We have many programs in place which, in effect, help individuals to become better trained for other jobs. We have mobility grants in place, which help people who are unemployed. My department has a whole series of these kinds of operations in place which are coping with the situation once a lay-off takes place. Of course, we would much prefer to see the reverse occur, that the lay-off not in fact take place, but that is not the sole responsibility of one department of the government at any particular level.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT STEPS TO MAINTAIN SMALL INDUSTRIES AND PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is he aware, as his officials are aware, that across this country there is a spin-off effect on small service industries which are supported by larger industries? Is he doing anything on an individual basis to monitor, reinforce and see what help can be granted to those industries to keep going and provide employment? What action is he taking, in line with his officials in the various provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are aware, of course, of the positive effects that the development and the establishment of some major industries have in various areas and that their impact on service or secondary industries is always significant. What we can do, as the hon. member and most of his colleagues know, is to help the industries to set up, to modernize and expand their facilities, but beyond that stage, we could not until recently do more to promote the development of certain sectors. As the hon. member also knows, we are cooperating with the provinces in the development of a number of manufacturing and resource industries throughout the provinces. With regard to the particular province of concern to him, Newfoundland and especially Labrador, I certainly hope that within the next few weeks we shall be in a position to enter into some agreements which, I am sure, will have beneficial effects on the economy of that particular province.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—EFFECT OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT ON ECONOMY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It relates to the shocking statistics revealed today with respect to unemployment. The figures show a massive increase for the province of British Columbia, undoubtedly reflecting the rather depressed market conditions which the wood fibre industry faces in world markets. The wood fibre industry in British Columbia represents 58 per cent of the economy of the province and improves our balance of trade position by $7.5 billion. Earlier, the Prime Minister said in the question period that these—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it forthwith?

Mr. Oberle: The Prime Minister is prepared to wait to see the government's policies work through the economy. What specific policy is the Prime Minister waiting for to improve this situation, which will obviously result in thousands of lay-offs in British Columbia over the next few months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member refers to the very figures he is quoting from the report on unemployment in January, he will see exactly the contrary to what he is suggesting. Employment has gone up in British Columbia. It has gone up, or at least remained stable, in every province except Quebec, as the Minister of Finance said. Employment has gone up, in terms of its rate of creation, in British Columbia.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—LAY-OFFS IN CONSTRUCTION AND STEEL INDUSTRIES—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister chooses to play with figures which are adjusted and not adjusted. My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It deals with yet another industry. The government has imposed import restrictions on steel in British Columbia, which will result in the lay-off, in the construction and steel industries in B.C., of at least 2,000 workers. The restrictions are not at all designed to save Canadian jobs, but merely to shift them from B.C. to Ontario. Can the minister tell the House whether the construction and steel industries in British Columbia are as satisfied with government policies as he led us to believe everyone else in this country is?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this problem is before the cabinet and I have nothing to say about it at this moment.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST THAT GENERAL ELECTION BE CALLED THIS YEAR

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. However, before putting my question I would like to point out that today is the beginning of the Chinese new year. On behalf of all Canadians of Chinese descent, I wish all hon. members a happy Chinese new year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lee: As some hon. members have already noted, this is the Year of the Horse.

An hon. Member: Which end?

Mr. Lee: In view of that, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will gallop to victory again some time in this Year of the Horse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not without significance that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just returned from China, where he learned a great deal about the techniques of galloping. We in this country, of course, have our own ways of doing it, and I am glad to see that the opposition is champing at the bit.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GOVERNMENT-COMPANY DISCUSSIONS TO REDUCE LAY-OFFS AND IMPROVE SERVICE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, in Winnipeg, the CPR announced the lay-off of 50 employees in its freight department. Lay-offs are taking place in every region of Canada. In the last 2½ years the two major railways have laid off 10,000 employees. Will the minister discuss with the president of the CNR the whole policy of profit centres which has led to the tremendous number of lay-offs and to much poorer service for customers of the CNR and residents in small communities from one end of Canada to the other?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am always glad to have a discussion about any specific area where service can be improved. I think it is worth noting that improved ways of managing the CNR have resulted in the movement of more freight and passengers. It is true that in the process, 6,000 fewer people are employed, but surely hon. members will commend a more efficient way of operating which will lead to a profit, for a change, for the CNR and will result in more productivity.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the minister consider discussing with the president of the CNR whether efficiency is attained by contracting work out to other companies which do not pay wages arrived at over generations of negotiating, but which pay as little as possible, and which provide the poor service now being provided to many small cities, towns and hamlets in Canada? Is there not a better way of operating, without taking it out of the hides of the people of Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think that is too general a question, but if the hon. member has a specific item about which he would like me to receive some information, I would be glad to take it under advisement.

REQUEST DREE PROGRAMS BE IMPROVED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the very depressing figures which have been in front of us for, I think, about 17 months in a row, will the minister have the Prime Minister put before the first ministers next week a program which would have the effect of turning around DREE programs in regions of disparity? I refer particularly to the 75 per cent or 80 per cent leakage back into the central economy of moneys pumped into areas such as the Atlantic provinces, where that money has created only temporary jobs and has done absolutely nothing, particularly in the infrastructure area, to create permanent jobs since the DREE program was established several years ago.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I must disagree completely with the hon. member's statement to the effect that DREE programs had no effect whatsoever in the Atlantic area. I should like to refer to his own province, Nova Scotia, where, as he knows very well, industries have been set up in the past seven years thanks to DREE financing. He should recognize that fact himself like most if not all Atlantic premiers who fully endorse the DREE programs. I rest assured that during the conference of first ministers to be held next week here in Ottawa, federal support to regional development will be discussed, especially with regard to the Atlantic area. I am sure that the Prime Minister and myself will have the opportunity to discuss this particular matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: One supplementary question; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I will have one supplementary question, and perhaps another, depending on whether the minister is calling me a liar.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: I accept the minister's word if he says I am wrong in my information, it being primarily that money pumped into the Atlantic economy has come back into the central Canadian economy at a rate varying between 60 per cent and 80 per cent, depending on whether there was an infrastructure program or an industrial development incentive program. If that information is wrong, the minister will have to demonstrate it or withdraw his comment to me.

My question is straightforward and simple. Does the minister, together with the Prime Minister, have a proposal to put before the first ministers next week which will have the effect of reversing this trend and creating permanent jobs, and not temporary jobs digging ditches?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me to rectify my statement when he says that DREE programs have had no positive effect and created no permanent jobs in the Atlantic region. I reject that statement. As for the fact that a certain portion of the department's expenditures in that region through shared cost programs with the provinces or with industry may eventually leak back into the economy of central Canada or other provinces, that is quite right indeed, because provinces do benefit from the production of other provinces, but this works both ways. As for specific programs that, together with the Prime Minister, I may put before the first ministers next week, I am afraid the hon. member will have to wait for the report on that conference and judge for himself.

GULL ISLAND, LABRADOR, HYDRO PROJECT—GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there are 32,000 unemployed in Newfoundland today, 1,000 more than last month, many of them in the construction industry, has the government of Canada reached an agreement with the government of Newfoundland on the development of the Gull Island hydro project in Labrador, which would create several thousand construction jobs; and are they close to signing an agreement so that that development can go ahead? If there is no agreement yet, has the government of Canada made a new proposal to the government of Newfoundland and, if so, what is the federal government prepared to do: what assistance is it prepared to give to that project?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I discussed that very matter two weeks ago with Premier Moores and discussions were continued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This government is convinced it will be able to reach an agreement with Newfoundland. However, both parties to it must make certain preparations before anything can be finalized.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the premier of Newfoundland says that an agreement is close to being reached. I should like the Prime Minister to comment on that.

● (1452)

Also, eight months ago the Premier of Newfoundland put before this government a proposal for a three-year job creation project to cut the wood from the sides of the reservoir at the Gull Island development. This would employ 400 loggers for three years, at a cost of some $4 million. It would be self-sustaining and would be of permanent benefit. The work has been ordered by the environmental authorities. Is the Prime Minister going to approve that project which will put back to work the 400 loggers laid off by the closing of the Labrador linerboard mill?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the first point, I agree with the statement of the premier as quoted by the hon. member. It seems to me that my first answer indicated the very same thing. On the second question, cabinet dealt with this matter as recently as last week and I expect an announcement to be made soon.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING FUNCTIONS OF DREE

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion if the government has any plans to either disband the DREE program or to transfer its functions to another ministry.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, we have no such plan, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Keeping in mind that some areas of the country have enjoyed a special relationship with DREE because they are classed as areas of high unemployment, will the minister say whether the government would be prepared to extend the operations of DREE into other areas of high unemployment, especially north-central Ontario?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, the DREE programs apply also to northern Ontario. It can be said that 80 per cent of the Ontario territory is covered by some DREE programs, by way of grants to corporations or otherwise. The DREE programs apply to southern and eastern Ontario as well. These programs have been and continue being applied there.

PENITENTIARIES

HOSTAGE-TAKING AT B.C. PENITENTIARY—INQUIRY INTO ADMINISTRATION OF INSTITUTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. The recent hostage-taking at the B.C. penitentiary involved five prisoners known to be extremely dangerous, one of whom was the leader in the events of June, 1975, and is described as one of Canada's most dangerous men. Can the Solicitor General give the House any indication why the administration at B.C. penitentiary allowed these five men into the visitors' area at the same time?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the hon. member for bringing these events to the attention of the House and, indeed, the solution of that particular problem. I should like to commend all parties who participated, including the Canadian Penitentiary Service and the RCMP who assisted in the resolution of the difficulty. Again I commend my predecessor who was instrumental in bringing in the "no deal" policy, which in my view was highly responsible for the eventual solution of the problem.

To answer the hon. member's specific question, Mr. Speaker, I announced in my release on Saturday that there will be a formal inquiry. Surely the information the hon. member seeks will be made available as a result of that inquiry.

Mr. Friesen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. According to information I have received, the assistant director of socialization, a former psychiatric nurse, was advanced from a WP3 position to a WP5 position in 18 months, and the head of social development, without previous penitentiary experience, moved from a WP1 to a WP4 position in one year. Could the Solicitor General give a commitment to the House that the parliamentary subcommittee which worked so successfully last year will be reconstituted to look into this matter, as it was a very non-partisan group and it could zero in on this specific problem regarding administration and the policy of promotion and advancement in the penitentiary service?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, without accepting the allegations of the hon. member, I am not ready to reconstitute the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF SELLING RAILWAY STOCK TO CHINA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the continuing high unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island, and in view of the fact that the Sydney Steel Corporation has been able to get into foreign markets in the past, including Korea and Asia, can the minister advise the House what potential there may be to sell rails, railway cars and locomotives to China as a result of the discussions he and Canadian businessmen had recently with the foreign trade minister in Peking?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member, having been a very valuable member of the delegation, will know that there was considerable interest expressed in both rolling stock and other forms of railway equipment in China. There is a good prospect there, and we will continue to follow it up. I should add, of course, that there are a number of prospects, as well, through CIDA payments to various countries and one or two of these have already materialized for rail cars to be produced in Nova Scotia. I hope that others will come through for rails as well as cars.

RAILWAYS

OWNERSHIP OF ABANDONED LINES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It concerns the monitoring committee dealing with rights-of-way of railway lines abandoned on the prairies. Has the minister obtained from the law officers of the Crown a definite statement about the legal ownership of these abandoned railway lines when the railways cease operating them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think there is no doubt about the position in relation to those lines: they are the property of the two railways. In both cases, however, they have agreed to give the land to us, and we are setting up the necessary machinery to put the land into the hands of the appropriate owner, which most often is the farmer through whose land the right-of-way passes. It is our intention to give the benefit of the land, whether it remains in the hands of the farmer, the municipality or occasionally the province, to the municipality in question so that they will be compensated for the loss of the rights-of-way and service.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, am I correct in deducting from the answer of the minister that there has not been a statement from the law officers of the Crown?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not correct. I think there have been, in fact, based on rather secondary questions rather than the principal one the hon. member asked, because so far as I know no one has any doubt about that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON FISHERIES AND HYDROCARBON RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Before doing so, however, may I join in welcoming him back safely from his recent trip to China.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: When the minister released the text of the joint report of the chief negotiators on the Canada-United States maritime boundaries dispute, he indicated that fish stocks off our two coasts would be divided into three management categories, and that each country would be entitled to one-half the oil and gas production from the shared access zones covering hydrocarbon resources.

Would the minister indicate on which issue the negotiations have bogged down? Is it on the sharing of fisheries' resources, the sharing of hydrocarbon resources, or on the proposal with regard to the boundaries? Since the question of offshore hydrocarbon resources in Canada is a matter of direct interest to the provinces of Atlantic Canada, did the federal government consult the provinces during this phase of the negotiations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will appreciate that it is not possible to be very specific, nor would it be wise to indicate the areas which remain unresolved. I can tell him, however, that there is some question remaining unsettled with regard to various matters of allocation of fish stocks. There are some hydrocarbon issues which remain unresolved, and there is the question of the actual drawing of the boundary. None of this has been firmly put in place, but the whole negotiating process is continuing and I would, therefore, prefer not to go beyond these general comments.

I can tell the hon. member, as well, that the provinces on the east and west coasts have been thoroughly involved in the negotiating process, and certainly up until the last round they or their representatives were present either in Washington or Ottawa, depending on where the talks between the negotiators were taking place. I would not want to leave the impression that I am pessimistic. I believe the mere fact that we extended the mandates of the two negotiators for a short period indicates that they are moving toward what I hope will be a satisfactory solution for both sides.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADIAN STEEL EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES NOT HAMPERED BY TRIGGER PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Canadian steel industry and the jobs of 40,000 steelworkers may be threatened by the American trigger price system affecting steel exports to the U.S. because Canadian steel prices are lower than American prices, due to efficiency rather than dumping, and in view of representations made by my leader, as well as the president of Algoma Steel, to the minister, can the minister assure us that he has sought and gained assurance from the U.S. government that Canadian steel will not be unduly hampered or delayed from entry into the United States because of the trigger price system?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have taken steps with the U.S. government concerning this, but we have been unable to obtain any results as yet. As soon as I receive a definite answer, I shall gladly convey it to the House.

[English]

Mr. Symes: My supplementary question is to the minister. Since the U.S. trigger price system will divert foreign steel from the United States, and thereby pose a threat of dumping this steel on the Canadian market, will the minister implement a trigger or reference price system similar to the American and European models in order to safeguard the Canadian steel industry and Canadian jobs?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are looking into this suggestion at this time. I will probably report on that aspect of the problem at the same time as I report on the other part of the problem, as I have already mentioned.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ANSWER GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday at the conclusion of the question period, the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) raised by way of a question of privilege a reference which had been made in yesterday's question period by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to some proceedings before an in camera meeting of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee.

I have examined the precedents, one of which I might refer to the hon. member for Yukon. It is reported at page 781 of Journals for Tuesday, June 21, 1955. That particular ruling had to do with the difference between a secret or confidential meeting and a meeting in camera. I do not rely on this precedent too heavily. However, there is a distinction drawn, and I think that a much more elaborate argument would have to be made in order to establish the kind of confidentiality referred to in the argument yesterday.

Secondly, in examining the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister yesterday, he seemed to indicate to the House, in answer to a question, that it was his information that this subject had been discussed by the meeting, which was evidently an in camera meeting. It does not appear to be at all clear whether that in any way will be an infraction of the confidentiality of the in camera meeting, if in fact that was part of an in camera meeting. To refer to the subject matter discussed does not, it seems to me, betray a confidence as to what in fact was said or what was done in the meeting.

I think it is well known that often in camera meetings are held where the subject matter of a meeting is published; it forms part of the notice of the meeting. And therefore simply to make reference to what was discussed would seem to me to fall short of betraying the confidentiality of an in camera meeting. In the final analysis, although the hon. member serves the House well by bringing this matter to the attention of the House, his application was not accompanied by a motion, so in any event there is no action that the Chair can take. Therefore I would set aside the question of privilege.

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF CERTAIN HARBOURS

The House resumed, from Monday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent) that Bill C-2, respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, last night when I was interrupted at ten o'clock I was endeavouring to address myself to the bill in an effort to explain to the minister that if indeed we are going to pass this bill and levy fees on those fishermen who use harbour facilities, we should remember our priorities.

I would like to point out that before we approach fishermen on the subject of their paying fees so that they may tie up at harbours, we should have the proper harbour facilities. I would also like to mention the lack of co-ordination of effort between the various agencies which are trying to direct their attention to the provision of small craft harbours. Under the Canada Works Program many small craft harbours have been provided with help and the supplementation of funding by the small craft harbours division of the Department of Fisheries. Unfortunately, because of the lack of sufficient funding the proper harbours cannot be provided. And instead of getting proper engineering and design to put a harbour in place, whether it be a breakwater or a small craft harbour or wharf, it becomes impossible to put a small craft harbour in place as it should be for the benefit of the fisherman and for the benefit of the country.

Last week I made a quick tour through my district to witness and assess the storm damage which has actually obliterated many wharves and breakwaters, with damage reaching millions of dollars. Now they will have to be replaced and more millions of dollars spent. I am sure the minister's officials who are faced with that problem will be able to advise him on the difficulties of providing a reasonable wharf or harbour when funds are limited.

Last week I attended a meeting of another agency, the community employment strategy agency. They have a bit of funding to provide toward creating employment. As everyone in Newfoundland knows, the provision of employment will best be done by the creation, improvement, and expansion of our small craft harbours development policy. It is frustrating when the funding to provide proper facilities is limited. Millions of dollars are being wasted because the wharves float away as a result of storm damage. This is because they are not properly built.

Another problem to which the minister should address himself with regard to the small craft harbours on which a fee will be levied is the lack of capability, and the complete inefficiency of our dredging and icebreaking forces. During this season the fishermen cannot get out into the water. They cannot get their boats through the ice because of the inefficiency of our icebreaking services.

Another problem is the deployment of icebreaking services which are now in existence. Most icebreakers are deployed 300, 400 or 500 miles from the ice. Icebreakers are presently in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and in Quebec. If the minister would just look at a map, he would find it would be better if they were centrally located on the west coast of Newfoundland where there is a perennial ice problem.

A new icebreaker, the Franklin, will soon be coming into service. It will be deployed to the province of Newfoundland in order to try to overcome the present inefficiency. Not only will it provide a service which is needed, permitting the fishermen to get out into the water in order to get the fish, but it will provide 70 or 80 jobs that are badly needed in Newfoundland.

Last year we had a perfect example of dredging inefficiency and lack of capability. The fishermen had been promised dredging services for months and months. When the dredge finally arrived, it could not do the work. In some locations it ruined almost a complete season for the fishermen. Both the officials and myself have asked that a new type dredge be provided.

I hope the minister will give priority to protecting, supporting, and reinforcing the present facilities rather than trying to work the reverse through bills such as the one before us, which only creates hostility among the fishermen because they do not have the service required to take advantage of the stocks.

Another matter of importance is that the fishermen will be reluctant to pay fees. In order to build up our stocks, quotas have been placed on the fish over the past few years. There have been restrictions with regard to those who could get a licence to fish, whatever species. This is another detriment, charging the fishermen fees to use harbours which we do not have. I hope, with the various programs that are to come about, that this deficiency will be overcome.

The minister apologized to me for not being here because he is committed elsewhere. However, there is another matter I want to bring to his attention. Under the Canada Works Program there is no definition as to who owns a wharf. There are no criteria which state who has responsibility for a wharf after it has been built. In committee meetings, the minister and his staff indicated they would be responsible, but there is nothing to say whether it is owned by a municipality, town or group of fishermen. This must be clarified. I hope the law officers will look at that situation as it is causing a disruption and disadvantage to the fishermen.

The minister stated that under the bill wharfingers, harbour masters, or whatever you want to call them, will be hired. They will be responsible for a 50-mile radius. They must ensure that proper warning is given if damage should occur to a wharf. As stated in committee, this is building up another bureaucracy. I make this point because we have a situation which is contradictory.

With regard to protecting our rivers from poaching, there has always been a restriction by Treasury Board on funds to hire guardians for a long enough period to provide the protection that is needed. In every case we were told there were not enough funds. As I have pointed out a number of times, the guardians are hired on a 12 week basis, even though the season lasts three months. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) cannot get the funds, but the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has enough funds to pay those same people two thirds of their salary for nine months of the year. Here is an opportunity to do a double job.

Ministers are always looking for ideas. The river guardians know the small craft harbours in their area. If they were hired as guardian wharfingers, they could serve a dual purpose. They would provide a benefit to the fishermen and be cost effective. The guardians and wardens should be hired on a year round basis to carry out this double job. The minister mentioned at committee that this might be a good idea.

I wrote to the minister with regard to the vital necessity of increasing surveillance and control over the rivers which are being poached to the detriment of the legitimate angler. In some cases it resulted in the season being closed, and others the season was restricted. A part of our society was destroyed.

I hope the minister will give serious consideration to the excellent points made by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) and others of my colleagues who are interested in this bill and in the changes that are taking place. However, we must ensure that it is done in a cost effective way for the benefit of the fishermen and the economy as well as providing good development policies for the benefit of the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased to take part in the consideration of Bill C-2 on third reading. Obviously, it is quite a controversial issue and on several occasions I intervened during the study of the bill in committee to echo some comments made to me by fishermen and fishery workers of the Gaspé Peninsula. More particularly on November 10, 1977 when the bill was considered in committee, I put a question to the director of the Small Craft Harbours Branch and to the legal advisers about the responsibility of Quebec in that matter. My question which appears on page 126 reads as follows:

Does Bill C-2 conform to the agreement or to the spirit of the agreement signed in 1922 between the federal government and Quebec assuring the transfer of certain responsibilities in the area of commercial fishing to the province of Quebec?

Mr. Reid replied, and I quote:

Mr. Chairman, the responsibility for fishing harbours, and their construction and maintenance, was not part of the agreement in 1922. The responsibility for fishing harbours, their maintenance, their control, their administration, their repairs, remains exclusively the responsibility of the federal government—commercial fishing harbours.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is pursuant to the terms of the British North America Act that the federal government has jurisdiction over the construction, maintenance and repair of commercial fishing harbours in the province of Quebec as in every other province in Canada. This bill, now before the House for third reading, will clear up the use of fishing ports because, at times, commercial fishermen find it difficult to moor their boats, pleasure crafts crowding most of the facilities.

Nowadays fishing boats are becoming larger and larger and extremely well equipped. We should set well protected facilities and we require increasingly higher credits for building wharves, breakwaters and harbours. Who should pay for these facilities and these works? Mr. Speaker, the federal government did its large share and will continue to do so in the future, and the bill provides for the imposition of berthing fees for boat owners who will have to use these facilities. Several people will say, and several hon. members repeated this here in the House, that this is a new financial burden which we impose on fishermen both in Quebec and in the other provinces.

But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that Quebec fishermen do not pay any berthing fees at the moment although most commercial fishermen do in other provinces. So this new legislation will put the province of Quebec on an equal footing with the other provinces of Canada. To eliminate the discrimination that has been going on for some time and to get a modest revenue for the administration of fishing harbours, this bill provides for the implementation of limited, easy to apply regulations taking into account regional disparities. So fishermen in the Gaspé area will be paying a lower berthing fee than commercial fishermen in British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, having said that, I would like to take a few minutes of the time of the House to review briefly the distribution of budgetary allocations and the needs of the Gaspé area with respect to fishing harbours as well as for the rest of the province of Quebec, particularly on the shoreline of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the river. According to my estimates, the province of Quebec received a very low portion of the budget revenues for the construction of fishing harbours prior to the 1970s—and I did say prior to the 1970s. It was impossible to determine the amount of supplies used for fishing harbours and the budget was administrated by the Department of Public Works and included fishing harbours as well as commercial wharves. It was only in 1972 that the government established two administrative levels: one for commercial wharves and the other for fishing and small craft harbours. The Department of the Environment is responsible for the administration of fishing and recreational harbours.

Let us review for a moment the amounts received by the province out of the budget for small craft harbours since 1973: $899,500 for fiscal year 1973-74 or 4 per cent of the national budget. In 1974-75, $4,361,800 or 14 per cent of the national budget. In 1975-76, $10,205,600 or 35 per cent of the national budget. In 1976-77, $5,754,000 or 20 per cent of the budget; 1977-78, $4,800,000 or 6 per cent of the national budget for small craft harbours. Mr. Speaker, it is after a long battle with the former minister of fisheries and environment, the Hon. Jack Davis, which battle was led jointly by hon. members from Gaspé, Bonaventure and the Magdalen Islands—

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): —also from New Brunswick.

Mr. Cyr: —Yes, from New Brunswick also, as the minister just mentioned. I was saying that we fought this battle to obtain a special fund of $10 million to meet the commitments made in 1968 by the federal government and the Quebec government under the eastern Quebec economic development agreement to provide the Gaspé Peninsula and the Magdalen Islands with adequate fishing harbours and wharves.

The Hon. Jack Davis, like many department officials, did not know much about the needs of the province of Quebec.

This is why I said that the battle was difficult, and I would like to thank all hon. members from eastern Quebec and the caucus who helped us throughout these years to support the rights of all Canadians, whether they live in Quebec or British Columbia.

Is not the reason for us being here, Mr. Speaker, that we may defend the rights of our constituents? We have a responsibility, as any member of the legislative assembly in Ontario, in Quebec or in New Brunswick. Every member who received a mandate from his constituents has a responsibility to defend their interests both here in Ottawa and in Quebec and this is why we, as members from Quebec, have been doing so here over the years, with the co-operation of ministers from Quebec who represent us here in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, the fishing centre development program provided for in the 1968 agreement has been a great success. Considering the delay experienced from 1968 to 1974 in the voting of funds, a 6-year delay, projects require more funds, the designs of various structures have to be reduced to comply with estimates, other projects were undertaken through stages and are not yet completed. As an illustration, we have the unloading harbour in Cloridorme. Mr. Speaker, my concern and that of my Quebec colleagues on the fisheries and forest committee are that the province of Quebec might not get its due share of estimates in the coming years for the improvement of small craft harbours. If the criteria for distributing national budgets for small craft harbours are maintained, I can see that Quebec will get just about 5 or 6 per cent of budgetary funding. As I said, the criteria were established around 1973 by the Hon. Jack Davis. Since the catch or the value of landings in Quebec is now smaller than in other provinces, our share of the budgets are much smaller than our needs. With such criteria, Mr. Speaker, havenot areas and provinces will always remain poor, and provinces where the value of landings is greater will progress at the expense of other Canadian areas. How can our fishing fleet in the Gaspé Peninsula increase, how can it have larger boats to get to the Atlantic coast when fishing harbours or industrial centres are not provided with good wharves?

Mr. Speaker, I would remind this House of a statement made by the Minister of Fisheries and Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) on January 31, 1978. Let it be said in passing that the minister, an Acadian like myself, has taken to heart the development of fisheries in eastern Quebec as much as in the Pacific. Thanks to successful negotiations with various countries at the Law of the Sea conferences in New York, Caracas and—Geneva and I see here my friend the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, we were in Geneva together, and although he is sitting on the other side of the House he has nothing but commendation for our minister from New Brunswick for the way he defended Canada's interests at the Law of the Sea conference in Geneva. Certainly the minister must be commended for all he did for eastern Quebec, for the protection and encouragement of fishermen to remain in their trade, because things were not easy some years ago when fish was declining and plants were operating a few months only every year.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for all he has done for fisheries in eastern Canada, particularly in Quebec. I refer to the statement he made in this House last January 31, and I quote:

> It must be remembered that in 1973 the department inherited over 2,000 harbours and wharves, very large numbers of which were in dire need of repairs as a result of neglect in the past. Because of this, our programs have focused on making good this backlog of repairs and providing for only the most urgent of harbour expansions. It is only now that we are in a position to change the main thrust of our programs from repairs to that of improving, expanding and up-dating our harbours, and providing the better services needed by fishermen such as lighting, haulouts and proper work areas.
> In 1973 we initiated a series of major studies to evaluate the existing fishing and recreational harbours owned by the federal government and to suggest a rationale for their development in the future. These studies were completed in 1975 and provide the basis for our ongoing plans—

Further on the minister said:

> For example, expenditures in Quebec peaked during 1975-1976 and 1976-77 due to the special St. Lawrence fishing harbour development program, and have now been reduced to more modest levels.

Mr. Speaker, it is the expression "more modest" that I would like to comment on in the next few minutes. The province of Quebec has the longest shoreline in Canada. So we ask that for the coming years the government continue to set aside 15 per cent of the regular department budget to allow the province to build more recreational and fishing harbours along the St. Lawrence and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In 1974, the province of Quebec got 14 per cent of the national budget for small craft harbours. This distribution seems perfectly logical. However the minister expects a reduction of expenses to a more modest level compared to 1975, 1976 and 1977, but we do not accept these cuts. They should not be lower than 15 per cent as it was for fiscal year 1974-75. We shall not accept that our percentage of the budget be reduced to 6 per cent only.

Mr. Speaker, as I said on several occasions, several structures show an urgent need for repairs and I am thinking of those located in the communities of L'Anse-à-Valleau, St-Joachim de Tourelles, Ste-Anne-des-Monts, Ste-Thérèse-de-Gaspé and L'Anse-à-Brillant and so on. The works undertaken in the fishing centres and unloading harbours of Cloridorme, Newport, Grande-Rivière and Rivière-aux-Renards should also be completed. I remain very optimistic about the future of fishing activities in the Gaspé Peninsula on account of the newly adopted 200-mile limit as well as the fishing regulations imposed for certain species a few years ago by the minister. But since we have a very high rate of unemployment in the Gaspé Peninsula and that many young people would like to take over the job of their fathers and ancestors as fishermen, we want to give the Gaspé Peninsula and eastern Quebec adequate and fully equipped facilities to accommodate these new fishermen.

I know that the minister is quite aware of the needs of the Gaspé Peninsula and I trust his goodwill and co-operation in that respect so that the province of Quebec may get its fair share of the estimates adopted for the forthcoming years.

When I say "fair share" I mean about 15 per cent. I would like to close my remarks by asking my colleagues in this House to vote in favour of Bill C-2 so that we way give the minister and his officials working tools for the administration and the good management of our fishing and recreational harbours.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House to any great degree on third reading of this bill. I think the position of our party has already been clearly stated by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) with regard to this particular initiative. However, I should like to add a word with respect to the Prince Edward Island fisheries situation because I know the minister has had considerable contact with the fisheries people there, not only with the provincial minister of fisheries but with fisheries organizations in that province.

Although he has not been minister of that department since 1969, the minister is well aware of the fact that since that time the organization and planning of fisheries in P.E.I. has generally been included under the umbrella of the P.E.I. comprehensive development plan. I think it is worth while for all hon. members to reflect on what has happened during that time, a period of some eight years. I say it is important because I think we should learn some lessons from what has happened as a result of the 1969 plan.

Hon. members may recall that the attempt, through the joint plan signed by the Government of Canada and the government of P.E.I., provided an over-all comprehensive planning framework for the various economic sectors in the province. These included sectors such as agriculture, fisheries, tourism, light manufacturing, service, etc. With respect to the fishing sector, and I am here quoting from the plan itself, "the essential strategy must therefore be to assist those fishermen who wish to move to other occupations". That was a kind of fisheries abandonment program. Unfortunately, far too much time and attention have been devoted to this kind of rationalization or, perhaps more accurately, this kind of winding down of the fisheries sector in P.E.I.

I suppose that, from the standpoint of some kind of objective logic, one could accept the initiatives that were being taken at the federal and provincial levels. They looked at the number of fishermen involved in the fisheries industry, they looked at the gross intake of either fish products or income, and they divided one into the other and said it was not possible for a fisherman to sustain himself or his family at that income level. The obvious answer, on a kind of mathematical basis, was to reduce the number of people involved in the fishing industry, assuming the fish stock remained constant.

Perhaps that makes mathematical sense, but that kind of logic could not be applied for a number of very important reasons. One reason is the very nature of the fishing occupation in Prince Edward Island. It is not a trade situation in which people are regarded as another element in the production factor. Fisheries has been a way of life. As such, that industry was not isolated as if it had no relationship to other forms of activity.

The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) and I share a similar fishing district, district No. 8. Thus I do not have to say the following to him. The situation for many years was one where individual fishermen could fish only for certain periods of the year. That was by reason of the regulation itself. Traditionally our most productive industry had been lobster fishing. Therefore, fishermen had to discover other forms of endeavour or employment. This meant that many fishermen looked upon fishing as a primary way of life and looked upon other forms of activity to support that way of life.

The kinds of activities engaged in by fishermen are too numerous to mention. One could talk about the people who fished and farmed, a stereotype example. On the eastern end of the island, relatives of mine have very naturally combined these two occupations for generations. There was a nice ordering of the seasons, in terms of the preparing of traps, planting, fishing and harvesting. It all fitted into a pattern which made a lot of sense in Prince Edward Island.

Recently fishermen who were not involved in farming turned to other forms of second employment activity. Some turned to the service sector; some were individual entrepreneurs. The list is quite long and extensive. As the approach to the regulation of the fishing industry has become more precision like, if a fisherman did not fall into the precise definition of that category, then he was no longer considered a valid or bona fide fisherman. Quite frankly, the approach taken by the officials in the federal Department of Fisheries and the Environment has concerned me. I see the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is shaking his head as he reflects on this. I realize he has had similar experiences. I hope I am shoring up the minister's own basic instinct to identify with the way of life in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, rather than that which perhaps is more directly related to commercial operations on factory ships, or in a situation where it is possible to have year round employment and income from a direct involvement in that industry. However, that has not been the case for a very long period of time in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

In attempting to maintain an adequate lobster industry in order to supply sufficient income for those engaged in it, we have been required to point out that there is a limited supply of lobster and a limited return from that industry. Also we have indicated, if we are to make the return sufficient for the capital investment and for the employment activity of the fishermen, that we will have to reduce their numbers.

During the last year there was a specific program entered into with the province of Prince Edward Island, as well as others. It was a buy back program which would reduce the number of people engaged in the lobster industry. I was impressed by the fact that few people seriously objected to implementation of this program, because it has restricted greatly the flexibility which has been part and parcel of the lives of Prince Edward Island fishermen, as well as others. This is not to say that particular individuals have not been affected seriously. I have raised various cases with the minister. Because of the rules, regulations, and the agreement entered into, it has been difficult for some fishermen to fall within the ambit of this particular definition or regime.

Implicit in the legislation before the House today is the suggestion that increasingly there will be determinations concerning the regulation of fisheries; determinations in terms of the tax or imposition of fees which will be imposed upon fishermen using harbours; determinations as to who these harbours will be leased to; and determinations as to the use and abandonment of harbours by the federal government, which will have major implications in terms of their upkeep and serviceability. I am extremely wary, which perhaps is a mild description.

At the time the development plan was signed in 1969, it called for a reduction of fishing ports in Prince Edward Island from 80 to 14 or 20. I have never been able to understand the consultation or the recognition of the fabric of Prince Edward Island society, community life, or the lives of fishermen, which occurred prior to this announcement. Under that development plan, there would have been a reduction of the fishing harbours and communities by approximately 70 per cent to 80 per cent. It is impossible to understand the type of thinking which arrived at that particular decision.

I see the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is present in the chamber this afternoon. He was a member of the provincial administration when the development plan was signed. I do not want to draw him into the debate, but it would be interesting to know his point of view as one who sat in the provincial government at that time. It would be interesting to know the earthly justification for a reduction in the number of fishing communities in Prince Edward Island. That was called for in the first phase of the plan. The Minister of Veterans Affairs, as well as the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, are aware of the fact that subsequently it was abandoned partially. The intent of that reduction is still in existence to this present day.

There have been expenditures made on specific harbours without consultation or agreement with fishermen's associations, processors, or any community structures existent in Prince Edward Island. Those expenditures were based on expert opinions. I use the word "expert" deliberately. I agree it was not the opinion of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. He has too much sense for that, quite frankly. It is to be hoped we have entered into a more realistic age where we can get beyond that type of game playing and manipulation of communities and local people who are part and parcel of society. Prince Edward Island has very deep roots and very strong traditions. Manipulation can only do harm and jeopardize the entire province. I realize the minister is attempting to reverse that situation, but also I know how easy it is for officials to enact regulations and create situations which are almost diametrically opposed to the intent of the minister.

I realize the minister is attempting to soften the intent of this legislation. Surely he is not seeing himself as a fisheries czar who will enact fishing policies on the banks of the Rideau Canal which will be appropriate for Antigonish, Albert, Surrey, Summerside—

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): And North Lake.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): North Lake or wherever. The minister well knows, as a fellow maritimer, how we have been affected by that kind of action on the part of well-informed and well-intentioned "experts" in Ottawa. The minister sits within breathing distance of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), who emphasized as recently as a day or two ago what a wonderful policy user-pay is and what an advantage it is for this country to have a minister of transport like the one who is presently the incumbent.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am surprised to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs applaud. If he supports the user-pay concept, I hope he will come to Prince Edward Island and announce that publicly because he has given it a very wide berth over a considerable period of time.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) I would like to say that I support the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang).

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am glad the Minister of Veterans Affairs has clarified his position. I did not think he wanted to applaud the user-pay policy of the Minister of Transport because the Minister of Veterans Affairs is much too aware of the political repercussions of coming even within breathing distance of the user-pay syndrome which has afflicted the Minister of Transport and which is threatening to afflict the whole government.

I, as one individual member, am exceedingly aware of this legislation. The Minister of Fisheries has not fixed a fee, and he has indicated that there is no immediate plan, because of the nature of the fisheries on the east coast, to bring in such a policy. However, the fact is that we are giving the minister a blank cheque in this legislation. The minister is shaking his head, but unless he can tell me that there is any prohibition against him, tomorrow or next week—or what is more likely in this government, because ministers change once every three weeks, next month—deciding that there is a good reason from his point of view, or from the point of view of his officials, to bring in a user-pay fee on fishing ports on the east coast, it appears that he could do so. Provision is in the legislation for that. A full mandate is there. In effect, we are opening the door to a certain kind of taxation, and there are no parliamentary inhibitions that I can see in this legislative item.

Perhaps as the minister winds up the third reading debate on Bill C-2 he will indicate what safeguards there are. I realize that at this point all we could get would be a verbal commitment, but that might be more than he has already given to us. Will there be safeguards through references to an appropriate standing committee if the minister or his successor imposes this kind of tax?

I looked at a recent report in the business section of the Globe and Mail on business prospects for Prince Edward Island in 1978, and I looked at the value of fish landings projected for this year compared with last year. The fish landings in 1976 were valued at $12.396 million, and in 1977 they were valued at $12.162 million. In actual terms and without allowing for what has happened with respect to inflation there has been an absolute decrease in the income from fisheries received by fishermen. That is not a comforting situation to look at, but it is less comforting to see that through this legislation we are giving the minister the opportunity to impose further taxation. Whether it will be, as some of my colleagues have suggested, $50 or $100 a month for fishermen as an additional fee, I do not know. However, I do know that the representative group for P.E.I., the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association, has already publicly protested the implementation of this aspect of this bill.

I would like to think that this item, as well as the whole question of changes in port policy which might occur in Prince Edward Island and elsewhere, would be the subject of adequate consultation not only with provincial government agencies but also with the people directly involved in the industry. It is my understanding that even the provincial governments concerned were not asked for any specific input with respect to this legislation. The minister is shaking his head. This is an interesting situation, because I was told they were not. The consultation which took place must have taken place in a corridor. Someone must have said, "By the way, did you know?" The measure of consultation was not enough to make impact on officials in the fisheries department of P.E.I. They were not even aware of it. If consultation did not extend that far, one can only assume that it dit not extend to the P.E.I. Fishermen's Association or to the various county fishing groups. What kind of consultation took place? The answer has to be that there was none.

Therefore, I hope that, with the mandate contained in this bill, the minister will take a renewed interest in the consultative process with respect to the implementation of this legislation and the passage of regulations, and that he will make a definite commitment with respect at least to parliamentary ratification in a standing committee or elsewhere concerning any imposition of port fees which might have a detrimental effect on or do a disservice to the people employed in the fisheries, whom I know best, those who are fishermen in eastern Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak today on the second reading of Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes.

To some this bill may appear to be an insignificant housekeeping item; it is a brief bill and deals with rather mundane matters concerning one of our Crown corporations. In reality, however, it is rather more important. This bill creates a capital structure for Canada's largest Crown corporation which is appropriate to a mature corporation; it will establish a sensible relationship between the debt and equity; it will consolidate the investment of the Government of Canada in the CNR and will remove the need for regular votes of money to assist the CNR.

Current legislative and other arrangements governing the financing of CNR which have remained largely unchanged for the last 25 years provide that each year the government purchase CNR preferred non-cumulative shares in an amount equal to 3 per cent of the gross revenues of the national system. In 1978 this would have required the inclusion in the government's main estimates of an amount of some $80 million; however, my proposal would eliminate this requirement and, indeed, the main estimate for 1978-79 are being prepared without this provision. This is a very important feature, given the pressures on government to keep public expenditures down and its determination to do so.

Existing arrangements also oblige the government to appropriate funds to meet company deficits. Indeed, an amount of $22 million was included in last fall's supplementary estimates for this purpose. However, agreement has been reached among all concerned that as part of this recapitalization proposal authority would be obtained to restrict the already authorized purchase of preferred stock in the current fiscal year by an equivalent amount. This, in effect, would save $22 million in cash flow from the treasury, and is also an important consideration given the current difficulties being experienced in overall cash management. The provisions of this bill will enable the company to attain an adequate profit level in the future and thus eliminate the need to appropriate funds to meet deficits.

Financing arrangements in place also provide that the CNR would obtain its other capital requirements either from loans from the Minister of Finance or from the private sector. In recent years the company has been encouraged not to look to the Minister of Finance for these needs. It has been co-operative in this regard and has been successful in the capital markets. However, the result of this long-standing obligation for the company to rely on loans for the bulk of its capital requirements has been a debt ratio of about 62 per cent, compared with the rail industry average in North America of approximately 35 per cent, and about 35 per cent for the CPR in particular.

The proposed conversion of about $800 million of debt into equity would result in a debt ratio of 42 per cent, and thus would provide a more realistic basis for the government and the public to assess the economic efficiency of the company and the performance of its officers in relation to that of its competitors. It would also provide an important morale boost to the CNR management who, I am sure you will agree, are dedicated individuals making considerable progress in improving the efficiency and profitability of their operation. It should provide a similar boost to those who work throughout the CN railway system, men and women who have also helped in recent years to improve the productivity and efficiency of the over-all operation.

The interest which will be forgone on converted debt would be more than offset by the elimination of the requirement for the government to purchase CNR preferred shares. Indeed, it is estimated that over the next five years the net gain to the federal treasury will be in the order of $145 million.

Another important feature of the proposal from the government's point of view is that CNR will be required to pay annually to the federal treasury a dividend equal to 20 per cent of its profits or such higher amount as the governor in council may direct. For the first time in over 20 years the Canadian people will be receiving a monetary return on their equity in the company.

A further feature of the proposal would see the consolidation of the remaining CNR debt held by the government, and its repayment rescheduled in a manner that would facilitate cash management for the government's account by the Department of Finance.

Finally, there is the proposed merging into common shares of the present preferred shares and the government's investment in the Canadian government railways. There will also be a reduction of equity in recognition of depreciation attributable to years prior to the adoption of depreciation accounting. This "cleaning-up" action, coupled with the more realistic debt/equity relation and the enhanced ability of the CNR to register and retain profits in the future, will place the company on a more readily understood financial basis and reduce the possibility of having to come to the government for funds.

As the long term advantages of this project of reallocation of capital, the CN will be able to meet its financial and operational needs without the assistance of the government of Canada. On the short term, that is for this financial year and the next, as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told the House on December 19, 1977, we will avoid outlays of about $100 million and by that very fact we will be able to cut down $80 million from next year's main estimates. On the medium term basis, that is over the next five years, it will no longer be necessary to allocate in the main budget an amount of $470 million for the purchase of preferred shares; the interest lost by writing off the debt will amount to $320 million but the federal treasury will record a net saving of $145 million. In addition, all dividends collected by the government will represent additional revenue. These are important advantages from the viewpoint of the government of Canada.

[English]

During the past two years the financial structure of the Crown corporations reporting to the Minister of Transport has been examined and restructured where necessary, for example, the St. Lawrence Seaway, Air Canada, and the Northern Transportation Company Ltd. Passage of this bill will bring the financial structure of the CN closer to that enjoyed by other Crown corporations. It will provide a framework which will reduce the government's financial requirements in the future and clearly impose on the CN the responsibility and accountability to manage a financially viable, self-supporting institution.

Hon. members will have seen the effect in the last year or two of the new policy of the government in relation to its major Crown corporations, particularly CNR and Air Canada. Both of them in preliminary statements or estimates of their financial position indicate that in the current year they will be turning past deficits into profits. The profits, it is true, are still relatively small, but the policy is to emphasize increasingly that the government, on behalf of the people of Canada, expects these major Crown corporations to operate as efficiently and effectively as possible. In our view, we should not cloud their performance by imposing obligations upon them to carry out even good public services unless we are prepared to quantify the cost of that public service and to pay the price for it directly.

In the past, far too often the morale of management and their ability to handle their affairs effectively has been adversely affected by these obligations imposed on them, without consequence to cost and over-all profitability and efficiency. That is not our intention, nor is it our intention to be involved as shareholders in what might be called the day to day management of the corporation. That is best left in the hands of the best possible management of the best possible board of directors in the usual commercial way, not subjected to day to day variations of the whim of the minister or in response to immediate demands of a particular member.

I think it is important that we continue to allow these corporations to provide the best possible service in this way. Both of them this year are not only turning past deficits into profits but are doing so with a measurably increased performance in terms of the load of work they are accomplishing. Both CNR and Air Canada are doing so with a smaller use of over-all manpower, demonstrating the greater efficiency they have achieved in comparison with a year or so ago.

It is important that we now put CNR on a basis more in keeping with the debt equity ratios of other corporations performing similar functions. But the challenge is that hereafter it should so manage its affairs as to be efficient in the provision of service, and therefore efficient in the use of the investment which the people of Canada have in it, and that it make a progressive return on that investment which is more appropriate to the size of that investment. We in turn should restrain ourselves from demanding of it things which may serve other purposes, unless we are prepared to pay the price. We have stated that such is our policy. We should see the result of this policy over the years in the continuing good performance of the men and women who work in these two great corporations, from the lower levels to the very top management. This is our hope as we move second reading of the bill at this time.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) when he says this is not an insignificant piece of legislation. Any bill that writes off $808 million worth of debt is certainly not insignificant but rather a major piece of legislation. Any legislative measure that restructures the capital organization of a corporation of the magnitude of the CNR is certainly a major piece of legislation. I think it is fair to say that the impact of this bill will serve to place a heavy onus on management in terms of its financial operations in carrying out its mandate to operate an efficient and effective railway, both from the financial and from the service point of view.

I must begin by saying that I am somewhat surprised that it was not the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who introduced this bill because he was chafing at the bit back in December, challenging the opposition to bring forward such a bill because it would in effect save the taxpayers $100 million. That statement has not been forgotten and, as near as we can figure it out, it is as phony as the hollow proclamations he has been making on the economy. I am sure that it is this kind of bluffing and flippancy that causes Canadians to fail to build the necessary faith and confidence in the administration which is at the helm at present. One must seriously question the credibility of a leader of a government who mouths off such flippant and bluffing statements.

Writing off a debt of $808 million is one thing, but losing $65 million worth of interest as a result of that write off is another. While the government, under the provisions of this bill, will no longer have to purchase the 4 per cent CN preferred stock, which at this time would amount to $100 million, this does not translate into a saving of $100 million to the taxpayers. The $100 million at this time is the combination of that which is left owing for the current fiscal year plus the total for the next fiscal year.

In addition to the bill writing off $808 million worth of debt and converting it to equity, it cancels the purchase of the 4 per cent preferred stock by the government which is based on 3 per cent of the gross earnings of the CN system. As I said earlier, the bill also essentially reorganizes the capital structure by converting $1.5 billion worth of preferred shares now held by the government into common shares. It also provides for the payment of an annual dividend by CN of 20 per cent of the net income after interest, depreciation and taxes are met. Also, it provides for the CN to borrow money to meet its deficits. No longer will parliament be called upon to cover the deficits through parliamentary appropriation.

The $808 million arises from changes in accounting procedures with respect to the depreciation which was introduced back in 1940, 1954, and 1956 in a phasing in process. This is covered at page 21 of the 1976 CN annual report in a footnote to the consolidated financial statement. I should like to quote it because this is primarily the issue which surrounds the $808 million debt. I quote from page 21 of the 1976 annual report of Canadian National Railways as follows:

> For Canadian properties, depreciation accounting was introduced for equipment in 1940, for hotel properties in 1954, and for track and road structures and all other physical properties except land in 1956. For United States properties, depreciation accounting was introduced for ties, rails, other track material and ballast in 1976.

Because there were no profits to speak of, depreciation was not taken during these periods. If depreciation had been taken, as it probably should have been, the deficits would have been higher or the profits would have been lower, as the case may be. As all members are aware, profits have been recorded for only a few years. Now the theory is that the deficits would have been higher and parliament would have been called upon to provide the shortfall. In that event, Canadian National Railways would have had additional money for capital expansion. Because this did not take place, the railway now believes it is justified in coming before parliament at this time to ask for this adjustment and a cancellation of the $808 million which has arisen as a result of accumulation of depreciation that was not taken into account in prior years. This argument is based upon the assumption that in its wisdom parliament would have seen fit to provide these funds over the past years, and that this allocation would have been reflected in the amount of deficit recorded by CN.

This fact was clearly explained by the current president of the CNR, Mr. Robert Bandeen, when he appeared before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on March 29, 1977. Mr. Bandeen said:

> We contend that because proper depreciation was not charged over the years—and it was proper at the time, and I should not use that term, I do not mean that it was against accounting principles, but it was on a different theory—that the deficits would have been higher or the profits lower over the years and, indeed, we would have had that money to finance capital expansion. Because we did not have this, we had to go out in the market and borrow money or borrow money from the government. So, we are saying that should be recognized and we should have a chance to make that change.

In effect, CN is indicating that depreciation on its own represents a cash flow to the company. I believe that is a rather strange application because such is not necessarily the case with regard to the private sector. It is fair to assume that in the private sector depreciation charges must be earned, and these funds must be available in order to take advantage of that depreciation. It seems this is being overlooked by CN completely.

Now it is suggested that the deficits covered by cash payments from the treasury were understated, as a result of the failure to take into consideration depreciation which could have been charged over the years. On this basis, from 1923 to 1955—and I use the year 1955 because 1956 is the year when the depreciation formula was changed for road, track and physical properties—this would have meant an additional deficit of more than $24 million on an average basis per year over those 33 years. Thus, one would have to question seriously whether parliament would have willingly provided the funding in face of the commitments and what transpired during the recapitalization in 1937, and particularly, the recapitalization in 1952 which placed CN in as good a position or perhaps an even better position than its competitors.

Also it is interesting to note the commitment which was undertaken by the then president of the CNR when the 1952 recapitalization bill was passed. After the passage of the Capital Revision Act of 1952, the late Donald Gordon said the following:

> Capital revision has taken away the curse of the past, but let us be frank enough to recognize that it has also taken away an alibi and convenient excuse. This is its real meaning for the future. We are now in a position where we have nothing to hide behind, and nothing to block the road to success. We have a fighting chance of paying our way in the world, and counting the bad years with the good we ought to be able on the average to pay all our operating expenses, our fixed interest charges and income taxes, and still have something left to return to our owners as a dividend on preferred stock.

That was a very lofty proclamation, but it did not come to pass. Given the obvious break which was acknowledged by the then president, and given the clear obligation which was placed upon the shoulders of CN management, it is very questionable whether parliament would have granted these extra funds on an annual basis for what is really tantamount to a bookkeeping entry. Also it is very difficult to arrive at an accurate evaluation of the assets acquired by CN prior to the turn of the century. Thus, the $808 million figure is not based on anything concrete and is not a firm evaluation. It is subject to some questioning.

I take issue with the fact that the 1976 CN annual report makes the assumption, for all intents and purposes, that this bill would be passed, since it is noted that CN actually capitalized the $808 million accumulated depreciation and charged it against assets. Obviously this action was sanctioned by CN's auditor and the government. Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the last week we have waited patiently to receive some advice from the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) as to what will happen as far as private members' business and public bills are concerned. We have not received anything from the minister since last Wednesday. We do not know what bills are coming up. If we had not checked with the Table at 4.45 p.m. or 4.50 p.m. today, we would not have known what bill was going to be before the House this evening. I think the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council, or his parliamentary secretary, owes that courtesy to the opposition.

● (1702)

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I certainly have been aware, as others have been, of what was going to occur. I am surprised that the hon. member was not.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, as a courtesy the President of Privy Council sends a list over to the opposition so that we know what is going to happen for the next week with regard to private members' bills, but that courtesy was not extended to us this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I suggest that the hon. member raise his point of order at a later date when the government House leader is in the House.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

CANADIAN LANGUAGE LAW AMENDMENT ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CORRECT CERTAIN ANOMALIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved that Bill C-210, to correct certain anomalies and inconsistencies in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 pertaining to the protection of Canadian language rights, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not intend to discuss the merits of the bill in the course of debate on this point of order except for the purposes of arguing with respect to procedure. This bill is entitled "An Act to correct certain anomalies and inconsistencies in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 pertaining to the protection of Canadian language rights". It may not be proper for a private member to advance this bill in this House.

I have looked over the bill to see whether there is present in it a royal recommendation involving an expenditure of money. Bills calling for the expenditure of money, as we know, cannot be dealt with without the presence of a royal recommendation, and certainly cannot be advanced by private members. I would like to have just a few moments to deal with that procedural matter so that we can decide today whether the matter should go forward.

I want to deal first of all with part I of the bill concerning legal proceedings and the Official Languages Act. The explanatory note to clause 2 says the following:

> The purpose of this amendment is to allow the transfer of a case to a judicial district other than the district in which the accused had to make his original appearance, in order to allow him to be tried in his own official language.

That applies not to a provincial court, the Supreme Court of Ontario, the supreme courts of any of the provinces or to a county court; it applies to a federal court and, according to the explanatory note, it imposes a duty on federal courts to provide simultaneous translation.

If this bill were being advanced by a minister of the Crown, if there were an accompanying royal recommendation, and if the bill were adopted, it would impose a duty on the taxpayers of Canada to provide funds for the operation of a federal court. That is the situation as it appears to me. I raise this as an objection from the point of view of the procedure involved. The section which clause 2 is intended to amend says the following:

> Every court of record established by or pursuant to an act of the Parliament of Canada has, in any proceedings conducted before it within the national capital region or a federal bilingual district established under the act, the duty to ensure that, at the request of any party to the proceedings, facilities are made available for the simultaneous translation of the proceedings—

The bill extends this duty beyond the national capital region. In a geographical sense that is an extension but, if this bill is passed, it will impose upon the government the necessity to provide funds to pay for the function set forth in the bill.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Paproski: We have one point of order.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Then I rise on a question of privilege. I find it very unusual for the House leader of the Conservative party to discuss a bill on the basis of monetary implications. The hon. member has not heard the remarks I will be making at second reading of this bill. In addition, and more important, there are already provisions—for example, section 11 of the Official Languages Act—which allow courts to offer translation services—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. With all due respect to all hon. members, and particularly the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, I must tell him that this is rather an argument he is trying to put to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and I will hear him after the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for taking his time. I sincerely do, but I think it is important that, whether a bill is a private bill or a public bill advanced by the government, the rules should apply, if indeed these be the rules. I suppose all of us have a duty to observe the rules—at least to attempt to observe the rules. There is a question in my mind, and I would like the opportunity to discuss it.

Clause 3 of this bill seeks to amend the Criminal Code. It seeks to extend requirements which are already set forth in the statute. At the moment, according to section 555 of the Criminal Code, in the province of Quebec only and not in all judicial districts, there is a requirement on the choice of jurors involving public expense. The whole system demands public expense. The purpose of this bill is to extend that beyond the limitation of the moment and therefore involve the expenditure of money. As it involves the expenditure of public money, it could not be advanced by a private member and would require a royal recommendation.

Clause 6 deals with the Railway Act and requires changing railway signs, timetables, bills of lading and notices throughout the country so that they are printed in both languages. However laudable that motive may be, it involves the expenditure of public moneys, and I therefore ask the Chair to consider the propriety of this being done in a private member's bill without a royal recommendation.

Those are the provisions which struck me as I reviewed the bill, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately with the short notice that was given us as explained by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). It may be that an explanation can be advanced by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), but there does seem to be some question about the propriety of this bill. The strongest part of my argument concerns the provision with respect to the Federal Court of Canada which would entail a tremendous increase of expenditure for its operation if that right or privilege were to be extended across the country.

I wonder if Your Honour would be prepared to deal with that point in a preliminary way?

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the point of order raised by the member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I have heard quite a few arguments in this House in attempts to slow down the discussion and sometimes even the passage of certain pieces of legislation but this is undoubtedly the weakest argument, if one at all, I have heard in the ten years I have been in this House. This seems to me to be merely a tactic to delay the discussion of this bill which is quite worthwhile.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of every session of Parliament when private members' bills are published or announced, the Speaker of the House of Commons rules on the receivability of the bills from the standpoint of the financial implications they might have for the Crown and when this occurs he usually rejects those bills as a whole. I would like to know if Mr. Speaker did indeed examine the bill we are now discussing this afternoon under Standing Order 94. You may be prepared, Mr. Speaker, to rule immediately on the argument of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton but I do not see how that argument could hold.

The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) whose argument we have not yet heard, as the hon. member implied earlier, does not add any new provisions to the Official Languages Act but only seeks to amend its application. The financial implications for the Crown that could be contained therein are already in the Official Languages Act. So it seems to me that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, who is a lawyer, should understand those things.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the first comment I should like to make with respect to this point of order is that I think I have to correct something just said by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin). I believe it is a fact that when Mr. Speaker grants first reading to all bills brought in at the beginning of a session, he does enter a caveat as to the procedural propriety of each individual bill, to be dealt with later. The suggestion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), therefore, that this bill should now be looked at is certainly in order.

The second thing I want to say is that on the face of it the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton seems to have a point in that it looks as though more money would have to be spent if this amended bill were passed than would be spent if it were not passed. I say on the face of it he seems to have a point, but I have not had the opportunity to look at the act on the statute books. There may be financial provisions in the act that cover this.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

I do not want to spend time now in a procedural argument. I think all of us in this House, in all parties, like to see private members have the opportunity to present their ideas and I would not like the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) to be denied the right to proceed with discussion of this matter this afternoon. I hope we could have the discussion on the merits of the legislation rather than on the procedural point.

I also point out that there have been times when the Chair has had doubts and has allowed discussion to proceed. I would hope the Chair might take that position today.

The other thing I should like to say—and I have checked this and know I am not revealing a secret—is that I understand a member on the government side at some point is going to move that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to an appropriate standing committee. That would certainly not violate any procedural rule about spending money because sending the subject matter to a committee does not involve spending money. I would therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would be willing and that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would be willing that you reserve decision on this point, not ruling it in order or out of order, but, letting us proceed on the understanding that we are simply having a discussion, particularly in the knowledge that there will be a motion to refer the subject matter to committee and thus the discussion be allowed to go ahead.

I think I express the view of all members of the House when I say we have enough trouble around here, and one trouble we do not like is having private members denied the right to present their ideas and have them debated.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, albeit that the hon. member may have a good bill, I happen to be in the position that I presented a bill to the Speaker's legal department which it is alleged—and I disagree—would entail the expenditure of money. There is a disagreement between myself and that department on the point. I am quite surprised that a bill of this nature would come before the House and proceed this far.

I take great exception to this member's bill being presented as a private member's bill and my bill not being presented, apparently because I am an independent. It is outright discrimination and I do not think it is proper at all. It was explained to me by legal counsel who came to my office that the particular bill I wish to present would not be valid, and would not be proper for the exact reasons—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would like to advise the hon. member that he was recognized on a point of order, namely, the objection to the presentation of this bill. I see no connection between this bill and the one the hon. member had refused to him. I would certainly hear argument as to why this one should not be proceeded with on the point of order which was raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Jones: If I might be permitted to continue, this bill obviously is going to entail expenditure of additional moneys than those budgeted for. There is nothing in the bill to indicate otherwise. When you change signs, when you provide simultaneous translation, you just do not call for expenditure of thousands of dollars, you call for expenditure of thousands and thousands of dollars. You do not have to be any mathematical accountant to come to the conclusion that this is in fact a money bill. If it entails the expenditure of money it should not be here at all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe there is money in the original act.

Mr. Jones: If there is money in the original act, then it should not have been there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said. I would be prepared to move a motion that the bill be withdrawn but the subject matter be referred to committee. If it will assist in resolving the procedural wrangle that we seem to be caught in, I would be prepared to do so now and put to rest that problem. Perhaps we could use the balance of the house to discuss the subject matter. If my understanding is correct and my amendment is accepted by the House, then the subject matter would be referred to a committee. If that will solve your problem, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to make that motion now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the parliamentary secretary. I think it is an excellent suggestion and one with which I am in accord.

I said at the outset, as my hon. friend will note, that I made my argument on the procedural problem extremely short for the very purposes about which he is concerned. I would think it would be appropriate if the hon. gentleman wanted to move the motion now, that we deal with the matter and then perhaps that can be the end of it.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I have only one question. I would like to allow my colleague from Ottawa-Vanier who has proposed a motion to be able to speak on it. If I propose the amendment now, am I going to be required to speak to the amendment right away with the possibility that he will lose his turn?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You cannot move an amendment until the motion is put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If you are seeking guidance you cannot move the amendment now.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Are we on the bill now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps we should seek the consent of the House. Is it agreed, if there is a forthcoming amendment, to refer the subject matter to the committee and that the point of order will be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we are therefore discussing the subject of Bill C-210 rather than the bill itself, but I am somewhat confused and perplexed by the comments made on the point of order because, as indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), although there are monetary provisions in the current Revised Statutes of Canada, Bill C-210 does not address itself to them but rather to the intent of statutes, and the Official Languages Act in particular which, in my view, should be paramount as regards language rights in Canada.

Bill C-210 would correct some anomalies and inconsistencies in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1970 pertaining to language rights in Canada. Moreover, it would delete references to billingual districts which were never implemented, and finally it would give the accused the right to be heard and dealt with in his official language. The bill is the result of extensive study and is based in particular on the conviction that Canadians in 1978 are ready and willing to recognize equal legal status to this country's both official languages. I would like to pay tribute and extend my sincere thanks to counsel, and especially his assistant Mr. R. M. Beaupré, for the advice and expertise they so generously extended in the preparation of this legislation.

Since tonight's debate is on the bill at second reading stage, or the principle of the bill, I would like to briefly review the situation as it now exists and then discuss in general terms the amendments proposed in Bill C-210. The issue of language rights has been widely publicized and is closely linked to that of national unity. If the official status of the English and French languages is accepted, their equal status must also be recognized in the courts of justice as well as before all government institutions, and both official languages must also be accepted in the day to day cultural, educational, social and economic life. Bill C-210 brings a contribution to language equality, and that concept of natural justice that will give every Canadian a feeling of belonging and true equality.

[English]

Historically, Mr. Speaker, it was only in the province of Quebec that Canadians had a right to a trial in the language of their choice. In the last decade, major changes were brought about in a few other provinces, allowing the accused the right to use the language of his choice. It has been argued convincingly that amendments to the Criminal Code were required before language rights could be given to all Canadians. Hon. members will remember that as recently as last summer the attorney general for Ontario, the Honourable Roy McMurtry, had indicated that his province was proceeding with its provincial program to provide court services in French in designated areas and that amendments to the Criminal Code were required to permit French trials in Ontario. This the federal government promised to do; in the Speech from the Throne in October last, this statement was made:

After consultation with the provinces, the government will amend the Criminal Code to guarantee the right of accused persons to be tried in the official language of their choice.

Although we know that ongoing consultations with the provinces are continuing at this time, we are all waiting impatiently for the government to table the amending legislation. I began working on Bill C-210 in the spring of 1977 and tabled the bill in October, 1977. Since I am not party to the consultations, hon. members will understand that Bill C-210 could vary considerably with the addition of the proposed amendments whenever they are tabled by the justice minister.

Bill C-210 is divided into two parts. Part I deals with legal proceedings and, more specifically, with amendments to the Official Languages Act and to the Criminal Code. It deals specifically with the duty of federal courts to provide simultaneous translation. Members will recall that section 11(2) of the Official Languages Act restricted the simultaneous translation facilities to proceedings conducted within the national capital region or in a bilingual district to be established under the same act. Since the government announced that it did not intend at this time to establish these bilingual districts, and since I sincerely believe that all persons appearing before federal courts should have facilities for simultaneous translation of the proceedings, I propose to amend the Official Languages Act to eliminate this restrictive clause and make it mandatory that, at the request of any party to the proceedings before a federal court, facilities be made available for simultaneous translation of the proceedings.

Further, Section 11 of the Official Languages Act needs to be amended to allow a change of venue in cases where the courts do not speak the official language of the accused. This would allow an accused who is arraigned before a court of criminal jurisdiction, as defined in section 2 of the Criminal Code, and who speaks an official language other than that in which the proceedings of the court are conducted, to request the court that his trial be conducted in a judicial district in Canada where such language is used.

[Translation]

When we read the Revised Statutes of 1970, it is obvious that substantial amendments to the Criminal Code are required, especially as concerns sections 555 and 556. These two sections concern the selection of the jury and the right of the accused to demand a mixed jury. It is probably because of historical reasons that there are mixed juries in Quebec and Manitoba. In 1864, the legislature instituted by the Act of Union of 1840 passed legislation introducing a system of mixed juries which applied only to the province of Lower Canada which later was to become the province of Quebec. In 1867, section 129 of the British North America Act maintained the laws that had already been passed in 1903, including those passed in the province of Lower Canada. Section 555 of the Criminal Code of Canada simply reflects this situation, and has done so since passage of an amendment to the Criminal Code in June 1869. As concerns Manitoba, the province was formed within the Northwest Territories. The section of the act of parliament which created the province of Manitoba instituted bilingualism in this province and consequently a system of mixed juries.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

About twenty years later, the Manitoba legislature adopted a policy of English unilingualism, but since criminal trials did not come under its jurisdiction, it could not repeal the legislation. The Canadian Parliament having decided not to rescind its own legislation, the system of mixed juries has been maintained until now in Manitoba. In this province as in Quebec, the present Criminal Code is only reflecting a historical situation. At the present time, under section II of the Official Languages Act, anyone called before a court in Canada is entitled, subject to the provisions of section 5 of the act, to do so in French or English. Of course, the courts must therefore provide translation services to the court, the jury, the legal officers and the audience. But this does not provide the right to a mixed jury. Moreover, there is a discretionary element and nothing can force the courts to allow the person charged to be tried in his language, whether English or French.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, neither the British North America Act, the Official Languages Act, the Canadian Bill of Rights or any other act passed by the Canadian parliament provides for the constitution of mixed juries in any province other than Quebec and Manitoba. The amendment contained in Bill C-210 would extend this right to the whole Canadian population in all provinces. Moreover, it would coincide with the spirit of the Official Languages Act and would confirm the equality before the law of all Canadians, whatever official language they may use.

Taking into account the recent decision of the Quebec Superior Court concerning the constitutionality of Bill 101, and in particular of the sections dealing with the language of legislation and the courts, bearing in mind also the Forest case in Manitoba which in fact challenges the constitutionality of the Manitoba Act of 1899, I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the House will recognize the urgency and prime necessity of passing the necessary amendments suggested by Bill C-210.

The interest and support of the Canadian public opinion, the many editorials, the recent comments in support of bilingualizing our judicial services can only strengthen the legislators who are interested in and concerned about national unity. The recent statements of the Ontario premier also give serious suppport to linguistic equality. If I understand Mr. Davis well, he says: No more symbolic gestures—we will prove our support and understanding of the great principles of bilingualism.

