

As I see it, the intention of this bill is to uphold and strengthen these precepts which are so clearly set forth, and in that light it must be tested. Canadians at all levels of income concede readily that judges of all courts should be paid such salaries and provided with such pensions for themselves and their dependants as will assure not only full financial independence but will be attractive to leaders of the bar to accept judicial appointment; for without financial independence other aspects of independence are illusory or hallucinatory.

It becomes a matter of judgment as to what the levels of salary must be to achieve those universally accepted objectives. For myself, I believe that if there is to be error it should be on the side of generosity. When we are in committee of the whole we can examine in detail with the Solicitor General the scale of salaries proposed by the bill, ascertain more closely than he has stated on second reading the principles upon which the figures are based, and decide then upon their wisdom. Consequently at this stage I refrain from detailed comment upon the salary levels proposed.

But I believe I should point out that there is an ever-growing problem of persuading leaders of the bar to accept judicial appointment, particularly in the courts which go on circuit. At the age when a distinguished barrister is suitable for appointment he is not only at the height of his earning capacity, which is usually very substantial, but he has accustomed himself to the comforts of home and family. To uproot such a man and put him on circuit, say in Ontario from Kenora to L'Orignal, and require him to spend perhaps 100 nights a year in hotel rooms, not only away from his family but insulated from his former comrades at the bar with whom he dare not fraternize, is to ask a great deal in dedication and sacrifice.

For a long time I have personally believed that the circuit system is obsolete in a great province like Ontario and should be replaced by a system of judicial districts such as exists in Quebec. But this is a matter not for this parliament but for the legislature of Ontario, which I hope will soon come to grips with it. I believe the circuit system is a direct deterrent to many prospective and admirable judicial appointees. All I indicate now is that the life of a circuit judge is no bed of roses, no valhalla of unalloyed joy.

Today the earnings of leaders of the bar are high, in some cases very high. Judicial emoluments, at whatever level they may be, are unlikely to be able to match those earnings and we must rely on the fact that a large number of, if not most, lawyers conceal under their gowns a yearning for judicial preferment.

Without this sense of tradition within the bar the role of the Minister of Justice would not be easy in making acceptable appointments to the bench. Referring to high earnings at the bar, I was fascinated to read in the memoirs of the Earl of Kilmuir that when he returned to the bar after Nuremberg and after having ceased to be a cabinet minister his earnings were £38,500 per annum, and this was during the time he was a member of the shadow cabinet and took his place in the House of Commons every day. It was some accomplishment to have earned $115,000 per annum at the bar while a leading member of parliament, particularly in the light of the fact that some of us in this country, who are much lesser parliamentary lights, have been compelled to virtually give up practice at the bar in order to attend to public duties.

One aspect of this bill which concerns me is that it increases the disparity in income between superior court justices and county or district court judges. I shall speak here of the province about which I know most. County court judges in most centres in Ontario have a tremendous volume of highly diversified judicial work. It is true that some—I think only a few—are far from busy, but that is a problem for the Ontario legislature to redesign boundaries of judicial jurisdiction. However, even at this stage I urge upon the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice that the quantum of increase for superior and county court judges be equivalent in dollar value, and that it should not widen the disparity, as this bill does. I concur in a different scale or level of salary for the two benches; I think it is proper and inevitable, but the difference should be retained, I venture to suggest, at approximately the existing level and not widened. My own opinion is that the jurisdiction of the county court judges, as opposed to the high court, will be continually increased, and that recognition should be given to that trend which is evident within this province.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, to some disappointment that the minister has not dealt in this bill with the question of pensions, except in one or two small particulars. I think the time is overdue for a full review of judicial pensions, in collaboration with the judges themselves.

I will mention one special problem. The pension for the widow of a judge is one third of the judge's pension if he dies while on pension or two ninths of his salary if he dies in office. In this day this is surely an anomaly. Personally I know of no enlightened pension scheme where the widow's pension is less than one half of the husband's. It is true that judges' pensions are non-contributory and indeed are perhaps the most significant fringe benefit of judicial appointments, but the retirement age is 75 and there may be no pension, except on the ground of ill health, under the age of 70. The retirement age at 75 reduces by 10 years the normal period of pension entitlement.

What I am suggesting to the Solicitor General is a full review of judicial pensions in collaboration with the judges themselves in the light of developments in other pension arrangements in recent years.

One of the features of the bill, which has been mentioned by the Solicitor General, is the provision of an additional salary of $2,000 to every judge who does not receive extra remuneration from the province for any extra judicial duties for the government of Canada, for the province, or for acting as arbitrator, referee, conciliator or mediator, and the prohibition of payment to him for such duties of any additional emolument except out of pocket expenses.

My understanding is that this will not now apply in Ontario, because supreme court justices receive $4,000 per annum from the province and county court judges receive $3,500. However, to make provision for payment of an extra $2,000 to county court judges in Ontario, as I understand the section, all the legislature of Ontario would need to do is to provide that $3,500 is payable to them qua surrogate judges, as is done in Manitoba. Thereupon the $2,000 under section 20 of the bill would be payable. But that, of course, is in the discretion of the legislature of the province.

In this particular I want to state my firm objection to what I may describe as moonlighting by judges. With the new salaries proposed I believe that only in cases of greatest urgency should judges be permitted to accept outside employment. In most courts there is a heavy backlog of work, much of it created by judges accepting non-judicial assignments as royal commissioners, arbitrators, conciliators or the like. These extra judicial duties are prejudicial to the independence and impartiality of the judiciary, and should be stopped.

Indeed, I believe my friend Mr. Justice Wishart F. Spence may unwittingly have performed a great public service last year, because I believe that never again will a justice of our highest court either be asked to accept or actually accept appointment to a commission with political undertones.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Personally I hope that never again will a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada be appointed to any royal commission at any time. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that I have on the order paper private members' Bill C-237, which would have the effect of preventing any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada from accepting any extra judicial appointment. In arbitration, conciliation and mediation work in employer-employee relations it is exceedingly difficult for a judge to avoid being tagged as either a labour man or a company man. It is hard for him to avoid public attacks as a result of his activities. Indeed, the constant use of judges for arbitration and conciliation has, at least in the province of Ontario, divided the bench into the "haves" and the "have nots". The "haves" are those who are regularly engaged in outside non-judicial assignments at worthwhile fees, and the "have nots" are those whose talents are not sought in this field or those who on principle refuse to accept non-judicial work.

My hope is that this legislation will result in actually restricting judges to their judicial knitting. It is true that there will have to be panels of arbitrators, mediators or conciliators, but I suggest they will have to be created from the non-judicial world, from the academic world, from members of the bar and elsewhere. I suggest most earnestly that judges must be sent back to their courtrooms. If this is the by-product of these increases and of other amendments in the bill, it will be most worth-while in the national interest.

My views on the excellence of the Canadian judiciary have been frequently expressed in this chamber and I do not intend to repeat them this morning. Without necessarily approving the particular increases or the scale of increases proposed by the bill, we welcome any legislation which will strengthen the independence and impartiality of the Canadian judiciary, for thereby we strengthen the nation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a lay member of the house to say that I have listened with great interest to the speech by the hon. member for Carleton I thought he was very logical in his approach to several of the problems or principles related to this bill. I must say that he almost brought tears to my eyes when he dealt with the way lawyers are required at certain times to give up very substantial incomes and sacrifice themselves for the public good for the salaries being provided under this bill. Those who do it I think should have the gratitude of members of the house and of the people of Canada for accepting great reductions in income in order to serve the people of this country.

The other point I wish to mention, Mr. Speaker, is the reference to moonlighting. As I sat here it struck a responsive chord in the members of this party who are normally used to earning their living with their hands and the sweat of their brows. I thought there was great merit in this suggestion. During my experience I have known some excellent judges who have undertaken this work of conciliation, on arbitration boards and other commissions. I do think the member was correct in stating there was the possibility of a judge being tagged as a labour judge, a management judge or having an opinion in one direction or the other. I wholeheartedly support this suggestion that judges should not be required to undertake these extra functions.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, as an ordinary, hard working man, I resume my seat.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, just a word to say that we fully agree with the hon. minister as to the increase proposed by the government.

I shall certainly not pity our judges' fate, but I want to say that they deserve salaries just as much as international sportsman and any kind of television performer.

I think that they have the most thankless job in the country and besides, we have to consider the fact that the majority of them are the greatest technicians in the country and that they play an essential role.

I should like to call the attention of the house to the appointment of some judges. If their duties are most important, I think that they should be appointed according to the duties they will have to perform. However, I will confess frankly that when we see appointed to the bench people that we used to know and hobnob with in the past and who were considered as rather poor lawyers, because of their political affiliation, it is not likely to inspire a great deal of confidence in the people, in some cases.

We want judges to get the salary they deserve, but we also want them to be equal to their task. That is why I say that appointments should be made sensibly. As a matter of fact, when appointing a judge, any government should first consider the qualifications and the honesty, of a candidate, before taking into account his political allegiance. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the situation will improve in the future.

Judges of the Supreme Court and of other courts will get a small annual increase of $5,000. This is not to be disdained; indeed, it should prompt them to carry out their duties year round instead of accepting all types of subcontracts. A judge who gets $35,000 or $40,000 per year has enough to live on, I think, especially if the new legislation provides for travelling expenses, living allowances and all kinds of exemptions. It is said that a judge needs an increase to provide for his family. I think that when a lawyer is appointed to the bench, his family is quite independent of his salary, and with $35,000 or $40,000 per annum, he can discharge his duties 365 days a year, without looking for other fees, outside his functions as a judge.

To some extent, I think this is why we seem to be short of judges, especially in our district courts. Some cases drag on for one, two, and even three years. People say: there are too many cases before the courts, judges are scarce and have no time to hear these cases. I believe, Mr. Speaker, the government should do some checking. I would be anxious to know, at the end of the year, the total number of hours each judge has devoted to his work, as compared with his salary, for I am aware that there are several judges —fortunately, several of our judges are very serious-minded—who have their duties at heart, but some others take life easily and they are not working as much as they should.

I would like to find out at the end of the year the total number of hours during which they sat and heard cases; it would be surprising. Even the government would be surprised, as far as some districts are concerned. After all, judges are being appointed to render justice to the people, to do justice to the ones who wish to appear before them, but if they devote only three, four or five hours to the hearing of cases, I believe that at the end of the month or of the year, there will be 50 or 60 per cent of the cases which will not have been heard.

I believe such a situation is due to the sluggishness on the part of judges. They care more about getting their salary—a fairly healthy one—than about hearing cases that have been entered on the roll and should be heard during the year.

I did not know exactly how many judges there were; then I see the list for Quebec, and I quote:

(a) The Chief Justice of Quebec;

(b) Eleven puisne judges of the Court of the Queen's Bench;

(c) The Chief Justice of the Superior Court;

(d) The Associate Chief Justice;

(e) Seventy-three puisne judges of the Superior Court—

I wonder why we have more judges than Ontario. I also see here the list for Ontario, and I notice that this province has fewer judges than Quebec. I do not know whether this is because people in the province of Quebec are more difficult to deal with than in Ontario, but even so the fact remains that there are 73 judges of the Superior Court in Quebec and only 24 in Ontario. I do not know whether—

[English]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman not aware that there is no county court in Quebec?

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member that he is now making a detailed study or analysis of the bill. The point he is raising now should be discussed when the bill is studied in committee.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to give an idea of the over-all situation, which gives rise to a question in my mind. I also wanted to point out that, generally, in spite of a larger number of judges in the province of Quebec, we get less service from them than the citizens of Ontario get from theirs. That is the point I wanted to make in order that the government might be aware of that sad state of affairs. We have much to complain about, in Quebec, with regard to certain judges.

Once again, I congratulate the vast majority of judges who really deserve their salary, for only the minority, namely 15 or 20 per cent of them, do not carry out their responsibilities. In spite of this, I believe that percentage is high enough to call the attention of the house to the situation and I trust that in the future the government will keep a lookout with regard to the work performed by the judges.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a very brief point to the Solicitor General, and my point is this. A separation recently took place in Nova Scotia with the creation of an appeal division with three judges and a trial division with six judges. At the moment nine judges replace a system which employed seven judges. The arithmetic of this change has had the effect of removing one of the trial judges, and I suggest this is something the Solicitor General and the attorney general of Nova Scotia might well wish to consider, perhaps after some consultation with the newly appointed chief justice of the appeal division, Hon. L. D. Currie, who was recently chief justice in the trial division and who would therefore be aware of the problem which had been created.

The reason this problem is a little acute at the present time is that it frequently happens that one of the three appeal judges has to remove himself from hearing an appeal because of his involvement in the case when it came on for trial. There are also other reasons why one of the members of a three man appeal court may feel he should not be sitting on a certain appeal. This can be remedied by bringing up a judge from the trial division to fill in on a temporary basis and hear the appeal, but this has the effect of putting more pressure on the judges of the trial division. I think this is a matter the Solicitor General and the attorney general of Nova Scotia should consider, I suggest in consultation with the chief justice of the appeal division and other judges as well.

I should like to make a further point, one which has been made several times and made very well by the hon. member for Carleton. There is a group of judges who do not partake of extra-judicial functions such as sitting as conciliators, mediators and the like, and this has created the rather awesome burden of trying to keep the court calendars and trial work up to date.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we seriously consider that judicial independence of judges means much more than financial independence. It should also mean that none of them is put in the position of carrying such a work load that his ability to deal properly with cases is impaired because there is simply too much work to do.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

On clause 1—Salaries of Judges of Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would now elaborate briefly on the principles which were adopted by the government in reaching the scale of increases set forth in this clause. While he is doing this would he also deal with the other point I made, which concerned the increasing disparity between the salaries of supreme court judges and county and district court judges.

While I am on my feet I might say to the hon. gentleman for Roberval that if he will examine the bill he will find there are 118 federal judges in the province of Ontario and 88 federal judges in the province of Quebec. What I think the hon. gentleman did not appreciate was that in the province of Quebec there are no county courts. He will find that there are 83 judges in the county courts in Ontario, which with 35 supreme court judges brings the total to 118 federal judges, whereas in the province of Quebec there are only the superior court judges totalling 88 in number.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, before dealing with some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Carleton I wish to compliment him on the eloquent address he made, and to concur in general with his remarks about the judiciary and the sacrifices they make in accepting an appointment to the bench. The hon. member mentioned the case of Lord Kilmuir, and that Lord Kilmuir while a practising member of the bar was earning $115,000 per annum. The recent increase in the salaries of high court judges in the United Kingdom brings the salary of a high court judge up to $30,000, which confirms the point made by the hon. member.

As I stated earlier, Mr. Chairman, it is not easy to formulate the criteria by which judicial salaries should be assessed. It is not done on a percentage basis or by an across the board increase. We try to even it out according to the responsibilities of the office. The supreme court judges will receive between $28,000 and $30,000, depending on the province in which they serve. This compares with the figure of $30,000 in Great Britain I mentioned a moment ago.

So far as the county court and district court judges are concerned a difficult problem arises. The salaries paid county court judges under provincial legislation are such that in some provinces the additional salary is caught by clause 20 while in other provinces it is not. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the salary paid by the provinces in some cases is free from the deduction of $2,000.

Perhaps I may put it in another way. I believe that in some provinces the county court judges will receive, over and above anything that is paid to them under the federal statute, the amount paid to them under the provincial statute. In other provinces they will have to forgo the amount paid to them under the provincial statute if they accept the full amount under the federal statute. So no matter what course we adopted we were still going to have disparity in the salaries of county court judges across the country.

I did have the pleasure of meeting with a number of representatives of the county court judges, Mr. Chairman, and I appreciate the problem. I suggested at the time that I enter into private consultation with the attorneys general of the various provinces to see whether the provincial legislatures will consider amending their statutes to enable the federal government to bring uniformity to the salaries of county and district court judges. On reflection I would say, with respect, that this seems to me perhaps to be the most desirable way in which to approach this rather difficult subject.

The hon. member for Carleton also raised the point about pensions and with genuine concern suggested we should be a little more generous in this connection. The government was perhaps a little reluctant to move any further under this bill, because in fairness I think the pensions of all public servants should be considered and given equal study before any action is taken. There has been study of this point from time to time.

On the question of extrajudicial duties, I think this meets the point the hon. member has in mind, namely that the members of the judiciary should concentrate on the discharge of their official duties rather than on extrajudicial activities. The act does permit judges to undertake extrajudicial duties if provision is made on in a statute of the legislature or of parliament, but they can only be paid in respect of those duties if remuneration is made available by the provincial or federal government.

I believe the hon. member for Carleton dealt effectively with the question raised by the hon. member for Roberval. As he pointed out, in the province of Quebec the superior court judges discharge many of the functions which are performed by county court judges in Ontario. In addition, magistrates in Quebec perform some of the duties performed by county court judges in Ontario. So the number of persons engaged in judicial functions is relatively the same per capita in these provinces.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my gratitude for the devotion and sense of public service with which the judges in Quebec and elsewhere are discharging their duties.

I believe I have answered most of the questions which were raised, but if there are some I have overlooked—

Mr. McCleave: Yes. I did ask a question which the minister has not dealt with.

Mr. Pennell: I apologize to the hon. member for Halifax; I overlooked the point he made. I find merit in the suggestion he put forward, and I think it would be proper that the Minister of Justice should consult with the attorney general of Nova Scotia with regard to it. I will bring this matter to the attention of my colleague and urge it upon him.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not sure the minister has dealt effectively with the point I made about the disparity between salaries paid to supreme court and county court judges in the province of Ontario. The position, as I understand it, is that both receive an amount from the province, so neither bench would be entitled to draw anything under clause 20, the extra $2,000, unless the legislature amends the existing legislation.

The position is that the supreme court judges draw an amount of $4,000 from the Ontario legislature, and the county judges get $3,500. The addition of these amounts to the amounts proposed in this bill would mean that the supreme court judges would receive a total of $30,000 and the county judges $22,-500. This in fact increases the disparity between the two benches; there is an increase of $5,000 for the supreme court and $3,000 for the county court. This represents a widening of the disparity, whereas in my opinion the reverse should be the case. I am not sure that the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice have dealt as generously with the county judges, relatively, as they should have done in the circumstances.

I understand that the minister intends as a concomitant to introduce an amendment whereby pensions will be based upon an amount including the $2,000. In cases where these judges are receiving sums from the province they will not be entitled to a pension based on the $2,000, and I suggest this is a serious factor. In my opinion the minister should give more consideration to the position of the county court judges.

Mr. Pennell: I appreciate the point made by the hon. member for Carleton. Perhaps I can elaborate on the question. Supreme court judges in the province of Ontario receive, as I understand it, an additional $4,000 from the province for performing their duties as high court judges. The county court judges receive from the province $3,500 and, if I am correct, this covers their duties as surrogate court judges. I respectfully suggest that if the provincial act was drafted so that they received say $2,500 as surrogate court judges and $1,-000 for county court duties, the $2,500 set aside for surrogate duties would not be caught by the clause we have been considering. This would be an effective way of bringing the salaries of Ontario county court judges closer to those of high court judges.

If we were to adopt any other approach it would mean that in provinces where the provincial statute is drafted so that the amount paid is not caught by the provisions of clause 20, the county court judges in that province would be receiving an amount much closer to the supreme court scales than in other provinces, and we would still have the problem of disparity.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The point is that at the present time the total dollar income of a county court judge in Ontario including the federal payments and the provincial payments is $5,500 lower than that of a supreme court judge. Under this legislation it will be $7,500 lower. The minister has been thinking more in terms of percentages than in terms of amounts, and I rather think he should have worked on the basis of amounts.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member for Carleton said most of what can be said when he spoke on second reading. No better proof of his eloquence could be forthcoming than the admission by the hon. member for Kootenay West that my hon. friend had brought tears to his eyes. This, I thought, was impossible because in the years during which I have been observing the hon. member for Kootenay West, it seems to me he had surely shed all the tears it was possible for him to shed.

I wish to touch on this distinction between county or district court judges and supreme court judges. My view is that the situation in Quebec is far better than it is in other provinces. I have always felt there should not be the present distinction. There is often an inclination among some people to measure the quality of justice which litigants receive by the extent of the jurisdiction possessed by the judges, and sometimes this involves the question of salaries. One of the difficulties the Solicitor General faces is that the extent of a judge's duties is fixed largely by the provincial legislatures. It is my feeling that this might be the subject of discussion at a conference of attorneys general looking toward the removal of the barriers which now exist.

As a solicitor I have sometimes raised the amount of a statement of claim by a thousand dollars so as to get a case from one court into another. This is frequently done. Surrogate court work and the handling of estates are matters for the provinces. They might wish eventually to appoint their own people to handle these matters, as they have done by the appointment of masters in chambers in some districts.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but pursuant to an order of the house made last Monday this committee stands adjourned until two o'clock?

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, before this committee in its infinite wisdom decided at one o'clock there were better places for hon. members to spend their time than in committee, I had been dealing with the distinctions between supreme court and country court judges. I said that I admired the system prevailing in Quebec where there is no distinction between judges. There superior court judges deal with matters which in other provinces are divided between supreme court and county court judges. It is for the provinces and not for the federal government to say how the courts shall be organized and how they shall deal with their work. I hope that at some time this subject may be discussed at the meetings which take place between the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice and the Attorneys General. I think it is desirable that the ultimate objective of having no distinction between judges be achieved.

While we are not allowed to say what proceedings have taken place in committee it is no secret that in the joint committee on divorce where we have been considering proposed changes in our divorce laws most of the briefs which have been presented and made public have shown the wisdom of conferring the right to dissolve marriages on county, district and supreme court judges. As work piles up it will be most desirable to bring together under one judge the jurisdiction of supreme court and district court judges, leaving the provinces free rein as to the way estate and surrogate work and debt collection are handled.

Another point I wish to talk about is dealt with in clause 1. I refer to the payment of the additional $2,000 which is to be included in the new section 20 of the Judges Act. New section 20 in part reads as follows:

—an additional salary of $2,000.00 per annum as compensation for any extra-judicial services—

I take it that the extra work referred to is extra work which the judges will perform as judges. I also take it that this follows the recommendations made over a number of years by the public accounts committee. For a number of years that committee, during examination of the Auditor General's report, has commented about supreme court, county and district court judges having been assigned to extrajudicial duties as conciliators, members of arbitration boards and so on. They have received $40, $50 or even $100 a day, ostensibly earmarked as living and travelling expenses. I feel that these payments have contained an element of remuneration. The view that the Auditor General and the public accounts committee have consistently taken for four or five years is that payments of this kind do contain an element of remuneration. Both the persons who received this money and the government which approved payment thereof would therefore be in direct violation of the Judges Act as it then stood, because that act provides that apart from his salary no judge should receive any remuneration.

During the hearings of the committee we had the pleasure of having the deputy minister of justice appear before us to give us his view, but quite frankly I might say that we were not satisfied. However, as I understand it this clause will now cover that situation. It was not that we objected to judges receiving these payments but rather that we objected to their receiving them in the way in which they did, since they contain an element of remuneration. There is ample justification for them. It has been brought to our attention that in some cases judges who have received such payments have filed income tax returns in which they included a portion of the $60 or $100 a day they had received allegedly as living allowance. In their income tax returns they included part of these amounts as income.

I think this provision brings to an end a very undesirable situation. As the hon. member for Carleton pointed out, a distinction was created between judges because while some judges engaged in this type of work and received very substantial additional remuneration their colleagues on the bench were compelled to carry out most of the judicial duties.

Therefore an additional arduous burden fell upon some judges because of the absence of some of their colleagues who were engaged in these other duties.

For this reason I hope the Solicitor General will confirm that this provision does take care of the objection which the Auditor General and the public accounts committee have expressed over a number of years. I hope that the attempt to introduce what can only be described as an element of remuneration in the living and travelling allowances of judges engaged in extrajudicial duties will now cease.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to say that I concur with the hon. member for Peace River that there is a trend toward a division of judicial duties as he suggested. I am also pleased to be able to confirm his understanding of the purpose of this bill regarding payment to judges who are engaged in extrajudicial duties.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, before this matter is dealt with by the committee of the whole I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he does not feel the time has come when methods of appointment to the judiciary other than the one now followed should be seriously looked into. It seems to me that in his eloquent words this morning in connection with the judiciary the hon. member for Carleton might have included the fact that judicial appointments usually are made from those persons who happen to be friends of the government in office at the particular time. Although it may be said that one does not know whether a certain person is a friend of the government, I still say that in terms of practical politics we know what the score is. Perhaps the Solicitor General might indicate what he thinks might be a suitable alternative to appointments to the judiciary almost always being made from among those who are friendly to the government.

I am not a lawyer but from a logical point of view I certainly agree with the hon. member for Peace River that it does seem that some steps should be taken to ensure that the divisions existing in some of the provinces so far as the judiciary is concerned are eliminated so that a direct allocation of service can be made in respect of the judiciary. This might be spelled out and specified more clearly so that the members of the judiciary might be able to give better service to the general public.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised what one might almost call the annual question which comes before the house whenever we are dealing with matters related to the judiciary. Without in any way reflecting upon what considerations may have entered into the appointment of judges before I assumed any responsibility in that regard, I wish to assure the house that the number one consideration to my knowledge has been the experience, character and learning of the person who is appointed to the bench. I would be less than frank, however, if I said there were no other considerations, but I wish to emphasize that to the best of my knowledge the primary considerations have been the character and learning of the individual. I might go further to indicate that in my experience inquiries have been discreetly made about the individual concerned and as to whether or not he has ever been before the dicipline committees of the various law societies. Generally speaking the person who is appointed has been endorsed by a bencher or other high ranking member of the Law Society. The Law Society, after all, includes persons who have the best knowledge in this regard, and is the governing body of the legal profession in the respective provinces. I suggest to the hon. member that the Minister of Justice is performing his duties in this regard in a very able manner.

While I am on my feet I might be permitted to advise the committee that I seek to amend clause 1 of the bill. First of all, on page 5 of the bill I would seek an amendment to new section 19. Where it now reads in subsection (e) of new section 19, "Seventeen judges and junior judges of the county courts", it should read, "Eighteen judges and junior judges of the county courts". This is applicable to the province of British Columbia. Since the preparation of this bill an additional judge has been added to the number of county court judges in the province of British Columbia. I believe the house carried the resolution the other evening. The text of the amendment I should like to have made is printed at page 13 of Votes and Proceedings of February 21 last. I would ask that this amendment now be put.

Mr. Sharp: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pennell: I apologize to the house for not having copies of this very minor amendment.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I should like to get back to the question I raised a moment ago. While I very much appreciate what the Solicitor General has said about the care with which members of the judiciary are picked, my concern is about the limited scope in practice in picking these individuals. I believe we are limited in scope by the practice of looking for those who are friends of the government. I hope the government will give serious consideration to finding a different way of selecting the judiciary. We would be burying our heads in the sand if we did not realize in spite of the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Carleton, that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction about these appointments because of the suspicion that surrounds the way in which members of the judiciary are appointed.

I believe that not only should the judiciary be, as I believe they are, very capable and honest individuals doing a good job but they should be appointed in a way that would leave them beyond suspicion. I think this is one of the things the government should look into in order that our judiciary will not be suspect because they belong to a political party and because a friend of the government secured their appointment over someone else who was just as competent but was not a friend of the government.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the only reply I can give is that to my personal knowledge there have been two appointments to the bench since I have been a member of the government where the appointees were not, in the words of the hon. member, friends of the government. I admit frankly, as I said earlier, that there are other considerations that enter into these appointments.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, if I may ask the indulgence of the committee I should like to propose another amendment, unless the previous amendment has not yet been dealt with.

The Chairman: Perhaps the Chair should first put the previous amendment to the committee. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry? Amendment (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

Judges Act

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word on clause 1 generally, although part of what I had in mind to say has perhaps been covered. First may I note that when the hon. member for Cariboo was speaking a little earlier this afternoon he used a phrase and then added a couple of words as an afterthought. The phrase referred to "men", and then he said "or women"; that was the afterthought. I should like to ask the Solicitor General, how many of the judges whose salaries we are providing for in this bill are women?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I am in the unenviable position of not being able to give an answer to that question. I know that the county court judge of the county which I have the honour to represent in this house was a lady but unfortunately she retired for health reasons not very long ago. I am not aware at the moment of any woman sitting on the bench in Canada.

Mr. Rapp: Yes, in Saskatoon.

Mr. Pennell: I am not aware of any woman sitting on the bench in Ontario. But I am advised by my colleagues that in respect of other provinces there is at least one county court judge, namely in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Rapp: In Saskatoon.

Mr. Grafftey: This is a question for the royal commission.

Mr. Pennell: However, Mr. Chairman, I am not answering the question of the hon. member, who asked me how many of our judges are women. I am not able to give him an answer.

Mr. Knowles: Let me put it this way, Mr. Chairman. Does the Solicitor General know of any judge of any court higher than a country court who is a woman?

Mr. Pennell: I cannot give a single instance of a woman sitting on the superior or supreme courts of this country.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I may be able to help my hon. friend. There has never been a woman superior court judge appointed in Canada; indeed, there has been only one in the entire commonwealth and that is in the United Kingdom. There is at the present time one county court judge, Judge Mary Batten, in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Rapp: And Judge Mary Batten is a very capable judge.

Miss LaMarsh: Judge Mary Batten was appointed by this administration and she is only the second woman in Canada to be so appointed. A woman was appointed to the position of citizenship court judge in Halifax. She was also appointed by this administration.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the Secretary of State has revealed sensitivity on a point that was not in my mind at all. I was not raising the question of how many appointments of women had been made by the present administration; I was asking this question in general terms having in mind the whole history of the country. I suppose all I can say with respect to the embarrassing position in which I have put the Solicitor General is, page Ann Francis.

Miss LaMarsh: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask one or two more questions, if I may, though it may be that one of the questions I have in mind was covered in the answer the Solicitor General gave to the hon. member for Peace River. As the Solicitor General knows, I am sure, there is on page 38 of the current Auditor General's report a section which deals with the question of living allowances paid to federally appointed judges. Does the Solicitor General consider that the changes he has made in this bill take care of the problem about which the Auditor General has made his complaints?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can best answer the question by giving a very brief explanation of what is covered by this bill. Under this bill a judge will be permitted to perform extrajudicial duties but he will only be paid for his travelling and out-of-pocket expenses. He will not receive any additional remuneration; he will continue to receive the same salary he would have received had he been performing judicial duties. I believe that meets the point raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: To put it in specific terms, Mr. Chairman, the Auditor General complained about rates of living allowances from $50 to $100 a day. Of course, the complaint was that there seemed to be an element of remuneration in an amount of that quantum, to use the language of the lawyers. When the Solicitor General says that from now on there can be paid only the actual out-of-pocket living and travelling expenses, does he mean that these flat allowances of $50, $60 or $100 a day, which were included in some of the orders in council appointing judges to special assignments, will be discontinued?

Mr. Pennell: That is my understanding.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have one other question and it also arises from the Auditor General's report. On page 39 of the report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1966, there are a couple of paragraphs concerning admiralty courts. I should like to read a sentence or two starting with the second paragraph:

> An examination during the year of all of the Admiralty courts disclosed a number of weaknesses in administration, including inadequate records, intermingling of federal and provincial funds, retention of the interest earnings by some of the registrars, fees improperly paid to the provinces, etc. Our report to the Department of Justice pointed out the need for more careful definition of the financial arrangements for these courts and for the establishment of adequate financial records. These matters are now under study by the accounting advisory service of the comptroller of the treasury.

I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether this matter is also being taken care of by the Department of Justice?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I believe that effect is being given to this recommendation as it is only in three provinces that the salaries of admiralty district judges are being increased. They are unchanged in the other provinces. It would therefore appear that the department is looking at the duties being performed by the various admiralty district judges and acting accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: I think that the criticism of the Auditor General goes a little further in that it relates to the administrative practices of these courts. I do not wish to embarrass the Solicitor General with facts with which he may not be intimately familiar, but perhaps he will ask his officials to take note of these paragraphs in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Pennell: I will do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I just want to take a few minutes of the committee's time to refer briefly to remarks made by the hon. member for Cariboo. First of all I wish to point out that I am not a lawyer and up to the present time I have not found it necessary to employ one to defend me. Of course I do not know how long that will last. However, the point I wish to make centres around the word "suspicion" mentioned by the hon. member for Cariboo in reference to appointments to the judiciary. I do not think that is a very good word to use. Frankly I do not know why it should be used.

An hon. Member: Do you wish to use a stronger term?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I certainly would not refer to the judiciary in stronger terms or in any really critical terms because I have always had a very high respect for the men who serve that profession in Canada. I do not understand these people who wrap themselves up in white robes of purity and say that judges are suspect. For instance, only recently in Nova Scotia Mr. J. L. Dubinsky, Mr. Gordon S. Cowan and Justice L. D. Currie received new appointments in the judiciary. These men worked very hard and for many years, possibly for the Liberal party. I do not see anything wrong with that. They are entitled to their way of thinking. Are we to eliminate from politics all people who are lawyers? However, I do admit that there may be too many of them in the house. Are we to keep all lawyers away from politics and prevent them from working for political parties? What wrong is there in a lawyer working for a political party? Certainly the men whom I have mentioned, because their appointments have taken place in recent days, are all distinguished men who have served their country well, particularly chief justice L. D. Currie.

Let us take the case of the Solicitor General himself, to my mind one of the finest and most capable men that ever held that position in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I am sure that he is appreciated by all parties. He presents himself well both inside and outside the house and he is most co-operative and courteous at all times. Should we say that because of the fact that he served his party and served as a minister in the government, when the day comes when he no longer holds his office he will be suspect?

Mr. Leboe: I object to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I believe I have the floor.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I have a question of privilege. I object to having the hon. member put words in my mouth. I said no such thing. I suggested that the general public regard certain things with suspicion, which is the privilege of any individual no matter what his status may be. He has the privilege of regarding with suspicion anything he wants. To say that this situation does not exist does not accord with the facts.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I do not profess to be as brilliant as you are Mr. Chairman, but I am wondering what the question of privilege is.

Mr. Leboe: You did not hear what I said.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I regret I aroused the ire of the generally quiet and considerate hon. member for Cariboo and I certainly apologize, but of course if the hat fits he can wear it.

I think what I have said bears repeating. From time to time we hear that so and so is suspect because he works for the Liberals or for the Conservatives. What is the crime in doing that under our system of government? What is wrong with it?

Mr. Leboe: I never said there was anything wrong with it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): If this is the case then every member here is suspect, whether he is a lawyer or a coal miner, because he may be appointed to a higher place at some time.

Mr. Winkler: Some may be more suspect than others.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): However, to speak more seriously, I will say that I have every respect for the judiciary of this country regardless of whether they were appointed by the previous Conservative government or by the Liberal government. I believe that no reflection should be cast on the judiciary.

There may be the odd occasion when a problem arises but after all judges are human beings just the same as any other person. I am sure that if you explore any party, fraternal organization, service club or church you will find people who are not acting in the way they should. Once again let me say that when the day comes that the present Solicitor General ceases to hold his office, surely the fact that he was a Liberal cabinet minister and served his party and the country well will not prevent him from receiving any type of appointment in the judiciary. Of course I am not buttering him up because I am trying to get something out of him as there is very little that he can do for me or my constituency. If he were the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of Transport I might be doing so, but this is another matter.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I understood the Solicitor General intended to propose an amendment. This may be an appropriate time for him to do so.

Mr. Pennell: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all I wish to say that I thank the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria for his generous remarks. I should say, with sincerity, that if the illustration had been left to me I could have looked across the floor of the house and picked better examples.

I should like to move an amendment which reads as follows:

That clause 1 of Bill C-267, An Act to amend the Judges Act, be amended by adding thereto the following subclause:

(3) Sections 4 to 7 and sections 9 to 19 of the said Act as enacted by this section shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of March, 1967.

The purpose of the amendment is to permit judges who retire between March 1 and June of this year to have their pensions calculated on the increased salary. In the case of a county court judge it would be $19,000 but it would not include the additional $2,000 which is established by the new section 20.

Mr. Fairweather: May I ask if this provision would assist the widow of the late chief justice of Nova Scotia with her pension? I hope it would.

Mr. Pennell: I regret to advise the hon. member that it is my understanding it would not. It would only cover those who retire between March 1 and June 1. There has to be a cut-off period, and whatever period is chosen it works to the disadvantage of some otherwise deserving individual. This is an unfortunate fact of life.

Mr. Sharp: I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There are two matters I should like to mention. The minister has by his amendment taken care of the increase in the number of judges in British Columbia. Doubtless he will have observed from the morning newspaper that first reading was given yesterday in the legislature of Ontario to a bill to increase the number of judges of the high court to 26. Does the minister think he might take judicial notice of the legislation and perhaps seek an amendment now so we would not have to come back to this matter on another occasion? We would be prepared to have the resolution adopted by unanimous consent to cover the particular situation.

The other situation is that this proposed new section 20 has been exempted from the amendment just carried. Will the minister indicate why he has chosen the 1st day of June, 1967 as the operative date for the proposed new section 20?

Mr. Pennell: If I may deal with the last question first, Mr. Chairman, the date of June 1 was selected to give the judges an opportunity to make an election as to whether they preferred to receive the additional salary under new section 20 or reject it and accept the allowance from the province. This date also permits the provinces a period in which they may revise their own legislation if they so desire dealing with the point raised earlier in the debate.

In so far as the first point is concerned, I am grateful for the spirit of co-operation manifested by the hon. member for Carleton. If I am hesitant about accepting his suggestion, it is only because I am not satisfied that all the steps have been taken in connection with the provincial legislation. It might be somewhat presumptuous on our part to take steps here when there are still certain formalities to be cleared in the provincial legislature. I do appreciate the offer of co-operation.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Regulations re payment of inheritance taxes, etc.

Mr. Pennell: I seek to make an amendment to clause 4. The amendment I seek would mean that the present proposed new section 30 in clause 4 would be renumbered new section 30A and there would be a new proposed section 30 which would read as follows:

30. For the purposes of the provisions of this act respecting annuities, there shall be included in the salary of which a judge was in receipt under this act at any time after the coming into force of section 20, the amount of any additional salary provided for by that section whether or not at that time such additional salary was being paid to him.

Then, of course, this would be followed by the renumbering of the present proposed section 30 as 30A. The purpose of the amendment is to clarify the fact that the pension of a judge will be calculated on his salary, including the additional salary that is paid to him under new section 20. If I may use an illustration, because the basic increase is $3,000 a county court judge will receive $19,000. Then, according to new section 20, he will be paid an additional $2,000 which will bring his salary up to $21,000.

Since certain provinces are paying their judges an additional salary the judge has to make an election. Either he accepts the $2,000 under this provision or he accepts the additional salary payable under the provincial legislation. The county court judge would receive the basic $3,000 increase bringing his salary to $19,000. I would expect that most of them in Ontario would prefer to accept the $3,500 from the province rather than the $2,000 provided under the new section 20. This would bring their gross salary up to $22,500. However, their pensions will be calculated on $21,000 so that every county court judge in Canada will have his pension calculated on the common figure of $21,000. This amendment was introduced because there was some doubt expressed whether it was clear the additional salary of $2,000 was included in the amount for calculation of pension.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I gather from what the minister has said that if this amendment were not introduced there might be a difference between the judges in one province and another. In one province the calculation could have been on the basis of $21,000 and in another province it could conceivably have been on the basis of $19,000. This amendment will make the basis of calculation uniform across the country.

Mr. Pennell: The hon. member for Carleton has put the matter succinctly.

Mr. Sharp: I so move.

Amendment (Mr. Sharp) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 5—Acting as commissioner, etc.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to come back to the general matter of the acceptance by judges of appointments to extrajudicial functions. I fully support the position taken in this matter by the hon. member for Carleton and I certainly support any moves such as are reflected in this bill to discourage the acceptance by judges of appointments to non-judicial functions. However, I do not believe the bill goes far enough. Accordingly I have an amendment to offer to clause 5 which I think would carry this provision a further step along the way.

The general arguments against acceptance by judges of appointments to extrajudicial functions have been made already, so I will not do more than summarize them. They are first, that with the pressure of litigation and business which is properly the function of judges this practice imposes an extra burden on those judges who do not take such appointments. It is also unfair to litigants when delays occur because judges are not available to dispose of their cases.

An equally undesirable result is that the way we have been inclined to appoint judges to boards and commissions—I use the word "we" advisedly; I am not singling out any government—has brought them into political controversy and has lowered the standing and reputation of the bench. The outstanding example, of course, has already been referred to by the hon. member for Carleton, the inquiry of which Mr. Justice Spence was appointed commissioner. But there are other cases where we have been all too prone to appoint judges as chairmen of conciliation and arbitration boards and to make appointments of the kind where the judge in question is bound to be criticized by one or both parties to a dispute. In addition, where awards are bound to come back to parliament or to one of the legislatures and be subjected to political controversy or political settlement, judges are brought into relationship with the parties in a role they should not have, and also inevitably into the centre of political dispute.

I feel very strongly, Mr. Chairman, that both the federal and provincial authorities should be precluded from so appointing judges. I remember that when I was minister I said to myself that I would not do it, that I was opposed to it in principle, but without a legislative prohibition the pressure—if you like, the habit—was such that I was not able to resist the trend as successfully as I had intended and as I had hoped. I am quite satisfied that whatever may be the approach in principle on the part of the Solicitor General and his colleague, the hon. gentleman will also be unable to resist the pressure unless there is a stronger legislative prohibition than the one presently contained in the bill.

Clause 5 actually proposes, in my view, a weakening of the restraint on the appointment of judges to this kind of function because it removes the requirement that the consent of the governor in council of Canada be obtained before a judge can accept such an appointment. While not a prohibition, it provided at least some restraint. I think that we should in fact go further, and provide that neither federal nor provincial levels of government may make this kind of use of members of the judiciary unless the appointment is specifically authorized by a statute of the federal parliament or one of the provincial legislatures. I do not think there should be the discretion which this clause still contemplates leaving to the governor in council or lieutenant-governor in council in making an appointment even though the appointment in question may not be authorized by statute.

If you amend the bill to prohibit appointments without specific statutory authorization in the first place, you would have the protection of inertia; you would have to introduce legislation to authorize an appointment. It would of course be possible to amend the labour code here and in the provinces, but this would be subject to the natural disinclination to introduce legislation into busy legislative assemblies.

In the second place, the attention of the members of the legislatures would in each case be directed to the propriety of authorizing judges to serve in the capacity which the legislation might contemplate. I would hope and expect that the legislators in both provincial and federal parliaments would accept the principle that except in special and rare cases judges should not be asked to assume duties which are not part of their ordinary judicial function, and for the reasons I have outlined; so that they would look critically at any such proposed legislation.

There is one particular aspect of this matter that I want to mention. It is frequently said, at times when this principle is being discussed and the point of view I have put forward is under consideration, that it would be very difficult to carry on the process of labour conciliation and arbitration unless we had judges available to serve as chairmen of arbitration and conciliation boards. I think, Mr. Chairman—I hope the minister will agree with me, and I think the members of the committee will—that in the present atmosphere it has become quite evident that the bench is indeed being brought into disrepute because of the dislike of labour unions in particular for the kind of decision which is given in these adjudications. We now have labour leaders declaring they have no confidence in the impartiality of the bench. That is a statement which, of course, I absolutely reject. There is no foundation for it; but it is symptomatic of a very undesirable situation and is proof positive of the fact that because of the use being made of the judiciary in these extrajudicial functions the bench is suffering a loss of reputation, of regard and of stature in the community.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think it becomes an inescapable and an urgent responsibility of this parliament to act to prevent any further development along those lines. I think it is incumbent upon this parliament and this government, as well as upon provincial legislatures, instead of following blindly this pattern of reaching out and asking judges to accept this kind of appointment, rather to build up a panel of permanent chairmen within the cadre of the labour departments, both federal and provincial, who will be available for appointment at a moment's notice as chairmen of conciliation and arbitration boards. In this way we would establish a group of people who will acquire an expertise and a skill in the issues involved in industrial disputes and who will have the confidence of both sides to such disputes.

This would be a most important and I think essential beginning toward a system of having not only chairmen of arbitration boards available but of building up a permanent judicial process for dealing with labour disputes. It would be a judicial process although not part of the present court system. Indeed, I think labour disputes should be dealt with by a separate judicial process which would have the confidence from the outset of both sides to disputes and would also have the result that adjudications would protect the interests of society as well.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I think it is essential that we now make a firm legislative prohibition against the appointment of judges to these kinds of functions, and I therefore move:

That clause 5 of the bill be amended as follows:

1. By deleting from the proposed section 38 (1) (a) the words "or he is thereunto appointed or so authorized by the Governor in Council" where they appear in lines 24 and 25;

2. By deleting from the proposed section 38 (1) (b) the words "or he is thereunto appointed or so authorized by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province" where they appear in lines 29 to 32;

3. By adding the following as subsection (2) of section 38:

"(2) This section does not apply in any case where a judge was appointed commissioner, arbitrator, adjudicator, referee, conciliator or mediator before the coming into force of this section".

As you will appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the effect of the first part of the amendment would be to take out the power otherwise expressly reserved to the governor in council to appoint or authorize the services of a judge in these non-judicial capacities. The second part would remove the similar authority given the lieutenant-governor in council of a province. So unless the appointment were authorized with respect to matters within federal jurisdiction expressly by a statute of the parliament of Canada, a judge could not be appointed, or in the case of matters within provincial jurisdiction, if my amendment carries such appointment would have to be expressly authorized by a statute of the legislature. It would not be open to the governor in council to exercise a discretion and to reach out and make an appointment of a judge to a conciliation or arbitration board unless the appointment was so authorized by statute.

The effect of the third part of the amendment would be simply to preserve the appointment and authority of any judge who had been appointed before the amendment comes into effect. I would not want to go so far as to render nugatory anything that had been done under an appointment that was hitherto legal. The effect of the amendment, therefore, would be that when presently appointed judges have completed their work no such appointment could be made in future unless expressly authorized by statute.

I hope the minister will accept the spirit and purpose of the amendment. There may be some technical flaws in it. If there are and if he will point them out to me, I will be glad to accept modifications which achieve the purpose sought. But I believe it to be clear and acceptable in principle that judges should not be allowed to accept these appointments unless they are specifically authorized by a statute of the parliament of Canada or of the provincial legislatures.

Mr. Pennell: I appreciate the spirit in which the amendment is proposed. As I understand it, the purpose is, first of all, that the time of judges should be conserved by ceasing to employ judges in non-judicial capacities and, in the second place, that judges should not be called upon in connection with labour disputes unless statutory authority is given by an act of parliament or of the legislatures.

Though the intention is a worthy one I cannot but think of a recent experience in the province of Saskatchewan if I remember correctly where both parties to a dispute made a request of the Attorney General that a particular judge be appointed to deal with it because of the special confidence they felt in him. It seems to me that if we were to agree to the amendment proposed by the hon. member we should no longer find it possible to accede to a reasonable request of this nature.

I agree, that the occasions on which the governor in council or the lieutenant governors in council should call on judges to undertake non-judicial duties ought to be restricted to a bare minimum. As the hon. member suggested, such appointments do expose judges to risks of the kind he mentioned. However, I believe we should continue to give the governor in council and the lieutenant governors authority to appoint judges on the rare occasions when it would be clearly be in the public interest to do so. When both parties request a particular judge, surely we should not deny a course of action which might quickly settle a dispute. Otherwise it might drag on for months.

Mr. Fulton: To deal with the minister's brief reply, may I suggest to him that the illustration he has given does not really support his argument or weaken the proposition I have advanced. I suggest to the minister in all seriousness that if a judge could not be appointed in the case he mentioned the parties would readily have agreed on someone else, especially if the provinces were encouraged to build up panels of permanent chairmen as part of the cadres of their labour departments.

If we do not stop appointing judges we shall never build up these cadres of men who will be available for appointment as chairmen of these boards. We can go on saying that there are all sorts of particular cases where judges would be suitable, but if judges could not serve others could be found. It is the principle which is important here and I do not see how the principle can be preserved except by agreeing to an amendment such as I have moved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we do not often get an opportunity to speak in committee of the whole with so many faces opposite. It is a temptation which is difficult to resist, now that so many members have come in.

We understand the motives behind the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops and we are in agreement with some of the things he said when introducing it. Obviously that is a prelude to suggesting there is something to be said on the other side. We agree that the load placed on the judiciary because of the acceptance of these outside appointments is perhaps a heavy one and that the services of judges should be used sparingly for this kind of work, or maybe there should be more judges.

We also agree that there are certain kinds of inquiry to which the appointment of judges is not desirable because they do not add to the respect with which the judiciary is held by the public. At the same time, I believe the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops goes too far. I do not agree with him that a hard and fast line can be drawn between the kind of issues which get into the courts and the kind of issues which never get into the courts of the land but which require judicial and impartial determination.

The standard complaint to make, of course, is that judges should not be used in connection with labour disputes. I submit there are occasions when a labour dispute is just as important as any issue which comes into a court. There are times, as the Solicitor General has pointed out, when both sides feel that the resolution of a dispute can best be made by someone with the experience of a judge, by someone who has the reputation for impartiality which goes with sitting on the bench.

I think the kind of warning which has been sounded against appointing judges to a good many of these boards and so on is one which should be sounded. But it is not a good principle to say that judges should never be available for employment in connection with labour disputes or special problems which may arise in our country.

I believe that the actual wording of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops is too ironclad. It leaves no loopholes for a special circumstance. An issue might arise in a provincial or national setting when the legislature or parliament is not in session to pass the necessary act. If the amendment as proposed were carried there would no no possibility, even by order in council, of appointing a member of the bench to one of these positions mentioned, no matter how badly he might be needed.

I am ready to say that the kind of warning sounded on this matter is good, but I believe the amendment goes too far. We shall vote against it.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 27; nays, 50.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Before the clause carries could the minister say what acts of the parliament of Canada at the present time expressly authorize a judge to act as a commissioner, arbitrator, adjudicator, referee, conciliator or mediator? When the bill was drafted the minister obviously must have known what these acts were. I think the committee should know the precise authority under existing statutes.

Mr. Pennell: I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to carry a list of the acts with me. I do not have such list. Speaking from memory, I believe the municipal act says that the county court may act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a provincial act and I spoke of acts of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Pennell: The clause refers to federal and provincial legislation. There is the Expropriation Act, and other acts. I could cite a number of provincial acts giving power to judges to act as arbitrator and adjudicator. The power is given to the county court of the county in which the action arises.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): With respect, the minister has not mentioned a single act of the parliament of Canada. He did refer to the Expropriation Act but matters dealt with under that act come by way of information laid before the Exchequer Court of Canada. The proceeding is entirely judicial. It is not an inquiry. There is no mediator or conciliator there.

I have no doubt that before the bill was drafted the minister was fully aware of the acts. The officials in his department would know the acts of parliament relevant to my question and would inform the minister. The acts I refer to are not provincial acts. I do not think it is our business to delve into the provincial situation, but I think we should know what the minister understood on the advice of his officials.

Mr. Pennell: I believe the Inquiries Act is a federal act and provides that a judge may act. I always try to be perfectly frank with the house. In all my nakedness I stand here; I cannot give the hon. member specific acts. The validity and the force of this clause do not turn on the Solicitor General's ability to name specific acts. I am satisfied that if this matter were not dealt with in the manner we have dealt with it the effect would be to jeopardize future actions by the lieutenant governors and governor in council in legitimate circumstances.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The minister is confusing things and confusing me. He speaks of action taken by the lieutenant governor or the governor in council. That is not the point. The minister has spoken of the Inquiries Act. That act provides for the appointment of a commissioner. It does not say that the commissioner shall be a judge. There is nothing in that act which is express authority to a judge to act. With great respect, the Inquiries Act is not relevant to my question.

I am not trying to embarrass the Solicitor General. He has brilliant officials in the gallery. I cannot understand why he did not bring them to the floor of the house to assist him. I was glad to see that the President of the Treasury Board had no such inhibition earlier this week. The Solicitor General is asking the committee to approve this clause without saying what are the acts of parliament which expressly authorize a judge to act as commissioner, arbitrator, adjudicator, referee, conciliator or mediator on any inquiry, commission or other proceeding, to use the exact language of the clause.

That language was not included in the draft idly. Obviously somebody must have studied the situation and said: "These are the statutes where there is express provision to do these things." This has nothing to do with the power of the governor in council.

I do not want to delay the legislation because I approve of it in general, with the exception of this clause. I ask the minister to undertake to give me a list of the acts of parliament I asked for in the very near future and before this bill has had royal assent.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I find the hon. member's request reasonable. He has cooperated well in the passage of this bill and I cannot take exception to anything he has said. I am pleased to give the undertaking he requests.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry.

An hon. Member: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the bill be read the third time?

• (3:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I would appeal to the hon. member for Kamloops that we be permitted to proceed with third reading now. If the hon. member cannot see his way clear to allow this, I will take no exception. However, there is some urgency because I understand there are several judges who are nearing retirement age and I would hope that no unforeseen delay would cause loss of income to retiring judges. Therefore, I make a special appeal to the hon. member's sense of fairness and justice.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to place any member of the bench in a position of such jeopardy as that outlined by the minister. I am very glad to have what might be called a sort of death-bed repentance by proxy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): When shall the bill be read the third time?

An hon. Member: By leave, now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pennell (for Mr. Cardin) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT AMENDMENT

BROADENING OF LENDING PROVISIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-270, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank hon. members of this house for the very unexpected and very welcome applause. I expected it from this side of the house, but from the other side it is a particular pleasure. I wish to express my deep gratitude.

At the resolution stage my parliamentary secretary gave a description of the purpose of the bill which is before us. His remarks will be found in Hansard for February 16 beginning at page 13139. I do not intend to repeat what he said and I am sure the house would not expect me to do so.

I should like to make a brief summary. The bill extends the Small Businesses Loans Act for another three year period. It already has been in effect for six years. At the same time it enlarges the application of the act by broadening the purposes for which guaranteed loans may be made. The principal changes are as follows: First, to enable the owner of a retail store to obtain a loan to finance the purchase of the building in which he is located. This removes an anomaly which existed in the present act. I am sure that everyone would wish this anomaly removed. Previously the owner could purchase premises across the road but could not buy the building in which he was located. The second change enables loans to be made to small business enterprises in the construction, transportation and communications industries as well as in manufacturing, wholesale and retail trade and services. The third change is to amend the definition of an eligible small business enterprise as one whose estimated annual gross revenue does not exceed $500,000. The limitation in the present act is $250,000.

These amendments, I believe, will enable the Small Businesses Loans Act to make a greater contribution to the needs of small enterprises in this country.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the brief introduction the minister has just given us to the bill now before us. We have very little more to say at this time, since many members of our party spoke on this legislation when it was at the resolution stage. At that time they expressed their general support for the bill and for what this act had done in the past. They were very much in accord with the changes, particularly in view of the fact that we introduced this type of legislation in 1961 when we were the government. We have been glad to see this act amended once or twice previously and we now are glad to see it revised once more so that it will become more applicable to the needs of the small businessman who certainly requires such support. Other points will be discussed when we reach the clause by clause consideration of the bill. Therefore I do not propose to hold up the progress of the bill at this time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I shall be quite brief at this time, which is my usual practice. We support the principle behind the proposed amendments. I remember that prior to the introduction of this legislation by the Conservative government in 1961 small business organizations throughout the country had made frequent requests for legislation of this type. I do not think there is any doubt that this is good legislation. At this time I cannot resist at least congratulating the former government for introducing it into the house in 1961. Since that time there have been several amendments as a result of experience and I think that generally the act has proven to be very satisfactory.

I am very interested in the application of the act. I have had conversations with many bank managers in my constituency, particularly in the smaller communities. I have found them most co-operative. They did not lend money unless there was a sound basis for the loan but they were co-operative in that they were anxious to do what they could to assist the smaller businessman. I have here the fifth annual report on operations under the Small Businesses Loans Act for the year ended December 31, 1965. To show how sound in principle this program is I should like to read this paragraph:

> Since inception to December 31, 1965, 14,050 loans amounting to over $127 million were made by the banks under this legislation. During this period payments have been made to the banks under the guarantee provision in respect of 25 claims amounting to $139,954.

I think this clearly demonstrates that the government of the day was fully justified in introducing the act and expecting it to operate soundly and to the advantage of the small businessman. I rose particularly to mention that the chambers of commerce and the unions in the Kootenays are very interested in the development of secondary industry. This act could be of assistance to persons interested in such development. I refer to small manufacturers and those interested in the development of the tourist business and recreational facilities.

Only this morning I received a letter from the Nelson Chamber of Commerce dealing with this question. We have a large smelting business in the riding, a mining industry and a forest industry but there is a place for the development of secondary industry, particularly in the smaller communities. I will give the minister one experience of mine in this respect. I went into this question very carefully with firms in Ontario which are interested in the manufacture of furniture, because we have large quantities of excellent quality birch in the district. The birch you see in Ontario looks like weeds compared with the birch we grow in our country.

I remember on one occasion shipping ten carloads of birch logs 32 feet in length and 2 feet in diameter at the top. I mention this to illustrate the size of the timber that grows in southeastern British Columbia. Millions of feet of birch are being destroyed at the present time as a result of building the dams on the Columbia river. The timber is simply being piled up and burned. I did everything possible to get people interested in establishing a furniture industry in the district in order to use the birch and other woods there which are very suitable for the manufacture of various types of furniture. However, I was completely unsuccessful in that respect owing to the fact that for some unknown reason the Okanagan district has been declared a designated area. That is a rather ambiguous term, Mr. Speaker, but anyway it qualifies for certain assistance in the development of new industries such as write-offs, grants and so on.

There is a great demand for the development of secondary industry in the smaller communities. These industries need financial assistance in order that they may become stabilized. When the dams and other large construction projects are completed in the constituency I have the honour to represent, this program will be more necessary than ever. There are in the area people very interested in developing accommodation for tourists, particularly in the summer months. There are others interested in the development of a small pottery industry. We have in my area excellent clay which could be used in the manufacture of pottery on a small scale, something similar to what has been done in other places in Canada. We also have in our district six hot springs; two or three are owned by people who would like to develop them further. This could be done if they were extended credit under the provisions of this act.

I mention these matters to bring them to the minister's attention and arouse his sympathy with respect to the needs of the district I have the honour to represent. I shall be writing him later on this question to see what he can propose with respect to the development of secondary industry and business in Kootenay West and Kootenay East. The people of these two constituencies are working together on these problems because they affect the whole area as a region rather than just one constituency.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I said a few words on this subject when we were at the resolution stage. We put forward some suggestions then which I thought would be implemented with regard to areas in which the provisions of the bill might be improved to make it more acceptable and used to a greater extent than has been the case in the past. We appreciate the increase in the number of people who will be able to benefit from this legislation, but we wonder whether the loan ceiling of $25,000 is realistic. If it was realistic in 1960 I do not think it is realistic in 1967, particularly when one considers the construction, transportation and communications industries and others of that size which need a great deal more money than the ordinary retail merchant or the small manufacturer.

I was hoping that when the minister spoke today he would deal with this question. When the parliamentary secretary to the minister spoke at the resolution stage on February 16 he said, as reported at page 13141 of Hansard:

> All the more reason why we must expect businesses needing over $25,000 and those having a turnover exceeding $500,000 to have plans that require financing beyond the scope of the Small Businesses Loans Act.

After all, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to raise the potential turnover of a small business to $500,000, in my opinion a maximum loan of $25,000 is not sufficient. I have often wondered whether the government has considered applying a scale of charges whereby a certain interest percentage would apply on the first $25,000 and then there would be a small increase in the percentage on, say, a further $25,000. If this were done I believe more people would participate in the program and it would be more beneficial to those in the construction and transportation businesses in particular. Twenty five thousand dollars would not buy a bulldozer for use in the construction business, or a cement mixer or large machinery of this type, and in the transportation business many trucks cannot be bought for $25,000.

I wonder whom the government discussed these amendments with and whether they went to the Retail Merchants Association, the chambers of commerce and people interested in small business to obtain their ideas as to ways and means to make the legislation more workable. The parliamentary secretary also said when speaking on this matter at the resolution stage, as reported at page 13140 of Hansard:

> Of course, it is not an unimportant amount and it has probably been quite beneficial to borrowers. But it might be possible that it is not a valid sign of the entire potential demand which could exist for such loans.

He was there referring to the amount of money which had been lent under this program. So the government admits that there is a potential demand for more loans. When the hon. member for Kootenay West was speaking I was thinking of the suggestion I made in this connection. I suggested that perhaps a certain amount of the fund be set aside to provide working capital, because in small businesses this is an area where businessmen experience difficulty. To become established and obtain credit takes a certain length of time, and the small businessman often finds himself in trouble in this respect for one, two or three years. He experiences difficulty because he does not have enough working capital to carry him over this critical period. These are two important areas which have not been covered in this bill.

There is one other matter which I should like to raise at this time. The parliamentary secretary indicated in the statement he made at the resolution stage that he was not sure whether the rate of 5.5 per cent could be retained and that this would be decided after passage of the new Bank Act. Now that the Bank Act bill is out of the committee I wonder whether the minister could give us a more definite statement on what the rate on these loans will be. Will it stay at 5.5 per cent or will it go up to 6.5 per cent? It has to be kept in mind that a lower rate of interest on these small business loans will make it possible for more people to participate. I hope that before second reading of the bill the minister will take note of our suggestions and give them his consideration.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member of the Social Credit party who has relinquished his place to me to allow me to say a few words about the bill.

I think the opposition is to be congratulated for having had the initiative in 1961 to bring in this legislation which was designed to make funds available to small businessmen. However, I do not think that the act, at least in my province, has lived up to its potential, and this is no reflection on the government which drafted the original bill or on the legislation itself. I think, however, that it is indicative of the rather conservative methods under which the chartered banks in my province function.

There is a tendency on the part of the chartered banks in the province of Quebec to discourage loans under this act. I suspect that in all probability there are one or two features in the act which make the average bank manager reluctant to lend money at the present time. One of them has of course been the fixed rate of interest which might have been logical at the time when it was set but now is no longer realistic, particularly in view of the advent of the new Bank Act.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) pointed out that the banks were risking relatively little in lending money under the provisions of this act. I think he mentioned that there were only about 25 loans for which the federal government had to reimburse the banks against default. I have in front of me some figures that might interest those hon. members who are concerned about the point I am trying to make. In the period from October to December of 1965 the amounts of money lent under this act in Ontario and Quebec were practically identical. In Ontario the figure was $1,699,000 and in Quebec it was $1,672,000. In the period of tight money, or at least when money was not quite so free, from October to December of 1966 it is significant that loans in Ontario increased from $1,699,000 to $1,745,000 but unfortunately in the province of Quebec loans dropped from $1,672,000 to $669,000. It is obvious that in the province of Quebec it has been virtually impossible for small businessmen to take advantage of this act.

The amendments before us broaden the base in that theoretically they enable a larger group of people to take advantage of the act and in that way more contractors and transportation people will obtain loans to buy trucks and so forth. Conceivably these people are expected to walk into a bank and borrow under the provisions of Bill C-270. However, I can assure hon. members that unless there is a change in the attitude of the bankers with whom I am familiar there will be as much reluctance, if not more than ever before, to make loans under this act unless the minister takes advantage of his prerogative to establish a realistic rate of interest.

It may sound paradoxical for me to be suggesting that the rate of interest under this act should be higher than under normal circumstances, but the small businessmen in my particular area, in view of the fact that because of the civil code in our province they cannot borrow money under what are known as general mortgages in other parts of the country, are faced with the problem of obtaining working capital, as the hon. member for Wellington-Huron (Mr. Howe) pointed out so realistically. The problem of the small businessman is not the rate of interest but the difficulty of obtaining money from a place such as a chartered bank with which he deals in his everyday business life. This is the normal place from which he obtains money when he needs working capital and money for expansion, repairs or a new piece of equipment. Statistics prove that in the province of Quebec advantage is not taken of these loans. I hope that the minister will comment a little later on the reasons why the act is not working.

Not knowing what the minister will say and faced with the reality that I want to go home on the five o'clock train, I turn to the Porter commission report to see what its point of view may be on this act. It mentions the very significant fact that interest rates on guaranteed loans should be set initially at reasonable levels and move up and down with other lending rates. If this is not to be the policy under the proposed legislation, then the banks will have a tendency to discourage loans under this act and take advantage of what may be higher rates of interest for shorter term loans, loans that they say they like to turn over, rather than lend to small businessmen for longer periods of time—I think the limit is 10 years—at a lower rate of interest than that on non-guaranteed loans. Unless the minister can give the house some assurance that it is his intention that interest rates on guaranteed loans should be set at reasonable rates and should move up and down with other rates, then I suspect that the full intent of the amendments will not be realized.

An important statement is made in the Porter commission report which I think should be read into the record. The commission points out that there is increased competition for large loans by large corporations from other lending institutions which have cut into the operations of the chartered banks. It says at page 124:

> In spite of new competitive pressures in their traditional stronghold—

That is loans to businessmen.

> —the banks have continued to concentrate their attention on short-term business lending and have not moved aggressively into longer term lending.

The whole philosophy behind this bill is to make available to small businessmen loans on a long-term basis and, as this report points out, the banks have continued to concentrate their attention on short-term business lending and have not moved aggressively into longer term lending.

There are no amendments in this bill which force the banks to abandon their traditional reluctance to being involved in long-term lending. I doubt very much that their appetite for this type of legislation will be whetted if long term-lending is also associated with lower interest rates than they can get from their normal type of activities. I continue the quotation:

> A number of reasons may be adduced for this reluctance to reach into an area which would seem attractive to the banks. The banks made it clear to us that they do not believe term lending to be a completely inappropriate use for a portion of bank funds, but that they do place a priority on short-term "self-liquidating" finance.

If the banks insist on keeping the emphasis on short-term self-liquidating finance, the whole spirit of this particular bill is defeated. I think it is a significant fact that the act has not been a successful one. When one has had a chance to study the figures one will see that the sum total of these loans comes nowhere near the ceiling the government set in 1961. As I understand it, the amendments before us do not raise the ceiling. This is indicative to me at least that the act, while very desirable, is being circumvented by the banks.

I have no right to presume that this is true right across the country. Last year Ontario, despite the tight money policy of 1966, increased the amount of loans under this act but in Quebec loans fell from $1,600,000 to under $700,000, an indication I suspect of the failure of the chartered banks to realize the traditional role they are supposed to play in the Canadian economy. It seems to me that Canadian banks are to some degree pampered. The recent revisions of the Bank Act which will be coming before us, in the discussion of which in the finance committee I have been privileged to participate, indicate that the chartered banks of Canada have a particular role in our economy. They are synonymous in our thinking with stability. We are very proud of their record compared with that of the banks in other countries.

On the other side of the coin I think that the banking institutions of this country have a responsibility to Canadians and that responsibility extends as well to small businessmen. Some of the speeches made at the resolution stage by the hon. member for Wellington-Huron (Mr. Howe) and other Conservative members, as well as by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman) and other members of the New Democratic Party, indicate that they have the same idea as I do that the banks have a moral obligation to help the small businessman. There are, I believe, close to 500,000 small businesses in this country which are not getting a fair share of the banking facilities that are supposed to be at their disposal. I am not sure what the solution is. I suggest to the minister that he take a good look at the interest rate. I cannot understand those in this house who believe they are helping the small businessman by setting the interest rate as low as possible. If they would talk to these businessmen on the week ends they would find that the barrier these people face is not the interest rate but how they can get their hands on money from the chartered banks or other institutions of which they are a little suspicious, perhaps unjustly so.

While I endorse the amendments I believe they in no way shape or form overcome the weaknesses which existed in the act, one of which is indicated by the reluctance of the chartered banks to co-operate or to live up to their moral obligations so that the small businessman in each community has a chance to grow. I would have liked to see some provision in the act which would have permitted small businesses to obtain funds for mergers with other small businesses. Big businesses merge and unify. One of the problems of the small businessman is that he has surplus capacity sometimes or lacks a sales staff and this could be rectified easily by merging with another small business. I think that this might have been one welcome addition to the act.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will realize that on the one hand we sponsor the Industrial Development Bank from which one can obtain a loan at a rate of well over 8 per cent, whereas the chartered banks can provide this service at a rate of interest that is lower. However, the small businessman cannot get a loan there. If this act is going to be of service to the small businessman, then we have to be very realistic about setting a rate of interest, a prerogative which lies with the minister. Secondly, we have to use some type of moral suasion on the chartered banks to co-operate for the benefit of the small businessman.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly in support of the principle of the bill now before the house. Like the family farm to which we have made reference on so many occasions, small business has been in the past and continues to be one of the important and desirable factors in our economic life. We all know that in recent years there has been an increasing emphasis on business. This is true in practically every phase of life. We talk about big business, big firms and big products. This type of thinking has even moved into ecclesiastical circles. We talk about big church organizations. My theory is that there is a danger in equating the idea of size with efficiency and progress. I suggest it is not always indicative of efficiency or progress. People put huge units in opposition to small units in our society.

In my view the so-called small businessman has made and continues to make a very worth-while contribution to our way of life. He should be encouraged and assisted in the efforts he is putting forth. When my colleague the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston) spoke at the resolution stage of the bill he referred to the fact that on many occasions the small businessman operates as a convenience to the respective communities in which he may function. Unfortunately, I suggest that too many of us just use the small businessman as a convenience after the large business places have closed for the night or when the housewife runs short of one or two items. In such case the corner grocer is very convenient. However, we think he should be more than a convenience and as such he should receive encouragement and assistance in carrying on his operations. Not only does he provide a convenience but he also provides a personalized service in many cases which is not found in the larger units. I am sure we all appreciate the fact that these businessmen who operate in our communities are providing a service that is not only convenient but is personalized as well.

I believe, as I have said, that we must do everything we possibly can to assist the small businessman to carry on his operations, make a living for himself and his family and make the contribution to the community he desires to make. The small businessman is not there just to make money. It is true that he has to make money in order to survive and provide for himself, but I believe he takes pride in being part of the community and rendering a service. I believe we all appreciate and recognize that. Perhaps we should recognize the additional burdens that are placed not only upon him but on larger units as well. The small businessman has had to become a bookkeeper for the government with regard to pensions, taxes and all these other things. He is burdened to a considerable extent with bookkeeping, accounting and other activities on behalf not of himself but of various levels of government. Perhaps there should be some way in which this is recognized when he is taking care of his tax return.

I believe there are other ways in which he should be assisted, but I think that the provision of capital is a very essential requirement. A short time ago I read that there are approximately 4,000 small businesses which go out of business every year, and I think this is a rather serious situation. I realize many reasons may contribute to business failure. For example, perhaps a businessman did not make sufficient preparation before going into business to assure that he would be able to continue his operations. Perhaps he did not have enough capital in the first place in order to provide adequate facilities.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that inability to acquire sufficient capital at various stages of a business operation is one of the factors which forces the small businessman to the wall and which puts him on the labour market. He must have access to sources of capital to meet emergencies which may arise. He must have sufficient capital to expand his business or to face the competition that he meets today. Some small business operators say that they are not afraid of competition from large concerns if only they are able to obtain the capital required to expand their business facilities to meet that competition. I think it is absolutely essential that they do receive the assistance that is required in this connection. Then, of course, working capital is also necessary to help small businesses to continue to serve their community and help our economy.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, we support the principle of the measure now before us. However, even though there has been some expansion of the categories of businesses covered by the legislation, I think the legislation is still too restrictive. There are other types of business operations that I believe should be incorporated within the provisions of this bill. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although the minister has widened the legislation a little further this time I hope that in the very near future he will see fit to bring others within its scope. As I have said, it is still too difficult to obtain capital not only under this legislation but also under other pieces of legislation.

Reference has been made today to the Industrial Development Bank. Relatively small businessmen or industrialists have approached the bank for loans, yet there seems to be a repetition of the old saying that if you do not need money you can get it, but that if you do need money you cannot get it. This has apparently been the experience of all too many in their endeavours to secure capital under the provisions of various pieces of legislation, and I believe it is also true in this particular case.

The hon. member who preceded me pointed out that perhaps part of the responsibility lies with the banks, because of their hesitancy in lending money under the interest rate prescribed. Perhaps they are more interested in lending large sums than small sums, owing to the cost of administration. Nevertheless I believe it is still too difficult for small businessmen to obtain the capital that is required, and that we ought to accommodate them in this regard by enabling them to borrow the money required to carry on their operations.

We have noted the increase in the estimated gross revenue from $250,000 to $500,000. Perhaps smaller businesses are more in need than those with a gross revenue above $250,000. However, Mr. Speaker, as I say, we support this particular provision. On the other hand we also put in an extra plug for the more humble businessmen, because of their greater need. We support of course the extension of the operations of this act for a further period, and we may have some other comments to make when the bill is before committee of the whole.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief.

Naturally I support the proposals made by the minister as far as they go, but I submit that they do not go quite far enough. I assume the minister will agree that perhaps the act has not been made use of to the extent that was anticipated when it was passed. The mere fact that the original limit on loans set in the act was $300 million over a period of three years and that up to the end of 1965 only $127 million of that amount had been taken up is an indication of this. This means that an amount of $25 million a year or so is being taken up.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the number of loans which are being made seems extremely small, something in the order of 2,000 to 3,000 per year. Obviously there must be some reason why this act has not been used to the extent anticipated. I realize that the purposes for which loans can be made are limited and no doubt this has been a factor. Therefore a broadening of the act in this respect by the present bill is commendable.

Like the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) I also have the feeling that in many cases banks have been rather loath to lend money under this act. In some instances I know that banks have talked the proposed borrower out of obtaining a loan under the terms of this act and have given him a loan under the provisions of the Bank Act. I am not a suggesting that the minister should raise the rate, but I think he could inquire whether banks are prepared to lend money at the rate prescribed. It would be more advantageous for a small businessman to get a loan even at a slightly higher rate than to be unable to get a loan at all.

My main criticism of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that it does not increase the maximum amount of the loan that may be made. It is true that the average amount of loan up to the end of 1965 was less than $10,000. Nevertheless I have personal knowledge of at least two cases in my riding where a loan could not be obtained because an amount of more than $25,000 was required.

I have checked with officials of the minister's department, Mr. Speaker, but they have no first-hand knowledge of how many applications may have been submitted and rejected because the amount of loan was restricted to $25,000. They have no way of knowing except from inquiring of the banks how many turned down loans for this reason. Banks report to the government of course only on loans actually made.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me logical that since the gross revenue has now been increased to half a million dollars from a quarter of a million, the maximum amount of loan available should be substantially increased also, and I hope the minister will give this his consideration. I see no objection to increasing the amount from $25,000 to, say, $50,000, a higher rate of interest being applied on the second half of that amount. This is being done today under the Farm Credit Act and the Veterans' Land Act. I think the minister would be well advised to increase the amount of the loan and then at his discretion to set a higher rate of interest on that part of the loan wich would exceed $25,000.

I hope the minister will give consideration to these points and that later, in his closing speech, he will tell us, from the information he has available to him, why this act has not been used to the extent originally anticipated.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): My remarks, too, will be brief. I am confident the minister will find that these proposed amendments will meet with general approval all over the country. I think it is recognized that we are a country of small businesses. I have no recent data available, but statistics published not long ago indicated that of the 37,500 manufacturing industries or establishments in existence at that time some 35,000 could be placed in the category of small business, employing fewer than 99 people each.

I know that in the Atlantic area from which I come, the greater the number of small and prosperous industries we have the sounder will be our economy. I often think it is better to have 20 businesses employing 50 people each than to have one employing 1,000 people. This is why I am confident that every encouragement should be given to people who wish to open small businesses and small enterprises.

There is one deficiency that I see in the act as it now exists, and I should like to draw it to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) so that he may give it whatever consideration he sees fit. As I read the act today, no provision is made for the advancement of the guarantee on loans to buy existing businesses. The amendment before us would, if it is true, allow a guaranteed loan to be made for the purpose of buying premises. If a young man wished to enter business, this loan would be available to him. Under the existing provisions he would be able to get a loan in order to buy the fixtures and equipment and to make the necessary renovations. But as the act is drafted at present I see nothing which would allow the banks to guarantee a loan for the purchase of an existing business. I think this is an important consideration because there are many young men who would like to enter the small business field, and who see an opportunity to do so when someone who has been engaged in a particular enterprise wishes to get out of it.

Unfortunately, even with the amendment proposed today by the minister, a guaranteed loan cannot be made for this purpose under the act. I would therefore suggest to the minister that it would be of tremendous benefit to small enterprise if now, while we have the act open, some provision could be made whereby a guaranteed loan could be obtained from the banks for the purpose I have outlined.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I wish to make a few comments of a general nature on this bill. I presume we shall shortly begin a clause by clause discussion.

The purpose of the bill before us is limited. It extends the provisions of the Small Businesses Loans Act to construction, transportation or communications. It extends the duration of the act and expands its scope so as to include the purchase and construction of premises. There are two matters I should like to refer to the minister's attention and the first relates to the limitations which are placed on the amount of the loan which can be made.

When the original bill was passed some five years ago, $25,000 was considered adequate for what the government had in mind. At that time there was no other fund to which small business could turn for public assistance. This applied particularly to the type of business in which I am interested, the resort business and the service industry. The bill did serve a purpose, though perhaps it has not been as successful as we had hoped.

I think the time has come when we should expand the provisions of this act far beyond anything the present bill proposes. I believe we should raise the ceiling on these loans because $25,000 is not enough in the case of many of these businesses. I believe the time has come when provision should be made for refinancing. In my view the only reason the small Businesses Loans Act has not been as successful as originally hoped is that in many cases the people who make application for loans need to pay off smaller existing encumbrances before proceeding with the work they have in mind. I may say there are very few businesses today which do not have some sort of mortgage or encumbrance against them.

As the bill now reads, the full amount made available must be used for the purpose of the construction and modernizing of premises; none of it can be used for refinancing. There certainly has to be a limit but I think, for a reason. I shall mention in a few moments, that the time has come to permit a certain amount of refinancing to be undertaken.

I say this because the only other source of guaranteed government loans available to most people, the Industrial Development Bank seems now to be restricting its credit to small businessmen. Both the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Industrial Development Bank have their shortcomings. The former does not permit the use of any money for refinancing. The I.D.B. does, but it has been my experience in the last year or so that the bank has been greatly restricting its loans to private industry and to small business. Indeed, loans have been restricted to the point at which the system has lost its effectiveness. There is a wide gap at the present time between transactions which are covered by the Small Businesses Loans Act and those which are handled by the I.D.B. Years ago there were signs that the Industrial Development Bank would be useful to small manufacturing firms, small tourist industries and the like. But during the past year there has been a change of attitude or a change of direction. Time after time I have been unsuccessful in getting the bank to do what the act it should do—assist in development.

The people running it have established themselves as bankers and they are not doing the development job they should be doing for small business. I do not wish to go too deeply into this aspect of the subject because you might call me to order, Mr. Speaker, but I would point out again that there is a tremendous gap between what is intended under the Small Businesses Loans Act and what the I.D.B. does. There does not need to be such a gap because there is sufficient authority under this Act to permit loans for the expansion of premises, and there is authority vested in the Industrial Development Bank to handle a lot of industrial loans. The authority is there but it is not being used.

I can think of four or five industries which are ready to move, but which have been tied up with Industrial Development Bank red tape, to the point where they cannot do their job. The bank is acting as a banker and not as an agency of the government. For this reason I appeal to the minister to close the existing gap between the Small Businesses Loans Act and the I.D.B. The authority exists. The idea is to help the businesses that want to begin or improve production in Canada, also to help our export business.

Let me give an example of the gap existing between the provisions of this bill and the functions of the I.D.B. A company manufacturing entirely for export applied to the I.D.B. for a loan. At that time it had received a letter from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) asking it to step up its export business for the 1967 centennial year. The company had also applied to the area development agency, and had been approved. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had requested it to set up its business, the area development agency had authorized it to proceed with expansion, but the I.D.B. procrastinated for six months, fooling around with red tape. Eventually the firm had to abandon the expansion for 1967. All its business was export business.

A gap exists, and needs to be closed. I could cite other examples, and I have already spoken to the minister about one or two instances. I feel, and feel strongly, that the Industrial Development Bank is not doing its job, and that the Small Businesses Loans Act is not functioning in those areas where the bank does not function. Between the I.D.B. and Small Businesses Loans Act, and their failure to meet certain needs, the development of industry, in Canada, particularly small industry, is being held back. I do not know what can be done to persuade them.

I appeal to the minister to do what he can to make the Small Businesses Loans Act as effective as possible. If the measure before us is all that can be proposed at this time, then let us pass it. If the Industrial Development Bank will not do the job it was set up to do namely, development loans, then the Small Businesses Loans Act should be expanded to do the job the bank ought to do. The bank tangles everybody in red tape.

Let me cite another example. The company in question tried for six months to obtain a loan. In February of 1966 the company applied to the I.D.B. for a development loan. The bank did nothing until November. When the Ontario development agency was set up the company went to it and obtained a loan in three weeks. The point is that the I.D.B. ought to have provided that loan. This is just one example out of half a dozen.

I know that the minister does not tell the I.D.B. how to run its show. He does not like to tell the bank to make a loan to this or that person. If he did that sort of thing it would put all its applications on his desk. Nevertheless I appeal to the minister to tell the bank to get off its rear end and to help develop industry in this country.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. members who have contributed to this debate. My reply will be brief. A good deal has been said about the size of loans and whether it would not be wise in this act to increase the limit above $25,000, just as we have increased the eligibility of businesses by increasing the volume of business that makes them eligible from $250,000 to $500,000.

It will interest the house to know that in the last three years the average size of a loan under this act has been less than $10,000, though the upper limit was $25,000. It is even more interesting to note that the great bulk of loans has been in the range $5,000 to $15,000, which shows that the upper limit of the size of loans has not been a particularly limiting factor. Indeed the demand has been for much smaller loans.

Somebody asked whether the proposed amendments had been discussed with the retail merchants. I can answer in the affirmative. The Retail Merchants Association of Canada made representations to the government that the upper limit should be $50,000 rather than $25,000. The association on examination, however, was unable really to substantiate the need for the increase in the upper limit. Indeed they said that they would consider an increase of much smaller proportions to be quite adequate.

We did consider the possibility of raising the limit above $25,000, but in the light of the figures I have given to the house I think it will be understood that we do not consider that this was a major factor affecting the usefulness of this legislation.

Various members have spoken about the rate of interest. There has been general support for greater flexibility in the interest rate, that the banks might be encouraged to make loans to businesses under the guarantee provided by the act. Until the Bank Act provisions are approved it will be difficult to know on what basis to fix the rate of interest.

May I suggest to the house three general considerations that I believe are highly relevant and that will to a large extent govern the regulations when they are ultimately promulgated. I think the maximum rate should be sufficiently high to preclude the banks discriminating against the use of this guaranteed facility by small business, in favour of other borrowers. Second, the rate must be lower than the rate at which banks normally lend to businesses by a differential wide enough to preclude the banks putting all small business loans under the guarantee.

The original .5 per cent differential below the prevailing rate achieved this end. Of course, if the banks are given greater freedom under the Bank Act the rates will have to be changed accordingly. We believe too that there should not be too wide a difference between the rate under this legislation and the Industrial Development Bank rate on small loans.

As hon. members know, the I.D.B. rate at present is around 7.5 per cent to 8 per cent. Loans have recently been made at higher rates. I can assure the house that the interest rate will be looked at in the light of making the act as widely available to small businesses as possible.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Aiken) voiced complaints about the activities of the Industrial Development Bank. Since you did not choose to consider this as being out of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to make a brief reply. As the hon. member said, the Minister of Finance does not govern the activities of the Industrial Development Bank, and I do not believe he should. I believe there is a good deal of advantage in having the Industrial Development Bank removed from political pressures, by having it a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. However, it will interest my hon. friend to know that representations were made to me the other day by an association of financial companies complaining to me that the Industrial Development Bank was being so active in the financing of small businesses that in fact it was taking business away from organizations which would be able to do the job, if only they were not subjected to such unfair competition from a government agency. So, Mr. Speaker, I think there are two sides to this problem.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question, more or less in clarification. Would he not agree that if the Industrial Development Bank would limit itself to those companies who need some assistance in their development, then the ordinary lending institutions could handle loans which are easily within the limitations of commercial transactions. In other words the Industrial Development Bank and the Small Businesses Loans Act administration could assist many of the companies which otherwise could not get credit. In fact the Industrial Development Bank is involved in these safe loans and is leaving alone the marginal businesses which should be helped.

Mr. Sharp: I will see that the comments of the hon. gentleman are brought to the attention of the bank. Generally the question has been asked, why is the act not being used as extensively as it might be. There are several reasons. First of all I believe that the range of businesses which are eligible for loans has not been as wide as it should be. The purpose of this bill is to correct that defect. Second, I believe monetary conditions have developed in such a way that the banks have not had the incentives which they might have had to make loans under the provisions of this legislation.

When the Bank Act revisions are made I hope the regulations in respect of the interest rate will be such that they will provide the banks with the necessary incentive to ensure that small businesses do obtain the advantage of the government guarantee which is available under this legislation.

Finally, questions were asked concerning the reason the provisions of this act are not available for the establishment of new businesses. I can only reply that that is not its purpose. It was not introduced for that purpose. I believe it would be a mistake to enlarge this act so that it would enable people who are not now in business to finance the establishment of a business. There are other facilities which exist for that purpose, notably the Industrial Development Bank. If we feel, however, that existing facilities are not adequate for the purpose, I suggest that we should look to legislation other than the Small Businesses Loans Act for the remedy.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the Chair.

Small Businesses Loans Act Amendment

On clause 1—"Small business enterprise."

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): In my remarks I said that I wondered whether in respect of these amendments the minister would consider the possibility of increasing the amount of the loan. This has been suggested by the Retail Merchants Association. I wonder whether consideration might be given to raising the amount of the loan and charging a little extra interest for the extra $10,000, $15,000 or $25,000.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, as members of the committee probably realize, this is only one means by which small businesses can be financed. The purpose is to provide loans of up to $25,000 at preferred rates of interest because of the existence of the government guarantee. I do not think any purpose would be served by having a higher rate of interest on loans in larger amounts. That in fact now is provided for by the banks themselves, which can lend any amount of money they wish to a business, and charge what rate of interest they will within the law. I suggest to the hon. member that his suggestion would not be a practical way to accomplish his purpose. Had we thought that the $25,000 limitation was unnecessary under present circumstances, or undesirable, we would have altered it. Our analysis, however, showed that it was not the size of the loan which limited the usefulness of the act.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would like to clarify his statement to the effect that the banks could charge what they will.

Mr. Sharp: I said, "within the law". The banks, however, can make loans to these businesses without the government guarantee provided by the act. The banks are free to charge what they will within the law.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question which I should like to address to the minister. Would the minister inform the house whether banks or other lending institutions can refuse a loan, even though the borrower qualifies for it but is not a customer of that bank or lending institution? Would such a reason enable a bank or other lending institution to refuse the loan.

Mr. Sharp: There is nothing in this act which compels a bank to make a loan. So I think I must say that the answer to that question is yes. The purpose of this act is to provide guarantees to banks so that they will be more disposed to make loans. I do not think we could pass legislation which would require a bank to make a loan.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, the minister has broadened this act to include construction, transportation and communication. I am wondering whether he would give consideration to extending the guaranteed loan provisions of this act to cover loans made to medical and dental clinics. I am sure that if the minister would pause to reflect on the situation which exists across our country, he would realize there is a great lack in the field of medical and dental facilities. All of us are aware that there are many young graduates who wish to start a practice in the medical or dental profession who find that the cost of setting up such practice, with the cost of new equipment today being what it is, is terrific.

In the dental field I believe the desired requirement for dentists is that there be one for every 1,000 persons. We are a long way from reaching that target. I believe there is only one dentist for about every 3,000 persons. If we look at the figures in respect of the medical profession, I think we would find that the percentage would be about the same.

I think there is a great need in Canada for medical and dental services and anything we can do to improve the situation will be a step in the right direction. I would like the minister to review this question and see if he cannot add a provision to include medical and dental clinics. I would like to hear the minister's views on this matter.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am myself awaiting some clarification of the point. Obviously the act as it now is, or as it will be amended, does not cover professions; but I am not quite certain what the meaning of "service" is in this connection. Perhaps the hon. member would wait until I receive some advice.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like one more category to be added to this clause that of veterinarians. It is one that is extremely important to livestock men. There is a graduate in veterinary science in my home town and there is one in an adjacent town. These men graduated from Guelph with a degree in veterinary science and one of them wanted to establish a small clinic in which to carry out his practice. He could not obtain a loan from the bank and came to me and others asking us to sign a note to assist him in borrowing the money necessary to enable him to establish a clinic.

Eventually he obtained the necessary backing for a loan, but it was out of the good graces of others that he was able to do so. I do not think that veterinary science graduates who wish to borrow money, and who have behind them some capital, should be placed in the position where they are unable effectively to carry out their responsibilities in this field because they are not able to obtain loans from regular banks. I believe that veterinarians should be included, with dental and medical services, in the provisions of this bill. I support the hon. member for Wellington South who asks that medical and dental services be included, and I would ask the minister to add graduates in veterinary science.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would consider introducing an amendment to subclause 3 of clause 1 of the bill so that the provisions of the act could be extended to those who wish to purchase an existing business, including stock as well as premises. This would not be putting another business into operation. I would suggest that such a provision should apply only to an existing business. In this way a young man who wished to set himself up in business and had a chance to purchase an existing business in the community in which he lived could obtain a guaranteed loan in order to purchase not only the premises, the fixed and movable equipment, but also the stock contained in the business.

I believe that such a provision would be of tremendous benefit to a young man who wanted to set himself up in business, and it would not add to the number of businesses already existing in the community.

Mr. Sharp: As I said, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this would be the place to make such a provision. If this house believes that it would be appropriate to have legislation other than that now in existence to enable people to get started in business or to buy existing businesses, I would suggest that it should be done through legislation other than the Small Businesses Loans Act, which has as its purpose to increase the availability of term credit from the chartered banks to small businesses, to assist them in financing a wide range of capital improvements. That was the purpose of the act, and I believe that should remain its purpose.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask for clarification on one aspect of this bill. The provisions of the act are being expanded to take in several categories in addition to those previously outlined, including construction, transportation or communications. The explanatory note states:

> The purpose of this amendment is to extend the guaranteed loan provisions of the act to cover loans made to small businesses engaged in construction, transportation or communications.

The explanatory note in connection with clause 5 reads:

> The purpose of this amendment is to authorize the minister to define by regulations the meaning of the expressions "construction", "transportation" and "communications" for purposes of the act.

I believe there is some ambiguity here. Some people think this provision is concerned with construction businesses and they can obtain a loan under the act if, for instance, they want to purchase additional equipment in order to expand a business. Other people are inclined to think that it means construction and facilities for secondary industry and other types of industry. I wonder whether the minister would clarify this matter. Does it mean the construction business as such or construction as an activity?

Mr. Sharp: The intention here is to cover small contractors, people who are engaged in that kind of business.

Mr. Patterson: Then it would not cover construction as far as facilities are concerned?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Chairman. We are considering here the financing of a kind of business, and the kind of business is the business engaged in construction, which means, since it is a small enterprise, small contractors.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether we could proceed to clause 2 until the minister receives the answers to the questions raised in connection with clause 1.

Mr. Sharp: I now have the answer, Mr. Chairman. As I understnad the position, and it may be that I am misinformed, veterinarian, dental and medical clinics have not had difficulty in obtaining finance either through traditional sources or through the I.D.B. Professions, as I said, are specifically excluded. My officials in administering the act have not had, nor have I, representations relating to these professions. Personally I have not had any complaints that people who are setting up dental or veterinary clinics have had difficulty in financing the purchase of equipment. They may feel they have had more difficulty recently than they have had in the past, but that is true of all businesses, because of the great competition for funds. But I am quite willing to listen to my hon. friend on this point.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, the need exists, whether it has come to the minister's attention or not. As the hon. member for Macleod said, the veterinarian people have had trouble in this respect; the banks sometimes do not provide these loans too freely. As I say, the need does exist, whether or not it has come to the attention of the minister. I would be pleased to move an amendment here if the minister thinks it woud be in order, but I do not wish to move it if he thinks it would be out of order. I have an amendment ready. Perhaps in order to allow the Chair to rule on it I should read the amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod:

• (4:50 p.m.)

That clause 1 be amended by adding thereto as subsection (8) the following:

"(8) Medical, dental and veterinary clinics."

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a footnote by stating that while the minister may not have received letters from people trained in veterinary sciences, young people graduating from Guelph and other veterinary institutions, they do occupy a very vital role in curing brucellosis, in the administration of certain medicines and in the checking of livestock. I believe that these people should be included among those benefiting from the small loans act. As I said before, there are instances in my own home town and in neighbouring towns where graduates in the veterinary science who are starting out in their business are handicapped by being unable to obtain loans to acquire the necessary facilities for carrying on their business. When they graduate from college it is obvious that they do not have a great deal of money, and several years go by in paying off their university debts and building up their business.

Both they and the people to whom they give their services are handicapped when no funds are available for them to acquire the proper equipment, and other things which they need to carry out the veterinary science. I would ask the minister to consider this seriously because this is a measure which the livestock industries in western Canada would greatly appreciate and for which they have asked. This is an extremely small profession. There is a veterinary college at Guelph and I think one is to be established in Saskatoon, but perhaps these are the only two such establishments in the Dominion of Canada. Most of our veterinary scientists have graduated from the Ontario veterinarian college. The number of veterinary scientists is so small that perhaps their needs for financing have not come to the attention of the Minister of Finance. In developing our livestock industry and other small businesses we should not look solely to the big interests and overlook the veterinary scientists who need working capital and funds as much as do the well established practitioners in the medical or dental field.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make two comments. The act does specifically exclude the business of a profession. I am not quite certain whether or not a clinic is a profession; perhaps it is run by technicians rather than by professional people. However, on the acceptability of this particular amendment I would draw your attention to the terms of the resolution, which specifically extend the guaranteed loan provisions of the act to cover loans made to small businesses engaged in construction, transportation or communications. It seems to me that the amendment goes beyond the principle embodied in the resolution.

The Chairman: Order. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Wellington South introduces into the bill a provision whereby medical, dental and veterinary clinics will be considered under the provisions of this bill. The purpose of the bill which we have before us, as explained in the resolution preceding the bill which was passed on December 13, 1966, is to extend the guaranteed loan provision of the act to cover loans made to small businesses engaged in construction, transportation and communications. I consider that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Wellington South is irrelevant both to the resolution preceding the bill and to the bill itself. I regret therefore that I must rule the amendment out of order.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to ask the minister what is the figure representing the maximum amount. It is said here that the new guarantee will amount to $300 million. Can the minister tell us what is the figure at the present time? I note from the return made recently that the losses are actually less than .1 per cent. It would seem that we need not be too concerned about setting a limit. I wonder whether the minister could tell us what it is at present.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite certain that I understand the question. The total amount of loans made in 1966 was $20 million, and that figure added to the amounts in the two previous years would give the limits under the previous $300 million quota. We are now beginning a new $300 million quota and therefore the number of loans made since January 1, since we are dating this back to that time, would be very small indeed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question. According to this clause the minister can spell out what construction, transportation and communications mean. Would he care to say whether community antennae businesses would be considered under communications?

Mr. Sharp: I think so, Mr. Chairman. One of the exclusions in the present act which seemed most illogical, was small radio stations. I would think that we will promulgate the regulations in such a way as to cover community antennae as well as small radio stations.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

REVISION OF LAW ON EAVESDROPPING THROUGH WIRE TAPPING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved second reading of Bill No. C-33, to amend the Criminal Code (wire tapping, etc.).

He said: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to amend the Criminal Code in order to revise the old common law offence of eavesdropping. At the present time the only penalty for wire tapping is to be found in the various provincial telephone acts wherein the penalty ranges from a maximum of six months imprisonment in Manitoba to a maximum of one month in Ontario. Some of the other provincial telephone acts contain no provision for dealing with this type of offence.

The greatest testimony to the value of this bill is the fact that the bill was originally introduced into this house by the present Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) before he took that important office. When he became Solicitor General, I looked at the bill and made certain small revisions in it. It is now evident that in many parts of Canada eavesdropping, wire tapping or electronic bugging as it has been called, is being carried on very extensively both by police agencies and private organizations.

Some weeks ago the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, Mr. Wishart, admitted in the Ontario legislature that the Ontario Provincial Police were involved in wire tapping. He made the comment that he urged the federal government to amend the Criminal Code to permit wire tapping by police and law enforcement agencies under certain conditions. He urged the federal government to outline the conditions under which such wire tapping would be permissible. While I am not certain, Mr. Speaker, that it is really necessary for the police to have this authority, I do recognize the problem which police and law enforcement agencies have to face. I have therefore included in clause 2 of this bill a provision which would spell out the right of the police to appear before a judge of a superior court, to give the judge reasons for requiring the right to wire tap, and for the judge to grant an order giving the police such right.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that in the last couple of years, from one end of Canada to the other, we have had evidence that wire tapping is being used. It is being used in a way which infringes very definitely, I submit, the fundamental right which every citizen ought to have to privacy. In British Columbia there is now a royal commission investigating wire tapping. I do not want to comment on the reasons which led to the establishment of the royal commission, nor do I want to say anything about what the royal commission may find. I do want to say that an R.C.M.P. officer made a statement before the royal commission that he had received training in the R.C.M.P. organization on methods of wire tapping. He had been involved in wiretapping, not in the particular case being investigated but in other cases.

In the city of Saskatoon evidence came to light several years ago that the only telephone which could be used by people who were locked up in the city jail had been so "looked after" that the police could listen in and record conversations by prisoners, or people kept in custody even though not convicted, including conversations of a confidential nature with lawyers. I submit that this is quite improper.

During the hearings before Mr. Justice Dorion in the province of Quebec the R.C.M.P. officers gave evidence that they had equipment which they can and do use to record conversations carried on over the telephone. During the time of the F.L.Q. bombings—and I do not for a moment minimize the seriousness of those occurrences and the difficulties experienced by the police—according to the information I have, police officials in the city of Montreal tapped at least 200 telephones in order to attempt to get information about the people involved.

It may be that these techniques are necessary, Mr. Speaker. If they are, I submit that it is incumbent upon the police and the attorney general of a province, as well as upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), to make a case that they are necessary. First of all, they should change the law to permit wire tapping. Second, there should be included in such changes methods by which the police and other agencies with legitimate cause to wire tap can do so legally. I submit that unless this is done it is not only morally wrong but is indefensible and should be prohibited by law.

In 1964 a Toronto Star columnist, Mr. Ron Haggart, disclosed detailed information about wire tapping by R.C.M.P. officers in the city to Toronto. The leader of this party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), as well as myself, asked detailed questions of the then minister of justice, and this practice was denied. Yet both Mr. Haggart and a responsible lawyer in Toronto, Mr. Frank Nasso, wrote to me giving the details. I submitted the letter of Mr. Nasso and the columns written by Mr. Haggart to the then minister of justice. I know he had his difficulties and became ill later, but he never did reply to the very serious charges being made that wire tapping was going on.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the minister of justice at that time denied that the man named in the charges was an official of the R.C.M.P. According to Mr. Nasso, this man stated that the owners of the building had given him permission to instal wire tapping equipment because he was investigating an excise case. In fact he never did have the permission of the building owners and in fact was trespassing, yet nothing was done. The matter was ignored by the minister of justice, who as I say never did reply to my letters.

I might also mention, Mr. Speaker, that the Bell Telephone Company admitted that even if they had received information that the police were engaged in wire tapping they would not have instituted any action that would lead to prosecution of the police. Perhaps this is understandable from the point of view of the Bell Telephone Company or any other company, because there are no laws to prohibit wire tapping. This is the purpose of my bill, Mr. Speaker.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is sufficient evidence today that wire tapping is carried on both by the police and by private agencies. There is no law to prohibit it. If wire tapping is a necessary practice, then the Criminal Code should be amended to spell out to the people of Canada that this practice is necessary. It should not only detail when wire tapping is necessary but why it is necessary, and it should outline the kind of steps police or any other agencies which require to engage upon wire tapping should and must take before they carry on their operations.

I submit that the implications of wire tapping are so serious that it ought not to be permitted without an order from a supreme court judge, and this is precisely what I am suggesting.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the principle contained in this bill was introduced into the house and endorsed by the present Solicitor General. It has also been endorsed and adopted by newspaper editors from one end of Canada to the other.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I want to put on the record very briefly the views of some newspaper editorial writers in this country, both Liberal and Conservative in allegiance. The Toronto Globe and Mail for December 9, 1966 carried an editorial headed "Laws for dangerous snoops", and I should like to read the last paragraph:

> Obviously, there is a need for laws to restrain electronic eavesdropping—not just for private individuals, but for the police, the military, and everyone. Bugging is an invasion of individual privacy; the dangers of permitting such an invasion to go unchecked are far greater than those involved in depriving private and public investigative agencies of a useful tool.

An editorial entitled "The big ear is listening" appeared in the Toronto Star on September 5, 1964 and carried the following statement:

> What is needed is an amendment to the Criminal Code that would ban all electronic or mechanical eavesdropping. The only exception would be made for police eavesdropping with the permission of a superior court judge.

This is precisely what I am proposing, Mr. Speaker.

In an editorial headed "Wire tapping" in the Toronto Telegram for Friday, May 13, 1966, which was after the Solicitor General had been asked questions about wire tapping, questions which he did not answer, three choices are listed for the minister which I think are quite logical and commend to him, though unfortunately he is not here this afternoon. They are as follows:

> 1. If the R.C.M.P. resorts to wire tapping, which is illegal under the Criminal Code,—

I interject to say that I think they are wrong in this regard, too.

> —he must put an end to this practice, for the force is breaking the law. He should also announce this action to parliament and the country.
> 2. If the R.C.M.P. is not engaged in wire tapping, he should clear it of this suspicion at once by making a statement in parliament.
> 3. If Mr. Pennell believes that wire tapping is a necessary method of investigation, he should admit this. He should then introduce legislation to make it legal for the R.C.M.P. and other police forces to carry on this practice.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot deal with this question because the royal commission on security will be dealing with it. That may well be so. However, I submit that if the law enforcement agencies of this country believe that in security cases the police require to resort to wire tapping, then they ought to say so. This contention is not in contradistinction to what I am proposing in this bill. If the law enforcement agencies can prove a case, then I submit that by passing this bill parliament can give them the right to take action.

I submit in closing that it is wrong for police agents no matter how responsible they may be to arrogate to themselves the right to decide when and where and in what circumstances they will listen to telephone conversations carried on by any citizen of this country, because I submit there is not a person in this chamber or outside this house who cannot remember at least one occasion on which he discussed matters over the telephone which would be extremely embarrassing if they came to the attention of any other person. I submit that this kind of eavesdropping is wrong in principle and that it should be stopped, and this is the purpose of my appeal.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Durham): I want to take a few minutes in which to consider what is involved in the bill before us. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has used many arguments in favour of the principle of the bill but I think there is probably no one in this chamber who would disagree with that principle. There are, however, some details on which I have suggestions to make.

My primary criticism, indeed, is that the bill does not go far enough. I would prefer that this house were dealing with Bill C-45, the bill introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) which covers such things as electronic listening devices which are not dealt with here. However, the principle is good and it is really not necessary to convince those of us who sit on this side of the house that in principle this is desirable legislation and a good step to take.

Nevertheless, I would suggest to the hon. member, though I realize he will not agree with me, that it would be prudent and wise for us on this side of the house, and indeed for all hon. members, to wait until the commission which will undoubtedly consider these questions in relation to national security has reported. We might also do well to wait until the royal commission set up by the British Columbia government has completed its work. It is fair to say that the hon. member has ancitipated this suggestion because he himself referred to the commission set up in British Columbia.

I might also say that I am generally in favour of this bill because there is some confusion attaching to the legal aspects of intrusions on privacy. There are areas with which our common law does not deal and with regard to which we have no legislation. The bill before us will make it an offence, not being a sender or receiver of a telephone or telegraph communication to wilfully, and by means of an instrument—this is where I criticize the measure as being too narrow in its application—intercept, or record a telephone or telegraph communication. Then the penalties are set out and provision is made for an exception by authority of an order of a judge of a superior court. A further provision makes it an offence, except in certain circumstances, to disclose any information concerning the application for the granting or denial of an order.

I wish to refer quickly to the law in the United Kingdom because I think it is in a more satisfactory state in this area than is our law in Canada.

Mr. Herridge: We can learn a lot from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Honey: I have to agree with the hon. member. This is one of the reasons I am taking a minute or two to review their law. There are very few of us in this house, certainly very few common law lawyers in this house, who would argue with the hon. member when he says we can learn a good deal from the mother country in regard to the law.

The origin of the power to intercept communications can only be surmised, but this power has been recognized from very early times and has been recognized as lawful by a succession of statutes covering the last 200 years or more. There is some difference of view among United Kingdom lawyers as to the authority to intercept telephone messages.

According to one view, this power is identical with the power to open letters and rests on the ancient power to intercept communications. Another view is that it derives from statutory authority. The power to intercept communications is exercised in the United Kingdom for the prevention and detection of serious crime and for the preservation of the safety of the state.

Turning from this brief summary of the United Kingdom law, I note that the sponsor of this bill has already alluded to the unsatisfactory situation in Canada where we have left what little legislation there is to be enacted by the provincial legislatures. The law in Canada is not nearly as clear as it appears to be in the United Kingdom. As I have said, the English law seems to base the power of the executive to intercept communications upon the power to open letters. The only statute we appear to have in Canada under federal authority, and which might be relevant, is section 41 of the Post Office Act, chapter 212 of the Statutes of Canada, 1952. There is no power under that act at all to intercept or open letters, except letters coming into Canada, even by police or government agencies for the purpose of national security.

Thus, we do not have this parallel power upon which the law in the United Kingdom is founded. The prohibition against interception of telegraphic and telephonic communication seems to be broader and I can refer the house to section 6 of the Telegraphs Act, chapter 262 of the Statutes of Canada, 1952. There is a good case for some form of legislation in Canada if for no other reason than to clarify the law.

It is undoubtedly the case that certain segments of the criminal element exploit the practice of wire tapping for illegal purposes. The problem is likely to be a growing one, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North said. It is likely to increase to an alarming degree. Provisions should be set out in the law to deal with electronic devices. The use of anything being used for the interception of telephonic or telegraphic communications should be rigidly controlled by an act of this parliament. To justify interference with the privacy and liberty of the individual Canadian there must be strict proof for the necessity of such interference. This proof must be established before a competent judicial authority.

I shall have something to say about this point in just a moment. I think we ought to follow the broad principle covered by my remarks. The power of interception should be granted and used for the prevention and detection of serious crime and for the preservation of the safety of the nation.

I shall go into detail. My criticisms, I hope will be taken as constructive criticisms, because I do not criticize the principle of the bill. Clause 2 seeks to add section 429A to the Criminal Code. It seems to me that it would not be advisable to require proof only of offences punishable by ten years imprisonment. Offences with a lesser punishment ought to be included under these provisions. For instance, we might consider frauds upon the government, municipal corruption as defined under sections 102 and 104 of the Criminal Code; we might consider the sending of false messages, or indecent and threatening telephone calls dealt with under sections 315 and 316 of the Criminal Code. We might also deal with organized gambling, under the gambling provisions of the code. All these offences carry penalties of less than ten years. I think the Criminal Code should be amended in the way I have suggested, to bring in these lesser offences. On some of these lesser offences it might be proper to make application for an order giving power to eavesdrop.

Another criticism I have is that in clause 2 the application must be made before a judge of superior court jurisdiction. This ought to be considered further. I do not say this order should be returnable before a justice of the peace, as under section 429, of the Criminal Code. Search warrants are obtained from a justice of the peace. I think the order should be made returnable to an official higher than a justice of the peace, but lower than a superior court judge. In some areas of Canada it is often difficult to have access to a judge of the superior court. It seems to me that we could rely on the judicial function of a county or district court judge. County judges should have concurrent jurisdiction with superior court judges. This is important, as I said, because it is often difficult to have access to judges of superior court jurisdiction.

The other matter I mention criticizes a detail of the bill, not its principle. Again I refer to clause 2. It seems to me the provision that the order extend for one month is much too rigid. I suggest to the sponsor that this provision would inhibit the investigation of suspected offences. I think a three month order ought to be considered; possibly a six month order would be better. The investigating officials would not be hampered by having to come back to a judge after a month for an extension of the original order.

I conclude by saying that in principle I think this legislation is desirable. I think the bill ought to go farther than it does. It should cover items of electronic intrusion I mentioned earlier. All hon. members should support the measure when the point is reached where the house may make a decision. That point will probably be reached when we are able to read the report of the royal commission dealing with security matters, and after we have given the commission an opportunity to recommend what should be done about the matters we are now considering. We should also read the report of the British Columbia royal commission on this subject. As I say, when we have read these reports we shall be in a position to enact legislation along the lines of the bill before us.

For the reasons I have already suggested, the bill should be changed. In general, however, the legislation should be enacted. It should be operative in respect of the new devices of this electronic age which intrude on the privacy of the Canadian people.

Mr. Aiken: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he think that the royal commission on security will deal with the subject of this debate?

Mr. Honey: I have no more reason to think it will deal with this subject than my hon. friend has. From the terms of reference under which the royal commission was set up, it seems reasonable to assume that it would want to consider these matters, because they pertain to the security of Canada. I think my assumption is reasonable.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the principle of this bill. My remarks are limited to wire tapping only, to that one aspect of the invasion of privacy.

I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that this is one subject that, under present circumstances, must be covered by an amendment to the Criminal Code. Of course the amendment must include the other devices that can invade the privacy of the citizen. The introduction of this bill provides an opportunity for members to express their opinion on this subject. I suppose it is fair to say, as a result of the happenings of recent date, that all members in the house support an amendment to the Criminal Code that will meet the situation with which we are faced at this time. The provincial legislatures have legislation in some cases which applies to telephone companies, the prevention of wire tapping, and so on. This matter has come before a number of provincial legislatures. That, however, is not the only aspect of the problem with which the provincial legislatures are entitled to deal.

I think we all realize that in order to deal satisfactorily with the problem we should have an amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada. I remember that the question of wire tapping was the concern of a number of people as far back as 1924. The other devices had not been invented at that time. People were concerned with wire tapping on the part of companies in some cases, on the part of the police, and on the part of other persons. I remember as far back as that time resolutions being passed by trade unions particularly, and in some cases by other organizations, which were concerned with the practice of wire tapping.

I believe that recent events have caused a great surge of interest in this problem generally, and among members of this house particularly, since the refinement of the devices which can be used for the invasion of a person's privacy, and the new devices which have been developed in the electronic age. I do not have any documents here which deal with the interest the various organizations took in this matter many years ago, but in recent years this has been the concern of trade unionists. I should like to quote from a memorandum in support of the proposed legislation presented by Hon. W. A. C. Bennett, premier, and members of the provincial cabinet on January 14, 1964 which was signed by Mr. E. P. O'Neal, secretary treasurer of the B. C. Federation of Labour. This is the memorandum:

> The rights of all British Columbians to personal privacy are jeopardized by three recently developed practices. The first is the practice of wire tapping.

I suppose that is the most ancient of these devices.

> Some of our affiliated unions have from time to time expressed strong suspicions that their telephones have been "tapped." The widespread use of this practice in the United States is well known. Undoubtedly it occurs in Canada, and legislation is required to outlaw it completely.
> A second unsavoury practice which is becoming increasingly common is that of secreting listening devices to spy on employees. We have had several complaints about this matter and at least one case where the employer was forced to admit that they had been guilty of this practice. Surely, no British Columbian "could defend such loathsome invasions of personal privacy. Legislation is needed immediately to outlaw any use of hidden listening devices, with severe penalties for violation."

That memorandum expressed the sentiments of the trade union in question, but unfortunately the gentleman who presented this memorandum to the cabinet of British Columbia, as a representative of the B.C. Federation of Labour, has fallen from grace since then. We now know that he did not even use his correct name. We now know his name is Thomas Casey. That is another matter.

As a result of the bugging of the Canadian pulp and paper workers, which union I did my level best to promote in my constituency because of what I thought of the tyrannous aspect of the Washington office of the pulp and paper workers, we have had this invasion of their privacy in Vancouver. It was intended that what occured at the executive meeting of the union should be recorded on tape by the use of this device. That stirred up a great deal of interest in the trade union movement in British Columbia. As a matter of fact, I have a phone call nearly every day connected with some aspect of this problem. This also has been of interest to the people in British Columbia and the newspapers. I should like to quote from the Vancouver Province of January 16, 1967:

Get on with 'anti-bugging' laws . . .

Canadian legislators should lose no time in considering stricter regulations against all forms of "bugging", wire tapping or otherwise invading human privacy.

The investigation of the "bugging" of a local union underlines the need for more comprehensive laws against the evils of electronic snooping.

President Johnson proposes to recommend U.S. legislation to ban all public and private spying except in instances where national security is threatened.

"We should protect what Justice Brandeis called the 'right most valued by civilized men'—the right to privacy", declared the president last week. "We should outlaw all wire tapping—public and private —wherever and whenever it occurs, except when the security of the nation itself is at stake—and then only with the strictest safeguards.

"We should exercise the full reach of our constitutional powers to outlaw electronic 'bugging' and 'snooping'.

The need for anti-eavesdropping laws may be more widely comprehended when it is understood how sophisticated snooping has become. It is now possible to direct an electronic beam against a distant window pane, and from the minute vibrations created by voices within, listen to the conversation. When the human ear has been extended by technology to this extent the need for tougher laws against eavesdroppers becomes evident.

I think the Province in that editorial is expressing the opinion of a good many people in British Columbia. Then, on November 12, 1966, the Vancouver Sun followed with this editorial, headed "Several Kinds of Bugging":

No matter whether practical politics or high principles motivated Premier Bennett in ordering a royal commission into "bugging", the public's immediate interest is in the prospect of obtaining better protection of its right to privacy.

Some new defences against electronic intrusion are likely to flow from Judge R. A. Sargent's inquiry into this week's discovery of listening devices planted in a downtown hotel. Comment on the case itself, involving trade union rivalry, must be withheld until the commissioner's findings are made.

Still, the judge's terms of reference clearly show that the premier's expressed alarm does not spring solely from a sudden desire to safeguard British Columbians in the intimacy of their own premises. Mr. Bennett also intends to expose "the cause of, the motives for, and the background leading to" this particular affair.

Then they go on to deal with the whole problem in a more philosophical vein. I have had letters from the I.W.A. in Vancouver, New Westminster and Vancouver Island expressing concern about this. I also have had letters from members of the B.C. Federation of Labour and from locals in other parts of British Columbia.