Mr. Speaker, the Francophones of Ontario still hope to see the historical moment when the province will quit making beautiful promises and start acting concretely. It is awaiting impatiently the legislative interventions that will confer equal status upon it. We are willing to exchange the historic symbols of which Mr. Davis speaks for serious steps indicative of serious support for our just claims.

[English]

Part II of Bill C-210 addresses itself to four statutes which upon review require amendment so that they will conform to the spirit of the Official Languages Act adopted by parliament. Section 7 of the Official Languages Act deals with the printing of notices and advertisements. The present provision says that where, by virtue of the authority of parliament, the Government of Canada, any judicial, quasi-judicial or administrative body or Crown corporation established by or pursuant to an act of the parliament of Canada, any notice or advertisement for information to the public in the national capital region or a federal bilingual district established under the Official Languages Act is printed, it shall be printed in both official languages. Here again, Mr. Speaker, we find a restrictive clause, that of establishing bilingual districts not in keeping with present government intentions. Bill C-210 would amend section 7 so as to extend to any corporation having national status the language requirements of the Official Languages Act concerning public notices and announcements. It would in fact be a step toward establishing the supremacy of the Official Languages Act over all statutes with regard to language requirements of all corporations established or continuing to exist by or pursuant to an act of the parliament of Canada.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, the Bank Act, the Railway Act and the Winding-Up Act restrict to the province of Quebec public notices and announcements in both official languages. It is particularly inconsistent at this time that the Railway Act should state that English and French are to be used in the province of Quebec and English only in the other provinces. It could happen, Mr. Speaker, that somebody may contest the right of our national railways to advertise in French outside Quebec, thereby putting to the test the legality of CNR using both official languages outside the province of Quebec.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-210 introduces some important amendments. In short, these amendments allow the provinces, which bear responsibility for the administration of justice in Canada, to amend certain acts which limit language rights, thereby confirming the right to language equality before the courts. The amendments to other statutes largely eliminate what I would term the "Quebec restrictions" as regards public notices in both official languages. The amendment to the act would allow banks and other public institutions, whenever possible, to publish in newspapers of general circulation in their area, either in French or in English. To conclude my remarks, I would say that, in my opinion, until we have adopted international signs, railway crossing signs will have to be bilingual. Government institutions must reflect the spirit of the Official Languages Act and full bilingualism.

Mr. Speaker, even if it can be maintained that there are financial implications, I am also convinced that the present legislation provides for expenditures for services which are mentioned in Bill C-210. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should not think in terms of privileges. In this bill we should think in terms of rights. What we want to obtain are not privileges. All Canadians are equal and full citizens. I think it is also a matter of natural right which should be recognized to each and every Canadian citizen. The federal government and the provinces should demonstrate their co-operation by introducing amendments which will enable all Canadians to be heard in the courts and to see the English and French facts reflected in our government institutions all over Canada.

[English]

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make my comments very brief and then move my motion at the end.

I commend the hon. member for giving us the opportunity to debate this subject matter this afternoon. These proposals are a step in the right direction. Some time ago the government announced its intention of finding a means to recognize the right of a person whose language is one of the official languages of Canada to be heard before a judge or a judge and jury who speaks that language. Furthermore, provisions may well be required dealing with joint trials of accused when one speaks French and the other speaks English, with trials where a large number of witnesses testify in both languages, or where a large number of documents in both languages are filed. The solution, in appropriate cases, may be the use of bilingual judges or jurors.

Then again, provision for change of venue may be required in order to permit the transfer of a case from one district in a province to another district in the same province. It is desirable that resident francophones or anglophones of a province should be entitled to trial before a judge, or before a judge and jury, capable of understanding and speaking the appropriate language. In most provinces, including Quebec, it may not be possible to constitute an English or a French jury in all judicial districts. For this reason, mixed juries, as proposed, might not achieve the goal of providing adequate rights to accused persons. Mixed juries have been seldom used in Quebec and Manitoba; problems have arisen with regard to their operational efficacy. In cases where knowledge of the two official languages is required, bilingual juries should be used.

It is important to recognize that provisions for the hearing of trials by judges and jurors who speak French and/or English are not of the kind which can be implemented overnight. Adequate provision should be made to allow for proclamation province by province, thus allowing sufficient lead time in which the provinces can implement the legislation.

To sum up, let me say the bill is a suggestion in the right direction. It purports to recognize a principle which the government fully supports. However, it fails to deal with some of the practical problems which regularly confront the courts. It seeks to establish mixed juries throughout Canada though it would seem preferable to follow the concept of French, English or bilingual juries. Moreover, the bill does not ensure that residents of a province would be tried in that province by judges or jurors who speak their language.

I might add that in the near future the government proposes to introduce legislation in relation to language rights before courts of criminal jurisdiction. It proposes to offer solutions which will guarantee language rights before such courts without adversely affecting the efficiency of the administration of justice.

It should be borne in mind that the provinces have an important role to play in the implementation of any proposed legislation. The views of the provinces have been solicited and the minister has been in consultation with his provincial colleagues in relation to what should be done. Legislation is now being considered with a view to drafting. We would like to commend the provinces for the co-operation they have shown.

Since we are dealing with a subject covering a wide field—there are a number of ramifications—I should like to move an amendment in the hope that, while we can continue to deal with these issues in the few minutes remaining to us, the subject matter of the bill itself will be referred to the committee, at which stage all members will have an opportunity to make their views known and to amplify their remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I second that proposal.

Mr. Young: I therefore move:

That Bill C-210, to correct certain anomalies and inconsistencies in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, pertaining to the protection of Canadian language rights be not now read the second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Speaker, I wish to say, first of all, that I appreciate the attitude taken by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Young) with respect to this difficult and vexing question, one which has troubled Canadians for years. I was also pleased to hear him say—and I am sure he was speaking for the Government of Canada—that his department has had the co-operation of all provinces with respect to this matter.

Discussions have obviously taken place between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the attorney general of Ontario, for instance. The parliamentary secretary nods his head in agreement. There have been negotiations, I am sure, with the attorney general of British Columbia and with attorneys general of other provinces. With respect to these discussions the parliamentary secretary has commended those concerned for the positive and helpful approach they have adopted.

I note that the bill itself provides for the immediate introduction of the services to which it refers. This does concern me in the light of the questions raised by the parliamentary secretary. The hon. gentleman called attention to possible adverse effects upon the administration of justice in a particular case even though we might be dealing, as we are in this bill, with the Federal Court of Canada. This is something we cannot ignore.

I have been concerned, also, by a line of questioning which has gone on in this House involving the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and the hon. member for Madawaska with respect to the position of the government of Ontario.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on a point of order.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply want to remind the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that my riding is called Madawaska-Victoria.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am sorry. I did not want to misname the hon. member's constituency. As I was saying, in light of the statement made just now by a representative of the government, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice, with respect to co-operation, I am very much concerned about the maintenance of the goodwill which must exist between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario in the course of the discussions on this subject.

It is unfortunate that the questions which have been put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier and by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) have been somewhat provocative with respect to the position taken by the premier of Ontario, who has the political responsibility for the administration of justice and, indeed, for the administration of the government of Ontario. I just want to say to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) that while the premier of Ontario has indicated that perhaps there is a better way of moving than by codification, and that symbols are not nearly as important as substance, with respect to questions involving second language, whether it be in education, in the administration of justice or in the provision of schools for education in the second language of Ontario, I think the record of the government of Ontario is impressive, given the situation. I believe it is important that nothing happen on the political level which would harden attitudes and perhaps blind people to certain realities.

Yesterday or the day before the premier of Ontario, in speaking to the Canadian Club in Toronto, expressed his concern for those in the second language group in Ontario, French-speaking Ontarians, by saying that he did not want to repeat the errors on the provincial side, in his jurisdiction, that have been made by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): What errors?

Mr. Corbin: He could have followed the example of New Brunswick.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am very glad that hon. members are listening to my argument because I intend to deal with the question of New Brunswick. New Brunswick, under the jurisdiction of the premier there and having regard to the situation in that province, decided to enact an official languages act in that province. As the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) will confirm, there is a tremendous difference, in terms of the development of the province and its history, between the province of New Brunswick and the province of Ontario. One of the things that concerns me about the whole matter of language is that when we move headlong into language matters we can destroy the soil of good will. All of us must be very careful not to criticize efforts that might seem small to some but which in certain areas, having regard to the development and history of certain provinces, are really major steps.

Keith Spicer has said to the federal government and to the people of Canada that the federal government's language approach, the codification of the law, the overdesignation of bilingual positions, and all the tremendous emphasis on bilingualsim, has generated an attitude in Canada which the premier of Ontario does not want to have generated in Ontario. That is what he said. If members of the House are really interested in advancing the cause, they should not use this forum carelessly. The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) should not have answered the questions of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier the other day in the way in which he answered them if we are to maintain an attitude of good will.

I have been across this country too and I have seen attitudes in Canada that are not helping with respect to second language training. What has happened in Canada is that suddenly, and I suppose finally, people are beginning to recognize that the place to begin with second language training, wherever one resides, is in the schools. It is to be hoped that it is an evolutionary process. If it ever becomes anything other than evolutionary, resentments will develop. Somehow we must balance that situation with other resentments that develop because the process has not moved swiftly enough.

An hon. Member: How do you balance rights?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member puts a good question. I guess it is a delicate act of statecraft. If there is anything indicative of the first ten years, anything that falls out of the federal Official Languages Act, it is that it is not, and has not been in terms of its implementation, an act of statecraft.

We hope that the approach involving the provinces will be proclamation seriatim, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Young) said, as the situation develops, and that the federal government will admit there are differences in Canada. That is a very healthy thing. We in the House can damage good will and can undermine progress if we use the House irresponsibly. The danger that I see in the attitudes expressed in the questions the other day was precisely that. That is something we must avoid.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Therefore, I do now leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, prior to the adjournment hour I mentioned I was very disturbed by the fact that the latest annual report of CN for 1976 made the assumption that this bill would be passed. It noted that the CN had actually capitalized the $808 million accumulated depreciation and charged it against its assets. This was obviously sanctioned by CN auditors and by the government, and I consider it to be another affront to the parliamentary process and a clear example of this government's taking parliament for granted and of administration by decree.

I suppose in some respects we might consider ourselves fortunate because we have in the past had the dissolution of debts merely by a stroke of the pen through the estimates. It seems to me these are very important issues that should be debated in the House of Commons, and it is my hope that in future CN or any other government Crown corporation will not take it upon itself to assume that because it proposes something which would constitute the cancellation of a very massive debt parliament will simply rubber stamp it or give it that support.

This is not the first time CN has had a capital revision. As a matter of fact, this particular bill is the third such piece of legislation. Also it is interesting to note that this is the fourth time since its formation in 1922 that the CNR has been relieved of debt and interest costs. In addition to the $808 million which is being cancelled under this bill, the total relief provided over that period is in excess of $6.7 billion.

The first relief was provided for in the provisions of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933. It provided for the government to contribute outright, commencing with the year 1932, all future deficits of the company. Prior to this the government had met the annual deficits of CNR by advances in the form of interest-bearing loans. From 1932 to 1976 the government contributed $1,230 million to cover the deficits of the CNR. This amount is net of the surpluses, which total $37 million, earned by the CNR in the years 1952, 1953, 1955 and 1956 and paid to the government. Thus, there is quite a history of deficits, the CNR recording a profit only in those four years.

The Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1937 relieved Canadian National of liabilities totalling approximately $1,167 million. In addition, it converted other liabilities amounting to $658 million into proprietors' equity of the dominion government. By eliminating the government loans for deficits prior to 1932 and the interest accruals thereon, and by writing out the Grand Trunk stock and writing down Canadian Northern stock to a nominal $18 million, it effectively wiped out what Canadian National management has referred to frequently as the legacy of the past. That was followed by the 1952 recapitalization act, and the one we are dealing with now in 1978. I understand there was one proposed in 1962. However, it did not materialize.

The relief under the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act of 1933 totalled approximately $1,230 million. The Revision Act of 1937 relieved Canadian National of the debt of $1,167 million and $658 million respectively. The Canadian National Revision Act of 1952 relieved the debt of the Canadian National by $2,845 million. At the present time $808 million is being cancelled under this bill. Therefore, the total debt reduction provided by the public treasury was $6,708 million. That is a whopping amount of money.

We have received many reasons why this measure is necessary. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that it was necessary because it constituted a saving to the public treasury. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) outlined today some reasons why this particular measure is necessary. Canadian National Railways officials have outlined their reasoning for this particular piece of legislation.

The arguments in favour of this bill are essentially the same as they were back in 1952 when the recapitalization bill was advanced. It has been said that the passage of this bill will provide Canadian National with a capital structure comparable to other companies in the North American railway system, with a debt ratio of approximately 38 per cent to 40 per cent compared to the current debt ratio of the CNR which ranges in the vicinity of 60 per cent. Also it is suggested that this piece of legislation will improve international investor confidence, now that the CNR is going outside government circles for its capital. I suppose the $168 million loss which was incurred in 1975, for example, would not be over appealing to the international investor.

We should not overlook the fact that the CNR is wholly owned by the government of Canada. Even though the credibility of the government is not that great at the present time, the CNR has the credibility and the backing of the government and indeed the country. Nevertheless, when the CNR goes outside government circles for money, it does so with the backing of the Government of Canada, and certainly that has an impact on investors' confidence.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Also it has been suggested that this bill will impose a much stronger discipline upon management to operate effectively and efficiently. In looking at the bill, I really do not see the mechanisms which will provide for that. When the parliamentary secretary or hon. members opposite speak on this bill, I hope they will give us the advantage of placing their interpretations on some of the clauses which would have the effect of imposing that stronger discipline upon management to operate in an effective and efficient manner. As a minimum, effective disciplinary guidelines ought to be inserted in the legislation, as well as proper and effective accountability features. I do not see those provisions in the bill at the present time.

From the government's point of view, the cancellation of this debt has the effect of relieving the government of an encumbrance. Under this piece of legislation, the debt will reflect the financial position of the CNR rather than being a burden to the government. In the eyes of the Auditor General and in the eyes of the Canadian public, I suppose it is fair to say the debt position of the federal government is improved by the fact that this debt has been cancelled and transferred to the equity of the CNR.

Because of the cancellation of the $808 million debt, this bill will relieve the CNR from paying interest on that amount, which works out to approximately $65 million on an annual basis. For that reason, it will tend to improve the economic performance of the CNR, at least on paper.

Then there is the phony argument which suggests the passage of this bill will represent no cost to the government but will be merely a book transaction. The Prime Minister suggested the other day that the passage of this bill will constitute a saving. I find that to be highly questionable and it will have to be explored in detail at committee stage.

The effect of the 1937 Capital Revision Act reduced the fixed charges of the CNR by something more than $35 million a year. The second Capital Revision Act more or less completed the job of removing the debt which has been termed a legacy of the past. After the 1937 recapitalization act and by the time 1952 rolled around, the capital liabilities of the CNR had increased from approximately $1.2 billion to approximately $2.2 billion, which is more than it was prior to its first recapitalization.

The revision of 1952 converted $736 million of debt into 4 per cent non-cumulative preferred stock of the same value. This had the effect of reducing CN's fixed charges by about $23 million, from $47 million to $24 million. As I said earlier, this was heralded with great anticipation and expectation. The late Donald Gordon, the former president of the CNR who was in command at that time, addressing CN's interdepartmental education association, had this to say in Toronto, and I quote:

> This will clean the windows of our financial house. Once the legacy of excessive debt has been lifted from our shoulders, we will be judged entirely on our merits, and it will be a challenge to everyone in the organization to show what we can do.

Then in the transportation committee he said the following:

If we should get this bill through, then all the hocus pocus, if I may use the term, in respect of bookkeeping entries, will be wound up, and from then on the Canadian National System will have a chance to be judged on its record, and on a basis which will be appropriate and reasonable in respect to what might be expected of it.

The Montreal Star attributed the following quotation to the late Mr. Gordon:

I would like to record, even now, my complete confidence that our proposal deals with the last possibility of any further revision of this nature and that it is aimed at a final clearance of the effects of what has been called the legacy of the past. I am confident that, given this final clearance, the Canadian National will be able to demonstrate that it is an efficient and well run organization.

There are many similarities between those glowing words, those we heard at the presentation of this bill and the remarks which have been made by officers of the CNR. If there is any apprehension or suspicion that this may recur, it is certainly in the minds of hon. members on this side of the House.

The 1952 revision act went beyond the debt aspect of CN's financial structure by providing the railway with a new source of funds. It provided that CN would increase its equity annually to the tune of 3 per cent of the gross annual revenues of the national system. It also provided for an interest waiver on some $100 million for a period of ten years.

As for the $736 million equity fund provided for in the act, in no single year has the full 4 per cent dividend been paid to the government. As a matter of fact, in only three years during that period did the government receive a dividend, and the highest amount which was received was something in the order of 3.1 per cent. It should also be noted that as a result of the 1952 recapitalization act CN had the advantage of enjoying the use of cost-free capital which amounted to $1.504 billion by 1976.

Having said all that, it is very difficult for us to draw any other conclusion than that the result of the first and second recapitalization acts has been to unleash to CN the opportunity to go on a capital spending binge of enormous proportions. It is quite interesting to note that CN's capital expenditure policies have been extravagant, to say the least. From 1952 to the end of 1976 CN spent $4.8 billion, equal to 80 per cent of its total property investment at the end of 1976, on improvements, additions and replacements of its properties. About $2.8 billion of this was provided by depreciation and salvage, and $768 million came from government purchases of preferred stock, leaving over $1 billion to be financed by borrowing.

Of the increase by this amount in CN's long-term debt we are now proposing here under this bill to cancel some $808 million, or roughly two-thirds. This can be interpreted only as an admission that the capital expenditures represented by that amount are unable to pay their way and were therefore not justifiable economically. What is more important is that this has very serious implications for every privately owned firm which competes with the transportation undertaking or any other undertaking of CNR, because CN is once again able to enjoy the benefits of spending money without bearing the burden of its cost. One more time CN's competitors are finding the terms of competition radically altered, to their disadvantage, as a result of CN's having expanded and having improved its operations through capital spending on which no return need ever be earned.

So one can only conclude that, given this record of performance and given the realities of what we are seeing, CN has been grossly mismanaged. When I say that I do not cast a reflection upon the current management. I think the current management is very eagerly and desperately trying to turn things around; but the management and the record of performance of CN from a financial management point of view over the years is less than satisfactory. I must say that CN is not unlike many other Crown corporations which have been subjected to parliamentary scrutiny, when parliament has been given the chance to scrutinize.

It should be noted, with respect to debt-equity, that in 1952 when the recapitalization bill was passed CN had a debt-equity ratio of about 32 per cent or 33 per cent, compared with CP, which had a debt-equity ratio in the same vicinity. One must seriously question how CP could show a profit every year, pay a dividend and take advantage of its rightful depreciation while CN went merrily along accumulating more and more debt. I say that even though I understand that CP pays rather extraordinary salaries to its senior officials, which is a subject of some controversy and a matter of highly guarded secrecy. I am not sure whether CP pays its chief executive officer, Mr. Sinclair, for his services by the pound or by the amount of brains he has, but he is probably getting more than he is worth regardless of what formula is used. I say that particularly in view of some of his preposterous reasons for failing to disclose the salaries of CP officials to the securities exchange commission. It seems to me only logical that we should propose the same legislation which is in existence in the United States. Under U.S. law all companies which do business or arrange financing must reveal their executives' or directors' salaries when those salaries are above $40,000.

I want to reiterate that we are concerned that there are not sufficient safeguards and guidelines in this legislation to prevent a repeat performance of that which has gone before us. Since in no one year did CN meet its obligation to pay a 4 per cent dividend to the government on its non-cumulative preferred shares, what is so different about this particular legislation under which CN is obliged to provide the payment of 20 per cent of its net earnings to the government under clause 10? Unless there are clearly defined objectives and responsibilities for management to meet clearly spelled out in the legislation, unless the consequences of failing to carry out those responsibilities are clearly defined, unpleasant as they might be, and unless appropriate safeguards are inserted for meeting that purpose and ensuring that there is absolute accountability to this House, I submit that we can conclude that there is nothing to prevent a repetition of CN's past performance.

Clearly this legislation must have some teeth to guarantee that parliament will not be called upon to continue the pattern of covering future deficits without taking management to task. We must call upon management to produce and to be answerable for their actions. In other words, they must produce or face the consequences. There should be no further excuses. We are now in a situation where we must assess the cost of providing transportation. Under this policy, the government is prepared to pay for the provision of transportation services which may not be economic but which are in the best public interest. We are in the process of looking at the Crowsnest pass freight rates and I think there is general agreement that the railways will have to be given a compensatory rate. Whether that will come out of the public treasury or out of the pockets of the farmers, or both, we know the railways will obtain redress in that area so there is no reason why subsidization should be required. Any cross-subsidization will be minimized by the policies of the government.

The CNR clearly has the type of economic environment which should provide service effectively, efficiently and at a profit. The corporation must be held accountable too and must be answerable to parliament through the House and the committee. To these ends we will be advancing the necessary amendments in committee.

We will allow the bill to go to committee with the understanding that witnesses will be called and in the anticipation of the government being receptive to logical, well reasoned amendments. We will be particularly interested in knowing how the current management will demonstrate that this measure will impose stronger management disciplines and how it proposes to manage effectively, efficiently and responsibly. We will want a clear projection of the future plans for the corporation in terms of growth in order to meet the important challenges in the field of transportation in the 1980s.

We will want, as well, a realistic five-year projection based on the current structure vis-à-vis the modified structure under this bill in order to prove that there are advantages to the government and the corporation. The committee should be able to see clearly the total implications of the bill.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we will demand answers from CN management and from the minister in charge on how CN will fulfil its mandate efficiently, effectively and profitably in the interests of all Canadians, particularly those Canadians it serves.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the little the minister had to say on this bill and to what my good friend the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) had to say. I must disagree with some of his conclusions arrived at from what I consider to be incorrect premises.

Canadian National Railways started off with the deck stacked against it. For the benefit of my colleague from Vegreville, if no one else in this House, I do not think it will hurt to go over a little bit of history. The hon. member and the minister as well as others over the years have talked about the unprofitability of CN. They conveniently forgot to mention that in most years, particularly those since World War II, the

CN has shown an operating profit. When it came to paying interest on the debt, however, it consumed all the operating profit, plus $5 million or $6 million in any good year that parliament had to vote.

When any company, whether privately or publicly owned, starts out with a debt that it can never pay off, even if it lasts for a thousand years, which debt was not acquired as a result of operating the company, then it is doomed to failure. A private company would declare bankruptcy and fold up, but in the case of a public company like the CN parliament and the people of Canada pick up the tab. Of course, parliament and the people of Canada have done that with some private companies as well—for instance, the CPR and some others.

Given that sound economic and private enterprise business premise, I am surprised that any fair-minded private enterpriser would condemn a corporation, public or private, that is required to pay off debts which have nothing to do with its operation or how efficiently it is managed but which accrued as a result of bailing out bankrupt private companies.

The minister is not here this evening, Mr. Speaker, and one is almost tempted to call a vote in order to adjourn the debate until a time when he can be around. On a bill as important as this one would think the minister could schedule his activities so that he could be present in the House. In order to educate his parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Vegreville, I would remind the House that this all started in 1850. The Intercolonial Railway was not built as a commercial proposition, but to serve the political and economic needs of the country. Its construction was one of the conditions of confederation.

Then there was the National Transcontinental Railway. The government of the day claimed that all of the most important reasons for building it as a government railway and retaining control were that it could be used as a common outlet for both eastern and western railways. The National Transcontinental Railway was financed by government funds and the Grand Trunk Railway approved the specifications. That railroad, built with the taxpayers' money, was operated by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. It was a private enterprise operation without rental for a period of seven years and paid 3 per cent on the cost for the next 43 years. The cost of construction exceeded by a considerable amount the original estimates. We have been through that in this country before. The Grand Trunk found itself in financial difficulties and, in 1913, the National Transcontinental Railway was placed under the management of the Intercolonial Railway.

The Grand Trunk Railway itself was incorporated by an act of parliament in 1852. The expression "Grand Trunk", used in the 1850s, signified a line running from east to west in Canada, which in those days comprised the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, connecting the Atlantic ports of Montreal in the summer and Portland, Maine, in the winter with midwestern United States railways. In 1923 the Grand Trunk was amalgamated with the Canadian National. By that time the Grand Trunk had been merged into the 125 companies which originally had separate corporate identities.

The financial success of the privately owned Grand Trunk Pacific Railway depended upon rapid development of the west. It was inhibited by some business recessions in 1912 and again during the first world war. The Grand Trunk Pacific found itself in financial difficulties and had to turn to the government for further aid. These are private companies, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian government refused to provide any further financial assistance; they had already provided them with quite a bit, and in order to maintain operation of that company the government took it over as receiver in 1919.

The Canadian Northern Railway began with a few small enterprises in western Canada and grew into the third largest railway in the nation. At the time it was taken over by the Canadian government it had a complete system from Montreal to Vancouver with numerous branch lines. In 1918 financial difficulties again forced the Canadian government to take over the operations of a formerly prosperous private railway company.

In 1914 both the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern were in financial difficulties. They were granted loans by the dominion government which enabled them to carry on the necessary work on their line and continue in operation.

In 1916 further loans were requested. It became apparent to the government of the day that it was necessary to take stock of the situation and define policies for the future. They were faced with alternatives: to withhold further aid and let them go belly up; take them over and operate them as government properties; or continue with temporary assistance. They opted for continuing with temporary assistance.

By 1923 the government of that day took over all of those railroads and amalgamated them into the Canadan National Railways. All but one were privately owned. When Canadian National was set up they took over all the bonded indebtedness of those railroads. The taxpayers of Canada have been paying and paying ever since. On the successive refinancing occasions to which the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) referred, we paid off some more. I thought it was a tenet and a truism for private enterprise that if you invest in something, you take your chance. If it makes a buck, you make a buck; if it loses and goes broke, you lose. But in this instance all the private enterprise investors, the ones who were going to operate in the marketplace, have been paid. I do not hear my friend the hon. member for Vegreville or anyone else complaining about the poor management and inefficiency of these railroad companies that the Government of Canada had no choice in 1923 but to take over.

It is useless having a private enterprise government trying to run a Crown corporation. In the first place, they do not believe in it. Secondly, they do it as a last resort, a last desperate, frantic effort to bail out their private enterprise friends who got themselves into trouble.

In a country such as Canada with a large land mass, a cold climate and a thinly scattered population, there is not a single transportation system in our entire history that has ever made a profit without substantial public assistance from the taxpayers. My hon. friend from Vegreville mentioned the profitability of the CPR. I wish he would return to his office and turn up the financial reports for the CPR for the period 1960 to 1969. He will find in every year except two that had it not been for the subsidies received from the taxpayers of Canada, Canadian Pacific Railway would have been in a deficit position. I get sick and tired of the Canadian Pacific being held up as some kind of god of private enterprise, profitability and efficient operations, because without financial input from the public of Canada the CPR would have shown a loss eight out of ten during the 1960s.

We in the New Democratic Party agree with the principle of refinancing the Canadian National Railways system, but we highly suspect the motives behind it. If it is such a good idea now, why was it not an excellent idea 10, 20, 30 or 40 years ago? The refinancing that was done in previous years, the last being 1952-53, was not only an exercise in futility, it was just trimming off the edges of some of the tougher parts of the CNR's indebtedness.

In a situation like this you cannot be half pregnant. There is no such thing. You either own everything or else you get out of the operation. If we had been straightforward in the past and were straightforward now, the people of Canada would own all of Canadian National. The people of Canada are the sole and total shareholders of Canadian National.

An amount of $808 million debt is being transferred. This is because of depreciation not taken in previous years. Why I will never know, because all private enterprise firms are allowed to claim depreciation. Of course, they get tax benefits. Another $1,500 million is being taken out of 4 per cent preferred stock and transferred to no par value common stock. So we are looking at $2.3 billion of CN indebtedness transferred into the common equity of the people of Canada.

I agree with that, but we are only doing half the job. I ask this question, and I certainly will ask it in committee: "Why do we not do the whole job?" There is $271 million of long term debt in Government of Canada loans which falls due between now and I believe 1983; I am subject to correction on that date. There is another $991 million in loans under the 1955 refunding act that is due this year. Why is not that amount of money being transferred into common no par value stock held by the people of Canada through their national government so we can relieve Canadian National and put them into a net equity ratio, even better than Canadian Pacific or any other private company? After all it is our company. It belongs to the people of Canada. They have paid for it and repaid for it time and time again all the way back to 1850. The mythology of private enterprise and transportation in this country, which is still perpetuated and promulgated by my colleagues in the free enterprise parties, has been disproven time and time again, not only in Canada but in every other industrialized nation in the world.

When are we in Canada, with our kind of climate, going to face the reality that there is no such thing as a transportation company in any mode, be it trucks, buses, rail or air, that can operate on its own, provide its own infrastructure and facilities, provide service to the public in the area it serves, and still make a profit? It has never happened and it never will happen. In countries with a much smaller land mass than ours but much greater population, transportation companies are subsidized by the public. However, they are publicly owned and controlled. Not so in Canada and the United States.

While we support the principle of the refinancing of Canadian National's debt, we are terrified about the motive behind that refinancing. In January of last year the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) sent a letter, which was nothing more than a letter of instruction, to the chairman of the board of directors of Canadian National. He said such things as:

Although it has generally been conceded that the railways should operate on a commercial basis—

I do not know where he got that general consensus.

—in fact the impression has persisted that Canadian National should be used as an instrument of public policy even if at the expense of its commercial performance—

That is perfectly true. The minister is admitting that since Canadian National was set up, every year it has operated the government of Canada has been misleading the people. The minister says it is just an impression that has persisted. I assure him that when I was a child it was not an impression on the prairies. We believed that both the public and private railway systems were there to provide a service and that their objective was not a commercial operation. Their objective was to provide a public utility, something we can all use. In the minister's letter the truth comes out. He went on to say:

—it is the view of the government that Canadian National should make every attempt to conduct its affairs with a commercial attitude and in a commercial manner.

In plain language, that means a reduction in service, a reduction of thousands of employees. And how many bucks are in it for CN? In that letter the minister encouraged the board of directors to make Canadian National profitable and therefore more attractive to the private sector.

We in the New Democratic Party are in something of a catch 22 situation. We agree with the principle of refinancing and the recapitalizing of the CN debt. In fact, it is my opinion that this bill does not go nearly far enough. At least another $2 billion should be transferred into equity and shares owned by the people of Canada. If that were accepted and passed by parliament, it would make Canadian National very attractive to the private investor.

Canadian National have already established six or seven profit centres, such as CN Marine, CN Hotels, CN Express and CN Rail. They have regionalized each operation. They are supposed to be semi-autonomous. In doing that, they made commercial viability and profitability the priority. As a result, there has been reduced service and thousands of layoffs. Those who do not live in the large profitable metropolitan areas must either sink or swim.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Most Canadians, regardless of their political belief, believe that this is the kind of enterprise in which competition and profitability have no place. Many areas of enterprise should remain in the hands of the private entrepreneur. However, in the case of transportation, it is only logical, sensible and civilized that it be publicly owned and controlled.

When operating a transportation company in Canada, there are areas which are very profitable because of the density of population and the volume of traffic moved, with or without competition. The only way to provide reasonable service to the other parts of the country is to take the profit from those areas and cross-subsidize services in those parts of the country that are not profitable.

This nineteenth century free enterprise mythology which is still perpetuated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and echoed by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has been proven a disaster so many times that I question their intelligence as so-called free enterprisers and sound businessmen. If they were operating their own businesses in that manner, they would be appealing to parliament to bail them out the same way we bailed out the shareholders of the railroads from 1850 to 1923.

Why do we just play around, going only half way? The long term debt of Canadian National should be transferred into equity, common shares in the name of the people of Canada I agree with the hon. member for Vegreville that Canadian National should be fully accountable. It should be part of the statute that their annual report must not only be tabled in the House of Commons, but that CN officials must appear before the appropriate standing committee of parliament. That should apply to every Crown corporation.

Private corporations in the public service sector should be accountable to parliament. You can bet your bottom dollar the shareholders of Canadian Pacific are not given a full accounting at their annual meeting. They operate as a law unto themselves. That enterprise is of a public service nature. They withhold much of the detail of their operations and management from their shareholders.

Having spent a few years in that operation, I still think of the horror of some of their activities. The shareholders never knew about them. Therefore, Canadian Pacific should also be accountable. The same is true of any other privately owned enterprise that provides a public service. That includes utilities as well as transportation.

These bookkeeping entries of $808 million for depreciation and $1.5 billion for the transfer of stock from 4 per cent preferred to no par value common is all on paper. No money will change hands. The essential motive behind this bill is to make Canadian National more attractive for private investment. The minister, the president of the company and some of its officers have stated that in this way it can move to the private sector. This means two things will happen. The profitable areas in the dense high traffic regions will be sold to private enterprise. Those fellows will make a sound business investment and get a good return on it. What about the rest of the country where it is not profitable to service the public by rail or any other method? They will have to make their own way or be left in the lurch.

The hon. member for Vegreville talked about subsidization. You increase the amount of direct public subsidy every time you move a larger part of your transportation system into private enterprise. No matter which or how many of us are sitting here in years to come, the public will demand, and this parliament will have to provide, hundreds of millions of dollars in direct subsidies for transportation. That is an economic reality, whether those systems are publicly or privately owned.

To suggest, now, that we could cut off six or seven profit sectors in Canadian National and sell them off means that a few private investors will rake in the profits while the taxpayers get stuck with all the operations that fail to make money. Surely it is a civilized thing, as well as good business practice, to use money from the profitable sectors to pay for the sectors which lose money. Sometimes this cross-subsidization will be insufficient. Periodically there will be a need for additional public subsidies. That is the reality in Canada. That is part of the price of national unity. That is why confederation was agreed upon in the first place—to attain some measure of equity in transportation costs.

Both the privately-owned Canadian Pacific and the publicly-owned Canadian National have been deserting Canadians by the thousand—on the prairies, in the far north, in the eastern provinces, on the coast of British Columbia, in northern British Columbia. Why? Because they cannot make a buck there. Tough cookie, Mr. Speaker. Surely this proves that private enterprise has no damned business in transportation. This is what got us into trouble in the first place. Take the western European countries which have private enterprise governments. They think we are nuts having private enterprise transport systems. Theirs are publicly-owned and are subsidized as required.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is worried about the Canadian people knowing how much the railways are costing us. Hells bells, every year when we got the estimates and the company reports we knew how much it was costing us. The minister suggested that in the case of the statutory grain rates maybe the farmer should receive the benefit of those rates in some other way. He "conned" the Atlantic premiers into forgetting about the Maritime Freight Rates Compensation Act. The premiers did not realize when dealing with the Minister of Transport that they should keep their backs to the wall and their guns loose in their holsters. They were "had". Transportation is a field in which we all share the costs through fares, rates and subsidies. If the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) really wants to do something about national unity, he will refuse to agree to this sell-off which is contemplated, the so-called privatization of Canadian National. His party will refuse to agree to it.

If the government really wanted to do something for national unity, if it really wished to end the feeling of alienation in various parts of the country, it would change its mind. Transportation is one of the key elements in national unity. Let ministers opposite say to the people of Canada just once, without equivocation, that, for example, in the case of the statutory grain rates, the amount paid by the grain producers is a sufficient amount and that the cost of putting grain into export position should be borne by the nation as a whole, so that we can compete with Argentina, the United States and Australia whose grain is much closer to the seaports. That is the basic reason for the statutory grain rates.

I trust I did not hear the hon. member for Vegreville suggest tonight that he and his colleagues would agree to the total cost of grain transport being borne by the grain producers and then, somehow or other, a little subsidy cheque would be sent out to each farmer. Mr. Speaker, that would be taking us back to the old days of Jimmy Gardiner when he could send every farmer a cheque around election time. I hope I did not misunderstand the hon. member for Vegreville, the spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You would have difficulty understanding him.

Mr. Benjamin: Any deficit the railways incur through moving grain should be paid to them directly by the people of Canada through parliament. Canadian grain producers can then remain in competition with the other countries of the world which produce grain. The same applies to the Atlantic provinces. If they are to get their manufactured or primary products into central Canada where the market is to be found, then transportation cost ought surely to be a neutral factor in the business process. If you privatize Canadian National you will not be able to fault management for closing down services in small cities and towns, let alone in small cities and hamlets. You cannot blame the company if the only equipment they buy is the kind that serves big customers and makes the bucks.

I would point out that in most years Canadian National showed an operating profit. The reality is that, whether the railways were privately or publicly owned, when they were built is immaterial. They could not have been built by private investment alone and they would not have been built in the absence of public investment by way of cash, loans at low interest or interest-free, land grant, mineral rights and so on. Once started they got into trouble almost immediately trying to run a private enterprise operation in a geographic and economic situation completely unacceptable to any sensible businessman.

It is no different from trying to run a power line or telephone line into a rural area containing only scattered farm houses and hamlets. You would lose your shirt. Public investment is a necessity because you are dealing with a public utility which everyone in the country uses.

I would be just as happy voting against this bill as voting for it. I do not want to reject the principle of refinancing Canadian National, but the reason for bringing in the bill at the present time is to privatize the company in the same way as Air Canada and other agencies. It is convenient for private enterprises to forget that when the railway companies could not make a buck, when they would not move in and do the job, the people of Canada did it. Now that parts of the operation have become profitable, the minister is saying: It is time to privatize the CN.

As for the private enterprisers who tried to get into the railway business, we bought them off. We made sure they did not go bankrupt. We made sure they got a return on their investment. It has taken us since 1850, and particularly since 1923, to do so. Now, I'll be damned if the Minister of Transport with the support of the hon. member for Vegreville does not want to go through the whole process again. Much of the indebtedness on the CN books is still carried over, financed and refinanced, from the original indebtedness of those private enterprise railroads. And now that we have paid and paid and paid again, we own the system. I wish we had more control over it. Now the minister wants to sell it off. Mr. Speaker, after all these years of paying and struggling and arguing, now is not the time to instruct the board of directors of the CN to make the operations of the CN purely commercial.

In my province of Saskatchewan, CN and CP have deserted hundreds of towns and villages so far as the provision of rail or truck services is concerned, regardless of their public responsibility and the commitments they made in the past. First they promised us better service if we would let them take off the trains and close the stations. They were going to give us better service with trucks. Then they moved all their truck agencies to only two or three locations in the province. Now they want to take away their trucks too.

We have gone through the business of making them profitable and commercial, and this has harmed Canadians. It had discriminated against Canadians because of where they happen to live. It has discriminated against small and big businessmen just because of the location of their processing plants. You cannot run a transportation system in a country like Canada on a private enterprise basis. It is the dumbest thing you can do. Ask any of your private enterprise friends and they will agree. Talk, for instance, to people in West Germany. The head of the biggest private enterprise you can find in that country would say it would be stupid. It would make even less sense to try it here.

The paper work we are doing in juggling the books for the recapitalization of CN is only on paper. We should add another $1.5 billion.

Mr. Mazankowski: What's a billion?

Mr. Benjamin: The bill does not go far enough. The total ownership is in the hands of the people of Canada and no place else. The mandate of CNR is to provide the best, most efficient and frequent service they can provide in every part of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: If it becomes private, it will not be able to do that. No private company can do that and survive. If you keep it publicly owned, as it is now, with an instruction from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and a government policy which says it must be commercially viable and profitable, then you will be preventing a publicly owned enterprise from providing a decent service to people in every part of Canada. I say that you can equate efficiency and good management with good service—and I have not heard the word "service" mentioned here tonight. Surely when an enterprise fulfils the role of a public utility, service has to be the number one priority. There will be times when the operation will lose money, but if it is providing an equitable, decent and fair service to every part of the country, then the money is well spent.

This is called co-operative federalism; it is called aiding national unity. All the people in Canada share the cost; we all treat one another the same. Surely that is the raison d'être of a publicly owned rail transportation system. At that point it has nothing to do with whether it is a private enterprise or a Crown corporation. Its purpose is to provide a rail transportation service to all parts of Canada. The bill before us lessens that equity across the country and, I submit, it does great harm to national unity.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join the debate with some surprise that there was no contribution from our friends a little farther down to the left. However, notwithstanding that, I feel obliged this evening to pick up the threads of the debate opened up by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), as well as comment on one or two points made by the previous speaker, the distinguished railroader from Saskatchewan. A little later I will deal with something a little more parochial than the national unity issue, namely CN's attitude to the freight rate structure. Then, in winding up my few remarks, I will put a very serious question to whomever on the government side will be taking part in the debate next, and it will have to do with the quid pro quo that the government has been able to get from Dr. Bandeen and CNR with respect to the largesse with which we are dealing now.

The observations and comments of the hon. member for Vegreville had to do with our skepticism about the position taken by CNR with respect to this bill. It is quite easy to accept on the surface the argument of Dr. Bandeen and others in CN that if we give them one more chance, if we let them operate under more modern methods of applying depreciation and accounting procedures and practices, they will do better. As the hon. member for Vegreville has pointed out, and as others who follow me will point out, again and again I hope, the argument is somewhat shallow and is perhaps not quite what this parliament or the people of Canada deserve.

I suppose that the position of CNR should be debated here in a general way. It will be discussed in great depth in committee. In any event, for a more general purpose it might be well to reiterate some of the points made by the hon. member for Vegreville and to emphasize one or two others. Any review of the CN's financial history since 1940—that is a 35 to 40 year period—would quite readily lay a primary colour against which this application to parliament and to the people of Canada for relief of $808 million can be clearly portrayed. In the years 1942 to 1951, for example, it can be reasonably estimated that if CNR had accrued depreciation on all its structures, which is part of the point made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville, it would have had approximately $110 million to $115 million more available for capital expenditures. Consequently, it would not have had to borrow the $110 million for capital expansion. However, the Capital Revision Act of 1952 in fact eliminated all the interest charge. As indicated, it wiped out all of the interest charge in respect of the government's participation.

Of the total government debt held, some $857 million, $736 million was converted to preferred stock, $100 million was converted to interest-free debentures, leaving a balance of $21 million. This has already been pointed out but it must be repeated. It is a reasonable assumption that the government held the debt of the CN. If the government had held the debt at the much lower rate in 1951-52 because of the depreciation accrual on structures, the amount of preferred stock would have been smaller; but it is difficult to see how higher depreciation accruals prior to that particular Capital Revision Act of 1952 could have had any effect on the present level of interest charges of CN.

We continue to be concerned about this because during the four-year period from 1952 to the 1955-56 year the depreciation on structures in Canada would have made available approximately $42 million to the CN for capital expenditures or whatever other purpose it might have had in mind.

My colleague has pointed out that this seems to approximate the amount by which the funded debt of the CN is higher because of the depreciation practices it has followed in comparison with that followed by the CP. I think this is apparent if you take 8 per cent, which represents the additional interest charges over that particular period of time, on something under $4 million during the year. At the very best the argument regarding insufficient depreciation having caused this situation is unacceptable and has to be viewed with some skepticism. The amount this would account for to this point in time would only be minor in terms of writing off debt, nowhere near the $808 million we are confronted with in this particular bill.

One could go on with these examples, and probably there are a dozen arguments that might occur to us, but all of them lead us to the shallowness of CN management and the government in their attempt to indicate to the people of Canada that in fact this $800 million is simply a paper transfer which in any event does not mean anything. I almost used the word "spurious" to describe that attempt by management and the government. What it amounts to is CN management suggesting that we should get out from under these old unworkable accounting practices. There is no suggestion they were unethical, but simply old fashioned practices which do not keep the system in line with the situation in the late 1970s and 1980s. Management is suggesting we should get the debt equity ratio in line with that of the Canadian Pacific. I do not know what is so magical about CP, but they keep referring to it. All of this just does not hold much water as far as I am concerned when viewed in conjunction with past practice. We have had three capital revision debt relief measures in respect of the CNR, all of them occurring very nearly within my lifetime; none has worked.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) made a very valid point. He asked what there is in this measure that will give us some assurance that when we write off the $808 million—and that is not a mundane matter—this parliament or a parliament ten or 15 years down the road will not be back here doing exactly the same thing. It is that question to which this House tonight and the committee within the next few days must address themselves. Hon. members must address themselves to this question in a way which I hope will reflect the type of assurance desired by the Canadian people. I hope there is some assurance that we will not be coming back to this chamber literally month in and month out, year in and year out, looking for debt relief of this magnitude on structures within our social and economic system.

This government is proud of the fact it has written off Air Canada's debt, the debt associated with the St. Lawrence Seaway and now Canadian National's debt. Please do not tell me that the writing off of the St. Lawrence Seaway debt cost the people of Canada nothing. Let us consider what it did to the ports of Halifax and Saint John. Who paid for this debt? I suggest the people of Atlantic Canada did.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Forrestall: It is true.

An hon. Member: What about the expansion?

Mr. Forrestall: What expansion is that? I will mention the 115 per cent increase in freight rates on containers out of the port of Halifax since 1969 with another 6 per cent coming up in two or three months. The Council of Maritime Premiers and a premier of the province of Nova Scotia thought they knew the answers to everything, but they howled and cried when the CN said it wanted an increase in rates. Management finally said that they had made a lot of noise and would only put in the 4 per cent increase on January 1, instead of the 9 per cent. Do you realize what they intend to do on June 1? They will not just put on the other 5 per cent increase but will pick up what they have calculated they lost between those dates by not having the additional 5 per cent. The people of Atlantic Canada will not be paying the 9 per cent increase in 1978; they will be paying in reality something much closer to 10.5 per cent in additional freight rate charges. Do not talk to me about expansion and the grandeur of everything the CN has done for us.

Let us talk a little bit about the port of Halifax.

An hon. Member: Why don't you just mention the benefits you got through DREE?

Mr. Forrestall: What benefits?

An hon. Member: The expansion to the ports.

Mr. Forrestall: You are talking about the benefits received from DREE which has an 80 per cent leakage. The CNR is bad enough, but DREE is far worse. You gave us $100 million and within 60 days $80 million was back in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Is that what you call expansion? You tell me why DREE is a failure.

We hear a lot of talk about Canadian unity and those things that constitute that unity. I wonder if the members on the other side are really aware of what is contained in this bill before us? I wonder how many of them have ever bothered to read the bill or consider any of its history?

I want to talk about the bill before us and point out some of the "great things" that have been done for Atlantic Canada by this do-nothing government, and I will do so in the context of the Canadian National so that I will be properly in order. We over here want to know what return the Canadian National is offering Canadians. It will have to be better than what the CNR has been offering in recent years.

This evening I do not want to become involved in a purely provincial or parochial debate on this matter of CN re-financing, but I must suggest that the attitude of the CN to Atlantic Canada typifies the shallowness of the argument put foward to justify this request for re-financing. Let us consider some of the facts. There is not much question about the fact that the metropolitan area of Halifax-Dartmouth is one of the most important industrial centres in Atlantic Canada. It has to be one of the key centres, and is probably one of the most influential and important. It is acknowledged that the port itself is the key to the importance of the industrial area. It plays a significant role and is the main economic element in the development of our Atlantic economy.

In connection with that port, our sole railway to the market of central Canada is Canadian National. In the past the CNR has played a very active and positive role toward development in Atlantic Canada. Not only did the railway live up to its responsibilities, but it was able to benefit from its monopolistic position. As a matter of fact, perhaps we would have been better off to continue the concepts and the policies under which Intercolonial operated. Then we would have had an industrial corridor stretching from the marketplace in the heartland of Ontario and Quebec all the way to Halifax. I see the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) is shaking his head. He does not want our industrial processing and producing capacity to be in a position to compete in the Canadian marketplace. In fact, we cannot compete in our own economy because our marketplace is too small. We cannot compete in the central Canadian marketplace as a result of the policies of the government.

In the past the CNR has played a very important and effective role in the development of the maritime economy. However, lately there seems to have been a drastic change in its attitude toward the Halifax-Dartmouth port. It is not an overstatement to say that this change in attitude is causing enormous uncertainty in the minds of the traditional users of that port. I am sure the same thing could be said with respect to the port of Saint John, except for the influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The reason for this uncertainty is the steady and seemingly unending series of rate increases dating back to 1969. Since that year there has been an average of more than one rate increase per year. In percentage terms, it is something in the vicinity of a 115 per cent increase.

The psychological effect of this on shippers and the users of the port has been nothing short of intimidating. Indeed, business has been lost. Above and beyond that, any further rate increases may very well have a disastrous effect on the capacity of the port of Halifax-Dartmouth to continue to serve as an interface of intermodal transportation into central Canada. The point has been reached now where Halifax is only a hair's breadth away from losing its competitive advantage over the port of New York in terms of moving containers into Montreal, Toronto and points west, including the mid-west of the United States. The advantage which has been enjoyed is gone because of continued harassment of our users and customers by freight rate increases. The 20-foot container business is seriously threatened, and we are virtually out of the 40-foot container business. We still have a little toehold in the 20-foot container business, but it is in serious jeopardy.

With respect to this situation, brought about solely by our captive position to the CNR, I should like to point out to hon. members that if business is lost, it will not show up in any other Canadian port. It will be lost to the United States. It will be lost to the port of New York, the port of Boston, as well as other ports. That business will be lost to the ports of the United States and will not be rerouted to the central Canadian or river ports.

We are at the will of Canadian National. A few years ago I argued strongly against the CNR investing in cast steamships. It seemed unnatural to me for Canadian taxpayers to invest their money in shipping operations which were owned offshore. The president of the CNR, Dr. Bandeen, will indicate that it was a viable investment, that Canadian National received a good return on its money. If one examines the background of cast, one will find out that Canadian National was trying to tie up the entire container business, which would remove competition. The notion of a Crown corporation engaging in this type of practice is somewhat repugnant to me in light of the history of Canadian National and the role it has played in the development of the Atlantic economy.

The CNR has come forward requesting assistance. There is nothing in this bill to assure that the CNR will not return in 15, 20 or 25 years seeking further relief. On the other hand, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) said that he accepted the position of Canadian National. I want to find out something about the quid pro quo. If the Minister of Transport is correct in believing that this bill will resolve the problems of Canadian National and will put it in a position where it can properly expand its plant, buildings and equipment, then I ask the minister what he has received from Dr. Bandeen in exchange for that.

We would be interested in receiving answers to questions regarding the entire situation with respect to road beds and grades over which Canadian National runs its stock. What will be done to upgrade the roadbeds and grades? What will be done about the bottlenecks which cause congestion in the lower mainland of British Columbia? What will be done about electrification? Canadian National Railways will have all kinds of capital for investment. What undertaking has the Minister of Transport received from the CNR in these areas? What will be done about rail and ferry passenger service in Atlantic Canada? Essentially there are five systems. The Minister of Transport has indicated that four of those systems will be abandoned, and yet the CNR comes forward and requests $808 million in debt relief. What will be done about the ferry system of Atlantic Canada? The Minister of Transport is talking out of both sides of his mouth. The other day he told me in the House that his departmental officials had not gone to Europe to find new construction for a ferry to replace the one in use; they had gone to Europe attempting to find one to lease. Balderdash and hogwash! They are over there looking for someone to construct a ferry at a time when our Canadian shipyards are underutilized and when there is an excess capacity which should be used! Of course a ferry cannot be built in a year, but if they do not order it this year, they will not have it for four years. They will still be going offshore to look. They know what the requirements will be well into the 1980s, but they have not canvassed Canadian shipyards where there is a capacity and a willingness to build.

What is Canadian National going to do with all this capital? What is the government going to do about rate increase for containers out of Halifax to central Canada? People in Atlantic Canada are very bitter when they see thousands of millions being poured into the central economy. We are criticized because we have to transfer the natural wealth of the richer provinces to Atlantic Canada. The government says it believes in equalization but, as I mentioned earlier, within 30 or 60 days a large percentage of every $1 million sent to us is back in Quebec. That is by design. Hon. members can ask the drafters of the original DREE policy. They were instructed to write it that way. They play games. Will $808 million not cost anybody anything?

Whatever happened to the "at and east" rates? That government proposal would have cost thousands of jobs at the lakehead, on farm lands and in Atlantic Canada. Processors, millers and shippers would have been affected.

Mr. Benjamin: The Atlantic premiers agreed with it.

Mr. Forrestall: Well, they were sucked in by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). We are concerned. We want solutions to these problems.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) says we are quite prepared to let this bill go to the committee. I do not think it should until every member on this side of the House has expressed his concern to the minister about the absence of any meaningful assurance that this new accounting system is going to work and an acknowledgement that, if in fact it does work, the funding available for capital expansion and improvement will be spent on road bed improvement, grade improvement, bottleneck problems in the lower mainland of B.C., the coal resources in the northern region of Alberta, and rail access to the port at Prince Rupert.

One is hard pressed to go more than 200 or 300 miles without finding a major requirement for capital expansion in the system and facilities of CN. There are signalling and switching requirements, control of box cars is needed and new rolling stock and reefer cars are needed. Cars are needed to move shakes, potatoes and fish. We need a new dock warehouse facility at the port of Saint John. What assurances did the Minister of Transport get out of Dr. Bandeen and Canadian National with respect to these requirements? Where are those assurances, and when are we going to hear about them? This is a form of contempt, disregard and arrogance on the part of a government which has been in power so long that it does not know the difference and does not care.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: That hon. member will be put on the bench shortly. Perhaps he will go to the Senate or somewhere else; either that or we will build a tunnel so that we can visit him.

I hope hon. members on all sides of the House will raise matters regarding the assurances of which I spoke. There is a need, and I hope hon. members will point out clearly alternative policies to be followed. I hope hon. members will extract from the government what CN will do with the capital which is going to be available. I hope we can get from the minister or some other hon. member opposite an assurance with respect to our shipyards. Unless these things are done, skepticism and cynicism will continue with respect to CN and its role in the development of the national economy. We believe that transportation is a tool of economic development. We believe it is a useful, meaningful and needed tool in the development of the economies of regions of disparity. Without that tool Atlantic Canada and the north will not survive.

A change of attitude on the part of Canadian National is needed, and I hope that this $808 million will go a long way toward improving the attitude of CN toward this chamber, the regions of this country which rely totally and completely on transportation and toward the people of this country whose economic well being depends so much upon the capacity of CN to service, in an efficient and economic way, not only the financial requirements of this country but also the hopes and aspirations of the people who live in it.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak in this hallowed chamber on the subject of the CNR. It is a subject which is of great importance to the province from which I come. I am glad to see that the minister responsible for small business, or responsible for the problems suffered by small business in this country, is here tonight. However, this bill is not about small business, and the minister might be able to learn something about debt forgiveness in the amount of $808 million.

The late C. D. Howe would be turning over in his grave if he knew that the Canadian government was writing off $808 million in the bill which is before us now. I believe he got into serious political difficulty one time when he said "What's a million?" We are dealing with $808 million tonight, a burden we are going to have to take off the shoulders of the CNR.

When I speak about transportation, I like to consult the experts. One of the experts is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). He used to be the transportation critic for this side of the House, so when I was preparing for this debate I felt I could do no better than look into some of the views of a man who is now in a position to see that his views are confirmed.

In the fall of 1976 the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was still able to say what he thought, or he was still able to think. I do not know whether either applies today but I would like to quote from Hansard for November 6, 1976 at page 14,417. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, then a civilian, referring to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), said:

He has bought the line handed down by, I suppose, the civil service which said that we must work on a 'user pay' concept. I have always felt that transportation could serve the people of Canada a great deal better if users had a little more say before they were asked to pay.

That is an excellent principle that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce pronounced in 1976 and I am sure his view has not changed. He went on to say:

The only conclusion I can come to is that the minister seems bent on increasing freight rates, increasing the cost of air passenger travel, increasing the cost of rail passenger travel, and recently, increasing the cost of shipping.

What the minister said then is true still. The Minister of Transport is bent on increasing freight rates, increasing air passenger costs, rail passenger costs and the cost of shipping. Now our former critic is over there helping him carry out those objectives. Time changes all things and the man who was going to tar and feather the Minister of Transport has forgotten all about it.

The principles he enunciated are still correct, however. I am not against lifting this burden of $808 million off the back of the CNR if it is a burden. After all, it is only taxpayers' money and since the taxpayers do not know they loaned it in the first place they will not worry that they will never get it back.

Before I quote, Mr. Bandeen I want to say that I think he and the people running the CN are a capable group and I have no criticism of them. They had to operate within the conditions set by this government. The Department of Transport is extremely unlucky, Mr. Speaker. Most other departments have been lucky with this cabinet and had a change of minister every six or nine months, so no minister could do too much damage in his short tenure. But the unlucky Department of Transport has had the same minister since September, 1975. For 29 months the minister has headed the department and this is really taking its toll on the country's transportation system. Instead of the "whirling dervish" policy, the present policy is that the minister is so effective in punishing the people of Canada and squeezing every dollar of savings that can be squeezed out of the transportation system, that he should be left there at least until the next election when the constituency of Saskatoon-Humboldt will be liberated from the user-pay concept of the minister.

I will mention only part of what Mr. Bandeen predicted would be needed for a profitable CN. In an interview reported in the Globe and Mail on February 11, 1977, he said:

Canadian National Railways can be profitable if four main burdens are lifted—

He really meant five but he did not want to mention the Minister of Transport. The report gives the first principle:

The losses from the almost compulsory provision of rail passenger service, estimated by Mr. Bandeen at about $50 million a year.

Why have railway passenger services at all, Mr. Speaker? Without them we could save $50 million per year. In the Newfoundland scorched earth policy they eliminated the railway passenger service in 1965. I remember the sign a grateful Mr. Smallwood erected on behalf of the public which said: "We will finish the drive in '65, thanks to Mr. Pearson." The drive was the TransCanada highway of which the federal government agreed to pay 90 per cent of the cost if Newfoundland would not make a fuss about losing the rail passenger service. If Newfoundland has no rail passenger service, why should Canada have a rail passenger service? I say we should look at this Bandeen principle very seriously. It would eliminate losses of $50 million per year.

The report then gives the second and third principles:

The losses from grain transport at low Crowsnest rates, which he calculated could reach about $64 million in 1977.

The losses from rail operations in Newfoundland which are in the range of $22 million to $23 million a year.

Let us finish off the railway in Newfoundland. We only did a partial job in 1965 so let us do away with the rest of it—take away the rails and sell them! That would be user-pay effective and cost-effective. Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Transport attempts that we will put the rails around his neck and drop him into the Cabot Strait. The Hydrology Institute has been moved to Saskatoon so the minister is now an expert on water.

To return to the Globe and Mail report, it continues with the fourth principle:

The $2 billion in long term debt, most of it to the federal government, which has been building since the Crown corporation's founding in 1923.

This bill is only the start, the first instalment, Mr. Speaker, because Mr. Bandeen's four great principles include $2 billion in debt.

I hope I am not speaking too loudly, Mr. Speaker, but I want to make my point. This $808 million is only the start. The Bandeen plan is to make the CNR profitable. The bill will only do one quarter of one-quarter of what Mr. Bandeen said should be done if the CNR is to become profitable. Why has the Minister of Transport not included these things in the bill? Is he waiting until after the election to slip through the appendices of this bill—in other words, to eliminate rail service altogether in Newfoundland? That is part of the prescription: forgive another $1,200 million in debt and that will really help out the CN. Eliminate the Crowsnest pass rates. There are not going to be any Liberal members west of Toronto anyway after the next election, so they may as well eliminate the Crowsnest rates. Eliminate rail passenger service; let us have a railway without any rails, without any passengers. That is what we want, a profitable railway that has no passengers, no trains, no freight rates and no cargo! At last we will be able to point to CN and say that after 100 years we now have a railway that is profitable. It has no passengers, no freight, no cargo, but by golly it makes money! That is why I am so anxious to support this bill, Mr. Speaker.

I have not enough time to speak tonight and I am only warming up, but I did want to reveal the conspiracy that lies behind this bill. I also want to ask the minister some questions before he closes debate about five months hence—because the bill is not going through tonight or tomorrow or Friday. The bill is not going through until we get passenger service back in Newfoundland. Unless all the people on the mainland agree to have their passenger service taken away, we will not agree to this bill. We will agree to it only if ours is restored. We have a TransCanada highway that is falling apart. You can hardly drive a hundred yards without falling into the swamp.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—PROPOSED PRESSURE ON ALCAN TO OPERATE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on December 6, 1977, I asked a question of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) about unemployment. After that question I asked about a work project in Newfoundland concerning the lower Churchill water reservoir, a project which was suggested by the Newfoundland government and put forward to the Ottawa government in June, 1977. I asked whether the Gull Island project is to go ahead either this year, next year or in five years' time. The environmentalists have said that they have to clear cut the sides of the river which is to comprise the reservoir. They said this work can be done now, that it will take 400 loggers three years to clear this reservoir and it will cost about $4 million. The work they would do would be of permanent value and it must be done before this job goes ahead. It will re-employ 400 loggers laid off as a result of the closing of Labrador Linerboard Limited. The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council then said to me:

—I will take note of the hon. member's representations and ensure that whatever proposals have been made will be considered at the earliest possible date.

That was on December 6, 1977. I now come before you, Mr. Speaker, and it is February 7, two months later. Today during the question period, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the "living" Prime Minister, what had been done about this proposal for employment on the lower Churchill reservoir, Gull Island River. The Prime Minister said that it was discussed in cabinet last week. I presume it will be produced at the televised extravaganza on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday as some great work project that the Prime Minister and his confreres have cooked up to pull out of their hats in front of the public. I am just reminding them now that it has been eight months since that project was put forward. And that has been eight months during which time 400 men were unemployed while the government up here dithered, neither accepting nor rejecting the project. The minister said on December 6 that he was going to consider these things at the earliest possible date, but two months have passed before they have been properly discussed.

Another question I asked on December 6, 1977 concerned the closing of the fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland. The consultants paid for by the federal-provincial governments, B. L. Hodge and Partners of London, England, made a report to the two governments saying that it was feasible to operate this fluorspar mine and that it could be profitable if Alcan would operate it properly and make the necessary investments. But Alcan refused. They wanted to close the mine because they were able to import fluorspar more cheaply from Mexico than operate the mine itself. I asked if the government would put pressure on Alcan and tell Alcan that there would be no tax concessions, no tax relief, no help for Alcan in any way, shape or form if they did not continue to operate that fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland and save the jobs of 300 men. And this silly, stupid answer that I had from the minister was that Alcan had informed him that the fluorspar from the mine at St. Lawrence was used mainly as a chemical in spray cans, and because of the drastic reduction in the use of spray cans in Canada it was no longer feasible to operate that mine. That is a piece of nonsense. A man that would believe that tripe from Alcan would believe anything. That is a "Hornerism" of the worst. It is a spoonerism disguised as a "Hornerism" but that is the answer I got. It shows the lack of concern for jobs in Newfoundland.

When Sun Life decided to move its head office from Montreal to Toronto there was a fuss and a furore. But when Alcan wants to close a mine for no good economic reason, move out of Newfoundland and cause the loss of 300 jobs, it does not cause the government any bother at all. If firms move out of Quebec it is different, but out of Newfoundland anyone can move.

Then yesterday I came across a proud boast from the Export Development Corporation that that crowd of clowns are giving $30.6 million to Alcan to help them construct an alumina plant in Ireland. The government allow Alcan to do away with jobs in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, and create them with our money and our credit in Ireland. Jobs for the Irish through Alcan, but not in Newfoundland. What kind of sense does that make?

The Export Development Corporation has to be brought under control. They do not care what they do as long as they whack the money out. The more money they whack out, supposedly financing our exports, the better they like it. It is the "Export and be Damned the Canadian Workers Corporation". That is what the EDC is.

Alcan should not receive one cent from the government of Canada. Alcan has calmly shut a fluorspar mine down and put 300 men out of work in St. Lawrence, not because the mine was losing money but because Alcan can get fluorspar cheaper from Mexico. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) did nothing to stop this. The government would not put on a tariff or impose quotas for reasons they never properly explained.

The only alternative for that community is a fish plant. There is a fine harbour there. The only alternative for the men is to go back to fishing or work in a fish plant. They made a proposal to the federal government through Fisheries Products Limited and the Newfoundland government to put a plant there. They need two things. They need loans and grants from DREE and permission from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) to allow several Portuguese vessels to land there. But the federal government is delaying making any decision. I call on the ministers to take some action on these problems, particularly with regard to St. Lawrence.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not always understand English very well. The hon. member has used the word "dithering". What does it mean in French? I did not quite understand everything, but the hon. member asked two questions to which I will now reply.

[English]

I would like to advise the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), that the minister has a copy of the preliminary report on a study of the economic potential of the St. Lawrence fluorspar deposits in Newfoundland which was prepared for the government of Newfoundland and Labrador by B. L. Hodge and Partners, London, England. The report was sent to the minister by the Hon. T. Alex Hickman, minister of intergovernmental affairs of the government of Newfoundland and Labrador—I am sure the hon. member is familiar with this gentleman—on the understanding that it be kept strictly confidential. Accordingly, I suggest that the hon. member approach the Hon. A. Brian Peckford, minister of mines and energy of the government of Newfoundland and Labrador, with regard to the report, because we intend to uphold the confidentiality of the report that was given to the minister.

I understand that Mr. Peckford met with Alcan officials in Montreal when Alcan restated the company's decision to close down its fluorspar mining operations in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland because they are no longer economically viable. A press release of December 1, 1977 by Alcan indicates that there are differences of opinion between Alcan and its consultants and the Hodge report on many aspects of the possible continuation of production having regard to mining safety and economic viability under present conditions.

I also understand that Alcan has offered the Newfoundland government a five-year lease of the mining rights and equipment at St. Lawrence for a nominal sum of $1 per year as the company does not want to be a stumbling block between the Newfoundland government and any other company which may be found to operate the fluorspar mines at St. Lawrence.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—CARE OF THE ELDERLY—FINANCIAL AID FOR THOSE IN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on January 26 I asked the minister whether home care help was available under the Canada assistance plan and, if so, how much. Her answer was that the plan extended into the home care field, that Ontario had already been given $1 billion under the block funding arrangements, and that money was available also for home care programs.

I wish to set my question in order and lay the basis for the question I am going to ask. In 1957, the federal government brought in the Hospital Diagnostic Services Act. Ten years later they brought in national medicare. Quality of service was stressed. There was to be 95 per cent coverage. This was in spite of the fact that Ontario had a health care plan brought in by the Robarts government which covered all social services.

The federal government forced the provinces to accept the universal health care scheme, and then the pressure went on. Of course, escalating costs due to inflation were an important factor. The situation necessitated cuts in the nursing staff and then there was pressure to get patients out of active treatment beds quickly because the cost of an active treatment bed is anywhere from $100 to over $200 a day. Patients were removed to chronic care beds costing between $40 to $100, quite a saving. As I say, the nursing staff was reduced and a nurse, no matter how capable, can only do so much. My contention is that these measures could lead inevitably to a reduction in the quality of patient care.

I go on a little further. From chronic care beds patients are transferred to nursing homes, in which case the government pays a total of $14.10 a day per patient. I want to ask this question: How often has the minister or her officials been in consultation with provincial officials with regard to the effectiveness of these arrangements? I ask this question bearing in mind that this is an extended plan operating right across Canada. Is the quality of care in these homes guaranteed? What equipment is in place to treat patients with illnesses capable of being treated? Are oxygen cylinders in place for use as necessary? Is other necessary medical apparatus available for use if required? In short, is the quality of care promised by the federal government when it brought in this scheme up to standard and is it being maintained across Canada?

I turn now to the charitable institutions which are finding it very hard now to make ends meet. I have in mind the Catholic institutions, and the Protestant ones, too. Their revenues are falling far behind and each patient they receive is cared for at a financial loss. If nothing is done, these institutions will be obliged to close down.

I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell us how often officials of the department talk over the future of this plan and consider the direction we are taking in the field of health care. Can we continue to assure the people concerned that the quality of health care across Canada will be maintained? What I am pleading for tonight is that the minister ensure more frequent consultations between her officials and those of the provincial governments with emphasis on future needs so that the mess in which we find ourselves at the present time in the field of health care will not continue.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for his usual clarity in presenting his concerns. They are also the concerns of the minister. I can assure him there is no intent whatever to cut the level of medical care that we have enjoyed in Canada for so long.

As the hon. member is aware, the provision of health and social services is a responsibility of the provinces, with the federal government helping them in meeting those responsibilities by providing financial assistance, collaborating in the development of standards, undertaking studies in important subject areas, and through other means. In the present instance the federal government is providing a $2.2 billion cash contribution in the current year to support the hospital and medical care services. In addition, for 1977-78, some $464 million is being transferred to assist provinces in providing extended health care services, which include nursing home, institutional and home care services, the very items the hon. member has referred to. This amount is considerably in excess of the contribution that the provinces would have received under the Canada assistance plan for these same services. Hence, in a very real way the Government of Canada is sharing with the provinces the costs of both institutional and home care services.

In addition, the government of Canada has recently proposed to the provinces that $575 million be transferred in 1978-79 through a block funding arrangement to assist them in providing a comprehensive range of social services, which includes the homemaker component of a home care program. While a final agreement has not yet been reached, it is hoped that this new financing arrangement can come into effect on April 1, 1978. In the meantime the Canada assistance plan is sharing with the provinces the cost of providing homemaker services to persons in need who are living in their own homes, and is also assisting with the basic income maintenance needs of adults residing in a residential care institution. The provinces have been advised that even with the introduction of block financing for social services Canada will continue to assist individuals with their basic income needs through the Canada assistance plan, whether such persons are living in their own homes or in institutions.

In conclusion, may I say that it is the purpose and intention of the department to continue the same level of medical care as has been provided in the past. Once again I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to the attention of the minister and the department concerned.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—PROPOSED LAY-OFFS AT CERTAIN MINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, on January 24 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) what specific steps he had discussed with Canada's provincial mines ministers to prevent the impending lay-off of 4,000 workers in the nickel industry in the Sudbury basin, Port Colborne and Thompson, Manitoba. In his response to me he did not list one single specific proposal. He talked about medium term prospects, he talked about restoring confidence in the mining industry, and he talked about separate jurisdictions, but he did not mention one specific step he would consider taking to save the jobs of 4,000 of Canada's miners.

The reason the minister could not talk about such steps is that he has no steps. He has totally abdicated his responsibility both to Canada's miners and to the communities of Port Colborne, Thompson and the Sudbury basin. His government is prepared to dump millions of dollars into the mining sector but it is not prepared to even attempt to see that the money is used constructively.

The government gave the International Nickel Company $318 million in deferred taxes but were not prepared to make such deferrals conditional on increasing employment. In fact, at the time the company announced the lay-offs the government was in the process of passing tax legislation that would give Inco $10 million. That comes to a grant of $3,333 for every miner they are laying off.

The government would not consider a temporary stockpile of the nickel to keep those men employed. Instead they would prefer to give the company more tax concessions and then pay the laid off miners unemployment insurance. The miners do not want unemployment insurance; they want jobs, they want to be productive. This government has denied them the opportunity to work and be productive.

It is not as if a stockpile would have been a bad investment, because officials of the companies involved all say publicly that the nickel markets look healthy in the medium to long term. Even a recent study by G. A. Barry and G. E. Wood of the minister's department says the same thing. But the government will not act to stockpile nickel, an action it has undertaken profitably in the past with uranium.

The government also refuses to take steps to prevent such a crisis in the future. At a time when Canada and the Sudbury basin desperately needed money for investment in job producing secondary industry, Inco was exporting hundreds of millions of dollars made from profits in Canada to invest in new mines abroad. What did the government do about this? It gave the company another $77 million to help it on its way. This was $77 million of taxpayers' money paid in taxes by the workers who become unemployed next Monday.

The government would not even take steps to protect jobs in Canada. My party requested a temporary tariff on nickel carbonate coming into Canada destined for the Sherritt Gordon refinery at Fort Saskatchewan. It would not put that temporary tariff on raw nickel coming into Canada even though the Japanese have been protecting their nickel industries with temporary tariffs of 13 per cent for the last few years. The government would not even stop the import of that nickel into Canada, yet that nickel is processed in the Sherritt Gordon refinery. The irony of it all is that it is sold to our mint in Winnipeg to make our coinage, and this at a time when we have raw nickel stockpiled to our eyeballs in Port Colborne and Sudbury.

This is the same kind of brutal unconcern that permits this government to allow Alcan to close out a mine in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland because the mine is not making as much money as it would make if it were importing the fluorspar from Mexico. Yet this government has given Alcan $200 million in deferred taxes. We heard earlier tonight that this government through the EDC is lending Alcan $30 million to build a plant in Ireland. I wonder by what stretch of the imagination the government can now turn around and put Ireland in the same category as Guatemala and Indonesia. I suppose Ireland is a third world country and we are now helping third world Ireland with this low interest loan.

The government could have come up with specific proposals to save the jobs of our miners. It could have stockpiled nickel in the short-term and made a profit. It could have imposed a temporary tariff which would have saved some jobs in the nickel mining industry. Most important, over the years that this government has been in power it could have initiated economic planning that would have prevented companies from such criminal acts as deliberately stockpiling nickel to gamble on future markets and then using the stockpile as a weapon in wage negotiations with the workers. This government could have prevented the companies from making the workers pay for the companies' own economic mismanagement. The government could have used ownership or taxation of our resources to make sure there was an adequate pool of investment capital here in Canada to ensure jobs in manufacturing and to diversify the economies of one-industry towns such as Sudbury and Thompson.

Truly this government is tired; it has grown fat and sassy. It is like a ship struggling through the water, barnacles hanging from its bottom and impeding its progress. Members opposite have to be completely out of touch with the citizenry of Canada to be able to sit so insensitively on the government benches while Canadian workers are discarded like so many used pieces of tissue. This government in its repeated failure to act has surely earned and richly deserves the scorn of the Canadian people at the polls whenever an election should come.

Mr. Ken Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has been extremely eloquent, as he usually is, and has made his case extremely well. It is very tough to say anything when you are talking about 4,000 people out of work in a constituency. I assure the hon. member that I share his concern because I have Anaconda in my riding where there may be 875 laid off; I have Christie's Bread in my riding where there may be another 500 laid off; and I have Continental Can which is having some problems as well. I hope I do not have to continue.

I share the hon. member's concern; this matter is very, very important, indeed. I do know that the minister, his department and the government share the hon. member's concern as well. The question is, how do we remedy the situation? Time would probably not permit us to go into that in detail.

In response to the question of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, need I point out that the mining industry, one of this country's great exporting industries, is dependent upon customers outside Canada. Manpower shortages in periods of peak demand, or conversely, surpluses during depressed mineral markets, are characteristic of mining.

At the moment, as my hon. colleague has already been told, copper, nickel and zinc, as well as the people who mine them, are being especially hard hit. Yet this is not a reflection of the entire state of the mineral market. The year 1977 brought widely divergent fortunes to different sections of the mining industry. While excessive stocks are keeping prices down in the commodities I have just mentioned, the demand for molybdenum and tungsten is very firm while aluminum's recovery continues. In addition, it might be added that the price of gold has also risen.

Because of this, cutbacks in the labour force are related to soft markets. These lay-offs are not in line with government objectives, although from the corporate point of view they may seem rational. The government is concerned with ameliorating the hardships to labour.

As the hon. member for Nickel Belt is well aware, a conference of mines ministers was held on January 20, 1978 to look at the medium-term prospects for the mining industry and how it would be possible for mines ministers to restore confidence in the mining industry. There was general agreement that over the next few years world market conditions will be a major influence on the mining industry of this country.

The ministers discussed several questions under the general topic of mineral sector management and co-ordination. Many subjects were discussed, including the point that it is important to ensure the industry and its employees are getting the maximum benefit from social programs already available. It was agreed that there was a need for a better understanding of social factors related to mining employment, particularly in the area of pensions and the desirability or not of portable pensions for industry employees. It was agreed that there is a need for continuing dialogue between ministers. The ministers looked at a number of questions in their separate jurisdictions which they may be able to address for the purpose of reporting to their first ministers' meeting in February.

In the long run a unified effort by both the federal and provincial governments to design measures on a commodity basis is needed to protect industry's viability and expand into new employment areas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Therefore this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PARLIAMENT HILL

USE OF FACILITIES FOR LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the event scheduled to take place in the parliamentary buildings on Friday, February 24, allegedly involving the setting up of 26 bars and the participation of approximately 4,000 people as part of a convention being held by the Liberal Party of Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That this constitutes abuse and blatant misuse of the privileges afforded to members of parliament, as well as degrading the dignity of the parliamentary buildings, that particularly at this time these buildings should be used for solving the problems of unemployment and inflation, rather than as a gigantic cocktail lounge for members of the Liberal party and, finally, ask that the Speaker review the matter in order that the parliamentary buildings will not be debased by a booze-bash and become known as "Trudeau's tavern".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some difficulty about putting the motion. There are notices of questions of privilege to be raised about the same matter, and I am certain it will necessitate a long discussion later. It involves a decision that I made in terms of the initial permission for the use of the parliament buildings. However, the question involves legitimate discussion concerning the extent of the arrangements since the original permission was given; therefore, I will give the benefit of the doubt to the hon. member and ask if there is unanimous consent that the motion be put.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRIME MINISTER URGED TO CANCEL PLANS TO USE PARLIAMENT HILL FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion on the same subject, which I agree is extremely serious. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said recently in British Columbia, "There are no free lunches". Considering that the Liberal Party of Canada plans to turn Parliament Hill into a colossal free lunch for their convention that is to take place later this month, using parliament's facilities, which are paid for by the taxpayers of Canada, to provide what one Liberal officer has described as "a mammoth bash", and considering that another Liberal planner is quoted as saying, "Who wants to drink and dance in some hotel basement room when you can use parliament?", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the Prime Minister to practice what he preaches and take steps to ensure the Liberal party cancels its plans to use parliament's facilities to provide themselves with "a mammoth bash".

[Editor's Note: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) entered the chamber and received loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. Speaker: As on many occasions in the past, hon. members have shown their warmth of feeling and affection in welcoming back among us an hon. member of great distinction who has suffered a serious illness. We certainly welcome back to the House the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) and wish him good health in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This leaves us with the question of whether there is unanimous consent for the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR HOUSE TO HOUSE MAIL DELIVERY SERVICE THROUGHOUT CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It is not with respect to any political bash, but it might concern some political problems. It is of national concern and comes under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that many Canadian households which would ordinarily be receiving house to house mail delivery service have not been obtaining this service for some time, due to alleged restraint by the postal department, and in view of the fact that it is reported that house to house mail delivery service has been implemented in at least one area of the country and the same rules have not been applied to all parts of the country, and in view of the fact that all Canadian householders pay the same postal rates and the same federal taxes and deserve and are entitled to equal service and treatment, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the Postmaster General take steps forthwith to implement full house to house mail delivery service and provide all the adequate and necessary walks and postal carriers, without any further restraint, restrictions or discrimination, right across Canada—not just in a part of the Toronto area, as reported in one of the Toronto papers recently, but right across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR KILLING OF PRISON GUARDS OR POLICE OFFICERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and very urgent matter.

Considering that murders of police officers and prison guards are increasing alarmingly in Canada and in view of the murder of Archambault Institution Warden Michel Roy yesterday, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House urge the Solicitor General to introduce before parliament a bill to amend the Criminal Code and reinstate capital punishment for the murder of police officers and prison guards, or at least a very harsh sentence which would punish and act as a deterrent for those who have no respect whatsoever for the life of others.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT HILL

USE OF FACILITIES FOR LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION—CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Liberal Party of Canada wishes to take over and utilize facilities in the Centre Block and the West Block for purposes of entertaining delegates and other misguided people attending the Liberal party conference in Ottawa during February, so that liquor can be dispensed and gaiety engendered among their gloomy ranks, and in view of the fact that Emperor Nero during the decline and fall of the Roman empire fiddled while Rome burned, while Prime Minister Trudeau now fiddles while our unemployed burn with indignation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House deplores any suggestion that the parliamentary buildings should be used for Liberal bars, Liberal balls or other swinging Liberal pursuits and requests the government to withdraw its dipsomaniac proposals.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO BOOST ECONOMY TO PROVIDE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion relates to the current economic crisis which is highlighted by statistics showing one million unemployed Canadians, the highest number in Canadian history. Given the tragedy of this situation and the need expressed by members of the opposition and bodies such as the C. D. Howe Institute to take urgent and immediate measures to alleviate this crisis, and given that the eleven first ministers whose decisions can have a profound impact on the Canadian economy will be meeting in formal session next week, for the first time in 15 months, to deal with, in the words of the Prime Minister "a medium-term economic strategy for Canada," I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That, as a first order of business, the agenda of the first ministers' conference deal with specific proposals aimed at giving an immediate boost to the economy in order to counteract this winter's heavy unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS OF SOVIET CITIZENS—REQUEST QUESTION BE RAISED AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

In light of the offer of the Government of Canada to grant immediate landed immigrant status to Anatoly Shcharansky, and recognizing that the Soviet Union has not yet positively responded to this initiative, this House wishes to express its deep disappointment as well as its concern respecting the treatment of Soviet citizens who have attempted to exercise their rights and freedoms as embodied in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and agreed to by participating states at Helsinki and, further, this House asks that parliament's concern on this vital issue be raised at the earliest opportunity at the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe now under way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be presented to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PENITENTIARIES

HOSTAGE-TAKING—INQUIRY INTO RECENT INCIDENTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, who shocked the House yesterday when he said, in response to a question by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, that he was not prepared to reconstitute the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which deals with penitentiary matters. In case this was another instance of the minister taking a position too hastily, I want to give him an opportunity to extricate himself.

In view of the fact that the subcommittee did its work with integrity and in a non-partisan way, and that it presented the House with a unanimous report, will the minister reconsider the attitude he took yesterday and accept recommendation No. 65 which asks that the subcommittee be reconstituted for this parliament? Specifically, will the hon. gentleman permit that subcommittee to participate in the inquiries which are taking place or which are about to take place into the two most recent hostage-taking incidents?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): First, may I point out that I was replying to a question by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock which referred specifically to the hostage-taking incident in British Columbia. I have stated, with respect to that incident, it was my intention to request the appointment of a formal inquiry. The precise form the inquiry will take will be decided upon in a day or two. I did not think it was necessary to reconstitute the subcommittee for that purpose. However, I am the first to agree the subcommittee has done excellent work, and I do not use those words loosely. It has done marvellous work in terms of the reference made to it. We are investigating its report and all the recommendations which were made, including recommendation No. 65. I shall have a statement to make on that recommendation on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. Jarvis: The Solicitor General and his predecessor have had eight or nine months in which to consider those unanimous recommendations. Does the hon. gentleman intend to continue the policy of his predecessor, that the recommendations forming the heart and soul of the report will not be implemented immediately, without further consideration, since ample time has now been given to the minister and his predecessor?

Mr. Blais: The hon. member underestimates the value and, indeed, the logical sequence of the recommendations which were made. If he recognized their importance and the seriousness with which they are being considered, he would recognize, also, that they require considerable analysis—

Mr. Jarvis: Eight or nine months?

Mr. Blais: —in order that they may be implemented. I might add that I am in contact with the chairman of the subcommittee in order to accelerate the process of implementation of the recommendations.

Mr. Jarvis: What the minister underestimates are the murders, hostage-taking incidents and injuries which are continually occurring in Canadian penitentiaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: I ask him again: Will he, first of all, implement these unanimous recommendations with dispatch, and will he with equal dispatch reconstitute the subcommittee?

Mr. Blais: I think I have replied to both those questions quite honestly and quite openly.

Mr. McGrath: And quite negatively.

ARCHAMBAULT—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS ON CONDITIONS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Solicitor General as well. In light of the recommendations made in that report which was tabled nine months ago, it seems that at the time we recognized that the conditions, particularly in the Laval institution, were abominable. Could the Solicitor General tell us if the recommendations contained in that report will be implemented soon and also tell us what has been done about this in the past nine months, particularly with regard to conditions prevailing in the Laval institution?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the conditions will necessarily apply to the whole system. We must not begin singling out specific situations. I want to tell the hon. member that all the people in my department have worked very hard on this. I have received a preliminary report. Mr. Speaker, at the very beginning when I accepted this portfolio, I insisted that I should meet with the officials of the Canadian Penitentiary Service to assure myself that the recommendations of a subcommittee of a committee of the House be implemented as soon as possible. I am seeing to it that this is done and I want the hon. member to be sure of that.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. The Solicitor General is referring to the standardization of living conditions in penitentiaries throughout Canada. In that report, meetings with various provincial justice ministers were also mentioned. Could the Solicitor General say whether his predecessor had met the Quebec minister to deal with Quebec institutions as far as standardization is involved?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to pinpoint one of the reasons why there may have seemed to be some delay in the implementation. I intend to meet personally my provincial counterparts in the near future, probably in the first week of March if I am not mistaken.

Mr. La Salle: A last supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General says that he intends to meet the ministers in the near future. Could he explain why those meetings have not yet been held since the government was handed that report nine months ago?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that there was no meeting. I merely stated that, personally, I will meet those ministers in the near future.

TRADE

DEFICIT IN AUTOMOTIVE TRADE WITH U.S.—INDUSTRY COMMITMENTS TO IMPROVE SITUATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In an incredible paper released by his department last week, the deficit in automotive trade between Canada and the United States is forecast to reach the alarming figure of $2.5 billion annually by 1981. This represents a 250 per cent increase in the current annual deficit, and would mean the net loss—I put the figure conservatively—of at least 40,000 jobs which would be due to Canada under the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement. Can the minister tell us what commitments he has obtained from the industry to head off this deplorable situation?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, General Motors has agreed to build one additional parts plant in Windsor. We are urging the company, and working with it to negotiate a second plant. Ford has agreed to modernize a plant it is operating in Windsor, and we are working with that company and urging it to build additional plants. I would like to point out to the hon. member that our export of automotive parts increased last year by 22 per cent; our export of automobiles increased last year by 25 per cent. If we can continue to do that, I think we will narrow the gap, rather than increase it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows as well as I do that in terms of the essence of the argument, the figures he has just given us are meaningless. In spite of the increase the minister is talking about, we had a $1 billion deficit last year. Is the minister aware that the president of the Ford Motor Company said recently that the industry will be investing $58 billion in North America in the next eight years, largely because of new requirements regarding energy and pollution? Is he aware that the minimum entitlement to Canada, at that level of investment, would be at least $750 million a year, starting next year? If so, can he assure the House that we will get anywhere near that figure?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that we are doing our utmost to get Ford to build additional plants in Canada. We are in severe competition with the southern and northern United States—a bidding match as to who can provide them with the most facilities at the lowest cost to them.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, let me remind the minister that the government of the United States does not have a treaty with the southern states; this is a treaty it has signed with Canada. Clause 1 of that treaty states that Canada and the United States are to share on a fair and equitable basis in the growth of the industry. I would, therefore, like to ask the minister, if we do not have our share of growth, which we do not, why does not the government insist on the United States living up to that agreement, and particularly on getting letters of agreement from the industry to invest in the way it did in 1965 when it signed the agreement?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are working and asking the industry to do just that. I might say that if the hon. member were to look at the publication my department released on the automotive industry, he would see that we have steadily increased our production in both automobiles and parts. In fact, we have doubled parts manufacturing in Canada in the past ten years.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR MEASURE TO PROTECT PRISON GUARDS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General.

Considering that over nine months ago the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs tabled a very special report concerning steps the Solicitor General and his officials should take to improve our prison security system; considering that hardened inmates who want to boss the prisons have indicated quite clearly that it is the Solicitor General's department which, through mismanagement, is mostly responsible for this situation; and considering also that several acts of violence have been perpetrated in Canadian penitentiaries because of this, could the minister advise the House whether something will be done shortly to protect these guards and especially younger prisoners from older ones, assure law and order in these institutions, and guarantee the safety of all those whose duty it is to maintain law and order there?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his question. This very serious question is somewhat similar to those which other members directed to me less than ten minutes ago. I want only to indicate to the hon. member that I am eager to implement most of the recommendations put forward by the subcommittee. I should like also to indicate that there is a new penitentiary commissioner who has been on the job for nearly two months now and who is striving to improve the administration in line with the subcommittee's recommendations.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RECOMMENDED REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In light of the recommendations of the subcommittee and considering what the Solicitor General can do to improve the situation if it continues to deteriorate as we have seen lately, does the Solicitor General intend to bring a bill before the House to reinstate capital punishment or at least to urge the Department of Justice to give harsher sentences to those who are responsible for the murders of prison guards or policemen on duty?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

ACCESS OF INFLATION MONITORING AGENCY TO INFORMATION PROVIDED UNDER ANTI-INFLATION ACT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, I should like to put my first question to the Deputy Prime Minister and House leader. As a private bill entitled "The Inflation Monitoring Agency Act" has been circulated by the Minister of Finance to various provincial government departments, and as this bill sets out in one of its clauses, "Any information, including privileged information, obtained under the Anti-Inflation Act shall be made available to the Agency"—that is, the Inflation Monitoring Agency, will the Deputy Prime Minister indicate what the government has in mind in making this information available to the Inflation Monitoring Agency, bearing in mind that such information was given on the strict understanding it would remain confidential within the AIB and would in no event be turned over to any other body?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not fully informed on the subject matter, except I think it is normal practice for the government to consult with the provinces on matters that are in the common interest of the federal government and the provincial governments. I hope the hon. member does not take serious objection to the practice of involving the provinces in such economic discussions and ultimate decisions.

AVAILABILITY OF STATISTICS CANADA DATA TO INFLATION MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, now that the Prime Minister has joined us, I should like to direct my supplementary question to him. A proposed companion bill to the Inflation Monitoring Agency Act is to be known as the Financial and Compensation Data Returns Act, which has been circulated to various provincial departments. Can the Prime Minister indicate why it is intended under this act to make Statistics Canada a data collection agency with a view to turning information over to the new monitoring agency, bearing in mind that until now the essence of Statistics Canada has been that it is a confidential agency of government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is too early for the government or the House of Commons to draw conclusions about how the post-inflation period will be dealt with in terms of institutions. As the hon. House leader just indicated, we are examining different propositions, now, with the provinces and, indeed, in meetings we are having with business and labour groups. From the hon. member's point of view and from our own, it would be preferable to wait until, in effect, we make an announcement or introduce legislation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You do not want any input.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does he not feel it is also preferable at least to familiarize members of this House, through a white paper, with what the government is proposing to various provincial jurisdictions and labour unions in this country with respect to the so-called post-control period which the Prime Minister has in mind? We must bear in mind that one of the provisions of the proposed Inflation Monitoring Agency Act provides for the agency to have the power, with the approval of the minister, to communicate or allow to be communicated to any person any privileged information filed under the act.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is suggesting a white paper. Let me remind him that we published two such papers on the post-inflation period. One of them was entitled "The Way Ahead"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: You are "away behind".

Mr. Trudeau: The other paper was entitled "Agenda for Co-operation". It is well known to the opposition, and has been for some time, that there would be a post-inflation period—a post-control period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, ho!

Mr. Trudeau: A post-Anti-Inflation Board period. Hon. members opposite have been arguing for the better part of a year that we should get out from under the Anti-Inflation Board and be in an anti-inflation period—a post-Anti-Inflation Board period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The opposition has known this. We have made our intentions clear; we have sketched out the kinds of institutions we see in existence then. As I have said, we have been consulting with the provinces and other sectors of the economy. We are still waiting to receive any constructive proposition from the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Stevens.]

C. D. HOWE RESEARCH INSTITUTE—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the warning by the C. D. Howe Research Institute that lack of action on their recommendations, which call for generous tax reductions for retraining workers in declining industries, extended unemployment insurance benefits for the long-term unemployed, greater use of differential fiscal policies for regional development, and a significant reduction in sales tax, would mean unnecessary delay and would cause serious exacerbation and concern with respect to the growth of unemployment in the economy, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House what action he intends to take on the very serious recommendations of this respected research institute?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has already acted on some of the recommendations. As a matter of fact, the recommendations are echoing some of the policies the government has already announced and is following. I am sure that even the hon. member would not want to stand and say his party would advocate applying all those recommendations. With regard to recommendations by various institutes across the country, obviously you accept some and you do not accept others. I am sure this is the position of the hon. member's party.

REQUEST BUDGET BE INTRODUCED TO IMPROVE ECONOMY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the failure of the government, despite repeated demands from the opposition and others in the country, to bring in a budget right now which would provide for the necessary tax credits and incentives to encourage the private sector to expand, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House, if he cannot screw up his courage to call a general election, whether we can expect a new budget?

Mr. Basford: We want to build a pipeline before we have an election.

Right Hon. P. E. (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is now calling for tax cuts. Let met remind him that when we proposed tax cuts in past months the opposition took some 20 days to make up its mind on whether they would vote for them or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: It took you 11 months to bring in the bill.

Mr. Trudeau: I warn you, Mr. Speaker, that it is going to become fashionable for opposition members to stand up, beat their chests and say, "We want an election".

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Guess why?

Mr. Trudeau: It was not fashionable to say that a few months ago, but it is becoming fashionable now. I am sure Your Honour will hear more about it. I think they should tell us if they want to have an election before we deal with the pipeline bill, or after. If they want to have an election before, let them say so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Right now.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the opposition has demonstrated already its attitude and its desire to co-operate in dealing with matters affecting the economy, as exemplified by our allowing passage of the employment tax credit bill in one day, the Prime Minister must accept responsibility for the six months' delay in bringing in that bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I should like to ask the Prime Minister, on behalf of the over one million unemployed Canadians, if he does not have the guts to bring in a budget, does he have the guts to call an election?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Let's get on with it now, Pierre.

Mr. McGrath: The sooner, the better.

Mr. Paproski: Why wait for spring: do it now!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the events of the past weeks have shown that the opposition can learn something from the feelings of the people, after having opposed the tax cuts before the House for some 20 days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Great stuff.

Mr. Trudeau: Then they got the message and they screwed up the courage to vote for another good government bill in one day. I hope they continue using that good example.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is pretty weak.

PENITENTIARIES

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO PROTECT PRISON GUARDS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. In light of the procrastination and vacillation with reference to the reconstitution of the subcommittee of the committee on justice and legal affairs which deals with penitentiaries, and because there is now an emergency situation respecting penitentiaries across Canada, I should like to ask this very serious question: What investigation is being carried out now to meet this emergency and to make certain there will be no further tragic incidents such as the execution of a warden? What emergency legislation is there to protect correctional institution officers across this nation and preserve their morale?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. member brought to the attention of the House a very tragic event which happened yesterday in Montreal. As regards the tragic death of Archambault Institution Warden Michel Roy, I should simply like to offer his family my sympathy and the sympathy of the House, and to assure all employees of the Canadian penitentiary system that we are doing everything we can to help provincial authorities—and, we hope, municipal and police authorities in Montreal—to continue the inquiry and prosecute those who are responsible for this absolutely inexcusable and in fact very wild and very barbarous act.

• (1442)

Mr. Woolliams: I am sure every member of parliament wishes to express sympathy to the family, but condolences will not bring a public servant back to life. I will ask my question again. What emergency steps are being taken right now to protect correctional institution officers, not only in the penitentiary mentioned but in others, so that such tragic occurrences such as murder and the taking of hostages will not continue? There is a state of emergency in the whole penitentiary service. If the minister cannot see that, he cannot see anything.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that his question did not make clear the fact that this tragic event took place, not close to the penitentiary but close to Mr. Roy's home. Under the circumstances, I would want to have more time in order to ascertain the circumstances exactly, not only the actual slaying but the circumstances and whatever evidence might be brought forward, prior to making any further comment on the matter.

Mr. Woolliams: I have one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POPLAR RIVER POWER PROJECT—FURNISHING OF INFORMATION TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is with respect to the Poplar River power project near the south Saskatchewan border with Montana. Can the minister say whether the government of the province of Saskatchewan has yet provided all the information requested by the IJC on that project, lack of which prompted the commission to ask for work on the project to be halted? If the IJC now has that information at hand, do we yet have any indication from the commission as to whether or not they regard it as being sufficient for their purposes?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as is always the case with IJC reports, of course, the government took seriously the comments of the commission with regard to the failure, or the reluctance at least, of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation to provide all the material that was necessary at that time. I have since been advised that more information has been provided to the commission. Obviously, this will be examined by the IJC and we will then determine what representations we will make to the United States in light of the new recommendations that come from the IJC.

GARRISON DIVERSION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it has to do with a related matter, it being the Garrison Diversion project. Is it the government's position that the Canadian government is still—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I point out, with respect, that that is not a supplementary question.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT LAY-OFF OF STEELWORKERS—STOCKPILING OF NICKEL

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Labour, but I assume he is away tackling Harold Ballard in order to save the Hamilton Tiger-Cats. Therefore, I will put my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that on December 18 the United Steelworkers of America presented the Minister of Labour with a proposal for temporary stockpiling of nickel, which brief the minister was supposed to communicate to the cabinet for a decision to be made, and in view of the fact that the lay-off of thousands of people in the nickel industry will happen in five days, on this coming Monday, and I understand that the minister has not even responded to the steelworkers with respect to their proposal, can the Prime Minister tell the House, since his cabinet has chosen not to respond to the request of the United Steelworkers, whether or not he is going to act on these proposals?

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say that the Minister of Labour is in Vancouver, not to try to save the Tiger Cats but to try to help Canadian workers. To answer the hon. member's question, I should say that there is still a discussion going on and that no decision has been made up to now.

[English]

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER OF MINES HAS UNDERTAKEN COST-BENEFIT STUDY ON STOCKPILING

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it gets curiouser and curiouser. My next question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that when I last spoke to the president of Falconbridge Nickel Mines I was informed that the only contact he has had on the question of nickel stockpiling was one brief phone call asking very few questions, and in view of the fact that although it would cost money to undertake a temporary stockpiling program, much of this money would be saved in areas such as UIC, manpower mobility and retraining and expenses under the Canada Assistance Plan covering the social costs of unemployment, can the minister tell this House if the government undertook a detailed cost-benefit analysis on the question of stockpiling nickel and, if such a study was done, will the minister table it in the House?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, the department and I have met with senior officers of both the corporations, Inco and Falconbridge, to examine the question of whether or not a stockpiling system would, indeed, assist that industry. Quite clearly, the conclusion of those discussions and that study is that it would increase the problems of the industry, that there is a significant overhang of nickel inventories in this country and elsewhere in the world, and by adding to that overhang we would be delaying the period of adjustment and therefore keeping more people out of work longer than would otherwise be necessary.

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTION PROPOSED AUTOMOTIVE PARTS PLANTS BE LOCATED IN SUDBURY BASIN

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I knew it was absolutely useless to ask the minister that question, I will now direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that 2,800 workers will be laid off next Monday in the Sudbury basin and this will do massive damage to the community, and in view of the fact that the minister told the House on February 2, and repeated it today, that he is negotiating with the three automotive companies for the location of three parts plants in Canada, can the minister tell the House if he has made any suggestions to the manufacturers in question to locate one of the plants in the Sudbury basin? If he has not, will he undertake to do so, making them aware of the DREE program or other available incentives?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is, quite clearly, a representation—a forceful one, but a representation nevertheless.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, this is a serious problem to which the minister should respond.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

STEPS TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT TO ASSIST MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. His department's study, entitled "Manufacturing Performance", released on Monday, states:

> Manufacturing output remains no higher than it did in 1974 and the country has lost 80,000 manufacturing jobs.

In view of this, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what he and his department are doing to pull the Canadian manufacturing industry out of its present nose-dive, and in that way start to overcome this country's $11.5 billion trade deficit in manufactured products, the ones that produce jobs?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We are working on many fronts in an attempt to assist the growth of manufacturing in Canada. I should like to inform the hon. member and the House that last year our export of goods went up from $38 billion to $44 billion—a tremendous growth—and 65 per cent of that was the export of manufactured goods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: So we are both manufacturing and selling.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister not aware of the fact that our international trade deficit in manufactured goods increased from $10.2 billion a year ago to $11.5 billion a year later? If that is his idea of progress, I do not know what he thinks progress is. Does his answer not indicate the government is doing nothing, and is this not another good indication that the country is in a hell of a mess so far as trade in manufactured products is concerned?

Mr. Horner: In reply to that long-winded speech, Mr. Speaker, may I say that our exports have increased. We did have a surplus in total trade of nearly $3 billion, which is a near record. With respect to manufactured goods, the hon. member keeps referring to $11 billion. That is an end-product figure, and there is a difference between our exports and our imports. Our exports have increased, although not as fast as our imports.

● (1452)

Mr. Horner: In no way do I believe we should limit the ability of Canadians to buy goods made in other countries.

Some hon. Members: Boo!

PROPOSALS GOVERNMENT PLACING BEFORE FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC SITUATION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. While he may prefer to procrastinate about an election or a budget, there are some things of immediate interest, namely, the first ministers' conference which is to take place next week.

In view of the fact that when the Prime Minister wrote to the first ministers on December 9, he said the objective would be to determine a medium-term economic strategy for Canada, in view of the fact that since then the economic situation has deteriorated considerably, and given that there are representations from members of the opposition and from the C. D. Howe Research Institute that the government take immediate action to cope with the unemployment situation, can the Prime Minister tell the House if he has any specific proposals to put before the first ministers as the first order of business, aimed at giving an immediate boost to the economy in order to deal with this winter's heavy unemployment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the detailed agenda will be made public as soon as the premiers have agreed to it. I have been in contact with them about it. The hon. lady will see that one of the items deals with the economic situation as of now, and another is in the medium term.

As far as the hon. lady's repeated suggestion that we act on the C.D. Howe Research Institute's very recent recommendation is concerned, I repeat what I said earlier, that we have already done what the C.D. Howe Institute recommends we should do. If the hon. lady had been attentive, she would have seen that two of the important recommendations have been implemented. The first was that the provinces cut their sales tax. Let me remind the hon. lady that the Minister of Finance proposed to the provinces last October that they should cut their sales tax as recommended by the C.D. Howe Research Institute. In addition, the Minister of Finance made the offer to the provinces that we would pay half of that cut. Therefore, this recommendation is not new to us; it is something we have already attempted to do.

Mr. Basford: We invented it.

Mr. Trudeau: As the Minister of Justice says, we invented this idea and, as usual, the opposition is trying to climb on the band wagon.

On the second matter, that of regional incentives, if the opposition look at the March budget and at the November statement of the Minister of Finance, they will see that those two statements contain incentives for regional development and particular incentives for the areas where there is high unemployment—so thank you very much for your support.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. After that recital, that litany of the Prime Minister's statement as to what his action has produced—namely, one million unemployed Canadians—I must say that is not the kind of band wagon that we choose to be on.

Miss MacDonald: I thought the Prime Minister was discussing the agenda with the first ministers two months ago, but he does not seem to have arrived at an agenda—so he says—in all that time. I should like to ask whether he will now consider canvassing them this weekend with specific proposals to deal with the unemployment situation, or is he really telling us that the one million unemployed Canadians will be the forgotten group at the first ministers' conference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady cannot have it both ways—recommend that we adopt certain initiatives recommended by the C.D. Howe Research Institute and then, when informed we have already taken them, claim that they are not right. Either she thinks they are right, or she thinks they are not. If she thinks they are right, she should congratulate the government for having taken the action.

As far as the agenda is concerned, Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding in the normal way, through consultation with the provinces. I realize the opposition would be much more heavy-handed and would decide unilaterally what the agenda should be, but that is not our way. We have proposed an agenda to the provinces. There has been not only an exchange of correspondence, in which they have suggested modifications to the agenda, but there have been at least two full-scale meetings of provincial officials with federal officials. It is as a result of this that I am today proposing to the provinces the final agenda, taking into account their various suggestions.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In all that wriggling and evasion, the Prime Minister failed to answer the specific question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Is the Prime Minister, and the government of Canada, making specific proposals to the first ministers' conference next week for immediate action to help the unemployed of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is no evasion in indicating that over a period of months we have been proposing various initiatives, some of which have been belatedly espoused by the opposition. Next week the opposition will again have the occasion to evade its responsibility by not supporting more of the government's suggestions.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, for the fourth time I put the simple question. Will the Prime Minister be making specific proposals to the first ministers' conference regarding action that can be taken immediately to create jobs for Canadians? This is the fourth time the question has been asked today.

Will the Prime Minister continue to evade the question, or will he tell this House whether the government is accepting its responsibility and will propose specific policies to the first ministers' conference to provide jobs, now, for Canadians?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, by asking the question four times, the Leader of the Opposition indicates that he does not have a very good grasp of the subject.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this charade cannot go on—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —with one million Canadians out of work, and the Prime Minister of Canada laughing and playing word games with parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have asked whether he is going to propose immediate action that can help Canadians who are out of work to find jobs. We have asked that simple question four times, and four times he has evaded it. I now ask a fifth time: Will the Prime Minister face up to his responsibility and say whether he is going to make that kind of proposal next week to the first ministers' conference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is, indeed, beginning to look like a charade. This question has been asked repeatedly by the opposition, and from this side of the House we have repeatedly given answers. I will repeat some of them. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am not sure the opposition really wants the answers, nor, having received them, whether they understand them. I will repeat a few of them given by the Minister of Finance and other ministers on this side.

In the course of a 12-month period we have cut personal taxes and ensured that consumers benefit from these tax measures to the tune of $2 billion. We have also cut corporation taxes to the tune of $900 million. We have, also, budgeted and begun spending for direct job creation to the extent of $1 billion. The opposition says today—and I understand the Leader of the Opposition had occasion to say it yesterday in Toronto—that we should be cutting $2 billion from spending. Our answer is that we have already done that.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you very much for supporting the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can see that we may get into a rather protracted debate on this subject, and I think the matter should conclude now, it being three o'clock. The hon. member for Edmonton West on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I had a question, but if Your Honour is now calling it three o'clock, I shall proceed to my question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST)—PARLIAMENT HILL—USE OF FACILITIES FOR LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in compliance with Standing Order 17(2) I sent to your ofice the terms of the question of privilege I am going to raise today, along with the nature of the motion I would put in the event you agreed that I had a prima facie question of privilege. The subject matter I wish to refer to affects all the members of this House and of the other place because, in my view, it is a very serious misuse of parliamentary facilities.

It was my privilege some years ago to occupy the chair that you now occupy. I have a full sense of responsibility for the proper administration of this building and its facilities as well as their use for parliamentary purposes. To that and I can do nothing better than quote what you, Mr. Speaker, stated on June 27, 1977. At that time a question was raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester-North (Mr. Coates) concerning the use of parliamentary facilities by commercial or other bodies for their purposes. It was reported at pages 7103 and 7104 of Hansard. You said, among other things:

> I have attempted to develop a policy that whenever these premises are used by hon. members to receive Canadian people who are taxpayers or visitors, there ought to be some parliamentary connection. We have attempted to do some things which would on the one hand encourage that activity to take place, because it is at the very root of our domocratic system. However, on the other hand we must see to it that this does not become a commercial establishment and that events are not held here when they ought to be held in commercial premises. Therefore, what I am attempting to do is to exert some influence over the content of what takes place on these premises and to bear in mind that when the buildings of parliament are being used the activities should have a parliamentary flavour and a parliamentary purpose.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

> Even if that were the motivation, which I feel all hon. members endorse, it would not be expected that I would want to inquire on every occasion into the full details of the agenda and of the arrangements, but I think it ought to be expected that since the parliament buildings are being used, I, on behalf of all members of parliament, ought to attempt to encourage the highest possible use and the appearance of the highest possible use, to the best interests and motivations of the premises.

I apologize, Mr. Speaker, in some degree for the length of that citation, but I think at that time you had addressed yourself to the nub of the question.

On this occasion we have a proposed use of the premises on Parliament Hill which, I suggest to you, is not of a parliamentary purpose and not of a parliamentary activity.

Of course, it may be said all the party caucuses hold parties on the Hill. They hold a Christmas party and they occasionally hold another gathering of caucus members in the restricted area of the West Block where there are eating facilities and other entertainment facilities. There is a limited guest list. But I am of the opinion, having read what has appeared in the press as given by representatives of the Liberal party—in that connection I do not think it is the Chair that forms part of and has intimate knowledge of what goes on in the Liberal party—that it determines what is going to be done here, in this building, the use of the Hall of Honour, the Confederation Room in the West Block and the West Block cafeteria, and possibly of some of the other areas as well. There has been no consultation with other party representatives on what will be done with those premises.

We have the news reports, and I believe they will stand being put on the record. In Ottawa Today, Monday's edition reported the following:

> To keep them entertained, Liberal party organizers are planning 26 bars—dispensing booze at a mere 75 cents a shot—and three bands to fill the West Block cafeteria, a ball room, a parliamentary meeting room and the stately Hall of Honour that separates the Commons and Senate Chambers.

And then in quotes it states:

> "Who wants to drink and dance in some hotel basement room when you can use Parliament?" one planner quipped.

In the Ottawa Citizen of last night, February 7, the following appeared:

> Organizers of the February 24-26 Liberal pre-election convention intend to use a West Block cafeteria, a ball room, a committee room and the Hall of Honour, which separates the House of Commons and the Senate in the Centre Block, to welcome—

And here is the point that is the big difference:

> —3,000-4,000 "party"-goers.

And in quotes it states:

> "Who wants to drink and dance in some hotel basement room when you can use parliament?" said a Liberal organizer.
> Entertainment for the event will be furnished by three bands and drinks will be available at any one of 26 bars.

These premises are subject to security control at all times. In the past we have had party functions where there were limited numbers and there have been security problems. There is no parliamentary function with a parliamentary purpose that will admit, in this building and in the West Block, some 3,000 to 4,000 persons, without the creation of very distinctive security problems.

What about the use of these buildings by other members who have a right to be in the West Block?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is no time stated but 3,000 to 4,000 people will be invited to attend. The party organizers are not going to screen visitors, they want to have as many as possible. That goes well beyond the proper use of these buildings.

There is a further question—the policy convention is not going to take place here in this building. The Liberal party is not going to use committee rooms for actual policy convention doings. No, this is going to be the social adjunct, the hotel, the ballroom, the bars—everything. As my friend from Central Nova says, this could be the casino for the convention. Any party could hold a policy convention, and that is perfectly all right, in one of the hotels or one of the other centres designed for that purpose in this city, commercial premises for which they pay. But here they may pay for security service and they will pay for dining room facilities, all at a very nice rate, of course, but there is nothing that will be charged to them for the premises, nothing whatsoever.

It is a buckshee bonus for the gathering of the Liberal party that they should use these facilities for an adjunct, the social side of a policy convention. If they had made arrangements and there had been agreement that they would use committee rooms for some of their policy discussions, there might be some difficulty, but it would be much more acceptable than using Room 209 as a bar and Room 371 in the West Block as another bar.

Once or twice a year Mr. Speaker puts on a very gracious, dignified reception for members of parliament, Senators, and representatives of other countries, in the Hall of Honour. This is as it should be. However, you, sir, are the host for parliament and the function is under your patronage. In this case, not one of these functions is going to be under Your Honour's patronage, or they should not be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have before me the letter Your Honour wrote to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in his capacity as House leader of the official opposition with regard to these matters. I will only refer to the letter. It was rather strange that it was written the morning the article appeared in Ottawa Today, before there had been any representations by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton who wrote to you on February 7.

The last point I want to make is this. There is a very fine dividing line with regard to the catering facilities, including the provision of drink, on Parliament Hill, used by an indiscriminate group and whether this is in competition with the restaurateurs and hotelkeepers of the city of Ottawa. This is always a very sore point. Having been on the members' services committee and so forth, we know that sometimes there is a question with regard to the cafeteria facilities being used by members of parliament for visitors. It creates a division.

We have major hotels with ample facilities for all sorts of social functions, but they are being completely disregarded. One Liberal organizer, and I suppose he reflects the thinking among those who organize this sort of thing, seems to think that Parliament Hill belongs to their party, so why use the hotel facilities or drinking rooms of a hotel? In other words, they equate Parliament Hill facilities to cocktail lounges and dance areas in hotels. I suggest this is a grave affront to the privileges of members of this House.

In the due administration of the facilities of this place, they can and should be used for activities with a parliamentary flavour. A party convention is not that. Certainly the social side of a party policy convention has nothing to do with parliamentary facilities. To that extent, the use of these premises as proposed should be denied by Mr. Speaker.

My colleagues have suggested that I draw to Your Honour's attention, if it is worth anything in the argument, that the last policy convention held by this party was held in Quebec city in entirely commercial premises. We certainly paid for them. That is as it should be. Under no circumstances should any political party use these premises for the social side of a convention which is held on other grounds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the interest of shortening the discussion on this subject and in the interest of getting on with the legislative program, I wish to make a very few comments with regard to the question of privilege that has been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

It is to be understood and accepted that the hon. member's material has been derived substantially from anonymous sources in newspapers, which have been clothed in anonymous expressions like "Liberal organizers", and "a Liberal organizer said that". This is the first time I have heard the hon. member for Edmonton West attach such importance to anything a Liberal said, let alone an anonymous Liberal organizer.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Are you denying that?

Mr. MacEachen: I am saying he has information, for example, that is being put forward which is quite incorrect. He admitted himself in his statement, and I attempted to take his words down, that "We have had party functions in this building." Those are the words of the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We had a Christmas party, our caucus party.

Mr. MacEachen: It would require a hypocrite of dimensions that has not yet entered the House of Commons to attempt to cast the notion that activities of the kind described have not ever taken place in these buildings. We have all been invited to the press gallery dinner which takes place in this building. It is late at night.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Governor General goes to that. Is he going to the Liberal convention?

Mr. MacEachen: I would hesitate to divulge all the confidences we respect when we attend that marvellous annual occasion, with many hundreds of people coming into the building. It is a selected group of people. The facilities are available and used in many original ways, as I have learned.

I remember not so many months ago when I was coming into the building, I had to fight my way in the main door. I was coming in at a time when the lawyers of Canada were leaving the building after having what might be called a mammoth reception. We would not call it a bash. It was just a reception. However, there were many people, probably including some members who are here, who participated in that reception for the legal profession. Is it argued now that the ordinary poeple of Canada should not have access to the building?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Is it to be argued that it is possible for members of the professions, such as lawyers, to come into the building, but the foot soldiers, as they were so eloquently described by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), should not be permitted? I do not think anyone would agree to that. However, I just want to mention these things so that this can be put into perspective. Those on the other side who do not recollect these events must have had a better time than I expected.

● (1522)

On this present particular issue, it is true that availability for functions has been explored with Mr. Speaker by officials of the National Liberal Federation and members of parliament. No final decision has been made, but I want to make this perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker: you have laid down guidelines; you are the protector of the dignity of parliament.

Mr. Paproski: Lock the doors!

Mr. MacEachen: We are ready to accept whatever decision you may make. We shall support it 100 per cent, and we on this side will observe any guidelines which you propose to ensure that horrendous security problems will be looked after, and to ensure that members of parliament who are going to work in the West Block on Friday night at eleven o'clock will have privacy and quiet.

Furthermore, in the interest of amity and in the interest of the requirements of the Canadian political system I am prepared, as House leader for the government, to consult with the Speaker, to consult with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), to consult with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and with my colleague in the Social Credit party on this subject if that would help. We quite realize that the Liberal party will flourish even if it does not hold a reception in these buildings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join briefly in this discussion. The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said that the argumentation in connection with this motion earlier in the day was derived from quotations attributed to certain anonymous Liberal organizers—he implied that this was not a very reliable source. I want the hon. gentleman to know that any Liberal organizer in the country today, if he is an organizer, sure as hell wants to remain anonymous!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I want to get to the substance of the issue. The Deputy Prime Minister has tried to dismiss this question as one which has been raised in connection with a function which is entirely analogous to other functions which take place in the House of Commons. I submit that the argument he put forward rests on such an assumption. I further submit that the argument is completely fallacious.

In my experience there are only two other functions of comparable magnitude which take place in parliament, gatherings which are large in scale and festive in nature. They are Your Honour's annual function and the press gallery annual dinner. I would point out that there are unique features attached to those functions. First, they are non-partisan, in the sense that they are not associated with any of the political parties—in one case they are associated with Your Honour, and in the other we have a get-together of representatives of the press and old associates, along with members of parliament, for an annual bash—

Mr. MacEachen: It is the size that is important.

Mr. Broadbent: I submit that an annual, frivolous, good-natured function of that kind is in order precisely because it is not restricted to any one party and because it is very limited in terms of the frequency of its occurrence. I am talking about two functions, Your Honour's and the press gallery dinner. I think it is important that the social aspect of parliament be restricted so that we do not find ourselves in a pattern of associating the House of Commons with frivolous, good-natured parties which are, to a considerable extent, subsidized by the people of Canada. Particularly, I submit, this should not be the case when functions are organized on a partisan basis. In my view, neither my own party nor the Liberal party nor the Conservative party should, in the first place, submit a proposal to hold such a bash here. Having been submitted, on the basis of bad judgment, it should not be accepted.

It is appropriate for any of the parties to use the facilities here on a limited basis for a conference or for a serious meeting, but to use these facilities as an extension of a national convention is a serious mistake and would put in jeopardy the esteem, to the extent it still exists, which the people of Canada have for parliament and its members. If we get into the habit of using this building for regular bashes organized by each of our political parties at the expense, in good measure, of Canadians generally—

An hon. Member: Ah!

Mr. Broadbent: Some members opposite say "Ah!". I hope they will reconsider this proposal.

An hon. Member: Quack, quack!

Mr. Paproski: Donald Duck again!

Mr. Broadbent: A quacking backbencher in the Liberal party interrupts me. The reference is to conventions of political parties. I want him to know we pay for our conventions, not the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Deputy Prime Minister would have put his finger more directly on the issue if he had given it more thought. We must not get into the habit of turning parliament, for which the people pay, into an extension of a convention.

Mr. MacFarlane: Let us not waste time!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Liberal whip has interjected. He said we ought not to waste our time upon what I believe, quite frankly, to be a dreadful case of the Liberal party assuming it has a right to wallow in the public trough all the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think the Deputy Prime Mininster and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) ought to be reminded that today is Ash Wednesday. Perhaps it would not hurt if he were to cover his head with just a few ashes.

I do not think it will be lost on members of parliament that the offer of consultation with opposition parties comes, for the first time, only after the matter has been raised.

I would be the last to argue that there are not appropriate parliamentary functions, functions coming within Your Honour's dictum, which can be held here. Of course there are. Nobody is arguing about that al all. The question is whether it is proper in the circumstances for members of a political party to use the facilities to the extent and for the purpose that they are reported to be wanting to use them. That is the first thing. I have not learned from the government House leader what the extent and purpose are. I have not learned from the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Langlois) what the purpose is and how far this has gone.

I have been told that Your Honour consulted the hon. member for Chicoutimi with respect to this matter as a result of some statements which were made and which Your Honour heard on CBC radio earlier this week. The letter Your Honour wrote to me—I think properly; I do not fault Your Honour for that—obviously crossed the path of my letter expressing concern to Your Honour. Under these circumstances I think the House of Commons is entitled to the facts.

As Your Honour said in your letter, Your Honour sought and received assurances that there is no intention to permit attendance at this event by other than registered convention delegates and convention workers. I think past experiences confirm the numbers which will be here to use the facilities. There are 200 parliamentarians in the Liberal party, more or less, counting members of parliament and Senators who, under the rules, are entitled to use the facilities. If each of those parliamentarians invited ten people—and under the rules that would be quite proper—there would be 2,000 registered delegates.

I suppose the information Your Honour received from the hon. member for Chicoutimi, or whoever provided the information, did not refer to the number of registered guests, observers, spouses and others who are legitimate attenders at political conventions and who, I am sure, are now included in a blanket invitation. The number could reach nearly 4,000 people using the House of Commons on that day. From the information your Honour transmitted to me I am satisfied that Your Honour has no way of knowing the number, and I think that is serious from the point of view of security. If the government House leader wants to make light of security problems, that is fine, but I do not make light of them.

It is true that members of parliament use this building for entertaining members of the public. Your Honour uses it for entertaining heads of state, representatives of state, members of parliament, visitors from other parliaments and segments of the community. The Governor General sometimes uses it, and on any occasion when it is appropriate that Your Honour be present, whether it is a Christmas party or anything else, this building is used properly. That is not a bad guideline for Your Honour to use; any event which is parliamentary in nature is appropriate in this building.

Aside from hotel operators, restaurateurs, and other commercial considerations which are great indeed and are a constant source of irritation between the city and the Hill, I think the importance of using these buildings for events of a parliamentary nature is being overlooked. I respectfully suggest that this particular use is unprecedented in our political history. I agree that we have used this building for political purposes. We have used the restaurant facilities, but never have there been 4,000 people here in connection with a political convention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hon. members opposite laugh. I am sorry this strikes them as strange. I will not be sat down because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is exercising a sense of ethics which is similar to the ethics he used when he flew a nanny here from Great Britain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There are two bites at this apple. I assume that the delegates to this convention are quite properly using the Election Expenses Act to benefit under the taxation system because of their rather high registration fees. They are similar to those in the Progressive Conservative party, $175, but the difference is that they will be using a public facility for nothing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hon. members say that is not so. If they establish that what I am saying is not true, I will withdraw that statement.

I am happy to note that the arrangements have not been finalized and that they are still subject to cancellation. That being the case, I think it might be presumptuous if, in the promotion of this thing, members of the Liberal party have been told that they are going to use the parliament buildings. There has been no consultation as yet on this matter, and I am happy to know that the arrangements have not yet been finalized.

For Your Honour to have agreed to this use of our facilities, I cannot help but feel that someone in the Liberal party misrepresented the situation to you. I say that quite candidly; it must have happened that way. I just want my hon. friends opposite to know—

Mr. Olivier: You don't have any friends on this side.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): An hon. member talked about a day off. Part of this meeting is to be held on a parliamentary day. Before any motion to suspend sittings of this House on Friday is proposed, I hope this matter will be resolved to the satisfaction of the House of Commons.

Mr. MacFarlane: Typical blackmail. Now we know what it is all about.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There has always been co-operation on these matters. We have always co-operated. That has been a hallmark of this place, but this is the first time we have been asked to clear the House of Commons for a shindig. I think the government House leader should live up to his reputation with regard to consultation. I suppose the first person to consult would be Your Honour, and then the House leaders should be consulted so that we can get back to the system of consultation and co-operation.

Most important, these premises should be used appropriately. I am open to consultation. I always have been. I just wish that someone had had the good grace to suggest that it might be a good idea to sit down and talk about this before presuming anything.

Mr. Speaker: There will have been representations from all parties on this matter after I have recognized the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise). There are several other hon. members who are seeking the floor to make interventions. I am going to conclude the discussion with the hon. member for Abitibi because that will complete an all-party discussion. At the conclusion of the remarks of the hon. member for Abitibi I may have some remarks to make.

Mr. Brisco: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Jones: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Abitibi.

● (1542)

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, no doubt you have noted as all of us did that the request made by Liberal party officials to use available premises in the Parliament Buildings for what might be termed a giant reception at the political convention of their party has given rise to strong feelings in the House. I think it is unusual that the organizers of such a large demonstration ask permission to use public premises such as those available to members in the Parliament Buildings. Such a demonstration could give rise to future complications and I think that even if it established that members can use those premises to receive delegates from their ridings, or groups of electors visiting the national capital or meeting ministers, I think that on those occasions those rooms can be made available for members or even for a caucus. But when it comes to large gatherings such as the convention of a political party, not only a Liberal convention, but the convention of any Canadian party, I think that such requests should be turned down. Ottawa and Hull are not small towns and have organizations in a position to host conventions and groups as large as that expected during the weekend of February 24 and 25. Now, Mr. Speaker, when the convention for the selection of a leader for the Social Credit Party of Canada was held in Ottawa in 1975, we rented some facilities in the city and our convention was held there. I think that the Liberal party was ill-advised when it asked you for permission to use the public premises of the House of Commons to hold such large convention which, as we know, could have serious effects when we realize how preparations are going on to serve refreshments to some 3,000 or 4,000 guests at a party. It could have serious consequences which would remain in the history of Canadian parliamentarism.

So I think we should avoid this kind of things. In my opinion the Liberal organization is not made up of beggars and I think they have enough money to look for facilities in town because there are places where they could be accommodated and I suggest they go to those places to host their delegations and their guests.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of other hon. members who seek to make an intervention in this regard; I know the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) is one, and there are others including the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier). I have no intention of preventing their intervention in any way. At this moment I am simply going to defer the matter until a later time when I may hear these other representations. The matter has been raised, and I want to give the House a brief history of it. I would invite hon. members to exercise some patience while we do undertake the kind of consultations referred to by several participants.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has raised this by way of a question of privilege. Indeed, it is a matter that deeply affects the right of all members to access to the building. They have made representations as to the proper use of the building, and I think this is a very proper subject to be taken up in this way.

The House will know that on Monday some hon. members made representations to me. When I wrote the hon. member for (Grenville-Carleton) I was writing to all four House leaders. I was doing so for two reasons. First of all, the press on Monday morning had raised this problem and, secondly, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had in fact come into my office to speak to me about it, so I was well apprised of the difficulties we were facing and, as well, very much aware of the concerns expressed by hon. members.

I called in the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Langlois), who is the social convener from the House of Commons side of this convention for the Liberal party, and after a discussion I wrote that letter to the House leaders.

That does not tell the whole story. On reflection, going back to the beginning of these arrangements, I was asked, following the necessary step, that I make some of the premises available in the House for an event in connection with this convention. I have my notes here, and on checking back on a request for an examination of precedents in respect of the use of the building in this respect I found, and I may be over-simplifying it, that in principle, as I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) attempted to put it, there were precedents which would support this kind of use of the building.

Certainly on a numerical basis, the formula for inviting a number of guests for each member or Senator would lead to something that could be held along these lines. The difficulty, of course, is that if this were done all at the same time it would so over-tax the ordinary facilities of the building that some special arrangements would have to be made. I only say this to indicate that I did examine the precedents to see whether functions of this sort, or of some sort, had been held in connection with meetings of this kind.

I also re-examined my own precedents that I had outlined to the House some time ago in the way of a statement regarding the proper use of this building because, indeed, as I have said in the past, the building should be used to bring Canadians into contact with their members of parliament in this setting. Sometimes that is done purely for parliamentary purposes, and sometimes for a combination of parliamentary and social purposes. Therefore, in keeping with that, it seemed in principle it would be appropriate to hold some event.

In fairness, I think what has happened is not that the nature of the event was in any way misrepresented to me, but probably, since the giving of permission and the state arrangements have reached at the present time, the proportions of the event have grown tremendously, at least in the understanding of the people who were engaged in the original conversation.

At this point there are two questions. In principle, is there something untoward about the use of these buildings for this sort of event, and, even in principle, if there is not something untoward, has this matter in this particular instance grown to such a dimension it raises problems that were not anticipated at the time of the giving of permission?

If the House will permit me to do so, I should like to pursue the matter with the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) as he has suggested, and following our conversation I would pursue it with other House leaders, as has also been suggested, to see whether the matter can be resolved in that way.

If it cannot be resolved in that way, then I assume all the hon. members who seek to make an intervention this afternoon that, before finalizing my decision on the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton West, I will certainly come back to the House and give them an opportunity to make such intervention, and that includes, of course, the independent member who was not represented in the party discussions this afternoon.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you mentioned in your comments a moment ago, I am one of the members who was seeking your recognition on this issue on the basis of the fact that I provided you with notice of my intention to raise this as a question of privilege. I appreciate and accept your comment that you are prepared to bring this forward at another time to allow members to contribute further and express their concerns. My concern, Sir, is that I shall be absent from this House on parliamentary business from February 9 to February 13 inclusive. In light of that, I find it very difficult to accept your ruling. Because I am highly indignant about the entire affair I regret having lost the opportunity to express that indignation and the indignation I feel my constituents inevitably will feel.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Kootenay West insists, he certainly can express his indignation right now.

Mr. Brisco: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker I will be as brief as possible. I am not going to deal in legal terms or parliamentary references, like those used by experienced members such as a former Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and our House leader. I would ask you, Sir, as the First Commoner, how you or any member in fact feels he would be received with reference to this proposal if an approach were made to Canadians on the street today? If you were to ask people in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, Montreal or Halifax about this matter, what do you think the response would be?

• (1552)

Rarely have I felt as indignant, astounded, and hurt by the responses from the insensitive hon. members on the government side of the House as I have today. These hon. members are not treating this matter seriously.

I had the opportunity of standing in the Hall of Honour and watching Her Majesty the Queen enter the parliament buildings. The Hall of Honour exists to honour Canadians. When I think of it being used for a Liberal convention, I wonder what Canadians will think of the manner in which we treat and remember the people for whom that Hall exists. Whether or not the rules of the House provide for such, I think it is grossly wrong. It is a matter of principle, and that basic principle is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which has nothing to do with the matter presently before the House.

Mr. Speaker: I might as well hear other members on the main subject, rather than on a new question of privilege.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this matter is very disturbing, as was suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Brisco). Those of us who were brought up as students of parliamentary procedures and practices respect the decorum of these hallowed halls and buildings. We feel great shame because we have to go to our constituents and tell them the type of bash which will take place, and with this precedent set, what types of bashes will take place in the future. This will lower the respect for and the decorum of the House of Commons, as well as each hon. member.

Toward the end of Your Honour's remarks you indicated that consultations would take place with House leaders and that the Independent would be excluded. My constituents are just as important to the operations of the House as any of the constituents of the other 264 hon. members. All members should re-examine themselves as members of parliament. Anyone who has the audacity to make such a proposal to Your Honour should be bloody well ashamed of himself.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Jones: I see the hon. cabinet minister from Newfoundland is putting his collar up around his head. He should do that. He should be ashamed of himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jones: I am a Canadian—

An hon. Member: Doubtful.

Mr. Forrestall: Withdraw that remark.

Mr. MacFarlane: Who are you? Are you Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Forrestall: I am not Mr. Speaker, but I do not think remarks like that should be made to any member of this House.

Mr. Jones: In reply to the hon. member opposite, let me indicate that I am a true blooded Canadian. I have gone through a lot to get to this House. I expect hon. members to respect each other. The application before the House is stupid and shameful. I hope hon. members opposite can live with it. I am sure their constituents will not live with it. I will proudly tell my constituents there is no way, if I was a member of a party—and I do not think I ever want to be—I would want to have a bash in these hallowed halls.

At one time an hon. memer from Cape Breton indicated that the parliament buildings reminded him of a church. Yes, that is so, and there are many vacant seats too. All of the buildings on Parliament Hill are held in awe and are respected. People from all over Canada come here to see parliament in operation, as well as the beautiful buildings. If they knew the Hall of Honour was to be used for receptions and there would be 26 bars, I am sure all hon. members would be ousted out, in one way or another, before the next election.

I will not be present at the consultations which Your Honour will conduct, but I plead with you to use and exercise your jurisdiction to cut out bashes now. There is no need of any further complications. Your Honour should show Canadians that your office is one which can be respected.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment briefly on the question of privilege before the House. I should like to refer to one of the more hypocritical suggestions made today. I am not one of the organizers of the affair referred to, but I should like to point out that the Liberal party will pay for any use that is made of buildings on Parliament Hill. I felt I had to say that because the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) left the impression that the Liberal Party of Canada was receiving something for nothing. I should like to correct that impression.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How much is the rent?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I sat here quietly in my place listening to hon. members opposite making rather unpleasant and hypocritical remarks about the Liberal party. Surely I am entitled to the same courtesy from them.

The question has been before the House since three o'clock, during which time the hon. House leader indicated that hundreds of lawyers use the facilities of the House of Commons. There are Christmas parties for the Conservative and Liberal parties, which are attended by approximately 1,500 or 2,000 people. The opposition is attempting to create the impression that unless a person is a member of an elitist group and works in parliament, he should not have the opportunity of using the facilities of the House of Commons.

People interested in politics, whether Liberal, Conservative, New Democratic or Social Credit, should be allowed to conduct social affairs in the parliament buildings. The House of Commons is representative of the Canadian political system and works toward retaining the type of democracy Canada has. I say this for all sides of the House. There is the example of the press gallery dinner. No one is supposed to talk about the press gallery dinner. We all go to the press gallery dinner every year and swear a great vow of secrecy that we will not talk about it. Well, I feel very strongly that the hypocrisy shown by the opposition, in attempting to restrict the average Canadian member of a political party from visiting the House of Commons and from using the House of Commons for political and social purposes, is a disgrace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Surely hon. members are satisfied that I have heard adequate argument on this question of privilege from all sides of the House. I will reserve my judgment until later.

● (1602)

MR. RODRIGUEZ—QUESTION TO MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has to do with the question I asked today of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). I recognize that there is at times some difficulty with the acoustics in the Chamber or with the sound system and it may be that the question was not heard.

I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the following question: can he tell the House if he has made any suggestions to the manufacturers in question to locate one of the plants in the Sudbury basin and, if he has not, will he undertake to do so, making them aware of the DREE program and other available incentives? In fact I was not making a representation to the minister but rather asking him if he had made a representation to the automotive industry with respect to locating one of the parts plants in the Sudbury basin. As Your Honour may be well aware, I am very concerned about positive measures being taken in the Sudbury basin in view of the impending lay-offs which are to take place on Monday.

I asked that question so as to obtain some information from the minister on the government's intentions with respect to diversifying the industry in the Sudbury basin. Unfortunately, the minister has left the chamber, but I hope that tomorrow you will catch my eye and I will then put the question again so we can get some answers from the minister.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, I am as interested as he is in the proposition and in the answer and I hope the hon. member will pursue it privately, which I think will be more in order.

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Will you listen to me, Mr. Speaker? Will you listen to me now?

An hon. Member: Apologize.

An hon. Member: Watch your attitude.

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You may have been distracted by what was being said from both sides of the House, but for a few minutes I have been trying to be recognized on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). In any case, I hope it is not intentional on your part because I did rise well before other hon. members and I hope I will have the opportunity to give my views on the question of privilege before us. I think it would be a denial of justice not to let me express my point of view. You have recognized others. I am as much a member in the House as any others who are here, irrespective of the political party to which I belong. I think—

[Mr. Stollery.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have tried this afternoon to explain my position on arguments put forward by several hon. members from both sides of the House. For one hour I have listened very carefully to all arguments. I have also proposed to discuss again this subject with the hon. President of Privy Council and then with the leaders of all political parties. If that can settle the problem, so much the better! If not, later I am going to listen to all other members including the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier).

[English]

MR. MURTA—PROCEEDINGS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege pertains to the question period. I rose on a supplementary question following the question of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), as you no doubt remember, sir. He had a question regarding the International Joint Commission in so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. My supplementary question pertained to the recommendations of IJC with regard to the province of Manitoba. You ruled that it was not a proper supplementary question.

In view of the fact that I will be away for the next three days, I wonder if I may be allowed to ask a question regarding the government's position vis-à-vis the Garrison diversion project on which a decision is being made by the IJC, and the government's position on the transfer of waters from the south to the north. Is it still the government's position to oppose any transfer of water from the Missouri system to the Hudson Bay system?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course it would be a totally unwarranted extension of the question period to permit the question to be put now. I had hoped the question period this afternoon would evolve in such a way as to permit me to recognize the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) on a new question, not a supplementary question as he had tried to put it. It was certainly a relevant and important question. Unfortunately, as he knows, exposure in the question period this afternoon was limited, as often happens on Wednesdays.

MR. NIELSEN—DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMATIONAL PACKAGE RESPECTING BILL C-25

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question of privilege which is directed to the President of Privy Council and government House leader (Mr. MacEachen). In his absence, perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), or his colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), might speak to their colleague.

On Friday, Bill C-25 was introduced. I could, but I will not, mention the fact that it was available to all sorts of persons outside the House before it was introduced in the House. However, what concerns me now is that the package which the minister used on Friday during his press conference, which contains a copy of the bill, was widely distributed to members of the press, members of the public, civil servants, bureaucrats, and employees in the pipeline commission office, but hon. members have not received that package in the mail. I am told that the debate is to commence next Monday on a very important and complex bill.

An hon. Member: Typical arrogance.