I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker: I have been agreeably surprised to notice that while they are determined to do something to persuade the government to take action to amend the Criminal Code, which will prevent the invasion of a person's privacy, they also show their responsibility by recognizing that there are two circumstances which require protection: the safety of the state, and the administration of the criminal law under certain difficult circumstances. I have here a copy of a resolution from one trade union which proposes that they—

(1) call on the federal government to take firm action against officers of the R.C.M.P. responsible for this shocking affair, and to publicly instruct the R.C.M.P. to cease and desist from activities on behalf of foreign agencies and governments which in any way violate the civil rights and democratic freedom of the Canadian people;

(2) Vigorously condemn the spy role of Pat O'Neal of the international brotherhood of pulp, sulphite and paper mill workers;

(3) Call on the federal government to act immediately on new legislation which will protect all citizens from eavesdropping and spying, through electronic devices, phone tapping and all other such means, and to provide heavy penalties for any violation of the law.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I have received a number of resolutions in similar vein. This indicates the interest of the trade unions in this topic. I think it is a very healthy sign to see them interested in a problem that affects the rights of all Canadians and to see them accepting their full responsibility in this respect. The Province of February 8, 1967, contained an interesting article in which Mr. Jack Webster condemned this practice. The article is headed, "Bugging 'evil', inquiry told by broadcaster". The article says:

Open line broadcaster Jack Webster condemned electronic eavesdropping as evil Tuesday.

But he stopped when it came to defining the legal complexities in outlawing bugging.

Webster testifying before the royal commission into invasion of privacy, was asked to give his interpretation of the meaning of privacy.

It was, he said, the right to khold a conversation without being spied on.

Commissioner R. A. Sargent said he wasn't trying to start an argument, but in his view it would be difficult to legally define the meaning of the word "privacy". "It can take many forms," he said.

Replied Webster: "To me any person who eavesdrops without authority, by electronic device, is guilty of invasion of privacy."

The fact was later brought out that unfortunately a corporal of the R.C.M.P. and a former member of the force co-operated together to advise Mr. Pat O'Neal, as he was then known, how to proceed to bug a convention being held by another union. That is, of course, the reason for the investigation being conducted in Vancouver. We cannot say very much about that investigation, we have to await the report of the commissioner; but it has stirred a very healthy interest in this question.

It also stirred the interest of the hon. member for Kootenay West, Mr. Speaker. I have spent over two months consulting trade unions in British Columbia, other persons and legal gentlemen who are not members of the House of Commons. On Monday I hope to introduce a bill that is the result of a considerable study of the practice in the United States and in Great Britain in dealing with this kind of issue. As I say, I hope to introduce this bill next Monday, and it will be termed an act respecting the right of privacy. I must say that this bill was not drafted off the cuff, as it were; a great deal of time was taken on this question and I consulted persons whose opinions I respect very much indeed.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has now entered the chamber. I am quite confident he has something interesting to tell the house. Therefore, I again express my support for the principle of the bill and am grateful for this opportunity for members to express their opinions on it. I trust that not later than the receipt of the report of the royal commission investigating security the government will take action to amend the Criminal Code to protect the rights of all citizens of Canada.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it has been a useful exercise, discussing this question of wire tapping. We have just heard an interesting presentation by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) concerning his fellow British Columbian, Paddy O'Neal and his fall from grace. We found this very interesting.

Mr. Herridge: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. To be quite correct, the name is Pat O'Neal. They are two different people.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I very much appreciate being corrected by the hon. member. I thought just to complete the record it might be useful to complete the hagiography, I suppose one should say—the study of the lives of the saints—and should put on the record the attitude of the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan in connection with this matter. As the hon. member will recall, this question was dealt with and is on the record of Hansard for June 21, 1965, at page 2736. It stands as a monument to the interest of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) in this question.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North had at that time described the practice followed by the R.C.M.P. in connection with the Rivard case as being morally wrong, as he said here today. I had the opportunity to point out to him that the identical practice had been followed by Hon. Robert Walker, the former C.C.F. attorney general of Saskatchewan and a close colleague and associate for at least five or six years of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas).

Hon. members will recall that there was certain discussion of efforts to bribe Hon. Robert Walker, and he issued a press release pointing out that he in fact had a recorder attached to his telephone. Although the hon. member for Winnipeg North has said this practice is morally wrong, I would point out that the C.C.F. attorney general of Saskatchewan had a recorder attached to his telephone. He said he had been engaging in this practice. One of the more interesting aspects of that debate occurred when I remarked:

As hon. members will recall, what the hon. member described was not a wire tap but a recording. In fact, it was the same practice used by the government over which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam presided when he was premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Douglas: That is not true.

Mr. Macdonald: Then in that event, if the hon. member will listen, I should like to read a statement made by the former Attorney General of Saskatchewan, Hon. Robert Walker, as reported in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix for December 17, 1964.

I thought it might be useful to have that little incident on the record to show that when hon. members of the New Democratic Party introduce these arguments with respect to wire tapping, they do so from an intimate knowledge of the practice, a practice which was followed right into the office of the former C.C.F. Attorney General of Saskatchewan.

May I for a few minutes refer to the bill itself. I notice that the hon. member who has introduced the bill has used the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the house revert to motions for the purpose of tabling a document.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

TABLING OF REPORT OF CARTER COMMISSION ON TAXATION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to table the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation. It was delivered to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on Wednesday of this week. There are, as hon. members will see, six volumes in English. There are four full volumes here of the French version, plus the conclusions and recommendations in French of the two other volumes, namely volumes 4 and 6. When we have received volumes 4 and 6 in the French language, they will of course be tabled promptly.

As the house can plainly see, this is a very long report on the result of an inquiry that has been under way since the commissioners were appointed in September, 1962. The majority of the commission, I am informed, has recommended many novel and important changes in our tax laws, which are complicated and interrelated. It will take a long time for hon. members and the public to read these reports and to assess the recommendations and arguments pro and con. There will inevitably be many differing views as to what should be done about the proposals.

The government intends to study the report and the views expressed on it during the next few months, before reaching conclusions about the recommendations made by the commission or alternative suggestions from other sources. In the meantime, we do not intend to comment upon the substance of the report, nor indicate our intentions concerning its recommendations. Any premature comments, or forecasts of our intentions on these matters, could have substantial effects upon markets and upon business decisions. There will no doubt be uncertainty in some of our markets and in some industries during the period that is necessary to come to wise decisions after public discussion of these important but contentious issues.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he was able to make the arrangements to which he referred this morning to have copies of the report delivered to all members immediately?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may explain to the house that arrangements were made to have copies of this report delivered to each member of the house immediately it was tabled. The messengers are in possession of the copies now and they will be delivering them momentarily.

Mr. Knowles: We can hardly wait to get to our offices.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 27, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

OBSERVANCE OF STATEHOOD DAY CEREMONIES IN WEST INDIES

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the holding of Statehood day ceremonies beginning today on the islands of Antigua and St. Christopher-Nevis-Anguilla, to be followed by similar ceremonies on the island of St. Lucia on March 1 and Grenada on March 3. Statehood day ceremonies will also be observed on the islands of St. Vincent and Dominica on dates to be announced later.

These Statehood day ceremonies mark the assumption of a new constitutional status of association with Britain based on agreements negotiated by the six commonwealth Caribbean islands and the British government. The new constitutions provide for full internal self government while Britain remains responsible for defence and external relations, apart from trade, aid and migration.

The new constitutions of the West Indian Associated States will enable them to play a full role in the development of the new and closer relationship between Canada and all the Commonwealth Caribbean countries.

I know hon. members will join me in extending sincere good wishes for the future to the West Indies Associated States as they assume their new status.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is one occasion when we all can join in complete agreement with what has taken place among the states in the Caribbean, and in paying tribute not only to the residents of the various areas and islands but also to the beneficent efforts of Great Britain in providing these people with a form of government by which they are ensured a civil service system to maintain and carry out the democratic principle.

I certainly join with the right hon. Prime Minister in offering congratulations not only to these several countries and their leaders but also to a commonwealth which makes possible the development and expansion of those countries which come under its sway, so that when the days of colonialism are over these countries may take their place as part and parcel, either directly or indirectly, of the commonwealth as a whole.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the members of this party wish to join with the right hon. Prime Minister and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in extending our congratulations to the West Indies Associated States on this very historic occasion. I am certain that when the history of our era is written one of the great triumphs of the United Kingdom will be recorded as the manner in which during the past 25 years it has divested itself of an empire and created a commonwealth of free nations freely associated together. This is a transition which has come about peacefully and with a very high degree of statesmanship.

Now that the constitutions of the West Indies Associated States are set up, these states will have many economic and political problems. I should like to make the appeal I have made before in this house, and express the hope that Canada will take a much greater interest in the Caribbean area. The people there are close to us; many of them speak either English or French. We are admirably suited, both by language and common association in the commonwealth, to play an important role in their economic, cultural and social development. I hope that Canadians will take this responsibility seriously and play an ever more important role in the development of that particular area of the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, the members of our group join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the spokesmen of the various parties in the house to say how happy we are to see that the West Indies Associated States had the courage to direct their own affairs. In this age of progress, colonialism is gradually disappearing. We are happy to see also that while moving ahead those people are keeping alive the democratic spirit of the free world.

West Indies Associated States

Mr. Speaker, since the importance and influence of those associated states throughout the world are unquestionably growing, it is desirable that Canada should maintain relations with those states to be able, if need be, to give them help or ask them for help. I think that Canada must take an interest in those new nations: they need help and we can help them. We can also assure them of our friendship particularly in view of the present conditions in the world. The bond of friendship and understanding between democratic countries must be strengthened and I think that Canada must assure the West Indies of her co-operation and help.

It is with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I add the wishes of our group to those of the Prime Minister. I hope that the present government and all those which will come after it will always be inspired by that spirit of friendship and mutual help so vital to the survival of the free world.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Social Credit party wish to associate themselves with the Prime Minister and other speakers in extending greetings and best wishes to the West Indian Associated States. I am sure it was a matter of concern and regret that the West Indies federation failed to measure up to the expectations and hopes of the member states. We do trust that in this new association these countries will find a vehicle by which they will be able to move forward socially and culturally in the development of their respective economies.

Those of us who had the opportunity of attending the commonwealth conference in Jamaica two years ago were impressed by the fact that many of the representatives of the West Indies group spoke so highly of Canada and its endeavours to be of assistance throughout the years. They were looking forward to closer co-operation, and believed that Canada occupied a wonderful position to assist them in achieving their true destinies. Therefore we look forward to working for and with them in the achievement of this objective.

EGGS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to support the price of eggs by a deficiency program for the 12 month period ending September 30, 1967. The support level is at a national average price of 34 cents per dozen for grade A large eggs to the producer. This level is approximately 98 per cent of the national base price or ten year average.

The eligibility per producer for assistance will be to a maximum of 10,000 dozen, as compared with last year when the support level of 34 cents per dozen was limited to 4,000 dozen, with a support level of 31 cents per dozen for the next 6,000 dozen grade A extra large, large and medium eggs.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this announcement, but I must say that as far as the western provinces are concerned the deficiency payments are unjust because they are not to be made on a regional basis. Had that been the case the three western provinces would also have been eligible. I am glad, however, that these deficiency payments are now to be paid on 10,000 dozen eggs rather than on 4,000 dozen as has been the case in the past.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to briefly refer to the statement by the Minister of Agriculture. I want to read it over carefully because I am not too sure that I understood it completely. I am of the opinion that the price is too low, but I should like to confer with the poultry producers in western Canada before saying anything definite on the question.

Mr. Kindt: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There can be no supplementary question at this time. A ministerial statement has been made by the minister and comments have been made by representatives of the parties in opposition. The rules do not provide for supplementary questions to be asked at this time. I will recognize the hon. member on questions.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REPRINTING OF BILLS AMENDING BANK ACT AND QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, many amendments have been made to Bills C-222 and C-223, amending the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, by the standing committee to which they were referred. That committee has passed a motion to the effect that the bills as amended be reprinted. I would ask the house for consent to have that done. I am told that the consent of the house is necessary before this can be done. From the number of amendments it is obvious that this reprinting will be of great convenience to hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PROVISIONS CONCERNING ELECTIONS

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-272, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (duration of House of Commons).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this bill is a personal centennial project designed to provoke discussion in depth of the state of parliamentary and responsible government in 1967. To achieve its aim of restoring the independence of private members of parliament, the bill has four features. It would abolish the royal power of dissolution and substitute fixed dates of elections, subject to the right of the House of Commons itself and not the Prime Minister to determine a different and earlier date.

Second, defeat of a government proposal would lead to an election only if the house itself so determined by resolution.

A third and concomitant provision of the bill is that the House of Commons would have continuous legal existence, and in case of international or national crises parliament could be called into session even during an election campaign.

Finally, parliament would be required to make financial provision for the administration during an election period, and governor general's warrants would be abolished. The bill would apply to the twenty eighth and subsequent parliaments.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HUMAN RIGHTS

PROVISION FOR MAINTENANCE OF RIGHT OF PRIVACY

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-273, respecting the right of privacy.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to introduce this bill entitled "An act respecting the right of privacy". Mr. Justice Brandeis has referred to the right of privacy as the right most valued by civilized men. Several outstanding jurists in Canada share the same opinion. It is advisable to protect that right adequately and to stop the various forms of invasion of privacy. Recent unfortunate events in British Columbia have focussed public attention on this question.

I am introducing this bill at the request of certain members of our party in British Columbia and certain trade union members in that province. After reading of the consideration that is being given to this question in other countries I have spent a good deal of my spare time studying this subject.

The purpose of this bill is to provide that wire tapping and eavesdropping be prohibited except in cases of the administration of justice and the security of the state.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STUDY OF SYNTHETIC DETERGENTS

Question No. 2,443—Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron):

1. Is any government department or agency making a study of synthetic detergent residuals in Canadian lakes and rivers and, if so, what agency or department?

2. Is any department giving consideration to the need for developing standards of bio-degradability for synthetic detergents offered for sale in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. Yes. Synthetic detergent residuals are of two types: an organic surface-active agent and inorganic phosphates. The water quality and engineering group, water research branch, Department of Energy, Mines and Resources occasionally check certain waters for surface-active substances. In their country-wide quality network and in other survey studies, determinations of phosphate contents are routine practice. Analyses of water for both these constituents of detergents are being extended, especially with regard to surface-active agents. The chemical analytical programs of energy, mines and resources in support of the International Joint Commission reference on pollution in lakes Ontario and Erie, 1966 and 1967 summers, include tests for nutrients which may, in part, have been introduced to the lakes from synthetic detergent residuals.

2. No. No work has been done to date relative to developing standards of bio-degradability. When facilities and staff are available, it is planned to study methods of removing phosphates and it may be that biological methods will be studied. Research in these fields will be primarily of an applied nature.

SHIPPING

ICEBREAKING OPERATIONS IN ST. LAWRENCE —MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I beg for leave, under standing order 26, seconded by the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois), to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation now prevailing on the St. Lawrence river. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to argue that the matter is of urgent public importance, and that it should be discussed today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lapointe may make his comments on the urgency of discussing this question today.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons for the urgency of the debate. First, you have the safety of many sailors now on board ice-bound ships; I feel we must take immediate action, for tomorrow may be too late.

I simply wish to quote a representative of the Danish shipping company, owner of three of the ships at present ice-bound near Montreal. He said:

[English]

—he was more concerned with the question of safety to his ships than with the money lost digging the vessels out—

The spokesman said the men aboard the Danish freighters are starting to worry about their predicament.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the matter is urgent precisely because of the security of the people on board the ships that are trapped by the ice since Thursday, people who at this very moment wonder what lies in store for them in the next few hours.

The same spokesman added, and I quote:

[English]

"There's no telling what hundreds of tons of ice can do. Ships stuck in a moving jam helplessly smash into whatever stands in the way."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is the question of the immediate security of these men who are trapped on the ships.

Another point may help to prove the urgency of discussing this problem today: if no decision is made immediately, the whole economic activity of a Canadian region, namely that of Montreal, will be seriously affected. In this connection I should like to point out what a Montreal spokesman for the National Harbours Board said, and I quote:

[English]

"It only stands to reason that if ships can't get in and out of here in the winter, they're going to stop coming," he said.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that spokesman is not now referring only to the three ice-bound Danish ships but also to the three ice-bound Russian ships.

And this Montreal spokesman of the National Harbours Board further stated:

[English]

"Many shipping lines have already hinted that their ocean going vessels won't go further than Halifax or Saint John, New Brunswick. Thousands of dollars are lost each day their ships are immobilized."

[Translation]

In addition, the spokesman of the Danish shipping company, one of the companies which most contributed to promote winter navigation on the St. Lawrence, stated:

[English]

He added that ship owners who have spent millions of dollars building steel reinforced hulls to trade here during the winter expect co-operation in keeping the St. Lawrence navigable.

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, shipping companies are now beginning to talk about not sending their ships and ocean-going vessels as far as Montreal harbour, because the Department of Transport is not doing anything to assist those ships, as indicated by the statements of the authorities I have just quoted.

Therefore, there are two reasons which militate for an emergency debate today. The first consideration is the safety of the many sailors confined on board their ship in extremely dangerous circumstances, according to the spokesman for the shippers.

Second, no announcement has been made, nor has any decision been taken in this regard; shippers may well decide not to use the St. Lawrence river any more, which would cause the economic areas of Montreal, Sorel, Trois-Rivières and Quebec to suffer serious losses.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the safety of the men and the economy of the above-mentioned areas are reason enough to consider this a matter of great urgency. We have no right to endanger the lives of these men courageously trying to get through in order to develop the economy of the St. Lawrence area, year after year, without the co-operation of the government. I feel the matter is urgent, because human lives are at stake.

• (3:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I do not always agree with the political opinions of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) but I do agree with him that when ships are caught in the ice we should get them out. I am aware of the fact that he has raised this subject in the past, but I would like to point out that not only is the question of security involved but also winter trade between Canada and other countries whose ships are now trapped in the ice of the St. Lawrence.

The ship owners have indicated that it is the responsibility of the federal government to take some action. If the federal government does not want to assume this responsibility it should so inform the harbours board, which would then have to act accordingly. Under present circumstances there is a security problem involving these three ships which are trapped in the ice and cannot budge, and a very dangerous situation might arise depending which way thousands and thousands of tons of ice might move.

The point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that the government has permitted its icebreaker to move down the St. Lawrence river, leaving these three ships in this critical situation. We are not very happy at the fact that the government or someone has issued the order instructing the icebreakers to move downriver, because it does leave the crews of these vessels exposed to a hazardous situation. We have had enough incidents to date on the waterways in and around Canada, and if we take the precaution of preventing another then this will be one less for the record.

I for one agree on this occasion with the hon. member for Lapointe, and I think we should do something, if possible, to free these ships from the ice.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to this motion on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), and I address my remarks to the urgency of debate. I concede that conditions in the St. Lawrence river channel have been extremely difficult for some weeks, with repeated jams both in Montreal harbour and lower down the channel. It is true that today the jam does extend from Sorel down to the bridge at Trois-Rivières. Montreal harbour has also been jammed. However, I might say that the ice control structure is in operation and working effectively, and the water level in the port of Montreal has dropped to a point where I am now advised there is no danger to the Expo site.

With regard to the three vessels referred to by both the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois), may I say that a few minutes ago I was in communication with the president of the shipping agency referred to by the hon. member for Lapointe, and he tells me that there has been a misquotation of his port captain's statement. He assures me that the three Danish ships have now been freed from the ice jam they were in and are trying to get into the upper harbour at Montreal, so the immediate problem of the jam has been minimized.

St. Lawrence Shipping

There are 11 icebreakers working in the gulf of St. Lawrence, in the part of the river around Quebec city and in the Sorel region. There are four icebreakers currently in operation between Trois-Rivières and Montreal, and we have provided an additional icebreaker which is proceeding upriver from Quebec to the Montreal region.

I might point out that it is an engineering fact that unless the ice is broken and the river kept fluid in the Lac St. Pierre area it would be relatively useless to open the river up at Montreal. Therefore there is constant need all the way down the river to keep the ice moving, otherwise there will be a bottleneck. I have asked the department to maintain full icebreaking service and to anticipate and prevent all danger to shipping. I can assure the house that all suitable and available icebreaking forces are now in action.

On the question of urgency, Mr. Speaker, I need not recall to Your Honour that urgency within the rule does not relate to the matter of debate itself, urgent though that might be—and I have tried to argue to Your Honour that the immediate urgency is under control—but applies to the urgency of debate. I would also draw Your Honour's attention to citation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister, but so far as the urgency of the matter is concerned I can assure him that my mind is made up and I am quite prepared at this moment to make a decision on the motion of the hon. member for Lapointe. If hon. members think the debate should continue further I will allow the minister to continue his argument.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the debate unduly, but lest silence on the part of maritime members be taken as consent I should like to point out that there is one way in which this whole difficulty could have been avoided in the first place. This is by telling the captains of these ships in no uncertain terms that if they had gone to the ice free ports of Halifax and Saint John there would have been no difficulty.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. gentleman were allowed to continue his remarks—though I understand he has completed them—we might get into a discussion of the substance.

[Mr. Turner.]

[Translation]

The only point now before the house is whether discussion is urgent. It is not whether the subject matter of the complaint as expressed in the request of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and seconded by the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) is urgent, but whether discussion is urgent. I hardly feel that allowing discussion this afternoon would settle the problem. The hon. Minister without Portfolio, in his comments, replied to the main problem mentioned by the hon. member for Lapointe to the effect that it was a question of immediate security. Since this problem is settled, I consider that the request made by the hon. member for Lapointe should not be entertained.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Minister of Labour which has to do with the unemployment which has arisen in consequence of the Canada-U.S. automobile agreement and the fact that people have been laid off in large numbers without having received any consideration.

Would the minister now give consideration to the establishment of a committee composed of representatives of labour, management and government for the purpose of giving protection to workers who are dislocated, either by transferring them to other jobs or by supplying additional work in the industry at the same geographical location? This is something that has been asked for on a number of occasions. In view of the seriousness of the situation, too often denied, and the numbers of unemployed as a result of this auto agreement, I suggest to the minister that such a committee would go a long way toward allaying fear and would give some hope to those who are being laid off.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion put forward by the right hon. gentleman has been put forward previously, as he intimated. I have discussed it with representatives of the unions and with perhaps not all but certainly most of the employers concerned, as well as with some of my cabinet colleagues. At the present time I would not be disposed to take action along the lines suggested by the right hon.

gentleman, but I will certainly give the matter further consideration after consultation with my colleagues.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister consider having an investigation made by a royal commission, to report very soon, into why it is that under this automobile agreement automobiles which are produced in Canada are being sold in the United States at a price a great deal lower than the price of the same automobiles manufactured in Canada?

Second, why is it that Canadians have to pay more for United States made cars than United States consumers have to pay, though the tariff has been eliminated?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has been brought up in the house more than once and has been dealt with by the Minister of Industry. I will be glad to refer my right hon. friend's additional observations to the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would not consider a commission to look into this matter. The answers given by the Minister of Industry have been simply pushovers, removing the question from serious consideration. Canadians pay through the nose, and United States consumers obtain Canadian cars at cheaper rates than Canadians pay.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECOMMENDATIONS OF TAXATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does he intend fairly soon to make a statement to the house about the recommendations of the Carter commission on taxation, particularly with a view to setting forth any order of priority the government has established for implementation of the commission's recommendations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am filled with wonder, on reading the newspapers this morning, that members of the House of Commons have been able to absorb that monumental document and reach opinions so quickly. I must be, shall I say, rather dull.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: I think it will take several months with my inferior intellectual capacity and with the help of my officials before I can reach decisions on this matter or before I would want to make any recommendations to my colleagues.

As I said when I tabled the report on Friday, I intend to let several months pass to allow members of the public who would like to take a serious look at this report, rather than the sort of cursory look which has been taken by members opposite, to do so before I would feel justified in bringing down recommendations.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has made one statement with which there seems to be almost unanimous agreement. May I ask the minister if it is his intention to refer the recommendations of this commission to the House of Commons committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, that it may have an opportunity of examining those recommendations in depth and making some report to the house with respect to this matter.

Mr. Sharp: I am glad the hon. gentleman now recognizes the need for a much more serious discussion of this matter before opinions are expressed. I think it would be a better procedure, however, for the public to have some opportunity of studying the report, making its recommendations known, and then for the government to put forward its recommendations which could be discussed in the committee. It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to do that.

I have said earlier in a number of public addresses and I think in the house that perhaps the best way of proceeding would be for the government, after there has been a reasonable opportunity for discussion, to bring in a bill and have that bill referred, before it is approved on second reading, to a committee for discussion when representations could be made.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. In light of the admission of the Minister of Finance with respect to his inferior intellect, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Labour whether he has been able to digest the Gill commission report on unemployment insurance and what the government proposes to do about that report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a supplementary question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister can tell the house when he will be inviting the provinces to discuss the contents of the Carter commission report with officials of his department.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have not made up our minds yet. I can assure the house that before we reach any tentative decisions on these matters we shall be having a full discussion with the provinces whose interests are very much involved.

Mr. Olson: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether he is sure that each provincial treasurer has received a copy of the report?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, special preparations were taken at the time of the publication of the report to inform officials of the provincial governments, who were invited to Ottawa for that purpose.

INQUIRY AS TO SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I was going to say I thought I might have to wait until tomorrow to ask my question, but I think I shall be able to ask it today. Can the minister advise the house what progress he is making with the authorities concerned in the respective provinces regarding discussions leading to the possible adoption of Canadian securities and exchange commission legislation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. That particular question I think should be referred to my colleague the Minister without Portfolio, who has been Acting Registrar General. I can say that in connection with other financial institutions we have written to the provinces asking them when it would be convenient to have a meeting. The matter of securities legislation I think ought to be referred to my colleague the Acting Registrar General.

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, answering the question, we are now preparing for a meeting at the official level and eventually at the ministerial level to implement the answers sought by my hon. friend.

[Mr. Speaker.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I see the congenial member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) is back from his Asian trip.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kindt: I ask whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Leeds are planning to issue a joint press release on the political situation in Asia.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I propose to ask the advice of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRADE

FAILURE TO MENTION LAKEHEAD CITIES IN ADVERTISING BROCHURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I shall address it to the acting minister. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the elegant and presumably expensive brochure on Canada for distribution to the United States? If so, did he note that the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur were completely ignored? In fact, as far as this publication is concerned the Canadian lakehead does not exist.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question is so important that I shall take note of it myself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he may have a question of privilege to be raised at the appropriate time. This is not a question for orders of the day.

Mr. Badanai: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR HUNDRED MILLION DOLLAR FEDERAL LOAN

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. My question is based on my capacity for premonition and prevision, and the penchant for publicity of the premier of British Columbia. Has the minister received any communication from the premier of British Columbia asking the federal government for an unconditional $100 million loan for hydro development, guaranteed as to principal and interest by that province? If so, what is the response of the federal government to the premier's appeal for financial assistance?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I received a telegram asking whether the federal government would be prepared to lend the British Columbia hydro and power authority $100 million, subject to the guarantee of the British Columbia government, at the federal government's own borrowing rate of interest. I should add that the request was accompanied neither by an explanation nor by a justification. It will be difficult for the government to seriously consider such a request, without explanation and justification, in what appears to be a remarkable change in the financial position of the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: As a supplementary question just to clinch the argument, Mr. Speaker, was the 11 per cent federal sales tax in effect when the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia was signed with respect to the Columbia river treaty?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he should ascertain this under circumstances different from the present, that is, not on orders of the day.

AIR POLLUTION

EQUIPPING OF AUTOMOBILES WITH PROTECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement outside the house last week to the effect that we could expect immediate action on air pollution, and in view of the assurance given to the house by the Minister of National Health and Welfare a number of days ago that the government was studying recent United States federal regulations requiring clean air packages and anti-air pollution features in automobiles, I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether these studies have been completed, and has the government arrived at a conclusion that the same clean air features will be required in automobiles in Canada in the future?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, consideration has proceeded within the department with respect to the use of this particular package, and the tentative conclusion is that at the moment the alleged benefits are not clear enough to warrant action of this kind in Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: As a supplementary question, will the government be making an announcement as to why it is not going to require this feature to be made a requisite, and why there will be this difference in Canada as opposed to the regulations which will be applied in the United States?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, the first point to be borne in mind is that the conference on resources made a recommendation that no action be taken in Canada until there had been an opportunity to observe the results in the United States, and we are not satisfied that the benefits are great enough. Further, it is a very expensive operation, and there is some suggestion that this device acts as a pollutant itself.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State. It arises out of the advertising of a certain book on the C.B.C. network. Can the parliamentary secretary find out whether it is now going to be the policy of the C.B.C. to go into the publishing business?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, if it is urgent and acceptable, should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning his forthcoming journey to the West Indies. While he is in the West Indies would he ask one of those islands to join Canada so we could establish a legislative capital in a more civilized climate? Or, failing that, I have another suggestion.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—MAINTENANCE OF WINTER NAVIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance and urgency of winter shipping on the St. Lawrence, could the Prime Minister tell us whether his government intends to do something to increase the efficiency of winter shipping on the St. Lawrence?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has already been raised and dealt with in the House of Commons, and I have nothing to add to what the Minister of Transport said about it some time ago.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO ADOPTION OF ELECTRONIC VOTING METHOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It is prompted by my reading of a portion of his excellent interview by the editor of the Ottawa Journal recently. Can he advise the house of his plans for electrifying the voting procedures in this chamber?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which I hope our committee dealing with rules and procedure will take up, and I trust that committee will meet today or tomorrow. I have often thought, as have other hon. members, that we could save a lot of time in this way, and I hope we will be able to take some action in electrifying our procedures.

Mr. Brewin: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to suggest that there should be a supplementary. I doubt whether the first question was of such an urgent nature that it should have been allowed and I suggest, if supplementaries are in order, that they be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Brewin: Perhaps I can ask a question later, Mr. Speaker.

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF COMPLETE OVERHAUL OF HOUSE RULES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister which is related to but I think broader and a little more urgent than the question put by the hon. member for Queens. The Prime Minister is reported as having said that the tremendous amount of legislation facing the house made it necessary to reform the rules and procedures in the house by a complete overhaul rather than by mere tinkering. I want to ask the Prime Minister, will the government be putting proposals for such a complete overhaul of the rules of the house before the special committee on procedure?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the terms of reference of the committee in question are wide enough to encompass any proposal under this general subject, however far reaching its results may be on our procedures. I would think the members of the committee are quite able to put such proposals forward, but in the light of the work of the committee as we go on we might be able to discuss whether the government as such—and I might say this would be very unusual—would put forward proposals.

FISHERIES

LOBSTER REGULATIONS IN SOUTHERN PART OF DISTRICT 7B

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries of which I have given notice, and I understand he is very anxious to answer it. Will regulations soon be approved to afford some measure of protection to those lobster fishermen who operate in that portion of district 7B other than the north shore of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for sending me notice of his intention to ask this question. I wish to confirm that lobster fishing regulations will be amended so that licences to engage in the lobster fishery in the southern Prince Edward Island portion of district 7B, extending from East Point to Victoria Harbour, will be limited this year to persons who held such licences in 1966. Exceptions may be made where there are extenuating circumstances, and each case will be examined in co-operation with representatives of the fishermen.

I wish to add, Mr. Speaker, that no interchange of operations between the two areas will be permitted. Operators licensed for the northern P.E.I. portion of district 7B will not be permitted to fish lobsters in the southern portion, and vice versa.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—EFFECT OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the poultry market report, and I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Farmers have been writing me, saying that eggs at 21 cents per dozen are not worth the wear and tear on the rooster—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kindt: May I ask the minister, is he aware—

An hon. Member: Of the wear and tear?

Mr. Kindt:—of the fact that the statistical average which he announced this morning has no particular benefit beyond what is already provided under the stabilization act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is argumentative.

EXPO '67

PROPOSED IMPORTATION OF VESSEL FOR USE AS FLOATING HOTEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport may I direct a question to the Acting Registrar General, who I believe is also Acting Minister of Transport. Has he knowledge of the proposal to use the ship called the Florida about which I asked the other day, and is it the intention of the Department of Transport to permit the use of this ship in Montreal for the purposes outlined?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I shall have to take this question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA—TRANSFER OF COAL OPERATIONS TO CROWN CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he report any progress in the negotiations to take over the Dominion Coal Company?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There has been progress, Mr. Speaker, but the negotiations are very complicated indeed. It will be some time before we will be able to make an announcement in the house, but we want to make that announcement as quickly as possible.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): As a supplementary question, if progress is being made why is it necessary for the shareholders of DOSCO to establish a purchase price, something for which they are looking?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The second question is argumentative in nature.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, further to the question addressed to the Prime Minister regarding the crown company being established in Cape Breton, has any person been chosen to head this company?

Mr. Pearson: The corporation has not been set up yet. When it is we will be in a position to announce the name of the president.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EXPRESS DELIVERIES IN SAGUENAY-LAKE ST. JOHN AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the hon. Minister of Transport or, in his absence, for his parliamentary secretary.

Does the minister know that the officials of the C.N.R. have ordered discontinuation of express shipments to the Saguenay, Lake St. John and Alma, in particular?

Mr. Speaker: That question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Simard: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister indicate when the new Northwest Territories commissioner will be named?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Very shortly, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does he now have a better appreciation of when he can begin establishing the straight base line co-ordinates under the fishing zone bill, which he said on February 9 he expected to have within a few days?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnett: With that very definite assurance from the minister, will he let the rest of us know when he will begin establishing these base line co-ordinates?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will be glad to do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—POSSIBLE RETURN OF CHESTER RONNING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether the government is now giving consideration to sending Mr. Ronning to Hanoi again? I ask this question in view of the interpretation placed on some rather less than lucid remarks made by the minister in the past couple of days in this connection. By what he said or left unsaid did he mean that Mr. Ronning is about to leave for Hanoi?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not indicate that. I said previously, however, in this house that if the government felt that any situation not now known to us warranted the use of these services they would again be used unhesitatingly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the latter part of the minister's statement mean that no circumstances at the moment are known to the minister which in any way cause the government to feel that to send Mr. Ronning there would be helpful?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think my answer is complete.

[Mr. Laing.]

FINANCE

SALES TAX INCREASE—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF THIRD READING OF BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Last Monday I asked the minister whether the government would consider postponing third reading of the bill to increase the sales tax because of the fact that the Carter report was coming down that week. The minister said "No", but third reading was delayed anyway. Now that the government has the report and in view of its comments in respect of the sales tax, will the government consider postponing indefinitely the third reading of the bill?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer again is no.

Mr. Knowles: Does "no" today mean the same thing it meant last week?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and for the same reason.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration—Mr. Marchand—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Thursday, February 23, clause 1 of the bill was under consideration.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, having been a member of the standing committee on immigration and having had the privilege to serve as parliamentary secretary to two ministers of citizenship and immigration, naturally I am interested in this important and absorbing subject. For years I have given attention to problems and questions in respect of the admission to Canada of prospective immigrants.

In the nine-year period during which I have had the honour to represent the constituency of Fort William, I have consistently maintained that Canada's immigration policies were out of date. In 1962 barely 72,000 immigrants were admitted and we lost nearly as many persons to the United States. That was approximately the situation when in April, 1963 the present government took office. At that time a start was immediately made to give substance to the statement in the speech from the throne which promised that the government would give attention to the need to encourage immigration.

Subsequently, under the energetic direction of dedicated ministers, the mists which obscured the operations of the immigration services in the past began to clear away. Now, under the dynamic leadership of the present minister, we are assured of an immigration policy worthy of this great nation which has the greatest open spaces to be found anywhere in the world. I am sure every hon. member will agree that positive factors have replaced negative motivations with regard to Canadian immigration.

The white paper, which took two years of intensive study involving many changes, has been the subject of scrutiny by the press and the public in general. It has been before the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on immigration. This committee has recently heard views expressed by many interested individuals and organizations both in Ottawa and Toronto, and spent three days last week in Montreal. It is about the meetings held in Montreal that I wish to speak briefly. Excellent briefs were presented to the committee. During the time that the committee was discussing a brief submitted by the United Council for Human Rights, dealing with the immigration appeal board, the hon. member for Parkdale moved that the house leader be asked to hold clause 1 of the bill to enable members to express their views at the Montreal hearings. This is precisely the reason I wish to participate in the final stage of debate on this important bill.

First of all, I should like to join those who have preceded me in extending sincere congratulations to the minister for introducing this legislation which can be likened to the appointment of an ombudsman who cuts through red tape to fight the ordinary citizen's battle when he gets embroiled in difficulties with government departments. During the past four years many cases have come to light in which immigrants have had trouble with the law and have been confined to jail for long periods without knowing their rights. Most immigrants do not know the laws of this country and if they run into trouble with the immigration department they are almost helpless. The immigration appeal board should be the answer to any unreasonable conditions or demands made by officers of the immigration department in cases of detentions, refusals to grant extensions of temporary permits, and requests for change from one non-immigrant status to another non-immigrant status.

The brief of the United Council for Human Rights stressed the particular concern about the exclusion from the board's jurisdiction of the power to examine into and determine the justification for decisions, based on criminal intelligence reports which are undisclosed, to refuse stay of deportation. An important point of their submission was to the effect that the powers of the appeal board with respect to appeals from refusals to approve sponsorship applications made by Canadian citizens were altogether too restrictive. I agree with their contention and I also urge the minister that appeals from the rejection of sponsorship applications made by any landed immigrant be allowed.

The Catholic immigrant services of Canada made a powerful appeal to the committee on behalf of sponsorship under the auspices of accepted voluntary organizations. The history of immigration to Canada to date has proven the contribution to Canada and to the immigrant that this organization has made in the past. Their submission made it clear that this organization is prepared to continue to work on a partnership basis with the department. Their feeling is that there should be some provision for continued co-sponsorship arrangements with such organizations.

The general feeling expressed by several witnesses was that the white paper proposes an increase of unsponsored immigrants and a decrease of sponsored immigrants. It suggests that sponsored immigrants generally are unskilled and their educational level is not according to the desired standard. The fact is that the sponsored immigrant adapts very easily under the guidance of his sponsor who, in the great majority of cases, becomes his benevolent protector. As everyone knows, the family ties of most European people are very close and a nephew or even a cousin and certainly adult children or brothers and sisters are considered as being part of the family, even if they are married. This is an important consideration.

With regard to educational standards required for admission, this is considered by nearly everyone to be the most decisive deterrent to attracting the number of people we should be looking for to populate our vast country. Regardless of the number of years an immigrant may have spent at school, the advent of automation makes it necessary to train and retrain several times in a lifetime, and that applies equally to the Canadian born as well as to newcomers.

In this regard I wish to refer to the excellent presentation made on behalf of the government of Manitoba by Hon. Sydney Spivac, Minister of Industry and Commerce, in which he pointed out that the requirements of that province are in the order of 3,500 unskilled immigrants yearly up to a maximum of 10,000 in the next few years. He contended, and I agree, that certain aspects of the policy outlined in the white paper, while claiming to be non-discriminatory in terms of geography and race, do in fact discriminate against the kind of people his province needs today to enable its economy to expand and grow. Rigid admission standards based primarily on education are unrealistic and do not meet the needs of the economy. They are discriminatory rather than expansionistic.

The Mining Association of Canada, in a brief presented to the committee, described the difficulties which many mining companies have experienced during the past two years in recruiting in Canada a labour force adequate to maintain their productive capacity, and suggested that the mining industry will continue to suffer from shortages of suitable manpower unless greater recourse is made to immigration and the educational requirements for unsponsored immigrants are modified.

I have a letter from the chief engineer of Canadian National Railways addressed to Mr. R. F. Welch, president of R. F. Welch Limited of Port Arthur, Ontario, the firm charged with the responsibility of recruiting manpower for building and maintenance of tracks, which I wish to put on record. It reads as follows:

> Canadian National Railways has experienced serious difficulty during 1966 in securing the necessary labour for major track maintenance programs and new track construction.
> There is every indication that the shortage of track labour will become even more serious for the 1967 working season. Next summer, in addition to the major track programs to be carried out on existing lines, track laying will be required on five new branch lines. I understand you have had some preliminary conversations and exchange of correspondence, with the regional engineers on the great lakes, prairie and mountain regions, regarding manpower supply.
> You are hereby authorized to recruit eight hundred (800) men for work on track maintenance and construction gangs on these regions of C.N. lines during the 1967 working season. Three hundred (300) of these men can be guaranteed twelve months' employment, but the balance of five hundred (500) will be required for the six months' working season only—May to October.
> Please keep me advised of your progress in securing these men.

The letter is signed by A. V. Johnston, chief engineer of the engineering department of Canadian National Railways, Montreal.

I do not wish to take the time to refer to a dozen other briefs and submissions made by responsible individuals and organizations, nearly all of them pointing to the fact that the number of years in school or I.Q. tests or academic degrees do not always spell brilliance or even brightness in assessing the desirability of prospective immigrants. It is not even ability that determines performance. I venture to say that dedication, perseverance or just plain good habits and determination are other dimensions to be considered in gauging a person's effectiveness in any job.

I should also like to say a word in favour of establishing some ways and means to enable immigrants from the Ukraine to join their relatives and friends in Canada. I realize that it is not the government's fault we are not getting immigrants from eastern Europe. Nevertheless, I believe that an approach should be made to the U.S.S.R. for a review of their attitude toward a humane immigration policy which would go a long way to establishing greater and more effective friendly relations between our two countries.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate let me first of all deal with a problem created last week when the committee on immigration held a meeting in the city of Montreal at the same time the House of Commons was dealing with the bill now before us. I think that the circumstances which prevailed point up more clearly than anything else the lack of planning on the government benches with regard to the preparation of the work of the House of Commons. We have heard the Prime Minister and other cabinet members pay lip service to the role committees can play in the preparation of legislation and in helping to make the work of the House of Commons proceed in a more orderly and effective manner. Not only in the immigration committee but in other committees of the house we have seen the spectacle of the House of Commons dealing with legislation at the same time as the appropriate committee was sitting in some part of the parliament buildings or outside the capital of our nation. To my mind this points us the real need of hon. members opposite, particularly those charged with the order of business that is brought before the house, to take another look at the way in which they have discharged their responsibilities in this regard. Indeed, I cannot help but feel that this was an affront to the members of the committee and parliament itself and as such should be noted in the record at this time.

Every member of the committee had to make a choice whether to stay here or go to Montreal. Many of us went to Montreal because we thought we should hear from the people who had representations to make before we came back to the House of Commons to consider the legislation that was before the house. Now we are presented with an accomplished fact; everything in the bill has been dealt with except clause 1. The hon. member for Fort William indicated that the hon. member for Parkdale had moved that only clause 1 be held in abeyance. I do not think this is quite correct. I think the hon. member for Parkdale indicated that consideration of this bill should be delayed until we had heard the representations to be made to us. I wanted to set the record straight in that regard.

The situation thus created resulted in our committee sitting in Montreal almost without any representation from the New Democratic Party. Apparently they thought it was more important to be here in the House of Commons. This points up the whole question of which is more important and where the duty of a member lies. This confused situation exists when there is inadequate planning in respect of the business of the house.

I know that Bill C-220 does not deal with the whole sphere of immigration matters but the hon. member for Fort William said something about the white paper and perhaps at this time, Mr. Chairman, you would allow me to say a word or two about it. I do not wish to deal with this question at any length. The hon. member for Fort William referred to the fact that there had been a two-year study of immigration. In view of the fact that for two years the minister considered this question, when I look at the shortcomings of the white paper, which has failed to recognize the need for unskilled and semi-skilled people in this country and has created a number of other discriminations in regard to families and so on, I cannot help but wonder what consideration was given to this matter during those two years.

I should like to make one suggestion to the minister with regard to some of the hearings that have so far been held. I urge the minister to consider the urgent need of an immigration officer and office in Beirut, Lebanon. There is a real need for opening an office there. I should like the minister to give this matter his careful and considerate attention.

In considering the legislation before us I am very glad that the hon. members who were here were able to bring forward the amendment which has made it possible for a person making an appeal to have laid before him the information forming the basis upon which deportation was decided. This will give him an opportunity to prepare his defence and lay out his case in a more orderly manner than has been the case in the past. Without saying anything further in that regard, Mr. Chairman, I shall conclude my remarks.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, in beginning my remarks on clause 1 of Bill C-220 I hasten to thank the Minister of Manpower and Immigration for reopening this clause. This gives the members of the special committee on immigration, who were doing their duty in Montreal hearing briefs from important regional and national organizations on Canadian immigration policies as outlined in the white paper, an opportunity to express their views on this question. It was just and courageous of the minister to grant the members of our committee the opportunity to exercise our right, state our views today and make them known to the committee of the whole. We are glad to have this opportunity to place before the committee of the whole the representations put before us when hearing briefs in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

May I say at the outset that I was the one responsible for the action taken by the minister, having moved in Montreal a motion to inform the house leader that the members of the Committee who were in Montreal should be able to make known to the committee of the whole the views of these important national organizations, especially the views of the United Council for Human Rights which represents no less than 24 very important organizations in the greatest city of Canada.

The United Council for Human Rights is composed of the Quebec Federation of Labour, the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the United Nations Association in Canada, the Office des Oeuvres de L'Archevêché de

Montreal, and many other important organizations. I was shocked, and so were the members of the committee, I believe, to hear some of the grievances that were expressed. These grievances are outlined in the brief presented to us. I do not want to take the time of the committee of the whole to read them but they are grievances which merit the attention of the house and especially of the minister. They cry out for the recognition of human rights, because in dealing with matters of immigration we are concerned with the dignity of the human person.

I also wish to answer some of the remarks that were made last Thursday in the committee of the whole. It was said on that occasion that the members of the immigration committee had no right to express the views that we did in Montreal. One of the reasons given was that Bill C-220 has nothing to do with the white paper. May I draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that the new immigration appeal board is mentioned specifically in the white paper in sections 88, 90 and 92. The new immigration appeal board and matters connected with it are also mentioned in the second Sedgwick report on immigration at pages 6 to 10. I believe this is proof enough that the immigration appeal board was a matter for study and consideration by our committee. This has been accepted by the chairman. I believe that these remarks negate what was said last Thursday night, namely, that we had no right to ask the committee of the whole to hear our views about the immigration appeal board.

The briefs which were presented in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal pointed out the necessity of extending the classes of relatives that can be sponsored by Canadian citizens and landed immigrants. This point is dealt with under clause 17 of the bill and I understand that several amendments were proposed to change it and the related clauses.

I understand the difficulty of the minister in trying to satisfy every point of view. However, I believe it is my duty, representing as I do the constituency of Parkdale almost 50 per cent of which is composed of people of ethnic origins other than French and Anglo-Saxon, to express the views of my constituents. I hear from them about many cases dealing with immigration problems which call for humanitarian, moral and compassionate action. I also receive representations on the same subject from all across Canada and they are also based on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. Unfortunately, owing to the way in which the department has been run so far, it has been very difficult to obtain a favourable decision in most of these cases in which appeals have been made on compassionate and moral grounds. For this reason I appreciate the fact that amendments have been made to certain clauses allowing for compassionate grounds to be taken into account in the review of appeals.

However, there are other recommendations which have been made in the briefs from important national organizations. One of them is that the classes of relatives which can be sponsored should be extended. According to the white paper on Canadian immigration policy, a Canadian citizen can only sponsor up to an unmarried niece or nephew under 21 years of age. Most of the representations made to me, and I believe to other members of the house, have asked for an extension of the class of relatives that can be sponsored to include first and second cousins. In some cases, requests have been made to extend the class of sponsorable relatives to next of kin.

The reason for these requests is that many Canadian citizens do not have close relatives in the old country but wish to bring their next of kin who might be their fourth or fifth cousin. I believe that the Canadian government should grant Canadian citizens the right to appeal to the board asking for an extension of the classes of relatives specified in the regulations designated by the governor in council.

I make these remarks in the presence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration because I feel it is my duty as a member of parliament to voice the wishes of the people whom I represent in this house. I believe in government of the people, for the people and by the people. We are here to legislate for the people. The people want these changes for which they have been asking for the past four years. If we turn a deaf ear to their demands we will be acting in a rather contemptuous manner. I wish to stress how important it is to listen to the requests of Canadian citizens. I am happy to have been granted the opportunity this afternoon to make these representations in the committee of the whole.

May I also express words of appreciation for the arduous task which the minister is performing. I realize that he has made more progress in immigration matters than any other immigration minister in Canadian history and I want to pay him a tribute for his efforts. I also wish to urge him to continue his work and to take our remarks into consideration.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Chairman, I should like to intervene in the debate to indicate to the house some of the highlights of the brief presented by the United Council for Human Rights and to indicate that in my view the amendments which were brought forward by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration during the course of the debate have largely taken care of some of the recommendations contained in that brief. Perhaps some that are not covered will be considered by the committee set up to study the white paper on immigration policy and will be implemented in their recommendations.

I should like to say in support of the position taken by the hon. member for Parkdale that I think it is only fair to point out the fact that of all the briefs this particular brief dealt more exclusively and to a larger extent with the immigration appeal board. Most of the briefs dealt generally with the white paper and did not concentrate in depth on the immigration appeal board to the same extent as did the brief of the United Council for Human Rights.

I should like to quote from the brief to indicate the extent to which the amendments put forward by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration have covered its main recommendations. It reads in part as follows:

> We welcome the proposed reconstitution of the board of immigration appeals as an independent court of record with appeals on questions of law to the Supreme Court of Canada and with authority to deal conclusively in all respects with appeals against orders of deportation; and
> We welcome the power given to the board of immigration appeals to stay the execution of deportation orders on the ground of unusual hardship and the possibility that the person concerned may be punished for activities of a political nature should he be deported; but we object to restricting its powers regarding appeals from refusals to approve sponsorship applications to those made by Canadian citizens and recommend that there shall also be an appeal from the rejection of sponsorship applications made by any landed immigrant; and we view with concern the exclusion from the board's jurisdiction of the power to examine into and determine the justification for decisions, based on criminal intelligence reports which are undisclosed, to refuse stay of deportation; and we also recommend that the board of immigration appeals be given the power to consider and pass upon appeals in connection with
> (a) refusal of special inquiry officers to grant conditional release;

● (4:10 p.m.)

> (b) unreasonable conditions for release and demands for exorbitant amount for release bonds;
> (c) denials to grant voluntary departure;
> (d) refusals to grant extensions of temporary permits and requests for change from one non-immigrant status to another non-immigrant status...
> We recommend that change of status from that of non-immigrant to that of immigrant, while in this country, be liberalized to afford relief not only in all cases of bona fide marriage to a Canadian citizen or landed immigrant but also in all cases where undue hardship may be caused by deportation.
> We view with concern the minister's acceptance of the vicious principle of "guilt by association" and the granting of extraordinary powers to immigrant officers to make subjective decisions and believe that, unless proper safeguards for review, both administrative and judicial, are afforded and clear and precise definitions are set forth in the act or published regulations, the following proposed categories should not be included in the list of prohibited classes, to wit, "persons suspected of associating with criminals, so-called professional gamblers, confidence men and fugitives from justice who have not been declared to be such by the regular courts of law"; we also recommend that the existing provisions of the Immigration Act which give immigration officers the power to determine whether a person is "likely" to commit an offence or "likely" to become a public charge and which recognize "guilt by association" be reviewed and carefully redrafted to avoid abuse.
> We also view with concern the intention to include in the prohibited classes those "attempting to circumvent immigration procedures" unless these "procedures" are clearly set forth in the act or in published regulations available to the public; and we also view with concern the proposed inclusion in the prohibited classes of those who give "false and misleading information about themselves or their intentions" unless it is clearly set forth that the misrepresentation is wilful and the information is material and relates to immigration matters, otherwise, this power is open to abuse and would lead to "fishing expeditions" into the private lives of individuals into areas of no direct concern to the immigration department.

I am reading excerpts from this brief. Finally, the recommendations are as follows:

> (a) the right to counsel should be meaningful and should be exercisable immediately upon detention;
> (b) there be a complete separation of officers performing adjudicatory functions from those handling the investigation and prosecution of cases;
> (c) petty offences be excluded from those convictions under the Canadian Criminal Code that are subject to deportation

Farther down the page they recommend:

> (g) evidence before the special inquiry officers should have probative value and not merely be "credible and trustworthy in the opinion of the special inquiry officer";
> (h) judges be given the power to recommend no deportation in convictions under the Criminal Code;
> (i) police cells and prisons be not designated as "immigrant stations";
> (j) machinery be set up to prevent unreasonable delay in processing cases.

Those are the highlights of the brief. I believe that many of the matters complained of have been covered by the various amendments that have been made by the minister. Those that have not can be covered in subsequent legislation. Many people are concerned about Canada being a satellite of the United States. I do not know how Canada can get away from the status of being a satellite of the United States as long as we continue the practice of discouraging United States investment for manufacturing purposes and discouraging immigration into this country. I do not know how we can ever become a great nation. During the last two years about 250,000 immigrants came to this country and they brought with them $250 million. This is a statistical fact. I have suggested on occasion that perhaps it might be a good idea for Canada to admit a million immigrants immediately so we could redress our balance of payments because they would bring $1 billion into Canada. I feel that since 1957 the Canadian government—I include the present government and the government of the Conservative party—has been over-protective. As a result we have become a nation of resenters. We resent everything in this country. We even resent each other.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Klein: This is true. We seem to want to make progress in this country reluctantly. If there is a difference between 1867 and 1967, I think it would be that in 1867 we feared the United States but we did not resent her. In 1967 the reverse is true; we resent the United States but we do not fear her. Perhaps if the reverse were true we would be a more united country than we are at this time.

Mr. Kindt: You are all wrong.

Mr. Stewart: Those are harsh words.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Let us get back to the bill.

Mr. Klein: I want to come back now to the question of the immigration appeal board and the hearing of appeals on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. I think this places on the special inquiry officers a greater duty than heretofore. In my opinion, unless the special inquiry officers are ready to shoulder their responsibility the immigration appeal board is going to be swamped with appeals. Every single case of every immigrant, so far as the immigrant or the sponsor is concerned, has a humanitarian and compassionate aspect. What is needed in the immigration department is a process of unlearning what has been learned in that department in the past 50 years. The department has to adopt a new attitude. It has to adopt the attitude expressed by the briefs that have been submitted by the different organizations which have come before the committee.

I may say that in view—I may be contradicted by other members of the committee—the country is ahead of the white paper. I believe that the progress made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, as referred to by other members who have preceded me, deserves commendation and the highest praise from all segments of the Canadian people. He has introduced for the first time, in the immgiration appeal board, the concept that a sponsor can sponsor a relative of his by right of the fact he is in Canada. I want to add my personal compliments to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I want to comment briefly on the point that has been discussed this afternoon and I can assure members of the committee I shall stick to the principle of the bill. A comment has been made with reference to an incident that took place in the committee on immigration last Thursday in the city of Montreal. I must admit I was somewhat disappointed and frustrated at having to be away from the house when this important bill to set up an appeal board was under discussion. At the same time I felt that the benefit of attending the committee hearings in Montreal would in the long run be of some useful purpose in gaining a wider understanding of the problems of the very difficult field of immigration.

I must confess too that I thought it might have been a deliberate government stratagem to have the members of the house most directly interested in immigration matters elsewhere at the time such an important item as Bill No. C-220 was before the committee of the whole. Obviously, Mr. Chairman, judging from the comments of the hon. member for Parkdale and the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Cartier, there was no deliberate stratagem. It was just lack of good planning and management that the two activities relating to immigration took place simultaneously.

The new approach to the functions of house committees has been heralded by the government as an improvement in the management of the growing complexities of the business of this house. That could be, but unless there is overall co-ordination to avoid the situation which confronted us last week this approach, rather than assisting and facilitating the business of the house, is going to create a further log jam. As a matter of fact, this debate was held over from last Thursday because of the criticism that had arisen in the committee. We have been proceeding now for an hour or so to debate matters that could have been resolved had there been proper co-ordination. I feel that the present operation of the committee system instead of facilitating the business is confusing and aggravating. There are so many committees sitting that it is quite impossible for members to give attention to their respective committee responsibilities.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I can sympathize with the hon. member for Parkdale in his concern because the brief presented to the committee in Montreal last Friday by the United Council for Human Rights pertained specifically to the legislation before the house. On looking at Hansard to review the debate which took place last week in the absence of the members of the committee I find that the United Council for Human Rights dealt precisely with one of the points which were raised with considerable force and skill by the hon. member for Carleton. That was the matter of the reference of security cases to the appeal board. The suggestion of the United Council for Human Rights was that we might consider security cases under the two heads of criminality and subversion and cases in the first category might be referred to the appeal board. I know that the minister put up a strong argument that in cases of subversion sources of information are dried up if they come before an appeal board and are discussed publicly.

This question was discussed in the committee last week and the United Council for Human Rights was aware of this difficulty. At the same time it saw no need for such hush-hush procedures in cases involving security based on criminality. In view of the debate last week this is all water that has gone under the bridge. Clause by clause consideration of the bill has already taken place. Some excellent amendments put forward by hon. members were acceded to and they do improve the bill. At this state an opportunity is merely being provided on clause 1 to make general statements, and I thought it was incumbent upon me to add my voice to those of others who have protested against the lack of co-ordination and the further confusion of our business which has resulted from the failure of the government to co-ordinate the functions of the committee of the whole and the committees of the house.

Bill No. C-220 to establish an appeal board is an important bill. As I recall, there have been no changes in immigration policy since January, 1963, when very dynamic leadership was given to the immigration department by my colleague the hon. member for Carleton, and I am delighted to see that he has been most active in the course of the committee deliberations.

Perhaps I should add one other comment. We had an interesting presentation on Friday last, by a very fine group representing the West Indies, I believe, and they wound up their presentation with that well known French adage, "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose". That was their summation of the white paper as it stands. I am sure that had they looked at the original form of the bill to establish the appeal board they would have made the same comment. As I say, some worth-while amendments have been made, which is an indication of what can be done when opposition and government work together to achieve beneficial results in the most important field of immigration.

I am not going to press the brief of the Manitoba government because I might be accused of being prejudiced in this regard. I am sure that the minister will read it with a great deal of edification because I think it points to one of the great weaknesses in the white paper, namely, that it is oriented toward our urban, industrial, metropolitan communities. The fact is that in certain parts of Canada, so far as manpower needs on our frontier are concerned, there is still much to be taken care of by a dynamic immigration policy. However, this is another matter which lies in the future. We shall be considering immigration in its broad perspective in due course and we will have many more comments to make at that time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, does the minister intend to make any comment on the statements that have been made today? With friends such as he has on his side of the house I do not think he needs an opposition.

Mr. Marchand: Just a few comments, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I understand that the members of the committee in Montreal felt frustrated when they heard that we were discussing in this chamber the very subject they were dealing with in Montreal. I think the members of the committee will also understand that the committee of the whole might be frustrated if all the standing committees sat at the same time and paralysed the work of the house. So there is a problem of organizing the work of the committees and the house. I hope we shall find a solution. It is frustrating for the committee of the whole to be paralysed by a telephone call or by an item in a newspaper. This problem must be dealt with. I understand how the hon. member feels, but I hope he understands how we all feel in the house.

As to the second point, I do not wish to dwell on the white paper. It is not perfect and I hope it will be amended in parts. The educational requirements seemed to exercise most hon. members. I did not invent the educational requirements. They were in the law before I appeared on the scene. We must remember that the bill concerning the appeal board was read for the first time before the white paper was tabled in the house. I hope we shall find more flexible criteria and that in due course we shall obtain the same kind of co-operation in this area that we have obtained in discussing the appeal board bill. I do not wish it to be thought that I am not interested in hon. members' comments, but at this stage I do not think they are relevant to the bill we are studying.

Another point I wish to refer to affects the department and the government. I think the hon. member for Cartier referred to this matter, which also was dealt with in the newspapers. It has been alleged that mental hospitals and prisons on a certain list are used by the immigration department. I must state emphatically that a person appearing at a port of entry with inadequate documents is not detained in a prison or mental hospital. Any such allegation plainly is not true. It is not a fact. Of course, if the person is mentally ill he might be referred to a hospital. If he has been sentenced in Canada he might be sent to a jail shown on a list, but never for the reason alleged. The immigration department does not send a person to a mental hospital or prison. This impression should be corrected, if there is such an impression. It is not the policy of the department and it has never been in the past under any government. We have enough real problems and we should dispense with all unreal problems. I do not know what motivated this rumour, but let us forget about it.

[Mr. Marchand.]

Those are the only comments I wish to make at this stage. Again I wish to thank hon. members for their co-operation. Though this legislation is not perfect and can be improved, I am sure it is an important forward step in bringing in the kind of immigration policy that we desire to have for Canada.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since the bill has been substantially amended in committee is it the wish of the house that the bill be reprinted before being read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POSTAL SERVICES INTERRUPTION RELIEF ACT

MEASURE TO RELIEVE LOSS OR HARDSHIP RESULTING FROM INTERRUPTION OF SERVICES

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for the Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-55, to provide relief in certain cases against loss or hardship suffered as a result of interruptions of normal postal services.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some federal enactments impose a time requirement or period of limitation within which something must be done. If a person fails to comply with such a time requirement or period of limitation, other than by his own choice, he may suffer loss or hardship. One example of a time requirement or period of limitation of that kind is found in section 28 of the Patent Act, which imposes a time requirement with respect to the filing of an application for a patent for an invention. If the time requirement is not complied with, no patent can issue for the invention and the invention will fall into the public domain.

It is known that a number of persons missed time limits of one kind or another under the Patent Act and the Trade Marks Act as a result of the postal strike in 1965. Although it is likely that all cases of time limits missed under industrial property legislation as a result of that strike have by now come to the government's attention, there is, of course, no way of being certain that that is so or of knowing whether there are cases that have not come to our attention of time limits missed under other federal enactments. Moreover, it is not possible to foresee under what federal enactments time limits may be missed as a result of any future interruption of normal postal services.

The purpose of this bill is, therefore, to provide a way in which relief may be obtained by persons who, because of an interruption of normal postal services, suffer loss or hardship as a result of failing to comply with a time requirement or period of limitation contained in any law of Canada. This bill will apply not only to the interruption of normal postal services caused by the postal strike in 1965, but also to any subsequent local or national interruption of normal postal services however caused. A flood or other local disaster is an example of something that might cause a local interruption of normal postal services.

The bill provides that a person who wishes to obtain relief must apply to a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada. He must also give 14 days notice of the application to the deputy attorney general of Canada and to any other person who he has reason to believe may be affected by any order that may be made pursuant to clause 3 of the bill. In order to ensure as far as possible that the application for relief will come to the attention of all interested third parties, clause 4 provides that the judge may direct the applicant to give public notice of the hearing of the application. By providing in the bill that notice of the application must be given to the deputy attorney general of Canada, it was felt that the interests of the government department or authority administering the law that contains the time requirement or period of limitation will be adequately protected.

The bill provides that the granting of an order will be in the discretion of the judge. However, before he may exercise that discretion he must be satisfied on three points, namely,

(a) that the applicant suffered loss or hardship as a result of the interruption of normal postal services;

(b) that the applicant took such reasonable steps as were open to him to comply with the time requirement or period of limitation; and

(c) that the application was made without undue delay.

Clause 3 also requires the judge to afford to any person who may be affected by any order that he may make an opportunity to be heard or to make representations. Paragraph (d) of clause 3 provides that the judge may make an order waiving the time requirement or period of limitation and fixing a new one. Paragraph (e) of that clause provides, in effect, for the making of such further order as may be necessary to give full effect to an order made under paragraph (d). The provision in clause 3 that an order may be made subject to such conditions, if any, as to the judge seem just is intended to give flexibility that may be necessary in dealing with cases where third parties may be affected by the order.

Perhaps I should mention in closing that at the appropriate stage when the bill is before the committee I shall seek an amendment to the bill proposing the addition of one further clause of a procedural nature. It has been suggested to me, and I am inclined to think that the suggestion is a useful one, that it would be undesirable, where an application has been made to a particular judge, to require that all further proceedings consequent on the application must be taken by or before that judge. The proposed amendment would make it clear that any such further proceedings may be taken by or before any other judge of the court in the same way as though the application had been made initially to the court.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Application for relief to judge.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the minister has made the case as to both the necessity and desirability of this legislation and I have only a few brief comments to make in connection with it.

The first question I would like to ask him is whether the bill applies in cases other than patents, trade marks and copyrights? Has he knowledge of other legislation where this bill might be effective?

The second question I would like to ask him is whether this principle of the bill and the proposed procedure thereunder have been discussed with the Canadian Patent Institute and whether it is satisfied that the bill will meet the situation as it applies to patents and trade marks?

The third matter to which I would refer is the question of the time limit within which an application is to be heard. The bill provides that the judge must be satisfied that the application has been made without undue delay. Those words are not too clear. Does the minister not think it would be wise to put a time limit in the bill within which the application would have to be made subsequent to the resumption of normal service?

Finally, may I ask the minister whether he does not think there may be some possibility of similar difficulties arising in relation to other interruptions, for example, an interruption of telegraph and telephone service, and whether the confining of this bill merely to postal services is in fact a wise limitation?

Mr. Pennell: It is my understanding that the bill will apply to any situation where a person has suffered loss or hardship by failing to comply with a time requirement in a statute. It is my understanding that the only cases that have come to light come under the Patent Act. Under the Bank Act bills of exchange are instruments that are subject to time requirements. I understand the Industrial Design and Union Label Act is another statute which has certain time requirements. Therefore, dealing with that particular aspect of the hon. member's question, the bill applies to provide relief against loss or hardship caused by stoppage of normal postal services where a statute has a time requirement.

Another question arised by the hon. member centred around the words "undue delay". I agree that so far as lawyers are concerned this is a vague term. However, the bill provides for the operation of the discretion of the presiding judge. I am sure the hon. member will agree that if it is a question of fact then each case must be taken on its own merits, and what might be undue delay in one case might not necessarily be undue delay in another. For that reason, as it is a matter of fact rather than of law, we used the words "undue delay" and left it to the judge hearing all the facts in a case to decide whether it was an appropriate case.

Another interesting point raised by the hon. member concerned why the application of the bill was limited to interruption of normal postal services and did not include telegraph and telephone services. From talking with the officials I understand that it is only in case of the interruption of postal services that there is any real difficulty and that it applies almost entirely to applications mailed from other countries. Some of the applications would require written forms, possibly with some designs attached to them that could not be transmitted very well by telegraph or telephone. It was felt that restricting the bill to postal services would not impose any hardship on any individual and that the addition of provisions covering telephone and telegraph services would not add materially to the application of the bill. Just as I was reaching for my pen the hon. member asked another question. Would he mind repeating it?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Has this matter been discussed with the Canadian Patent Institute and is the executive of that distinguished organization in general agreement with the bill?

Mr. Pennell: I am advised that there was no formal discussion with the institute but a number of the leaders in the institute have been consulted as individuals. The hon. member, of course, is aware that this bill has been dealt with in the other place and that there was considerable public notice of the bill and its contents. No opposition having been filed by the institute, we proceeded on the basis that there was no formal objection.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether the bill has any effect on loss or hardship suffered outside the government area, for example, if a person suffers loss or hardship in relation to an insurance contract where there is a time limit involved? Does this legislation apply any relief in such a case?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pennell: As I understand the bill relief can only be granted when there has been loss or hardship suffered by failure to comply with a time limitation set down in a statute of parliament. A private individual, of course, could obtain relief if he, for instance, was filing an application for a patent and because of the interruption of the postal services was not able to file his application in time. That would be a case of a private individual suffering a loss. I hope I have explained the situation satisfactorily.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In any event, this probably would be a case in respect of which the provincial legislatures would have to act.

Mr. Pennell: I think the hon. member for Carleton has put the case correctly.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, is this the point at which the minister has an amendment?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated earlier I seek to make an amendment by adding the following new clause 5:

Where in respect of any application under section 2 any matter or thing is authorized or required by this act to be done or proceeded with by or before a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, the matter or thing may be done or proceeded with by or before any other judge of the court as though the application were an application to the court.

Mr. Greene: I so move.

Mr. Pennell: Perhaps I may be permitted to offer a brief word of explanation. As members of the committee are aware the Exchequer Court judges frequently are required to conduct courts in various provinces across the country. It was felt it might not be advisable to have an application made to a judge while he was sitting in Ottawa because he might be called, for instance, to Vancouver to perform other judicial duties and the applicant, as the bill is now worded, would have to wait until that judge returned to Ottawa before he could take any further steps in respect of the application. The intent of the proposed new clause is to permit a second or subsequent step to be taken before another judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not think there will be any objection to this amendment, although I would have preferred to have the minister amend the bill so that the application would be made initially to the court rather than to a judge. If that were the case this amendment would not be needed. There is some danger in providing for application to a judge as such, because it may be that the judge thereby is persona designata. However, I shall not pursue the argument. There is no objection to the amendment, although a drafting amendment whereby the application would be to the court might have been preferable.

Mr. Pennell: May I answer very briefly? What the hon. member says is quite right. It could have been done in the way he suggests and it might have been more explicit in that form. But as I understand it, by drafting it in the way proposed a little less work was necessary on the part of the draftsman. It will achieve the same end.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to

Title agreed to.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I wish to indicate that the hon. member for Carleton is well informed so far as the importance of this bill is concerned. It now has been drawn to my attention that the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada did suggest that the department make an amendment concerning the points covered by this bill although it did not appear formally as a body to make representations.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): By leave, now.

Mr. Pennell moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FUND FOR RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AMOUNTS AVAILABLE UNDER AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act to increase the limit on the aggregate of the amounts that may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and charged to the Fund for Rural Economic Development under agreements with the provinces from fifty million dollars to three hundred million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, royal assent was given on July 11 to Bill No. C-151 to provide for the establishment of a fund for the economic and social development of special rural development areas. The purpose of today's resolution and bill is to increase the fund from $50 million to $300 million—

[English]

When royal assent was given to establish the fund for rural economic development the legislation provided a special account in the consolidated revenue fund and the appropriate authority to enable the federal government and the provinces to join forces in concerted attacks on the problem of rural poverty. The approach was novel and significant in that it called for the joint development and implementation of comprehensive and coordinated programs for regions of acute rural poverty to raise substantially the standards of living of the residents of these areas as well as the economic and social opportunities open to them.

The fund was to be used to provide financial assistance beyond that normally available under the cost sharing provisions of the rural development agreement established under the ARDA legislation. More fundamentally, however, the legislation was designed to provide a means whereby federal and provincial agencies could work together to birng all available programs to bear jointly on depressed rural areas. The process leading to the signing of a federal-provincial agreement for the comprehensive development of special rural development areas involves several steps.

In the first place, development areas have to be identified. These are areas with readily apparent problems of widespread and severe low income, where the economic and social situation indicated little hope for improvement without special action and where there exists none the less a recognizable development potential. Economic and social studies are then undertaken to detail in depth the problems of the area and the appropriate remedies. These researchers can be carried out with substantial federal assistance under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. Once the investigations are completed, the province and Canada can jointly draft a comprehensive development plan based on the studies and taking into account the attitudes of the local people as expressed through local committees. These integrated plans provide for a broad range of interrelated projects designed to increase income, raise the standards of living in the area and provide a better adjustment of resources and peoples. It should be stressed here that involvement of local people is built in throughout, both at the development and at the implementation stages.

When this legislation was introduced it was mentioned that studies were in progress in various areas of this country preparatory to the development of comprehensive plans. At that time, none of these studies had reached the point where a comprehensive plan had been finally developed. While we had every indication of substantial provincial interest, we could not yet be certain of the extent to which provinces would wish to participate in large scale in integrated programs for specific areas. This uncertainty, as I will make clear later, has now been substantially removed.

At the time the bill was introduced into the house, we noted that studies were in progress in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, the interlake area of Manitoba and the lower St. Lawrence-Gaspé area of Quebec. Since then a new study has been initiated in Newfoundland. On September 20, 1966, Canada entered into two agreements with the province of New Brunswick under the terms of this legislation calling for comprehensive rural development plans for the northeastern and Mactaquac special rural development areas of that province. Northeastern New Brunswick, a region containing approximately 106,000 people, has a labour force of which approximately one-third are seriously underemployed or permanently unemployed. Incomes are just over $500 per capita, much less than half the Canadian average. Investments in social capital have lagged behind, especially in education. Thirty six per cent of the labour force have an education of grade 4 or less compared with 13 per cent for Canada, and only 17 per cent have reached grade 9 or higher compared with 33 per cent for Canada.

The main objective of the plan, as it was developed, is to provide for a major provincial commitment in education to enable the population to take advantage of new opportunities expected to become available in the area. There is provision for profound structural adjustments in the resource sector, to be accomplished by the province standing ready to buy land offered for sale to permit the rural people to benefit from technical and vocational training. There will be development work to assist fisheries; roads will be built to assist school consolidation and there may be some investment in recreation. A resettlement program is foreseen for those who voluntarily agree to move to larger centres to take advantage of new opportunities and social amenities.

The total development program calls for expenditures of $90 million. The federal contribution, including the cost of the manpower program, will exceed $62 million. The contribution from the fund for rural economic development is to exceed $31 million.

In the Mactaquac area, a smaller but similarly well balanced plan calls for a total comitment of almost $21 million, with a contribution of more than $9 million from the fund.

The Mactaquac plan also foresees major retraining, resettlement and rehabilitation programs to go along with resource adjustment and development.

In signing agreements with the province of New Brunswick for two major comprehensive rural development programs, Canada has committed almost $41 million of the $50 million provided by the initial legislation which was passed by this house on May 12, 1966. The legislation provides that when an agreement is signed the funds must be encumbered. At the present time, however, the research phase in the interlake area of the province of Manitoba has been completed and the province and the officials of the Department of Forestry and Rural Development have drafted a proposed comprehensive development plan. This plan is now ready for final review by senior federal and provincial officials and, if accepted, will result in an agreement requiring a substantial commitment from the fund, possibly in excess of $25 million, although the total plan may cost about $65 million to $70 million.

In the initial debate in the house, many members suggested that $50 million was not enough to carry out the program that was outlined as the objective of the legislation. One hon. member commented that almost $2 billion would be required to develop the rural areas of Canada that are subject to chronic poverty conditions. At the time of discussion it was agreed that the initial $50 million would undoubtedly be insufficient to meet demands but that as yet there was some uncertainty as to the reception of this new concept in rural development by the provinces. We now have clear indications of provincial interest. The comprehensive plan for the interlake area may require at least $25 million from the fund.

Preliminary discussions are under way with the province of Quebec based on the report of the Bureau d'Aménagement de l'Est du Quebec and it is hoped that a mutually satisfactory strategy for the lower St. Lawrence-Gaspé area can culminate in an agreement with that province in the near future.

The investigations in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland are to be completed this year and agreements with those provinces might be concluded shortly thereafter. The totals of these programs, plus developments in certain areas of Ontario and the three remaining western provinces, will easily commit the balance of the $300 million.

The process through which plans can be developed has been determined and progress has been rapid. We have good hopes that the provinces will now take advantage of the opportunities open to them to assist those rural regions that require special attention. We are confident that we can join together as partners to eliminate the conditions that have resulted in abject poverty for so many rural Canadians. The fund as it now stands is totally inadequate for that overriding purpose. Its enlargement to the proposed size should enable us to look forward more reasonably to the final elimination of rural poverty in Canada.

I hope that members of the committee will readily adopt this resolution.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house are not surprised at the minister coming once again with a request for additional funds to augment this program. We were dubious when the act was passed in May that $50 million would be adequate, particularly in view of the vast areas of this country devoted to agriculture. No matter how affluent agriculture may be in a province there are always some segments which, because of climatic conditions and geographical locations in relation to markets will suffer more than others to the detriment of the financial return to those engaged in agriculture in those areas.

When this legislation was introduced we in the official opposition took no exception to it and in fact were in accord with the principles outlined in it, but we had some reservations which we expressed at that time. One reservation was: Why was such an act necessary when one considers all the specific aids outlined in ARDA? Second, we asked how this act would be administered in conjunction with the ARDA program. We were particularly concerned about the joint action of the federal and provincial governments under this new legislation. It seemed to us that the provisions of Bill C-151 gave the federal government much more power to intrude into provincial jurisdiction than was necessary or had been granted under the provisions of ARDA.

We are not too adverse to the actions of the federal government in promoting the welfare of agriculture in the various provinces. I think farmers in general are not too particular where the aid comes from provided that the nature and substance of the aid are enough to really achieve something in depressed areas. But according to the explanation given by the minister today we see that the act allows a more concentrated effort in the way of federal aid in smaller, designated regional areas. It allows the more effective use of government funds to correct what is a very major problem in smaller areas to the degree that the financial return to the farmers or indeed the communities in those areas can be raised.

When this act was introduced by the minister he enumerated some of the things it was designed to do. In explaining the reasons for the act the minister stated that it certainly could not be used as disguised social welfare for any particular reason. He said it was not designed to provide work for the unemployed; this was not the major or principal consideration of the act. He said that the provisions of the act could not be used to support a rural economy whose resources could not carry it once the provisions of the act were withdrawn. If we understand the minister correctly, the basis of the act was to assess carefully the entire resources of an area and develop those regions wherein it was felt the resources could provide opportunities for the people to increase their potential and improve their standard of living. I think in the main this is what has been done.

I had intended to ask the minister what progress has been made in the interlake area of Manitoba, the Gaspé peninsula and northern New Brunswick, because these were the areas he designated in particular when introducing the bill. The information he provided in Hansard at that time gave no reason for mistaking the intentions of the measure. There was no reason for misinterpreting what the minister said on that occasion. He stated that these were areas in which something should certainly be done to improve the average income picture.

It seems that this act and the accompanying ARDA program are being used in a way which means that ARDA provides the funds for the exploratory, information gathering services that are so necessary before any comprehensive program can be undertaken. The minister indicated today that there are now other areas in Canada where initial investigations are taking place, and no doubt programs will be carefully worked out for these areas which will then approach the government for more funds.

We are not going to oppose the passage of this resolution calling for an increase in the fund from $50 million to $300 million. It is not a normal procedure after the introduction of a bill in this house to come back within a year and request an increase in the fund of almost 600 per cent. That is the increase requested in the amount of money to be available. However, in view of the information given by the minister today and in view of the fears we expressed on the introduction of the bill, we feel that the increase is justified. Although $300 million is a tremendous amount of money, when we take into account the fact that it will be devoted to improving agriculture across Canada and realize how costly some of these projects must be if they are to improve the economy of a particular region, the fund is not excessive.

In his explanation today the minister placed a great deal of emphasis on the retraining and education being undertaken in these areas by the provinces. The very low educational standards in these regions is no reflection on the people there. The fact that they have these low standards is due to circumstances which have been forced upon them. We see this measure as the first step to bringing these areas out of their economic stagnation. We believe there is real hope in this program because with the facilities available today in the fields of science and applied technology we can do much to help these regions. In view of the fact that the government is taking the initiative at the federal-provincial level to make available these very essential tools to the people of these regions, we believe that at long last they have the opportunity to face the future with a great deal of hope.

We on this side of the house are not going to elaborate on this resolution because the act, as was indicated by the minister, was passed just last June and most of the arguments we put forth at that time still hold good as far as we are concerned. This is a new measure; it has just become active and a good deal of time will elapse before we are able to assess fairly and honestly how effective it has been. The only question that remains in my mind is where actual responsibility under the act ends and responsibility under ARDA comes into play. When we speak of an expenditure of $60 million or $80 million in one province under a single plan we certainly wonder whether a great deal of this work could not have been undertaken under ARDA. However, the minister will have an opportunity during the committee stage on the bill to elaborate on his explanation in this regard. That being so, I am prepared to allow the resolution to pass.

Mr. Herridge: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I must apologize to the minister for not being in the chamber when he read his statement. I was summoned to answer a long distance telephone call. I appreciate the minister handing me his notes when I returned to the chamber and I read then while the previous speaker was giving his opinion of this resolution. We supported the principle of the legislation when it was before the house some time ago and we support the principle of the resolution in increasing the fund to $300 million. I have been very keen on this type of development. I have followed the progress of ARDA with a great deal of interest and I am sure we will all follow the developments that will take place under this legislation.

The minister said that the approach was novel and significant in that it called for the joint development and implementation of comprehensive and co-ordinated programs for regions of acute rural poverty, to raise substantially the standards of living of the residents of these areas as well as the economic and social opportunities open to them. I think this is an excellent objective to which we can all say "amen." However, I believe we should gather facts concerning what is required in various regions in Canada. This will require an inventory of land and local circumstances with particular relation, as I understand the legislation, to local communities rather than to regions as a whole. It will require a survey of the needs that have to be met across the whole country.

I want to stress the fact that in my experience as a stock rancher over a long period of years I have always found that the success of such enterprises depends on the co-operation of the local organizations and local people. It is not a question of someone coming in and laying down a plan for them to accept. As I see it, this type of legislation will be most successful if every effort is made to co-operate with the local community organizations, with the persons who are interested in this type of problem and with those who will be directly affected by this legislation.

I could go back over a long period of years and relate my experiences in this connection. I remember a program being undertaken some 55 years ago strictly on a community basis. Democracy flourishes best in the small communities and that was particularly true in the pioneer era. I well remember the people gathering together to build by their own efforts the necessary domestic irrigation system required in the district. Many different people composed this group, people with titles, men retired from the British army or navy or the Indian army, people from eastern Canada who came to settle in our district some 60 years ago, as well as a few people who had been sent there from Dr. Barnardo's home for waifs and strays. They all made very good citizens when they had an opportunity to settle on decent land which was made productive by the use of the irrigation system.

I remember that on that occasion we were wondering what we were going to do. I mention this incident because in my opinion participation of the local communities is of great importance. We got the more or less better-off English people to donate cash. We collected some $1,500 to purchase pipe for this irrigation system. Those who did not have cash paid for their share by their labour. As a result we developed this irrigation system in co-operation with the officials of the department of agriculture of the provincial government of that time who were very keen on it. They gave us every assistance they could, having more knowledge of the district than many of us. The irrigation system brought a supply of water to the farmers for $1 a month. The price has gone up a bit since then. It was a most successful enterprise. Today that system is valued at some $350,000.

I mention that to indicate the necessity of getting the co-operation of local people in the administration of ARDA or other similar programs. I presume that this legislation provides for the retraining of people and in certain cases their resettlement if required. However, I do stress to the minister, in view of the trend in our society today, that everything possible be done to get as many people as possible who can earn a reasonable living to stay on the land. Higher pay is not everything. After the war many sons of farmers went to work in industry when they came back from overseas. Now I find there is a trend for them to come back to the farms. They have realized that big pay is not everything. Some of them have bought sizeable farms and some have bought smaller farms for fruit growing purposes because they have realized that the compensations of rural life and farming cannot be measured in dollars and cents. Others have shown interest in establishing small secondary industries. There is quite an interest in doing that among my constituents.

I am not suggesting that my constituency is an area of acute rural poverty because we have some large mining, smelting and lumbering industries. However, there is a place for this type of legislation in the light of all the facts. As I mentioned the other day, owing to the clearing which is going on now as a result of the development of the Columbia river project large amounts of excellent timber are being destroyed and burned. Some of the largest birch trees in Canada grow in southeastern British Columbia and they are being destroyed at the present time. I took this matter up with four firms in Ontario to see whether I could not persuade them to start a small furniture factory.

Other people in the small communities in my constituency are interested in the development of recreational resources, while still others are interested in the development of hot springs. I might bring to the attention of the minister the fact that here are six hot springs in my constituency and only one is actually being developed. There is opportunity for the development of small secondary industries. I might also mention the opportunities which exist in the development of industries catering to the increasing number of tourists that are coming each year to the Garden of Eden in Kootenay West. I am not suggesting that this is something that can be done overnight. The first thing is to get the facts and the information and the second thing is to get the co-operation and participation of the local people, whether it be a municipality, a village community, a farmers' organization, a chamber of commerce or other organizations. If co-operation between the federal and provincial governments and the local people is carried out successfully, then I am quite sure that this legislation will be of benefit in raising the standards of the Canadian people in rural areas.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, having heard the two previous speakers, I feel that the minister will have the present motion accepted without difficulty. As a matter of fact, he acknowledged the importance of the studies and developments which must be undertaken with respect to the underdeveloped areas, and recognized that the funds available for such surveys and developments must be consistent with the projects to be implemented.

I agree with the increase provided for in this resolution and I believe that it will help us to achieve tremendous improvements in our rural areas, which are greatly in need of planning and surveys in order to be efficiently developed. I happen to live in one of those areas, namely Abitibi, where considerable sums are required for the development of the immense natural resources of all kinds.

In a speech delivered to the two economic councils of the lower St. Lawrence region on October 23 last, the minister made the following statement:

> The purpose of this program is to help the people living in rural areas adjust to the rapidly changing economic situation, whether it be in agriculture or in other rural industries. The program is also aimed at developing rural resources, with a view to providing increased income and greater employment possibilities for the rural population, through development projects.

I believe this is what the minister meant when he introduced his resolution a few moments ago.

I should like to point out to the minister —he may or may not be already aware of this—that Mr. Michel Sicé, a consulting engineer, recently completed his report on a detailed survey of the Nottoway basin, in the Abitibi area. I have not had the opportunity to read or examine the report myself because it is still in the press, but I have read excerpts which appeared in our Val d'Or and Rouyn newspapers.

These excerpts show that this northwestern Quebec area is extremely rich, that is has been neglected to a considerable extent and that it should have been developed a long time ago.

With regard to agriculture, Mr. Sicé noted that no real study of farming possibilities in this vast area had ever been made since Abitibi was first settled, 50 years ago. In my opinion, it is inconceivable that a whole area should be mapped out for farming settlements, without a survey of farming possibilities having first been undertaken or at least having been carried out during the developmental period.

Therefore, I feel that the directors of the ARDA program should, following experiments in the Gaspé and lower St. Lawrence region, apply the knowledge gained from these studies and experiments and conduct similar surveys in the Abitibi region, so as to bring about the necessary development and improvement as regards agriculture.

With respect to forestry, the Sicé report states that the area can support at least four pulp mills with an annual consumption of 300,000 cords of wood. Therefore, there are great possibilities in the pulp and paper industry. The report also adds that there is enough wood to supply 135 sawmills cutting one million board feet per year.

Supposing that a sawmill with a capacity of only one million board feet a year might not be profitable and supposing that the 135 sawmills were to be reduced by half to increase the capacity of each, there again it is realized there are untapped resources, which, if they were developed, would help considerably in finding jobs for local manpower, particularly seasonal workers.

In the mining area, the same report notes that 1,022 mining companies are operating or holding mining claims. Once again, Mr. Chairman, this means that the vast region of Abitibi is teeming with enormous resources of all kinds, of minerals that might be needed. It is a known fact that the government of the province of Quebec is currently surveying the James Bay area hydroelectric possibilities in view of the future or possibly even the early construction of a dam the potential of which might be greater than that of the Manicouagan or even the celebrated Churchill Falls, in Labrador.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that we have everything required to give jobs to the workers of the area. In fact, a large number of people might even be imported to populate this immense area. Obviously, Mr. Chairman, to bring this vast region within reach of the industrialists, the businessmen, access roads are naturally required to open up the area and to assess its wealth.

Now, I would ask the minister to concern himself with a matter not necessarily connected with ARDA, that is, to proceed with the roads to resources program, which has already proved highly successful. I urge him to pursue that development and to consult with the Quebec minister in charge of this program in order to extend as soon as possible the access roads to those vast areas.

Since I feel the resolution before us deserves our full attention, I therefore endorse it.

[English]

Mr. Olson: The resolution before the committee, Mr. Chairman, standing in the name of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development asks the house to approve the introduction of a bill to increase the fund for rural economic development sixfold from $50 million to $300 million. I suppose members ought to take advantage of this opportunity to review the work that has been undertaken under ARDA and perhaps discuss these projects with the minister to ascertain whether or not they have been useful. Furthermore, we could ascertain whether or not the accomplishments under ARDA have been anything like the accomplishments anticipated when that legislation was brought into being. I am not going to do that because the many projects that have been undertaken in co-operation with the provinces have not yet reached the stage where we can make a useful assessment of them. I should say to the minister, however, that I agree there have been a number of useful programs undertaken even at this date. I would have to say that what has come about has certainly not been in line with the expectations of the people with respect to this program, particularly when one reviews the tremendous amount of publicity given to the program across the country when it was launched several years ago. I do not believe it would be fair to try to attach all the blame for the shortfall to this particular minister. However, as I said, we should probably look at these projects.

One of the criticisms I have of the ARDA program to date is that there have been far too many surveys and studies and an insufficient amount of action. However, bearing in mind that $50 million was available for all ten provinces, perhaps this was a first step and all the money the minister felt he was authorized to expend on behalf of the federal government. I know that the federal government has not been limited by the amount of $50 million because there is one project under way, I understand, that is going to cost an aggregate of $41 million. If one adds this amount to the cost of other projects agreed to by the various provincial and federal ARDA committees, then of course the total far exceeds $50 million.

I know that all this money has not been spent at the moment. Certainly the total would be over $50 million if we had to pay now for all the projects that have been agreed upon to date. Perhaps, therefore, there is some validity in the position that we should in the first instance make surveys and studies to find out what we are going to do. What disturbs me about all these studies and surveys is this. I am not attaching blame to the minister for this; it is probably the fault of the provincial or even local ARDA committees just as much as the fault of the minister. However, it seems to me that if you do not know what to do about a certain matter or how to go about it you make a study of the situation.

The fact remains that there is a problem of rural poverty which in some cases is staring the minister, the provincial ministers and the ARDA committees right in the face. When there is need for immediate action what we do is to launch a study or a survey and it is months and sometimes years before we are able to take effective action.

The only criticism that I make of the minister is that probably he should resist acquiescing in the making of a survey or study of a situation where it is completely obvious there is need for immediate action. I hope we are going to be a little more bold, imaginative and active in setting up programs to deal with immediate problems facing us, rather than relegating them to the subject matter of a study or survey, knowing very well it will be months and in some cases years before we can take action. This is particularly useless in cases where there is immediate need to resolve the problem.

I am not going to say much more, but I do know that in my own constituency at the present time there is need to do something to assist Indians who want to come to that part of Canada to take advantage of the job opportunities that exist there. There is great need for manpower in southern Alberta, and some of the Indians from northern Alberta and Saskatchewan have shown the capability of filling jobs available there. The farmers want them and the Indians want to go there. The farmers also pay good wages.

Mr. Barnett: Are these the sugar beet workers?

Mr. Olson: Some of them are sugar beet workers but they do all the other work which needs to be done in the agricultural sector, as well as filling industrial jobs. I admit that not all these Indians are satisfactory workers at the outset but certainly a very high percentage of them are.

Unfortunately there are social problems involved such as lack of housing and recreation. There is no problem as far as jobs which pay reasonably well are concerned, but because of the lack of housing and recreational facilities, places where these Indians can gather in the evenings when off work, social problems are created which need to be resolved.

I hope that the officials of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and ARDA will get together and provide the capital funds required to build the kind of housing units which will be satisfactory for these seasonal workers. In one town near my constituency this scheme was tried last year and it worked, but the farmers had to undertake to provide these accommodations themselves. The Indian workers all lived in a small community—I think there was only a few families. The farmers had to undertake to provide the housing, to look after the accommodation, to provide some recreational facilities and so on, as well as make sure there was a group of Indians in charge and that there was some kind of social responsibility and discipline in that small community. This was tried and it worked. The farmers and the Indians, I am told, are happy with it.

But this involved only 10 or 12 families. About 3,000 of these people are required every year and there are job opportunities for them from May right through to the end of September. My information is that if these very same people do not take advantage of these job opportunities they are committed to living on welfare all through the year. It seems to me it would be a far more satisfactory situation for the people involved if something along this line was done.

At the present time there is a movement under way on the part of the farmers who have already subscribed several thousand dollars to bring the local community into the whole project. My information is that the farmers were asked to make some contribution to a camp which would provide the kind of housing that was suitable for the Indians, and the response was terrific. We are now waiting for the provincial and federal governments to come along and make their contribution. I understand that the need is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $160,000. The farmers have put up a substantial share of that already but they want some co-operation from the two senior levels of government so they can proceed further with the project. They do not want the accommodation to be substandard or low-grade. These people will be required in this area not only this year but for a long while into the future. As I said, Mr. Chairman, this is a development that could be very useful to these Indian people as well as to the farmers. People who do not have a job will benefit and it also enhances the productive capacity of the irrigated acres of southern Alberta.

I do not know whether a request for funds will come to the minister but I am sure a request will be made to the government, whether through the department of Indian affairs or C.M.H.C. I hope there will not be any resistance to this proposal because I think it would be a very useful service to the Indian people who come to this area from time to time. I have had some complaints from time to time from the local municipalities concerning Indians who are loitering on the streets and visiting beer parlours and various other places in the evening. If there is no other place for them to go, Mr. Chairman, where can one expect to be? That is the problem.

I think these housing unit developments require a recreational area and need to be administered, at least in part, by leaders selected from the Indian communities or the working groups themselves. As I said, this plan worked well last year as a very small pilot project and I hope it will be continued in the future so that both parties involved will be able to reap the benefits that are apparent.

I am not going to go on any longer. I hope the minister will take into account the few criticisms I have made, knowing full well I am not making them of him directly. But there are some shortcomings compared with what could be done and with what I suggest was anticipated under the ARDA program. If agreeing to increase greatly the amount of money made available by the house to the government brings to fruition some of these projects and plans to which reference has been made, and which I am convinced will be beneficial, then we in this party are prepared to support this resolution.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before us is important and deals with one segment of activity by the federal government which is most commendable. I wish to touch on several aspects of the situation and in doing so I should like to go somewhat farther than the hon. member who has just resumed his seat in regard to the native population of our country.

Before making my comments I want to say something about my province, Saskatchewan, which at the present time is undergoing a more rapid change than any other part of Canada. I refer to the transition from a rural to an urban economy, and to the development of the South Saskatchewan River dam, renamed by the present government as the Gardiner dam. It will have an appreciable effect on the industrial capacity of our province and on employment.

May I deal now with the situation in our northern areas where our native Indian people are suffering from various degrees of poverty regardless of the grants made to them individually or collectively by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I wish to reinforce the argument of the New Democratic Party member who spoke of the need to bring the people into the program sought to be undertaken so they may participate personally. The hon. member's remarks apply particularly to the native population of our country. When I think of the various resources in my constituency and in nearby constituencies in Saskatchewan I think of the need to train and retrain people. This applies not only to the young but also to those in the older age groups. Training and retraining will enable such people to take a more active part in the producing capacity of our nation. Many of these people have skills of one kind or another and perhaps through the ARDA program they might develop these skills and produce things, thereby being able to live a better life than they live now. That should be possible without having to disrupt the way of life these people have chosen.

When one considers northern Saskatchewan, the frontier limits of our province, one immediately thinks of the wealth of tourist and recreational facilities and resources of the area. Nevertheless people there today are unemployed and are suffering greatly from poverty. These are the people who ought to be fitted into the development program. They have a place in this kind of development. I hope that the ARDA program in Saskatchewan and across Canada can give all such people their rightful place in our economic and social life. They ought to be brought into the program in such a way that other Canadians will have a renewed appreciation of the part that all can play. If that is done it will be good.

The Gardiner dam and the Saskatchewan potash industry might affect thousands of people who have left farms and are now living in Saskatoon or Regina on limited incomes. I believe there is an opportunity here for the development of secondary industry. I ask the minister not to forget these people and the native people in the northern part of the province when considering the various programs to be brought forward under this government activity.

I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary secretary are not here to share in the discussion. They must be interested in rural redevelopment programs. That they are not here shows one of the weaknesses of the present allocation of duties to various ministers. I do not detract from the present minister when I say that. This is one of the facts of life. Perhaps this subject is small enough for one minister to handle but all the same it would have been nice to see the Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary secretary sharing in the discussion.

I agree entirely that we must take an inventory of what we have before embarking on a program. In a province such as Saskatchewan, where the trend is toward larger operations and where the cost-price squeeze is affecting agriculture, our primary industry, the need for this program will become more evident not only in the immediate future but in subsequent years.

In conclusion I wish to emphasize again to the minister and the government the need to remember our Indian people when considering this program. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has spent much money but when one looks at many reserves across Canada one wonders what has been achieved. Perhaps the ARDA program can restore, to the original people of this country the pride of achievement and tradition that they should be able to have in this nation.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this resolution. The impression I have is that so far the province of British Columbia has not been one of the places where the program now being discussed has developed on a large scale. That may be partially explainable by our geography. Our area is perhaps more interesting to the minister in his capacity as minister of forestry. There is one matter in the category of things to which the hon. member for Medicine Hat referred which I should like to put before the minister. It has to do with what I believe may be a possible joint development under ARDA and the federal Department of Fisheries.

As I understand it, under the ARDA agreements the basic initiative normally has to come to some extent from local or provincial authorities. I believe that along the eastern coastal plain of Vancouver Island small scale ARDA projects could be developed in conjunction or in co-operation with the federal Department of Fisheries in order to reclaim and develop our rather limited acreage of agricultural land. At the same time we might improve salmon spawning channels in smaller streams which in the past have been quite important but which have lost importance through the encroachment of sentiment. I have raised this matter with the Minister of Fisheries and I understand from him that there is nothing in principle to prevent co-operative arrangements between the federal Department of Fisheries and the ARDA administration for the development of projects.

I am rising at this time to make a specific suggestion and to request the minister to have his officials take a specific initiative with the Department of Fisheries in providing a background of factual assessment as to what the possibilities may be. My request concerns particularly the eastern side of Vancouver Island. I suggest that an investigation might include the Cowichan River valley, and moving up north into my own area I would specifically mention the Tsolum and Puntledge River areas. Farther north there is a creek known as Black Creek, and I might say that at one time I had discussions with fishery officials with a view to having steps taken to eliminate some of the loss of young spawning salmon which often takes place there because of flood conditions in the spring. According to the local people good agricultural land could be developed through a proper drainage program, but at the time I was told by the Department of Fisheries that the economic benefit from salmon stream improvement would not warrant the cost it would have to meet to provide stream flow control. However, I believe that a properly combined scheme would rescue a relatively small but quite good agricultural area from its present rather marginal situation and at the same time make a valuable contribution to our salmon fishery resource.

I realize that such a program would have to be the subject of investigation and evaluation. I hope the minister will take steps to have that kind of evaluation provided for him by the Department of Fisheries. If this were done the relevant information and a forecast of economic possibilities related to such a development could be passed on to the provincial authorities. With such encouragement and interest on the part of the federal Department of Fisheries the provincial authorities might then be prepared to take a really active look at the possibilities of such projects within the limit of the ARDA program itself and the agreements made between the federal and provincial authorities.

Mr. Stefanson: Mr. Chairman, I am in full accord with the purpose of the resolution to increase the fund for rural economic development from $50 million to $300 million. As has been pointed out, when the original legislation was passed we on this side of the house felt the fund was not sufficient. I have always believed that this legislation should have been introduced as an amendment to ARDA as both acts deal with the same types of projects, but I do congratulate the minister for introducing this resolution to increase the fund and for his enthusiasm for ARDA itself. The minister from whom he took over was not so enthusiastic about ARDA and it was during that minister's period of responsibility that things seemed to slow down. However, I know the present minister is very interested in ARDA developments.

The minister is quite familiar with the interlake area. He has visited it on at least two occasions. Last year he attended a successful conference of provincial and municipal officials at Teulon. I hope this legislation will be broad enough to cover a wide variety of projects. As the minister has mentioned, the province of Manitoba has submitted a comprehensive program for the interlake area. He and his colleagues are now studying it. I hope it will not be long before they are able to approve it and sign the appropriate covering agreement.

I believe the minister mentioned that the cost of the over-all project would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $65 million or $70 million and that possibly $25 million would be made available from the federal fund. We are very happy about this and we hope that education and retraining will be included in the project. Many development committees have been working in the interlake area and have done a great deal of work. Nearly all of them have mentioned education and retraining as the No. 1 priority. Sometimes the interlake area has been referred to as a depressed region. I have never felt that it is. In my opinion it is an underdeveloped area. It has great potential, and with co-operation between the federal and provincial authorities I believe the area will move forward and provide a higher standard of living for the people living there.

Some hon. members have mentioned the native population. So far as I know representatives of the native population in the interlake area have served on a number of the area's development committees, and I am sure consideration is being given to their problems.

Last year Lake Winnipeg was at an all-time high level, which created many new problems. I am hoping that under the proposed agreement something can be done to solve some of those problems. The area is different from many others. It contains many miles of beaches and we certainly must develop more recreational facilities. There are many opportunities in the area for that type of development and we shall have to provide such facilities for both winter and summer. At present there is a pattern whereby people earning average incomes or above average are acquiring second homes. These used to be known as summer homes but now more and more of their owners are using them in wintertime. Therefore we have to think along the lines of developing recreational facilities for wintertime.

I may have one or two questions to ask at a later stage but at the moment I am pleased that the minister has announced that the agreement with the province of Manitoba covering the interlake area will soon be ready for signing. The only complaint I have received from people serving on the local development committees is that they have been discouraged by the length of time it has already taken to get things going. I know that many extensive surveys have been carried on in the interlake area which no doubt were necessary in order to obtain the required information. I and everybody in the area will be happy when the agreement is signed and the actual projects are undertaken.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, if I may I should like to make a few brief observations with regard to the resolution before us. I accept the invitation to speak from my hon. friends directly across from me. The minister referred to the areas of eastern Canada which will be considered under the legislation. I long have felt, when the government of Canada is willing to spend such amounts of money as will be available under this legislation, that a hydraulic study of the St. Lawrence waterway would be a very valuable project to undertake. As I understand it, some persons who are knowledgeable in the field of hydraulics believe that the change in the flow of the St. Lawrence, which has had an effect on man-made structures along the waterway, has also had a very undesirable effect on the fertility of the maritime provinces. They believe that the character of the area and its ability to produce have been changed in that the climate has changed from what might be referred to as a maritime climate to a continental climate.

I understand that it would not take a tremendous amount of money to solve this and other problems which are not necessarily related to the field of agriculture. Because this matter is so important and because I am sure the minister is interested in that area of Canada I hope that he will take this matter to heart and do something practical about it. I know that in the past there have been very divergent views among the engineers in the various departments of government concerning the St. Lawrence waterway and therefore the good results which this waterway could produce for the maritimes have not been forthcoming. I wished to make this point.

I should also like to say that I think there is a relevancy between what the minister is endeavouring to do and what the Minister of Industry has done in respect of the designated area program for Canada. I believe that diversification of industry to a degree in some of the rural areas would be as advantageous as it is in some of the places the minister has in mind. This would help retain the local population who otherwise would have to go to the urban centres in order to find jobs and earn a livelihood. I should like to impress this point on the minister and ask him to consider having a study made in this regard. I believe that if this matter were considered, having in mind the goals and the money to be spent, this would bring about a valuable result.

In speaking for the people whom I have the privilege to represent I might say I am sure that if this were done in the rural areas of Bruce county, Grey county and some of the other areas close by, the minister would not have to be interested in these areas from an agricultural point of view. The Minister of Industry has been very dogmatic in his position when I have requested that he include some of these fringe areas in the coverage of the designated area provisions. I hope that the minister in the implementation of this legislation will consider the points I have raised.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to tell the minister that I am sorry I was not here when he made his comments, and above all to give him the encouragement which he deserves.

In the measure now before us, the minister certainly took the necessary steps to do the task assigned to him. If I am not mistaken, this bill is partly based upon and constitutes a continuation of ARDA. We also know that the minister spent a lot of time and energy to see that ARDA would give a part of the population, and particularly the unemployed and the most needy, the help they need.

The minister will undoubtedly have an opportunity while doing some interesting work to make a name for himself since he will be spreading a little prosperity in all the regions which need it.

I am sure that the Quebec minister of agriculture understands the problem very well and that, like the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé), he wants very much to help the rural people.

Everyone knows that the rural sector plays a very important role in our country's economy; in fact, I think that no economic progress can be achieved if it is ignored. There are so many sectors in the rural economy, namely agriculture, fisheries and forestry. In my opinion, to overlook those various branches would risk jeopardizing any work undertaken by the minister in those different fields.

I know that the minister is determined to succeed and is sparing no effort to obtain good results. I want to assure him that we, on this side of the house, are keeping an eye on his activities, not for the purpose of criticizing him, but because we look favourably on him and want him to accomplish even more. Knowing the feelings of all members, I am sure that if we co-ordinate our efforts, we shall surely be successful.

I take this opportunity to call his attention to a problem of capital importance, that is the problem of fresh water, of drinking water in the province of Quebec as well as in the other parts of the country. This is one of the great resources we have and we are wasting it without due consideration. I would even suggest that we are consuming our fresh water too freely, and unless measures are taken, sooner or later, we are bound to regret the excessive and inconsiderate use of the fresh water we have.

If my information is right, I believe the province of Quebec controls nearly one fifth of the fresh water supply of the globe. This, of course, means that we are in a favoured position and that we should take care of this resource, so as not to pollute the waters of our lakes and rivers to the detriment of our population.

I know that the minister will wish to pay some attention to that natural resource and, as far as we are concerned, he can be assured of our full co-operation.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to commend the minister for asking the house to provide additional funds to further the implementation of the ARDA program. In the past I have stressed the desirability of using this program to improve agricultural lands on Indian reservations. In southwestern Ontario there are several reservations which contain some of the finest land in that area. These lands could be made very productive to the great benefit of the residents and the economy of the country if modern agricultural techniques were employed. Such techniques cannot be employed without first providing drainage for the lands. If these lands can be drained and proper fertilization effected they would be more productive than any other land in the area. When these additional funds are made available I hope the minister will not lose sight of the requirements in respect of agricultural lands located within these Indian reservations.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, at the resolution stage, I should like to call the attention of the minister responsible for ARDA to the desirability of introducing a measure to increase the amounts available to develop special regions. About this special program, referring to the catalogue of ARDA projects, I note that western Quebec, which includes the constituencies of Pontiac, Gatineau, Hull and Papineau and the provincial county of Labelle, seems to have been overlooked. I do not want to blame the minister responsible for this program, for I know that the initiative must come from the province under the act passed in 1961.

I also note, sir, that under that act the federal government may take certain initiatives in the field of research and studies.

Last year, in 1966, the four ridings located in western Quebec formed an economic council. Very recently, the county of Labelle also established an economic council.

Among other undertakings, under ARDA it contains provision for an inventory of information and data regarding a comprehensive development program for the area; pilot studies in the western part of Quebec, with a view to working out a development program for outdoor recreation; of rational utilization of forest and agricultural resources, along with the setting up of a series of provincial camp sites in the western part of Quebec.

So far, Mr. Chairman, according to the information I have received, only two projects have been implemented in that area since the beginning of the ARDA program, in 1962; one of these is the Rouge valley survey. Here are some of the recommendations contained in this 2,000 page report: an 850-acre community pasture for sheep raising purposes in Marchand district; planting of 25 million trees over a 25,000 acre area, at an approximate cost of $1,300,000; construction of a 38-mile highway between Saint-Sauveur-des-Monts and Saint-Rémi d'Amherst; a tourist centre for Saint-Rémi d'Amherst; a tourist trail in the Laurentians; setting up of a series of camp sites; establishment of a fish hatchery station; construction of a technical and vocational training centre for retraining rural workers.

Mr. Chairman, I need not urge the necessity of taking action on the minister responsible for this program, for he is aware of the needs of western Quebec and Labelle riding. I am sure that these areas will be included in future undertakings.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Sauvé thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-274, to amend the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

• (6:30 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-274, to amend the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act.

On clause 1—Limitation.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, members of the committee will note that this must be one of the shortest bills ever introduced in this house. In fact, the object is to replace one figure, $50 million, by another figure, $300 million. This will increase the fund for rural economic development from $50 million to $300 million. It is expected that the total cash payment from the fund in any one fiscal year will not exceed $40 million. The fund will be increased from $50 million to $300 million, but we cannot commit funds for special rural development agreements unless parliament has already voted the necessary amounts.

When the first bill was introduced in the house last spring, I for one and most of the hon. members of this house mentioned that the amount of $50 million was small and we could expect large calls on the fund from the provinces. This has happened, as expected. One of the reasons the fund was limited to $50 million in the first bill was that at that time we did not have any precise figures about the cost of other programs that were to be developed. Since then as I mentioned at the resolution stage, we have proceeded with negotiations, with many of the provinces and we now know we will have to commit $250 million more in the next two years for rural development programs.

Some hon. members have asked, especially the hon. member for Kent (Ont.), why it is that the ARDA agreement is not sufficient to cover these rural development programs. There are many reasons for this, and I will enumerate a few. The first reason is that ARDA applies everywhere in Canada, that is, to any rural areas, while this fund applies only to certain specific regions where there is a concentration of low income families and where the income is usually half, or less than the average income for families across the nation.

The second reason for having this fund rather than an extension of the normal ARDA program is that under the ARDA program the provinces have an annual allotment. The third reason is that under the ARDA program and its agreements the federal government's contribution is limited to 50 per cent of the cost of any project. Under this fund for rural economic development the federal contribution can go up to 100 per cent of the cost of a project. Under the ARDA program we are committed to 5-year programs or projects. Under the fund for rural economic development we can commit the federal government's contribution for 10 years. Those are some of the reasons why we felt—and I explained this to the house—there was a necessity for this fund.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat said that he thought there was too much research and not enough implementation in respect of this program. The catalogue of the programs of the ARDA administration has been distributed to all hon. members of the house and the public in general. This document deals with projects undertaken in 1962-65 and 1965-66. While the hon. member for Medicine Hat was speaking I glanced at the projects that had been accepted by or were being implemented in the province of British Columbia. I do not want to have an argument with the hon. member, but in the province of British Columbia in the years 1963-65, the first term of the ARDA agreement, 35 projects were accepted for a total shareable cost of $3.7 million. If one looks at the list of projects he is surprised at the very limited number of research projects undertaken in the province. They are mostly concerned with the development of marginal land and the maintenance and improvement of agricultural production. There are projects listed to improve storage capacity for a reservoir, the reconstruction of a dam to increase productivity, to improve soils, and so on and so forth. There are listed very few research projects, at least in that province. If I look at the same document for the year 1965-66 I am amazed to see the extraordinary expansion in British Columbia. Shareable cost programs in British Columbia have increased in one year to $9.4 million, while in the first three years we committed only $3.7 million. So in that province, as in all other provinces, the ARDA program is picking up.

I will undertake to have the ARDA administration prepare for hon. members of the house and the general public an account of all the projects, by categories that is, soil, water conservation, research, rural development and so on so that hon. members will be able to judge for themselves exactly what has been done under this program. As hon. members know, the ARDA catalogue gives the description of each of the projects, but it does not classify them under various headings for the provinces. I think such a classification would be very useful. In this respect a good suggestion was made earlier. It would be useful because many people in this country are under the impression, and some people outside the house have made speeches to this effect, that ARDA is too much of a research program, and I think such a list would tend to prove that we have committed and spent very large sums of money on concrete projects, and not only on research. I do not think we have so far committed more than 10 per cent of our total funds on research; 90 per cent has been committed and the amount spent on various projects.

Some hon. members have talked about the native people and their involvement in this program. When we adopted the amendment to ARDA last spring I mentioned that for the first time under the new agreement, which will cover the period April 1, 1965, to March 31, 1970, the provinces, under article 11, may apply ARDA programs to Indian lands and Indian people. This was an innovation. I am pleased to report that some provinces have already embarked upon projects under which the native people are benefiting from the ARDA program.

We would be pleased if we could secure the appointment of a metis or an Indian to direct the program in the interlake region. I share some of the views of the hon. member for Selkirk regarding the involvement of the metis people. We will start recruiting people for the program in the interlake region as soon as we have signed the agreement with the province of Manitoba. As hon. members know, a federal director and a provincial director will be appointed, and if, with the help of the Civil Service Commission, we can secure the services of a metis or an Indian, we would be well satisfied because I understand that about one third of the population in the interlake region is of metis or Indian origin. We want the local people to be involved in the program. This has been so in all the regions where we are now implementing rural development programs. The program is complex but we have been satisfied with the results so far.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Clermont) just remarked that the approval of projects rests upon the provinces. Therefore in the case of the valley of the Rouge river and of other areas, in Quebec as well as in other provinces, we must await provincial proposals.

There is a tendency to believe that the province is not willing to approve or to carry out such or such program. It is not only a matter of willingness; it is a financial matter. It happens very often that the province—I do not refer specifically to the province of Quebec because that applies to all Canadian provinces—having allocated or decided to allocate a certain amount for the ARDA program, is forced, because of the great number of projects submitted, to put off the execution of certain projects it wished to submit to federal authorities. I know that in the valley of the Rouge river, for instance, the minister of tourism is extremely concerned with the development of tourism in that area of the province of Quebec.

On the whole, Mr. Chairman, I think that hon. members agree on the necessity to increase this fund from $50 to $300 million. I also think that the work we have done is going forward at an increasing speed. This work is worthwhile, and while we cannot presume to settle all problems in rural areas covered by the fund for rural economic development, it seems obvious that, within the next five or ten years, when these projects have been implemented as they were designed, the people living in these rural areas will be better off. In fact, there is every reason to believe that through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments, we will have brought a valuable contribution to this war on poverty about which we have been talking for so long.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think all of us on this side of the house share the minister's enthusiasm for the bill before us. I will not dwell too much on its purposes, but I think it should be pointed out that the minister has accomplished a feat which is somewhat rare in parliamentary history. The accomplishment lies in the fact that on June 21 the house passed the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act, and in the same session we are presented with amendments to that act. There are probably reasons for this, one of which may be that it looks now as if this session will never end, and undoubtedly the second reason is the fact that the provincial governments, with whom cost sharing arrangements and agreements have to be worked out, have had the advantage of completing one, perhaps two, sessions of their legislatures since the act was originally introduced.

May I also say by way of some criticism that it would appear that somebody had not quite done the necessary homework because the original sum of $50 million has now been succeeded by one of $300 million. At one time it used to be great fun for Conservative and other non Liberal campaigners to quote or misquote the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe's remark "What's a million?"

However, here the minister has, in a very quiet way and in a very small house—one more member was present in the national defence committee than here, in this much larger chamber—succeeded in outdoing the late Mr. Howe's pronouncement of the day.