Mr. Nielsen: I am asking for immediate restitution to all members of the House so that we might be prepared to participate intelligently in that debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): With reference to the issue raised by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I was here on Friday and you will certainly remember the many points of order and the many questions of privilege which were discussed and which kept the President of Privy Council in the House until one o'clock. He had agreed to hold a press conference at 12.30 p.m. to deal with the bill on the northern pipeline, a conference which I was supposed to attend. This press conference was delayed because of the questions which were raised in the House and which were of paramount importance.

When the House adjourned at 1 p.m., I personally distributed the packages mentioned by the hon. member: I gave three such packages to the leader of his party in the House, one to the chief whip of his party, two to the representative of the New Democratic Party; however, I was unable to give any to the representative of the Social Credit Party of Canada, for there was not a single hon. member of that party present in the House on Friday at one o'clock. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member is complaining unduly. We advised all hon. members and distributed these packages to them in the House at 1 p.m., before distributing them elsewhere.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know that we can carry this much further. The hon. member has raised a point of order or a grievance and there has been a response to it. There is no mechanism by which I can go back to the hon. member again. Perhaps the matter can be resolved in another way. If I allow second interventions on subjects of this sort, it may never stop.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a question of privilege. My understanding of the rules is that when a point of order is raised, a member is denied a second or third intervention. However, I will not enter into that. I raise the matter in a non-contentious way. I wish to inform the hon. gentleman who replied for the government House leader that we have checked with the office of the President of Privy Council, with distribution, and with the pipeline commission office to obtain copies—and that was as late as today—but we can obtain copies from nowhere.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, last Friday, right after the bill was tabled, when the House adjourned at one o'clock, copies of those documents were made available to the parties of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rimouski on a point of order.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the packages mentioned by the hon. member, he said one o'clock, but I should like to point out that at one o'clock Friday—

Mr. Pinard: No one of the Social Credit Party of Canada was there.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: All you gave us was five copies—that is all.

• (1612)

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: I know, that is exactly what I wanted to say. At one o'clock the House takes recess until two o'clock so none of the hon. members were there at that time. When the hon. member distributed the packages, no one was in the House. I imagine it must have been because it was one o'clock and the House takes recess from one to two. That is my point of order. He said, that we were not in the House. We were here from eleven to one o'clock, but from one to two we, like the others, went to lunch.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS OF SOVIET CITIZENS—REQUEST QUESTION BE RAISED AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Speaker: Earlier today under the provisions of Standing Order 43 the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), with the support of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), received the consent of the House to present a motion, and in due course the motion was passed.

The motion made reference to a brief preamble put by the hon. member for York Centre. Upon re-examination it appeared that the motion was worded in such a way as to be self-sufficient in its own terms, and in fact it was not. As a result, the Table officers have suggested an editorial change which I understand meets the approval of the mover and seconder of the motion. The motion now reads as follows:

[Mr. Allard.]

That this House asks that parliament's concern respecting the treatment of Anatoly Shcharansky and other Soviet citizens who have attempted to exercise their rights and freedoms as embodied in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and agreed to by participating states at Helsinki, be raised at the earliest opportunity at the Belgrade meeting of the CSCE now under way.

Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be some understanding. I believe the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) was consulted as well.

Mr. Jones: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker. I do not know who is going to pay for it, but I shall not be there.

Mr. Speaker: There has been some consultation that the motion should be put at this time. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

4. There are no complete statistics on capital spending to expand existing foreign-owned or controlled businesses in Canada. However on the basis of data on the extent of foreign ownership or control in particular industries, the results of the Survey of Capital Spending by larger firms, carried out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and known and projected capital spending by all businesses, expenditures for the expansion or replacement of fixed assets by foreign-controlled businesses is estimated to be approximately as follows: 1974, $7.4 billion; 1975, $5.7 billion; 1976, $7.0 billion 1977, $8.1 billion.

5. Research and development expenditure commitments to which dollar figures can be assigned, given by investors whose proposals were allowed under the Foreign Investment Review Act to October 31, 1977 exceed $30 million. A more precise answer to the question cannot be given as research and development benefits of many allowed transactions are not readily quantifiable. Frequently investors undertake to transfer technology to a Canadian business being acquired or established on favourable terms or otherwise support R and D activities in Canada. The amount shown above includes specific commitments to establish or expand research facilities but does not include in all cases the costs of continuing to operate such facilities. It includes an estimate of salaries of research professionals, in those cases where investors have undertaken to employ a specified number of such persons in research, but does not include any estimate of capital or other operating costs that would necessarily be incurred in such situations. In addition, the amount above does not include estimated R and D expenditures in those cases where investors have undertaken to spend a specified percentage of future gross revenues or sales for R and D. Commitments with respect to R and D expenditures or the transfer of technology were given in 295 allowed investments in the period from April 9, 1974 to October 31, 1977.

6. Planned investment under proposals that were allowed under the Foreign Investment Review Act to October 31, 1977 amounts to $2,450 million.

7. The plans and undertakings of investors whose proposals were allowed under the Foreign Investment Review Act provide for the direct creation of 32,160 jobs. This figure includes a relatively small number of jobs retained as a result of allowed acquisitions in cases where those jobs would almost certainly have been lost if the acquisition had not been allowed to proceed. It does not include jobs that will be created indirectly, e.g. those that will be created in supplying industries.

8. Yes, the agency monitors and reviews compliance with all undertakings given by investors at appropriate intervals after allowance of the investment by the governor in council. Usually the monitoring begins one year after the government's decision to allow. However, where there are commitments to be fulfilled in a shorter period of time the investor is required to report on the fulfillment of those undertakings as soon as fulfillment is due. The agency seeks verification of investors' reports of their performance with respect to undertakings when and to the extent considered necessary, consistent with responsible administration of the act.

REMOVAL OF GANTRY CRANE FROM QUEBEC CITY TO MONTREAL

Question No. 488—Mr. Forrestall:

Did the National Harbours Board agree with Logistic Corporation or its subsidiary SAAB to move its gantry crane from Quebec city to Montreal and, if so, what location at the Port of Montreal will accommodate the crane?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: No agreement has been made between Logistic Corporation or its subsidiary corporation and the National Harbours Board to move a gantry crane from Quebec city.

REYE'S SYNDROME

Question No. 705—Mr. Howie:

1. Did the Medical Research Council sponsor research into Reye's Syndrome since January 1, 1975 and, if so (a) in what locations (b) by whom (c) in each fiscal year since the inception of such research, what amount was paid?

2. Have there been any findings as to the cause of Reye's Syndrome and has any link with aerial spraying of spruce budworm been established?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Medical Research Council is concerned: 1. Yes. (a) Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia. (b) Dr. J. F. S. Crocker, Associate Professor of Pediatrics. (c) 1976-77: $14,550; 1977-78: $15,750.

2. To the best of our knowledge a link between aerial spraying for spruce budworm and incidence of Reye's Syndrome has not been definitely established.

RHEUMATIC FEVER

Has the Medical Research Council funded any research presently underway into rheumatic fever?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Medical Research Council is concerned: No. It is of course possible that basic research underway into the auto-immune response or streptococcal infection could in future have a bearing on rheumatic fever.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—AMOUNT SPENT FOR ENTERTAINMENT SINCE APRIL 1, 1976

2. What was the government's participation in the project?

3. Has the rehabilitation of handicapped persons been entrusted to a private organization and, if so, to which organization?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Minister of National Health and Welfare is concerned: 1, 2 and 3. There was no involvement with the subject of this enquiry.

INDIAN EDUCATION

Question No. 793—Mr. Smith (Churchill):

1. Are monies available to Indian Bands to review their existing educational system and to plan for the eventual takeover of education for their Reserve members?

2. When Bands take control of education, will moneys be made available to monitor the system?

3. Are moneys available for the training of Band members in preparation for local control of education?

4. Do the provincial education Acts enable Indian representation on school boards and, if so, under what conditions?

5. (a) How many spaces were purchased for Indian children in provincial schools since 1973 (b) how many were purchased in Manitoba?

6. What is being done to ensure that a disproportionate number of Indian students do not continue to end up in non-academic streams?

7. What is being done to ensure universal literacy for Indians?

8. What is the present rate of illiteracy?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Where the need can be established, regions may support various activities which enable bands to assess the feasibility of assuming control of their educational programmes. Federal staff have been seconded to bands for this purpose and funds have been made available for the hiring of outside consultants and for school committees to visit locations where local control has been established. In addition, other programmes such as Educational Liaison and band training may contribute indirectly towards bands' planning for the takeover of their educational systems.

2. Funds for administration, supervision and inspection are already built into locally-controlled school budgets.

3. Training for band members in preparation for local control of education is offered as an integral part of the Band Training Program. Specifically, training is provided to members of band committees formed to assume responsibility for band control of education.

4. British Columbia: The Public Schools Act of British Columbia, 1972, provides for Indians of B.C. to have full and equal rights with other citizens of that province to participate as representatives or as members of school boards. There is no restriction on the number of Indians who could be elected to a school board. The Minister of Education may order that a rural area, such as a reserve, is deemed to be a ward and can elect a member to a school district board. Alberta: Presently, reserve residents cannot be members of school boards in Alberta because reserves are not considered to be part of a district, division or county. The province drafted legislation a few years ago which would have enabled reserve residents to participate fully on school boards; however, at the request of the Indian Association of Alberta, the proposed legislation was not enacted into law. Tuition agreements in Alberta contain a clause about Indian representatives attending board meetings; however, the representatives do not have a vote. The Lesser Slave Lake Indian Regional Council (Education Division) which now functions as a school board under the auspices of the federal Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, meets with the various provincial school boards where the children of the bands involved attend school. Saskatchewan: The Larger School Units Act, as amended in 1973, permits the establishing of one or more Indian reserves as a sub-unit attached to a school unit. In the province each sub-unit (usually five in a school unit) is represented on the board by one trustee. This legislation does not apply to city boards, consolidated boards or separate school boards. Manitoba: Where the Minister of Education receives a written request from a Band Council for the inclusion of a reserve in a School Division, and the Board of Reference grants the request, the reserve becomes a ward of the division. The new ward elects a trustee to the board of the division. As in the case of Saskatchewan, more than one reserve ward could be included in a school division. Ontario: The Provincial Education Act, 1974, allows for Indian representation on school boards where the board has entered into an agreeement or agreements with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The appointee is named by the band. Where Indian enrolment exceeds 25 per cent, two persons may be named. If agreements are restricted to either elementary or secondary education, the representatives may not vote on issues outside the area of agreement. Where the Indian enrolment is the lesser of 10 per cent or 100, any appointment of an Indian member is at the discretion of the board. In some cases where numbers have not justified full Indian membership on the board, an Indian liaison person sits with the board in discussions of matters relevant to Indian students. Quebec: The province of Quebec presently does not recognize Indian reserves or Indian communities on provincial crown land as being part of a municipality. Consequently, Indians are excluded from participation on school boards as trustees or school commissioners. The James Bay Agreement created two school boards in Northern Quebec. The Cree Board is composed of a member from each of the communities plus a representative of the Grand Council of the Crees. The Kativik (Inuit) School Board has a commissioner for each community having up to 500 inhabitants. Those communities having more than 500 inhabitants have an extra commissioner and the Northern Quebec Inuit Association has a representative on the Board. The Indians of Quebec Association has in the past expressed opposition to legislation which would enable reserve residents to serve on school boards. New Brunswick: The Schools Act (consolidated to 1971) allows for the election of school trustees and their appointment by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. In New Brunswick a resident of a reserve within a school district is considered a resident of the district and may stand for election. With regard to those appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, in practice the Chief and Council nominate a person who is accepted by the Minister of Education. In addition to the foregoing, it is common practice for Indian representatives to meet informally with boards to discuss educational matters. Nova Scotia: Under the Education Act, 1972, it is apparently accepted that to be appointed to a municipal school board the person must be a resident rate-payer or his spouse. For the legislation to apply to Indians, it would be necessary for a reserve to be recognized as being within a municipality and for the province to accept tuition payments as the equivalent of municipal property taxes. However, under tuition agreements and other less formal arrangements liaison committees have been formed by school boards and reserve education representatives. Prince Edward Island: There is no existing legislation which refers specifically to Indian representation on school boards. Newfoundland: Native people are not registered in Newfoundland but people of native ancestry sit on the Integrated Board in Labrador West and on the Labrador R C School Board. Also, a native representative sits on the Humber-St. Barbe R C School Board which manages the Cone River School.

5. (a) 4,277. (b) 486.

6. The Department and local Indian education authorities aim at ensuring, through their counselling services and discussions with provincial education authorities, that sufficient information and guidance is provided to students and parents to enable them to select educational program in keeping with the students' aspirations, abilities and interests.

7. On request by band councils, the department organizes literacy programmes according to local needs and preferences. Community resources, including departmental staff, are utilized. Arrangements may also include Basic Literacy and Upgrading Program which are organized by the Department of Manpower to improve the level of literacy among adults on reserves. On a longer term basis the steadily increasing retention rate of students at all levels is the best indicator of the decline of illiteracy.

8. The Department does not have statistics regarding the present rate of illiteracy since there appears to be no universally accepted criterion at the present time.

CONTRACT BETWEEN AECL AND NBEPC FOR SALE OF URANIUM

Question No. 814—Mr. Howie:

Did Atomic Energy of Canada Limited enter into a contract with the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission for the sale of uranium and, if so, what is the term of the contract and the price charged for the uranium?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows: No.

BANK OF CANADA—TOTAL AMOUNT ON DEPOSIT BY THE CHARTERED BANKS

What was the total amount on deposit with the Bank of Canada by chartered banks on (a) January 1, 1977 (b) June 1, 1977 (c) December 1, 1977?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The Bank of Canada publishes its balance sheet as of the close of business on Wednesday of each week and on the last business day of each month. Chartered bank deposits with the Bank of Canada on the nearest balance sheet dates were as follows ($ million): December 31, 1976, 3,169.3; June 1, 1977, 3,302.9; November 30, 1977, 3,517.

COST OF ELECTRICAL CABLES INSTALLED UNDER NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT LINKING P.E.I. AND N.B.

Question No. 911—Mr. Howie:

1. (a) What was the cost of the electrical cable installed under the Northumberland Strait linking Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick (b) what was the cost of installing the cable (c) what amount did Canada contribute to the project?

2. What is the name of the company where the cable was purchased and what was the cost of transporting it to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. (a) Approximately $36,000,000. (b) The cost of installing the two cables is not available since this element of the project cost was included in the price for supply and installation of the cables. (c) The contribution by Canada to the project totals $27,000,000 comprising a grant of $18,000,000 and a long-term loan of $9,000,000.

2. The cables were purchased from and supplied by L.N. Ecricsson and Sivertz Kabelvorke of Sweden. The cost of transporting the cables to Prince Edward Island is not available since this was included in the price for supply and installation.

BAN ON COSMETIC PRODUCTS

Since January 1, 1977, how many cosmetic products were banned or recommended against use by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Minister of National Health and Welfare is concerned: One cosmetic product has been banned for reasons of microbial contamination. Two non-product specific regulatory actions have been undertaken which will affect cosmetic products. Effective January 1, 1978, chloroform has been banned from cosmetic products and effective the same date estrogenic substances may no longer be included in the formation of cosmetic products.

Question No. 1,135—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and those agencies that report to it?

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada does not record expenditures by constituency. Restrictive Trade Practices Commission: same as above.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I commenced my remarks on this bill last night. I must say I am all shook up this afternoon at this surprising attempt to turn our hallowed halls into a beer emporium, but I shall carry on.

I hope all hon. members present read the remarks I made last night so that they have a proper introduction to what I am going to say now. I pointed out that the $808 million that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) wants us to agree that the government should lift from the back of the CNR is not all that is needed to put the CNR on a profit-making basis, according to Mr. Bandeen, the president of CNR. He said four things were needed, according to a report in the Globe and Mail on February 11, 1977, and I shall repeat them quickly. He said the CNR can be profitable if four main burdens are lifted. He did not mention the fifth burden—the Minister of Transport, because I suppose he has to watch his p's and q's. There are really five great burdens.

The first one was the losses from the almost compulsory provision of rail passenger service which he estimated at $50 million per year. The implication is that we do away with rail passenger service except where it makes a profit.

The second burden was the losses from grain transportation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: It is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just thought I should tell the hon. member that I have read his remarks and it would probably be helpful to the House if he did not repeat them but went on to his final remarks.

Mr. Crosbie: I admire the efficiency of the minister but it would do him good to listen to my remarks twice. His performance might improve.

An hon. Member: He would still hear nothing.

Mr. Crosbie: The losses from grain transport at low Crowsnest rates, Dr. Bandeen calculated, could reach about $64 million in 1977.

He mentioned losses from rail operations in Newfoundland in the range of $22 million to $23 million per year. Of course the only way to do away with that is do away with the rest of the railway in Newfoundland—in other words the freight, the cargo, the employees and the passengers.

The fourth burden he mentioned is the $2 billion in long term debt, most of it owed to the federal government, which has been building since the founding of the Crown corporation in 1923.

This bill only does part of what Dr. Bandeen said was needed to put the CN on the even keel. I pointed out last night that we would have an ideal situation if all these things were carried out. We will have a railway with no passengers, no freight, no cargo, no carriages, and then we will have a profitable railway. This is desirable if we look at it from that point of view. But we do not look at it from that point of view where I come from, Mr. Speaker. We believe that transportation is a service not to be based on the principle entirely of user-pay, or boozer-pay. Transportation is a policy.

The four Atlantic premiers suggested to the minister when they met with him a few months ago that transportation should be a positive instrument for regional economic development. Transportation is not just a pay-your-way concept. If that were the case we would never have had the CNR and we certainly would never have had the Newfoundland railway. We would not have had the marine or ferry service in Newfoundland, and the like. The minister and the CNR want to put the railway on a self-sustaining profit-making basis. When that is done they are in a deadly bind for which this government has not been able to find a solution.

I want to point out to the House, when it is stated the Newfoundland railway operations lose $22 million to $23 million a year, that one of the items included in the loss is interest on a $100 million loan made to the CN by the Government of Canada in 1952. A $100 million loan was made to the CNR in order for them to use the funds to improve the Newfoundland service and facilities. No interest was paid on that loan until 1974, a year before the present minister got his hooks into transportation. Since 1974 they have had to pay interest on that $100 million loan and the amount which is included annually in their losses is $5.5 million. So, of the $22 million to $23 million which they say they are losing on the passenger service, $5.5 million is interest on this 1952 loan which should now be cancelled.

I ask the minister the next time he speaks on this bill to say whether or not the Government of Canada will agree to cancel repayment of the $100 million loan to the Newfoundland section of the CNR which was made in 1952.

Some of the items which concern us in Newfoundland have been studied by a Royal Commission on Transportation which should be reporting in a month or two. The chairman is Dr. Arthur Sullivan; Mr. Esau Thoms and Mr. B. Ploughman are the two other members. We do not know yet what they are going to report. It has been suggested before the commission that the railway service in Newfoundland should be closed absolutely. I say to the minister now to forget that, to forget any thought that he is going to close the railway operations in Newfoundland absolutely. He is not going to close them, and if he attempts to close them he will have more trouble on his hands than he has ever had before because we simply will not let the railways be closed. If he and the CNR refuse to operate the facilities, we will operate the facilities and we will take the wherewithal from federal taxes that we will withhold, or from wherever, to operate the railway. So he can forget it. He has no solution to the problem of closing the remaining CN rail operations in Newfoundland.

In 1974 there were 1,891 employees in the railway service of CN. There are 3,000 to 4,000 employees in CN altogether but 1,891 are employed by CN rail. In 1976 there were 1,715 employees, 176 less than 1974. The CN, encouraged by the Minister of Transport and the government, is doing everything it can to squeeze employees out of the system, to lay off more Newfoundlanders who will join our already horrendous unemployment ranks. When the CN are not laying off workers they are transferring them to the mainland. They are blinded by their prejudice for the mainland. Everything has to be operated from the mainland.

In their insidious manner, month after month the CN cut down on their express service, they cut down on the CN telegraph service and they cut back the CN marine service. By transfer they established the main office for CN marine at Moncton, which is 70 per cent of their operations to be on the liberal side. Now they want to transfer the accounting and the computing services to the mainland of Atlantic Canada. I caught the minister and the railway in the midst of that deal some months ago. They are waiting now until they receive the report from this royal commission. This is what is going on. This is the meaning of cost effectiveness in human terms in a province that is already on the bottom rung of the economic ladder. They want the province squeezed. Its railway services have to be squeezed, reduced and cut back year by year in order to save a few dollars.

We know that the railway service is not making money. But what has to be done in Newfoundland is for the minister to spend $300 million or a half a billion dollars to put the rails back into shape again and give the province a decent roadbed and to give us a standard gauge railway. Or, I suppose they could drag along as they are doing now, and if they do that they will be faced with spending some money on the Trans-Canada Highway.

In 1965 the Liberal deal was made between the Smallwood government and the Pearson government. If the Smallwood government did not raise a fuss at the abandonment of the railway passenger lines, 90 per cent of the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway would be paid for by the Pearson government. The Trans-Canada Highway was finished. It is a narrow road. However, in the last 17 years it has completely deteriorated because the freight has now left the railway. CN, being so badly operated and supported in resources, are trying to skimp every corner. The movement of freight has left the CN and is now being hauled by trucks. These huge heavy transport trucks are travelling over our narrow two-lane Trans-Canada Highway, which is subject to some of the most difficult weather conditions in the world.

The Newfoundland climate experiences freezing alternated with mild spells all during the winter and spring with the result that these heavy transport trucks have wrecked the highway. Yet when the government of Newfoundland approaches the Government of Canada together with representatives of the other Atlantic provinces, and asks them to share 90 per cent of the cost of reinvigorating, redoing, revitalizing and repaving the road which is now a danger and a menace, because of this federally induced action the minister says no. "Old cost effective Lang" says "no"—50 per cent, and he will not budge on the 50 per cent.

I think, as the election approaches, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will become less and less cost effective and more and more, hopefully for him, politically effective. There will be a change in policy. But I ask the minister to change it now when he speaks later in this debate again, if he speaks again—all these things—the minister's treatment of the railway, his cost effectiveness respecting the railway, the squeeze on the CN, his refusal to meet their deficits, and so on.

In 1949 the federal government took over the Newfoundland railway. Now it is forcing CN to move all freight on a little highway which is dissolving into the mire. Drive on that highway, Mr. Speaker; it is worth your life! And the minister is not prepared to give anything more than 50 per cent. He knows that the provincial government of Newfoundland cannot raise the money to meet its 50 per cent share of the cost, which would be something like $100 million over ten years. The minister has to change his policy there, and to bend.

We have other problems. The CN bus service was to replace our rail passenger service. It was supervised by the Newfoundland Public Utilities Commission which did not allow exorbitant rate increases. In July of 1976 the Minister of Transport, the "bus snatcher" as we call him in Newfoundland, had an order in council passed and snatched the buses from under the jurisdiction of the public utilities commission and placed them under the jurisdiction of this laughable joke, this Canadian Transport Commission. What has happened since is just what I have said, Mr. Speaker. It is an insidious plan to give rate increases.

First of all they had a rate increase of 8 per cent and they approved it without blinking an eye several months after they gained jurisdiction over the rates. Now six months later CN has asked for another 15 per cent increase; I did not have time to check this but I think that 15 per cent has also been approved. There has been a 23 per cent increase in total since the bus service went under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission—all without consultation with the province. This is co-operative federalism? This is the Liberal view on how to treat the provinces! Does anyone wonder why the province of Quebec wants to separate? Does anyone wonder why any provincial government in Canada today, with one or two exceptions, is angry and frustrated and disturbed at the federal government? They are no longer satisfied with this system. There is one thing that will change that, Mr. Speaker, that is a change of government, and that is coming.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the Minister of Transport rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The hon. member has referred to a lack of consultation in connection with the problem relating to the buses in Newfoundland. I expected that he would have known there was a consultation. At that time the buses were not operating because of the actions taken by the Newfoundland government. Indeed, there were members of his own party from Newfoundland who joined in asking me to act to make sure those buses would operate again. We transferred them to another jurisdiction in order to get them operating again. I hope the hon. member will recognize that fact and that consultation.

● (1632)

Mr. Crosbie: I do not recognize that fact. I do not have the time now to go into the details to ram that right down the minister's gullet. Here is the minister's idea of co-operation. This is what the four Atlantic premiers said. I quote:

> Federal-provincial consultation does not occur when one party merely informs the other of its position or intended action.

That is the minister's view of consultation, "There you are, boys, this is what I am doing." That is his idea of consultation. It does not take place.

I go on with the quote:

> It does not take place when the basic information or rationale underlining one party's position is partially or completely withheld from the other party. It does not occur when the dialogue starts too late to influence positions or events.

Finally, it does not occur when a point adequately and fairly demonstrated by one party to be in the common interest is dismissed out of hand by the other, regardless of the degree of jurisdiction that each may have in the matter.

That is our view of the minister's kind of consultation. There was no consultation on that bus situation. It was barbaric. The protest from the Newfoundland government will be ample to show that.

The CN dockyard is there. It is owned by the Government of Canada. This crowd opposite owns it. They got it lock, stock and barrel in 1949. CN is operating it at the request of the Government of Canada. That dockyard has had losses for several years. There were rumours that it was going to be closed. It is not going to be closed. As long as I am in this House, I do not care what side I am on, it is not going to be closed. There are 350 to 400 people working in that dockyard. It is of tremendous economic benefit to the city of St. John's. It is not closing.

Last year it broke even. That yard could make money if the Government of Canada would get off its fanny and advance a loan of $6 million to the dockyard authority so that they could buy and instal a syncrolift. The yard is old. It has a big graving dock. When you put a vessel or two on that graving dock, as long as they are still under repair you cannot take other vessels. You cannot allow the water out and other vessels in until the job is finished. The consequence is that they have to turn away work while the graving dock is occupied. Last year they turned away over 20 major jobs from ships passing in the Atlantic which got into trouble because the graving dock was in use and they could not guarantee quick service.

With a syncrolift there to handle repairs on all the vessels under 4,000 tons, they will be able to expand their work force by 200. They will then be able to handle all the work they are offered.

When the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) changes the regulations, as he is going to, so that foreign fishing vessels can be repaired in Canadian dockyards and crew changes and cargo changes can take place, that dockyard will really come into its own. That is what we want of that dockyard. We are not even asking for a grant.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is not concerned. He does not care. Maybe he thinks he is taking it out on me because he has not moved on this. He made a stupid statement in January about a new shipbuilding policy for spending money in Esquimalt and in two places in Quebec, Granby and Lachine. They are giving grants to those dockyards which they own.

After a study of the situation for two and a half years in St. John's, Newfoundland, by a task force of his own officials, the minister says he is still studying the situation in Newfoundland and that he will talk to the Newfoundland government about it. There is no need for further study. What we want is a $6 million loan from the federal government to that dockyard in order to get the syncrolift installed. By the way, relations between the minister and the Newfoundland minister of transportation and communications could not be more abysmal or unsatisfactory. I have never seen the likes of it. This minister will not give our minister the time of day. There is no consultation there.

CN Marine has just taken over all the vessels and other assets which the federal government financed for the ferry service and marine coastal service in Newfoundland. That went into effect January 1, 1978. The idea is that CN Marine is going to operate as efficiently as they can. The minister and the government are to meet any losses they have in that service. If they can operate more efficiently within the boundaries set by the minister's department, they will make money and so on.

Mr. Gratwick made a speech about this on February 3. He is a very able official. I am supportive of him as I am of all CN officials. They are a fine group, very efficient. The trouble they get into is caused by the government which will not give them the money to do the job. They have been told they have to make a profit. This is what they are trying to do. Mr. Gratwick's speech illustrates the dilemma. This speech was delivered to the Kiwanis Club of Ottawa on February 3. He said:

When I preach the need for vigorous control in the operation of public ferry services, it should be easier to obtain agreement from this group—

He is referring to the group here in Ottawa. He further stated:

Certainly CN Marine is the product of a constrained economic environment.

Why constrained? It is because the federal government has constrained it.

It represents an effort to balance the pursuit of economies with public need.

That is where the rub comes. I quote from page 3:

CN Marine, incidentally, does not set ferry rates.... Rates and levels of service are set by the federal government.

I ask my people in Newfoundland to note that. It is the federal government that they must hold responsible for the deficiencies in CN's operations in Newfoundland, not CN. Page 4:

CN Marine is essentially a mechanism for applying modern business techniques to control of costs while providing acceptable levels of ferry service at acceptable prices.

That is the rub, Mr. Speaker. Who is going to decide the acceptable levels, and what are acceptable prices?

Last year, the bill for CN Marine operations was $5 million less than the government's budget.

CN is pleased. They think they have done a good job. They saved $5 million on the government's budget. It is the people who use the service who pay for that. They have less than satisfactory service. Every cent was scrimped and pinched. Whenever they stepped over a nickel, their what-not snapped on it. That is how they saved $5 million. That gave a much poorer service to those who use the ferry service.

Last December Otto Lang, the Minister of Transport, and Robert Bandeen, the president of Canadian National, signed a memorandum of understanding.

I am glad Mr. Bandeen can understand him. I certainly do not. At page 5 he talks about the new service. CN Marine is going to operate the ferries to Newfoundland. It is going to operate our coastal service. This is the new arrangement. They have $125 million set aside for capital improvements. After that they generate their own capital.

The Ministry of Transport will specify in detail the level of service to be maintained. It will establish the fares.

That is the rub. Further on he stated:

But what about the user? Does he get jammed between the rollers of private profit and public cost cutting? I think not.

I think so. This is just what will happen in this new arrangement. The users of this service, the public of Newfoundland, the tourists travelling to Newfoundland, the people using the ferry service and the coastal service will be jammed in the ice. "Does he get jammed between the rollers of private profit", that is CN in its new role, "and public cost cutting", that is the Minister of Transport in his old familiar role? Yes, they do get caught because the Minister of Transport says he believes in user-pay and the user has to pay for these services.

CN believes in profit. The government is not going to agree to a level of service and fares that will satisfy the travelling public. It has not for the past couple of years and will not do so in the future. That is what is wrong with this new set-up. It is not going to work.

On page 9, Mr. Gratwick said:

Distinguishing between what is most desired and what is acceptable or will suffice, and acting on it, is what CN Marine is all about.

There is going to be some rough old times with CN Marine. CN Marine will want to do what will suffice. There will be a bare-bones service to carry people along the Newfoundland coast to Labrador and on the ferry service from the mainland to Newfoundland. They will want to do what will suffice, but the public wants satisfactory service. That is where it will break down. It is inevitable that it will break down.

I now want to deal with the Argentia service. I understand, and I hope it is correct, the minister will restore that service with two vessels. Last year, because of the sinking of the Carson, only one vessel was used on that run. The service given was undesirable, uncomfortable, and unsatisfactory. Last year they took a vessel from the Argentia run but now they have taken it back to Argentia. The people of Labrador and the people of Lewisporte, Newfoundland, want to know what will replace it. The MHA for Lewisporte District asks for this decision to be reconsidered and a replacement to be named for the William Carson. I hope the minister will be successful, first, in obtaining a replacement and continuing the service to Labrador and, second, and most important, in ensuing that a proper service to Newfoundland is maintained.

How can Newfoundland enjoy the benefits of the tourist business, such as they are, if the people who wish to travel in their campers, trailers and cars cannot get across the gulf to St. John's, to Argentia, to Port aux Basques and so on? And once there, they need to get back, which requires a decent system.

The ferry service is not a money-making proposition, and it never will be. The user-pay system will never answer the problem, not here nor in any other part of Canada. No account is taken, either, of the fact that the user-pay concept drove all the freight and express services off the sea and railway services and on to the highways. All this traffic going on the highway has demolished the highways. The result is that the province with the least financial capacity in Canada has been left with the job of trying to do something about the highways without the wherewithal to do it, as well as looking after the hundreds of other miles of roads.

A hard-hearted, stony-fisted government without any concern for the ordinary person, without even a streak of humanity, has grown arrogant after being so long in office and has ceased to care about the concerns of the ordinary people. It thinks it can get away with anything. It thinks it can move in and take over these hallowed halls and use them for Liberal party rallies et cetera any time it likes without any consultation with anyone. The public realizes this is an unfeeling government and that it no longer cares what is happening to people. We care in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, and the government will learn that whenever the next election is called.

I would like to advise the minister not to fall into any trap by trying to abandon our railway. I do not believe the CTC will suggest that, although I know the minister would jump at the chance to do it if the suggestion were made.

I have an article here about the CN ferry service which appeared in the St. John's Evening Telegram on June 28, headed "Mix-ups, Confusion on the Gulf—Journalist Can't Believe CN Ferry Service So Bad." The article concerns a statement made by a reporter with the CBC's radio show, "As It Happens." We all know about the reliability of the CBC. The reporter said:

At least 70 people turned up last Friday at North Sydney to make a crossing to find their reservations were cancelled.

Imagine that, Mr. Speaker! Seventy people turn up to make the crossing to Newfoundland at the end of June only to find their reservations have been cancelled. That is a great boost to the tourist industry of Newfoundland—for the hoteliers and moteliers and restaurateurs there, the purveyors of hot turkey sandwiches and that kind of thing. Seventy were turned back because their reservations were cancelled. The problem was caused apparently by the switch of the Ambrose Shea with the Marine Cruiser which had reduced vehicle and passenger capacity. A Mr. Scott—I believe he is with the CN—commented:

"I find it strange. There shouldn't have been any problems."

Well, there were problems. This kind of thing went on all summer and it isn't just a matter of the convenience of a few people, Mr. Speaker.

Another clipping I have here shows what is happening with respect to personnel down in Newfoundland. It says:

CN Marine has denied MP John Crosbie's assertion that computer and payroll services are to be moved out of the province—

Well, they think that puts poor old John right in his place. Then they go on:

—but admits that major relocations could become necessary if CN Marine becomes an independent corporation next year as expected.

And lo and behold, CN Marine has become a separate corporation as of January 1. So old John's assertion was completely right. After that, the article goes on to say:

—there are no immediate plans to move people out of Newfoundland.

No, there certainly weren't. Five minutes after I made my statement their immediate plans were dropped. Mr. Wes Kelly, the public affairs director of CN Marine, said a more centralized structure had been thought about which would "probably lead to relocation from Newfoundland" and that it was being re-examined. That is the kind of weasel-wording, chicanery and duplicity we are dealing with in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker. If I had not pulled that one out of the basket on them in July, 1977, they would already have relocated their computer and payroll services personnel.

Upward of 60 employees could be affected by the decision to centralize operations. But there hasn't been any final decision on the matter as yet. Mr. Speaker, we are not going to let them centralize. They are working out of Newfoundland and we are going to keep them working out of Newfoundland. We have had enough of this. We are not going to allow them out on the airplanes or across the Gulf. To hell with the computers which are over in Moncton or Halifax or here in Ottawa! We are not going to sacrifice Newfoundland to the cost-effectiveness of the CN's computers or of the Minister of Transport's computers.

Here is another clipping dated April, 1977, which says, "CN Withdraws Lay-Off Notices". It concerns the lay-off of several people from the CN Express. We can see what is going on. There is no CN Express left in Newfoundland at all. There is no CN freight service on the island, either. The service has been barbarized by the company's efforts to cut back while trying to make money. The federal government has been on the backs of management telling them they are costing too much. There has been a squeeze in every direction. The rates are too high and the service is too poor.

Naturally a man will put his freight on a truck if it is going to take him 12 to 14 hours to truck it from Port-aux-Basques to St. John's instead of two or three days by rail—if it ever gets there at all. It is their way of discouraging him from using the rail. Of course he will use the truck under those circumstances. So, Mr. Speaker, we have seen the services go down and down. They have done the same thing to the telegraph service. But I must say there has been one improvement. We are getting into French more down in Newfoundland. I had a telegram last week from Jean Pigott. I was holding my nomination meeting that night and she was supposed to speak. She could not get down so she sent me a telegram with her good wishes and signed it Jean Pigott. The man rang me up to deliver the message—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he can continue only with unanimous consent. His time has expired. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Crosbie: I will only take one more minute, Mr. Speaker. In summation I will tell hon. members that the operator told me that there was a telegram for me from John Piquette. So, we are getting much more bilingual in Newfoundland.

In conclusion, I want to say again I am not against the $808 million being removed from the back of CN. I wanted to take the opportunity of outlining some of the problems we face with the service in Newfoundland, not caused by CN but caused by the policies adopted by the government. I would advise the minister that he should approach the solution to these problems and consider the royal commission's report very carefully because we are on a short fuse down in Newfoundland and, as I said last night half-facetiously, if I could I would keep this bill before the House for the next five months until the minister agreed to do something about rail service in Newfoundland, the service which was so casually taken away back in 1965. I ask him, also, when doing his accounting with respect to CN after the bill passes the House, as it doubtless will, to forget the interest on the $100 million he is proposing to charge CN with respect to Newfoundland, because it will, help reduce our losses.

I thank hon. members for allowing me the extra minutes on my time and I advise the minister to be very careful during the next few months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased as a member of the transport committee to speak in support of the provisions in Bill C-17, to amend the capital structure of CN by establishing a viable debt/equity ratio which would place CNR on a financial self-sustaining basis without the necessity for government borrowing. This would also provide for the government and the public a better opportunity to assess the economic performance of the CN.

Before I go further I think it only fair to all Canadians, especially those who follow parliament and read Hansard, to refer to the irresponsible contribution which was made here this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Surely the Canadians who witnessed this irresponsible performance on television realize that we on this side of the House take our responsibilities seriously, as shown by the dynamic administration of CNR. Dr. Bandeen indicated in a press statement today a positive forecast of profits in the years to come.

Hon. members opposite are negligent in not mentioning the positive performance of Air Canada and other Crown corportions. They refrain from telling Canadians what has really been happening in the field of transportation in recent years. The president and board of directors of Air Canada have brought a profit picture to the government and to all Canadians, and so has CNR. However, this afternoon we heard practically everything, save a few comments in the intervention of the hon. member for St. John's West, but comments relating to the bill before us. The hon. member talked about almost everything that is going on in Newfoundland. He spoke about his concern about meetings which might be held in the weeks to come. He made some irresponsible remarks about the minister, and followed the usual pattern of irresponsibility we have witnessed over the past few years with regard to transportation and with regard to practically everything else.

The homework and dedication which should be applied in order to make a concrete contribution to the daily workings of this House are sadly lacking. The previous speaker might be well advised to spend a little more time in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. If he did that, he would serve his constituents and his province better than he has done this afternoon. The hon. member spent 30 or 40 minutes of the time of this House speaking about something about which he really knew very little. Anyone listening to his remarks would be convinced he had not prepared himself with respect to Bill C-17 or any other aspect of transportation as it relates to the administration of transportation corporations.

Last year the committee travelled to the Atlantic provinces, and I was struck by the presentation made in Saint John, New Brunswick, by the administrators of the port commission there. The hon. member would have been well advised to have spent some time with his people to help them prepare their submission. As I recall it, they spent half an hour criticizing, but they failed to put the real facts on the table and to present any logical and reasonable suggestions.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I was at that hearing, and no submission was made by the St. John's, Newfoundland, port authority. The only submission which had anything to do with the port was from the CN dockyard. It made an excellent submission on the need for a syncro-lift. The hon. gentleman may have been there in person, but his head was somewhere else.

Mr. Harquail: The remarks of the hon. member in his intervention this afternoon showed clearly which heads are empty. I was referring to the group the hon. member just identified, the people involved with the dockyard. The hon. member would have better spent his time helping them prepare recommendations which could have been considered. An excellent opportunity was missed. By comparison, other submissions we received at Halifax and at Saint John put the facts on the table for our consideration. As a result, we were able to act in a positive way.

It is always interesting to hear from a former member of the former Newfoundland Liberal government. He has made a complete about-face in terms of his basic philosophy and of statements he has made in the past. The hon. member held different positions and different portfolios in that provincial Liberal government. However, we witness that all the time. We witness it in Nova Scotia, which enjoys the benefits of substantial amounts of federal funds not only in the transportation field but in other fields as well.

The amount of DREE money going to the Atlantic provinces and the positive results of that have been mentioned. However, hon. members opposite are not interested in positive things, good administration or responsible government. They are interested only in picking up leads from the press and coming here with ill-conceived and poorly prepared presentations. They think somewhere along the line they might succeed in hoodwinking the average citizen. They hope Canadians will believe them. They never refer to the positive, dynamic administration of, for example, Air Canada and Dr. Bandeen.

Mr. Paproski: What about the last ten years?

Mr. Harquail: We hear much discussion and criticism about deficits, and when the minister, the cabinet or other responsible corporate officials succeed, people have very short memories.

Mr. Paproski: We give credit where credit is due.

Mr. Harquail: I am glad that the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is prepared to state on behalf of his party that it is prepared to give credit where credit is due. I am encouraged by that. I am encouraged to note that he is taking this position, and when he says that I assume he speaks for all members of his party. This is an encouraging development of a kind I have not witnessed here before. If he is prepared to make that statement, then I am certainly pleased to know this is the position of his party.

• (1702)

In terms of all the consultants and experts who have considered transportation matters, particularly in eastern Canada and the Atlantic area, there is no doubt about the importance of transportation. There can be no doubt about the vital importance of the co-operation that must take place among the Council of Maritime Premiers, the provincial governments of the Atlantic area and the federal government. They must work in concert to develop policies that will bring forth actions and results to provide us with necessary transportation facilities so that we can improve the economic situation in the Atlantic provinces.

We must not forget the important aspects I raised earlier before the committee regarding improvements to air passenger service linking the four Atlantic provinces, as well as the necessity for the continuation of a high speed modern rail passenger service between Halifax and Montreal. These are matters we have had an opportunity to discuss in the committee.

I am pleased that officials of the CN have indicated, through Dr. Bandeen and the new president of VIA, Mr. Roberts, in a positive response, that it is their intention to continue with policy directions to assure Canadians in the four Atlantic provinces that the type of transportation facilities required will be introduced as as result of the substantially large amount of federal money being directed into VIA for upgrading the road bed and equipment in general, and in this way providing a rail passenger service we hope will be much improved on that run between Halifax and Montreal.

We are continuing to work very closely with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the Council of Maritime Premiers to develop that concept, which will be supported by all elected representatives in that region, assuring the people that there will be a modern air passenger service linking the four Atlantic provinces as well. There has been much discussion about this much needed service, and various regional air carriers have indicated an interest in developing a corporate structure to carry out negotiations between the airlines and the Department of Transport regarding the possibility of implementing such a service. As I have suggested, this is of vital necessity to the economic survival and industrial development of various sectors within the Atlantic provinces. We must see this modern type of transportation facility implemented at the earliest possible opportunity.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I support Bill C-17 and its general objective, to amend the capital structure of the CN by establishing a viable debt-equity ratio, putting the CN on a financially self-sustaining basis.

Again, this is just one of the indicators we have of the determination of the government through the department and the Minister of Transport to improve the atmosphere of the situation, by taking the necessary steps to bring forward the necessary changes to the legislation, thus permitting the CN not only to operate, but operate efficiently, successfully and, as we are now witnessing, in a profit position.

Let me take a few moments this afternoon to indicate my dismay and displeasure over the display we witnessed today by the hon. member for St. John's West who took up the time of the House speaking on practically every subject during the course of his speech other than those contained in Bill C-17. I suppose it is too much to hope that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his critic for this department will have any success in keeping those members who would speak on Bill C-17 more under control, and in this way not wasting the time of the House.

I suggested earlier that perhaps the opposition critic in respect of the Department of Transport would invite the hon. member for St. John's West to serve on the committee in order to find out exactly what is going on in respect of transportation in Canada. Perhaps then he would show good faith regarding the seriousness of this bill by not taking up any more time in the House, and perhaps even encourage other members on that side to do the same.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I will now display good faith by not taking up any more time of the House and by concluding my remarks at this stage.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, without the railways I suggest there would have been no confederation. Part of the agreement which lead to Confederation was that a railway be constructed to connect the Atlantic provinces with central Canada, Ontario and Quebec as we now know them. It was part of the agreement which brought Britlish Columbia into confederation that the then Government of Canada agreed to the construction of a transcontinental railway connecting the western and eastern coasts of Canada. Without that east-west railway connection, the natural tendency would have been to move north and south. We might then have had the prairie regions of western Canada drawn into the orbit of the great American plains, with British Columbia simply an extension of the mountainous area of Idaho and Washington states. As I have suggested, there would then be no Canada as we know it today.

Just as there would be no Canada without the railways, without the people of Canada and the financial assistance they provided the developers of the CPR in grants of millions of acres and millions of dollars through guarantees of bonds floated by the company, the CPR would have gone bankrupt, as did many of the railway companies built as separate entities. When they went bankrupt they were amalgamated by a Conservative government into what we now know as the Canadian National Railways.

We know that from the beginning the CPR received generous support from the federal government. People like to use the CPR as an example of an efficient, private enterprise corporation, and often compare it with publicly owned and Crown corporations. I should like to take a few minutes to put on the record some of the facts about the assistance the CPR received from the people of Canada, all of which helped to make it the profitable organization it is today. Let me quote one paragraph from a book entitled "The CPR" by Robert Chodos:

> Largely because of the almost limitless aid provided by the government to get the railway started, the CPR was at least a moderate success from the beginning. The total value of that government aid is impossible to estimate. There was $25 million in cash. Large portions of the transcontinental lines were built by the Government and turned over to the company; those sections cost the public treasury $37.8 million. There were the lands: initially 25 million acres of land 'fairly fit for settlement'—

● (1712)

The book continues:

> The company's prairie lands were valued at $1.50 an acre when it gave back 6.8 million acres in 1886 as partial payment of an emergency government loan; by 1916, however, the company estimated its net proceeds from land sales at $68.25 million, and carried its unsold lands in its accounts at $119.25 million.

The land grants helped the Canadian Pacific Railway to become the tremendously diversified corporation it is at the present time. That corporation runs a railway; it is involved in land development through Marathon Realty; it operates an airline business through CP Air; it is involved in the mineral business through Cominco; it is involved in the oil business through CP Oil; and it owns the tremendous corporation known as CP Investment. The corporation is based upon the assistance which it received from Canadians in the early years. At the present time the assets of the CPR are estimated to be over $5 billion. It was built by the original largesse of Canadians.

Some years after the CPR was created, a number of private investors associated with the Liberal party thought that if investors associated with the Conservative party at the time of Sir John A. Macdonald could make such a good thing of railways, they too should become involved in that business. Thus, the construction of other railway lines was commenced. There was no planning or thought as to where resources were located. They were interested in building lines, posting bonds, selling shares and making money by building railways as cheaply as possible and with as little thought as possible. They did not worry because they knew the government would look after them. Therefore those investors were faced with repeated financial crises. Eventually, a Conservative government had to move in to save the bankrupt properties.

Originally there were five independent railways: the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Northern. All of them were amalgamated into what is now known as the Canadian National Railways. These railways were brought together because of economic conditions. They were brought together under one management in order to serve Canadians, not to make a profit. The original purpose of the establishment of the CNR was not to make a profit.

In an attempt to figure out what to do with the bankrupt railways, the Borden government appointed a commission to study the problem. That commission made some very interesting recommendations. Once again I should like to quote from Mr. Robert Chodos' book, which reads as follows:

> The report was a divided one, with two of the commissioners . . .favouring a government takeover of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, and the third calling for a reorganization, but with retention of private ownership.

When this commission looked at what the companies were worth, it recommended that the government take over the liabilities. The commission did not recommend what would be done by private enterprises, that is, a payment of two cents or three cents on the dollar, which is probably what they were worth. Instead, it was recommended that the liabilities be paid in full. I should like to refer to what the commission said, as reported in the book. It reads as follows:

> —'this is a case for generosity rather than strict justice"..."Governments in the past have not taken a stand on strictly legal grounds in their dealings with other companies' that Canadian Northern shareholders could expect any compensation at all.

That is how the government got into the railway business. What did it cost? What did these bankrupt railways, which should have been taken over for nothing cost? Professor Lukasiewicz in his book entitled "The Railway Game" indicated the following:

> As of June 30, 1916, $1.9 billion was invested in Canadian railways; of this, almost exactly one-half, $955 million, came from the public purse. Except for the Grand Trunk, public investment ranged from 40 to 100 per cent.

Public ownership did not create the CNR's debt. Public ownership did not hang the burden on the shoulders of the CNR, which it has had to carry for approximately 50 years and which has resulted in losses on paper for almost every year. The hides of the then shareholders were saved. Those people went into this business to make money, and when the going got rough and they could not make money, then they got out.

We support the principle of recapitalization. We support the idea that the debt of the CNR should be written off. That debt amounts to $808 million, and the CNR has been required to pay interest on it. Indeed, we wonder why it is only $808 million, rather than $2 billion. If the entire debt of the CNR were written off, its debt equity position would be better than that of the CPR. Thus, the CPR would have difficulty competing with the CNR. I suppose we should be thankful for small mercies. If the government is prepared to write off $808 million, then we support it with doubt and with reservations. On the basis of the policies enunciated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the president of the CNR, Dr. Bandeen, we think this is being done for the wrong reasons.

What is the concept of the Minister of Transport? What is the concept of the present president of the CNR? What are their ideas as to the function of the CNR? To find answers to these questions, one only has to turn to the speeches of the minister and of the railway president. Obviously the minister still believes in the principle of user-pay. He believes if the user is a farmer on the prairies who has to move his grain, then of course he should pay the full shot; if the user is a potato grower in Prince Edward Island, he should pay the full shot; but if the user is a businessman who wants to travel quickly between Ottawa and Montreal, he should travel by air and the price of his ticket should be heavily subsidized. The airlines do not pay for any of the infrastructure, the building or maintenance of airports, or the communications system, all of which are absolutely essential to the operation of airlines. But when it comes to the railways, then of course the user shall pay to travel or to move the product which he produced, that is, according to the minister.

The minister still talks about the user-pay concept, profitability, the value of competition. All these are central to the minister's thinking, even though in fact no country in the world follows a policy of making its railway system pay for everything which it does. Every other country looks on all transportation modes as a necessity for the efficient use of resources and as an efficient way to move people and goods which are produced and required.

A former minister of transport who has now gone to the other place, Senator Jean Marchand, had a much better concept of what the transportation policy should be. Way back in 1962 before he came to parliament, before he succumbed to the blandishments of the Liberal party, when he was still an active trade union leader, he said the following:

> Transportation policy is closely linked to economic planning and as such must be linked to the common good and not the profitability of private enterprise.

In 1975, when he was minister of transport, he issued a policy with the same concept, because it was the right and proper concept. He said the following in his policy statement:

If you look at the size of this country and the distribution of its population you will see that you cannot have a transportation network which is economic everywhere; you cannot have an economic system of transportation to service the north, for example, or to service those regions of the country where the population is very thin. You cannot have an economic system for regions which are remote from the centre.

Then he said:

—the principle of competition can apply where there is competition in Canada at this moment, but it will not work in the many places in which there is no competition.

Implicit in that approach is an integrated transportation system in which you take the railways, the airlines, the trucking companies and the bus companies and you think through what is the best way to move people and to move the goods which we produce and which we need. Have we done that? Has the Minister of Transport given any thought to that? Has the president of CNR given any thought to that? Not if you read any of the papers which they have produced, because they are still thinking of CNR, of Air Canada and other air lines and of bus companies as separate corporations. No thought is given to integration. So a couple of years ago we witnessed the minister pouring $100 million or more into STOL aircraft. There is no way in which STOL aircraft could compete in terms of efficiency with a really modern railway system. We would never put that kind of money into our railway system. We could move people by rail from Ottawa to Montreal, from Toronto to Montreal or from Toronto to Ottawa—when you think in terms of city centre to city centre—almost as quickly as the air lines can do, and a hell of a lot cheaper. In this day and age when we have a world energy shortage, when Canada is importing more oil all the time, we are still not using our railways as we should.

Of course, the minister and the president of the CNR would say that they have divested themselves of the rail passenger service and turned it over to Via. Of course, Dr. Bandeen did not want the rail passenger service because CNR does not see the necessity for a totally efficient system of transportation. What we really need to do, they think, is to modernize our passenger railway system, to improve the rail beds, to bring in high speed rail engines, to bring in modern and comfortable cars, and to wipe out most of the air service which we now have between Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto because there is evidence to indicate that the short hauls are losers. The companies lose money on all the short hauls, but we have not faced that situation, we are still thinking in terms of separate modes of transportation and how to make them profitable and commercially viable.

Every other country in the world has realized that competition between these various modes of transport is a mistake, that there is a duplication of facilities, over-capacity and underutilization, but the government does not think that, as is evident in the proposals which it makes with regard to the CNR.

The minister has made frequent statements in parliament about his view of the advisability of private ownership and commercial viability, but some hon. members may not know, and certainly many Canadians do not know, what the minister's real views are. However, they are indicated very clearly in a letter which the Minister of Transport wrote to the chairman of the board of CNR, Mr. Pierre Taschereau, on January 13, 1977. In this letter he outlined a number of important principles from his point of view, and I want to quote some of them. He said in part:

[Mr. Orlikow.]

You will recall that the October 1976 Speech from the Throne stated that 'In a further effort to reduce the size of government as well as expand the range of opportunities for private enterprise, all federal programs will be reviewed to identify those government activities which could be transferred to the private sector without reducing the quality of service to the public.'

In other words, the minister is thinking about some time in the future, hoping the public will forget the hundreds of millions of dollars which had been poured into keeping CNR operating and that the public will agree to leaving the unprofitable services of CNR in the slow growth areas, the maritime provinces, Newfoundland, northern Ontario, the interlake area of Manitoba, northern British Columbia and interior British Columbia, to the public sector so the public will pour in the subsidies, and selling the profitable sections, the sections where there are lots of people and a tremendous volume of trade, to the private sector in this country.

What could be more stupid? What could be more unfair to the Canadian public? Then he said in his letter to Mr. Taschereau:

Although it has generally been conceded that the railway should operate on a commercial basis, in fact the impression has persisted that Canadian National should be used as an instrument of public policy even if at the expense of its commercial performance, it is the view of the government that CN should make every attempt to conduct its affairs with a commercial attitude and in a commercial manner.

● (1732)

I will come in a few moments to what that commercial attitude and manner mean and what their effect would be on the people of Canada. What follows now is a theme which occurs again and again in Dr. Bandeen's speeches. The minister continued:

It would seem to me that the profit centre concept is an excellent basis from which to consider the formation of full-fledged subsidiaries, the ownership of which might, in time, be shared with the private sector.

Now let us consider what the president of the CNR, Dr. Bandeen, sees as the role of the company. We quickly realize that service to the Canadian public is not very high on his list of priorities and that he does not have much sympathy for the needs of slow growth areas in which half the people of this country live.

I should like to quote from a speech Dr. Bandeen made on May 31, 1977, to the Financial Executive Institute of Canada. On that occasion he said:

Most of all, we needed to have strict control of manpower. In large organizations like ours there is an almost irresistible trend for staffs—particularly management and administrative ones—to expand by geometric progression.

I do not have figures to show how Dr. Bandeen has been able to reduce the management and administrative sections, but we do know that in the last two and one half years there has been a reduction of 6,000 people in the employ of the CNR. When International Nickel laid off 2,800 people in Sudbury and 1,400 in Thompson, Manitoba, there were questions and statements and appeals almost every day in this House, and editorials in virtually every newspaper in Canada. Yet the CNR, a Crown corporation, has laid off over 6,000 people in the last two and one half years, all in the name of efficiency.

In explaining how control of manpower was acquired Dr. Bandeen said:

> The first step was to start breaking out elements into operating divisions which related clearly to market sectors, establishing for each balance sheets which would reflect all the costs involved in doing business.

Later in that same speech referring to the better profit picture, he said:

> The major elements in this performance were, I feel, the impetus given to management by the profit-centre concept and the improved control over performance made possible by our computerized monitoring systems.

When you cut away all the phraseology, that means that the CNR forgets about providing service to the public, and wherever the computer shows it is not making money, it just cuts back. That means that people are laid off, 6,000 of them. I will give an example of what that means in Manitoba as I am in closer contact with people there.

The CNR has centralized its express service in Winnipeg. Employees have been cut back. Some who had worked for thirty years in towns like Dauphin and Brandon or Kenora and Sioux Lookout in northwestern Ontario were transferred to Winnipeg. They were not laid off because they have seniority but the towns they leave die a little because they sell their homes. When they get to Winnipeg the people there with less seniority are laid off. All this means less service.

For years the CNR and the CPR have come to the government and the Canadian Transport Commission appealing for permission to discontinue certain branch lines that are losing money. They say that they can provide better service by the use of trucks. In their ignorance parliament and the CTC agreed, and now, of course, both the CNR and the CPR are discontinuing their trucking service which is being taken over by people who operate more efficiently.

Who loses, Mr. Speaker? It is the people who are laid off—the 6,000 laid off in the last two and one half years who are just the beginning of a move to reduce staff in order to be "more efficient". The people in areas without enough population or money or products to be moved to make it profitable for the CNR, also lose. That means we accelerate the process by giving more to the areas that already have the most—Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and Windsor, while the rest of the people in Canada are left to whistle in the dark because they are going to get less and less. That is what Dr. Bandeen believes in and it is what the Minister of Transport believes in—commercial viability and commercial profitability. For the slow growth areas of the country it means "the public be damned".

This is completely contrary to the view taken by this party, Mr. Speaker. We believe the people of Canada cannot depend on the competition of profit centres to keep transportation rates fair and reasonable. We are concerned about the areas where there are no alternative forms of transportation—the maritimes, northern Quebec, northern Ontario and the prairies. These regions have never had the same kind of competition as there is in the golden triangle and cannot choose between rail and water transportation. There are not dozens of flights each day between their cities, as there are in the golden triangle. These are the people and regions who are going to pay the shot for the kind of policies which are advocated and are being implemented by the present Minister of Transport and the president of the CNR. We are not alone in this thought.

I commend to the members of this House a submission made to the Government of Canada dated March, 1977, by the Canadian Railway Labour Association. I will quote some proposals which they have made in explaining their outline of what the national transportation policy of this country should be. I would like hon. members to compare the suggestions and principles, which they make and outline, and suggest this country should follow in establishing a transportation policy, with the types of policies advocated and, unfortunately, implemented by the Minister of Transport and his cohorts in the CN management. I quote from the submission to the Government of Canada from the Canadian Railway Labour Association. It states:

> 1. National transportation policy should be an instrument of public policy not an instrument for private profit.

Compare that with what Dr. Bandeen of the CNR is saying. The submission continues on:

> 2. Transportation policy must encourage, not obstruct, free flow of people and goods in Canada.

I wish the member from the maritimes who spoke before I did would compare that statement with the very feeble attempts now being made by VIA with not much support from the Government of Canada and the Minister of Transport. I further quote from this same document:

> 3. Transportation policy must provide over-all framework for Canadian economic and regional development.

I ask any member of parliament who is not from the golden triangle what Canadian railway policy in the last few years has done for his region? Has it helped or hindered? Any member who is honest or objective would agree that in fact our present transportation policy has hindered the development and improvement of their regions.

The Canadian Railway Labour Association goes on to say:

> Freight rates should be based on consistent and equitable pricing, not 'what the traffic will bear'. Rates less than the cost of service to apply in specifically designated circumstances.

Let me just urge members of parliament, particularly those from western Canada, to compare what the Minister of Transport and the president of the CNR are saying about the movement of grain with what Mr. Justice Hall has recommended in his report. There could not be greater differences, Mr. Speaker, if they spoke entirely different languages.

Further on in the recommendations from the submission it is stated:

> The purchase of transportation plant and equipment, rail cars, locomotives, trucks, container ships, aircraft and pipeline facilities to meet peak demand and/or essential services.
> 11. Subsidization of inter-city and inter-urban rail passenger service where it is in the public interest to ease congestion of highways, improve the quality of life and to cope with pollution problems caused by other forms of private and public transportation, subject to the railways' equipment, plant, route and frequency standards being approved by an appropriate regulatory body and conditional upon the full protection of all employees affected.

Compare that, Mr. Speaker, with all the lay-offs of workers and you will see how far apart we are from that.

I want to support the proposals which were made by the Canadian Railway Labour Association. I want to support their concept in viewing transportation as a necessity in a modern country as large as Canada. A transportation system must meet the needs of the people. If we do that we must change our idea that the CNR as a corporation must show a profit because that profit will be made. It has been made at the expense of the people of Canada; at the expense of employees who have been laid off and at the expense of people who are now receiving less service than they ever did before.

Having spent most of my time saying what is wrong with the government's policy, what is wrong with Dr. Bandeen's policy, what is wrong with the Minister of Transport's policy and the policy we have followed, I now come back to the only question which we are asked to vote on, and that is the proposal in this bill to recapitalize some $800 million of the CN's debt.

For the reasons which I have indicated earlier we support that proposal. However, we look with a great deal of suspicion at the reasons why this minister is proposing this and what he intends to do with the CNR, if he is permitted to, and if he brings the CNR into a better financial position. We want the CNR in a better financial position and we want the CNR used to meet the real needs of the Canadian people but not by way of permitting private investors to make a profit on a system which the Canadian people have already paid for, not once, not twice, but probably ten times.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, some years ago when I was reading the history of the CNR, I believe it was at university, I read about its recapitalization in 1937 and 1952. I did not realize at that time that I would have an opportunity to speak on the subject of the recapitalization of the CNR at some point in my life. Nevertheless the bill is here before the House of Commons. Once more the question of relieving debt for our great national railway, the CNR, has come up so that it can continue on and compete.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the complaints of hon. members, particularly those from my far left, concerning the great debt which the CNR had inherited and which, over the last 50 or 60 years, it has been unable to recover from. At the same time I look at the other railway which services this nation. I have often wondered why that railroad could come out from under an almost similar debt, not having any of its debt relieved. It has, of course, taken advantage of depreciation allowed over the years and in most cases it has been able to pay a dividend to its shareholders.

During the preparation of my comments I came across a 1935 critique of CNR operations. I was not too surprised to read the following statement "The most important financial problem of the CNR is its tremendous burden of debt in relation to the earning power of the system". This argument has been used many times over the years. This statement was valid in 1935, and I suppose it could just as easily have been written today. We are again starting with a debt position of close to $810 million that we are attempting to relieve.

The CNR, as I have stated, throughout its history has been unable to rid itself of its financial burden. As other speakers have outlined the history of the CNR debt, I am just going to gloss over it quickly again. Attempts have been made to eradicate this debt. In 1936 the total long term debt of the CNR amounted to $2.3 billion. In an attempt to reduce this, a Capital Reorganization Act was introduced in 1937, and the effect of this bill was to wipe out almost half of this debt. In 1952 a further capital revision act was enacted.

Thus, through the Capital Revision Act, whereby an additional $736 million of historic debt was converted into 4 per cent non-cumulative preferred shares, interest payments on a further $100 million of debt were deferred and a nine-year direct subsidy was provided by way of purchasing annually further equity equal to 3 per cent of the gross revenue of the National system. The enactments of 1937 and 1952 were both attempts to stem the mounting debt figures revealed each year in the Crown corporation's annual report, and the effect of the 1952 act was to give the CN a debt/equity ratio closely aligned to that of the CPR.

Despite this government intervention, it was again necessary to rework the balance sheet of the CNR in 1962, and here we are in 1978 with Bill C-17 before us, a bill which will allow the CNR to rewrite its balance sheet once more through the elimination of $808 million worth of debt, debt which Mr. Bandeen has attributed to CN's failure to take certain depreciation charges into account in previous years. I suspect this was particularly the case in the late fifties when CN went into diesel service. This contributed to a large part of the debt, and also to its inability to produce profits through the sixties.

Mr. Bandeen stated that the relief of this debt would provide the CNR with a debt/equity ratio of 38 per cent. Again we see that this equity ratio is similar to that of the CPR. Over the years, and it is important that this figure be placed before the House, all these acts, including this bill that we will pass here fairly shortly, will relieve the CNR of some $6.7 billion of debt. That is a tremendous figure. In committee we have to deal with the reasons why, over the years, such a great amount of debt had to be written off in order that this corporation can continue to provide a service.

Given the debt saga on the CNR, our scepticism at claims that this is the last time that the CNR will approach the federal government for debt is certainly understandable. I hope that is the case. I hope I will not have to stand up in the near future and again make a speech about relieving CNR of certain amounts of debt. My colleagues and I are willing to endorse this legislation provided that this assurance can be made to us, particularly in committee, that this will be the last time CNR will appear before us for debt rescheduling.

CN's track record as far as this debt is concerned points to one of the major problems with Crown corporations. In the case of a private corporation, any losses are direct, personal, and keenly felt. As such, losses have the effect of providing a powerful incentive precaution. However, in the case of a Crown corporation such as the CNR, any losses which are suffered are borne by taxpayers, and thus the burden is diffused and is not direct and personal.

In a recent press interview, Mr. Bandeen dealt with the sectors within the CNR which would need improvement if the railway hoped to improve the efficiency of its operations and if it wanted to entertain seriously the idea of proferring public shares.

Mr. Bandeen cited low freight rates as one of the major impediments to financial solvency. He estimated that the CNR would suffer a $64 million revenue loss in 1977 from grain transport at low Crowsnest freight rates. This concern for the effect of historical freight rates on railway revenues was echoed in the Snavely report which was tabled in this House some months ago. It revealed that almost all the groups participating in the report had concluded that the railways were losing money on carrying grain.

It was not long afterwards that the problem of freight rates was raised in another context, the report of the Hall commission. In its report, the commission had offered the following as one of its major recommendations:

> The production and processing of agricultural products should take place in regions which enjoy natural locational advantages for such activities. Freight rates and other transport-related policies should not destroy these natural locational advantages.

The joint problem of securing adequate revenues for the railways and providing a strong basis for secondary industry in western Canada is one that should be of concern to this government. Over the years the railways have been complaining that one of their chief reasons for losses is because they have to haul grain and some oil seeds at the Crowsnest rates.

We have to realize that western grain crushers, rapeseed crushers, and the livestock industry as well, are suffering because they do not have the advantages of the Crowsnest rates when they ship their processed goods to eastern Canada or to other markets. We, as legislators, have to sit down and seek advice from our constituents on how we can solve the problem of the Crowsnest freight rates as they relate to the processing of oilseeds and the transportation of products that come from the feeding of grain, livestock in particular.

A number of suggestions have been made. The Minister of Transport suggested that perhaps the equivalent of a subsidy could be paid to the farmers through the acreage payment; and as well a payment to municipalities for the upkeep of roads and to solve other problems that may be encountered as a result of additional truck transportation on these roads.

The Hall report recommends that direct subsidies be paid to the railroads for the transportation of rapeseed oil and livestock products in order that they can compete with the Crowsnest freight rates. The suggestion of some people in western Canada is that the government is helping CNR in its financial problems of hauling grain by providing railroad cars. We have provided many thousands of railroad cars to the grain system in order to transport that grain at Crowsnest rates. We have provided them with equipment in order that it is not such a debt burden on the railroad companies. Surely this example could be used to solve the problem of the livestock producer and the oilseed crusher in western Canada. Buy the cars, provide them to the railroads and allow them to transport these procucts without their having to lay out the amount of money it would take to buy the cars.

Those are some of the suggestions I would make. I am pleased to have had an opportunity to speak on this bill. I hope it will be the last time CNR will have to come before us for debt revision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member calling it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

SUGGESTION VENUE OF LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION BE CHANGED TO DOWNTOWN OTTAWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that an application was made to the Speaker of the House on July 14, 1976, to hold a "Lethbridge night" inviting all MPs, senators and their guests, along with the mayor of St. Laurent, our twin city, and in light of the fact this application was turned down, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the Liberal annual meeting be moved to downtown Ottawa, where they can do the same as the NDP, Creditiste and PC parties by patronizing the business people who meet payrolls, pay taxes and provide a service every day of the year and, I should point out, they also vote.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to the Standing Order, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST ALLOCATION FIGURES AND UNEMPLOYMENT RATE BE PROVIDED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of national importance. All members of parliament have by now received from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) notice of the allocation of funds under the Young Canada Works program. One of the obvious deficiences in the minister's communication is the failure to provide allocation figures and the unemployment rate calculated for all constituencies in Canada. Since this does not allow the individual member of parliament any means of comparison of unemployment rates amongst students by constituencies, or the rise or fall of funding to other constituencies, and since this is a vital piece of information so that not only equity in allocation of the Canada taxpayers' money for Young Canada Works be done, but that it be seen to be done in this election year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That the minister provide every member of parliament this information not later than the end of February.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTION CORPORATION CHARGE PERSONS SIXTY AND OVER SAME FARE AS OTHER AIRLINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering that Air Canada aircraft operate at less than 60 per cent of capacity and that in some areas aircraft are the only means of transportation available; considering that there are about three million people in Canada who are 60 or over and that many would fly more often if travel rates were lower; considering that only private carriers such as Quebecair and Nordair offer reduced rates of some 50 per cent for senior citizens along with the privilege of making reservations at any time, while Air Canada's reduced rates do not vary more than 9 per cent or 10 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House urge the Minister of Transport to make any necessary arrangements so that Air Canada provide similar privileges, that is, reduced rates of 50 per cent for senior citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT IMPLEMENT CERTAIN RECOMMENDATIONS IN DAIRY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important matter.

As the government is due to announce its new dairy policy next April, as the dairy producers have found themselves in a dramatic situation for a number of years and as their problems are growing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That this House unanimously urge the responsible minister to incorporate in his new policy the following recommendations: (1) That the government adopt a dairy policy applicable for five years; (2) That the Canadian Dairy Commission be granted the same authority and prerogatives as the Canadian Wheat Board; (3) That price indexing apply to dairy production as soon as prices fluctuate by 2 per cent, either way; (4) That imports of cheese be reduced to 15 million pounds; (5) That the new quota calendar be changed to lessen its seasonal character.

Those, then, are the few recommendations that must be included in the new dairy policy.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MINISTER'S LETTER TO "OPERATIONS DISMANTLE"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, in order to assure the security of the nation in light of the incredibly naive letter written by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) to "Operations Dismantle", expressing his personal view of Soviet military intentions and his belief that in a crisis the "senior actors" should be kept in the dark until the last minute, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to give the Minister of National Defence a less demanding job more in keeping with this demonstrated inability.

MANPOWER

UNITED STATES CITIZEN HIRED BY CANADIAN COMPANY—REQUEST WORK PERMIT BE DENIED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the decision by the directors of the publicly-owned insurance corporation of British Columbia, ICBC, to hire Mr. Robert Sherrell, an American, at $80,000 per annum, in spite of the fact that there were some 100 applicants from Canada for the job, and in view of the fact that Manpower offices were, as usual, not involved in the hiring process, and in view of the fact that more than one million Canadians are without employment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the application for a work permit by Mr. Sherrell be denied in view of the many qualified Canadians available for this position.

PENITENTIARIES

GOVERNMENT IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF SUBCOMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, there can be no doubt about the urgency of this motion. In view of the fact that the unanimous report of the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on the penitentiary system in Canada was presented to the solicitor general on June 7, 1977, and in view of the fact that the response of the solicitor general to the said report containing 65 recommendations for penal reform in Canada was tabled in the House on August 5, 1977, and since the solicitor general has failed to adopt and implement those recommendations considered unanimously by the subcommittee members to be crucial to meaningful reform, and has otherwise procrastinated in the implementation of the recommendations in the said report, resulting in the renewal of hostage incidents at Millhaven, British Columbia penitentiary and Dorchester, in addition to other incidents such as the slaying of the warden of Archambault penitentiary on Tuesday last, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House direct the government to adopt and implement forthwith the whole of the recommendations as presented to the solicitor general and the government by the non-partisan, unanimous report of the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST SUBCOMMITTEE BE REACTIVATED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which has been the subject of wide agreement in the past. Having regard to the recent hostage-taking at the B.C. penitentiary and at Dorchester, and the fact that in one such incident five men known to be dangerous were brought together in the visitors' area, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the parliamentary subcommittee on penitentiaries be reactivated to investigate these latest incidents and present its findings to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to such a motion?

SOURCE OF FINANCE MINISTER'S ECONOMIC ADVICE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. From what sources is the minister getting his primary economic advice these days? I ask this question in light of reports yesterday that senior officials in the Department of Finance have said there need to be major economic changes if this country is to achieve its potential over the next three or four years, yet the minister has constantly stated in this House that there is no need for policy changes. So I ask, where is the minister getting his advice from at this time?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I am receiving advice from people in the Department of Finance. I suggest the hon. member should read the article more carefully. We all agree there should be important structural changes in Canada, but we are saying at this time that we cannot solve our problems through fiscal and monetary policies.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think if the minister read the article carefully he would see that the first recommendation made by officials of the Department of Finance was that there should be a shift in our monetary and fiscal policy. On that point, I should like to ask the minister if he has had discussions with the governor of the Bank of Canada about the fact that the rate of increase in the money supply has gone up very substantially, because for the first time in the history of Canada a high proportion of new debt is being financed through the bank—in fact, 49 per cent.

Has the minister talked with the governor of the Bank of Canada about this new policy that the bank is following, and does he understand how inflationary this will be on the economy in the course of the next six months?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I meet with the governor of the Bank of Canada every week and we discuss these problems. As everyone knows, the governor of the Bank of Canada has told the nation that he will operate his monetary policies within a certain framework. He is within the framework he indicated to the nation a few months ago.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in relation to the answer which the minister has just provided. How can he say that the governor of the Bank of Canada is still falling within that framework, when the rate of increase in the money supply has been tremendous in the last three months? Will the minister get the assurance of the governor of the Bank of Canada that an explanation for this fundamental change in policy will be made public by him?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, he has not changed his policy at all. I explained that he had set a limit on the growth of the money supply, and he is within the limit that he set for himself.

INCREASING FINANCIAL DEFICITS—GOVERNMENT STEPS TO PROVIDE ECONOMIC STIMULUS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The document which the minister tabled recently indicates that he will be calling for continued restraint on government spending at all levels. At the same time, it indicates that government deficits will continue to provide a strong stimulus to economic activity until 1981. There seems to be a conflict here. Can the minister advise how governments, including this one, expect to carry on with this greater deficit if they exercise restraint on not only their programs but on the tax intake?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I was arguing across the floor with the previous questioner, so I would ask the hon. member to repeat the question.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, it is a simple question. The paper that was filed by the minister in the past day or so calls for continued restraint on government spending at all levels. At the same time, however, government deficits are projected to continue to provide a strong stimulus to economic activity between now and 1981. How will governments, including this one, finance greater deficits if they exercise such restraint and, presumably, exercise restraint on the amount of taxes taken in?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have said we are running a high deficit, and we are not planning to have a higher deficit this year. I said earlier that we face a particular problem next year because of the interest we will have to pay on certain bond issues which were circulated in 1969. The cash requirement will be that much greater next year. We are trying to keep expenditures within the growth of the GNP. I hope every member of the House realizes we managed to do that in the last two years, and we will do it next year as well.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It appears to me that the provinces are very concerned about having continuing and even higher deficits, because this will affect their prime ratings in money markets in the United States. How can the minister put this particular situation before them, when it appears to me that the provinces will not agree to it?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this problem with the provinces. I think the cash requirements of the provinces are less, relatively speaking, than those of the federal government. I am very pleased to see the hon. member preoccupied with the size of the deficit, because yesterday his leader proposed that we increase it by $2 billion.

Mr. Clark: Another half-truth.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED CONTRAVENTION OF OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT BY SOVIET NATIONALS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister confirm a news report that has just come over the wire, to the effect that 13 Soviet nationals have been found to be involved in inadmissible activities in Canada, in clear contravention of the Official Secrets Act and, if so, would the minister tell the House what, if any, action has been taken?

● (1422)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the general report as stated by the hon. member. I will be making a full statement on this matter at the appropriate time, as near to three o'clock as possible.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST HOUSE COMMITTEE STUDY ADMINISTRATION OF DEPARTMENT AND POSSIBLE CONVERSION INTO CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. First, I should like to congratulate the minister on his appointment to this important federal institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: In view of the effectiveness of committees of the House in bringing about reform of other federal institutions experiencing grave difficulties, will the Postmaster General agree to establish a special committee of the House, in the session, to inquire into the postal service, into the administration of the Post Office, into labour management relations therein, and into the advisability of converting the Post Office into some form of Crown corporation?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague from Scarborough East for his congratulations. Probably—

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a really bad show: a fixed question right at the beginning of oral questions.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Scarborough East for his congratulations. They will probably be the last I shall receive in this House, I might as well enjoy it as long as it lasts.

I have said in public, on television and in other places, that I would be coming into this job with as open a mind as possible.

Many suggestions have been made, such as a royal commission, a committee, and a Crown corporation.

Mr. Lawrence: What about nationalization?

Mr. Lamontagne: Nationalization has already been done.

But all hon. members will understand, I think, that the negotiations are going on. Since I have taken office, mediators have been appointed in both cases with the CUPW and the GLT. CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR MORE SEVERE PENALTIES FOR KILLING OF PRISON GUARDS OR POLICE OFFICERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

Following the murder of Archambault Institution Warden Michel Roy, I moved a motion yesterday pursuant to Standing Order 43 to ask the House to consider seriously increased violence in Canada. My question is as follows: Given the growing number of murdered policemen, prison guards and even the murder of a warden, is the Solicitor General in a position to tell the House whether he will seriously study this matter with his cabinet colleagues and then present to Parliament a bill to amend the Criminal Code and impose harsher penalties on those who show no respect for life? Is the Solicitor General prepared to take a step in such direction?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. Indeed, as I said yesterday when I thanked him and his colleagues for their representations, this is quite a serious matter. As for his allegations about the growing number of certain crimes which he specified, I would ask him to provide particulars on which his allegations and representations are based.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question.

The invitation I have just received from the Solicitor General deserves a reply and today, in order to be able to provide him with the necessary information, I had a question put on the order paper requesting full details on events which have occurred over the past few years, details which, as soon as I am provided with them, I shall convey to him. I hope he will agree to look into this as soon as he receives the information and then seriously consider introducing legislation to amend the Criminal Code so that we may enjoy a little more peace and order in Canada—

GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE TO CURE ECONOMIC ILLS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Now that the government has made available its document prepared for the recent meeting of finance ministers and for the upcoming first ministers' conference on Canada's medium-term economic approaches, projections and targets, will the Prime Minister, in his usual co-operative manner, make available the governments' document on short-term projections, targets and proposals to deal with the current economic crisis, which it intends to make available to the first ministers next week? I presume that such a document exists.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will consider the hon. lady's request.

Miss MacDonald: Will the Prime Minister state, since he is not putting forth any such document here in the House, whether he is also declaring that there is an absence of any such proposals, and that what in fact he is doing is throwing on to the provinces the onus to deal with the economic situation which his government has created, thereby declaring not only bankruptcy in fiscal terms in this country but bankruptcy in ideas as well?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, surely that was an argument rather than a question.

OPPORTUNITY FOR INTERESTED PERSONS TO SUBMIT VIEWS ON RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the final plan for the western transcontinental passenger service. Since many representations have been received by members of parliament and the commission about the scheduling and structure of the final plan, as well as the potential lay-offs, and given the fact that the railway transport committee did not provide an opportunity for a number of citizens in the smaller communities of northern Ontario to present their views on the railway passenger service, what action will the minister take to ensure that the opinions and views of the people who are being grossly affected by the plan will, in fact, be heard and taken into consideration?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I should like to say, first of all, that as far as labour questions and lay-offs are concerned, we have extremely good working relationships with the unions and their representatives and have made some break-through agreements and, indeed, received some praise from the union leadership in connection with that work.

So far as the final plan is concerned, I think we are moving into a new phase where the positive, forward-looking management of VIA Rail, under the leadership of Frank Roberts, will be examining to the fullest extent all the opportunities for maintaining and expanding passenger service on the railways where that makes sense. He has been doing this by discussing the problem with municipal authorities and provinces across the country, and we will want that continued. Of course, with regard to some services, such as those in northern Ontario, a number of views have been made known to me directly and also through members of parliament representing the area.

Mr. Mazankowski: Am I to take it, then, that the president of VIA Rail may be taking into consideration the views and opinions of people who reside along the 900-mile stretch of the railroad involved in northern Ontario, so they will be able to advance their views and have them receive fair consideration?

In view of the fact that the railway transport committee did not provide a vehicle for these people to be heard, is the minister contemplating the establishment of formalized hearings so that formal notice can be presented and these people can present their views?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think that might depend on the form of action which is recommended. Obviously, the final plan has a certain weight and power from the point of view of its being a Canadian Transport Commission decision. But as the VIA Rail plans, in concert with various areas in the provinces, are developed, they will be translated into more positive applications for relief or approval and decision by the CTC. That may very well provide a further opportunity for the opinions of various individuals to be heard.

CENSORING

REQUEST SUPREME COURT OF CANADA OR HOUSE COMMITTEE DETERMINE EXTENT OF POWERS OF BOARDS OF CENSORS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in an action respecting the powers of the board of censors of a province to make orders and directives which are not challengeable. The Supreme Court of Canada decided, on a majority of five to four, that the board had the right to make orders. I know the Prime Minister will be interested in this matter because in past years he was a proponent of civil liberties organizations.

Miss MacDonald: "Was", past tense.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was, when he was not in his present position. I was speaking about the days when he was an outspoken member of a civil liberties organization, and I am not speaking in a facetious manner.

In the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, five judges determined one course—which was the final judgment—and four dissented. The Chief Justice of Canada, a very eminent judge, in dissenting said, among other things, that such a board can ban any film, even political or religious, and does not have to explain why. That was not part of the judgment which was handed down by the majority.

In view of the seriousness of the implications which flow from this decision, would the Prime Minister consider submitting a question to the Supreme Court of Canada to ascertain whether boards shall have the right to make determinations and not have to give the reasons therefor? Because if they have that right, that is the end of freedom. I suggest that the question be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, or a committee of this House be set up to look into the matter, because if the law stands as it is being interpreted now, freedom will hang by a very weak cord.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the right hon. gentleman, he was reading from the dissenting minority opinion, in which case he should be reassured, because in the supreme court it is the majority decision which prevails.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member said it did not affect the main judgment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Chief Justice of Canada, the Right Hon. Bora Laskin, pointed out the grave danger of boards having the power to make determinations without giving the reasons therefor. As I remember, the Prime Minister in his palmy days held the same view. Therefore, I wonder if he would submit this question to the Supreme Court of Canada so that once and for all we can have the matter determined, so that boards do not become absolute monarchs who do not allow the individual to know the basis of orders or directives they make.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I presume the court in this case was basing its decision on its interpretation of the statute. If there is to be a remedy, it seems to me it would be a change in the statute. I believe this is a statute passed by the government of Ontario. Perhaps that would be the proper course to follow.

An hon. Member: Nova Scotia.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, it is a statute passed by the government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the majority judgment apparently a statute cannot be enacted by the Parliament of Canada. I am asking that the Prime Minister follow the course he followed with such vocal success in the days when he was at the Bar, and say that this kind of thing is wrong.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, what I did when I was at the bar was study a statute to see if it should be changed. That is what I am arguing now. It seems to me that that is the position of the right hon. gentleman, in saying that the statute has dangerous implications. If that is so, surely the argument should be made to those who passed the statute and have the power to amend it.

LAY-OFFS IN NICKEL INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that an Ontario select committee reported yesterday and made recommendations to save thousands of jobs in the nickel industry through a combination of a 30-day stockpiling of nickel, 30 days of job-sharing, and a retirement plan, that this proposal was supported by a majority of the committee, including all the provincial Liberals on the committee, and that this is the only positive proposal which has been put forward by either the federal government or the provincial government to save these thousands of jobs, can the minister tell this House if the government will at long last take positive steps to protect these jobs and the communities involved by supporting the proposals of the Ontario select committee?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I very much want to see those proposals. I have not yet received them. We have asked the Ontario government to send them to us, but they have not yet arrived. I believe they will be in our possession later this afternoon. When we receive them, we will take a very good look at them.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that the provincial select committee has at last come forward with a plan which will protect the employment of over 3,000 miners, and the communities in which they live, for at least 60 days, that the federal Liberal government has put forward absolutely no plans to protect the jobs of these workers, and that what is proposed by this select committee is that an interest-free loan be given to Falconbridge and Inco so they can stockpile for one month, can the minister tell the House if he is prepared to enter into negotiations with the provincial government and to put up money to save the jobs of miners in the Sudbury basin and at Thompson, Manitoba?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the federal government has responded on a number of occasions, suggesting profitable avenues for the company and the union to pursue. Without accepting the hon. member's preamble, I go back to my earlier answer and say that I am prepared to consider what the select committee has proposed. However, I have not yet seen what has been proposed and until I do later this day I can add nothing more.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the lay-offs are to take place on Monday: on Monday, 3,000 workers in Sudbury will be hitting the bricks. In view of the fact that the proposal which was made yesterday must go into effect as quickly as possible if we are to avoid the lay-offs, can the minister tell the House if he is prepared to go to his office after the question period, get on the telephone or telex and get the proposals from the Ontario government so that a decision can be made as quickly as possible? Can the minister tell the House that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moncton.

Mr. Rodriguez: Come on; get up and answer the question. Don't sit there like a dummy; get up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moncton.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rodriguez: Answer the question. You don't care about workers. You have a nice fat job, haven't you?

Mr. Jones: Order, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE

HOUSE TO HOUSE MAIL DELIVERY SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General, to whom I would like to extend my personal congratulations, having been associated with him as a colleague in the municipal field for many years. Will the minister advise this House exactly when, and on what basis, the restraints placed on house to house mail delivery service will be lifted? Does the minister intend to discontinue house to house mail delivery service altogether, or is he going to follow the quid pro quo system which was followed in the Toronto area recently, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail on Monday.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I must say that we are not at all planning to discontinue house to house mail delivery service. Let us say that we are looking just now into ways we could improve this delivery service in urban areas which have developed very rapidly.

[English]

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why the alleged restraints placed on house to house mail delivery were instituted in the Scarborough area, in the Brandywine area subdivision, and not in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of house delivery; it is a question of principle. I am trying as much as possible to follow some of the advice given by the opposition when they say we spend too much. We have a deficit of $600 million in the Post Office, and we are trying to reduce that deficit and still maintain the best service we can with the least possible money.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I still ask the minister why he would pick one area in central Canada and not do the same thing in the maritime provinces, where employment is needed and where this service is required.

Mr. Lamontagne: I would like to mention to the hon. member for Moncton that I am sorry about the inconvenience and nuisance in Moncton. But it is also happening in Scarborough, Toronto, Windsor and other places.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTERNATIONAL ACTION TO CURB POWER EXERCISED BY MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It involves Inco, Falconbridge, Sun Life and branch plants of other global corporations, and given the kind of information proferred by the United States Senate finance committee, that these corporations control about twice the liquid assets of all the nation states in which they function, what initiatives is this government taking, along with other governments, at the OECD, UNCTAD and the IMF, to try to right the balance of power that exists between global corporations and nation states?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am by no means certain that I can provide a thorough answer to the question asked in the length of time you would permit. I think the hon. member knows that there are a number of studies under way at the OECD with regard to the conduct and the impact of multinational corporations. Also, the Prime Minister, along with the other leaders, at the London summit in May of last year agreed to further studies with regard to the conduct of other nationals. Perhaps I can serve the hon. member best by giving him a detailed, written, comprehensive report.

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—LIABILITY FOR SEARCH AND RECOVERY COSTS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On January 30, in reply to a question of mine concerning the cost of recovery of the Russian satellite, the Minister of National Defence replied, in part, "the international regime will meet its responsibilities as was indicated to the Department of External Affairs by the Soviet ambassador". Does that mean Russia has given us formal assurances that it will pay all search and recovery costs and, if not, what does that remark mean?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House when that remark was made. I would like to look at it in detail. I can tell the hon. member in general terms, of course, that yesterday—I believe he is familiar with this fact—I tabled in the House notes which we had sent to the Soviet embassy as well as to the Secretary General of the United Nations. Each one of these notes was designed to establish the fact that we were now satisfied that the debris was, in fact, part of the Soviet satellite.

This was an initial, and necessary, first step under international rules in order to lay the groundwork for a possible claim. So far—I believe the hon. member is also aware of this—the Soviets have not acknowledged specifically that the debris found in Canada is, indeed, part of their satellite. There will have to be an acknowledgement, first of all, on their part before the next phase can take place.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and only yesterday, at long last, I read the note which he sent to Russia. This note was sent in accordance with article V, paragraph 1, of the treaty. It is now obvious that we have not recovered the core of the nuclear reactor. Can the minister give us any assurance that Russia will not claim that our failure to request assistance under paragraph 4 extended unduly the time and cost of recovery operations? In other words, I suggest that if the U.S.S.R. looks at the list of recovered items and decides they are worthless, we will be stuck with meeting the entire cost of the search and recovery operations.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the latter part of the question is, of course, a conclusion to which I can neither agree nor disagree at the moment, not having heard from the Soviets. But I repeat, that I believe we have taken all the steps which we can take at this particular time, and we have taken the necessary first step. These were to indicate to the Soviet Union, unmistakably, that we believe the debris concerned in this case belongs to the Soviet satellite. The next steps will be through the United Nations mechanisms to which the hon. member made reference. I am going to the United Nations tomorrow and I am sure I will have an opportunity to discuss this matter with Mr. Waldheim on the weekend and to clarify more fully what procedures should be followed from this point.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO CONDUCT OF INDIAN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM OFFICIALS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is related to the recent report that four officials from the district office in Alberta involved in the Indian economic development program have been suspended for improper conduct in the mismanagement of departmental funds. I would like to ask the minister if he will confirm the fact that the RCMP are investigating the allegations. Would he also indicate who requested the investigation, and the date it commenced?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is accurate. The investigation was requested yesterday by my officials. It was based on an internal study of financial procedures which flowed from the problems we had a month or so ago when I appointed a new acting director to try to straighten out these things. I think that responds to the question asked.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, one final question. In view of the fact that these concerns were raised by members on this side of the House almost nine months ago, including during debate on an allocated day June 22, 1977, would the minister indicate if the departmental review has been completed? Would he also indicate whether he will refer the results of that review to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development who have a very particular interest in this matter?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I have no problem in referring the matter to the standing committee. In fact, I am rather looking forward to discussing this general problem with the standing committee when the estimates are before it. If there is a review which has a finite end and a report emerges from it, I will be pleased to bring the report with me when I appear before the standing committee. I think in this case it stemmed largely from my concern about charges that were being made, and I instructed my officials to look at the financial control procedures to see if any were not acceptable, were not correct or were being abused, and to clear them up. It may, in fact predate that, but my impression is that the recent inquiry stemmed from those instructions.

PENITENTIARIES—EXISTENCE OF PRISONERS' REVOLUTIONARY ARMY—NATURE OF ACTIVITIES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General, who is by now, I am sure, aware of the message received by the Toronto Globe and Mail from a caller identifying himself as a representative of the prisoners' revolutionary army, claiming responsibility for the tragic death of warden Michel Roy. They threatened further executions if the report of the subcommittee was not made public. It was, of course, made public some nine months ago.

● (1452)

Is the minister able to determine, from information received from his officials, the existence of such a group and, if such a group exists, what is the opinion of his advisers as to the serious nature of its activities?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, from the reports I have received to date, no link can be established between that one telephone call and any of the events in Montreal. I hope there is no such link. Further, I hope we do not play up that telephone call any more than it absolutely deserves. I will deal with it very seriously, but not with any exaggerated seriousness.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Solicitor General for that answer. I want to ask a supplementary, because some two weeks ago the Quebec human rights league warned of possible very serious trouble at Archambault. This was followed up last Monday in a letter that appeared in Le Journal de Montréal from Paul Rose, a member of the prisoners' committee, warning of some trouble.

What steps were taken as a result of those warnings, in terms of extraordinary precautions to safeguard correctional officers, and what steps are now being taken as a result of that terrible tragedy, the assassination, to protect correctional officers not just on duty but elsewhere?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is, of course, aware of this because of his very intimate co-operation with my predecessor, in terms of the implementation of the recommendation of the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. He is also aware that the subcommittee directed its attention to the Archambault situation, which left some serious doubts as to the way it was being operated. He is also well aware that the Rose letter could well be attributed to some of the tightening up in the operation that took place as a result of the subcommittee's recommendation.

We are aware of some dissatisfaction among certain elements of the inmate population. We are taking very serious additional measures in order to protect penitentiary personnel both at the work site and in the general area of their residences.

ESTIMATES

DATE OF TABLING

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Since many committees of this House are standing by for the usual tabling of the main estimates, is the President of the Treasury Board in a position to tell us when they will be tabled?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker I plan to table them within the next two weeks, probably about February 22.

Oral Questions

REPORTED DIFFICULTIES IN SHOE INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESOLVE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. A week ago a Vancouver newspaper warned as follows:

Grim warnings of zooming shoe prices, the virtual disappearance of low-priced imports, supply shortages and retail bankruptcies are rumbling through the B.C. shoe industry.

As the minister knows, this is imputed to be a direct result of the import quotas last month. Has the minister been in touch with people in the shoe industry in Vancouver? Can he tell the House whether these very dire warnings are exaggerated, whether his department is considering the situation, and whether it might mean some changes in the import quotas that have been put in place?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that those dire warnings are exaggerated. What we are attempting to do is limit an importer to the average importation of the 1974-75 year. There were no dire shortages in those years, and there will probably not be any dire shortages in 1978 and 1979.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, an official at Eaton's in Vancouver was asked about this and he pointed out—and I again quote from the article:

—the estimated cutback of 11 million imported shoes would mean domestic producers must increase their output by 50 per cent to make up the shortfall.

He went on to say that he discussed this matter with manufacturers in Canada and there is no possible way it can be done. Is the minister aware of this situation? Can he advise whether the figures quoted in the article are correct? If they are, we are in a serious shortfall position as far as the supply of shoes is concerned.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article and I cannot confirm the figure. In 1976, the Canadian shoe manufacturing industry had about 56 per cent of the Canadian market. In the first eight months of 1977, the share of the Canadian market to the Canadian shoe industry dropped to about 41 per cent. We are trying to bring it up to at least 50 per cent or 56 per cent of what it was in 1974 and 1975.

TRADE

REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER INCREASING IMPORTS OF BEEF

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is with regard to a possible strike, or boycott, by some meat producers in the prairies toward the end of February. I am sure the minister knows that the high level of imports and low prices are the cause of a lot of unrest on the prairies. Will he reconsider the decision to increase imports by two million pounds in 1978, and set import controls that will progressively increase the Canadian producers' share of our domestic market?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canadian producers have about 93 per cent or 94 per cent of the Canadian market. We exported more beef last year than we imported. If one totals up live and dressed beef, the two million pound increase to Australia and New Zealand is an increase of 1.5 per cent to those countries. That corresponds with the increase in growth of the population in Canada. That, to me, is a very small increase.

Mr. Nystrom: Since some cattle prices in this country are between 20 per cent and 30 per cent below the cost of production, will the minister now introduce the bill promised by the Minister of Agriculture last fall, in Saskatchewan, namely, a meat trade authority to monitor and control imports of beef and to monitor the whole beef industry in this country?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I suppose all kinds of bills could be introduced into parliament. Whether they would be passed is another matter. However, I want to assure the hon. member and the House that the importation of beef is being very closely monitored by my department. It is certainly in reliable hands.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: With respect, the minister did not answer my question. I asked whether it is the intention of the government to introduce this bill, because the Minister of Agriculture promised last fall that if the beef industry was in trouble we would get such a bill. Is it the intention of the government to introduce it?

Mr. Horner: As I have already answered, Mr. Speaker, the beef industry is being monitored very closely by my department with regard to the question of imports and exports. We will continue to do that.

THE MINISTRY

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS TO MEMBERS OF CABINET BEFORE APPOINTMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Last night on "The Watson Report", the Solicitor General was asked if he had been asked by the Prime Minister whether there might be any matters which might lead him, the Solicitor General, not to be able to carry out his responsibilities. He was asked whether that question had been asked by the Prime Minister prior to his appointment as Solicitor General. As I understand it, the Solicitor General said he would not answer that question.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether he, personally, as head of government, asked the present Solicitor General whether there were any activities or events in the past which might prevent him from carrying out his responsibilities in that very sensitive position?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question in general terms, because it was asked in general terms, about two weeks ago. The Leader of the Opposition asked me what procedure I followed before appointing people to the cabinet. I told him the kind of clearance I ask for. The answer is the same in this case.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it was the very general nature of the response earlier that caused me to raise the question again. The Prime Minister said earlier that he usually asks questions of this kind. I would like to know whether, first in the case of the present Solicitor General and, second, in the case of the former solicitor general, the Prime Minister asked these two people, prior to their appointment, whether there was anything in their background, or any activity that might render them unfit or unable to carry out the position of Solicitor General.

It is a specific question relating, first, to the present Solicitor General and, second, to the previous solicitor general. What was the standard of questioning and care exercised by the Prime Minister, personally, in each of these cases? Did he ask that question of each of them?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, if the Leader of the Opposition refers to my earlier answer, I indicated that I always ask the security services of the RCMP to inform me of anything which might be negative in the file of any individual I am considering appointing to cabinet. That is the first step. The second step is that I am satisfied that the lady or gentleman I appoint to cabinet will be able to exercise that role honourably.

Mr. Clark: We know what the general procedure is; we know that in this case the screening authority did its job. We want to know whether the Prime Minister did his own job; whether he, personally, put to those two ministers, before their appointment, the question whether there was anything in their backgrounds which might prevent them carrying out their duties. In the case of the previous solicitor general, did the Prime Minister ask that question, personally? In the case of the present Solicitor General, did the Prime Minister ask that question, personally?

Mr. Trudeau: I have told the Leader of the Opposition that I always satisfy myself that the members appointed would serve in that office with honour and distinction, and I am satisfied that they have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This is a very important matter relating to the standards of the government. We in the House of Commons have a right to know what action the Prime Minister took. He said he satisfied himself. I want to know whether the Prime Minister, personally and specifically, asked the present Solicitor General or the previous solicitor general whether there was anything in their backgrounds which might prevent them carrying out the responsibilities of this sensitive portfolio. Did the Prime Minister ask that question, specifically, in one or both those cases?

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me the essence of my answer is that I am satisfied when I appoint a person to the cabinet. The process by which I satisfy myself, the reasons for which I reach my conclusion, the questions I ask and the answers I receive, are none of the hon. member's business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPULSION OF SOVIET UNION DIPLOMATS AND EMBASSY EMPLOYEES—ATTEMPT TO BREACH NATIONAL SECURITY

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at noon today, on my instructions, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs requested the Ambassador of the Soviet Union to withdraw 11 Soviet nationals from Canada for engaging in inadmissible activities in violation of the Official Secrets Act, and of course of their status in Canada. Two other Soviet nationals who were involved have already departed Canada but will not be permitted to return. A strong protest has been conveyed to the Soviet authorities about these activities.

The Soviet Ambassador was informed that the Canadian government had irrefutable evidence that all 13 persons had been involved in an attempt to recruit a member of the RCMP in order to penetrate the RCMP Security Service. Nine of the Soviet nationals still in Canada are employees of the Soviet embassy, one is an official of the Soviet Trade Office in Ottawa, and one is a member of the International Civil Aviation Organization Secretariat in Montreal.

The Canadian authorities have informed the Ambassador of the Soviet Union today of the discovery of an attempt by the Soviet intelligence service to recruit a member of the RCMP in order to penetrate the RCMP Security Service. Thirteen nationals of the Soviet Union have been involved in this operation. Two have already left Canada and the eleven others have been requested to do so. Nine are employees of the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa; one is an employee of the Secretariat of the International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal and one is an official of the Soviet Trade Office in Ottawa.

Not only did this operation involve a large number of persons but it had been elaborately planned, involving coded messages, clandestine meetings, secret concealment devices and the payment of $30,500. This unsuccessful operation was mounted by the Soviet intelligence service in April, 1977. It has involved no compromise to national security.

[English]

The Soviet nationals involved are:

Igor P. Vartanian, First Secretary responsible for sports and cultural affairs, Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Nikolai M. Talanov, counsellor, Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Anatoly A. Mikhalin, official of the Soviet Foreign Trade Office, Ottawa.

Vadim A. Borishpolets, attaché (Consular Affairs), Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Vladimir L. Souvorov, Second Secretary, Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Vladimir I. Oshkaderov, translator, International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), Montreal.

Yevgeniy K. Koblov, clerk, Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Gennadi V. Ivashavitch, Third Secretary, Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Oleg D. Reztsov, attaché, Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Vera A. Reztsov, employed in the library of the Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Petr R. Lillenurm, Second Secretary (Consular Affairs), Soviet embassy, Ottawa.

Voldemar P. Veber, formerly Second Secretary in the Consular Division, Soviet embassy, Ottawa. Returned to the U.S.S.R. July 1977.

Andrei V. Krysin, economist, Soviet Foreign Trade Office, Ottawa. Returned to the U.S.S.R. December 1977.

Early in 1977 two Soviet intelligence officers approached a member of the RCMP and offered him an unlimited sum of money to spy for them. This member of the force had, on an earlier posting and in the normal course of his responsibilities, come into infrequent contact with one of the Soviet officials in this case. To establish the ultimate purpose of the Soviet approach, the member of the force was authorized, by the RCMP, under carefully controlled circumstances, to meet with the principal agent, Mr. Vartanian, in accordance with elaborate instructions he had received from the two Soviet officials. Between April, 1977, and the present he met secretly with the principal agent on seven occasions.

The 12 other Soviet nationals identified with this operation were involved in different support functions including transportation, counter-surveillance, and regular weekly observation activities.

This case proved to be a classic example of an intelligence operation, involving complex signalling systems, coded passwords, and secret concealment devices, all for the purpose of arranging clandestine meetings between the RCMP member and the Soviet agent.

As an example, on different occasions filmed instructions were passed to the RCMP member in a hollowed-out stick and a specially prepared package of cigarettes. The RCMP member was instructed by the agent to obtain information on such subjects as the methods the RCMP Security Service employed against Soviet intelligence services in Canada, character assessments of RCMP personnel, and details regarding RCMP counter-espionage cases. The RCMP member in return provided the Soviets with carefully screened non-sensitive information or completely fabricated material. The fact that he was paid $30,500 for information of no consequence provides an indication of the importance the Soviet intelligence service attached to this operation. The important point for the House to note, however, is that this case has involved no compromise of Canada's security.

This Soviet recruitment attempt is, nevertheless, a source of serious concern to the government. Its importance should be seen in the context of the unusual lengths to which the Soviet intelligence service was prepared to go to suborn a member of the RCMP. The case did not have any other implications for Canada's security. The evidence derived from this operation indicates that it was directed solely against the RCMP.

The firm action taken by the government in this case will remind the Soviet Union of our determination to deter foreign espionage. The government regrets that activities of this kind should be conducted at a time when there are efforts under way, to which both Canada and the Soviet Union have subscribed, to reduce the level of international tensions by overcoming mistrust and increasing confidence. Activities such as those I have disclosed to the House are contrary to that objective and represent a serious setback in our bilateral relations. This incident, and the action we have had to take today, will inevitably place strains on our relations with the Soviet Union. Nevertheless the Canadian government continues to attach importance to Canadian-Soviet relations and hopes the Soviet government does likewise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the statement just read to this House by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) reveals a very shocking state of affairs, and a matter that is of great concern to all members of the House. Before commenting briefly upon the substance of the report, I should like to express my appreciation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the very unusual courtesy he extended to me and, I believe, to leaders of the other parties, by not only making a copy of the statement available to us in advance but also by providing us with a short personal briefing regarding the contents of the statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That's because he's a Newfoundlander.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement reminds us in a direct way that the current east-west détente is at best a limited agreement. The reality, although sad, is that the countries of the communist block persist in pursuing activities which are neither friendly nor of a nature likely to foster positive relationships between countries. Because of its participation in NATO and NORAD and given the proximity and the friendship linking Canada and the United States, our country—sad but true—sometimes appears to be an ideal target for activities of this kind.

[English]

The minister's statement is a stark reminder to us that the détente between east and west is, at best, a very limited understanding. The hard reality, unfortunate though it is, is that nations of the communist bloc persist in activities that are neither friendly nor conductive to relations among countries.

It is also unfortunate but true—and we must recognize this—that Canada continues to be a particular target for such activities. Our membership in NATO and in NORAD, as well as our proximity and close relationship to the United States, seem to invite a level of espionage activity, or at least attempted espionage activity, which must be of great concern to all in this country.

Members of my party, particularly the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), have taken a very leading role—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —in trying to determine through oral and written questions in this House, the nature of the threat of espionage or other related activity that cannot by any stretch of the imagination be called acceptable within the context of diplomacy. He has sought to determine the nature and has also sought to determine the response of the government to this general threat. I believe the statement made today by the minister will cause my colleague and others in the House of Commons to want to continue that kind of an investigation into the extent and nature of a threat to our security posed by persons who are in this country under diplomatic cover.

I am sure all members of the House want to join me in congratulating the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, a member on the government side laughed at that. I regret that because I am sure this is a matter that all members, including the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), agree is a case where it is just and proper that the House of Commons extend its most serious congratulations to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the thoroughly professional and effective manner in which members of the force pursued this difficult situation to an effective conclusion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I must say that I find it very strange that ministers on the other side would try to shout down the Leader of the Opposition when he extends to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police some very deserved congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: You are hypocrite.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the matter was serious enough that the Secretary of State for External Affairs Mr. Jamieson was given quiet attention when he made his statement, and I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) should be extended the same courtesy.

Mr. Clark: Thank you for your intervention, Mr. Speaker. The minister said in his statement, and indicated to me previously, that a strong protest had been conveyed to Soviet authorities. I think that is appropriate. While I recognize that it is not always normal practice in affairs of this kind, I think, given the unusual circumstances, that we in this House of Commons would like the opportunity to see the aide memoire or protest which the minister despatched. I would therefore ask the minister if he would be prepared to table the text of the aide memoire which he indicated had been sent to the Soviet authorities.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can do that now if it is the wish of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs shall have leave to table the aide memoire now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the activities undertaken by certain Soviet officials, as outlined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), are extremely serious indeed. Before commenting briefly on those activities and the course of action taken by the government, I should like to join the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in extending my appreciation to the minister not only for notice of the statement he was going to make today but for the personal briefing he provided to explain the circumstances. I think that was an exceptional course of action, for which the minister deserves the commendation of this House.

● (1522)

Mr. Broadbent: As I was saying, these offences are extremely serious. They are wrong in principle, and of course wrong in practice. To put it bluntly, they are particularly odious when one neighbouring country inflicts them upon another. All Canadians should feel particularly sensitive on that point.

On behalf of my colleagues, I extend my appreciation to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for their good work in security matters. Obviously it was a professional job. They did their work, and they got the culprits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: This is a series of events which is particularly unfortunate at these times in terms not only of the detente issue, because we are part of the western alliance and it has serious implications for it, but particularly in terms of the improving relations which had existed between the Government of Canada and the government of the U.S.S.R. There can be no doubt that this represents a serious setback, clearly in the face of those people of good will in both governments who, in recent years, have been attempting to improve and make more civilized the relationships between our two peoples. The authorities in the Soviet Union, who are responsible for these despicable activities, now have to assume responsibility for the unfortunate consequences which will follow from them.

It is worth emphasizing the Soviet Union, although it would be naive to ignore other great powers in the world which are still conducting these kinds of activities. But in this particular instance we are discussing the Soviet Union. The fact that this is still ongoing in 1978—and we are not back in the forties or fifties—indeed clearly illustrates how far we have yet to go in the modern world in trying to establish civilized and decent working relationships among all the nation states.

Under the circumstances, the response of the government in requesting the expulsion of 11 Soviet nationals who are still here, and the retention at home of two others who went back to the Soviet Union for a vist and planned to return, is entirely acceptable. Is this sufficient in terms of the relationships which were improving between Canada and the U.S.S.R.? We saw the clear possibility of the expansion of trade and the expansion of intercourse between our peoples, and now we witness this kind of dastardly act inflicted upon us. I raise the question as to the appropriateness of the government's response. In the view of my colleagues, certainly the minimum is to request those who were at fault to stay out of our country. However, on behalf of my colleagues, it seems to me something else should be done. I suggest, with all seriousness, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should think about the appropriateness of withdrawing the Canadian ambassador from Moscow on a temporary basis until relationships, and particularly this incident, are clearly discused and resolved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first of all, like the hon. leader of the official opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party, I would like to sincerely thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for his great courtesy in notifying us in advance of the nature of his statement and for having us meet in his office to discuss this matter very seriously.

We do not often have the opportunity to agree to discuss a matter as serious as that which has just been brought up in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As a Canadian, I was shocked to learn that Soviet citizens employed in the U.S.S.R. embassy in Canada had taken part in espionage activities. It seems to me that this can be explained in wartime as it is then more or less normal for countries to try to learn the secrets of others. But in peacetime, and I hope that we are now in peacetime, when we try to work together to improve relations among nations so that peace may bring about more prosperity in each country, such situations are truly shocking.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that today in the House, certain members have related the important matter communicated to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Igor Gouzenko espionage affair which happened a few years ago and which received much publicity. I recall this affair very well and I would like the younger members of the House to take the trouble to get to the bottom of things before relating this espionage activity of a few years ago and that of which we have just been informed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I also recall that on December 20 of last year, there was a debate in parliament about external affairs. I remember very well that all hon. members who took part in this debate showed much patriotic feeling and supported the external policy of our country. Whatever the party in power, as I said at that time, Canada is a country whose citizens are respected and loved throughout the world.

I also remember, I think it was in October 1973 if my memory serves me right, that I had the honour to participate in a NATO conference in Turkey. It was on the U.S.S.R. border. At that time aircraft were flying over an their way to Lebanon where the war was going on. I was very upset to hear the noise of those heavy aircraft transporting armaments and soldiers going to a foreign country. At that time, Mr. Speaker, you were also a member of the delegation and you participated in a debate of the NATO Plenary Assembly and I remember very well what you said. In fact you expressed the hope as a member of that delegation that as long as Canada is a democracy it will promote that détente between the two blocks. I still agree today that we should do everything to encourage the détente. As Canadians, we have, more than anyone else, an interest in encouraging that détente as geographically we are between two great nations with incredible strength. On one side the U.S.S.R. and on the other the United States.

We must be very careful every day that the little secrets we have to ensure our defence are not known by those big powers so that we can ensure our independence and security. If we always act as we did today by making the whole population aware of the dangers of spying activities within our borders we shall draw the problem to the attention of every Canadian so that every one, whatever his language or religion, will be first of all a Canadian proud of his country and ready to defend it against everyone, and ready to co-operate with the government to ensure the security of our country and make sure that in foreign embassies on Canadian territory no one is working to discover our little secrets, of which we are proud, but rather to establish better co-operation within our nation through those embassies.

Once more I commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I wish him good health so that he can achieve his mission. I saw him last week on TV like other hon. members when he was travelling in China to meet the great leaders of that country. Notwithstanding our political views and options, when international matters and relationships with other nations are at stake we must all share the same pride in our country and defend our Canadian rights throughout the world.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have at least one question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I am sure my colleagues will have other questions as well. I understand the minister himself was advised of these matters in the middle of last month. Since this is a security matter, can the minister tell us whether advice was given during the course of the operation to the former solicitor general of Canada and what was the nature of the involvement of the Solicitor General himself or of his officials in this matter?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer in specific terms. I am not copping out when I say that perhaps the question might more properly be directed at the appropriate time to the Solicitor General. I can explain to the House and to the Leader of the Opposition that, in so far as security investigations are concerned, generally speaking the Department of External Affairs does not become involved in them until such time as a case is established. We are then advised by the RCMP, and the necessary foreign relations actions are taken. So the extent to which the former solicitor general was involved during the period of the investigation is not something which is known to me personally.

Mr. Lawrence: The minister's statement does not make clear to what branch of the RCMP the original member of the RCMP who was approached belonged. Was he a member of the Security Service or was he a member of one of the other branches of the RCMP?

Mr. Jamieson: In this regard I am sure that an opportunity will be provided for a more detailed statement by the RCMP sources on the very specific matters concerned. My information is that on the two occasions involved when the RCMP officer concerned was, for example, first associated with or first came into contact with the Soviets, he was working in a particular job. Subsequently he was transferred to another job, and it was in that second job that contact was made with him in an effort to suborn him. What specific titles he held is not information which I have directly in front of me. I do not think it is a matter of any confidence. I would be glad to try to find it out but, as I understand it, in one case he was working for a particular branch and it was after he was transferred that the Soviets, who had been familiar with him in the first job, made the contact with him later.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, so that it becomes part of the public record, if he would tell the House when he, as a Secretary of State for External Affairs, first learned of the espionage activities that were being undertaken. Can he explain to the House why there was a delay in time? I know he was out of the country, but I understand there are other reasons why there was a delay in time between when he learned of the activities on the one hand, and today's announcement on the other.

Mr. Jamieson: There were two reasons. It was January 9 when I was advised formally that the RCMP had in fact completed, or virtually completed— I emphasize the word "virtually"—their investigation. The time lapse between then and now was due to two reasons. One was that I was not available for a matter of two weeks, being out of the country, and the other was, as I understand it, that there was a kind of final liaison which the RCMP wished to undertake in order to conclude the investigation and to complete their activities. Upon my return on Monday I was advised that indeed no further purpose would be served by continuing the operation and was advised directly by the RCMP authorities of the situation, and I chose immediately to take the action which I announced in the House today.

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to ask the minister another question. Considering the fact that the Government of Canada now has expelled 13 Soviet nationals, asking 11 to leave and prohibiting the re-entry of two others, and considering that that is the minimum action that one could expect to take under the circumstances, what other alternatives has the government considered, and specifically, given the seriousness of this action, why did the government not withdraw the Canadian ambassador from Moscow for a period of time to indicate just how seriously we regard this, until further resolution of the matter and further discussion of the unfortunate series of events perpetrated in Canada by the Soviet Union?

Mr. Jamieson: I hope I have demonstrated today my desire to be as frank as possible in discussing this matter, but if I am somewhat restricted in my answer to that question, let me simply say that, of course, having taken this action, we are in no way aware at this moment of what action the Soviets themselves may take. I would think that under those circumstances it would be advisable to have an ambassador on the spot in Moscow against any eventualities which may occur.

Espionage

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has not shown the insolence, arrogance and overbearing attitude to parliament which was evidenced this afternoon by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister's attitude was in keeping with parliamentary tradition and his appreciation of parliament, which he has shown again today.

● (1542)

Having regard to the overwhelming power in nuclear weapons on submarines in the Atlantic, as has been set forth in detail by admirals in the navy, the great danger to North America and the cause of it, will the minister do his part in an effort to arrange a parliamentary debate immediately so that we can discuss at length the seriousness of the threat against us, as evidenced by what the minister spoke about today, in order to ensure that complete information can be given? If necessary, we might have a closed session such as we have had from time to time, for example, immediately after the war.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I presume this would be a matter for discussion among House leaders. At the instigation of the right hon. member we did have a couple days of general debate on foreign affairs. I assume, from the right hon. gentleman's preamble, that the debate he proposes would relate directly to defence matters. I would be glad to take this up with the Minister of National Defence and also with the government House leader. I personally have no objection to it. Indeed, I believe there is some effort under way at the moment to have members of parliament, who are associated with the NATO Association, have a discussion with the Minister of National Defence and myself. Anything of this nature which would enhance the general level of information and knowledge of hon. members, I think would be very useful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister press for such a sitting in the House because the situation on the Atlantic, on the Mediterranean and the sea adjacent to South Africa has placed the U.S.S.R. in a position of overwhelming power. Warning of the danger has been given over and over again in the United States Congress. I hope something will be done in this connection because what was revealed today illustrates the attitude of the U.S.S.R. toward the reasonable and responsible attitude taken by Canada with regard to the U.S.S.R. in order to achieve renewed comity and good will between our nations.

Mr. Jamieson: I will do my best, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have only one question for the Minister. In his statement the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) disclosed the names of the Soviet citizens involved. He also referred to an RCMP officer and to a sum of $30,500 which was paid to that officer to help him obtain some secrets. Is it out of simple prudence or because of necessity that the minister did not disclose the name of that officer? Surely this question has occurred to other members as well, and if it is in the interest of the country that the name be kept unknown, I am prepared to accept the statement as it is, but on the other hand, if it is in the interest of the country that the officer's name be disclosed, I submit it is all to the honour of that person and it should not be a disgrace for him to have his name revealed before Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it is obviously a matter of importance and security that the name of the RCMP officer in this case not be disclosed, and I know hon. members will not press me in that regard.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I have a number of very important questions, so I hope Your Honour will bear with me. Some of the speakers today indicated shock at what has happened in this regard. I am not shocked or surprised whatsoever because, as the minister will recall, well over a year ago I made public a list of individuals whom I asked the government to inquire into. Individuals from inside the Soviet embassy were involved, I thought, in activities incompatible with their status as diplomats. I have not double checked, but at least eight or nine people on the list to which I have just referred have either already been asked to leave the country or have now been expelled, including the principal agent, Mr. Vartanian. Since some of these so-called diplomats have been asked to leave the country, what assurance does the minister have that the government has cleaned house, and why has it taken so long since I made this list public to bring this matter forward?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, not meaning any offence to the hon. member, I am sure he would accept that if he was in possession of that list, the RCMP and perhaps some others were in possession of it as well. The mere fact that the association of a resident diplomat with the KGB or, for that matter, any other foreign intelligence agency, is known is not of itself, obviously, sufficient evidence on which to take either expulsive action or anything related to it. What is necessary is to establish that the conduct of that person is inconsistent with his status in Canada as a registered diplomat. I think it has been said by hon. members on both sides of the House that the RCMP was aware of the list to which the hon. member referred, has been very diligent, and has produced over a period of approximately seven months evidence which is adequate to take the actions we have taken today.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated that nine embassy employees and four others, a total of 13, were involved in recruiting the RCMP officer. Were the 13 agents, as we now know them, involved in other subversive activities in Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that all of the parties whose names I revealed today were associated exclusively with this one particular action whose sole objective was to penetrate the RCMP Security Services and establish within those services someone whom they regarded as being a reliable source of information. My statement makes the point that it is an indication of the important the Soviets attached to this there were so many people involved. I have no doubt that the RCMP would be prepared to provide certain information as to the roles played by certain of these parties. I can, however, tell the hon. member in a general way that there was a central person involved who was the principal contact. Many of the others were involved in transportation, in the identification of signals, and in various other activities related to and part of the establishment of the two-way contact. I am perfectly satisfied that all were involved and that they were involved in this particular matter.

Mr. Jelinek: In the year between February, 1976, and January, 1977, during which time, according to the minister's statement, the RCMP was aware of some of these happenings, the minister's own department granted 908 special travel permits to diplomats from the Soviet embassy to travel in parts of Canada other than the national capital region, including 41 special travel permits to the principal agent named today, Mr. Vartania. Eighty-eight were granted to Mr. Veber. The total number granted is 908. I wonder, if the RCMP was in the know with regard to these activities over the last year, why was the minister's department giving these individuals travel permits with such frequency and permitting them to travel outside the national capital area where surveillance obviously would be far more difficult?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of conclusions in the question which I would prefer not to go into in detail. I suggest in a hypothetical sense, however, that it is not inconceivable that the travel permits might have been authorized and issued on the basis of the investigation.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I would like to lump my questions together. With the minister's capability I am sure he will be able to answer them all. Quite frankly, I am not really surprised. I am disturbed because things have been a bit too cosy between the U.S.S.R. and Canada for far too long. I would like to know what measures are now being taken to prevent the recurrence of this type of situation. Has the Canadian government any further steps in mind regarding a temporary severance of diplomatic relations between Canada and the U.S.S.R.? What investigations are still going on with regard to other Soviet nationals either inside or outside Canada? Are there other similar investigations regarding any other country in espionage ongoing, and have any espionage approaches been made, to the knowledge of the minister, to any other person or persons in Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect and with, as I said, my assurances that I want to be as open as I can, I reluctantly have to decline to answer all of those questions.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I have two brief questions for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the addendum to the aide memoire it is said four persons were ordered to leave Canada within 48 hours and, I believe, seven in about two weeks. Is the difference exclusively because of the degree of activity which the various persons within the two groups were perceived to participate in this affair?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, yes, the hon. member has it exactly. The four who have been given 48 hours' notice to leave are those who were very specifically and clearly in breach of the Official Secrets Act. Incidentally we have had advice from reputable authorities that all of these people under normal circumstances could have been charged with some breach, but that these four came under the provisions of the Official Secrets Act. The remainder were, what I might describe as, supporting players who unquestionably had breached their status as diplomatic persons within Canada but whose offence, if one wishes to use that word, was not of the same magnitude as that of the four principals involved.

Mr. Jarvis: Was this entire law enforcement operation carried on exclusively within the RCMP, or was it directed under the authority of the police and security planning analysis branch, which is a branch within the Solicitor General's department?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, subject to later qualification by the Solicitor General, and I want to make that point because I am speaking on the basis of my own information and assumptions, I believe it was exclusively an RCMP operation.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs will certainly come as a shock to many Canadians, and especially his announcement that 13 have been declared as persona non grata. I would like to ask the minister what percentage the 13 represent of the personnel that are presently working in the Soviet embassy here in Ottawa, and would the minister indicate how many people still remain in that embassy? Finally, do we have any guarantees whatsoever that the 13 who have been ordered to leave Canada will not be immediately replaced by 13 others who will carry out similar activities?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the number on strength at the Soviet embassy is 64, as approved by us under the international rules of procedure. Of the 13 referred to today, I recall that two have left, so we are speaking of 11. Of that number 10 are actually on that strength of 64. One is with the International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal. This means a reduction of the 64 to presumably 54—or to 53—I am not precisely certain.

On the matter of replacements, the Under-Secretary, on my instructions and with my approval, indicated to the Soviet Union today that we will examine very carefully all requests for replacements and that, furthermore, given the events which we have now reported to the House, we will examine also very carefully the size of the personnel presently within Canada who are under what might be described as diplomatic immunity. Therefore, in a general way my answer to the hon. member is that we will move very cautiously in terms of replacements. As at this moment we are not proposing to reduce the assigned total of 64. I will be glad to explain to the hon. member in private the reasons why that is the case.

Mr. Crouse: My supplementary question is to the minister, and I thank him for his answer.

I wonder if he could inform the House how many personnel we are permitted to have in the Soviet Union. Secondly, are any of the names of the people whom you have mentioned today in any way connected with the Soviet consular office that is presently maintained in Halifax where there is a liaison between shore personnel and the large Soviet fleet which is operating within our 200-mile economic zone?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the precise figure of the number of Canadians in the Soviet Union at the present time. I can say with almost 100 per cent assurance that it comes very close to 64, because the general pattern has been a one for one type of situation. Once again I would ask the hon. member to give me the benefit of the doubt until I have had a chance to check it fully, but that is a reasonable expectation.

In reply to the hon. member's second question, there is no linkage whatsoever, at least anything that has been perceived, between this operation and the general fisheries office to which he has made reference.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the hon. minister. In view of suggestions at the Keable commission hearings that money from outside Canada went to subversive groups, I would like to ask the minister if this episode has any connection with any such events of which he may be aware?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, no. There is no such connection as I have said repeatedly, and I wish to emphasize, that all of the evidence I have seen, and everything that the RCMP has produced, lead me to the satisfactory conclusion that this activity was expressly and directly related to an effort to penetrate the RCMP Security Service.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, the House was both surprised and perplexed to see the Prime Minister leave the chamber just prior to the minister's announcement. Does the minister know the reason why the Prime Minister walked out of this House immediately before the Secretary of State for External Affairs made this important announcement pertaining to our national security?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, yes I do. I really think the question is quite irrelevant. The Prime Minister and I discussed it earlier this afternoon. He had an important meeting which it was not possible for him to change. We even discussed the possibility of changing the time of the statement in order to accommodate him. I can assure you it was through no lack of interest. The Prime Minister of course, was fully briefed on the situation.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, with respect, why he did not make the announcement until this date? Given the fact that he was away out of the country, and keeping in mind our association with NATO and other countries, for him to wait two weeks to make the announcement on a matter of such significance, after being fully knowledgeable of the events, makes me think he should have returned home for this particular reason.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may have given a somewhat incorrect impression; I do not think so. In any event, so that the hon. member can have the benefit of the doubt, I said that on January 9 I was provided with a general briefing. At that time there was no suggestion that we ought to have moved immediately. There were indeed some other things that it was felt ought to be done in the interim. I hope hon. members will appreciate that I am going about as far as it is possible for me to go in these circumstances.

It was not until January 26 that the RCMP, in writing and in detail, was able to put before us the documented, factual information on which, after all, the decision had to be made. It is one thing to be reasonably certain of something; it is something else to say, "Here it is. The evidence is now clear cut." I do not think the difference between January 26 and now is of any great significance.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions I would like to put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the aide-mémoire which he very kindly provided to members, there is a clear indication that, prior to these incidents, within the last 14 months there have been three other incidents. How many employees or officers from the Soviet Embassy in those three individual instances were declared persona non grata?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said members from External Affairs. I presume he meant from Soviet External Affairs. My recollection is that I have referred to all three of those incidents in the House. Once again, may I ask the hon. member for some leeway on my memory. I know that up until now we have had incidents involving the Soviet Union, with a total of eight people. Whether some of them were declared NPG, whether some had left the country, or whether it was resolved in some other manner, I do not know. However, there were three incidents that have come to public knowledge and to which reference has been made in the House.

Mr. Paproski: KBG.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am sure the minister meant PNG. May I ask the minister whether in those instances there was retaliation on the Soviet side declaring some of our officials or personel PNG in retaliation.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, no member would probably be more aware than I that it is not always easy to identify retaliation as such. However, if the hon. member is asking me if some individual and specific person was asked to leave, to the best of my knowledge, no.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is with relation to a comment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he declared he instructed the Under-Secretary of State to declare specifically to the Soviet ambassador when he came in that the Canadian authorities would be examining most carefully any applications for replacement. I am surprised there are going to be any replacements. However, since the government has decided there might be, I wonder whether this suggests that applications in the past have not been given careful examination.

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker, I think that would be an improper inference. Also, on the question of numbers, may I remind the hon. member that many representations are made to us by the Soviet Union and, I should also add, by other bodies and so on, with regard to numbers. I think we make a very thorough assessment of need. I am satisfied that we do. Indeed, there are some cases where we have been criticized for not permitting more trade representatives, for example, into Canada. We have a situation in which I have, in the best diplomatic language that I know, and the experts know, made it clear that we are going to examine very carefully the specific needs for replacement and for any change in the current levels within the Soviet Union. I think that is about as much as I ought to say at this present time.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I compliment the minister on a very forthright statement on what has happened and, so far, a very forthright way in answering questions. I would like to ask the minister a question and a supplementary, the question being in two parts. First, have any Canadian citizens outside the RCMP and outside the political security analysis group been in any way involved in this operation, in other words assisting the Soviet Union in their operations? This may perhaps be premature, but has there been any indication from Moscow as yet, as so often happens when other countries have expelled Soviet diplomats, that they have retaliated, not on a justifiable basis, but simply kicking people out saying, "Well, you people are doing the same thing"? That is the first question. I have a supplementary, if I might be permitted to ask it afterwards.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the first part might more properly be directed to a spokesman for the RCMP. Again to the best of my knowledge, there were no people other than RCMP officers involved. On the second question, the hon. member is quite right. It is still too early to have received any reaction from the Soviet Union. I should indicate to the House that we have told the Soviets that any action by them with regard to Canadian personnel would be considered entirely unjustified because there is no comparable activity of this kind being undertaken in the Soviet Union, or anywhere else for that matter.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary goes back to a question answered in the House by the immediate former solicitor general a month or so ago. He admitted to the House, after some three years during which I tried to draw out the information, that there was such a thing known as the "Featherbed Operation." Is the minister prepared to confer with the present Solicitor General with a view to making public the nature of the "featherbed" file which, I am sure he and other ministers must realize, would shed a great deal more light on the operation in Canada of such things as has been brought out today? Will he attempt to have some of this information made public from the "featherbed" file as to what has been going on in Canada over a period of years?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the information provided to me, and I have no reason to question it in any way, is to the effect that this was exclusively the kind of operation that I have outlined. It had nothing to do with any other of the ongoing activities of the RCMP. Therefore, I do not believe there is any relevancy between what we have been discussing today and the question the hon. member has asked.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister one question. In view of the fact that Igor Vartanian was the sports and fitness representative for the Soviet Union when the minister learned about this particular espionage on January 9, did he inform our Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) of Igor's activities in Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: No, I did not, Mr. Speaker. I realize, of course, that levity is not wise in these circumstances. In case I did not give a full answer, I should add that I did not know the gentleman's name at that particular time. I was only when the final and detailed facts came to my attention.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, that was a very serious question. It was not intended to be at all funny. I was very serious when I asked that question.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated that he became aware of this operation on January 9. Relative to that, on January 20, the Minister of National Defence wrote, and I quote:

> —Canadian governments have tried to achieve arms control but the 'problem is how best to proceed in a world where one group of states, namely the Warsaw Pact led by the Soviet Union, openly proclaims its policy to impose its political philosophy, if possible by peaceful means but, if necessary, by force.'

Was the Minister of National Defence aware of this information when he wrote this letter on January 20, and was he speaking in anticipation of this statement today? Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs agree with the point of view stated by the Minister of National Defence? In fact, as a result of this instance, does that statement have a new credibility?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will just answer the one part of the question which is germane to the matter we are discussing today. To the best of my knowledge, the Minister of National Defence was not aware of this activity to which I am making reference. It is my responsibility. I took that responsibility and I did not consult with him in any way on it. I would have to look very carefully at what he said with regard to international affairs generally to know whether I agree entirely with him or not.

● (1612)

Mr. Towers: Can the minister tell us whether the two agents who left the country were recalled or whether they were requested to leave by Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: I gather they left in the normal course of posting to somewhere else while the investigation was going on. Whether there was any relationship between their departure and the activities referred today, I do not know. I would suspect not. I would think it was simply a matter of rotation.

Mr. Prud'homme: In spite of the many criticisms to which the RCMP have been subjected in the last few months, would the minister convey to the Commissioner of the RCMP our congratulations on what seems to be a job well done?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I shall be very glad to do that.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF RIDING OF SAINTE-MARIE

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-417, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Sainte-Marie).

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF RIDING OF HOCHELAGA-MAISONNEUVE

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-418, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Joyal: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of those two bills is to reestablish historical relevance in the designation of the new ridings of Hochelaga and Maisonneuve. The new riding named Hochelaga covers in fact the territory formerly known as the Sainte-Marie district. The history of the city of Montreal at the time of confederation shows us that that territory has always been designated under the name of Sainte-Marie from the very beginning. As for the village of Hochelaga, it was annexed to the city of Montreal in 1883, and its territorial limits are now included in the new riding of Maisonneuve. The purpose of those bills is therefore to respect historical relevance in the designation of those new ridings.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the adoption of those bills will cause particular difficulties, even if the word "Hochelaga" means in the Huron language "place where one is caught in ambush".

Motions agreed to, bills read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise relative to statements made during the question period today. In view of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) contempt of the House of Commons and the people of Canada in suggesting during the question period, as he did today, that information which may relate directly to national security or to national standards is, and I quote him, none of the business of the House of Commons, I move, seconded by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Clark) which was negatived on the following division:

OIL PRODUCTION

Question No. 1,072—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the current number of barrels of oil produced per day in Canada?
2. What quantity is exported and to which countries?
3. What is the current daily consumption of barrels of oil in Canada?
4. What is the quantity imported?
5. What is the daily receipt from the tax on exported oil?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Preliminary data for 1977 indicate that Canada produced about 1.6 million barrels per day of crude oil and equivalent, synthetic (tar sands) oil and gas plant liquefied petroleum gases (LPG's).

2. Crude oil exports in 1977 (net of exchanged oil) averaged about 271 thousand barrels per day. It was all exported to the United States.

3. Preliminary data for 1977 indicate that total oil consumption in Canada (including LPGs) averaged about 1.8 million barrels per day.

4. Approximately 575 thousand barrels per day of oil were imported in 1977 for consumption in Canada.

5. In 1977, the export charge on oil generated about $1.3 million per day.

6. Oil import compensation liabilities averaged at almost $2.5 million per day in 1977.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Today is Thursday, the conventional time to ask the deputy House leader, in the absence of the government House leader, if he will inform the House as to the business for the balance of this week and possibly into next week, bearing in mind that tomorrow is an allotted day. When the deputy House leader is addressing himself to the business of the House, I wonder whether he will be good enough to designate next Thursday, February 16, as an allotted day, in accordance with the understanding arrived at between the House leaders. Finally, if this matter was raised by my colleague from Edmonton West during the course of the question period perhaps the answer given by the President of the Treasury Board was not complete. However, I wonder if the deputy House leader might tell the House of the government's intention with respect to bringing in the main estimates, bearing in mind the limited time the House has to consider these estimates under our rules? Could he be more specific as to when the main estimates might be tabled in this House so we may give them appropriate attention?

● (1702)

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate today that we will proceed with second reading of Bill C-17, which is the CNR recapitalization act, and in light of the co-operative spirit in the House today I am sure that matter will be concluded. If so, we could proceed to Bill C-16, which would be the Bank Act extension. Tomorrow is an allotted day, and on Monday it is the intention of the government to bring forward Bill C-25, which is the northern pipeline legislation.

In order to comply with a request by the hon. member with respect to an allotted day next week, on behalf of the government I am happy to confirm that next Thursday, February 16, will be designated as an allotted day. Regarding the last point raised by the hon. member I agree with him that the main estimates are an important and pertinent matter. In light of the time frame in which these estimates would be considered, I will bring a specific answer to that reasonable request to the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the deputy House leader could indicate if Bill C-25 will be brought forward as an item of business on Monday and whether that is a firm commitment so we can prepare ourselves for it, regardless of progress or otherwise with respect to matters now before the House.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to bring forward Bill C-25 on Monday as I indicated, and I stand by my statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the announcement that the government intends to proceed with Bill C-25 on Monday, it is true that earlier there was an indication that that bill would be proceeded with yesterday, I believe it was, but in response to objections from this side of the House, that was changed. I must say we have not been notified until just now that it was the government's intention to proceed with the second reading of Bill C-25 on Monday, and I would like to give notice to the government House leader through his deputy that we will ask for a further delay in that matter, particularly in view of the fact that the question of the pipe specifications has not yet been settled.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, prior to the Christmas recess there was unanimous consent given by the House to refer the annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. Since it is obvious that the main estimates will be presented very soon, I wonder if the deputy House leader would verify whether that matter can be referred to the standing committee as soon as possible to comply with the unanimous consent given.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into the matter carefully in the hope that we will be able to comply expeditiously with the disposition of the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Health—Government action to fight cardiovascular disease; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Labour Conditions—Layoffs in nickel industry—Government action to alleviate; the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington—Capital Punishment—Request for reinstatement.

Order, please. It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, December 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Leggatt.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words respecting the amendment to Bill C-1001 which is before the House. Unfortunately it will be a few words because I have only 20 minutes. I would like to enlighten my more Conservative friends as to the merits of publicly owned telephones, but with only 20 minutes it is very difficult to list all of the attributes of public ownership when it comes to the telephone system.

I am pleased that the first comment given was by a member from British Columbia. Before he disappears from the House I want to say to him that I have an article here from the Toronto Globe and Mail which says that the highest telephone rates in the country are those charged in British Columbia, in central Canada and in the maritimes. The lowest telephone rates in the country, as the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) knows, are the rates charged in the prairie provinces. You will note that all telephone systems operating in the prairie provinces are publicly owned. In instances where the telephone systems are privately owned, the rates are all very high indeed, and that speaks for itself. A publicly-owned telephone system is much more efficient, it provides a service at a much lower rate to the consumers, be they businessmen or private residential consumers.