I think perhaps it could be pointed out that at one time parliamentary practice did not allow us to amend a bill that had been passed in the same session, the amendment had to wait for another session. However, this short-sighted government may thank heaven that the Interpretation Act permits the procedure we are following this evening. I would like to compliment the minister on the positive purposes of the act. Although I do not want to throw any cold water in his direction I think he will be very pleased to know that he is one of the very few people in this chamber who is making parliamentary history by following the procedure which we have now adopted.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the remarks of the previous speaker. All I want to say in that connection is that, according to our experience since the bill was passed in the first instance, the minister was quite right in raising by $250 million the amount that can be provided for this program. I want to thank the minister for his explanation of the program, to date, and on the procedure in its development.

I think the hon. member for Medicine Hat showed himself to be less well informed than he usually is on these questions when he complained about the amount of research, because I think it is well in balance with the purpose of the program. However, I would like the minister to explain to the house what procedures will be used in the development of this program. Could he tell us for instance what approach will be taken with regard to the provincial governments, to the communities and to the farmers organizations? I mention this because I have one criticism to make of the minister's department, so far as the district which I have the honour to represent is concerned. I am referring to the taking of land inventory under ARDA. The gentlemen who did this work stole in silently during the night, as it were, and proceeded to do their work under cover, so that information was difficult to obtain even from the local newspapers. People were even writing to me and asking me what these people were doing in the district.

I suggest that the program is of such great value that every effort should be made to inform local people of what is being undertaken, whether it is a land inventory or some research in connection with the development of a certain project under this act. The only failure I can mention in connection with these programs, to date, is the failure of the officials of the department to take advantage of the publicity in connection with the work they undertake in any particular area or region. I believe that the local people usually co-operate once they understand what is being undertaken. I found in the instance that I mentioned that people were mystified as to what was going on. I actually asked the minister on one occasion, on the strength of a number of inquiries from various persons and organizations, what a land inventory meant and under what branch of the government it was being undertaken.

This is the only criticism I have to make with respect to the administration of the ARDA program. I want to make one other suggestion. It might be a good idea when the minister's officials visit the district to address the chamber of commerce, not on government policy but on the administration of this act, or to address farmers' organizations or women's organizations—which I am sure they would be very pleased to do if they saw the women in my constituency. This would result in getting as much information as possible about the application of this act to the people it is intended to serve.

Mr. Winkler: I should like to ask the minister if he would make some reference to the brief contribution I made about the effects of the climatic changes, particularly in the Gaspé area, as a result of the hydraulic changes in the St. Lawrence. Has there been any thinking in his department in this regard?

Mr. Sauvé: I have taken note of the remarks made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, but I could not decide if this subject came under the authority of the ARDA administration or the authority of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources under the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act. For this reason, I did not refer specifically to his remarks, as I desire to consult with officials and then perhaps write to the hon. member to give him the information.

Mr. Winkler: That is fine.

Mr. Sauvé: In so far as the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West are concerned, I must say that so far the ARDA administration has been very discreet about publicizing its activities or the results of its work. We intend, in the coming fiscal year, to embark on a program of information to all the people of Canada, telling them what we are doing, either under the Canada land inventory, the ARDA administration or the fund for rural economic development. As you know, there is in existence the Canadian Council for Rural Development in which all the major organizations are represented and through which continuous contact is established with these organizations. This council is about to present its annual report to parliament and make its comments on the ARDA administration.

Mr. Enns: The minister referred to the fact that there was some delay in coming to an agreement with the provinces because there had been no regional directors appointed. Was I correct in that understanding?

Mr. Sauvé: No, I did not say that at all. Where an agreement is signed between the province and the federal government for a special rural development region, as in the interlake region, we would appoint a federal director for administrative purposes and the provinces would do the same for their share of the program.

Mr. Enns: This, I take it, is not what is holding up the signing of the agreement in the interlake area?

Mr. Sauvé: No, there are many problems in the interlake region. The federal and provincial authorities have been negotiating an agreement, which is being reviewed now by a committee of officials at the federal-provincial level. I hope that in the next four to six weeks we would be ready to proceed with the final document at both levels, the provincial and federal cabinets. This agreement has to be authorized by both cabinets, and then we can proceed with the official signatures to the agreement.

Mr. Enns: It is a source of some chagrin to me that it has taken so long to arrive at this point in Manitoba. Even the promise of reaching an agreement will be delayed for six weeks. This seems a long delay when you think of the agreement that was signed in New Brunswick and other areas of the country. I am wondering if Manitoba is being left behind.

Mr. Sauvé: No; one must remember it took many months to prepare the northeast New Brunswick agreement. There has been no undue delay in the case of the interlake region, but the procedure used to establish the plan was different. In northeast New Brunswick, we had a task force which proceeded in a different manner than that followed in the interlake region, where there was a provincial government working group studying the many problems. The report of this group was presented to us, and after that, you will recall, that parliament voted the funds for rural economic development. Then we entered into negotiations with the province. We have to be very specific in what we want to have, how it is going to be paid for and who will be responsible. I have seen the final draft of the agreement, and my understanding is that we should be able to proceed as I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Stefanson: I have a brief question for the minister, but first I want to express my appreciation of the attitude he has adopted toward the interlake region. He did say the department would be prepared to consider hiring people from this area. Reference was made to the fact that the total cost of the agreement signed with New Brunswick would be $90 million, of which $31 million was coming from the fund but the federal contribution would be $52 million. Is the difference between the amount contributed by the federal government and the amount contributed toward the project coming from ARDA funds?

Mr. Sauvé: It is partly coming from ARDA funds and partly coming from funds for specific programs in each department. The member will notice that the brochure called, "Northeast New Brunswick", which was distributed to all members, a breakdown is given of these contributions on pages 38 and 39. There will be $2.3 million coming from ARDA funds; $24 million from the fund for rural economic development; $25 million from the Department of Manpower and Immigration; $3 million from Central Mortgage and Housing and $34 million from the province itself.

Mr. Stefanson: The minister said that the interlake agreement would probably involve a total of $65 million to $70 million, of which approximately $25 million would be coming from the fund. Will there be some other federal money flowing to that project?

Mr. Sauvé: Yes; some will come from the ARDA fund and some will come from the specific departments of the federal government that have responsibilities in that region.

Mr. Danforth: I have a brief question I should like to pose to the minister. He referred to discussions between various members of the provincial and federal governments concerning the sharing of costs and he also indicated that the federal government could undertake a project on its own initiative. Could the minister indicate roughly just what yardstick is used when federal participation is considered, whether it be 20 per cent or 60 per cent?

The Chairman: Order, please. Before the minister replies to that question perhaps I might be permitted to outline the business on the adjournment motion: First, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai); trade—failure to mention lakehead cities in advertising brochure; the hon. member for Lac Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard); Canadian National—reporting cancellation of express services in Saguenay; the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Bower); transport—second ferry between Nova Scotia and New England.

It being seven o'clock, pursuant to an order of the house made February 20, I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at eight o'clock.

Mr. Winkler: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. It may be possible to dispose of this in a few minutes.

An hon. Member: Order.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at seven o'clock the minister was about to answer a question.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, before we adjourned for dinner the hon. member for Kent (Ont.), asked me whether I could indicate roughly just what yardstick is used when considering federal participation in the fund for rural economic development. Much depends on the nature of the project in a specific region and on the importance being attached by both authorities as to the urgency of the implementation of a specific project. There is really no precise yardstick; it is a question of the importance of a project in the total rural development plan and the easiest way of financing it, either provincially or federally. It varies from one region to another.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, before asking my question, I should like to express the great satisfaction felt by the hon. member for Bonaventure, and the inhabitants of the pilot area generally, concerning this resolution which will increase the funds for rural development.

I know the hon. minister is closely associated with the economic studies undertaken in the pilot area of the lower St. Lawrence, the Gaspé peninsula and the Magdalen Islands under the ARDA program by the Eastern Quebec Development Board, known as the E.Q.D.B.

The hon. minister is also most anxious to see implemented the project handed over to the provincial government last summer, on July 17, during a ceremony attended by the federal minister. Above all, the minister wishes to reassure the population which has high hopes with regard to this program.

Can he tell us what proportion, as a result of this discussion with the provincial minister concerned, of the $250 million will be spent on implementing this E.Q.D.B. project? As the hon. minister knows, implementation of the whole project could cost much more than those $250 million.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, it is too early to foresee exactly what amounts will be allotted by the fund for rural economic development to make the area development program for the lower St. Lawrence, Gaspesia and the Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

But it may be presumed, in view of our negotiations with other provinces, that the over-all federal contribution will represent between 60 and 70 per cent of the total cost of similar programs. What portion of the federal funds will come from the fund for rural economic development it is absolutely impossible to say precisely.

What we do know, however, is that the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau program comprises a development plan which was handed over to the provincial and federal governments last summer. Implementing the initial phase of this development program represented outlays of roughly $250 to $300 million for both the provincial and the federal governments. If those figures are accurate, and all depends on current negotiations between the two governments, we could expect the federal government to contribute from 60 to 70 per cent of the total amount of $250 to $300 million. But as several of the projects referred to such as transportation and public works projects, will be implemented under the direct responsibility of federal departments, and as certain other projects will be financed under a regular ARDA program, that is by a 50 per cent federal contribution and a 50 per cent provincial contribution, there will be left to determine what portion must be financed through the fund for rural economic development we are now referring to. It is really too soon to give precise information about that contribution.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, shortly before the adjournment, while talking of the Rouge river valley, the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development said that the minister of tourism was interested in it. I imagine this is the Quebec minister of tourism?

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to join my colleague from Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) in thanking the minister for the benefits the ARDA program has brought to the province as a whole. However, I cannot add my thanks as far as western Quebec and my riding of Labelle are concerned, because my remarks are based on the list of projects. Western Quebec and the riding of Labelle have not benefited so far from projects carried out under ARDA. The minister said that this area and the riding of Labelle could undoubtedly benefit from the ARDA program but that it was a matter of budget as far as some projects are concerned.

However, since the ARDA program has been in operation, I notice that the province of Quebec is the one which has benefited most from it because as of March 31, 1966, under the ARDA program $98 million had been allocated, out of which $28 million went to the province of Quebec, and the contribution of the federal government amounted to a little over $14 million. Like the hon. member for Bonaventure and others, I hope to be able to extend my thanks to the minister when my area has benefited from that program.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, I have just two small questions. In the first place, will the minister kindly ask the government of the province of Quebec to follow through on the Mount Logan development project? I know the federal minister is interested in this project and to my mind, it would be most beneficial not only for that part of the Gaspé but for the entire region.

Now, the amendment before us provides for a maximum of $300 million for the fund for rural economic development. I suppose that this is not the full extent of federal expenditures under ARDA for rural development. It may be the maximum under the present act, but may we hope that when this amount of $300 million is expended parliament may be asked to vote additional sums, if required.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, the bill under study provides for the establishment of a $300 million fund. In addition, for the period between April 1, 1965 and March 31, 1970, that is, a five year period, $125 million are being appropriated by the federal government. Moreover, taking into account the yearly budget of every department, it may be expected that with the $300 million made available to ARDA by parliament, it will be possible to commit, both on the federal and on the provincial level, an amount exceeding $1 billion for rural development in future years.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, the more we talk about ARDA, the more we realize how much the initiator of that act, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) was far-seeing.

Therefore, I should like to add additional information to that gathered by my good friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard), with whom I rejoice in the benefits which Gaspé and his section of the country will derive from this act. I should also like to ask the minister to tell us which projects are now under way in the province of Quebec under ARDA, aside from those already mentioned by the hon. member for Bonaventure?

Mr. Sauvé: Many projects have been undertaken in the province of Quebec, as may be seen from the list of works for the years 1962, 1965 and 1966. During the first period, 1962-65, there were 179 projects in the province of Quebec, to which the federal and provincial governments subscribed a total of $23.4 million. For the period from April 1, 1965 to March 31, 1966, there were 61 projects, to which the two governments subscribed a total of $5 million. To enumerate all the items on the list would take too much time, and I believe that all the hon. members have received a catalogue of the works executed under the ARDA program; this catalogue gives a very detailed idea of what is being done not only in the province of Quebec but also in the other provinces. The document supplies the number, the title, the description, the place and the operation of the project, that is the location of the project under way, the total cost and the federal government's share. I shall be pleased to send the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) a copy of this document, which is a public document, and he may see for himself that we have projects of all sorts in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I do thank the minister and I wish to ask him a supplementary question.

Has he noticed, in routine dealings with his colleagues from the other provinces, a greater desire for co-operation? For instance, does the minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec show as much will to cooperate as do the other hon. members, the ministers of other governments? Is there room for improvement, are conditions better or worse than before?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, I presume our hon. friend the member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) wants me to speak of our old friend from Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) in flattering terms. The ministers of all provincial governments have always cooperated fully. As far as ARDA is concerned, contacts are numerous between officials and between ministers. Meetings and conferences are often held, attended by representatives of all Canadian provinces, and I must say that a very healthy atmosphere has been created, in short, relations with the former government of the province of Quebec were just as cordial as they are with the present government.

[English]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the minister will recall that earlier I raised some questions about the eastern part of Vancouver island involving the minister's department with the federal Department of Fisheries. Since then the Minister of Fisheries has come in. The Minister of Forestry and Rural Development may recall my suggestion that we ask for the co-operation of the Department of Fisheries in certain investigatory work. What I had in mind may not come within the scope of this program. Since the Minister of Fisheries is here it might be a good idea for the two ministers to get together in committee, in answering my question.

Mr. Sauvé: I did not reply directly to the hon. member's suggestion because it was not clear to me if the initiative should be taken by the provincial authorities or by the Department of Fisheries. If the Department of Fisheries took the initiative it could finance the entire cost of the program from its own budget. One thing is certain, that for any province to benefit from the rural development program, it must be a comprehensive program. A comprehensive rural development program has to be treated as such. There is no proposal from the province of British Columbia at this moment such as that to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps I did not make my point clear. I was referring to the salmon fishery and I felt that it would be in keeping with our constitutional understanding if the Department of Fisheries could make the type of investigation I referred to, and perhaps provide background information which, if made available, might stimulate an interest by provincial authorities. They might take the appropriate initiative to seek an agreement with the minister. The point is that the Department of Fisheries might deem it advantageous to participate also in such investigation. This is the point I was making. There has not been much provincial initiative in this area under the ARDA program, or the rural economic development program. I felt that if the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development would make this sort of request to the federal Minister of Fisheries and his department, this might act as a catalyst in producing desirable results in that region.

Mr. Kindt: I wish to inform the minister that there are many projects in Alberta, especially in southern Alberta, where we have looked for great things from this particular ARDA program, but up until now there has been very little if any development. It is an area waiting for development. I have in mind the big dam west of Lethbridge on the headwaters of the Oldman River. It has been planned for a number of years by P.F.R.A. but as yet no funds have been appropriated or set aside to go ahead with the development.

Further north from that, on the Highwood River, the Little Bow, and other rivers and tributaries, plans have been made by P.F.R.A. for water development projects. In that part of the country—and I really should not have to tell the minister this because I believe he knows it—water development is one of the main things leading to prosperity, good crops and industrial development. Further east, on the Red Deer River at Emerson, Alberta, another project has been mentioned many times and I am wondering how one could discover who is responsible for the delay in implementing it. Something should be done. The people of Emerson have been asking for this project for years. They would like it to be considered by both the provincial and federal governments so that progress could be made in carrying the project through. I just mention these few things, Mr. Chairman, but there are many others I could mention. In short, we will be glad to see more development under this ARDA program in southern Alberta.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I understand the minister is quite anxious to have this legislation put through all stages just as quickly as possible. Looking at the subject matter of the bill one can readily admit that it is quite simple and should go through relatively quickly. I would like to congratulate the minister on his successful persuasiveness with his colleagues, in being able to increase by $250 million the amount of money for the purpose of this special fund for rural econoic development.

The problem this fund was designed to cope with is a massive one and requires massive amounts of money. I believe this was the central point of my remarks last year when the original bill was before us. Further, I believe that there is an inverse relationship between the amount of moneys necessary under this program and ARDA, and the kind of agricultural policies which we have in Canada. I say there is an inverse relationship, because the more limited the success of our agricultural policies, at the federal level in particular, in dealing with the specific problems of low farm income and prices, the more money we shall have to keep pouring in to this fund for rural economic development, and the more we shall have to put into ARDA. I am not trying to say that the relationship is completely inverse, but it is to a degree.

It can be argued with validity that even if we did have agricultural policies that were successful in coping with the problem of low farm prices and income, there would still be the problem of rural non-farm poverty, and funds for rural economic development and for ARDA would still be necessary. I certainly agree, but I do not apologize for repeating the assertion that with each passing year of this decade there is an ever-worsening differential between farm prices and costs, causing in turn a steady deterioration of the farm income picture and position. As this proceeds the minister will have to come back again to this house and introduce more legislation to increase still further the fund for rural economic development.

I would like to think that within the next two or three years we shall be more successful in devising agricultural policies that will help improve the farm income position. Such a step would take the immediate stress off the fund for rural economic development and ARDA, thus allowing those programs to fulfil their true purpose, to deal with rural non-farm poverty and with small farm adjustment problems.

The way things are going now there is even an income problem with those farm operations that approach the statistical average, and this is certainly cause for alarm and distress. Although one should seek to avoid appearing to be a doom seer I must say that, after spending three days at a farm conference in the prairies recently, it is clear to me that the present trends are really cause for distress. I do not say this in a tone critical of the Minister of Forestry. I believe he is to be commended and congratulated for, as I said, being so persuasive with his colleagues and getting this fund increased by the order of about 600 per cent. The problems require dramatic and immediate action and when the minister brings in a bill like this I believe he means business. Let us hope his good intentions and the increase in the fund can be translated into effective action at the point where the problem exists, in our rural areas.

I know the minister has to look at this legislation from the perspective of the federal government, but in order to assist him gain an insight into particular application of the legislation I would like to refer him to the interlake area of Manitoba and the manner in which ARDA and the F.R.E.D. legislation is working there. No doubt the hon. member for Selkirk made some extensive comments in this regard. I am sorry I was not in the house to hear him. In any event, I feel that in many ways this program does provide some hope for the people of that area. Some specific things can and are being done. The educational programming facilities of that particular area are or soon will be in the process, hopefully, of being upgraded. Technical and vocational training facilities will be more readily available in a more conveniently accessible manner.

Fund for Rural Economic Development Act

If the minister has not been asked this already, I should like to ask him whether there is any substance to the press stories that one reads in the Winnipeg papers. These stories appeared a few months ago and were to the effect that there seemed to be disagreement arising between the provincial and federal authorities relative to the constitutionality of the technical education content of the ARDA program as carried out by the province of Manitoba under the provisions of the federal-provincial agreement. I must admit that I have not seen anything more about this in the press, but usually where there is smoke there is fire and there must have been some basis for those stories.

It would be disturbing to me if the federal government were attempting to discourage or inhibit the province of Manitoba, as one of the patrons of the interlake area program, putting emphasis on upgrading the educational program and facilities, because it seems to me and to many others that one of the things which can be done in a tangible way for the residents of that area is to give them access to technical and vocational training and assist them in the upgrading process.

In the not too distant future one really can foresee a possibility that the technical and educational opportunities under ARDA and related programs can be correlated with or joined to the concept of the guaranteed minimum annual income so that while society tries to help those in immediate financial straits there is also in turn a responsibility on the people involved to try to get out of their particular difficulty. So, it seems very logical to me to upgrade the educational and training courses available to the people in rural areas, and join this program to the guaranteed minimum annual income concept.

I should like to make brief reference to one other field under this legislation and the allied legislation of ARDA. It is my understanding that the ARDA program inherently and of necessity is based on the regional concept. This may be very necessary for administrative and other purposes, but quite frankly I am not aware of this. If this is necessary, however, I also see in it a dilemma, because in the way in which it is working now we have one area in the province of Manitoba which is specifically designated as a special area eligible for special grants and special programming. Obviously this is on an experimental basis; it is an experiment in dealing with this problem in a social and economic way—that is, it is an effort to deal with the economic problem, but also a social and perhaps even a human problem, involving human beings.

I am not convinced there is any fairness in the special area approach. The only justification for it can be that it is being tried for experimental purposes and is set up on a temporary basis. What is more fair is to have this kind of programming available to areas which qualify, provided they meet certain criteria or conditions. We still have in many parts of the country—certainly in the province of Manitoba with which I am more intimately familiar—areas which would meet the same criteria. Yet one area is deemed to be a special area eligible under ARDA and another is not. This of course, as I say, can be justified only on a temporary basis.

I should like to ask the minister whether it is the intention to move toward implementation on the basis that so long as certain sets of criteria are met these areas become eligible. It is all very well to speak about specially designated areas, but the justice of the matter demands that all areas which meet certain criteria become eligible. I am not suggesting that anyone in Manitoba begrudges the benefits being received by the residents of any specially designated area in Manitoba, or in any other part of Canada, or the fact that they are eligible for certain programs under ARDA and F.R.E.D.

We find, however, that within the special area there are districts which really are not facing any problem of rural poverty and where relatively speaking—and of course this is so important—there is no problem in respect of small marginal farm units. If there are problems, they are few. There is no problem with regard to farm income relative to other areas of the province, and yet that area is eligible for special grants for ordinary municipal and intermunicipal drainage. Through ARDA federal moneys have been used to build big municipal and intermunicipal drainage works in districts which do not meet any of the criteria which were set up for ARDA or F.R.E.D. Yet, 50, 60, 100, 200, 300, or 400, miles away there are farming districts in which the same kind of conditions exist, where virtually no money is available under the auspices of ARDA.

I understand that ARDA moneys can be made available to non-specially designated areas, but the amount is limited; it is very small indeed. Therefore I should like to ask the minister for how long an interval it is intended that the special designated area concept will continue. I realize that it is necessary in the short run, but I should like to know how long it will be before we recognize the principle that equality of criteria should bring with it equality of eligibility under federal-provincial programming.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member for Springfield came into the house I indicated that we expected to sign the agreements with Manitoba about the interlake region within the next four to six weeks. This would show that the press reports he has mentioned are without foundation. There has been no difficulty so far as provinces are concerned in relation to this fund for rural economic development, and the ARDA agreement, although some distinctions have to be made.

The ARDA agreement applies to all rural areas in Canada, irrespective of social and economic conditions. The fund for rural economic development is limited to areas where there is a concentration of low income families, according to certain criteria. The provinces must decide which projects will be initiated under the ARDA agreement. They must also decide what projects should be initiated with federal government assistance in respect of the designation of special rural development areas under Part VI of the federal-provincial rural development agreement, which was signed early in 1965.

Administratively it seems that most provinces have desired to begin with one project under Part VI. In any event it was left with the provinces to designate, in co-operation with federal authorities, the regions where this special program would apply. In Manitoba it was felt by the provincial authorities that the interlake region was the first region where such a program, partly financed by the fund for rural economic development, should be initiated. There are other regions in that province, as well as in other provinces, which also qualify for financial assistance from this fund, and I am sure applications in this regard will be forthcoming in the future.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a short statement and then ask a question. Recently I saw plans for the redevelopment of a small town in a resort area of the Muskoka district. This town was not developed under a plan. The town council has now seen the error of its ways in that the growth of this community has not developed to facilitate the purposes for which it was proposed; that is, to provide beach and playground areas.

The new plans which have now been prepared are very substantial and are being submitted to a provincial department for transmission to the minister. This is a new development under ARDA so far as I am concerned, and I am wondering whether or not the minister has received other applications of this kind for the redevelopment of small communities in order that better use can be made of the occupied areas. Perhaps the minister can give us some indication as to whether or not redevelopment plans of this type are being submitted.

Mr. Moore: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see this additional money made available. I am sure the minister will agree that in some areas of Canada there is a great need for the development of community pastures. The cost of land is very high and it is very difficult for individual farmers to increase their land holdings. These areas are not necessarily low income areas. Very often there is not sufficient land available for grazing. Some community pastures have been developed under the P.F.R.A., but there is not enough land available to alleviate the situation. Can this program be used in this way for the benefit of these small farmers?

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two remarks at this time, but I will yield the floor to the minister if he wishes to make some comment about community pastures.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, the two preceding speakers asked specific questions. In answer to the first let me say I do not have with me the list of projects initiated under this part of the agreement, but I recall a development at Mont Ste-Anne in the city of Beaupré which is very similar to the one mentioned. Provincial authorities must make the decision to accept this kind of project, and once one has been accepted plans must be forwarded to the ARDA development administration.

Large numbers of community pastures have been financed under the ARDA agreement. In this regard the provincial governments must make the decision as to the type of program they wish to initiate with federal support. The federal government does not initiate or indicate projects in respect of which provinces should spend ARDA money. The decision rests solely with each province.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the difficulties being experienced by many small producers of beef who are attempting to increase the size of their herds. The operation of community pastures is becoming more important to these small producers in western Canada. While the government of the province of Alberta frowns upon the federal government purchasing land, there is nothing to prevent the provincial and federal governments co-operating in the development of community pastures. I hope the minister in his wisdom will encourage this type of development.

Grazing land is essential to beef producers in western Canada and grass is needed to raise cattle. Many thousands of acres of land in semi-airid regions are used for cattle grazing, but it requires 60 acres of this land per animal. I think this ARDA program could be used to advantage for the development of this type of land. The cattle grazing in this area tend to eat off the preferred grass and leave the less palatable. As a result, over a period of time, the land becomes almost entirely covered with vegetation of a type not readily eaten by the cattle.

When this transition has taken place in the past the composition, palatability and nature of the vegetative cover has changed. We find that the vegetative cover today has a deficiency of phosphorous and the livestock are in many cases in need of grasses that will provide them with phosphorous. It is not uncommon to see a cow with a large bone in its mouth, chewing away in order to obtain phosphorous. Stockmen have to put out phosphorous in boxes on their ranges in certain areas in order to provide the phosphorous which animals need to achieve proper growth.

In the United States experiments are being carried out with different grasses that can be grown on semi-arid lands and will step up the carrying capacity of these lands. I refer to such grasses as sainfoin, the rambler alfalfa in certain places, pubescent wheat grasses in others, tall wheat grasses, Russian rye grasses, and many others.

If the ARDA program is to be of benefit in this regard, I think the minister ought to encourage the setting up in these semi-arid regions, in co-operation with the provincial and federal research stations to try to grow grass which will be palatable to our cattle and increase the carrying capacity of those areas. Once the best method to do this has been established you will find that stockmen will welcome the information provided, and will appreciate what the government is doing and will give 100 per cent co-operation. They are asking for this kind of information. They want it. They feel that when all this money is being spent on ARDA projects they have a right to ask that research projects of this kind be conducted under the program in order to improve the vegetative cover of their ranges and increase the palatability of the grass on their lands. In other words, they want a type of vegetative cover that will put more beef on their cattle. These lands are quite capable of a greater degree of carrying capacity. This is being shown down in Wyoming where sainfoin and certain other grasses are being grown, which has tripled the vegetative cover of semi-arid range lands. The benefit to the stockmen grazing cattle on their range land would be tremendous. Such a program would cause some expense to the stockmen, but they are willing to accept this expense if the range will produce more grass for their beef cattle.

I do not care whether or not this measure is passed; I want to get my story across to the minister. We have a minister who lives in a little island some place down east, and these western people never see him. I want the minister to come out there, get in the car with me and I shall take him over the area about which I am speaking. I am sure I can bring home to him very forcefully and clearly, and without any malice aforethought, what the problem is and in what way a project could be started, with the co-operation of the provincial government, that would be to the benefit of Canada as a whole and in particular to the people who live in these areas.

This government says it is always looking for useful things to do. Perhaps the minister is familiar with this problem because of his wide experience. All I am saying is that if he does not know about it, I stand ready to assist him. If he will give me a ring ahead of time, I shall meet him and take him in the car into these areas; then we can look at this problem and consider many other problems while we are there.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I gather from the remarks the minister made in answering one or two of my questions that the fund for rural economic development, unlike ARDA, was to be related to designated or special areas or regions exclusively. If this is the case, I should like to ask the minister whether the regions to benefit from the fund for rural economic development will be established on the basis of specific criteria. I realize that the minute one begins to draw up a set of specific criteria he injects a certain amount of rigidity into a program, at the expense of flexibility. On the other hand, I think that to be consistent, to be responsible, we must have a certain, basic set of criteria which any area must meet before it can become eligible under the provisions of this legislation, somewhat along the same lines as ARDA in the industrial development field.

I would ask the minister whether this set of criteria has already been elaborately set up, and if so, is it available to be taken advantage of? I have followed this debate quite closely, and quite frankly I have not heard of any articulated set of conditions, standards or criteria in respect of the purposes of this legislation.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, in 1964 the ARDA administration published a series of definitions with respect to poverty in Canada and the criteria to be applied to the farm. We have divided farms into those which earn $2,500 or less a year and have an income from the sale of produce, and a non-farm family which has an income of less than $3,000 per year. This has been the sole criteria for both farm and non-farm families. Everywhere in Canada where there is a concentration of such low income farms there is a possibility for the federal and provincial governments to agree on the designation of a region. These have been the usual criteria used in Manitoba, where such conditions exist in the interlake region; and they also exist in other parts of Manitoba, especially the northern region.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I was aware of the information which the minister has just given us. But if there is a set of criteria upon which an area is designated, I say to the minister that I believe it will require a tightening up of administration on the part of his department, because whether it be my own province or not I say to him that in some instances the boundaries have been drawn so as to take in areas or parts of areas where the income factor is considerably above that which is required for an area to be eligible for assistance under the provisions of this legislation.

It was done in order to get special projects carried out which really have nothing to do with the kind of legislation we have before us, or with ARDA. We can support the request of a province for a project which has merit, but when a program that does not meet the criteria is being proposed under the aegis of ARDA or F.R.E.D. it should not be allowed by the federal government. If such a program is allowed it will become the butt of jokes and wisecracks, as is the case right now in the Manitoba legislature and in other parts of the province.

I do not say this as a criticism of the federal department, but if there is to be a set of criteria—and I certainly agree there must be—then they should be well administered and upheld.

Mr. Sauvé: I would not like to forgo giving the last speaker some further information. Another necessary criterion is that the region must be economically viable. It is quite possible that part of the interlake region may not qualify as far as a number of families are concerned, but they would have to be attracted to the other areas so as to make economic development possible.

One cannot include one area of so many thousands of square miles, and exclude another, because the economic development of the region is dependent on the entire area. Otherwise its economy would not be viable. We cannot exclude small wealthier sections from a larger area of low income families. The well-being of the whole region depends on the global approach which would tackle all the problems of the region. Evidently there will be some people who are better off who would also derive benefits from that program.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

INCOME TAX

IMPLEMENTATION OF VARIOUS AGREEMENTS RESPECTING DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill S-56, to implement agreements for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax between Canada and Trinidad and Tobago, Canada and Ireland, Canada and Norway and Canada and the United Kingdom, and to implement a supplementary income tax convention between Canada and the United States of America.

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as its title indicates, is to give legislative effect to the recently signed income tax agreements with Trinidad and Tobago, Ireland, Norway, the United Kingdom and the United States. For convenience all these agreements have been incorporated into one bill, as had been done on previous occasions in recent years, and the bill has been divided into parts, each dealing with one agreement.

In substance the bill is similar to the bills implementing income tax agreements or supplementary income tax agreements between Canada and other countries that have been approved by the house since 1942. Canada now has in force 12 comprehensive income tax agreements with the United States of America, New Zealand, France, Sweden, Ireland, Denmark, West Germany, the Union of South Africa, the Netherlands, Australia, Finland and Japan.

The agreement with Trinidad and Tobago is new. The 1946 agreement with the United Kingdom was extended to Trinidad and Tobago when it was a colony and remained in force when it became an independent state; but that agreement was terminated. The new agreement, which reflects changes in the tax structure of Trinidad and Tobago, was negotiated immediately after the Commonwealth-Caribbean-Canada conference of last summer, and the minister was particularly pleased to be able to sign it together with the minister of finance of Trinidad and Tobago a few months later. Since the agreement will come into force as soon as each country has given legislative approval to it, and this has already been done in Trinidad and Tobago, we are hopeful that this agreement will come into force very shortly.

The agreement with Ireland replaces the existing comprehensive agreement with that country. The change of most significance to us is that Canada will have the right to impose a tax of 15 per cent on dividends paid to a parent company in Ireland by its subsidiary controlled company in Canada. Under the existing agreement the tax rate on such dividends is limited to 5 per cent.

The convention with Norway is new. A previous agreement signed in 1960 was not proceeded with because it provided for a maximum 5 per cent rate on dividends from a subsidiary in one country to a parent in the other. The new convention provides for a maximum 15 per cent rate.

The agreement with the United Kingdom assimilates the provisions of the limited agreement that parliament approved last year and also contains provisions similar to those of other comprehensive agreements. The terms of the new agreement generally become effective from the dates when the 1946 Canada-United Kingdom agreement ceased to be effective, so that there is no hiatus between the provisions of the two agreements. The provisions of the new agreement relative to the new British taxes on corporations and capital gains become effective from the inception of these taxes. The agreement will enter into force when parliamentary approval has been given in both countries.

The supplementary convention with the United States of America is designed to overcome a tax avoidance device now being used by certain companies incorporated in Canada but not resident in Canada. The supplementary convention deals only with this change which was requested by the United States. The Canadian government has generally been postponing negotiations with other countries to be held with a view to revising existing tax agreements or entering into new agreements until after there has been an opportunity to examine fully the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Taxation. The other agreements dealt with in the bill now before the house are the culmination of negotiations held as a result of Canadian initiatives taken some years ago.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the principle embodied in these agreements is well known and the legislation follows a familiar pattern. Consequently I think it is not necessary to delay the house for any length of time on second reading of the bill. Agreements of this type have been in existence for a considerable number of years as a means of avoiding double taxation, of preventing fiscal evasion and of endeavouring to promote international trade and commercial relations among the nations. They are highly complex and technical in nature, and I think it is in committee of the whole that the best examination can be given them. Indeed I doubt if there is anyone in the country who really fully understands the complexities of these agreements, except for that very dedicated public servant, Mr. F. R. Irwin, director of taxation, who has had so much to do with their negotiation.

I think the house will welcome, sir, the new agreement between Canada and Trinidad and Tobago, and will hope that this agreement heralds an increase in commercial and fiscal relations between that country and Canada. We believe that increased commercial relations would be greatly to the advantage of both countries.

The agreement with the United Kingdom is perhaps, that of greatest significance among the agreements which are in this bill. We will wish to know in committee just how the agreement which is now proposed integrates with the earlier agreements of June 5, 1946 and December 6, 1965.

The agreement with Norway is a new one which replaces an agreement which is perhaps the longest lived of all, since it has been in existence since May 4, 1929. The agreement with Ireland replaces one which has been in existence since October 28, 1954. The parliamentary secretary, sir, has told us that there are 12 agreements of this type and he has listed the countries with which we have such agreements. Perhaps it is worth while that we should ask how many additional agreements there are under negotiation, and why it is that this country does not have more agreements of this type with the nations of the world.

There are now, of course, well over 125 nations of the world. It seems rather extraordinary, when we are attempting to avoid double taxation and to prevent fiscal evasion, that we should have agreements with as few as 12 countries. As I have indicated, sir, the technicalities and complexities of these agreements are such that I think the proper place to put questions is in committee of the whole. We have no objection to second reading of the bill and welcome the agreements themselves.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) that the proper place to discuss the details of this bill is in committee of the whole. I shall therefore take only a moment or two and, in effect, I shall be presenting the parliamentary secretary with a couple of questions with which I hope he will be ready to deal when we get to the appropriate clauses or schedules. I suppose the parliamentary secretary will not be surprised at my particular interest in the fact that in the new agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom there is a reference to the capital gains tax which is in effect in the United Kingdom. I hope he will be ready with some choice comments about what would happen if, during the life of this agreement, this government saw the wisdom of the Carter commission recommendation that Canada should also have a capital gains tax.

I should appreciate it also if the parliamentary secretary would spell out a little more fully the relationship between the agreement with the United Kingdom that we are now being asked to approve and the one we approved a year or two ago. I have in mind in particular the situation that obtained with respect to the pensioners who draw a pension in one country and live in the other. To be even more precise, I am thinking particularly of the pensioners from the United Kingdom who are living in Canada and who, for a period of time, were being taxed somewhat disadvantageously to them. It was my understanding the agreement we approved a year ago improved the situation, and I should like to be assured the agreement that is now before us does not interfere with the improvement that was made in that respect last year.

Like the hon. member for Carleton, I would be interested in knowing why it is we have these agreements with only 12 countries out of all those around the globe, but that too is a matter with which we can deal when we get into committee. Generally speaking, I am sure the house will approve of the idea of these agreements with other countries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), seconded by—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should bring to the attention of the house that we are dealing with only a procedural motion, a motion that the Speaker leave the chair. Perhaps there is no specific difficulty—

Mr. Chrétien: I wanted to make a few comments before second reading.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make comments because the question has been put and we have had second reading. I do suggest to the house, however, that we are dealing with a procedural motion and perhaps the hon. member for Carleton would second the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am intrigued by the suggestion which you make, Mr. Speaker, but I think attention should be drawn to the fact there is only one minister in the house when government legislation is under consideration. On Friday we had a situation in which there was not a minister in the house who had even read the bill. I regret, therefore, I must decline your invitation to second the motion, and I respectfully suggest to you it is not within the prerogative of someone who is not a minister of the crown to second even a procedural motion on a government bill.

Mr. Robichaud: The Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, who is supposed to be in the house at this time, was called out for a few minutes. It was an emergency, but he is here now to second the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) moves, seconded by the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé) that I do now leave the chair.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 2—Agreement approved.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I wonder if the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance could answer some of the questions which were asked during the debate on second reading?

Mr. Chrétien: The first question asked by both the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre concerned the number of countries with which we have agreements. The explanation is simple. We have some negotiations going on now, but the policy of the government has been to await the expected report of the commission on taxation in view of the fact that many technical changes in our tax laws were expected. This is the reason we have waited up until now, and perhaps we will have to wait a few years or a few months, I do not know, to make new agreements. We have agreements with most countries in which Canadians do business and with countries very closely related to Canada. I do not think any citizens of this country are suffering now as a result of this situation. If an emergency does arise my hon. friend can be sure that the government will take the appropriate steps.

• (9:20 p.m.)

In reply to the question posed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in regard to capital gains, although I cannot express a view on this I do not think this problem will confront us next week. If a problem does arise next week in connection with this matter we will make the necessary provision. The agreement with the United Kingdom of 1965 is still valid and nothing in the new agreement will change that situation. So I do not see any problem there.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary has stated that a number of agreements are under negotiation. Could he indicate how many there are and with which countries negotiations are taking place?

Second, the parliamentary secretary indicated that there has been a holding back on the part of the government in the conduct of negotiations by reason of the deliberations of a royal commission which has now reported. Are we to infer from this that until a decision has been made whether or not to implement the Carter commission report, the government will not engage in negotiations on a more extensive basis except with the particular countries with which negotiations are now under way?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think I can tell the hon. member that we are in the process of conducting negotiations with Jamaica and we are negotiating to renew some agreements, especially with Germany and also with France. We hope the agreements will be concluded soon, judging from the stage of the negotiations at the moment.

With regard to the second question, I think I answered it when I said that we are dealing with the problems which have arisen. If the hon. member finds a situation in which a citizen of this country is suffering, then I would ask him to inform the government. But I can assure the hon. member that there is no such problem. We are in negotiation or have agreements presently in force with all the countries with which we have had some problem.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The parliamentary secretary has indicated that the government is seeking to renew the agreement with West Germany. Does that mean that this agreement has expired?

Mr. Chrétien: No. I said "renewed" but I meant "revised". The hon. member will understand that I should probably use the language of Molière to reply, instead of Shakespearean language, in which case I would not make such mistakes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I was intrigued by the reference made just now by the parliamentary secretary to the Carter report. For the last three or four years the stock answer to almost every question about taxation has been: We have to wait till we have the Carter report. The parliamentary secretary almost admits tonight that the government now stands exposed. It has the Carter report and has not yet found another excuse. However, we will give the government a few weeks to find another excuse for not acting in these matters, and I am sure it will find one.

At the risk of seeming to be more persistent than I ought to be I wonder whether I may ask the parliamentary secretary for an answer to the specific question concerning pensions which I asked him earlier under the heading of the United Kingdom agreement. I think he has given the answer, but I have had a number of contacts from people in this country who have been concerned.

Let me spell it out briefly, Mr. Chairman. When they first came from the United Kingdom to Canada a certain agreement was in effect which established the rate of taxation on their pension originating in the United Kingdom. This provision was changed and I think the fault was on the other side. About a year ago the fault was corrected and the agreement that we passed a year ago restored the status quo. All I should like to be sure of is that the agreement we now have leaves the position with respect to the taxation of people who draw pensions from the United Kingdom, but who are living in Canada, exactly as it was last year.

Mr. Chrétien: I can reply to the hon. member by saying that the text of the provision included in the 1965 agreement has been incorporated in the new agreement, so there is no problem at all.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question, but first of all may I congratulate you upon obtaining your high office of chairman of the committee of the house.

What would be the position—and I am now quoting a case of which I have knowledge—of a pensioner living in Canada who had certain moneys left her in England, from which she draws a dividend sufficient to go to England perhaps every year and spend a couple of months at a posh club in London? This money is never brought to Canada but left in England. The dividends are collected in England and spent for the purpose that I have mentioned. What would be the position under this agreement of a pensioner in this situation?

Mr. Chrétien: The question asked by the hon. member is an interesting one but I cannot assume the office of dealing with the taxation of citizens. The general policy is that all the revenue of a citizen is taxed. It is not a question of pension or no pension; we are all in the same position whether pensioners or not. If a person has income in another country, then he has to abide by the law of the country. If he is not satisfied, then there is provision for appealing the decision. However, I do not want to take the place tonight of the legal officers of the Department of National Revenue.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Short title of Part II.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could briefly indicate the basic differences between the agreement with the government of Ireland, which we are being asked to approve, and the previous agreement with Ireland which was dated October 28, 1954?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I do have a press release about this which was issued on November 23, 1966, so I might read it to the hon. member.

In substance the new agreement will differ from the existing agreement only in the following respects:

(1) Effective upon ratification of the revised agreement Canada will have the right to impose a tax of 15 per cent on dividends paid to a parent company in Ireland by its subsidiary controlled company in Canada. Under the existing agreement the tax rate on such dividends is limited to 5 per cent.

• (9:30 p.m.)

(2) It will be made clear that Canada has the right to impose a special 15 per cent tax on the branch profits of Irish companies operating in Canada. At present Ireland does not impose a tax on branches similar to that of Canada.

(3) Canada undertakes to exempt from its withholding tax on non-residents the dividends paid by a certain kind of holding company known as a "funnel" company because it funnels its earnings, substantially all of which come from outside of Canada, to its parent company in Ireland.

(4) Both countries undertake not to tax an individual who has come from the other country to pursue advanced studies (including research) at a recognized institution of higher learning, or to be employed as a teacher provided that his temporary residence does not extend beyond two years. A similar provision in the existing agreement applies to teachers only.

(5) The new agreement will remove a doubt arising from a court decision that Ireland has the right to continue to tax the investment income of any Canadian insurance company attributable to operations in Ireland.

(6) Canada will bind itself to exempt that proportion of a dividend received by a company resident in Canada from a subsidiary in Ireland that is attributable to profits in respect of which the current tax incentive concessions in Ireland apply, if that subsidiary is owned to the textent of 25 per cent or more by the Canadian company. This does not represent a departure from current Canadian tax law, which, under section 28 of the Income Tax Act, exempts dividends received by a company resident in Canada from a non-resident company that is at least 25 per cent owned by the Canadian company.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I take it that the decision regarding the taxation of Canadian insurance companies to which the parliamentary secretary referred is a decision of the Irish courts.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes. It is not a decision of the Canadian courts. I understand it is a decision of the House of Lords. I must admit I do not know that exactly. It is at the request of this country that the various conditions referred to were put into the new agreement.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member must refer to an ancient case. It surely is not a House of Lords case. I do not think any Irish case has gone to the House of Lords since about 1921.

Mr. Chrétien: This is a new regulation or new legislation. The problem is that the Irish law is similar to the law in England. The Irish were afraid that the decision of the English House of Lords would create a precedent. That is why they asked to change this part. I am not familiar with the Irish tax laws, and it is difficult for me to give the hon. member a clearer explanation.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Short title of Part III.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I observe that the previous agreement with Norway was dated May 2, 1929. This perhaps is the oldest of the existing agreements. It must have been well negotiated to last so long. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could explain briefly the basic differences between the agreement we are asked to approve tonight and the previous agreement.

Mr. Chrétien: I understand that the old agreement covered only shipping profits and such matters. It was not as extensive and as comprehensive as this agreement. The present agreement is much more comprehensive.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This agreement covers the field usually covered in such agreements.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes. The other one provided for shipping profits only.

Mr. Monteith: The agreement was not amended since 1929?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think so.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

On clause 10—Short title of Part IV.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have had some difficulty in studying this and in calculating how this new agreement integrates with the earlier agreements which are still in effect, the one of June 5, 1946, and that of December 6, 1965. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would tell us how these agreements do integrate. Why was it not attempted to consolidate the agreements into one agreement, to place the whole situation in front of us?

Mr. Chrétien: I shall refer my hon. friend again to the news release of the Department of Finance of December 12, 1966, which explains the situation in this way:

The Canada-United Kingdom Income Tax Agreement of 1946 was terminated in 1964. It was replaced in part by a limited agreement confined to four classes of income, signed in 1965. Subsequent negotiations have resulted in a comprehensive agreement similar to the comprehensive agreements concluded by Canada with other countries. The provisions of the 1965 agreement have been assimilated—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Assimilated?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

—into the new agreement.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Has the 1965 agreement not been taken into account? That seems to be already in that agreement.

Mr. Chrétien: According to my understanding, the others will end when the new agreement is in force.

Mr. Knowles: But the wording that was in last year's agreement has been built into this one. Is that it?

Mr. Chrétien: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: I have one other question at this point. This bill seems a bit odd, in the sense that it has four short titles. I do not know what you decided, Mr. Chairman, about applying the rules of debate to clause 1, because clauses 1, 4, 7 and 10 are all short titles. Does this mean that when the commission that is revising the statutes gets around to its job with respect to this matter, this bill will be separated into its various component parts, and in each case each part will be an act that will stand on its own feet? For example, will the Canada-United Kingdom income tax agreement be a separate act in the Revised Statutes of Canada?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Chrétien: In revising statutes sometimes one has to face a problem like this, and I think it is better for us to leave the job to the people mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: We may leave the job to them, but certainly we have created a good many jobs for them over the last few years.

While I am on my feet, and dealing with clause 10 which has to do with the Canada-United Kingdom income tax agreement, in the interval since we discussed this matter has the parliamentary secretary come up with any ideas about the capital gains tax? This is the agreement that specifically refers to a capital gains tax on the part of the United Kingdom but does not refer to any such tax on the part of Canada.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the capital gains tax provision was included in the agreement at the request of the United Kingdom, because there is such a tax in that country, and it is in order for the United Kingdom to control its own taxes. This is not a new problem. We face the same problem with the United States, which has similar taxes. We have the same thing in the agreement with the United States. They asked us to put this provision in the agreement in order to protect themselves. I do not know the actual implications for them, but the reason is that they have such taxes in those countries. Fortunately, or unfortunately, we do not have a capital gains tax in Canada yet.

Mr. Knowles: Do I take it that if we were to introduce a capital gains tax in Canada these agreements would have to be renegotiated?

Mr. Chrétien: We do not know yet. Perhaps this clause may or may not apply, but if that happens we will look into the situation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the parliamentary secretary consider that the expression in article I(b) "income taxes" would be sufficient to cover the proposals in the Carter commission report in view of the fact that they do not propose to tax capital gains as capital but as income?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the rules do not permit us to give legal opinions in the House of Commons.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would like to be clear on one matter with the parliamentary secretary. If this agreement before us in schedule IV be approved in parliament, it is the only tax agreement that will be in effect with the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland?

Mr. Chrétien: Perhaps my hon. friend will read with interest paragraph 3 on page 64 of the bill which states:

> The agreement between the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the government of Canada signed at Ottawa on 6 December, 1965 shall not have effect in relation to any tax for any period for which this agreement has effect as respects that tax.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, but is it not true that the agreement of December 6, 1965, will continue to have effect for any taxation period prior to the coming into effect of this agreement?

Mr. Chrétien: Oh yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 and 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Supplementary convention approved.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the parliamentary secretary explain the need for this amendment to the United States agreement?

Mr. Chrétien: In my statement I said that the problem concerned some companies incorporated in Canada but which are not resident in Canada any more. There was a kind of loophole for tax evasion by companies incorporated in Canada but not resident in Canada, and that is why we have been obliged to put that provision in the agreement.

Mr. Monteith: Does the parliamentary secretary mean by that companies incorporated in Canada but not actually doing any business in Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: That is what I mean.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX AMENDMENT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS ANALOGOUS TO THOSE IN CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act is long and unfortunately somewhat complicated. Its amendments might be said to fall into four categories as follows:

1. Amendments to implement three paragraphs of the March, 1966 budget resolutions.

It will be recalled that the resolutions were approved by the committee of ways and means in June, 1966, and that all but three paragraphs in the resolutions were implemented in the income tax bill, Bill C-216, passed in July, 1966.

When Bill C-216 was before the committee last July I explained that it had not been possible to complete the drafting to cover all the proposals, but that it was the intention of the government to proceed with the remainder of the resolutions when the house resumed in the fall. The three paragraphs of the resolutions left to be implemented were: paragraph 11 dealing with deferred profit sharing plans, paragraph 12 dealing with transfers from pension plans or retiring allowances into a deferred profit sharing plan, and paragraph 13 dealing with supplementary unemployment benefit plans. The second category was the repeal of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

It may be recalled that when Bill No. C-216 was introduced last year it contained provisions dealing with the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. These provisions were withdrawn from Bill C-216 in order to give the shipping and shipbuilding industry time to study and make representations on the proposed changes. It was indicated that these provisions would be reintroduced in the autumn of 1966.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

The third category was what I would call provincial abatements. It is necessary to change and extend the abatements of personal and corporation income taxes on income earned in a province in accordance with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

The fourth category is miscellaneous amendments, which included some changes to remove uncertainty and assist in the administration of the act.

This bill received first reading on December 21, 1966 but because some of the provisions are complicated it was thought desirable to allow a period of some weeks so that it could be thoroughly examined by all who are concerned. In this period the government has had the benefit of a number of submissions on particular parts of the bill and I shall have several amendments to place before the committee.

I shall be glad to provide comments and information as each subclause is called but since the bulk of the bill is made up of amendments dealing with deferred profit sharing plans and the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, and since these amendments are spread throughout the bill, it might be helpful if I gave a general outline at this stage of what is proposed in these two areas.

It will be noted that a substantial part of this bill deals with deferred profit sharing plans. The bulk of these amendments is contained in clauses 15 and 19 of the bill.

Hon. members will recall that the budget speech on March 29, 1966 announced that changes would be proposed to the Income Tax Act to prevent abuse of the provisions dealing with these plans. In that speech as reported on page 3385 of Hansard, I said:

> In recent months there has been evidence of increasing abuse of the section of the act providing special tax treatment for deferred profit sharing plans. In 1960 and 1961 my predecessor, then the hon. member for Eglinton, with the worthiest of motives, introduced a section in the act to provide for these plans, which he described as an important piece of social legislation. Since then various businessmen and their professional advisers have exploited this well intended but vulnerable section in various ways. Essentially what happens in typical cases is that contributions of profits from a business, made deductible in computing income for tax purpose and held in a tax free fund, which were intended to benefit the employees of the business generally are being diverted to benefit a few key people, chief shareholders or their relatives or heirs.

Briefly, a deferred profit sharing plan is an arrangement under which payments, computed by reference to profits from a business, are made by an employer into a trust on behalf of his employees. These payments, sometimes called contributions, are deductible for income tax purposes by the employer. The contributions are held by the trust for a period of years, very often until the employee retires. The earnings from investing these accumulating funds by the trustee are not taxed in the hands of the trust. When the accumulated funds to the credit of an employee are paid to him, either as a retirement income or in a lump sum, these payments are taxable in his hands.

The two important tax features of these plans are that the employer obtains a deduction for amounts paid into the plan and the employee enjoys deferral of tax, often for many years, on the amounts eventually paid to him. In order to prevent abuse of these plans it has been found necessary to propose new rules dealing with several features of the plans including, first, vesting of the amounts allocated to each employee; second, reallocation of amounts when an employee leaves; third, investment of the funds held by a trustee, and, fourth, distribution of the accumulated funds.

It has also been necessary to impose penalty taxes to ensure that all the requirements are observed. Existing plans which are not now operating in accordance with the new rules will have to make changes to comply, but the amendments provide some time for these plans to make the necessary changes.

In drawing up these new rules there has been careful regard for the objectives of legitimate profit sharing plans. I think that most of the established plans that have been operated for the benefit of employees following the generally accepted principles of profit sharing will not be much affected by the new rules. Since the announcement last March that changes would be made we have had the benefit of a number of very helpful representations from persons who are familiar with profit sharing plans. In the two months that have elapsed since the proposed legislation was made public there has been a good opportunity for interested persons to examine the proposed changes in detail and again we have had the benefit of suggestions from those who are close to the operations of these plans. All the suggestions and representations received since December 19 have been helpful and they have been considered very carefully. It has not been found possible to accept all of these suggestions, but I shall have several amendments to place before the committee to improve the wording and to modify the application of the relevant clauses.

I shall be glad to give a more detailed explanation of the amendments as each clause and subclause is called, but by way of general outline I might point out that clause 16 lays down new requirements with which plans must comply in order to be accepted for registration. Clause 19 provides some rules of operation and imposes penalties for non-compliance.

Clause 15 would add five new paragraphs which describe conditions with which plans must comply if they are to be accepted for registration by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) as deferred profit sharing plans. These are as follows: First, if the trustee under the plan is not a trust company there must be three trustees who shall be individuals. Second, all income received, all capital gains made and capital losses sustained by the trust must be allocated to beneficiaries under the plan within 90 days after the end of the year. Third, all amounts allocated or reallocated by a trustee under the plan to a beneficiary must vest in that beneficiary not later than five years after the year in which the amounts are allocated or reallocated unless the beneficiary has ceased to be an employee.

Fourth, the trustee must inform all new beneficiaries of their rights under the plan. Fifth, all amounts vested in an employee under a plan must become payable to that employee—or to his beneficiary or estate in the event of his death—promptly after the employee dies, leaves the employment or become age 71. However, the plan may provide that upon election of the employee all or part of the amounts payable to him may be paid in equal instalments over a period of 10 years or used to purchase an annuity.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would be beneficial to the house if I could complete my remarks. They are a bit complicated. I am sure that if I could get them on the record, it would expedite the subsequent debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the minister should continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: This clause will also provide an amendment to place a new limitation on the amount an employer may deduct as a contribution to a deferred profit sharing plan. Under the present law the limit on the amount an employer may deduct in respect of each employee who is a beneficiary under the plan is $1,500 minus the amount deducted by the employer as a contribution under a registered pension plan in respect of that employee. I shall have an amendment to propose to this section, but it is proposed that the amount contributed to a deferred profit sharing plan may not exceed 20 per cent of the salary or wages paid in the year to the employee. The effect of this will be that an employer may no longer deduct $1,500 in respect of contributions for employees, such as relatives, to which he pays only a small salary.

A new subsection is provided to deal with the situation where a trust governed by a deferred profit sharing plan, or a revoked plan, disposes of property at less than its fair market value or pays more for property than its fair market value. Where this has occurred two things are deemed to have happened as follows:

(a) the difference between the fair market value and the consideration for the property shall be deemed to have been received as proceeds from the plan by the taxpayer who benefited, and

(b) the difference between the fair market value and the consideration for the property shall be deemed to be an amount forfeited in the trust and re-allocated to the taxpayer as if the taxpayer were a beneficiary under the plan.

The Minister of National Revenue is given authority to revoke the registration of a plan, including a plan now in existence, unless the plan has met two conditions by January 1, 1968. These two conditions are:

(a) it must comply with the rules described in section 79C(2) of the act, including those which will be added by this bill, and

(b) it must provide in its terms or bylaws that amounts held by the trust for the benefit of beneficiaries that remain unallocated to employees on December 31, 1967 must be allocated before 1969.

Clause 19 will add a new Part II E to the act to impose certain penalty taxes where a trust governed by a deferred profit sharing plan does certain things. It also deals with returns and provides definitions. It will add new sections 105K to 105Q to the act.

The new section 105K will provide that every trust for a deferred profit sharing plan that acquires a non-qualified investment, or uses any property of the trust as security for a loan, shall pay a tax equal to the cost of the non-qualified investment, or equal to the value of the property used as security for a loan, as the case may be. However, it is also provided that this tax shall be refunded when the trust disposes of a non-qualified investment or when a loan for which property has been pledged is repaid.

This new section also provides that a trust may use as much as 25 per cent of all amounts paid into it each year to pay premiums for life insurance of any kind without being deemed to have acquired a non-qualified investment. If the 25 per cent limit is exceeded the life insurance must be endowment type policies as described in the new section.

The new section 105L is intended to induce the trust for a plan to dispose of its non-qualified investments but it provides that this may be done gradually between now and the end of 1970. The proportion of non-qualified investments that must be disposed of in order to avoid a penalty tax are as follows: 20 per cent thereof by the end of 1967; 40 per cent thereof by the end of 1968; 60 per cent thereof by the end of 1969; 100 per cent thereof by the end of 1970.

Where a tax is imposed because non-qualified investments held on December 21, 1966 are not disposed of within the time limits, this tax will be refunded whenever disposal does take place provided the non-qualified investments are disposed of for not less than the full value placed on them on December 21, 1966. If there is some loss on disposal and the tax paid exceeds the loss there will be a partial refund of the tax.

A new section 105N will impose a tax when excessive amounts are re-allocated to remaining employees when other employees leave the plan. Since amounts paid into a plan and yearly earnings of the trust do not have to vest in members of the plan for five years there may be substantial amounts to be re-allocated to remaining members of the plan when employees terminate their employment or otherwise leave the plan. The amounts that are forfeited by the terminating employees may be returned to the employer and included in his income for tax purposes or re-allocated to remaining members of the plan. A tax of 50 per cent will be imposed on excessive re-allocations but the amount of a re-allocation to an employee will not be regarded as excessive unless it, plus the amounts paid into the plan by the employer on behalf of that employee, plus previous tax-free re-allocations to that employee, exceed an amount equal to the number of years the employee has been in the plan times $2,000.

A new section 105O requires a trustee for a plan to file returns for each year and a new section 105Q provides definitions including the definition of qualified investments for a trust under a plan. It should be borne in mind that the rules governing what shall be a qualified investment have been influenced by the need to prevent funds paid into a plan being returned to the employer as a loan that might never be repaid. The trust may buy the shares of the employer company where these shares are listed on a prescribed stock exchange in Canada and also in non-listed equity shares of the employer company where these shares meet certain tests. The right to invest in the shares of the employer company is an important part of the philosophy of some profit sharing plans since it is believed that this gives the employee a greater sense of participation in the business for which he works.

I apologize for this long and very complicated statement which departs somewhat from the rules governing debate on second reading, but without it I think it would have been very difficult for a debate to take place that would be relevant to this complicated change. I thank the house for its indulgence.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether or not it would be possible to have these proposed amendments included in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. Sharp: I have the amendments with me and I intended to suggest that they be distributed to hon. members. I thank the hon. member for his suggestion because I think if these proposed amendments are distributed it will help during subsequent discussion, I think this will help in the subsequent discussion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, as far as this party is concerned, I think this will probably fill the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the amendments referred to by the minister be distributed to hon. members?

Mr. Monteith: As far as I personally am concerned, that is very satisfactory. I was just thinking that possibly there are other hon. members who would like copies of the amendments.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important and complicated matter. I wonder whether the minister could give notice of these amendments and have them printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings. I think this would be most helpful to hon. members.

Mr. Sharp: I am quite agreeable to doing this, if it meets the wishes of the house. I have distributed these copies for the convenience of hon. members. If they are printed in Votes and Proceedings I think it would be even more convenient.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the amendments be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of amendments referred to above, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose submitting to the house for its consideration the continuation of the matter now before the house, that is, item 119 on the order paper. Then we will deal with item 133, item 83, item 135 and item 134.

Mr. Monteith: What was the third item?

Mr. McIlraith: The third item was the third reading of the immigration appeal board bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—FAILURE TO MENTION LAKEHEAD CITIES IN ADVERTISING BROCHURE

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, today I addressed the following question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters):

> Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the elegant and presumably expensive brochure on Canada for distribution to the United States and, if so, did he take note that the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur were completely ignored? In fact, as far as this publication is concerned the Canadian lakehead does not exist.

In the minister's absence the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) took notice of the question and promised to bring it to the attention of the minister upon his return. However, I considered the matter of sufficient importance to ask for a debate on the adjournment motion. It seems inconceivable to me that the Canadian government travel bureau has permitted an elaborate publication to be circulated without showing complete access to Fort William and Port Arthur. I wonder whether those responsible for the printing of the booklet were really serious in producing a map which is supposed to show how Canada can be reached by train, plane and automobile, and leave out the whole of northwestern Ontario.

No Air Canada route to the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur is shown, nor is the North Central Airlines serving the lakehead mentioned. But the most glaring error is in the omission of the Canadian Pacific Railway passenger service, and of course the map leaves out even the international highway 61 from Duluth, Minnesota to the lakehead.

An appropriate editorial in the Fort William Times Journal bore the headlines: "It is in our own capital where education is needed", pointing out that there is no plausible excuse for such omissions.

The Northwestern Ontario Development Association, upon hearing of this unbelievable discovery, issued a news release condemning such an unseemly oversight, which may have the effect of drastically reducing the extent to which the lakehead area will share in the influx of tourists expected to be drawn to Canada by Expo.

The news bulletin of the association contains the following observations which are really a classic description of disappointment. It writes:

> With Ontario's northwest thus relegated to the status of an almost inaccessible no-man's-land, it follows naturally that scant if any attention is given our region, either in the descriptive text of Canada's delights, or among the 140 colour photographs that cram this handsome publication.
> The Ontario section, for instance, is dominated by a view of Niagara Falls. Other photos show Toronto's skyline, Upper Canada village, and an unidentified lakeside picture. The text, though brief, mentions tulip time at Ottawa, the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto, the Royal Winter Fair at the same place, car racing at nearby Mosport, Highland Games at Maxville, Indian pageant at Brantford, Shakespearean Festival at Stratford and the flea market at Aberfoyle.

But what upsets the people of northwestern Ontario is the apparent disregard exhibited so often in the past by government agencies and others, whose horizon apparently does not extend too far beyond the larger populated centres of Canada. I ask the minister to have the publication withdrawn and the proper correction made at the earliest possible moment.

[Mr. Badanai.]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters). I can well appreciate the disappointment of the hon. member for Fort William, and I sympathize with him in not seeing any reference to the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur in this publication. The reason is not that the lakehead cities were deliberately ignored but that a single booklet that skims over Canada's 10 provinces and two territories in 4,000 words of copy and 54 pages of photographs simply cannot do justice to every important community.

I am told that the travel bureau is now in the midst of giving thought to the production of an entirely new version of "Invitation to Canada" for 1968, and every consideration will be given to the inclusion of the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur.

However, after examining the first and second versions of other basic booklets distributed by the Department of Trade and Commerce I have realized that the department is really doing its best to give the lakehead the recognition it deserves. I have here a collection of booklets distributed by the department. One is entitled "Adventure along the Trans-Canada Highway". The red markers I have here are not to indicate the party to which the hon. member for Fort William belongs but simply to help me identify the references to the cities he represents so well. Another booklet is entitled "Canada Events 1967" and it indicates many events and festivities taking place in the lakehead this year. I have another pamphlet entitled, "Hay Fever, Canadian Havens From". It gives proper recognition to the climate of Fort William and Port Arthur. Then, I have a last pamphlet entitled, "Circle Tours from the Trans-Canada Highway". This one really gives Port Arthur and Fort William recognition with words like, "dynamic twin cities of the enormously important lakehead; a metropolis of 100,000 persons which offers a rare combination of scenic grandeur and industrial power." Fort William is referred to as, "the greatest grain port in the world," with the additional comment that "there are 25 grain elevators which store annually over 100 million bushels of wheat." The pamphlet contains such phrases as, "see beautiful Boulevard Lake in the heart of Port Arthur". There is a reference to having "fun in Fort William's Chippewa Park", as well as a reference to a "miniature railway".

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EXPRESS DELIVERIES IN SAGUENAY-LAKE ST. JOHN AREAS

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I put the following question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

Is the minister aware that the C.N.R. officials have ordered the discontinuation of express services in the Saguenay, Lake St. John and, especially, Alma districts?

Many serious reasons prompted me to ask this question of the Minister of Transport. However, I shall limit myself to listing the main ones which I hope will succeed in getting the minister's sympathetic attention.

Last week end, I received many telephone calls from constituents who wanted to bring to my attention the fact that, in a very near future, they would be deprived of the express services now offered by the Canadian National Railways. Most of the people who complain are store owners, businessmen, industrialists living in Alma, my riding's major city with a population of approximately 25,000. It should be noted also that those businessmen extend their operations over 25 or 30 square miles.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, that our population feels that this decision is completely arbitrary and harmful to our region which has already been classified as economically weak. How can anyone imagine that such action will improve its economic and commercial situation? I doubt very much that it will.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, if my suspicions are justified but until I get evidence to the contrary, I will find it very hard to get rid of them. I have good reason to believe that the government has chosen the Saguenay-Lake St. John area as a buffer zone where it can try out all kinds of experiments which most of the time go against the interests of our good people who have a right to expect fairer treatment from their government.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that our businessmen will have to spend time and money in order to pick up their goods in Jonquière presumably; this is unacceptable, because I feel the cost of delivery service which is presently available to them, is compensated to a large extent by express rates charged by the Canadian National Railways.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, economic reasons will be put forward; the point will be made that we must cut down on operating and administration expenses since the annual deficits of the national railway system, which is a crown corporation, must always be borne by the Canadian taxpayer. This reason does not stand up to examination, according to the comments and recommendations of the Auditor General of public accounts for Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966. We can reasonably say that the administrators are not particularly careful in their spending or, shall we say, do not hesitate to squander public funds.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the riding I have the honour to represent in this house, and on behalf of all citizens whose rights have been violated by arbitrary decicisions of bureaucrats and well paid quill-drivers, I wish to voice vigorous protest against the way in which my constituents are being treated, and I urge the hon. minister to review this unfair policy, if there is still time.

• (10:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some misunderstanding about this matter which has been brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Lake St. John. Information that was provided me by telephone from officials of the Canadian National Railways is to the effect that, following general practice in industry, where firms are working a five day week delivery of express has been discontinued in the area on Saturdays. However, the offices will remain open on that day for those wishing to pick up their parcels.

If the hon. member has information that the entire service has been discontinued, then this is not the information that we have to hand.

TRANSPORT—SECOND FERRY BETWEEN NOVA SCOTIA AND NEW ENGLAND

Mr. J. O. Bower (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I raised or tried to raise with the Minister of Transport a matter concerning transportation of some importance to the economy of the maritime provinces. Your Honour ruled that I was a little verbose in my question and invited me to bring the matter up on the adjournment debate. I am now taking advantage of that advice. I regret that at this late hour the minister is not present, though I understand this. In view of his interest in and sympathy for all things for the good of the maritimes, I wish he were here. However, I trust that he has instructed his parliamentary secretary to give equally sympathetic consideration to the matter.

I should like to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Transport to the need for supplementing the ferry service of the motor vessel Bluenose on the Bar Harbor, Maine-Yarmouth, Nova Scotia run during the coming summer months. As the minister and his parliamentary secretary undoubtedly know, the tourist business is of major economic importance to Nova Scotia and indeed to all maritime provinces. Tourist traffic demands have grown to such proportions that the Bluenose can no longer handle the traffic during the peak season. The necessity for making reservations for car space well in advance under the present congested summer traffic conditions tends to discourage potential traffic flow. Thus the actual over-demand for space is obscured, because people simply give up and do not visit the maritimes.

In addition to the tourist trade there is another function that the Bar Harbor ferry performs, that of carrying the truck transport of our fisheries exports. Since we are involved here with the freighting of a perishable commodity it is of fundamental importance that this particular traffic suffer no interruption or slow-down for the want of carrying capacity.

It has been the practice to give the Bluenose an annual overhaul in the winter. When she is laid up a substitute ferry of sorts has been provided. This year it was reported that a car ferry type of vessel, the Lief Erikson, suitable for the Bar Harbor summer service would be utilized during the Bluenose overhaul period. Owing to the accident to the ferry Cabot in Montreal harbour, the Lief Erikson was called in to take its place and was thus eliminated as a replacement for the Bluenose.

A small ship, inadequate as a summer supplement, was provided by the Department of Transport to render a minimum freight service at least. This emergency action was much appreciated. On the assumption that the Cabot will be back in commission by next June, I urge the minister to assign her to fill the aching void next summer—the aching void I have called to his attention.

In pressing the project I have been discussing, and to emphasize the dollars and cents practicality of it, I draw attention to the fact that during the period January 1, 1965, to December 31, 1965, the ferry Bluenose showed an operating profit of some $19,000.

Finally, sir, while reminding the minister again that the ferry service to Bar Harbor is basic to the trade in tourists and fish of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland—a pipe line as it were—I venture the hope that the minister will not allow this pipe line to become intolerably constricted.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the hon. member that the minister's absence is not an indication that he does not consider this a most important matter. He is on important business elsewhere this evening. I have information supplied by the department, and I am sure the hon. member is aware of some of that information that I have this evening.

The Bluenose service was set up originally as a result of a co-operative arrangement between the federal government and the provincial government, under which each assumed a portion of the capital cost involved at the outset. Two or three years ago the federal government made a special study and forecast which indicated that the longer term traffic growth between southern Nova Scotia and New England would, in due course, justify additional service.

Around that time, and arising out of this, the provincial government suggested that a special consultant be employed to report more specifically on the need for an additional ferry, and the terminals which should be used. The federal government agreed to share in the costs of this study. The study itself was completed last year—in the first half of 1966—and made available to the province, and through the province to the federal government. This indicated there was need for eventual development of additional service. Several alternative routes were studied, with particular attention being given to the desirability of a Bay of Fundy routing.

Since that time, the departmental representatives have been actively engaged in consultation with various interested parties about the best means of developing an appropriate, long-term solution to this problem, this course being considered preferable to short-term improvisation. The province has been kept informed of developments in this connection, and I want to assure the hon. member that I will draw to the attention of the minister new evidence which he has produced here this evening.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Seventh and eighth reports of standing committee on justice and legal affairs—Mr. Cameron (High Park).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPENDITURES IN CANADA BY U.S. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, information has just been brought to my attention as a result of which I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, who may require some time before answering. This question relates to the extraordinary and completely unjustifiable conduct of the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States as revealed recently regarding the secret transfer of large amounts of money to organizations outside the United States. Will the Prime Minister communicate with the administration in Washington to ascertain what moneys, if any, were expended by the C.I.A. to Canadians during the period between May of 1962 and June of 1963? I refer to those amounts of money in addition to what was given to one student organization, the facts of which are now public knowledge.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into this matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RETRAINING OF WORKERS LAID OFF BECAUSE OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has his attention been drawn to the address delivered to the Empire Club of Canada at Toronto by Mr. George Burt, director of the United Automobile Workers, in which he stated that the auto workers laid off by reason of the auto pact are not being retrained and have not been able to obtain alternative employment? Have steps been taken by the minister's department to remedy this situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. gentleman will realize that in this regard there is a problem in relation to the reference of workers to retraining programs because of a lack of facilities in certain areas. We are attempting to solve this problem with provincial co-operation.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since it is not possible to ask the minister detailed questions on the orders of the day, I wonder whether he would consider making a statement or issuing a white paper very soon indicating what the government is doing with respect to either the retraining of or finding employment for the several thousand auto workers who have been laid off recently.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I am preparing a more detailed statement, and as soon as it is ready I will be happy to make it in the house.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING AIR MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Could he tell us what came out of his discussions with the authorities in Washington about the air mail service between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. member for Mégantic is now inviting the minister to make a statement which should normally be made on motions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

FARM MACHINERY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It is based on the report from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that Canadian farmers bought fewer machines in 1966 but paid more money for those fewer implements. I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture could advise the house whether the royal commission looking into these prices, and so on, will soon be in a position to give the house a report as to the justification for these price increases during 1966.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, the royal commission has not indicated any intention to make an interim report of any kind, although I will be pleased to look into this matter. But I will be having a statement for the house very shortly on my personal findings with respect to farm machinery prices, which I made pending the report of the royal commission.

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could advise the house whether he is now prepared to ask the royal commission for an interim report respecting this matter, inasmuch as we now have conclusive evidence that there was a substantial increase during the past year.

Mr. Greene: I will be pleased to consider this suggestion, Mr. Speaker. The newspaper reports I have read to date do not indicate the extent of the increase except in gross amounts. But I will be pleased to consider this question with the commission.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not be justified now in putting a moratorium on the prices of farm machinery, in view of the fact that the prices have increased since the commission was appointed?

Mr. Greene: I know of no authority that the federal government has to put a moratorium on prices, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister has no power to fix prices, has he communicated with the implement companies and asked them not to increase their prices while the commission is continuing its investigation, prices which too often appear to be completely unjust and unjustifiable?

Mr. Greene: I have had such meetings and I have put the position put forward by the right hon. gentleman as forcibly as I know how. I will have a report for the house very shortly on the results of these meetings and negotiations.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Will he consider the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the sales tax on production machinery will be reduced by half in April of this year and will be entirely removed a year hence.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has attempted to enter into negotiations with the provincial authorities with respect to the question of a moratorium on farm machinery price increases.

Mr. Greene: No, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In the light of the announced intention of General Motors to lay off workers both in St. Catharines and Windsor, and in view of the continual permanent lay-offs and stoppages of work, will the minister consider referring the auto pact to a standing committee of the house to study the question of why these lay-offs are taking place?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think the assumption that these are permanent lay-offs is not well founded.

Mr. Starr: It is.

Mr. Drury: MacKinnon Industries have stated publicly that the current lay-offs are due to the decline by some 20 per cent in the current market for motor cars in the United States. These lay-offs are not permanent.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

KENT COUNTY, N.B.—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENTS TO WOODS WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Crossman (Kent (N.B.)): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Has he been made aware of the fact that at least 200 woodsmen in Kent county, New Brunswick, had their unemployment insurance suspended because they refused to work under difficult conditions due to deep snow, and will he have this situation investigated?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Yes Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to this complaint. I have tried to get in touch with the chief commissioner but have not yet been able to do so. I will be speaking to the other commissioners later today, if I cannot contact the chief commissioner. I will request a report and reply to the hon. member.

AIR POLLUTION

EQUIPPING OF AUTOMOBILES WITH PROTECTIVE DEVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is based on the answer given to my question yesterday to the effect that the government was not immediately ordering anti-pollution clean air packages in cars as has been done in the United States. Today my question is as follows. Was this decision made after verbal or written representations by the motor vehicle industry in Canada, and did the minister contact any United States health officials or experts in Canadian urban centres who take air pollution measurements before arriving at the decision he announced yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question asked by the hon. member refers to circumstances which have lapsed and therefore the question should more properly be put on the order paper.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase my question. Was the decision announced yesterday that Canada will not get the clean air package as has been ordered in the United States arrived at only after strong recommendations by the Canadian motor vehicle industry? It is most important that we know this.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have received no representations whatsoever on this subject matter from the industry.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry. Before arriving at this decision did the government receive any strong written or verbal representations from the motor vehicle industry in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to uphold the opinion I expressed a moment ago to the hon. member, that this question should be placed on the order paper.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY DISPUTE—GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING REJECTION OF MEDIATION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether the government has arrived at any decision on the course it will follow in respect of those railway unions which did not agree to the recommendations of Mr. Goldenberg.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Starr: Can the minister say what course of action will be taken to settle the dispute?

Mr. Nicholson: First of all the Minister of Labour will be meeting with the representatives or spokesmen for the two groups of unions that have not accepted the results of the mediation proceedings and have not gone along with them. Meetings with them have been arranged for tomorrow, after which I will be meeting the representatives of the railways. It is expected that the board of arbitration will be set up before too long, but I must have these consultations before taking any such action.

[Later:]

Mr. Starr: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, based on his answer to my previous question, which had to do with the selection of personnel to the arbitration board to deal with railway disputes. This will affect those unions which have not adopted the recommendations of Mr. Goldenberg. Will the members of the board be appointed on a basis of their knowledge of economics, the trade union movement and transportation, or will other criteria be used?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Nicholson: A combination of qualities is desirable and the situation will be carefully considered to be sure we get the best men available.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REFUSAL OF UNION OFFICIAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address a question to the kindly Solicitor General with a great deal of righteous indignation because this matter is of national significance. In view of the fact that Mr. Orville Braaten, a respected trade union leader and a member of our party, was sentenced to jail for contempt of court and was walked off handcuffed for refusing to answer questions on the ground that the instructions from the Solicitor General placed time limitations on questions that could be asked in the inquiry, will the minister inform the house what he intends to do to correct this situation and whether he intends to be represented at any hearings questioning the validity of the public inquiries act of British Columbia?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am informed no reference was made to the Solicitor General before the commissioner by Mr. Braaten or his counsel in relation to the incidents which led to Mr. Braaten being cited for contempt. Furthermore, I or no one acting on my behalf issued instructions placing general limitations on questions that could be asked at the inquiry, nor would I have any authority to do so. Under the circumstances it is not our intention to be represented at the proceedings now before the Supreme Court.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION ON NAVY HYDROFOIL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister made a decision on the matter of the hydrofoil program for the Royal Canadian Navy? If so, what is that decision?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No final decision has been taken as yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacEwan: May I ask the minister, because many months have gone by, if he can tell the country and the navy when he will be deciding this important question?

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Hellyer: Soon, I hope, Mr. Speaker. It is my earnest hope that within a few days or weeks there will be time for contemplating some of the important decisions that have to be taken, including this one.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SYDNEY, N.S.—LAY-OFFS AT STEEL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration which presumably would be supplementary to the questions put by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam with regard to the laid off automobile workers. May I ask the minister if he can advise the house today what is being done by his department and the government to assist the 1100 steel workers who have been laid off at the Sydney steel plant? When he is replying to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in detail, could the minister provide further information in detail with regard to this important subject, since some of the men who have been laid off have seniority of 16 years or more?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to making a report on that case as well.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I did not quite catch what the minister said was being done at the moment. He is going to reply in detail later?

Mr. Speaker: Order. My understanding is that the question has been answered by the minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is related to the question asked by my colleague from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir), and has to do with the 1100 men laid off at the Sydney steel plant. I ask the minister whether he is in on any plans that will alleviate the situation in Sydney.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I have said that I am ready to make a detailed report on this matter. In the meantime the department is doing what it should do. As the hon. member knows we have in Canada manpower centres which try to find jobs for people and which direct people to jobs where those are available. Some people are invited to move if jobs for them can be found elsewhere. There is also a counselling service for workers. This sort of thing is done throughout Canada. If the hon. member wants more details of these matters I am ready to make a report.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I will put the question again to the minister. Is he in on any specific plans—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South):—to alleviate the situation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has already asked the question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think we have the privilege of asking questions in this house about Cape Breton. A Liberal backbencher had the right to put a question about a Canadian fugitive arrested in New York—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): —and we should have the right to ask about 1100 men in Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton South on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a question of privilege, because I seek to ask questions about 1100 men at the Sydney steel plant, and the fact that information available to the government is denied by the minister's answer. I was not allowed to ask my question despite the fact that only a few days ago in this house a Liberal backbencher was permitted to ask questions about a fugitive from justice, on his way either to or from Europe, who was arrested in New York. If questions such as that are permitted, surely questions affecting 1100 people in Cape Breton can also be asked. I wanted information; the situation there shows lack of government planning. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration today failed to give me a concise answer. The Prime Minister has denied his own minister in the house.

I draw the minister's attention to the answer by the Minister of Industry on page 12950 of Hansard, when this was said:

> Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman will recognize that the government is concerned about this problem of continuing job opportunities in the Cape Breton area. He will recall the recent announcement of the intention of the government to establish through legislation a corporation, the specific task of which would be to endeavour to find new job opportunities in Cape Breton to replace those that seem to be in the course of disappearing.

My question of privilege concerns the answers that are available to members of this house. There is the statement of the Minister of Industry, then a denial from the Prime Minister, then evasion from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will read the citations and precedents he will know that an hon. member cannot raise a question of privilege on the failure of a minister to supply information.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): They asked about a fugitive.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS AND AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): My question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and is in two parts. I should like to ask him first if the regulations supporting the Canada Assistance Plan have been developed as yet; and, if so, when the agreements will be signed with the provinces to give effect to this very worthwhile legislation.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The regulations have been approved by the governor in council, and agreements have been circulated to the provincial ministers for signature if they find them in order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having in mind Canada's efforts to encourage a Viet Nam cease fire, is the minister making fresh representations to the United States following the escalation of attacks on North Viet Nam by the United States?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Before answering this question, Mr. Speaker, may I direct your attention to the presence in the gallery of the executive committee of the Atlantic association of young political leaders, representing the 15 partners in the NATO alliance, who are visiting Ottawa at this time?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to the question, we have had discussions about the military actions to which the hon. gentleman directs my attention. It is a fact that Canada has encouraged, and is continuing to encourage, a reversal of the course of military events in Viet Nam. We recognize that this will depend on a mutually acceptable basis for a cease fire being found by both parties. Until a basis for a cease fire has been created, however, I am afraid that each side will continue to deploy its military effort in the way which it regards as best calculated to counteract the military efforts of the other side.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I ask a supplementary question for clarification. Has the minister received from the hon. member for Leeds certain reports with regard to his far eastern visit that would be helpful in solving some of the problems that so exercise the minister's mind?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have been led to believe that the hon. member was being brought back in a hurry because he had some information he wished to transmit. Would the minister let us in on the secret so we will be able to understand some of the actions suggested by the hon. member in consequence of his momentous tour?

Mr. Speaker: Order. What the right hon. gentleman is asking for now is a statement to be made on motions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I just reply—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Martin (Essex East):—to the question, because I think my right hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Mather.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SMOKING—REPORTED C.B.C. STATEMENT BY STANLEY BURKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of state. Has it been drawn to the minister's attention, by way of protest or otherwise, that last week Stanley Burke made a most insinuating and non-factual statement on a C.B.C. national newscast to the effect that the average Canadian smokes 14 cigarettes a day and that 32 die from respiratory diseases? I should like to ask the minister whether she is in favour of such a statement being made on a national news broadcast.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member would welcome an opportunity to take this matter up on the adjournment debate.

Mr. Roxburgh: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION AND DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Having in mind his admirable statement yesterday in connection with submitting the details of the Carter commission report for public discussion and debate with the provinces, would the minister use his very best brand of eloquence on the Prime Minister to persuade him to adopt the same course with regard to constitutional changes?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need give the Prime Minister of Canada any advice whatever. He makes the most admirable decisions for the benefit of Canada.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CRITERIA FOR DISTRIBUTION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the genial Secretary of State, with no citation for contempt. In view of the fact that perhaps only two or three technically trained people in the

C.B.C. are qualified to evaluate colour television, what criteria—and I emphasize "criteria"—other than technical ones were used to justify the distribution of 107 colour television sets to ministers and employees reported to need them in their work?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question because, of course, he did not send me any. However, in this matter of colour television sets I should like to say that from the beginning, when various crown corporations were set up, it has been the practice of members of parliament not to inquire into matters which are purely questions of internal management. That has been the practice, though of course there is no question but that parliament may demand to be given any piece of information it chooses and, if it does demand it, will of course receive it.

None the less, this sort of question is tantamount to asking who has a dictaphone, either at home or otherwise, for use in one's business. It is tantamount to asking questions about any other piece of office furniture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not think I can be expected—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but I do not think she is answering the exact question asked. Perhaps I should recognize that the question should not have been allowed at this time. It is more properly the type of question that should be on the order paper. Certainly the minister is not answering the question which has been asked at this time.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the minister does the C.B.C. take the stand that the distribution —"dispensation" is possibly the appropriate word—of colour television sets paid for by the people of Canada to people outside the C.B.C. is a matter of internal management?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Miss LaMarsh: No, it is not. If the right hon. member refers to his question which is on the order paper, there will be an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Good.

Miss LaMarsh: The C.B.C. has taken the position that distribution within the corporation comes within internal management. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that this is a hoax, much like talking about who pays for the furniture in the right hon. gentleman's house, the Prime Minister's house or Government House. All such furniture belongs to the people, and there should be no suggestion of impropriety in having it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest to the minister that the choice of the expression "furniture", considering events not far removed, was not very appropriate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Kindt: Will the Secretary of State join me in the late show and bring with her the answers as to who received the 107 television sets, and the criteria used for the distribution?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR HUNDRED MILLION DOLLAR FEDERAL LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the answer given yesterday to the question of the hon. member for Kootenay West. The question is this. Considering the reports that have been circulated in British Columbia within the last year by hon. members opposite, to the effect that large sums of federal money were available to British Columbia for the asking, does the minister not believe that a further explanation on the part of the premier of British Columbia is unnecessary?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

EXPO '67

PROPOSED IMPORTATION OF VESSEL FOR USE AS FLOATING HOTEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Minister of Transport): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) asked me a question having to do with a possible application for the importation of a ship, the Florida, as a hotel ship for Montreal harbour to be used during Expo '67. I direct this answer to him.

The Department of Transport has not received any formal application for this purpose. However, persons interested in operating the ship in this manner have met with officials of the department to discuss what would be the department's requirements for the ship when used in such a service. They have been given details of rather extensive alterations that would be required in order to bring the ship up to the standard of safety appropriate to the intended use.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of an answer he gave me yesterday when I asked whether he would let the house know when he would begin establishing base line co-ordinates. He said at page 13502 of Hansard:

I will be glad to do so.

May I ask the minister whether today is the day when he will put these glad tidings in terms of specific calendar dates?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I hope to be in a position to do so very soon.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO RESTRICTIONS ON DC-6 AND DC-7 AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio who I believe is the Acting Minister of Transport. Has the Department of Transport issued an order respecting the DC-6 and DC-7 aircraft, restricting the altitude at which they may fly and their pressurization?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I had better look into that and let the hon. member know the answer.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

WESTON, ONT.—REPORTED WALKOUT OF LETTER CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): My question is for the Postmaster General.

[Mr. Turner.]

Can the minister report to the house about the walkout of letter carriers this morning at Weston, Ontario?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this is a matter of national urgency. If the hon. member feels it is, he may want to discuss the matter at ten o'clock.

Mr. Stanbury: In view of the history of the walkouts such as this which have spread across the country, I think my question is of national importance.

Mr. Speaker: Then I invite the hon. member to have the matter debated this evening. That debate is only a matter of hours away, and I am sure he will receive a more satisfactory reply than he would on orders of the day.

[Later:]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would allow me to say that the letter carriers at Weston were back at work at one o'clock today.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Just like the Minister of Finance; he says "no" and means "yes".

LABOUR RELATIONS

SEAFARERS' UNION—TRIAL OF MEMBER FOR CRITICISM OF FORMER UNION OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for rising again, but I have two very important questions to ask this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Happy birthday, Bert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: My question is addressed to the Minister of Labour. Mr. Speaker, if you will pardon me, I must say I appreciate your kind congratulations and the kind congratulations of members of the house. After 22 years in the house I find I have something in common with all parties here. I am a bit of a Conservative because I do not like coloured socks and loud suits. I am attracted to the Liberal party because I am very fond of the Liberal lady members on the government side of the house. I have a certain amount of admiration for the Social Credit party because I like the "farmer approach" to parliamentary procedure taken by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I love the Créditistes because although at times they are in my opinion strictly illogical, they are adorable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: Someone has asked me to tell about my own party. I am a member of the New Democratic Party and proud that all the youth movements in our party recognize that I am way out on the left as far as economics and the cultural revolution are concerned.

Now I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been informed that a seaman, a member of the Seafarers International Union, has been placed on charge by the officers of the union for criticizing the payment of over $20,000 to Mr. Rod Heinekey, former vice president, at the time of his resignation?

Since the trial of this seaman is to take place in Quebec city on March 9, would the minister refer this case to the board of maritime trustees for their investigation and report to him?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is, I am sure, entitled to a reply on this very particular date.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): May I join in the congratulations extended to the genial member for Kootenay West on his birthday—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nicholson: May I also thank the hon. member for his customary courtesy in giving notice of his intention to ask the question. In reply may I say that I have already caused inquiries to be made of the chairman of the board of maritime trustees and will report to the hon. member later.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF PROPOSED CROWN CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): My question is for the Prime Minister. Would the right hon. gentleman clarify the situation with regard to the Cape Breton development corporation concerning which there have been some questions in recent days? Will the personnel of the corporation be announced prior to the introduction of the legislation to set up this body, or at a later stage?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I cannot add substantially to what I said yesterday. It is difficult to announce exactly when the appointments to the corporation will be made public until we have concluded our discussions with DOSCO itself. It may well be possible to announce the personnel of the corporation before the legislation is dealt with, but I am not sure yet.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS AND GOOD WISHES TO SENATOR ROEBUCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would mind extending our most sincere good wishes for continued health and activity to a parliamentarian who I think has earned the respect of everyone by his activities in the past, and who today celebrates his 89th birthday anniversary. I refer to hon. Senator Roebuck.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be very glad to do that, and I know that my hon. friend in the other place will be grateful to the hon. gentleman for bringing this to our attention, and for the good wishes of the house.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Since the hon. senator is the senator for Trinity, the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house, I should like to join in that salutation.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps on this pleasant note we can call orders of the day.

INCOME TAX AMENDMENT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS ANALOGOUS TO THOSE IN CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp for the second reading of Bill No. C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Income Tax Amendment

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Last evening the minister outlined in some detail with the contents of Bill No. C-259. He told us that it could really be considered in four categories. The first category would be implementing budget resolution No. 11 of last March, dealing with deferred profit sharing plans, budget resolution No. 12 dealing with the transfer of pension plans or retiring allowances into a deferred profit sharing plan, and budget resolution No. 13 dealing with supplementary unemployment benefit plans.

Then he explained that the second category had to do with the repeal of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. The third category dealt with provincial abatements which are necessary to change and extend the abatements of personal and corporation income tax on income earned in a province in accordance with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. The fourth category he described as consisting of miscellaneous amendments intended, I gather, to tidy up the act and assist in its administration. All in all, this represents a comprehensive package to be contained in one bill.

The bill has been before us since December 21, 1966 and now, as a result of representations, the minister is offering several amendments. The hon. gentleman called this measure a complicated one. Having spent a good deal of time trying to analyse not only the minister's words of last evening but the amendments he proposes to make, I cannot but agree with him. It is most complicated. I should like to thank him, however, for following a somewhat unusual procedure, as he himself said, by giving us advance copies of the amendments he proposes to introduce as we proceed with the clause by clause study.

In his remarks on second reading the minister referred to his budget speech of March 29, 1966 and said he wished to prevent abuse of the provisions dealing with profit sharing plans. I agree that abuses at the expense of the employees must be stopped. I have read the minister's speech very carefully and I must admit that some of his explanations sound reasonable enough. I trust, however, that the circumstances described in "The Tax Corner" of the Globe and Mail of February 24, 1967 will not prevail. I should like to mention that this article does throw considerable doubt upon what the minister is trying to achieve in the bill before us.

I should like to read one excerpt, which incidentally, is by Mr. H. Heward Stikeman in the Canada Tax Service Letter and which has been reproduced in this article "The Tax Corner":

> In these amendments, the government is indulging its growing propensity for using massive legislation to block relatively isolated and minor abuses. The side-effects of the amendments could be more detrimental to the tax-paying public than the loopholes they seek to close. Also, because of their extremely harsh sanctions and the retroactive effect on profit sharing plans already established which are, in many cases, almost impossible to alter, little incentive is left to the businessman to continue or start plans of this type for his employees. The rules of the game have been once more changed in midstream without warning and incentive legislation has proved a trap for the innocent majority because of the antics of a daring few.

I should like to point out also that the article contains a speech delivered by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) to the Toronto Junior Board of Trade in which he raises doubts and criticizes the retroactive features of this bill concerning profit sharing plans. I assume that the hon. member for Kamloops will be speaking later.

Several matters are brought up in that article which seem to point out that there is discrimination in retroactive legislation here, which is not good. I do not intend to go into details at the moment, but I am inclined to think some of these retroactive and very harsh features of Bill No. C-259 may be somewhat alleviated by the proposed amendments. In endeavouring to apply the proposed amendments to the bill itself I found that time seemed to run out before I could analyse the whole situation. As a consequence I am afraid we will have to leave discussion in this regard until we are considering the bill clause by clause.

There is one inquiry I should like to make of the minister which he may answer later. Has the minister met with representatives of the shipbuilding industry, and are they satisfied with the proposed amendments regarding the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act? Other members will have something to say in this regard, Mr. Speaker; but there is one clause in Bill C-259 which I am assuming the minister includes in category 4, namely "miscellaneous amendments". Possibly he or his advisers consider this to be a tidying up clause, but I view it with some alarm. I refer to clause 21. It seems to me the government is using this amendment to the Income Tax Act, which really constitutes a new section, to continue its progress toward a completely regimented society. They seem to be continuing their trend toward making us all numbers.

If we might recall the history of this numbering business for a moment, I should like to point out that it first came about when a new system of numbering was developed for unemployment insurance purposes. At that time various instructions went out to teachers and others to register, even though they were not obliged by law to do so. They were instructed to register and obtain what was to be called a social insurance number. Subsequently this was extended so the same numbering system would be used for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan. Back on April 8, 1964 the Prime Minister stated this was not to be used for income tax purposes. This was an interjection by the Prime Minister as the consequence of a question asked by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. Now this numbering business is to be extended compulsorily to everyone who files an income tax return. So, Mr. Speaker, I am guessing that every new child soon will be registered as a number. Personally I do not like this trend.

Aside from the intent behind clause 21, as the minister has stated the bill is very, very complicated. I do not propose to discuss it further on second reading, but I hope we shall receive full and complete explanation when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have read the minister's speech of yesterday very carefully. I must congratulate him on his lucidity. At the same time I admit that at the end of it I was not much more enlightened than I was at the beginning, but that is not at all his fault; the complexity of the matter which is before the house is responsible. My dullness and lack of experience in the field make it difficult for me to follow the precise terms of what the minister proposes. So my remarks on behalf of this party on second reading will be very brief indeed.

I cannot do other, Mr. Speaker, than say that all of us in our party are happy that the minister has attempted to close holes which were in the law before. I cannot say anything but words favourable to the idea that the use of the profit sharing plan for the purpose of tax evasion should be stopped. I am particularly pleased that the amendments require the vesting in the employee of any allocation or reallocation of funds.

I am equally glad that the minister makes another demand on the employer which I know from experience to be very important; that is, that the beneficiaries must be informed of their rights. Usually their rights are as complicated as the minister's bill, and it is a difficult for the employees to understand precisely what they are entitled to in many of these profit sharing plans as it is for some of us to understand precisely what these amendments will mean in practice.

Finally I greet with pleasure the fact that the new rules will place some limitation on the kind of investment trustees of such profit sharing plans can make. Obviously those limits are placed there for the purpose of protecting the funds against any possibility of erosion through economic action which might affect the investments.

These are the things which we greet with pleasure. They are necessary. I look forward to the minister's promised explanations on each clause and subclause as they are taken up in the committee of the whole. I hope that any fears I may have in this regard will be dissipated when I understand the details a great deal more than I can honestly say I do now. Because of the general reasons that make the amendments socially desirable we support this bill on second reading. If hon. members hear a shorter speech at this stage I should like to know about it.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) may very soon hear a shorter speech on second reading. I must agree with him and with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) that this is a complicated bill. Any attempt to launch into a debate at this time in respect of all the facets of the bill would, I believe, be fruitless. Surely it would be better to deal with the various aspects raised when we come to them individually.

There are one or two questions I should like to ask and I hope the minister will deal with them during his remarks in closing the debate on second reading. Last night the minister mentioned different categories of amendments, some of which deal with provincial tax abatements. I am wondering whether these amendments result from agreements between the provinces and the federal government and whether we can look forward to this type of agreement on a continuing if not on a permanent basis. On the other hand, perhaps they are necessary to tidy up certain arrangements pending a full scale federal-provincial conference which I presume will be convened before long. Perhaps the minister would indicate whether these amendments have been prepared to take care of different situations between now and the time the recommendations of the Carter commission are put into effect or until a completely new approach is adopted in respect of federal-provincial tax sharing.

The minister also referred to what he called miscellaneous amendments. On looking through the bill I found several things which might fall into this general category. Last night the minister mentioned certain amendments relating to the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act and indicated that they did not all appear together in the bill. I am wondering whether, during the clause by clause study of the bill in committee, we will consider the various categories of amendments in sequence.

I do not intend to say anything more about the bill at this time except that it would be helpful if the minister would reply to the three general questions I have raised.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I must introduce a rather harsher note than has been sounded by either of the last two speakers representing the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party, but I find after studying this bill that it contains features which are so objectionable that they render the bill, whatever its primary objective may have been, unacceptable in principle.

The minister has explained that in so far as deferred profit sharing plans are concerned a part of the bill is intended to plug loopholes and to eliminate abuses. One cannot take issue with that objective. If a responsible minister finds that certain schemes introduced to enable taxpayers and their employers to enter into desirable arrangements are, because of some loosely worded legislation, being used for other purposes than those for which the legislation was enacted, resulting in substantial losses to the treasury, I do not think any responsible legislator could take objection to the plugging of the loopholes. Legislation to prevent abuse is one thing, but the enactment of retroactive legislation having the effect of making illegal today a whole arrangement that was legal, proper and approved by the minister yesterday, is another thing. I object very strenuously to the principle of making criminals out of Canadians by retroactive legislation. My very strong belief is that only the courts can decide whether or not Canadians are guilty of criminal offences.

[Mr. Olson.]

This legislation at least opens the door, if it does not accomplish it in actual fact, to a situation whereby a profit sharing scheme worked out under legislation in effect until now, and approved by the minister and registered, becomes illegal. This legislation does more than plug loopholes which may have existed. I have read the bill several times and have read the minister's statement and it may be that I am wrong in my analysis of the effect of this legislation. If I am I will be blad to have my error pointed out. However, because I believe I am right in this regard I feel I must oppose the bill.

Not only does the bill state that a plan must not in future acquire certain heretofore approved securities and investments, now to be called non-qualified investments it must also divest itself of securities of this type acquired yesterday, notwithstanding the fact that the minister approved of such acquisition. In other words, a plan must not only refrain from making this type of investment in the future, it must dispose now of previous investments, and will be subject to the imposition of tax on parts of the proceeds.

Apparently the minister does not disagree with that analysis of the provisions of the bill. Taxpayers who have entered into this kind of an arrangement, under which certain securities were acquired for purposes of an approved profit sharing plan, are now told that what they have done, notwithstanding the formality of approval, will be illegal as from now on and that what was done legally must be undone. These people who acquired these securities, under arrangements which provided that tax on income would be deferred until the plan went into effect and profits were distributed to employees, are now required to dispose of them tomorrow, and they will be required to pay taxes on part of the proceeds of disposal.

Surely this is an exemplification of an aggressive bureaucracy reaching out to take into the coffers of government the proceeds of the sale of taxpayers' property which they are now compelled to dispose of, although they never had any intention of using this property in this way when their plan was set up and approved under the original legislation passed by parliament. It was for this reason that on another occasion outside the house I characterized this legislation as not just bureaucracy run wild but bureaucracy run hog wild. I believe it is time that we in this house served notice on the government, the minister and the Department of National Revenue that we are going to oppose strenuously this approach to income tax legislation which has the effect that, under the guise of plugging a loophole, hitherto legal and proper actions are swept in and made subject to tax penalties. After all, Mr. Speaker, Canadian taxpayers have rights too, or they should have rights. That is the principle that should be followed here.

Legislation may be enacted which has clear and specific effects for the future and taxpayers can study it and be advised as to what they may or may not do, but it is surely not acceptable that taxpayers who have studied existing legislation and taken advice as to what they may or may not do, and have had that advice approved by the minister in the form of registration, should now be told that what was sanctioned by the administration yesterday is improper today, that not only can they not continue to do what they were doing, but they will have to pay a penalty for having done it. I object so strongly to that approach in income tax legislation that I intend to oppose the bill.

Another reason why I oppose the bill is that, if it goes through, as I appreciate it deferred profit sharing plans which are designed to benefit the employees of a company may not be operable in the future except with respect to the larger type of public company. As I understand it, under the legislation or regulations it is intended to provide that these plans cannot be applicable with respect to shares which contain any restriction as to their transferability. In the case of almost every private company, the family type corporation there is a restriction on the transferability of shares. There is a provision which has the effect that if a shareholder wishes to alienate the shares he must first offer them to an existing shareholder at the same price per share as contained in any bona fide offer from outside, and the existing shareholders have the right to exercise that option within a limited period.

That is the nature of a private company. It is incorporated on the basis that a small number of people, having carried on business and being unincorporated, wish to take advantage of the various benefits conferred by corporate structure but they do not want to change the relationship and suddenly find, without notice, some outsider being brought into the corporate enterprise as a shareholder. That is the reason for the restriction on the transferability of shares, and it is a perfectly proper, valid and normal reason. But this is precisely the type of company that may grow through the enterprise and skill of its managers or owners and eventually employ perhaps 20, 30, 50 or 100 people. It is still a small company. It is desired that those employees will be placed in the position, because of their long and faithful service through which they have established an identity of interest with the company, that when the principal shareholders die, they can, through participation in a profit sharing plan, have an opportunity to acquire ownership of the shares.

This system operates in other ways which represent very direct advantages to Canada. If the employees are not in a position where under a profit sharing plan they have the assets to buy the shares, the shares will probably have to be put on the market and sold to the highest bidder if for no other reason than to meet estate taxes imposed by the federal and provincial governments. It has been the practical experience that all too often in such cases the highest bidder is foreign capital. The profit sharing plan represented a very advantageous means by which Canadian employees were placed in a position where they could acquire these shares on the death of a principal shareholder. Employees who otherwise could not have accumulated the capital required to put them in an ownership position have been able to acquire ownership under this system.

This is surely desirable social progress; we should encourage and assist people to become owners and operators of enterprises. That advantage will be gone under this legislation, and the estate of a principal shareholder will be forced to put the shares on the market in order to pay the succession duties. The shares will be sold and the company will probably come under foreign ownership. That is why it is very important in my view that the benefits and advantages of deferred profit sharing plans, inasmuch as they are to be allowed to continue under the new legislation, should be available to the private corporation as well as the large public company which does not have that kind of restriction on the transferability of its shares.

The other objection I have to the bill concerns clause 21, the "numbers clause". Not only are we invited by this bill to pass retroactive legislation making criminals out of Canadians for having done things which yesterday were perfectly legal but we are invited to join in the process of further reducing society to a grey, numbered mass. I am satisfied that one of the very grave concerns in the minds of Canadian people today, and especially in the minds of younger Canadians, is whether they will be able to maintain any individual identity, any dignity, any personal existence, any personal privacy in the kind of organized society which they see growing up around them. I am satisfied that protest and resentment against the growing, grey anonymity imposed by society and big government on the individual have been the reason for these otherwise inexplicable waves of protest—riots, if you like—that every now and then shake some of our larger urban centres.

Here we have a further extension of this process. I realize that in an age of automation when payments and benefits are calculated by computers, numbers are important, so that perhaps to some extent we are compelled to accept the numbering of recipients of benefits such as old age security and the Canada Pension Plan. But now we find in a bill to amend the Income Tax Act the provision that everyone who files an income tax return shall have a number. I protest vehemently and vigorously against this unnecessary and what I can only describe as attempted stealthy extension of the numbering system into Canadian society.

What is the minister doing? Is he trying to play the numbers game in this house? Why does he introduce a provision of this sort into the Income Tax Act? Let the pensions legislation and other legislation with regard to which numbers may be necessary have such a provision, and let the argument be made there and stand upon its merits. But what right has the Minister of Finance to do this in a bill to amend the Income Tax Act, a bill dealing with the filing of income tax returns? By what assumption of authority does he seek to have this house impose upon Canadian taxpayers, without reference to anything else, the obligation to take out a number when they file their income tax returns? It appears to me that the minister is trying to play the numbers game with legislation here in the House of Commons, and I have always understood that the numbers game is a pretty shady sort of racket.

For these reasons and for the reasons outlined by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) I must oppose the bill because while some of its objectives are desirable except for the social security numbers, in our view the objectionable principles and features in the bill outweigh its advantages. It is not as though the objectives could not be accomplished by legitimate and acceptable means. The minister could introduce a bill which said that in the future all deferred profit sharing plans must comply with these new provisions, and we could have an honest debate on this matter. However, when he introduces a bill which says that not only must profit sharing plans comply in the future but that those plans which yesterday were legal, legitimate and approved by the minister will tomorrow become illegal, unacceptable and must be subject to a tax penalty on the disposition of the proceeds, then I say that no objective justifies the insertion into legislation of this unacceptable principle.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) a question? Is the hon. member suggesting that it would be socially preferable to have two classes of plans, one class which would benefit from a previous set of rules giving them greater advantages and another class which would benefit from a new set of rules and would not have those advantages? Is it better to have two classes of plans rather than to have legislation which would reduce them all to the same kind of plan?

Mr. Fulton: I think I have made my position perfectly clear. I object in principle to making illegal and virtually criminal something that was legal and specifically approved in detail by the minister. If the only course is to have one class under former legislation and a new type under legislation introduced today, then that is the position we must accept. But I hope that the hon. member for York South, as a lawyer and as a defender of civil rights and liberties, will join me in opposing legislation which seeks retroactively to make Canadian taxpayers criminals and lawbreakers for doing something for which they had the specific approval of the minister. I hope that the hon. member will join me in opposing that type of legislation.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member a further question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Kamloops prepared to allow the hon. member for York South to ask a further question?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better if that were done in committee.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), as I always do. I must say that, like my colleague for York South, I do not pretend to comprehend fully all the details of this bill. I made an attempt to understand the various clauses as best I could but I must say that I was completely unaware of some of the sinister philosophical undertones in the legislation which the hon. member for Kamloops sees in it. It has become obvious to me that when the bill is considered in committee a good deal of the discussion on the clauses of the bill will centre around the different aspects of the legislation. This is to be expected in view of the heading which appears in yesterday's Hansard preceding the minister's speech on second reading. It appears to put the emphasis on the incorporation of provisions in the Income Tax Act analogous to those contained in the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

My only purpose in participating in the debate at this stage is to say a word about an aspect of the legislation which was not touched upon by my colleague from York South, namely, the proposed repeal of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. I have looked at the clauses in the bill relating to the existing provisions of that act and I find myself in agreement with the recommendations of the minister in this connection. In fact I am prepared to go somewhat further and to congratulate the minister on having had the foresight to take a course which in my view eliminates what was largely a piece of political window dressing introduced by a former Liberal administration in the immediate post-war period when a hue and cry was raised regarding the future of our merchant marine and of the Canadian shipbuilding industry.

As I understand the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act, it is really an act which could very well have been incorporated in the Income Tax Act had it not been for what appears now to have been a ploy at the time to give some comfort to those engaged in Canadian vessel construction. Therefore, to the extent to which the minister is in effect rationalizing the legislation on our statute books by putting the provisions of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act where I think they should have been in the first place, in the Income Tax Act, I am happy to support the minister's move in that direction.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I should like to make in connection with this bill are more in the nature of a protest at the method by which the principle is evolved rather than against the principle itself. I am referring to clause 21 of the bill which contains a definite principle that is to a large extent not connected with the bill, and requires every person filing an income tax return to have a social security number. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) quoted a statement that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made as long ago as 1964 in connection with the use of social security numbers. There are a number of other occasions on which members of the government have solemnly assured the house and committees of the house that it was not the intention of the government to make the social security numbers applicable to everyone in Canada for every purpose. My objection is based on the fact that if clause 21 is adopted the process will be completed and practically everyone in Canada will be identified by a social security number.

In an automated society such as we have at present we must recognize the need for a certain amount of numbering. In fact, I could not conscientiously protest the use of numbers in plans the government brings forward in connection with social justice measures. One could not do so because such plans could not be operated without a reasonable system. To that extent I have to go along with the fact that numbering is necessary in many of the plans that are brought before parliament.

What I protest most strongly is that all the time the government was stating this was not what it intended to do it was in fact, through a series of four or five pieces of legislation, doing exactly this. If we adopt this bill the process will be complete. I should like to outline for a moment how this has been accomplished through a series of enactments that we have passed. It is the way it was done that I wish to protest. If the government had started out by saying, we are making plans for the Canada Pension Plan, for medical insurance later and for automating the income tax set-up, as well as a number of other things which will require social insurance numbers, then we could have had a debate on this subject. We could have settled the matter.

The government would probably have won such a debate because I suspect it would have had the support of the New Democratic Party. We would possibly have lost the battle if we had chosen to oppose the legislation. However, this is not the point I am trying to make. The point is that all the time the government has been protesting that it was not doing this it has in fact been doing it. From the start of the Canada Pension Plan until today we have been assured time and again that the only reason social security numbers were required was related to the Canada Pension Plan. We were told that the numbering would not extend to everybody in Canada but would cover a limited number of people because there would be many people who would not be included in the Canada Pension Plan. We accepted this statement at face value. The Canada Pension Plan came into effect and social security numbers were adopted.

Social security numbers are being used now in connection with other acts parliament has passed and they are being extended to cover the whole field. Following the adoption of the Canada Pension Plan other acts were passed. The most recent was the bill covering the old age pension supplement. Under the Canada Pension Plan everyone who was employed in Canada was covered by a social security number. The self-employed earning over $800 per year, being the majority of Canadians, were also included. However, there was still a group of people who were not included. Recently the old age supplement was brought into existence and it included all the elderly from those who had no income whatever right up to those who had an income of $720. If they draw an old age pension of $900 a year and have another $720 from other income they are within the taxable area, so all the elderly are included and there is no one left who will not be registered under a social security number. It is possible, Mr. Speaker, that this is why the $720 level was selected in the original plan for the old age pension supplement, so that it would provide a group of persons drawing old age pensions who would be eligible for social security numbers?

The present clause 21 in this bill will take in everybody else because it covers every individual who is required to file an income tax return. There will not be anyone left by the time you include those who have an income of not less than $800 under the Canada Pension Plan and by the time you add those covered by the old age supplement and the medical insurance legislation we have just passed. We will find that everybody in Canada is covered by a social security number. My objection is that the government has sneaked up on us in this matter. I feel that they have done so by the inclusion of a section in our income tax laws which really covers a fundamental principle in social legislation, and have tucked it away in a bill having to do with the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act. I noted that last night the minister dealt with the other clauses up to clause 19 and then stopped. I do not know if he had any ulterior motive but he never got to clause 21 when he was explaining the provisions of the bill. I do not know whether we were intended to overlook that or what the intention was.

There is a fundamental principle involved here and it is stuck in the middle of a bill making an amendment to the Income Tax Act. This clause should be the subject of a separate vote and the change should have been made three years ago, not in 1967 when the process has been completed. My objection is to the way in which this program has developed. One bill after another has been introduced which included more persons who were subject to public returns and all this time the government has been saying it was not applying this principle to this group or that group. They have by stealth completed the process of implementing a principle on which we should have voted two or three years ago.

The unfortunate part, Mr. Speaker, is that having once established this principle and the numbering system it is very difficult now to stop using it. If the government had been forthright with the house in the first place when these social security numbers were introduced and had said that we were going to use them for purposes of all social legislation from now on, including income tax purposes, then we could have made a stand on the matter at the time and settled the principle. Perhaps the principle would have been adopted, but at least the people would have known what they were supporting and voting for in the election which took place in November, 1965. But this has not happened, Mr. Speaker, and it is why I protest strongly at the present time.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. I was very interested in what was said by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). It is a very disturbing thought, as the hon. gentleman put it, that this house is approving a bill which may be inequitable in its effect. What the hon. gentleman suggested was that the element of retroactivity is not fair. He said that it is unfair for the government and for this house to say to any company which has established a pension plan that we have given them a clean bill of health but we are now going to make them pay a tax and possibly a penalty as a result of what they have done in the past.

That may sound very logical, Mr. Speaker, but I put it to the hon. gentleman that there are two kinds of companies which come to the minister. There is the one class which definitely intends to set up a pension plan. These companies have an honest intention to set up a workable and feasible pension plan. However, I think the hon. gentleman will also admit that there is another class that comes to the minister for approval not with the intention of establishing a pension plan but with the intention of avoiding payment of income tax.

I am sure that most of us in this house, Mr. Speaker, have had experience of a pension plan set up by a company to provide a pension for its employees. Under such a plan the contributions are usually made by the company; there is seldom a contributory element requiring participation by the employees. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, this is very generous, but in most cases the vesting period of the plan is 20 to 30 years which means that none of the employees is entitled to draw a pension from the plan until the end of that period. Obviously some employees would never last 20 years.

It is also to be noted that the trustees of the plan who direct the pension fund are often the directors and sometimes the owners of the company concerned. And, Mr. Speaker, lo and behold, after a few years these directors decide that the best investment to make on behalf of the pension fund is in the shares of the parent company. As time progresses the pension fund invests in these shares at what are called reasonable prices, though sometimes they are higher than the market value. Shares owned by the directors of the company are sold to the pension fund.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, seldom does one employee derive any benefit from the pension fund because the employees of the company seldom outlive the vesting period of the fund. By this means the directors of the fund, without any intention of paying out any benefits, have been avoiding the payment of tax in that contributions to the pension fund are deductible for tax purposes. And this goes on in perpetuity. All those who have practised law, Mr. Speaker, know that this sort of thing takes place, and I think the hon. gentleman for Kamloops would admit it is not fair.

I think it is fair to say that very few companies would object to the retroactivity clause; and I suggest that those who came to the minister in all honesty with the intention of establishing a good pension plan will not be the serious objectors. The companies we are asked to protect are those which sought the minister's and the department's approval of a plan which, though it complied with the rules, was not intended to be primarily a pension plan but a means of avoiding the payment of tax. These are the companies which will object most strenuously.

I put it to hon. members that it would not be fair to allow these people to enjoy the benefits of what could be termed their fraud by protecting the few who might object to the retroactive element in this bill. I put it to the hon. member for Kamloops that this bill is the fairest way of making all pension plans come within the regulations and I repeat that it is my opinion that very few people with honest intentions will have any serious objection to this legislation.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks. They have been prompted by the speech of the former leader of the Conservative party in British Columbia, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I was very much interested in his denunciation of a proposed piece of legislation which will make something illegal which was hitherto legal. I think that was the force and effect of part of his argument.

Mr. Fulton: My objection is to the retroactive effect not to stopping this being done in the future. My objection is to saying that what was done in the past and which was specifically approved at the time, now becomes, in effect, illegal even at the time it was done and has to be undone.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, this clarification assists me. I must commend the hon. member for Kamloops for his very agile and forceful way of putting up a good fight for a very bad case, if I may put it in that way.

On listening to the hon. member I was reminded of the time in 1960 when the hon. gentleman was minister of justice and piloted through parliament a bill amending the Combines Investigation Act. I submit that at that time the hon. gentleman was author of a piece of legislation which did the very reverse of that about which he now complains. In effect it made something legal which had previously been illegal and by a variety of circumstances authorized an illegal act, namely, a conspiracy to fix prices, especially in the production, distribution and sale of raw fish in British Columbia. Prior to 1960 an inquiry was conducted by the combines investigation branch into the production, distribution and sale of raw fish in that province. This matter was delayed for many years as a result of a number of court actions and to my knowledge the case never did come to trial, though it may have in later years when interest in the subject had died down. In any event the allegation was that the fishing industry as one element and the companies in the industry had entered into an illegal conspiracy to fix prices.

The hon. member, who was then minister of justice, in introducing amendments to the Combines Investigation Act took the course of saying that what was previously illegal should be made legal. Consequently he piloted amendments through the house and the banking and commerce committee which, incidentally, were supported by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon member for Kamloops in a moment. I allowed the hon. member for Skeena to continue along the line he has been following because I thought he wished to establish an analogy between two situations. Certainly, the discussion he is now embarking on is, to my way of thinking not relevant to the bill before the house.

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a question of privilege and not to enter into any detailed debate on the matter to point out that the hon. member for Skeena has completely misstated the effect and the intention of the legislation I introduced in 1960. It did not have, nor was it intended to have, the effect he outlined.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it might be simpler if we returned to considering the bill before the house.

Mr. Howard: I am amazed at the sensitivity of the hon. member for Kamloops. Having successfully drawn my analogy, having drawn blood by way of a protest, and having gone far enough to prove the case beyond doubt, in view of your admonition, Mr. Speaker, I shall resist going further into the very poor case that the hon. member for Kamloops tried to sell the house.

Mr. Aiken: Talk about agility.

Mr. H. R. Ballard (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make two serious objections in a general way to some provisions of the bill. I shall be more specific when we consider the bill clause by clause. One point has to do with deferred profit sharing plans and the amendments in regard thereto in the bill. Section 79C of the Income Tax Act and the amendments to that section in this bill must be considered together as dealing with deferred profit sharing plans. The matters dealt with are not necessarily pension plans, as implied by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). A deferred profit sharing plan can be used for a number of different circumstances. It need not be used as a pension plan for employees.

Many taxpayers of Canada have interpreted section 79C in this light. This is shown by what some taxpayers have done since section 79C was introduced in 1961. The original section 79C laid down a number of regulations governing a deferred profit sharing plan. For example, such plans had to be registered with the Minister of Finance. Instructions were given by the minister about the types of plans which could be registered with him.

The act laid down general criteria about how trust funds could be used. Then, as so often happens, a general clause was included. Section 79C, subsection (2) (g) is the catchall part of the act. It reads as follows:

> (g) the plan, in all other respects, complies with regulations of the governor in council made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance.

It is apparent that if the regulations were not broad enough to catch all the situations the minister had in mind he had this particular clause to fall back on when making additional regulations. As a matter of fact he used this clause to some extent in issuing directives to the various income tax offices for their guidance in assessing these plans.

I am particularly concerned about what the hon. member for Kamloops said this afternoon in regard to the retroactivity of the legislation and the fact that quite a number of profit sharing plans will now be more or less discarded. It was apparent to the Minister of Finance, I believe, that a number of profit sharing plans were instituted for the purchase of life insurance on the lives of principals of companies, and that eventually, on the death of the principal shareholders, the employees would be enabled to buy out the concern without selling its assets. I say that the minister was aware of this because we have this guide line issued by the department. I quote guide line No. 5, as contained in the Canada Tax Service Letter dated January 31, 1967:

> Where the funds of the trustee are used to pay life insurance premiums, they must not be directed to the purchase of term insurance. The proceeds of the insurance must always be payable to the trustee.

This, I maintain, proves that the minister was aware that some of these trusts set up under profit sharing plans were buying life insurance on the lives of the principal company shareholders. The effect of the present legislation is to set up new rules governing the purchase of insurance. The new legislation says that only 25 per cent of the money paid in by employees can be used to purchase life insurance. I know there are many plans, some of which I know of personally, where practically all the money paid in by employees is directed to the purchase of life insurance. I suggest that this bill will change the situation to such an extent that a considerable number of acceptable profit sharing plans will have to be dropped.

I agree with the hon. member for York East that many plans were not acceptable. In those cases the Minister of Finance should have established guide lines to enunciate more clearly the situations under which profit sharing plans could be accepted. With the amendments being made we are putting all profit sharing plans into the same category and condemning them all in the same way.

Mr. Heward Stikeman, Q.C., in the Canada Tax Service Letter dated January 31, 1967, has this to say:

> In these amendments, the government is indulging its growing propensity for using massive legislation to block relatively isolated and minor abuses. The side effects of the amendments could be more detrimental to the tax-paying public than the loopholes they seek to close. Also, because of their extremely harsh sanctions and the retroactive effect on profit sharing plans already established which are, in many cases, almost impossible to alter, little incentive is left to the businessman to continue or start plans of this type for his employees.
> The rules of the game have once more been changed in midstream without warning and incentive legislation has proved a trap for the innocent majority because of the antics of a daring few.

In other words, we are condemning the whole spectrum of profit sharing plans so as to trap a few who have abused the privileges of this procedure. I believe the minister could have brought in amendments capable of trapping the few who are abusing these plans without prejudice to all those who are now participating in the procedure. I think this is a dangerous piece of legislation. It is retroactive. Some of its provisions are applicable to 1966. This is an unusual procedure as far as income tax is concerned. It is not customary to enact income tax legislation which affects prior years. If this were not the practice, how could taxpayers in this country know where they stand at any particular time? They do not if they face the possibility of retroactive legislation at any time.

The other point which concerns me is the further amendment to section 133. It has been traditional in Canada that dealings between the director of taxation and taxpayers should be regarded as extremely confidential. As a matter of fact, until 1965 this area of confidentiality was extremely well guarded under section 133. In 1965 the section read as follows:

> (1) Every person who, while employed in the service of Her Majesty, has communicated or allowed to be communicated to a person not legally entitled thereto any information obtained under this Act or has allowed any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under this Act is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $200.

There was one exception made at that time. When the provinces began to impose income tax, arrangements were made for information to be exchanged between the federal and the provincial departments in order to compare the tax returns reported in each case. This, I suggest, was acceptable. The only other occasion upon which information held by the Minister of National Revenue could be called into the public purview, as it were, was when the courts of justice required its production in a criminal case, there being substantial ground for such a request.

Last year this section was amended in a bill which received royal assent on July 15, 1966. The concept of confidentiality was breached to a large extent by that amendment, the essence of which was that an official or authorized person in the course of his duties in connection with the administration or enforcement of this act could communicate such information to authorized persons, and the act really did not say who these authorized persons were. This matter came to my attention as a result of a case in the Supreme Court of Ontario last fall. I am reading from the Canada Tax Service of November 25, 1966:

> Contrary to what had previously been regarded as the rule under the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act, the Ontario Supreme Court on November 23rd in the case of Bazos v. Bazos ordered the taxation division to produce in court Bazos' 1957 to 1962 income tax returns in a civil case involving the contesting of Bazos' will by his nephew.
> Under earlier jurisprudence the taxation division had been held entitled to refuse to produce tax returns except in criminal proceedings. However, Mr. Justice W. J. Henderson based his findings on Section 133(4)(c) which was added to the Act last year and which permits the communication of information to "any person otherwise legally entitled thereto."
> On the production of the returns the next day the court agreed to relieve the tax official of any penalty for which he might be held liable under Section 133 for communicating the information.

Some time ago I raised a question in the house about the secrecy which attaches to information in possession of the Department of National Revenue and the Minister of National Revenue suggested to me then that the procedure would be amended by the bill now before us. On reading the amendment which is contemplated I find it really does nothing to increase the confidentiality of this information. Indeed, it increases the number of people in the department who can give this information to outsiders, to "authorized people"—and that phrase, as I say, is not defined.

I believe we are departing from the old concept of confidentiality and in my opinion it is not necessary to do so. The minister could spell out in the act itself the people to whom this information is available and not leave it in general terms as is now down. We have seen one case in which income tax files have been used in a civil court. This could set a precedent for future orders by courts for the production of income tax files, possibly for the most frivolous of reasons. We can expect all the records of the department to become a completely open book, and to this I object.

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that I am disposed to vote against this omnibus bill unless the minister provides very clear explanations of some of its provisions when we come to the clause by clause study. I do not wish to repeat the arguments which have already been made but it seems to me that the clause dealing with section 79C has far reaching consequences so far as profit sharing plans are concerned and the initiation of plans of this nature in the future.

[Mr. Ballard.]

Very often many small business firms are closely held within a family or between partners or a very limited number of associates. Concerns of this type often have a group of very loyal employees who, because of the attitude of their employer, continue working for that firm. Under section 79C there was a provision that funds could be set aside by the company to enable these employees eventually to obtain an interest in the company for which they worked and in whose growth they were very interested. I believe one of the legitimate purposes of this section was to permit a company to develop a fund of money drawn out of earnings before taxes which would enable the principals of the company to dispose of their interest in the company in favour of employee groups.

I am not a lawyer and am not in a position to argue the matter from a legal viewpoint, but I believe the minister knows from the correspondence I have had with him that I have some knowledge about some plans which unfortunately were not in a position to be registered before the minister put a freeze on them. In particular I have knowledge of a plan involving a locally owned concern with 30 to 40 employees. Because of the age of the principals the company started to develop a plan in 1965. The first draft of the plan was submitted at that time. Its purpose was perfectly legitimate. It would have resulted in these 30 to 40 employees being able to take over this concern and continue to operate it as the principals. Most of these employees have worked for this firm for many years.

As I read the bill it seems to me that it practically eliminates the proposal which would have accomplished what this company and the employees wished to achieve. As I see it, when the time comes that this very good company must dispose of its assets the result can only be that the employees will not be in a position to acquire these assets. This may result in the company being swallowed up by one of the giants in the industry in which it operates, or it could be that this company might become a small base, and it would be a small one, from which foreign interests might get into this field and build a giant.

I have no objection to the intent of this legislation to cure the abuses which arose when these provisions were made use of by some daring individuals, as I believe the tax foundation put it. I do not object to the closing of these loopholes. I feel very strongly, however, that the minister has gone so far in this massive volume of amendments that he has almost eliminated the benefit under this section. I believe that the result will be that very few companies will even think about profit sharing plans of the type I have outlined.

There is one thing I find very difficult to understand. These plans required registration and there were guide lines which had to be followed. In the case of the company I have particularly in mind their first submission as I say, was in May of 1965. They were asked by the department to make certain changes. They revised the plan, made the changes, met the guide lines and submitted the plan again. There was a delay of six months after their last submission and by the end of 1966 the plan still had not received registration while other plans had. In this case I have every reason to believe that all the requests of the department were met in full. It was a legitimate plan so that the employees would be able to take over the company from the principals involved. I do not know what was the reason for the long deferment of registration but this company did not receive registration and therefore was subject to the freeze.

I have been in communication with the minister concerning this case. When I wrote to him the last time I asked him about the position this company might be in in view of the fact almost two years had elapsed. The minister stated in his letter:

> I have received your letter dated January 13 asking about the new rules for deferred profit sharing plans.

I did not ask the minister about the new rules. I asked him whether he could give me some indication of the position this company was in in respect of the proposed plan in view of the fact that at the end of the first year they were permitted to operate as though the plan had been registered. The minister did not really answer the question I put to him. I can only draw the conclusion that this company is now in the position that this plan cannot be of benefit to the employees in the way it had been hoped it would be when the first presentation was made. It may be in their interests to drop the plan completely. I think this is a mistake.

I may have misunderstood the proposed amendments but I cannot see that they do other than eliminate some plans already in force or which may be in the process of being prepared. Surely it is in the interest of the country and the employees that plans of this nature be legitimatized and registered. If the object of any proposed plan is against the intent of the section, surely because of the registration provision the minister has every opportunity to see that the section is not misused.

With regard to insurance I think we all recognize that the purpose is to provide for the eventuality of the death of one of the principals. One of the purposes of the trustees in investing in life insurance is that in the event funds will be produced through the policy to enable the employees to secure their interest in the company. This was the basic idea in respect of the plan at its inception.

The retroactivity provided for by this bill would seem to have far-reaching consequences. Surely the minister could accomplish what he has in mind in some other way. Improper practices which have been followed up to now could be eliminated from this date onward. It would seem to me that this would close the gap and would not create any undue hardship in respect of present plans. I believe it would have the desired effect. But the minister has gone further than that in his proposed legislation.

There is another clause which I believe will have much to do with whether a plan will or will not succeed. If a plan is intended for the purpose I have outlined, to enable a group of employees to become the owners of a business, then I agree with it. However, some companies have started in a small way, have retained profits to build up and extend operations, and have not paid dividends. The requirement that they can only pay dividends after five years will eliminate the effect of funds set up for the purpose of employees acquiring ownership of companies and will deny these employees that privilege.

When we reach the clause by clause study of the bill I hope the minister will, in explaining his proposal, remove the fears some of us have in this connection.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the Minister of Finance speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to deal briefly with some of the points raised. Some of them will require an extended explanation and I will reserve such for the committee stage.

I entirely agree with those who have spoken today and said that this is very complicated legislation. Indeed, I was horrified when my officials first placed before me the amendments they felt were necessary in order to enable deferred profit sharing plans to accomplish their purpose. Having gone over those amendments I am satisfied they are necessary and very much in the public interest. Before dealing with that particular subject let me answer some other questions that were raised.

The first specific question asked was whether the government or the minister had met with the shipbuilding industry. The answer is yes. We have discussed with that industry generally, as well as with specific companies, the application of the law as amended by this bill and by other legislation already approved of or announced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). Perhaps I should give a short statement at this time in respect of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act and the effects of the bill now before us on that act.

The Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act was enacted in 1949 to provide special tax measures to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada. In January 1966, the Minister of Transport announced changes in the government program to assist the shipbuilding industry. This announcement stated that the provisions of the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act permitting the exemption from taxable income of recaptured capital cost allowances would be discontinued although the rapid depreciation provisions of the act would be retained. Since the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act has to be amended as a result of this new program for shipbuilding assistance and since it is an act which deals entirely with income tax matters it seems sensible to move those of its provisions which are to continue to have effect into the Income Tax Act and regulations. Accordingly, the bill provides that the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act shall be repealed and that its provisions that are to continue to have effect shall be added to the appropriate sections of the Income Tax Act.

Several speakers have referred to clause 21 of the bill in which it is provided that an individual who is required by the act to file a return of his income for a taxation year, unless he has previously been assigned or made application to be assigned a social insurance number, must apply for a social insurance number in order to facilitate the administration of the Income Tax Act. To some degree I understand the objections to the extension of the number state, but I really do not see why there should be any objection to simplifying the system. If we do not use the same numbers we must use different numbers. For the efficient administration of government legislation these days it is almost a necessity that each of us have a code number. From the point of view of better administration of the Income Tax Act it is more appropriate that the same number should be used for that purpose as for social insurance purposes; otherwise there will be more confusion and more expense.

In this regard, if hon. gentlemen opposite object to each of us having a number then they ought to object even more to each of us having several numbers, and that is the alternative we face. While I understand the objection in principle to the regimentation now upon us as a result of the nature of our modern society, I do not believe that objection can be extended to a single number rather than several.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) asked a question about federal-provincial abatements and wanted to know whether these abatements were consequent upon agreements with the provinces or something now being introduced at this time. Let me say that the amendments have two purposes. The first is to re-enact the abatements that expired at the end of 1966, and the second is to include any abatements which result from recent negotiations with the provinces.

Let me now refer to the deferred profit sharing plans and the very complicated provisions of this bill. Perhaps it would help the house if I were to outline in simple language the nature of the legislation. There is a great deal to be said for profit sharing plans. Indeed, some people look upon them as the answer to employer-employee relations, although they have not been able to convince the whole world in this regard. Neverthless, those who do practise profit sharing plans consider them to be very successful.

It is my belief that the government was wise some years ago to recognize such plans and provide for their regulation. It is one thing to have a simple profit sharing plan under which the employer each year decides he is going to distribute a share of his profits to his employees. If that were the situation we faced it would not require such complicated legislation. The fact is, however, that profit sharing plans have become more and more complicated, and they have become more and more complicated, I suggest, for three reasons. First of all, it was soon realized that profit sharing plans would be of greater advantage if they could be used to provide some continuity in the relationship between the employer and the employee. That is why the idea of deferred profit sharing was introduced. Many plans began to emerge in which the profit sharing was not out of current profits but amounts were set aside and were made available after a period to those employees who had remained with the company for the stipulated period. This is the first complication.

The second complication is that these deferred profits when distributed could be used to purchase shares in the company itself. This introduced complications of quite a different kind into the administration of these plans. A third complication is that they became associated with pension plans. In many cases payments were converted into annuities payable at the time of the retirement of the employee from his employment. When my predecessor Hon. Donald Fleming introduced back in 1960 and 1961 the provisions in the legislation relating to these plans he had, I believe, a rather simple idea of the scope of these plans and their administration. The legislation that was presented to the house at that time reflected rather simpler concepts than eventually emerged. It is important that there should be some safeguards in these plans because what is in fact happening is that companies are being relieved of tax on a share of their profits supposed to be paid by them to employees.

Mr. Lewis: Paid to them or allocated to them.

Mr. Sharp: Paid to them or allocated to them. They should become taxable when they emerge as part of the income of the employee. I am informed, and I have seen some evidence on this score from my officials, that these plans began to be perverted; they began to be used as means of avoiding tax. That is why it was considered of importance that there should be some sort of uniform and restrictive rules applied to them. Otherwise, as has been related to me, it is possible for an employer to put large amounts of money into these plans upon which tax is never paid, or alternatively to put large sums of money into plans which do not benefit the employees who are supposed to have shared in the profits of the company but which inure to the benefit of friends of the employer who are put on the payroll simply as a means of sharing in the sum set aside in the trust, which was originally intended for the employees but finally emerged in the hands of special shareholders, the wife of the employer and so on.

It has been suggested that by applying these rules to existing as well as to new plans we are somehow or other being retroactive. I do not think I would bring before this parliament rules that would apply only in the future because in fact these plans are continuing and I could not permit plans to continue under the old rules when I applied the new rules to plans that might emerge hereafter. I do not consider it is retroactive any more than I consider retroactive the changes that are made from time to time in pension legislation which have an effect upon the sums that are set aside in a pension plan by the employer for the benefit of the employee. I am bringing forward, indeed—I hope in a day or so—legislation that will affect pension plans in undertakings that are subject to the jurisdiction of parliament. I do not consider that I will thereby be introducing retroactive legislation. I intend to affect the operation of those plans by making them portable in the future. The provisions will apply not only to existing plans but to those which may be introduced in federal undertakings hereafter. Mr. Speaker, these are the only comments I have to make at the present time. I shall be very happy when we come to the clause by clause discussion to amplify upon this explanation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must advise hon. members of the adjournment proceedings this evening. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Yanakis), Health and Welfare—request for health warning on cigarette packages; the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt), Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

INCOME TAX AMENDMENT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS ANALOGOUS TO THOSE IN CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I am assuming that the minister is going to give some explanation of this clause.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, subclause 1 of clause 1 is intended to make clear what must be included in income as superannuation or pension benefits. It repeals the subparagraph which refers only to "superannuation or pension benefits" and introduces in its place a longer subparagraph which makes clear that income includes a pension or supplement under the Old Age Security Act and the amount of any similar payment under a provincial act. It makes clear that income includes the amount of any benefit under the Canada Pension Plan or a provincial pension plan. It also makes clear that the expression "superannuation or pension benefits" does not include any social assistance payment made on a means or a needs test basis under a prescribed program provided for by a federal or provincial act.

The important change made by this amendment and that provided by clause 2 is that certain social assistance payments need no longer be included in income. It is expected that prescribed programs would include payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, blind persons pensions, disabled persons pensions and provincial old age assistance payments. Section 10 of the act already provides exemption for a number of payments of this class.

Mr. Monteith: What about the additional $30 beyond the $75 old age security payment?

Mr. Sharp: That will be income and will be taxable.

Mr. Knowles: What about payments under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. Sharp: Payments under the Canada Assistance Plan will not be taxable.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Monteith: I would ask the minister about this clause. Would he comment on the deductibility of interest that may be payable by a taxpayer on grants received by him under the program for the advancement of industrial technology or under the northern mineral exploration assistance regulations?

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry. I did not catch which clause the hon. member referred to.

Mr. Monteith: I was referring to clause 3, subclause 1. I refer to clause 3 in general.

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry. Have we passed all of clause 1?

An hon. Member: We are on clause 3 now.

Mr. Sharp: Subclause 1 of clause 3 provides for the deduction of interest that a taxpayer may be required to pay when he has to repay a grant received by him under the program for the advancement of industrial technology or under the northern mineral exploration assistance regulations. It is part of the arrangement that a company which receives a grant under the latter program or under the PAIT program shall have to repay the grant if the company sells or uses commercial products resulting from the research project. Grants made under the northern mineral explorations assistance regulations have to be repaid where the exploration project is successful. Interest has to be paid on the amount of the grants in each case to the date of repayment. This provision is for the deduction of such interest.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6.

Mr. Olson: Clause 6 appears to deal with payments to dental mechanics. On page 9 of the bill these are the words, "in respect of ...constructing and furnishing of a complete upper or complete lower denture."

I wonder why the word "complete" appears. Nothing is said about partial dentures or about repairs to dentures. Such things are excluded. If my interpretation of this clause is correct, what is the explanation for this? Is this clause not restrictive? It seems to me that sometimes the cost of a partial denture is greater than the cost of a whole denture. It may be a greater burden on the taxpayer. Should he not be allowed payments he has made for partial dentures or for repairs to dentures? This clause seems to exclude everything except a payment for a complete upper or a complete lower denture.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member for Medicine Hat has raised a question that is unprecedented. The only case we have had has been in Alberta. We thought we had dealt with the situation adequately.

Mr. Lewis: The minister could not get his teeth into it.

Mr. Sharp: The provision covers both the making and repairing of dentures, of course. We have not had problems about what might be called partial dentures. We were not trying to exclude anything. This particular matter had arisen and we felt we had to make provision for it.

Mr. Olson: If that is so then I suggest that the minister move an amendment deleting the word "complete" which appears four times in the clause. I notice the clause says:

> to a person authorized under the laws of a province to carry on the business of a dental mechanic, for the making or repairing—

That wording is satisfactory. The clause refers to a complete upper or a complete lower denture and then goes on to say:

> —or for the taking of impressions, bite registrations and insertions in respect of the making, producing, constructing and furnishing of a complete upper or complete lower denture,

If the minister accepts my argument the problem can be solved, I suggest, by deleting the word "complete" from the four places where it appears.

Mr. Sharp: May I say a word in explanation and also give the background of this amendment. The amendment provides that amounts paid to a dental mechanic for making or repairing dentures shall be classed as a medical expense for purposes of the act. Medical expenses in excess of 3 per cent of a taxpayer's income are deductible in computing taxable income.

Section 27(1)(c) of the act now provides that payments to a dentist qualify as medical expenses. This has covered payments made to a dentist for dentures, bridgework, etc. In some instances dentures are purchased by users from a certified dental mechanic and where such dentures may be supplied only upon the authority of a certificate issued by a dentist or medical practitioner the Department of National Revenue has taken the broad view under the existing law that the certificate was tantamount to a prescription and accordingly the payment to the certified dental mechanic for the dentures qualified under section 27(1)(c)(viid) as being the cost of prescribed laboratory services. If the person purchasing dentures from a dental mechanic does not have such a certificate the cost does not qualify at present as a medical expense.

[Mr. Sharp.]

With effect from March 31, 1965, the certified dental mechanics act of the province of Alberta was amended to delete the requirement that a certified dental mechanic could not make a denture unless the prospective user had a certificate from a doctor or dentist. As a result the district tax offices in Alberta concluded that they could no longer classify payments to a dental mechanic as medical expenses under existing law. It therefore became necessary to amend the existing law. I give this explanation to inform the hon. member and the house of the purpose of the amendment. It was to deal practically with an issue which had arisen.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I appreciate that explanation, but it seems to me that by leaving the word "complete" in the clause we are attempting to impose medical standards by means of the income tax law. I note what the minister has said about the regulations of the Alberta department of health concerning the certificates required by dental mechanics before they may fit dentures. In my opinion it is the responsibility of the department of health, whether federal or provincial, to impose standards of service upon these dental mechanics. It is unfair and unnecessary to attempt to impose these restrictions by means of amendments to the Income Tax Act.

In my view it is the responsibility of the people in the department of health to enforce the law with regard to what a dental mechanic may or may not do. I know that dental mechanics need certificates from qualified dentists giving a clean bill of health, if I may use that phrase, to their patients, and that these certificates must be presented to the mechanics before dentures are made. I know too that in some cases dental mechanics can and do provide something less than a complete upper or lower denture. They do this to the satisfaction of their patients, sometimes at a substantially lower price.

I should therefore like to move:

> That the word "complete" where it appears in lines four, eight and nine be deleted from clause 6 in the paragraph which appears at the top of page 9.

Mr. Sharp: I wonder whether the committee would allow this clause to stand? If we happen to have a little time over the dinner hour we might make some inquiries about this point. We are dealing here with the taxation of medical expenses. Ordinarily, dentists provide dental services. However, in this case it is now found that a certified dental mechanic can provide dentures without a prescription.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Where?

Mr. Sharp: In the province of Alberta. We have not encountered any case where a dental mechanic was permitted to deal with the patient directly when providing other than a complete denture. It is important to remember that this concerns medical expenses and is an exception from a rule which has hitherto been in the law. There must be some rules about this as we have found when dealing with many other examples of similar expenditure throughout our tax legislation.

Mr. Lewis: What in fact would be less than a complete denture? Is the minister certain that it has to be a denture including every tooth in the mouth? Is it also a complete denture if the frame is across the mouth? I do not know from personal experience.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): A complete denture is a denture that replaces all the teeth either of the upper or lower jaw. A partial denture replaces only a few of the teeth but is also removable. A bridge is fixed; it is soldered to crowns which are cemented to natural teeth.

Mr. Lewis: I would hope for the same consideration in respect of partial dentures. I do not see why a person should have all his teeth knocked out before he can get this benefit.

Mr. Olson: It is possible to have a partial denture which is removable. There are patients who retain some of their original teeth and are fitted with a partial denture which is removable and is not very different from a complete or full denture. I am therefore apprehensive about this provision as it stands. Authorization of dental mechanics to provide these dentures is a relatively recent action as far as some provinces are concerned, notably Alberta. The provinces may or may not have additional means of ensuring that the standard of work will be satisfactory. I am sure they will. In my view it would be a mistake to write into the tax laws something which is completely taken care of by the medical people in the department of health.

However, the Minister of Finance has agreed to let this clause stand. Perhaps we can look at it again after dinner and if there are technical or legal reasons why these words should appear in the clause we can be told what the situation is. In the meantime I am still of the opinion that the word "complete" wherever it appears should be omitted from this clause for the reasons I have given.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that clause 6 be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 7 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 13.

Mr. Sharp: Last evening during the discussion on second reading I distributed to hon. members copies of certain proposed amendments I intended to have moved. The first of these is to clause 13. These amendments were, I believe, also printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings. I have not checked to find out whether this was done.

• (6:00 p.m.)

The first of these amendments is to make a technical change which refers to the application of clause 13. The present subclause provides that the amendment is applicable to 1962 and subsequent taxation years. The proposed change would make the amendment applicable to the 1962 to 1966 taxation years, each inclusive. Therefore I should like to ask my colleague, the Minister without Portfolio, to move that clause 13 of Bill No. C-259 be amended by striking out subclause 3 on page 14 and substituting therefor the following:

(3) This section is applicable to the 1962 to 1966 taxation years, each inclusive.

Mr. Turner: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 14—Definitions.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put forward two suggestions for the consideration of the minister in respect of clause 14. I refer first to subclause 4 at the top of page 15 where an employer is allowed to make payments into a supplementary unemployment benefit plan within 30 days after the end of the year. I am speaking from memory now but I believe that in section 79B there is a provision that payments can be made into a retirement pension plan up to 60 days after the year end. I also notice that in section 79C the period is 120 days after the year end. I suggest to the minister that in order to make it easier to remember these dates the three dates should be in harmony. In other words, I suggest this clause should be amended to read

"60 days" after the end of the year. That is one point.

The other point I have in mind has to do with subsection 3 of clause 14 on page 15. It says that subsections 1 and 2 of section 79A, as enacted by subsection (1), are applicable to the 1966 and subsequent taxation years. To my mind this is certainly retroactive legislation. I am wondering whether the minister would consider changing "1966" to "1967" so that it will become effective on the first of January, 1967?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I deal with the first of these points while my officials are thinking about the second. The reason for the difference in time and for the longer period in clauses other than the one under discussion is that in respect of registered supplementary unemployment benefits the payments are not dependent upon income. So there is no need for any time to elapse before payments are made.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister what practical difference would be made by this clause? I do not object to it. It has always been my understanding that before payments into a fund for supplementary unemployment benefits are deductible for income tax purposes approval must be obtained from the Minister of National Revenue and that it cannot be done without such approval. As I understand it, this really would not change anything in practice except to formalize it. Am I right in my understanding?

Mr. Sharp: I do not expect it will make any practical difference. In fact these plans did not have to be approved and we are now bringing them under a process of approval. Now they have to be registered whereas previously that was not the case.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I should like the record to be clear. Perhaps the minister could obtain the information. My experience in respect of one or two cases has been that the employer in negotiations said that before he could agree to such a plan he would have to make certain from the authorities in Ottawa that his payments would be deductible for income tax purposes. He may have done this informally by verbal conversation or through informal letters, but it always has been my impression that he had to obtain such approval.

Mr. Sharp: My information is that it would of course be prudent for a taxpayer to do that. In fact there were no formal requirements for the registration of supplementary unemployment benefit plans.

[Mr. Ballard.]

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15—Profit sharing plan.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to ask the minister whether I am correct in my understanding that from now on a deferred profit sharing plan will not be approved if the arrangements thereunder consist primarily of the use of payments into the plan to pay the premiums on insurance policies on the life of the principal shareholder or shareholders, with a further provision that on the death of that shareholder the proceeds of the insurance policy will be applied by the trustee toward the purchase of the shares of that shareholder and their distribution among the employees who are the beneficiaries under the plan.

I understand from my reading of the act and from discussion with persons who have made a study of this field that insurance in respect of this type of profit sharing plan will no longer be approved in that the insurance policy will not be a qualifying investment and will be so characterized. I am wondering whether I am right in this, and if so on what reasoning this decision is based.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the reason I am a little uncertain in replying is that I think most of these provisions come up in clause 19 rather than in clause 15. I hope I do not have to repeat the explanation later.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that clause 19 primarily contains what I might call divesting provisions which require plans that will no longer be approved, although they have been approved in the past, to divest themselves of certain of their assets. Certainly it is my impression of clause 15 that it lays down the new specifications in respect of what can be done under approved plans.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Let me direct the hon. gentleman's attention to pages 21 and 22 of the bill and the new section 105K (6) (a). There are references to the acquisition of an interest in or the payment of an amount under a life insurance policy and the disposition of the interest. At page 22 the rules in respect of insurance policy investments are laid down. That might be the more appropriate clause under which we should discuss this subject.

Mr. Fulton: I have no objection to deferring the question until we reach consideration of that part but I should like to relate my other question which is of a general nature, to clause 15.

Clauses 15 and 19 are the two main clauses in respect of profit sharing plans. At this stage I should like to ask on what basis or principle the minister has rested the position that not only should this legislation provide that profit sharing plans which in the view of the government are being used to evade income tax to an unwarranted extent should not be able to carry on in the future but should also force certain plans to divest themselves of assets previously acquired under government approval. In other words, why does the minister insist on a retroactive effect? Why does he not confine the legislation to the future?

Mr. Sharp: I think it is the desire of these profit sharing plans to carry out their obvious intention, to enable the distribution of companies' profits to employees. That is the fundamental purpose of these plans and as such they have a great deal of merit. Some of these plans have been used as substitutes for pension plans. When we regulate in respect of pension plans we are extremely strict. If the hon. gentleman feels we are being too strict about deferred profit sharing plans he need only look at the registration or approval of pension plans to realize that the government in the interest of the taxpayers must be very restrictive as to conditions under which payments to pension plans are deductible from the incomes of taxpayers. Some of these deferred profit sharing plans are being used as substitutes for pension plans, and we cannot permit that to happen without undermining the whole purpose of our program in respect of pension planning. It is in line with that thought that we have laid down rules which, after all, relate to the deductibility of these payments from the taxable income of the company that is earning the profits.

That is the starting point. In the interest of tax equity we have to be sure that if these payments are deducted at one end they come out of the other as being taxable in the hands of the employees. It is perfectly proper that we should do this. I have observed enough of the ways in which these plans can be used to pervert the intention of parliament to come to the conclusion that it is essential to regulate them in such a way. It is also my belief that we should endeavour to change these plans by imposing certain penalties for non-compliance with the rules.

As the hon. member is no doubt aware, we have provided for transitional periods in order that transactions can be unwound and can be brought into line with the principle the government is attempting to apply.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the minister has not answered the question I asked. I am not challenging the suggestion that profit sharing plans must be required to conform to the purposes for which they were instituted, or that the legislation under which payments to the plans are deductible from income must be strictly drawn. A responsible minister of finance is constantly faced with the task of plugging loopholes and the institution of legislation to prevent the possibility of abuse. But that is not to say that this legislation which imposes retroactive penalties in respect of approved and registered profit sharing plans instituted some years ago, is not objectionable.

For the minister here is not only saying that these plans must not operate that way in the future; he is saying that they must now divest themselves of those investments they acquired quite legally and with approval in the past. Why does the minister not confine the legislation to the future rather than making it so harshly retroactive?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I must return to the proposition I placed before the house earlier. In some cases at least these plans have been used for a purpose for which they were not intended. It is true that the legislation was valid, but because we failed to foresee the ingenuity of taxpayers is not a reason we should not prevent them from continuing to do so. The fact is that plans not operating in accordance with the rules now laid down are not in fact distributing the profits to the employees. They are being used for other purposes, and I believe we should bring a stop to this practice. In order to do so I believe we should now apply penalties to prevent these subversive purposes.

It was not the intention of parliament and certainly not the original idea of profit sharing plans that they should be used to enable someone other than a bona fide employee to benefit from accumulated tax free funds. Some of these funds are being used to the benefit of employers' wives or preferred shareholders. Certainly that was not the intention. If we intend to deal effectively with this problem we cannot permit plans to remain in existence which have the effect of using the device of profit sharing for such purposes.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, again I must say that I have no objection to stopping the use of these plans for that purpose. I do not differ from the minister in saying that now the decision has been made we must stop them indulging in abusive practices. But the minister is not just saying that they may no longer continue that practice even though up to now they have been allowed to do it and in fact in the past it was not an abuse.

• (6:20 p.m.)

The minister used a word which I think was very revealing in this situation. He used the word "misconduct." I point out to him that it was not misconduct in the past; this practice was specifically approved. Yet when this legislation is passed we will define the past practice as misconduct and we will say to these employers: Your past conduct, which was valid at the time, is now misconduct. You must now undo it, and in addition we are going to penalize you now for doing something which the Minister of National Revenue approved in the past.

I am not suggesting that because the acquisition of this kind of asset was allowed in the past it should be continued. I say, make a cut-off in this respect, do not allow them to do it in future. But surely it is not necessary, in preventing abuses, to go back in time and penalize that which was not an abuse when it was done.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, earlier today the hon. member for Kamloops suggested that my colleagues and I ought perhaps to support his objection to what he calls retroactivity. I may not be following him but it seems to me that the proposition he puts forward is really indefensible. He must agree, by implication, that there are often abuses in this connection because he says he agrees that the minister ought to take steps to plug the holes which enabled these abuses to take place. It follows therefore from his own statement, if I understood him correctly, that there have in fact been cases where a deferred profit sharing plan was used in a way not contemplated by the legislation.

If the minister uses the word "misconduct", I join him in using it. I am sure he did not mean it was misconduct in the sense of being a violation of the law. I would use the word misconduct as being a violation of the spirit of the law even though the words of the law were obeyed. If you admit that the intention of the law was violated and abused by setting up funds which did not carry out that intention, I cannot understand how anyone can propose that funds which were set up contrary to the intention of the law should be permitted to continue to be administered contrary to the intention of the law. This is precisely what the hon. member for Kamloops is proposing. This is why I cannot join him in his objection. I cannot weep for employers who have in fact abused the intention of parliament, have not paid attention to the needs of their employees but have used deferred profit sharing plans for other and what I would call without hesitation improper purposes.

I suppose that the law as it stood heretofore did not give the Minister of National Revenue any alternative but to approve plans which met the letter of the law even though they violated the spirit of the law. As I understand the minister's proposal, it is in three parts. The first is that the intention of the law be made very clear and that all plans in the future be made to comply with that law. The second is a recognition of the fact that there are now plans which result in abuses of the law in terms of not fulfilling the intentions of the law. The minister says to us, and I say without hesitation entirely properly and in the interests of equity, that those plans which have in the past abused the intentions of the law must be brought into line with the new rules that seek to impose the proper application of those intentions. Third, the minister says to the employer who has a plan which does not meet the new requirements, "I give you a term of years"—if I remember correctly it is until 1970, which is four years —"during which you must divest yourself of investments that do not meet the qualifications of this legislation, and you must adjust your plan to meet the present requirements which are intended to plug the loopholes through which you crawled in the past five years."

I cannot see that that is retroactive legislation. It seems to me that if you did not do that you would impose upon employers who introduced profit sharing plans tomorrow a set of strict rules which an employer who introduced a profit sharing plan yesterday would not have to obey. He could go on forever with a plan that violated the intentions of the legislation and the genuine intentions of profit sharing plans because he would have been lucky enough to get that improper plan into existence before the holes in the legislation were plugged. That is why I could not agree with the hon. member and why the members of my party could not vote against the principle of the bill now before us. I personally, and I am sure this would apply to my colleagues, would have condemned the minister if he had permitted improper profit sharing plans to continue to be improper, which is what the proposal of the hon. member amounts to.

I think the minister is right in saying that from now on all profit sharing plans shall meet the requirements which will make them proper profit sharing plans. Those in the past which did not meet those requirements are now required to take steps to meet them. That is why I could not join the hon. member for Kamloops before, nor can I join him now. I urge upon the committee that the legislation on this point is surely right.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could ask a question of the minister. Is the minister aware of any particular case where the application of the legislation he is presenting would cause the bankruptcy of a company because of the necessity of divesting itself of the interest and profit accruing from the fund, according to the provision before us?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any such companies. Indeed, I would say that all bona fide profit sharing plans can with a minimum of adjustment fit within these rules. My officials have had extensive discussions with the companies which have profit sharing plans, and particularly with the well known and large ones. While these companies find some of the restrictions a little cramping and would prefer to have even greater freedom, nevertheless it is our belief that the profit sharing plans will continue and will flourish as they should.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take part in an extended debate with the hon. member for York South, but I think it is fair to point out to the committee that we have just heard a new and startling version, from perhaps the most prominent legal spokesman of the New Democratic Party, of their doctrine of the interpretation of statutes. That is, that the intention of a statute should be that which the hon. member ascribes to it, and not that which the courts have formed and which has been derived from the actual wording of the statute. This is, of course, a handy doctrine for the New Democratic Party should they ever come to power; but is part of the very principle to which I object.

Unfortunately the minister is also subscribing to that principle because he is saying through this legislation that that which was perfectly within the law and therefore was not an abuse of the law until now is, in his view, now an abuse of the law, because he ascribes an intent or meaning in the law which is not there in its wording. Therefore the minister is asking us to enact retroactive legislation to provide that that which was within the law and was specifically approved by his colleague the Minister of National Revenue now becomes retroactively illegal and invalid and must be undone.

No amount of casuistry from the hon. member for York South will convince me that this should be an acceptable principle. I repeat that I am in favour of changing the law prospectively, and saying that even though up to now this type of investment could be made in profit sharing plans, this cannot continue to be done and the operation of the plan in the future must conform to the requirements that are laid down. But it is unacceptable to say that a company must in addition divest itself of certain assets which it had purchased in the past and incur a liability by paying a tax on the proceeds of their disposition now, whereas its intention might have been to dispose of those assets some years from now.

However, it is obvious that we will not persuade the minister that the principle is more important than the dollars that will be gathered into the tax coffers as a result of the abuse of this principle. I maintain that this legislation is objectionable, and in my view the minister has not given any explanation as to why it is not appropriate to remove the retroactive effect of this legislation and let it speak prospectively with all proper severity and clarity. People should not be penalized because the law did not reflect what somebody now says it was intended to reflect.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I can understand the hon. gentleman's concern about the retroactivity of the legislation. However, I do suggest to him that we are not really violating this principle because if the plans do comply with the requirements laid down in the legislation no penalty is imposed. It is only if they do not, that they might then be subject to some tax penalty. But if they sell their investments and invest the proceeds for the benefit of the employees—and that is all that is at stake here—then of course there would be no tax penalty.

May I say to the hon. gentleman that one can conceive of a situation where a company is not really establishing a profit sharing plan, its purpose being to get access to funds tax free. It establishes a profit sharing plan with a number of employees who are also shareholders and it pays certain sums into that plan. It has tame trustees. It then invests in the shares of a company, which in turn buys the bonds of the company that has established the profit sharing plan, and in the end the company that has established the profit sharing plan never pays the bonds. All that has happened is that the company has had the use of tax free funds without any benefit to anyone except the company itself and its shareholders, with a resulting loss to the treasury.

I do not see how such a situation can be dealt with unless there is a requirement that the company change its investments. The legislation may be retroactive, it may change, it may require that the company change its practices, but I do not believe that parliament is really doing anything improper when it requires such a company to divest itself of such shares and invest for the purpose of benefiting the employees.

I regret to say that the ingenuity of the taxpayer is such that plans such as I have outlined are possible. This legislation was first enacted for well-intentioned reasons, I am sure that my predecessor, Mr. Fleming, was persuaded that it was in the public interest to encourage profit sharing plans, and I believe that in his position I would have done the same thing. I would probably not have had the imagination to foresee the ways in which the purposes of these worthy plans could be perverted, but in fact they have been, and now it is necessary to enact legislation which requires that the plans be used for the purpose for which they were intended.

The method used to do this is not extraordinary, it is just a requirement to change the practices that I think we would all agree are not in the public interest.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I understand we are on clause 15. I should like to ask the minister why an amount not greater than $1,500 has now been changed to $1,500 or 20 per cent of the salary or wages. I am aware of the fact that the company would have taken in the employees regardless of their salary scale on the basis of $1,500. It seems to me that this would have been of benefit to the lower paid employees who were getting paid for their job on a scale equal to that paid for similar jobs elsewhere, and they would not be discriminated against in the salary they were receiving. But certainly we have heard a lot about the average income of people in Canada and we know that every employee of the company does not receive at least $7,500 a year. It seems to me that if this 20 per cent maximum were not imposed under this legislation the legitimate proposals and plans would benefit the lower income employees.

Mr. Sharp: The explanation is that an employer may no longer deduct $1,500 in respect of contributions of employees such as relatives to whom he pays only a small salary. The present provisions were being abused and it was felt that there should be some relationship between the income or the salary being paid and the amounts contributed to the profit sharing plans. I shall have an amendment to propose which may go some distance to meet the legitimate concern of the hon. member for Regina City.

Mr. More: Does the minister have an amendment to clause 15 and does he intend to move it now?

Mr. Sharp: I will be very happy to move the amendment at this time. It appears in the Votes and Proceedings for last night. I will ask my colleague, the Postmaster General, to move the amendment, which reads as follows:

That clause 15 of Bill C-259 be amended

(a) by striking out line 25 on page 16 and substituting therefor the following:

becomes, before that time, a person who is not an employee of any;

(b) by striking out lines 36 and 37 on page 16 and substituting therefor the following:

to his estate, not later than 90 days after the earliest of;

(c) by striking out subclause (4) on page 17 and substituting therefor the following:

(4) All that portion of subsection (7) of section 79c of the said Act preceding paragraph (a) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Amount of employer's contribution deductible

"(7) There may be deducted in computing the income of an employer for a taxation year the aggregate of each amount paid by the employer in the year or within 120 days after the end of the year, to a trustee under a deferred profit sharing plan for the benefit of employees of the employer who are beneficiaries under the plan, not exceeding, however, in respect of each individual employee in respect of whom the amounts so paid by the employer were paid by him, an amount equal to the least of"

(5) Subsection (7) of section 79c of the said Act is further amended by striking out the word "or" at the end of paragraph (a) thereof, by adding the word "or" at the end of paragraph (b) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(c) 20 per cent of the salary or wages paid in the year to the employee by the employer,"; and

● (6:40 p.m.)

(d) by renumbering subclauses (5) to (8) as subclauses (6) to (9) and by striking out subclause (9) on page 19 and substituting therefor the following:

(10) subsections (1) to (3) and subsection (9) shall be deemed to have come into force on December 21, 1966, and subsections (4) and (5) are applicable to taxation years commencing after that date.

Mr. Monteith: Does the minister have, in a few words, an explanation of paragraph (c) of this amendment?

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member asked about paragraph (c)?

Mr. Monteith: Yes.

Mr. Sharp: Paragraph (c) of this amendment would change subclause 4 on page 17 and introduce a new subclause 5. This is a relieving amendment. The present subclause 4 proposes that a new limitation be placed on the amount an employer may deduct as a contribution to a deferred profit-sharing plan. Under the present provisions of the Income Tax Act, the limit on the amount an employer may deduct in respect of each employee who is a beneficiary under the plan is $1,500 minus the amount deducted by the employer as a contribution under a registered pension plan in respect of that employee.

The present subclause 4 would introduce a new limit which would be 20 per cent of the salary or wages paid in the year to the employee. The purpose of this present subclause 4 is to prevent an employer deducting $1,500 in respect of contributions for employees to whom he pays only a nominal salary, such as relatives. As presently drafted, the limitation of 20 per cent of salary would apply to the aggregate of the contributions under a deferred profit sharing plan and a registered pension plan for a particular employee. The amendment to the bill now proposed would make the 20 per cent of salary a separate test that applies only to contributions under a deferred profit sharing plan. This is one of the reasons for my statement to the hon. member for Regina City that this amendment, to some extent, meets one of the objections he raised.

Mr. Ballard: I have one question. I believe when this section of the act was first introduced in 1961, old age pensions became payable at 70. I feel this is the reason that age 71 appears twice in the section. I was wondering if the minister should be considering making the termination of this plan, in so far as individual employees are concerned, match the date when the old age pension becomes effective? At this time that would be 67, and in two years' time it would be 65 instead of 71.

Mr. Sharp: I understand that age 71 is used to place an outside limit on the time the amount may be paid. It may of course be paid earlier than that, and age 71 had nothing to do with the Old Age Security Act but had to do with registered pension plans or retirement savings plans.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I move the amendment.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 as amended carry?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Clause 15 agreed to.

On clause 16—Extended meaning of drilling and exploration expenses and prospecting, exploration and development expenses.

Mr. Olson: I should like to have some explanation of clause 16. It deals with the deductions from drilling and exploration expenses. As I understand the purpose of this amendment, one may deduct from these expenses any grants or any payments that are made under the northern mineral exploration assistance regulations. I am wondering if the minister can tell us if the result of the amendment would be that a profitable company which would be paying taxes would, in fact, have to reduce the total amount of grants that may be paid under the northern mineral exploration assistance regulations in completing corporation income tax payments for the year? If that is a correct assumption, then I have one or two other questions to ask.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, this amendment provides that drilling and exploration expenses, prospecting and development expenses of a taxpayer will be reduced by the amount of any grant received by him under the northern mineral assistance regulations, and will be increased by any repayment by the taxpayer of such grants. The northern mineral exploration assistance grants are grants paid to assist exploration for oil and minerals in northern Canada. They are paid under regulations passed or approved under authority of an Appropriation Act, item 7A of the 1966-67 supplementary estimates. Grants may be paid to a Canadian citizen or to a corporation that is controlled by a Canadian citizen or to any corporation that has its common shares listed on a Canadian stock exchange. Grants are not paid to oil or mining companies that are eligible for special write-offs under section 23A of the Income Tax Act.

The grant may be paid to corporations formed for the purpose of exploring for oil or minerals in the north. The grant is up to 40 per cent of the accrued cost of the exploration project. The northern mining exploration and assistance grants are repayable if the exploration project is successful. The repayment may be spread over ten years or such other time as the company wishes or the minister of northern affairs decides. Interest is also payable on the repayment from the date of success.

Amendments to the Income Tax Act are necessary to clarify the tax treatment of the grants that are received, and the repayments. Without clarification, there is some possiblity that the repayable grants may be treated as loans which are forgiven if the project is unsuccessful. Such treatment would give unusual and unintended benefits to the taxpayer. The proposed amendments will provide that the amount received as a grant reduces the amount that may be claimed as drilling and exploration expenses. Any amount that is repaid would be taken to be a drilling and exploration expense. Clause 3(1) provides an amendment to allow the taxpayer to deduct interest on the repayment of these grants. This we have already approved.

Mr. Olson: If this amendment simply represents a tidying up of things to be done, some problems that have arisen, then it seems to me the effect may be to slow down exploration and development. It seems to me also that it is highly desirable that these Canadian companies which do, in fact, qualify for grants under the northern mineral exploration assistance regulations, should continue to have this advantage because, as the minister well knows, there is great risk involved in this kind of exploration and development. The minister has pointed out that these grants are not paid to other than Canadian companies. I have no disagreement with that. I believe a valid case can be made, with all this talk that is going on about foreign control of our resources, for the desirability of giving some advantage to Canadian corporations.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Chairman, I was asking for an explanation because I did not quite understand all the implications of this amendment. If the amendment is simply to tidy up some anomalies which may have come to light in the application both of the Income Tax Act and the northern mineral exploration assistance regulations, then I suppose it is acceptable. But if the effect of the amendment will reduce in any way the advantage that Canadian corporations have in this field of high risk exploration and development, then I want to tell the minister that I think it would be undesirable.

I do not think any new penalties are being imposed on Canadian companies, though of course this may be possible. There may be some foreign-owned companies which may, for example, have access to some special tax deduction privileges in the United States for this kind of development involving high risk. If Canadian companies are not at the same level of advantage under Canadian law as are foreign companies, so far as their home government is concerned, then I think the minister should give us an explanation and should make whatever adjustments are necessary to make certain that Canadian companies are at least on an equal basis with any foreign-owned company engaging in exploration and development.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the general sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. These special grants were introduced specifically for the purpose of encouraging Canadian companies to engage in exploration in the north. Otherwise these advantages would, in effect, have been available only to large, foreign-owned corporations, and this would have been most unfair and certainly not in the interest of Canadian companies.

The only purpose of the amendment being made now is to avoid double counting to give an unintended benefit. It should be borne in mind that these allowances for exploration and drilling expenses can be carried indefinitely. Therefore, it would be quite possible unless we clarified the situation to make both the grant and the allowance, which is not what we intended and is not necessary to equalize the position of these new companies which are taking advantage of this legislation with the position of other companies already engaged in this business, companies which have large incomes against which to write off their drilling and exploration expenses.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I have some recollection of being advised that some United States companies enjoy a tax write-off or deduction privilege under United States law that in some cases puts them in a relatively advantageous position vis-à-vis Canadian companies in the matter of engaging in this kind of exploration in Canada. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether or not he is aware that any of these foreign companies have an advantage for taxation purposes that is not enjoyed by Canadian companies under Canadian law at the moment.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I can recollect long arguments when I was an official about the relative tax positions of Canadian and American mining and oil companies. The argument continues and I expect it will continue. The Carter commission has only provided a new round of discussion and a new enthusiasm, of which I expect to be the beneficiary in the near future.

Mr. Olson: I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that we now have this royal commission report on taxation and that when we have had sufficient time, and particularly when the minister has had time, to give the report appropriate study we may have some changes to make. But on this day, February 28, 1967, we have before us amendments to the law respecting income tax deductions for drilling and exploration expenses.

I should like to put my question again, and I do not think it is an exact repetition of the previous question. Has the government made any search of the law in this regard? We certainly have a vast assembly of foreign companies in Canada which in many cases are conducting this kind of exploration work. I would ask the minister whether the government is satisfied that Canadian companies are at least on an equal basis from the taxation point of view with some of the foreign owned companies with which, to some extent, Canadian companies compete. This competition gets to the point that if foreign owned companies have greater advantage than Canadian companies, the risk is such that they are more anxious to move in and undertake some of this high risk exploration work. However, Mr. Chairman, in the end if these companies find something worth while it is they who wind up with the assets.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the minister and his officials should have ascertained the position so as to make sure that by passing this amendment we are not putting any Canadian company in a relatively disadvantageous position in conducting this kind of work. Over the long range we want as many Canadian companies as possible to be involved in exploration, so that it is those companies that wind up with the assets if and when their efforts bear fruit.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I am rising to ask a question either of the hon. member for Medicine Hat or of the minister, so that we can at least understand what this discussion is about. As I understood it, the minister and the hon. member for Medicine Hat are agreed that the grants under the northern assistance regulations are available only to Canadian companies; I think I understood that part clearly.

What is puzzling me, in part at least, about the argument being advanced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat is this: By implication it almost seems that foreign owned companies must be receiving similar grants from government funds in their own country which they put into exploration in Canada. It seems to me that this is a rather strange procedure for another country to adopt. Have I got that straight or have I not?

Mr. Monteith: Seven o'clock.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member has followed the argument. What I am asking the minister is whether he and his officials have ascertained whether or not Canadian companies are in a relatively disadvantageous tax position vis-à-vis foreign companies in the matter of drilling and exploration. I agree there is the possibility that there may be some double advantages under the act as it is now written and perhaps this amendment will tidy the position up. But the question that I posed was whether, by passing this amendment to the act, we would reduce the relative advantage of Canadian companies, which I say would be undesirable.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that simply by making another amendment to clause 16 we equalize the situation, because other decisions may be made in this matter by other governments. But in the matter of exploration in Canada, Mr. Chairman, I believe that Canadian companies should have at least equal advantage.

The Chairman: Order. Pursuant to an order of the house made on Monday, February 20, I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume its work at eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at seven o'clock, clause 16 was being considered.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, in deference to the hon. member for Medicine Hat who asked a question at seven o'clock—had he asked it earlier he might have got an answer—I wish to say this. The hon. member referred to taxation in Canada and in the United States and raised something that has been asked about on many occasions. He wanted to know whether Canadian law as it relates to the taxation of mining companies is of greater or lesser advantage to Canadian companies than is United States law with respect to United States companies.

I do not think it is possible to answer that question. Depletion allowances in the United States are greater than those allowed in Canada. On the other hand exploration and drilling deductions generally speaking are more advantageous to Canadian companies. That is not the point concerning us here. All companies in Canada, regardless of who owns them, have the same tax laws applying to them. When we were considering giving a stimulus—and I believe stimulus would be the right word—to northern mining exploration, other than in the customary way of writing off exploration expenses, it was decided to bring in new legislation, or a new appropriation to encourage Canadian owned companies to embark on exploration that they otherwise might not do. Various plans were developed for these purposes and they are embodied in the appropriation acts and in new legislation.

The amendment now before us has nothing to do with the relative positions of foreign owned and Canadian owned companies. It was brought in to clarify the treatment of grants made under the northern mining exploration legislation or under appropriations related to it. We feel this clarification is necessary, otherwise a double benefit will be accorded, which was not intended.

So far as Canadian and United States owned companies engaged in mining in Canada are concerned, their positions are exactly the same regardless of who owns them. The question of whether our tax laws are more advantageous or more stimulating than they are in the United States is not one with which we need to concern ourselves in this legislation. The only argument that arises is as to whether United States companies have greater encouragement to explore for minerals in the United States than companies organized in Canada have to explore for minerals in Canada? But companies situated in Canada are all subject to similar tax laws.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I shall not pursue this much further. We have here a situation which the minister calls giving a double benefit. We have Canadian companies receiving grants, in some instances under the exploration assistance regulations, as well as being allowed to deduct drilling and exploration expenses from income for taxation purposes. That is what the minister calls a double benefit. Be that as it may, Canadian companies enjoy an advantage here that is being withdrawn. It is true that depletion allowances in the United States are greater than those we have here.

The minister talks of other advantage accruing to Canadian companies with respect to development expenses. I will not go into details because I am not completely familiar with the subject. The minister also, before the dinner recess, talked about some things contained in the report of the royal commission on taxation. In press release No. 14 of that report it is recommended that there be an immediate cancellation of mining and petroleum depletion allowances and a phased withdrawal of the three-year tax exemption for new mines. That, as I say, was a recommendation of the royal commission to the Minister of Finance.

• (8:10 p.m.)

This press release, presumably an official press release from the Minister of Finance, stated:

> The commission conceded that the existing concessions have encouraged Canadian mining and petroleum activities.

I emphasize the word "Canadian". It is my belief that the withdrawal of these concessions will be to the great disadvantage of Canadian companies engaged in this kind of exploration and development. The press release goes on to quote the commission as saying that the proposed tax reforms might shift some of the investment in mining and petroleum into other activities. Possibly this is desirable, and possibly not. If there is a shift of Canadian funds and investment into other activities as a result of action taken by Canadian law, there is not much validity left in the contention that there is too much foreign ownership of the mining and petroleum industries in Canada today.

This press release No. 14 goes on to say:

> If public policy dictates a need to stimulate mineral exploration, subsidies rather than tax concessions should be used, the commission added. For example, the new government loan program for northern exploration could be expanded; increased subsidies for transportation, communication and geological surveys could be made—

Here we have a situation in which the minister has referred to a change which may come about as a result of this report on taxation. At the same time we are withdrawing an advantage which Canadian companies presently enjoy. I suggest that the effect of this amendment will be that the total amount of the grant made under the act, which is intended to provide assistance to companies engaging in mineral exploration, will be withdrawn as a tax deduction from the expenses claimed for drilling and exploration.

Various ministers of the Crown have travelled about the country moaning and groaning about the degree of foreign control over Canada's basic industries. They should use what influence they have over the Minister of Finance in respect to matters of this kind. In this case we are withdrawing an advantage which Canadian companies possess at the moment, and if certain of the recommendations made by the Carter commission are implemented—I cite the recommendation that all the petroleum depletion allowances should be withdrawn—the position will be worse still.

On page 5 of this press release something is said about increasing the capital cost allowances for certain property. We do not have this proposal before us at the moment and we are not likely to have it before us for several months, at least, if we accept, as I do, what the minister said yesterday about the recommendations contained in this report.

The Minister of Agriculture was in Lethbridge the other day. He took the occasion to complain about foreign ownership of Canadian industry, and a newspaper reported him under the headline: "Greene Favours Limiting All Foreign-controlled Firms". The Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Davenport, goes about the country saying Canadians should own a great proportion of our industry. Yet when we reach this one point in the Income Tax Act where a distinct and definite advantage is offered to Canadian companies, the law is amended so that a large portion of this advantage will be withdrawn.

The minister says these companies were receiving a double advantage which was never intended. I could give many examples of cases where a double advantage is given by way of grants to designated areas, for example. The fact that these mining and oil companies are allowed to deduct the full cost of drilling and exploration, notwithstanding the fact that they have received a grant, is a factor which in my view leads to the desirable end of giving an advantage to Canadian companies.

I will not labour the point further. If any attention is to be paid to these complaints which we hear from members on the front government benches that Canadians own too small a share of the country's industry, we should not be considering an amendment such as this in parliament today.

Mr. Sharp: May I make a brief comment? First, so that the record may be clear, may I say that the Department of Finance has never issued any summary of the recommendations of the Carter commission. That summary was drafted by the commission itself. I will take no responsibility for it, nor do I want any of its views attributed to the government. The only purpose of this amendment is to ensure that the company cannot have both a grant and a write-off with respect to the same expenditure. That is all. I believe this is fair and equitable. Otherwise there would be ground for complaint from other taxpayers that a special and unwarranted advantage had been given to a particular class of taxpayers.

Mr. Winkler: I would like simply to say that the minister has no reason to be concerned, because the vehemence of the hon. member for Medicine Hat is exemplified by his support of the government at all times.

Mr. Olson: I would remind the hon. member for Grey-Bruce that he should confine his remarks to the bill before us. These other things are just useless observations which simply waste the time of the committee.

Mr. Winkler: My observations are not so useless when it comes to the support of the government.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 agreed to.

On clause 18—No deduction in respect of sale of property in certain circumstances.

Mr. Olson: The marginal note here reads: "No deduction in respect of sale of property in certain circumstances. The explanatory note tells us:

> The purpose of this amendment is to provide that a deduction may not be allowed under paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 85B in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year where that taxpayer ceases to be resident in Canada or becomes exempt from tax in that year or in the next following year.

The clause itself says that certain provisions of the act do not apply so far as this tax is concerned with respect to property sold in the course of the business where the taxpayer ceases to be a resident of Canada, and so on. Can the minister give us an example of what this is intended to cover?

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I may give a somewhat fuller explanation of the purpose of the amendment than is contained in the note. This amendment is intended to close a loophole by providing that a taxpayer may not take a deduction for a reserve for a taxation year where the taxpayer, in that year or the next following year, ceases to be a resident of Canada or becomes exempt from tax.

Section 85B(1)(d) provides that where an amount has been included in a taxpayer's income from a business in respect of property sold in the course of the business and that amount is not receivable until some time in the future, the taxpayer may deduct a reserve equal to a portion of the profit from the sale.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Under the existing law taxpayers can escape tax altogether by becoming non-resident or exempt between the date of sale and the date at which payment is received from the purchaser. To prevent this, it is necessary to amend section 85B to forbid the claiming of a reserve at the end of the year during which or after which the taxpayer becomes non-resident or exempt.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 19.

Mr. Fulton: In respect of this clause, Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a question I asked earlier concerning the possibility in the future of deferred profit sharing plans being used for the purpose, and through the medium, of policies of insurance to provide for the acquisition of the shares of a deceased principal shareholder, and their distribution in turn among the beneficiaries of the plan who have been the employees of the company. I have been told that a profit sharing plan subject to the simple proposal I have outlined no longer would be approved, and that an insurance policy would no longer be a qualified investment for those purposes. Could the minister tell me what the situation will be?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is, provided the insurance is of what might generally be called the endowment type, there is no limitation. The trustee fund can purchase an endowment type of policy upon the life of the principal shareholder without restriction. However, if the insurance is of another kind, then there are limitations concerning the proportion of the income of the plan which can be used for the purchase of insurance.

Mr. Fulton: Am I correct in understanding that if the insurance says that on the death of the insured prior to age 71 the proceeds which are payable can be used to purchase the shares of the insured, and that after age 71 when the endowment materializes, the proceeds can be used for that purpose. Under those circumstances could such a scheme be approved?

Mr. Sharp: My understanding is that this is merely for the purpose of defining the kind of endowment policy that is acceptable as an investment. Perhaps members of the committee will understand the reason for the limitation if I state it in this way. If there were no restriction, then it would be possible for all the fund to be invested in a term policy on the life of the principal shareholder, which might never be of any value; it would be a gamble in respect of the time at which the shareholder would die. The endowment policy ensures that there is an investment which inures to the benefit of the members of the fund. That, as I understand it, is the principle which is involved here. These limitations are only to describe the kind of endowment policy that is acceptable as an investment.

Mr. Fulton: If you look at subclause (d) on page 22, at lines 13 to 20, you will see the following:

> The cash surrender value of the policy ... is or will be, at a time before the 71st anniversary of the birth of the insured person, if all premiums under the policy are paid, not less than the maximum total amount ... payable by the insurer under the policy—

I assume that this is so that in effect the policy matures at age 70, and then it would have to be a term of the plan that the proceeds will be used at that time to buy the shares of the insured person and that the shares then will be distributed between the beneficiaries.

Mr. Sharp: I do not think it matters what are the terms of the plan. The first part of the description by the hon. member is correct; that is, that some time before the 71st anniversary of the birth of the insured the endowment policy matures, but the fund does not necessarily at that time acquire the shares. The proceeds go into the fund and can be used for whatever purpose the plan has in mind.

Mr. Fulton: Then, Mr. Chairman, I have one other technical question on this aspect of the matter. If the minister would look at subsection 6 at line 41 on page 21, he will notice that the introductory words are "For the purpose of this section", and then it goes on to describe the circumstances under which the acquisition of a policy of insurance will not be deemed to be a non-qualified investment, and so on.

I wonder whether those words should not be "For the purpose of this part"; that is, the part we are dealing with, Part IIE, because the intent and effect of the other clauses in this bill are that all things which are called non-qualified investments must be disposed of within certain periods; otherwise there is an extra penalty with regard to the tax. I have a concern lest a policy of insurance which is deemed to be a non-qualified investment owing to the purport of one section, is not sufficient to make it clear that with regard to the other sections of this part it would be exempt from the necessity to dispose of the tax penalties. In other words, is the exemption of insurance policies made applicable to the whole of this part of the bill; that is, insurance policies which are in accordance with the provisions set forth here.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I make two comments on what has been said by the hon. member for Kamloops. In the first place, it may give him some assurance to know that these sections were examined very carefully by the insurance industry itself, which has a very great interest in them. They do not feel that this is as limiting as the hon. member has suggested. Second, I am advised that if one were to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member, it would make the situation worse, because this section deals with insurance as such; it does not attempt to lay down a principle that a life insurance policy is a non-qualified investment. That is the principle on which these sections were drawn. It was an attempt to narrow the disqualification of insurance to specific kinds, and to place limitations upon them.

I am assured that the hon. member's suggestions would not accomplish his purpose. I hope he derives some assurance from the fact that the insurance companies have also adopted this attitude.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am forced to reiterate the objection I made earlier today in respect of the retroactivity of this measure. I cannot understand why there is a necessity for providing a legal prohibition in respect of something that has occurred in the past. Surely that was not the intent of the original legislation.

The next point I want to raise relates to clause 19 and the proposed changes to the Income Tax Act. Let me refer to page 27 of the bill at line 38 and following, continuing on to page 28, which deals with equity shares of corporations. There are very complicated provisions involved, and if I understand their effect correctly it is to qualify investments for trusts governed by deferred profit sharing plans.

As I understand this part of the measure, it deals with the investments which a plan may make, or trustees may make; yet one of the clauses qualifies the investment in respect of equity shares. It refers to equity shares of a corporation by which, before the date of acquisition by the trust of the shares, payments have been made in trust to a trustee under the plan for the benefit of beneficiaires thereunder, if the shares are of a class in respect of which there is no restriction on their transferability, and in each of four taxation years of the corporation in the period of the corporation's five consecutive taxation years that ended less than 12 months before the date of acquisition of the shares by the trust, and in the corporation's last taxation year.

This seems to me effectively to exclude from that classification of investment the shares of a private corporation because, as I pointed out, this normally would apply to restricted shares in private corporations, and the transferability for the purpose of holding those shares as restricted to the members of the private corporation.

It is my hope that the minister will explain the effects of this clause relating to the restriction of transferability in respect of private shares, because there is some question regarding profit sharing plans, particularly when you take into account the other features of these plans. I refer particularly to one of their objectives; to give their employees the opportunity to participate in the funds of the plan and the transferability of shares upon the death of shareholders who are, in other words, the owners of the corporation. Will the minister explain the restriction in this regard?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this section is to limit the investments of profit sharing plans to shares in respect of what might be termed family businesses. As hon. members will see, if we did not have any such restrictions, the trustee could buy the shares of a family business, which could not be sold except to the family. This might not accomplish the purposes which we have in mind.

If profit sharing plans are designed to share the profits among employees we do not believe it would be in the interest of the employee to have the plan designed to invest in shares that could not be transferred freely. Otherwise the funds themselves might be placed in a position in which the shares could only be sold to those individuals who were members of the shareholder family. This would obviously defeat the purposes of the plan, or could be used for the avoidance of taxation. Let me assure the hon. member that this is exactly the reason we have placed this restriction on profit sharing plans.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that what the minister is saying is that we should throw out the baby with the bath water. Instead of defining the restrictions and the exceptions, what is being said is that there are no exceptions at all, or perhaps I should say restrictions. Obviously there must be an advantage to the plan if the benefits cannot be transferred to the employees who should benefit.

The only thing to be contemplated as a result of this measure is a restriction confined to transferability, because seldom if ever will a private company have no restriction on transferability of its shares. Why does the minister not provide by legislation a clear indication of restrictions rather than an indication or an absence of accepted restrictions? It seems to me that under the present provisions there is no restriction, or to say the least an unqualified restriction as to transferability.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I must come back to the point at issue here relating to deductibility. A profit sharing plan is based on deductibility from the taxable income of the employer or employing company. I do not think we would be wise to allow a deduction from the income of an employing company unless there is a complete transfer to the employee. If the plan is such that it invests in shares of the company which are restricted as to transferability I do not think we can be assured that the benefit will accrue to the employee. Therefore, I am very much of the view that there should be no restriction on transferability of these shares. Otherwise I believe we are in fact giving a deduction for something that is not being transferred in full to the employee. After all, the employer can obtain deductibility simply by transferring a share of his profits; the profits do not have to be deferred or invested in shares.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not really like to engage in this sort of argument, but transferability may not mean at all that the shares cannot be sold: You may have to wait 30 days, and that is all. It does not destroy the marketability of the shares. If the company is a good company, outside people will make an offer, and if the family or other shareholders do not want to meet that offer, the shares can be sold. It seems to me an extremely desirable objective and proper purpose of these plans to have in mind that on the death of the principal shareholders employees will themselves become shareholders and owners of the business, and any plan that facilitates this should be approved and encouraged rather than discouraged.

If we were to include this provision, not even the proceeds of the insurance policy could be used to buy the shares and put them in the plan, because of the blanket exclusion here in respect of any shares which have any restriction on their transferability. I did not have an amendment to propose, but because

I do not think the minister really meant the argument he has advanced, I move:

That clause 19 be amended by deleting from the proposed section 105Q the words, "(A) there is no restriction on their transferability, and", where they occur at lines 44 and 45 on page 27.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, is this amendment before us?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

The Chairman: Order. It is moved by the hon. member for Kamloops:

That Bill C-529 be amended by deleting the words: "(A) there is no restriction on their transferability, and", at lines 44 and 45 on page 27.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, with some of the things the hon. member for Kamloops has said I am in sympathy, and I can see some validity in his concern in certain cases. But it seems to me that the amendment which is moved could not possibly be accepted, at least as far as my submission goes, because what is being done by removing these words and not replacing them with any others is enabling a profit sharing plan to be locked in to the non-transferable shares of a private company. Surely the hon. member cannot intend that. When he was speaking I thought he was appealing to the minister to make some amendment to this language so that in certain cases, if the restriction is of a certain kind only the investment would be a qualified investment. But instead of producing an amendment of that sort, which might have been looked at with some sympathy, the hon. member has produced an amendment which would mean that the proceeds of a profit sharing plan could be invested in the shares of a non-profit company and be locked there for as long as the employer desired, no matter what happened to the shares, what the employees wished, or anything else. Surely this does not accomplish the rather limited purpose of the hon. members's intention as he expressed it. We certainly could not support an amendment which would have the effect which I have suggested.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I need add very little to what has been said by the hon. member for York South, who has put his finger upon the essence of the problem. It would be possible to argue that profit sharing plans should never invest in the shares of the company itself, if one were looking at the original purpose of deferred profit sharing plans. The original purpose of deferred profit sharing plans was to enable the employees to share in the profits they were helping to create. But, as I said earlier, as a result of introducing the principle of deferment, introducing the further principle of using these funds to acquire shares in the company, and introducing the further complication that they could then be used as a form of annuity or pension, one has to make some compromises. Apparently it is now accepted as part of the doctrine that these profit sharing plans should be used to help employees acquire shares in the companies in which they work. So we have in a sense moved away from the pure theory of profit sharing plans toward a rather different concept.

A qualified investment includes investment in the shares of the company itself, but we have also tried to ensure that the investments are of such a character that the employee has a reasonable prospect of getting out of the fund the amount that the employer put in out of his profits.

It may be that with more experience we will be able to define more carefully the nature of the restrictions on transferability that are most to be feared, but I think the committee will realize that this is the first extensive effort to regulate these funds and plans. They were introduced for the first time in our legislation five or six years ago. On the basis of the experience that we have had until now we believe that it is necessary to be much more detailed if for one reason only, namely that these plans have been abused and we are trying if possible to establish regulations which will reduce the abuse.

I have to take very strong exception to the amendment that has been proposed because I do not believe that it would be in the interests of the employees that the funds should be invested in securities which have restrictions on their transferability. Therefore I hope that the hon. member will withdraw his amendment, and if not I certainly will vote against it because I do not believe it is in the interests of the employees.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister had something better to offer I would be glad to withdraw my amendment in favour of his. However, all he has said until now is that he does not see why the provision should not be in here. In brief, I do not claim the ability to draft an amendment on the spur of the moment which would specify the kind of restriction which we all agree might be acceptable. Nevertheless I think it is more to the disadvantage of the employees to exclude from investments in deferred profit sharing plans shares in private companies, which is what the bill does —they cannot have those shares in their portfolio under the present bill—than an amendment which says that these shares can be included even though there are some restrictions on their transferability. Let me point out that the kind of restriction that is normally applied does not exclude their sale, it merely gives an option to someone else to buy them at the proper price, so the employee will either get the shares or their fair market value.

Therefore in the absence of some indication by the minister that he will substitute another amendment for the one I proposed, I cannot withdraw mine.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: yeas, 25; nays, 51.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister one or two questions with regard to the proposed section 105L of the bill which appears at page 23. Am I right in my understanding that under this section a plan which will not now be approved must dispose of all non-qualified assets or investments, and even if it disposes of them immediately after this legislation comes into effect it is liable to pay a tax on part of the proceeds of that disposal?

Mr. Sharp: If the fund does dispose of the non-qualified investments in accordance with the schedule laid down in the act, then no penalty whatsoever is imposed. Indeed if it pays the penalty and then disposes of the non-qualified assets or investments, it can get the tax back. So I believe this is very fair under the circumstances.

Mr. Fulton: I am encouraged by that answer but I hope the minister will not misunderstand me if I say I cannot equate it with the provision of section 105L which reads as follows:

> Every trust governed by a deferred profit sharing plan or revoked plan shall pay a tax
> (a) for 1967, equal to the amount, if any, by which 20 per cent of the initial base of the trust exceeds the proceeds of disposition of its initial non-qualified investments disposed of after December 21, 1966 and before 1968;

Am I right in my understanding that under subparagraph (a) the first possible disposal, which now must be after December 21, 1966, will expose the plan to a liability for a tax because it would not have disposed of its non-qualified investments before that date? Unless the minister can point out to me some relieving subsection which has not yet come to my attention it seems to me that that would be inescapable. Since they cannot do it until after December 21, 1966, they become liable to a tax.

Mr. Sharp: I am a little puzzled by this question, and so are my officials, which gives me some assurance. I fail to see the difficulty which the hon. member is experiencing. We are talking about a tax for 1967 equal to the amount, if any, by which 20 per cent of the initial base of the trust exceeds the proceeds of disposition of its initial non-qualified investments disposed of after December 21, 1966 and before 1968. I do not understand how a difficulty could arise, nor does it seem to be retroactive.

Mr. Fulton: In the words of this section the fund would not have to dispose of its investments. If it were not for this legislation the plan would not have to dispose of its investments. Therefore it would not have any proceeds from its investments until the plan materialized and was put into effect, after which the deferred operation can take place.

Now, the minister's legislation imposes on some of these plans, I gather quite a number of them, the obligation to dispose of their investments and to pay a tax on the proceeds of that disposal. They cannot escape this liability to tax. This is the important point I made earlier this afternoon. You are changing the rules half way through the game. The minister is saying this type of investment cannot be acquired in the future, but he is not stopping there. It would have been acceptable if he had, but that is not what the minister is doing. The minister is not only saying; "you cannot acquire this type of investment in the future, but you are to dispose of the investments that you acquired in the past, notwithstanding the fact that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, approved specifically of what you were doing. You have to dispose of them and incur a liability to tax on part of the proceeds of disposition."

This is retroactive legislation, no matter what the hon. member for York South says. It is saying now that what you did, although right at the time, in accordance with the law at the time, in accordance with approval given at that time, is now wrong. You have to undo it and you have to pay a penalty now for doing that which last year we said you could do. I find this intolerable. I am just amazed that the minister would introduce such legislation into this house.

Mr. Sharp: I am still puzzled by the anxiety of the hon. member. If a trust carries out this disinvestment of non-qualified investments in accordance with the schedule, I think it is 20 per cent of their non-qualified investments by the end of 1967, 40 per cent by the end of 1968, 60 per cent by the end of 1969 and 100 per cent by the end of 1970, they do not have to pay any tax whatever. They are given a period of time to get rid of their non-qualified investments. If they fall short at the time, then they have to pay a penalty equal to the amount of the shortfall. There is a provision at the end of 105L that the trust is entitled to a refund later if they then disgorge their non-qualified investments. Perhaps this is the reason the hon. member has felt we were being retroactive in an undesirable way. I do not believe that is a justified criticism. We have enabled these trusts to get rid of non-qualified investments in an orderly way. If they meet these targets, no penalty is involved, and if thereafter they comply they can get the tax back.

Mr. Fulton: I understand what the minister is saying to me goes a long way toward meeting my point. I am sorry if I am dull, but I do not see how what he is saying to me is, in fact, the result of the wording of this legislation. The proposed section reads, in part:

> Every trust governed by a deferred profit-sharing plan or revoked plan shall pay a tax
> (a) for 1967, equal to the amount, if any, by which 20 per cent of the initial base of the trust exceeds the proceeds of disposition of its initial non-qualified investments disposed of after December 21, 1966, and before 1968;

Well, they cannot dispose of them until after December 21, 1966, because the legislation does not come into effect until after December 21, 1966. It seems to me they become liable for a tax equal to the amount by which 20 per cent of the initial base of the trust exceeds the proceeds of disposition of its initial non-qualified investments. Perhaps we could stand this clause and the minister might provide a private memorandum for me, since I am unable to see how this thing works.

Mr. Sharp: I have one here.

Mr. Fulton: Could we stand 105L?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, I would be happy to do so. Perhaps in the meantime I might pass over to my hon. friend a copy of the note that helped me to understand the section.

Mr. Lewis: Read it into Hansard.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I could give a brief description of how it is intended the section will operate, and perhaps the hon. member will see this is what the legislation says.

The new section 105L is intended to induce the trust for a deferred profit-sharing plan to dispose of some of its non-qualified investments each year and to have disposed of all these investments by the end of 1970. It imposes a penalty tax equal to the amount by which the proceeds of disposition of the initial non-qualified investments in a series of periods fall short of certain specified proportions of the initial base of the trust. The penalty tax, therefore, is equal to the amount by which the disposition falls short of the target set forth.

The proportions of the initial base that must be disposed of in order to avoid tax are as follows: 20 per cent by the end of 1967; 40 per cent by the end of 1968; 60 per cent by the end of 1969, and 100 per cent by the end of 1970.

The terms "initial base of the trust" and "initial non-qualified investments" used in this section are defined in a new section 105Q on page 26 of the bill.

"Initial base of a trust" means the aggregate of the values of all initial non-qualified investments held by the trust on December 21, 1966, when each such investment is valued at the lower of, (i) its cost to the trust, or (ii) its fair market value on December 21, 1966. The reason for the date, of course, is that is when the bill was read for the first time.

"Initial non-qualified investment" means a non-qualified investment held by the trust on December 21, 1966.

The second part provides for a refund of any tax paid under this section as I have just been describing if the non-qualified investments held on December 21, 1966 are disposed of for not less than the full value placed on them at that date. If there is some loss on disposal and the tax paid exceeds that loss, there will be a partial refund. I might add that the subsection is rather complicated because it also provides for interim adjustments from year to year as disposals are made.

I hope that that explanation will help the committee, and I suggest it is in line with the amendments proposed.

May I now place before the committee an amendment I should like the Minister of Labour to move? The amendment reads:

That clause 19 of Bill C-259 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 5 to 12 on page 22 and substituting therefor the following: to any rights or benefits under the policy (other than the rights or benefits of the insurer),

(b) by striking out lines 21 to 24 on page 22 and substituting therefor the following:

(e) the total of the premiums payable in any year under the policy is not greater than the aggregate of the amounts that, if the annual premiums had been payable in monthly instalments, would have been payable as such instalments in the twelve months commencing with the date the policy was issued,

(c) by striking out lines 32 and 33 on page 22 and substituting therefor the following:

policies in respect of which the trust is the only person entitled to any rights or benefits (other than the rights or benefits of the insurer) does not exceed an amount equal to 25 per cent of the aggregate of all amounts paid by employers to the trust in the year; and

(d) by striking out line 37 on page 24 and substituting therefor the following:

year or within 90 days after the end of the year to that employee, or

Mr. Nicholson: I so move.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Just a word of explanation, Mr. Chairman. The first two paragraphs of the amendment, (a) and (b), are the result of suggestions made by representatives of life insurance companies to provide a better way of describing what was intended by the legislation. Paragraph (c) has been proposed to make clear that the 25 per cent test that is in the legislation is based only on payments made into a plan by employers. The fourth paragraph, (d), is relieving. It will give a trust for a plan a period of 90 days after the end of the year in which to reallocate amounts which are forfeited in the trust during the year. As the bill reads now the trust would otherwise have to make the reallocations by the last day of the year.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 19 as amended carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I still object to the whole import of clause 19 and I do not modify that objection. However, with respect to the applicability and effect of section 105L I guess I have been too long away from the tutelage of the Department of Justice and the draftsmen that are at their disposal. At first I did not understand the way it worked. I thought it worked in the opposite way to that explained by the minister. However, having considered carefully the explanation and reconsidered the drafting I would have to agree that it operates in the way outlined by the minister, and I apologize to the committee for my inability to see that from the very outset. Therefore I withdraw my specific objection to section 105L but I maintain my objection to clause 19 as a whole.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I say that the hon. gentleman has certainly no need to apologize for not being able to understand this bill. Understanding this bill would be even more wonderful than understanding the Carter report at first reading.

Mr. More: I just have one short question to put to the minister on this clause which relates to investment in shares of corporations and the requirement that corporations pay dividends. I did raise this question with the minister in my earlier remarks as a result of knowledge I have of a plan which is set up to enable employees to obtain an interest in a company. Although this particular company is a well run company, it is small. It does not pay dividends, reserving the funds accumulated for expansion purposes. In this event the trustee of this plan would not invest in the shares of the company as I understand this section, even though this was the purpose of setting up a profit sharing arrangement.

I can understand the restriction if the plan were for pension purposes. This profit sharing plan was set up to provide funds to enable employees to obtain some equity in the company on the retirement of those who are now the proprietors of the company. It seems to me that this restriction would leave no basis on which they could operate a profit sharing plan to accomplish this objective.

Mr. Sharp: I do not know whether the hon. member has looked carefully at page 28, but according to section 105Q (e):

"qualified investment" for a trust governed by a deferred profit sharing plan or revoked plan means . . .

(vi) equity shares of a corporation by which, before the date of acquisition by the trust of the shares, payments have been made in trust to a trustee under the plan for the benefit of beneficiaries thereunder, if the shares are of a class in respect of which—

Then comes the clause to which the hon. member for Kamloops took exception; and then in subparagraph (B) appears a description of the kind of shares. The test there is whether dividends have been paid and, second, whether the corporation had earnings which did not have to be paid out in the form of dividends. I believe it is quite reasonable that the profit sharing plan should be restricted to investments in companies with good earnings records. I think it would be quite unreasonable to restrict them to companies which paid dividends regularly.

Mr. More: I thank the minister for his explanation. I think the import of the second part answers my question in part.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 20 agreed to.

On clause 21—Application for assignment of social insurance number.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, this clause is a requirement that every taxpayer from 1966 on shall have a social insurance number. Objections have been voiced before about this. I am not particularly against the principle that people in Canada should be required to obtain such a number so that the computing machines which it is desirable to use today can identify them by an account number. What I object to is the kind of insidious deception displayed in this house some time ago by some members of the government who stated categorically, and stated repeatedly, that there would be no requirement that anybody need apply for a social insurance number if the did not wish to do so.

The Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General and others know very well that the Minister of National Health and Welfare gave this assurance over and over again when the Canada Pension Plan was going through the house. It is now compulsory to pay income tax; it is compulsory to file a return if you have earnings above a certain minimum. This amendment to the Income Tax Act is a deceptive way of compelling people to apply for a social insurance number. Anyone not wishing for a government benefit should have the choice of not applying.

What concerns me mainly in this amendment, in this very complex tidying up bill, is a matter that was discussed when the Canada Pension Plan was being discussed. I am surprised that the Minister of Finance has completely reversed his position about the need to apply for a social security number. If it is government policy to require that everybody in Canada be registered, why not say so? Why does the government give these assurances, saying: "It will not be compulsory to have a number; people do not have to apply, the whole thing will be voluntary,"—and all the rest of it.

In section 130A, subsection 2, we have the compulsory part. It says that anyone who does not apply for a social insurance number after 1966 shall be deemed to have failed to complete the information on a prescribed form as required by or pursuant to section 44. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, if it is government policy for every Canadian to be compelled to apply for this number, why not say so? Why not be straightforward, instead of completely reversing what was said before. The Minister of National Health and Welfare insisted that the government would not want this number on a compulsory basis.

Clause 6 ought to be amended, to enforce a certain medical standard with respect to the making, producing and fitting of dentures. In any event I think the minister owes us an explanation. How can he justify the complete somersault with respect to being forced to apply for social insurance numbers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the government is proposing this amendment to the Income Tax Act because of the increasing work load on the Department of National Revenue. The main reasons for this increase in the work load are the increases, I am happy to say, in the number of taxpayers, the tax collection agreements with the provinces, the record keeping requirements as the result of the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements and the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan. There has been an enormous increase in the burdens of the Department of National Revenue, and this work load will be further increased as we move into the guaranteed income for old age pensioners.

The work presently required to be performed by the department could not be carried out today without the use of electronic computers. The increased demands to be placed upon the department will increase this dependence on computers. We cannot operate these computers without numbers; we have not yet invented a machine that will respond to names. We must use code numbers such as these.

The Department of National Revenue has a system of numbers, but it is not adequate. It was developed before the social insurance number system was implemented for the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Canada Pension Plan. The first public use of the taxation number occurred in 1965 when personalized 1964 tax forms were mailed to each taxpayer then on record. I am sure most hon. members are familiar with the personalized return forms; they received them in the mail. The forms bear the taxpayer's name, the last known address, and his unique number.

The unique taxation number has been of great assistance in meeting the problems of exact identification inherent in computer record keeping, but it has some serious shortcomings. Not all taxpayers choose to use the labelled return bearing their number. Others do not receive their returns because they have moved frequently. In either case the essential identifying number is unavailable to the department's computers. Furthermore the taxation number is based in part on name, and is therefore subject to variability when names change, as in the event of marriage.

Shortly after the Department of National Revenue developed its numbers system the requirements of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the advent of the Canada Pension Plan dictated the need for the design and implementation of a new and universal system of permanent unique numbers suitable for massive record keeping operations by electronic computers. The social insurance numbers system was the result. It now embraces over 9 million members of the population.

To carry out its responsibilities for collecting Canada Pension Plan contributions and to ensure that contributors' records are accurately maintained, the Department of National Revenue must use these social security numbers and require that all contributors use them on the reporting forms required to administer the plan. Thus the department is now using one system of numbers for the identification of taxpayers and another for Canada Pension Plan contributors, most of whom are the same.

As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, when speaking on second reading of the bill, I do not know why there should be objection to simplifying a system. I can understand the objection to having a number, but I do not see what objection there can be to having one number instead of several. I submit that this is a natural evolution in the system. I do not think it in any way infringes on our essential liberties nor in any way does it disclose to unauthorized persons the private business of taxpayers or individuals. I submit this is a very desirable improvement.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Smallwood: I did not intend to speak on this bill. I wish to thank the hon. member for Medicine Hat for drawing our attention to what the government is doing, forcing numbers on the Canadian people. The government is treating us like a bunch of cattle. In western Canada in the spring of the year we mark our cattle; the government wants to do that to our people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smallwood: Do not laugh. This is a serious matter. Here we find the people of Canada being forced to become numbers. We will not have names any more; we will be numbers. They will introduce a punch system and everybody will have to stamp his number wherever he goes. This is an absolute disgrace in a democracy.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Should we use letters instead of numbers?

Mr. Smallwood: The Postmaster General probably could not even read letters. He made a mess of them in his post office. It is disgraceful to treat people as numbers. We shall not have any more names; people will be No. 21, No. 23—they will be numbers instead of names.

The minister talked about computers and how efficient they are. Well, they are so efficient that they did not send a man in my constituency his cheque. They sent it to somebody else. The machine had the wrong number and somebody else got his money. The same held true for the May and June cheques. We were told: "Oh, but the machine cannot make a mistake; it cannot make cheques out to the wrong number." If that is so, where did these wrongly directed cheques go? One man in my constituency has been without a cheque since May.

What kind of outfit runs this country? Are we all to be cattle? I want to see more people getting up and complaining about being turned into cattle. I think this is disgraceful.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: I do not wish to disappoint the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose. He seemed sure that we would not object to the use of numbers in this very complicated operation. Frankly, I am puzzled as to why this annoyance with numbers has come into the picture. Most of us in this chamber were born, and most of us have birth certificates: They bear numbers. Most of us are married: Marriage licences have numbers. Some may have been divorced and divorce certificates have numbers. When finally we die, our death certificates will have numbers.

An hon. Member: We have got your number, too.

Mr. Knowles: Unemployment insurance had always used a number system of its own. Income tax has a numbering system for us. I suppose every person in this chamber has credit accounts and charge accounts and carries identification with respect to them in his pocket. All have numbers on them. I suspect that all of us have with us our railway passes and, though we may not use the trains as much as we used to, we use these passes for identification purposes time and time again. They have letters as well as a number—L.J.R. as well as a number.

Here in the House of Commons we have seat numbers. We have post office box numbers. We even have room numbers. Most of us have insurance policies and every policy has a number. If we own a car, it has a number. In my own province of Manitoba I have had the same number since 1950. Each of us has a driving licence. The number of that licence has now been made permanent in at least the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario. If any of us are fortunate enough to own property with a title to it, there is a number on the title. Most of us probably have mortgages, and they have numbers. When we vote we find our numbers on the voters lists. When we pay municipal taxes we find we have a number on the tax roll. We have telephone numbers. I even do my filing in my office on the basis of a numerical system. During the supper recess I found that the Minister of Finance is included in my filing system, and he has a number in that file.

An hon. Member: What is the number?

Mr. Sharp: No. 007.

Mr. Knowles: I find that I have the hon. member for Kamloops in my files, not because he is the hon. member for Kamloops but because for a number of years he was the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Chrétien: He is number one in the race, too.

Mr. Sharp: Have you the remaining Conservative leaders in order?

Mr. Knowles: The press is finding it difficult to assign numbers to their order of priority. But for years and years we have used numbers in all kinds of situations for ease in identification, and I find it hard to understand why all of a sudden it has become such a sin to have a number. I use that word with a double meaning, now. I thought the advertisement in Saturday's papers was a bit ridiculous, though I did laugh at it. The Department of National Revenue spent a few dollars telling the people of Canada that every taxpayer must have a SIN—and it was spelled "S-I-N", all in capital letters.

An hon. Member: It is the new morality.

Mr. Knowles: I wondered what it was and I admit I read the advertisement. The chap who was caricatured was looking at one of those delightful income tax forms. Of course there was a pretty girl shown on it, and every taxpayer was supposed to have a SIN. Of course, one goes on reading to find out what the SIN is, but before the reader is told what it is he is told he must report it on the tax form. I thought it was something one might get an income tax deduction for; I wondered what I might have been missing over a number of years.

Mr. Lewis: Would you object to having to report it?

Mr. Knowles: I am reminded of the old man who was asked whether, if he had to live his life over again, he would make the same mistakes. His reply was: "Yes, but I would start sooner."

Of course, SIN, to the Department of National Revenue, means Social Insurance Number. I am a little surprised that the department has not been taken to task already for this incursion into the new morality. I do not know whether other hon. members read the advertisement, but I freely confess that I did. I have asked a number of people what they thought about it. Some thought it was very good, because people would read it, while others thought it was less good because it did not really put into people's heads the idea that they must get this number on their income tax forms. But surely we are straining at something or other, when we see a loss or denial of individual liberty in the greater use of numbers in a very complicated situation. I do not think it is any more a denial of individual liberty than it is to have a number on my driver's licence, which I have to show when an officer stops my car on the street. Nor is it any more a denial of individual liberty than it is to have a number on my marriage licence, or because, as a minister who can still perform marriages, I have a number under which I do it. There is no loss of liberty or personality in this sort of thing.

On the other hand, if we are to deal with this complicated business of keeping all the records which are required for things like income tax, unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan and so on, we need a system which will work electronically. Others in this house were out, last year, as I was, to the place at Tunney's Pasture where these things are operated. I was certainly convinced that but for electronic equipment the Minister of Manpower and Immigration could not find all the people required to do the work of looking after our income tax records, let alone the Canada Pension Plan records.

An hon. Member: Government is getting too big.

Mr. Knowles: Well, if government is getting too big, this is one way of catching up. Maybe government is doing more and more things on behalf of the people of Canada. If these things are to be done, and done efficiently and effectively, I think we have to use modern methods.

As I understand it, one of the things we must have in this country is portability for the various social insurance plans. We have portability between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan, and it is a condition of the medicare legislation that there is to be portability among the provinces. If we are to carry this out effectively I think we must have one number for our people, not two, or three, or half a dozen numbers. I also think it is a service to our people to teach them to try to get these numbers. People take a long time to do the things which need to be done or which the law requires. The Canada Pension Plan legislation makes it clear that unless people have the number they cannot get pension benefits. It may seem harsh, but unless records are kept how can the benefits be paid?

The advertisement is careful to say that only people over 18 need to have their social insurance numbers, their SIN, as the Department of National Revenue puts it. The government's new morality does not require that anyone under 18 have a SIN. It does not start under that age.

[Mr. Knowles.]

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Fairweather: It does not restrict it to those over age 18.

Mr. Knowles: It does not make it compulsory under age 18. There already is a provision in the Canada Pension Plan legislation that people must apply for it if their income is $600 a year or more. This legislation does not go that far, but it does say that persons whose incomes are $1,000 in respect of a single person or $2,000 in respect of married persons must apply.

It has been said that this is an additional burden on our people. Surely, Mr. Chairman, it must also be said that one of the ways to save money in the government is to have things done efficiently. If we do not have electronic methods and are going to have it done by individual pen-pushing accountants, then it will cost that much more. Surely this is ordinary elementary common sense. I think that a lot of the talk we have had today and on other occasions about this matter is just so much talk. I believe that, just as we have accepted all these other numbers, we should not quarrel about having one number for our income tax, for our Canada Pension Plan, and for our unemployment insurance. Why not have one number for all the things concerning which we are in contact with the federal government, or indeed with the provinces, particularly where portability is required. Mr. Chairman, it was not my idea that this social insurance number be called SIN, but now that it has been so christened, I think it is not a bad idea.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply for a moment to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who gave us quite a sermon regarding numbers. He said that he has a number, as a minister. Possibly he would like to use that number, marry himself to the Liberals and be through with it. After listening to him I am more concerned than I was before that we should not have this compulsory number which is forced upon us, because I believe we must stick up for democracy. After hearing him I am more convinced than I was before that this is straight socialism. I am surprised that the Liberals swallowed it. I would go further and say that it is communism. We should wake up and realize what these people are trying to do to us. It is time we looked after our democracy, or we will go to sleep and then find that we have people on our hands who will be dangerous to the younger generation of our country. As was mentioned earlier, we might find that when a baby is born he will be given a number and not a name. What is happening here tonight is very serious.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I intend to rise only to ask a question for clarification in respect of a couple of statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who my colleague from Halifax says is in favour of SIN. I should like to ask my friend whether he would qualify what he meant when he said that some of us were born. This creates a bit of a question in the minds of some people. I should also like to draw his attention to what his colleague the hon. member for York South suggested, when he said that without the computer system the work of the government would never be done because the minister of manpower could never find the people. Is he overlooking the potential and possibilities of the Cape Breton area in which to find workers to fill in for the computers which he says are so essential. I bring this to his attention simply because of the suggestion of the hon. member for York South, who seems to be aware of the problem we have. If the minister is looking for workers, I suggest that he start in the east.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, after the explanation by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I suppose all of us should be reduced to the point where we would not object to licence numbers and various other serial numbers on documents and so on. It seems to me, however, that he has completely missed the point so far as the objection to insurance numbers is concerned. As he well knows, if there is to be one number attached to each citizen in Canada for the purpose of the Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security, taxation, and a number of other things which some centralized filing of this information in may come along later, and if there also is to be a computer system, then all this information which is filed in the computer can be blurted out. It can blurt out this information at the rate of 600 lines per minute.

What I object to is that in the Income Tax Act there are provisions which require that all officers who handle the files must keep the information to themselves, and now we will have a situation where we will have the same common number for every citizen in respect of all these matters and there is no prohibition of which I know at the moment in respect of information relative to the Canada Pension Plan, the Old Age Security Act, and so on, such as there is in respect of the Income Tax Act.

Therefore, as I said, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has completely missed the reason for the objection to having all this information filed under one number in the computer. This would mean that all these departments of government would have access to the information in respect of the individual.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Olson: Perhaps the hon. member should permit me to finish my remarks, but go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: Why does the hon. member think that having a common number would result in the information from different departments being in the same file, any more than having a common name would do that? I do not see how this situation would violate the secrecy of the income tax department.

Mr. Olson: Perhaps not. Maybe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a greater understanding than I do of computer programming and what happens when you ask for an account and information from those accounts which are filed electronically. However, my information is that when you call for a file from an electronic computer, and give a number, all the cards on this whole centralized filing system would be printed. Therefore since these accounts would be filed in a central area, people in the Department of National Health and Welfare—the people administering the Old Age Security program and other things—would have access to the income tax records of any taxpayer. Now, since all this information would be included in the same file with the same number, if a person pressed a button asking for information from this file, the computer would have the capability of blurting all the information out, and there it would be.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this would be in violation of the rights of the taxpayers of this country, which heretofore have been protected. When they file their income tax returns they are guaranteed by law that no one except the tax assessors with the Department of National Revenue shall have any access to this information.

Income Tax Amendment

Perhaps we need more assurance that no one else will have access to this information compiled by computers. With that assurance I am sure this measure will be accepted. Before it is acceptable we must know that there will be a separation of information so far as computers are concerned, so that the information will not be available to everyone. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who suggested that this general information should not be made available to anyone who seeks it.

In spite of the assurances given some months ago by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and in the absence of any satisfactory explanation, I think a great deal more supervision should be employed in respect of the information available from these computers. There is always the possibility that records and information, obtained in confidence, will become available generally as a result of computer operation. Without some assurance of a separation of confidential and public information there is a possibility of an invasion on human rights. We in this parliament must do everything possible to avert that invasion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have been very interested in the remarks made during the last 15 or 20 minutes, particularly those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding the effects of the provision in this measure having regard to the Income Tax Act. There may be some merit to the suggestion that for administrative purposes, in so far as the social security measures of this nation are concerned, individuals should have social insurance numbers. In this regard let me point out that there are provisions in the national health and welfare measures which require individuals to have these numbers. This is the first invasion of this kind we have observed in the nature of paraphernalia, purposes, and methods of enforcing the Income Tax Act. No one heretofore has been obliged to accept an income tax number in order that income tax regulations may be enforced, formidable and restrictive as they may be. This particular provision would have the effect of applying an income tax number by an indirect method, for a purpose other than enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

While I understand the reasons behind the insistence that people must have a social insurance number, I cannot understand the application of that principle to this particular measure. It will be used to enforce collection of income taxes under a government instituted social security program. We as members of parliament are well aware of the difficulties involved in income tax legislation, and we all appreciate that certain injustices occur. In the present case the government is using extraordinarily restrictive apparatus for a purpose not intended. If we must be labelled by a social security number, let us be so labelled without the impending threat of such a label being used for income tax collection purposes. The people of Canada resent very much being regarded as wards of the government, and resent being numbered for income tax purposes. They resent even more being numbered on the basis of social security in order to accomplish something not intended.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether in his view this particular clause will apply to old age supplements in years to come?

Mr. Sharp: I do not know the answer to that question. Let me make the very general statement that we are asking approval for identification of something that is not capable of being used for another reason. If we could be sure of an identification by names, that would be sufficient, but we all know that many individuals in this country have the same name by birth and very often the same name by marriage. The identification we now seek I do not think infringes in any way upon our freedoms. We are simply seeking a method of identification which can be used in respect of individuals who come under the provisions of various measures because of different circumstances. The whole thing involves a matter of identification.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, if this measure involves simply a matter of identification, why does the measure provide such a heavy penalty under the Income Tax Act?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, the penalties are not as serious as has been suggested; I can assure hon. members of that. They are just the ordinary sort of penalties that are provided if in your income tax return you file your name in an improper way. In other words, the same penalty would be provided if you did not fill out your name properly. This is exactly the kind of penalty that is involved in this measure. If you misinformed the tax authorities by filling in your name incorrectly, or your address in the wrong way, the same sort of penalty would be involved.

We now have a better method of identification, and I suggest that we should adopt it. I do not believe that this provision in any way affects our democratic rights or deprives any of us of our individuality. In fact, I think it is a much better means of identification than has been available heretofore.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, would the minister answer a question supplementary to that just put to him? He was asked whether this provision will apply to recipients of the old age pension in the following year, and the minister's answer was, "I do not know." How, under a numbers system, are we going to settle this issue?

Mr. Sharp: If this provision were to be applied, it might be a very useful thing to do. But the fact is that I do not know—I am not the Minister of National Revenue—and am not aware whether there are any plans of this kind.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I would like to reply to the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I should like to assure the hon. member and the committee that this provision has nothing to do with the privacy of income tax returns.

The tax returns of the people of this country are kept separately, just as though they were kept on pieces of paper with names on them, rather than on tape. But it happens to be a little more modern to adopt this method, and in this House of Commons I think we should take advantage of modern techniques to save the taxpayers' money and improve the administration of this country. I believe that the attitude being displayed here by some hon. members is that this system is something that has occurred recently. I believe this argument is perhaps best answered by the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has pointed out that we are all identified by a great many numbers in many files. I believe that for the government it would be of advantage to have these details clearly and accurately recorded.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Knowles: Don't say ten o'clock; that is a number.

Mr. Aiken: It is an hour, to my way of thinking.

Progress reported.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EXTENSION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask permission to revert to motions for the purpose of extending the reference of the special joint committee on the public service of Canada to include the right to examine and report upon the matter of the pensions paid on account of the service of former members of the R.C.M.P. and of the armed forces.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: I move:

That the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the public service of Canada be further empowered to inquire into and report upon the matter of the pensions paid on account of the service of former members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of former members of the armed forces; and

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours of this resolution and requesting that house, if it concurs, to authorize the committee to inquire into and report upon this matter.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow we propose to submit to the house for its consideration first, the third reading of the bill on immigration appeals, that is item 83 on the order paper, then we will continue the matter that was before the house today, item 119, followed by items 133, 135, 86 and 134.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—INTERVIEW WITH REPORTED COMMUNIST ON PROGRAM "AUJOURD'HUI"

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, on February 15, 1967 last, I put the following question to the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh):

Would the minister check with C.B.C. authorities in order to find out why the C.B.C. granted an interview last week to Mr. Vachon on the program "Aujourd'hui", during which the ex-policeman said that he had decided to join the Communist party and that, in the future, he would endeavour to convince our youth to share his views on Marxism?

The debate on this question was adjourned until tonight.

I would like to make a correction here, Mr. Speaker; I made a mistake when referring to the program "Aujourd'hui". My question was prompted by a news release of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news service.

Like so many Canadian taxpayers, Mr. Speaker, I raised this question because I am concerned over the attitude of certain C.B.C. officials. We are getting the feeling that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is straying away from its cultural and educational role. This agency is financed by public funds, and taxpayers have a right to wonder once in a while if their money is not being used to promote certain doctrines in complete opposition to the principles and beliefs of the great majority of taxpayers.

I, for one, believe strongly in freedom of the press and independence for the C.B.C.; I also wish to point out that I will fight to prevent this corporation from becoming a political instrument. However, when C.B.C. officials give us the impression that the corporation is conducting socialists, separatist and, in this case, communist propaganda, it is our duty to sound the alarm and ask ourselves a few questions regarding the inclinations and orientation of the management philosophy within the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

When an interview is granted an ex-policeman who says that he has decided to join the Communist party and that, in the future, he will endeavour to convince our youth to share his views on Marxism, I feel we must ask ourselves whether, in this case, the C.B.C. is really fulfilling its mission which consists in bringing into our homes sound ideas and valid opinions, in order to serve the interests of a democratic country such as ours.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I am not a McCarthyist, but I think it is time that parliament should consider setting up a board of inquiry into the C.B.C. to examine the thinking, the philosophy and the tendencies of certain employees who seem to have built up an empire, the influence of which represents hardly a marginal sector of our society but which seems to impose upon the majority a unity of thought which currently gives to this crown corporation a completely false concept of its social, cultural and artistic vocation.

[Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix).]

The consoling thought is that the new Broadcasting Act will vest the board of governors with greater authority over the programming of our radio and television stations.

It is time that the minister responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be removed from the very awkward position in which she is currently. It is said that the Secretary of State is responsible to parliament for the C.B.C., but that she is powerless to impose the views of parliament on the C.B.C. and that she is simply the C.B.C. messenger. I think that, in the present system, this formula must be changed.

I hope that the minister or her parliamentary secretary who will answer me tonight will forward my quite objective remarks to the C.B.C. in order to correct a situation which is becoming worse every day.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), I might repeat this evening what I said on February 23 last, when a similar question was put to the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

In order to provide a more specific reply, since the case of Mr. Vachon has been mentioned, I must point out, however, without going over the whole story, the circumstances in which that person was accused of being a risk to the security of the state during a recent election campaign in the province of Quebec.

At that time, Mr. Vachon, who was a member of the Provincial Police, I believe, had been charged by the hon. prime minister of Quebec with being, as I already stated, a security risk. Mr. Vachon then denied that allegation of the prime minister, and has since then admitted himself that he had joined the Communist party only recently.

In view of these circumstances, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation decided that it was a matter of public interest to bring Mr. Vachon to clarify his views on this situation on television, owing to the controversy which arose last spring.

I may say to the hon. member for Charlevoix and to this house that, through this appearance of Mr. Vachon on television, the C.B.C. had no intention whatsoever of presenting to the Canadian public the Communist policy or ideology in this country. Such is not the purpose of the C.B.C. and I believe that, in all fairness, although we may find fault with the C.B.C., just as there are faults everywhere, we must say that the recent appearance of Mr. Vachon on television, when he stated that he was a member of the Communist party, was not the intended—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—REQUEST FOR HEALTH WARNING ON CIGARETTE PACKAGES

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, last week, following the publication of the report by the Department of National Health and Welfare, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) whether his department intended to give priority to Bill No. C-130, which I introduced at the start of the session, and which would compel tobacco companies to place a warning on cigarette packages to the effect that smoking may be injurious to health; by so doing, deceitful publicity about tobacco would be limited.

In the very first place, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate doctors and psychologists who made contributions to that report, as well as the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, who helped with the questionnaires and necessary experiments.

Mr. Speaker, that report, which contains more than 140 pages, is the result of 12 years of research and experiments. After reading it, I can only congratulate the minister and his officials for the seriousness with which it was done and I suggest that it deserves particular attention by the minister, mainly in the light of the following excerpt from the foreword:

[English]

The outstanding finding of this study is that cigarette smokers compared to non-smokers had excessive mortality, particularly from heart disease, lung cancer, bronchitis and emphysema. This is consistent with findings of other related studies. These findings are compelling reasons to continue and develop measures to reduce or eliminate the hazard to health attributable to smoking.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this report has become public. I feel that it would be a serious mistake to ignore it, particularly in view of so many statements made and polls taken by teachers of medical science, psychologists, surgeons and others.

The possible danger of cigarette smoking was stressed in a report prepared by the public health service and submitted to the American Cancer Society.

According to that report, based on a poll taken between July 1964 and July 1965 and covering 42,000 American families:

—Americans over 17 suffered from 12 million more various chronic ailments than if they had not smoked.

—Americans spent 900,000 more days in bed than if they had not smoked.

—Among smokers 300,000 coronary cases, 1,000,000 cases of bronchitis or emphysema and 1,000,000 cases of peptic ulcers were noted.

—The loss from sick leave due to the effects of cigarette smoking amounts to millions of dollars.

The report states on the other hand that the total cigarette consumption has kept on increasing but that it is due to the increase in population only, each American smoking less on the contrary since the anti-tobacco campaign was launched.

In 1964, the percentage of smokers among the male population fell from 59 to 53 per cent. Furthermore, 18 million adults, which includes half the doctors, have stopped smoking.

The report states finally that the campaign against smoking had some effect, but it deplores the fact that the law passed in 1965 merely ordered the words "attention, smoking may be dangerous to your health" to be placed on cigarette packages instead of taking more vigorous steps to force cigarette manufacturers to have such warnings written on their advertisements.

Professors Francis Peyton and Charles Huggins, the two American Nobel prize winners for medicine in 1966, stressed the dangers of nicotine during a press conference in Stockholm, calling it an "undeniable source of cancer".

Professor Huggins, for his part, said that "sooner or later, cigarettes cause lung cancer and cigars cancer of the tongue or the mouth".

In a lecture given during a conference on health and tobacco addiction, Mr. Emerson Douyon, psychologist and head of the Montreal Association for Retarded Children, compared cigarette addicts to alcoholics and drug addicts who, by their behaviour, hide personality problems.

• (10:20 p.m.)

The confirmed smoker, especially the cigarette smoker, is often childish, insecure, inconsistent, and does not usually know why he smokes and why he cannot quit smoking. The habit is absurd, regressive, infantile and is also a manifestation of masochism. Smokers do not stop smoking, even when they are aware of the relationship between cigarette smoking and cancer of the lung. Statistics prove that lung cancer causes twice as many deaths, in every province and every year, as drowning. We know that safety organizations do their utmost to prevent fatal accidents, but the greatest calamity is still the number of deaths from lung cancer which, in many cases, could be avoided. Still, very few people seem to be concerned about it.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mrs. Rideout), as a result of this report, to alert the minister about the connection between smoking and lung cancer, one causing the other. The minister himself recently announced, after an investigation by Canadian Facts Ltd., that more than a million Canadian smokers had succeeded in giving up tobacco and this, I suppose, as a result of a campaign undertaken in the United States and Great Britain—but not in Canada—by the respective governments. What is most unfortunate is to find that the same investigation has shown that more than 300 young Canadians get into the habit of smoking each day, and we know that when they have fallen into the habit, they can hardly give it up. The Parliament of Canada should follow the example of Great Britain and the United States and pass a motion unanimously asking the government to take the necessary measures—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Yanakis: —to cope with lung cancer due to smoking.

[English]

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): The question from the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Yanakis) recorded in the House of Commons Hansard, page 13079, for February 15, 1967, has been noted with a good deal of interest by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Basically it refers to requiring cigarette manufacturers to specify on packages of cigarettes the following statement, which is also used in the United States:

Caution: Cigarette smoking may be hazardous to your health.

There is also reference to the elimination of misleading advertising and to the implementation specifically of the hon. member's private Bill No. C-130, to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act.

The fundamental approach of the Department of National Health and Welfare in dealing with the serious health hazards of cigarette smoking, which include heart disease, lung cancer and chronic lung disease, is to discourage cigarette smoking by Canadians. Emphasis has been placed on a program of health education and research. It might well be that the labelling of packages in a particular way with a cautionary note might be a useful adjunct to health education, but the effectiveness of this procedure and its full implications have not yet been clearly established. For example, it is necessary to consider the use of a caution regarding one harmful practice such as cigarette smoking in relation to the use of other hazardous substances, such as alcohol.

We are watching with great interest the results that may be ascribed to the use of this warning on packages of cigarettes in the United States. The feasibility of legislation in Canada for the control of cigarette advertising and for warning labels on cigarette packages is a matter of study in my department at the present time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—CRITERIA FOR DISTRIBUTION OF COLOUR TELEVISION SETS

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not see the Secretary of State in her seat and I do not propose to say anything to the parliamentary secretary. This is too important a matter for the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There can be no point of order.

Mr. Kindt: It is a point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. It is elementary that hon. members should resume their seats when the Speaker has the floor. I bring to the attention of the hon. member that the rules provide that either the minister or his parliamentary secretary should be here. I assume that is why the parliamentary secretary is here at this time.

Mr. Kindt: I rose on a point of privilege, sir. I said this morning that I wanted to be on the late show, provided the minister was here, and I wrote a letter to that effect to the Clerk. If the minister did not intend to be here, the Clerk should have informed me. I have wasted an hour or so. Who is running this show? Is it the Clerk, or is it the Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I invite the hon. member to resume his seat. This house is now adjourned.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RETRAINING OF WORKERS LAID OFF BECAUSE OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in response to a question from the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) I undertook to make a statement about workers who have been laid off in the automobile industry. I should emphasize that the figures I have do not distinguish between lay-offs caused by reduced sales or similar factors and those that can be attributed to adjustments under the auto pact.

We know of a total of 5,732 people in the automobile and parts industries who have been laid off and not recalled in the course of the past 14 months; that is since January 1, 1966. Of this total, our information is that 3,063 are in other employment or have withdrawn, temporarily or permanently, from the labour force; 1,874 are registered for employment at various manpower centres; there are 795 of whom we have no current record, though we are doing our best to get in touch with them. Of the total of 1,874 now registered with manpower centres, 566 have been recommended for training courses and 296 are currently in training.