I hope during this debate that Conservative members, particularly those from the prairies, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar as well as others, will join in the debate and urge the federal government to place the Bell Telephone company under public ownership, as are the telephone systems operating in the prairies.

The bill that is before us today states that Bell Telephone want to expand their company, they want extra capitalization, and they want to make some changes in the legislation so that they would not have to come before parliament as often as they have done in the past. The amendment that is before us is to give that a six months' hoist.

I do not think that any of us should be rushing this bill through the House. First of all, Mr. Speaker, we notice in the press just a week or so ago that Bell Telephone are applying to the CRTC for a rate application increase of some $399 million. This is an application made by a company that has experienced large profits over the last many decades directly from the Canadian taxpayers. The rate increase will be 20 per cent for residences—and the Conservative party members laugh, they think it is great.

An hon. Member: It is the Liberals who are laughing.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wish that the electronic equipment in this House could record the laughs of the Conservative party as they laugh at the increase which is to be inflicted on consumers by Bell Telephone. Business rates are being increased by some 28 per cent commencing July 15, 1978. When we see rate increases like that, Mr. Speaker, I am in no hurry to allow Bell Canada to have their way and to see their bill go through this House in an expeditious manner.

I wish the Conservatives who are now talking would get up from sitting on their brains and join this debate, it would be very interesting to hear their comments. People from Alberta, who have a socialized telephone system, should get up and tell us of the advantages of that socialized telephone system. There is another member who I would be very interested to hear speak, the progressive hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He used to work for the Manitoba Telephone Company, which is publicly owned. That telephone company was established in Manitoba years ago by a great socialist, Premier Bracken. It is a telephone system which has worked very well. It will stay public even though the Conservatives are back in power in Manitoba. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) should be telling us how a socialized telephone system works and how the people of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia should have a socialized system.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) will probably get up and tell us about the merits of public ownership of the telephone system in the province of Alberta. However, I am very concerned about the monopoly that Bell Canada has in this part of Canada. I am very concerned about the argument they are making to the CRTC for a rate increase.

In 1974, Bell Telephone made the argument that they needed to make between 11 per cent and 12 per cent profit in order to keep the company going. I gather they have been making that. Now they argue they need between 13½ per cent and 14½ per cent profit to maintain and expand the system, attract new shareholder investment, modernize the company, modernize the equipment, and provide service to people living in outlying areas, northern areas and other parts of the country.

If we do not protest in this House, Bell Telephone will very easily get their way with the CRTC. Their batting average is very good. It is worth while to put on record the batting average of Bell Telephone since 1970, the last seven or so years they have gone before government regulatory agencies. I will go back over the last six.

In June, 1970, Bell requested some $30 million in terms of increases from the federal government. In January, 1971, they were granted $22.5 million, 75 per cent of what they were requesting. In November, 1971, Bell requested $78.1 million. In June, 1972, they were granted $47.2 million, 60 per cent of what they had requested. In November, 1972, they requested $36 million. In July, 1973, they were granted $22.5 million, 63 per cent of what they requested.

In August, 1973, Bell requested $51.8 million. Here I am talking of a company that charges its consumers the highest rates in the country for telephone service for residences and businesses. In September, 1974, they were granted $51.8 million, 100 per cent of their request.

In May, 1975, Bell requested $110 million. In August, 1975, they were granted $14 million, and in January,1976, they were granted $96 million, again 100 per cent of what they had requested. In November, 1976, Bell again requested money, this time $171.4 million. In June, 1977, they were granted $162 million or 95 per cent of what they had requested of their clients in central Canada and the Atlantic provinces.

If you total that up, you find that since June, 1970, they have requested $477.3 million of which they have been granted $416 million, or 87 per cent of what they requested.

Bell Telephone wants to raise the rates for consumers in Ontario, Quebec and other places by 20 per cent in 1978. The chances of that increase going through are very high because over the past six or seven years they have received 87 per cent of what they requested. We have heard barely a whimper from the government members or members of the Conservative party about these excessive rate increases by Bell Telephone Company.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

I can go over the financial reports of Bell Telephone in detail and look at their annual profits. Being a large monopoly corporation, it makes a lot of money. Despite the fact that they claim poverty and state that they need another rate increase, I have recently found that Bell Telephone will be investing a lot of money in Saudi Arabia. During the month of January, Bell Telephone won a billion dollar contract to upgrade the telephone system in Saudi Arabia. If they can expand their empire outside the country in places like Saudi Arabia where there is no shortage of money or technological skills, surely they can provide better telephone service in this country, primarily to those in our rural areas, northern areas where many people are on one line and repair service is very slow, and in residential areas.

When I moved into a new area, I had to wait literally weeks before my telephone was installed. For a while it was necessary to share a telephone line with someone else. Over the years I have not had any problems getting telephones installed in my residences in Saskatchewan. I have never had a constituent call me, write to me or stop me on the street to say that the Saskatchewan government telephone company is being lax or slow in a needless way with regard to installing telephones in either a residence or business.

I am sure all members from Saskatchewan, a province where the population has grown in the last seven years since the NDP government was elected, have not received complaints about the telephone system. The same is probably true in the province of Manitoba. However, here Bell Telephone has a monopoly. There is virtually little public control being exercised. They do what they want in terms of consumers, generally kicking them around. They are only interested in profit, not in providing a service to the people of this country.

When the rate increase application came up and the lawyers for Bell were preparing to argue their case before the CRTC, an article appeared in the February 3 issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail headlined "Metro Rate Would Be Twice Winnipeg's". The telephone rate in Toronto would be twice as high as in the city of Winnipeg. There are other rates that are three times as high as those in provinces where the telephone system is publicly owned.

I want to read some of the article so that hon. members will be aware of it and perhaps aid us in ensuring that we do not facilitate and expedite passage of the bill before us. I quote:

> If Bell Canada has its way, a resident of some centres near metro Toronto soon will be paying three times as much for basic telephone service as residents of Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, and Toronto residents will be paying double the rate in effect in Winnipeg.
> A Globe and Mail survey of telephone rates in effect in seven metropolitan areas and seven small towns across Canada suggests that charges proposed in a Bell rate application now before the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission will be among the highest anywhere in Canada.
> The survey showed that phone service for businesses and residences alike now is costliest in British Columbia and the maritimes and cheapest on the prairies.
> Some of the differences are enormous. Among the cities, the charge for a private-line telephone service now ranges from a low of $4.00 in Winnipeg to a high of $9.95 in Halifax. Bell's charge in both Toronto and Montreal now is $8.15 but under the CRTC application would be $9.80.

● (1722)

Under the CRTC application the rate would go from $8.15 to $9.80. As I say, it is $4.90 in the city of Winnipeg—exactly half of what it is proposed Torontonians shall pay.

The articles goes on to say:

Residents of Portage la Prairie now pay $4 a month for basic phone service compared with a high of $10.25 a month in Bolton, Nobleton and parts of Pickering that can call free to Metro Toronto.

Of course, you could do the same thing from Portage la Prairie into Winnipeg as can be done between Pickering and Toronto.

The article goes on:

The same Metro-fringe Bell subscribers would pay $12.25 under the Bell proposal.

A barber in Portage la Prairie is billed only $8.75 a month for a business telephone. In Bolton the charge is now $31 and will jump to $39.70 if Bell's proposal is approved by the CRTC.

One could go on and quote at great length from the article in the Toronto Globe and Mail, because other examples are given about cities and rate comparisons across the country. Mention is made of Halifax and Regina, Portage la Prairie and Montreal. On previous occasions in debate I have given comparisons between cities like Moncton, Ottawa, etc. We find that in every case the rates charged by Bell Canada are substantially higher than the rates charged in my native province and its sister provinces of Alberta and Manitoba.

I have told the House that the rate in Winnipeg is $4.90. The comparable rate in my home province and capital of Regina is $5.45. I assume it is the same in the city of Saskatoon. I see no reason, therefore, why members of this House should give more power to Bell Canada. I see no reason why members of the House should give up what little scrutinizing ability we do have with respect to Bell. I do not see why Bell Canada should get our stamp of approval to secure a rate increase or expand the size of the corporation. The time has come to look realistically at ways of helping people and at the services we should offer.

Sometimes the best way of doing this is to establish publicly-owned companies. If a company is publicly-owned—and the communications field is a good example of where this should be done—then you can be sure that the sole motivation of such a company will be service to people. If a company is privately-owned, then normally its motivation will be to secure profits for its shareholders, not service to the people. For a privately-owned company there is no advantage at all in improving its facilities in outlying areas. In the hinterland areas, the rural communities far from villages and towns, there is no profit in improving the service.

Under the system which exists in Saskatchewan where an efficient, government-run telephone service is available, one which despite low rates has made a profit, you have a system of cross-subsidization. You can make a big profit in Regina or Saskatoon and use part of that profit to subsidize rates in the little towns and villages throughout the province. This is possible because the main motivating factor in the company is to serve people and to provide telephone service at the lowest possible cost. It will not be done by Bell Canada. It will not be done because Bell wants to make profits so it can invest money in Saudi Arabia or in other industries and make money for its shareholders.

Something else which I feel should be said at this time is that Bell Canada has made a great deal of money over the last number of years. It has done very well indeed. It has made a lot of money in this part of Canada and in the Atlantic provinces. We in our party, during the period in which this bill has been before the House, have drawn attention to some of the profits made by Bell. We have also outlined the manner in which the company treats some of its executives. Some of my colleagues have put on record details of the generous pension plans for some of the senior executives; they have put on record the amounts of some of the bonuses these senior people have received. Things like this just would not happen under a publicly-owned telephone system which was being run at the lowest possible cost for the best possible service to the greatest number of people.

These are just a few of the reasons why I call on all hon. members to oppose the bill before us as vigorously as possible.

An hon. Member: Bring it to a vote!

Mr. Nystrom: I see some Conservatives want us to bring the bill to a vote. I do not think we should bring it to a vote. The quicker we do that, the clearer the signal we give to the CRTC that we want a rate increase granted to Bell Canada. I know that members of the Conservative party from Saskatchewan probably do not want to do that. I also know that certain members from other parts of the country who do not know how a good telephone system should operate really believe Bell Canada needs the money the rate increases would provide. I am in no rush whatever to bring the bill to a vote, and I am sure other colleagues of mine who will be speaking later will take the same position as I.

I call upon the House to defeat the bill and to speak in the debate as long as they can in order to make sure that the people running Bell know we are concerned, that before they get any more handouts from us they will have to improve the services they provide to the people over whom they have a monopoly. Should this measure come to a vote before the next election, Mr. Speaker, the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen).

Mr. Friesen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just wish to remind the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) that in his opening remarks he said he had some things to say to me before I left the chamber. I want to say that even after listening to his jaded and jaundiced remarks for 20 minutes, I am still here—difficult as it was to listen to him—and I will still be here at six o'clock. He drew attention to how much money he is saving through the Saskatchewan Telephone Company. Obviously he took those savings and spent them on a vacation either in Florida or Cuba. Somehow or other he got that tan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, members should not get up and apologize for it not being their day in the House; that happens to everybody at times but I do not think they have to apologize.

Bell Canada is a very important operation and one which deserves attention from the House. If members believe this, I hope they will be prepared to vote against the bill before us. This measure provides, among other things, for a change of great significance. Instead of parliament controlling Bell Canda, the cabinet is to do so by means of orders in council flowing from an application for changes in the organization of Bell by letters patent. These letters patent would be referred to the cabinet for decision. It is true there is a suggestion there might be an intervention on the part of members asking for a debate. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the result would be an overwhelming stamp of approval by Liberal members because the cabinet was involved.

We are going to try to hold this bill up until an election is called. After an election there will be no rubber stamping because there is obviously going to be a minority government. With a minority government all hon. members have to participate and justify their position.

An hon. Member: All six of you!

Mr. Peters: There may very well only be six and I hope I am one of them. I am not prepared to say whether it will be a Conservative government or a Liberal government. I am not too optimistic about it being an NDP government, but I am very optimistic that, no matter which party forms the government, the NDP is going to make the decisions. My assessment is that it will be a Conservative government and that we will make the decisions for them as we have sometimes for the Liberals.

Many hon. members believe we should pass this bill because Bell Canada can do nothing wrong. These members are mainly from western Canada where telephone service does not cost too much. In fact, in the three prairie provinces the telephone service is operated by the governments, through commissions. They assess public demand, calculate the costs and establish the rate to be charged. As my colleague pointed out, in some cases this amounts to less than half the charge in other areas.

Some hon. members will claim that free enterprise is a good system and that it pays. Many people in this country are opposed, however, to paying all the time and now want service at cost. They do not mind paying something for administration as long as it is not unreasonable. Where the telephone service is provided by commissions the costs are not exorbitant, as they are when Bell Canada provides it.

[Mr. Friesen.]

Bell Canada admits it is not really a telephone company. It owns some telephone companies—Northern Telephone in northern Ontario, Maritime Telephone and some others. I am sure they operate their subsidiaries pretty well as telephone companies, but the profits go back to Bell. They own Northern Telecom Limited, New Brunswick Telephone, Maritime Telephone, Newfoundland Telephone and Capital Telephone in the Ottawa area which, although it has less than 2,000 subscribers, owns Place Bell Canada, a fleet of ships and a jet air fleet. The subscribers have not had a rate increase for years and will probably never have one. If one were proposed, some subscriber would probably take it up with the CRTC. The company operates many things that have no relationship to a telephone service.

The Ottawa Citizen of March 9, 1977 quotes the president of Bell Canada as saying the company is a telecommunications operation and not just a phone company. Mr. Speaker, if I subscribe to Reader's Digest I expect to receive a magazine. I am not subscribing to those coupons that offer books or a lottery ticket for a million dollar prize. In my opinion you subscribe only to that in which you are interested. Many people subscribe to Bell Canada who only want a telephone, not a telecommunications network. They are not interested in buying other corporations that may be directly or indirectly connected with telephone communications. Why should a telephone company own boats, for instance? Some years ago when there was an international cable company and ships were required to service the cable this may have been necessary. Is it necessary today, however? The ownership of jet aircraft is not necessary in order to maintain a telephone service. Yet Capital Telephone owns some and rents them to other companies, including Bell Canada and its telecommunications services.

Bell Canada recently requested the CRTC to allow it to increase its rates, and not only to maintain the level of return it has been receiving. When the company went before the CRTC last year Andrew Roman, an intervener representing the National Anti-Poverty Organization, said he was concerned that the proposed increases would not be used to improve services to the ordinary telephone user but to facilitate company investment in non-voice data transmission for businesses. He said he had nothing against those services but that a rate increase should not be used to develop this non-voice data transmission service at the expense of the ordinary telephone user.

At the hearing, questions were put by Mr. Dan Burtnick, a lawyer appearing for the government of Ontario, aimed at finding out from the president of Bell Canada whether his priorities lay with voice services or data services and where he would cut services if that were essential. In response, Mr. Thackray said that Bell Canada treated all its customers alike and did not give priority to the ordinary telephone user over data customers. He said that the Bell Canada act directed the company to provide telephones, but did not mention data services which did not exist when the act was passed. However, he insisted that the company was a telecommunications operation and not just a telephone company.

Also he said that the volume of data services offered by Bell Canada would likely increase relative to the volume of voice communication, and revenues from data might correspondingly increase in importance to the company. He continued by indicating that if Bell Canada did not get its rate increases, the company would cut back on services to private homes, because this was one of the quickest ways to stop spending money in the short term. He indicated that in doing this the company would be following the same course it had followed in 1975 when rate increases were held back.

Hon. members opposite must wear rose coloured glasses. They have indicated that Bell Canada should receive what it is requesting because it is necessary to maintain a good telephone communications system in Canada. Even the president of Bell Canada has indicated that the money will not be used to the benefit of ordinary telephone users. He has said that it will be used to make considerable money for Bell Canada.

It has been suggested that the New Democratic Party is interested in nationalizing Bell Canada. That is correct; we would like to do that because it is a public utility. These funds should be used to provide a service to the entire Canadian population, rather than the many ventures Bell Canada is now involved in.

There is a great similarity between the financial report of Bell Canada and that of the Canadian National Railways. The CNR is nationalized, but parliament has exercised very little control over it for many years. There has been control exercised by cabinet, and quite often the CNR was asked to do things it was not compensated for and did not wish to do. This was not the case with Bell Canada. That company has done things it wished rather than things which were requested by the cabinet or parliament. Bell Canada has had a greater interest in the role of the shareholder than that of the subscriber.

It has been recommended that the CNR should reduce its phony paper debt, a debt it was not capable of handling. That debt should have been written off a long time ago as any other such debt would have been. There have been very few years when the CNR has shown a profit. This year Canadian National is bragging about a $11 million profit. The last time the CNR debt was studied in committee, there was a deficit of $40 million and the interest on that debt was approximately $60 million. If the CNR had written off that debt, in that year the corporation would have earned $28 million in clear profit. Hon. members opposite have not paid much attention to the financial aspects of agencies under their control. This is also true of the agencies which have handled the rate structure of Bell Canada.

This year Bell Canada is requesting a 25 per cent increase. What is that company saying to the average person in Canada? Frankly, the public is not interested in giving Bell Canada that increase, but representatives of Bell Canada have said: "If you do not give it to us, none of the new suburbs will have telephones; we will not make any installations; and if you want to upgrade your telephone service, we will not do it".

The subscribers in rural areas are the worst abused by Bell Canada, and they will suffer even further if Bell Canada does not receive its increase. It has been argued that it is costly to supply rural telephones, which is not true. For example, the majority of the expense involved in providing a telephone system to the rural areas of Saskatchewan took place a number of years ago, but that service was installed at a rate which was 100 per cent less than Bell Canada's rate for installing thousands of telephones back to back in an apartment building. In many instances Bell Canada is not required to use 20 feet of cable when installing telephones in apartment buildings.

In the city of Ottawa, where the lots are approximately 50 feet apart, Bell Canada requires approximately 30, 40 or 50 feet of coaxial cable per unit. That cable is buried in the ground and the contractor is required to do the installation during construction. All the telephone company has to do is to make the appropriate connections and instal the telephones. Yet some people in Ottawa have been waiting a long time for telephones. They are waiting for telephones because the company has indicated that it cannot make those connections until it is in receipt of the rate increase. The public is being blackmailed by this company.

What does Bell Canada tell the general public about its business? It tells them about the widows and orphans who own Bell Canada stock and, for that reason, the stock must be kept viable and the amount of dividends on those stocks must be in line with our national inflationary rate so that the poor widows and orphans will not starve to death. I should like to point out that I have a list of Bell Canada shareholders in my possession.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Peters: All I wanted to indicate was that the smallest shareholder who owns 25 shares is not a widow or an orphan.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members are aware that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) comes from the province of Saskatchewan, which has a publicly owned telephone system, and I come from the province of Manitoba which also has such a system. Neither system was created by a New Democratic Party government or by a CCF government. In Manitoba the government telephone system was created by a Conservative government under Sir R. P. Roblin. The rates there are probably half the proposed rate of Bell Canada which we oppose. We oppose this bill, which would give Bell Canada much greater power to increase its rates and profits. Members of parliament from Ontario and Quebec whose constituents will be hit very hard are conspicuous by their presence in the chamber and by their silence in the debate. By their silence they demonstrate their approval of the increases Bell proposes.

Mr. Orlikow: I presume, when the hon. member says "right on," he supports Bell in its usual request to increase rates.

Mr. Maine: It is a free enterprise system.

Mr. Orlikow: I am happy for that interjection. I invite the hon. member to interject more often because his interjections give me an opportunity to point out how badly the free enterprise system is working for his constituents. The hon. member does not want to listen. He is leaving the chamber.

Let us look at the record of the free enterprise system in which Bell Canada operates. I would like to quote some figures which were printed in the Globe and Mail. That newspaper is not a radical socialist journal. An article on February 3 of this year showed that the rate for an individual residential telephone in Winnipeg was $4.90 a month. In Regina it was $5.45, and in Calgary, $6.10. The present rate in Toronto for that same kind of line is $8.15 a month. If Bell gets the increase it is now asking for, the rate will be $9.80 a month. In Vancouver where there is also a privately-owned telephone company the rate at the present time is $9.75 a month, and in Halifax the rate is $9.95 a month.

Mr. Friesen: What are the labour rates in B.C. and in Manitoba?

Mr. Orlikow: I can assure the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) that the labour rate in Winnipeg is not one half the labour rate in Vancouver. That is not the reason for the sharp difference in price.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) referred to rates in small towns. In Portage la Prairie the rate for an individual residential line is $4 a month. In Bolton, Ontario, a town about the same size, the rate is $10.20. If Bell gets the increase it is asking for, the rate at Bolton will be $12.25. Those figures demonstrate very clearly why even free enterprise governments in the western provinces realize that, when it comes to services people require, it makes sense to have a publicly-owned system rather than a privately-owned monopoly system like that of Bell Canada.

Bell Canada is asking for an increase of between 20 per cent and 28 per cent. Bell is able to get approval 90 per cent of the time from regulatory agencies. The old one was the Canadian Transport Commission, and the present one is the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission.

We in the New Democratic Party have been blocking this bill, and we promise members of parliament and the executives of Bell Canada that we will continue to block it as long as the rules permit.

This bill would make the increases Bell has been able to get almost every year since I came to parliament in 1962 look like small fish in a big tank. Bell wants to remove the limited authority parliament has to keep an eye on what it proposes to do. It wants to remove most of the power of the CRTC. The bill would give Bell the authority to do everything which private companies operating in a competitive market are able to do. Bell wants to be able to sell shares, set the price of the shares it sells, set up more subsidiaries, as it has already done, and operate with no government control at all. The company wants to increase its profit at a tremendous rate at the expense of the people of Canada. Bell Canada has a monopoly and is not in the same position as an ordinary private company which competes on the market with competitors here and abroad. An ordinary company risks losing money and going bankrupt but, being a monopoly, Bell does not.

This bill proposes a number of distinct amendments to Bell's act of incorporation. It would revise the act of incorporation relating to the company's ability and methodology of capitalization, including the removal of the scrutiny of the appropriate government regulatory body. That is something we will never agree to. If the bill is passed, it will give Bell the power to borrow and issue stocks, bonds, debentures or other securities that it deems necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I hate to quote a remark made either today or yesterday, but I find that in respect to this bill I will have to repeat a phrase which the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) used in this House. The more I read about this particular piece of legislation the more it becomes curiouser and curiouser. If one took a walk through the fairyland of economics, this would be the boulevard of all walking areas when looking at the history of the CNR.

It seems rather strange that people still ask for crown corporations in view of the history of this organization. How many times it has been refinanced is a matter of some minor dispute. Some say four and some say five. I suppose it depends on whether you refer to the assumption of debt as the various lines were incorporated into the CNR and whether there was a little written off then. Anyway, I find it very startling to take a look at the record of write-offs which the CNR has experienced.

While it may be repetitive, it is significant to note that governments of Canada in their wisdom of four different occasions have chosen to relieve the CNR of debt to a degree that should make it competitive with other instruments of transportation. On each of the three times prior to this one it has failed utterly. For example, in 1933, under the guise of one excuse or other, we forgave the CNR a debt of $1,230 million. At that time the CNR was supposed to be competitive.

In 1937 we eliminated a debt to the tune of $1,000,825. That is quite a hunk of change. It was particularly large coming just four years after the forgiveness of $1,230 million. In 1937 we therefore had nearly $3 billion of indebtedness that had been forgiven for a Crown corporation. To those who plead for Crown entities operated and financed by the taxpayer, that ought to be an initial lesson of its total lack of vision and capability.

In 1952 there was a further forgiveness of debt and interest which amounted to $2,845 million. In 1978 we are forgiving an additional $808 million, which will bring us to the point of having forgiven $6,708 million.

There is another Crown corporation owned and operated by the government of Canada which is building up a comparable structure of debt which was also forgiven by this government. I refer to the Seaway, which is another example of where the taxpayers have had to fork over in order to keep a Crown corporation in operation. I am just sick of Crown corporations. I submit there is a better way.

Thirty years ago rail rates were giving the Atlantic area problems in two ways. They were going up so fast that it made it difficult for producers to ship westward to Canadian markets. The Atlantic area was not developing at that time. We have had a meteor-like rise in rates in the past 30 years to the point where the income of producers in the Atlantic area has been further diminished. Our competitive position, particularly as it relates to agriculture, has been virtually wiped out. The advantages of expertise, soil in agriculture, yield and climate, have been literally totally wiped out. We now find ourselves in a position of disadvantage. Producers of those commodities which at one time were profitable are now at a disadvantage by virtue of the fact that this Crown corporation has led the way in the increment of freight rates from the Atlantic area to western markets.

We are now forgiving another $800 million indebtedness which brings the total relief given by the taxpayers to the CNR to $6.7 billion. Yet we still do not have a competitive position for our products in the Atlantic area.

There is a further problem. Not only has our income been reduced by virtue of railway tariff increments, but our cost of living has increased as charges levied by one Crown corporation after another in the movement of goods from west to east have increased. Therefore, we are getting it both ways; there is a reduction in income on that which we ship, and there is an increasing demand on our income and cost of living to pay for goods which cost us more because of freight charges which are increased on about a six monthly basis. As a maritimer being taken both coming and going, I am not really very happy about forgiving a further $800 million to the CNR.

I am particularly unhappy when I look at the CNR financial statement. It shows a long-term debt of $2,238 million. We are going to forgive $808 million of that. CN will still be $1.4 billion in debt.

I am even more unhappy when I look at remarks made at an earlier date when one of these forgiveness festivities took place. A gentleman known to many people in this House by the name of Mr. Donald Gordon said in a message to CN employees after the forgiveness of 1952 that we are now in a position where we have nothing to hide behind, nothing to block the road to success. He stated that we have a fighting chance of paying our way in the world and that, counting the bad years with the good, we ought to be able on the average to pay all our operating expenses, our fixed interest charges and income taxes and still have something left to return to the owners as a dividend on preferred stock.

In the 25 years since that assessment of its prospects, the CN system incurred net debts totalling $670 million, paid by the government, despite an infusion of $768 million of capital through government purchase of preferred stock which added more than $1 billion to its long-term debt, separate and apart from the financing of Air Canada. CN's fixed charges grew from $25 million to $132 million in the period 1952 to 1957.

I remember a very heated debate on a bill surrounding the establishment of the CN Tower in Toronto. At the time that tower was being proposed and while it was being constructed, it was criticized for taking money away that was badly needed for rolling stock and other items in the business of CN. It may or may not have been a profitable structure. I am not able to determine whether it is, except for a few government words and a few railroad official words which indicate something about it. In any event, whether it is profitable is not yet clear.

What is clear is that CN has been interested in a great many things other than transportation. When it was incapable of managing its principal business, it was permitted to go afield into real estate, towers, airplanes, hotels and a multitude of different services. It does this despite the fact it was not even capable of running the railroad first. The government has encouraged and allowed this structure to become diversified although this Crown corporation could not manage what it already had. This Crown corporation had proved itself incompetent ever since it was incorporated as such. I predict this will probably not be the last time members of the House will be asked to discuss refinancing the CNR and making further sums available to the company.

I would point out that the indebtedness remains at $1.4 billion. In earlier times when forgiveness was sought from parliament, it was said that the company had inherited massive debts, that it had been asked by government to do things which a private corporation would not be asked to do and it was therefore necessary to ask parliament for a little more money to put the railway back into competitive shape. But the historic debt has more than been forgiven, Mr. Speaker. The existing debt of the CNR is probably comparable to that of other corporations operating in Canada. It is said the company has no equity capital. But why should it need equity capital when the government will pour into its coffers every nickel the company loses in a year's operation? Why should it need equity capital when the government is always ready to buy preferred shares upon which no interest is ever paid? It might be accrued but it is never paid. I contend it has befuddled the minds of Canadians by failure to adopt proper accounting procedures over the years. Why did the government not insist on knowing on an annual basis just how badly this corporation was operating as compared with private companies of a similar nature?

The country has been hoodwinked by the government and by the executive structure of the CNR into believing the company was nearly making a profit as taxpayers poured their millions into the sustenance of this corporation. Now we are being asked to forgive another $808 million, making $6.7 billion in total.

Reading various commentaries on the CNR one finds that people are making statements with respect to the extravagance of the capital expenditure. I have no instance of this extravagance. Every shipper of farm goods, whether he lives on the east or the west coast, knows that the car situation has been critical for years. The Government of Canada, in addition to the $6.7 billion, has had to buy cars to move grain though it has refused to buy cars to move perishable goods. It is a sorry record.

I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that during the consideration of this bill no one to your right should urge us to hurry this legislation through so as to get the CN on its feet. Do not hurry this time. We want an accurate accounting study to show us what is the true position of the CN in comparison with that of its principal competitor, CP. What is the competitive position of the CNR in the area of road transportation? What is its competitive position in the area of water transportation? Until such time as the minister is prepared to give us authentic figures of this kind I do not think it would be fair to the taxpayers that any member on Your Honour's right should say at any point in time that a member of the opposition is holding up this bill. It is time the government and its child, the CNR, levelled with the people of Canada. We need to know these facts from experts who might have some idea what they are—and I mean from sources outside of government.

Another piece of legislation we are considering, the Aeronautics Act, shows that the Department of Transport has no idea what is going on. Take a look at the report. You will find out we collected certain funds from aircraft operations and then reimbursed them again. We are trying again to collect them now and we probably cannot win, because according to the advice the Department of Justice received, a regulation may not have been correctly worded or the act was improperly framed. Sure as anything it was improperly administered; the story is that for ten years the department wanted to get an amendment through, but the government has not given time or space in its schedule for a new aeronautics bill to be brought in. So the position with regard to that is one of total confusion. If the administration of the CNR and the Department of Transport is as dismal as it has been in the case of Air Canada, then Canada needs to know. We need to know what is the competitive position.

We do know that there will be demands on the CNR for cars for the shipment of perishable goods. There will be demands for cars for the prompt shipment of frozen foods, demands for cars for the prompt shipment of all kinds of goods and commodities. What is the total of these anticipated demands likely to be? What are likely to be the capital requirements of the CNR? Will the company be able to buy these cars and haul goods from one part of Canada to another at a price we can afford? What impact will this have on rates? As a maritimer I am concerned about this aspect.

In our last discussion of the cost of transportation in the Atlantic area my remarks involved a comparison of rates for the movement of wood products in the maritimes, particularly in New Brunswick, as compared with the cost of moving comparable products in British Columbia. I showed that in New Brunswick the CN was charging us anything from 25 per cent to 100 per cent more than the British Columbia railroad was charging to move such products in B.C.

At that time the B.C. railroad was making a profit. I admit there was a so-called government out there leaning a little to the left; it almost caused that enterprise to flounder, too. The only two governments which could be compared in business management would be that government and the one on your right, Mr. Speaker. We are now in a position where producers of wood, wood products and paper in New Brunswick are taking a look at competitive rates in the state of Maine. We find that in Maine there is an even wider differential when it comes to the movement of wood products than there was between rates in New Brunswick and British Columbia. It is even more unfavourable.

The CNR does not look very good, Mr. Speaker, and I can see no point in giving the company $808 million if this House is not assured by the minister and the department that there is likely to be in the foreseeable future sufficient management capability to ensure that we shall not be asked again to forgive a large portion of the railway's obligations. The Bible tells us we should turn the other cheek. Mr. Speaker, we have turned it, turned it and turned it—and we got slapped every time we turned. The minister from Restigouche can grin but he has potato producers in his constituency who are just not competitive with producers in central Canada today because of unfair freight rates charged by the only railway running through his constituency, the CNR. So the minister had better be prepared to tell us some facts and give us some prospects for the future which would justify the taxpayers forgiving $808 million.

What a dismal history for a Crown corporation. Why do members opposite not stand up and cheer? I remember going to the railway station in my community thirty years ago. It had a roadbed with no grass then but there were some good ties and a crew of men went along its length repairing it. Today the grass in that road bed is so high that you could not tell whether there were any ties unless you took the trouble to dig. The speed limit on the line is 15 miles an hour. It is ten miles an hour in Prince Edward Island. There are not many rail points in Prince Edward Island where heavy produce can be loaded, and even at those you cannot be sure what kind of car will be used and whether the load will be safe. Yet this government takes no action and the CNR takes no action.

Just recently the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) received a telegram from the New Brunswick Potato Shippers Association about the situation in that industry. When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) was in Grand Falls he received a deputation which stated that the industry could not be competitive if the CNR and the CPR did not take a realistic look at the value of transportation to industry, supply it with equipment and give it a rate that would enable it to survive.

Let us assume, Mr. Speaker, that you want to export potatoes from the constituency of Madawaska-Victoria. You might have the choice of loading them in Maine and shipping them through a port there or loading them in New Brunswick and shipping them through either Saint John or Halifax. The charges for going through the state of Maine would be somewhere between one-third and one half of the charges imposed by the CN or the CP. Now we are asked to forgive this debt and to smile while doing it. Mr. Speaker, it makes you cry crocodile tears.

It used to be the case that when you loaded a perishable commodity on the railway they had the responsibility to see to it—whether the weather be too hot or too cold—that the produce arrived at its destination in good condition. Now the government in its ignorance—and please note that I said ignorance, Mr. Speaker—has allowed the railroads to remove the priority for the movement of perishable products. Cars of potatoes, fruit and vegetables have been left sitting along the sidings in Canada until they rotted or froze, depending upon the weather. The CNR takes no responsibility for this. To the best of my knowledge and belief it is the only service in Canada for which the people have been asked to pay more and from which, on an annual basis, they have received less in the form of quality of equipment and service.

More and more producers in Atlantic Canada, agricultural or otherwise, are buying their own trucking outfits to move their goods to the markets of central Canada. This is not necessarily because it is cheaper or because they are making money on transportation—although they claim they are not losing—but rather because the railway system cannot deliver to the satisfaction of the customer. When you cannot satisfy your customer, Mr. Speaker, you do not have any business. Small businesses are going into trucking because the railroads, particularly the CNR, cannot deliver to their satisfaction.

I am looking forward to the day when CNR officials will appear before this committee, and I hope the minister will insist that we be given an opportunity to get an in depth accounting of present conditions. I should like the company to explain why wood products can be moved more cheaply in Maine than in New Brunswick, for instance.

I want also to know what is the cost structure. A blind man could tell that the Problem is not only the difference in equipment, though ours could not deteriorate any further. Does the problem lie with despatching? History shows that we have forgiven all debts, so they do not have to worry about money.

On many occasions I have inquired if the Department of Transport has ever made a study of other railroads in the world that managed to make a profit and compared them with the CNR, but I have not been able to get answers. Just this morning I put a question to an official of the department and he began his reply "I would conjecture—". Mr. Speaker, we have had a lot of conjectures and they have been costly. I think it is time we had some definitive and accurate answers.

We believe we have placed great men in executive positions in the CNR. Is the present situation their fault, or the fault of the government which has imposed constrictions upon the CNR? Is it because of bad management? Where is the weakness, Mr. Speaker, that causes producers to turn to trucks?

I hope the minister will also explain the competitive position between rail and water transportation. Other carriers are being put at a disadvantage. We know that the Post Office has discriminated against part of the trucking industry through adopting a plan to carry small packages. I do not think it has done very much for the Post Office but it has taken business away from private enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, this type of transportation is important to Canada. There is not much use, however, in the government investing in DREE and other aid projects if there is no transportation system to take goods to market at a competitive price. It does not make any difference whether the money is invested in Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, the product must go to market. If the goods cannot go through our ports at a price competitive with Maine, then they are not going to be competitive on the international market. If they cannot be moved to central Canada at a price competitive with other jurisdictions, then they are not going to be competitive with goods produced in the state of New York or the state of Washington.

I should like now to turn to CN Marine. As far as I know it is the only water transport structure that does not offer reasonable insurance protection for the vehicles it carries. The automatic coverage for a tractor-trailer carried on the CN marine ferry on the east coast is $500. To recover more than that one must sue the Crown. No matter how you try you cannot get marine insurance for travel on that ferry because all too often the tractor-trailers are not secured well enough. Not long ago when the ferry hit a big wave, a tractor-trailer tipped over and crushed three cars. Then when they got it off those three cars it went the other way and crushed two more. This is not hearsay, this is fact. There were five automobile owners who were in a jam when they tried to collect insurance, and there is no truck owner who can get insurance which will come anywhere near covering the loss of upsetting his load first left and then right. They did a good job on that one! This is what makes one wonder about Crown corporations.

CN Marine has insurance, but the only way you can collect from that insurance is to sue the Crown of Canada. It is not good to operate a ferry in such a fashion. Companies cannot afford to pay marine insurance for the loads they put on that ferry and have to take the liability into their own hands and sue the Crown, or buy insurance at such a rate that a maximum value load might cost you $15,000 in freight to move it from Cape Breton to Newfoundland. It could actually cost as much as $15,000 to move one load. Therefore, the people who use that ferry service are paying their own bills or, if they are big enough, bold enough, patient enough, and have money enough, they sue the Crown.

Why do we as taxpayers have to forgive for a fourth and maybe a fifth time? Why do we not have a Department of Transport with the capability of extending businesslike management to a Crown corporation? That is what it needs. I am not accusing this government as a government, I am accusing all governments of Canada historically for contributing to this situation. I am pleading with this government—and I hope the people of Canada will insist on this—to put this corporation on a paying basis. We in Canada cannot afford to allow the CNR or any other railway to neglect its road bed because it cannot find the ties. Canadian producers do not have the money to produce products when they cannot find cars to ship them. Canadian taxpayers are being abused by the Department of Transport and its minister in a very great way. A boulevard of fantasy to a fairyland of economics is what this tragedy of economic history would seem to be.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Paproski: Twice in one day! This is the sunshine socialist.

An hon. Member: Tell us about that sun tan.

Mr. Nystrom: I have a great fan club over here, Mr. Speaker, and I note that they are all informed.

An hon. Member: We are jealous of your tan.

Mr. Nystrom: When I spoke earlier today there were only three members of the Conservative party here. They heard that I spoke so well there are now 13 or 14.

[Mr. McCain.]

An hon. Member: Just talk for a while and we will be back to three.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: You are too young to know what a train is. Have you ridden one?

Mr. Nystrom: We now hear from the very articulate member from Nova Scotia. I hope he will get up during this debate and tell us how the transportation system should be organized so it will be more economical for all Canadians.

An hon. Member: I thought you were well trained.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Let's hear from the hon. member from Manitoba.

Mr. Nystrom: I am not a Manitoban, I am a Saskatchewanian, and I point this out in reply to that interjection from across the floor.

In any event, the bill before us today gives us a very good opportunity to talk about transportation and the way the economy and the industries of our country should be organized, and it gives us a chance to talk about some of the inequities that exist in Canada. The transportation system is really a vital key to how one organizes the country.

The bill before us is to recapitalize the CNR by writing off $808 million of a debt of around $2 billion that the CNR had accumulated at the time it was formed. There are three different things I want to refer to tonight in the remarks I intend to make. The first is that our party supports the move. We believe that writing off the debt of the CNR is a good thing. We believe the CNR should be on an equal footing with the CPR so it can give that company some real competition.

The second thing I want to concern myself with is the real fear I have that this move, even though it is a good move, is the first step toward privatization of the CNR, turning it into a private company by selling it off piece by piece, particularly the profitable areas, to private concerns and companies. I think that would be very wrong, Mr. Speaker.

My third concern when talking about a bill of this sort, to which I have already referred, is that we also talk a little about the transportation system of our country, how we plan it; we should talk about industrial strategy and how we want our country to be organized.

Let me have a look at the history of railways in our country. As I have said already, the move in itself is a good one. The CNR has been criticized very unfairly for a number of years as being a very inefficient corporation. The CNR has really been very efficient. If you go back to the time of World War II, Mr. Speaker, you find that the CNR really made a profit in almost all of those years; that is, if you take away some of the horrendous debt it has and the interest it had to pay on that debt which it inherited.

The CPR has always been in a different situation. It was subsidized very heavily by Canadian governments over the years, and as a result of that it is basically debt free compared to the CN.

An hon. Member: What absolute crap.

Mr. Nystrom: When the CPR was formed—

Mr. Nowlan: Absolute historical crap.

Mr. Nystrom: Let me look at some of the facts. When the CPR was formed it was given $25 million in cash on an outright gift basis; it was given some 25 million acres of land; it was given other private railways that became part of the CPR in our country, and it was given all kinds of various rights and gifts by the federal government of this country. It is now worth about $5 billion, which is a lot of money.

The CPR has also been able to expand into several other businesses in our country. It is involved in land development through Marathon Realty; it is involved in the airline business through CP Air; it is involved in the resource industry through Cominco; it is involved in oil through CP Oil; and it is involved in the financial world through CP Investments.

When we consider the CN we see the reverse situation. Instead of being given all kinds of gifts and subsidies, as was the CPR, we find that the CNR was really formed when five railways in this country went bankrupt—the Intercolonial Railway, the National Transcontinental Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway. In 1919 these five railway companies as well as a few tiny branch railways or companies were formed into the CNR. So that when the CNR was formed it was loaded down right away with all kinds of debts. As a result it has always been in a very disadvantageous position in terms of competition with the CPR.

I want to say at the outset that I am in favour of this bill, which will take away much of that debt from the CNR and put it on an equal footing with the CPR, giving it an equal chance to compete right across this country.

Let me now say a few words about my fear regarding the privatization of the CNR. From the statements I have heard from the president of the CNR, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and other officials of the railway and the government, one of the objectives is to gradually sell off the CN. They will start doing that by selling off the more profitable aspects of the railway; that is, by taking away some of its profitable branches. They have already set up VIA Rail and are now talking about reorganizing other branches of the CN, such as the hotel end, for example. They are talking about prying this aspect away from the company. I maintain this should not be done.

One amendment I should like to see would result in the shares of the CNR not being traded publicly but remaining 100 per cent owned by a Crown corporation. This would result in its being operated as a Crown corporation in a similar fashion to the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, the Saskatchewan government telephone company, the Saskatchewan insurance corporation and all kinds of other companies. This is the manner in which I would like to see the CNR operated, but it will not be done in that way.

There are many reasons why the CNR should remain a publicly-owned corporation. In fact, the CPR should be nationalized as well in order to have one national railway system in Canada. A transportation system should provide a basic service to people. It should not be in existence simply to provide a profit to its shareholders. If the railway system is publicly owned, then decent transportation will be provided to the various regions of our country. If that system is privately owned, its main concern will be the making of a profit. I do not believe in that, but it is the motivation of the free enterprise system.

Transportation should not be organized in that way. If it is, there will be greater concentrations of people in the huge urban centres such as southern Ontario, metropolitan Montreal and the lower mainland of British Columbia. At the same time there will be fewer people living in the farm regions, the small towns, the Atlantic provinces, the north and the other areas which are distant from the urban centres. People will gravitate toward the large centres if there is a privately owned transportation system, because transportation and freight rates will be lower.

If the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) and myself wanted to set up a shoe factory, we would do so in Toronto because it has the market and the freight rates are lower. Transportation should be organized in the opposite sense. It should be operated under a philosophy similar to that which governs the postage stamp. The postage stamp philosophy does not discriminate against people because of where they live. If a person lives in Inuvik and wants to send a letter to Ottawa, the cost will be the same as that for the person who wants to send one from Montreal to Ottawa: Some of that philosophy should be ingrained in the Canadian transportation and freight rate system.

If there was an equalization of freight rates in this country, a lot more would be done for the Atlantic provinces and the outlying areas than the DREE program is doing, for example. The DREE program is only good as long as the carrots or the gifts are there. When Santa Claus runs out of gifts, then there is no reason for DREE to stay in the place where it was established. Often it will fold up, or certainly it will not expand. If the freight rates were equalized from coast to coast, then there would be a reason for industry to stay and to expand.

I, as well as many other hon. members from the prairies, can give various examples of discriminatory freight rates and their effect upon the prairies provinces. Some commodities can be shipped more cheaply from Toronto and Hamilton to Vancouver than they can be shipped from Toronto to the prairies provinces. It is cheaper to ship certain goods overseas than it is to ship certain goods to the prairies because the transportation system is in the hands of large companies which are interested in making profits. There is no competition for those companies in the prairies. Thus, they have a monopoly and can charge what the market will bear. That is another reason why I believe the Canadian transportation system should be publicly owned and operated on behalf of all people.

I hope parts of the CNR are not sold off. If they are, the ones sold will be the profitable ones and the ones retained will be those which are losing money. The Liberal government has viewed Crown corporations over the years as follows: if it is profitable, sell it because it can be looked after by private companies; but if it is not profitable, then it should be subsidized by the treasury.

The transportation system should be an integrated system. It should be involved in the hotel business and be integrated with trucking companies, but companies and airlines. That would result in a national plan, and within the national transportation system, cross-subsidization could take place.

When the CCF took power in the province of Saskatchewan in 1944, one of its priorities was to ensure that small communities received bus service. Many villages, communities and hamlets received bus service because of that. They do not receive that service from Greyhound or some other private bus company because it does not pay to go into these small communities. They receive their bus service from the Saskatchewan Transportation Company, STC, which has been set up as a Crown corporation and is owned by the people of Saskatchewan.

The STC makes money on some of its lines, such as the run from Yorkton to Regina, which are large population centres. They are 115 to 120 miles apart. The STC is losing money on runs from Regina through little villages and hamlets, stopping every eight or ten miles. Sometimes the bus stops to pick up an old age pensioner who is going into the city; sometimes the bus stops to drop off a passenger who is going to visit someone in the next village or town. The Saskatchewan Transportation Company loses money on rural runs, but it uses the profits made on the busier runs to subsidize them. Without STC, rural communities would not have a bus service and they probably would be smaller today because there would be one less service for the people. But as a result of the publicly-owned bus system, these people have service. The only way that service could be profitable would be to charge excessively high rates, and then no one would use the service because of the cost. The example of the Saskatchewan Transportation Company could be expanded right across Canada.

In Yorkton and from time to time in Brandon, as is the case in Dauphin, Manitoba, there is a problem with inadequate air service because of the lack of population. Private companies do not want to provide air service to Yorkton and Dauphin because it does not pay. Thus, they cannot make a profit, nor can a dividend be paid to shareholders. The only way these communities will receive good air service is for a private company to be heavily subsidized, or for Air Canada to provide it. If a private company is going to be heavily subsidized, it might as well be publicly owned.

If the CNR and the CPR were amalgamated and operated as a Crown corporation, then it could be used as a major planning device for our economy and would assist in diversifing our population. Most Canadians live in three or four of the larger population centres. This creates all kinds of problems in terms of crime rates, the noise of the big city, transportation problems, and hustle and bustle. Most of our big cities are built on the best farmland. Only one half of one per cent of Canada is class one farmland. If the urban centres are expanded, then more farmland is paved over. By taking away the grain and oilseeds industries, Canada will not be self-sufficient in the production of food.

For many reasons it makes sense to have a publicly owned transportation system which has as its motivation service to people and service to outlying areas instead of making a profit. Those are some of the matters which concern me about this bill.

Another conern is that if we do not have a publicly-owned transportation system, we will have to adopt the philosophy of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) of user-pay. If that philosophy is adopted, outlying areas will have to pay the bill. Farmers on the prairies will have to pay the bill for transporting their grain. The Crowsnest rate will probably disappear, and farmers will then have to pay the full cost of transporting their grain.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Never.

Mr. Nystrom: Many of us on the prairies say "never" and "over our dead bodies." I am sure it would be over the dead body of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) as well as mine, but the Minister of Transport does not say "never". Sometimes he says "maybe," particularly right after an election. Perhaps as we go into a campaign he says "never", but reading through his speeches I have found that he is seriously considering getting rid of the Crow rate. He says that perhaps farmers will be given the benefit of that rate in some other way, but the user pay philosophy means that farmers themselves will pay the full cost of shipping their grain.

One of the benefits the country was supposed to have reaped from the CPR when that company got concessions from the public years ago was that the company was going to ship farmers' grain at a reduced rate forever. I am afraid that if we adopt the user-pay concept, that will not happen.

I want to discuss the issue of rail line abandonment. If we want railways to make money, we are obviously talking about abandoning unprofitable rail lines, rail lines which service small communities and which might not haul as much grain as rail lines which service communities in the big grain growing areas of the prairies. This issue affects many people in my area, and I want to spend a few minutes giving some specific examples.

The minister has talked for a long time about abandoning some rail lines. A commission chaired by Mr. Hall produced a report on grain handling and transportation in western Canada. The Hall commission report was tabled a few months ago. It recommended a number of things with regard to railways and the prairies.

There are three lines in my riding which can perhaps illustrate the point I want to make. Mr. Hall divided railways into three categories. He said that about one-third of the rail lines should stay as part of the basic network. About another one-third are rail lines which it is suggested should go between now and the year 1981. The third group of lines is a group upon which the commission could not make a decision. They might be commercially viable but they might not. The commission feels that they should be the subject of further study. The commission recommended that those rail lines be put under the proposed prairie rail authority. The prairie rail authority is to make up its mind about the future of those lines. However, the minister has not yet established a prairie rail authority. He set up a committee, which is really an extension of his office, chaired by an individual in Saskatchewan, which is going to make recommendations on the future of rail lines in the country.

One of the prime factors in determining whether a rail line will go or stay is whether it is profitable. Because the Minister of Transport believes in the user pay concept. If the user is not paying enough, then the rail line will go. I would like to give three specific examples of what I mean.

There is a rail line in the northern part of my constituency which runs through the towns of Preeceville, Lintlaw, Nut Mountain and Kelvington and which hauls a lot of grain. That rail line should stay. The ten-year average on that line is about 73,000 bushels per mile. That is a lot of grain, and yet the minister is considering abandoning that line. A local committee from those communities was established a few months ago to save the line. They received a letter from the minister. If I remember correctly, that was on December 28. It was certainly toward the end of last year. That letter stated that in the following year a recommendation would be received from the prairie rail action committee about the future of that line. Unless the members of those communities fight really hard, my guess is that that line will go since the minister believes in the philosophy of user pay.

That philosophy discriminates against small towns and small communities. As Saskatchewan members know, places like Preeceville and Kelvington are not small towns, and when you haul 73,000 bushels of grain per mile on a railway track, that is not a small haul. It is a significant amount of grain. That line should stay, and it would stay if we had a rational transportation system, a system concerned about service to people rather than profit.

What is happening now—and I suspect that the minister is an accomplice to this—is that that line is being allowed to deteriorate. Snow is not being cleared off the line. It is getting run down. It is more and more difficult to argue that the line is viable, but that is part of the plan. The plan is to eliminate many rail lines in this country.

There is another line in my constituency which runs from the town of Canora through to the little town of MacNutt, which is near the Manitoba boarder, close to the riding of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). That is another line which might be going between now and 1990. There are about ten elevators on that line. In the years in between 1967 and 1975, 1975 being the year the Hall commission was appointed, about 1.6 million bushels of grain moved along that line. That is about 42,000 bushels of grain per mile of track. The line is some 37.8 miles long, and it services a number of small communities. They are very fragile communities because they are located quite close to larger centres like Dauphin, Yorkton, Kamsack and Canora. In the small centres, if the railway goes, their elevators go. If the elevators go, so go the agents and their families. Where there are schools, they might be the next to go. If the elevators go, the reason for farmers to come to these communities also goes. Farmers will shop elsewhere and those communities will die. I do not want to see that happen. It is already happening too much on the prairies and in rural Canada; it does not have to happen.

A third line in my riding to which I want to refer is not as fortunate as the previous two. According to the Hall Commission report and all the indications I have received from the minister, it will probably be abandoned some time between now and the end of 1981. This line services two small communities, Jedburgh and Willowbrook, and hauls about 34,000 bushels of grain per mile. Both these communities are small, but they are communities. They have community halls, stores and post offices. They have grain elevators, and if the elevators go—and according to the minister they will—it is only a matter of time before the communities die. It is only a matter of time before some of the small farmers go, because if they have to haul their grain further to get to an elevator, they will not survive in business. Larger operations will, but the small ones will be squeezed out. Large operations can afford to haul grain longer distances.

In many of these places the taxpayer will have to foot the bill. These communities are on roads which are not built to carry large amounts of grain in large trucks. If large trucks are used on these roads, the roads will be damaged and municipalities will have to spend much more money upgrading them and keeping them in shape. Once again, the ordinary people of those communities will be hit the hardest.

That is an example of the tragedy which will be caused by the user pay concept. It is an example of what I mean by the tragedy of always trying to make a profit, instead of having a transportation system which will serve the people of this country. If we had a transportation system that had as its priority service to the people, we would not have wholesale rail line abandonment across the prairies, and there would be some hope for the small prairie communities which are gradually going to dwindle away and disappear.

We now come to the question whether we can believe the government. Transportation has been an issue in our part of the country for years. Before the debate this evening I searched for some statements made by the Minister of Transport and the Prime Minister in the last election campaign. This was in an effort to find any statement of hope for the people who live in those small communities I referred to in my riding and, also those who live in the ridings of almost any rural member from the prairies sitting in this House. I found that in the election campaign of 1974 the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport certainly fiddled and sang to a different tune than the tune they are singing now.

I will quote some statements that will prove that without any shadow of a doubt. First of all, I quote from the issue of the Winnipeg Free Press of June 8, 1974. I am sure this will be of interest to all Conservative candidates, and it is of interest to our candidates. It reads as follows:

> Justice Minister Otto Lang told a public meeting Friday night that if the Liberal government is re-elected not one railway branch line on the prairies will be abandoned as long as producers deliver to elevators on the line and the elevators continue to operate.

In the same meeting he said, and I quote again:

> Countering opposition that he is out to close the many small grain elevators situated close to farmers . . . he declared that the smaller elevators will, in effect, remain as long as farmers want them.

I serve notice on the Minister of Transport that in my riding there are three "save our rail" committees. In each of these three communities where these rural lines travel the people want those elevators, they want those branch lines, and the farmers will continue delivering to those elevators as long as the elevators are there. The elevator companies in some of these places have assured me that they have no intention at all, Mr. Speaker, of closing down the elevators. They will be there as long as the Minister of Transport makes sure the rail lines are there. I say to him: "Let us make sure that you live up to your promises". With another election coming the Minister of Transport will probably make those same promises again, so I remind him of the promises which he has made to the country.

Again, another statement from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 11, 1974:

> Otto Lang said, "as long as the Liberal party forms the government and as long as producers wish to continue to deliver to the elevator of their choice, not one rail line will be abandoned."

Now I wish to quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 15, 1974, under the headline "Prime Minister Outlines Farm Policy". I did not know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) knew one cow from the other, but he was in Winnipeg and on June 15 he outlined the government's farm policy, according to this newspaper. The Prime Minister said:

> He also reiterated his party's pledge to end any freight discrimination on the movement of meat, livestock and feed grains across Canada. This would not affect the Crowsnest special rates to aid the movement of grains for export to the west coast.

In that particular instance the Prime Minister is talking about saving the Crowsnest rate. I now quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 15, 1974:

> Justice Minister Otto Lang promised to pay farmers premium rates if they volunteer to take longer hauls, and to allow smaller grain elevators to stay in use as long as farmers want them.

As long as farmers want to use the grain elevators, they will stay in use, according to the Minister of Transport. I have a further quote from the Prime Minister saying approximately the same thing. This statement is also taken from the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 15, 1974:

> He also added another plank to a transportation policy . . . He promised yesterday (June 14, 1974) not to abandon rail service on branch lines as long as elevator companies considered that continued rail service was warranted.

These are examples of campaign promises that were made in June, 1974, all of them to the effect that if farmers wanted to continue delivering grain to the elevators on the branch lines as I am sure they will in all of our ridings, not one elevator would be closed by the government of this country.

Let us make sure that the people who live in those areas know what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport have said. When the election campaign gets under way these promises will be heard again. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) will be adding his promises as well. We must be certain that the people do not make the same mistake again and re-elect those members to the House of Commons. If they do, abandonment of the rail lines on the prairies will come to pass.

All of us can pick up a copy of the Hall report, and we can see the maps of the railways, we can see the different colours of the lines and we can see quite visually which rail lines will be abandoned. When Mr. Justice Hall tabled his report, so clearly and well presented, it seemed to me that he did not want all of those rail lines abandoned; he wanted a prairie rail authority set up to study them further.

The indication I am getting is that most of those rail lines will be abandoned. I say to the people of Canada: "Let's put pressure on the minister for the few short months that he is going to be on his job". We must try to have him make a commitment to the effect that those rail lines will stay.

I see the hon. member for Crowfoot and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) sitting across the way.

Mr. Horner: We're old friends.

Mr. Nystrom: I know the minister in charge of industry, trade and commerce would not make a statement like the one the Minister of Transport has made. I know that he is a man of much more integrity than the minister from Saskatchewan. I am sure the minister from Crowfoot is ashamed of these old Liberal campaign promises of 1974.

Mr. Horner: I am not ashamed of anything I have ever done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: He says he is not ashamed of anything he has ever done.

Mr. Horner: I have many friends on the opposite side of the House and I have many enemies. They are still the same.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister is saying that he is not ashamed of the statements his colleagues in the cabinet have made. He must be embarrassed by what has been said by the Minister of Transport. I think it was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who said at one time that the Minister of Transport should be tarred and feathered. I am sure he still believes that, and that he is a little embarrassed.

I return to this quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 8, 1974 which states:

> Justice Minister Otto Lang told a public meeting Friday night that if the Liberal government is re-elected not one railway branch line on the prairies will be abandoned as long as producers deliver to elevators on the line and the elevators continue to operate.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce must be embarrassed by that statement. He knows the Minister of Transport intends to abandon some lines. It must turn his stomach to sit in the cabinet with a minister who so blatantly breaks his campaign promises and so coolly will say to the people in my riding that their rail line must go. I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) must be disgusted with that type of dishonesty. Once the Minister of Transport is re-elected he will forget all about his promises. He sets up smokescreens by setting up studies and he teases the people and pretends that their lines will be saved. But when the time comes the lines are not saved. I hope the people who live in the prairie provinces will realize this same Minister of Transport, and his new "Tonto" over there are making promises out of both sides of their mouths.

I submit that our whole transportation system should be pulicly owned and controlled. The prime aims of this system should be to provide a service to the people of Canada, not to make a profit for the shareholders. That should be the prime need to which we should be addressing ourselves.

I say to those in this House who are firm and passionate believers of free enterprise, such as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan), that there are other areas in which profits can be made. There are other areas in which people can invest their money, rather than investing it in the transportation system to make a profit. If you do, Mr. Speaker, you are shafting your neighbours in the poorer parts of the country. Your are saying that rail lines in Saskatchewan should be abandoned. Small communities in my province would disintegrate because it does not pay to keep the rail lines open to some of these communities.

We should not just look at the ledger sheet. There are social conditions to take into account. If some of these lines do not pay, as long as they serve a good number of people, haul a good amount of grain and other freight, they should be subsidized.

In the future, more and more people may become alienated from the big cities and urban life. There may be more and more energy problems. Perhaps more people will return to the farms and the small communities. Perhaps some day we will have a government that is sensible about industrial strategy and which tries to help business locate in small communities. If that happens, maybe those communities will grow and perhaps those rail lines will pay for themselves.

They surely will not do that if we take the opposite approach and say the user must pay, that they must be economically viable, that CN must be a commercial corporation and operate like any other corporation. If we take that philosophy, we will all be losers in this country. There will be a few large population centres, but they will not be in Nova Scotia or Saskatchewan. The people are going to congregate in other areas. That is wrong, dead wrong.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Friesen: I noted the hon. member's remarks regarding debt forgiveness. I cannot help but wonder what this would do to the competitive advantage it would put the railways in with respect to the trucking companies. Can the hon. member tell us whether the truckers' union, the Teamsters, would be in total agreement with what he is proposing?

Mr. Nystrom: Unlike the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), I do not have many close personal friends in the teamsters' union. However, I am sure that if we had a rational transportation system in this country, the members of the teamsters' union would agree. Trucking is only one part of it. Railways are another very important part. My experience with trade union people, the working people of this country, is that they are concerned, not just about a fair deal for themselves, but about a fair deal for their brothers and sisters, in fact for all of the country. I am sure that if the hon. member consults the teamsters' union, he will find they are in favour of the general philosophy I have talked about, which is a publicly owned plant and a rational transportation system in our country that will service all the communities, not just those who happen to live in the big centres.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would entertain one more question.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has now expired. This would require unanimous consent, not only the consent of the hon. member. Is there consent to allow the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about public ownership of transportation. Does he have in mind to expand public ownership to the building of means of transportation such as airplanes and buses, possibly modelled after the recent Manitoba experience under former Premier Schreyer?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not know the examples in Manitoba to which the hon. member is referring. Perhaps he can shed some light on the good government of Mr. Schreyer in that province for many years. To answer his question in general, there is a case for having public ownership of the building of aircraft in this country and the building of buses in some cases. As I said, we have to plan the entire transportation system. If in that planning it makes sense to have the factories which manufacture the airplanes publicly owned, that should be the case. It is part of the overall planning one must look at.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-17, another recapitalization of a recapitalized debt of a national railway which has obviously had financial problems right from the start.

It has been most interesting listening to the various comments. Certainly the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) gave a very interesting and entertaining speech. Some of his historical perspective was obviously a little coloured because of his political perspective.

The hon. member said some kind things about me. I would not want to be unkind about him. However, one part of his speech that entertained me was the latter part, when he read off political promises of the 1974 campaign. I would be the last to try and pull rank in terms of chronological years or even years of seniority in this House, because we both came here at relatively the same time. I may have been here a little longer, but he has been here long enough to know that political promises from the other side, and especially those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), with regard to transportation during an election campaign are only worth the paper on which they are written, a couple of cents and nothing more.

I do not want to be unkind on this interesting night in the latter part of the week. However, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville almost shed crocodile tears when speaking about these broken promises. There was another election in 1972. I did not see too many crocodile tears between 1972 and 1974 when his party was supporting and buttressing a government that was abandoning rail lines all across the way. It was doing all the things about which the hon. member sincerely said he was concerned. He did not show that much concern nor did any members of his party between 1972 and 1974 when they voted yea, yea, yea every time Pierre Trudeau said yea, yea, yea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: They said: "You jump and we will jump higher." The parliamentary ploy monster in the front row from Winnipeg North Centre dusted the cobwebs off the parliamentary rules in order to support this government which has brought ruination not only to transportation but to the unity of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Whiteway.]

Mr. Nowlan: I do not want any more crocodile tears from parliamentary salamanders who slither over to the opposite side for parliamentary power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: It is interesting that we are debating Bill C-17. I want to be most ecumenical before I get to the merits of the bill because, quite frankly, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville gave a gosh darned good parish pump speech for his constituency and for a lot of other constituencies in the west.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the chairman of our transportation committee, when speaking last Tuesday gave a detailed assessment of the facts, figures, computations and compilations on the refinancing of refinanced capitalization deals. He could not get into all the details of constituency problems. He gave an overview. I hope to repeat some of it. Quite frankly, I read his speech of Tuesday and found it most informative.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville gave a gosh darned good parliamentary constituency speech. He did not talk about Bill C-17. As I listened to him and other speakers, I found it a little bit paradoxical. Perhaps it is not the time to say this, but I have sat in this House for 12 years and I have heard about some of the fundamental problems of this country. One of them that I do not accept is that because of the historical situation, having, in effect, two founding races, we do not possess a distinctive Canadian personality which makes us very different from other countries. I, for one, pay respect to the Francophones, to the Quebecois, who have a fantastic pride in their history and culture; mainly, it may be, for self-preservation, but they have it, and there is homogeneity there.

We all know, whether we listen to Jean-Luc Pepin, John Robarts or any of the other speakers on the unity commission, that the Anglophone dimension seems to be muted. It is muted in the Mazankowskis of Vegreville or in the McCains of Florenceville. We find a heterogeneous contribution to the Canadian scene which perhaps lacks individuality of culture because we are many cultures and many races. But, Mr. Speaker, I refuse to accept the defeatist attitude of some of the Anglophone politicians and political leaders in various parts of the country who say that, should unthinkable things occur, the Anglophone community, comprising basically nine provinces out of ten, is going to wither and die. You know, Mr. Speaker, there are institutions in this country apart from the House of Commons. There are institutions in this country which are neither Anglophone nor Francophone but Canadian. One of them is the CNR. Another is Air Canada. Another is the CBC. And my young friend to my left, who has not got on a choo-choo train, most likely does not appreciate this in terms of politics.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is aware of the contribution, in terms of political parties, which the Conservative party made to the establishment of the CBC and other institutions in this land. There are Canadian institutions with Canadian characteristics which transcend language. I don't care if you are a francophone on the north shore or on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, or whether you live in the West in the prairie bowl, in the great sky land or in the Rockies; when you hear that old choo-choo of a train you feel Canadian. They do not have that feeling in the United States. There is no nationalized state railway running side-by-side with a private enterprise line from coast to coast. There is no state-owned airline.

As a Conservative, as a member of a party which was responsible for some of these things historically, I agree there are obviously places for state-owned corporations. Perhaps part of the dilemma in which Canada finds itself today is because an institution which has helped bring this country together, the CNR, is not in the state of health it was, and perhaps does not enjoy the respect and confidence of Canadians from coast to coast as it did, when some hon. members on this side and across the way, including the Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner), worked for that company.

It is not the only institution in which Canadians perhaps lack confidence. Indeed, the situation reminds me somewhat about the riddle of the hen and the egg. Which came first? I am sorry the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has left the chamber. I certainly would not care to think he did so because he knew I was going to speak. I assure hon. members that I would be the last to suggest anything to him that he hasn't said before.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is quite right. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) are quite right. This country was never built on a user-pay concept. There would never have been a Nova Scotia, there would never have been a Saskatchewan, a British Columbia or a Northwest Territories if a user-pay concept had been followed. How many members of parliament could afford to come to Ottawa on the basis of user-pay? This country was not built on the user-pay concept and it cannot stay built on such a concept. While a user-pay objective might be followed where there are competitive, compensatory rates, you do not bring the periphery into the centre and make it part of the whole when you have a minister of transport, from whatever part of the country, defining government policy as "user-pay".

There are some odd paradoxes here. The CN helped pull this country together. But the CP helped pull us together, too. Was the Canadian Pacific, with all the things which the hon. member to my left said was given to it, built on a user-pay concept? Who would ever have started it on such a basis? When my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) built the Pine Point Railway, that wasn't done on a user-pay concept. There was a natural resource to be developed, though. So in this respect I agree with the hon. member in some things.

I shall certainly not repeat what my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) has said, but I will say this: the longer I am here, Mr. Speaker, the more cynical I become, in a sense. Yet I become ever more confident that government through Crown corporations is just not as economical or as efficient as when private enterprise, governed by the marketplace, tries to run the show.

As I say, the CPR also helped build this country, and that is where I differ from my young friend to my left both in terms of historical perspective and political philosophy. However, to paraphrase what Winston Churchill said many years ago, if you are not a socialist before you are 30 you are a damned fool; but if you are a socialist after 31 you are even more of a fool. And now there are a lot of old fools over there.

I do not want to talk about them tonight because doing so would not change their spots, but there is a fundamental difference between nationalization and rationalization. I am aware that some telegraph offices were closed down in my part of the country, but the telegraph service was hardly used enough to justify its continuance. I do not like phone calls coming from Montreal wishing well to my constituents. I do not like good wishes coming by long distance phone from Saint John or Montreal because there is no local telegraph service; it has been rationalized. These are inconveniences. If you ask people when they last sent a telegram you find they haven't sent one for years.

In my area, they have tried to close down the spur line of the CP, the DAR, for years, while this government was just playing around with rapid transit and the mass movement of people. Perhaps they will try again to close down this spur line which goes from Halifax into Digby, the heart of my riding. It is a natural way of moving people from the valley to the city. I would love people to stay in small towns. I myself am from a small town. I also know that as farms get larger there are fewer people needed on the land, so there is migration. We would like to rationalize, but obviously, where you have a captive shipper and compensatory rates are not being charged, you become very concerned about the consequences. I remind hon. members that this party was in office when this country was put together. We agree, basically, that transportation has to be a tool of national development.