The reason the figure is not larger is that training facilities have been heavily strained in some centres, particularly Oshawa. Representations have been made to the provincial governments for the provision of increased facilities, and detailed discussions are now in progress between the manpower division and the Ontario department of education. We certainly hope this will result in increasing the training capacity available at Oshawa.

All Canada manpower centres in Ontario are making special efforts to bring the qualifications of autoworkers to the attention of prospective employers. Mobility grants are available to assist workers to move if necessary. It must be appreciated, however, that the automotive industry is a relatively high wage one and it cannot be expected that equivalent employment will be available quickly in all cases.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, this announcement by the Minister of Manpower and Citizenship points up the urgency of this whole situation. It points up the fact also that the government was not prepared to deal with this emergency. The minister has admitted that the government has been unable to cope with the retraining of these people so they might find useful employment in other industry. He mentioned that no facilities have been provided in Oshawa, the city in which most of the people affected are located.

This is another indication of the fact that this government, on all occasions when it has been faced with labour problems and other matters, has sat back on its haunches and done nothing until these situations have become critical.

This matter is not completed as yet. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Industry if he was aware of the lay-offs that were announced by General Motors affecting St. Catharines and Windsor. To this he replied again in the negative. The government is not prepared to do anything about these matters. This morning the newspapers contained an announcement that another 300 workers were being laid off by General Motors, 250 in Oshawa, 20 in Ste. Therese, Quebec and 20 in London, Ontario.

These lay-offs have been taking place every day, every week and every month since last December. All this government does is announce in the House of Commons that we do not have training facilities. It is about time they realized all these lay-offs are taking place as a result of the poor policies of this government.

Mr. Winkler: And no interest shown by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Windsor never had as many people at work.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): It is unfortunate the minister has not got a breakdown—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —though I think he is on his way toward one. It is unfortunate he does not have a breakdown as to the number of the 5,700 individuals who have been laid off in the automotive industry whose unemployment is due to the Canada-United States auto agreement, and those who may have been laid off for other reasons. The government has a definite responsibility with regard to those who have been laid off as a result of the auto pact. One of the two undertakings we were given by the Minister of Industry when this auto agreement was being discussed was that adequate provision would be made for the retraining of those employees who were dislocated as a result of the pact. The other undertaking was, of course, that there would be greater parity of prices in Canada as compared to the United States.

There has been compliance with neither of these undertakings. In the case of workers in the auto industry it is quite apparent now, according to the statement made by Mr. George Burt, Canadian director of the U.A.W., that there are thousands of auto workers who are not able to obtain alternative employment and who have not been able to secure retraining through the department of manpower.

This is an extremely serious situation. It seems to me that the minister cannot shuffle off on to the Ontario government the blame for the fact that there are not adequate facilities to train these men. When the Canadian government signed the auto pact they undertook to see that there would be adequate facilities to take care of training. This is a responsibility which is theirs and which they cannot shuffle off on to anyone else.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, none of the requests made by the men themselves or their representatives has been met. One of the first was that a committee should be set up on which the employers, the union and the government would be represented so the men would have notice from time to time as to the number who were going to be laid off, so the government would be acquainted with what training facilities would be required, and so there could be a co-ordinated effort to cope with this problem.

All we have had from the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker, are repeated statements that he has been unable to persuade the employers to agree to the setting up of such a committee. Surely one of the terms laid down in the agreement should have been that the employers would be prepared to sit down with government and union representatives to work out solutions to the problems confronting the men displaced under the auto agreement.

I want to say to the government, Mr. Speaker, that so far they have completely failed to meet their responsibilities to these men as well as to the Canadian people at large. I do not put all the blame on the minister of manpower; he has inherited this problem as a result of the lack of foresight on the part of the ministers who concocted this agreement and went into it without adequate preparation to meet the problems which an auto agreement was bound to produce.

SYDNEY, N.S.—LAY-OFFS AT STEEL PLANT

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was questioned about the employment and training situation in Sydney Nova Scotia. First on the subject of training, I should say that at the end of January there were 2,425 persons in the province of Nova Scotia who had been recommended for training by my department but for whom training places were not at that time available. The provincial authorities have been trying to remedy this situation. In the past month they have found 11 additional instructors and made places available for 210 persons in the Cape Breton area in a pre-vocational upgrading course. At this date 164 other people in the area are still waiting for places.

With regard to employment at the DOSCO steel plant at Sydney, I should say that at the beginning of last year it employed 3,560 workers and at the beginning of this year 735 fewer, a decline of 20 per cent. Intensive efforts are being made to find other work for those laid off and, indeed, referrals are going on steadily. There are some important improvements in prospect. Two new industrial operations are on the point of starting up in the area, and it is expected that heavy construction work at Port Hawkesbury in the spring will draw on Sydney for much of its labour requirements. My department will make assistance for training, mobility and placement available to the full extent of the need.

In terminating this statement, Mr. Speaker, I must emphasize that my department will fulfil its responsibilities and is ready to pay training allowance to all those who are accepted. As far as training facilities are concerned, according to our agreement with the provinces this is a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the minister of manpower indicated that he was going to make a report on the situation in Sydney, but he has reported not specifically on that area but on the situation generally in Nova Scotia with some reference to the Sydney area.

He referred to the number of men in training and the number awaiting places, a total of about 374 persons out of 1,100 workers laid off at the steel plant. The government has not considered those workers at all. There is unemployment in the area about which the government has done nothing. We have had lay-offs. Our naval base has been closed despite the fact that the former Conservative government established this as a permanent base. This government closed it after having promised the men in that area alternative work. Despite this promise many men in our area have been laid off.

The government is trying to do one thing with one hand and is taking it away with the other when laying persons off. There have been lay-offs in Cape Breton and in Louisbourg. Because of the differences of opinion publicly expressed the government brought the men back on the job; they tried to take the credit for that. First they fired them, then they rehired them. What contradictions have we here.

When we speak of contradictions, the minister yesterday was asked to clarify the situation that has developed with respect to the crown corporation the government intends to establish. He was asked to make a statement. Now we find the minister saying one thing and the Prime Minister saying something else. First the Prime Minister agreed that the crown corporation would do something for the steel workers; then he withdrew from that stand. Behind the Prime Minister the Minister of Industry promised that the government would do something for the steel workers when the crown corporation was established. On top of that, yesterday and today we heard from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He was unable to say anything about the proposed development. All those remarks are on record.

We have one minister saying one thing, and the Prime Minister saying "No." Behind the Prime Minister the Minister of Industry tried to leave the impression that the unemployed people in Cape Breton would be looked after by the crown corporation. The Prime Minister denied that, too. From all this it ought to be evident to the people of Cape Breton and others across this nation that this government does not know where it is going.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to repeat some of the things the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has said. It seems to me, from the statements the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has made in the past and recently, that a serious situation has been exposed. Obviously there is not much value in having a program of mobility grants or of training and retraining if there are not facilities by which such programs can be implemented. I suggest to the minister and to the house that the situation exposed by the minister's statements requires a new look to be directed at our federal policy with regard to the assistance the federal treasury gives to the provision of facilities for training and retraining. Perhaps an entirely new program is required.

The thing most disturbing about the statement is the expression of anxiety by the minister on behalf of himself and his department. He is worried about his ability to carry out the policies in question; then he turns around and says "But I cannot do it because I have not the training facilities." Well, the responsibility exists. The minister goes on to say that it is the responsibility of the province.

This subject, of course, is one of the problems existing in Canada, and I suggest to the minister and the government with as much urgency as I can that this situation ought to force the government to bring in a new policy with respect to the provision of training facilities, finding teachers for training and doing those things necessary to implement the training and retraining program. It just is not good enough for the minister to shuffle off the responsibility to some other level of government. He should not blame some other level of government for his inability to carry out a program for which he is responsible.

My second point is this. It becomes daily more clear that the government's coal policy with respect to operations in Cape Breton and parts of Nova Scotia is obviously a half policy which will not meet the problems in Cape Breton, in particular. The government ought to take a second look at this program and consider the solution we have urged, namely that it is time to take over all the operations of DOSCO, steel as well as coal, so the workers in both industries can be integrated in a program for rehabilitating this unhappy area of Canada.

In any case, I cannot understand what these lengthy negotiations with the Dominion Coal Company are about. What is it we are buying from the Dominion Coal Company that it should take all this time to set up a crown corporation to get going toward a solution of the problems to which the minister has referred? I conclude by urging that at the proper time this house should reconsider the entire policy in connection with training facilities and particularly the policy toward that giant in the area which is becoming a pygmy at the expense of the people of Cape Breton island.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): (a) (i) 522; (ii) 397; (iii) 67; (iv) 23. (b) (i) 159; (ii) 50; (iii) 12; (iv) none. (c) (i) 195; (ii) 116; (iii) 28; (iv) 7.

Air Canada, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and Polymer Corporation advise that it has not been considered in the best interests of their respective corporations to disclose data on employees' earnings other than what is available through the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

*TAX ON ALLOWANCES TO B AND B COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 2,296—Mr. Coates:

Are the amounts that have been received by the commissioners of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism tax exempt?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Only to the extent of the living allowances, on a per diem basis, and the reimbursement of actual and reasonable out of pocket transportation expenses, paid in respect of absences from their normal places of residence in connection with their duties as commissioners.

*POSSIBLE CONFUSION IN NAMES OF COMPANIES

Question No. 2,377—Mr. Stanbury:

1. In the light of recent experience with North American General Insurance Company and Prudential Finance Corporation Limited, will the government initiate a federal-provincial survey to determine whether other companies in the financial and insurance fields are trading on the names of well-established companies?

2. What steps are being taken by the government, independently or in conjunction with provincial governments, to ensure that neither letters patent nor licences hereafter will be granted or continued in circumstances likely to confuse or deceive the public as to the identity and reputation of financial and insurance companies?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The answer to the first part of the question is as follows:

The government does not intend to undertake an investigation of such a general nature because we feel that it would not bring in the required information. The fact that two companies have similar names does not necessarily imply that a company operates by using the other one's name.

However, the government will ask that the similarity in names of financial institutions be put on the agenda of the next federal-provincial conference when those institutions are discussed.

Here is the answer to the second part of the question:

With regard to the new insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies, the Superintendent of Insurance is inquiring into the similarity in names and ordering special research work on the list kept by the Registrar General of Canada of the names of all the companies incorporated in Canada, under a federal or a provincial act. Before bills incorporating such companies are introduced in parliament, the petitioners are asked to choose a name which will not be mistaken for that of another. Any special problem is submitted to the attention of the parliamentary committees and it is up to parliament to approve the name.

With regard to insurance companies with their head office outside Canada and wanting to do business in Canada, the superintendent studies the question of similarity in names by referring to the list kept by the Registrar General of Canada. If he feels that the name might lead to confusion, he must so inform the Minister of Finance who may then forbid the company from doing business in Canada.

As for the companies that may be incorporated by letters patent under the Companies Act, the Registrar General's Department is inquiring into the similarity of names by searching through their own files and through files of the Registrar of Trade Marks. The department does not approve the name of a company if it is felt that the name could be confused with that of any other company.

The Superintendent of Insurance may take administrative measures to alter the practice of any company under his authority if he deems such practices may lead to misunderstanding or confusion.

When proceeding to an examination of legislation and regulations likely to apply to financial enterprises, not now subject to a system of supervision, particular attention will be given the need for authority to require companies to change their advertising or any other practice likely to cause mistaken identity.

This question will be considered at the next federal-provincial conference on financial institutions.

When new insurance, trust or loan companies are to be incorporated, attention will be given to the question of names similar to other corporations operating in the financial field and not only in the field of insurance, trust or loans, as the case may be.

The list of names of corporations maintained by the Registrar General will be brought to the attention of the provincial governments.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to suggest to him that such a lengthy answer to a question should be made an order for return. Would the hon. member please resume his seat? However, judging to the extent that I can see from this distance, it seems the hon. member has just about completed his statement, but if he has not he should make arrangements to give the information in some other way.

Mr. Chrétien: Ten seconds more, Mr. Speaker. I had intended to ask permission to have it made an order for return, but I have tried to read the answer as fast as I could. I will finish in ten seconds.

[Translation]

When an insurance company having its head office in a foreign country applies for registration under federal legislation, public notice will be required so that any protest concerning the name of the company may be heard by the Superintendent of Insurance.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I repeat my caution that anyone required to give an answer of this length should consider the advisability of making it an order for return.

Questions

INCOME FIGURES, NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Question No. 2,436—Mr. Reid:

1. What are the unemployment figures for the past five years for the electoral districts of Kenora-Rainy River, Fort William, Port Arthur, and for the northwestern Ontario region?

2. What is the rate of income growth for the past five years in the above areas?

3. What is the comparison of the rate of income growth in the last five years for the above areas with the national average?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Departments of Manpower and Immigration and National Revenue as follows:

1. Unemployment figures are not available for electoral districts.

Annual averages of unplaced applicants on file in the Canada manpower centres in northwestern Ontario are shown below for each of the past five years:

	1962	1963	1964	1965	1966
Fort William	2,294	2,128	1,841	1,471	1,316
Port Arthur	3,279	3,035	2,606	2,108	1,919
Fort Frances	607	508	563	531	439
Kenora	845	795	767	897	752
Northwestern Ontario	7,025	6,466	5,777	5,007	4,426

The areas served by the Fort William and Port Arthur centres approximate the corresponding electoral districts, and the area served by the Fort Frances and Kenora centres closely resembles the Kenora-Rainy River electoral district.

2. No income figures are available by electoral district to permit comparison but the following statistics of aggregate income reported on individual income tax returns are believed to cover approximately the area described in the question as the northwestern Ontario region:

District	Total income ($000) 1959	1964	% Growth for 5 years (1959-1964)
Kenora	50,414	60,705	20.4
Rainy River	27,378	31,759	16.0
Thunder Bay	182,092	217,306	19.3
Total	259,884	309,770	19.2

3. The rate of growth indicated on a similar absis for the same five-year period for all Canada was 39.3 per cent.

STUDY OF HIGHLAND VILLAGE, IONA, N.S.

Question No. 2,531—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. On what date was the study approved under ARDA to examine the feasibility of creating a highland village at Iona, Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, and to prepare a plan of action?

2. Who is conducting or has conducted such a study?

3. Has the study been completed and, if so, on what date?

4. What are the results of the aforementioned study and what plan of action has been prepared?

5. What has this study cost?

6. What remuneration has been received to date by those carrying out the study?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. December 21, 1965.

2. Professor H. Spence-Sales, McGill University.

3 and 4. The study is incomplete in that no report has yet been received by Nova Scotia. The province expects the report within the next two or three weeks. The results of the study and the plan of action will not be known until then.

5. The cost agreed to with Nova Scotia is $6,000.

6. The payment of fees is arranged between the province and the contractor. The federal government has no direct relationship with the contractor; billings for the cost of the project are made by the province to the federal government.

ARDA PROJECTS, RIMOUSKI CONSTITUENCY, QUE.

Question No. 2,537—Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski):

1. What is the total cost figure for ARDA projects carried out in the constituency of Rimouski from 1962 to March 31, 1965?

2. What is the figure for 1965-66?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. Total cost figure of $77,442, of which the federal government's share is $41,659. This amount is comprised of:

	Total	Federal share

In addition, in January 1967 the federal government approved participation in the following project:

	Total	Federal share
Project 24144 Riviere du Bic watercourse	$ 69,475	$ 26,053

COST OF PREPARING ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Question No. 2,542—Mr. Isabelle:

What was the estimated cost to the different government departments for the preparation of the following answers to questions numbered 2,060, 2,063 and 2,070 (answered November 23, 1966), 2,069 (answered November 16, 1966), 1,860 (answered November 9, 1966), 2,024 (answered November 2, 1966), 1,996 (answered October 26, 1966), 1,894 (answered October 19, 1966), 1,871, 1,891 and 1,896 (answered October 12, 1966), 1,793, 1,840, 1,872 and 1,880 (answered October 5, 1966)?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): It is not possible to estimate the cost of answering questions on the order paper or to determine how many people are engaged in research involved in answering these questions. All departments have an official assigned to deal with parliamentary inquiries and to procure the required information from the appropriate division or divisions of the department and/or the crown corporations. Answering some questions may involve a number of people and represent many man days of labour. 2. Arrangements, however, have been made with a view to remedying the situation.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—PROPOSED CREATION OF DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a bill has been introduced in the Quebec legislature to set up through legislative action what might be termed a department of external affairs empowered to deal with other countries. I ask the Prime Minister whether any consultation took place in this connection, and whether the government is of the same view as that expressed when the Lesage government was entering into treaties a couple of years ago. What is the government's attitude in this regard, and what does the government intend to do?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not received a copy of the bill in question, but when I do receive it I will study it with some interest. I do not think a copy of the bill has been received by any member of the government.

We have not been consulted as to its contents, but in view of the reports that have appeared in the press, which may or may not be accurate, based on the terms of the bill, I feel I should say that to the extent that such a bill purports to set up the administrative machinery which the Quebec government feels it requires for the performance of the functions assigned to its competence, this is a matter for the Quebec government to decide and I have no comment to make.

Inasmuch as the new department being created is reportedly to be entrusted with responsibilities in the external field, such as relations between Quebec and foreign countries and the negotiation of agreements with those governments, I can say this. Our view of the constitutional position in Canada in respect of the federal government's exclusive responsibility for the conduct of the country's external affairs has been put clearly on record in the statement issued on April 23, 1965, by my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and has been reiterated on other occasions in this house by myself and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There should be no doubt as to the position in this regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not a fact that the Quebec government entered into treaty arrangements? Did not the government of Canada—and as I recall it this was expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister—take the view that under the British North America Act there was no provision for exclusivity in so far as foreign affairs are concerned because at the time the British North America Act became the law of the United Kingdom and the constitution of Canada our foreign affairs were handled in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has not stated the situation accurately in so far as the actions taken by the previous government of Quebec are concerned. Any agreements made by that government with other countries in respect of cultural and educational matters have been made under a master agreement entered into by the federal government with the countries in question.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. Does this situation not again point up the desirability of setting up a parliamentary study of our constitution as quickly as possible?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. It underlines the desirability of observing the existing constitution.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): I wish to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it not true that the Statute of Westminster rendered null and void section 132 of the constitution of Canada, which concerns the signing of treaties with foreign countries and that in view of the lapsing of this provision, the provinces have also international authority.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Sherbrooke will agree that his question is argumentative.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the right hon. Prime Minister has just stated that the present constitution must be respected, would he say whether this also applies to the federal government?

INDUSTRY

SPEECH BY MINISTER RESPECTING WAGE PARITY WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas(Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has his attention been drawn to the speech made by the Minister of Industry to the Reform club of Montreal on Monday, February 27 in which he stated that wage parity with the United States was not realistic at the present time? Does this represent considered government policy and, if so, will this be applicable in respect of those industries where there is parity of productivity per man hour with the United States?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a very technical and a very important question. So far as the first part is concerned, it is the government's feeling that it would be inadvisable to try to bring about general wage parity with the United States at this time. So far as the second part is concerned, I should like to look into the matter.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister agree with the implications of the statement by the Minister of Industry to the effect that this pressure for parity of wages where parity of productivity is apparent is the result of international unions wishing to make Canadian production non-competitive with the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is now asking for an expression of opinion, and the question to this extent is not acceptable.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was not asking the Prime Minister for an expression of opinion. I was asking him whether the Minister of Industry was expressing government policy.

Mr. Speaker: That is a different question, and I find it difficult to reconcile the hon. member's explanation with the question.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could be permitted to say that I am very interested in the hon. gentleman's acceptance of the principle that wages should be linked to productivity.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Douglas: May I be allowed to rephrase my supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Ontario.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in view of the enunciation of the policy of wage parity in the automobile industry by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago, will he now indicate if it is government policy not to have price parity in respect of the automobiles being manufactured by these workers?

Mr. Pearson: I did not say that.

Mr. Starr: Will the Prime Minister say whether it is the policy of the government that there should not be parity in respect of prices of automobiles manufactured by these workers?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I believe that as a result of action on the part of the government this industry is moving in that direction.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPORTED RECOMMENDATION THAT CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE BE LEASED FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Have Professors Hawthorne and Tremblay reported to the government recommending that the Caughnawaga Indian reserve be leased to a trust company for development, and that the Iroquois people of Caughnawaga be moved elsewhere? If such a recommendation has been made will the minister reject it as preposterous, monstrous and completely contrary to our concept of human rights?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The first part of this question should be placed on the order paper and the second is out of order.

Mr. Howard: With all due respect I agree with the second part of your ruling, but this question involves a matter which is of immediate importance affecting the human rights of a number of Canadian citizens who are liable to be moved from their home lands. I think the minister should be given an opportunity to answer.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Does the hon. minister intend to grant the urgent request of the C.F.U., asking that the price of fluid milk be set at $5 per hundredweight.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, our dairy policy will be announced before the beginning of the dairy year.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO RESTRICTIONS ON DC-6 AND DC-7 AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I addressed a question to the Minister without Portfolio regarding a restricting order in relation to altitude and pressurization in respect of DC-6 and DC-7's as a result of the serious accident in the United States. The minister took the question as notice, but in view of the number of these aircraft being used in western Canada in regular passenger service I should like to ask him whether these planes will be permitted to fly only at the altitudes directed by the Department of Transport, which may cause serious discomfort to passengers, or have altitude regulations been changed? I might say the minister was good enough to send me a partial answer this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister without Portfolio was about to answer my question, or at least that was my assumption.

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I took it from your posture that you considered the question out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I may say that I do not consider the question out of order, but the hon. member himself indicated that he had already received at least a partial reply from the minister, so I took it that he would want to place his question on the order paper, or that he expects to receive the balance of the reply from the minister in due course.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, may I say to you with respect that I did not expect to place it on the order paper. I think it is urgent because, as I said, a number of these aircraft are being used, and if a restriction is placed in a certain regulation I should like to ask the minister whether the altitude at which the aircraft can fly and other regulations have also been altered so that people can travel in these aircraft without serious discomfort as a result of the restricting order.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I should like to clarify this situation. Following the recent DC-6 incident in the United States and pending further investigation, the Department of Transport has issued, as a precautionary measure, an airworthiness directive restricting DC-6 and DC-7 aircraft registered in Canada to unpressurized operation. The department will be reviewing this situation; consequently I am unable at present to answer that part of the question just put to me.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN RESERVE REQUIREMENTS UNDER BANK ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the regrettable absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In light of the action of the United States federal reserve board reducing the reserve requirements from 4 per cent to 3 per cent on savings deposits, will the government even at this late date take into consideration a reduction in the reserve requirements under the Bank Act amendments, which have now been reported back to the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly want to discuss this matter with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there any truth to the report that the government intends to present an amendment to the Bank Act to reduce the shares which Citibank may own in the Mercantile Bank from 25 per cent to 10 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask for confirmation or denial of a report.

IMMIGRATION

DOCUMENTATION SYSTEM RESPECTING ARRIVAL AND DEPARTURE OF VISITORS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It has to do with the new documentation system which provides a record of the arrival of visitors and confirms their departure. I should like to ask the minister why this was brought into effect during Expo year, when we want to secure as many visitors as possible. The second part of my question is why this system is not made applicable to the United States, yet applies to the United Kingdom.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it was not decided to implement this policy because of Expo. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that last spring when we decided to make special regulations concerning visitors to Canada who had no status it was mentioned in the house that in the future we would try to gather more information with regard to such visitors and exercise better control over them. We have enacted these regulations to prevent a recurrence of this situation. It is absolutely accidental that the regulations come into effect in the Expo year.

They will not apply to United States citizens and residents for two reasons. The first is that about 34 million or 35 million visitors from the United States come to Canada each year, and of course we cannot control such a large number, so that only United States citizens and residents will be exempted from this regulation. The other reason is that since the United States is so close, it is not too difficult to send back the unwanted visitors. However, when visitors from European countries or other more distant parts of the world come here and decide to stay in Canada, it is much more difficult to send them back. For this reason I think the difference in treatment is justified.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question to the minister is whether the purpose of this regulation is to ensure that people shall not enter this country unlawfully. If so, would it not apply with greater force when 35 million visitors arrive here from one part of the world? Yet these visitors do not come within the ambit of the regulations, while those coming from the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries find themselves discriminated against.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the intention of the regulation is to control visitors who come here on a visitor's visa and decide to stay. Most of them, or 99.9 per cent, come from countries other than the United States. We have no trouble with those who come from the United States and it is very easy to send them back home. Our main problem is with visitors who come here with the intention of staying. We want to be able to exert some control over them, and we do not wish the situation which existed in the past to be renewed in the future.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether those who come here from central Europe on a visitor's visa are now required to post a bond of $1,000?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, this requirement applies only to those who we have reason to believe intend to stay here, not to all visitors who come from countries behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that since we are running short on time we might go on to another subject.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The minister said a moment ago that these regulations apply only to those who the department has reason to believe will stay here. Since this matter affects the applicants and members of parliament who intercede on their behalf, I think it is imperative that we should know how the government can recognize those who intend to stay here when they apply for visitors' visas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a question of privilege, and the point made by the hon. member is argumentative.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CHANGE IN ARMED FORCES PROPOSED IN WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In a public statement yesterday the chief of defence staff, with the approval of the Minister of National Defence, stated that the defence white paper of 1964 proposed a transformation in the role that Canada wishes to play in international affairs.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman, as an experienced member of the house, knows perfectly well that it is not within the rules of the house for any hon. member to ask a question in respect of evidence given before a committee which is sitting while the house itself is in session. That is the rule of the house, and no one should be expected to observe it more closely than the hon. gentleman himself.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since the Secretary of State for External Affairs brought this up himself may I say that when he was in the opposition he did more to evade the rules of this house than anyone else.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. member wishes my discarded opinions he may have them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am in agreement with the point made by the minister in so far as the rules are concerned. Perhaps if the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is seeking information, which should be the purpose of asking questions, he might rephrase his question in such a way as to elicit information.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to infringe on the rules, but this was a public statement made at a public meeting. However, I will pay attention to the susceptibilities of the minister and will rephrase my question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister will have to apologize.

Mr. Churchill: Was there a proposal contained in the defence white paper of 1964 that there would be a transformation in the role of Canada in foreign affairs, and that that transformation now requires the destruction of the identity of the navy, army and air force and the formation of a single service with a common rank structure and a common uniform?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the white paper was brilliantly conceived and has been brilliantly executed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has certainly been executed.

Mr. Fairweather: With apologies from those hanged.

Mr. Churchill: The minister supported the white paper in a public address made in September 1964. May I ask the following question. When he suggested that one of the proposals made in the white paper would be the formation of a small, highly trained force for effective deployment in peace keeping operations under the United Nations and for other purposes, was it his intention to provide intervention by force of arms in some trouble spot in the world?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is speechless.

NATO—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN CANADIAN MILITARY CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I can address, I think, either to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of National Defence, because it refers to the responsibilities of both. In the light of the hopes expressed in the recent United Kingdom white paper on defence estimates that by the end of June, 1967 there will be discussions and revisions of NATO commitments which will produce an agreement on the size and composition of forces and the military roles of the various partners, has the government made any proposals to the other governments with regard to the size, composition or military role of the Canadian contribution to NATO forces in the future?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member should agree that this question is much too large in context for a question on orders of the day.

An hon. Member: The question is too large for the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has a prepared statement in answer to the question.

Mr. Speaker: The minister may want to revert to motions, but for the moment I recognize the hon. member for Oxford.

SUGGESTED JOINT MEETING OF DEFENCE AND EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the observations made by General Allard before the defence committee yesterday, which observations involve the foreign policy of the country, would the minister recommend to his colleagues in cabinet that in the immediate future the defence committee be joined by the house committee on external affairs in a joint meeting to study the armed services unification bill?

[Later:]

Mr. Nesbitt: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A few minutes ago I addressed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning a joint meeting of the defence and external affairs committees. I believe, Your Honour, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was just extricating himself from his seat when Your Honour gave the floor to another member. I was wondering if the minister might have a chance to reply.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if it had not been for the running interference immediately opposite I would have been able to deal with the question right away. The external affairs committee may meet at any time, and I think this type of question could be dealt with in that committee. However, I see no reason for the suggestion made by my hon. friend.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO WELSH PEOPLE ON ST. DAVID'S DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. In the unavoidable absence of the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, who I understand is of Welsh ancestry, may I take the opportunity to bring to the attention of the house the importance of March 1, the day when Welshmen and those of Welsh ancestry honour their patron saint, St. David. The contribution of the Welsh people is well known, especially in the field of arts and music. So may I say to those lovers of the land of the leek, "I echyd da".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED SURCHARGES ON CARGOES TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has anything to report on his negotiations with regard to the surcharges on freight entering the port of Vancouver proposed by the shipping conferences of Japan and San Francisco, which surcharges were to become effective today?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In the case of San Francisco I understand that the surcharges will not apply. The proposed arrangement has been cancelled. The same applies for Hong Kong. In so far as Tokyo is concerned, the date of application has been deferred until March 17 and we are hopeful it too will be cancelled.

Mr. Fulton: Since the date of March 17 has been mentioned will the minister give it the "good old Irish" in his negotiation, to assure the outcome?

Mr. Winters: One way or the other.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST THAT MANUFACTURERS REDUCE PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry. In view of the great decrease in car sales in Canada and the large number of unemployed people in industry, as well as the minister's statement that the prices of Canadian cars would be reduced, can the minister assure the house that he has made firm requests to the car manufacturers that prices be reduced?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think the car manufacturers are as conscious as anyone else of the desirability of reducing the sale price of cars to the lowest level possible with a view to stimulating sales.

Mr. Hales: Can the minister assure the house that it was part of the agreement that prices would be reduced?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to which agreement the hon. member is referring. It is quite clearly understood by the motor car manufacturers that one of the principal objects of the automobile agreement and its concomitant arrangements is lower manufacturing costs and consequently lower manufacturers' sale prices of automobiles in Canada.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, and I wish to put it in the form of a plea on behalf of those who are continually being laid off as a result of the auto pact signed with the United States. In view of the announcement yesterday that 300 more workers are being laid off by General Motors, 250 in Oshawa, 20 in Ste. Therese, 10 in Windsor and 20 in London, will he not agree now, in the interests of all of these people, to bring the auto pact before a standing committee of the house so we can find out why these people are being laid off and perhaps stop these lay-offs?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman quite unfairly and misleadingly, though he may not mean to be misleading, attributes all these lay-offs to the automotive agreement, and that is not the fact.

Mr. Starr: Let us find out the facts.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend says "Let us find out the facts". He has already made up his mind. He says these lay-offs are due to this pact, so what more does he hope to find?

Mr. Starr: Then prove you are right.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Will he explain to the house that part of his answer which he implies is not the fault of the auto pact?

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister inform the house how many of the models previously produced in Canada are now produced in the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for statistical information.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I know the Minister of Industry is anxious to answer questions. In view of the fact that this agreement was to bring about cheaper cars for Canadians, how does he explain the fact that motor cars manufactured in Canada are sold in the United States at prices competitive with the lower United States prices? Why do you not give the same right to Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROVISION OF TELEVISION SETS TO MEMBERS OF PREVIOUS GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State related to the question she answered about television sets. Could the minister tell us whether television sets were supplied by the C.B.C. to the secretary of state and the prime minister of the previous government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that this question is in order.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-220, to make provision for appeals to an immigration appeal board in respect of certain matters relating to immigration.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to reiterate too much of what was said at earlier stages of the present bill. However, we cannot let the bill receive third reading without again expressing our protest against some of the thoroughly undesirable features which the minister insisted on retaining.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure all of us on this side of the house were grateful to the minister for accepting a number of suggestions and implementing them in amendments.

One of the suggestions which he accepted and in respect of which he introduced an amendment was to broaden the area in which sponsors could launch an appeal to the appeal board. You will perhaps recall, Mr. Speaker, that the original proposal in the bill would have limited the right of appeal to citizens of Canada. After a great deal of discussion on the floor of this chamber the minister accepted suggestions from this side and came back with an amendment which changed the word "citizen" to "person". So that as far as the general right of appeal contained in the first sentence of clause 17 is concerned, any sponsor, citizen or non-citizen, it would seem from the wording, would be able to appeal to the immigration appeal board in accordance with the provisions of the bill and the regulations which are to follow its passage.

Having done that, Mr. Speaker, the minister then turned around and took to the governor in council the power to limit the area in which that right may be exercised. He took to the governor in council the power by regulation, as I understand the amendment that the minister brought in, to state which classes of sponsor may use the right of appeal. In answer to an interjection of mine at one point to the effect that it seemed to me that he intended by regulation to limit the right of appeal to citizens and to exclude non-citizens, the minister stated, if I remember his words correctly, "It may be". So it seems that that is the intention of the minister and his department.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, having used language in the first sentence to extend the right of appeal to all sponsors, the minister then takes upon himself or upon the government the authority to limit the class of sponsor that may appeal. He also gives to the governor in council the authority to state in respect of which classes of proposed immigrants such an appeal may be made. In other words, clause 17 as now worded in the amended bill gives a general right to all sponsors to appeal if they feel aggrieved, and it reserves to the government the right by regulation to limit the area within which that appeal may be exercised.

I do not think I use language too strong, Mr. Speaker, when I say that I find that an odious provision. I find it odious for several reasons of principle. First, it seems to me axiomatic that if you give a right of appeal to a class of person, every member of that class ought to have the opportunity of exercising it if he so wishes. Any proposition whereby parliament lays down a general rule giving everyone in a certain class a right of appeal and then gives to the government the authority to say which persons within that class can exercise that right of appeal is completely unacceptable and thoroughly reprehensible. If parliament does recognize that people have the right of appeal to the immigration appeal board, then parliament should be the one to decide which groups of people within that class may or may not appeal. That decision should not be left to the governor in council.

Second, it seems to me that this will lead to the exercise of a kind of arbitrary, bureaucratic discrimination, and this also is unacceptable. What will be the criterion used to decide which class of sponsors may use the right of appeal and which may not, or to decide in respect to which class of relative the right may be used? This decision will be made by the minister and his advisers. They will decide to start at a certain point, and I expect that at the beginning this right will be limited to citizens only. It will be limited to the closest of relatives, perhaps mothers and fathers, and all others will be excluded.

In these matters, Mr. Speaker, you cannot make decisions arbitrarily. I say that to the minister with the utmost respect to him. You may easily have a case whose elements and characteristics are a great deal more urgent but which falls into the group that is excluded rather than the group that is included. It may be more important, though from the humanitarian point of view more heartbreaking, to keep out someone who is a little more distant than a mother in certain cases than to keep out someone who is a mother. The circumstances of each case are separate and distinct and have to be dealt with on their merits in each particular case. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, the arbitrary decision which is going to be made under the proposed clause 17 of the present bill is unacceptable.

Third, Mr. Speaker, the bill is unacceptable to me because the whole purpose of the immigration appeal tribunal seems to be vitiated by this power which is reserved unto the government. I understood that the purpose of the bill was this. Under the present act you have to go through the procedure of making application to the officers of the department, then to an inquiry officer, then to an appeal board, and then beyond the appeal board to the minister. It is that situation which the minister sought to correct, if I understand aright. In effect, what the minister said to parliament—and I commend him for it—was that he wanted to place appeals on such matters in the hands of a tribunal which will have the final decision; the decision should not be shunted from the appeal tribunal back to him to have the final word on the matter.

It seems to me that by reserving to the government the right to limit the classes of people who may appeal, or on whose behalf an appeal may be launched, the minister is preserving precisely what he sought to get rid of. The old procedure will still be there. It will be possible to go through the officers of the department and up to the minister for a decision. The old appeal board, of course, will not be in existence, so that in cases where the present appeal procedure is excluded the appellants concerned will have fewer avenues of approach than they had before. They will be able to go through officialdom to the minister only without any appeal tribunal being available to them.

What is the purpose of this? As I understood the minister, he said that we have to do this in order to find out how the new appeal procedure will work and whether it will work happily. As I asked the other day, Mr. Speaker, work happily for whom? The minister is concerned about the number of appeals. He came to the committee and the committee agreed unanimously that he should have the authority to appoint up to nine members to the appeal board instead of only seven. We have agreed to the provision in the bill that one member of the board is sufficient to hear the evidence, even though a panel of members of the board will have to make the decision in the matter.

I should like to repeat what I said to the minister at an earlier stage, that we ought to give everybody who so wishes the opportunity to use the right of appeal which is provided for in clause 17. If at a later date the minister finds from experience that his policy is not working, that some harm is being done, that something untoward is occurring, then he can come back to parliament with a new plan. I would hope that that plan would be one to increase the number of people who sit on the appeal board, perhaps to establish a number of panels at points across Canada to deal with appeals instead of merely having the one board with panels travelling across the country.

[Mr. Lewis.]

I submit that the minister should not at this point start by introducing what I can only describe as the deliberate creation of a delusion in the minds and hearts of the people affected that they have a right of appeal, only to find that the governor in council will tell them that they do not have that right as a result of an arbitrary decision having been made which is entirely unrelated to the particular circumstances and merits of the case. This we cannot accept, Mr. Speaker. Neither can we agree to third reading of this bill so long as this undemocratic, undesirable and reprehensible reservation of power to the government is retained in clause 17 of the bill. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

• (3:50 p.m.)

That Bill C-220 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering clause 17 thereof.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall not go over everything that was said on second reading in committee of the whole. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) did not bring up any new arguments. It was more of the same. All I can do, obviously, is to repeat what I have already said.

There is only one point I should like to stress. I can only agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for York South when he deals with the merits of the case. We have asked, or rather, I have asked that this section might be applied progressively by order in council for a very good reason: a new right is being granted Canadian citizens, Canadian residents. As I have said, we are trying out something new. What will be its impact? Will the Appeal Board, as we are setting it up, as we see it, really suffice to take this into account? Perhaps it will be necessary to change it. Then, if such a move is imperative, it will have to be made. Therefore, all I asked and all we ask, is a chance to conduct experiment and to extend it progressively until everybody is on the same footing.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it would not be sensible to give certain classes of citizens in Canada certain rights which would be denied to others.

Canada is the first country, as far as I know, to give a right to sponsor, a legal right, a right with a right of appeal to a court, and what we are asking the house is merely an opportunity to experiment in order to ascertain exactly what impact this may have on our policy.

The board itself will have much to learn in this respect. I feel it is only reasonable that the house let us make this experiment in a broad-minded way, contrary to the suggestion made by the hon. member for York South. We want the governor in council to extend this right to a maximum. Therefore, we are not providing restrictions to this right.

I suggest that this right can and should be granted to everyone, and we should not use the word "limit". Why should this right appear in the bill, if we do not want to grant it? No one forced us to do so. We felt that it was—and we realize that it must eventually be considered,—a matter of right and we simply ask to proceed step by step in order to find out whether the proposed structure is really the right one. If we have to change it, if we discover that we are swamped because of the inadequacy of our structures, the process will be temporarily halted, so as to enable the house to change the structure, the sponsoring, the right of a sponsor to appeal, to make adjustments concerning the board. That is the only purpose.

When the member for York South deals with merit, I shall not answer him, because I agree with him. There is only one point—he used what may not be called a misleading argument, but could become one—which is that we never suggested in the house that there would be distinctions within a given class. Should we state that Canadian citizens are entitled to sponsor, then it would mean that all Canadian citizens are entitled to do so; if we were to say, at a given time, that landed immigrants are entitled to sponsor, then we would be extending this right to all landed immigrants, and the governor in council must in no way discriminate between Canadians and immigrants. Therefore, we have no intention of discriminating, or using discretionary powers; all we want, and this seems quite reasonable to me, is the opportunity to experiment something new, which was never tested before in any country, and of embarking ourselves in a venture which is at present unknown to us. That was the spirit in which it was submitted, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I believe, with great respect, that the minister has missed the whole point of the amendment. I will not argue again the case put forward in committee when the minister moved certain amendments to clause 17. Immediately thereafter what he had given with one hand he took away with the other. In response to criticisms from this side he presented amendments which I styled sophistical. I still think they were sophistical. The ministers' amendments extended the category of appellant from a Canadian citizen to any person, including a landed immigrant. Then he took the power away. Behind the closed doors of the cabinet chamber he has the right to say that it shall be only a Canadian citizen or some class of Canadian citizen who may appeal. The minister retained the power to determine what classes of relatives shall be included. As I say, he gave with one hand and took away with the other.

I do not doubt the minister's personal sincerity, but he will not be minister very long. He will not retain his present portfolio for long because I do not think anybody could take on his leadership responsibilities in Quebec and retain the responsibilities of the portfolio of manpower and immigration. Frankly, I think to do both things is impossible. The minister will have to leave a portfolio as heavy as that of manpower and immigration. That portfolio is no part time job.

For these reasons he may not be the minister for much longer. We do not know who may be the new minister, who will be the person with the right at any time to present a recommendation to the cabinet to close the door on the class of persons who may appeal. We do not know who may close the door on classes of relatives. It is not good enough to give power to the governor in council sitting behind closed doors to reduce this clause to a total nullity, because that is what is happening.

Even at this late date I suggest that the minister should reconsider the position of the government. He should adopt the reasonable position suggested to him by members on this side during debate in committee of the whole house. In many particulars the minister showed considerable flexibility as the bill went through committee. As the bill stands at third reading it has been greatly improved over the bill which received second reading. On few occasions have I seen as many useful amendments adopted in the committee of the whole house. The bill has been improved and would be improved more if the minister allowed it to go back to the committee of the whole as proposed by this amendment, and if he gave effect to the representations which I had the privilege of making in committee.

Those representations were made by other members also. If the minister did that we should pass a bill of which he would be proud.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I waited during the remarks of my colleague from York South and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) to see what some hon. members on the other side of the house who were so vocal in the special committee dealing with the white paper and in their espousals of a fair system of immigration would say. I have waited to see whether hon. members like the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai), the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) and the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) would rise to protest even midly a provision in this bill which is to my mind contrary to the whole spirit of the immigration policy we have ostensibly espoused.

Amid great fanfare the government came to parliament with a white paper on immigration and this bill and announced that for the first time in Canada it was intended to eliminate the practices of the past whereby people from some countries were considered to be better than people from other countries, practices which gave citizens of Britain, France and other northern countries every opportunity to enter while making it much more difficult for prospective immigrants from countries farther south to do so. Government spokesmen said that additional provisions would be made. Educational qualifications and qualifications based on skills would be introduced but they would be the same for everybody. I believe I am right in saying there was almost unanimous agreement both in the house and in the country that this attitude was the correct one to take.

But lo and behold, here we have a clause which leads one to the conclusion that the statements made on behalf of the government did not really mean very much. The minister is proposing here that the government shall have the power to restrict the rights of certain people compared with other people. He says this provision is experimental and that as time goes by it will be made more liberal. If I could be sure that the present minister, for whom I have considerable regard, would stay in his job longer than past ministers of immigration have done, I might not be so worried about this clause as I am. But we have no assurance that this minister will be on the job for very long. Nor have we any assurance that a future minister either in this or in some other government might not wish to use the power provided in this clause to impose a restrictionist policy as followed in the past. There would be nothing to prevent another minister getting an order in council passed to the effect that all non-white people who have the right to sponsor relatives shall not enjoy the right to appeal when the department says that the applicant sponsored may not enter this country. Or the minister could secure an order in council to the effect that no Italian who is sponsoring the entry of a relative into Canada should have the right to appeal an adverse ruling of the department.

This is wrong in principle. I am not saying the minister would propose anything of this kind. But having adopted a principle that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race, colour, religion or nationality in respect of immigration, and having set up an appeal board so that a sponsor can appeal against a decision reached by the department, it seems to me completely wrong that the minister should be able to say by order in council at some future time that certain people who have the right to sponsor immigrants shall no longer have the right to appeal when the decision is one with which the department does not agree. This cannot be justified.

The minister says this is a temporary thing. But the provision in the bill is not temporary. It is not stated that the right of the minister to obtain an order in council shall exist for two, three or five years while the government considers how the system is working. For as long as the bill is in force the governor in council will have the right to decide what classes of people shall have the right to appeal. This kind of provision ought not to be approved and the minister should agree to remove this clause from the bill. As I say, I am surprised we have not heard from members on the government side who disagreed with such a provision in the committee. We have not heard any objection from them.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, like many of my colleagues I am somewhat reluctant to extend the debate, but things have been repeated which I think call for the repetition of certain arguments that are not in agreement with those advanced a while ago.

So, we have before us an amendment moved by one of our colleagues of the New Democratic Party, who proposes that the bill be not now read a third time but be referred to a committee of the house with spceific instructions to reconsider clause 17.

The argumentation of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and some other colleagues is that the bill does not entitle everybody to equal treatment as regards the right of appeal in immigration matters.

• (4:10 p.m.)

I listened to the minister's explanations and I thought I could detect in them what I would call a conciliatory attitude which at times bordered on the desire to apologize. Mr. Speaker, I feel that there is no need for apologies. Some principles have apparently been forgotten and the fact is that, first of all, the right to immigration is a privilege that no country has to grant to anyone.

If I decide to bring a child into my home and adopt it, that child has no right to force anything on me; in short, no one can force anything on me unless freak accidents happened on the way, which is not the case in immigration.

I believe that an immigrant who wishes to settle in Canada is unable to assert his claim to remain in the country if the government feels there are some objections. It is not impossible for the government to have some information causing it to refuse the right of citizenship to an immigrant, perhaps not necessarily because of his shortcomings or weaknesses, but on account of incidents which, without involving him personally, make him all the same a risk for the security of the country. That is why I say that the government should retain such powers of authority.

I fail to understand why some relentlessly object to the government exercising the authority conferred legally upon it by our constitution. It has been said on several occasions: We have a lot of confidence in the present minister, but he will not be there forever and we do not know who will be there at a later time.

Mr. Speaker, I should not be concerned if the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) or any of his colleagues, except one or two I will abstain from specifying in a spirit of Christian charity, or even the hon. member for York South, were to be appointed Minister of Immigration. I should not be concerned, I say, to allow them discretionary powers in cases that must precisely be handled with discretion and settled expeditiously, because if settlement of these cases were to be delayed by unending procedures, the security of Canada would be endangered for all kinds of reasons.

Mr. Speaker, I think that power of discretion must be left with the government in some instances. Besides—and now I am almost tempted to be mean—I would say to our friends of the New Democratic Party that they are casting stones while living in a glass house, since not later than today the Ottawa Citizen reports that two young men, who were members of the New Democratic Party, for reasons which seem to me quite insignificant, have lost their membership cards and find it difficult to get them back. I notice also that a representative of the New Democratic Party stated this:

[English]

"We don't like giving reasons for why we would refuse membership," Mr. Harney continued. "We don't like leaving ourselves open for libel suits."

[Translation]

If this is true for the New Democratic Party, it could be true, all the more, for the government, whichever it is—today it is a Liberal government, maybe some day it will be an N.D.P. or a Conservative government. But I think that the principle remains the same. We must preserve in our country the principle of authority, and establish an arbitration principle among authorized representatives. The Canadian people want to be protected against what I could call the use of force, even against individuals who can, through all kinds of resources and assistance from learned legal advisers, drag out procedures with the risk of seeing those undesirable people stay here longer than necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I confess that such obstinacy in always doubting the objectivity and the professional ethics, the concern for the common good of the responsible members of government, surprises me greatly. To me, it is a kind of moral revolution which tends, in the long run, to undermine the confidence of the Canadian people in their administrators.

What is the reason for that obstinacy in suggesting that there might be something more "arbitrary" in the decision of one minister or even two ministers who base their decision on reports which have been prepared by serious people, from various sources and various bodies. I cannot believe that any minister, whoever he is, to whatever party he belongs, can be influenced by personal reasons and refuse to a person of good will, who would be an asset to this nation, the right to citizenship.

Even if it were just a doubt that cannot be disproved by unquestionable facts, I think the government should give the benefit of the doubt to the Canadian nation rather than to the immigrant who wants to come and live in our country.

I think the door to our country has been opened wider to immigrants. I believe that, as a rule there is no limitation for any group of people, except in very special cases. I think it would be unwise to go further than that for the time being or, at least, until the present legislation has been tried.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, I am looking at the situation as objectively as possible. I do not believe I am prejudiced against anyone in this house, and it sometimes happens—I said it the other day—if things come to the worst, that I correct the views expressed by some members of the New Democratic Party or the Progressive Conservative party. I do not worry at all about saying frankly, in public, that the more I listen to their arguments concerning this matter of granting to the immigrants the open door treatment, the more I find they are adopting a disturbing position and the more disquieting their arguments are, because they are in danger of damaging in the public mind the trust that should be placed in the administrators of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is not right to attack the authorities on the basis of possible discrimination. In my opinion, this amendment should be rejected and the motion for third reading of Bill No. C-220 should be passed without further delay, thus putting this legislation to the test for the next 12 months. I am sure that if discrimination exists, we will hear about it during the next 12 months, for I know we have watch-dogs of democratic rights who will surely bring the matter to our attention. I hope I am not offending anyone by using the term "watch-dogs", because this word is to be found in the Scriptures referring to silent dogs, blaming silent dogs. I am sure there will not be any silent dogs here if ever a government abused its powers in this field; hon. members will not hesitate to bring up this matter in the house, thus enabling parliament to reconsider and amend the legislation in the light of new developments.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

[English]

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words at this point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) made a certain statement about members on this side not speaking. I am going to speak on the subject but first I would like to correct the impression being created by hon. members on the other side of the house that it is only they who are taking a stand with respect to the proposed immigration appeal board.

Since first being elected to the house some four and a half to five years ago the committee on immigration on which I have served has been united and of one mind so far as immigration is concerned. Politics has played absolutely no part in its proceedings. But here in the House of Commons hon. members on the opposite side, including our good friend from Carleton, have hardly ever opened their mouths on the subject of the white paper simply because it was the Liberal members who were taking up all the time in presenting ideas to improve the white paper.

I notice that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) is now doing quite a bit of talking on the subject. I think it would be very nice if the New Democratic Party would let some of its members who served on the committee carry the ball. Do those members not have the ability to carry the ball or do they intend to rely on the person who is supposed to take over the leadership of that party from the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas)? Is this the only way that the hon. member for York South can gain recognition in the House of Commons?

Hon. members opposite must acknowledge that there has never been a minister in charge of any bill who has co-operated more fully than the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) in devising a new policy, a new idea, and a white paper such as the Conservative and other previous governments never even thought of bringing into being.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Roxburgh: When I finish my remarks, Mr. Speaker. We are dealing with something new, new thoughts and new ideas introduced by the minister, his department and the committee of the house. I have to agree that from the moral aspect there is a point to the amendment; there is certainly good in it. I am not arguing against that.

• (4:20 p.m.)

The present minister is a very hard worker and I am sure there will be radical changes in the white paper. He is a man who has stood on his feet before and I am sure will stand on his feet again in opposition to anyone who opposes necessary changes. This man has spoken until three o'clock in the morning about what the government intends to do to improve this legislation. Let me appeal to hon. members opposite to give him a chance to see what he and his department can do. If they do not propose beneficial changes and I am in the house I will vote in opposition to the government for an amendment of the type suggested. Again I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to work with this man who is trying to work with them.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member who has just concluded whether he is aware of the fact that the bill now under discussion was not referred to the committee on immigration which discussed the white paper on immigration?

Mr. Roxburgh: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that fact.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks made in the house this afternoon on third reading of Bill C-220, I feel compelled to make some observations. I do not intend to prolong the debate because I know the government and the minister want the bill passed, but I should like to state, especially to those hon. members who have made remarks concerning me, that they should read my speech made in this chamber last Monday. At that time I tried to direct the attention of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) to the representations which have been made, not only to me but also to other members of the house, to the effect that many Canadian citizens believe the present classes of relatives who can be sponsored for admission to Canada are restrictive. I paid a tribute to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration last Monday and the week before when speaking on this bill. He is making history in this country as a result of bringing in the white paper on immigration and Bill C-220.

I appreciate the views of hon. members opposite and I share with them their concern that, althought it is entirely possible to eliminate irrational forms of discrimination from Canadian legislation, as the white paper proposes to do, certain legislation we now have makes it possible to discriminate by setting certain criteria or standards which erect barriers to admission to Canada. What I should like the minister to do this afternoon is tell hon. members again how we as members of parliament can explain the last three lines of clause 17 of Bill C-220 to assure our constituents and those Canadian citizens who make representations to us that they will not be discriminated against if they desire to bring to Canada relatives who are inadmissible according to the white paper which limits admissible relatives to unmarried nieces and nephews under age 21.

Many Canadian citizens wish to bring their next of kin to Canada. They may have no brothers, sisters, nieces or nephews alive in the old country. They may want to bring their first, second, third or fourth cousins here. These Canadian citizens should have the right to do so. If the regulations are interpreted in such a way that they are prevented from doing so, they should have the right to appeal and explain the circumstances to the appeal board. If that board turns them down, they should have recourse to the minister. At this time the minister should again explain to us how we can handle complaints from our constituents in respect of the problems I have just raised.

Let me join with the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) who is a very faithful member of the special joint committee on immigration with very strong views in respect of justice as it should be dispensed in matters of immigration. I should like to see this bill passed in order that its benefits will become available to Canadian citizens and the country as a whole. I realize that the minister is sincere in his approach and will find some way out of this dilemma. Let me say also that as a member of the committee on immigration, like the hon. member for Norfolk, I will see to it that the recommendations we bring in dealing with classes of relatives who may be sponsored will be wide enough to satisfy the representations of our constituents.

Again let me emphasize the necessity to widen the classes of relatives who can be sponsored. The people of Canada desire this change. We are here to legislate for the people rather than for certain theoreticians. In closing my remarks let me say I consider it my duty, when we bring in our recommendations in respect of the white paper and have an opportunity to discuss the government's bill, to do my best to see that any discrimination which may exist in Bill C-220 is eliminated.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel compelled in any way to take part in this debate but I wish to say a few words in connection with the apprehensions expressed about the last three lines of clause 17. There seems to be a general impression that this appeal board will be the panacea to all our problems. That is not the case. There also seems to be an impression that immigration matters should be removed from federal government responsibility. I am sure the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) would be the first to object if he could not pin down someone in this house in connection with immigration problems.

With the establishment of the appeal board we will establish two classes of appellants and two classes of relatives. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said that in a court such as this, and it will be a court, great emphasis will be put on precedents. Obviously smart, good lawyers, and therefore expensive ones, will do a better job than mediocre lawyers, so that before we know it we will have a class of immigration lawyers who will charge big fees. If such is the case then automatically we will have two classes of applicants.

On the other hand, I cannot accept the minister's point of view which he expressed in the words "we will try it and see". I cannot accept legislation based on trial and error. I am sure the minister did not mean that, because any legislation which we pass in the house is enforceable and should mean exactly what it says. We should not take the attitude that we will see what happens and if it does not work out we will do something else. I am sure the minister did not mean that.

I have no objection to retaining the last three lines of clause 17 because it will give me and other members of the house an opportunity to question the minister from day to day, whereas if these lines were not included the minister could say, as we have been told in the case of the C.B.C., "It is out of my hands. It is in the hands of the appeal board." On the other hand, I do not think that these three lines will provide the solution which some members in the house feel they may.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, may I answer the hon. member?

[Mr. Haidasz.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister will require the unanimous consent of the house to speak now. Is there unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the minister speaks again some of us may wish to say another word.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Lewis) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Skoreyko: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Fairweather: I was paired.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question on the main motion?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the committee stage and at second reading various spokesmen from our party, myself included, stated objections to clause 21 and proposed amendments which were not accepted. Because important and fundamental principles are at stake I propose to move an amendment dealing with clause 21. I shall not repeat in detail the arguments made in committee.

The bill as a whole, especially with the amendments moved in committee, in my view is excellent. The minister and his department deserve considerable credit for it. The bill provides for an appeal from orders for deportation to an independent tribunal.

Unfortunately clause 21 creates a grave and gaping hole in this admirable principle. In effect the clause says that in security cases the matter may be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the appeal tribunal and the appeal in those cases is rendered useless or inoperative. It is precisely in these types of so-called security cases that the right to a fair hearing and a real appeal is important. It is because of alleged or real security reports that many immigrants have been rejected without any possibility of proving that objections to them are based on mistakes of identity or on misapprehensions of the significance of political activities contained in police reports.

It is a fundamental human right to which the house has solemnly subscribed in the Bill of Rights that when a person's rights or future are being dealt with he shall be given a fair opportunity to meet the case against him. Such a person must know the outline at least of the case against him and the objections he has to meet. There are reasons, of course, why security reports from confidential sources cannot be made public or even disclosed in full at the hearing. But that is no reason for denying a fair hearing and denying a meaningful right of appeal in security cases. It is perfectly possible to maintain the right of appeal and yet to pay attention to the need of guarding security sources.

I proposed an amendment in committee which would have achieved the end I have just outlined. The amendment would have given authority in security cases for the board to hold its appeal hearings in camera and to exclude the accused and his counsel when evidence of a security nature was being given. It would have required the Department of Manpower and Immigration, on the order only of the appeal board, to give particulars of the objections to admission.

There is no point in beating our breasts about human rights in theory and then denying them in practice. Reasons of security of state are always used in an effort to excuse breaches or denials of rights acknowledged in theory. Admittedly there may be occasions when genuine reasons of state may require the suspension of normal rights, but this is not such an occasion. Security in wartime even in regard to internment did not require the total denial to those interned of any reason for their internment. In this instance security does not require that the beneficial right of appeal conferred by this bill should effectively be denied.

Fundamental rights are not for the majority alone. They are not for the popular. They are not for the accepted. Fundamental rights are for minorities, for unpopular minorities. They are for harried, would-be immigrants who are seeking admission to this country. It is important in the interests of Canada, not just of the immigrants, that our immigration procedures should be fair and in accordance with the best of our traditions.

This bill is a significant advance in the fair treatment of immigrants and sponsors of would-be immigrants. It is too bad that in the interest of security there should be a blot place upon what is otherwise good legislation in the very field where the rights conferred by this measure are most urgently needed. I have heard the explanation given by the minister in committee. He argued that there is no half way house, that there must either be a full hearing with evidence or there can be no appeal at all of any value. I said then that I believed him to be wrong and I repeat that he is totally wrong. Practice has shown that there is a half way house where the interests of security can be balanced against a desire to be fair to those concerned. For this reason I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That Bill No. C-220 be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering clause 21 thereof.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we made it quite clear in committee of the whole that we were not satisfied with clause 21 as it now stands. The view which we take, and it was supported by an amendment moved a week ago today—

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to question whether the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood is in order. We have already had a decision of the house not to refer this bill back to committee. That amendment was that the bill be not read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for reconsideration of clause 17.

May I refer Your Honour to citation 415 of Beauchesne where it is stated:

(2) Bills may be recommitted a number of times with or without limitation; in the latter case the whole bill is opened to reconsideration—

I suggest that if the bill had been referred back to the committee for the purpose of reconsidering clause 17 and we had then progressed to third reading it would be in order to move another motion to recommit the bill in line with this citation. It could be recommitted then for the reconsideration of another clause. But since it is stated that the whole bill is opened for consideration and since the house has in fact rejected an amendment for recommittal only a few minutes ago, I suggest that the present amendment is not in order inasmuch as the house has already reached a decision on an amendment which is essentially the same as the one before us except that the one before us refers to clause 21 and the former amendment referred to clause 17.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the answer to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Medicine Hat is contained in the very citation from which he read. Citation 415 (2) refers to recommittal without limitation. Neither the amendment moved by the hon. member for York South nor the amendment now moved by the hon. member for Greenwood is a motion without limitation. In each case it is a motion for referral back for the purpose of considering one specific clause.

There are many examples of bills recommitted over and over again. My recollection tells me that in 1956 this happened repeatedly. I have had occasion to look up this point and see what happened during some of the early years of the history of the House of Commons. In the latter decades of the last century there were bills which on third reading were referred back to committee as many as 50 or 60 times. I am not suggesting we shall be doing that today but I am saying it is completely in order to do so. The house did not reject the idea of recommitting the bill. It rejected the amendment to recommit it for the reconsideration of clause 17. This amendment is an entirely different proposition and I maintain it is in order.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member for Medicine Hat failed to read the whole of citation 415, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In the second paragraph it is stated that a bill may be recommitted a number of times with or without limitation and that in the latter case the whole bill is opened to reconsideration. But in the former case it says that the committee can only consider the clause or amendments or instructions referred to them. If the first amendment had carried the committee of the whole could have considered clause 17 and the instructions given by the house with Mr. Speaker in the chair.

If one pursued the argument advanced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat to its logical conclusion one could secure a recommittal on a very minor point where both sides of the house were really in agreement, but in order to bar consideration completely one could seek referral back on a point which would have no hope of carrying and then all the more important and contentious points would be effectively barred. The amendment may be unacceptable to Your Honour but certainly not, I would suggest, on the ground advanced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their expression of views in connection with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I am sure the hon. member has had an opportunity to reconsider the matter and with his usual sound judgment on procedural matters has convinced himself he was wrong in the first instance. I am certain that the argument advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Edmonton West is the correct one and that the question now proposed to the house is entirely different from the one proposed in connection with the amendment which was defeated earlier this afternoon. Therefore I cannot accept the point of order raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the point of order was raised I was indicating that we in this party were very far from satisfied with the existing provisions of clause 21. Our dissatisfaction was clearly indicated a week ago today when we proposed an amendment to it. The amendment we proposed was directly in line with the recommendations made by Mr. Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., to the effect that the validity of security or criminal intelligence reports should be determined not by the certificate of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) but by the board itself, that they should be laid before the board but that before the board they should, however, be kept secret, although the appellant should be made aware of the fact that it is a security or criminal intelligence matter which is being raised against him.

In those circumstances, at least knowing the nature of the case he has to meet, the appellant would be able to bring evidence that might establish to the board that the evidence presented by the minister was not sufficient to constitute the appellant a security risk or to demonstrate that he had not the criminal record which was indicated. That amendment, which was in line with Mr. Joseph Sedgwick's proposals, was voted down by the committee of the whole.

Subsequently the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) presented an amendment which in my view was totally unacceptable. With the objective he had in mind of democratization of the procedures in relation to this matter I have the most complete sympathy, but the procedures and techniques the hon. gentleman proposed in committee of the whole were ones which would not achieve the purposes he had in mind. I can only assume, unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to say something different, that that is what he intends if this amendment is carried and the bill is recommitted to committee of the whole.

In committee of the whole I would not be able to support an amendment in any way similar to that which the hon. gentleman proposed in committee of the whole previously. On that occasion he left completely alone the question of criminal intelligence reports. Yet this is a field which in today's context may be even more important than security itself. The hon. gentleman would have left the whole field of criminal intelligence reports without any provision in the bill and without any protection of any kind whatsoever for such reports. In those circumstances it would be impossible to vote for any such amendment.

In committee of the whole the hon. gentleman used terms of art like "particulars." He used a word which undoubtedly would be interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada in accordance with the jurisprudence under the rules of practice and the Judicature Act and which, if so interpreted, could not conceivably keep secret the sources of information. Such an amendment as was moved in committee of the whole is one that we in this party could not support under any circumstances.

If the purpose is simply to recommit the bill in order to consider such an amendment, then I would look on it as an exercise in total futility in which I do not think the house should engage. Unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to indicate that he has in mind something totally different from the amendment he presented previously in committee, I for one intend to vote against this amendment.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the terms that the hon. member has put forward his amendment and, shall we say, in the terms of the context of the debate that took place at the committee stage and the hon. member's references to the matter, I too, like the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), find his proposal far too sweeping in its ambit and I would be obliged to place some limitation on it. However, having said that I wish to add that the present practices of the department of immigration, which I am sure would carry up to the appeal board, in failing to state reasons for barring immigrants, simply saying that a proposed immigrant fails to meet the requirements or the standards of the department, are not good enough.

With modern medical knowledge it can be stated that a proposed immigrant unfortunately suffers from a tubercular infection. He may well have been a mental patient. These can be facts, but on many occasions it has been said to me, "Well, we don't want to offend the susceptibilities or feelings of the sponsoring relatives." This is a lot of nonsense, if I may say so with respect to the minister and his officials. The sponsoring relatives know the situation.

With new interpretation of the regulations and with the co-operation of provincial health authorities, diseases which previously have barred proposed immigrants can now be treated, or some arrangements can be made to post a bond of a minor nature whereby, provided an immigrant meets certain residence requirements, he can be treated like any other resident in our country. Therefore it is not proper that such reasons should not be disclosed.

In many cases the department has said, "This is a security case and let us leave it at that." I have had experience of the department lifting a corner of the carpet or raising the curtain a little bit. Frankly, I found that the security reasons given were most specious, and following discussion with the minister and his officials in a number of instances they have agreed that the person involved should not be barred.

An hon. Member: Or deported.

Mr. Lambert: I do not recall running into any deportation cases of this particular kind. In this instance I am referring more particularly to people from the Orient. I fully recognize the problems which the minister faces in this regard but I cannot go so far as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) with regard to asking for particulars and disclosure of information.

I am sure the minister will recognize that tremendous frustration is caused to members of parliament and bona fide sponsors in this country in the case of an intending immigrant from Italy, for example, when he is told that he cannot meet the requirements and that it is a security case. It is suggested to the relatives that it looks like a security case. They ask why, and having scouted around it turns out that some jealous person went to the police and said the immigrant in question was suspect. I had a case recently of a person who in 1945 or 1946, just after the war when many Italians were starving, belonged to a certain organization, and in 1964 that fact caused a complete ban on his application to come to Canada even though his sons and daughters and other relatives, with the exception of his father and mother, were already in Canada. I must say that the minister and his officials had the good sense to review the situation, but I find it exceedingly difficult to accept this wide open amendment to the effect that the minister and his officials must disclose all the particulars. There must be some protection for the state for the greater good of the nation. On the other hand, I do hope to see some relaxation in respect of illness and residential requirements, and some relaxation in respect of the often criticized provision in relation to moral turpitude. I believe this involves a great deal of nonsense.

In respect of security I go more than half way with the minister, and for the reasons I have outlined I cannot support the wide open amendment put forward by the hon. member. Having said that I hope the minister and his officials can find some way to make these restrictions humanely intelligent.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I have not participated to any extent in this debate but I should like to comment in respect of clause 21. Let me commend the minister for supporting the clause as it stands. It is very difficult to reach perfection although we attempt to do so. This clause makes an attempt in that direction and is accompanied by some success though it may not attain it. We must content ourselves with the best that can be done under given circumstances.

Clause 21 involves very delicate, tricky and dangerous circumstances. We should not allow criminals or individuals who have shown a tendency in this direction by their past records to come into the country under the guise of humanitarianism. We must always consider causes and effects and in respect of this amendment we must pay particular attention to its possible effects.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said he could not support this open amendment and its implications, and I am in agreement with him. I could agree with the clause if it related only to undesirable individuals who were security risks in a political or military sense. On the other hand, I do not think all the evidence or information should be made available to an appellant or his counsel. Once that information is made available to these people it becomes almost public knowledge. Anyone who is a member of the underworld could easily obtain this information and all the damage that could be done by making it public would then be done.

Very often because of humanity we are inclined to give more rights and opportunities to individuals than they deserve, but I think in respect of the principle involved in this bill we should be extremely careful. We must protect ourselves from an indiscriminate policy of admitting individuals who may be security risks in a political or military sense.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) are responsible individuals and until the entire cabinet becomes a security risk I will rely on these gentlemen to do their duty under the provisions of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say only two or three words about this amendment. Let me point out to the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) that neither the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) in committee nor the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) suggested that just anybody be given the precise evidence or its source.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): You have asked for all the information.

Mr. Lewis: No. The amendment of the hon. member for Carleton suggested that the minister should file a report with the appeal board but that the information should remain secret and that all the individual concerned would be informed of was the fact that a report had been made. Neither the individual nor his counsel, if he had one, would be given the information. It would be accessible only to the members of the appeal board.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood specifically provided that the evidence against an individual would be heard by the board in camera in the absence of the concerned person and his counsel. Neither of them would know what the evidence was. The particulars to be made available under the terms of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood are those particulars demanded by the appeal board, not by the person concerned or his lawyer. You would therefore have the safeguard that the board, in consultation with the minister, would ask for those particulars which could be given in the interests of the security of Canada and not for particulars which would be against the interests of our country's security.

Therefore may I say to the hon. member with respect—and I appreciate fully his motives and intentions—that he could not have read the amendment that was actually moved when he spoke as he did. I simply cannot understand the position taken by the hon. members for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that they will vote against the amendment now before the house because they disagree with the particular amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) in committee.

Division

I am the last one to lecture them about what is obvious in this amendment. The amendment now before the house is not that the bill go back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of incorporating the amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood but that it go back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering clause 21, which would open the door for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Carleton to be moved again.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Of course it would not. It having been already disposed of in committee of the whole I could not move the same amendment again.

Mr. Lewis: With great respect and without the knowledge of the rules that I am sure my hon. friend has, my logic tells me that he is obviously wrong. If the house sends the bill back to the committee of the whole then it will be asking the committee of the whole to reconsider the clause. In such a case any amendment could be moved, that of the hon. member for Carleton which we supported in committee and would support again, that of the hon. member for Greenwood, or any other suggestion that might emerge and which might be wiser than either of those that were put before the committee of the whole. Neither the hon. member for Greenwood nor any one of us is wedded to the particular proposal which was made. What we are anxious to see is an amendment to clause 21 which would open the door to the kind of possibility about which the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) spoke and which was repeated several times by the hon. member for Carleton during second reading and in committee of the whole.

I do not think the hon. member for Carleton or any other hon. member can get away with voting against this amendment on the ground that it is a particular kind of amendment to be considered by the committee of the whole, because it is just not so. If the hon. members for Carleton and Edmonton West, or any other hon. members, are dissatisfied with clause 21 as it stands, as they claim they are, then they have no logical alternative other than to vote for the amendment now before the house and leave it to the committee of the whole to decide what to do.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Brewin) which was negatived on the following division:

CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY PREVIOUS CHANGES IN ACT

Hon. L. T. Pennell (for the Registrar General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-275, to amend the Canada Corporations Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Pennell: I ask for the indulgence of the house. I understand that the Acting Registrar General will be with us in just a moment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the desire of the house that this motion be allowed to stand for a moment and does the house agree to revert to this item of business in due course?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask leave of the house to revert to introduction of bills so the Acting Registrar General may give the explanation requested by hon. members?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to revert to introduction of bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Registrar General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-275, to amend the Canada Corporations Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for its courtesy in reverting to this item, and I apologize for not being here when it was called. This bill is merely a series of technical amendments to the Canada Corporations Act. It does not involve any major policy changes, and is only of a housekeeping nature.

Motion agreed and bill read the first time.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER WHO MAY BE APPOINTED

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Parliamentary Secretaries Act to provide for an increase in the number of parliamentary secretaries who may be appointed under the act.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

SPEECH BY MINISTER RESPECTING WAGE PARITY WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, better known as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). Did he receive a telegram yesterday from Mr. Burt regarding the statement made by his colleague the Minister of Industry, and can he tell us whether he replied to this telegram? If so, what was the gist of his reply?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend, of course, must know that I receive many communications from the United Automobile Workers. We work together a great deal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With regard to the particular question asked, I did receive a telegram concerning a report I had seen in the newspapers of a speech by my colleague the Minister of Industry. I replied that my views have been well known and continue to be well known on this subject, namely, that the collective bargaining process is one that must not, in normal circumstances, be interfered with by government.

I have since had an opportunity of looking at the speech of my colleague the Minister of Industry, and I find no reference whatever in that speech to the automobile industry. The same applies to what my hon. friend sought to attribute to the Prime Minister yesterday.

The Prime Minister clearly denied the implication in the last observation on this point made yesterday by the hon. member for Ontario, who was at one time minister of labour and who I think should show greater sympathy for the labour unions of this country.

Mr. Starr: May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister in view of his statement yesterday in connection with the statement by the Minister of Industry that the government's feeling was that it would be inadvisable to try to bring about general wage parity with the United States at this time, and the reply of the hon. member for Essex East to Mr. George Burt, which reads in part:

I must say unreservedly that I am not in accord with what my colleague is reported to have said.

And in view of the telegram sent by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) which reads:

Mr. Drury's statement is his own as far as I am concerned. I disagree 100 per cent with him—

Can the Prime Minister say whether the only member who is supporting the policy of the government is the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray), and whether there is a great disparity and disagreement in the cabinet on this matter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am glad the hon. gentleman's question has given me an opportunity to point out to him that the policy of the government on this matter of the relation of wages to income and productivity is that which was laid down on page 11 in the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Industry, at which time he was quoting from the third annual report of the Economic Council of Canada on wages, income and productivity. The quotation is:

Given the fundamental nature of the factors accounting for the income gap, it should be clear that a great deal remains to be done, on a variety of fronts, before the Canadian economy as a whole can be expected to enjoy effective parity of average per capita income with the United States.

This report, Mr. Speaker, was signed by, among others Claude Jodoin, W. Ladyman, William Mahoney, Marcel Pépin and A. R. Gibbons.

Mr. Starr: May I put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he stand by the statement he made in his telegram to Mr. Burt in which he said he must unreservedly state that he is not in accord with what his colleague is reported to have said?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we have had a debate which perhaps has gone beyond the usual confines of question and answer at this time. I think we might move on to another subject.

Mr. Starr: Then may I put another question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I beseech the hon. member's co-operation; perhaps I can return to him later if he wishes to ask further questions.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN U.S. OWNERSHIP OF SHARES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask whether the government has decided to introduce an amendment to the Bank Act to reduce from 25 per cent to 10 per cent the number of shares which Citibank may own in the Mercantile bank?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should show a little patience. This bill will be reintroduced very shortly, I hope, at which time his curiosity will be satisfied, though perhaps not in a way which will suit him.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. In view of the reported division in the cabinet with respect to this matter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —and the controversy which is alleged to be going on between the Minister of Finance and the senior Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Davenport, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the senior Minister without Portfolio has been shipped to Jamaica to keep him warm or to keep him quiet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the problem of division in the federal cabinet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pearson: —is not one which need face my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in connection with this Mercantile bank business and the apparent precipitous retreat from the stand taken by the Prime Minister a few weeks ago, when he said there was not going to be a retreat but the government would stand firm. When did the Prime Minister and the cabinet take the decision to turn a complete somersault in the matter, giving the Mercantile bank five years in which to reduce its share ownership?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend is, of course, an expert on standing firm. He is also an expert on cabinet divisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We on this side, of course, are experts on unification.

Mr. Starr: At what price?

Mr. Pearson: I assure the right hon. gentleman that there is no division on this matter and that we will be standing firm, as my right hon. friend will find out if he is here when the bill is introduced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know how many years that will be, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, I would remind the Prime Minister never to take any advice from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, unless, of course, he intends to be entirely at sea.

I ask the Prime Minister this. Speaking of divisions and the patching over of divisions by wallpaper, and breaks that can not be covered up, is it a fact that there is this division? Why is the Minister without Portfolio abroad? Is it for his health or that he may cool off?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend was down south a little while ago, fishing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I understand he had more success down there than he has had since he came back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been more successful fishing here than down there.

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Transport but, in his absence, I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary.

Could the hon. member tell the house whether the department intends to ask the house for an increased appropriation in order to build local airports in 1967-68?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

MARKETING OF FROZEN GROUNDFISH FROM ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister aware of the problem existing at present with respect to the marketing of frozen groundfish from the Atlantic provinces?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Can the minister advise the house what steps are being taken to overcome this very serious problem.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is refreshing to have a serious question addressed to the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I can tell my hon. friend—and I hope he will not misunderstand me—that if he keeps on in this way one day he may be able to enjoy free colour television.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Kent (N.B.).

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, though I was pleased to receive the Prime Minister's most encouraging answer I had addressed my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think he would like to answer.

Mr. Speaker: I would rather he did not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

KENT COUNTY, N.B.—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENTS TO WOODS WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Crossman (Kent (N.B.)): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Labour now in a position to answer my question of Tuesday, February 28, concerning the urgent matter of unemployment insurance for the woodsmen in Kent county, New Brunswick?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker, based on the preliminary report that I have received. Actually, in accordance with the normal procedures this matter has come before the Unemployment Insurance Commission. With respect to the 200-odd employees mentioned the other day, some qualified for benefits, some were disqualified and some have been reinstated. Others, not reinstated, have appealed to the board of referees. This matter is being dealt with in the normal way. I hope that when it has been disposed of my hon. friend's constituents will have nothing to complain about.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING FEDERAL SUPERVISION OF AUTOMOBILE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grafftey: I am afraid there is serious doubt whether Canada is ready for me yet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the startling revolution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the startling revelations yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the startling revelations yesterday by auto union workers relating to safety inspection cutbacks and the production of unsafe cars, and in view of the deplorable rise in highway deaths and injuries reported for 1966 as compared with 1965, could the Minister of Industry report progress in his consultations with the provinces with regard to bringing the building of motor vehicles within the scope of federal law?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Our discussions with the provinces are continuing toward a useful end. I do not wish to try to deal with them in detail at this time. I may say I do not share the hon. gentleman's doubt as to Canada's readiness for him.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Now that all the herring fleets have left for open water I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the house how many more items of business we can expect to be placed on the order paper in the current session.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It is hard to say how many there may be in addition to those now on the order paper. I think if we manage to dispose of those on the order paper we shall have done a good job, and then perhaps we can consider prorogation. This includes, of course, the defence bill.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Is the Prime Minister able to tell us whether the government has decided to introduce legislation setting up a department of consumer affairs? If so, may this legislation be expected during the present session?

Mr. Pearson: This matter is under consideration at the present time, and as soon as a decision has been reached I shall be glad to make an announcement in the house.

FINANCE

REPORTED SPEECH BY FORESTRY MINISTER RESPECTING FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would direct a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, having before me the speech he delivered yesterday in rebuttal of the economic theories regarding foreign ownership held by the former minister of finance. In view of the fact that the former minister of finance, now Minister without Portfolio, is head of the economic task force or flying squad set up in this connection, do the views expressed yesterday by the hon. gentleman indicate a prejudging of the task assigned to this task force or, indeed, that this body may now be dispensed with?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a question is not acceptable at this point. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition knows that in connection with speeches made by cabinet ministers outside the house, questions can only be asked of the Prime Minister to determine whether such speeches represent government policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely it is not intended by the rules that ministers can make irresponsible statements which have no rhyme or reason as far as cabinet policy is concerned, and not expect to be examined on them in this house. If, however, Your Honour holds that there must be a protective wall for these ministers—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —then I will reword my question and ask the minister whether the economic task force which was to determine the question of Canada's position relative to foreign investment and the like is no longer effective, and whether he was speaking for the government.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): I mentioned the task force twice in my speech. I said the formation of the task force would be very helpful in enabling the government to determine its policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You prejudged it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members citation 171 (z) in Beauchesne's fourth edition, which states that a question must not—> —refer to speeches made outside the house; but in the case of a cabinet minister, it is permissible to ask Prime Minister whether such speech represents policy of government.

This, of course, is the citation to which I referred. It is part of the rules of the house.

SHIPPING

NOVA SCOTIA—ASSISTANCE FOR SURVIVORS OF MEN LOST AT SEA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the tragedies that occurred last week off the coast of Nova Scotia when 35 men lost their lives after a series of bitter storms in the Atlantic, will the government give consideration to making a contribution to the survivors of the men lost on the Polly and Robbie, the Iceland II and the Cape Bonnie?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a situation which very much touched the hearts of all of us. It was a terrible tragedy, and we should look into the possibility of anything we can do to make it less terrible for the survivors.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CAPE BRETON ISLAND—CRASH TRAINING PROGRAM FOR UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wished to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration but in his absence may I direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the serious, tragic and distressing unemployment situation, finally acknowledged by the minister of manpower in his statement yesterday, regarding unemployed steel workers at Sydney, may I ask the right hon. gentleman would he recommend to the cabinet, at a special meeting which I think should be called immediately for that purpose, that a massive crash training program for the unemployed should be instituted as quickly as possible on Cape Breton Island?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to discuss this with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED VISIT TO EXPO '67 BY PROTECTIVE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to do by indirection something the rules would not permit me to do directly, but strictly in order I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that there will be at least a half million visitors touring these parliament buildings during this centennial year and that many will be asking questions of the protective staff about Expo '67, would the minister mind whispering in the ear of the appropriate authority that it might be a good idea for members of the protective staff to visit Expo in groups, so they can answer all questions accurately as a result of their personal experience?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member set out to accomplish an impossible task, but he succeeded.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED JOINT MEETING OF DEFENCE AND EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as acting chairman of the standing committee on external affairs. Would the minister use his good offices to arrange a joint meeting of the defence and external affairs committee so that a number of matters affecting armed services unification can be more properly and more carefully examined?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think I dealt effectively with that matter yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of that answer I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that a few moments ago the Prime Minister indicated he was an expert on unification, I wonder if he might use his good offices to try to arrange such a joint meeting.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I could not possibly be more effective than my hon. friend the minister.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON ISLAND—STATEMENTS RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in dealing with the auto pact and the problems in the automobile industry, will he advise his ministers that when they make statements outside the house, respecting matters not concerning their own departments, they will be expected to give me the same privilege they have been allowed here in this house with respect to answers.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On a point of privilege—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of privilege—

Mr. Starr: Can't you see the Speaker is on his feet?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs rose first on a question of privilege, and I think I should hear him first.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My point of privilege is this, Mr. Speaker. A member of the government also has obligations to his constituents, and I want my hon. friend to know that I regard the interests of the automobile workers in my constituency as part of my obligations as a member of this house. What I have said in no way conflicts with my obligations as a minister of the crown, notwithstanding the observation understandably and so willingly made by the Leader of the Opposition just now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Better turn around and correct the Minister of Industry.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I would direct the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the fact that when similar questions were asked of the Minister of National Health and Welfare dealing with coal miners in Nova Scotia, of whom there are some in his own constituency, answers were absolutely refused by that minister, and there is a definite contradiction between what the Secretary of State for External Affairs says now and what his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare did and what this house has ruled in the past. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is not only contradicting his colleague but he is contradicting the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a question of privilege too. Why is the minister rising on a question directed to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat? The hon. member asked a question. That was not a question of privilege and, having asked his question, the Secretary of State for External Affairs rose on a question of privilege—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, what right has he to rise and answer a question I directed to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I assume the minister was not rising for that purpose, in view of the fact that he indicated he was rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Could I be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Sherbrooke?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order—

Mr. Starr: I wish to ask a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a point of order, I feel that having directed a question to the Prime Minister I am at least entitled to an answer dealing with this particular question.

Mr. Speaker: According to the rules the hon. member is entitled to ask a question but, as he knows, I have expressed the view previously, which I believe is supported by ample authority, that no member is entitled to an answer. He may be dissatisfied with the answer he receives or he may be dissatisfied with the fact that he receives no answer at all, but it has been the practice for many years that no member can insist on either receiving an answer or on receiving the answer which he would like to receive.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I take it from his silence that he is in agreement with the Minister of National Health and Welfare that they can do nothing other than ignore the miners of Cape Breton island.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—STEPS TO DEAL WITH ALLEGED VANDALISM AND THEFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, my question is addressed to the acting minister, the Member of the Administration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the thefts and pilfering which have been occurring with regularity in the harbour of Montreal recently, is the Department of Transport or the government taking the appropriate measures to check such depredations and damages to ensure a greater degree of success for Expo and avoid harming the international repute of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The question of the hon. member should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Allard: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON APPLICATION TO FARM LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I have received some letters from farmers who complain that no information is available as to when or how they can apply for unemployment insurance for their farm labourers. Has the minister sent out circulars or letters giving this information?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member shares my concern about this matter, which I have anticipated, and I have suggested to the commission that they should give wider publicity to their activities in this field. I believe they are doing so now.

TRADE

POTATOES—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of which I have given him notice. Has the minister received any representations from the Prince Edward Island government for special measures to assist in obtaining new or larger markets for the large quantity of potatoes still in storage, and could he advise what helpful steps are being taken to meet the very serious situation facing thousands of eastern Canadian potato growers?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have received no direct representations from the government of Prince Edward Island, but I am aware of the situation and we have been trying to alleviate it.

The good results in this crop year have been noted in the departmental promotion programs for seed potato exports, and these exports are 45 per cent above those to the same date in 1966. Table potato exports are currently much higher than for the same period last year. The United States is the largest market for potatoes, but the low duty quota there has been filled and smaller quantities are now moving to the United States over a substantial tariff barrier. In other markets the industry and our trade commissioners have been making a special effort to move Canadian potatoes.

European suppliers also have surpluses and world market prices are low, but despite these problems a record movement of Canadian potatoes into foreign markets is expected.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of privilege which affects members of this house. It concerns the recognition which Your Honour extends to representatives of different parties. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has been attempting to catch Your Honour's eye since the inception of the question period. While only two members of this party have been recognized, innumerable Conservative members have been recognized ad nauseam. I can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that with all the contenders for a future office there is a desire on their part to be recognized interminably, but I do wish you would glance this way occasionally in order to balance the representation.

[Later:]

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Has he received any representations from New Brunswick concerning the surplus of potatoes which exists in that province, and if so could he inform the house whether action is being considered to deal with the problem?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any specific representations on that matter, but my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce instructs me that he has been advised of it, and I think he gave a rather lengthy answer a few moments ago in respect of the action taken by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Flemming: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that possibly the request from the provincial government of New Brunswick concerning the potato surplus may come to him before it reaches the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If it does, would he give it his prompt attention, if at all possible?

Mr. Greene: I will be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, lest there be any misunderstanding I think perhaps I should say that the minister of agriculture of the province of New Brunswick has been in touch with me on that problem.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR, ONT.—LAY-OFFS AT WALKER METAL PRODUCTS LTD.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in view of the fact that he is so conscious of his obligations. I should like to ask him whether his obligations have directed his attention and the attention of the government to the fact that 180 production line workers will be laid off tomorrow by Walker Metal Products Ltd. in Windsor, a subsidiary of Chrysler Canada Ltd. I should also like to ask him whether his obligations were sufficient to prompt him to ask that some action be taken with a view to looking into this whole situation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was aware of that fact. The Minister of Industry also told me that as a result of the Canada-United States auto pact there has been increased production in Canada, and that more workers are now employed in the automobile industry than at any other time in Canadian history.

Mr. Starr: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Then can the minister explain why the lay-offs are now starting in Windsor?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the 380,000 unemployed?

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN AUTHORIZED CAPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In view of speculation in the press today that the minister may be considering recommending to his colleagues Treasury Board action to increase the authorized capital of the Mercantile bank, can the minister assure us that if such a course of action is taken he will notify the house at once?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a hypothetical question. There has been no application by any bank recently for an increase in capital.

HIGHWAYS

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION OF ACCESS ROADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Finance. Could he tell us if he met recently with officials of the Quebec government, with respect to a 1966-67 roads to resources program and could he also inform the house as to whether the Quebec government has requested the assistance of federal government for this roads to resources program?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is not within my ministerial responsibility; therefore I do not have any information. Perhaps it should be directed to another of my colleagues.

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR HUNDRED MILLION DOLLAR FEDERAL LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Has he replied to the urgent request of the premier of British Columbia for a loan of $100 million and, if so, what is the nature of his reply?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. I do not know whether you would permit me to read my reply or wish that I table it.

Mr. Speaker: Certainly I would prefer that the hon. minister did not read the reply. Perhaps there might be agreement that the reply should be placed on the table.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I think there is general consent that the minister be allowed to read the telegram. I think he should do so.

Mr. Speaker: It has been agreed that the telegram should be tabled.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

SUBMISSION RESPECTING PROPOSED YOUTH SEMINAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of great and growing urgency for the Secretary of State. Could the Secretary of State now inform the house when the ad hoc committee that was charged with the responsibility for making plans for a parliamentary youth seminar will be called together to deal with this important matter?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the young people we have waded through three or four different submissions. I now have a submission which has not yet been dealt with by the centennial people. I think it will be shortly and then I shall have an opportunity to call a meeting. I think the seminar will be on a much smaller scale than that suggested in the proposals previously submitted.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ROLE OF PROPOSED MOBILE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask him whether the transformation of Canada's role in foreign affairs is intended to place the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the position of sponsoring a heavily armoured mobile force ready for punitive action anywhere in the world.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question is urgent.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I am asking for information on a very important matter. If you will permit me to do so, I will phrase the question in a somewhat different way. I am searching for information. May I ask the minister this question. Is the Canadian mobile force, equipped with guns, tanks and close support aircraft for instant punitive action, the minister's proposed substitute for the antiquated method of gunboat diplomacy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the second question is no more acceptable than the first. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre realizes that this type of question is much too general, concerns a general statement of policy, and to my mind is not the type of question that should be answered at this time.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, there has been a public declaration that there has been a complete change in Canada's foreign policy. I am seriously searching for information from the only person who can supply it, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to help the hon. member. I suggest that perhaps he would be able to better appreciate the procedures of the house if he would place that question on the order paper, where it will be answered in due course.

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Transport. Could the minister give us any news concerning the whereabouts of the report of the pilotage commission? I think it has been under way for four years. Perhaps he could send a pilot to pilot it back.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN CRITERIA RESPECTING DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. Is the minister giving consideration to changing the criteria now in use for the selection or designation of areas of low economic growth?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this question is of a general nature, and I wonder whether it should be asked at this time.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of very urgent importance to those in my particular part of the country who are waiting for a decision on this matter.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated before, a continuing review is being carried out with a view to establishing the appropriateness of the criteria.

NICKEL—REPORTED DEVELOPMENT OF BLACK MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the serious situation in respect of a black market which has developed in the sale of nickel on the Canadian market in the past few weeks, what action is the minister or the government taking to see that Canadian users of this important metal do not have to pay these inflated prices and as a consequence find themselves in a more non-competitive position in the world markets?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe this question should be placed on the order paper. If the hon. member feels there is an urgency, which I fail to see, I would be pleased to give the hon. member an opportunity to debate the question on the adjournment motion.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRICE UNDER INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now that western farmers are in the process of planning their spring seeding operations, could the minister inform us when he expects to be able to announce the new price schedule under the international wheat agreement?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we will do that at the very earliest opportunity. We are still in the process of negotiating a new international wheat agreement.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO INDIANS AND ESKIMOS IN FILING APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he could assure the house that steps would be taken by officials in the Indian affairs branch to assist the recipients of old age pensions among our Indian people to fill out the necessary application forms for the $30 a month old age pension supplement. Can the minister say now whether a directive has gone out to the field men to do this and, if so, when was this done?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that this has been done everywhere.

Mr. Simpson: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he could give particular attention to the situation in northern Manitoba, because, having just returned from there I find that nothing has been done there so far.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROVISION OF TELEVISION SETS TO MEMBERS OF PREVIOUS GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State can answer today the question which I asked yesterday concerning the T.V. sets?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have ascertained that my predecessors who were responsible for the C.B.C.—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My recollection is that the question asked yesterday by the hon. member, if it is the question I have in mind, had either been ruled out of order or I had suggested to the hon. member that he should place it on the order paper.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, may I say with respect that you have allowed a number of questions on the same line, and the Secretary of State has made replies.

Mr. Speaker: I may have allowed other questions, but this particular one has not been allowed. I believe I suggested that it be placed on the order paper. It cannot be asked today.

EXCISE TAX AND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-268, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, for a considerable period of time it was felt that possibly we should permit third reading of the bill, until we realized that the Minister of Finance himself indicated to the house that the measure before the house with regard to the Excise Tax Act did not provide that the moneys which would accrue from its application would in fact be placed in the old age security fund. Our position on this question has been very clear and firm throughout the debate, and I recognize that at this time I am not allowed to reiterate some of the points that have been made already in order to indicate to the house and to the country that our position has been the correct one.

When we were made aware initially—and as I recall we did so from answers to questions which I myself placed on the order paper—of the amount of money that was to be made available to the government for this purpose, I think we had the support of some of our friends to the left in the proposals we put forward from time to time, and we were certainly supported in the program that we laid before the house and before the country. When the measure was first introduced in the house we knew that sufficient money was already available and that the minister would not be required to present his budget or to apply the tax that is proposed in the bill before us. Indeed, many people throughout the country would have been quite satisfied with the proposal which was so ardently put forward by my party as well as by almost all members on this side of the house.

At one stage of the debate the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that I advocated that course for the sake of publicity. Nothing could be further from the truth, as is well known by everyone in this country. After what has transpired, namely the way in which this government has seen fit to spend money in other fields and the way they have established the division of the Department of National Health and Welfare to administer the payments for which the money is being collected, it is obvious that the Minister of Finance could have shown a greater degree of responsibility and effciency in preparing and presenting this bill. It is very clear that this money was not needed at the time because it will not go into the old age security fund. Therefore there was no need to collect it for this purpose. Consequently I move the following amendment:

• (3:30 p.m.)

That Bill No. C-268 be not now read a third time but be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to the committee to amend the said bill to provide that all moneys raised by the increase in the levy of the Excise Tax Act as provided by the said bill shall be paid into the old age security fund for the purposes of meeting supplementary old age security payments authorized by this parliament and not into the consolidated revenue fund.

While you are giving consideration to the amendment I have placed before you, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about what has happened to the taxpayers' money which has made this supplementary payment possible with a means test. Let no one deny this. Many years ago the means test was thrown out by parliament as outmoded and useless. It was regarded as an old fashioned way of giving to deserving people a little bit of charity. Now the present government is reinstituting the means test. I suggest that the amount of money it is costing the taxpayers to institute this plan is substantial. For instance, forms have been printed, pamphlets have been printed and a bureaucracy organized, and the cost of all this to the taxpayer is one thing this government should endeavour to change.

As I indicated in a previous speech, in the area of social justice the government now has three divisions, with goodness knows how many people to administer these policies. All these measures could be brought under one division and administered by the same people. We suggested that a flat rate payment of $25 a month be made across the board to all recipients of old age security. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) suggested this was the easy method, the old method of solving this problem and the government wanted to try something new. However, the new method is going to cost the country an additional amount in taxes.

If we read the Auditor General's report we find that the government implemented its program without authorization to spend the money. They had to come back later and get approval. Although I suppose at this juncture it does not matter any more, this fact is indicative of the inefficient way in which this government functions in almost every area.

When I have returned to the constituency of Grey-Bruce during the last two or more weeks I have found that the whole program has been a confusing one. I tried to find out how an applicant could determine what amount of money he was allowed to have or what amount of money he was allowed to deduct from income. I found that even the government did not know the answers to some of these questions, particularly with regard to capital cost allowance. The other evening we found that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) was not sure whether the recipients of these supplements were going to be forced to acquire a social security number, as the measure under consideration at that time required other people to do. This all proves to me that our program would have been the correct one, and we had a considerable degree of support from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Our program would not have necessitated the employment of another group of civil servants for administrative purposes. Indeed, it could have been instituted without any increase in taxes, and certainly without the introduction of the recent mini-budget.

The government took the view that our program was going to be too costly, and yet if we knew the total cost of the government's program in so far as advertising, the printing of brochures and other papers is concerned, I am quite sure our program would have been less expensive. I feel certain the fund would have lasted well beyond the current fiscal year and perhaps the next one as well. When one reads the report concerning the proliferation of positions in the civil service and the amount of money this is costing the taxpayer, I can assure you that a $25 payment across the board would have resulted in a considerably lower expenditure than that which the government is now making.

So, Mr. Speaker, in view of the increase in taxes the minister is proposing in this measure I am suggesting, on behalf of my colleagues, that we keep the government honest and that we put forth every effort on behalf of the senior citizens and the taxpayers of Canada toward having the money that will accrue from this measure placed where it rightfully belongs, in the old age security fund. I do not believe the minister expects for one moment that in putting this money into the consolidated revenue fund it will be used only if necessary. The minister will find some other way of spending it and if he cannot he has a lot of colleagues who will. The position we are taking is that we want the government to remain honest with the taxpayers and with the senior citizens of Canada, so in accordance with the terms of my amendment we want the money placed in the old age security fund.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has read the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce and is prepared to listen to arguments on its validity.

Mr. Pennell: It is my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment proposed by the hon. member is outside the prerogatives granted to private members. This amendment will affect the balance of ways and means. During the course of his argument the hon. member clearly indicated that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will find some way of spending this money. If I may use his words, he wanted to keep the government honest. Clearly, in his mind, this money was going to be spent by the Treasury Board. On his own explanation the amendment is clearly going to affect the balance of ways and means. It is my respectful submission, therefore, that the amendment is out of order. This amendment is moved by one who is not accountable for items of public expenditure, and I would ask you to so rule.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Winkler: In that regard, Mr. Speaker, if my words were not correct or if we have misinterpreted the purpose of the introduction of this measure, I am willing to apologize. However, we know what is the purpose of the measure; that has been made clear. What we want is to see the minister put the money in the proper fund. That was the purpose of the mini-budget and it is the reason this measure is before us. That was the statement of the minister himself. Yet he now informs us that the money will not go into that fund. I have stated our position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can see no reason that this amendment is not a proper one. It in no way interferes with ways and means. The amendment reads:

> That Bill C-268 be not now read a third time but be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to the committee to amend the said bill to provide that all moneys raised by the increase in the levy of the Excise Tax Act as provided by the said bill shall be paid into the old age security fund for the purposes of meeting supplementary old age security payments—

I submit there is no interference whatever with the balance of ways and means. This is the reason the tax was imposed. The excuse given was that the moneys that were to be raised were to provide for the extra old age security payment. Surely the government is not going to impose a tax for one purpose and then use the revenue for another purpose. This is what the amendment is designed to prevent.

We have placed our arguments before the house over and over again. We pointed to the danger of the action that was being taken and to the snooper's paradise that was being created as a result of the action of the government. Everywhere across the nation there will be snoopers snooping. The old age pensioners are being harried by an avalanche of documents, forms, brochures and advertising. And this all because of the fact that the government has stubbornly refused to permit the payment of an extra $25 a month to the old age pensioners of Canada, a measure which we in this party advocated.

Having brought in a tax which the minister stated was for the purpose of showing the people of Canada that they cannot get something for nothing, the government now wishes to use the money for other purposes. They extract money under one pretence and are going to use the money for another purpose. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this can in no way be justified.

I suggest to Your Honour that there is no interference with ways and means and that this amendment is a proper one. We know the waste that is taking place. The amount of advertising being placed across the country is unbelievable. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are being wasted by a government that is using this measure for the sole purpose of pretending that those who pay this extra tax are providing the amount required for the supplementary payment to the old age pensioners when in point of fact the money is going to be placed in the general consolidated revenue fund.

If the people were of the opinion that money devoted to a certain purpose should go into the old age security fund, what possible objection could the government have? There is no interference at all with ways and means because the money would be paid. There is no direction in any way of the manner in which ways and means shall be applied. The government has said that the money derived from these extra taxes that are being mulcted out of the Canadian people will be used for the purpose of making the supplementary payment to the pensioners. Now, Mr. Speaker, having led the way clothed in the garments of political righteousness which they assumed in this connection and appealed to the people, they are going to use the money they have secured for another purpose.

All that this amendment says in effect is: Carry out your promise. You said that social security has to be paid for—and I am one who believes that. Therefore, use this money for the purpose for which it was extracted, rather than choose another method for the expenditure which you told the people of Canada was being levied for specific purpose. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is the only way in which the members of this house can impress upon the government the necessity for keeping their word.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to support my colleague the Solicitor General in his position that this amendment is out of order and beyond the competence of private members. In so doing I should like to draw attention to what I said on December 19 when I introduced these proposed measures. It has been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and by other speakers that somehow I misled the house or misled the public. At the same time as I am speaking on the validity of the amendment I should like to reply to the other point since both are related.

On December 19 I said that I had to meet immediate cash needs arising out of the increase in payments to old age pensioners. I proposed to meet these cash needs in two ways. The first way was by increasing the ceiling under the Old Age Security Act with relation to the 4 per cent tax on personal incomes. I did that because there was a duty laid upon me by parliament to keep the old age security fund reasonably in balance. As I have said on previous occasions, Mr. Speaker, this has been honoured as often in the breach as in the performance. Nevertheless, as Minister of Finance I have the responsibility of proposing measures when I have reason to believe that the fund is out of balance. For that purpose I proposed to raise the ceiling on the old age security tax on personal incomes.

Then, as reported at page 11336 of Hansard for December 19, I had this to say:

> The second tax change I am recommending is intended to add to our general revenues to provide the remaining cash required to pay the guaranteed income supplement.

For that purpose, Mr. Speaker, I proposed that there should be an addition of 1 per cent made to the general sales tax, with certain exceptions that are familiar to the house.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I thereupon proposed two resolutions, Mr. Speaker, to which I should like to draw your particular attention. The first read as follows:

> That it is expedient to amend the Old Age Security Act to provide that for the 1967 and subsequent taxation years the maximum amount of old age security tax payable on the taxable income of an individual be increased from $120 to $240.

The second resolution read:

> That it is expedient to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide that, effective January 1, 1967, the rate of the consumption or sales tax imposed under section 30 of the said act be increased from 8 per cent to 9 per cent—

And so on. There, Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear I was not relating this to the Old Age Security Act; otherwise I would have proposed an increase in the particular excise tax that is imposed under the Old Age Security Act. For these reasons I support the Solicitor General in saying that this proposal does affect the balance of ways and means.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, regardless of what the minister may have said on December 19—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not clear.

Mr. Monteith: The matter is not clear. The minister implied that his reason for introducing the mini-budget was that he wished to raise money for the old age supplementary payments. That this was his purpose was accepted by citizens across Canada, by the press and by all news media. It was said that the purpose of the mini-budget was to provide the funds necessary for the supplementary payment.

We did not wish to do it the way the government had proposed doing it. We should have preferred to give old age pensioners a flat increase of $25 per month. Nevertheless, everybody understood that the purpose of the extra taxes was to pay for the supplement. All editorials on the mini-budget commented on this situation. If the people are to be misled in this way and if the amendment is not allowed, I can see no alternative open to us other than to vote against the bill on third reading.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the question to be considered is whether the amendment is in order. Having looked at the precedents and citations in Beauchesne I suggest that the matter is not clear. I say that because I find contradictions. Do the precedents establish the competence of a member of the house to move adjustments to a money bill? Citation 263 reads:

(2) The principle that the sanction of the Crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue.

Citation 265 says:

(1) No member other than a minister of the Crown may introduce a bill for the reduction of duties.

Of course the underlying principle is contained in citation 249 which reads:

(1) No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian Commons receiving the authority of the Crown, through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money.

I submit there is authority showing that no amendment involving public expenditure can be moved by anybody but a minister of the crown. Even then the proposal must be preceded by a money resolution.

Turning to citation 270 of Beauchesne we find these words:

(1) A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted—

Mr. Monteith: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: The citation goes on to say:

—and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged.

What must be decided, Mr. Speaker, is whether there will in fact be an additional expenditure involving the public treasury which was not provided for in the resolution. I say that because if the money collected under Bill C-268 is to be transferred in some way other than provided for in the resolution preceding the bill, the amendment is out of order. On the other hand, if there is to be no additional charge on the public treasury it is difficult to see why the amendment would upset the balance of ways and means. Upsetting the balance of ways and means was the reason advanced by the Solicitor General.

Citation 278, the fourth paragraph, reads,

(4) The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers have inserted in the bill—

The bill does not say where this money is to be put. The money is to be found and the tax is to be an additional charge on the taxpayers of Canada. It is to be paid into the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. Sharp: That is the point.

Mr. Olson: Certainly, that is one of the points. Citation 270 says:

A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted—

I take it that that means that the matter may be readjusted without upsetting the balance of ways and means. Referring again to citation 278, paragraph 4, we find these words:

(4) The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers have inserted in the Bill—

I suggest to Your Honour that if you invoke this citation—the authority for it is not given —and if the committee is not bound by the terms of the provision in the bill, the amendment does not change the balance of ways and means. It does not change what was encompassed in the resolution preceding the bill. Therefore the amendment ought to be in order.

The last part of citation 278 reads as follows:

—whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom, so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

I submit that there is authority supporting the hon. member for Grey-Bruce in his attempt to adjust the allocation of certain taxes, so long as the hon. member's amendment does not involve changing the amount of the taxes. I should add, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment ought not to increase taxes, but many citations show that a private member has competence to move motions to reduce taxes. The hon. member's amendment does not attempt to increase taxes. It simply seeks to restrict these taxes to a specified purpose.

The bill does not specify where the money is to go, and that troubles me. One must assume that the money raised through the bill is to go into the consolidated revenue fund. Relying on citation 270, I think there is authority to support acceptance of the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. Winkler: Would the hon. member permit a question which is germane to the final part of his presentation? The Minister of Finance told the house that he is collecting money for the old age supplement. Because the money collected often exceeds the forecast of need, would it not follow as a matter of common sense that the honest and correct thing to do would be to pay the money into an old age supplement account? The minister already has the old age security fund. The budget was introduced to raise money for the supplement. I ask the hon. member if it would not be the fair and honest thing to do to pay the money into an old age supplement account?

Mr. Olson: I am not prepared to argue about what is fair or honest or what the hon. member for Grey-Bruce or any other member thinks should be done.

Mr. Winkler: One has to be honest once in a while.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: All we have before us is Bill C-268 and an attempt to move an amendment which would refer the bill back to committee for the inclusion of a provision that all these moneys be paid directly into the old age security fund. To answer the hon. member's question, as far as I know there is no provision made in the bill for a supplementary old age pension fund. Whether he thinks it would be a good idea to have one or whether I do is irrelevant to the point of order before the house at the moment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. members for the contributions they have made in helping the Chair to decide whether or not the amendment moved by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce is in order.

First I should point out that the amendment deals with the disposition or the rerouting of moneys. As such, it is a financial proposal which would have to be contained in the resolution preceding a money bill. Further, I should like to read to the house citation 418 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which reads as follows:

> The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on the second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

In the opinion of the Chair the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce introduces a new principle. It deals with something which is not contained in the bill and therefore it is not admissible as an amendment on third reading. I regret I shall have to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) as well as with other members of the house that if there is to be an increase in the sales tax the proceeds from that increase ought to go into the old age security fund. However, it appears that a vote on that issue will not be possible. This leaves us again on the main motion for the third reading of Bill C-268.

[Mr. Winkler.]

I wish to state categorically on behalf of this party that we are still opposed to any increase at all in the sales tax. I intend to propose an amendment to the motion for third reading which, if passed, would give the committee of the whole an opportunity to reconsider clause 1 of the bill. Clause 1 of Bill C-268 is the clause in this legislation which raises the sales tax by 1 per cent. What it does, of course, is to raise the general sales tax from 8 per cent to 9 per cent, and with the addition of the 3 per cent old age security tax this gives us the 12 per cent federal sales tax which is now in effect.

Our point is simple, direct and clear. We think this 1 per cent should not be added to the sales tax. My amendment, the only one which can be moved at this stage to give the house a chance to consider this matter, will be to this effect.

Let me indicate two or three reasons for believing that the sales tax should not be increased at this time. First, if I may do so without provoking some wry humour of the part of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) I should like to mention the Carter report. It seems that when one of us on this side of the house mentions the Carter report the hon. gentleman is amazed that we have somehow understood at least parts of it during the short time in which it has been available. I confess that I too have not read it all yet, and no doubt when we read it in all its detail we will find things in it with which we do not agree. But it is fairly clear that the Carter commission is against a federal sales tax at the level which now prevails. It is also clear that the commission is against a federal sales tax applied at the manufacturers' level which facilitates the escalation of that tax so that it becomes a much higher percentage by the time it reaches the consumer.

Even though it may take time to deal with all the recommendations in the Carter report, even though there is a case for those recommendations being considered as a package, I think it is an insult to this house to ask us to fly in the face of the opposition expressed by the commission to this kind of sales tax by inviting us to vote for a bill which increases the federal sales tax at the manufacturers' level to 12 per cent.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentlemen a question? Is the Carter commission not also opposed to the income tax in its present form?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, that is perfectly correct. But the Minister of Finance is not by this bill proposing any changes or extensions in the income tax other than the provision raising the limit on the old age security tax.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. member permit another question? The reason I ask it is this. If we refrain from imposing this 1 per cent tax, I gather he would prefer raising the money through some other form of taxation. He does not disagree that we need the money, does he?

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister inviting me to remind him of the recommendation in the Carter commission report that a capital gains tax be imposed? If that is his intention I will certainly do so, with pleasure.

Mr. Sharp: And that a reduction be made in the top limits of personal income tax?

Mr. Knowles: Most of what I see in the Carter commission report, I like.

Mr. Sharp: That is not what the hon. gentleman was suggesting.

Mr. Knowles: Let me enter a caveat against the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions and a few things of that sort.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I am pleased to have provoked a few "hear, hears".

Let us consider this question straightforwardly. What is before the house now is not legislation amending the income tax structure generally. What is before us is a simple, narrow proposition in two parts. One has to do with the ceiling on the old age security tax that people pay. The other, the more significant one, is an increase in the federal sales tax. The Carter commission having stated its view that a federal sales tax even at its present level is undesirable, I submit it is an insult to hon. members of this house to ask us to fly in the face of that opinion by passing a bill which would raise that tax by another percentage point. As a matter of fact the sales tax increase that is provided in this bill represents, I believe, $155 million a year out of the $290 million a year that the minister expects to raise by way of extra revenue as a result of this bill.

• (4:10 p.m.)

I have asked the minister two or three times by means of questions on orders of the day if he would consider postponing third reading of this bill in view of the recommendations of the Carter report. He told me no the first time, but then he did postpone it a week. When I asked him once more he told me no again, but once again he postponed it. I only hope he keeps on postponing it. However, the house will decide on that question when it votes on the amendment which I will be moving in a few minutes.

The second reason for our opposing the increase in the sales tax is in line with what was argued by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce and those who spoke on the point of order a few moments ago, namely, that this sales tax revenue is not going into the old age security fund. We have been over this argument back and forth, around and about and home again, several times. The minister talks at one point about balancing funds and at another point about cash inflow and cash outflow, and so on. But in my view the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) was perfectly correct when he said a few minutes ago that the general public's understanding was, and is, that the whole purpose of the taxes being raised by the mini-budget was to meet the increased cost of old age security pensions.

Mr. Sharp: To raise the cash.

Mr. Knowles: The minister returns to cash when we talk to him about the fund. If that is the case I suggest to him that he pick up the Carter report again and read what it says about these funds for social security purposes. I am glad to see him nodding his head. Apparently he has read that part of the report and apparently he agrees with the report's recommendation that these funds for social security purposes are really just political devices.

Mr. Sharp: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is a red letter day when we get a comment from the Minister of Finance on the Carter report. He agrees with what the Carter commission says about funded social security funds.

Mr. Douglas: Without a three year period of contemplation either.

Mr. Sharp: I would have agreed with that before they published the report.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, the minister has made statements like that two or three times during the course of this debate. I suggest that if he agrees with that he should not be so concerned about what he calls his responsibility as Minister of Finance to put taxes into a fund which he now admits is just a political device after all. So, Mr. Speaker, because the money is not going to be used for the fund which in the public mind is the fund that is used to pay pensions, we suggest it is not necessary.

May I also point out that there is still plenty of money in the old age security fund, if we accord any sanctity at all to these funds, to pay old age security pensions for quite a while into the future. I know the minister asks, "Where is the cash"? But as I say, at one moment he says, "I have to find the cash," and at another moment he says, I have to keep the fund reasonably in balance." Why does he have to keep the fund reasonably in balance? Is it just an accountancy exercise, or does it mean that fund has to be kept reasonably in balance so that payments can be made out of it?

The government publishes its own figures with respect to the fund. In this connection I am looking at page 632 of the Canada Gazette, part 1, for Saturday, February 25, 1967, which is fairly recent. In fact I think it is the most recent issue, and on that page we are given figures about old age security fund transactions. We are given them by years for quite a number of years and for the last three years we are given them by months.

I find that in the most recent month for which there are figures, January, 1967, the surplus of collections from taxes for old age security purposes over payments made out was the largest it has ever been in any month in the history of that fund. This, I repeat, was in the month of January following passage of the pension increase in December and before the money from these extra taxes has started to go into the fund. In the month of January the government collected by way of its 3-3-4 taxes—per cent on corporations, 3 per cent on sales tax and 4 per cent on income—$50.2 million more than it paid out. Yet the minister talks about the problem of finding the cash. He picked up a lot more cash in January than he needed to pay these pensions.

He has also told us that the old age security fund, with the money that is going to be put into it by raising the ceiling on the income tax people pay for old age security, will remain in reasonable balance, to use his own words, until 1971. He says that will be the case even though there will be extra payments out of it for the guaranteed income supplement and even though the eligible age will be brought down to 65 years.

What is the point of having a fund that seems to be reasonably solvent, since there was $50 million worth of gravy added to it in January, 1967, if with all that money around and that surplus coming in the minister comes along and says, "We need this extra cash and we are going to get the extra cash by imposing a sales tax, but we are going to put the money into the consolidated revenue fund"? We think it is all wrong, Mr. Speaker, on all counts.

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-268, while it has several clauses, has but two main propositions. On the one hand it raises the sales tax about which I have been talking. On the other hand it raises the ceiling on the amount of income on which one pays the 4 per cent social security income tax. We are in agreement with the latter proposition.

If you go right back to 1950 when we discussed this matter in the committee on old age security you will see that we advocated that there be no ceiling on this tax. We advocated that the tax people paid for old age security should be on all income, no matter how high those incomes might be. We opposed the $60 ceiling, then the $90 ceiling, and following that the $120 ceiling. Therefore we do not quarrel with raising the ceiling now from $120 a year to $240 a year.

The minister has certainly not demonstrated that he needs it. He certainly does not need it, but he says that with this increase he will be able to keep the fund reasonably in balance until 1971. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to criticize this second proposition. We are not going to criticize or seek to vote against the proposal that the ceiling on income taxes for old age security purposes be increased, but we do register our strong objection to the increase in the sales tax. We think it is not needed at all in terms of budgetary arrangements, and despite what the minister says we think the whole proposition is misleading to the country. We think the Carter report's pronouncements on this issue should be taken note of, and therefore we think the house should send the bill back to the committee of the whole and give it the chance to reconsider clause 1. Clause 1 is the clause which raises the sales tax by 1 per cent. We hope the result of the reconsideration that would follow the passing of our amendment at this time would be to wipe out that increase in the sales tax.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis):

That Bill No. C-268 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering clause 1 thereof.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, this amendment, of course, is worded in such a way that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) knows very well it is in order. It simply refers to a reconsideration of clause 1. There is no doubt that many hon. members, including the members of this party, are in some measure of agreement with the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The statement was made by the minister when he introduced the mini-budget in December that there are sufficient moneys in the old age security fund to pay not only the present requirement of $75 a month under the Old Age Security Act but also the anticipated expenditures for the supplement to the old age security pension until, I believe, somewhere in 1968 or 1969. So there is no question that for the immediate cash requirements for this particular purpose there is sufficient money coming in now. There is a surplus in the old age security fund and if the supplement is paid out of that same fund there is no immediate need with receipts coming in at the present rate.

I suggest there is something that can be said for the government in fact levying taxes only when they are needed for a particular purpose provided they can show that they are needed for that purpose. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), of course, on at least one or more occasions has suggested that the increase provided for in clause 1 of Bill No. C-268 is for the purpose of taking care of the additional expenditures involved in the supplement to the old age security payments.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that all the arguments the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has advanced this afternoon in moving this amendment have been placed before the house not only once but on a number of occasions. The fact is that the majority of hon. members did not choose to acquiesce in those arguments or amendments. I recognize that perhaps there can be some admiration of the perseverance exhibited in presenting exactly the same case and the same argument over and over again, but there comes a point when one must accept the fact that the government must bring in the amendments so far as old age security or any other expenditure is concerned, and that the majority rules.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we reached that point some time ago. While many members of the house, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, might like to go on repeating exactly the same arguments and have another vote on exactly the same issue, because of course it is permissible under the rules to refer a bill back which has already been through the committee, I think this is a waste of time.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Are you suggesting that we abolish the third reading stage of bills?

Mr. Olson: If because of third reading we are to be continually faced with a repetition of having exactly the same proposition put before the house which we have just gone through on second reading, then I suggest that we are engaging in a useless and frustrating exercise. If members of the New Democratic Party continue to do what they have been doing recently, waste the time that is needed by parliament to deal with other matters which have not yet been considered by the house, then perhaps we might give some consideration to amending the provision for third reading so that we do not have to have this useless repetition.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows in his own mind that he has about as much chance to succeed in getting this bill amended, if it is referred back to the committee now, as he had when the same arguments were advanced on second reading. Therefore he has not acted in a sincere belief that changes will be made. He has taken this action simply for the purpose that his party may get some mention in the press of their perseverance in attempting to do some of these things. We in this party are interested in getting on with the business of the house so that we can provide as much of an increase as possible to the senior citizens who need it as quickly as possible. The way we can achieve this is by passing third reading now and getting this legislation into effect. We know, as does the hon. member who moved this amendment, that absolutely nothing will be achieved by it except to waste time. If this amendment is passed we will be in exactly the same position when we get back to third reading again.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member satisfied in advance that there is no purpose? Does he not believe that if he voted with us there might be a chance to win the vote?

Mr. Olson: We know the consequences which would result if the hon. member had his way. The result would not be to the advantage of the senior citizens of this country who need this additional money in the form of the supplement as quickly as it can be delivered to them. One way to achieve this purpose is by passing the legislation.

Mr. Knowles: Has not the amendment to the Old Age Security Act already been passed? Is it not in effect whether or not this bill passes?

An hon. Member: Of course it is.

Mr. Monteith: Of course it is.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member knows it.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as well as his colleagues sitting around him who are smiling at this point, know that while we do some pleasant things we have to do the unpleasant job of collecting the money as well. If they think they can avoid this they are going to have a rude awakening if they ever form a government, and so will the people who have been accepting this kind of garbage over the years.

Mr. Douglas: Did the hon. member not say that there is now sufficient money to last until 1969? Even if the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were accepted there would still be enough money to last until the end of March, 1971. Therefore, how could this amendment delay payment of the supplement to the old age pension?

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: That is correct, but the leader of the New Democratic Party has completely misunderstood the argument I was trying to advance. He knows very well that this will not be done anyway. All we are doing is wasting more time because all the arguments that are now being advanced in support of sending this bill back to the committee have already been advanced previously and were not accepted at that time. All that is being asked in this amendment is that the bill go back to the committee for reconsideration of clause 1. What is more, that reconsideration will be undertaken on the basis of arguments that have already been advanced.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the hon. gentleman. I should like to ask that you cease to recognize him because obviously he should be in the Senate and the Liberals should appoint him to that body.

Mr. Olson: If the suggestion of the hon. member for Skeena brings the same results as his other suggestions have, then I would propose that the Liberal party disregard it completely.

The main point of my argument is simply to plead that the house be sufficiently realistic and practical to realize that the best way to proceed to dispose of this amendment and to go on to the other business with which members of parliament are charged. We have heard all the valid arguments that can be advanced. To continue this discussion will mean a repetition of arguments we have heard before and on which the house has already decided.

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that according to the rules there should only be one session of this assembly a year. This session, which has been under way since January 18, 1966, has already lasted 13 months. We are not moving ahead with the business that is before the house and the reason is that hon. members are continually invoking the rules so as to waste more time. I suggest, therefore, that the most expeditious way in which we can dispatch the business before the house is to pass third reading of the bill. I do not think the bill is perfect but we should proceed to other matters which demand the attention of the house.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify one point which the hon. member for Medicine Hat raised. He suggested that the recipients of old age security might not receive these payments retroactive to January 1 if we did not pass this bill. He knows very well that this is utter nonsense.

Mr. Olson: I never said that.

Mr. Monteith: That was the implication of what was said. He also said that third reading of the bill was a useless and fruitless exercise. Surely to goodness he has sufficient respect for the rules of the house to realize that we have to go through various procedures and that a bill cannot become law until the last step has been taken. We are still considering Bill C-268, and there is certainly nothing wrong with anything that has been said thus far on third reading. I think that his statements have been utterly ridiculous.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I say with regard to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) concerning the passage of business of the house that we could save a great deal of time if the members of his party would vote in accordance with what they say on matters that are before the house. They have supported the government on every occasion even after having criticized the legislation before the house.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie). Had I voted I would have voted for third reading.

Mr. Pennell: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Rynard: I was paired with the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rynard: That was a slip of the tongue, Mr. Speaker. I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. More: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against third reading.

Mr. Bower: I was paired with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Dubé). Had I voted I would have voted against the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights of members of this house. Both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have a responsibility to parliament and it is in my capacity as Leader of the Opposition that I say this exhibition today, involving a delay of 77 minutes in the taking of a vote, is a gross perversion of the rights of members of this house and deserves the severest condemnation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We hear unctuous references to the reform of parliament. What happened here today made a puppet show of this House of Commons and I protest with all the force at my command. There is no parliament in the British parliamentary system which would countenance a delay of this extent, wasting the time of members of parliament for the benefit of a government which was frightened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has a very convenient memory. He seems to have forgotten the days when he was on this side of the house and we were on that side. Very often we waited minute after minute, 10, 20, 30 and sometimes 40 minutes after the bell had begun to ring.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is false, completely false, and the Prime Minister knows it is false.

Mr. Pearson: It is not false. There is no rule against ringing the bell. I would point out that we were in our places after the previous vote had been taken, and if the chief opposition whip had not left the chamber a vote could have been taken right then.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is false, and the Prime Minister knows it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my duty to inform hon. members that under provisional standing order 39A the following matters will be discussed on the adjournment debate: The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh), National Health and Welfare—Smoking—reported C.B.C. statement by Stanley Burke; the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), National Defence—NATO—Possible change in Canadian military contribution; the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), Ports—request for bringing thefts and pillage to an end in the port of Montreal.

It being after six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions and public bills. Order. I suggest to hon. members that conversations, discussions and other meetings be held behind the curtains or in the lobbies.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE NORTH WEST LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am substituting for my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford), and at his request and with his authority I would ask that Bill No. S-25 be proceeded with.

Mr. Ryan (for Mr. Basford) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. S-25, to incorporate the North West Life Assurance Company of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, many of us in the house have been interested in the rash of insurance companies coming to parliament for incorporation. We have been interested in the distinction which is drawn between the operations of insurance companies and those of the banking institutions of this nation. We have re-assessed our position on banking institutions and decided the interests of Canada can best be served by having them operated by persons who are responsible to the Canadian public. We have not taken such care with insurance companies, although such companies provide large sums of money used in our economic development, particularly mortgage money for housing.

It is interesting to note that this bill meets the criteria we are trying to establish with respect to ownership for all companies engaged in the insurance and assurance business. This is a Canadian company which was initially provincially incorporated in British Columbia, under provincial statute, in 1956. Most of the directors have served on the executive at the provincial level.

I believe it is necessary to have competition between insurance companies and insurance agents. It is nice to have two or three agents in a town with whom one can discuss insurance problems, but since we already have 3,000 to 4,000 insurance companies in existence I do not see the necessity for additional competition by increasing their number. Members of this party have been unable to find out from any reliable source whether there is any necessity for creating new insurance companies.

One problem which has arisen in connection with this bill was discussed in committee today, when the answer was given that incorporation was arrived at by the use of the legal term "deemed to be a company." In this case we are establishing a company which has previously operated under provincial jurisdiction. We can ascertain from the bill who the directors will be, what type of company they want to incorporate, what type of insurance they want to underwrite, and how much money they must raise before incorporation. Because it is a company that has been under the supervision of the inspector of insurance, that official has been able to tell us that its previous operations were proper and that it is the type of company that should receive incorporation.

This company will assume the responsibilities of the provincially incorporated company, and in effect will be transferred from provincial to federal jurisdiction. I am sure many other companies will follow this path.

All hon. members have had the experience of going into an insurance agent's office and seeing the agent draw a form from a drawer containing 20 or 30 forms for various companies—possibly a hundred or, if he is fortunate enough, 3,000 forms representing all companies. It does not seem to make any difference which form he picks up. One agent told me he took the forms in rotation. Is this really competitive? Is there any difference if he picks out the first one or the seventh one so far as the cost of insuring property is concerned?

If you are seeking life insurance, does it make any difference whether you go to one agent or another and ask about the cost of term insurance, of endowment policies, or of sickness and accident insurance? I think there is no difference and no competition. There may be competition in other forms of insurance but the number of companies does not have much effect.

From checking with some of my colleagues from British Columbia I have discovered that the three major shareholders in this company are important members of a political party. They also have connections in a number of other operations. They were involved in setting up a sickness and accident insurance company which could have administered the federal health plan in that province, and considering the amount of money which such companies can provide for long-term mortgages I think this is worth investigating, because there might be a danger that such companies would decide to halt their normal investment in such an important part of our economy.

The other night I discussed with a number of people the problems raised by the needs test connected with the old age pension supplement, and the difficulties that arise in securing widows and veterans allowances. If a person has savings it is difficult to obtain these benefits. I told the people I met that it was becoming less and less advantageous to take out life insurance policies of the endowment nature, and that it would be very foolish for a young person today to take out a government annuity. For a person in the low income level to acquire sizeable savings may result in his eliminating himself from various social and welfare benefits.

• (6:40 p.m.)

I think there are many facets of the insurance business which warrant consideration. The major consideration should be the desire of the Canadian people not to incorporate insurance companies just for fun, but rather to incorporate insurance companies which will have in mind the welfare of the nation, because the large assets these companies have should be used for the public good. In my opinion, in a few years these assets will be transferred into an additional section of the Canada Pension Plan which will allow us to insure for many things not now contemplated, and which will make it possible for the companies to provide the type of insurance money which is necessary for social capital in our nation.

The Toronto Daily Star discusses the report of the Carter royal commission report in relation to this matter. Although in my opinion this company does meet the criteria we have demanded, I think the Carter commission report in respect of insurance companies is something all members of parliament should give consideration to. I should like to quote from the editorial in the Toronto Daily Star of February 28, 1967:

> The life insurance industry is a sluggish giant.
> It consumes 30 per cent of the personal savings of Canadians, but is chronically reluctant to invest in the country's industrial growth. And the Carter royal commission has found that it is taking a virtually free ride on the backs of Canadian taxpayers.
> The commission's figures on life insurance companies are eye-popping. Here is an industry with $12 billion worth of assets which in 1964 took in $1.3 billion in premiums and $600 million net in investment income. It paid out $800 million in dividends and benefits—and just $2,000,000 in corporation income taxes.
> Foreign life insurance companies operating in Canada pay no taxes on their business income, since they are considered to have no shareholders' accounts in this country. But the favour is not reciprocated to Canadian life insurance firms operating abroad, which—on a comparable amount of business—paid foreign governments nearly $14 million in income taxes in 1964.
> Canadian mutual life insurance companies likewise get a free ride. They have no shareholders' accounts, since the policyholders have bought out the shareholders.
> The others managed to get their taxable income down to $5,000,000 in 1964, although the revenues of Canadian life companies exceeded expenditures by $90 million after increasing reserves to meet future claims. Hence that paltry $2,000,000 tax.
> The commission found that life insurance companies are being too generous with themselves in calculating actuarial reserves—the funds needed to pay policyholders' claims.
> They typically assume that their long-term investments will yield only 3 to 3.5 per cent, although their actual average yield has not dropped below 4 per cent in any 20-year period since 1900—and was almost 5.5 per cent in 1964.
> The Carter report favours setting a new, arbitrary rate for their investment yield—something over 4 per cent at present, although the precise rate would be worked out in discussions between the government and the industry.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I raise this only as an indication to members that the Carter commission which investigated the insurance companies operations in Canada was very concerned with the lack of what the Minister of Industry calls good Canadian corporate citizenship.

If they have a citizenship—and those which are controlled by Canadians ought to have—then obviously they are not meeting the criteria which I think even the Minister of Industry would indicate constitutes good corporate citizenship. It is interesting to note that a company of this nature will start out by amassing $600,000 and will build from that into an agency. I would think, if one would look down the list of names of the directors of this insurance company, he would find that any one of them could bring in $600,000. There are at least three millionaires on the executive. I do not think they would have any difficulty in transferring a few assets from one place to another in order to raise this amount of money.

This company will be worth some hundreds of millions of dollars in assets. How much of that will be used for the benefit of Canada and for the national good; how much of it will be used to establish competition, and how much of it will be used to see that some other company gives us insurance at rates cheaper than this company will? I think I can suggest that the answer is, not one red cent. There will be absolutely no competition in this field. All of this leads us to question whether there is any real difference in the company being owned by Canadians or by foreign investors. The answer is not yet known to me, although I think it is something to which I shall have to pay some attention, and to which I think other members of parliament will have to give some consideration.

I believe we will be guided to some extent by the remarks which have been made by persons such as the present Minister of Finance who has said in relation to banks that this large accumulation of money in the banking industry must be under the control of the Canadian people, because it is such an important factor in the economic development of our nation. These millions and billions of dollars—and the indication is that in 1964 it will amount to about $1.3 billion in premiums alone—would be available through the interlocking of insurance companies which are so important in the development of some facets of our economy. I do not think it is possible for us any longer to look the other way in respect of the chartering of these new companies under federal control when really in effect they do what they like with my money, and collectively with everyone else's, quite often to the detriment of our national economy.

Several important aspects of this bill are a credit to the company, and while we see nothing particularly wrong with the bill I believe we should be looking at the over-all picture as it affects insurance companies. I believe if collectively we looked at the insurance industry we would see that we do not need more insurance companies, but that we need fewer, so that there would be some guarantee of competition in the industry, which I am sure is not going to result from the passage of this particular bill.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

• (6:50 p.m.)

On clause 4—Subscription and payment before general meeting.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, in respect of clause 4 I agree with the hon. member for Timiskaming regarding the inadequacy of the $2,250. I do not believe the provisional directors should be allowed to call an annual general meeting after the subscription of $2,250. In this regard let me refer to another bill, S-28, the next one on the order paper.

The Chairman: Order, please. We are now considering clause 4. The hon. member's remarks relate to the subject matter of another bill. I suggest he confine his remarks to clause 4 of the bill now before us.

Mr. Howard: That is precisely what I was attempting to do, but I wanted to preface my amendment by a few explanatory remarks.

This bill refers to a $1 million capitalization and has a provision which allows the provisional directors to hold an annual general meeting after the subscription of $2,250. In this respect it is similar to Bill No. S-28. The difference between the two bills is the amount of the required subscription. In the one before us only $2,250 is required, whereas in Bill No. S-28 $500,000 is required. I suggest that there should be a subscription requirement of more than what this bill requires. Therefore I move:

That clause 4 be amended by deleting in lines 3 and 4 thereof the words "two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars" and by substituting therefor the words "five hundred thousand dollars".

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Chairman, I did not anticipate an amendment of this kind and I have no authority to accept it. Let me suggest to the committee that a provision requiring a $500,000 subscription before a general meeting could be held would be too restrictive. I suggest the amount is too high, and if we desire to continue with the free enterprise system a company would have great difficulty in getting started, if it were faced with such a requirement. The first general meeting is held mainly for the purpose of ratifying the by-laws and acts of the provisional directors and deciding upon the make-up of its policies. There should be sufficient money put up to show that they are in earnest, but the requirement of $500,000 is altogether inordinate. I ask hon. members of this committee to defeat the amendment on that basis.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) negatived: Yeas, 3; nays, 15.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Peters: By leave, now.

Mr. Ryan (for Mr. Basford) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Peters: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time on division.

ANNIVERSARY LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (for Mr. Fairweather) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-28, to incorporate Anniversary Life Insurance Company.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 105, the said bill is referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I ask that we proceed with the bill through all the stages.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised by the Clerk of the House that it is not possible to proceed with the bill in committee of the whole. It would either have to be referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs or be allowed to stand at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, would you reconsider your view on this procedure? I recall distinctly that the house made a similar decision to the one requested by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce with respect to another bill, by giving unanimous consent to waiving the rule, after which it proceeded to consider the bill in committee of the whole and then proceeded, again by unanimous consent, to third reading of the bill.

I submit the fundamental rule is that the house is master of its rules, and if it decides by unanimous consent to waive the rules it should be able to do so. In fact it has done so on other occasions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should point out to the hon. member for Skeena that the difficulty with which we are faced here is not only a procedural matter but also a matter of finances. If the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill is prepared to declare to the house that the financial implications involved have been met, then perhaps the Chair will be able to withdraw its objection.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, we agree to let it stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree to let the bill stand at this stage of proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised that there may be some difficulty in allowing the bill to stand at this stage. Since the second reading has been completed, there is no way in which the bill can be referred to on the order paper.

Mr. Winkler: Can we not allow it to remain on the order paper by unanimous consent?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since second reading of the bill has been completed it cannot remain on the order paper.

Mr. Howard: I suggest that it remain on the order paper at the head of the list under "special order—stand for reconsideration of the disposal of the committee stage of the bill". I think the house can proceed in this manner if it wishes to. This should not transgress the financial position of the company.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised that there is no procedure which would allow the bill to stand at this stage, as the bill must go to some committee after it has had second reading.

Mr. Winkler: I suggest that we should refer it to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to standing order 105, the said bill stands referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

The hour for the consideration of private members business has now expired.

INCOME TAX ACT AMENDMENT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS ANALOGOUS TO THOSE IN CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: Pursuant to an order passed on Tuesday, February 28, I now leave the chair. The committee will resume at eight o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose, clause 21 of the bill was under consideration and clause 6 was allowed to stand.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I understand that Mr. Speaker may wish to make a very short announcement. I therefore move that the committee rise and report progress.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

• (8:10 p.m.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO RELEASE FROM CUSTODY PERSON WHO THREW LEAFLETS FROM GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, during the question period earlier today leaflets were thrown from the general gallery to the floor of the chamber. Thanks to the alertness of the House of Commons protective staff, the offender was partially frustrated in his attempts and he was forthwith taken into custody. The individual identified himself as one John Richard Campbell of no fixed address.

Standing order 14 reads in part as follows:

> Any stranger admitted into any part of the house or gallery, who misconducts himself... shall be taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms; and no person so taken into custody shall be discharged without the special order of the house.

I should now like to obtain directions from the house before proceeding further.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all perhaps I might be permitted to commend the protective staff for their vigilance in this matter.

Then, I should like to move:

> That without prejudice to any later action that may be taken elsewhere, the person who identified himself as John Richard Campbell be forthwith discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house so order?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

The house will now resume the business interrupted a moment ago.

INCOME TAX ACT AMENDMENT

INCORPORATION OF PROVISIONS ANALOGOUS TO THOSE IN CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 21—Application for assignment of social insurance number.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, when the committee was considering clause 21 of this bill last Tuesday I raised a question of the Minister of Finance concerning the manner in which these records would be handled by the computing system, so as to make certain that all of the information filed, such as the income tax returns that I presume will be stored by these electronic devices, is kept confidential in conformity with the law.

[Mr. Speaker.]

There are a number of problems involved here, Mr. Chairman. I am advised that there are a number of ways in which these electronic devices store this information which is fed to them. For example, I am told that these memory banks or storage devices are controlled by tapes, or by discs, or by drums. There are also other data cells which can store information. I am also advised, Mr. Chairman, that codes or labels are attached to the various files containing the information that goes into this data storage centre. I am advised that these data cells can in fact produce a formula in the form of a label, number, code, or whatever you want to call it, and this activates a device which by means of a track or a channel leads to what is called an address at which the records are located.

So far, Mr. Chairman, we have had no indication from the Minister of Finance whether this is the kind of system which will be used to make certain that the confidential information contained in the income tax files does not get into exactly the same place as, for example, information filed under the Canada Pension Plan, the Old Age Security Act, or other measures which require the use of these numbers for computing purposes.

For example, Mr. Chairman, we are aware that the number which the minister is insisting under clause 21 be attached to an individual's income tax return is exactly the same number as that used for his social security account. I have learned from talking to some university people who are knowledgeable in programming techniques and computing devices that if these files are not going to be used for comparison with files used for other purposes, then there is no advantage in retaining the same number for each file. Therefore I have to assume that the minister does intend that there be some advantage in retaining the same number.

I want to dissociate myself completely from the remarks made in this chamber the other evening by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose, who suggested that there may be some socialist, communist or other sinister plot involved in the use of a social security number on income tax files. I accept the minister's statement wherein he said that this is done for administrative convenience. However, Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that under our income tax law, which I think is good law, information contained in income tax returns is confidential and cannot be revealed unless a court order is obtained. Even then, I suggest, it is very difficult for anyone in the government or anybody else to get information from income tax files.

We now understand computers or electronic devices are going to store these files. If it is true that there is no advantage in having the same number on a person's income tax file as on his social security file, unless it is for purposes of comparison, then I would ask the minister why the same number is retained.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went on to make a great case that we have numbers attached to us for all sorts of purposes—drivers' licences, marriage certificates, and he even included the numbers on the various credit cards hon. members have. I am not opposed to a number being attached to income tax files. What I am concerned about is that we keep the same number, and therefore presumably the same file, for income tax purposes as for all other accounts in respect to social security.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to give the assurance that there is absolutely no intention of using information contained in these files for purposes of comparison with other files. If this is the intention, Mr. Chairman, the minister is violating the income tax law of this country, and I hope that he is not.

Along with this, Mr. Chairman, we must also be given the assurance—I think this we must demand—that the filing system is such that people seeking information by means of the social security number for purposes of old age security, the Canada Pension Plan and for other purposes, will not be able to gain access to information filed in income tax returns. As I say, the problem bothering me is the insistence of the minister on retaining the same number.

An other matter I want to raise is this. I understand a definite pattern is emerging in the assignation of social security numbers at the present time. In other words, by using various combinations of these nine numbers which form your social security number a great deal of information about a particular individual can be gleaned from the way the number is put together. That is what I have been told and I am prepared to verify that statement. This is why I should like to ask the minister whether there is some code or pattern which has been worked out in assigning numbers to various individuals.

Will there be any sequence to things when the applications arrive? Will these nine digits, these three groups of three numbers that have been assigned to individuals, be arranged in such a way that much information can be gleaned from their arrangement by computing devices? The people of Canada ought to know about this.

I do not suggest that there is anything wrong or sinister about this arrangement; but I do think the minister should answer questions which have been raised. Will these numbers be used in such a way that income tax files will no longer be confidential. Will that confidence be broken?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Medicine Hat has raised a legitimate question, one that I think the committee has every reason to seek reassurance about.

In the interval, since we were last discussing this bill, I have been in touch with officials of the Department of National Revenue and have asked them to assure me that the records of income of taxpayers are maintained as confidentially as they are required to be maintained, and that they are not available through any electronic devices or otherwise to people other than those concerned with the administration of the tax laws. I have this assurance; I will read what the deputy minister of national revenue has advised me. I then propose to discuss one or two questions raised by the hon. member.

The deputy minister of taxation for the Department of National Revenue advises me as follows:

> All of a taxpayer's data on the records and files of the taxation division are protected by the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act. Any requirement on taxpayers to obtain a social insurance number does not affect the confidentiality of his affairs or the secrecy rules which protect them.
> It is untrue to say that tax or other information obtained from any taxpayer would be passed to other departments of government for other purposes if that taxpayer obtains a social insurance number.

My understanding of the reason for having the same number is that it enables one to identify the taxpayer much more accurately than he otherwise might be identified, and that it saves a great deal of administrative trouble.

The social insurance number gives a continuity that is not otherwise available as to the identity of individuals. The hon. member has said he is concerned that, because the same department polices the Canada Pension Plan provisions and the Income Tax Act, and because the same number might be used, say, for the Canada Pension Plan as for income tax purposes, persons other than authorized collectors may have access to income tax information. I can assure the hon. member that the fact that the same number is used has nothing to do with access to information. In other words an employee of the Department of National Revenue not concerned with the administration of income tax could not obtain information about a taxpayer's income simply because the taxpayer used with respect to his income tax the same number he used for the Canada Pension Plan.

I am afraid a sort of mythology has grown up around this subject. There would be no difference if instead of using numbers we could use names. If there is any concern about numbers, that concern ought to extend to names also. After all, we use identical names on different forms; why not use identical numbers, if it is the same person. The fact that information is now kept in machines does not, I am assured by officials to whom I have written and to whom I have talked, affect the availability of income tax information to anyone other than authorized persons.

Mr. Olson: I appreciate what the minister says, but he has not really answered the question. When these discs, drums, tapes or whatever they are, are used, will there be any cross-reference with respect to information. In other words, will the income tax information and other Department of National Revenue information be kept completely separate? Will the information to do with identical numbers be compared? If the information is not to be compared, identical numbers need not be used.

I am told that using identical numbers would mean a great deal of administrative convenience. Will the information to do with income tax be compared with other information? Will there be any cross-comparison of information on file? If not, I see no great advantage to having identical numbers.

Will the numbers be kept on the same discs, film, or tape, or will they be kept separately? Frankly I cannot accept the analogy the minister drew with respect to electronic files and other files. Surely information entering the Department of National Revenue, and being filed on its files, is not made available to other branches of the department. Information is kept physically separate. The question is, will information be separated in the department if income tax information and other information is listed under the same number and kept on the same tape.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am no greater expert on these machines than is the hon. member for Medicine Hat, but I am assured that the files are kept quite separate and are not available to any officials other than those engaged in the collection of taxes. Indeed, the problem that he is concerned with would have arisen if the machines had been more ingenious and could read names as well as numbers. Unfortunately they cannot read names; as a result we have had to assign numbers. If names were capable of being distinguished by the machines we should not have had to resort to a numbers method. Some day perhaps machines will be able to distinguish groups of letters in such a way that we can do away altogether with numbers. We shall then have exactly the same problem that we now have. I can assure the hon. member that if this government is in office it will be as scrupulous as it has been in the past in maintaining inviolable the secrecy of the income tax return.

Mr. Olson: I have another question, Mr. Chairman. I understand that there will be a central data processing centre in which there will be stored computer memory banks. Can the minister assure me that none of these files will be compared by the machine, that the machines will not be programmed to compare, say, income tax files and other files that may be brought to some data processing centre?

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Even if all this data were to be processed on the same machines I could give an assurance that the information would not be available to any unauthorized persons. But it is my understanding that not even the same machines would be used. Special computers are being used by the Department of National Revenue and the department does not depend upon central computing devices.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The minister has told us why numbers are necessary. He told us that these machines can read only numbers, and that he wants to keep up to date. It is not the case that these machines can read only numbers. Is the minister aware that electronic computers are available which can work from the written word as well as from numbers? Only last night an authority from the Post Office Department stated that the department would avail itself of electronic computers capable of operating from the written word.

Mr. Sharp: I am very glad to have this information. The treasury is not sufficiently flush to afford one of these machines. Perhaps in due course we shall buy one, and then we can get rid of these numbers. In the meantime we have to rely on the equipment which is available and which operates on the basis of numbers only.

Mr. Ballard: I should like to add my protest to that of the hon. member for Medicine Hat about the use of computer numbers, the SIN numbers, as they have been called, in connection with income tax returns. One of the points the hon. member makes is that government income tax files will no longer be secret. But there is no confidentiality left in the revenue department. When the Income Tax Act was amended last July the traditional secrecy which existed between taxpayers and the department was removed.

I refer to section 133(4)(c) of that act which reads follows:

> An official or authorized person may communicate or allow to be communicated information obtained under this act, or allow inspection of or access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, to or by any person otherwise legally entitled thereto.

The other day when the house was in committee I pointed out to the minister that income tax files had actually been taken from the department and used in a civil law case for the first time in Canada. This was made possible by the section of the act to which I have just referred. It is all very well for the minister to say that there is confidentiality within the department. But it no longer exists. As proof, we need only recall what took place a few weeks ago when we passed the old age security amending legislation. The officials administering that act can now call upon the director of taxation for information to be used to verify the returns filed by applicants for supplementary old age pensions.

These are two examples of opening the doors to the files of the income tax department. I suggest that if the doors can be opened for such reasons it will not be long before the records of the Department of National Revenue become an open book not only to other departments of government but to all the courts of the land.

In the case of Bazos v. Bazos which I cited the other night, the issue before the court concerned a will. I suggest that the type of court case into which income tax files can be injected will gradually broaden until we see these files brought into court in connection with divorce applications, and a whole variety of civil cases. I believe the hon. member for Medicine Hat has put forward a valid argument against the use of numbers. I will go further. He has based his argument upon the possibility that the records in the Department of National Revenue may no longer be secret. Unhappily, in my opinion, at this point of time they are no longer secret, despite the tradition of the past. I know this is a protest made in vain but I should nevertheless like to protest very strongly against the erosion of our traditional concept of confidentiality between the taxpayer and the department.

I believe the use of numbers opens the door to making this information which the government gathers available over a wide spectrum. As individual citizens of Canada we will find our affairs becoming an open book to the bureaucrats in the government. The minister should put his foot down at this point. It is not that we do not trust the present Minister of Finance; we often pass legislation in this house because we know that the Minister of Finance is a fine fellow. I think the present minister would do nothing to jeopardize the rights of the individual. But another minister of finance 20 or 30 years from now might dispose of this information in a far different way from that in which the present minister intends it to be used. We are just reaching the point where the lives of all the people of Canada will be laid bare for examination by every department of government, in fact by all the people in the land.

An hon. Member: Like "1984".

Mr. Kindt: There are parts of this clause which do not appeal to me. Only a year or two ago the subject of social security numbers was raised in the house. Questions were asked on the floor of the house. Ministers were pressed to say who would be required to obtain such numbers, and whether members of parliament would be required to obtain them. Hon. members were told at that time that no social security numbers were to be obtained by members of parliament or by certain other groups of people covered by the questions asked. Now all that is out the window. Under the provisions of clause 21 we have to obtain a social security number. Some bureaucrat, with the aid of the minister, is having this written into law. The explanatory notes state that such a number is necessary

"to facilitate the carrying out of the administrative responsibilities of the Department of National Revenue." Would the minister delineate these responsibilities?

• (8:40 p.m.)

I sympathize fully with the questions asked by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. They have not been completely answered. I also sympathize with the questions asked by the hon. member for Calgary South. The Department of National Revenue has always prided itself on the confidence with which it treats information given on income tax returns. The average citizen who fills out such a return is honest, but if he feels that due to the Minister of Finance and this bill the information he gives on his return will go here, there, and the other place, his loss of confidence will not be in the best interests of the minister, of the Department of National Revenue or of the country as a whole. It will certainly not be in the individual's own interests.

The minister has indicated that a number is not necessary to tie the Canada Pension Plan in with the Department of National Revenue. He has said that these are separate departments, but that only makes some of us wonder what are the functions of the Department of National Revenue which make it necessary for everybody in this dominion who fills out an income tax return to obtain a number and be known as a number.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to bore the committee by reading what I said on Tuesday as recorded at page 13597 of Hansard when I gave a fairly elaborate description of the reasons for this amendment. The hon. member will find that in Hansard, but may I say to him that the Department of National Revenue has two alternatives, either to assign a number to every taxpayer so that we can keep our income tax forms more efficiently and use computing devices, and to have a separate number for the Canada Pension Plan and other purposes, or to have only one number.

I would like to assure the hon. member that we are all going to have numbers. This is the essence of the modern world and the essence of the use of computers, other than those referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who spoke about some new developments that may come in due course. As a result of these developments he suggests we will not need to have numbers because machines will be able to read our names and identify us by our handwriting or by other methods. I can understand the hon. member's objection to numbers, but they are almost universal.

I gather that pretty soon we will all carry a number around with us. When we go in to shop we will order our groceries and put our numbers down, and the stores will debit our bank accounts. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave us a dozen examples of the way we are numbered today, and we are going to continue to be numbered in this way. It may not be a very desirable social phenomenon but it goes along with the use of machines.

I find it difficult to give any further explanation to the hon. member who has just spoken, other than the explanation I gave as recorded at pages 13597 and 13598 of Hansard. Perhaps I could remind him of that by reading one paragraph, or perhaps two, from what I said at that time.

Mr. Kindt: I wish you would.

Mr. Sharp:

Shortly after the Department of National Revenue developed its numbers system—

Not its numbers game.

—its numbers system the requirements of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the advent of the Canada Pension Plan dictated the need for the design and implementation of a new and universal system of permanent unique numbers suitable for massive record keeping operations by electronic computers. The social insurance numbers system was the result. It now embraces over nine million members of the population.

To carry out its responsibilities for collecting Canada Pension Plan contributions and to ensure that contributors' records are accurately maintained, the Department of National Revenue must use these social security numbers and require that all contributors use them on the reporting forms required to administer the plan. Thus the department is now using one system of numbers for the identification of taxpayers and another for Canada Pension Plan contributors, most of whom are the same.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if one looks at last year's income tax returns, or perhaps the income tax returns that are being used now, it will be seen that the use of SIN numbers had been voluntary. You could include them or not, and most taxpayers did. There was no problem about it. They did not feel they were jeopardizing their civil rights or anything like that by filling in the social insurance number on the income tax return. They had no desire to conceal anything, and a very high proportion of taxpayers agreed that it made for administrative convenience if instead of the Department of National Revenue having to give them another number they just used the number they already had for social insurance purposes. The purpose of this bill is to carry the matter a step forward by requiring everyone to put that number on the form.

As I have said, it is not going to give unauthorized people access to information about incomes. I have given that assurance and I give it without any qualifications whatever. I do believe, however, that it is more efficient, and I do not believe it in any way jeopardizes our freedoms or causes us to become more undifferentiated if we have numbers as well as names.

Mr. Kindt: The minister says it is a convenience to the department which handles income tax returns. Does it cut costs?

Mr. Sharp: Very substantially, Mr. Chairman, because instead of having two sets of numbers attached to the same people there is only one, and it makes for closer identification of the taxpayer as he moves about. One of the problems that the tax collection department has is that taxpayers move about the country, not only within the area in which they were formerly located but elsewhere. Now they carry their number with them and it is therefore possible to link the returns from year to year much more readily.

Mr. Kindt: Does the housewife of a husband who is a taxpayer need a social security number if she is not paying taxes and, second does she need such a number if she is paying taxes?

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the simple answer to this is that the only requirement in this bill is that which requires taxpayers to have numbers. We are concerned only about them.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the minister did not answer the question very distinctly. I think the simple answer is that if the wife is not earning and is not a taxpayer, then she does not have a number; but if she is working and is a taxpayer, then she has a number.

Mr. Sharp: Yes.

Mr. Monteith: There is a system of numbers now. I know that on my own tax return I am labelled "M-o-n-t-e", plus some number. Is that system to be done away with; will it be discarded?

Mr. Sharp: Yes. I also have a number like that. The intention will be to replace that linkage with the social insurance number.

Mr. Monteith: May I accuse the government of being somewhat wasteful in having gone through this system of numbering some years ago and now changing it again. A year or two ago, when we were talking about this system in respect, first of all, of unemployment insurance and then the Canada Pension Plan, we were against the numbering system. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised the point that it is the insidious way in which this has been done which disturbs us. Two years ago the answer was that there would not be anything like this, and here we are again.

I should like to ask a question which probably might not be considered relevant. However, I am interested in an answer. What is the legal position of a taxpayer who does not apply for a number and when he files his income tax return remits the stipulated fine with his income tax return?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the proposed new section provides that a person who files a return and has failed to show a social insurance number shall be deemed to have failed to complete the information as required by section 44 of the act. Section 44 of the act is the section which requires individuals to file returns in prescribed form and containing prescribed information. Section 55(3) of the act imposes a penalty for failure to complete the information required on a return. The subsection reads as follows:

> Every person who has failed to complete the information on a prescribed form as required by or pursuant to section 44 is, unless in the case of an individual the minister has waived it, liable to a penalty
> (a) of 1% of the tax payable under this part but, whether he is taxable or not, not less than $25 or more than $100, or
> (b) in the case of an individual, of such lesser amount as the minister may have fixed in respect of the specific failure.

Mr. Monteith: The minister has not quite answered my question. If the person should be subject to a $50 or $100 fine, according to the section and so on, and pays it when he files his income tax return, what is his situation? Some people have standards in this regard. They have certain rules by which they like to live; one of these is not to be a number. If they are willing in successive years to pay the fine when they file their tax return, what is their situation?

Mr. Sharp: One of my officials advises me that he can pay for his pride every year. I might point out one thing in this regard which I think is important. Since the new proposed section 103A invokes a civil penalty under the act, no criminal penalty can be invoked.

Mr. Monteith: He can stay out of jail.

Mr. Sharp: Yes. If he objects to having a number as well as a name, he can pay the fine every year and feel virtuous.

Mr. Kindt: If an individual—perhaps even myself or the minister—fails to file his income tax form until the last two or three days in April and for some reason or other forgets to inscribe his social security number, he would then be in default because his form was not complete and he would have to pay a penalty. What are the rules in this regard? I should like a specific answer to that question. While I am on my feet let me say that now we have this number business in addition to all the other detail that is on these income tax forms. They are so involved that one must hire a consultant to fill out the form, and pay this person a large sum of money. This is no laughing matter; it is a serious matter.

Mr. Monteith: I agree that it is not a laughing matter. That is the way in which I once earned my living.

Mr. Kindt: Yes; I did too. I used to earn a lot of money by filling out income tax returns, until I found that I could not make any more money out of it. People do not want to pay for that. They object to paying for anything of this kind, and strongly object to filling out forms. It is no laughing matter if you are going to be penalized because you did not put your security number on the form. I do not know what the minister is laughing about, but he would find out how these people feel if he would go out and listen to the opinions of some of those who are going to be asked to fill out these income tax forms. He thinks he is doing something here that the people will sanction, and he is making a joke of it.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I was not smiling at the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I was thinking about a story concerning a form filled out by an applicant in the civil service. The question on the form was, "Sex?", and the reply was "Yes". However, perhaps I can answer the question asked by the hon. member in this way: For example, if a taxpayer fails to sign his name on the form as taxpayers sometimes do, it is sent back with a polite request that the form be signed. No penalty is involved. If a taxpayer should forget to fill in his social insurance number, I am quite sure the officials would send the form back and ask him to fill it in. If he refused to do so, this would be the only circumstance in which there would be any penalty.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I brought to the attention of the minister the fact that the Post Office Department expect soon to have electronic computers that will read the name as well as the number. The minister seemed to have accepted this because he referred to the special cost of this type of equipment. I do not know how he could have any knowledge that it would cost more money to have a computer that can remember a name rather than a series of numbers. However, immediately thereafter the minister went back to his theme about why it was necessary to have numbers. He seemed to disregard the fact that the Post Office Department expects to have these electronic computers that will read the name. It appears, Mr. Chairman, that the minister apparently is not listening. I may be wasting my time.

Mr. Kindt: He never listens to anything; he laughs.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): The fact remains, however, that if there are these electronic computers which can read the name, then the argument the minister uses about a computer, and the numbers, is not necessarily a proper argument. I should like to call attention to the fact that when he apparently accepted my argument in the first place, he seemed to refer to the cost of these machines. Let me again emphasize how much it would cost to instal electronic computers. The Department of National Revenue has indicated that this equipment can be made available, and I suggest that the minister responsible should look into the possibility of installing this type of a computer system, but such a system should not be installed until it is found to be of economic advantage.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the government is always interested in finding ways of cutting down on expenses. If machines are developed that can distinguish between names and numbers I am sure the government will take advantage of them.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister another question. Apparently he has some doubt about the suggestion that this type of equipment is available. Perhaps he will refer to the national news of Tuesday evening. Information was given to the effect that computers no longer depend on numbers but can now distinguish between names and numbers. Perhaps the minister would check on this information.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the minister's contention that we in Canada have an objection to regimentation. I have had some experience in this regard in relation to applications for pension. I am inclined to agree with the minister when he suggests that it would be difficult to deal with numerous applications of this type, because of the number of names involved. Many people in this country have the same name, and as a result a great deal of confusion may exist with the use of computers.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken in that names present a problem, but according to the latest information available computers no longer depend on names only, but can distinguish between names and addresses. Surely this could apply in respect of the Post Office Department just as it does in respect of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of criticism about the computerized income tax form. These complaints have been of a very general nature and undoubtedly the Minister of Finance is aware of them. If a mistake occurred in the income tax branch computer system, perhaps my pension would be tremendously increased and the minister's pension would be substantially decreased. Will the minister give us some indication of the situation which now exists in respect of the use of computers in departments concerned with finances?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, a number of different types of computers is now available, but so far as income tax information is concerned taxpayers file returns and indicate their social insurance numbers. Sometimes these taxpayers inadvertently give the wrong number. This results in some confusion, and this confusion must be straightened out. However, no problem would exist in this regard because the accounts would be handled separately.

Mr. Kindt: Under those circumstances the error must be related to the taxpayer. For this reason some check of an internal nature in the Department of National Revenue must be made before any disposition is made of the funds collected.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can be of some help to the committee in this regard. This whole matter was one of the main subjects considered during our discussions. I think it was resolved by the fact that every two or three years all the documentation is copied and sent out.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Mr. Monteith: On division.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 22—Appeal from order of direction.

Mr. Ballard: Mr. Chairman, I should like again to raise the question with the minister in respect of the traditional concept of confidentiality in respect of income tax returns. There has always been an accepted principle that information passing from taxpayers to the Department of National Revenue shall be considered as confidential. While I realize that under certain circumstances some information must be circulated between departments the income taxpayer must be protected.

Recently our attention has been directed to security, and it has become apparent that certain information has been made available to the income tax department. It is obvious that this type of information must be circulated for the purposes of administrating the Canada Pension Plan and other government social security measures, but information collected by the income tax department should not be made available indiscriminantly. There is some valid apprehension about the exchange of information as a result of our present state of cybernetics. Very often, because of our methods of assessing taxes, we have allowed this traditional right to slip through our fingers.

It has always been the case that information on file with the director of taxation could be used in the case of a criminal court case but never in the case of a civil court case. Last year the door was opened when an amendment was made to section 133 of the Income Tax Act which allowed this information to be passed on to any authorized person or to a person legally entitled to this information, without defining who were the persons legally entitled to receive the information. Last year we had the case of an Ontario court which called for an income tax file and had it read into the evidence in a civil court case. The amendment that we are considering tonight does nothing more than protect the civil servants involved in passing this file from the department to the court. I suggest to the minister that while it may be all well and good to protect the position of the civil servants involved, I think the minister should take this matter up with the Minister of National Revenue, who has had much experience with income tax matters, and should be aware of the concern that this developing situation is causing in the professions of law and accountancy.

While I cannot object strongly to the protection that this clause is affording civil servants, I do protest the fact that amendments were made last summer which opened the files in the taxation department to all and sundry. I urge the minister to confer with his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to bring in in the very near future an amendment to the Income Tax Act which would close this gap once again.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, it was because of this case that the present clause 22 which we are considering is being brought forward. This amendment provides that the Minister of National Revenue or an official or authorized person, as defined in section 133 of the act, may appeal an order or direction made by a court to require the minister or official to give evidence or produce information relating to information received under the Income Tax Act. This amendment is considered necessary, due to a recent case in Ontario where, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, a judge was in error in requiring the Department of National Revenue to produce certain income tax returns.

It is of interest to note that in similar circumstances a judge in British Columbia held that the returns could not be produced in a civil case. I do not know what more we can do in parliament than to provide for an appeal, nor how we could define any more clearly than is defined in the law who is legally entitled to the information. If a judge says that somebody is legally entitled to it in a civil court case, then I think the best way to deal with that is to provide for an appeal from the ruling.

Mr. Monteith: May I ask the minister, with respect to the Ontario case to which he referred, whether the judge's decision was based on an amendment which was brought in last year?

Mr. Sharp: I am so informed, Mr. Chairman. I do not think that this is good law and I would like to think that if that decision had been appealed at that time the judgment would have been reversed.

Mr. Monteith: In that case, Mr. Chairman, may I offer a word of warning? The minister has agreed that this was not a good move at the time and he is suggesting that there should be an appeal by the Minister of National Revenue against such information being brought forward.

It seems to me this is an indication to us all that some of these laws are brought in by the bureaucratic service with a view to making things easier for them, without respect for the rights of private citizens. I think the minister has admitted it by bringing forth this amendment. I think it is a good lesson for all of us to watch what is happening in these amendments that come before us from time to time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The fault is with the minister and not the civil service.

Mr. Ballard: I thought the minister was going to reply, but failing that I will ask him a direct question. He will recall that, in the case to which both he and I referred, the court ruled that the civil servant involved would be absolved from any penalty under section 133 (4) (c). If this was the case, then why was this amendment necessary?

Mr. Sharp: As I understand the question of the hon. member, he asked why section 133 was amended. I myself was not personally involved in this and I depend upon the advice of my officials.

They believe it was amended for two reasons: first of all to tighten the law so as to make it quite clear that the information was only available to legally authorized persons. There was some doubt previously as to whether a former civil servant might not have had access to this information, so the amendment to section 133 removed that doubt. I gather it was also meant to enable the Department of National Revenue to provide the information to its own agents to be used in court cases.

I submit that the amendments to section 133 did not have any effect upon the availability of this information, and certainly that was not the intention. That is why I believe that the ruling given by the judge was bad law. I do not know what more this parliament can do than authorize the Minister of National Revenue to intervene in cases, which formally he did not have an opportunity of doing, and appeal any ruling that requires the production of this information contrary to the intent of parliament.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly not opposed to the passing of this clause. All I am suggesting is that when the amendment was brought forward a year ago, greater regard should have been given to the general public, and this amending clause should have been brought in in conjunction with it at that time.

Mr. Sharp: May I suggest that at that time we did not have an adverse case and we never anticipated one. Since that time such a case has arisen and therefore we feel that this new procedure should be available to the government.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 23 agreed to.

On clause 24—Amount paid in lieu of taxes.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, clause 24 repeals the old Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act and I want to say a few words about it. The minister has given us a brief history with respect to this act. Hon. members will remember that I was interested in this matter on a previous occasion. The minister undertook to consult the industry about some proposals that he had in mind at that time. This has been done. He did not say exactly what the attitude of the industry was, but he did say he had consulted them as he promised. To this extent, therefore some credit should be given to the minister.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I want the minister and his officials to listen to me, if they will, as I try to comprehend exactly what is taking place here, and so I can be certain there is a full understanding on the record. As I understand what the minister said, the old act to which I have just referred is being repealed. This is being done because of changes that the Minister of Transport mentioned on another occasion. We do not have, in my opinion, anything on the record to indicate why these changes are taking place. I do not believe the Minister of Transport gave any detailed explanation as to whether the old act is not working or what the reasons were. Perhaps the Minister of Transport is the one who should indicate this; but if the Minister of Finance has any idea as to why he is being given responsibility for this matter under the Income Tax Act, I would appreciate his explanation.

According to the minister, we are omitting certain provisions in the old act with respect to exemption from the recapture of capital cost allowances. I take it there has not been any substantial objection to this from the industry. We are incorporating now, under the provisions of this act in clauses 2, 3 and 5, the rapid depreciation provision. According to my interpretation, the major assistance that can be given to the industry will remain in the Income Tax Act and a great deal of the regulatory authority contained therein. I am no expert on the Income Tax Act, but I understand that under its regulations the minister would have considerable authority to regulate the so-called rapid depreciation provision. I think the minister should give some assurance to the house that if my interpretation is correct, if there were substantial changes of any nature in the regulations under the Income Tax Act, he would consult the industry again. So far as I know, the old act was quite successful and we did not receive any substantial criticism from the industry.

Neither the Minister of Transport nor the Minister of Finance has said why the old act was not working or why the changes are being made. However, the industry was consulted. We do not know that they are fully in favour of the change. The industry is now brought under these sweeping regulatory powers contained in the Income Tax Act. So I should like to have, and I think the house is entitled to it, an assurance from the minister that, first of all, my brief interpretation of what is taking place is substantially correct and, second, the minister's assurance that if any great changes are to take place under these regulatory powers the industry would be consulted again.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I think I can give the assurances the hon. member is requesting. Certainly I can give the assurance that if there are to be any changes in the regulations under the Income Tax Act, or anything of that kind, representations from the shipbuilding industry will be welcomed. I do not believe we should go out and seek them, but I am sure they will be forthcoming. In any event, since we are interested and I believe have a better method now of providing the kind of assistance that is desirable, we will be in constant communication with the industry about the administration of the new shipbuilding program announced by the Minister of Transport.

Perhaps it would interest the hon. member to know that the principal change between the bill I introduced at the time of the budget in 1966 and the present bill is a provision concerning the time allowed for a taxpayer to take advantage of the exemption from taxable income now allowed for the recapture of capital cost allowance. We received representations on this, and as a result a modification will change the time limit for disposal of the vessel and disposal of the funds, which in Bill C-216 were 1970 and 1972 respectively, to the end of 1973 in both cases. This was one of the representations made to us and this was the modification made.

I do not believe it matters very much whether those provisions that were formerly in the special act, along with other provisions, are now being transferred into the Income Tax Act. I can assure him that whatever special allowances were made, they will be carried forward in that way, but the main part of the program now is to be found in a different form of assistance.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In other words, the minister gave the industry at least part of what they desired so far as the first proposal was concerned. Without going into a great deal of income tax law, what are these regulatory powers that might be used under the Income Tax Act that did not exist under the old vessel construction act? I suppose it would be within the power of the minister to vary this depreciation?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, I can confirm what the hon. gentleman has said, the power to vary the rate of depreciation.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I guess that is all I want to know. I do not apologize for taking time on this matter because, as hon. members know, I am one who feels there is not enough attention paid here or in country generally to anything related to the sea or shipbuilding. We need lots of measures to help build ships. We need lots of attention to a merchant fleet and to encouraging our young people to go to sea.

In another committee of this house, which is probably sitting tonight, the government is wiping out one of the great heritages of this country. They are wiping out the navy and all that it stands for. The results of this action will bulge out in other ways. No matter how powerful this government is, they still have to face up to the fact we are a seafaring nation with the largest coastline in the world. Although landlubbers exist in central Canada, there has to be some attention paid to the sea, not only because of our heritage but because of the food that comes from the sea, and for the protection of our great country. I only hope, and it is a fervent hope, that now the minister has authority for this measure that will assist shipbuilding in the country, he will forget his central Canada, landlubber background and show a little discretion and leniency to the shipbuilding industry by giving them tax exemptions and the like.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Guay: Mr. Chairman, following the question or the intervention of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell), I understand that this change will not affect the shipbuilding industry and that the government will make every effort to maintain the situation now existing in Canadian shipyards.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the changes we are now approving do not alter in any way the government's policy toward the encouragment of shipbuilding.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: The committee will now revert to clause 6.

On clause 6—

The Chairman: When this clause was stood the hon. member for Medicine Hat had moved an amendment. The amendment was not read by the chair, and if the hon. member wishes to proceed with his amendment I shall do so now.

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat:

That Bill C-259 be amended as follows:
"That the word 'complete' be deleted from clause 6, subclause (1), section (viii) where it appears in lines 4, 8 and 9 on page 9".

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I moved this amendment because it seemed to me that under the present wording a person was authorized to deduct under the terms of the Income Tax Act the cost of a denture constructed or provided by a dental mechanic or technician, only if it were a complete upper or complete lower denture. I believe that the Minister of Finance is ready to accept this amendment, so I will not repeat the arguments I advanced the other day.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I can confirm that the government is ready to accept this amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Monteith: Next sitting of this house.

Mr. Lewis: By leave, now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should point out to the house that the order for third reading of the bill does not carry with it the order to reprint the bill. If it is the wish of the house to have the bill reprinted, an order of the house can be made now. Is it agreed that the bill be reprinted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

FINANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment to provinces out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, for each fiscal year in the period commencing on the first day of April, 1967 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1972, of provincial revenue equalization payments and post-secondary education adjustment payments, and for each fiscal year commencing on or after the first day of April, 1967, of provincial revenue stabilization payments and succession duty payments; to authorize tax collection agreements with provinces and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act to extend for an additional three years the interim period relating to the health grants program.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, this resolution and the bill which it seeks permission to introduce are the outcome of extensive discussions with the provinces. These discussions took place in the tax structure committee, on which the federal and provincial governments were represented by their ministers of finance or provincial treasurers, and culminated in the federal-provincial conference of October last.

I reported to the house on October 31 on the several proposals made to the provinces by the federal government at that conference. Major changes were proposed in the following fields: the occupancy of tax fields or tax sharing; provincial revenue equalization arrangements; provincial revenue stabilization arrangements; federal financial assistance in respect of post-secondary education; a new form of federal compensation to the provinces in respect of well established shared cost programs in the health and welfare field; and finally, a new federal program for the occupational training of adults in lieu of the technical and vocational training agreements which expire on March 31 this year.

My colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has given notice that he will shortly be asking permission of this committee to introduce legislation to carry out the federal government's undertaking in respect of adult occupational training. The resolution now being considered seeks permission to introduce legislation to give effect to a new set of fiscal arrangements between Canada and the provinces in accordance with the government's undertakings at the October conference.

In presenting the federal proposals to the tax structure committee last September I suggested certain principles by which I believed that committee should be guided in the development of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, consistent with the federalism of the future. For the information of this committee I should like to read these principles from my remarks to the tax structure committee:

First, the fiscal arrangements should give both the federal and provincial governments access to fiscal resources sufficient to discharge their responsibilities under the constitution.

Second, they should provide that each government should be accountable to its own electors for its taxing and spending decisions and should make these decisions with due regard for their effect on other governments.

Third, the fiscal arrangements should, through a system of equalization grants, enable each province to provide an adequate level of public services without resort to rates of taxation substantially higher than those of other provinces.

Fourth, they should give to the federal government sufficient fiscal power to discharge its economic and monetary responsibilities, as well as to pay its bills. In particular, they should retain for the federal government a sufficient part of the income tax field in all provinces—both personal and corporate—to enable it to use variations in the weight and form of that tax for economic purposes and to achieve a reasonable degree of equity in the incidence of taxation across Canada.

Fifth, they should lead to uniform intergovernmental arrangements and the uniform application of federal laws in all provinces.

Sixth, the fiscal arrangements should seek to provide machinery for harmonizing the policies and the priorities of the federal and provincial governments.

These principles underlie the proposals contained in the legislation which the resolution now under consideration seeks permission to introduce. Before proceeding to a discussion of the terms of the resolution, I would like to review very briefly the major fiscal proposals put forward by the federal government at the federal-provincial conference of last October.

• (9:40 p.m.)

On tax sharing or, more accurately, the use of tax fields by the federal, provincial and municipal governments, we maintained that so long as provincial governments had access to sufficient tax fields and so long as provincial revenues were equalized fairly, the provinces should impose their own taxes to finance their own programs. Only when parliament was prepared to acknowledge the exceptional priority of some provincial programs of expenditures should the federal government recommend that taxes should be imposed or federal expenditures reduced for the purpose of financing a federal contribution toward provincial expenditures. Since the priority of expenditures for higher education is now well recognized the federal government undertook to ask parliament to abate or reduce the federal income by four additional percentage points of personal income tax and one additional percentage point of corporate profits. This would enable the provincial governments to take up the extra tax room by making corresponding increases in their income taxes to help meet the rising costs of higher education.

An amendment to the Income Tax Act authorizing these tax abatements is now before the house. Thus the general abatement of the federal individual income tax will be increased from 24 to 28 percentage points and the abatement of the federal corporation income tax will be increased from 9 to 10 per cent of corporate profits.

Mr. Douglas: I do not like to interrupt the minister, but at some point will he tell us what the net gain or loss will be to the provinces by virtue of the government's discontinuing these payments to the universities? What is the net figure that the government has been paying out, and what will the abatement mean to the provinces with respect to higher education? If the minister has not that information now, perhaps he could give it to the committee at some later time?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think that in my relatively short presentation on this occasion I can give this information. I shall be happy to let the hon. member have it when the bill is before us.

The federal offer to the provinces to help them finance the rising costs of post-secondary education goes beyond this tax transfer. It includes equalization payments associated with the revenue derived from these additional tax points, together with special adjustment payments to each province which will bring the total value of the fiscal transfer to $15 per capita or 50 per cent of post-secondary education operating expenditures. My colleague, the Secretary of State, will speak to this aspect of the proposed fiscal arrangements with the provinces.

As to the equalization of provincial revenues, a central feature of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements since 1956, a fundamental reform was proposed. The plan put to the provinces—and which is provided for in the bill to be introduced upon the passage of this resolution—is designed to ensure that all provinces, regardless of their fiscal circumstances, will be able through a redistribution of Canada's wealth to provide their citizens a reasonably comparable level of basic services without having to resort to unduly burdensome levels of taxation. Instead of selecting certain taxes at given or standard rates and equalizing their yield to the level of the top two provinces, the proposed formula will take into account all provincial revenues, at average provincial rates, and will bring the revenue yield in all provinces up to the national average yield. Thus any province in which average provincial tax rates would yield less revenue per capita than the yield of provincial tax rates in Canada as a whole will be entitled to an equalization payment equal to this per capita deficiency.

I do not propose to take the time of the committee to provide a detailed explanation of the mechanics of determining the amount of equalization payable to a province under this formula. This might best be left to the clause by clause committee discussion which will follow second reading of the bill. However, to assist the hon. members to understand the formula, I would like the permission of this committee to place two tables in Hansard. The first table shows the provincial revenues in 16 classes which are to be taken into account; the revenue base associated with each revenue class and, the amount of each revenue base by province and for all provinces as a whole. The second table illustrates the manner of determining the equalization payable. The mechanics of the determination are shown in detail for four provincial revenue sources and in summary for the other 12.

May I have permission to have these tables inserted in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree to have these tables printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Another important element in the proposed fiscal arrangements with the provinces is the undertaking to place a floor under provincial revenues. The provinces have, from time to time, expressed concern over the vulnerability of their revenues to changes in the economic climate. The provinces have argued that in periods of recession when revenues are falling, the costs of provincial responsibilities continue to rise. To the relentless rise in education, health and welfare costs would be added the additional financial burdens occasioned by the recession. The federal government, in the past, has gone part way to alleviate this provincial anxiety for certain provinces, by undertaking to stabilize the equalization payments and standard taxes. Thus the federal government, in the present fiscal arrangements act, undertook for the five-year duration of the arrangements to pay a provincial revenue stabilization payment to a province whenever the amount of that province's three standard taxes and equalization payment fell below 95 per cent of the average of the same taxes and payment for the preceding two fiscal years. The federal government now proposes to extend this stabilization to all provincial revenues and it proposes to remove the five-year limit which has applied to the stabilization provision as well as to the equalization provisions. Stabilization is to be provided on a continuing basis as a protection to the provinces against sharp declines in revenues.

Mr. Douglas: At what percentage?

Mr. Sharp: At 95 per cent. A province will be entitled to stabilization payments when its net general revenues for a fiscal year fall below 95 per cent of the province's net general revenues for the immediately preceding year. In order that the years shall be comparable, the net general revenues for the fiscal year will have to be adjusted to eliminate the effects of changes in provincial taxes and tax rates between years. It will also be necessary to adjust for the effect of revenue windfalls that are characteristic of such revenue sources as succession duties and oil and gas lease sales, as well as for tax revenues accruing to a province because of arrangements between Canada and a province which are not of general application. An example is the federal tax abatements to Quebec under the "contracting-out" arrangements.

Finally, a major proposal was also made to the provinces in respect of the continuing and well-established programs in the field of health and welfare. This offer was designed to enable the provinces ultimately to assume full responsibility for such programs thus bringing to an end the cumulative and continuing influence on provincial decision-making resulting from these major established programs. In return for the assumption of full financial responsibility for hospital insurance, the Canada Assistance Plan and the continuing portion of the health grants, the provinces were offered 17 points of the individual income tax with associated equalization and an adjustment payment or special program equalization grant which would bring each province's annual compensation up to the amount to which it was entitled under the shared-cost agreements involved. From 1970 the provinces would, if they chose, be relieved of the conditions attached to these shared-cost programs, and the adjustment payment or program equalization grant would from then on be escalated independently of program costs.

This was the federal offer in respect of shared-cost programs. It was not, of course, obligatory and because the main change of substance would not occur until 1970 I did not expect the provinces to accept the offer immediately. This in fact turned out to be the case. Consequently the arrangements with the province of Quebec covering these same programs, under the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act, are to be continued, and it is necessary to extend the interim period applicable to the health grants program to March 31, 1970. The other programs are already covered to that date under the act.

That, Mr. Chairman, completes my brief review of the major changes proposed in the fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces. The final element of the proposed arrangements contained no change: the federal government offered to extend for a further two years the tax collection agreements we have with nine of the ten provinces. Also the government proposes to continue the present arrangements for sharing the yield of the federal estate tax with the provinces.

My colleague, the Secretary of State, will speak to the proposed arrangements to help the provinces meet the rising costs of post-secondary education.

Mr. Douglas: Before the minister sits down may I ask him a couple of questions to help us study his statement and deal with the legislation when it is brought down? When the minister's predecessor brought down legislation relating to federal-provincial financing some two years ago he provided the house with tables showing comparative statistics, what provinces were getting under the existing agreement and what they could anticipate receiving under the new proposals. That made it easy to compare the relative advantages or disadvantages of the proposed legislation. Has the minister such tables? Could he undertake to obtain such tables before we deal with the bill on second reading?

Mr. Sharp: I had prepared such comparisons for the meetings of the tax structure committee. I shall have to see whether those must be brought up to date. I shall be happy to provide this kind of information to the house or to the committee.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: I should like to ask the minister whether he could give us some statistical data which would help us to understand the new proposal with respect to the financing of post-secondary education. First, what are the estimates of operating expenditures of institutions of post-secondary education on which the government has based its estimates of the costs of the fiscal transfer, categorized as follows: (i) total by provinces, and (ii) operating expenses of degree-granting universities, by provinces? The second question I should like to ask the minister is this: What are the estimates of population, by provinces, on which the government has based its estimates of the costs of the fiscal transfer? If we could get this information it would be useful to us in trying to make a proper assessment of the legislation.

Mr. Sharp: I understand that my colleague the Secretary of State is prepared to put her statement on the record now. It might help to answer some of these questions and so facilitate the work of the committee.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have this opportunity to associate myself with the Minister of Finance in introducing this resolution relating the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I should like to refer in particular to the measure which will be introduced under this resolution to provide for post-secondary education adjustment payments.

As indicated at the October federal-provincial conference, the federal government proposes to co-ordinate its general financial support of the two main sectors of post-secondary education—technical training and university education—under one program, and to make fiscal transfers to the provinces to assist them in meeting the fast rising costs of post-secondary education.

A word about the origin of these new proposals may be helpful to the committee.

Following publication of the Bladen report in 1965, the federal government acted immediately to increase the rate of the per capita university grants as an interim measure, pending a detailed review of policy and discussions with the provinces. The grants were increased for 1966-67 from $2 to $5 per capita, involving an increase in total allocations under the program from $40 million to $100 million.

The policy review subsequently undertaken was designed to take into account the fiscal needs of the provinces not only in relation to university financing, but the whole area of post-secondary education. Community college developments and the fast growth of technical training facilities called for such a comprehensive approach by the federal government, especially in view of the March 1967, termination date of those technical and vocational training agreements relating to training at the post-secondary level.

The government's desire in co-ordinating its future assistance to post-secondary education is to facilitate comprehensive planning on the part of the provinces, and of course to assist them financially in carrying their appropriate share of the extremely heavy cost burden created by the rapid expansion of all forms of post-secondary education.

The government proposes that the calculation of the amounts to be transferred be tied to the rising costs, so that its future contributions may be adequate and its future commitments known. In particular, the federal government proposes to transfer in total amounts the equivalent of whichever is greater in a given province: 50 per cent of its post-secondary operating costs, or $15 per head of population in 1967-68. These latter amounts will be increased in future years at the rate of increase in post-secondary education operating expenditures in all provinces in Canada.

The central concept in this plan is that the fiscal transfers will be calculated in relation to post-secondary operating expenditures only. The federal government considers this the only satisfactory measuring stick of rising education costs, and is prepared to increase its future transfers by the rate of increase in these costs. I must stress, however, that it is the province which determines upon the allocation of these funds, and it will have to do so in the light of both the operating and capital requirements of post-secondary institutions. The funds transferred are calculated in relation to operating expenditures, but are intended for use in both the operating and capital areas.

In addition to the percentage formula, the government is advancing an alternative formula for calculation—a per capita calculation—for the simple reason that in some provinces the expenditures on post-secondary education have not grown at the same rate, and if the 50 per cent formula were to be applied these provinces would lose substantially, compared with what they had previously been receiving. Additional help was provided to these provinces, then, through a per capita payment.

These points highlight the essentials of the proposal. Reference made in the resolution now before the committee to "adjustment payments" relates to one aspect of the total transfers under this plan.

The first transfers will be effected in three ways. First, the government is proposing to abate four personal income tax points and one corporate income tax point to allow provinces to secure additional revenues without a corresponding increase in the burden of taxation on provincial taxpayers. A bill to amend the Income Tax Act has just been passed by this house and will provide for these abatements.

Second, an increase in the equalization payment is proposed, as the Minister of Finance has just indicated. The increase will relate to the increases in provincial income tax revenue attributable to the tax abatement.

Third, a cash transfer termed the "post-secondary education adjustment payment" will be made to make up the difference between the value of the tax abatement and equalization transfers and the greater of, in each province, 50 per cent of operating expenditures, or $15 per capita.

In detailing how the adjustment payment is to be calculated and on what conditions it may be paid to the provinces it has been necessary, of course, to formulate certain definitions of what, for the purposes of the plan, constitutes post-secondary education and what may comprise admissible operating expenditures.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

Perhaps a few words on these two difficult questions may be helpful, Mr. Chairman.

In connection with the definition of post-secondary education, it was necessary to indicate the academic level in each province we shall take as marking the transition from secondary to post-secondary education. Our solution to this problem, which is made so difficult through the considerable variances in practice from one province to another, is to stipulate that post-secondary educational programs are those requiring for entrance at least the equivalent of the academic level of junior matriculation. This has been discussed with the provinces, and agreement has been reached on the equity of the proposal.

With regard to operating expenditure, perhaps I need only explain that we have made every effort to follow in our definition those terms of expenditures which are regarded as operating by educational institutions, and we have attempted to secure a definition which so far as possible takes account of practices current in institutions across the country. The guiding principle in drawing the necessary definitions was the need to propose arrangements that would be equitable among all provinces, and this, we feel, has been achieved.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure I need not impress on the house either the crucial importance of this matter to the future of our country or the very difficult and complex problems posed in trying to deal with it. Having regard to these various factors, the government believes firmly that the proposals I have outlined meet the situation in the fairest and fullest way possible.

May I in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Douglas: Do I take it the minister has concluded her remarks? Or does she intend to continue tomorrow?

Miss LaMarsh: I was concluding, unless there is something I think of overnight.

Mr. Douglas: I wanted to ask the minister whether we could have some comparative figures, in the form of a table if possible, setting out a comparison of the revenues paid to provinces under the present plan, $5 per head of the population, and the payments which will be made under the new proposal of tax abatement in each province, in lieu of the adjustment grant.

• (10:00 p.m.)

There is also the question I asked of the Minister of Finance a few moments ago. Has she some figures as to the basis on which the government is estimating the operating costs of the post-secondary educational institutions by provinces?

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Starr: Ten o'clock was called.

Progress reported.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—SMOKING—REPORTED C.B.C. STATEMENT BY STANLEY BURKE

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, one night last week at the finish of the C.B.C. national news Mr. Stanley Burke made this announcement:

> The average Canadian smoked 14 cigarettes today; 32 died from respiratory diseases.

The inference was that these people who died from respiratory diseases died because they smoked cigarettes. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, all news services in this country are supposed to promote factual news only and not unfounded insinuations.

Talking about unfounded insinuations brings to my mind a previous case in connection with the C.B.C. when it carried the program "This Hour Has Seven Days". The information given on that occasion was not only misleading and insinuating but was absolutely 100 per cent false. It was about the Italian government prohibiting the television advertising of foreign cigarettes. They did not do this because of the health aspect of it, or anything like that. The Italian government controls the tobacco industry in that country. Foreign cigarettes were beginning to have an influence on their tobacco industry. So, for three years, the televising of foreign cigarette advertising was prohibited. The information given over the C.B.C. on the program "This Hour Has Seven Days" was difficult to believe. They stated that cigarette smoking had dropped 30 per cent. Nothing could be further from the truth. The actual fact is that over this three-year period from 1961 to 1964 the consumption did not decrease but actually increased 13 per cent. This is up to date information I have been able to obtain from the foreign agricultural service of the United States Department of Agriculture.

In all fairness to the industry and to individual companies, I should like to say that if such innuendoes and suggestions are to be made on the national news, or any other program in our national broadcasting system, then this cannot help but affect not only the companies and the industry but also individuals as well.

I should like to remind hon. members that this same industry gave to the government this year in taxes $495 million, practically half a billion dollars. I feel very strongly that it is time that such innuendoes and statements should not be allowed on any C.B.C. program, let alone on the national news. Believe me, it is absolutely degrading to hear such innuendoes on our national news program. I cannot help repeating that it is on our national news program that we hear this and it certainly brings the C.B.C. down to a low level.

I was greatly surprised and, if I may say so, disappointed that a person of Mr. Burke's standing would allow such poppycock to be part of his national news programming. In all fairness to Mr. Burke I should say that I now understand he just reads the news. Perhaps that is the reason why, when he came to this quotation which he read over the national news, I noticed that his eye moved a little. Perhaps he was as surprised as some of the rest of us. I only hope that is a fact.

Before I conclude, I should like to say that at the present time the C.B.C. is like a ship without a rudder. We need some factual, solid businessman to run the C.B.C., not someone who is interested in shows or anything else. We did have the possibility of securing a terrific man. Whether or not he would have been foolish enought to accept the job, I do not know, but we lost that good man to private business. I am referring to Mr. Donald Gordon—the type of man the C.B.C. needs. He would lay down the law. We need a businessman and a factual man.

In completing my remarks I just wish to say that no one blames the Secretary of State for these things. It is only through that department, under her jurisdiction, that we as backbenchers can bring these matters to the attention of the C.B.C. I hope the minister is sincere enough to make a special effort to see that this does not happen again. If it does happen again, I can assure hon. members of this house that Jack Roxburgh will be up on his feet every day in this house, protesting.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern and feelings of the hon. member for Norfolk. The last sentence spoken by Stanley Burke on the television newscast on Wednesday, February 22, 1967, was a little bit confusing. According to the information I have Mr. Burke's actual words were: "and finally the average Canadian smoker had 14 cigarettes today and across the nation 32 people died of respiratory diseases."

The figures in respect of deaths were taken from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the year ending December 31, 1965. The statistics relating to the average cigarette smoker were also taken from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics information respecting the estimated number of smokers. The breakdown is 26 deaths from respiratory diseases and six from cancer in relation to respiratory diseases. However, deaths from respiratory diseases are not necessarily related to the smoking of tobacco. However, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, the remarks televised by the C.B.C. gave that indication.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—NATO—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN CANADIAN MILITARY CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the United Kingdom white paper, which is more officially known as the statement on defence estimates, 1967, was issued recently and contained at page 5, paragraph 18, the following statement:

> The government hopes—

That is the United Kingdom government.

> The government hopes, that by the end of June, 1967, allied discussions on the revision of NATO strategy will have produced broad agreement on the size, composition, deployment and military role of the forces required and on a fairer sharing of the economic burdens they impose.

[Mr. Roxburgh.]

This statement has very important implications for the whole of Canadian defence and international policy. On Wednesday last I addressed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of National Defence as to whether the government of Canada had made any proposals to the other NATO governments with regard to the size, composition and military role of the Canadian contribution to NATO forces in the future.

Members of the house will know that Canadian defence efforts at the present time, and for a good many years past, have been concentrated on certain roles in NATO and NORAD. We are maintaining as a brigade group in Germany an air division, and the major task of our navy is an anti-submarine role in NATO. The brigade group and the air division are a relatively small but doubtless efficient contribution to the current NATO strategy of reliance on a massive tactical nuclear response to any active aggression in central Europe.

On January 13, 1963 the Prime Minister, in a famous speech at Scarborough, before his administration was elected to office and when he was leader of the opposition, said the following:

> The government should re-examine at once the whole basis of Canadian defence policy. In particular it should discuss with the United States and with NATO a role for Canada in continental and collective defence which would be more realistic and effective than the present one. Our financial resources are limited. Therefore we should be careful to see that our defence dollars are spent sensibly and economically avoiding commitments which require expensive equipment that is or soon will be obsolete, and the activities that are or soon will be meaningless.

Notwithstanding these words, more than four years later with the Liberal administration headed by the present Prime Minister in office for nearly all of these four years, there has been no change in the role. Despite diligent inquiry it has been impossible to discover whether the government has made any suggestions whatsoever as to a change in the role. Indeed if anything has emerged from the mist of obscurity in which these vital matters are generally enshrouded in this country, it would seem to have been Canadian policy to hold fast to the continuation of precisely these same roles. This indeed has been indicated by the famous defence white paper of 1964 which seems to be the sheet anchor of government defence policy. The policy was reiterated recently by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) as the basis for his whole unification solution.

Nevertheless the whole military and political picture has changed in Europe. The roles now carried out by the Canadian forces are obviously obsolete. The British white paper reveals that in a few short months, indeed by the end of June, allied discussion on the revision of NATO strategy will have produced broad agreement on the size, composition and military roles of various nations. The British white paper clearly discussed the rationality of any threat of aggression in Europe and opted for a reduction in the forces of NATO to promote the detente in Europe.

We in this house and the Canadian public are entitled to know if the Canadian government has made any suggestions for a change or a reduction of its military role in NATO. What is the revised NATO strategy? Is it our policy to stick indefinitely to a policy and strategy which are now outworn? Does the government propose or does it not propose any changes? I seek a clear and definitive statement on the crucial issues that have apparently now been discussed by our allies, and I presume, by ourselves. Unless we are playing a role of passive acquiescence in decisions in which we have played no part, our whole discussion in the house on the issue of unification is quite meaningless if we are to be kept in the dark as to the crucial background to the whole problem of our defence, and our role in defence.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I point out, in response to the hon. member, that he has in effect answered his own question. He asked for a clear statement as to our future role and at the same time acknowledged that the NATO allies are in the middle of a discussion of that very question.

As he has pointed out, the passage in the U.K. white paper which he quoted indicates that the NATO countries are in the midst of a major review of the evolving nature of any threat to their security, the appropriate strategy in changing international conditions, and the appropriate force levels to carry out the strategy. The Canadian government has been participating actively in this review. When the review has been completed we shall be in a better position to consider whether changes in our contribution are warranted. A statement on this should at least await the conclusion of the review.

• (10:20 p.m.)

The nature of the future Canadian military commitment to NATO defence will also have to take into account the relevance of that commitment to collective defence and to the major political objectives of a peaceful settlement in Europe. Along with our allies we are watching carefully to see whether there are any prospects for achieving mutual reductions of forces of NATO and Warsaw pact countries. This is an approach which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) advocated before the NATO council last December.

HARBOURS—MONTREAL—STEPS TO DEAL WITH ALLEGED VANDALISM AND THEFT

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), I asked the Member of the Administration (Mr. Turner) the following question: "In view of the thefts and pilfering regularly occurring in the port of Montreal lately, is the minister in a position to check such depredations and damages, so as to ensure the success of Expo and avoid harming the international repute of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, my question is based more particularly on a report published in La Presse, of Montreal, on February 28 and entitled:

An importer has had enough of piracy and will no longer use the harbour of Montreal.

And the article began with these words:

At least one importing company has had enough of the piracy occurring in the port of Montreal and has made known his decision to henceforth use Canadian ports other than that of the metropolis.

And the article continues:

The manager, Mr. Georges Dupuis, wants to alert public opinion as concerns the plague affecting the port of Montreal.

He advised the mayor of Montreal, Mr. Jean Drapeau, in writing of the disastrous situation in which the shipping trade finds itself in Montreal. He also stated his grievances to the harbourmaster, Mr. Guy Beaudet, and he finally sent letters to the press.

The article goes on to say:

—goods, in this case, electric tools, are stolen from this firm every time shipments are sent by boat. Since those losses drain the profits, the firm now must have its shipments delivered through other Canadian ports and has instructed its suppliers in 80 different countries to forward the goods in the future via Toronto or Halifax, if not by air.

These are serious facts, Mr. Speaker, very serious protests indeed, indicating that an alarming situation exists. This is not the first time such complaints are voiced with respect to Montreal and other harbours. In view of the fact that these misdeeds are widespread and have been occurring more frequently, I suggest that the Department of Transport should investigate immediately.

This is the eve of World Fair celebrations, and a very great number of visitors to Expo will be entering Montreal harbour. A great many business concerns, not only Montreal firms but also those in the eastern townships and Sherbrooke, as well as in the immediate area, use Montreal harbour. Members of the Association du camionnage de l'Estrie told me recently that they had gone to Montreal harbour to pick up goods and found, when the got there, that they had been stolen, crates had been opened and others damaged. This had happened more than once.

I feel this is prejudicial to trade and could have an adverse effect on our international repute, in view of the World Fair held in Montreal. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to point out very briefly to the hon. minister that the central government should take immediate action; this is important. In spite of the request of many hon. members during the present session, the government has either procrastinated or refused to appoint a royal commission of inquiry on organized crime. We know that several countries have launched such national investigations on organized crime and especially in the United States and in Italy, it has been discovered that the source of gangsterism could be found in the ports of those countries. In fact, it is through seaports that smuggling is done and this is why those networks of gangsters have connections and facilities there, either by bribing the port guards or by using any other methods liable to encourage such pilfering and misdeeds.

This is the reason why I would greatly appreciate it if the minister, by using his great persuasiveness, could convince his colleagues in the cabinet to consider seriously the possibility of establishing a royal commission to inquire into organized crime, which commission would also include investigations on seaports and also on fraudulent bankruptcies which continue to occur in Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, if we say that to govern is to anticipate, then to manage is to act. This government cannot afford to stand by and witness such crimes and damages, and remain unmoved in holy meditation. Indeed not. We must act, and if to govern is to anticipate, I submit that unless the present government undertakes such inquiries immediately we may well have to face, in a matter of weeks or in a few months, calamities which could be without remedy.

For this reason, I am relying upon the initiative and good faith of the minister in urging him to take immediate steps with respect to this matter.

• (10:30 p.m.)

Hon. John N. Turner (Member of the Administration): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) who raised a very important matter so far as the Montreal harbour and all other Canadian harbours are concerned. First of all, I must thank him for giving me notice of it this afternoon. However, in view of the ruling of the Chair, I had to wait until tonight to answer him, although I was ready to do so this afternoon.

The question gives me the opportunity to make a few comments on pilfering. That problem exists in all large harbours throughout the world, and not only in Canada, where a large volume of freight is handled I wish to point out to the hon. member that this situation is not peculiar to the Montreal harbour and I think he will readily agree.

The National Harbours Board is very conscious of the need to take the necessary steps to limit the pilfering going on in the Montreal harbour. Some of them, such as vehicle checks, are already in force and others will soon be spelled out. The closing of certain port entrances, the revision of procedure and documents with respect to the shipping of merchandise and, finally, an improved cargo guard service are planned.

I can assure the hon. member that the National Harbours Board is keeping a close watch on this matter and that the board will take all appropriate measures within the limits of its powers to eliminate as much of the pilfering as it possibly can.

Of course, the city of Montreal must share this responsibility with the National Harbours Board. I must say that, in certain cases, shippers believe that thefts occur at Montreal. But after all, a ship arriving in Montreal has been in many other parts of the world; so the thefts might have occurred elsewhere. When a ship leaves Hamburg with stopovers in Le Havre or London or elsewhere before reaching Montreal, it is difficult to pinpoint where the theft occurred. I must frankly say that information in such cases is not very reliable. As a Montreal citizen, I object to the Montreal dockworkers always getting the blame, since they are not the only ones who could have committed these thefts.

In fact, many vehicles driven by tourists, truckers, in short by several categories of persons have access to the port; therefore, it is very difficult to determine who is responsible. But the National Harbours Board is very conscious of the problem, and I can assure the hon. member that a comparison of figures on a tonnage basis, between the port of Montreal and other ports in Canada, in North America and elsewhere in the world, will show that Montreal's record is not that bad.

Anyway, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, we are going to make sure that all possible measures are taken to control, to try and fight this problem which costs millions of dollars to shippers and to Montreal merchants.

The question raised tonight by the hon. member will be brought to the attention of the proper authorities, in order to arouse public opinion in this connection.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 3, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCHILL—CONDUCT OF CHAIRMAN OF DEFENCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege which affects the rights and privileges of every member of the House of Commons, and particularly affects the conduct of standing and special committees of the house. The normal procedure with regard to these committees, according to my understanding, is that they are masters of their own arrangements concerning the number of meetings and the times at which these meetings may be held. Normally these arrangements are arrived at by unanimous consent or by consultation in the steering committee and, infrequently, by a motion which is debated and settled by the committee as a whole. The latter method is rarely used.

The chairman of a standing or special committee, according to my understanding, has no rights or authority greater than those enjoyed by the chairman of the committee of the whole house, and certainly not equal to those of Mr. Speaker. My understanding has always been that committees are conducted according to the rules of the House of Commons as they are applicable; that the rules of debate apply in committees as they do in the house, as do similarly the rules pertaining to motions and amendments.

I am drawing your attention, sir—and I think we will have to get this settled—to what I term absolutely autocratic action on the part of the chairman of the defence committee this morning at eleven o'clock. At eleven o'clock this morning the chairman made this statement which I copied down, and which I reaffirm because he repeated it. His statement was "We will meet this afternoon at 3.30".

We received notice of a meeting of the committee for 9.30 this morning which we observed, and that meeting was held. We received no notice of a meeting at 3.30 this afternoon. In the committee at eleven o'clock no motion that we should meet this afternoon at 3.30 was put forward or received.

Mr. Harkness: At two o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: Was it at two o'clock?

Mr. Starr: That is even worse.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, it is even worse. I will change that statement to read two o'clock instead of 3.30, which is an even more arbitrary decision than I imagined it to be. As I say, no motion came before the committee and there was no opportunity for discussion. I simply raised this point with the chairman and I jotted down his words and asked whether he was arbitrarily making that ruling.

If this is permitted to become an established practice, Mr. Speaker, every committee chairman will set himself up with greater authority than you yourself enjoy—because you operate within the rules—and will determine on his own authority and at his own wish when, and I suppose where, meetings may be held. There is nothing to prevent the autocratic chairman of the defence committee from calling a meeting for tomorrow, or for Sunday, or for tonight, or for 3 a.m. tomorrow morning. This is how far the matter has gone. Unless some restraint can be placed upon this committee chairman—and I hope this restraint will then be observed and followed by other committee chairmen—we as members of this house will have our rights and privileges taken away from us. It is a shocking state of affairs, sir, that a standing committee of the House of Commons should be conducted in this arbitrary fashion, as a result of which hon. members are prevented from carrying out their duties effectively.

There is no excuse for this type of arbitrary action, sir, because this committee has been meeting every day of each week now for four weeks, sometimes twice a day and sometimes three times a day, for a total of 39 meetings. It is doing effective work of the greatest national importance. Yet here are its members being subjected to arbitrary action, sir, action which you yourself would never countenance and have never attempted to take in the House of Commons, because you operate within the rules.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the committee chairmen must operate by the rules of this house and must act in accordance with the example that is set by the Speaker himself and by the chairman of the committee of the whole house, not in this arbitrary fashion which makes the rest of us just slaves at the beck and call of a temporary chairman of a committee who has no particular standing in the House of Commons.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, may I just say a few words on the point raised by the hon. member. I do not base my remarks upon the fact that I am a member of the defence committee, because I am not a member of that committee.

I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to the attention of the house, and it is my understanding of procedures in the house and procedures in committees, that questions of order in committee must be settled in committee and cannot be appealed to Mr. Speaker. I have not had a chance to look at the precedents set forth in Beauchesne, but the question of such a decision being appealed to the Speaker arose on at least one occasion during the time the hon. gentleman and his colleagues occupied the government side of the house.

I suggest this is not a matter to be dealt with at this time in the House of Commons. It should be settled within the committee according to the usual and accustomed practices.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I am not a member of the defence committee—

An hon. Member: Keep quiet, then.

Mr. Howard: I shall refrain from commenting on that blurb from somebody I shall politely call an hon. member. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of that committee but I know something about the conduct of the hon. gentleman chairing that committee at the moment. We must look at the whole matter in that light when considering whether there is a question of privilege.

The hon. gentleman chairing the committee in question is also chairman of the fisheries committee, of which I am a member. The fisheries committee met on a number of occasions during this session, considering the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. While it is true that the chairman of that fisheries committee, acting as chairman probably are wont to act, attempted on a number of occasions to speed the committee's consideration of the fisheries estimates, he did not have his full sway with the committee in its activities.

I am not detracting from the hon. gentleman; I am merely saying he acted as chairmen of committees should act, to get the committee business proceeded with as quickly as possible. It seems to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who has raised this matter of privilege, when this particular declaration was made by the chairman in the defence committee ought to have moved an appropriate motion to do something—

Mr. Churchill: It was eleven o'clock. The bells were ringing.

Mr. Howard: The bells were ringing, but I wish the hon. gentleman would let me finish. I did not interrupt him, and neither did anybody else. Everybody listened with great interest to what he had to say. As I was saying, had he been on his toes there was nothing to stop him from trying to obtain the floor to move that the committee meet at a particular time.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, I had no opportunity to get the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: The hon. gentleman from Winnipeg Centre—

An hon. Member: Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Howard: Every time I listen to the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg South Centre raise one of his spurious points in this house I must restrain myself so much that I forget the geographical location of his constituency. We had dealings with him in the past when he was government house leader, when he fumbled everything that came within his grasp.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly limit his remarks to the question now before the house.

Mr. Howard: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you recognized from the outset that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had no question of privilege, and I am sure it will only be a matter of time until Your Honour so advises him.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Essex West would search in vain through the precedents and rulings in Beauchesne to settle the question that has been raised with respect to the ruling of a chairman in a committee. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I expect that the committee dealing with procedure will soon draw to your attention that there is a deficiency in the citations dealing with this subject. That deficiency came to light, I believe, when the rules were studied a few months ago. It is provided in the provisional standing orders accepted for the session that there shall be an appeal from the chairman's ruling in committee, and that the matter shall be settled by the committee. That is the way this matter ought to be settled.

Mr. Terence Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Speaking to this point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to clarify the picture for the hon. member for Skeena. I am surprised that he should make so free with something he knows nothing about. The incident in question occurred at eleven o'clock when the chairman made his ruling, gave his order and adjourned the meeting. There was no opportunity at all to speak to the matter, and because he adjourned the meeting summarily we had no chance to complain about the action of the Chair.

I should like to say further that it had been understood in the committee—I am not sure I can go as far as to say it had been agreed —that we would not meet Friday afternoon. I think this is borne out by the notice of meetings, on which only one meeting at 9.30 this morning appeared. These notices generally cover the meetings for the day. So I think I am supported in my contention that the understanding was that we would not meet on Friday afternoon.

The position is, then, that the chairman himself made a declaration as to what the committee would do and when it would meet, though the custom is that as a rule these matters are decided by agreement; if there is no agreement a motion is made and a vote is taken. We try to avoid votes; in my mind there is not much doubt that general agreement usually is reached.

This question of privilege is by way of an appeal from the ruling of the chairman of a committee. The new rules provide for appeals to the Speaker from rulings made by the chairman of the committee of the whole house. I do not think there has yet been an occasion under our new rules when anyone has asked Your Honour to hear an appeal against a ruling made by the chairman of a committee. I am not sure that our new provisional rules are clear enough in this respect to give the Chair any clear guidance; I do not believe there is any precedent either for or against my suggestion that Your Honour has authority to hear an appeal of this kind, though it is a fact that in general the rules governing the committee of the whole house apply to the proceedings of committees of the house. It is true that each committee has the right to conduct its own business, but this is subject to the general rules governing committees; and except where special provision is made the same general rules govern committees as govern the committee of the whole.

Therefore, since a ruling by the chairman of the committee of the whole house is subject to appeal to the Speaker, I submit that the same applies to a ruling made by the chairman of a committee and that we have the right to ask Your Honour to hear such an appeal. In doing so I ask Your Honour to bear in mind that this decision was taken arbitrarily, and that there was no opportunity to discuss it. The chairman adjourned the meeting immediately so that no dissenting voice should be heard.

In these circumstances I believe Your Honour should go out of your way, if necessary, to so interpret our rules that justice will be done and that the proceedings of our committees will not only be properly conducted but that the appearance that we can act as honourable gentlemen in the proper conduct of our affairs may be maintained. I submit this can best be done by Your Honour making the ruling which I have suggested.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It seems to me that the question raised by hon. gentlemen opposite is not in order. Our rules on this point are quite clear. Perhaps I may be allowed to quote from our standing orders, which seem to me to deal very definitely with the point referred to by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Standing order 68-A reads:

> In any standing or special committee of the house questions of order shall be decided by the chairman, subject only to an appeal to the committee.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): On this point, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has so forcefully pointed out the rule under which he says the subject matter which has been brought up is completely out of order, I would like to express my surprise that he has entered into this question; because it is quite evident that by its actions, including those of the chairman, today and for the past few days the defence committee has been endeavouring to curtail debate—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Starr: We have been endeavouring to bring forward witnesses who have expressed their desire to appear before the committee in order to give the committee the fullest detail. The attempt to block them is exactly opposite to what the Prime Minister said before the committee was set up. He said that every opportunity would be given to every witness who had anything to add or any information to give. It is surprising that the Prime Minister now gets up and takes the side of the chairman of that committee and of the members of the Liberal party in trying to curtail the defence committee's discussions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, not being a lawyer I am not going to get into a debate on the legality of this point, but I suggest that both the Prime Minister and you, sir, have a greater responsibility than the legality of the point we are discussing. What has happened this morning is just a means whereby the committee system may be made useless.

The principle of democracy, whereby a minority group can be and should be heard, applies foremost in this house, and I am surprised that the Prime Minister should get up and say that he is going to abide by and support the ruling of the committee chairman. If the Prime Minister does not believe in the principle of democracy—

Mr. Pearson: I believe in the rules.

Mr. McIntosh: —then all I can say—

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that we allow the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek to complete his remarks and then I will recognize the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker. I was rising on a point of order—

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know the minister is anxious to bring the rules and precedents to my attention, but I think it would be much more conducive to reaching a decision on this matter if we proceeded in an orderly fashion. If I were given an opportunity to hear the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek then I would be glad to recognize the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if he would be patient just one moment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. McIntosh: I still say—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The minister insists on his right to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be most anxious to comply with your request but in view of the statement by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Starr), and the argument now being made, I wish to point out that the only issue before Your Honour at the present time is whether this house can discuss this matter at this time, and that was the only point made by the Prime Minister. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: Why not leave it up to the Speaker?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that you now have the responsibility of deciding whether the rule as stated by the Prime Minister is the one which covers the situation—

Mr. Starr: Don't try to force the Speaker to make up his mind—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and if it does there is no use making abusive remarks to the Prime Minister, who is simply, by reason of his office as leader of the house called upon to point out what are the rules.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I was not proposing to engage in an argument. I was only putting forward a point of view. Whether or not it is the rules that are concerned, the principle of democracy applies and I think this is the place where minority groups in Canada can have a voice. The question is whether that principle continues down into the committees, and I am very surprised that the Prime Minister will not get up and support my contention that the principle of democracy applies—

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. McIntosh: —starting in this house, and that it should end here in this house. A rule has been made where by temporarily—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the point made by the hon. member and I shall certainly bear it in mind when the time comes to reach a decision, but perhaps we should try to move on. I will now recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I was beginning to wonder who had been recognized. There is more talking from the Liberal side of the house than from the one who has been given your recognition.

Since what happened in the committee and what has developed here in the house as a result of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, we have heard the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) stand up in defence of the chairman concerning the conditions which prevailed in the committee this morning. I should think the only people who would be in a position to comment on the developments in the committee are those who witnessed what happened there this morning. What happened in the committee I believe is something that neither the Secretary of State for External Affairs nor the Prime Minister would condone.

I might comment on what the chairman of the committee himself said as to his duties as chairman. He referred to the difficulty experienced by chairmen in other committees. He mentioned the fact that some members who chair committees of this house, because they are attending their first parliament and have inadequate knowledge of the rules and procedures as well as inadequate experience, are running into considerable difficulty. In reflecting upon these other chairmen it would be fair to say that possibly he had in mind the chairman of the fisheries committee.

What happened this morning at what we might call the eleventh hour was that a member tried to put a motion to the chair in respect of meeting this afternoon. In all fairness to the chairman—and he can contradict this statement or accept it, but this is the understanding I have—I think he had some doubt in his mind as to whether there was a motion before the committee to meet this afternoon. While members on both sides of the committee were speaking—and there is no doubt that sides have been established in the committee, one against the other—and while he was trying to make up his mind as to whether there was a motion before the committee, the house bells were ringing. At that point the chairman raised his gavel and indicated to the committee that there would be a further meeting this afternoon at two o'clock and thereby cut off any further discussion in respect of any of the rules of the house which are applicable to committees.

When the hon. member for Essex West and the hon. member for Skeena indicate that under the rules the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had an opportunity to discuss this matter, this is not the case. There was absolutely no opportunity to discuss the rules or anything else. The fact that the chairman raised his gavel, adjourned the meeting, said that we would meet at two o'clock, and then rose from his position as chairman without further ado should be a clear indication that there was no opportunity in committee to discuss the matter of the meeting this afternoon. Therefore the appeal on the question of privilege has been brought to your attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice there are four more members who wish to take part in this debate. I will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) or any other member who wishes to take part in the discussion of the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but I am wondering whether this is the consensus of the house. In any event, for the moment I will call on the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the standing committee on national defence now has before it Bill No. C-243, and today's meeting was the 39th meeting of that committee. We have heard some 25 to 30 witnesses. At the meeting of the steering committee the question arose as to how we should now proceed and whether we should begin the clause by clause consideration of the bill.

Yesterday after the presentation of that report a motion was made, which this morning I ruled out of order on the ground that it was made while another topic was being discussed. Then a further motion was moved this morning that we adopt the report of the steering committee, the effect of which would be that we would proceed on Monday to the orderly discussion of the bill clause by clause. Thereupon a debate arose on the motion which did not conclude until about three minutes to eleven this morning, before the bells rang. I then noted that we would have to consider the balance of the list of hon. members who wished to speak on this matter, and that we should meet this afternoon for that purpose. There was some discussion on that, the bells of the house began to ring and, as the hon. member has suggested, at this moment I said we should meet this afternoon at two o'clock. There was some dissent and I asked for a show of hands—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deachman: —concerning whether we would be prepared to meet this afternoon. A majority agreed to meet this afternoon, and then we rose.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): An absolute falsehood.

Mr. Deachman: We rose then and prepared to meet this afternoon at two o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deachman: I am as willing to admit, as are some hon. members opposite who were in the room this morning, that there was some confusion about whether a motion had been put. I certainly am right, however, in saying that I suggested we meet at two o'clock, following which there was some dissension in respect of the idea of meeting at two o'clock, and then I pleaded with the committee to meet this afternoon in order to further the business of the committee. Finally, as the bells were ringing, I asked whether members were willing to meet this afternoon and hands were raised indicating willingness to meet this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deachman: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I called the meeting for two o'clock this afternoon and, unless you rule against me, we will meet again this afternoon and proceed with our study of the bill.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is a shameful misstatement of the facts to say there was a vote called in the committee. That is not true.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

[Mr. Deachman.]

Mr. Churchill: Is this a dictatorship?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee on national defence, but unfortunately I was not able to be there this morning and did not hear what took place. It seems to me, however, that it would be most unfortunate if we should have a good deal of bickering and hardening of positions in respect of this matter. I think it would be a mistake for the committee to attempt to meet this afternoon if a substantial number of members feel they did not have adequate notice or believe there has been some misunderstanding concerning whether we would meet this afternoon. It seems to me that nothing is to be gained by shouting, bickering, standing up and filibustering on the one hand, or by closure on the other hand.

I suggest that the steering committee should meet again and plan how we should conclude the study of this very important matter. I regret that we are spending all this time here. I suggest the chairman should reconsider with the steering committee the question of postponing the meeting this afternoon and make other arrangements.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; I do not think—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has given his version and another hon. member has given his version. I doubt that much can be gained by arguing who is right or wrong. The hon. member has already spoken on the question of privilege.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. It is my feeling that the version I gave is so different from that of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that I am almost being accused of misleading the house. Let me say here and now that if the hon. member says there was a call for a vote I never heard it. If he asked for a show of hands I never heard that, and if he says there was a show of hands I never saw one. Let me assert that my version is accurate. If I am correct there was no motion, and if there was no motion there could be no call for a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not disagree with the interpretation of facts by the hon. member. Certainly I think we would be making a terrible mistake, and perhaps we have already gone too far, in discussing the proceedings of this committee. Although the matter is serious I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I say that we would be getting into difficulty were hon. members of the committee to come to the house to try to settle matters arising in the committee.

I am not trying to belittle the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre or the seriousness or grievousness of the situation suggested by the hon. member for Halifax, but I do suggest to hon. members that perhaps we should not allow this discussion to continue. The Chair should be given the opportunity at this point to express an opinion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: However, I am the servant of this house and if hon. members wish to continue this discussion I shall hear them.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be very brief. I should like to refer to citation 288 at page 237 of Beauchesne which states:

> Committees are regarded as portions of the house and are governed for the most part in their proceedings by the same rules which prevail in the house.
> Every question is determined in a committee in the same manner as in the house to which it belongs.

Later it states:

> —whereupon the chairman must suspend the proceedings until a quorum be present or adjourn the committee to some future day.

This indicates to me that there should be at least one day when the chairman is making his decision regarding the sitting of the particular committee. Surely members of the House of Commons are entitled to that day's notice in respect of a committee meeting, even if we should agree that the chairman had the power to do what he has done, as I doubt very much.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief and I should like to relate them to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. It is my belief that some type of a ruling or decision by Your Honour is necessary because of the tenor of events in the defence committee in the past two days.

Part of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre appears to relate to threats and arguments in the committee about arrangements or deals made by the committee. This is quite contrary to the rules. To add to the confusion, the chairman in only slightly veiled terms made it quite clear to the members of the committee that it requires only 9 to make a quorum.

In support of my suggestion as to the need for some meaningful decision by Your Honour let me make two points. The question of privilege in the final analysis must result in a ruling on what may be a point of order, but in no way does this mitigate the seriousness or grievousness of the situation which now exists in the defence committee.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could say two or three words about this matter. I attended the committee meeting this morning, and my recollection of the events is the same as that outlined by the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), and Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent). I do not intend to go into what actually happened but I should like to say the hon. member for Greenwood spoke very good sense when he said he could not see any real purpose in the committee reconvening this afternoon at two o'clock. In view of the general feeling and tenor of the committee this morning and at the time we adjourned, nothing useful could be accomplished by meeting again this afternoon. I am sure the result of such a meeting would be a further series of rows.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Cape Breton South rising on a point of order? He has already taken part in this debate.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I am rising on a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We can have only one question of privilege before the house at a time.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): This is a personal question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Whether the hon. member's question is personal or impersonal, there can be but one question of privilege before the house at any one time accordink to our rules. I suggest to the hon. member that he may wish to rise on a point of order.

Conduct of Chairman of Defence Committee

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am rising on a point of order. I should like to ask for some clarification or ruling in relation to the statement I made regarding what happened in the committee this morning. Having regard to the remark by the chairman of that committee to the effect that a show of hands was called, when you review what has been stated by myself and by the chairman the implication is that I lied.

If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, I would call as my only witness the Minister of National Defence, who was present, and ask him whether he supports what the chairman has said, that a show of hands was called, or that what I have said is the basic truth.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is restating substantially the same things already said. There is obviously a disagreement of opinion as to what transpired. I am sure all hon. members have stated the facts to the best of their recollection, but essentially the situation is not changed whether it developed in one way or the other. Do hon. members not think we have considered this matter sufficiently? We have heard a question of privilege and various points of order. We have spent about 50 minutes of the time of this house on the matter. I suggest that hon. members now would want me as their servant to make a decision at this time.

Generally speaking hon. members know that by virtue of citation 324 (1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition it is irregular to refer to the proceedings or the evidence taken in a committee while that committee is sitting. This is a basic principle and it is only in extreme circumstances that the House of Commons takes it upon itself to refer to the proceedings of a committee.

A question of privilege has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. It was not followed by a motion so that it would seem to me that at this point I could say there is no motion and therefore no question of privilege. However, I do consider the question raised by the hon. member to be a point of order and I will look at the situation in that light.

The hon. members for Vancouver Quadra and Edmonton-Strathcona, and I believe the hon. members for Rosthern and Halifax, suggested that this matter should be considered as an appeal from the chairman's ruling to the Chair. It might be possible to do that if there were not specific rules in our rule book providing for a situation such as this. The rule referred to by the right hon. Prime Minister, namely 68-A, is the one to which my attention has been drawn by my advisers. It states:

> In any standing or special committee of the house questions of order shall be decided by the chairman, subject only to an appeal to the committee.

• (11:50 a.m.)

I may say that as there is no opportunity for an appeal, what can the Speaker of the house do about this situation? Not very much, I suggest. I realize it may very well be that the procedure followed was not the correct one but in view of the standing order to which I have referred I do not think it is possible for the Chair to accept an appeal from that procedure. I may say for the guidance of the committee, if it should meet again, that citation 303(3) of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

> Committees should be regularly adjourned from day to day, though the chairman is frequently allowed to arrange the day and hour of sitting, but this can be done only with the general consent of the committee.

I agree fully that this citation should apply to the committee. Whether or not it was applied it is difficult for me to determine. I have listened to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and by other hon. members, and I do not disagree with their interpretation of what actually took place. It might well be that the procedure followed in the committee was not exactly in accordance with our practice, but the remedy must be found in the committee and not in the house and I must so rule.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGES IN MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the house of changes the government proposes to make, to become effective on April 1, to strengthen the manpower mobility program.

It will be recalled that this program was introduced late in 1965. A worker who has been unemployed for four months may qualify for a grant to help him to move with his family to another area where there is a job for him. A worker who has been unemployed for less than four months may obtain a loan for the same purpose.

Parliament in this fiscal year provided $3,500,000 for grants, and a revolving fund of $5 million was established for the loans. In the first 12 months, however, there were 1,207 grants and 982 loans amounting to a total combined value of approximately $1,185,000.

Clearly the program is not providing as much help as was intended. The reason is that we recognized from the beginning that it would be a difficult program to administer, and that therefore we should start cautiously, broadening the program as we gain experience. I took one step in that direction last April by providing that people living in an area where a shut-down or a lay-off removed a major source of employment would be eligible for grants and not be subject to the previous requirement that they be unemployed for four months.

We are now ready to take a further major step. The following three changes are proposed. First, we will drop altogether the restrictive condition about four months' unemployment. That is to say, this will no longer be partially a loan program. Any man who is unemployed, or has been notified of his permanent lay-off, will be entitled to a grant if there is little prospect of suitable employment in his home community and there is a definite job for him to go to in another area.

Second, we propose to amend the grants to lessen what is often the main obstacle to moving, in that the man who owns his own home faces considerable expense and even loss in selling a house in an area where there is unemployment and has to obtain what is likely to be more expensive housing in another area. To offset this we will make a grant of $500 when the former home is sold or when a new one is purchased.

Third, we propose to make small grants to enable unemployed people to look for work in the nearest area where there are better opportunities than in their home district. This grant will cover the person's return travel expenses and, if he has dependants, a modest allowance to help support them while he is away. This allowance will be up to $20 a week for the first dependant, $30 a week for two dependants, and $40 a week for three or more. The allowance will be available for a maximum of four weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that these changes greatly improve our mobility program. They do not, however, make it complete. The people who most need help in relocation are not always unemployed but are people such as marginal farmers with very low incomes from their present occupations. We want to help these underemployed people but it will be appreciated that there are difficult problems of definition and administration. We therefore want our officers to gain experience with the broader grants for unemployed before making the further extension of coverage.

Accordingly, the government plans that, while the changes I have announced will take effect on April 1, further changes to cover underemployed people will be introduced with effect on September 1.

I would like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that we will implement this broadened program in a way that co-ordinates it with the industrial development activities of the provinces and of other governmental agencies. Generally speaking, we will be helping workers to move to the nearest community where there are jobs. It is not our intention to divert manpower from emerging employment in nearby areas or elsewhere in a province, but rather to make it possible for people to move to such employment and thus strengthen regional and provincial development programs.

There is one final point. This program now operates on the basis of regulations. That is appropriate to the developmental stage that it has been in and that will continue for some time yet. By the fall, however, I think we will have brought it to a form that can be regarded as fairly complete. The government's intention therefore is at that time to introduce legislation by which parliament would give the program a permanent basis.

[English]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the minister on trying to improve the experimental manpower mobility program which was originally introduced. It was quite evident at the beginning that this program contained too many restrictions so that people could only qualify for either a grant or a loan if they were unemployed for a certain period; I believe it was four months. The minister said several changes were proposed, one of them being that the restrictive condition requiring that a man be unemployed for four months will be dropped altogether and that any person who becomes unemployed or has been notified of his permanent lay-off will be entitled to a grant or a loan.

I notice that the word "loan" has been dropped in favour of the word "grant". In other words there will be an outright debt free grant given to these people. However, the minister does not specify that such grants will only be extended to people in dire financial need. If that is not so, then an unconditional grant will be available to anyone who is unemployed or who has been given notice of his permanent lay-off, regardless of his financial position.

The second change is that a grant of $500 will be given to people who have to sell a house and move to another area, thus incurring a financial loss. It seems to me that $500 would not be sufficient where a worker in a small municipality owns a house where the value is in the range of $5,000 or $6,000 and has to move to another area where the only housing available to him is in the range of $14,000. I think the minister should look at this aspect to ascertain whether some other plan could be put into effect which would be more helpful to people who have to move to areas where houses might be available but where this flat $500 grant would not be sufficient.

• (12 noon)

Under the third proposal the minister said travel expenses would be paid to areas where there may be better opportunities, and the dependants of the person concerned will receive allowances based on $20 for the first dependant, $30 for two dependants and $40 for three or more for a maximum of four weeks. I presume these payments will be made when a person is directed by the manpower service to a certain place and before that person has established a residence.

As I said at the beginning, these changes are welcome and I compliment the minister upon them. I hope they work to the benefit of those who find themselves without jobs. It is quite evident that more and more people are becoming unemployed, and of course this program becomes necessary for those who find themselves in that position. I should like the minister to take another look at the $500 grant to aid in the purchase of another home, to ascertain whether some other type of plan can be worked out.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we greet with approval the improvements in the manpower mobility program which the minister announced today. Having said that, however, I think it is necessary to point out to the minister and the government that over the past couple of years organizations such as the Canadian Labour Congress and its affiliated unions have been extremely critical of the inadequacies of the existing program as well as the projected programs. The announcements the minister makes today are welcome, but if we compare them with the need illustrated recently for facilities for the retraining of auto workers, the inadequacies are pointed up.

According to the minister, 5,700 auto workers are being laid off as a result of the auto pact, yet we do not have facilities for training more than a small percentage of these displaced workers. It is obvious, therefore, we have a long way to go before we could consider the manpower program of the government adequate. I join with the hon. member for Ontario in expressing concern over the $500 grant announced by the minister because it will prove inadequate, as have most of the steps the government has taken to date. This grant will be of small help to a worker who may be laid off in Oshawa or in Cape Breton, where the coal industry is in trouble, if he has to move to a city like Toronto in which the cost of housing is high. The $500 will be of little help in the purchase or rental of another house.

So, Mr. Speaker, while joining with the spokesman for the official opposition in welcoming these small changes, I suggest to the minister that he still has a long way to go before his department has established a policy which will meet the needs of Canadian workers who are being displaced at a rapid rate in this technological age.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope the minister has found some means of improving the mobility program. As I look over the statement he made today I find there are a number of weaknesses in it. I believe his statement that it will be difficult to administer this program is the understatement of the year. It would appear that the new program will make a great many people eligible for payments to cover some of the cost of moving, and with the transfers that are going on all over Canada a substantial administrative problem could arise. It seems to me if this interpretation can be placed on this mobility program it would be possible for people to be paid for their house, for example, upon moving into Calgary while other people are being paid who are moving out of Calgary. I believe, therefore, there needs to be some definition of the areas of job opportunities, areas in which there is an excess of workers in relation to job opportunities.

We go along with the minister's hope that he will be able to move workers into those parts of Canada in which there are job opportunities. Unless there is far more in the regulations under which this mobility program will be administered, I suggest to him that a large number of administrative problems will arise which do not seem to be met by the statement we have heard. We agree that one of the major problems concerns disposing of and acquiring new houses. This problem is particularly acute in areas in which there are job opportunities, because they are the same areas in which there is a shortage of housing at the moment.

While we wish the minister success in these amendments to the mobility program, there must be far more than has been indicated so far or I am sure the minister is going to be severely upset.

FARM MACHINERY

REPORT BY MINISTER ON DISCUSSIONS WITH MANUFACTURERS

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions recently hon. members have inquired about the discussions I have held with farm machinery companies concerning recently announced price increases.

During recent weeks I have met with representatives of the major manufacturers of farm machinery. At these meetings we discussed the question of price increases for farm machinery during 1967, and in particular increases while the work of the royal commission on farm machinery is under way, the lines of equipment which would be most affected and the reasons for any proposed increases. In these discussions I indicated my desire to keep any price increases to a minimum, particularly while the royal commission on farm machinery prices was deliberating.

Report of Discussions on Farm Machinery

I have been very much encouraged by the response from the farm machinery companies. Generally speaking I have obtained assurances that price increases to be effected in 1967 will not result in overall increases of more than 2 per cent to 3 per cent. On some individual items price increases may be somewhat higher, but for other items no price increases whatever are expected.

Part of the price increase in many cases is the result of product improvement. The effect of this on prices was estimated by various companies to be about a third to one half of the price increase. In certain cases the price increases are due to factors beyond the control of companies operating in Canada. Some companies import considerable quantities of their components from the United States and the United Kingdom. Price increases on components from these sources have been 3 per cent to 4 per cent. One company, for example, imports 90 per cent of its Canadian sales. The house will appreciate that in a case like this, price increases outside our borders have a direct bearing on the prices which such companies have to charge in Canada.

The companies in turn have pointed out to me the increased costs which they face in 1967 and which they are not in a position to absorb out of their earnings without affecting their ability to obtain new capital. Increased costs mentioned by the machinery companies were 3.5 per cent to 4.5 per cent on materials, 7 per cent on wages, higher borrowing rates and increased transportation charges of 10 per cent on materials. Materials represent a high proportion of the total cost of farm machinery, as much as 70 per cent being reported by one company.

I, of course, appreciate the grave difficulties of the farmer currently faced with a cost-price squeeze. We are extremely hopeful that some of the pressure of this squeeze will be relieved by an upward movement of the price factor, and particularly by the attainment of a more realistic level of world wheat prices under the new world cereals agreement now being negotiated in Geneva. I am also extremely hopeful that the royal commission on farm machinery prices will come to helpful conclusions on the difficult issue of rising farm machinery costs which have been of such great concern to our farmers.

In the meantime, in the light of generally rising costs and the considerably higher price increases, including those of wages, in other areas of our economy, it is my belief, following lengthy discussions with many farm machinery company officials, that this over-all—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am wondering whether this is an announcement of policy. If so, nothing has been said yet. All we have been listening to is propaganda, and I do not know whether this is the time for that sort of thing. If the minister has a matter of policy to announce then I wish he would get around to it instead of embarking upon a long preamble.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to what point of order the hon. gentleman is referring.

Mr. Starr: We want to know what you are trying to tell us.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's colleagues have been asking for a statement on the results of the discussions I have had in connection with the prices of farm machinery. I think if hon. members listen to the facts I am giving them they will be apprised of the results of those discussions, with which I trust they will concur. I do not know what else I can tell them other than relating the facts and the results of the discussions.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in the meantime, in the light of generally rising costs and the considerably higher price increases, including those of wages, in other areas of our economy, it is my belief, following lengthy discussions with many farm machinery company officials, that this over-all price increase of some 2 per cent to 3 per cent is not, in the light of all the circumstances, an irresponsible one.

I have been asked whether I propose to table this correspondence between myself and machinery companies. Since the companies have voluntarily provided the information on which this statement is based, and in view of the value of, and need for, continued co-operation in the light of the investigations being conducted by the Barber commission, I do not believe any useful purpose would be served by the tabling of these documents.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, the farmers of this country will be delighted to learn that the government has finally ascertained that there has been an increase in the prices of farm machinery, something the farmers have been aware of for the last four years. Both the farmers and the agricultural industry as a whole are going to be very disappointed in the announcement that has been made this morning, because following previous announcements of the Minister of Agriculture when he first took office they anticipated that should there be a drastic increase in the prices of farm machinery something would be done about it. This is why we have constantly requested an announcement in this regard, hoping the government would enunciate some policy to prevent the tremendous increase in the prices of farm machinery which has occurred. On the other hand, I am sure the machinery companies both in the United States and in Canada will be delighted indeed that the minister has taken this opportunity to justify the increase in their prices.