I was amazed about two years ago when the then minister of transport, Senator Marchand, convened a conference called WEOC. There was some hesitancy in recognizing that transportation was a tool of national development. We wasted a lot of time before that principle on which this country was built was invoked and used from coast to coast. This House created the CTC and gave the job of chairman to the then minister of transport. At that time compensatory rates were to be the be-all and end-all. I am all for a transportation policy that has business guidelines and is a tool of national development.

I am amazed at some of the history I hear from my friends to my left. It reaffirms my view that there should be consolidation of school curricula. We have some fundamental problems in this country. I am not trying to downgrade them but sometimes a note of levity does not hurt. It is not just a question of anglophone history or francophone history and who won the battle on the Plains of Abraham. I guess each province has different schoolbooks. When I hear about the history of the CN from my friends to the left, I am amazed. Some members of that party, especially the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), have a sincere personal interest in railways from their experience in earlier days, and I would not compete with him on that basis. But when he tries to tell me the history of the re-capitalization of the CN and implies that its problems today result from its still carrying the load of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Northern Railway and all the consolidations of railways in the 1920s and 1930s, I say that is a lot of hogwash.

A short, simple pithy name for this bill would be "the third train robbery." You might even say it is the fourth train robbery. The first was the capitalization of all the lines that went belly-up back in the 1970s. My friends are correct, they went bankrupt and the CN grew out of the problems of too many rail lines and disordered systems. They finally got some order out of chaos, though not complete order, of course.

There was a forgiveness of debts in 1933. According to the information given by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), $1.2 billion was forgiven at that time. We had the first forgiveness of the other operation in 1937 when under the Capital Revision Act something like $1.8 billion of debt was forgiven. This is when the train robbery really began.

An hon. Member: Watch out, Horner is back!

Mr. Nowlan: I am not worried about "Old Crowfoot". I have dealt with "Old Crowfoot" in more intimate circles than the formality of this Chamber. Whether it is intimate contact, formal contact or parliamentary contact, I do not worry about my scar tissue. Before I come to the user-pay aspect I should like to ask my late venerated friend, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), what he thinks about it and how he reconciles his view with that of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang).

Let me get back to the train robbery, Mr. Speaker, because this is a serious matter. The history given by some members of the NDP is astounding. We should check the social study classes in this country and send some parliamentarians to the library to get their facts straight.

In 1952, when some of the present members were around, a bill was presented to this House. I do not fully understand the system of debt equity and I do not want to get into that. I have great respect, however, for Mr. Bandeen. I think he is a dynamic businessman who wants to put the CN on a profitable footing; but when, to justify this bill, he says that this is the first time the CN is in a position comparable to the CP and will have a chance to compete, I say that is hogwash.

In 1952 there was a debt capitalization bill when the debt equity ratio of the CN minus parliament was forgiven to the tune of $2 billion and the debt equity ratio of the CN was almost identical to that of the CP. As the hon. member for Vegreville said in his speech on Tuesday, the then president of the CN, Mr. Donald Gordon, said in a private speech to employees and officers of the CN: "Look, we have had this debt forgiven; we are now in the same position as CP, but that entails the obligation to compete with them. We cannot now use the excuse that we have to pay interest on this heavy debt which makes it impossible for us to compete."

That is why I call this the second or third great train robbery. I agree with the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), and especially with the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), that we cannot keep on doing this—in 1952 there was a ten-year plan, and then in 1953 they were getting into debt again—there has to be an end to this somewhere. This time we are forgiving about $800 million.

I hope this bill goes to committee, Mr. Speaker, and that officers of the CN tell us how they will run the railway so that five or ten years ahead there will not have to be another recapitalization. There were three recapitalizations—1933, 1937 and 1952. The first was of the original debt, so there have really been two recapitalizations since the beginning. This is the refinancing of the recapitalized debt of a bankrupt outfit.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) raised the question of the problems of teamsters and the trucking industry which is most relevant. This company is a national institution and the parliament of Canada, another national institution, obviously has to bail it out. There comes a time, though, when we must ask why this should be. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte said we will forgive this time. There is an old song that says "forgive and forget", but I think parliamentarians had better not forget. We are being asked to do the same thing today that we were asked to do in 1952 and in 1937. We want to know the guidelines that will prevent this from happening again.

In 1952, after the debt was recapitalized to the tune of $2.8 billion, the then president of CN, Donald Gordon, entered upon a massive dieselization program almost overnight. Within a year the old steam locomotives were almost all recapitalized. Where is the private enterprise benefactor of all the largesse others have talked about today? They knew they could not accomplish this, and they would not be responsible for doing so overnight. They had to phase in the program.

In addition, after 1952, as I understand history and as I have been informed, because of recapitalization a blank cheque was given to start anew and the CN rushed into the trucking industry. That is why the question of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock is very relevant. CN rushed into the trucking industry and bought trucking firms in some cases at outrageous prices—because the company knew its backup was the power in the presence of the mint down here on Sussex Street. Even I could almost sing that song "I forgive"—with qualifications—but I cannot always forget, and nor should we forget.

There are serious things to be considered. For instance, we must consider the passenger service that is supposed to be changed or eliminated; the Crowsnest pass rates are to be changed; and there are other matters the president of the CN says will happen under this bill. I agree with what every other speaker has said in this House—and I do not care what side of the political spectrum a member might be on—that by this sort of performance we are chopping off the debt on the one hand and starving as a result. This is what happens when you have a regional economic policy that is not integrated with transportation policy.

Perhaps I am on the periphery of such change, as is the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), who, incidentally, so ably handled our party's position in respect of Bill C-2 on fishing and recreational harbours. He talked time after time about the problem of getting the products of the sea to the marketplace.

As I have said, the trucks have taken over to a large extent, but when you talk about fish and agricultural products in my part of the country you cannot do so meaningfully unless you also talk about transportation to get those products to the market place. I have plants in my riding that have been expanded through the DREE program, but because of successive and cumulative effects of freight rate increases around the Lakehead, where we used to have markets, they again experienced difficulties. There was a kraft paper plant at the head of my riding that received a DREE grant one month of about $200,000 to $300,000 to expand plant facilities. Before that expansion was completed there were two freight rate increases which effectively prohibited that company from servicing its customers, let alone expanding. This was some three years ago, but that is the type of thing that is happening.

I will conclude from the point whence I started, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Where was that?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I am awfully sorry to see that my friend, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), has disappeared again. He is elusive, a will-o'-the-wisp, a Kilroy; he is here today and gone tomorrow. I think it is poetic that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is one of the ministers in charge of tourism. I can relate this comment to the railway bill by referring to the tourist package that he has propounded. There has never been a minister travel farther in such a short distance than the hon. member for Crowfoot. He is a master, Mandrake the magician, travelling so far by going just about 15 feet. I do not know if that comes under a tourist plan, walking across the floor and changing your political spots. Do you get a premium for that or a discount? Is it a family package deal or a DREE grant?

I think it is very appropriate that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is responsible for tourism, because every tourist finally has to come home; every tour finally ends and the vacation is over. It will be a sad thing in a way because the hon. member for Crowfoot is a personal friend of mine, though I cannot say a great political colleague at the moment. But great political and poetic justice will take place, or might, at the next election. Obviously there will be a change of government, and can you imagine the turmoil in the opposition ranks if the hon. member for Crowfoot ever bubbled forth and won and had to sit in opposition with the Liberals when we took over the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I think that would be political and poetic justice. I almost wish it would happen, even though it would mean one of my colleagues would have to be defeated.

An hon. Member: You are dreaming.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. minister for consumer affairs or whatever department he is with at the moment is not with it, because I am not dreaming. On the basis of the facts as I know them, Alberta will obviously continue to be pretty true blue. If I could only protect the one colleague who might have to bite the dust for this type of thing to happen, I think it would be tremendous. Members of the opposition, as they then would be, would have to learn to handle the hon. member for Crowfoot in caucus. That would be an education that would give any tourist guide the right to a special rate at any time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, back to the main issue.

An hon. Member: You were never on it.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, I was speaking to Bill C-17. Let me say in conclusion that I hope this bill gets to committee. I still think it is paradoxical, and perhaps ironic, that one of the national institutions which has helped bring us together is in difficulty. Now we have Bill C-17 I hope that Bandeen and others come to the committee and give us firm guidelines indicating how we are going to avoid going through this procedure again and again and again. You can only refinance or re-capitalize so often. I hope many of these problems will be clarified. Obviously there is much interest in what will happen to Crowsnest pass rates. There is also much interest in the ferry system run by the CN. We are deeply concerned about the status of the ferry system in Atlantic Canada. The hotel operation is another facet that is of interest. I will leave that subject to my tourism friend. There are such things as "at and east" rates for the export of grain.

When we get back to fundamentals, it seems our transportation policies did not necessarily work cohesively. They grew a little bit like Topsy. The government has gone through recapitalization like this from time to time. These things helped build this country.

Perhaps if we can put some strength, vitality and better debt financing into the CN, making it a very vibrant part of the country, we will get it back as a national institution. Perhaps this will alleviate some of the problems of this country. Obviously they will not all disappear. Maybe this will become a company we can be proud of as an institution. We will then not have to take a hangdog, defeatist attitude because of René

Lévesque and the power of la Grande allée. We have many things to be proud of in this country in terms of national institutions. These problems do occur, but they come and some of them go.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is time for me to go, so let me call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FIGHT CARDIOVASCULAR DISEASE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, on February 1, when the traditional heart month was launched, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) what new initiatives she had taken to help Canadians fight cardiovascular disease. What prompted me to ask this question was the statistics concerning the epidemiology of this disease in spite of improved medical and surgical technology. Although a perceptible decrease in mortality from cardiovascular disease has been noted, it is still the number one cause of morbidity and mortality in Canada. In fact, cardiovascular disease accounts for approximately 77,000 deaths in our country. Recent statistics also reveal that there are about 2.5 million Candians suffering from some form of cardiovascular disease.

This kind of incidence is of epidemic proportions, and yet government health authorities do not consider cardiovascular disease to be an epidemic. That is why initiatives at all levels of government are few and inadequate. Cardiovascular disease in our country causes absenteeism, reduced productivity, wage loss, chronic disability and death which in economic terms alone amounts to a loss to Canada which exceeds $200 million annually. Above that, the human tragedy and suffering are incalculable.

Arteriosclerosis is known to be a multifactorial disease with many risk factors, such as obesity, hypertension, tobacco smoking and so on. To date medical research has achieved a great deal to cope with some forms of this disease. But it is clear that coronary heart disease, in particular, has a multifactorial origin. Many factors are related to it in relatively consistent but unknown ways. Many of these factors can be controlled or prevented. Therefore, there is hope to develop a fairly effective preventive approach.

This approach can become more effective if appropriate investigation into these factors is carried out. This means more research and better public education in cardiovascular disease are needed. In this area, the Canadian Heart Foundation has taken many initiatives and its members and volunteer workers are doing a tremendous job for which they are to be commended. Any increased financial assistance from all levels of government and from the public would be beneficial and appreciated by health workers and especially those people directly or indirectly affected by cardiovascular disease.

It has been well known for many years that most deaths due to acute myocardial infarction, the most common cause of death in Canada, occur within the first two hours of the onset of symptoms and are specifically due to disturbances in cardiac rhythm. Effective electrical and drug treatment of arrhythmias has reduced the hospital mortality, but not the home or community mortality. Therefore, if mortality from acute myocardial infarction and other causes of sudden unexpected death is to be reduced substantially, a major reorganization of emergency medical services is needed. Public education in basic life support procedures, such as cardio-pulmonary resuscitation, is a necessary primary task.

Next, rapid delivery of highly trained ambulance personnel should be available. For this type of case, more public education and trained personnel are necessary. This means more financial resources. But above all, coherent provincial and national policies are necessary.

Therefore, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) can take greater initiatives and allocate more resources to meet this new challenge. A vigorous campaign of federal leadership is urgently needed. The minister could call an early meeting with provincial health ministers and the medical profession to launch a co-ordinated comprehensive program at all government levels to fight this insidious epidemic. Mobilizing all the necessary resources could do a great deal to diminish the incidence of cardiovascular disease.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) on his very comprehensive representation. The hon. member is highly regarded as a doctor of medicine and as one who is very concerned about his constituents and Canadians generally.

I am pleased to be able to reply that the government has taken a number of new steps which I hope will help Canadians fight cardiovascular diseases. Several parts of the Department of National Health and Welfare are carrying out activities which we expect will have an impact on the prevention and control of heart attacks, strokes and other problems of the cardiovascular system.

How we live often determines when as well as how we die, and in no condition is the influence of lifestyle more important than in the case of heart attack. Consequently the prevention of premature death as a result of heart attacks is a major goal of the department's expanded efforts to assist Canadians to adopt healthful lifestyles.

On the subject of cigarette smoking, one of the major risk factors for heart attack, I am pleased to inform the hon. member that a series of activities is being developed or is under way as part of a new comprehensive tobacco and health plan. I want to mention especially that the department plans to expand efforts to encourage children to avoid smoking; to focus on smoking by young women among whom, until recently, smoking was increasing rapidly; to review smoking cessation programs and encourage those which are most effective; and to persuade manufacturers to reduce tar, nicotine and other constituents of cigarette smoke.

In a news release on February 2, the minister announced the launching of a nutrition program being carried out by the department in co-operation with provinces, heart foundations and other groups. The program is intended to reduce the impact of cardiovascular disease. Recommendations are designed, among other things, to deal with another of the major risk factors for heart attack, elevated blood fat levels.

I am also pleased to announce that a new departmental publication, "Food and Your Heart", is now available from provincial health departments, local health units and heart foundations.

The newest departmental activity to promote physical fitness is the exercise break package to help fitness leaders and health professionals conduct active breaks for employee groups, elementary and secondary school children and the elderly. Funded by the Federal Labour Intensive Project, the exercise break package will cost some $1.1 million, from a total departmental FLIP allocation of $1.4 million, and will create more that 200 jobs across Canada.

In addition to the above, a working group of Canadian physicians who are experts in the field of high blood pressure are preparing for the department, with the department's co-operation, a therapeutic monograph on this subject. This document will discuss the drugs used in treating high blood pressure and should help physicians in the selection of drugs.

Finally, I want to mention two new developments intended to sharpen the focus of our efforts and to assist in the co-ordination of various departmental activities in the field of cardiovascular disease. The first of these new developments is the establishment of a focal point on lifestyle and health promotion. The main purpose of the focal point is to assist in developing greater collaboration among governments and other agencies in lifestyle and health promotion activities and to bring about better co-ordination of activities within the department. The second development is the establishment of a co-ordinating mechanism for programs concerned with cardiovascular disease within the health protection branch.

Before I close I wish to correct a misprint in Hansard. The minister's reply on February 1 should have stated that the 1978 campaign target for the Quebec Heart Foundation is $1 million, rather than the $6 million recorded.

I have much more to say, but time does not permit. I will provide my hon. colleague with a complete copy of my notes.

Adjournment Debate

LABOUR CONDITIONS—LAY-OFFS IN NICKEL INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) regarding his response to the report and recommendations of the Ontario legislature's select committee looking into the Inco and Falconbridge lay-offs. I pointed out to the minister that the select committee proposed some very practical suggestions, such as a 60-day moratorium on the lay-offs, a 30-day stockpile of nickel, with the two levels of government providing interest-free loans for the stockpiling, a job-sharing program, a retraining program and an improved pension plan which alone would save some 1,000 jobs. I pointed out to the minister that this select committee comprised members of all parties of the Ontario legislature and that in fact the Liberals on the committee all voted for the recommendations without hesitation.

I also pointed out that the committee held a press conference yesterday afternoon at 5 p.m. and released its report and recommendations at that time. However, in answer to my question the minister said he did not know what the recommendations were but that he had requested such information from the Ontario government and was hoping to have the recommendations later on. I asked my question 17 hours after the report was made public. There was a headline story in the Globe and Mail this morning. There were reports on every radio and television broadcast last evening and this morning. The minister rose in the House of Commons this afternoon and said that he has not yet seen the report or the recommendations.

Is this the action and attitude of a concerned minister and of a concerned government? Absolutely not. I have never in all my 40 years seen such callousness and disinterest for people's well-being as I saw displayed, particularly this afternoon, by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). For four months this House has been bombarded with questions about the impending lay-offs at Falconbridge and Inco. A special day of debate was held in this House of the question. Thirty thousand cards of protest were tabled in the House by myself. There were two demonstrations on Parliament Hill by Inco and Falconbridge workers in an attempt to make the government aware of the problems facing these workers.

There were innumerable meetings between ministers of this government, the United Steel Workers of America and the mine mill union. Practically every day for the last four months I have raised the matter in the question period in order to make this government and its minister aware of the problems facing the workers in the Sudbury basin. And for four months, Mr. Speaker, all we have heard in reply is how concerned the minister and this government are about the impending lay-offs. They have stated they were on top of the situation. He was as on top of the situation today, as he was when he heard the night before the official announcement made by Inco of the lay-offs.

What should a concerned minister and a concerned government have done under the present circumstances? Considering the fact that this government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have made no positive proposals, upon hearing of the committee's proposal last evening he should have flown this morning to Queen's Park, on the jet the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) uses to travel to and from football games and all the rest of it, and asked to meet with the minister of mines for the province of Ontario. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should have asked to see the report and the recommendations. He should have asked if this problem could be solved by working together.

Even if he had not flown to Toronto, had he forgotten about the telephone system? The House of Commons has all sorts of party lines for members. There is a government Telex system and a member for one of the ridings across the way uses it for his own personal congratulatory messages to constituents. It could have been used in this instance. How callously the Minister of Energy, Mines, and Resources treats the people of Canada when he stands up in the House and brushes off the problem, as he has for the last four months.

He owed this House and the people of Canada, including the workers of the Sudbury basin, a knowledgeable response this afternoon. But, Mr. Speaker, the minister and this government have not displayed a sense of urgency. The lay-offs take effect in four days—Monday. In the Sudbury basin we support the recommendations of the select committee and we demand a positive response from this minister and government. Anything less is a dereliction of duty. This government should resign and let the people deal with them accordingly. I have little respect for them, and the least respect of all for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, that is a hard act to follow.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is no act.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has just this evening concluded a meeting with Mr. Sidney B. Handleman, MPP, chairman of the Ontario select committee dealing with the Inco Limited and Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited lay-offs. Mr. Handleman was accompanied by the hon. Mr. Miller, minister of natural resources for that province, plus other representatives and officials.

The program as proposed by the select committee consists of two components; first, for the first 30 days, the excess production, being that production which would be a direct result of not carrying out the proposed lay-offs, would be financed by interest-free loans provided by the government of Canada and the province of Ontario, as agreed upon by them; and second, for the second 30 days, there would be the implementation by Inco and the United Steelworkers of America of an agreed upon work-sharing program.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The purpose of the 60-day program, according to the select committee report, is to, first, enable Inco to reconsider its early retirement and severance programs and, second, enable Canada and Ontario to develop and introduce a retraining program for Inco workers.

In the meeting previously mentioned it was made clear to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the Ontario government does not support the recommendation of the select committee regarding stockpiling. Additionally, several members of the select committee submitted dissenting opinions on stockpiling. Indeed, the chairman of the select committee viewed the stockpiling program as counter-productive. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would also draw to the attention of hon. members that the financing arrangement suggested in the select committee report is in essence a stockpiling program.

The position of the federal government has been stated on several occasions in this House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and other ministers. On February 8, in this House the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated:

> —the department and I have met with senior officers of both the corporations, Inco and Falconbridge, to examine the question of whether or not a stockpiling system would, indeed, assist that industry. Quite clearly, the conclusion of those discussions and that study is that it would increase the problems of the industry, that there is a significant overhang of nickel inventories in this country and elsewhere in the world, and by adding to that overhang we would be delaying the period of adjustment and therefore keeping more people out of work longer than would otherwise be necessary.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would again draw to the attention of this House that world nickel inventories are at an all time high. At this time Inco's inventory exceeds 340 million pounds and Falconbridge's over 50 million.

Additionally the cutbacks now being implemented by Inco are not sufficient to stop an increase in their stockpile. For example, Inco's stockpile of nickel, even in the face of production cutbacks, will increase during 1978.

The government of Canada strongly supports the concept of work sharing providing the union and Inco agree to the concept and make a joint proposal to the appropriate federal department.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would also hope that Inco would re-evaluate its early retirement programs and that retraining programs for Inco workers would be utilized.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight pursuant to a question I asked of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) on January 24, 1978. I asked him at that time:

> Since the legislation of this government abolishing capital punishment has obviously resulted in an increase in capital murder, particularly the murder of police officers, will the minister immediately bring in legislation amending the Criminal Code to reinstate capital punishment, which is the ultimate, permanent and effective deterrent to capital crime?

As I expected, the minister answered "No". The first response from the Liberal side of the House was from an unknown member who said:

That is not true; the rate has gone down.

That man does not know what he is talking about. We have lost ten policemen since the infamous incident last year in Moncton, New Brunswick where two policemen were forced to dig their own graves before they were executed by gunfire by their murderers. In less than the past two months we have lost four policemen, in Manitoba, Thunder Bay, New Brunswick and Toronto. The latest brutal crimes are the murder of prison warden Michel Roy in front of his home in Montreal, and also the premeditated capital murder of Miss Healther Zematis by a hold-up gang at the Chalet BBQ on Decarie Boulevard in Montreal. I include this case of capital murder along with the capital murder of policemen and the prison warden because the murder of Miss Zematis was premeditated.

We have got to get back to basics in this country in that any person who arms himself to commit armed robbery is guilty of capital murder if the armed robbery results in a death. Capital punishment was abolished in July 1976 by this House. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the cabinet and the Liberal party made sure it would be, because as the vote neared they scrounged around and organized themselves sufficiently to get a six-vote majority. Yes, they have abolished capital punishment in law, but it is still retained by the underworld and the outlaws of this country. They practice capital punishment upon their victims.

Of all the arguments advanced against capital punishment the most specious and phony is that which pretends to equate the taking of life by judicial execution with the criminal act of a murderer. By the same lunatic logic, then, punitive fines are simply theft and imprisonment is kidnapping. To be consistent, the abolitionists should also want to abolish punitive fines and punitive imprisonment. Indeed, since all forms of punishment are unpleasant actions which it would be criminal for one individual to inflict unjustifiably on another, they should all be ruled inadmissible.

Not all taking of life is murder. The distinction lies in the qualifying word "justifiable". The act of a victim killing in self-defence is not the same as the act of a cold-blooded murderer.

Judicial execution has always been regarded as justified and its justification cannot be swept away by disingenuous logic. To fail to see the distinction between the execution of the criminal and the murder of the victim is simply to be unable to tell right from wrong and is an ingredient in the obscene inequity between our solicitude for the rights of the criminal—though this is indeed a responsibility of society—and our neglect of the needs of the victim, which are nobody's responsibility. The ancient rabbis put it well: "Whoever is kind to the cruel will end up being cruel to be kind."

The expression of society's abhorrence of a crime is an important part of judicial punishment and should not be carelessly disregarded. It is an educational process. Our behaviour may not truly reflect our theoretical test of values but our ethical values will eventually come to reflect the way we act. By treating murderers leniently, our society has learned to take murder for granted and has accepted it as a perfectly natural accompaniment to robbery and organized financial crime. The need for a firm official stand is most urgent. The punishment should fit the crime.

If we fail to recognize these principles, the day is upon us when the recruitment of policemen and prison guards and officials will dry up. Protection of persons and property is the primary, yes, originally the sole reason for government. Without protection for persons and property we lapse into anarchy.

We noted today the answer given by the latest of a long string of solicitors general when the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) asked him a question regarding the murder of Mr. Michel Roy. He said the government was thinking about providing protection for penal officials and guards both on and off duty. Mr. Speaker, we have reached a pretty pass when the government is thinking about hiring security personnel to guard policemen and prison officials in their homes. Guards to guard guards! This is the result of the Trudeau government's betrayal of the people of Canada through lenient and foolish policies which fail to provide protection to persons and property. This is the result of the abolition of capital punishment, the ultimate permanent and effective deterrent to capital crime. Again, I say: Canada must get back to basics and make the punishment fit the crime.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by reminding the hon. member that the vote on capital punishment in this House was a free vote of individual members of parliament. Let me also say to him that the statistics he quoted this evening are different from those I have seen published. In answer to the hon. member, the ministry is not prepared to accede to a request for the reinstatement of capital punishment in this country. Its position on this issue is well known. However, the Canadian public should be well aware of the concern of the government with the incidence of violent crime in Canada. Significant initiatives in the areas of wire tapping and gun control were the direct result of our concern with the growth of organized crime and the need to control its violent characteristics.

This House has only to look to its present agenda for further evidence of our concern. The relationship of violent crime to the flow of narcotics in this country is undeniable. Our proposals, which would allow law enforcement officials subject to legislative controls to open mails in order to curb the flow of narcotics within Canada, is directed at combating precisely this situation.

In the not too distant future, the next Criminal Code omnibus bill will contain a package of provisions dealing with increased penalties for the crimes of hostage-taking and extortion, as well as wider powers to deal with the problems of the defilement of children and the distribution of pornographic material which portrays the defilement of children.

It should not be forgotten that in the very legislation whereby this House abolished capital punishment, new rigorous provisions were added to the Criminal Code concerning the eligibility for parole of persons convicted of first and second degree murder. The present law of the land decrees that individuals convicted of first degree murder are to be sentenced to imprisonment for life without eligibility for parole until 25 years of the sentence have been served. With respect to accused persons found guilty of second degree murder, we have now entrusted the jury with the task of recommending to the trial judge whether he should substitute for the ten-year period which the law would otherwise require the accused to serve before he is eligible to be considered for release on parole, a number of years that is more than ten but less than 25 years.

In summary, the record of this government in responding to the challenges posed by violent crime in Canadian society is, I suggest, unimpeachable. The government is cognizant of the problems posed by violent, organized and serious crimes. It has dealt with and will continue to deal with them in order to best ensure the safety and security of our people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:28 p.m.

GOVERNMENT PAPER ON UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST MINISTER CORRECT INACCURACIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of pressing and urgent necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has provided his colleagues on the government side with a 28-page paper on unemployment for use in speeches, mailing and other misguided propaganda efforts by the Liberal party. This paper, which contains a long list of excuses for the government's failure to solve the unemployment problem, was prepared at taxpayers' expense by civil servants in the minister's department; a practice not unknown to the Liberal party. I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House strongly condemns yet another example of the Liberal party wallowing at the public trough, requests ministers to stop using civil servants for political purposes and, furthermore, demands that the "minister of unemployment" correct the large number of factual inaccuracies and gratuitous comments contained in the document, and that this be carried out at the expense of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of the Standing Order, such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT OF MORE EFFECTIVE ICE-BREAKING VESSELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the report that another fishing vessel is trapped in ice in one of Nova Scotia's small harbours, the second such report in less than a month, and since Canadian Coastguard officials in Halifax are unable to respond to this type of emergency because they lack adequate ice-breaking capability, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this House urge the Minister of Transport to take immediate action to ensure that the Canadian Coastguard service in Halifax is equipped with effective ice-breaking vessels, preferably of the hovercraft type.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented, under Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUSPENSION OF SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO ARGENTINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the denial of basic human rights in Argentina, and the continuing record of murders, torture and military intervention by the military regime there, and in view of the sale of the Candu reactor and nuclear technology by Canada to Argentina, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the suspension of the sale of the Candu reactor and nuclear technology by Canada to Argentina until

1. New elections are called under the provisions of the constitution

2. Full trade union rights are reinstated

3. All political prisoners are released

4. Adequate assurances are forthcoming that nuclear technology will be used only for peaceful purposes, including the signing of the International Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty, and

5. Basic human rights are restored.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent for the motion to be presented for discussion?

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering that pipeline builders and unions have said that natives do not have the necessary skill to obtain specialized jobs in the construction of the pipeline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government order that specialized training courses be made available to natives so they may benefit from employment stemming from the construction of the pipeline.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND-NEW BRUNSWICK FERRY—COST-COMPARISON OF SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Bearing in mind the extreme importance of the ferry service between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the provision and maintenance of such a service being one of the original conditions of confederation, and having regard to the degree of public concern over the rising cost of utilizing the service, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Transport report on the cost of the ferry service from Borden, P.E.I., to Tormentine, N.B., presently provided by the CNR, as compared to the cost effectiveness of the Wood Island to Caribou run provided by Northumberland Ferry Limited, and in the meantime provide increased subsidies so that rates on the Borden route do not jeopardize either the maximum utilization of the service, nor the jobs of the employees who provide it, both considerations being of vital concern to the area at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COMPENSATION TO PRISONERS OF WAR AND ESCAPEES IN WORLD WARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning an important matter of pressing necessity respecting the limited number of Canadian citizens who are not now eligible under the provisions of the prisoners of war legislation. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook):

That this House urges the Minister of Veterans Affairs to consider introducing appropriate amendments to the prisoners of war legislation so that compensation provided therein will apply to those who are Canadian citizens and were prisoners of war or escapees in World War I or World War II and who fought alongside the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

EQUAL BROADCAST TIME FOR POLITICAL PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the CBC refuses to televise live the question period across Canada, and in view of the fact that this week it did televise "The Champions" and this morning's press conference by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which rated a big zero in terms of quality, news value and legitimate public service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That this House reminds the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that its mandate is to provide the Canadian people with balanced programming, and not to serve as a propaganda arm of the Liberal party and, furthermore, that the CBC offer all parties equal time in the future when it decides to broadcast live a press conference by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONDEMNATION OF MINISTER FOR PUBLICATION OF "WESTERN GRAIN STORY"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, grain farmers on the prairies are now receiving a booklet, which I have here, extolling the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) for his so-called decade of challenge and achievement of the Wheat Board. Because this is such an outrageous example of electioneering at the public expense, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House severely reprimands the minister for using public funds to produce the odiously partisan "Western Grain Story".

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

That this House direct the Minister of Fisheries to conduct a full, independent financial audit of the FFMC, and that their findings be tabled in this House within 90 days.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TO HIGH LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFECT OF DREE PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Apart from what has been described by the Hon. Walter Gordon as the degrading and soul-destroying nature of the present high level of unemployment, my question is prompted by the following facts which by now should be well known to the minister. Given the fact that as of January 26 more than 37 per cent of the unemployed have been unemployed for three months or more and we have arrived at a point in time where half of the unemployed no longer qualify for unemployment insurance, and given the fact that this represents an additional burden on the provinces, some of whom have had to cut back on welfare payments, is it the government's position that unemployment no longer represents a financial disaster in this country?

● (1117)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member uses figures with the cunning of a con artist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The situation, in fact, is that these particular figures are incorrect. The hon. member and, I believe, the Leader of the Opposition were citing 40,000 as the number of people who had gone off unemployment insurance and had, therefore, gone on to the welfare rolls. This information was made public. The fact is that about 4 per cent represents the number of those who actually use up their benefits and end up on the welfare rolls of the provinces. The figure 30,000 is more appropriate to something over the course of a year, rather than the course of a month, as the hon. member's figures will bear out.

I think high unemployment is tragic, and we are doing what we can at the federal government level, with myriad programs, to alleviate the situation. But the situation is not helped by using figures in this particular way.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I can take a lesson from the hon. minister in being a con artist, because he tried to con his own colleagues in this scurrilous, misleading document which he circulated to them. It says, among other things, that "unemployment no longer represents a financial disaster".

My next question to the minister—again I quote from this document, dated February 7, to members of the Liberal caucus, produced at public expense—refers to his statement, among others, that the present "UI program is well conceived and administered". If that is so, will the minister please tell the House why it is necessary to spend over $1 million on an advertising campaign warning Canadians against the abuse of unemployment insurance?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, here, again, the hon. member is making a selective choice from the particular document.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They are your words; it is your document.

Mr. Cullen: In comparing the situation, the paper goes on to make it very clear that the unemployment situation today is not the same as it was during the disastrous 1930s, when there was no unemployment insurance under the Tories.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: It talks about the impact of unemployment not being the disaster it was during the 1930s, when there was no unemployment insurance and when there were, in fact, no welfare schemes such as we have in place at the present time. That was the point of that statement. Of course, the hon. member, again—for whatever purpose—is being very selective in the information he takes from the document.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, the document is very honest. If the hon. member will read it, he will see it indicates where the unemployment is, that it is extremely high among the youth—about 15.2 per cent. Nothing is hidden; that information is available to the opposition, if they are interested in facts. But they are interested in hyperbole.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the only honest and straightforward statement in that document is this one in the final conclusion:

> We have not got perfect answers to the unemployment problems facing Canada.

That is the only statement in this document I can agree with, or any other Canadian could agree with, for that matter. Is it now the policy of the government, notwithstanding ten years of a multimillion, indeed, a billion dollar DREE program, that the serious unemployment situation in the five eastern provinces is the result of, and I quote, "a . . . combination of cyclical, long-term structural and, to a lesser extent, seasonal factors"? After ten years of DREE the government now admits that we have structural problems in the Atlantic provinces. Is that the view of the government? If so, what steps does it intend to take to improve DREE programs, given the fact that the five eastern provinces, with less than half the population of Canada, have more than half of the unemployment?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that simply points out the honesty of the particular statement which was made available, and is available, to the opposition. The fact of the matter is that neither DREE nor any other program can overcome some of the seasonal factors that are in place in the Atlantic provinces. The fact is that this was recognized some time ago, and it was this government which brought forward the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which is an indication that help is required there. The fact that the heaviest emphasis of the Young Canada Works funding, and all other funding, takes place in the Atlantic provinces is another recognition by this government of the structural problems in that area. If the hon. member has better schemes and better ideas, we have yet to hear them.

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister table the document; and if not, why not?

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM FOR JOB CREATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a couple of questions to the minister regarding this very shameful propaganda document delivered to the Liberal caucus, which dismisses lightly the traumatic experience of our more than one million unemployed. I quote from the document as follows:

> The design features of a program to use UI funds for direct job creation have yet to be completed.

This is a shocking revelation, in light of the fact that the minister led this House to believe he had a design and a plan. Why has there been this foot-dragging? When can we expect the design to be completed, given the fact that in February and March more people will be on the unemployment rolls?

● (1122)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a fantastic conversion. It was the hon. member and his party, and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, who moved amendments to take job-creation and work-sharing out of the bill which I brought in last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: That is a lie. Withdraw that remark.

Mr. Cullen: If the hon. member will remember, I indicated that there were difficulties with the administration, and putting that program in place would be difficult. Rather than waste taxpayers' money on a program which was not carefully thought out, we felt it was better to work very hard on the design features. In the interim, there are over 675 people working in Canada today who would not have been working if we had listened to the opposition parties and removed that provision from the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister is deliberately misleading the House, because this party supported job-creation. That outfit was the one that did not go for it. I want the minister to withdraw that comment, now.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Alexander: Given the fact that in this rotten document the minister has indicated there are no perfect answers to the unemployment problems facing Canada—which in my view means the government has no answers whatsoever—and given the fact the OECD, the Economic Council of Canada and the Conference Board of Canada have answers, unlike the minister, his department and the government, is it the intention, now—did you see what the Prime Minister did? He is using another gesture of derision when we are talking about a very serious subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member has put a question.

Mr. Alexander: I do not like the Prime Minister making light of a very serious subject.

Mr. Clark: He laughs at the unemployed.

Mr. Alexander: I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration whether it is the government's intention to take the advice of these very respected bodies, which in my view can bring some relief to the unemployed and assist the economic development of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that he, in fact, moved an amendment to withdraw the work-sharing provision from the—

Mr. Alexander: That is a different story; don't talk about that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member was so negative about every innovative feature we attempted to build into that act that it is tough to remember those he supported and those he did not. Certainly he was opposed to work-sharing.

Mr. Clark: Are you withdrawing your false statement?

Mr. Cullen: I have already indicated that the hon. member made the amendment.

Mr. Clark: Are you withdrawing your false statement?

Mr. Cullen: I am withdrawing my statement on job-creation, but not on work-sharing.

Mr. Clark: Are you withdrawing your false statement?

Mr. Cullen: Does the hon. Leader of the Opposition think the hon. member is not capable of handling his own argument? The hon. member is a very competent and capable guy; he does not need help from the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: You are right.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated in that particular statement, we do not have perfect answers. We have some of the answers. Obviously, they are not perfect.

Mr. Alexander: You have no answers.

Mr. Cullen: Obviously, they need improvement. Only the opposition, according to them, can take any credit or find the funds necessary for improving this situation. They have all the perfect answers. We have some of them. They are not perfect. We are trying to be honest with the Canadian public in our approach. We are not holding out false hopes, as has been done all too often by the opposition.

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER ASK FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Clark: The smiler.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact, with all due respect, that the Minister of Employment and Immigration does not seem to have any ideas, and perhaps we need a fresh face, will the Prime Minister ask for the resignation of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and give some of the competent backbenchers an opportunity to bring in fresh, new and innovative solutions for the plight of the unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—SIZE OF PIPE TO BE USED IN CONSTRUCTION—CANADIAN CONTENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration should not be too hard on the hon. member for Hamilton West, because before long the hon. member will be voting for the government's iniquitous pipeline bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I turn my back to you, sir.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. When the National Energy Board announces its decision on the pipe to be used for the Alcan pipeline, particularly the portion between Whitehorse and Caroline, which is the principal part of the Canadian section, will it be stating a specific type to be used, or will it simply be recommending tests on two or more alternative kinds of pipe? I ask this question in light of the assertions made by President Carter when he recommended the Alcan pipeline to the U.S. Congress. One of President Carter's assertions was the following:

> The choice between larger-diameter and thicker-walled pipe will be made at the conclusion of a testing program to assess the safety and reliability of the two alternatives.

As the Deputy Prime Minister knows, the decision as to what kind of pipe will be used involves perhaps hundreds of thousands of Canadian jobs. Will the Deputy Prime Minister answer the question?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have not received, nor has the government received, from the National Energy Board a recommendation on pipe size. It is expected that a recommendation will follow reasonably quickly after we have received the final results of the United States study which is under way and is near completion. I hope we will get these results within a few days and that it will be possible for the National Energy Board to study them and make a recommendation to the government.

With respect to testing, it is not my expectation that there will be burst tests in order to resolve this question, nor do I think it is the intention of the government of the United States, at the present time, to propose further physical testing. The word "test" which is used in the Canada-U.S. agreement is subject to various interpretations, but in the present context it is not expected that we will be faced with further physical burst tests.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, as the Deputy Prime Minister knows, the precise answer to my question is extremely important in terms of jobs created in Canada. I would like him now to answer my question. I grant that there might be some possibility of misunderstanding it. Will the recommendation which is coming from the NEB be for a specific kind of pipe for the Canadian portion between Whitehorse and Caroline, or will the recommendation be that further tests or consideration be applied to one or more alternative kinds of pipe?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the recommendation of the National Energy Board and I do not want to prejudge what the NEB will do. However, I will tell the hon. member what I expect. I expect to receive, in the form of advice to the government, a very specific proposal with respect to pipe size.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister had indicated that he hopes the NEB will be making its decision within a few days, and I understand from other conversations that it may be a week from Monday. If it is going to come as early as a week from Monday, and since the recommendation is absolutely central to parliament's decision on the pipeline as it affects the cost of the pipeline and Canadian jobs, Canadian content, why in heaven's name is the government going ahead with second reading debate on the bill next Monday, in advance of the NEB recommendation?

Mr. MacEachen: There has been a request from hon. members opposite to bring forward this bill.

Mr. Broadbent: From where?

Mr. Trudeau: All last fall you were asking for it.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't give us that.

● (1132)

Mr. MacEachen: In fact, there has been criticism about delay in bringing the bill forward.

Mr. Broadbent: From whom? Be specific.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: I said, members of the opposition.

Mr. Broadbent: Not us.

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member wants me to give him chapter and verse at a later date, I shall; but he will not find that information in the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a very valid concern about reaching a decision on the bill before, for example, the declared intentions of the government are made known. I will certainly attempt to accommodate that concern in the handling of the bill. I believe it is quite possible, however, to begin discussion of the bill on Monday, admitting that the information should be before the House before a decision is taken, for example, on second reading.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST NATIVES BE EMPLOYED IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council.

In view of the fact that the Deputy Prime Minister—I only hope he is listening to me—has already mentioned job security in connection with the northern pipeline, could he advise the House whether its purpose is to hire native people, as they are directly affected by the environmental, social and economic aspects of this project?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it will certainly be the intention of the pipeline company and the government to employ the greatest possible number of native people and northerners in the construction of the pipeline. In the course of the debate I think it will be possible to indicate to the hon. member more detail as to what plans are under way to achieve this objective.

[Translation]

NORTHERN PIPELINE—TRAINING COURSES FOR NATIVES EMPLOYED IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that both the contractors and unions involved have already stated that natives lack the necessary know-how to perform specialized jobs, could the minister advise the House whether special training programs have been devised for northern natives so that once the construction project has been completed they may stay on to look after its operation.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the plans are being developed within the Department of Employment and Immigration, to provide the necessary training. As the hon. member knows, there will be a considerable number of permanent jobs once the pipeline is completed. But a large number of jobs will be available in the construction period. Obviously, it would be our intention to ensure that training is made available for potential employees once the pipeline is in operation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

COST OF AND TIME SPENT IN PREPARING PAPER CIRCULATED BY DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration about this secret piece of paper that is an excuse and an alibi and was distributed only to members of the Liberal caucus. It has 25 pages in both French and English, and was obviously prepared by officials within the minister's department.

Could the minister tell the House how many departmental man-hours went into the preparation of this and the other pieces of paper referred to in the foreword by the minister, and how much the preparation, printing and distribution of this material cost the taxpayers of the country?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to give the hon. member an exact figure at this time. I suggest it is much less than the time and effort my department has to put out in order to correct some of the misinformation spread by opposition parties.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Because this is a further example of the confusion that exists in the minds of some people in the ministry respecting government interests and Liberal party interests, would the minister be prepared to table this piece of propaganda? As a further supplementary, I wonder if he would tell us why this paper was sent only to members of the Liberal caucus, rather than to all members of this House?

An hon. Member: They are more gullible, that's why.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was not necessary to table it. I gather that members of the opposition have a copy of it. They are doing a little bit of selective reading, and then calling it propaganda. I am quite prepared to make this paper available to all members of the opposition. The reason it was sent to Liberals is that they seem to be the only ones interested in facts, and not fiction.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES BY SOVIET NATIONALS—TRAVEL PERMITS ISSUED TO SOVIET PERSONNEL

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It refers to yesterday's revelations and actions regarding Soviet espionage activities in this country. Could the minister tell the House if the government has received any assurances whatsoever from the Soviets and/or the RCMP that no further subversive activities are going on in Canada by the Soviets? If he has not, would the minister consider discontinuing the issuance of special travel permits to all Soviet personnel operating in Ottawa until realistic assurances are received that all such activities by them are discontinued?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not reasonable to expect that the Soviets would give me the kind of assurances the hon. member requests. I am sure they would say there is nothing improper going on. I think the hon. member knows that the RCMP has an ongoing role, and from time to time is undoubtedly investigating the various intelligence activities of foreign governments.

On the question of travel permits, I do not think it would be appropriate to end all such travel permits. I can assure the hon. member that when they are asked for the reasons, these are examined very carefully. I should also point out to the hon. member, as he ought to be aware, that in other countries we seek travel permits for our representatives in order that they may carry out very important duties, including work on some family reunification cases in which the hon. member is very interested. I do not want to be self-defeating in this exercise.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to remind the minister that the government issues roughly 1,000 travel permits per year.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): My supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the seriousness of this matter, and the numerous allegations that subversive espionage activities are far more widespread than is generally presumed, will the minister indicate whether he will consider initiating a far more extensive investigation into subversive espionage activities in Canada as a whole, and at the same time make the screening of foreign diplomats working in Canada far more stringent than has been the case up to now?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, I would point out that the facts made public yesterday reveal the high excellence of the security service of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I am satisfied that the service is one of the most excellent, in terms of that sort of counter-espionage work, in the western hemisphere, and I am encouraging them in any way I possibly can in fulfilling their responsibility.

RCMP—REQUEST SECURITY RESOURCES BE ENLARGED

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that some estimates place the number of personnel in the RCMP security service at a mere 400 operatives engaged in counter-espionage activities, is the minister giving immediate consideration to providing the resources, personnel and otherwise, so the RCMP can more adequately cope with increased espionage activities?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to comment on the hon. member's information. The information relating to our security service is highly confidential, and hon. members on that side should recognize the necessity of keeping it confidential.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the minister misunderstood my question. I am suggesting that he should give immediate consideration to increasing the number of officers operating in that field within the RCMP, so that it might cope more adequately with what appears to be ever-increasing espionage activity in this country.

Mr. Blais: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not misunderstand the question. I indicated that I am not going to comment on the number because it is classified information.

In reply to the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley, I indicated that I am satisfied the operation is one of the best in the western hemisphere and that it is discharging its duties in accordance with the mandate this government has given it. I am mindful of the need to review, from time to time, the total personnel engaged in this sort of operation. I can judge as well as the hon. member when additional requirements are made known.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST EDC NOT ASSIST CUBA IN BUILDING STAINLESS STEEL MILL

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, or the Prime Minister. Since it is now evident, in spite of previous representations, that Cuba is going ahead with its plan to build a stainless steel mill with a very large capacity, and since this mill will be in direct competition with Atlas Steels in Welland and Tracey, Quebec, and since the world market for stainless steel does not need the influx of this product, will the minister assure the House that no Canadian government money or money from the Export Development Corporation of Canada will be used to assist this project?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should bring to the attention of the House that my former seatmate and colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Denis and the hon. member for Laurier, are today celebrating 14 years as members of parliament.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This must be a retirement party.

Mr. Horner: Some are more fortunate than others. In reply to the hon. member's question, if Cuba decides to build a stainless steel mill, that will be their decision, not ours.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The Export Development Corporation does not give assistance to the building of steel mills or plants; it gives assistance to the sale of Canadian-made goods. Most of the time those Canadian-made goods create a good deal of employment in this country.

FINANCE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—RELIEF FOR STEEL FABRICATING INDUSTRY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, in the absence, again, of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the President of Privy Council. It is now over a week that the cabinet has had before it the statement of damages submitted to them by the province of British Columbia concerning the Algoma appeal on wide-flange steel beams. The Minister of Finance told us in the House that the matter was under consideration. Is the President of Privy Council in a position to announce the relief requested by the province of British Columbia in order to save 2,000 jobs in the steel fabricating industry? If not, when will he make such an announcement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the matter is still under consideration by the government. We hope to be able to make a decision and an announcement in the near future.

NATURAL RESOURCES

NICKEL INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I hope that he has found his tongue today.

Mr. Jamieson: You have never lost yours.

Mr. Rodriguez: On Monday next, three days from today, 3,000 workers in the Sudbury basin will lose their jobs. An Ontario select committee came down with a report on Wednesday which offered several solutions to the problem of the 3,000 people being laid off in the Sudbury basin. This report was supported by all the Liberals on the select committee of the legislature.

When I raised this question in the House yesterday, the minister had not bothered to obtain a copy of the report. In view of the fact that a meeting was held last evening, can the minister now tell this House his government's position with regard to the Ontario select committee's proposals to save these 3,000 jobs?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a crime to wait until you have seen the information before you express an opinion. There are occasions when it seems the hon. member is prepared to shoot from the hip without knowing the facts. If he had looked at the record or listened to the reply of the distinguished Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology last night during the adjournment debate, he would have found a very full and complete answer. It dealt with the meeting I held yesterday afternoon with the minister of resources of the Ontario government, and the chairman of the select committee.

If the hon. member had read the record, he would also have discovered that the chairman of the select committee disclaimed any support for the stockpiling proposal which the select committee made. When they came to see me yesterday, they told me clearly that the Ontario government does not support the select committee's report. It is not an Ontario government document. We did agree that the most profitable way to proceed would be to try to get the two parties together, that is to say, the companies and the unions, to look at the work-sharing project.

I understand the hon. member is against work-sharing. At one time he moved a motion to remove work-sharing from the UIC. I suppose he is now being consistent in trying to cover that up. It might be worth trying to explain to his constituents why he did that, because I believe it offers the best chance to try to work out a very painful and grim situation in Sudbury.

Mr. Rodriguez: Notwithstanding the horse manure preamble of the minister—and it is interesting to note that the minister has not disputed this fact—the Ontario select committee estimated that the social and material costs to the taxpayers of Canada will, conservatively, be between $150 million and $200 million through such programs as UIC and Manpower retraining. Is the minister telling this House that he is prepared to trade-off the human cost against the few million dollars it would cost to stockpile, along with all the other proposals, including work-sharing? Is he prepared to trade-off the human cost and material cost for the interest-free loan proposal of the select committee?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it very clear, in answers in this House, that we are interested in trying to ameliorate this situation, not create greater problems. All the work that has been done indicates that any additional stockpiling program would create greater, not lesser, problems.

Mr. Rodriguez: This minister and this government have rejected all suggestions for preventing the lay-offs which were put forward by members on this side of the House, the trade union movement and local municipal officials. It has not even responded to the immediate and specific proposals of the United Steelworkers of America which were sent to the Minister of Labour on December 18. What does the government intend to do, specifically, to prevent the lay-offs of 3,000 workers in the Sudbury basin from taking place on Monday next?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we have gone over this ground many times. We have done everything in our power to try to ease a very difficult situation. I am not sure the hon. member is as interested in easing the situation as he is in trying to make some political capital out of it. Quite frankly, I find that terribly offensive at this time. His efforts might have been much better devoted to trying to bring together the two sides, the company and the union, in order to work out something to help the workers.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BUILDING OF DEFENCE RESEARCH CENTRE IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. For the past four years the minister and his department have been negotiating with the city of Winnipeg for the purchase of 111 acres on which a new defence research centre is to be built. This is an unusual length of time to be negotiating the purchase of a piece of property. Can the minister bring us up to date? Does the government intend to purchase this property? If no final agreement can be reached, will the hon. gentleman abandon the plan and seek an alternative site in Winnipeg, since the present situation is causing no end of problems for the city, for residents in the area affected and for developers?

• (1152)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): It is true that these negotiations have taken a long time. The municipality is encountering difficulties in obtaining easements for the land. However, the negotiations are continuing and alternatives are being pursued.

Mr. McKenzie: I might point out that the federal government has the power to remove the obstacles to the purchase of that property. Has the minister, or have any of his officials, spoken with the mayor, offering another proposal, that if the request for the defence research centre were dropped, the department would build a new air command headquarters at the air base?

Mr. Danson: Several alternatives are being explored, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSION ON COMMUNICATIONS POLICY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. It is interesting to note from recent press announcements that the minister is finally communicating with the minister of communications of Quebec and intends to have further talks with Mr. O'Neil. Does the hon. lady intend to hold talks with other ministers of communications across the country, so as to arrive at a cohesive policy of co-ordination with respect to communications, particularly cable communications?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I offered the Quebec Minister of Communications that together we look into the ways in which we could share the authority in the field of cable television. I offered him no less than I did the communications ministers of the other provinces. The hon. member surely knows that I have already started discussions with Saskatchewan and Manitoba, where I signed an agreement, as well as with Ontario. At the federal-provincial conference of communications ministers to be held at the end of next March in Charlottetown, we should be able to take stock of the situation; in other words, the file is being dealt with. I am trying, of course, as suggested by the hon. member, to evolve a cohesive policy of co-ordination between the provinces for, as everyone knows, their requests vary.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: With reference to the latter part of that answer, does the minister intend to delay discussing with the House leader the introduction and second reading of the communications bill, so that these discussions and/or the ministerial conference can be concluded before we begin debate on the bill?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: No, Mr. Speaker, not at all. The bill I introduced 15 days ago is an integral part of the discussions and the atmosphere in which they are taking place now with the communications ministers. The hon. member will remember that in that bill a provision allows the governor in council to delegate powers to the provinces; it indicates the flexibility we have proved in that particular field, as we think we have in other sectors.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

ALLEGED GOVERNMENT MISHANDLING OF ECONOMIC SITUATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, who has strongly and vehemently claimed that the government is handling well the economic problems facing the country. Since the Gallup poll produced last Wednesday states that only 27 per cent of the people believe the government is handling the economy properly, while 59 per cent believe the economy is being handled poorly, and since this is the key issue upon which the people will decide the outcome of the next election, will the right hon. gentleman screw up his courage and slip out to the Governor General's this afternoon and let the people decide who is doing what to whom?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

EXPULSION FROM CANADA OF MEMBERS OF SOVIET DIPLOMATIC CORPS—EFFECT OF NEWS SCOOP ON RCMP INVESTIGATION

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is relevant to the announcement made yesterday concerning the expulsion from Canada of 13 members of the Russian diplomatic corps. In view of the fact that the reporter Paul Jackson claims a scoop and broke the story at 11 a.m. on Thursday in Edmonton, could the minister tell us whether, as a result, the RCMP was compelled to interrupt this crucial investigation, thus preventing full and further disclosures of crimes against Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker; I think the record speaks for itself in that regard. There is nothing to that suggestion.

ENERGY

CANADA-U.S. PIPELINE AGREEMENT—INPUT OF PROVINCES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. It has to do with the Canada-United States pipeline agreement. As the agreement requires the acquiescence of provinces which will be affected by the pipeline, and since the co-operation of British Columbia was conditional upon certain demands made in a telex of August 15, 1977, would the President of Privy Council be prepared to table that telex in the House of Commons, as we do debate the bill on Monday?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I will consider that suggestion. Usually, the consent of the province concerned is required before tabling such communications. I might add that discussions with British Columbia are continuing. I had a meeting with the minister concerned, in December, and I hope to see him again at an early date.

Mr. Oberle: Since the concurrence of the province is very crucial to this project, can the minister tell us whether this telex has been discussed with United States officials and whether they are happy with the demands made by the province in its communication of August 15?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, we have not discussed matters of concern to Canada and British Columbia with American officials.

FISHERIES

AUDIT OF FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. It has to do with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and very serious problems which could affect thousands of fishermen in all three prairie provinces. Is the minister now prepared to tell the House whether or not he will order an independent audit of the financial affairs of the FFMC?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The hon. member, surely, owes it to the House and the Canadian people not to smear a corporation which is trying to help fishermen, by talking about "serious problems" without identifying them. If the hon. member is referring to the slowness in the movement of fish, he should know—and if he does not, he is not representing his riding properly—that we took in a large quantity of fish, which we would not normally have been taken in, in order to try to help the fishermen. Market conditions have improved, and I expect the Board will be able to make a final payment soon.

As far as the accounting of the corporation is concerned, the Auditor General examines its books, and I have full confidence in the Auditor General. I would point out, too, that the board includes representatives of the provinces and of the fishermen: four or five fishermen are on the board. I hope that before smearing the corporation, the hon. member will check his facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: Perhaps the almost indifferent attitude the minister has shown toward the FFMC—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whiteway: Is the minister suggesting that it is irresponsible for the new minister in the province of Manitoba to ask for an independent audit of the books and financial affairs of the corporation? Is it not remarkable that a provincial minister should be talking about withdrawing from the FFMC? Is it being suggested that he, also, is being irresponsible by making such a statement?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is yes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Fisheries has shown there is no limit to his venal politics.

THE MINISTRY

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS TO MEMBERS OF CABINET BEFORE APPOINTMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Prime Minister in the hope that he may have reconsidered his decision to hide from public view information about the standards he follows when appointing hon. members to the cabinet. My question is simple and direct. Before appointing the present and previous solicitors general to the most sensitive security portfolio in the government, did the right hon. gentleman, personally, ask each of them whether there was anything in their background which might lead to blackmail or otherwise compromise the ability of that person to carry out his responsibilities as Solicitor General?

• (1202)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that this question was asked yesterday, and I answered it to the satisfaction of all reasonable people.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons whether, before appointing ministers to the most sensitive security portfolio in the government of Canada, he asks questions, personally, to determine whether or not there is anything in the background of the person he is appointing to this sensitive portfolio which might compromise the ability of that person to carry out that responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Leader of the Opposition will realize that in his special capacity, yesterday I hesitated to interfere in the repetition of questions. I am sure that when he examines the record, he will see he was pressing the same question several times. I did not stop him yesterday. However, after its being asked twice today and four times yesterday, I must say there has been repetition of the same question.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. McGRATH—REPLY GIVEN BY MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to take the time of the House on a point of order but it is merely for the sake of accuracy in the record. Today the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) accused me of making inaccurate and misleading statements. I want to say for the record that I can stand behind and document every statement I have made in this House, which is more than the minister can do, having already admitted misleading the House.

MR. HNATYSHYN—PARLIAMENT HILL—USE OF FACILITIES FOR LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the substantial interest in the topic and the understanding we have that the government House leader was to discuss the matter respecting the use of the premises on Parliament Hill for the forthcoming Liberal convention, I wonder if Your Honour can tell the House whether the government House leader has had those preliminary discussions and whether you will be in a position to report to the House in the near future or make a decision with respect to the point of privilege which was raised.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I indicated in dealing with the question in a preliminary way on the matter of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) I said I would keep the matter under reserve while I had consultations with the government House leader, who is the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. McEachen). I can tell the House that I have had some preliminary conversations and it seems to me to be useful that the matter should be the subject of further consultations and conversations between us. I will endeavour to finalize the matter and report to the House as soon as possible. I have reason to believe that will be within the next two or three days.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-419, to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to accede to the request to explain my bill. The purpose of the bill is to amend the Diplomatic and Consular Privileges and Immunities Act to require the government twice yearly to publish a list by country of all alleged infractions against Canadian law for which diplomatic immunity has been claimed. While the vast majority of foreign diplomats in Canada are honourable guests in this country, a small portion of them are systematically abusing their diplomatic immunity.

I believe my bill is unique because it was researched and prepared by a number of political science students attending Wilfrid Laurier University, nine of whom are seated in the south gallery.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: the following loans and grants for the Neighbourhood Improvement Program under the National Housing Act have been approved for Fredericton, New Brunswick:

Question No. 975—Mr. Howie:

Is consideration being given to extending the Neighbourhood Improvement Programme and Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Programme to Marysville, Barker's Point, Nashwaaksis and remainder of Devon areas of Fredericton, New Brunswick?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: the government of the province of New Brunswick has not participated in the Neighbourhood Improvement Program in 1976 and 1977, and does not intend to participate in 1978 even if the programme is extended beyond its scheduled expiry date of March 31, 1978. Marysville, Barker's Point, Nashwaaksis and the remainder of Devon areas of Fredericton will, therefore, not be able to participate in the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and the associated Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program during 1978.

PAYMENT OF INSURANCE MONIES

Question No. 1,245—Mr. Herbert:

Does the Superintendent of Insurance ensure that monies payable to an estate upon the death of a policy holder be payable upon request at any point in Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Being a contractual matter, the place of payment of insurance is subject to the terms of the insurance contract itself and the laws of the province in which the contract was made. The federal insurance acts do not empower the superintendent of insurance to take any action that would bear upon the place of payment of insurance money within Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—PENITENTIARY REFORM

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon) moved:

That this House deeply regrets the failure of the Solicitor General to adopt and implement the sixty-five unanimous recommendations of the Subcommittee on the Penitentiary System in Canada, and therefore directs the government to adopt and implement forthwith the whole of these recommendations to promote meaningful penitentiary reform and to prevent further hostage incidents.

Mr. Speaker: Members will note that pursuant to Standing Order 32(1)(k) and Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on this motion will expire this afternoon at the ordinary hour of adjournment.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, before embarking on the main points which I will make in this debate, I would like to outline how the subcommittee on penitentiaries was set up.

In August, 1976, after a rash of prison violence across the country, our leader and his caucus decided the situation was so serious that it required action on the part of the government, which was dragging its feet in meeting the horrible situation that existed. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) prior to the assembling of the House that year set up a special committee of our own caucus on this side to inquire into and bring forth solutions to settle the unrest in the penitentiary system in Canada. Some three weeks after that decision which was made by our leader, the then solicitor general approached me and suggested that there should be a parliamentary committee set up in order to cope with this problem which was rapidly getting out of control.

Throughout my time in this House I have not been hesitant in showing my partisanship in the debates in this House. But because of the serious nature of the problem in the penitentiary system confronting the country, in my view it was crucial that a unanimous report be presented and accepted by the government to provide for the implementation of the recommendations of the committee. With some considerable difficulty I attempted to convince or, rather, I urged hon. members who were chosen to serve on that subcommittee to work by crossing party lines to ensure there would be no partisanship in the work of the committee. In all of my time here I have never seen any committee of parliament operate in the unanimous fashion in which that subcommittee worked. That says something about our committee system generally which, in my personal viewpoint, is rather useless as the system is now operated.

The single, shining example of an exception to the uselessness of the general commitee system is the work of that subcommittee on penitentiaries, operating under the aegis of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

In 1975-76 there were no less than 69 major incidents in Canadian penitentiaries, including 35 hostage-takings. This was pointed out in the evidence before our subcommittee, but it was even more lucidly and eloquently pointed out on more than one occasion by the distinguished hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who chairs the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and who chaired the subcommittee on penitentiaries. I think I speak for all members who served on that committee when I applaud the manner in which the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville conducted those meetings, and mention his subsequent papers, prepared and delivered to various organizations across the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I commend the reading of those papers to hon. members. Being the honest and forthright person that chairman is, he had some very critical things to say in those papers he wrote. I am going to refer to two of them now. The first is contained in a speech he made to the Canadian Association of Provincial Court Judges in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on October 1, 1977. I quote from page 8 of the text which states:

As I sense the state of mind of members of the subcommittee, we are not prepared to accept anything less than the full implementation by the government of any of the important recommendations of the report.

He sensed our feelings correctly. That report was passed to the government with the full intention of all committee members that it was a package, and that it would serve no useful purpose to pick away at the report, adopting and selecting a recommendation here and a recommendation there. There were 65 recommendations in that report and the general sense was correctly stated by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, our chairman, that the package had to be adopted as a whole if meaningful reform was to be achieved.

The other quotation to which I wish to refer hon. members is from the same speech made on the same day, at page 12, where the hon. member had some complimentary things to say about the then solicitor general. As an aside at this stage I might say that in my personal view the then solicitor general exercised good judgment, paid a good deal of personal attention to the recommendations of the report, and put forth a genuine effort to ensure that its major recommendations were adopted. He was not entirely successful in that, and that is wherein lies my disappointment, I am sure, a disappointment shared by several others on the committee.

The quotation I wish to put on the record from page 12 of the hon. member's remarks on that occasion is as follows:

Since I have already complimented the minister where it was his due, perhaps I may be permitted to say, without fear of misunderstanding, that his initial response to recommendation 29 is not entirely satisfactory. Of course, the important point is that the the system be operated in a manner consistent with the principles of natural justice, and this is fully accepted by the minister's failure to unambiguously endorse the proposition that all penitentiary directives should be recognized as regulations have the force of law (thereby giving rise to rights owed to inmates as well as duties owed by them) can only reinforce the tendency of penitentiary administrators to evade the rule of law in this area. Two parliamentary committees within a few months have now insisted that commissioner's directives can no longer be allowed to subsist as a species of sub-law within penitentiaries. I hope that the minister will announce his agreement at least with the principle.

In order to achieve the unanimity in that committee of which I spoke a few moments ago, and there were many of us who thought that the recommendations should go much further than they did, and others who thought they went too far, we reached a middle ground, a compromise on all of these 65 recommendations in the hope, which is not entirely unreasonable, that having unanimity, with the government members sitting on the committee united with members of other parties, the government would have no recourse but to implement those recommendations. If they are not adopted and implemented, this only points out the uselessness of the committee system even more strongly than I feel it to be now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: There can be no purpose in members travelling throughout Canada visiting almost every maximum-security institution, almost 25 per cent of the medium and minimum security institutions, as well as half-way houses, and travelling into other countries as a committee and as individuals to examine penal systems outside Canada, in order to come up with fresh ideas for the purpose of assisting in the reform of our system, spending all that time and taxpayers' money, if in the face of that unanimity the government rejects that package of recommendations from the committee.

Other members on this side, notably the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), will be addressing themselves to some shining examples of our own provincial systems where procedures and methods are working that do not exist in our federal system. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) will be speaking in respect of specific incidents at the British Columbia penitentiary, past and recent. Hopefully there will be time for the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) to engage in the debate as well.

Members receive a great deal of reading material during the normal course of business here, but I hope they will read that report and the recommendations contained therein, because I think if they do so, particularly the government members, they would add their urgings to the government to implement those recommendations.

I want to speak for a moment on the extent to which I and my party believe the recommendations should have gone. As I said, we compromised in order to achieve unanimity in the committee.

In the area of the system itself, based on the observations that we made and the conclusions we came to in the committee, it would be our recommendation that we look at some alternatives to incarceration. When dealing with non-violent offenders against property, greater use should be made of such sanctions as restitution, fines and sentences to community service. The Criminal Code should be amended to allow far greater flexibility for the use of such measures.

With respect to the scope of the system, the government should commence early discussions with the provinces with a view to merging the federal and provincial correctional services under suitable federal-provincial cost-sharing arrangements. Adequate cost-sharing arrangements should be worked out, along with standardization of training, pay, and benefits. A ten-year program should be established whereby the merger may be accomplished in phases. In that fashion, a standard treatment would be achieved for those unfortunate enough to be incarcerated in the present system. Under present constrictions there is a double standard existing throughout Canada. This is because each province is responsible for the treatment of its inmates within its jurisdiction. We should strive toward the standardization of the entire system in the country.

During my visit to Europe in January of last year, I saw examples of standardization. Because of the nature of the countries I visited, it was easy to achieve standardization. The benefits of the system in those countries were manifested wherever I travelled, whether it was Germany, France, Denmark or Holland. I was impressed with the progress being made and the approach being taken in Denmark where I visited several prisons. I was convinced that the penal system and our approach in Canada are in the dark ages compared with that country's policies and approach.

With respect to the operation of the penal system in Canada, the government should adopt in the policy-making process the concept of a penitentiary board. Other than just the necessary secretarial record-keeping staff, as was recommended in the report, that board should have no fulltime employees attached to it. It should function as a vitalistic structure and not just another level of bureaucracy. That is one of the difficulties the minister's department is facing at the present time when considering this report. It is having difficult accepting the recommendation of establishing an independent advisory board and policymaking body.

Citizens advisory committees can play a more functional role in the system. These committees should attempt to solicit the support of business and labour for institutional work release programs. An example of this plan can be found in Prince Albert where inmates have formed a committee and exercised discipline on their fellow inmates who were permitted to go out into the community and work on projects with the co-operation of labour and the community. Approximately 30 inmates were released daily to work on projects, and none of them have failed to return. There was an unimportant exception to that, which is not relevant to what I am discussing now.

This program worked well. It contained the highly desirable system of internal disciplining of inmates. Work was being parcelled out by that inmates' committee. Because of a ridiculous regulation which prevented back-to-back absences, the program was discontinued on the recommendation of the Parole Board. I do not know whether that situation has been corrected, but I hope so.

With respect to the operation of the penal system, we heard disappointing evidence from inmates with regard to parole and mandatory supervision. The decision of the Parole Board to revoke paroles should be reviewable by the courts. Minor violations of the terms of parole should be punishable by temporary reconfinement, during which time the inmate would not lose time served on his sentence. This measure as well should be reviewable by the courts.

With respect to our position vis-à-vis staff, it is our belief that the system is sadly lacking in good policies concerning recruitment, career opportunities, and discipline. One of the major reasons for hostage-taking incidents is the fact that there is constant conflict between inmates and staff because of improper attitudes on the part of both. A shining example of how that can be corrected existed in the institutions we visited in the United States.

The Canadian penitentiary service should be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission. It should establish hiring, career planning, and dismissal procedures of its own, using the standards of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as a model. Recruitment standards for the service should be raised, and all applicants should undergo appropriate personality testing to determine their suitability for correctional positions. Also they should be subjected to security clearance.

Further, the Canadian penitentiaries system should provide regular upgrading courses and educational leaves to improve the quality of its staff and make it possible for employees to rise in the service. In this connection, an attempt should be made to generate personnel trading-off programs with other countries. If that were implemented, Canadian personnel in the penitentiaries system could work in the Danish system or in the American system at places like McNeil Island, San Diego, etc. This exchange will result in benefits to the system. There are several further recommendations with respect to staff which I do not have the time to put on the record.