The minister states, Mr. Speaker, that he has been assured that the price increase for 1967 will be in the neighbourhood of 2 per cent to 3 per cent over-all. However, he tempers this by saying there will not be an increase on some items of machinery. The farmers know that if machinery is not selling, then there will not be an increase in the price. On the other hand, the minister has indicated that there could be an even greater increase in the prices of certain specified machines.

Anyone who buys farm machinery, Mr. Speaker, knows that under normal circumstances most of it is purchased during the first three months of the year. This announcement has been delayed until the major portion of the machinery required for the 1967 season is either now in the hands of the farmers or has been contracted for.

I would take issue with the minister's figure of 2 per cent to 3 per cent. Figures just released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics would seem to indicate that in the 1965 season there was an 10 per cent over-all increase in farm machinery prices. As far as the 1966 season is concerned, it has been pointed out in this house to the minister that in some instances prices went up 8 per cent. With the increase now indicated by the minister of some 2 per cent to 3 per cent for this year, this means that in 1967 the farmers of this nation could be faced with increases in prices on some lines of machinery of 20 per cent over the 1965 prices.

Such an increase is not justified, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that the farmers of this nation have every reason to blame this government for not bringing in a policy which would hold down farm machinery prices. That was what the farmers expected, and they had every reason to believe that the announcement of such a policy would be made. I am sure that at the present time they are both disappointed and disgusted with the minister's statement.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, many of us in this chamber as well as many farmers across the country have been waiting for quite a long time now for the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Agriculture. As has already been said by the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth), there really is not much substance to the alleged policy statement which has just been made by the minister. Of course the minister is quite good at analysing the problems which face the Canadian agricultural industry and which have faced it in the course of the past decade or more; but when it comes to giving some concrete indication as to what remedial action the government intends to take, the minister makes, as I say, a statement which simply has no substance.

The minister is optimistic, and many of us must remain optimistic, that the general price level of agricultural products will increase, and that prices paid under the international wheat agreement will be raised relatively soon. But even this, Mr. Speaker, will not make a substantial contribution toward easing the continuing cost-price squeeze which has prevailed for so long. By every index that one would care to look at it is becoming all too apparent and obvious that those who are engaged in the agricultural industry are facing a deteriorating economic position.

It is either a case, Mr. Speaker, of specific and rather massive action being taken by the government to improve the prices received by farm operators, or some kind of specific and tangible action which must be taken to try to hold the line on costs to the producer.

• (12:20 p.m.)

The minister tried to leave the impression that he has been active and successful in exercising moral suasion with respect to requests for increases by manufacturers of farm machinery. If he did so he ought to be prepared to table the correspondence. I did not clearly understand what he said on that point.

An hon. Member: He did not wish to table it.

Mr. Schreyer: I understand the minister is not prepared to table the correspondence. We must take his word that he has been in touch with some manufacturers and has succeeded in persuading them to hold the line on prices until we get the commission report, at least.

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale in particular asked whether the government contemplates imposing a moratorium with respect to prices, but the contention was advanced that there is no constitutional jurisdiction for that to be done. Would the minister take this problem seriously enough to investigate the feasibility of consulting with provincial authorities with a view to taking joint federal-provincial action in this regard which I submit would be intra vires and constitutional. The problem is serious enough when one considers farm machinery prices to warrant extraordinary joint federal-provincial action.

The minister may say there have been increases because material prices have increased, because the cost of labour has increased and that these increases have necessitated increased farm machinery prices. Yet the minister does not say what labour unit costs are involved in the manufacture of farm machinery. I submit that unit labour costs in this field have remained steady or may have gone down somewhat. Also the minister does not tell us as he should of profits earned in the farm machinery manufacturing sector. Those profits have increased dramatically upward in the past two years and that situation should not be tolerated.

The minister should exercise more than moral suasion; he should try to implement negotiations with the provinces to persuade them to take specific action. In the meantime, until something extraordinary is done in his field we may only look forward to a continuation of the cost-price squeeze and a worsening of conditions generally. Between the present time and two or three years in the future it will be necessary to increase moneys available under ARDA and other special programs to deal with problems of poverty in rural sectors; such moneys will have to be increased by 500 per cent or 600 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I shall allow the hon. member to continue in a moment. I do not wish to single him out from other hon. members, but statements made by ministers should be as concise as possible and, according to the standing order, comments should be brief. Representatives of the parties have made comments that are longer than they need be. I bring this to the attention of all hon. members.

Mr. Nasserden: On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I have just ruled on the point of order.

Mr. Schreyer: Could I conclude with a few sentences? I will take but a second. The minister's statement has been vague; it may be unfair to criticize it too much, but it shows, as yet, no evidence of concrete and specific actions to be taken. That is why we are disappointed.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, taking into account what you have just said, I will be brief to shorten this debate as much as possible. Besides, I never speak very long at the resolution stage.

This morning the minister moved a resolution which reads in part as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment to provinces out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, for each fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1972, of provincial revenue equalization payments and post-secondary education adjustment payments—

In my opinion, that is just an extension of the equalization payments legislation which concerns mainly the province of Quebec. It is understood that we do not accept the present makeshift, namely the refund of the equalization payments, which we find rather small in any case compared to the amount which the province of Quebec pays in taxes to the federal government. We hope to see the day when the constitution is given its true meaning again. Quebec will then recover its three taxation fields in full and will no longer have to depend on the good will of the federal government for those small equalization payments.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we will wait until the bill is introduced when we will certainly have something to say.

[English]

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, briefly commenting on the minister's statement, he has left me puzzled. First he said he was encouraged by the discussions he had had with farm machinery manufacturers; then he tried to justify price increases. I understand that the cost of parts coming in from the United States and the United Kingdom have increased by 3 per cent or 4 per cent; yet the Dominion Bureau of Statistics report says that substantially over 10 per cent more was being charged for these implements in 1966 than was being charged in 1965.

Would the royal commission looking into this matter make an interim report on this situation? We have no satisfactory explanation why price increases are justified. Those increases ought to be explained. It is all very well to say that costs have increased so much more for labour and so much more for other things, but are those increases justified? The royal commission was set up to investigate this very situation.

In conclusion may I say that farmers are not satisfied with things as they are. We hope there will be some governmental investigation and a report with respect to whether farm machinery companies have been asking for unjustified increases.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TAKING OF ADMISSIONS OR CONFESSIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-276, to amend the Canada Evidence Act (incriminating statements).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Orlikow: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Evidence Act to put into that act some of the principles enunciated by the United States Supreme Court in 1966, according to which any admission or confession made while the accused is in custody cannot be used by the prosecution unless it proves that the police warned the suspect that he may remain silent and that anything he says may be held against him; also, that he has the right to have a lawyer present during interrogation.

If the suspect desires a lawyer but cannot afford one he cannot be questioned unless the crown appoints a lawyer and that lawyer is present. If the suspect confesses after receiving the required warning, but without having the benefit of counsel, the burden is on the prosecution to prove a knowing waiver by the accused—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member knows that according to the rules his statement should be brief. I suggest that perhaps brevity is being forgotten this morning.

Mr. Orlikow: May I conclude with one more sentence. The burden is on the prosecution to prove a knowing waiver by the accused, and the interrogation will be conducted in such a way, and will be taken to show a lack of waiver unless proof to the contrary is provided.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES

SEALS—STEPS TO ENSURE COMPLIANCE WITH REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that 11 ships are setting sail from Halifax within the next day or so to kill seals, what measures is the minister taking to ensure the observance of the new regulations?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have recently made a number of statements in the house on this matter, particularly on February 13 when I spoke during the budget debate. A meeting of our officers who will be asked to participate in or try to control this operation took place in Halifax this week. We shall have a fisheries officer on every sealer engaged in the gulf of St. Lawrence. We shall have officers at every landing point so we can control operations by aircraft. We have secured the services of four helicopters, and we shall have a number of officers—

Mr. Speaker: Order. My impression is that the minister is now reiterating the statement to which he referred a moment ago. I know how important this question is, but I suggest that his statement should not be allowed to go any further.

Mr. Starr: I should like to ask whether in addition to this supervision the minister himself is planning to be on the spot to make certain that the sealers comply with the new rule calling for the use of a 30-inch club only in the slaughter of baby seals.

Mr. Robichaud: I believe my visit to the ice packs last year during the sealing operation was sufficient to enable me to realize what regulations should be implemented in order to establish full control. I am confident that our officers and representatives of the S.P.C.A. who will be on the ice this year will be able to give factual reports on what will take place.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether his attention has been drawn to the figures released by Southam Building Reports to the effect that construction contracts awarded in the first two months of this year have declined by 20.8 per cent compared with the first two months of last year, that major contracts over one million dollars are down by 144 per cent, residential contracts by 10.8 per cent, construction for business by 36.1 per cent and institutional awards by 18.4 per cent. The provinces which seem to be most adversely affected are Quebec, the prairie provinces and British Columbia. In view of the serious repercussions of this situation not only for the construction industry but for the industries supplying building materials, I should like to ask the minister whether his department has any plans in prospect to stimulate construction during the present year and whether he will be making a statement in this regard.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the figures to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but my department and I are watching economic developments very closely and if I feel it is necessary to make a statement I will certainly be happy to do so. Government policies are under constant review.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the the minister whether the information given to him by his department coincides with the statistics in Southam Building Reports showing a substantial decline in contract awards for the first two months of this year, and whether he intends fairly soon to make a statement as to the monetary or credit policies it is proposed to follow in order to cope with the situation?

Mr. Sharp: The information I have at the present time is that economic expansion has come down to a much more sustainable level. I had expected there would be some decline in the rate of construction expenditures compared with last year, when they were so high that it was necessary for the government to cut back its own expenditures. Indeed, I would have been very disappointed if there had not been. Our objective should be not to repeat the experience of 1966 but to reach a much more sustainable and stable level.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, does this mean the minister now realizes that rising interest rates, rising costs of material and rising taxation are hindering the progress of our economy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EXTENSION OF MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM TO FARM LABOUR AND INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Earlier today the hon. gentleman made a statement about the revised manpower mobility program. Will that program also include provision for unemployment insurance for farm labour to become effective on April 1 of this year?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that we shall have to postpone that part of the program until we can find good definitions and have better administrative rulings than we have at present. However, the intention is to cover farmers too, and I hope we can do it as soon as possible.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, a number of us are wondering whether grants available under the mobility policy will also be available to the first citizens of Canada, our Indians.

Mr. Marchand: As far as the first citizens of Canada are concerned, if they fulfil the requirements of the legislation I do not see why they should not be entitled to the same advantages as others.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REARRANGEMENT OF MENTAL HEALTH BRANCH OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister tell the house whether the mental health division of his department has been assigned a lower position in the departmental structure recently, as a result of which the chief of this division does not now report directly to the deputy minister?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question asked by the hon. member is not in order at this time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAY DISPUTE—APPOINTMENT OF ARBITRATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the Minister of Labour. I tried to give him notice but I was informed he would not be in the house today and so I should like to address it to the parliamentary secretary. No doubt he will bring it to the notice of the minister and perhaps use his well established negotiating procedures to get a proper answer.

I should like to know what progress the minister has made in drafting the appropriate regulations and in appointing the board or boards of arbitration to deal with the dispute between the railways and those unions which rejected the terms submitted by Mr. Goldenberg as mediator.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, because of the great respect I have for the hon. member I would have had a prepared answer ready for him had he brought the question to my attention as well. He can rest assured, however, that I will bring the matter to the notice of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Lewis: I apologize to the hon. gentleman. I telephoned the minister's office rather late this morning and did not follow up the matter. Would the hon. gentleman find out and inform the house, or have the minister do so, whether it is intended to provide in the regulations which I understand are in preparation that the award of the arbitrators will be for a three year term or for some other specific term, or whether the arbitrators are to be left with discretion in this area?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF STATEMENTS BY NATIONAL DEFENCE DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it his intention to make a statement on government policy in the near future so that parliament and the country will be able to judge whether statements being issued through the Department of National Defence in recent days, purporting to reflect Canada's foreign policy, are invalid or just premature?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to believe that any statement made by the Minister of National Defence, or by anyone purporting to speak on behalf of that department, is not consistent with the foreign policy of this country as already enunciated.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact it is my understanding that the minister is going to appear next week before the external affairs committee of the other place, would he agree to use his good offices to call a meeting of the standing committee on external affairs of this house so that he may give evidence with respect to statements made by the chief of staff in the defence committee that affect foreign policy very seriously?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to reply to the last part of my hon. friend's question because I think it does not have obvious application. The Prime Minister has already indicated our desire to have the external affairs committee of this house meet. I believe steps have been taken toward that end. With regard to the hearing before a committee of the other place, it must not be forgotten that it too is a part of parliament.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is it true that the hon. member for Verdun paid a visit to Mr. J. S. Rockefeller on behalf of the government to see what amendments to the Bank Act might be proposed that could reconcile the differences of opinion existing between the Minister of Finance and the Minister without Portfolio?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

OPPORTUNITY FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF UNIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the assurances of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence that the defence committee would have full opportunity to look into the advantages or disadvantages of the proposed unification of the armed forces, with full freedom to call qualified witnesses before that committee, and in view of the fact that the Liberal members on that committee have now in effect applied closure, would the Prime Minister exert his influence on the members of his party to enable the full examination which he assured us would be possible to take place?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that 37 meetings having already been held—and I believe 39 is the number of meetings which have already been called—ample opportunity has been given to discuss the matter.

Mr. Harkness: As a supplementary question, is the Prime Minister aware that only nine presentations have been made by witnesses who could be looked upon as being independent witnesses—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: —and would he—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now seeking to discuss proceedings in a committee which has not reported, and doing that is against the rules.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSSIBLE ACTION FOLLOWING THROWING OF PAMPHLETS ON FLOOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Is he yet in a position to advise whether he intends to lay charges in connection with the incident yesterday during which we were bombarded with pamphlets?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a matter which, with respect, does not fall under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTS TO CORPORATION BY OFFICIALS HAVING COLOUR TELEVISION SETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Do those people who have been issued colour television sets by the C.B.C. report from time to time to the corporation on C.B.C. programming?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question certainly is not an urgent one, even if it were acceptable, and I suggest to the hon. member that it cannot be asked at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the question which I asked previously—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question or to raise a point of order?

Mr. Nasserden: On a point of order with regard to the question I posed to the Secretary of State. Surely we in parliament have a right to know whether or not the people who have been issued sets make reports.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did not suggest to the hon. member that he is not entitled to the information. I suggested he could not ask the question at this time.

EXPO '67

CONTRACT WITH PRIVATE STATION FOR TELEVISING SPORTS EVENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has a large, exclusive contract just been issued to a private Toronto station, I believe CFTO, in connection with Expo sporting events and, if so, what about the anomalous position of the C.B.C. with its $10 million television station at Expo?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member suggests that this is a matter so urgent that the question should be asked at this time? I doubt very much that it is.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL SAFETY INSPECTORS IN AUTOMOBILE PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made within the last 48 hours by automobile workers saying that there have been cut-backs in safety inspection procedures at factories and in view of the number of recalls of defective cars recently, will the Minister of Industry consider seriously the automobile workers' recommendation, namely, that federal safety inspectors be stationed in automobile plants just as there are federal inspectors in shipyards and aircraft plants?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I understand this particular question is under study by a committee of the house and consequently it would be presumptuous of me to anticipate what their conclusions might be.

Mr. Grafftey: Then may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. This statement was not made in the committee. It was made outside the committee. In view of the fact that it was made outside the committee, would the minister say whether he himself is seriously considering the proposition of having federal inspectors in automobile factories, just as we have in shipyards and aircraft factories?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—POSSIBLE TARIFF CHARGES IF PRODUCTION TARGETS NOT MET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. As it is becoming clearly apparent because of the slump in car sales that the car manufacturers will experience great difficulty in meeting their production targets as laid down by the United States-Canada auto pact, is it the intention of the government to charge the manufacturers all the tariffs that would have been paid if it had not been for the automobile pact?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member points out, there has been a decline in the effective demand for new motor cars both in Canada and the United States. This does impose difficulties of a character which are greater than if the market were rapidly expanding. However, I have every hope that the Canadian manufacturers will be able to fulfil the terms of the order in council and the similar arrangements. To attempt to anticipate failure to do so on their part would, I think, be erroneous.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ISSUE OF MEDALS TO FIREFIGHTERS WHO SERVED OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would he kindly advise the house of his answer to the letter of March 1 from the corps of voluntary fire fighters?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for letting me know he would ask this question. Unfortunately I have not yet seen the letter to which he is referring. I presume it is in connection with service medals for the fire fighters and I would direct him to the answer I gave the Leader of the Opposition on February 20, which can be found at page 13213 of Hansard.

Mr. Webb: As a supplementary question, when the minister has an opportunity to read this letter would he give serious consideration to the striking of a centennial medal to honour the voluntary firemen who served in world war II?

FISHERIES

LOBSTERS—ENCOURAGEMENT OF DEEP SEA INDUSTRY IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the findings established by survey crews from the fisheries research board's biological station at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, relative to the high yield of lobsters on the southeast corner of George's Bank, is the minister contemplating any changes in the lobster fishing industry in Nova Scotia?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the survey referred to by the hon. member is being studied and reviewed by officials of my department. I am not in a position to decide now if such a lobster fishery as referred to by the hon. member could be instituted this year.

Mr. Crouse: As a supplementary question may I ask, for the benefit of the inshore lobster fishing industry, whether the tagging process has established if the resource is dependent upon offshore stocks for replacement?

Mr. Speaker: I must confess I know very little about this tagging process but I doubt very much that this is a question which should be asked at this time.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INLAND FISH MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the government to date given any consideration to the report of the royal commission on inland fish marketing? Can the minister say whether this matter has reached the determination stage?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the decision concerning implementation of the recommendations contained in this report comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I can inform the hon. member, however, that at least two and probably three meetings have already been held by officials of the federal government and representatives of the provincial governments concerned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. When the meeting takes place on March 8 between himself and President Johnson in Washington can the Prime Minister give us some indication what subjects will be discussed and whether the Mercantile Bank situation might be one of the subjects discussed at this meeting?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the President has invited me to meet him. Naturally I shall be glad to discuss anything he brings up. He is the host and therefore I will leave the initiative to him.

Mr. Starr: Will the Prime Minister be consulting over the hot line to Jamaica prior to this meeting?

Mr. Pearson: I am unable to catch the import of my hon. friend's question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—ACTIVITIES OF ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious concern in the Atlantic ports, will the right hon. gentleman check to see whether the current icebreaking activities by 11 ships in the St. Lawrence are in accordance with the guide lines laid down by the Minister of Transport when he was in Halifax on December 3 on ports' day and on previous occasions?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take the matter up with the Minister of Transport who will be back shortly from the Caribbean where he has been the guest of those countries which are celebrating their independence.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the urgency regarding flooding seems to be over and in view of the mounting criticism in the Atlantic region which is spoiling the image of the Acting Minister of Transport in that area, will the Prime Minister call off the Acting Minister of Transport and stop all icebreaking activities over the week end until the Minister of Transport returns?

Mr. Pearson: I am anxious to do whatever I can to preserve the image of the acting minister, whoever he may be. I shall be pleased to take up the matter with him at once.

AGRICULTURE

LONG TERM LOANS TO EXHIBITION BOARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. When speaking in Lethbridge the minister is reported to have said that legislation providing for long term loans to exhibition boards for multipurpose buildings may be possible before the end of this session. Can the minister amplify these remarks and report in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question which has been asked is not acceptable. I have tried to indicate to the hon. members that according to our rules an hon. member may refer to a statement made outside the house only to ask whether it reflects government policy, but the question must be directed to the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pascoe: This is a very urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Prime Minister might like to comment on it.

Mr. Pascoe: Then, I will direct the question to the Prime Minister. When speaking in Lethbridge the Minister of Agriculture is reported to have said that legislation providing for long term loans to exhibition boards for multipurpose buildings may be before the house this session. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether this is likely to happen.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, it might be before the house this session if the session goes on long enough, but I think it is more likely to be considered later in the year because I hope this session will be ending very shortly.

[Later:]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he reached a decision regarding the granting of long term loans for exhibitions and fairs and, if so, what is that decision?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Certainly this question should be placed on the order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL LEGISLATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Prime Minister said about the session can he now say how many more pieces of legislation the government intends to put on the order paper to be dealt with at this session, because four additional items already have been added?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if we can deal with the items which now appear on the order paper, I think that would be a very good time to prorogue.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister sticking to his target date of March 10 for the ending of this session?

Mr. Pearson: March 10 is next Friday. I think we would be very fortunate indeed if we completed the business on the order paper by next Friday, but it is not beyond the bounds of human possibility.

SPORTS

REQUEST FOR PUBLICITY FOR PAN-AMERICAN GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the millions of dollars being spent by the government to publicize Expo '67, would the government consider spending a proportionate amount to tell the nation there is also an important event taking place this summer in Manitoba, namely the Pan-American games?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very important event as is indicated by the contribution of the federal government in terms of money. I would hope that we can participate with the provinces in the kind of advertising that may be required so that it will be as successful as I know Expo '67 will be.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RETRAINING OF WORKERS LAID OFF BECAUSE OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In a statement he made to the house the day before yesterday he gave some interesting information. I wonder whether he can fill in the details now or make a statement later.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member asking the minister to make a statement?

Mr. Douglas: I am asking the minister to give me some information now or take notice of the question. The minister told us of some 5,732 persons who had been laid off in the auto industry since January 1, 1966. I am asking the minister whether he can give us any information concerning how many of those persons who have been laid off have actually been placed in employment by his department. Am I correct in my information that the figure is something less than 300? Would the minister give us the information now or take the question as notice and give us the information later?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and give the information later. I do not know the answer.

FINANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 2, consideration of the following resolution—Mr. Sharp—Mr. Batten in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment to provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund, for each fiscal year in the period commencing on the 1st day of April, 1967 and ending on the 31st day of March, 1972, of provincial revenue equalization payments and post-secondary education adjustment payments, and for each fiscal year commencing on or after the 1st day of April, 1967, of provincial revenue stabilization payments and succession duty payments; to authorize tax collection agreements with provinces and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act to extend for an additional three years the interim period relating to the health grants program.

The Chairman: In accordance with the order of February 28 I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume its consideration of this resolution at two o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

SITTING RESUMED

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. The house again in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution to provide for certain federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I concluded the few remarks I had to make last evening with one exception. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, who I expect will be in the chamber in a moment or two, asked me to provide certain information in the form of tables. I now have that information. I regret that I have only six copies, but if it is satisfactory to the committee I am prepared to table these three tables showing in the first two a comparison of fiscal allocations at present and as intended under the new scheme to each of the provinces. The third table relates to the basis of calculation of the proposed 1967-68 federal transfers in respect of post-secondary education costs. I am prepared to table these documents if that meets with the desire of the committee.

Equalization Payments to Provinces

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. lady will agree to having these included in Hansard.

Miss LaMarsh: I am very happy to do so.

The Chairman: It would be difficult to table these statistics at this time but it is possible to have them included in Hansard, if that is the committee's wish, as part of the minister's remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The tables above referred to are as follows:]

(2) The arrangement is that the provinces will receive the greater of columns 5 or 6.

(3) Column 7 indicates the amounts to be transferred to the provinces on the basis of estimated total operating expenditures. When actual expenditures are subsequently known, a final settlement will be made with those provinces to which the per cent formula applies.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, last evening the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State outlined in broad terms the contents of this resolution and the intent of the bill which will be before us at the conclusion of the debate on the resolution. I think this intent represents probably as important a step in federal-provincial relations as has been taken in this house for many years. As has been announced, this resolution and the bill to follow are the outcome of discussions with the provinces at a meeting last October between the Minister of Finance and his counterparts in the provincial governments. At that time major changes were proposed to the provinces and the Minister of Finance outlined them in the following words:

Major changes were proposed in the following fields: the occupancy of tax fields or tax sharing; provincial revenue equalization arrangements; provincial revenue stabilization arrangements; federal financial assistance in respect of post-secondary education; a new form of federal compensation to the provinces in respect of well established shared cost programs in the health and welfare field; and finally, a new federal program for the occupational training of adults in lieu of the technical and vocational training agreements which expire on March 31 this year.

The Minister of Finance suggested that there were certain principles which he had presented to the tax structure committee whose findings were subsequently presented to the federal-provincial meetings of finance ministers. Some six principles were evolved to guide the committee in its deliberations.

The minister also mentioned that the federal government maintained the following:

—that so long as provincial governments had access to sufficient tax fields and so long as provincial revenues were equalized fairly, the provinces should impose their own taxes to finance their own programs.

Certainly this is a most important statement with which I cannot disagree, but I would like to withhold judgment until I see the bill. The minister indicated last night that when the bill is before us he will give us information as to just what the net gain or loss will be to the provinces under the new arrangements. He also stated:

Instead of selecting certain taxes at given or standard rates and equalizing their yield to the level of the top two provinces, the proposed formula will take into account all provincial revenues, at average provincial rates, and will bring the revenue yield in all provinces up to the national average yield.

[The Chairman.]

Just what this will mean in dollars and cents remains to be seen. I cannot help but agree that it is a very important principle.

The Minister of Finance last evening and the Secretary of State today have put on record certain tables. Sufficient time has not been available to permit me to analyse these figures but they will be helpful when we study the bill in detail.

The Minister of Finance made a statement to the effect that the federal government now proposes to extend the stabilization provision to all provincial revenues and proposes to remove the five-year limit which has applied to the stabilization provision as well as to the equalization provisions. Stabilization is to be provided on a continuing basis as a protection to the provinces against sharp declines in revenue. I am wondering whether these agreements are to be in effect forever or to what degree they are subject to discontinuance by either party concerned. If they are to be extended beyond the five-year limit I wonder what the duration of that extension will be.

Mr. Prittie: Until a change of government.

Mr. Monteith: I can assure the hon. member for Essex East that he will not be around when this matter is discussed next because I doubt very much that he will be re-elected in that auto city of his. Last night the Secretary of State dealt with the post-secondary education adjustment payments. She outlined in some detail the way in which they would work and made the following statement:

I am sure I need not impress on the house either the crucial importance of this matter to the future of our country or the very difficult and complex problems posed in trying to deal with it.

I agree completely that it is of crucial importance. I would like to point out that practically everything that the Secretary of State suggested last night is merely an extension of the programs instituted by the government with which I had the honour to be associated. This matter is very complex and the tables contained in Hansard must be studied before we can come to any firm opinion. I can only suggest that we wait until we see the bill and I hope that we will be given some time to study it before being asked to debate it. I think it will be one of the most important matters before this house in this session and I hope that a reasonable length of time will be given us to examine the contents of the bill.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is a prelude to very important legislation, and the purpose of having a resolution stage is to allow hon. members to get all the information available in order to make a considered judgment on the legislation when it is presented. I must say that the amount of information we have so far is quite limited and I hope that before the resolution is passed the Minister of Finance will give us at least comparative statements showing the revenues which the provincial governments receive now under the present tax sharing arrangements as against the revenues they will receive under the legislation which the minister intends to bring down. I believe that such comparative statistics were available to the tax structure committee. Although the minister said last night that he wants to bring those statistics up to date, I think it is extremely important that we get those figures while we are at the resolution stage.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member whether he has looked at the table which appears at page 13687 of Hansard where the final two lines show the comparison between the present and the proposed equalization payments?

Mr. Douglas: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I looked at those tables very carefully this morning but it seems to me that if the minister will look at the breakdown which we had when the previous tax sharing arrangements were before the house he will see that it was much more detailed. If we could have it in that form I think it would be extremely useful.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The matter which must concern the house, Mr. Chairman, is what the long term effect of this legislation will be, not only with respect to the ability of the federal government to discharge its responsibilities but also the effect it will have on the ability of the provinces and municipalities to discharge their responsibilities. In his statement last night, as recorded at page 13681 of Hansard, the minister set forth six basic principles with which I am sure no one could disagree. However, the minister did not demonstrate the extent to which the measures he is proposing will give effect to the principles he enunciated.

By way of illustration, I will refer to the first principle. The minister stated that the fiscal arrangements should give both the federal and provincial governments access to fiscal resources sufficient to discharge their responsibilities under the constitution. I must say that from the minister's statement last night I am far from convinced that the provinces and municipalities can discharge their responsibilities within the terms of the tax sharing arrangement which the minister announced.

I understand that the tax structure committee prepared some figures which indicated that by 1972, on the basis of a 7 per cent annual rate of growth in the gross national product, the federal government will have a surplus of $727 million but the provinces and municipalities will have deficits of $2.1 billion. It is suggested also, predicated on a 6 per cent annual rate of growth in the gross national product, that by 1972 the federal government will still have a small surplus but that the provinces and municipalities will have deficits of $2.4 billion. If these compilations have not been produced by the tax structure committee I hope the minister will give us what their estimate was when he presents the legislation or before we close the debate on this resolution. If these figures are correct, what they really mean is that the provinces and municipalities are now going to operate within a very restricted fiscal framework.

The provinces will have three alternatives. One will be to cut services. The second will be to raise other taxes which are outside of the agreement. The third will be to do a great deal of deficit financing by borrowing. I think any one of these proposals would be disastrous for Canada. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that while as members of parliament we are primarily concerned with the financial problems of the government of Canada we cannot for one moment be indifferent to the welfare of the provinces and municipalities. After all, if the provinces and municipalities are unable to discharge their constitutional responsibilities with respect to education, health, welfare, roads and industrial development, then no matter what the federal government does Canada will not prosper and grow at the rate which might otherwise be the case. Therefore, in examining this legislation when it comes before us we must be concerned with the overall effect on all three levels of government of these tax sharing proposals.

I am concerned, for instance, about the decision to include all provincial revenues in the determination of the equalization payments. I think this can work to the great disadvantage of some areas of Canada and can produce great inequalities in the equalization formula. I am concerned that it is being predicated upon the average income for Canada rather than bringing the provinces up to the level of the highest province or at least to the average of the two highest provinces. It would seem to me we are making a retrograde step by saying to the provinces, we will only bring you up to the national average. If we are going to have equality of opportunity for people in all parts of Canada, if we are going to remove any disparity between Canadians in different areas, surely we ought to average the equalization payments to the highest province in Canada and not to the national average.

We will want to examine these proposals more closely when the legislation comes before us. I think the reference to assistance to post-secondary education is a very necessary step and a very welcome innovation. I am sure the provinces must be concerned, as we must be concerned, about the fact that what the Lord giveth the Lord taketh away. While the government is proposing to give greater assistance to post-secondary education, it is proposing to discontinue its grants with respect to technical and vocational education. We will want to go into that in detail to see what the net effect is for the provinces.

Miss LaMarsh: It is a long phase-out.

Mr. Douglas: The minister says it is a long phase-out. This is true, and that is what worries me about it. The provinces might be induced to accept a program which may be slightly more beneficial this year and next year, but we have to take the long view. If the figures I quoted earlier are correct and by 1972 the provinces and municipalities will be deeper in debt as a result of these proposals, then of course a long phase-out will not meet their problems.

The other thing that concerns me is that the provinces are being asked to accept responsibility for some of the shared cost programs in return for tax abatements. These shared cost programs have escalated in the past and, in my opinion, over the next 10 or 15 years will escalate in almost goemetric progression. Any province getting into difficulty with programs like hospital insurance, medicare or the old age assistance program will have no alternative but to cut back these programs. The federal government may feel comfortable in that it has washed its hands of responsibility by giving the provinces certain tax abatements. But if, Mr. Chairman, they cut these programs back we will have lost the measure of national social security which we provided when we instituted programs like national hospitalization and which we hope will obtain when medicare comes into effect.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many questions that have to be answered before we can give our support to these tax sharing proposals. I am hopeful that when the ministers make their speeches on second reading of the bill we will have a greater amount of detail to enable us to make a better comparison of the projected revenues which the provinces can anticipate under the legislation compared with what they could expect to receive under the existing tax sharing arrangements. I think some of the suggestions made by the ministers will undoubtedly make for improvement, but I am very fearful that we are manoeuvring the provinces into an inflexible taxation framework which will have the result of restricting their ability to keep pace with the growth of the Canadian economy and to meet the increasing demands of their people and of the times in which we live. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we will look forward to the statements which will be made by the ministers when the bill is brought forward, and at that time we will be able to deal more exhaustively with the proposals which are being placed before us.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before us, as has been stated, deals with renewing and in some cases changing the tax sharing arrangements between the provinces and the federal government. A very cursory examination of the remarks made by the two ministers last night as well as of the resolution indicates that probably this is all that can be done at this time owing to the fact that no agreement was reached between the two levels of government at the conference held on this subject last fall as to the future arrangements.

In looking over some of the proposals that the federal government has offered the provinces—and this aspect took up a very large portion of the minister's statement last night—it seems to me that there are some serious inequities which are now coming home to roost. Unfortunately we are now going to be asked to perpetuate some of them. For example, I should like the minister to explain why it is that in the table on page 13687 of Hansard showing the yield at national average province revenue rate for the other 12 revenue sources there is included an item of $93,083,000 in general sales tax for the province of Alberta. The province of Alberta does not have any such tax.

I have known for some time that the federal government has assumed that the province of Alberta does have access to revenue from a sales tax. It seems to me that there is something fundamentally wrong with so-called federal-provincial relations when the federal government assumes that a province has a revenue in respect of which in actual fact there is no provincial legislation. That is not to say, of course, that if it so wished the province of Alberta could not impose such a sales tax. It so happens that under the constitution of Canada the provincial legislatures have the right to say whether or not they are going to impose this, that or any other tax. Yet in this table it is claimed that the province of Alberta has a revenue source of $93 million by way of sales tax.

I think we have reached a pretty serious situation so far as federal-provincial relations are concerned, when the federal government now uses federal money as the basis for requiring or prodding provincial governments to levy certain taxes. I had hoped that this was not going to be the attitude of the federal government, but obviously it is. Therefore we will have to do what we can to keep the federal government within its own area of jurisdiction and see that it treats all provinces essentially the same.

As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has pointed out, we have no disagreement with the principles underlying the federal proposals for new tax sharing arrangements; there is no question of that. I am not going to refer to them because they are well known to the members of this house as well as to the provincial governments. However, there are some other matters which have been introduced recently into the tax sharing arrangements which form the basis of the program and which in my view are completely unacceptable.

We know that when the equalization payments were formulated a number of years ago there were only three tax bases—personal income tax, corporate income tax and succession duties. This was changed by the former Conservative government in 1961 and resource revenue was included as a fourth basis. There has never been any satisfactory explanation for this inclusion except the penalizing of the government of Alberta. That the federal government certainly did, because the province of Alberta was penalized by approximately $30 million to $40 million a year as a result of the inclusion of this particular form of revenue in the calculation of the equalization payments.

It has always seemed strange to me, Mr. Chairman, looking back to that period, that there were 17 Conservative members out of a possible 17 from the province of Alberta at that time and not one of them stood up in the house and defended the people they represented notwithstanding the fact that the change was going to cost them millions of dollars every year. I do not think we can lay all of the blame on the present government when it was the previous government which introduced that change. However, the present government certainly should have seen the inequity in this kind of arrangement and remedied it.

This government did not introduce any other additions to the tax base. They did not include, for example, the retail sales tax which many of the provinces had in effect at the time. That source of revenue was not used to calculate the equalization payments. Even the province of Saskatchewan is now reaching the point where the inclusion of resource revenue is starting to hurt them. In fact, a few weeks ago the premier of Saskatchewan said that the new arrangement is a cruel blow to his province. He had expected something like $35 million, I believe, in 1967 in equalization payments, but according to the table that has been put before us Saskatchewan now moves out of the "have not" class into the "have" class and does not get one cent. Conservative members might well go back to 1961 to find out what originated the arbitrary inclusion of resource revenues in the tax base. It is there, Mr. Chairman, and it is unjust. It is even more unjust now because the federal government is assuming that Alberta has a sales tax when it has not.

I submit that there are many injustices in this whole arrangement. I am hoping that we will have further federal-provincial agreements concluded or federal-provincial conferences held very soon to straighten out some of these injustices and to treat all provinces in Canada and all citizens of those provinces equally. It is about time we realized that some of the revenue produced in Alberta and British Columbia has been from the sale of capital assets. These sales will not be repeated year by year to bring additional revenue. Yet these sales of assets are treated as things which ordinarily produce revenue. Not all provinces do that sort of thing.

I now wish to turn to the statement made by the Secretary of State with respect to future federal contributions to be made to post-secondary education. I will not go into details but I have discussed this matter with people interested in the subject.

A number of things bother me, the most important one being the matter of definitions. What kinds of costs or expenses will these grants be paid for? The minister last night said something about costs being paid with respect to students who have achieved junior matriculation level. The government will be prepared to pay $15 per capita for education beyond that level. The whole question is fuzzy. What is junior matriculation? At the moment in Alberta junior matriculation is reached at the end of grade 11. Is that what the minister has in mind? If I understand correctly, junior matriculation is the point at which young people may leave high school. Could the minister expand on this point?

It seems to me that post-secondary education ought to be defined in a more satisfactory way than by saying it is education after certain scholastic standards are reached. The program should apply to vocational and training institutions as well as to universities. The government could pay up to 50 per cent of the operating and capital costs of these institutions. That would be easier than trying to pay the money to individuals or on their behalf after they have attained a certain scholastic standing.

I am greatly concerned about high school drop-outs. Those who do not have junior matriculation often need to go to vocational training institutions, of which there are many in this country. High school drop-outs have as much right to grants and financial assistance from the federal treasury as those attaining junior matriculation level.

If I interpret what the minister has said there will be no provision in the bill for students to attend vocational and technical training schools unless they have their junior matriculation. In many provinces junior matriculation level is not attained until students are in grade 12. In one or two provinces they do not attain that level until grade 13.

One of the major problems is that those who drop out of high school, often without junior matriculation, will not be able to attend a technical or vocational training school and those young people are the very ones who will be found on the unemployment rolls.

Item No. 134 on the order paper is a resolution providing for the training of adults wishing to undertake occupational training. But conditions are attached. They must have entered the labour force and they must have been unemployed for a long period before they can qualify for assistance under this proposal.

The Secretary of State and the Minister of Finance would be well advised to try to reach agreement with the provinces to pay 50 per cent of the costs, or whatever the figure may be, for vocational training schools rather than going through the complexities of ascertaining the scholastic standing of students and making the payments on the basis of their standing. I presume this argument has been advanced previously to the Secretary of State. If it has been rejected I should like to know why. Why are we becoming involved with students rather than with schools?

The problem must be met in one of two ways. The provinces will have to assume the full financial responsibility for training young people who do not reach junior matriculation standards or, alternatively, the young people will have to leave school, enter the labour market, be unemployed for a long period and then receive help from the federal government. The latter course is not desirable.

The vocational and technical training program is useful. Among other things it has provided much of the capital for building such schools. I can perhaps exonerate myself in the eyes of the Conservative party by paying a tribute and saying that this was their program. It has been appreciated and has done at least all it was intended to do and perhaps more. But now it will be phased out. Technical and vocational training schools, at least in Alberta, train young people who have dropped out of high school. They give them the kind of training to fit them to find their place in the labour market.

Taking the two resolutions together, it appears that there is a serious gap in federal contributions to a particular group of people needing financial assistance. I hope the minister will explain why this way of doing things has been chosen. Why has the government not chosen to pay 50 per cent of the cost of operating technical and vocational training schools? We shall await the bill to see what details are proposed and will have more to say about some of the details. I conclude by hoping that the minister will explain some of the points I have raised.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to sit here and let the statements of the hon. member for Medicine Hat go unchallenged. I wish to make cursory comments about the resolution before us. I agree with what has been said. It is essential that we have sufficient time to study the bill. I agree that this bill will be one of the most important that we shall pass this session, and it will be most unfortunate if we do not have adequate time to study it seriously and to present arguments on it.

I am most concerned about the comment of the hon. member for Medicine Hat that the provinces will suffer serious losses under the equalization formula. Saskatchewan strenuously objects to these changes. In fact, the premier of Saskatchewan on going home seemed to feel that his province had received a very dirty deal indeed. The members from Saskatchewan in this house share his feelings. Saskatchewan may be a "have" province today. Everyone knows that the economy of the province is to a great extent founded on the wheat crop and in one year the situation in that province could change so drastically if there were a really bad crop failure that the province would be in serious difficulties under the arrangements now to be made. We shall, of course, know better when we have the bill before us.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat stated that in 1961 the policy which the present government is pursuing was started by the former government. I think he forgets that in 1957 and 1958 the Progressive Conservative government then in power greatly increased the equalization grants, and I know full well that during those difficult years the province of Saskatchewan could not have balanced its budget but for the large increase in equalization grants. I know too, from my interest in education, that it was these equalization grants more than any other factor which enabled the province to improve its educational facilities during those years. At that time and for some years earlier the teachers' organizations had been pressing for direct assistance to education. But it was impossible to get anywhere along those lines, and we know that the equalization grants made by the federal government were intended in large measure to assist in overcoming the difficulties encountered in the field of education. They fulfilled that function.

The radical changes which are about to take place will, I believe, hurt education more than any other government activity, particularly if, as seems likely in the future, the federal government disposes of a surplus of revenue while provincial and municipal governments face deficits. I fear we shall find that education, which does not appear to produce any immediate tangible benefits, will suffer most. As I said many years ago, a community can see the direct benefits which it derives from a road but it is more difficult to see the benefits it derives because its young people have gone through secondary school and then to university before working for this nation in the wider scene, particularly if not many of these students return to work in the community from which they set out. This being the case I have a feeling that the change now proposed will hurt education more than any other service.

I welcome the suggestion that assistance should be given to post-secondary education. But assistance of this kind is needed less than the assistance which I feel should be given to secondary and even to public school education. What is causing the greatest difficulty is the enormous expense of building schools and the financial burden which rests on the municipal governments in this connection. I am sorry that the government has not found some way of assisting the provinces to carry out the large building programs which face them in this field. I think a way could be found and I believe that such assistance would be welcomed more than any other which could be given to the provinces. There is a real need in all the provinces for such aid.

In my own province of Saskatchewan the minister of education has, according to newspaper reports in recent days, completely revised the way in which the vocational education program is to be carried out. I wonder what effect the changes now contemplated will have on these plans. What lies ahead if the grant is to be changed so radically and if there is to be a gradual phasing out of the vocational education program?

Some provinces have made very little use of the vocational education program though others, like Ontario, have made tremendous use of the grants available in this field. In the more industrialized provinces communities are sufficiently large to make it relatively easy to establish large schools. But in my own province, for example, there are few large communities and consequently there are few places where vocational education can be carried out as was intended by the legislation. This does not mean that modifications could not have been made to enable such provinces to take advantage of these grants. I fear that the revision which the government of Saskatchewan is trying to carry out now will be seriously hampered by the changes now proposed.

With these cursory and superficial comments, I wish to say once again that I hope we shall have sufficient time to study the bill adequately in order that proper presentations may be made with regard to it.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, this resolution, item No. 135 on the order paper, is similar in one respect to the resolution which precedes it, item No. 134. Both flow from the federal-provincial conference of last October on tax sharing. So some comments could be made at this time which would apply to either of these resolutions.

On October 31 following the conference the Minister of Finance made a statement in the house on government policy. At that time, speaking for this party I expressed both praise and blame for the stand the government was adopting. I congratulated the government upon recognizing that there is a role for the federal government to play in the field of adult education. The resolution in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with which we shall be dealing shortly seeks to implement that part of the policy. I went on to express great regret that the federal government had decided to cease financing university, technical and vocational education or at least to withdraw from this field in a formal way. The minister announced he intended to transfer certain percentage points of personal and corporation income tax to the provinces and make certain other payments to compensate for the lost grants, and this is what the resolution before us is about.

I felt then that the federal government was moving in the wrong direction. It has agreed that certain persons who have been out of school for at least three years and who are on the labour market and need retraining may receive federal assistance. But people who do not find themselves in this position cannot receive any assistance if they are within the educational system. It seems to me that an artificial line has been drawn.

[Mr. Cantelon.]

On other occasions I have talked about why the government has taken this decision. It seems to me it is quite different from the type of policy toward formal education developed over the past several years by successive governments. It is quite different from the policies of co-operative federalism developed by the present government since it took office in 1963. Unless it is taking a very doctrinaire approach, as I understand it, I think the government has been persuaded by certain of its supporters, notably the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the hon. member for Hochelaga and the hon. member for Mount Royal, that this is the course it should follow, that Quebec should not be treated differently from the other provinces and if Quebec objects to federal involvement in technical and vocational education and in university financing, then the government should withdraw from that field so that all the provinces may receive the same treatment.

This is a very doctrinaire approach. It is a step backward. So far as I know, no real objections have come from the other provinces about federal assistance to university financing or about technical and vocational financing. In fact, some of the provinces jumped eagerly into the program of technical and vocational financing introduced by the previous government in 1959 or 1960. In the light of that I have to conclude that the objections come from Quebec. Because of the government's fear that Quebec will receive treatment different from that given to the other provinces it has advocated this new policy of all the provinces receiving the same treatment, and therefore it will pull back from some of the areas which it has occupied.

Not long ago I disputed this line of thinking. I see nothing wrong in giving a province special treatment if it requires such treatment because of its particular characteristics or background. When I spoke earlier I mentioned the case of the United Kingdom, which is made up of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, each with its own national characteristics. Quite frequently Westminster passes laws which have written into them a clause saying that the law shall not apply to Northern Ireland or Scotland. Indeed, Scotland has its own educational system. If a particular group in Canada in one province requires special treatment, let us recognize that fact and provide for it, but let us not stop doing things which are in the national interest simply because one province objects.

The announcement made in October was a complete reversal of policy. It was quite different from the type of policy advocated during the past few years by such members of the government as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and quite different from the policy enunciated by the Secretary of State in speeches she made during the past year. In this connection I wish to quote briefly from one speech she made at Niagara Falls on March 27, 1966, when she said:

> Universities, it might be said, are also provincial institutions. But they are distinct from kindergartens and high schools in that they are also places of scholarship, of research, of learning. And, as the Prime Minister has put it, "learning knows no boundaries. It's nature is such that it must extend as wide as all human experience; outward, indeed, into matters beyond direct human experience."

In another paragraph she said:

> This question of "learning" is a truly national one and, as such, must be of real concern to the federal government.

She also quoted from the Bladen report as follows:

> Federal support does not automatically mean federal control. The federal government does not control higher education today although it contributes to its revenues. The cultural distinctiveness of Quebec and the rights of that province to fashion its own university system are well recognized. But it is pointed out that the problems of all universities, whether English speaking or French speaking, are similar. All universities need far more funds than their provincial governments can provide.

She went on to point out that in line with the Bladen commission recommendations the government was increasing its grants to universities, and she also mentioned the role that the federal government was playing in technical and vocational education.

I do not think the government has achieved very much by this policy change because by even taking unto itself a role in the field of adult education it is still going to meet with objection from Quebec. Undoubtedly this is something which will come up when the next resolution is discussed but I wish to mention it briefly now.

According to an article by Claude Turcotte from Quebec city in yesterday's La Presse several senior officials of the Quebec government came to Ottawa to meet with the federal deputy minister who deals with education. They included Claude Morin, deputy minister of federal-provincial affairs, Arthur Tremblay and Yves Martin, deputy ministers of education, and Fernand Jolicoeur of the Quebec department of education. The article suggested that they were concerned about the provisions of the bill which the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is going to introduce to deal with adult education, and went on at one point to mention the possibility of another Trojan horse. I suggest that even in this field it may be necessary to make special arrangements with Quebec because it will not be satisfied with the federal role in adult education.

The whole point of all the speeches I have made on this subject is that we need national concern for post-secondary education. We will not achieve that if the federal government withdraws from the field even though it transfers certain funds to the provinces for that function.

We in the New Democratic Party are often accused of being very doctrinaire. In this instance it seems to me that the government is being doctrinaire. It has been sold a particular doctrine. I notice the hon. member for Hochelaga is in the chamber and I would like to hear from him on this subject, either on this or on the next resolution or on the two bills when we reach them.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, on the examination of this resolution, I should like to take the opportunity to make a few brief comments on education, a field in which the federal government is trying to intervene by every possible means.

• (3:10 p.m.)

As everyone knows, the province of Quebec keeps a jealous watch over its prerogatives in a field which, according to the constitution, belongs to the province, namely education. I was surprised, although it is true that I examined only briefly the statements made yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) when he said that the declarations of the Minister of Finance of Ottawa were not very compatible with the views of the hon. prime minister of Quebec on education. In a few minutes, I will put a question to the Minister of Finance with respect to a statement he made which surprised me very much and even left me puzzled. I am making specific reference to a statement he made concerning education and the rights of the province of Quebec.

Mention was also made of the fact that the province of Quebec seemed to be asking for favours as regards education. I suggest that the province of Quebec is not looking for favours in this field; it is only asking for that which belongs to Quebec as a matter of right. In this regard, I feel that the right to levy taxes should be left entirely to the province of Quebec, and this, precisely to enable it to deal with education. We should not be surprised to see Quebec going forward in various other fields. This is due to inaction in Ottawa. Might I point out, incidentally, that Bill No. 33 was introduced recently in the Quebec legislature. By so doing, Quebec wanted to serve the interests of the province, again because the federal government does not act according to the interests of the province of Quebec, not to the detriment of the other provinces, but in the interest of Quebec.

There is another field, that comes to my mind, in which Quebec is taking a stronger attitude, that of the C.B.C.. In Quebec, there is a great deal of talk about setting up a provincial corporation, because the C.BC serves the province poorly. I know what I am talking about because my own riding, where some people pay huge amounts in federal taxes, does not get any service from the C.B.C. As far as programming is concerned, I think that there again Quebec has something to say and it would not be surprising if before long something were heard in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to say more at the resolution stage. I hope the minister will make a more elaborate statement when the bill is introduced. We will have the opportunity to study the figures given by the minister during yesterday's debate.

Now, about the statement he made yesterday and which is found on page 13,682 of Hansard, left-hand column, I would like the minister to tell us exactly what he meant when he said:

> Only when parliament was prepared to acknowledge the exceptional priority of some provincial programs of expenditures—

And there, I am wondering why the federal government should approve the decisions of the province of Quebec in the field of education. And he added:

> —should the federal government recommend that taxes should be imposed or federal expenditures reduced for the purpose of financing a federal contribution toward provincial expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, that statement puzzles me and worries me greatly, because I do not think it is reasonable that the parliament in Ottawa, the federal government, should have anything to say in the decisions of a province, or the province of Quebec, in the field of education. I hope the minister will clarify that matter.

[Mr. Laprise.]

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, to me as well as to other members of our party it is extremely disappointing, despite all the evidence from every part of the country that the federal government must become more and more involved in the whole matter of education and manpower training if we are to utilize fully to the best possible degree the manpower resources of this country, that we are faced here and in the resolution with which we shall be dealing next with a proposal by the federal government to get out of an increasingly important aspect of manpower training, the field of technical and vocational education.

I must admit that I find this decision by the federal government completely incomprehensible. Every agency, public and private, which has looked at this problem has been urging the governments of Canada and the provinces, as well as the people of Canada, to pay increasing attention to technical and vocational training and to endeavour to get more young people to take the courses. In the face of this, in the face of quite impressive results based on the program that was begun by the former government under the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario, and in the face of the expansion of the program by this government which has worked well—if it has failed it is only because it has not been extended far enough—we have a decision by this government to vacate the field.

It is true that the provinces are promised some further percentage points in terms of income tax abatement so that they will hold the line where it is now, as proposed by this government. The federal government has expended a substantial amount of money in this field. I have received a table from the Department of Labour which shows just what has been done in the field of capital projects for technical and vocational training under the agreements between the federal and provincial governments from April, 1961 to March 31, 1966. The federal government spent just over $620 million. The province of Ontario took $300 million. The province of Quebec, despite the fears of some hon. members on both sides of the house that it was not quite constitutional, took over $117 million. The province of British Columbia took $52 million and the province of Manitoba, to my regret, took under $12 million. The expenditure of this money, however, has acted as a spur to the provinces to invest money of their own because they have to share in the expenditures.

In every province in Canada excellent and impressive technical and vocational schools have been built. An excellent job has been done. We ought to have more; we need more. In the face of this need what do we have here? We get the announcement of the government in this resolution that they are leaving this field to the provinces. Yesterday the Minister of Finance was pretty careful. It is difficult to pin down the fact that this is what the federal government is doing. If hon. members doubt that this is what the federal government is doing, I should like to refer them to a statement made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to the federal-provincial conference on October 25, 1966. I should like to put a few sentences from this statement on the record because I think in that statement he made very clear what the government is proposing to do. I will be as brief as possible in summarizing his statement. He said:

> We are determined to get out of shared cost programs in education ... for us to be involved in the school system in the name of technical and vocational training inevitably introduces distortions ... increasingly your decisions—

Meaning the decisions of the provinces.

> —as to what to do are influenced by a natural desire to get as much as possible out of the programs of which we will pay 50 per cent.

I think that is true and I think it is a good thing. The fact that the federal government has spent $620 million, which amount has been matched by the provinces, has given us the beginning of a technical and vocational school system for the first time in this country. For too many years 90 per cent of our students could not attend university because they could not afford to and were thrown out on the labour market without even the most minimal educational training to fill the available jobs. This program, which the former government initiated and this government has continued, for the first time is turning out individuals who will not attend university but will have the understanding and knowledge to fill jobs in our modern industrial society. Having accomplished this the government is now saying that it intends to throw the whole thing down the drain and let the provinces continue on their own.

• (3:20 p.m.)

As the leader of this party said a little while ago, you cannot divide the taxpayers, and when the government gets out of this program as this resolution proposes the provinces are going to have to pick up the tab. It makes little difference whether the individual pays taxes to the federal government, a provincial government or a municipality. When this program is abandoned by the government something else will suffer.

I am afraid that many provincial university building programs designed to meet the flood of students who will be attending universities in the next ten years will have to be scaled down because the provinces and local municipalities simply do not have the money to do everything that is required in this field of education.

Mr. Douglas: They are not even retraining the auto workers.

Mr. Orlikow: As my leader has pointed out, the minister a couple of days ago said that the problem in Oshawa of trying to find jobs for displaced auto workers is aggravated because there are not sufficient facilities to train these displaced workers. I presume they should be provided by the provinces but they are already strapped for money.

The minister is saying that the federal government is going to get out of the field of technical and vocational training. That is nonsensical, to put it mildly. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration also said in his statement of October 25:

> So, unless you are prepared to argue that we should have the permanent influence on your programs that shared-cost arrangements give us, I suggest that you must accept the principle of our withdrawal.

That is precisely what I intend to argue about because the federal government not only has the right but the responsibility to continue this kind of program in order to assist all provinces, particularly the poor ones. It has a responsibility to continue and extend this kind of manpower training program. While it may be possible for the province of Ontario or the province of British Columbia to finance their own programs, surely no one here would suggest that the province of Newfoundland or the province of New Brunswick could find the money required for this kind of program.

Because of the kind of mobility we now enjoy people from the "have-not" provinces such as Newfoundland and New Brunswick move to cities such as Toronto, Hamilton and Oshawa where they find it almost impossible to obtain work because they have not got the educational requirements to fill highly skilled jobs. It makes no sense at all to me to have a federal program which encourages the provinces to enter this kind of training plan alone but waits to help finance the training of these poorly educated students until they become unemployed workers. It makes no sense at all that we are prepared to assist in financing adult training programs but will have nothing to do with training programs of a technical and vocational nature for young people who are still attending school.

The Canadian Labour Congress at its convention in April, 1966 looked at this question very realistically and hard-headedly. In their statement on economic policy dealing with technological change in manpower policy they outlined a series of nine steps which the government should follow if it is to have an effective manpower training policy. I do not intend to read them all but I should like to refer to two.

The first suggestion was that we require a nation-wide network of adult training centres to retrain men and women for new jobs requiring greater or different skills. That is precisely what the minister proposes through the next resolution we will consider. The second suggestion is that we should have a massive program of technical and vocational training for adolescents and pre-employment youth to prepare them for the kind of labour market they will face on leaving school. Obviously these two things go hand in hand; yet the government is prepared to assist financially in programs for adult retraining but is not prepared to help finance the training of young people still attending school. It seems to me this is not only wrong in principle but that it is foolish if not idiotic.

It seems obvious to me that it is cheaper, better and more efficient to train young people while they are still living at home, because the only real cost is the cost of building schools, maintaining them and paying the teachers, than it is to wait until they are adults and unemployed. At that time we must pay not only the cost to build the schools, maintain them, pay the teachers and buy the supplies required but also pay living allowances or moving allowances and a whole host of other expenses.

Today during motions the minister made a statement about an extension of the government's program for manpower and mobility.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Like all members of the house I greeted it with approval but is it not obvious that it is better to provide training when people are 15, 16 or 17 rather than when they are in their 20's, 30's or 40's? I find it completely impossible to comprehend why the government would take this basically retrograde step. My colleague the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond hit the nail right on the head when he said what is involved here is not a matter of principle or basic philosophy in terms of education and manpower training but rather the feeling, particularly in the province of Quebec, that under the provisions of the B.N.A. Act the provinces have the sole right to make decisions in respect of education.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I respect the status of provinces and the feelings of the people of Quebec. The provinces must maintain their authority; but I do not believe that it is impossible to work out an agreement with the provinces in this field. I do not believe it is impossible to work out an agreement with the province of Quebec, which feels more strongly on this question than any other province. After all, the province of Quebec has agreed to accept federal financial assistance to maintain the universities of that province. Under the present agreement with regard to technical and vocational training it has accepted, as I mentioned earlier, $117 million for the building and maintenance of technical-vocational institutes. I do not believe that the province of Quebec cannot be persuaded to participate with the other provinces in a joint federal-provincial plan for technical-vocational education.

It may be that the way in which the province of Quebec will get its money will be different from the other nine provinces. That would not worry me at all because I believe—and I am certainly no expert on Quebec—that the province of Quebec is not quite like all the other provinces in this country. I do not say that in a critical manner but I believe it to be a statement of fact. I do not think this creates any insoluble problem for this country if it wants to solve its problems.

It seems to me that the difference between the province of Quebec and the other nine provinces could have been worked out and even now could be worked out. The government, in this resolution and in the bill which will be brought forward following passage of the resolution, is taking a retrograde step which not only will we all regret but which will have a very serious effect on the lives of the next generation in all parts of Canada. It is one which I personally regret a great deal.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, as has already been said, this is a very important resolution. I confess, and I am not alone in this feeling, that it is somewhat difficult to understand. I recall the injunction of the Minister of Finance that we must read these documents carefully, thoroughly and for a long time before we expatiate thereupon. Of course it is not at all new for the parliament of Canada to be dealing with measures which change the fiscal relationships between the provinces and the dominion. This has been done ever since 1867. I am always amused by people who talk about the B.N.A. Act as being a rigid and inflexible document. If one were to look at the changes in subsidies which have been written into the document he would see that on certain matters it has been frequently altered, and in every case this was essential.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North said that Quebec is not a province like the other provinces. Let me say that there is no province that is like any other, and at times all provinces have had to make special arrangements and have their special needs recognized.

A resolution of this kind is in large measure an emanation from a dominion-provincial conference and therefore we are suffering, as we have suffered in recent months and years, from insufficient information as to what goes on at these gatherings. I think we will have to develop some method whereby what is transacted at these gatherings is more fully and widely known. I have even seen the occasion when provincial ministers have come back from Ottawa and their stories as to what went on there did not correspond, or to be more mundane I might say that their stories as to what they got there did not correspond. I would suggest that this is certainly one area which will produce more dominion-provincial conferences.

Mr. Sharp: If the hon. member knows of any provincial ministers who are satisfied, will he let me have their names?

Mr. Macquarrie: I am sure the list is not very long, but some are less dissatisfied than others. It is another situation in which there is no similarity—and it is not surprising that it is lacking in this area—among the provinces as to the needs of the people. There is a great need for advances in all fields but at the same time there is a great inequality in the ability of the provinces to meet these needs.

I have looked carefully at the elaborate tables on revenue sources and revenue bases; the expression sometimes used for this is "fiscal ability" of the provinces. I think it is very difficult to measure fiscal ability. I think it would be unrealistic not to consider the potential fiscal ability of a province, and yet it is more difficult to measure than ever.

I suppose all of us tend to look at a measure of this kind at this stage of our debate in relation to the areas from which we come. I know that the Atlantic adjustment grants have been considered and, I presume, are being preserved. I hope they will be preserved as something separate and distinct and not subsumed in other funds upon which the calculations are based. The Atlantic provinces adjustment grants were made to the four eastern provinces as a token to compensate for many years of economic disparity which has continued through the years since confederation. I think that these grants must be regarded as sacrosanct over and above the other elaborate calculations for equalization grants. When we start the next stage of our discussions I am sure we will want to probe a little more carefully so as to discover where the Atlantic adjustment grants will fit in.

I was surprised to find that the province of Prince Edward Island, whose tax base is surely narrower than that of any other province, did not come out a little better in the mathematical calculations. Some time ago our premier came back with the report that we were going to be $200,000 better off, and he was not very proud of this. The leader of the opposition in our province made a quick calculation and said that this would not pay the skunk tax in the province of Prince Edward Island. I think that no formula could be devised which would give us as small an improvement as that.

I want to say a few words about another aspect of this very important measure.

Mr. Sharp: Will the hon. member permit a question? Perhaps he may be able to answer a question which has always troubled me. How is it that it costs me so many hundreds of millions of dollars to give so little to the provinces?

Mr. Macquarrie: I would say that the problem lies in the distribution of that money.

Mr. Sharp: But none of the provinces are satisfied.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Macquarrie: I am not quibbling about the total amount but about the direction which it has been given.

Of course the government has been and should be congratulated for the steps which it took some months ago consequent upon the Bladen report. The increases in grants to universities were large and they were welcome. However, we all know that they are inadequate. The needs of education in these days and in the years ahead are simply massive and monumental. We might just as well face up to the situation. There will be many more calls upon all levels of government.

Education is a national problem and it requires national leadership. Heaven knows, it requires national revenue as well. Having said that, we must all be very careful in this country to pay the proper respect to the sacred nature of provincial jurisdiction and to exalt the virtue of provincial control. I, too, am concerned about the technical and vocational problem. The period before junior matriculation is the period in which we face our greatest problem in education. This is the area in which we find the greatest number of drop-outs. It seems to me that we have to have, for the drop-out or the potential drop-out from our high school system, some alternative training program which is reasonably attractive, some wide range of options for young people whose minds must be trained to the highest degree possible even though for a variety of reasons they may not be suited to academic courses.

I agree with what was said about the program of the former government. I think it is one of the finest that any national government has established. The former minister of labour was indeed, as is his custom, far too modest about the contribution which he made to the development of these splendid technical and vocational schools across the country. They are being well attended and many young people are being given new opportunities to enter the labour force where, as we all know, the demand for skilled personnel is increasing day by day.

Here again in the field of education and technical training, the leadership came from the dominion level. It was good leadership and I am very proud of it. I am concerned, as was the last speaker, that the role of the dominion authorities will be diminished and will be phased out. I would feel much better if in this important area, where the dominion once had jurisdiction, it had remained because there will be no phasing out of the schools. You may phase out the program but these schools will be needed. There will be a growing stream of young people requiring the kind of training they can get from these schools.

There are other questions about the university structure that we will have. I should like to ask later about the perennial problem of the relationship of university population to provincial population as related to the various formulae set out here. I am not quite sure that the problems of the province with the small population but the large university population are being met. I hope they are. When we start discussing the bill we can make inquiries. To my concern about the phasing out of the technical and vocational program I would add my approval of the arrangement which has been made for post-secondary educational plans. If we can just find some way of meeting the financial needs of the more needy provinces, I would even approve of the first part.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few general remarks on this resolution which involves education. I believe many, if not most of those here, recognize this as the greatest social need in this country at the present time. We have had a good deal of talk in the past year about the operations of welfare programs which were demanded and needed by the people. In so far as education is concerned, we are talking about a social need which helps to produce the people who produce the gross national product that helps to pay for a good many of these welfare programs.

It seems a strange situation, but perhaps looking at some of the history of the present government it should not appear too strange, that there should be the apparent contradiction of the federal government starting to withdraw from its responsibilities toward education in the face of the great need for finances and leadership. I can quite appreciate the constitutional situation. Some hon. members have come out flatly and said that the British North America Act no longer needs revision. The hon. member for Queens says it has been a most flexible document in many ways so far as the provinces are concerned.

As other speakers have said this afternoon, we only have to look at the vocational training program commenced by the Diefenbaker government in 1960 to see that the federal government of that time moved into an area in which there was a vacuum. Heaven help Canadians today if that area had not been canvassed and entered by the federal government. I believe the approval of the province of Quebec six months after the other provinces came into the program gives the lie, Mr. Chairman, to the statement that the provincial governments would not, under a proper formula providing protection for provincial autonomy, enter into a federal program of education or take federal help. It is a contradiction, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot quite rationalize and I do not see how the Minister of Finance can rationalize it. I should like to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare try to rationalize it because only a few months ago we had a long debate on medicare which involved provincial jurisdiction and provincial sensitivity. However, the federal government, because of a plank that party had in its platform for 40 years, came along and said that we would have a type of medicare under which the federal government would not impose anything on the provinces. The government said these were basic guide lines.

All during that debate members opposite from the province of Quebec had no real disagreement or dispute with these guide lines. The provincial government could enter into the program if it so wished but it did not have to enter the program if it did not desire to do so. It seems to me that this fundamental contradiction is something which has Canadians wondering about the state of politics and the state of the leadership of the government, in that at one time this year we talked about guide lines in an area of provincial responsibility and two or three months later when we are talking about education, one of the great social needs of this country, the government hides behind the barrier of the constitution. The government attempts to say their hands are tied and they cannot give federal leadership. Worse than that, Mr. Chairman, they not only fail to give federal leadership but they are starting to withdraw from a field in which the federal government had participated.

The hon. member for Queens referred to the minister of labour in the previous administration, the hon. member for Ontario, and the bold program he started in 1960 which the provinces all joined. I wonder if the members of this committee truly appreciate the extent of that program and the fact that all provinces participated fully. One of the members to the left mentioned that federal participation involved a sum of over $600 million. Well, Mr. Chairman, during a three year period about 330,000 places were provided for students in vocational and technical training schools.

The area I come from is not one of the great industrial areas of the country, but several vocational schools were built there under this program two or three years ago and they are filled to capacity. In spite of this expansion during the last two years, unfortunately applicants for vocational training are still being turned down in large numbers. That indicates the state of the program at the present time, Mr. Chairman. Nevertheless, where would we in Canada be today if the federal government under the party to which I belong had not taken some initiative and trodden very carefully, so as to recognize not only the problems under the constitution but to institute a program which provided over 330,000 student places in two and a half to three years. Over 800 new schools or additions to existing schools were built during that two and a half to three year period and over $1,200 million was spent by the federal and provincial governments combined on that building program.

I suggest there is even greater need for education and skilled manpower in this day and age. In spite of the manpower problems which have arisen during the last two or three months as a result of the auto pact and in other areas as well, we would have been in an even more precarious position today had not the former government taken some initiative. The vocational training program alone shows that when a federal government is prepared to move in and take the lead and also respect the provincial jurisdiction, the provinces will also move into the vacuum. In 1960 there was a vacuum, but fortunately for Canada the government of that day stepped in to fill it.

We are now withdrawing and throwing the problem back to the provinces. Some provinces are capable of doing a good job whereas others are faced with certain problems. But the point is that the federal government is not providing national leadership. I can well understand the concern of the public over the fundamental distinction which is being made between guide lines for medicare but not for education. I should like to hear the Minister of Finance or the minister for health or somebody else on that side try to rationalize the apparent contradiction that exists in this proposition, which involves provincial jurisdiction.

There is another problem in connection with the transfer to the provinces of certain percentages of corporation and personal income taxes. In effect they are unconditional grants made to the provinces for their educational programs. Just as an aside, Mr. Chairman, and following upon what the hon. member for Queens said, I might point out that there was a good flow of information passing between federal and provincial representatives during the conference last fall. The initial proposals made by the federal government were somewhat confusing and the visiting provincial representatives were somewhat caught by surprise when they read about some of them in the newspapers even before they got to the conference table. But I think the minister and his officials are to be given credit for their give and take attitude with regard to some of the initial proposals, and the final results of the conference will undoubtedly be enshrined within the subject matter of the bill which is to follow this resolution.

I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that there are two points of view in connection with transferring a percentage of corporation and personal income taxes to the provinces. Some provinces and certainly some of the university officials are most concerned that these unconditional grants which are made to the provinces may not find their way into the university coffers. There have been examples in the not too distant past of moneys given to the provinces for educational purposes which did not find their way into the university stream.

Again, Mr. Chairman, this is an area, quite separate and apart from technical and vocational training, from which the federal government has withdrawn. It is an area which I think involves one of the most fluid segments of our society. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond quoted a speech made by the Secretary of State some time ago in which she said that education has no boundaries. In this day and age there is a much greater flow of manpower and skilled tradesmen from one province to another, but I would suggest there is not quite such a great flow in the vocational area as there is in the academic field. University graduates in my part of the country have to travel to other provinces because they cannot become absorbed in the rather limited economic climate prevailing in the Atlantic area.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that in certain parts of Canada there is a tremendous influx of one of the most fluid segments of society. In other areas the federal government is withdrawing from this mainstream of society, leaving its control strictly to the provinces, and is hiding behind the strait-jacket of the constitution.

Three or four months ago the minister of health was bold enough to stand up time and again to defend the medicare program, a program which touches the very areas from which the Minister of Finance is now trying to withdraw. No wonder the public are looking for some leadership and direction in this area, Mr. Chairman, and it seems to me they are somewhat bewildered at this apparent paradox.

I wanted to make those two general points at this time. Certainly the vocational and technical program has proven the need, and the medicare bill which was passed by this house a few months ago showed that the government will take responsibility in some areas. In other areas the government prefers to hide. The only people who will be the losers are the students and the young people of the country who pass through the educational process and move into the mainstream. In these days of easier travel people are not so hesitant to move from one province to another across the land. I am given to understand that one out of every three persons in the United States moves from one part of the United States to another during the course of his lifetime, and similar figures exist for Canada indicating a tremendous movement of people. Yet in respect of those who have the greatest potential for movement throughout the country, namely, our students who receive university education, no federal guide lines or direction are provided.

What is even worse, Mr. Chairman, or could be worse, is the fact that the federal government has refused to impose any conditions upon the moneys provided to the provinces. The provincial grants committees and the university heads are somewhat concerned how the money provided by this transfer of corporation and personal income taxes will be funnelled into the provinces. Let me take, for example, the province of British Columbia where you have the University of British Columbia, a strong and historic institution, competing for funds with Victoria College in Victoria and Simon Fraser University on Burnaby mountain. I have had some association with British Columbia in that I lived there for six or seven years, and I know there are some areas of discontent amongst those three universities, just to pick one province out of the hat. In areas where the federal government withdraws from the educational field I suggest the problems may be compounded. In general, I think it is a retrograde step to ignore the reasoning that was followed when the medicare legislation was passed.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Chrétien: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: I was about to conclude. Yes.

Mr. Chrétien: Is the hon. member not aware that there is no contradiction in government policy toward education and medicare, because after a five-year study and implementation period we shall turn the administration of the program over to the provinces. It is the same with education. There is a federal-provincial agreement under which we shall turn the program back to the provinces. Exactly the same philosophy applies.

Mr. Nowlan: At least with the medicare program guide lines were set out. There were four basic guide lines for provinces wishing to qualify under the medicare program. There are no federal government guide lines in this resolution. The government gave direction under the medicare program; whether one agreed with the principle or not, direction was given; no direction is being given with respect to education.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief observations. I must say that on this important and complex resolution that I am not quite as pessimistic as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat about what we shall ultimately obtain with this type of agreement.

I listened to both ministers last night with interest, and listened to the outline of the six principles that are the result of agreements with the provinces. We wholeheartedly endorse these principles as being in keeping with the philosophy of the beginnings of cooperation between the federal and provincial government to meet certain needs and requirements in this country.

Before going further I want to say this: Frequently I run into people who do not seem to realize that no government can give anybody anything, whether that government be federal, provincial or municipal, without taking something away from somebody else. I have met so many people who think that the government can take something from some other source. They think you can take something out without replacing it. We must show our people in Canada that they can have anything they want, provided they are willing to pay for it.

Mr. Sharp: They are all the same taxpayers.

Mr. Herridge: That is right; they are the same taxpayers. I have had letters recently, not from my constituency, because my people are philosophically sound, but from people in eastern Canada, showing that they have no conception of costs and how these things are met. I do think that this resolution does represent a demonstration of an effort between the federal and provincial governments to get together and to come to agreements with respect to division of taxes and the acceptance of certain responsibilities. To that extent I rejoice in this first step toward, shall I say, what will finally be known as federalism or federal-provincial co-operation.

I listened with great interest to some hon. members speaking about technical and vocational training features of this resolution. I have always been interested in this question. I know there are quite a number of boys and girls dropping out of high school who are not interested in academic training, but who are interested in using their hands and heads in other fields. There is great opportunity here for the development of technical and vocational training and I give the government credit for what has been envisaged to this extent. I hope this program will be continued and improved. There is a great place in Canada for it under present circumstances.

This debate has been informative and interesting. I have risen particularly as a result of the remarks made by the previous speaker. I think members of the house and of the public should be better informed about what happens in federal-provincial conferences on questions of the type we are discussing. Would the minister tell us how this conference was called, or how the arrangements were made for the calling of the conference. What was the general procedure at the conference? Did the provinces one after the other make submissions on topics or did they make a submission in total, with other submissions being made afterwards? How were amendments moved? How was agreement reached between the various provinces during the discussion? What was the general atmosphere, the spirit at these conferences? That is important. Knowing that is more important, perhaps, than knowing about figures alone.

I think hon. members would like to be informed about how the conference was developed and how it was handled; also, what was the response of the provincial premiers at the conference to the various steps discussed, and to the final agreement that I understand was signed by all provinces? What has been the response of the premiers and governments of the various provinces since the agreements were signed, as a result of changing circumstances? Could the minister give us information in this respect? It would help us to understand the general atmosphere prevailing during the period of discussions.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I might answer the last question first by reference to a report of the federal-provincial tax structure committee which met in Ottawa on September 14 and 15, 1966. For those members of the committee interested in knowing the positions of the respective governments, this is the official source of reference. I have tabled all these documents in the house from time to time.

In this document there is an account of the formation of the tax structure committee, the meetings it has held and their outcome. The report I have in my hand is a report of the federal-provincial tax structure committee, and it contains submissions made by the federal government and by each of the provincial governments. When we met subsequently, in October, I, on behalf of the federal government presented further refinements of the federal position based on discussions we had had in September. I made a report to the federal-provincial conference presided over by the Prime Minister. At that conference the Prime Minister confirmed that the proposals put forward by the federal government were in fact the proposals he would recommend to parliament.

The short answer to the other question is that there are no agreements at federal-provincial conferences. Indeed, since there are no written documents as to the division of tax fields or as to the acceptance of equalization payments, and so on, the only agreements reached are for administrative matters such as tax collection agreements. The federal government agrees to collect taxes on behalf of the provincial governments, and to turn revenues over to them.

I can assure the hon. member that when it comes to the division of tax fields the federal government ultimately has to say, "These are the taxes we propose to levy" and the provincial governments have to decide that there are other taxes that they propose to levy; and, we hope by consultation and mutual consideration of each other's plans, that we have put together a pattern that is not illogical. I do not think it would be agreeable to this house, for example, if it were to be bound in its decisions of what are appropriate tax policies for Canada through the federal government's entering into agreements with the provinces with respect to the division of tax fields to the point where the freedom of this parliament to legislate with respect to taxes was in any way hampered.

In the bill, to be founded on this resolution, the federal government will be putting forth proposals that it put before the provinces. I can assure the hon. member that not one of the provinces liked them; not one. They all felt that the federal government was being niggardly, and they raised all sorts of questions about the future, and how we were to have all sorts of revenues and the provinces would go further into debt. I commented on this attitude from time to time during the conference. I can assure the hon. member that if that indeed were the prospect we would not have had to implement a mini-budget to raise $250 million; we would have plenty of revenues to meet all expenditures. In fact, in this house we all know that that is not so.

It is true that our prospects for obtaining revenues are better than the prospects of provinces or municipalities, but we have no surplus to turn over. The best we can hope for is that we have taxation systems that are mutually compatible and that permit the economic growth of this country. We shall continue to meet in the future, as provinces meeting with the federal government, to discuss tax problems.

• (4:10 p.m.)

The Carter commission presents us with a new problem altogether, and one of the reasons for my urging that this report should be studied very carefully, and one of the reasons I am very careful not to make any judgments about this matter, is that I want an opportunity to discuss this subject with the provinces, who are very much concerned with the recommendations of the Carter commission. I want to do this before making any recommendations to my colleagues or to this house about changes in the present system.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Sharp thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-277 to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF COSTS, AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the training of adults wishing to undertake occupational training; to authorize the entering into of contracts with provinces and employers to provide for the payment of the costs incurred in providing occupational training to those adults and to authorize the payment of charges for tuition or otherwise for the training of adults in occupational training courses not operated by a province or an employer; to authorize the payment of training allowances to certain adults undertaking occupational training; to authorize agreements with the provinces respecting research in respect of occupational training and the making of loans to provinces to assist in the purchase or construction of occupational training facilities; to authorize transitional agreements and arrangements with the provinces related to the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act; and to provide further for other related and incidental matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Batten in the chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, last June this house passed the Training Allowances Act. It provided substantially increased training allowances for unemployed workers. In addition, under this act, the workers preserved their unemployment insurance rights while they took training.

As a result of this legislation, the concept of training in Canada has been altered. For the first time, people with adult responsibilities are being granted allowances generous enough to enable them to take training courses. This put an end to the previous dependence of training on the unemployment insurance plan. From here on vocational training ranks with work; it is no longer associated with unemployment or welfare.

The measure I propose today is the logical development of the policy that I had the honour to introduce last year. It is a greatly extended program for the training and retraining of members of the labour force. It is an explicit recognition of the federal responsibility for the over-all performance of the economy, and the advancement of the workers on whom that performance depends.

This new program is an integral part of a national manpower policy whose basic purpose is to bring economic opportunity within the reach of Canadian workers.

The resolution proposes to extend training services and training allowances to all persons with adult responsibilities who can benefit from training. Whether a man or woman is eligible for training will not depend on whether he or she is employed, unemployed, underemployed, or self-employed.

The program will respond directly to the person's need for training, not to his statistical classification. The question is whether he will benefit substantially from training, whether it will make his earning power greater in future, whether his contribution to the economy will be increased.

Adult training, as the Economic Council of Canada and many others have pointed out, is one of Canada's most urgent needs. It is a national problem requiring a solution that can be implemented right across the country. But the program must, of course, be administered in full co-operation with the provinces. It must be sensitive to local needs. The federal functions under the program will be discharged by our strengthened and decentralized Canada Manpower Centres. It will be part of the range of services which these centres offer workers who need a second chance to acquire the skills and knowledge they must have to compete in today's dynamic labour market.

I would like to emphasize that this program is not concerned with young people at school but with people who have been in the labour force for some time and intend to stay in it.

This does not mean that the federal government feels that the education of youth is unimportant. Obviously, it is vital to our development. But we are a federal country—which means, though it is often forgotten, that some things that are vital are the responsibility not of this parliament but of the provinces.

The education of youth is a provincial, not a federal responsibility. During the past six years the federal government has contributed greatly to the capital costs of provincial facilities for technical training. The arrangement was made for six years. It was mostly capital, not operating assistance, because such federal activity in a provincial field could not and should not be thought of as permanent.

Accordingly, the Prime Minister announced last October the termination or phase-out of cost-sharing agreements in this field. Financially, they are more than replaced by unconditional fiscal transfers designed to make it possible for provinces to respond to the rapidly expanding needs of post-secondary education.

Those needs, financially, are very great. But when we think of people, we must recognize that the needs of adults are very different from those of continuing students.

First, there is a financial difference. The adult has been earning an income. He has been using that income to support himself or members of his family. They and he cannot afford to have his income cut off. If he is going to take training, he must be provided with an alternative income from public sources.

The need is in this respect much the same as the need for unemployment insurance. But I think we would all agree that the amount should be appreciably larger. Training is work. And training should not prejudice a man's future protection in the form of his rights to unemployment insurance benefits. What is the same is the principle of an income support.

Second, adult training is different from school education because quite a lot of it can best be carried on, not in a teaching institution, but within industry. This, plainly, is a growing trend. It makes a great deal of sense. But we cannot expect a company to do a great deal of training that may help a man get a job with other firms, unless government bears a good part of the cost.

Third, adult training is most directly related to full employment and improved productivity. It is true, of course, that the quality of education also has an important influence, as young people enter the labour force. The training provided to adults has a direct impact on employment and productivity. Therefore, it is of current, direct concern to the federal government.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Obviously, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean that the federal government should provide the training. Provincial governments and industry are both already in that business and there is no reason for us to join them. But we do have the responsibility for seeing that provincial governments and industry have customers, and that means we have to pay the customers' bills.

This is the responsibility we propose to assume. Instead of being involved 50 per cent and 75 per cent in a variety of technical and vocational education programs, we propose to take 100 per cent financial responsibility for the adult, the person who has left school to earn his living but now needs retraining or further training.

We want to provide a second chance to the people who need it most. These are the men and women who missed the chance to acquire a skill during their youth or whose skill has been made obsolete by technological change. They are the people whose whole lives can be changed, dramatically in many cases, by giving them the occupational training they need.

Occupational training will be provided in courses of 12 months or less. The experience of the last six years has shown what can be accomplished in this way. But it has also shown that many mature adults lack the basic arithmetic, scientific and linguistic facility they need to learn a new occupation. The provinces have developed accelerated courses to provide adults with this background material, and the program will pay for any such basic training that is needed for an occupational skill. To put it another way, our concern is with the skills, but when people must have basic background to learn the skills the program will meet both necessary parts of the total cost.

The provinces have built up extensive systems for providing the type of training adults need. We wish to make use of these facilities and we will pay the provinces for training the adults we refer to their courses.

Occasionally we will need to make use of private training facilities, but we will do so only when a province cannot, at the time, provide the type of training a man needs at a school near where he lives. We will not use private facilities unless it is necessary and the province agrees that it cannot meet the need.

The program will give the employment counsellors in our Canada manpower centres an effective means of helping adult workers adapt to changing occupational and employment conditions. One of the major functions of these centres is to seek out opportunities and make sure that people are aware of them. To discharge this responsibility we must know which occupations to train people for. Misplaced or misguided training is an economic waste and a human tragedy. This is another reason why this program must be implemented through the Canada manpower centres, if it is to be effective and equitable. They will have the necessary information on labour market trends and prospects. This is the only way to keep adult training and retraining closely related to the changing needs of the labour market, and so most helpful to individual workers and employers.

In industry I should make it plain that the program is not designed to pay for the kind of on-the-job training, in a particular job, that is a normal and necessary part of industrial costs. We are concerned with the kind of general training that a worker can take with him from job to job. Where a company provides that kind of training the program will pay both the cost of running the course and an element of reimbursement of the wages the company pays workers while they are learning. But, while the program will normally apply to what might be called "classroom" training in industry, it will also be available for on-the-job training when workers' jobs are threatened by technological change, and extensive retraining by their employer is necessary to help people adapt to new ways of working.

Besides paying living allowances and buying the necessary training services, the program will help provinces to acquire the buildings and equipment to provide the services. This will be done by lending them money to build adult training facilities.

They could take up to 30 years to repay, out of the money the federal government provides, by including the renting of facilities in the costs of the courses we pay for. In effect adult training facilities will cost the provincial taxpayers nothing, and the provinces will have free buildings after 30 years.

The training allowances which will be extended to all trainees who are established members of the labour force will initially be paid at the levels which have been agreed with the provinces under the Training Allowances Act. This means that training allowances will range from $35 to $90 a week as is the case now, depending on family circumstances and living costs. The upper and lower limits will escalate with increases in the general wage level. The actual scales, between those limits, will be settled in consultation with each province so as to fit in with wage conditions in different areas.

I think, Mr. Chairman, I have made it clear that this program is designed to provide a sounder basis for co-operation with the provinces in the years ahead. That co-operation is essential to the success of all our efforts. It is with the provinces that we will contract for the training services that they and their municipalities provide. When it is necessary to purchase services from private training organizations, that will not be done without provincial agreement. Some provinces already have extensive programs for training in industry; our contributions will be put within the framework that already exists. In addition, we stand ready to share with the provinces the costs of research and development which are needed to establish sound and effective occupational training courses for adults.

The new program outlined in this resolution involves important changes. It moves us from shared-cost agreements with the provinces to different principles of co-operation which I believe will be healthier in every way and give us better value for money. But such a change cannot be implemented abruptly.

On April 1, when the present agreements expire, there will be many people in the midst of courses. To avoid disruption we will continue to share the provincial costs of training such people until they have finished their present courses.

The very substantial capital grants which have been made to the provinces under the current shared-cost arrangements for building secondary, post-secondary and adult and technical and vocational training facilities will be phased out gradually. They will continue at 75 per cent cost-sharing rate until each province has received $480 for every person in its 1961 youth population. In addition, a further $320 per person will be available for the same purpose at a 50 per cent sharing rate. The provinces have already received nearly $600 million through these grants; they will receive a further $550 million under this phase-out arrangement. Funds will be available for exactly the same purposes as before, but there will now be no time limit on their use. In short, this arrangement assures equal treatment for all provinces despite the very different rates at which they have in the past been able to utilize the cost sharing program.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I think this is all I need say about this new program at this time. I believe it is most important. It is a measure which will help the men and women of the Canadian labour force make the adaptations to changing conditions which the world today requires. By making it genuinely possible for people to break out of occupations which offer only under-employment, intermittent unemployment, and poor prospects, we open up new opportunities for people and accelerate the growth and development of our country. We cannot afford any other course of action.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the minister before he sits down. I should like to ask him whether he has any information about, first, the number of training centres which he says now are available and carried on by the provinces; second, the number of adults province by province now in such training centres and, perhaps most important of all, whether he and his advisers have made any estimate concerning the number of adults who in the next few years expect to be able to take advantage of the plan he has outlined.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, I will take these questions as notice. I think I can obtain this information and as soon as I am in a position to supply it to the hon. gentleman I shall be glad to do so.

[Translation]

Mr. Régimbal: Mr. Chairman, I find it strange that such an incident should occur a second time. Following the comments made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand), a member of the party sitting on the Speaker's left asked questions, thus trying to get around the very obvious difficulty of stating his party's position, not knowing what the hon. minister was going to say.

Naturally, since we had no idea of what the minister was going to say, our comments at this stage will be very brief.

In general, I feel that we cannot but commend the proposal being introduced this afternoon, particularly when one considers that it is based on the following principle: a person who is in difficulty, who is unemployed, should not rank among the needy, the beggars, his personal dignity having suffered enough already because of his present unemployment. One must necessarily give favourable consideration to any piece of legislation that will contribute to the development of the human person.

Everyone agrees that it is urgent to give reorientation or training to thousands of workers. Everyone is happy to see that new skilled workers are trained and that people are given the means to develop the skills needed because of technological changes and the moving or concentration of industries. Finally, no one can object if the provinces are kept informed of every initiative, if they are called upon to participate and to accept the services offered.

However, some safeguards should be included in the bill when it is introduced. Various efforts were made in the past with regard to retraining and vocational training but they have not necessarily given the results hoped for. That is why it is necessary to go about it with great caution in view of what happened in the past.

For instance, I have in mind the danger that may arise from training formulas concentrating only on the training of skilled labour and on the development of new techniques, because, unless we make sure in advance—and those things happen—that there is a market for such crafts, we will find ourselves in a situation where, instead of having one unemployed tinsmith in a given area, we will have, if there are eight applicants, nine unemployed tinsmiths. There will always be a very close relationship to be established between the crafts to be developed and the market open to those who are going to engage in such crafts, considering particularly that you have to ascertain not only the crafts and occupations required, but also to what extent people willing to train will agree to move to where opportunities are, once they have received that training.

Mention has been made recently of mines in outlying areas in urgent need of skilled workers. Let us suppose that people were trained in a central place to meet that requirement. If those people refuse to go where jobs are available, they will have been trained to no avail and it will be necessary to start all over again and offer them another type of training. Therefore, it will be most interesting to study the provisions of the bill to be submitted.

There is, I am sure, some contradiction in the fact that professional training opportunities are being provided when, at the same time, the number of existing training centres is being reduced. I am referring particularly to the phasing out of the vocational schools where it would possibly be more practical to ensure that such premises are fully utilized.

This afternoon, during discussion on the preceding resolution, occasional mention was made of education and provincial rights. I think it must be fully realized that any province demanding its provincial rights is not seeking autonomy as an end in itself, but as a means to ensure the development of its heritage and of its citizens.

In such a case, any new situation likely to affect the well-being and the normal development of the citizens should always have a certain priority. This justifies, for instance, the direction and the measures which the federal government wants to present to the provinces, even though they might accept or reject them. The fact that the provinces are sensitive about some fields which, up to now, were considered for specific reasons areas of provincial responsibility, must not restrict the initiatives that the federal government must take, with regard to the full development of our national economy. I am sure that the provinces need no particular spokesman, in one corner of the house or another, to state their rights. The provinces have all the necessary means to put a stop to it if, at one time or another, they feel that there is a negative encroachment on their rights.

Something special may come out of this initiative in the field of training. We talk more and more about training through television, for instance.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I believe that education through television is possible in this field. If provincial authorities denied residents the opportunity to take part in training programs through the television medium, claiming exclusive rights in the field of education and training, these authorities would have a very difficult time trying to explain these restrictions imposed on the citizen.

We speak of training. In the same line of thought, I am sure that before very long there will be televised classes in the schools, in those provinces where an agreement is reached as to a uniform program, so long as the fundamental rights of each province are respected. In my opinion, this particular aspect of the question represents a positive step; it is a step forward.

I believe the hon. minister and his government are worthy of commendation in this respect. But we will wait for the bill which will reveal the process or the means by which this principle will be implemented and applied to industry and schools. We will then be able to make more intelligent and surely more complete comments—

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: I am sure the broad general principles enunciated by the minister will be welcomed by every member of the house and by every person who has looked at the problem in respect of full employment, and manpower training and retraining in our complex society. Having said that we greet the general principles warmly I must say that if one compares what the minister said today with the results of past programs he will realize the tremendous distance we must cover in the next year or two to implement the things about which the minister spoke.

We welcome the announcement of the minister that training allowances will be paid by the government to people taking training, and that this will in no way jeopardize unemployment insurance benefits. We also welcomed the announcement that 100 per cent of the bills for retraining of students will be paid by the government. This is precisely what I suggested during an earlier debate in relation to tax arrangements, namely that the federal government should accept its responsibilities to help those people who come from or live in have-not provinces.

We will be watching very carefully the details as to how the minister proposes to do these things. We will carefully scrutinize the estimates of the minister's department, the number of centres that will be open and the number of people who are trained. There is, however, a tremendous if not immeasurable gulf between these broad general principles enunciated by the minister and the realities of situations.

Mr. George Bain has an article in the Globe and Mail today under the heading "Have Job—Will Travel". Mr. Bain does have a job and does travel. This article was written in Stockholm and deals with a program which has been in existence in Sweden for a number of years. I commend this article to the minister because it outlines a program which works, and which is far superior to anything this or any other government has established to date. This is the kind of program which if emulated, would allow this government to accomplish a great deal.

Mr. Bain points out that in Sweden the national labour market board, which does essentially the job carried out by the minister's department in Canada, is empowered to retrain a Swedish worker, to pay his and his wife's way to another town to look after a new job, to help him while he gets settled there, to support her and the family in the old place until he can find a home for them, and to move them. This board can even buy the old house, if it happens to be in a part of the country where the population is declining and the person being moved could sell it otherwise only at a loss.

Mr. Bain spells out some of the details of this program. In part he writes:

> An unemployed, or about-to-become-unemployed worker, can obtain retraining which may extend up to two years. His basic monthly allowance during that period will be $90 (allowing five Swedish crowns to the dollar), plus $15 for his wife, and $12 a month for each child—$129 in all, for a man with two children.
> (If the same man has to leave his home area to take retraining, he will get about 1,100 Swedish crowns a month, or $220, the amount being flexible to include the total cost of his rent. In all cases, these allowances are tax free.)

Later on Mr. Bain writes this:

> For instance, to help provide for the upkeep of his family while he finds a new home for them, the worker who goes to a new place is entitled for 12 months to $44 a month for his wife, $12 for each child, moving expenses when they move, and a so-called installation grant of $411, plus $30 for each child, to help get the new home going.

This is the kind of program which has been in existence for some time in Sweden. It seems to be the kind of program the minister was referring to in broad generalities, but it is not the kind of program we have had in Canada up to now. We have had training programs, but I suppose one could not expect that a training program which started late should be successful at the beginning.

People who have been close to workers and unemployed people, such as representatives of trade unions, whether or not they are affiliated with the Canadian Labour Congress or the Confederation of National Trade Unions, have known from firsthand observation that these training programs were not working.

Program No. 5 had from its inception a fantastically high drop-out rate because the allowances were inadequate. The individuals taking advantage of that program could not continue to do so because they could not maintain their families. It was obvious to these workers and everybody else that if they finished the program they would get better work at higher rates of pay, but that was little consolation when they could not afford to keep their families.

It is true that we have increased very substantially the amounts allowed. However, I think we have to keep a constant eye on whether we are doing enough so that workers who are unemployed will be persuaded that it pays them and their families to make the effort to study under the retraining programs which will be offered, so that they can improve themselves.

One of the difficulties we have had in the past, and which we continue to have in a country as large as Canada, is that very often the jobs available—and in the period of high economic activity which we are now experiencing there is a great number of jobs available—in Hamilton, Toronto or Vancouver, to mention just three of the areas in which there is the highest rate of economic activity, are of little use to the unemployed worker in Newfoundland, Cape Breton or the Gaspé peninsula, even if he has the training to fill the job which is open, if he cannot afford to move his family. When we study the details of the program which the government will be instituting, and when we study in particular the question of retraining, we will have to consider this fact because there will be little purpose in retraining people if we do not enable them to move to the kind of jobs which they have been trained to fill.

The fact is that we have not had this kind of training program in the past. Mr. J. Fenwick, assistant to the director of the largest district covered by the United Steelworkers of America has given particular attention to this problem. In a speech made to a conference convened by the Canadian Labour Congress to deal with manpower training, held about this time last year, he reported that a survey of almost 100,000 workers carried out by their union showed that the training program on the job covered only 1,400 workers out of that group. This is just not good enough. In the same survey it was found that the basic steel fabricating, aluminum and mining companies had only 505 apprentices. Again this is not good enough. While I commend the government for the program establishing these manpower training centres which the minister has announced, it is my opinion that, even though the federal government is prepared to put up substantially more money than it has done in the past, the program will fail unless the people involved are made aware of it, unless they are told the kind of allowances that will be paid and the kind of training which they can receive.

Until now this information has not been made available so that one union leader after another has reported that his members and the workers with whom he has come in contact are almost completely ignorant of the existing training programs. I hope the new Department of Manpower and Immigration will set up advisory committees of labour and industry so that the information about the kind of programs which the minister has announced today will be made available to unions and to management, and that the minister and his department will go out, in cooperation with labour and management, and do a selling job to convince people that there is hope for them, that they should avail themselves of the opportunities which are now being provided by the government, and that it is in their interest and in the interest of their families that they avail themselves of the retraining programs and thus upgrade their skills and knowledge.

We may have heard an excellent speech from the minister, and he may have enunciated very important principles which will be useful to the working population of Canada, but without this kind of aggressive program of education and salesmanship—although I am not particularly enthused by the term "salesmanship"—I am afraid that this program will fail, as have past programs.

In closing I would urge the minister, in introducing the bill, to give the members of the house the information requested by my colleague, the hon. member for York South, as to the amount of money which the government envisages will be allocated to this program over the next two or three years, the number of people it is expected can be trained, the number of manpower centres which will be established, and all the other information which was requested, so that the house can be assured that the government is serious about this program, that it intends to proceed with the retraining of the people of Canada who need the kind of training about which the minister has spoken, and so that we can get a meaningful program rather than just the excellent speeches we have so often heard in the last half dozen years.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, in the next two minutes I want to say that the minister's explanation of this adult training program does in fact confirm the objections I raised to resolution which appears as order number 135, namely that it leaves a gap. This program is only for people who have been in the labour force and are now unemployed, and who can enhance their opportunity for getting a job by retraining. This legislation does not cover the young unemployed adults, the dropouts from high school who did not get the best secondary education either in vocational training schools or universities.

It seems to me that the legislation does not cover this group. The minister cannot justify the gap by saying that the federal government has no jurisdiction in the area of education, in view of the fact that there is now before the house a resolution which stands as item 135 on the order paper and which provides for large federal grants for post-secondary education purposes. Neither of the two acts covers young people up to the age of 18 or 19 who have not achieved the scholastic or academic standing necessary to obtain junior matriculation.

The minister might say that the provinces can pick up the tab; but why should the full responsibility for retraining these young people be put on the provinces, if the federal government finds that there is justification for retraining post-secondary students and adults? To leave this gap does not make sense to me.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Marchand thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-278, respecting the occupational training of adults.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pennell: May I be permitted to announce the business of the house for Monday? The government proposes to call item 119, third reading of Bill No. C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and repeal the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act; item 135, second reading of the bill dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements; item 63, Bill No. C-190 respecting the Bank of Canada Act; item 136, Bill No. C-257, respecting the Canada Corporations Act; item 137, the resolution concerning the amendment to the Parliamentary Secretaries Act, and then item 74, the Bank Act. I would ask the indulgence of the house because it may be necessary to reverse the order of item 136, the Canada Corporations Act and item 137, the Parliamentary Secretaries Act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the minister confident that the bill based on the resolution which stands as item 135 will be available in time? If it is not available until Monday morning, I doubt if there will be time to give such an important bill the necessary study.

Mr. Pennell: The minister gave me the assurance that the bill was printed and ready for distribution upon the passing of the resolution. I would agree with the observations of the hon. member if the bill were not printed, but I have been assured it is, and that it is Bill No. C-277.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I ask if the bill based on the resolution, item 134, will be coming up again? I refer to the one we were discussing this afternoon.

Mr. Pennell: No, it is not being called for Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTENSION OF ORDER GOVERNING HOURS OF SITTING

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member who is about to address the house, but by leave I should like to revert to motions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pennell: I move:

That the order of the house adopted on February 20, 1967, suspending the sittings of the house from seven o'clock p.m. to eight o'clock p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays and from one o'clock to two o'clock p.m. on Fridays be extended for a further two week period commencing March 6, 1967.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, by consent may we stand items 1 to 9 on today's order paper under "Public Bills", and take item No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree to stand public bills on today's order paper, items 1 to 9?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Pennell.]

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

MEASURE TO PERMIT PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS TO CONDUCT LOTTERIES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-38, to amend the Criminal Code (provincial lotteries).

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, for the fifth consecutive year I have the honour to introduce a bill to amend section 179 of the Criminal Code, in order to make an exception to that legislation and enable or authorize provincial governments, which would like to do so, to establish their own provincial schemes intended solely and strictly for provincial purposes, especially welfare and education as well as any other responsibility falling under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I have made five attempts to try to convince my colleagues of the House of Commons by substantive arguments, reports of investigations and finally by indications of popular opinion, that it is time for the government to change its policy on this matter and yield to the evidence that a majority of people is asking that provincial governments be authorized to legalize the organization of lotteries in provinces.

During previous discussions, certain members representing various parties in the house have supported the substance and the letter of the legislation which I introduced during those past years.

All the spokesmen of the parties have approved the principle that I would like to stress, and no one has opposed either this bill or its implications.

Unfortunately, however, they resorted to the well-known process of stifling with praise and kind words this bill which I shall again attempt to have accepted by this house. I hope that today the house will express its views by a vote, and that we shall not have recourse to dilatory practices to prevent the passage of a bill which seems to fulfil the wishes of the public at large.

I wish to thank the N.D.P. and Social Credit members, and even the government members who supported me in the past in my efforts initiated many years ago while I tried to persuade my colleagues that it was high time for the house to take a clear and definite stand on this matter.

Since I failed in my attempts, Mr. Speaker, I decided to conduct a national investigation myself, that is, I attempted to ascertain the consensus of opinion in each province. It seems to me that the work I performed was incumbent upon the governmental authorities, particularly the Minister of Justice and Attorney General (Mr. Cardin) who is responsible for such an amendment. Well, owing to the department's inertia, I would say, in this respect, I personally undertook to conduct such an investigation.

I am happy to have the opportunity today to let my colleagues in the house know the results of this investigation conducted through most of the Canadian municipalities, either through the mayor himself or through the municipal councils.

Over the past two years I have sent a questionnaire to many Canadian municipalities from Halifax to Vancouver, including the Northwest Territories. I wanted to establish unequivocally whether Canadians in general, and provincial residents in particular would favour an amendment to the Criminal Code in order to allow the provinces to have their own lottery system.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I have here a large collection of these questionnaires that I had sent to the mayors. I urge hon. members to consult this huge file. Every answer has been listed, province by province, in that record which I am ready to put at the disposal of the Department of Justice so that it can confirm or invalidate the result of that investigation which leaves no doubt concerning the general approval of my initiatives and those of a great number of Canadians who devoted themselves in the past to advocate this idea of provincial lotteries.

I wish to emphasize the splendid work done over many years by one Mrs. English, of Calgary, who gathered more than 500,000 signatures for a petition in favour of the establishment of a lottery in Canada, a few years ago.

The result of my investigation supports that petition and, moreover, adds opinions from each of the provinces.

For instance, from the province of Manitoba, where 1 sent 43 questionnaires, I received 18 answers, 11 of which were for and 7 against. From Saskatchewan, out of the 44 questionnaires I forwarded, I received 23 answers, 20 favourable and 3 unfavourable. In Alberta, 31 municipalities answered favourably and 6 unfavourably. Out of the 86 questionnaires sent to British Columbia, I received 56 answers, 47 of which were favourable and only 4 unfavourable. In the Northwest Territories, I sent one questionnaire and the answer was unfavourable. From Newfoundland, out of 21 municipalities, 7 answered favourably and one unfavourably. From Prince Edward Island, two declared themselves in favour and none against. From Nova Scotia, out of 19 answers received, 13 were favourable and 2 unfavourable. From New Brunswick, out of 14 answers, 8 were favourable and 3 unfavourable. Ontario, of course, gave much more significant answers, in view of the great number of municipalities in that province. Out of the 233 questionnaires I sent, I received 111 answers, 94 of which were favourable and 8 only were opposed. In the province of Quebec, out of the 207 questionnaires I sent, I received 135 answers, 134 were favourable and one opposed.

Mr. Speaker, out of 428 replies received from municipalities across the land, 367 were in favour of provincial lotteries and only 36 were against. That is a clear and explicit expression of the Canadian people's opinion on the possibility of setting up a system of provincially operated lotteries.

Now, in the light of such obvious and favourable replies, I wonder why the Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin) and the government still hesitate, even today, to vote on this bill, so that hon. members might have a chance of expressing their views. If hon. members truly wish to express an opinion which reflects the wishes and desires of the people they represent here, there is no doubt that the house will amend the Criminal Code so as to authorize the provinces to set up their own system of lotteries.

That is the problem in many circles which fear some small groups of reactionaries, of bigots and I would even say of chauvinists who, out of personal conviction or taking their stand on a principle supposedly connected with public morality, object to the government amending the Criminal Code and allowing the establishment of provincial lotteries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the views of such people, I feel that if it is to be argued that lotteries are against public morality, those people should be told that there are some criteria making it possible to determine whether or not lotteries are against public morality. Mr. Speaker, there are three such criteria.

If the lottery is free from fraud and under government control for the common good, I believe that, in such a case, public morals are not involved and the argument of the opposing groups does not stand.

On the other hand, if more than statistics or inquiries are required to prove the desirability of establishing a lottery, I suggest that the house refer to the views expressed by the provincial premiers themselves.

During the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa in November 1963, the question of a provincial lottery was brought up. At that time, some provincial premiers as well as the Prime Minister of Canada expressed their views.

On being questioned at the end of one of these conferences, Mr. Robichaud, premier of New Brunswick, stated that his province had no firm idea on this problem, although he was not opposed to a lottery.

Mr. Lesage, then premier of Quebec province, is supposed to have said: If lotteries were legalized, they could provide additional revenues to the province, which greatly needs them.

On the other hand, Mr. Robarts, premier of Ontario, expressed a favourable opinion by stating that he was for the minor amendments to legalize bingos and other ancillary lotteries.

Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, and Alberta are opposed in principle, but they are not against the expression of opinions. They did not bring forward any denial and they did not make any formal opposition.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) also expressed a personal opinion at the conclusion of this conference, and I quote his words:

> The establishment of a federal lottery does not interest the central government, but amendment to criminal code will be examined in the light of the views expressed by the provinces.

Now, you see, Mr. Speaker, these are extremely serious thoughts, allowing the members or permitting them, if they so desire, to express their views and vote on this question, since we are aware of the opinions of several prime ministers, federal or provincial, and we have at our disposal the results of some popular surveys which leave no doubt on the increasing popularity of the idea.

Some time ago, I took part in some radio and television broadcasts on this matter, and I am happy to tell my colleagues that I have received over 1,200 letters from viewers and listeners who encouraged my efforts to convince the government that the time has come to act and to have the house decide on this question.

[Mr. Valade.]

There are also many social groups which have endorsed the legalization of lotteries, and still do, at the federal as well as the provincial level, as I am suggesting.

• (5:20 p.m.)

On November 19, 1963, there has been the Quebec Federation of School Boards. In its report, the Royal Commission on Health Services in Canada had advanced this possibility.

In a brief submitted to the Royal Commission on April 17, 1962, "L'Association des médecins de langue française du Canada, Quebec section, had also endorsed this idea. The United Textile Workers of America had also supported this view during a congress held in Trois-Rivières.

The Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities had also approved this opinion on May 31, 1963. On December 19, 1962, the Quebec Boards of trade had also agreed on the possibility of amending the Criminal Code in favour of lotteries.

The Canadian Railway Workers Federation, in a brief submitted to the federal government, also endorsed lotteries. And many organizations have supported and expressed opinions in favour of legislation to permit the setting up of provincial lotteries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, several advantages could be outlined in favour of lotteries. I will simply summarize five major ones to my way of thinking.

First, this legislation would leave the provinces entirely free to act or not to act in this field.

Second, the setting up of Canadian lotteries would stop the drain of our money to foreign countries; as reported in certain quarters, this amounts to something like $150 to $200 million per year.

It would also put a check on the illegal lotteries which are found in such great numbers in all the big cities of Canada. A provincial lottery would also be a source of employment for people who for lack of qualifications can only hold part-time jobs or do general work.

Fifth, it would be for the provinces a source of income voluntarily fed by the people and which could be used for provincial purposes exclusively.

There are throughout the world over 70 countries which operate a lottery and recently in the United States the state of New York, following the state of New Jersey, decided to operate its own lottery. What we are waiting for in Canada is to do the same and assume our responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, after five years of work and discussions, after a number of bills introduced exactly in that same spirit by colleagues in this house, the time has come to vote on that matter.

I note that some of my Social Credit colleagues have also put a bill similar to mine on the order paper. If in the past five years there have been discussions and investigations, and if even federal-provincial conferences have put this item on their agenda, so as to allow discussions on the advisability of amending the Criminal Code in order to legalize lotteries in the provinces, I wonder why we, legislators, are waiting to settle this matter.

Those who for reasons of political partisanship will object or practise obstruction, as is too often done in this house, in order to kill such a bill, will be answerable to their constituents whom they represent in the Commons. They will be answerable to public opinion in their riding.

A few years ago—I can see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin) bursting out laughing. He does not seem to fear the opinion of his constituents. Perhaps he is callous and has joined, in his complacency, the former Quebec premier who paid for it through defeat during the last provincial election. But if hon. members of this house, especially those who represent Quebec ridings, do not realize that 80 per cent of the people of that province have declared themselves in favour of a provincial lottery and if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin) is so energetic, why does he persist in objecting to a bill which answers and meets the aspirations of 80 per cent of the people who are called upon to elect him?

If for reasons of partisanship, some hon. members refuse to voice their opinions by a vote, they will have to account for it to those who are responsible for their election.

A few years ago a colleague of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) presented Bill No. C-2, to change the name of Trans-Canada Air Lines into Air Canada and, during the hour set aside for consideration of public bills, opposition members co-operated with the hon. member.

At that time, the bill to change Trans-Canada Air Lines' name into Air Canada was adopted, because we showed political responsibility in this house.

I urge members on the government side and the minister to call for a vote. That is not complicated and I know that by voting, we will be acting responsibly towards our constituents whom we represent in this house.

[English]

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, three private members bills relating to lotteries have been introduced during the present session of parliament, Bill No. C-38 being introduced by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) who has just resumed his seat, Bill No. C-42 by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) and Bill No. C-84 by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray). The first two bills would amend section 179 of the Criminal Code, to permit a lottery organized and operated by a provincial government, where the purpose is, in the one case "to provide financial assistance to hospitals or for other welfare purposes, under provincial jurisdiction" or in the other case to provide "for payment in the province of additional amounts with respect to family allowances and old age pensions".

• (5:30 p.m.)

Bill C-84 sponsored by the hon. member for Essex West would repeal the provisions of section 168 which deals with common gaming houses, and would give certain immunities to social clubs, charitable and religious organizations, and would further repeal section 179 dealing with lotteries to give certain immunities to charitable and religious bazaars and allow a wider exemption for games and lotteries held by private charitable organizations, provided the gain to the organization is expended for a charitable purpose within six months. It would seem that recent stories about the financial success of lotteries in such places as New Hampshire in the United States, New South Wales in Australia, and New Zealand, have stimulated interest in this subject.

Bill C-42 immediately follows Bill C-38 on the public bills list, and it may be that today's debate will be continued in private members hour a week hence, as the subject matter of both bills is practically the same. There would seem to be little likelihood of Bill C-84 being reached in the present session, as it is No. 42 on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker, the last official inquiry in Canada into the policy of lotteries, including bingo and similar games, was made by a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which made its report on July 31, 1956. The report recommended several minor clarifications of the lottery provisions of the Criminal Code and some comparatively minor relaxations in favour of charitable purposes, but it recommended expressly against state lotteries. It was recommended that three types of lotteries be permitted as follows:

1. Lotteries licensed under provincial authority in aid of charitable, religious and community purposes, provided the retail value of prizes offered by any one organization does not exceed $5,000 in any year, promotion expenses are prohibited, expenses such as rent and advertising are restricted, and audited reports are submitted to the licensing authority.

2. Small raffles of goods, without licence, in connection with non-commercial gatherings, provided the raffle is merely incidental to the gathering and the prizes do not exceed $50 in total value.

3. All midways at agricultural fairs, as presently allowed, with the further concession that agricultural fair associations be permitted, if licensed, to hold lotteries for prizes not exceeding a total of $10,000 yearly in connection with the presale of admission tickets.

The question of lotteries, particularly state lotteries, was discussed at the federal-provincial conference held in November, 1963 and the attitude of the provinces differed widely. Quebec put the case for state lotteries. Nova Scotia was not interested in a state lottery, but favoured some relaxation in favour of small raffles. Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan were opposed to state lotteries. Manitoba expressed interest in the legalizing of off-track betting. Prince Edward Island expressed some interest in the New Hampshire scheme. Newfoundland did not take up a position. New Brunswick was not interested, itself, in conducting a state lottery, but had no objection to an amendment which would permit another province to do so. Ontario took somewhat the same position as New Brunswick, although it anticipated enforcement problems should a state lottery be set up in a neighbouring province. All these attitudes were informally stated. At the conclusion of the 1963 conference, the following press release was issued:

> Some provincial governments explained the difficulties they have in enforcing the provisions of the Criminal Code in respect of lotteries and gambling. Suggestions were made that the institution of provincial lotteries would alleviate this situation. Other provinces, however, opposed this suggestion. The federal government indicated that it had no interest in instituting a federal lottery but undertook to consider the amendment of the Criminal Code in the light of the view put forward.

The matter was considered again at the conference of attorneys-general on organized crime held in Ottawa on January 6, and 7, 1966. At this conference, provincial attitudes again varied widely and may be summarized as follows: Quebec again put the case for state lotteries under provincial auspices, expressing the view that such lotteries would help eliminate rackets in this field. Manitoba favoured some relaxation of the present provisions in favour of charitable and benevolent organizations, under provincial licence, the conditions to be uniform and stated in the Criminal Code; by implication it was against state lotteries. British Columbia was completely opposed to state lotteries; it considered that racketeers manage to get into even charitable and benevolent lotteries and that it is impossible to carve out a government niche free from danger of such intrusions.

Spokesmen for the province challenged the Quebec view that state lotteries would solve the racket problem and considered a review of the gambling laws to be more important than that of the lotteries laws, because gambling is one of the most important areas of organized criminal activity in Canada. They suggested an all party committee of the House of Commons to study gambling laws. Saskatchewan referred with approbation to a working paper which has been discussed by the criminal law section of the conference on uniformity of legislation in 1960; by implication Saskatchewan appeared to be against state lotteries. This working paper comprised a draft revision of the lottery sections designed to implement substantially the recommendations of the 1956 joint committee. The views of the section were in line with those of the joint committee, to the effect that any relaxation of the law should be in the field of charities. Ontario had no instructions upon, and no interest in, state lotteries, but it was not opposed to small charitable lotteries governed by the Criminal Code.

Nova Scotia was against state lotteries in Nova Scotia and in any other province because a state lottery in another province would put Nova Scotia in a very difficult political position. It felt, however, that the existing gap between present law and present practice brings the law into disrepute and adjustments are necessary, and it agreed generally with Saskatchewan. Alberta and New Brunswick, being represented by their deputy attorneys general, made no comment and the record does not indicate that Prince Edward Island made any comment either.

At the conclusion of the conference of January, 1966, the following statement was issued:

> The government of Canada will consider lotteries and the gaming sections along with all other amendments to the Criminal Code suggested at this conference. As to lotteries and the gaming sections the report of the Senate and House of Commons committee, other representations received, the views expressed at this conference and the work already done in the Department of Justice will be examined and considered in the department and a report made to the government.

The reply that the Department of Justice has been making to all persons who have written to make representations, for or against state lotteries, or relaxation of the gaming and lottery provisions in their application to charitable organizations, is to refer to the statements issued following the federal-provincial conference of November, 1963, and that of January, 1966, and to state that the opinions received upon this somewhat controversial subject will be carefully considered in connection with the review that is now under way.

Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, most of the churches have expressed themselves as opposed to state lotteries and to any extension of the immunities given to charitable and religious organizations, the Church of England going so far as to ask to be expressly excluded from such immunities.

Strong representations in favour of relaxing the immunities in favour of charitable organizations have come from certain service clubs. Representations in favour of state sweepstakes have come from various organizations and individuals, and particularly the Quebec government.

It is interesting to consider the experience of the United Kingdom where small pools and lotteries are legal. There have been two royal commissions on lotteries and betting in the United Kingdom since 1930. The first one sat in 1932 and 1933, and the second one in parts of the years 1949 and 1951. The 1932-33 report recommended against the institution of large lotteries in the United Kingdom, but said that if it should be decided to permit the institution of any large lotteries, the least objectionable form would be a state lottery for the benefit of the exchequer. Of course we have to bear in mind here that the United Kingdom is a unitary state, whereas we are a federation of federal government and ten provinces.

The 1949-51 commission considered the question of national lotteries as part of an inquiry into the whole field of gambling. Generally speaking, it did not find that gambling in moderation had any serious, economic, social or moral consequences. It did not believe, however, that the state should take a direct part in providing gambling facilities unless there were special reasons therefor. Approaching the question of a national lottery from these viewpoints, it said it did not consider that a lottery is a form of gambling which is likely to lead to excessive expenditure on the part of individuals or to an undue preoccupation with gambling.

It expressed the view that the estimate of revenue which may be obtained from a national lottery is usually greatly exaggerated by the supporters of the proposal, and it thought that a national lottery would add to rather than displace existing forms of gambling.

The commission said it did not overlook certain advantages of a national lottery: It was cheap to run; made no great demands on manpower; avoided any undesirable forms of advertising and inducement; assured honesty in administration; could be regulated in size to correspond with current economic conditions, and could be abolished without affecting vested interests. The commission concluded, however, that there was no important advantage to be gained by establishing a national lottery and no reason, therefore, to depart from the general principle that it is undesirable for the state to make itself responsible for the provision of gambling facilities.

Now, let us review some of the more important considerations in the Canadian context—

Mr. Valade: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Ryan: Certainly.

Mr. Valade: Although I am very much edified by some of the hon. member's remarks about the English commission on crime, does the hon. member not realize that we in Canada pay out over $200 million a year to foreign lotteries, and we allow this because of a law which is hypocritical in this regard? Is the hon. member himself favourable or unfavourable to establishing a national lottery? Does he not recognize that the inquiry conducted in all the provinces has shown our people's opinion, and not England's opinion, on this matter? Does he not think it is our responsibility to follow the Canadian people's opinion and not that of the royal commission on crime in England? Is the hon. member for or against the proposal?

Mr. Ryan: Let me answer in my own way. I do not think there is anything hypocritical about the federal government's position on this matter. The enforcement of the Criminal Code of Canada is up to the provinces and not up to the federal government, and it is probably true that in many parts of Canada there should be greater enforcement of the Criminal Code. Second, I think I take a fairly moderate position on this whole matter. I cannot get too excited either one way or the other in this controversy.

Mr. Valade: Then why did the hon. member speak?

Mr. Ryan: The federal government is just not interested in lotteries. It has too many other things to think of, too many other priorities. Possibly it should be nationalizing the drug trade, or something like that, as one priority. If the provinces want to put their staffs and energies to work to set up lottery organizations, I do not see why we should not assist them—if they really want that. But they too must have priorities and other problems to take care of first.

Mr. Speaker: I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, as one who favours public control and public operation of lotteries I wish to say a few brief words. I do not intend to talk out this measure because I support the hon. member's proposal. First, it seems to me we should keep in mind that the question today is not whether we want to have lotteries: We have them. The last estimate I received showed we have 28 separate illegal lotteries operating in Canada.

Gambling and drinking are two of the world's most ancient frailties, and for a long time past governments have acted to control drinking. At present some 30 countries in the world have acted to control forms of gambling. In this country we have control of gambling at the race tracks, and some people would also say we have had control of gambling in the stock markets for many years.

I think we should have governmental control, provincial or federal, of publicly operated lotteries. One of the facts in support of this proposal is that at the present time many millions of dollars are leaving our country every year to go to privately and publicly operated lotteries in other countries, and it seems to me logical that we should try to keep this money at home.

A very modest estimate of sweepstake or lottery revenue for a province the size of my own, British Columbia, with quarterly lotteries conducted by the government, is that it would amount to over $1 million a year in extra public revenue. I look on the idea of a lottery conducted by a provincial or a federal government as an indirect or do-it-yourself tax. I believe that nowadays, when we are looking for revenue, we should not overlook any additional way to obtain it. Canada is one of the dwindling number of countries which do not have some form of government operated lottery. Over 30 different countries now have lotteries.

Finally, I would urge support of the hon. member's bill from the point of view of a respect for law. At present we have so many illegal sweepstakes and lotteries which are operated in Canada that the law is in great disrespect. I believe that if this were regulated by the provinces, those who wish to conduct lotteries would be able to do so with public support.

If we cannot bring this to a vote tonight, I should like to see this bill and one or two others like it referred to a committee such as the committee on justice and legal affairs. This committee could consider these bills jointly as has been done in respect of other proposals, and recommendations could be made. I should like to see this come to a vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the bill and also thank the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) for a marvellous job across the country to find out the views of the whole population on lotteries. We are one hundred per cent behind him and we support all who favour the establishment of lotteries because the latter are needed by the provinces.

Many provinces have no idea where to find funds to finance education and all kinds of social programs, to finance all kinds of assistance programs for human beings. So, we are far from being against lotteries. We want them because we feel that the millions or billions they would bring in would go to the people for the development and the education of Canadian citizens. It is a source of income we are losing at this time because, as it has been said by several others, much of this money is now going to other countries and in no way helps the cause of the Canadian people. I believe that if we pass this bill giving the provinces the opportunity of taking advantage of this act, or this amendment to the Criminal Code, we will do a great service to the population.

I again support the member for Sainte-Marie, and I think that all Canadians and all the members of our party and many other parties share these views. Lotteries have been talked about for a long time, particularly in the province of Quebec. This has been repeatedly requested for many years and Ottawa has always opposed any change to this effect in the Criminal Code. I believe that the time has come when we must assume our responsibilities and support vigorously the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie. I suggest that we proceed with the vote without delay.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I extremely regret that the sponsor of this bill, the member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), has talked for twenty minutes, since he has used up all the time allotted to him. If he could have restrained himself we would have had the opportunity to say what we wanted on the matter and afterwards the question could have been put. But the hon. member has taken up all the time allotted to him. He was entitled to twenty minutes and he has spoken for twenty minutes. He could have spoken for two minutes, because we were acquainted with the substance and the purpose of that bill. Instead of being reasonable enough to let several other members state their opinion, he took up all the time allotted to him, and will thus prevent the house from voting. He has, in other words, filibustered his own bill.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Lotbinière is not saying the truth when he states that I spent all the time available to me on a discussion of that bill. His colleague who spoke after me, also took the time allotted to him and the hon. member for Lotbinière is the second Liberal member to speak—when he could have allowed the house to take the vote.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, beside the twenty minutes he has taken for his speech, he is now on a point of order to extend the debate further. The hon. member will preclude the vote.

This is what I had to say in respect of this bill. I agree with the principles involved in lotteries, as is everyone in the province of Quebec, if I may say so. On the other hand, I disagree with the bill as it is introduced by the hon. member because it is much too summary and we cannot see our way clear. First, in order that some lotteries may be instituted, of course, we need a government bill and not a private bill.

Second, in this private bill—this is its essential weakness—the operational structure of the lotteries is not outlined. How are we to rely on a bill so short and so simple to determine the existence of lotteries in the province and in the country?

Third, there is need for a uniform legislation in the country. Now, the bill leaves it up to the provinces to establish their own lottery, without knowing exactly what will happen in the other provinces. The province of Quebec may have lotteries, but supposing that Ontario and Manitoba prohibit lotteries, what might happen, if not a confusion which it will be difficult to prevent.

In view of such pitiable deficiencies, we are not in a position, for the time being, to say that the hon. member's bill should be passed. However, we can say—at least I can say so on my own behalf—that we will support the principle of such a legislation.

The member for Sainte-Marie stated: "I have made an investigation across the country". Basing myself on a remark of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I might very well say that I am going to make an investigation everywhere in the country and ask people if they are in favour of family planning. Everybody will say yes, but what means could we apply to implement such planning? Are we to favour abortion? The investigation made by the member has not indicated the object of his bill; this investigation reveals nothing, except that the principle is acceptable, but since the methods of implementation are not sufficiently determined, we cannot accept such a weak document. Mr. Speaker, that is why I am against the member's bill, although I favour its principle.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am quite willing, in order to edify the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) who talks in such a way as to leave doubts about the honesty of my investigation, to table the documents I used, provided he requests it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow me to point out to the hon. member that it is now six o'clock. I do not wish to deprive the hon. member of his right to rise on a question of privilege, but I beg of him to be as brief as possible.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. One question of privilege at a time.

Mr. Choquette: I point out to the hon. member that he has just killed his own bill.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to argue with the Chair, but I would merely point out to Your Honour that the hour for private members' bills started only at 5.12. In fact, the business of the house planned for next Monday took 12 minutes. Therefore, we have another 12 minutes to deal with this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately, according to standing orders, the hour assigned for private member's bills is now over.

[English]

It being after six o'clock, the house stands adjourned until 2.30 on Monday afternoon.

It being two minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

GEORGES PHILIAS VANIER

TRIBUTES ON PASSING OF LATE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find it more difficult than usual to find words adequately to express the grief that I know we all feel at the passing of our Governor General. That difficulty for me is increased by the recollection of our close personal friendship over so many years.

Since his death on Sunday morning messages have been coming in from the great in the world and from plain citizens in Canada, all testifying, high and low alike, to the affection that was felt for him by everyone. Among the first messages to arrive was one from Her Majesty the Queen, whose servant and representative in Canada he was. This message, which has already been made public, read:

> My husband and I are so deeply distressed to hear the tragic news of the Governor General's death. We send our deepest sympathy to you and the Canadian people and the Canadian government in the loss of this most distinguished Canadian.

He was indeed, Mr. Speaker, a distinguished Canadian and his whole life is a record of that distinction; a record of his service to Canada, a record of willing acceptance in peace and in war of every duty he was asked to perform or, perhaps I should put it, of every duty that he asked to be permitted to perform.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, General Vanier was trained for the bar to which he was called in 1911. He answered the call to arms shortly afterwards and served for three years in France as a gallant officer of a gallant regiment whose traditions he helped to create and maintain. The Distinguished Service Order, the Military Cross and bar and the Legion of Honour attest to his courage. His wounds attest to his sacrifices. After the war he returned to civilian life for a very short time, then again took up a military career, as a member of the permanent forces.

During the years he was in the army there was a steady promotion to new responsibilities until in 1928, I think it was, he was asked to be the Canadian military representative on the disarmament commission of the League of Nations at Geneva. At that time he acquired the interest in diplomacy and international affairs and in peace keeping which he retained throughout his life and which was recognized a few years later, in 1931, by the government of the day when he was made the secretary of the office of the high commissioner in London. It was at that time that our official and family association began, Mr. Speaker, which was broken only by his death.

After serving at Canada House in London, General Vanier was made Canadian minister to France. After the outbreak of war and the collapse of France in 1940 he returned after a series of adventures to London, where I had the privilege of meeting him and Madame Vanier on their return. Although he had been going through some pretty difficult and dangerous moments he had that calm imperturbability and good humour that always characterized him in any difficulty. During the war he went to Algiers, where he was the Canadian representative to the Free French government headed by General de Gaulle and established a relationship and friendship with General de Gaulle which has persisted to the present. Then after the liberation he went back to Paris as Canadian ambassador, where he and his wife became outstanding members of the diplomatic corps.

On his retirement from the diplomatic service he might well have looked forward to some years of peace and tranquility, but when he was asked by the prime minister of the day, now the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, to be Governor General he naturally accepted it as a call to duty. When his normal term of office ended and I as Prime Minister asked him to stay on, he agreed to do that at my request as long as his health permitted. That was permitted by his health until last week.

As you know, he had an operation last autumn, but he was recovering well from it except for his heart. I went to see him at Rideau Hall last Wednesday, after he had been examined by specialists, in order to discuss with him whether his health would permit him to take on the very heavy duties of Governor General during our centennial year. We agreed to meet again on Friday, and at that time he indicated that he felt he would not likely be able to continue in office.

On Friday afternoon he made his last appearance before a group, when he talked to students of the University of Montreal very eloquently and impressively on a subject so dear to his heart, namely Canadian unity and the part which French speaking Canadians can play in the development of this country. Then, as we have learned, he spent Saturday evening indulging in a favourite pastime, watching the hockey game on television, and he enjoyed the victory of his favourite team. On Sunday morning this good and faithful servant passed away peacefully and quietly, without pain and with the spiritual solace of the last rites of his church.

His public career, as we know, was marked with distinction and wisdom in everything he undertook and with a broad understanding of Canada and its problems, coupled with faith and confidence in our ability as a people to solve those problems. He had a passionate belief in this country, in its unity, in its destiny of true greatness based on enduring values and patriotic ideals which should be shared by all its citizens. He made Canada and its unity his own crusade, in every word he uttered, in every visit he made and on every occasion that he honoured with his presence.

His French ancestors were among the very first settlers in Canada. He was very proud of that ancestry, but prouder still, I think, of the Canada of today. With roots so deep in our soil, he also saw far into the future and gave his all to make it a good future for the country he loved.

All his life he maintained that keen and expert interest in defence matters that befitted such a distinguished soldier and the commander in chief of the armed forces. He was always particularly interested in the welfare of the veterans. He was grand patron and honorary life member of the Canadian Legion, and he was the comrade of every legionnaire and every veteran.

As a man he had the dignity of the true patrician and the modesty and simplicity of the true gentleman. He had the calm security and inner strength that come from a deep belief in the Christian faith. His religion meant very much to him indeed. He was a devout man without being sanctimonious. He was a serious man but with a delicious sense of humour. He was a man of high quality without being stuffy or superior. Indeed, I believe our Governor General embodied in his own person and in his own life and achievements all that is best in Canadians and all that we hope for our country.

When General Vanier was installed as Governor General on April 15, 1959, he said this:

> Each one of us, in his own way and place, however humble, must play his part towards the fulfilment of our national destiny. To realize how mighty this destiny will be let us lift our eyes beyond the horizon of our time. In our march forward in material happiness, let us not neglect the spiritual threads in the weaving of our lives. If Canada is to attain the greatness worthy of it, each of us must say "I ask only to serve".

His request was granted. No Canadian has ever served more abundantly, more unselfishly or more gallantly.

We also think at this time of Madame Vanier, a very gracious, generous and, indeed, wonderful person who has earned and will retain her own place in the esteem and affection of the Canadian people. She was the perfect partner for her husband over the years; to his strength and his character she added her own superlative qualities of grace, kindliness and warmth. To Madame Vanier and to the children, who are following the family tradition of service, I am sure we all in this house would wish to send our deep and heartfelt sympathy. I know they are all getting comfort and support in this dark time from a faith which has given them the peace which passes all human understanding. To this spiritual peace is added the solace which comes from pride in the life of one dear to them, a life which had nothing in it of littleness or meanness, and everything that makes for a happy memory.

Mr. Speaker, when I saw the Governor General on Friday evening and he indicated to me that he did not think it would be possible for him to carry on, I said I hoped we could find some way of maintaining his association with our centennial year even if he did leave Rideau Hall. Then I made an observation which was picked, as it were, out of the air. I said "What we should do is give you a position which would in no way tax your strength but which would maintain your association with Canada in this centennial year; and perhaps I will ask you to go down to Quebec and take up residence there, at least for 1967, as Keeper of the Citadel."

He smiled at the idea of becoming a keeper. Indeed, it would have been a small honour for a man who throughout his life was the keeper of the citadel of truth and faith and honour.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, His Excellency General Vanier, Governor General of Canada, is dead. He departed very peacefully from this life on earth for the other in which he believed so deeply. His death does not seem like a break or an end but rather an expected transition which did not disturb the continuous and coherent course of his life.

Those who had the privilege to talk with the Governor General in the last months before his death could not help but notice the elevation of his thoughts and feelings. The breath of life which still kept him here revealed to us, without his being aware of it, the spiritual level which he had reached and which left human values far behind. Not that he had lost all interest in our problems. On the contrary, a few weeks ago in a private conversation, I had the honour of discussing with him the great problems which concern our world. I was amazed at the keen interest he took in the future of this country, to understanding between groups, to the brotherhood of men. From his lofty position, in spite of his wavering health, he was present and active to the end.

His Excellency General Vanier was the first French speaking Canadian to occupy the position of Governor General of Canada since Confederation. This event marks an important stage in the evolution of this country, because his appointment was not merely an act of condescension towards French Canadians. During his military and diplomatic careers, he was the embodiment of our people's aspirations, as well as the human symbol of our common ideal.

I hope the life of this great man who has just passed away will serve as an example for all those who believe in justice, peace and brotherhood.

All French Canadians, I am sure, wish the family of His Excellency to accept their heartfelt sympathy.

In conclusion Mr. Speaker I shall simply quote these few lines of verse by Charles Péguy:

Heureux ceux qui sont morts pour la terre charnelle,
Mais pourvu que ce fût dans une juste guerre.
Heureux ceux qui sont morts pour quatre coins de terre.
Heureux ceux qui sont morts d'une mort solennelle.
Heureux ceux qui sont morts dans les grandes batailles,
Couchés dessus le sol à la face de Dieu.
Heureux ceux qui sont morts sur un dernier haut lieu,
Parmi tout l'appareil des grandes funérailles.
Heureux les épis mûrs et les blés moissonnés.

[English]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, how little any of us thought when we adjourned on Friday that we would meet today under the tragic circumstance of the loss of our Governor General.

It is my sad duty this afternoon, in the unavoidable absence of the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), to add to the tribute paid to General Vanier by the Prime Minister an expression of the sorrow that lies heavily at this time on the hearts of my colleagues here, and on their behalf to pay our heartfelt respects to the memory of a very great Canadian. As perhaps no other governor general in our history he was known and loved by every member of this house, and to an amazing extent by the millions of Canadians whom we have the honour to represent here.

I speak, too, of the sympathy we all feel for the gracious lady who was so often our hostess at Rideau Hall, whose charm and poise have so often been the chief ornament of this parliament in the other place, and whose so sudden bereavement cries out for the utmost of our sympathy, understanding and appreciation of the great loss that has come to her, to her sons and daughters, as well as to us and all Canadians.

Today we pay our profoundest respects not only to his memory as the representative of the Queen of Canada and head of the Commonwealth but also to his memory as a man, one would almost say the ideal man, and certainly one who set a standard and example of Canadian manhood which we would hope to see every one of our fellow citizens, young or old, emulate.

The word that will be linked over and over again with his career and character will be "gentleman". It is, perhaps, an old fashioned word. No one who knew him will say that he was in the ordinary sense old fashioned, but he did practise, as none other I have known, the old fashioned virtues of courtesy, kindness and consideration for his fellow men whatever their station in life, whatever their creed or colour.

"A Christian," said Robert Louis Stevenson, "is God Almighty's gentleman." General Vanier was that kind of gentleman. During his term of office he gave a new dimension to the term Canadian. He was the first French Canadian since the Marquis de Vaudreuil to hold the post of governor general. Representing a different crown there was, nevertheless, a dedication and devotion unsurpassed.

He acted at all times with a largeness of view extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific encompassing the many shades and varieties of opinion, race and creed which make up the greatness of this nation. He was a great Canadian. In the tradition of Macdonald and Laurier he was beloved by Canadians. His name will live in the annals of the nation as one personifying in his conduct and his beliefs a type of Canadianism which all can follow regardless of origin.

This was a man whose vision of confederation was such that it embodied a living reality. He saw confederation as a rich stream of commonly shared experience and belief springing from two main cultural sources, widened, deepened and strengthened by the later infusions from other groups. He saw nothing contradictory in the flowing together of many cultures, all tending toward the same objective—a greater, finer and stronger Canada.

Surely we can all pay to his memory the tribute of our support of this powerful thesis, on the acceptance of which depends the future strength of this nation. Some of the things he said in his high office, with all the dignity and prestige of his personal and public stature will be remembered so long as there is a Canada. He stressed what is good, what is creative, and what is strong in our history and being. In his message on January 1, 1967 appear these thoughts:

> —let us remember and cherish that which is creative in our history—if we imagine that we can now go our separate ways within our country; if we think that selfish interests can now take precedence over the national good; if we exaggerate our differences or revel in contention; if we do any of these things, we will promote our own destruction—

His last formal message to Canada in that address was this:

> The resolution which the Canadian nation must now propose for 1967 and for the century to come, is the unity of our country.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Speaker, as a member of this house and speaking on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, I endorse those words and put them forward as a goal toward which we must all strive. Their adoption is the greatest tribute we at this stage can pay to a great man who has passed from our midst.

A soldier of the Queen to the last breath; a patriot, statesman, devoted Canadian; an ornament to his province, his people and his nation; let us all unite in saluting a Canadian whose greatness we shall not soon see again.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, the death of General Georges P. Vanier plunges all Canadians into deep mourning, and French Canadians are particularly grieved.

The dignity with which this great Canadian discharged his military and diplomatic duties, as well as those of Governor General, has gained French Canadians much admiration and respect on the part of all Canadians. General Vanier was the true image of French Canada, namely respect for tradition and order. He was also proud of the part he had been given to play in history.

When he became the Queen's representative, General Vanier was succeeding another great Canadian, His Excellency the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, who was the first Canadian ever to hold such high office.

General Vanier's stay at Rideau Hall has shown that the two founding peoples of confederation have within their ranks men capable of serving their country with honour and attaining the highest position to which a Canadian can aspire.

The name of General Vanier will be inscribed in letters of gold in the history of Canada. His personal qualities, his wisdom and his courage will forever be a source of inspiration as well as legitimate pride to his compatriots.

General Vanier was not content to assume passively the role of representative of the crown. On the contrary. His inexhaustible optimism and dynamism inspired the life of the community. The Vanier Institute of the Family will stand as a lasting monument to his memory.

To Madame Vanier, so sorely tried, who contributed immeasurably to the affection we all felt for General Vanier, to the children and relatives of the illustrious deceased, I offer, on behalf of the French speaking Canadians, the condolences of a people who will always consider General Vanier as one of its noblest sons.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in common with all Canadians, the members of the New Democratic Party are saddened and distressed at the passing of Governor General Georges P. Vanier, and we join most sincerely with those who have spoken in paying tribute to his memory.

Throughout the years we have had not only a profound respect and admiration for his public service but also a deep personal affection for him as a kind and warm hearted person. During his long term as Governor General he and Madame Vanier have broken through the trappings of their high office to endear themselves to us and to Canadians in every walk of life. His death at this time occasions a sense of personal loss as well as regret at the passing of an outstanding public figure.

The late Governor General was the personification of the dedicated public servant. In war and in peace he gave of himself unstintingly with modest courage and quiet determination. His heroism on the battlefield has added lustre to the already magnificent traditions of the famous Van Doos. His performance in a succession of overseas posts demonstrated his stature as a competent and effective diplomat.

But it was in the role of Governor General that he made his most lasting contribution to Canada. The grace and charm which His Excellency and Madame Vanier displayed won the hearts of the Canadian people. It was clear from the beginning that they loved the Canadian people and they were soon beloved by them in return. Personally what I shall cherish most in my memory of the late Governor General was his unfailing kindness to people in the every day walks of life. To me he will always be associated with the lines of Wordsworth:

> That best portion of a good man's life,—
> His little, nameless, unremembered acts
> Of kindness and of love.

General Vanier was the first French speaking Canadian to occupy the high post of the Queen's representative in this country. He himself was the personification of the finest attributes and culture of the two races that laid the foundations of Canadian confederation. Few men have done more to promote a better understanding and mutual appreciation between French speaking and English speaking Canadians than the late Governor General. His New Year's message to the Canadian people was a plea for good will and forbearance in learning to live together in harmony. But it was more than that. It was a challenge to all Canadians to realize the potential enrichment that can come from a bicultural and bilingual society. If Canada is to survive as a viable nation it must produce more men of the calibre of Georges P. Vanier.

Example is often much more important than pronouncements, no matter how sincerely they are expressed. The greatest contribution of the Vaniers may well be the lasting effect of their personal lives. With clear insight they recognized that the family is the heart of a nation's life. The formation of the Vanier Institute of the Family could be the most lasting memorial to one who in addition to being a distinguished public servant was also a good man in the finest meaning of that word.

General Vanier's concern for the family as the well-spring of our national life was undoubtedly motivated by his own happy family life. His successful tenure of office as Governor General was enhanced by the devoted assistance of his gracious, charming and highly intelligent wife. Together they symbolized all that was best in Canadian life, and they displayed a genuine fondness for people which was reciprocated in increasing measure with the passing years.

Today we mourn the passing of one who was a great Canadian and a true friend. While we shall miss him we shall also be challenged by his example. Because he lived, Canada will be a better place and we shall all be better men and women. That is his tribute, and that will be his epitaph. All of us join in extending to Madame Vanier and the members of his family our deepest sympathy at the loss which they and we have sustained. Our sorrow is great, but it is lessened by the memory of a life lived to the full in dedicated service to Canada.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, the whole country was saddened on learning of the death of His Excellency the Governor General, Mr. Georges P. Vanier. Every Canadian is moved and affected by the departure of this man who worked unceasingly to improve the lot of his fellow-men in all circumstances and everywhere he happened to be.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, his life activities, whether political, military, social or other, always reflected the great respect he had for his country. He was a brilliant example of what Canadianism really is, a sentiment that he tried to communicate throughout his lifetime to his fellow countrymen.

I shall not try to give a life history of General Vanier. The Prime Minister has done so in a marvellous way. I am only sorry that I could not also have been a close personal friend of His Excellency. However, with all Canadians I feel I was his friend because his lifetime activities devoted to the welfare and benefit of the Canadian people could not but make one feel a close relationship with the greatness of this man. As a young member of parliament I feel it my duty to ask young Canadians today to look upon Georges P. Vanier as I do; as a model of a true, honest and sincere Canadian.

[Translation]

It is all the more of a privilege, Mr. Speaker, that General Vanier was among my ancestors in the province of Quebec.

His activities, his sense of justice, his regard for Canada, the tasks he accomplished over a period of almost three quarters of a century, always striving to promote national unity, understanding and peace, in short, the achievements of this valorous man should make him an idol of all Canadians, whatever their origins.

French Canada can be proud of having produced such a great man. His labours, his patience, his devotion cover a period of three quarters of a century and I appeal to all Canadians, young, middle-aged and advanced in years, to consider that here was a true Canadian who was devoted to the welfare of his country, respectful of its traditions and convictions, while respectful of those of others.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, to any Canadian of the future General Georges P. Vanier will be as he was to those who knew him in his lifetime, a man of honour, wisdom and understanding, a just man and a man of great distinction who always had that humbleness about him that when I as a fairly young Canadian heard him speak, reminded me of my father. I think to the Canadian people he was everyone's father.

[Translation]

To Mrs. Vanier, her children and family, we extend our deepest sympathy.

Mr. Speaker, I am not only paying tribute to a great Canadian, but to one of the greatest Canadians in our history.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Social Credit party wish to join in expressing our sorrow and deep sense of loss in the passing of our respected and beloved Governor General, Georges P. Vanier. General Vanier's distinguished and heroic military career, his outstanding service in the diplomatic service of our country, and the efficient and dedicated manner in which he fulfilled his responsibilities as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen have combined to assure him of a special place in the hearts of Canadians and in the history of this nation.

While fully recognizing the outstanding contribution made in these important fields of service there is another area in which his example and influence and that of Madame Vanier will long be remembered and appreciated, namely in emphasizing the importance of spiritual values and the development and maintenance of the family as the foundation and bulwark of the nation. Deeply religious, warm hearted and sincere, dedicated and courageous, Governor General Vanier, though dead, still speaks, challenging us all to thrust aside those things which divide and destroy and to press forward under God to build an even greater and better nation.

We join in extending to Madame Vanier and the members of the family our sincere sympathy and the assurance of our prayers.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, with respect I should like to suggest that you might be pleased to convey in an appropriate manner the record of today's proceedings, in a form which you consider appropriate, to Madame Vanier as an indication of the feeling of pride we have in our late Governor General and our feeling of loss at his passing. I should like also, Mr. Speaker, if I might, to suggest that you might convey to Madame Vanier and her family an expression of our deep and heartfelt sympathy.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That this house adjourn until Thursday, March 9, at 2.30 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 3.20 p.m. until Thursday, March 9.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

REPRESENTATION AT FUNERAL OF LATE GOVERNOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I raise this question because of the fact that it has already received attention in the press, and to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to explain a situation that has already caused a great deal of questioning. Did the Prime Minister, in his constitutional position relative to Her Majesty, ask for representation of Her Majesty at the funeral of His Excellency the late Governor General? Was there such communication with the government of the United Kingdom? I ask the question because I know the Prime Minister will wish to clarify it before it assumes the proportions that are apparently developing.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it is a proper question at all, but it has been asked. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that I had been in touch with the palace on this matter immediately after the death of the Governor General.

I regret to have to report on this at this time, but I point out that when the administrator was sworn in Her Majesty the Queen was then represented by the administrator. He has all the powers of the Governor General, and he represented the Queen. I think that was the proper constitutional procedure. It was up to the British government, of course, to decide how they would be represented at the funeral, and they were represented.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say at once that the Prime Minister has clarified the situation. That is the reason the question was asked; the press has devoted considerable space today in this connection. Now the Prime Minister has given the answer.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

APPRECIATION ON COVERAGE OF FUNERAL SERVICE FOR LATE GOVERNOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, but perhaps before doing so I might be permitted to say to the Secretary of State that I hope she will convey to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the appreciation which many of us felt yesterday for the competent and inspiring way in which the corporation transmitted to the people of Canada the moving service which was held in the Basilica for the late Governor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

FINANCE

MERCANTILE BANK—REPORTED STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF NEW YORK BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether his attention has been drawn to the statement made by Mr. James S. Rockefeller, chairman of the First National City Bank of New York to the effect that his bank has no idea of getting out of the Mercantile Bank of Canada. Has the minister asked Mr. Rockefeller for any clarification of this statement? Does it mean that Citibank has no intention of divesting itself of any shares, or does it simply mean it intends to hold on to whatever percentage of shares it is allowed to hold under the amendments to the Bank Act which will be coming into effect?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Anticipating a question of this sort I made inquiries as to what Mr. Rockefeller had actually said. The information I have is as follows. The first question put to Mr. Rockefeller was "What about the Mercantile mess? Why don't you sell out?" To which Mr. Rockefeller replied "Because we have confidence in the future of Canada and of the Mercantile Bank and we have no intention of getting out of Canada."

The second question was "Why don't you put pressure on the Canadian government?" Mr. Rockefeller's answer was:

> Because we don't want to interfere with the right of a sovereign government to make its own laws. We would not do anything to give the impression to the Canadian government that we are putting pressure on them. We just maintain the status quo until they decide what the law ought to be.

Mr. Douglas: What interpretation does the minister place on this statement by Mr. Rockefeller? Is it his intention to proceed with the recommendation of the banking committee that there should be a five year period allowed during which the bank could divest itself of its shares?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will recognize that this is not a proper question to ask at this time. The report of the committee is now before the house and it will be considered by the house when we get an opportunity.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio, the former minister of finance for the purpose of identification. Was this question of the Mercantile Bank considered by the task force set up to look into this matter of United States investment and headed by the hon. gentleman? Was this question before the committee, and is he in agreement with the suggestion of a five year postponement or freeze, putting the whole thing into deep freeze for that period?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt as to whether the question is proper. The Leader of the Opposition knows that the Chair is always in a difficult position in trying to determine whether a question is asked of a minister in his ministerial capacity. I have been in trouble before on this point and I expect to get into trouble again. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would like to bear this in mind and direct his question to someone else in the ministry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This time I come squarely within the rules. This is the minister who is in charge of the task force. He is the one who is looking after it. I would ask him, as chairman of the task force looking into this question, was the Mercantile Bank matter brought to his attention, or does the task force just start to sit after it becomes useless to do so in this connection?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the question should be directed to the right hon. Prime Minister, who seems to be ready to reply.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would be very glad to put the right hon. gentleman right. In the first place his question was out of order, if he would read the rules; but apart from that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I followed the rules.

Mr. Pearson: —the hon. gentleman is not chairman of any task force, as my right hon. friend would have realized if he had read the press release at the time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is he?

Mr. Pearson: He is chairman of a committee of ministers of the cabinet looking into a certain question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What question?

Mr. Pearson: A task force has been set up to report to that committee of ministers. Now, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend has been in this house a long time—

Some hon. Members: Too long.

Mr. Pearson: —and may be in it for a much longer time, and he must know it is out of order to have cabinet ministers, meeting in committee, report to the house and not to the Prime Minister and the cabinet as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say at once the question is not out of order. I ask the Prime Minister now, was the Minister without Portfolio consulted regarding this deep freeze proposition, like saying "Don't open until Christmas—don't open until five years from now"? Was he consulted on this, or was it because he was not consulted that he went to the Caribbean?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that at this point the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is asking about communications between ministers of the cabinet and that, obviously, is not in order.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

APPOINTMENT OF UNILINGUAL LIAISON OFFICER WITH EXPO '67

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General of Canada.

Is it true that a unilingual R.C.M.P. inspector has been appointed as liaison officer between the federal police and the Expo security services and, if so, will the minister take steps to appoint a bilingual officer to that important position?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not quite sure whether this question is so urgent that it could not be put on the order paper. At any rate, that is my suggestion to the hon. member.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Laprise: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Chapleau gave notice that he wishes to discuss this question at ten o'clock, in view of my ruling that it was not sufficiently urgent to be put immediately.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if you will permit me to justify the urgency of the question. I should note that Expo opens in a month and a half, approximately, and that security operations are already—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Obviously, I have taken into consideration the fact that Expo opens only in a month and a half and that is why I suggested that the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General of Canada. Has he received complaints from Expo '67 officials to the effect that it would be urgent to change the R.C.M.P. inspector appointed to the security service at Expo?

Mr. Speaker: This question is essentially the same as the one which was considered as unacceptable a moment ago. The hon. member, by putting it now, undoubtedly wished to discuss it on the adjournment motion?

[Later:]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we still have 10 minutes left in the question period and nobody else seems to have any questions, and after considering the type of questions put—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has only 10 minutes, so would he put his question?

Mr. Grégoire: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I consider that the question I put a while ago is urgent, and I would ask you, since we have 10 minutes left, to allow the minister responsible to the house for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to answer the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The procedure suggested by the hon. member is dangerous.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED PEACE EFFORTS BY ITALIAN AMBASSADOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the peace efforts made by the Italian ambassador in Saigon, acclaimed by the Italian foreign minister as producing the best results to date, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs bring the house up to date on these developments in Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be a time when this can be done, but I am also sure my hon. friend would agree that this is not the moment. These efforts are under way and it would be wholly improper for me to disclose them.

REPORTED SPEECH BY STATE SECRETARY RESPECTING U.S. DRAFT DODGERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister whether the statement purported to have been made by the Secretary of State in Philadelphia on Saturday, to the effect that United States citizens who wish to evade their responsibilities under the draft law of that country will find a welcome here in Canada, represents the policy and the position of the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State will explain the situation.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The rule of the house is that in relation to a speech made outside the house hon. members can only ask the Prime Minister whether that statement made by a minister represents government policy. This is precisely the question the hon. member has asked. Perhaps by agreement hon. members would prefer to have the statement made by the Secretary of State; perhaps this would be in order.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply by way of a question of privilege if necessary, because my hon. friend's erroneous information concerning the remarks I made in Philadelphia is now on the record. I have in my hand the only newspaper report there was as a result of that particular press conference, where I pointed out that I was not responsible for immigration but for citizenship and that any such individual who wished to come to this country was free to enter it. "Free", that was the only word used. The word "welcome" was not used. The newspaper report goes on to say that if the immigrant indicated after entering that he reserved the right to decide himself whether or not he would serve when this country was at war, he would not be considered to be suitable to be admitted to Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether she could inform the house in any detail whatsoever where these draft dodgers who enter Canada are being employed.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not have the slightest idea. I am not responsible for immigration, nor for employment policy.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED PREFERENCE TO U.S. FIRMS IN OBTAINING RAW MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Industry. Is it a fact that Canadian industries have lost valuable orders to firms in the United States which have been able to obtain strategic industrial raw materials in Canada in preference to Canadian industry?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt about the validity of the question at the present time, but I understand the hon. member has been very patient, waiting for recognition from the Chair for quite some days to ask this question, and I think the Minister of Industry might accept to reply to it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, this is a very large question and a very general one. I think undoubtedly there are United States firms which further process strategic materials from Canada and that such firms have been successful in competing with Canadian firms. If there is a specific case where there appears to have been discrimination or injustice, then I would be glad to look into it.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to give the minister a specific case.

FINANCE

PERSONNEL OF TASK FORCE RESPECTING FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio and chairman of the committee of ministers to inquire into foreign ownership in Canada. I should like to ask him whether he is now in a position to inform the house what is the composition of the task force which the right hon. the Prime Minister stated would be set up under that committee.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The members of the task force include the following: Professor Melville Watkins of the University of Toronto, chairman; Professor A. E. Safarian, formerly of the University of Saskatchewan and now at the University of Toronto; Professor W. J. Woodfine of St. Francis Xavier University, Nova Scotia; Professor Bernard Bonin of École des Hautes Études Commerciales, Montreal; Professor Abraham Rotstein of the University of Toronto; Professor Stephen Hymer now at Yale University and formerly at McGill University.

It is expected that two additional members will join the task force, but they have not yet been sworn in.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought there was not a task force.

Mr. Gordon: The two additional members are Professor Gideon Rosenbluth of the University of British Columbia and Professor Claude Masson of Laval University who at present is at Harvard.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL INCENTIVES FOR CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I will address it to the Prime Minister. In view of the drop in housing starts in January, to 30 per cent below the preceding January, and the clear indication from these figures that we will not reach anywhere near the 170,000 starts this year which according to the Economic Council of Canada are necessary if we are to avoid a serious shortage, has the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that questions should not be preceded by speeches, however short. Has the hon. member now reached the question?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I now have laid the groundwork for my question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the housing situation today, whether the government has decided on any additional incentives to induce the house building industry to produce the 170,000 housing starts which, as explained by the Economic Council of Canada, are necessary.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been discussed in the house. The minister concerned is not present, but he has been speaking on this matter. When he comes back I will be glad to discuss it with him in light of the hon. gentleman's question, but not in relation to the preamble.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Is the government considering additional incentives to induce a greater volume of housing starts in Canada this year?

Mr. Pearson: Steps have already been taken in this regard, and more are under consideration.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister tell us when the Minister of Labour will stop speaking and start acting on this very pressing problem?

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance asking him whether, in light of the circumstances referred to in the previous question, the government is considering removing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the numerous requests we are getting from dairy producers associations in Canada, is the minister in a position to tell us when we can expect him to announce to the house the dairy policy for 1967-68?

Mr. Speaker: That question was asked last week and I think that the minister answered it.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—SUGGESTED DELAY IN ACQUISITION OF DOMINION COAL COMPANY HOLDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of recent developments and the apparent delay in the acquisition by the government of the holdings of the Dominion Coal Company, will he give consideration to the recent suggestion of Mr. John H. Delaney, international board member of the United Mine Workers, that the government get on with the job of operating and improving the coal mines and that the price to be paid for these assets be established by independent arbitrators?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no delay. Negotiations are now proceeding, but perhaps my hon. friend is not as aware of the complex and important nature of these negotiations as we are over here.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the right hon. gentleman that this is a complicated matter, but does he not agree that there has been enough delay regarding what is to be done for coal miners in Nova Scotia without adding to it the time consuming diversion relating to the question of price?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question based on the Prime Minister's reply to the effect there has been no delay. Is he aware of the dilemma which faces the coal company in making up its mind about the price it should ask the government to pay for its assets? Does he not consider this to be causing delay?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

QUEBEC—AGREEMENT RESPECTING TRAINING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

With regard to the new federal manpower training program, has the minister, or his government, reached an agreement with the Quebec government on which of the two governments will have the power to determine manpower priorities?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, negotiations are now in progress between my department and the provincial department of immigration. I am not in a position to give any details on the agreement which has been or will be reached.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONVERSATIONS WITH U.S. VICE PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister make some report to the house about the conversations he had yesterday with Mr. Humphrey, the Vice President of the United States?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure members of the house warmly welcomed the visit paid by the Vice President of the United States to Ottawa yesterday on the occasion of our national sorrow. This was a visit prompted by a decision of the President of the United States.

My colleagues and I had an opportunity of discussing matters of interest to our two countries. I am sure that as a former member of the cabinet of another government, my hon. friend would realize that it is not possible to disclose the nature of such conversations.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not in a position to inform the house of any results arising from these conversations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot add to what I have said, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Some time ago I directed several questions to the Prime Minister in relation to the possibility of amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention Act in order to clear up some of the difficulties as between that act and our Indian treaties. The Prime Minister mentioned that this matter was being studied. I wonder if he can now say whether a decision has been reached.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot, at this moment; but I will look into it right away and reply as soon as I can.

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, the chairman of the standing committee on external affairs. Now that the hon. member has returned to this house after his official duties abroad I should like to ask whether it is his intention to convene the committee on external affairs as soon as possible.

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I was away last week and I realize now that the order for the standing committee on external affairs to meet has been adopted. We are prepared to meet at any time, and I expect to call a meeting of the steering committee very shortly.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CANCELLATION OF PROPOSED VISIT BY COMMITTEE TO B.C. RESERVATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. Can the minister give any explanation to the house why a proposed visit by the Indian affairs committee to a number of Indian reservations in British Columbia was cancelled?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker; I am not aware of the internal administrative decisions of that committee.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I did not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member has reference to the deliberations and conduct of affairs of a committee. I am not sure whether the question should be asked at this time.

Mr. Howard: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that I was not seeking to ask about the internal conduct of the committee itself but the conduct of the house leader. I asked the house leader whether he has any knowledge of why the trip of that committee was postponed, and whether he had any hand in it. That is my question.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has answered the question.

NATURAL GAS

REPORTED NEW PROPOSAL FOR TRANSMISSION TO EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that Northern Natural Gas Company has placed before the United States federal power commission a completely new proposal to move gas to eastern Canada, has the minister received any indication or notice that Trans-Canada intend to withdraw or change their application to the United States federal power commission?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I was given the contents of a declaration made at noon by the president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. The president is challenging the compromise project on the basis that it is not as economical as the Great Lakes project, and on the basis that it would not be completed in time to provide the Canadian needs of gas for next winter.

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the chairman of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines indicate to the minister that that company intends to proceed with the application it now has before the federal power commission of the United States?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether, in view of the time this case is taking before the federal power commission, and the fact that it is obviously likely to take a great deal more time, he would now consider getting Trans-Canada to start work in twinning the northern line?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the position of the minister and the government has been clearly stated in a letter which was sent to Mr. Kerr on February 2 and which was reported by the press and reproduced as an appendix to a document issued by the federal power commission of the United States.

[Later:]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question which I put a few minutes ago to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines' application before the United Stated federal power commission, the minister referred to a letter which he had sent to the president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. He was good enough to let me see that letter, which he said appeared in a publication of the federal power commission. I should now like to ask the minister whether he would be prepared to table that letter to the president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, since he has referred to it and based his reply to my question on it.

Mr. Pepin: I will do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the letter to which the hon. member has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON MARITIME STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport; I see that he is well sun tanned. I wonder whether, having already avoided this question three times, he could now tell us if the report on the special maritime transportation study has been brought to his attention. Has the minister seen it, and if so, can he advise the house when we will be able to get on with it?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I will have to continue my evasive tactics.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR INSTALLATION OF ESCALATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Since there was an item in last year's estimates covering the installation of escalators at the Winnipeg international airport, I wonder whether the minister would consider it to be another of his centennial projects to see that this work is completed this year.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): It seems a very worth while suggestion, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF "BLUENOSE" ON TEN CENT PIECE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of further representations made to the minister by interested citizens throughout the Atlantic provinces regarding the Bluenose dime, has the minister secured sufficient documentary evidence to prove that the ship on the dime was the Bluenose, and has the government reached a decision to restore the Bluenose to her place of honour on the dime beginning with our coinage in 1968?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if I may transgress briefly on the time of this house, the matter I have raised is most urgent. Today Canada is spending millions of dollars on our centennial celebrations, and sincere men are searching desperately to establish a Canadian identity. I submit that there is nothing more truly Canadian than the Bluenose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crouse: It is indicative of an age of wooden ships and iron men. It is indicative of a generation that established our coastal trade in Nova Scotia, our great fishing industry and our trade with the West Indies and Europe, and I believe it is time this government gave an indication of when the Bluenose will be returned to our coinage.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO INDUCEMENTS TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY RATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry. In view of the latest D.B.S. report showing that Canadian productivity is rising at a rate considerably slower than the level of wages, is the government giving consideration to offering inducements to make possible a greater rate of increase in the level of productivity in Canada?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad indeed to advise the hon. member privately, without taking the time of the house, of the substantial number of effective programs that are directed precisely to the end of increasing productivity.

Mr. Hees: I should like to address a supplementary question to the minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that productivity is rising at a relatively slow rate in Canada today, and in view of the fact that the minister's programs are not producing the desired effect, would he consider introducing some that really are effective in increasing productivity?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF FURTHER U.S. DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. My question is based on the fact that I have been informed that a flood of representations is being sent to the minister at this time.

Has the minister received any representations from any organizations or persons urging that the Columbia river treaty be sent to the committee in view of the recent developments in the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, indeed; I have received at least one. The chairman of the House of Commons committee on industry, research and energy development told me, however, that the committee is very busy at this time and that he will have to reconsider the suggestion later in the session.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO CAPITAL ASSISTANCE FOR CLASS A FAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is it his intention to introduce a program of capital assistance for class A fairs, and if so, will the program be available for action during the current year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It has been suggested to the Chair that the question has already been asked.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO ENTRY OF AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Now that the planting season is fast approaching, can the minister indicate whether provision will be made for seasonal immigration of farm labour as was done in 1966, and whether other measures will be considered to ensure adequate farm labour in these critical times?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will be looking into this matter immediately.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EASTER MONDAY—INQUIRY AS TO HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Has it been indicated that Easter Monday will be a holiday for classified civil servants but not for prevailing rates employees? Will the government consider treating both groups in the same manner?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): I will be pleased to look into this matter.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

LOWER ST. LAWRENCE—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Some time ago he instituted a new mail service, which was intended to be an improvement, in the lower part of the St. Lawrence. Can he tell the house now whether he intends to establish another mail service which will deliver mail to the people within eight days at least?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I wish to ask him when he changed his mind about elevating the Minister without Portfolio to a more responsible position in the cabinet.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to be able to put the hon. member from Cape Breton in a more responsible position.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR SAFETY INSPECTION OF STEEL HULLED TOW BOATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In the light of the large number of tow boats which have sunk on the Pacific coast, can the minister tell us whether he has recently received representations from the Canadian Merchant Service Guild to the effect that all steel hulled tow boats be called in so it can be determined whether they have three watertight bulkheads, and if not that they be required to have them in order that future disasters be prevented? Can the minister tell us whether he has received such communications, and what plans are being made to cope with that request?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Judging from the careful way in which the hon. gentleman was consulting his notes I would assume that such representations must have been made to me in my absence, and no doubt were dealt with in a most effective manner by the acting minister. Nevertheless I will make inquiries and let the hon. gentleman know.

I might also remind the hon. gentleman that it is contrary to the rules to ask questions of the acting minister when the minister is in the house.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will use this forum to extend my apologies for puncturing the ego of the minister or for letting him suppose that I might ask the acting minister a question while the minister is here.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Will the Minister of Transport also inquire into the matter of icebreaking on the St. Lawrence, which has reached serious proportions during his absence?

Mr. Pickersgill: When the hon. member said it had reached dangerous proportions did he mean there was too much of it or too little?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Too much, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RETRAINING OF WORKERS LAID OFF BECAUSE OF AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question put to me on March 3 by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam concerning the number of automobile workers who have been placed in employment through our Canada manpower centres. Unfortunately I cannot give a complete answer because automobile workers reside in many places, and over 30 Canada manpower centres are known to have some registered. To avoid unnecessary paper work we keep separate records of placements only where there are substantial numbers of automobile workers, and of course these are the areas where placements are slow.

As of February 24, 833 referrals for employment had been made and 336 workers had been placed in employment. As I have indicated earlier, this is far from satisfactory. It has to be recognized that the re-employment of workers from a high wage industry cannot be done as quickly as we would like, but we are doing all we can to speed it up.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister has just stated that there is difficulty in getting adequate information regarding the auto workers who are laid off, I should like to ask whether this does not stress the need for the setting up of the kind of committee for which the U.A.W. has asked, a committee of the government, employers and employees, so there may be some co-ordinated follow-up as to what happens to the auto workers who are discharged.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to refer to the particular problem which the hon. gentleman has in mind but will only say that personally I certainly favour all joint committees of management and labour in order to solve those problems.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DIRECTION OF MONETARY POLICY, CASH RESERVES, ETC.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. C-190, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause 1:

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs reported this particular bill without amendment on March 1 of this year.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. Would hon. gentlemen please observe some silence and allow those taking part in this debate to be heard.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, the rules of this house with regard to debate on a bill of this kind make it a little difficult to mix general remarks with specific remarks relating to the bill, in that I want to discuss the determination of monetary policy and the maintenance or creation of statutory secondary reserves.

There is not a great deal in the act other than general housekeeping matters. If one refers back to the 1953-54 amendments which revised the act, as contained in the 1952 revised statutes, one can see that there are not now many changes in the provisions of the Bank of Canada Act. However, I feel there should be some remarks of a general nature made at this time and with your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, I should like to address myself to these subjects. My colleagues may have considerably more to say when we reach the individual clauses of the bill.

I wish to deal primarily with some of the testimony of Mr. Rasminsky, governor of the Bank of Canada, which appears in the minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 19 dated October 31, 1966. I am sorry I was not able to be present at this particular meeting of the committee, but in any event there is reproduced in the minutes for the edification and instruction of hon. members a fairly extensive brief which was presented by the governor and on which he was questioned.

One point with which I agree, and which is one of the crucial points made by Mr. Rasminsky, is that there is nothing in the bill which diminishes the responsibility which the governor bears for the monetary policy being followed. Then as reported at page 990 of the report the governor went on to say:

> So long as he occupies the position of governor the public is entitled to assume that the policy being followed carries his personal judgment. As the minister said in the second reading debate in the House of Commons, if the government of the day ever issued a directive to the governor to execute a monetary policy which he felt was contrary to the public interest, it may be taken for granted that he would resign rather than accept such a responsibility.

I find some difficulty in the provision of the bill which, shall we say, statutorily enshrines this difference of opinion and which would put it beyond the pale of a reconsideration of position either by the government or the governor so they could arrive at some consensus or at some variation. I want to discuss this further when we get to the appropriate clause, which is the proposed section 14, being clause 6 of this bill; but it seems to me that these differences of opinion have to be underlined by a written directive from the Minister of Finance, after consultation with the governor in council, to the governor of the Bank of Canada instructing him to follow a certain policy, which should be published in the Canada Gazette.

I think it would be beyond the pale that this should ever arise, Mr. Chairman. I just cannot conceive of any governor remaining in his position if he had to be subjected to this type of treatment. It might be that the government is now thinking that this would be an additional weapon with which to beat a governor—and I am referring to a recalcitrant governor—into submission. There is no doubt that monetary policy is the responsibility of the government.

Mr. Sharp: This is a recent conversion.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, no. The minister may want to play around with this, but he has had experience with the esteemed gentleman who was involved in this connection, and I am sure he would realize that if that man occupied his former position today there would be a great deal of difficulty. The minister would have to deal not only with the hon. member for Davenport but also with a governor of the Bank of Canada who at one time was making rather extraordinarily freelance speeches.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I found his behaviour at the time completely incomprehensible, and since then I have at times found his behaviour equally incomprehensible. However, I realize that the minister is trying to get some form of statutory power into the bill in order to deal with a governor who might refuse to carry out the monetary policies of the government of the day.

Then Mr. Rasminsky spoke of the technical arrangements, of which he sought improvement, for the exercise of monetary control by the Bank of Canada. This is by the institution of statutory secondary reserves about which I must confess I am not yet convinced in spite of all of the persuasive advocacy of the governor. To me this is adding a surplus of power to a surplus of power.

There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that within the statutory reserves, and particularly the statutory reserves which are embodied in the amendment to the proposed section 72 of the new Bank Act, the twelve and four formula, the effect of the 12 per cent requirement is felt on demand deposits. To me this is an extraordinarily effective weapon, and because of the changing picture of Canada's banking system as a result of the growth of a number of near banks and other financial institutions—a matter which we will be discussing when we reach the Bank Act—the Bank of Canada has less and less control over the monetary system of this country. It is trying to maintain the same level of control through the chartered banks by measures which will be and which will have to be all the more radical in their effect on the chartered banks. In other words, the basis of the exercise of this control is being narrowed as our financial system in this country evolves, and this proposal of the government to me compounds the difficulties.

I find that the provision for statutory secondary reserves is piling super-caution upon caution and it is not at all necessary. I spoke to the minister concerning the situation in the United States where the federal reserve board has the statutory power of varying the reserve requirement up or down in order to affect the monetary policy of the country. In Canada, as we know, it is a question merely of the Bank of Canada making more money available or restricting the amount of money in circulation. This has some effect on the bond market and it also affects the interest rate.

I would have thought, in addition to the power that the Bank of Canada has to affect the monetary situation in the country through this particular procedure, there should have been an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act to allow for a variation in the primary reserve rate, particularly in connection with deposits on a fixed or term basis.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Lambert: Yes.

Mr. Sharp: Is the hon. gentleman aware how many times the power that is already in the act has been exercised? I can give him the answer. It has never been exercised, but it has been there from 1954.

Mr. Lambert: The power to vary, to reduce, but never on fixed or term deposits.

Mr. Sharp: No, on the total; we could have increased it in steps from 8 per cent to 12 per cent.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, but never below 8 per cent, and there is a distinction between current deposits on a demand basis and deposits on a fixed or term basis. I would have thought that in addition to the power to affect the quantum of money there should have been an alternative procedure open to the Bank of Canada to affect the monetary situation in the country by allowing the bank to reduce reserves below the level indicated in the act. I hope when the minister replies he will comment upon the sufficiency of the powers at the disposal of the U.S. Federal Reserve Board, in relation to the Canadian monetary system, and whether we can add this particular tool of monetary control to our system.

This is the extent of my general remarks and I thank the committee for allowing me to make them. After all, the amendment called for by clause 1 is very limited. I hope we can get further comment from the minister, either in reply to these remarks or at the appropriate time when we are considering the clauses.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take too much of the time of the committee. I do not believe there is a great deal to be said about this bill because its purpose is to clear up some anachronisms. Unlike the hon. member for Edmonton West, I do not believe clause 6 can be interpreted as a club with which the government may beat the governor of the Bank of Canada. Rather, I suspect it is a club the governor of the Bank of Canada insisted upon having placed in his hands in order to beat the Minister of Finance of the day over the head. Certainly this is the view I take of it. I must say this particular minister has never done so but, having heard a number of his predecessors dodge their responsibilities by telling the House of Commons that, after all, they could do nothing because the matter was in the hands of the Bank of Canada, I suggest that neither this minister nor his successors will be able to do so now. Any attempt to do so will meet condign punishment, I am sure, from whatever opposition there is in this chamber.

As I say, I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West has it the wrong way around. I would not be surprised if the governor of the Bank of Canada had written that particular section himself. I regret I was not in attendance at the committee on finance and economic affairs when the Bank of Canada Act came before it. I had previously asked Mr. Rasminsky if he would be prepared to give us some information with regard to the role that the Bank of Canada plays in some of the conversations regarding reform of the international monetary system. I was hoping, as I told Mr. Rasminsky, that this might provide an opportunity for him to give at least some elementary education to myself and other members of the committee about what is going to be the next vexing question in monetary affairs. However, we can perhaps hope to get another opportunity to have the governor give us some information on that matter.

There is one thing I should like to stress now which perhaps is not truly linked to this bill. I ask the minister if he would not sound out the governor of the Bank of Canada and his staff as to the possibility of publishing some of the results of their research. I am informed the bank has collected one of the ablest stables of economists in the country who do a tremendous amount of research whose results stay in the bank or possibly go to a few selected people. If this information were made available to the public I think it would be useful in enabling the Canadian public and members of parliament to understand better the operations of our monetary system.

Beyond this, I have nothing to say about the bill. As I say, it clears up a lot of anachronisms. My seatmate, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, was rather regretful when he read that the phrase "will pay to bearer on demand" was being removed. He has always cherished the idea that one day he would take a dollar bill to the Bank of Canada and ask for a dollar for it. Now this opportunity is gone and he says that is the difficulty with postponing things. This is one of the anachronisms that has been cleared up. I think we can accept the bill as it is without further ado.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, we have before us the proposed amendments to the Bank of Canada Act and my question of privilege—I will hasten to say—is to the effect that French speaking hon. members in this house do not have the same opportunity to discuss these amendments as those whose mother tongue is English.

Let me explain my question of privilege. All these amendments to the Bank of Canada Act have been examined in committee. The evidence heard is contained in various numbers of committee hearing reports. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that the numbers containing the committee proceedings have only been printed in English. We have not yet received the French version. The French text is twelve numbers behind, since we have only received the French up to No. 41, whereas No. 53 of the English has been printed and distributed.

The amendments to the Bank of Canada Act had been disclosed in committee when No. 53 was published; it is still only available in English. At that time, we were discussing Bill No. C-222 and the amendments to the Chartered Banks Act. We have the English version of the minutes with respect to the clause by clause study of Bill No. C-190. However, we do not yet have these in French, since the French version of the reports on committee proceedings only go as far as January 31, 1967.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit that we are at a disadvantage. I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe), followed committee discussions very diligently. Under ordinary circumstances, it would be his turn to speak, after the Conservative party spokesman and the representative of the New Democratic Party. I am sure that he and I could express our views much more clearly if we had French transcripts of the proceedings, but we do not have them.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I feel that under the present circumstances, discussion of Bill No. C-190 should be postponed until we have received the French version of the proceedings of committee discussions.

I should like to put forward two arguments in support of my request, Mr. Chairman. My first argument is the fact that French is supposed to be an official language in this house, on a level with English. Since the proceedings are not available in the two official languages, the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp) should himself ask that consideration of the said bill be postponed until we receive the French version of the proceedings, at least those concerning Bill No. C-190 which has been studied in committee.

I also wish to refer to a precedent established in this house two or three years ago, when we were considering the Canada Pension Plan or the Canada Pension Act.

It will be recalled that, at the time, a group of members pressed for postponement of examination of the Canada pension bill until such time as the proceedings on examination of the bill in committee were distributed to us in both languages.

At that time, also, we had received in English only, the reports concerning the study in committee of the Canada Pension Plan.

And, at that time, the government had graciously agreed—thereby establishing a precedent—to postpone the study of the Pension Act until such time as we would be provided with the reports in both languages. And I recall very clearly that, at that time, the government acted quickly and, in less than 24 hours, we received the reports. In less than 24 or 36 hours, if my memory serves me right, we received the reports in French, since we already had them in English, and the study of the Canada Pension Act, or the Canada pension plan, had been postponed until we received the French translation of the committee reports.

Mr. Chairman, since it has always been said that both languages, French and English, are official in this house, and since we have received the reports in one language only and it is very important for a proper discussion of the amendments to Bill No. C-190, which is a very important bill, to have the documents in French and English to be able to discuss them better, and since a denial of those documents would be an obvious discrimination against the members who speak French as their first language, and since a precedent has already been established in that respect and the present government had accepted to establish that precedent, in those circumstances, I would ask the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to agree to the postponement of the study of Bill No. C-190, as did his colleague who is today the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), until we have the reports in both languages.

I shall ask him to move the postponement of the study of Bill No. C-190 until we have the reports in both languages. I think we could get unanimous consent in that respect.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

I understand that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is the spokesman for his party as far as this bill is concerned. He will also agree no doubt, since that procedure was followed at the time of the study of the bill concerning the Canada Pension Plan, that we postpone the study of Bill No. C-190 until we have the said reports in both languages.

I shall ask the Minister of Finance and Receiver General to move himself that the study of this bill be postponed. I know that it will not be very long before we have those reports in French, and it will avoid that kind of discrimination the government does not want to have in this house.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I regret just as much as does the hon. member for Lapointe that we do not have before us at this time a complete set of the reports of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. The principal reason for this situation is the diligence of the committee. This committee has given a more thorough examination to the bank acts than has ever been given by any committee, I believe, in the past and this has taken a great deal of time.

The hon. member for Lapointe has himself contributed very extensively to these debates and I am sure that he would like to see his contribution before us in both languages. Unfortunately this has not been possible. Had the committee been able to complete its hearings some weeks ago we would now have these reports before us.

The position in which we now find ourselves is that we must deal fully with these bills both in this house and in the Senate, so that they may receive royal assent before April 1. If we were to delay consideration of them now in order that these reports might be available in French as well as in English, something which we would all like to see, it would be necessary for parliament to extend once again the present acts. Failure to deal with the bills before us at this session would mean that consideration of these matters would have to begin all over again. I am sure the hon. member would not wish to impose a delay of that sort upon the house or upon the country.

These banking bills have been before the house on two separate occasions. They have been introduced twice. There has been general discussion on each of them and there has been detailed consideration in the committee of the bill now before us. So I hope the hon.

member will not press his point. I believe we are making progress in the direction he has indicated and I can assure him on behalf of the government that we are making every effort to ensure that these reports are translated quickly.

• (3:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, somewhat on the same question of privilege raised by my colleague for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), I must say I listened to the answer given by the hon. minister, which was of interest to me, as you may imagine, and also to the representations made by the hon. member for Lapointe.

I was surprised, for once, at the way the hon. member for Lapointe made his representations, for he was moderate and reasonable and, without any intention of insulting the government, he justified his request with arguments I believe serious. Therefore, I must say, Mr. Chairman—and I am trying to say it dispassionately and in the most objective way possible—that I feel compelled to support the request made by the hon. member for Lapointe and I ask the hon. minister to reconsider his decision.

There are other reasons in favour of such a suggestion. I am aware of the spirit of goodwill of the hon. minister and I do not doubt it; besides, I am also aware of the spirit of goodwill on the part of most of the ministers concerning that question. I am one of those who have asked since the opening of this session last year, for instance, for the simultaneous publication of the French and English versions of the Labour Gazette. And I have been told, since that time, that there would be improvement in a month, in two months, in three months, but it is always the same thing.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that if the government does not make up its mind one of these days to take extreme measures in order to grant to all members their right of having the documents in both languages and of being able to take part in the debates in an intelligent way, the question will not be settled. I must admit that, in my case, there is no inconvenience whether the documents are in English or in French, since I had the privilege of learning English, or rather I took the trouble of learning it, since I felt the need to do so. However, some of my colleagues here did not have the same privilege; in spite of all their willingness, they did not have the opportunity of learning English, but they take part in the debates in this house, they attend very regularly the sittings of the committees of which they are members and they tell us that they are embarrassed, since they cannot discuss intelligently the bill they are interested in.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this principle is more important than that of not delaying the study of the bill concerning the Bank Act. I do not intend to venture into a protracted debate, Mr. Chairman; besides, I think the hon. minister understands, since I already had the opportunity of knowing how he feels about that bill. I simply wish to say solemnly and sincerely that I feel compelled to support the request made by the hon. member for Lapointe and I object to the examination of this bill if the French documents cannot be produced.

[English]

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, when I was listening to the hon. member for Lapointe I wondered whether he was aware of the inclusion in the final report of the committee of a recommendation with regard to translation. I have great sympathy for the hon. member. I am sure he will recall that during the committee hearings our chairman was constantly pressing the translation authorities to speed up the French translations. It became obvious that the translation facilities are inadequate. But I would plead with the hon. member for Lapointe to realize that this is a much larger question than merely getting these particular minutes translated. It involves an extension of the whole translation service and I do not think we should hold up the proceedings on this bill, on which there is great urgency, because of this very reasonable grievance which the committee attempted to deal with in its final report.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, in support of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), I should like to quote section 133 of the British North America Act, which states:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the house of the parliament of Canada and of the house of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses;

Therefore, proceedings of committees of the house must be published in both languages and now, we do not have these reports today. As my friend the hon. member for Lapointe said a while ago, there is a substantial time lapse between the publication of the English and French versions. The minister told us a while ago that there is no delay, but I submit that there is a one-month gap between the two, because no particular effort was made to make the French version of the proceedings available to hon. members.

Mr. Chairman, for four years now, we have been demanding equal standards in house services with respect to the two official languages, and we intend to see to it that our request is granted.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I too would be glad if Bill No. C-190 were passed without delay. But since we still have many aspects of the bill to look into and even have amendments to move, I would have liked to read all the proceedings in French. The more important discussions concerning the Bank of Canada, in which its president took part are to be found in proceedings we have not yet received. Therefore, since we do not have those proceedings in which we could find the required information in order to discuss sensibly, I fully support the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Lapointe who wants those proceedings printed in both languages and the discussion on the bill suspended until we have obtained the French proceedings.

Mr. Chairman, at least a dozen issues of the proceedings in French have not yet been distributed. We surely need them, because discussion of the Bank of Canada is of the utmost importance. Discussion of the Bank of Canada includes basic aspects which must be considered and known in all their phases. We need the French version of the proceedings of the committee to be in a position to deal with the question. We have considerable discussion to carry on as regards the Bank of Canada.

I know that discussion of the Bank of Canada has not been very long in the past. Most of the time, the charter has been renewed without amendment. Now, we have amendments to the charter of the Bank of Canada to move and if they cannot be taken into consideration at least we will have the opportunity to move them, because we intend to fulfil our responsibilities as far as the financial situation of Canada is concerned, since that question and the question of the Bank of Canada is of major importance and constitutes a greater factor than all the others. To my mind, every member should closely consider the financial aspect of the Bank of Canada and, for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I fully support the statement of the hon. member for Lapointe. So, we will not agree to continuation of the debate on this bill without first having in hand a French copy of the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, just a few words about the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), who was admirably assisted by the hon. members for Trois-Rivières, Chapleau and Compton-Frontenac (Messrs. Mongrain, Laprise, and Latulippe).

The question raised by the hon. member for Lapointe is not a new problem in the house. Indeed, over the years, it has often happened under different governments, that committee reports did not appear at the same time in both languages, which prevented hon. members to have an intelligent discussion in the house. That which the hon. member complains about is not only convenient discrimination during a debate. This discrimination also becomes evident, as the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac pointed out, when the house is about to study an extremely important bill which is, let us say, the financial, economic and administrative backbone of our country, an act concerning the Bank of Canada. Now, it is most important that all hon. members be made aware of the learned proceedings which took place in the parliamentary committee.

There is, in the English text, technical and specific terms which it is difficult for us, French Canadians, to understand properly, to grasp their meaning and their scope in the financial and monetary field. That is why, it is necessary for us to have in our own tongue, the exact meaning of the word or expression that will enable us to understand the full scope of the wording or the principle to be incorporated in this new bill.

• (4:00 p.m.)

That is why, it would be highly appreciated if the hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General postponed the study of this bill in order to allow us, French Canadians, to get the French version of the proceedings of the committee.

We are not doing this, this afternoon, merely to complain about a certain discrimination in the distribution of French copies; we do so especially that we may better understand this most important bill. It is precisely because we French Canadian members of the house here in Ottawa want to contribute substantially to the study of important bills such as this one; because we want to address ourselves to the questions seriously, conscientiously and responsibly. Now, under the present circumstances, we cannot do so.

I must say that personally, although I speak and read English well enough, as it is not my mother tongue, I often find it difficult to understand certain technical and scientific expressions and realize the full impact of the bills or amendments we are asked to deal with.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention the Hansard of last Friday. I believe the hon. Minister of Finance and Receiver General, who was asked to introduce his bill today, could very well refer, in order to delay study of this bill, to the business of the house as given last Friday, that is on March 3, by the leader of the government. It did not provide for the immediate discussion of the hon. minister's bill at the next sitting. On the contrary, it indicated that the government proposed to call item 119, that is third reading of Bill No. C-259, then item 135, that is, second reading of the bill dealing with federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. And then we see Bill No. C-190, which it is proposed to consider this afternoon, as well as items 137 and 136.

Consequently, while we would discuss the four or five items included in the last list of business of the house for its next sitting, that is this afternoon, the translators would have plenty of time—even if we spent the few remaining days of this week on the four other items—to give us a French version of the parliamentary committee proceedings.

I hope that the government which, in different circumstances, appeared well disposed —and as the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) said, a precedent was furthermore created by the Liberal government, during consideration of the Canada Pension Plan Act, then the minister who is now Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) had accepted, as a result of similar representations, to put off consideration of the Canada Pension Plan bill to enable all members, and especially French Canadian members, to understand perfectly the scope, the meaning and all the implications of that act which was very important—will do the same once again.

As was so ably and rightly pointed out by the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac, this bill before the committee—perhaps the Minister of Finance and Receiver General is an expert in this matter, perhaps he has gained some experience as a civil servant, when he met experts in finance and economy, and I do not know whether or not he realizes that many hon. members here, in this house, despite their education and their particular knowledge in other subjects, despite all their good will are not as knowledgeable as him in this matter—demands much thought. Now, the first requisite to good comprehension is to have in one's mother tongue the true meaning and perfect translation of this act. And that is why, from time to time, we refer to tradition, not so just to recriminate, but because we want to make a substantial contribution to the debates. Therefore, we do want to understand correctly the meaning and the implications of the legislation before us. And we want to understand at the same time as the other hon. members in the house who speak our country's other official language, so that the members of the province of Quebec or the French speaking members will not be accused of inaction in the House of Commons. We are here, Mr. Chairman, to play a useful and adequate role and we want to do it with as much enthusiasm and interest as all other hon. members. To that end, we need an essential tool, namely documents and bills in French and we must have them when they are made available in English. If we always get them late we are in an unfavourable position, in which some discrimination might easily be seen, and for which we might be criticized, not so much by the taxpayers of the province of Quebec as by some people in English Canada who sometimes say that the French Canadian members from Quebec do not take part in discussions on economic or financial matters and do not seem interested to do so. I want to state clearly this afternoon that this is false. On the contrary, we are greatly interested, we are here to make a contribution. Therefore, since this bill of the utmost importance is being considered, we should be given what we need to understand the discussions in committee. The documents available in English now should also be available to us in French. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would very much appreciate it if the minister would reconsider the matter and comply with that request.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I point out two or three facts to some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question of privilege with which I have a good deal of sympathy, because I would protest as they have against the fact that these reports are not available in French. First of all, the hon. member who has just spoken asks the reason for the change in procedure. The reason, of course, I think is pretty plain. A very sad event has intervened which has placed before the government the necessity to proceed with the bank acts in an order other than had been decided in the program because these acts must be through this house, through the Senate and receive royal assent before April 1. Otherwise we will have to introduce another bill to extend the charters of the chartered banks for another period while we reintroduce the bill or extend this session indefinitely. Second, all the testimony relating to the Bank of Canada Act is now available in the French language. There is nothing missing.

While the argument may be valid in respect of the Bank Act and could be a valid criticism of the procedure with regard to that act —perhaps there is not much point in my bringing this to the attention of hon. members—in fact all the testimony relating to the Bank of Canada Act has been printed in the French language. No amendments were made in respect of this bill when it was under consideration. It is reintroduced exactly as it was introduced. Therefore I hope that hon. members, having raised this legitimate grievance, will be content to proceed with the Bank of Canada Act with regard to which the testimony in French, I am now informed, is printed.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) stated that evidence before the committee is now available in French. I am happy to hear it. As far as we are concerned, I believe that those proceedings have not yet been distributed to our offices. If he has them, would it be possible for him to have them distributed, particularly those dealing with the Bank of Canada? That would be acceptable for we obviously are not asking for the proceedings of the committee on the Bank Act or the Quebec Savings Banks Act since those are not now before us.

We are now considering the Bank of Canada Act, and if the minister says those reports are available in French, let us have them and we will be satisfied. We have not yet received them in our offices.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the testimony given in respect of the Bank of Canada Act relates to the testimony given by the governor of the Bank of Canada. That testimony was given quite early, has now been printed and has been available to members for quite some time. When I appeared before the committee, for example, I gave no testimony whatsoever on the Bank of Canada Act and I was not asked for any. It is my understanding that when the bill was before the committee no amendments were made so there was no discussion about changes. While I understand that there is a legitimate grievance about the reports not being printed in French as quickly as in English, that is not a complaint that can be directed particularly to the bill before us today. There are no technical questions of the kind the hon. member has raised which have to be translated since there were no technical amendments made.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister could indicate what kind of a delay we might expect before we have a translation department which will give us publications in French and in English at the same time. I have been complaining for more than a year about this situation, particularly in relation to the Labour Gazette.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps I should at this time give this factual answer. The minutes of proceedings and evidence of 50 meetings have been published in English and 43 have been published in French. The proceedings of three meetings have not yet been published in either language. I agree with the hon. member that it would be better if we could say that 53 had been printed in both languages but the disparity between the two is not as great as perhaps suggested. Certainly it is not as great as it once was, which is some evidence of the progress we are making.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I just want to correct a point raised by the minister. The governor of the Bank of Canada appeared before the committee before the Minister of Finance did, of course, and we then examined him on general matters. The Minister of Finance appeared afterwards and we also obtained, in French and in English, his evidence before the committee. But after that, we studied the Bank of Canada Act item by item and discussions took place, even though no amendments were moved.

Now, it is precisely the proceedings covering the study of the bill item by item that we have not yet received.

The Minister of Finance says that 43 issues have been sent; it may be so, but No. 41 was our latest issue. Perhaps 43 fascicules are ready but the proceedings end with Nos. 42 or 43 and we have not yet received them and those are precisely the issues dealing with the section by section consideration of the Bank of Canada Act. Even though no amendments were introduced, important discussions took place and if the minister says that the proceedings have been printed, there may have been a delay in their distribution. If that is the case, we shall not ask for a very long extension of time. As soon as we get them—this could be done before six o'clock—we will be ready to resume the debate.

I think the minister will realize that we are making this request in good faith, especially if 43 issues have already been printed and in view of the fact that we have not received Nos. 42 and 43 of the proceedings even though consideration of the Bank of Canada Act is over.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) rises on a question of privilege—I listen to him with much interest—he does it well, he makes a serious contribution to the debate, and it is interesting to have him make a serious contribution.

Mr. Chairman, for my part, I believe that when an hon. member insists on occasion to have a committee report in his own language —which, by the way, is one of the two official languages in this country—what he asks for is an absolute right, and the government and the house are going to take such absolute right into account.

However, in all fairness to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), I do believe that he is not responsible for all existing administrative problems.

Mr. Mongrain: Nobody says the minister is responsible, nobody blames him.

Mr. Lachance: I do not contend that the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) said he was; I am giving my personal opinion concerning this matter. In all fairness, the Minister of Finance should not be thus held responsible for all those administrative problems.

The minister should not be blamed either for the unfortunate aspects of this problem, if there are any such aspects. On the other hand, the problem of the translation of reports into the two official languages of the country is a new one. Only recently has the business of the house become so voluminous and the committee meetings so numerous; the point is just that the staff of the house is not yet adequate, and that is what should be emphasized. In fact, the staff should be increased so as to meet in so far as possible the needs of hon. members.

In my opinion, it is quite impossible to have the debates of the standing or special committees of the house translated into English or French barely five minutes after the end of a meeting; in fact, that would sometimes force us to delay consideration of an urgent bill. Hon. members know that there is as yet no automation or adequate planning to ensure that the translation and printing of committee proceedings are done quickly enough to meet the needs of the House of Commons.

Not so long ago when I was a member of the committee on procedure, we studied the committee problem and when, in June 1965, the number of committees was increased, the whole house agreed that it would create problems. In fact, it still creates problems and it will always do so, whether we like it or not, because the whole government staff cannot be assigned to translate the proceedings which take place in English in a committee. If that were done, the work in other government services would be delayed proportionally. Now, when a member asks to receive the proceedings of a committee in his mother tongue, whether he is English or French speaking, I think that the house must grant to an hon. member the right to check, in his own language, the proceedings of a committee.

But, I believe also that hon. members, aware of the administrative problem, must not make it a problem which unduly delays the study of a bill. I do not say that this is done in this case, because I do want the hon. member for Lapointe to know full well that if I take part in this discussion on a question of privilege, it is to support his request. However, in all fairness for the Minister of Finance, we must not blame him for a situation for which he is not responsible.

Mr. Grégoire: Oh no. This is not what I meant.

Mr. Lachance: Now, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe) said that the members should study the Bank Act. There is no doubt about that, and I think they are studying it; however, if they do not speak, that does not mean they are not considering the said act.

As to the matter of discrimination I do not see any in the present case. It is a technical problem, which members must try to understand, because I feel this problem will never be settled unless a miracle solution is found.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, it is rarely that I intervene on a question of privilege and it is even more rarely that I agree with the hon. member for Lapointe. However, I think we are faced with something really fundamental here and I should regret very much if the burden of discussion were carried by those who speak in the French language.

• (4:20 p.m.)

In my opinion this sort of thing is happening far too frequently. This country may not be bilingual but this is certainly a bilingual parliament and the two languages are equal, one to the other. One is in no way subordinate to the other, and there is no reason those who have difficulty with the English language should have to be content with documentation in English rather than in the language they find most familiar. I for one would protest most vigorously if the documentation relative to this bill were in French only, because my difficulty in reading French would delay me a good deal and I am sure I would not be finished reading the documentation until long after the bill had passed. I think hon. members who have protested have a legitimate protest. This is not a new situation which faces the government. I remember so well many such discussions when the Canada Pension Plan bill was before the house. I remember that when I first came to this house the sacred document of our procedure, Beauchesne, was available in English only and members who spoke the French language only had great difficulty in dealing with such matters.

I would say that if there are bills that are so urgent that they require immediate treatment efforts should be made to see that urgent measures are invoked with respect to the translation of any proceedings thereon. While there may be 43 copies printed in French and 50 in English, there should be 50 copies printed in French and 50 in English. I think it is quite unfair to those who speak French to be constantly left as a sort of second string. French is not the second language of this house; it is one of two languages which are equal and in no way subordinate one to the other.

Since "task force" is now an operative phrase on the government side, I think they should get a task force to work in order to complete this translation. There is plenty of room for flexibility in government orders. We frequently have examples of this flexibility. Frequently we do not know from day to day which particular order is going to come before us. I suggest that on a matter of principle so important as the rights of each language the government should take the necessary steps, provide a task force and get the translation done. I suggest that in the meantime we take up another important measure—there are several before us—and stop this situation whereby when something important comes before us we are told: "It is too bad but the documentation in French is not completed; and because this is an important matter let us deal with it in this form and we will do better next time".

We have been promised these better efforts for many years. If the translation facilities are not adequate, it behooves the government to make sure that they are improved and that bilingualism in this house is a functional fact as well as a legal fact that is acknowledged and a principle that is established.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to bring a slight correction to what the minister said. We may not have received the 43rd part of the French version of the report, but I want to point out to the house that it is in the 43rd part that we find final consideration of Bill No. C-190, as pointed out by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). In fact, it is then that Mr. Rasminsky, governor of the Bank of Canada, was again questioned, when several members took part in the discussion.

I would like to make another slight correction. My colleague the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) had moved an amendment which was rejected in committee and there had been a debate on that amendment. Even though the substance of that evidence and the minutes of proceedings concerning that bill was replaced in the 41st part of the report, we evidently have an addendum in the 42nd part, and I think it is necessary to point out this correction.

Now, I do not know whether we should postpone consideration of Bill No. C-190 this afternoon until we have the translation of report No. 49. Why consider the Bank Act? In fact, our position would be even more difficult, since we have not yet received the complete proceedings in English, let alone in French? Therefore, I leave the problem with the government. The leader of the house must decide what we shall do. It is not for the hon. Minister of Finance to decide the speed of translation of the committee reports. I think the government has had sufficient notice to realize that this situation constituted a problem, even though we must admit that great progress has taken place.

At this point, I would like to point out a paragraph of the committee report, page 3, where nothing is said, of course, about translation unfortunately. In fact, this is what the committee says, on page 3 of the English version. I quote:

[English]

Your committee recommends that the supporting services for this and other standing committees be expanded to meet the volume of work presently being carried out by them, such expansion to include

(a) more prompt translation of briefs and proposed amendments—

It says nothing about reports of proceedings. I suppose in general these should be included, but it does not specifically spell out the translation of reports of proceedings. I think this is just by way of per incuriam and I am sure all members of the committee would want to have this recommendation applied to the translation of all documents. They are not included specifically, but surely they fall within the generality of this recommendation.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Edmonton West has brought to the attention of the house quite well the recommendation of the committee with regard to the improvement of supporting services. The fact that certain specific improvements were enumerated certainly does not, I think, preclude the argument being made that the general recommendation for expanding the supporting services for the finance committee and other standing committees was intended to be carried out in such a way as to include translation. In fact, recommendation (b) refers to the faster printing of committee proceedings, and I think implicit in this recommendation would be the services for translation. The members of the finance committee at least are well aware of my own efforts to attempt to have this aspect of the printing of the proceedings carried out in a better way. Unfortunately this responsibility is not something that comes within the direct powers of chairmen of committees.

Since this matter has now been explored in detail in the house at this time I suggest that perhaps it would be suitable to dispose of it in the following way. The Minister of Finance is in charge of this particular legislation. He is a cabinet member of great prestige, if I may say so, and has great responsibility. Perhaps he will be able to say that he will use his influence and will work with the house leader and others to make sure that this problem is finally resolved.

I think an even more appropriate time to discuss this particular problem would be when the estimates pertaining to the services of the house are before us. Generally these estimates are disposed of without any particular discussion and debate. I am not saying this is necessarily wrong, but I believe this will be one occasion when, since the matter has been brought before us in this way, we might explore this aspect of the services of the house in greater depth, particularly with the attendance of the house leader who has some responsibility in this regard and who at that time or earlier might assure us that this type of problem will not continue to recur. This point having been made and as the existing legislation expires on April 1, while fully recognizing the principle of having publications completely available in both languages I suggest that we should not overlook our responsibility to all Canadians throughout our country, both French and English, and should now go on to dispose of this very important legislation.

[Translation]

The committee of the whole knows how hard I tried to create in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs a bilingual atmosphere which, in my opinion, helped all members of the committee to do their work in a friendly and serious manner, in short according to the proper method for a bilingual parliament in a country like Canada.

I am disappointed to see that in spite of all my own efforts to get the services of the house to operate in a more adequate manner and to improve the translation services, we are still without the full translation of all the committee proceedings as we are considering the bill. However, even those who like myself and other hon. members who spoke take a great interest in having fully bilingual services in this house must admit that we have a responsibility just as important toward all the people of Canada, English speaking as well as French speaking to study and pass, if they are adequate, the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act bills, because they are of capital importance to all Canadians. Should we find it impossible to conclude our consideration of those bills in committee of the whole before April 1, I feel that all hon. members who like myself are interested in promoting bilingualism in Canada will not be serving at all the interests of the people of Canada.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Gauthier: Regarding this question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I also wish to join with my colleagues and other English speaking hon. members in urging the minister this afternoon to make a gesture which will be conducive to greater unity in this house.

One French speaking member said that the minister should not be blamed for everything. I bear the minister no malice, but I submit he must accept his responsibilities. Having decided to introduce this bill this afternoon, he knew very well he had to make sure that we had the necessary documents in order to discuss the bill.

Words are all very nice, Mr. Chairman; I have been here almost five years now and, on both sides of the house, whenever this question of bilingualism comes up, I hear only one word: "sorry, sorry". Well, today, we say the same in French: we too are very sorry.

Mr. Chairman, we have been the first to demand what the constitution already provides; we have been doing this for almost five years now. It is not a question of favouritism, nor is it a question of one French Canadian speaking better English than other. No, no. It is a matter of constitutional right. I wonder when both groups will finally understand the meaning of this and I cannot see why the minister had to bring this bill before the house today.

We are told that discussion has to be completed by April 1. Mr. Chairman, let me point out to the hon. minister that there were exactly 12 months in the year 1966 and, since he knew that the bill had to be passed before April 1, 1967, the minister should have acted accordingly and brought the Bank of Canada Act before the house earlier, so that committee consideration might begin at an earlier date. Thus, he would not have to tell us, in a last minute rush: I have no alternative—

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow me a question?

[English]

Is he aware that the bill now before us received first reading on May 30, 1966?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: I am well aware of that, and it is precisely what I want to tell the minister. It should have been introduced in January; once more, enough time was not allowed, since we are caught again at the last minute. Something surely went wrong somewhere, since we face conditions which force us again to rush through the debate of a bill which is supposed to be of the utmost importance to Canada. Once more, we are confronted with a minister in the soup and we are told: The people will pay the toll; it must be done.

We are fed up with that. For four years now, we have heard such reasons, such excuses which are nothing more than excuses to us. The minister delayed amending the bill for two years now, if not three. Let him take the required time because, according to the amendments to the bill, I have a feeling it will not improve considerably our economic conditions in Canada.

I am merely telling the hon. minister to assume his responsibilities. If he is not ready, because of the documents, to present the bill to the two groups in the house, let him give the necessary instructions and wait till we are given the copies so that we can study the question in our own mother tongue and know what we are talking about when we express our views.

I therefore ask the hon. minister, without prejudice, to respect the constitution, to respect the two ethnic groups in the house, to put them on an equal footing with regard to the debate.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Roberval.

Of course, this is indeed an unfortunate situation, but one must remember that out of the 50 days of committee sittings that we have had and which ended recently, proceedings of 43 meetings have been translated and printed to date, while the 44th issue is being printed today and should be sent to hon. members tomorrow.

Out of the six fascicules which have not been translated and printed, three, I think, are not directly related to the Bank of Canada Act nor to the Bank Act, since they deal with evidence given in the Coyne-Stevens case as well as the evidence in connection with the Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. This would mean that there are no more than three or four reports, at the most, relating to the Bank Act and to the the Bank of Canada that have not been translated; there are also three English reports which are not ready.

One must not forget that the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs in whose work members have had a hand held 109 sittings in 50 days of work, since the end of October. Of course, this is committee work as has never been seen before, and this is the committee which has had the most sittings of all those created here in the House of Commons. Members of the committee have raised that question several times, and all were in agreement to demand that the translation be done more rapidly. Now, thanks to the efforts of our chairman and of other people on our committee, we have been successful in improving the situation greatly. Right now, even if we are three or four behind, I feel that is quite an improvement. Three years ago, one did not even expect to get them until six months later sometimes, whereas now one gets them only a few days late. In my opinion, one must recognize that the government is of good faith, and particularly the translation service which, as far as this committee is concerned, did a tremendous job. Of course, the system is not perfect but it has been tremendously improved and I think that a lot would be gained if hon. members were reasonable under such circumstances.

I know it is unpleasant, and I am as frustrated as any other member of the house. On the other hand, I sincerely believe that we have accomplished great progress. The fact that we spent one hour or perhaps an hour and a quarter this afternoon discussing this problem will make the heads of that service understand that we are really determined to find a solution. Their staff has been increased—I do not know by how much, but I believe it has tripled in the last two or three years—and when these new translators have acquired more experience, perhaps we will get a greater output.

As for now, I think it would be better to proceed without delay after making it clear that we will not tolerate such a situation indefinitely. We are honest enough to recognize the tremendous effort made, and I can assure the hon. member that we have pressed the translators every week to have the translation ready. I made every effort myself, but it was mostly the committee chairman. We are greatly disappointed.

On the other hand, because of the importance of this legislation and the work done by all committee members, and since we are all ready, at this time, to study that legislation, I think we could proceed without any prejudice to anyone. Under the circumstances, I do not think any members can complain, because the main evidence has been translated. I appreciate that the hon. member for Lapointe, (Mr. Grégoire) raised a very good point when he said that the last testimony of Mr. Rasminsky, which is recorded in fascicule No. 49, has not yet been translated unfortunately. On the other hand, one must admit that all relevant questions to the governor of the Bank of Canada were asked during many other sittings held previously. Under the circumstances, I do not think any member can complain that he has not received detailed information in his own language. And what is also most surprising, is that when the governor of the Bank of Canada was asked questions in French, he kindly answered in French.

There is also the fact that all those who have shown any interest in these debates have had the benefit of simultaneous translation. Truly, in the circumstances, we must admit that considerable efforts have been made in the last three or four years. In 1963, there was no simultaneous translation in the committees. But we have had it at every sitting of the committee.

In the circumstances, I think it would be reasonable to recognize the efforts that have been made. Obviously, the serious discussion that has taken place today in this matter is surely likely to improve this service which will gradually get better as the staff gains experience. To my mind, every effort has been made to give adequate simultaneous translation service and we should recognize it in the present circumstances.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the government has gotten itself into a hopeless situation here and I do not see how it is going to get out of it. There is no doubt that a matter of very fundamental importance, indeed a matter of principle, is involved. I agree wholeheartedly with my colleague the hon. member for Queens, who has pointed out to us that this is not a concession for which the members of the French tongue are asking. The proceedings before this parliament may be conducted in French or English. Those whose mother tongue is French have the right to have the proceedings to which we are referring and the documents with which we are dealing printed in their own language. I would further agree, Mr. Chairman, that were the situation reversed and the documentation was not available to me in the English language, I would be taking the position that my colleagues who speak the French language are taking, when they say that we should not be asked to proceed with the matter now before us until the French translations are available.

Mr. Chrétien: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Is he aware that there are three English reports which are not yet printed?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am aware of that. I will take the minister's and the parliamentary secretary's word for that, but I submit that this makes my case even stronger and that the government's sloppiness has put it into an inextricable position. We are here asked to deal with important legislation when some of the committee proceedings have not been printed at all and ten sessions have not been translated into French. If the governments are anxious, as they are to get on with the consideration of this legislation, then are they incapable of addressing their minds to the importance of having these committee proceedings translated into French?

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he not agree that it was the inability, the failure, of the former government to deal with this question that caused some of the difficulty we now are facing? The translation staff has increased about threefold since the present government has been in office.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Fulton: I certainly do not agree, Mr. Chairman. In fact, this only emphasizes the inadequacy and the impotence of the present government. Five years ago a situation arose of which the house leader said he had notice. This government have been in office for three and a half years but have still been unable to deal with the situation of which they had notice. The hon. gentleman is now trying to shift the responsibility to the former government.

Mr. McIlraith: I was really trying to correct—

Mr. Fulton: Is the house leader really trying to suggest that because there was an incident five years ago when a document was not translated that gives this government an excuse for not having taken action to correct the situation?

Mr. McIlraith: I am trying to correct the wrong impression that is being created by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fulton: It is obvious to me, Mr. Chairman, that what the hon. member is trying to do is to make a political point which does not apply.

Getting back to the question of principle involved here and away from the partisan political attitude of the house leader, I reiterate that proceedings in this chamber may be conducted in either French or English. The proceedings before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, which are important to the consideration of the bill before us, are not available in the French language. Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 49, the report containing the evidence of Mr. Rasminsky, the governor of the Bank of Canada, in connection with the Bank of Canada Act is one of the volumes which has not been translated and made available in French. Yet the evidence of the governor of the Bank of Canada dealt with a very important point in connection with the Bank of Canada Act, a point which is bound to come up for discussion in the consideration of the bill in this committee. That point has to do with the cash reserves which the chartered banks are required to maintain with the Bank of Canada as well, amongst other things, as the question whether or not the Bank of Canada should pay interest on any portion of those reserves. That, Mr. Chairman, is a difficult, complicated and important point which is bound to come up for consideration in this committee at this time.

Therefore my position is that if my colleagues of the French tongue say seriously that they find themselves in the position where they are unable to deal as they wish with the points that are before us because of the lack of a French translation of the proceedings, then I think they have established a case that we are bound to support, and I submit that we cannot proceed with our consideration until these reports are made available.

I recognize the dilemma in which the government find themselves, but surely the government of Canada are not so impotent—and I say this seriously and not entirely sarcastically—that they cannot correct the situation. The Minister of Public Works—the house leader—the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General and the Associate Minister of National Defence are all men, I am sure they would feel, of ability and energy, able to get things done. They and their colleagues collectively are able to carry on the government of Canada, if one were to take their word for it.

Are we to believe, Mr. Chairman, that these capable and energetic gentlemen cannot, if they address their minds to it, have these translations produced, overnight? If they gave the instruction, "Look, we need to deal with this bill without further delay so get going on the translation and printing of the French version of the reports", are we to understand that this cannot be done by tomorrow morning? If that is what hon. gentlemen are inviting us to assume, then I say in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, and more in sorrow than in anger, that it demonstrates perfectly the incapacity of this collection of ministers to carry on the government of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I do not know when last I listened to remarks more calculated to create a wrong impression about what is a difficult situation of great concern to this committee and to the House of Commons. The facts are these. The use of committees in the parliamentary procedures of this parliament has increased very sharply in this session. It increased by many times over the use made of them in former sessions. For example, there were 13 committees dealing with estimates alone. In no session in the past has the volume of committee work been anything more than a fraction of what it has been during this session.

To meet that situation, steps were taken to provide simultaneous interpretation in the committees. In this way, there would be a full appreciation of the right to use both languages without embarrassment to anyone. In spite of the difficulties in acquiring a sufficient number of skilled personnel, and thanks to the outstanding services of the personnel we were able to obtain, the system has worked well. Simultaneous translation was provided in all the committees and committee reports have been provided in the two languages. When the hon. member speaks about proceedings of the house, I must say we are not concerned now with the proceedings of the house, but rather with the printing of the evidence of a standing committee.

The situation in that respect has changed over the years. It has changed substantially. The former practice was to print the evidence of only some committees while other committees did not print any of the evidence of their hearings At the moment the practice is to print the evidence of all committees, with the possible exception of one or two. One exception is the special committee dealing with procedure. The other exception is a committee which does not meet very often, the committee on standing orders.

There has been a sharp change then in this regard, and there has been a sharp increase in the use of committees as an aid to this house in the performance of its duties. The demand that has been created has been difficult to meet. I regret that I must tell the committee that our educational system in this country has not been producing the volume of trained personnel necessary for this kind of work. The government has done everything in its power to get them—

Mr. Knowles: Has it?

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry to contradict the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but the government has given a great deal of attention to this subject, as he well knows.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of personal privilege. I was referring to the minister's statement that the government had done everything about education. That was the remark to which I was taking objection.

Mr. McIlraith: I made no reference to doing anything about education. I said we had done everything we could to obtain translators.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Oh, no.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, and the record will speak for itself.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If it is not changed, yes.

Mr. McIlraith: It will not be changed. I am not like the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, so the record will not be changed.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister to explain this fact? As a result of a recent tragic event this house has been adjourned for three or four days during which time there were no proceedings to be printed or translated. When the government knew this legislation was coming up as the first matter today why did they not give the necessary instructions to make arrangements to have this particular translating and printing done so the record would be available?

Mr. McIlraith: My answer is that I do not know. I did not check that administrative aspect, so I do not know what the explanation is. I do know something of the burden that has been put on these translators. There simply are not enough of them.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask a question?

Mr. McIlraith: In a moment. We have used every means possible to acquire a sufficient number of translators to do this job in a reasonable time. It is quite unrealistic, by the way, to expect that it could be done overnight.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. McIlraith: If there could be some order—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. Hon. gentlemen must realize this should be a quiet debate. There is a matter of principle involved. If the minister wants to answer questions, he will do so. I do not see why the debate should develop any heat.

Mr. McIlraith: The situation is that we have made every effort possible to get a sufficient number of translators to translate the proceedings. However, it has not been possible to get them. We have used a great many different methods to try to meet the situation. I hope it can be corrected reasonably soon. I am confident that it can. I am appreciative of the fact that the problem came upon us very suddenly when we changed the practice of the house and sent so much work to committees. I, for one, am fully appreciative of the desirability of having committee proceedings printed in both languages, although I do question the wisdom of all the committees ordering the printing of their evidence. This is a new practice which I think has been adopted without sufficient consideration.

In so far as the situation today is concerned—perhaps before I deal with it I should take a question from the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Grégoire: My question is the following: As the minister is aware, in 1964 when the pension plan was started the same problem arose but we were provided with 24 fascicules of the proceedings in less than 24 hours. Would the minister say, as the hon. member for Kamloops asked a few minutes ago, if he could take responsibility for producing seven or eight fascicules for tomorrow morning? As I said, the Secretary of State at that time succeeded in producing 24 fascicules in less than 24 hours, so could the minister do that for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot give the hon. member an answer concerning the proceedings in 1964. However, speaking from recollection and without having any direct knowledge of the matter, I believe the difficulty at that time was in connection with printing and not translation. This is the difference.

In any case, in order to get the evidence I will undertake to ask the appropriate officer to find out what can be done about getting it at the earliest possible moment. Unfortunately some of the printers were off duty yesterday, as were members of this house. These things do eat into the time available. In any event, in order to ascertain what can be done about this matter and how to do it I suggest that we should rise, report progress and then proceed to a consideration of items 135, 86 and 119 on today's order paper but not necessarily in that order. I should like to hear a discussion of that suggestion.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) if he would permit me a question.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): The hon. member for Kamloops said a while ago he was supporting the statement made by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean). Here is what the hon. member for Queens said: Parliament is bilingual but Canada is not a bilingual country. Does he agree with that statement?

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member can relate this question to the present discussion, I shall give him an answer.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to make something clear as concerns the statement made a while ago by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) and I also wish to caution the leader of the house to the effect that we have never asked to bring pressure on the translators or incite them to give us the committee reports more quickly. What we want is sufficient staff and equipment, so that we can get those reports. And we think it inhuman to press or prod the civil servants, calling for more work than they are able to do normally.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wonder whether the leader of the house would answer a question I wanted to ask him earlier, one which perhaps he did not wish to be asked?

Mr. McIlraith: No, I would be glad to answer it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is the minister aware that in the last year we have lost several members of the translation and interpretation service of this house because of dissatisfaction with the conditions imposed by this government? If he intends to look into this question will he look into the reasons for their resigning to go into private practice?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I will be very glad to do so. I have considerable knowledge of this matter. There is only one error in what the hon. member said. That was the phrase "due to conditions imposed by the government". If he had left out "the government" and associated himself and the members of his party more closely with his complaint, his statement would have been more accurate.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What is the minister inferring? Is he telling us that the government is no longer responsible? Is he giving us to understand that this is the case? We have accepted it for quite a while. Whose responsibility is it?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know whether I should try to enlighten the overheated hon. member. Technically, this work is the responsibility of the Clerk of the House of Commons under the direction of the Speaker.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The translation bureau is not. It comes under the control of the Secretary of State. If the leader of the house does not know that, he should find out these things before—

Mr. McIlraith: It is presently being undertaken by the bureau of translation of the Secretary of State so as to avoid adding personnel directly to the House of Commons staff since it was thought—and the record achieved has proven this to be correct—that the method now in effect is much the better way of doing things. The bureau of translation is, of course, a government agency and a direct responsibility of the government.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Then the government is responsible.

Mr. McIlraith: No. That is the wrong way of stating it. In any event, I do not think this is relevant to the question before us. It is a difficult question and one which deserves attention. Perhaps the hon. member could inject less heat into the debate and shed more light.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We can get no light from you.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to conclude my remarks on this subject by making a suggestion to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith).

He mentioned, quite rightly, that the government has difficulty in obtaining enough interpreters to meet the needs of the house and the parliamentary committees. I think the government should increasingly consider raising the salaries of interpreters. During the present session, the salary of judges has been raised from $21,000 to $26,000. In another session, the salary of members of parliament was raised to $18,000. If we wish to have as interpreters extremely qualified persons or encourage people to specialize in this field—the difficulty in recruiting interpreters is not new, for the situation has been with us for many years, here, in Ottawa—I suggest that we should offer exceptional salaries, very high salaries, so that in the house and in the parliamentary committees, we might have a greater number of interpreters and we might even get a greater number of Canadians interested in specializing and offering their services and even leaving private enterprise or other private organizations, to devote themselves to interpretation in the House of Commons.

Mr. Chairman, we did not want this afternoon to criticize at all the work of the interpreters; on the contrary, they do an excellent job and I want to congratulate them for their eagerness and their devotion to their work. But they are not numerous enough and I hope that very soon, since salary increases in all areas seem to be the trend, the government will not hesitate to grant substantial increases to our interpreters.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

I note that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith), government leader in the house, has just suggested that we proceed to the consideration of other government business.

I am one of those who wondered this afternoon at the great efforts made by everyone to guard against emotion and excitement which prevent mutual understanding.

I would like to suggest, if I am in order, that we accept the suggestion of the minister to proceed to another item; the minister will have the opportunity tomorrow to ascertain to what extent he can satisfy our complaints and we will then decide whether or not we are in a position to accept.

FINANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): moved the second reading of Bill No. C-277, to authorize the making of certain fiscal payments to provinces, to authorize the entry into tax collection agreements with provinces, and to amend the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in opening the debate on second reading of this bill it might be useful if I were to say a few more words of explanation to enable hon. members to have a better understanding of what is proposed and how it compares with present arrangements which will expire at the end of the month.

First, on the joint use of tax fields. Parliament is being asked to increase the general abatement of the federal individual income tax from 24 to 28 percentage points and the abatement of the corporation income tax from 9 to 10 per cent of corporate profits. As I explained when moving the resolution preceding this bill, this action is proposed to enable the provincial governments to make corresponding increases in their income taxes to help meet the rising costs of higher education. Parliament is also being asked to continue the present arrangements under which the provinces receive the equivalent of 75 per cent of the yield of the federal estate tax and to extend for two more years the agreements we have with nine provinces under which the federal government collects on their behalf the income taxes they impose. Thus the change in the arrangements concerning the division of tax fields is the reduction of the federal personal income tax by four percentage points and the reduction of the federal corporation income tax by one per cent of corporate profits. If the provinces ultimately were to accept the federal offer in respect of the continuing and well-established health and welfare shared-cost programs, the general abatement of the federal personal income tax would be further increased to 5 percentage points.

Second, a fundamental reform of the equalization arrangements is being proposed. Under existing arrangements the per capita yields of the personal and corporation income taxes and the estate tax at standard rates of taxation are equalized to the level of the top two provinces and then a deduction is made in the case of provinces whose natural resources revenues are above average. In addition, special grants, the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, are paid to the four Atlantic provinces. These grants were originally paid in amounts equal to an approximation of the amount required to equalize the yield, at national average rates, from all provincial-municipal revenue sources other than those already included in the general equalization formula, up to 85 per cent of the national average.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The equalization formula proposed in this bill differs from the existing arrangements in three important respects. First, it is based on a comprehensive index of the relative fiscal capacities of the provinces and takes all provincial revenues into account. Second, it is sensitive to the revenue requirements of the provinces taken together and to changes in the relative tax capacity of the individual provinces. Third it takes into account objective factors only; transitional problems are dealt with in special transitional arrangements.

If hon. members will refer to the two tables which were placed in Hansard of March 2, pages 13684 to 13687, it will be observed that for purposes of calculating equalization payments provincial revenues have been grouped into 16 classes. As indicated in Table 1, pages 13684 and 13685, the tax or revenue base for each class of revenue is identified and determined for each province and for all the provinces together. Having determined the revenue base for each revenue source, the amount of revenue derived from each source by all provinces is determined. The total of provincial revenues for each revenue source is then applied to the total appropriate revenue base to determine the national average provincial revenue rate for each source.

In brief, the average provincial "tax rate" for corporation income tax, the average provincial tax per gallon for gasoline, the average provincial sales tax rate, etc., is determined, and this average provincial tax rate is applied to the appropriate revenue base in each province to calculate the revenue each province would derive from its own revenue base at this provincial average tax rate. The total potential revenue available to each province from all provincial sources, at average provincial tax rates, is then converted into per capita terms for comparative purposes.

If the total potential per capita revenue for a province is below the per capita total for all provinces, that province will be entitled to an equalization payment equal to the difference. The total payment, as indicated in line 8(b) of Table II, pages 13686 and 13687 of Hansard, will be the product of the per capita deficiency multiplied by the population of the province.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I am describing this like the announcer on the radio in the morning who is trying to convince us that the simplified tax forms are indeed very simple. However, I think it will be better understood on reading than on listening.

On applying this formula to provincial data it was found that six provinces would be entitled to equalization and four provinces, Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, would not. To enable the province of Saskatchewan, which will receive equalization grants amounting to about $33 million in 1966-67, to make an orderly transition to its new status, provision is made to phase out Saskatchewan's current equalization entitlement over the five-year life of the new arrangements.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) will understand how embarrassing it is to be the premier of a prosperous province. He was never faced with this dilemma but I am sure his sympathies will go out to Premier Thatcher and the dilemma in which he finds himself of now being one of the "have" provinces.

Mr. Douglas: I sympathize with him having to deal with such a Scrooge of a minister of finance.

Mr. Sharp: The bill also includes a special guarantee for the Atlantic provinces. It provides that no Atlantic province shall receive less under the new formula than the amount it received in total in the present and last year of the existing arrangements plus an amount equal to its 1966-67 share of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant, that is, $3.5 million in the case of Prince Edward Island and $10.5 million in the case of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These guarantees are reflected in line 9 of the table on page 13687 of Hansard for March 2.

I have had a table prepared which compares the estimated payments to the provinces in 1967-68 under the equalization formula provided for in this bill with the estimated payments this year under the current arrangements, and with the permission of the house I would be pleased to have this table placed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the minister shall have leave to table certain documents which will be part of Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table above referred to is as follows:]

[2] The amounts shown do not include equalization associated with the revenue, in each province, estimated to be derived from the additional 4 percentage points of personal income tax and 1 percentage point of corporate profits being transferred to the provinces under the new post-secondary education arrangements.

March 7, 1967.

Mr. Douglas: Can the minister present any figures projecting what the revenues will be over the lifetime of the agreement?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot. That depends both upon the rates of provincial taxes and the revenues that are actually raised in a province and the revenues raised by all provinces. The difference between this formula and any other is that it is much more comprehensive and completely automatic in its operation, and I believe is a very considerable improvement over anything we have had previously.

I do not believe I need add to what I said earlier in the house about the provisions of this bill for stabilizing provincial revenues. Nor do I need to add to what my colleague, the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh), has said concerning the proposed arrangements in respect of post-secondary education.

I would like only to say a word about the value to the provinces of the whole of the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements being proposed and their relationship to the fiscal circumstances facing both levels of government in our country. As a result of the arrangements provided for in this fiscal arrangements bill and in the income tax bill, and as a result of the extension of capital assistance for technical and vocational training provided for in Bill No. C-278, the provinces will receive next fiscal year, either in the form of cash payments or additional tax transfers, a total amount estimated at over $1 billion. This is approximately $375 million more than the provinces will get this year under existing arrangements. With the permission of the house I would like to place in Hansard a table which compares estimated payments to each province in 1966-67 under the existing arrangements with estimates for 1967-68 under the proposed arrangements.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

March 7, 1967

Mr. Lewis: What is the difference between the two tables?

Mr. Sharp: The first one relates to the equalization payments and the other relates to the total of all payments.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, these proposals are not only generous and equitable but that they are well adapted to the circumstances facing governments in Canada today. The requirements of higher education in this country are such as to warrant priority and concerted action by both levels of government. This priority need is recognized in the proposed transfer of fiscal resources to the provinces in amounts which will keep pace with the growth in expenditures on post-secondary education.

But it is not enough any longer to enact periodic fiscal transfers to the provinces as and when the federal government feels it can afford to reduce its taxes or increase its grants to them. What is required is ready access to adequate revenue sources, sources which the provinces can cultivate as much or as little as they choose.

I am sure it is evident to all Canadians that the provinces have as much right to levy income taxes as does the federal government, that they are imposing consumption taxes which now almost equal the federal government's sales taxes, and that virtually all royalties and other resources revenues are paid to the provincial governments. What has been lacking is not adequate revenue sources but the automatic equalization of the yields from these revenue sources so as to guarantee to the less fortunate provinces that as provincial governments do levy higher taxes their tax yields will keep pace. Also lacking has been the automatic stabilization of provincial revenues so as to mitigate for provincial governments the hazards of the business cycle.

This bill remedies these two deficiencies in provincial public finance. It assures the provinces that as and when they increase their tax fields, federal equalization payments will increase automatically. It also assures them that if and when the yields should fall the federal government will provide a floor to provincial revenues. This is a régime of fiscal freedom and security, Mr. Speaker, which is a considerable stride forward from the fiscal uncertainties and insufficiencies from which the provinces once suffered.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated in the course of his remarks that the found the formula he was trying to explain much like the new simplified tax form that we have to fill out. I think he is minimizing the difficulties facing hon. members generally in respect of really analysing the bill to see who is to gain and to assess the value of the government's proposal. We recall that last autumn at the dominion-provincial conference there was a tremendous uproar from the representatives of the provinces because they felt that the proposal then put forward by the federal government was not even understood by the representatives of the federal government. Since that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and his staff have had an opportunity to really study all the implications, as have the provinces.

At the outset I must say I find it rather singular that last autumn the provinces cried to high heaven that they were being maltreated. There was a great performance all around. As a matter of fact, there were real histrionics. Since then, however, there has been a deadly silence. Although the bill has been published since March 3 we have not heard much, if anything at all, from the provinces concerning its effect. True enough, there is one, I suppose, who might be deemed to have benefited from the objectives he raised in view of the provision in clause 9 of the bill with regard to Saskatchewan transitional payments. I am wondering whether we should call it "Thatcher's Soothing Syrup". It does provide for some easing of the change with regard to Saskatchewan. I do not know whether this is an attempt to try to blight the cause of the premier of that province who seems to delight in raking the backs of his colleagues in Ottawa from time to time. I am not going to go into, shall we say, the period of transition in his political philosophies from when he sat with hon. members on the left to the position he now occupies where he seems to be in the Liberal right.

Some years ago at the time we went through a mammoth exercise when the minister's predecessor was in office we had presented to us with a great fanfare of trumpets, as though it was really the epitome of co-operative federalism, a bill called the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. I remember that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) and I characterized that bill as the smallest mouse the mountain had ever produced in its most difficult labours, because it did nothing. Lo and behold, it does nothing again today. All it does is confer on one province an extension of the famous opting out formula in part. Mind you, when we consider the bill clause by clause in detail I think the minister had better explain just what it all means and whether it is limited or applies to all joint programs. In essence, however, it does indicate that it applies to any program commencing after September 30, 1967. We will get around to that.

As I said, I still think that earlier legislation was the biggest fraud perpetrated on the Canadian public as being a new formula for granting the provinces fiscal rights. Under that act they had no more rights than they ever had in so far as these particular programs were concerned. They were still tied to the agreements and are now still tied to the joint program agreements. There are no relaxations at all. The only thing is that the one province, the province of Quebec, which has availed itself of the provisions may feel it is getting squatters' rights with regard to certain tax revenues. That, of course, will be something for the future to decide. I am trusting that there will be some amicable form of arrangement, because if there is not there will be a cataclysmic collision between the two governmental authorities and we will be in for a difficult time. If such is to be our fate, we may just be postponing the evil day. I trust that this will not be the case and that we will be able to work it out.

I agree that there is to be some sort of reallocation of the sources of funds between the federal government and the provinces. Just what the formula is is hard to define. It is worthy of note that the provinces and their municipalities now spend far more money than the federal government. Obviously this bill is the incarnation into a statute of a principle that was enunciated back in 1961 when the prior dominion-provincial agreement was negotiated, that is, if the provinces want to spend money, then let them tax for it. I think this is a sound and fundamental principle and I agree with it. Those provinces which wish to carry on at a higher level than some of their counterparts in the remainder of Canada can legislate and face up to the realities of imposing the taxes for the money they wish to spend. They have this right. The then minister of finance and the government were severely criticized for imposing this upon the provinces but, as I say, like Paul on the way to Tarsus the present administration became converted to this fact and now really is putting it into force with a vengeance.

One question on which the minister did not touch has to do with clause 5. This will be my only reference to that clause. It deals with the basic estate tax, its definition and what happens to succession duties. I should like to hear what the minister has to say about the proposal contained in the statute introduced for first reading in the legislature of the province of Alberta the other day in which power is given to the province to repay—this is a novel way to do it—to the administrators, trustees, or successors of an estate up to 75 per cent of the estate tax that has been paid. Presumably this is an initial step to create Alberta as an estate tax haven.

How will this affect this particular agreement? How will it affect the relationship with the other provinces? As a matter of fact, I think the province of British Columbia has similar legislation before its legislature. Perhaps it is not exactly the same in detail but it has the same aim. We will find, of course, that a number of other provinces will follow this example. How is this going to affect these agreements? After all, the agreement is for five years. Much can happen in that time in relation to succession duties, and the balance of payments to provinces may be completely upset. What then will be the result?

In concluding my remarks on second reading I should like to protest once more against what I think is a fundamental error in the determination of revenue source. I made this protest at the time of the passing of the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. I have specific reference to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements in relation to the determination of what moneys obtained by the provinces from the sale of crown leases and reserves on oil and natural gas lands shall be deemed to be revenue. This is fundamentally wrong because the sale of crown leases and reserves is in effect the alienation of capital assets.

It is true that revenue can come from royalties but the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have objected strenuously to the oil and gas revenue feature being incorporated in the formula in earlier years. I remember that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) also objected very strongly. The principles behind our arguments at that time apply equally today. I cannot for the life of me see why something which is in essence the sale of an asset should be considered revenue. In that event one might say that in a certain regard the province of Alberta would be acting like the prodigal son. I think a fundamental mistake has been made in this regard because of the budgeting philosophy of the province of Alberta which has always considered the proceeds from the sale of leases and reserves on oil and natural gas lands in the same way Saskatchewan considers the sale of leases on phosphates. If these were bonus considerations, that would be one thing, but these are sales of capital assets and it is fundamentally wrong to incorporate them in any revenue picture. This would be a method of financing a spendthrift or a person going into bankruptcy. One must believe that one could live off the proceeds of the disposal of capital assets.