The next matter I should like to deal with is the care of inmates. Despite assurances that the committee's brief is being accepted by the government with respect to a building program, I have some doubt. All we are doing is building more warehouses, the police are arresting more people, and the courts are sending more people to jail, when diversionary programs could prevent that kind of growth of prison populations. The Criminal Code must be looked at in order to achieve changes and have other methods of sanction employed. With respect to the ongoing building program, it should be brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible. This may mean that there will have to be more flexibility on the part of the government in its policy of constructing new institutions close to large urban areas. The report speaks of work communities and the like.

Generally wherever we went we found that the feeding and clothing of inmates was bad. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has pointed that out on more than one occasion. We found some serious deficiencies with respect to medical services, about which the hon. member for Oxford will be speaking.

We found very serious deficiencies in the treatment of inmate grievances. We on this side urge the minister that inmate grievances should be handled at the first level by a board consisting of two inmates and two staff members, with a member of the administrative staff sitting as chairman and voting only to break ties. This board should have the authority to decide upon the validity of a grievance and to make recommendations to the institutional director regarding possible solutions to inmate complaints. We believe that an inmate should have the right to appeal the decision of the director or the grievance committee to an arbitrator.

In different words parts of these policies are in the recommendations of the subcommittee. The arbitrator should be a person drawn from outside the system and appointed by the director. Such a person should be of good standing in the community and be possessed of arbitration skills. If a resolution of an inmate's grievance cannot be arrived at, the inmate should be able to appeal directly to the commission. No inmate should have to wait more than six weeks before receiving a final answer to his grievance after it has been passed on to the board of review or the commissioner's office. If more time is required the inmate should be so informed, and the reasons for the delay should be fully explained. Some progress has been made in this direction, but far from enough. This kind of system is now operating, with good results, in other countries.

This package of 65 recommendations as a whole may look quite radical to the officials in the pentitentiary system. I think that attitude might be changing slowly. The in camera hearings with respect to the progress of the implementation of some of the recommendations made by the subcommittee have been very useful. They have brought the members of that subcommittee into direct communication with those responsible for advising the minister on policies. We feel that we are making some progress in changing their thinking, and I say this without any disrespect to the top echelon staff involved. We would like to avoid the assessment by them that these recommendations are truly radical.

There are further recommendations with respect to inmates which I will not have time to put on the record, but let me stress that it is my belief that the recent incidents in B.C. and at Dorchester are a direct result of the long delay—nine months since the government has had the report—in implementing some of the more crucial recommendations of the report as they apply to inmate reform procedures and staff reform procedures. We are back to square one. There was not a single hostage-taking incident or a single incident of violence during the entire time that the subcommittee was doing its work. The report was tabled last June. Nine months have gone by. I for one am extremely disappointed—and that disappointment is shared by other members of all parties who sat on that subcommittee—that we have not moved more positively, aggressively, and quickly to implement the recommendations.

Had we done so, it is my belief that these incidents could have been avoided. Only by the adoption of this package of recommendations will peace be restored within the system.

While I am not attributing the slaying of Michel Roy in Montreal directly to faults in the system, there can be justification for drawing the conclusion—perhaps speculation is more accurate—that the slaying occurred as a result of the conditions which still exist in the federal system, largely around Montreal, Quebec. Nothing is improving there, and hence the violence. I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) can expect more of it unless the government ceases its foot dragging.

I want to emphasize recommendation No. 65, that is, for the ongoing work of the subcommittee. In response to a question asked of him yesterday, the Solicitor General said he had no intention yet of reconstituting that subcommittee. He could on his own initiative see to it that that is done by discussing it with the chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and I am certain that that standing committee would, with alacrity, accept its responsibility and reconstitute the subcommittee so that we could have a steady and ongoing review and exercise a monitoring input to assist the government to achieve a solution to this very serious problem.

One of the central features of the report is inmate labour. Idle hands turn only too often to evil intent. Inmate labour is essential to any well functioning penitentiary system. In Denmark, if I may draw a contrast again, a sanction against recalcitrant inmates is to take away from them the right to work. It is the reverse here. If they wish, inmates are allowed to sit around all day. They do not have to participate in any work programs, and much time is available for frustrations which they encounter in the system to seep to the surface and to break out into violent incidents.

I recommend to the Solicitor General a close study of that Danish system. A state corporation has been set up to market on a worldwide basis prison products made by inmates within the prisons. Essential to the success of the Danish scheme, the labour union movement there is deeply involved. That labour union co-operation must be had in order to achieve success. We are moving far too slowly on the recommendation of the subcommittee with respect to inmate work programs in this regard. The approach seems to be to get back into the market gardening business as an experiment. Some institutions are getting into the manufacturing business, but our suggestion is that all inmates who are physically capable of working should be required to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: No more than 20 per cent of the inmate population should be employed in institutional maintenance, and those who are should be paid a reasonable wage for their labour. I think all subcommittee members were unanimous in their feeling that it is absolutely disgraceful to set up a wage structure in a prison which does not permit even the bare necessities of hygiene to be purchased on a daily basis. That wage structure is so niggling that it ought to be disposed of.

Under the Danish system inmates earn an hourly rate, plus bonuses for over production. The inmates have banks in their prisons. The system adopted over there not only pays inmates a reasonable rate for the work they do but also enables them to pay for their room and board, which prevents the state from having to pay that cost. Inmates are able to send money to their wives and children, but inmates' wives and children in this country are supported by welfare.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired. However, there may be unanimous consent for him to continue his remarks. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: We suggest that the penitentiaries in this country be allowed to compete for contracts on the open market. In choosing its areas of production the system should bear in mind both the degree of job training a given industry will provide inmates, and the financial profits to be made from such industry. A Crown agency should be established. This is one of the heart and core recommendations of the report.

● (1242)

A Crown agency should be established to oversee the administration, accounting, sales and marketing operations of the prison industries. The individuals serving in this agency should be selected by the commissioner on the basis of their business enterprise.

Each individual inmate in prison industry should be paid on the basis of the amount he produces. There should be other, non-financial incentives offered as well, such as paid holidays and extra earned permission.

Vocational training programs could be vastly improved. Perhaps the minister will have an opportunity to visit the prison at Ringe in Denmark to view the beauty of that maximum security institution and its functions. The recidivism rate is less than half that of Canada because inmates leave there with a work incentive, able to cope with society, and make a useful contribution with far less chance of ever returning to prison. I believe the recidivism rate in Denmark is in the area of 40 per cent. One of our provincial institutions about which the hon. member for Oxford will speak later, has a similar rate because of policies adopted there which are applicable to highly dangerous criminals.

I charge the government with neglect, Mr. Speaker. I do so in the kindest possible way and in the hope it does not disturb the establishment of the subcommittee pursuant to recommendation No. 65 of our report. I want the attitude that was present in the committee to continue. If the committee is not reconstituted, if the recommendations are not adopted and implemented rapidly, the neglect which is apparent in British Columbia and Dorchester will get worse. I am sure this feeling is shared by all members of the subcommittee. Unless the government acts on this report with alacrity, I am sure the next time the committee embarks on this exercise we will be looking at ashes. I thank the House for the extra five minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for setting this motion down for debate. I should also like to thank him for the non-partisan way in which he has explained this problem, and I hope to speak in the same manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Members on every side of the House have some criticisms of this matter. We hope that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) will listen to them. It would be dangerous to the extreme if the crises that occur from day to day within the system were used for any narrow partisan advantage in terms of the continuing debate about the prison system in Canada.

The motion reflects the view of this party that there is disappointment and regret that the report of the subcommittee has not been adopted, has not been implemented, and that far too much time has passed since it was submitted. Those of us who sat on that committee did not get what we wanted in the report. Perhaps the Solicitor General has failed to understand that. A variety of views were expressed—views as different as my own, as those of the former member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, and those of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), but there was a tremendous amount of good will among members, which is expressed in the first sentence of the report. It was there because of the description of the crises in the system. All members accepted that fundamental premise and decided, since that is the state of the system, it is more important than anything else. No one wanted to get a vote out of anything, but everybody wanted a change in the system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I want to quote from the beginning of the report because it is vital to understanding the disappointment that is going to be expressed by members of this House. The very first recommendation on page 2 reads:

> A crisis exists in the Canadian Penitentiary System. It can be met only by the immediate implementation of large-scale reforms. It is imperative that the Solicitor General act immediately on this report as a matter of the utmost urgency.

The disappointment sets in when one examines the response of the former solicitor general which was as follows:

> While there are serious problems which must be resolved, doubt is expressed about use of the term 'crisis' to describe a situation which has been of ongoing concern for some time. It should also be noted that the subcommittee was established as a result of disturbances in three institutions in a system containing 54.

I am disappointed that the former solicitor general of that time did not read our report particularly carefully.

The history of the penitentiaries system and the acceleration of the crisis is outlined on page 5 of the report as follows:

> In the 42 years between 1932 and 1974 there were a total of 65 major incidents in federal penitentiaries. Yet in two years—1975 and 1976—there was a total of 69 major incidents, including 35 hostage-takings involving 92 victims, one of whom (a prison officer) was killed.

That is why the committee came to the conclusion there was a crisis in the system. It is not good enough for the then minister to say it is not really a crisis, that it is an ongoing problem. The acceleration of violence within the maximum security system is a crisis. I would have felt much less disappointment if he had accepted our proposition as stated. Then I would have believed that we were going to move quickly to adopt the report.

My second major regret concerns recommendation No. 65 on page 167, which reads as follows:

> The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs should have a permanent reference during the rest of the 30th Parliament and for the 31st Parliament to enable it to review the implementation of this Report in the context of the criminal justice system.

That recommendation was also rejected. Yet it seems to me it would not have been very difficult for the government to accept it if it was serious about implementing the report. It should have agreed to change the system and allow the committee to function as it has in a non-partisan way. What was the government worrying about with regard to the continuing operation of the committee, Mr. Speaker? What it was worried about was that it did not want to be pushed too hard with regard to making the tough changes. We in this party are ready to accept that there are some hard decisions that have to be made. As we indicated, none of us got all we wanted under the terms of the agreement.

We recognize that the changes, particularly with regard to the public service recommendations, the development of a Crown corporation and putting flexibility into the system, are going to be hard. You will have to fight the bureaucracy on them. One thing this government has to demonstrate is that it is willing to fight the bureaucracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: It has to demonstrate that it is willing to take on the mandarins who have run the system for so long and who have resisted any change. If it would change that, the Solicitor General would have my whole support. However, I must say that we are getting very impatient. We are tired of waiting. We want to hear from that task force. We could have heard from them in this instance if the Solicitor General had adopted recommendation No. 65, which he has not.

I want to say something else about the crisis in the system. The Solicitor General and his officials must be the last people in Canada to believe still that there is not a crisis in the system. There is a question which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) was instrumental in inserting in the report. It is a quote from Sir Winston Churchill in the House of Commons on July 20, 1910. We in this party have not been noted as great devotees of some of the statements of Winston Churchill, being a somewhat Conservative politician. However, what he said in 1910, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out, stands just as much today. He said the mood and temper of the public with regard to the treatment of crimes and criminals are one of the most unfailing tests of the civilization of any country. By any measurement, this country fails that test completely.

Why do I say it fails that test? All I have to do is refer to the judgment of Mr. Justice Heald in the case of Darrell versus Heald.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Darrell was his name.

Mr. Leggatt: The inmates of the penthouse at the British Columbia penitentiary decided to test whether the standards under which they were kept met anybody's level of civilization. I want to quote some of that judgment. It may tell us how low we have gone in terms of the way we are administering our prison system.

In that case, one of the famous or infamous inmates was Andrew Bruce. The other was John McCann. Before going into that particular case, I apologize to Mr. Justice Heald for including him in the style of cause.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I hope it is not profanity.

Mr. Leggatt: I hope it will not affect my future in the law business. In any event, one of the individuals in that particular case was Andrew Bruce. Andrew Bruce has been in trouble all his life. He, out of a large family, is the one who has had the most trouble. He spent time in juvenile homes. By the time he got to be 17, he was sent to the B.C. Penitentiary as a result of some serious property crime. Then he got his first taste of the penthouse. He was subsequently released.

In 1970 Andrew Bruce committed a particularly vicious murder. He went back to the B.C. Penitentiary and spent some two years in a cell which, if I recall correctly, is about four by six. He has spent most of his adult life in that particular cell.

I do not say this to justify for one minute any of the vicious and horrible crimes that Andrew Bruce has committed against society. However, I do ask members of parliament and members of the public to ask themselves whether we have reduced the risk of repetition of crime by the way we have treated Andrew Bruce? Is he any less likely or more likely to commit a crime?

Let us look at John McCann who spent 754 days in that cell continuously, with a half hour of exercise. If you bring a man in as a bank robber and put him in the hole, you cannot release him. You can hang him, but you cannot release him. If you release him, he will come out a murderer.

We sit here worrying about rates of recidivism. That is where the rate of recidivism comes. We are not rehabilitating these people, but turning them into dangerous, vicious killers, every day that we allow these conditions to prevail in the solitary confinement areas of our maximum security prisons.

There is no question that this is a difficult subject in terms of the public. The public is rightly concerned and upset with the rate and viciousness of crime. However, I plead with members of parliament and the public to understand that when you get on the wheel of punishment, you do not reduce the rate of crime. You increase the rate of crime and the viciousness of it.

I recall visiting a prisoner in the psychiatric section of Laval. For two weeks this prisoner had pleaded for psychiatric help. He was in for bank robbery. We always get conned when we go through a prison. However, he said he felt he could kill someone when he gets out. We got him his psychiatric treatment, but I really worried about that particular individual.

You cannot examine the prison system just with statistics. You have to examine it in terms of the people living in the cages and what you are going to do with them when they get out, because most of them get out. One way or another, they find their way to the streets. The public is not protected. What is our answer, and what is the answer of the government?

One of the major recommendations we made in this was that we have to start diversion programs with regard to those who are convicted of criminal offences, particularly with regard to property crime. Fifty per cent of those who live in maximum security institutions such as the B.C. Pen, Laval or Millhaven, are there as a result of property crime, not violent crime. However, we have seen no changes to the Criminal Code which would give the courts the kind of flexibility to allow them to sentence prisoners to work in the community to pay off their debt to society, or to pay the victim and thereby work off their debt to society or, indeed, through fines.

We have to be more flexible than just putting people in cages and saying, "Now you are paying your debt to society". They are not paying their debt to society. We are paying $17,500 a year to keep them. That is the current price to keep an inmate in prison.

Mr. Nielsen: It is $20,000.

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member for Yukon says it is $20,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, this morning I was discussing whether the Solicitor General should have responded to the assertion in the subcommittee's report that a crisis existed within the penitentiary system. I referred to the famous judgment of Mr. Justice Heald with regard to the infamous penthouse at the B.C. Penitentiary and I want to read into the record a portion of it which describes an area in the prison known as the penthouse. This is what the judge said after examining the conditions there:

> These cells with concrete walls, floors and ceilings have a steel door with a six-inch peephole that opens only from the outside. The prisoners sleep on a concrete pallet covered by a four-inch thick foam-rubber mattress. They have a foam-rubber pillow and a couple of sheets. A 116-watt bulb burns until about 10 p.m. when a 25-watt bulb is turned on for the night. The prisoners sleep with their heads one foot from the open toilet at the rear of their cell, so that the guards can see them in hourly checks during the night. If the guards cannot see their face, and evidence they are breathing, they will pound on the door until the prisoner moves. The guards said they did this to make sure the prisoners hadn't escaped or committed suicide.

It should be understood that there are some inmates who spend three years in such conditions. It is not just a matter of spending ten days, or 15 days, or 30 days there—for that length of time they might be tolerated. McCann spent 754 consecutive days in solitary confinement. Often one hears the argument, "Look at what they did to their victims." I agree that these men have committed atrocious crimes at the expense of society, but surely the standards we impose should not be those adopted by those who commit these crimes. Surely they should be civilized standards, because the way in which we treat the worst elements in our society reflects the standards which our society seeks to uphold. On this score, Canadians have a great deal about which to search their hearts.

The subcommittee recommended that in terms of the Criminal Code we should move into areas of diversion. I quote from paragraph 190 of the report:

Many witnesses testified that if Canada builds prisons, those prisons will be immediately filled. Conversely, if alternatives for prison can be found for the majority, who are not dangerous, some of the existing buildings will be emptied. Thus, before entering into a multi-million dollar construction program, less costly and more productive alternatives should be introduced.

Perhaps the Solicitor General would comment on the construction program proposed by his department. I realize that for him this is a new portfolio, but a number of figures have been put forward as to the extent of this program. My information is from a report which I would be happy to give to the Solicitor General. It states we are building 26 new institutions and that the estimated cost will run about $460 million over the next five years. We will be adding another 3,326 additional beds to the prison system. At the moment the total program will construct 4,712 new beds and we will be phasing out 1,386 old ones. The net figure is 3,326 new beds over a five-year period.

I would suggest that we are following a construction program which will be a self-fulfilling prophecy. When you provide beds inmates will be found to fill them and the courts and judges will continue the present archaic system of punishment without rehabilitation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired. If he seeks unanimous consent of the House I am ready to ask the House if it will allow him to continue. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leggatt: I wish to thank the House, Mr. Speaker. This construction program is a self-fulfilling prophecy. I submit that if the Solicitor General would examine the demographic figures he would find that the crime rate curve has been flattening over the years, in spite of the violent crime which we have experienced in Canada. Take a look at the facts and the statistics. In 1974 there were 545 homicides. In 1975 that figure increased to 620. In 1976 the homicide rate was reduced to 597, that is, by 7 per cent over 1975. If you use the population base figures and, taking the crime statistics, fix them to 100,000, which is the way judicial statistics are usually calculated, we find there has been a decrease in the homicide rate of .3 per cent. All violent crime curves are now on a down trend. The high point on the curve was reached in 1968.

In Canada people who commit the most crime fall into the 17 to 28 age group. After the second world war when there was the baby boom, when the crime peaked on the curve in 1968, a large percentage of the population was in that age bracket. Since then, crime has been slowly declining. With proper planning the crime rate would probably flatten out. It may not decine further but the population will continue to increase at a faster rate than that of the crime rate.

Therefore, while we may need some emergency construction, I would urge the Solicitor General to re-examine this massive building program of some $460 million. I appreciate that some new institutions will have to be built to alleviate immediate problems, particularly in the British Columbia penitentiary area. However, in terms of the total cost we ought to re-examine what we are doing.

I would like to cite some other interesting figures to the Solicitor General. In 1970 the total cost of running the penitentiary service was $70.6 million. In 1976 to 1977 it was $256 million. We are spending a lot of money but I do not think we are spending it wisely. We have not examined the trends carefully enough. There is no point in building a lot of "warehouses" in this country. The way the bureaucracy operates in Canada they will find a way to fill those warehouses. They will fill them with humans. This is not the way to solve the problem of reducing crime and, in the process, of rehabilitating criminals.

At the beginning I wanted to state that I support the motion before the House. It has been most carefully worded. It is traditional that we in this party will amend a motion which emanates from the official opposition. In examining this particular motion I can see nothing to amend. They have asked for the adoption of the 65 recommendations. Those recommendations came from every political party in this House, and it is a non-partisan motion reflecting the political views of the public as represented by the members on that committee.

In the three major areas of failure in implementing the report comes first of all the question of staff training, salaries and pensions, the idea of upgrading service to the RCMP model, and improving the morale of the service. There is nothing like money to improve morale. If you provide pay increases for correctional officers you will improve the morale of those institutions right away.

The second disappointment was the rejection of a recommendation with reference to regions. We want the warden to run his institution; we do not want him second guessed by region. We want the highest paid official in the region to be the warden. He has the toughest job. He has to be able to walk down the range and quell anger before it gets out of control. There is no point in promoting wardens in the region out of maximum security institutions. That is a trend that suggests the warden is not the most important man. The warden in maximum security prisons is the key man in the system. If he has the right philosophy and is tough enough, the institution will be well run. Having the bureaucracy located in a high rise in downtown Vancouver directing the region and second guessing the warden is a mistake.

Perhaps the key recommendation in the entire report was the development of a national prison industries corporation, a corporation that would change the structure internally in those prisons and would provide work, compulsory work. I am not against a person who has committed a crime being sentenced to work. We all have to work. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us there were no free lunches the other day. To sentence a person to work does not mean you are sentencing him to a ball and chain. It means that he will have the chance to make a productive contribution to society. Those inmates must be able to structure their day and put in eight hours like everyone else. The national prison industries corporation should be in place now. It is due to negligence and delay that this has not been done.

To those people in a community in the trade union movement and the business sector who object to the idea of their products competing with products made within a prison, I say that manufacturing can be tailored entirely to producing those items we buy abroad and that our own industries have not seen fit to make. That will not upset the general market area; if it does, it will be only slightly. It will provide wages for prisoners and compensation for victims as well as board and room for those who are sentenced. There is no reason why they should not pay for the cost of their keep or a significant part of it.

The Solicitor General has not agreed that we are in a crisis. We have had crisis management. The concern of the Solicitor General's department has been in the area of diffusing the next hostage-taking incident. We are asking the Solicitor General today to adopt the report so that long term strategy can be planned to change the atmosphere within the system. If that is done it will reduce the number of deaths, hostage takings and murders. We will be on our way to changing some of those statistics we were talking about earlier on rehabilitation.

I have tried to make this a non-partisan approach and I hope the Solicitor General will as well. I wish to take the opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who did a superb job for the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I am surprised that he is still outside the cabinet walls, and that is no reflection on our present Solicitor General. I do think new blood is always useful for a Liberal cabinet. I want to thank the House for its indulgence in listening to these remarks. I hope the Solicitor General now appreciates how vital and important it is that he adopt all the recommendations, and to show his expression of good will I expect him now to rise in this place and say, "I accept recommendation No. 65", that the committee be reconstituted so that we can get on with the job.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to thank the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) who has been kind enough to let me speak immediately after lunch, for which I am very grateful him. I hasten to add that I am anticipating with great pleasure the remarks he will make, I suppose, immediately after me.

[English]

In order to reply first of all to the comments of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), I might indicate I very much appreciate the tone of this debate. I was a bit apprehensive yesterday when I read the motion. However, I did recognize that it was brought forward in order to bring to the public's attention the very serious matters with which we are presently dealing, and I appreciate the motion having been advanced at this time by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who, as we all know, has a number of other irons in the fire.

Mr. Nielsen: With no embarrassing vote.

Mr. Blais: Yes, we are always happy to have votes in this place because we have a very good record in terms of results. Having said that, that is the only partisan remark I will be making.

I want to advise you, Mr. Speaker, that since assuming office about a week ago yesterday I have had some, albeit brief, opportunity to acquaint myself with the many important and difficult issues confronting the ministry of Solicitor General. As I stated very soon after my appointment, one of the principal areas of concern is that of corrections, an issue in which I have had a long-standing personal interest. I practised before the criminal Bar prior to my election and formed very strong opinions in that area.

My first week on the job has given me the occasion to see what is being done in this field right now, and what is being planned for the immediate future, and it is for that reason I welcome this opportunity, as I have indicated.

As a member of the House and, indeed, as a member of cabinet, I followed the work of the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada with a great deal of interest, as I did in respect of the publication of the report itself and my predecessor's August response and the November progress report. I strongly endorse and let there be no question about that—I give my own personal endorsement to the statement of support made by my predecessor in respect of the general thrust and philosophy of the report, and I share his sense of urgent commitment to far-reaching, and I repeat that term far-reaching, reform in corrections.

The subcommittee's excellent report presents Canadian corrections with a unique opportunity, as well as a challenge, and I welcome the fact I can be at the centre of the action that is being announced. It is an opportunity I do not intend to let pass, and a challenge that, indeed, I welcome. I intend to honour the undertakings made last August, and renewed last November, before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs by my predecessor. I fully intend to work closely with the committee on the implementation of reform.

The subcommittee may not be in existence, but that subcommittee reported to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and, as all hon. gentlemen know, there has been a very intimate exchange between members who prepared this report, my officials, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General, the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker). In fact I will be tabling a detailed recommendation by recommendation progress report before that committee at the time of its consideration of the main estimates in the next few weeks. As was the case in November and December, I expect this forum will provide for a constructive and specific examination of the issues with which we are concerned.

Before describing in more detail the mechanisms which have been set up within the ministry for implementing the report, and giving an idea of the progress which has already been made, I would be remiss in failing to make reference to several recent events. Those events are, of course, the widely reported "threats" against CPS staff, the brutal and tragic slaying of Michel Roy in Montreal, and the hostage-taking incidents at Dorchester and the B.C. penitentiaries. I want to repeat today my expression of deep condolences to the family of Michel Roy, and also my application for the 15 years of dedicated service he gave to the Canadian Penitentiary Service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Let no one, Mr. Speaker, make the mistake to believe that such criminal and unforgivable actions support the cause of the reforms we are dealing with today. It would rather be the opposite. As indicated last August, the permanent public support for reforms such as those suggested by the parliamentary subcommittee depends on the display of a responsible attitude on the part of both the inmates and those pretending to speak on their behalf. The efficient implementation of the important changes which I am going to describe requires a stable climate in our institutions. As regrettable as those incidents may be their only results are to build up tensions and fears thereby working against the prospects of positive changes.

Then I would like to point out, referring to Michel Roy, that a short time after the subcommittee's visit at the Archambault Institute there was a series of very deplorable incidents which showed that very serious measures would have to be taken. We then appointed Michel Roy who indeed managed within a relatively short period of time to bring back this institution under control. For this reason, I believe all subcommittee members should be grateful for that. Mr. Speaker, I must surely be speaking on behalf of all hon. members when stating as strongly as I can the government's adamant refusal to yield to intimidation or blackmail.

[English]

I think this bears repeating, and I am sure I am speaking for all hon. members in stating in the strongest possible terms the government's adamant refusal to be intimidated or blackmailed. While on that subject I want to take a moment to make it crystal clear that I fully endorse my predecessor's policy of "no deals" in respect of hostage takers, and I fully recognize where that policy originates. It comes directly from the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As the Solicitor General stated last summer, and which has been amply demonstrated during recent incidents, in conformity with the no-deal policy, hostage takers will be charged under the Criminal Code and immediately upon disposition of those charges will be transferred to a special handling unit. There is one in place and we will have another one in Quebec in April of this year.

Again, let there be no mistake about the determination of the government on this matter. The recent incidents at the B.C. penitentiary and Dorchester took some time to resolve, but they were resolved and the no-deals policy was held firm. It is clear to me that this is the only way to handle such situations, and I applaud the efforts of the RCMP and Canadian Penitentiary Service officers who successfully brought the hostage takings to a peaceful conclusion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I would now like to turn to an outline of the progress that is being made in respect of the implementation of the report of the parliamentary subcommittee. By the way, Mr. Speaker, members of the subcommittee are pretty well informed in terms of the progress that has been made to date. We have made it a policy of keeping them so informed, and I will be pursuing that policy as well.

In acquainting myself with the structure which has been set up within the Canadian Penitentiary Service to bring about this implementation, as well as with the recommendation by recommendation progress already made, I quickly came to see the truth of a recent remark by the chairman of the sub-committee, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), who has received the commendation of hon. members who have spoken today. In a speech to the national associations active in criminal justice, delivered on January 27, he said:

—It was abundantly evident in the November progress report that implementation was proceeding at a reasonable pace along lines agreed to in August.

[Translation]

Last August 5, my predecessor announced that he agreed wholly or partially with 53 of the recommendations of the subcommittee. In November, when we were considering the supplementary estimates, he tabled an interim report which underlined what had been done following each of these recommendations. These matters were discussed in detail with the members of the standing committee during in-camera hearings held in December. As I have said, it is my intention to pursue my efforts in this area and to table another interim report containing an appreciation of each recommendation when the committee begins consideration of the main estimates.

Mr. Speaker, in the ministry of the Solicitor General, there is a senior co-ordination group under a new deputy commissioner for implementation. Working under him, there are co-ordinators for implementation in each region and representatives in each institution. Every month, the responsible co-ordination units submit implementation progress reports to the headquarters and to this main co-ordination group in order to ensure that rapid progress is achieved in the implementation. The deputy commissioner has just come back from a trip across the country during which he has met with the senior officers in each region to find out how we could accelerate this process.

[English]

On the basis of this information, I will be receiving a detailed monthly update. Again this morning I held a briefing to apprise me of the current status of implementation, and I intend that this should happen on a regular basis. That is a brief description of the mechanism by which implementation is carried out and monitored.

Now I should like to turn to the substance of the implementation itself. Of the 65 recommendations in the subcommittee report, 37 have been implemented or are in the process of being implemented as of the end of January. For example, independent chairmen are now hearing disciplinary cases in all maximum security institutions, in accordance with sub-committee recommendation 30. The selection of an inspector general is now under way, and the final choice will be made in the near future, in accordance with recommendation 28. Citizens advisory committees have now been established in almost all institutions, in accordance with recommendation 49. A pilot grievance project is under way at the Saskatchewan penitentiary, in accordance with recommendation 36. Again, a detailed and specific progress report is being prepared in readiness for the standing committee's review of main estimates.

In addition to these 37 recommendations, a further eight recommendations will soon be in the process of implementation. Another 14 recommendations are of a longer term nature and require federal-provincial agreements. Hon. members would agree that is an essential part of our function. Others entail extensive research, others involve the construction of new institutions and facilities.

In reply to the hon. member for New Westminster and in relation to our building program, I would not want him to leave the impression that the amounts being invested are somehow to be additional to those presently in place. The hon. member strongly encouraged a different attitude, a radical change in terms of the occupation of the prisoners. He recognized that the committee made a strong recommendation to have smaller institutions arranged in clusters, and that those institutions ought to be accommodated in order to provide additional facilities for industrial work, educational processes, and technological training. The hon. member is aware that we must invest in that area, but surely that is an area to which we are addressing ourselves. I am sure he will want to monitor it very closely indeed, and I invite him to do so. There are other changes that will require legislation, which is a relatively long process. That is not to say we will delay recommendations as a result of having to implement legislation. We will attempt to hasten legislation through the House as soon as possible.

With respect to that latter question, I should like to refer to several legislative initiatives which derive from the sub-committee report or are relevant to it. Legislative measures widening the availability of alternatives to incarceration, the diversion process of the Law Reform Commission, such as community service orders—are now being drafted in the context of an omnibus bill which is shortly to be introduced in the House by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). This legislation bears on subcommittee recommendation 2, as does the proposed young offenders bill, which is also in the drafting process at the present time. A provision of the miscellaneous statutes amendment bill, which also will be introduced by my colleague, amends the section of the Parole Act dealing with sentence calculation, thus responding to subcommittee recommendation 35.

The subcommittee considered six recommendations to be at the "inmost core" of the report, to cite the chairman's words again. As hon. members are aware, my predecessor referred those recommendations to an interdepartmental working group consisting of senior representatives from the ministry, Treasury Board, the Privy Council Office and the Public Service Commission. Because the impact of those recommendations on the structure of government as a whole was so far reaching, it was clearly beyond the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General to give definitive responses on his own authority.

[Translation]

I have been informed of the progress which has been made since I have taken this portfolio, and it seems clear to me that it is really—and I repeat "really"—in agreement with the substance of the recommendations made by the sub-committee, namely the need to turn the Canadian Penitentiary Service into a service which is energetically administered, well disciplined and open to professionals while giving it the authority, and consequently, the responsibility needed to fulfil efficiently its difficult mandate. Because of the implications of the legislative, statutory and administrative measures which are suggested, it also seems clear to me that I should make a detailed and in-depth study of the final position which I shall recommend to my cabinet colleagues.

As I stated in the first eight—I repeat, eight—days I have been in this position, I could only familiarize myself with the main themes and not necessarily with all their ramifications. However, I hope I shall be able to make public the proposals relating to recommendations Nos. 26, 24, 27, 5, 11 and 18 of the subcommittee when the standing committee studies the main estimates. Mr. Speaker, some of these recommendations relate to areas in which I was interested when I had another portfolio, namely matters relating to relations with the unions and relations with the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

[English]

Before concluding, I should like to stress again the fact that I heartily endorse the goals for corrections enunciated in the subcommittee report. The 65 recommendations affecting all areas of corrections provide us with an important opportunity. The recommendations with respect to the purposes of imprisonment, the correctional staff, the organization and management of the penitentiary service, justice within the walls, work, education and training, socialization, institutions, prerelease and parole, all represent the fruits of hard thought and dedication. All of our efforts toward the implementation of the reforms suggested are being carried out with the same degree of devotion and the same sense of urgency. Those reforms are fundamental. They will best be accomplished in an atmosphere of non-partisan interest.

I fully agree with the hon. member for New Westminster when he says that as we proceed with these changes there might be incidents from time to time. I cannot guarantee that there will not be some unfortunate incidents. It would be extremely regrettable if, in our deliberations, we should seize upon these events, which are dastardly and barbaric, to score partisan points. I thank hon. members for their attention.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question. In view of the fact that while our subcommittee was sitting there was relative peace and calm in the system, and in view of the fact that the opposite seems to be returning to the system, would the minister give us some indication as to whether he will accept recommendation No. 65 for the reconsituation of the subcommittee in the hope that it can continue to accomplish what it accomplished when it was sitting?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would be belittling the members of that subcommittee if I were to agree with what the hon. gentleman is advancing, that because of the formal demise of the subcommittee there has not been a very active role played by its members. The hon. member knows full well that that is not the case. The subcommittee no longer exists, but the committee does. The committee is there to oversee, as it does with regard to estimates, the process of implementation. Surely that is what is important. If eventually it becomes evident that we have to reconstitute the subcommittee for the implementation of the program, I will take that recommendation very seriously indeed.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are discussing in this debate is likely to invite all hon. members to study very seriously the great problem of penal institutions. Obviously, it would be desirable that we should not need such institutions but we must face the evidence. We are in a society which is not perfect because it is human, and it happens unfortunately that some individuals do not comply with the law or do not respect the rights of others, so they must be incarcerated for a given period of time.

That is what we call doing penance and it is probably the reason why they are called penitentiaries, because the people there are doing penance. However they are human beings who must be treated with humanity and I believe that if there are some upheavals from time to time in those penitentiaries, there must be some reasons for it. That is why the sub-committee undertook a very complete study of the situation by visiting many penal institutions throughout Canada. It submitted a number of recommendations. It also based its report on principles listed on pages 159 and 160 of the report. The motion blames indirectly, or rather regrets—for this is the most accurate word in the motion—the failure of the Solicitor General to implement the recommendations of the Subcommittee on the Penitentiary System. I do not want to blame too severely the Solicitor General who addressed the House a moment ago, not even his predecessor.

It is not easy to implement every recommendation made by the subcommittee. But we must act and do something as soon as possible.

In the recommendations, on page 161—and I agree with this paragraph of the report—we are told:

> A crisis exists in the Canadian penitentiary system. It can be met only by the immediate implementation of large-scale reforms.

I realize that the Solicitor General has plenty of work on hand to overcome the unfortunate situations which exist within penitentiaries, but still we should devote much more time to get to the core of the problem before the situation grows worse.

And the same paragraph goes on to say:

> It is imperative that the Solicitor General act immediately on this report as a matter of the utmost urgency.

"A matter of the utmost urgency" means just that. Why? Because nothing is better than going there personally to see what atmosphere exists, in order to make truly valid recommendations. I truly regret that my colleague, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), who sat on this subcommittee, was detained outside the House today, because he would certainly have taken part in this debate and would have expressed much better that I the views and wishes of our party, so that conditions may improve in all penitentiaries across Canada.

This week we witnessed the brutal killing of Archambault Institution Warden Michel Roy. Who was the culprit? I don't know. The inquiry will reveal it one day, but one thing is for sure, a feeling of anger and vindictiveness now prevails against those who are in a position of authority.

I for one believe that even inside a prison, and especially there, justice must reign. Inmates are inmates because they failed to comply with justice, but if they are to have a taste of justice, to know what it is when they are released, then they have to see that men can administer justice, even toward inmates.

The role of police officers is not an easy one and neither is the role of prison wardens and prison guards. That is why when we considered in this House Bill C-84 to abolish the death penalty, we asked that the death penalty be at least retained to ensure the protection of police officers and prison guards. However, such was not the will of parliament. I feel it is now advisable to reconsider this matter in order to ensure the full protection which a well-organized community is entitled to expect. According to the report, living conditions are unacceptable in penitentiaries. I realize that the inmates are not enjoying a holiday on southern beaches. However, they are entitled to the essential, that is cleanliness, food and lodging. I feel that we should look into the problem more fully and I urge the Solicitor General to examine my suggestion.

Some four of five years ago, if I remember well, our party put forward in this House the suggestion that inmates should be taught a trade according to their abilities and the products they made from day to day could be sold on the market, providing they did not compete with domestic firms. The revenue accrued to inmates would be put in trust, so they could collect it on being released. In this way, they could leave with some money and hope to remain in the straight and narrow path.

I believe this should be tried. There is nothing like work to keep someone's mind on the right track. When there is nothing to do, the only pastime is to listen to someone else boasting about his past deeds. In our penitentiaries those people talk and brag. Younger inmates are exposed not only to bad examples but also to brainwashing. They are led to believe that once out there is no way they can start anew, they are bound to slip up again.

If shop work were established, and I am sure this could be set up with adequate security, considering the means we now have, I believe this would be true rehabilitation. As I said, it would give some incentive to those at least for whom there is still hope, and when they got out they would have a certain amount of money, it would not have been a totally futile exercise. While doing their time they would maintain good working habits, they would enjoy doing something tangible that would bring them something. We must always leave some incentive. I do not mean paying a salary, not in the least. Only, by working they could expect to accumulate some funds that would allow them to lead a useful life.

Mr. Speaker, this is no joke. I do not want to dramatize, but the day after the director of the Institut Archambault was killed, in the Quebec area, which I know very well, two inmates are reported to have knifed a warden in the Orsainville prison, close to Quebec city.

What is an inmate doing with a knife? Where did he get it? How did it get there? Come on, it must surely be a lack of supervision somewhere. There is something wrong, because if there had not been someone close by to rescue that guard who was being held at knife point, I think we would be talking about another murder today.

I think it is important to hire competent staff which could develop a friendly relationship on a daily basis with the inmates so as to gain their complete confidence. You can gain someone's confidence. Take the lion tamers. The lion is not always a gentle animal but you find that with patience, day after day, you can create a friendly relationship with it and turn that ferocious animal into a docile one. I think the example might be stretching it a bit, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to make the point strongly in order to make sure the Solicitor General really understands. He has a very great responsibility in this respect and must find the most competent and patient staff possible. Of course, if a prison guard runs the inmates with the boot and the stick, he is not going to make friends with them, and they are going to say, to hell with the rules. If I were there, I think that is how I would react. So that is why we must train the guards. We must have a training school for our penitentiary guards. There must be a general attitude, a humane attitude, an attitude that could bring the inmates to consider themselves as human beings who are respected and who, while they are paying their debt to society, can nevertheless live decently, at least in an acceptable way.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to draw the attention of this House on the parole system, another extremely serious matter that must be reviewed, because I understand paroles have been granted in recent months. I am not blaming anyone. I am not blaming the psychiatrists either. But in any case, there were two murders I know of and a third one not long ago, a very savage one, in Lévis: a seven-year old girl was raped and ripped by an ex-inmate. I cannot say any more about it because the case is before the courts, but the fact remains that there is something wrong. That an accident should happen, I am prepared to accept that, but when that happens too often, then one wonders. What is the Parole Board doing about it? What are psychiatrists doing? What is happening? Is society sick as a whole or is there nothing left to save? I am not prepared to accept that. Here again, a suggestion I make to the Solicitor General is to have the Parole Act reviewed with a view to bringing about improvements, corrections and the necessary amendments so as to make that board more responsible and avoid mistakes as much as possible.

The subcommittee reports also deal with the same subject and I wish the recommendations made by the subcommittee would be implemented. It has been said that 53 of them had been adopted—and I was here when the former solicitor general said so in the House—but there are 65 recommendations. The others should also be considered and implemented as soon as possible to improve our penitentiary system in Canada and I think that, if the government moves in that direction as soon as possible, Canadians will be happy to realize that they can count on the government to ensure their security and their protection everywhere.

But there are preventive measures to take: it is not enough to talk about the failures of the systems, they should be prevented. In our society, under the present system, we have a considerable number of unemployed and when unemployment insurance benefits come to an end they have much difficulty to get welfare and they must find another solution to survive. TV programs are teaching violence to our children, our sons and daughters. They show them all sorts of tricks to get hold of someone else's possessions and it is not surprising if they are tempted to imitate what they have seen. I have already asked in the House, and again I ask, that movies shown on our TV network, at least on the national network, be carefully screened. More broadcasting time should be used to educate people and teach them something useful rather than violence.

We simply have to react against that awful publicity. Like other hon. members, I receive hundreds of letters against pornographic movies that also feature violence. If people ask us to speak up against those movies it means there is something good left in our society. I am convinced that there is more good than evil and it is our duty to ensure the conservation of what is good and improve what is bad.

[English]

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to become involved in this debate in which the official opposition has urged the government to implement quickly the recommendations in the report of the subcommittee. It is a pleasure for a second reason. This is a unique debate. It is uncommon in the House of Commons that members from all sides are able to speak as virtually one voice and be in agreement that something should be done.

In my remarks today I will deal with four general areas. First, I want to comment on how the committee worked. Second, I want to say something about the general findings of the report of this committee. Third, I want to consider what has brought to a head the violence in the penitentiaries. Indeed, this is what brought about the formation of the subcommittee. Finally, I want to discuss the solutions as we see them through the hand of parliament.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) explained very well how the committee came about. I want to repeat what other members have said, including the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). It was a real pleasure working on a committee composed of members from all parties of the House. We worked in a collective way toward a common goal. The degree of partisanship which existed in that committee was minimal. In fact, when talking to other people I always pointed out that when there were differences within the committee, they were usually among members of the same party rather than across party lines.

I would be remiss if I did not acknowledge the fine contribution made to the committee by the chairman, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). He demonstrated a real capacity for hearing a number of diverse views. As the hon. member for New Westminster pointed out, we all had different views. However, under his leadership we were able to come together and bring forward a unanimous report.

This leads me to make a comment. I do not say it in any partisan manner; I say it in all good humour to the new Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). I smiled a bit when I learned of the new appointment to the post of Solicitor General. During the past months when the present Solicitor General was postmaster general, I urged him to establish a parliamentary committee of all parties to do exactly the same for the post office as this committee had done. I had to smile when I learned he was being transferred to this ministry where he would be confronted with a unanimous report of a parliamentary committee, the very thing I thought should be established for the post office.

The other paradox is this, and I again say this with all respect to the new minister. The chairman of our committee is perhaps one of the most knowledgeable people in Canada with regard to the affairs of prisons. He is a dean of law of a Canadian university. Yet when it came to appointing someone to a portfolio where one of the main concerns was the situation in our prisons, he was passed over. Again I say this with all due respect to the new minister—

Mr. Blais: I appreciate that.

Mr. Halliday: —who exhibited his abilities at stonewalling in the post office. I hope he does not carry that ability into his new office as Solicitor General.

It is interesting to note that during the interval from when the committee was set up until this report was tabled, there was virtually no unrest in our prison system. There was an expectant mood or air on the part of all people in the prisons, namely the prisoners, guards and management, as to what was going to come out of the report of that committee. This air of expectation has probably changed. In the last month or two, we have seen a renewal of hostage taking and other forms of violence in our prisons. One can suggest this may be partly due to the way the report has been handled.

I think it is fair to say that when the report was tabled and given to the then solicitor general, he had a real concern for the contents of it. We were all convinced of it. However, when one considers the nature of the report and the fact it had to deal with a lot of problems relating not only to the prisoners, the guards and management, it was a little strange that the first people to see the report in the way of advising the minister was a group of officials within the penitentiary service of the minister's department. That was the breadth of the expertise he was calling on to analyse and criticize the report. It led to some of the delays that are of concern to the opposition and, indeed, all members of this House.

We were critical when we saw the first progress report on the committee's report on about August 5. It indicated there was a desire on the part of the ministry to implement a goodly number of the recommendations, albeit not all. As time progressed, we waited for further word as to what was going to be done about the report. On November 29 of last year, we finally received another progress report. It was based on, and to some extent represented, an additional area of expertise which the minister had sought, namely the interdepartmental working group which the Solicitor General referred to this afternoon. In this, we were pleased to see an increase in the acceptance of the recommendations of the subcommittee.

In his comments a few minutes ago, the minister referred to the work being done by the interdepartmental working group and the fact that some of their recommendations required new legislation. Also, some of our recommendations in the report were rather far-reaching and fundamental and involved the development of new legislation.

I am sure the members of the committee would welcome an opportunity to see that proposed legislation very soon. If the minister proceeded now with the drafting of that legislation and if we had the proposed legislation before us at the time the minister appears before the committee in a few weeks with his estimates, I dare say he could count on very quick consideration and passage of such legislation. That would hurry up implementation of this whole report.

Mr. Nielsen: All stages in one day.

● (1512)

Mr. Halliday: My hon. friend from Yukon suggests all stages in one day. That is a possibility and I hope the minister will bear it in mind.

There is one all-pervasive finding in this report and it is embodied in the first of 761 paragraphs. It reads as follows:

> To sum up the totality of the needs of the Canadian penitentiary system, as we have observed them, in a single word may seem as hazardous as it is ambitious. However, we believe the word "discipline" says it all.

When we look at the implications of discipline in the system we are looking at four different elements. The first involves the inmates themselves, the second involves the guards, the third concerns management and the fourth concerns the general public which also has a part to play in the successful functioning of a penitentiary system.

As I said earlier, the raison d'être for the establishment of this committee and for the debate today is the violence in our penitentiaries. When we consider our prisons in this context, four conditions have to be met. These were outlined by the chairman of our committee during a speech he made in August before the 1977 World Congress for Mental Health. In the course of his comments at that time the hon. member made this statement in general about the subcommittee's report:

> I am personally persuaded that real progress in the establishment of these four conditions according to the recommendations of the subcommittee would provide almost complete control of collective violence in our prison system. But a warning is in order. The recommendations, if not exactly a seamless web, are at least an integrated package. Anything short of almost complete implementation will be ineffective.

In the same speech he went on to say:

> Unless the government implements all of the essential recommendations of the report it will not have changed the system.

This establishes the reason for our concern. We share the feelings expressed by our chairman. He was talking about four conditions which have to be met before we can control violence in our prisons. These are, first of all, justice. We must provide ordinary, common justice for the inmates.

Second, there must be some alternative to boredom in prisons. There must be some work provided, some opportunity for recreation, some challenge to inmates to prevent their being bored, apathetic, or in despair.

Third, we must provide some opportunity for the development of human relationships. The hon. member for New Westminster drew attention to this very clearly in his remarks. He showed that in the B.C. penitentiary there was no opportunity for human relationships. My hon. friend from Yukon went into this aspect further by describing what he had seen in the Oakridge division of the Penetang prison in Ontario where the emphasis was placed on the social development of inmates. It was amazing to see the extent to which even the difficult problem of discipline to which I have referred was looked after not by the authorities but by the inmates themselves. If an inmate became unruly he was handcuffed to two of his colleagues; he was not handled by the guards at all.

A fourth condition which must be achieved if violence is to be removed from our prisons is reform in the area of management. If there is to be a successful prison system there must be major changes in management. This is one area in which the former solicitor general refused to come to grips with the subcommittee's report. I will give him credit for this: as time went on he became increasingly in tune with the thinking of the committee as far as management was concerned. I must say, though, that he was rather slow.

What has led to the present situation? What is the background to management problems? First, the present system as we have known it for the last couple of hundred years is based upon the concept of militaristic control. The man at the top is the boss. He rules right on down and there is no input from the sides at all. However, during the last 20 years or so things have changed. Fresh input has come from various quarters and it has obviously taken time for the system to adjust. One important change in the old hierarchical system was brought about by the regionalization program which created uncertainty at the penitentiary level. Another was the unionization of the staffs. I am not suggesting there is no need for unions but I do submit that the main role of a union should be in the economic area rather than trying to influence policy, which ought to be decided by management or by some other policy forming body.

Again I wish to quote the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. He was speaking to another group this time, namely, to the conference of Canadian judges in August of 1977. At time he had this to say:

> Without a total change of the system the lesser changes which are made will not be of lasting benefit. Our recommendations represent the minimum change necessary to end collective violence in penitentiaries.

He was saying we must implement the report in its totality if we really wish to succeed.

I mentioned earlier that there are four elements in the system which need to be addressed—the inmates, the guards, management and the public. I wish to stress now the importance of good management, because this was highlighted by our chairman. In an address to the Criminology Centre at the University of Ottawa entitled "The Canadian Penitentiary System—A Crisis of Management", he had this to say:

I want to turn, now, to a uniquely Canadian dimension of the penitentiary problem, viz., appalling mismanagement on a scale seldom, if ever, seen before in the Canadian public service.

Our chairman spoke even more strongly than I would have done about management, though I share his concern. He went on:

The Americans manage their system from a position of strength. We manage ours from a position of weakness, with weak techniques, and, worst of all, with weak men.

I hasten to add that our chairman would be the first to say there are exceptions. One of the exceptions is in the south gallery this afternoon.

● (1522)

As an over-all view of the management situation I think that what the chairman said was accurate and precise. I would like to conclude by saying a few things about what I look upon as a solution to the management problem in our penitentiary system. My colleagues who were on the sub-committee will be tired of hearing me talk about this because they have listened time and time again, and not one of them has mentioned it today. There are three recommendations I want to refer to in particular. I will read them so we will understand them fully. Recommendation 24 reads:

The commissioner should remain the chief adminisstrative officer of the penitentiary system but he should be appointed by and responsible to a board of five members (appointed for five year terms on a staggered basis by the Solicitor General) which would have sole responsibility for the making of policy.

I emphasize that phrase "sole responsibility".

The board must not have an attached bureaucracy additional to the Penitentiary Service. It should report to the Solicitor General and should be required to make an annual report to parliament through the Solicitor General.

The Solicitor General in his first progress report referred to this recommendation in these words:

This is one of the most fundamental changes recommended by the committee—

To tie in with that recommendation is recommendation No. 26, which reads as follows:

The Penitentiary Service under the board—

I have just alluded to that; that is the five-man board.

—must be an independent agency of the government not subject to the Public Service Employment Act or the Public Service Staff Relations Act. It should resemble the RCM Police in its discipline and professionalism. Employees should be subject to discharge for misconduct and incompetence.

Once again the comment of the Solicitor General at the time was this:

This is another of the subcommittee's most far-reaching recommendations—

This has not been alluded to at all today by the Solicitor General except in a very indirect way. Indeed, these are recommendations which I am sure his interdepartmental group are looking at seriously, and I do want to say something more about them. There was a third recommendation, No. 62—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has elapsed. He may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Halliday: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank my colleagues who are as indulgent today as they have been over the past year when we were working together. We were interested in each other's presentations at all times. Let me quote recommendation No. 62:

The CPS should research the possibility of expanding, in at least one new institution, the Citizen Advisory Committee into a board of governors on an experimental basis. Such a board should consist of about 12 members and should appoint the director and senior administrative staff.

These three recommendations show a desire on the part of our subcommittee to have the public involved in the concepts, policy formation and in the running of our penitentiary system, apart from the management and administrative aspects. This suggests to me that the people of Canada have an input to make into the total penitentiary system which at the present time, under the hierarchical system, is virtually impossible. I agree that we have the citizen advisory committees in some of our institutions but they are rather impotent in most cases. We saw one or two that were effective, but by and large they were not.

My concern stems from a superficial analysis of our public institutions in Canada where people are rendering a service to other people. I am thinking, first of all, of schools, hospitals, universities, children's aid societies, public libraries and police commissions, wherever there is a public institution which renders a service for one group of people to another and results in public input. That input may be by way of an elected or appointed board, or a combination of both.

There is only one other public institution that I am aware of where there is a person-to-person involvement with no public input, and that is the army. That is the closest parallel I can think of to illustrate the point. In the penitentiary system people there have to deal with the most extreme, aberrant persons who have strayed from the normal sociological path which is accepted by society. In that instance there is virtually no effective public input. I submit, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the main reasons we are now having trouble with the prisons. This trend will continue because the original militaristic type of system has been destroyed by regionalization and by the input of unions as well.

Let me comment on the approach taken by the former solicitor general, and a few moments ago by our new Solicitor General, to the recommendations which had been approved by the ministry and those which were under investigation. The Solicitor General forgot to mention that the comment of the then minister on recommendation No. 62 was one word: "reject". I was disappointed at that in view of the interest I have in recommendation No. 62. I want to give my colleagues credit for agreeing that that recommendation was worth including on an experimental basis. With due deference to the former minister when I made representations to the acting commissioner a few months ago he made it possible for me to discuss them with two of his senior officials and I did appreciate this gesture. I am looking forward to the next progress report from the new minister. I hope he and his officials are having a second look at my request that the CPS should research the possibility of expanding the concept of a citizen advisory committee into something like an elected board or appointed board.

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I would like to cite two more quotations which support this philosophy that we must recognize in order to have peace in our institutions, namely that of effective public input. The five-man board recommended in recommendation No. 24 will be a policy forming board. A similar board or committee at the institution level will implement the policies made at the top. There are lots of precedents in our school jurisdictions to show that this system functions effectively.

In the course of our hearings we listened to Professor Grygier from the department of criminology, University of Ottawa. Part of the question I asked him read this way:

—do you feel that by involving the public more directly in the administration and planning of our prison systems that we would then have a better educated public? Is this a valid sort of conclusion or not?

The reply of Dr. Grygier was this:

I think so, yes. I think the public should be more involved than it is here.

When he said "here" he meant Canada.

Finally, as recently as this morning in the editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail commenting on Mr. Maloney's report on the prison system in Ontario, the last main paragraph reads:

One of Mr. Maloney's major recommendations, however, is that there should be a local advisory body, made up of senior correctional personnel, judges, lawyers, crown attorneys, police and members of the legislature, wherever there is a jail. These local bodies should meet regularly with a similar provincial body to discuss common problems.

Mr. Maloney's suggestion here is just what we suggested in our report, that there should be a committee at the top involving a cross-section of our society, and a committee at the institutional level involving a cross-section, both having effective input in the formation of policy. I would prefer not to use the term "advisory", because that seems to imply it can be ignored. I think it should be a committee that has some power to form policy.

Again I want to thank the House for its indulgence in allowing me to continue. May I just conclude by saying we have appreciated this opportunity today of being able to discuss from all sides of the House this very important issue. We want to welcome the new minister to this portfolio, and suggest to him we will be looking forward quite eagerly to the first time he appears before what we hope will be the reconstituted committee as suggested in recommendation 65.

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is, indeed, a pleasure and honour to participate in this debate. I say this because it is very appropriate and timely that the House, and particularly the members of the subcommittee, discuss the progress of our report. Later on I will lay the groundwork for the reasons that I accept the motion in principle.

I accept the principle of the motion as it stands in the name of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) because I feel certain events that have developed since the tabling of the report clearly indicate we must act quickly, and I would urge the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to do so.

As has been clearly pointed out by the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), who spoke on behalf of his party, and the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), the subcommittee was a very non-partisan one. It saw that we were clearly facing a crisis situation within our penitentiary system. Because of that we buried very quickly our partisanship.

We were truly parliamentarians in the sense that we saw the problem, and this transgressed any political philosophy. This was a problem that required the collective wisdom of different people from different backgrounds. On the one hand we had my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), a reporter for some 30-odd years doing the crime beat and being very involved with the whole issue of the penitentiary system; a number of us were lawyers who added that dimension of knowledge to the subcommittee; and the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) who is, as well as being a member of parliament, a physician and surgeon. I remember that every time we went into a penitentiary he would examine the medical facilities.

I remember at Millhaven particularly, which has created a lot of problems, and still does today, the members of the subcommittee pooled our resources and in fact shared information. We split up our time in order to get a proper cross-examination of the witnesses who appeared before us. I can remember giving information to the hon. member for New Westminster, and he in turn did likewise.

That sort of spirited co-operation and non-partisanship was never demonstrated to the public at large because at that time we did not have television following our committee system. This is why I think it is appropriate and timely here today clearly to demonstrate to the public that the committee system can work, and that when there is a very serious problem parliamentarians come to the fore, bury their partisanship and truly attack the problem on that basis.

I think it even more clearly demonstrated that the spirit of this non-partisanship should continue that the hon. member for Yukon before tabling his motion went around the House yesterday giving notice to everybody of what the motion would entail, and he sincerely expressed the hope that it would not destroy the unanimity and spirit of co-operation which we had developed.

I think I can speak for all my colleagues on this side of the House in saying that we agree with the hon. member; this motion he has presented will not destroy that unanimity and spirit of co-operation. As I have indicated, I accept the motion in principle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lee: What has happened in respect of the sub-committee's report? On August 5, 1977, the former solicitor general the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox), tabled his response. At that time there was an extreme amount of ambiguity concerning that response. He indicated he accepted 53 of the 65 recommendations and reserved decision on six. That unfortunately caused a lot of confusion. He quickly clarified the situation, and by so doing indicated his willingness to co-operate with the committee.

On November 29 of last year the then solicitor general tabled the first progress report. The subcommittee then conducted an in-depth analysis of this report, and during the month of December held a number of in camera sessions with officials of the department and with the task force charged with the implementation of our report.

What are the recommendations that have been accepted? There has been clear acceptance of the principle of equal employment opportunities for both men and women. The department has appointed a co-ordinator of equal opportunities for women programs within the Canadian penitentiary system. Secondly, contact visiting will, over a period of time, as facilities become available, be introduced in the maximum institutions of Archambault, Fort Saskatchewan and even Millhaven. At the present moment contact visiting occurs mostly in our minimum institutions.

The one issue in respect of which I think all of us expressed a high degree of unanimity was the issue of no deals for hostage takers. The government has clearly indicated its support for that recommendation by its actions with regard to the incident which occurred at Millhaven on November 21 of last year.

The department has also established independent chairpersons for disciplinary hearings within institutions. The department has presented a very lustrative list of persons chosen to sit as these chairpersons. It is also in the process of implementing recommendation 36 regarding the grievance procedure where you have a panel of two inmates, two representatives from the staff of the institution, chaired hopefully by an outside person. This system is presently being used in some of the more troublesome institutions like Attica. Members of the subcommittee will remember that well from the film we saw of what happened there. This is a pilot project which is now being undertaken at the Saskatchewan penitentiary. Hopefully when the inherent difficulties of that procedure are worked out it will be implemented on a nationwide basis.

When the report of the subcommittee was tabled, the then solicitor general and the department rejected our recommendation that all directors of institutions report directly to the commissioner. Subsequent to that, in December during the in camera hearings we learned that directors of maximum institutions now will report to the commissioner. This goes a long way toward meeting our first recommendation, which was originally rejected by the then solicitor general. This clearly indicates the government is forthcoming. Also it demonstrates the dedication of the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, and I congratulate him for implementing many of our recommendations. An entire system cannot be changed overnight. I am confident the new Solicitor General will be as forthcoming as his predecessor.

Many participants in the debate today have referred to the remarks of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). I applaud him as well. He did an excellent job. In an address before the national association active in criminal justice on January 27, 1978, he said the following:

> I have gone into a good deal of detail with respect to progress on the subcommittee report because the process of progressive adoption of a report which here appears is almost unprecedented in government. Normally, a government, wishing to put its best foot forward, will announce at the outset the maximum possible implementation of a report, and any subsequent changes in the government attitude are likely to be by way of diminution of the original impetus and undertakings.
> The process in this case has been the exact reverse. Although the impact of the subcommittee's report on the press and public was immediate and strong, the hardened professionals in the Canadian Penitentiary Service approached it rather gingerly, and the minister, even though from the outset filled with good will toward the report, was limited by the attitudes of his subordinates. But since the minister's initial response in August, there has been a steady groundswell of support in the CPS in favour of the recommendations. Things which seemed impossible then now seem possible. What then appeared merely possible now appears probable. The change in attitude of middle and senior management in the CPS was most strikingly evident to members of the standing committee during the in-camera hearings in December. I believe it is no exaggeration to say that it is now possible to foresee an almost total acceptance of the report by the government.

However, the major recommendations which called for taking the Canadian Penitentiaries Service out of the general rules, guidelines and legislation of most governme... departments is still under study. I urge strongly the new Solicitor General to accept these recommendations unequivocally. To do otherwise invites the continuation of the problems which resulted in the creation of our subcommittee, and the continuation of the kinds of events which occurred recently at the Dorchester penitentiary, in British Columbia, and at Archambault. Members of the committee are fully cognizant of the fact that the Solicitor General cannot guarantee the removal of all hostilities, but they should be minimized as much as possible.

Not only do these major changes have far-reaching implications in the Canadian Penitentiaries Service, but they have far-reaching implications for the government in general. We are dealing with a very unique situation in the Canadian Penitentiaries Service. It is very dangerous to decentralize just for the sake of regionalization. If the departments in Ottawa are duplicated in the various regions, then those departments are not sure if they have line or staff authority.

The committee looked at staff ratios. It was a one-for-one ratio. That indicates a lot of people are working, but are they effective and efficient? There is an extreme amount of confusion within the system. A lot of it is internal, and a lot has been overcome. Much of the confusion is caused by the fact that one must deal with government departments and the Public Service Commission.

I should like to refer to an incident which occurred at the airport here in Ottawa. Some guards were to pick up prisoners, and those guards were drunk. The RCMP officers who were escorting the prisoners rightly refused to turn them over to the guards. The guards were suspended but were not fired. They should have been fired. This is the type of problem which plagues the Canadian Penitentiaries Service. It has to be the master of its own destiny and come to grips with problems.

The crux of these recommendations is a straightening out of the organization. The previous solicitor general commenced the implementation of some of these recommendations. He appointed a new commissioner, Mr. Yeomans. I have been informed by lower and middle management within the service that Mr. Yeomans is the man for the job. He will do the job and shake things up. Some people are somewhat worried about this and phone their members of parliament because they are concerned about the fact that they are losing their jobs or being transferred. Mr. Yeomans is doing a good job, and I encourage the Solicitor General to back him up. In December Mr. Yeomans said: "The only thing I have read about the penitentiaries service was your report". Perhaps the members of the committee are not expert in everything, but we like to think that our report was a good start. If he can implement most of the recommendations, then he is well on his way to doing an excellent job.

Before closing I have a few remarks regarding the recent hostage takings and the murder at Archambault. These incidents should not prevent the government from continuing its reform. I was gratified to hear what the Solicitor General had to say in that respect. Hostage takings and murder are tragic. No one can condone those events. In due course the precipitators will be prosecuted before the courts. One must remember that hostage takings, and probably even murder, are symptoms of the problems in the penitentiaries service and society as a whole. Prisons are in existence to segregate criminals from the people in our society in order to protect the general population. Similarly, within the prison institution there are segregation units such as special maximum units to protect the general prison population from dangerous and violent persons like the infamous Andy Bruce, whom the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) referred to in his remarks earlier.

I have received some letters indicating that if we had capital punishment we would not have any of these problems. As a person who voted in favour of the retention of capital punishment, I say that such a view is very simplistic. To introduce capital punishment solely as a knee-jerk reaction would be extremely foolish. Capital punishment is just one form of punishment, and that must be remembered. During the debate on capital punishment I distinguished between premeditated and unpremeditated murder. I suppose the first degree murder referred to in Bill C-84 is premeditated murder and second degree murder is unpremeditated. People who are knowledgeable about and cognizant of what that means treat the two offences as being distinct; they do not think of capital punishment as a catch-all means of solving all our criminal justice problems.

One other thing I questioned very seriously during the capital punishment debate was the issue of long term incarceration. We must remember that people convicted of first degree murder will be incarcerated 25 years and will be eligible to apply for parole or a sentence review only after 15 years. Members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs have observed that we seem to be moving toward longer terms of incarceration. I seriously question that because long term incarceration creates time bombs. We in the subcommittee never really examined in any great depth problems created by long term incarceration, and to the best of my knowledge the Department of the Solicitor General has not completed its investigation into the ramifications of long term incarceration.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) cited the history of the infamous Andy Bruce, an individual who has been in and out of prison and who has spent most of his adult life in maximum security institutions. During his stay in the B.C. penitentiary most of his time has been spent in the "penthouse" or the super maximum unit. He says he does not condone what he has done, and I agree with him, but one must examine the consequences of keeping an individual in a four by six cell. He becomes a "time bomb".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time has expired. He may, however, continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lee: I thank my hon. colleagues for their indulgence, and I will try to make my closing remarks very brief.

I think it is urgent that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) study what should be done with people who are incarcerated for long periods of time, because we create time bombs when we send people involved in hostage-taking incidents back to the super maximum units from which they came.

I am sure the issue of capital punishment will be debated at another time. I do not think it should be confused with what we are talking about here, which is prison reform.

I think I speak on behalf of hon. members on this side of the House when I say that we shall continue the unanimity and the spirit of co-operation which developed during our investigations into the penitentiary system, during the drafting of our report and certainly in our cross-examination, if I may use that term, of the new Solicitor General with respect to his response to our report. For the reasons I have outlined I support in principle the motion in the name of the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have followed with interest the debate on this motion, which asks the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to adopt the unanimous recommendations put forward by the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada. Most of the speakers to this point were members of that subcommittee. I was not a member of it, but when it met in the Vancouver area and at the B.C. penitentiary I joined it and participated in hearings there, and the first thing which struck me was the change of mood among the personnel of the B.C. penitentiary service. I had visited the institution on previous occasions, but I had never before seen the marked enthusiasm there was among that staff while the subcommittee was there. It was enthusiasm almost to the point of euphoria, I suppose partly because they were getting some attention. They probably had a long list of what they thought were grievances which they felt had not had the attention they deserved, and now here was a parliamentary subcommittee coming to hear them. This was important to them. I think they had great hope that out of the hearings something substantive would come about to the benefit of the personnel at the B.C. penitentiary as well as the inmates there.

Another group which caught my notice was the group of reporters which followed that sub-committee. Those reporters told me that in all their experience they had never seen a group of parliamentarians working in such close co-operation as that subcommittee. The reporters were also in a state of euphoria. They had great expectations for the results which were to come out of the recommendations made by the subcommittee. They were looking forward to genuine and substantive reforms in the penitentiary service as a result of the work of the subcommittee. When a group reaches that level of hope and when its expectations are not met, a dangerous situation develops because hopes dashed are worse than no hopes at all. Accordingly, I urge the Solicitor General to implement all the recommendations of the subcommittee. If he does, he will see a marked change in the penitentiary service.

I am speaking in this debate because I believe that the events at the B.C. penitentiary in the last ten days probably resulted from the fact that not all the recommendations were followed. If the Solicitor General had taken some of the remedial measures these 65 recommendations contain, very likely he would have alleviated the pressure which has built up in the penitentiary service.

I want to focus on what I think are some of the problems at the B.C. penitentiary. The latest hostage-taking incident involved five prisoners and some visitors who probably collaborated with them.

Mr. Nielsen: Some of them.

Mr. Friesen: Some of them, not all the prisoners. The hon. member is right. This incident should never have happened. I suppose no incidents of this kind should ever happen, but particularly this one because we now have the benefit of all the information gleaned at the hearings of the subcommittee. We have had that additional education, and this latest incident should never have happened.

I think hon. members generally understand that there is a small group of activists which frequents the visiting area at the B.C. penitentiary. They are repeatedly permitted to visit some of the more dangerous prisoners there, among them Andy Bruce. Among this group of activists are people related to these dangerous prisoners. This group of activists can go to the B.C. penitentiary and visit these hard core criminals almost at will and there seems to be no way to stop it. For two years the staff has had profiles of these activists on file, but the administration seems to be afraid to deal with this thorny problem. Had the staff tried to stop them coming in they would have had to file a series of reports to the administration. At one time it was necessary for prisoners from the SMU to be handcuffed, to have leg cuffs and a double escort when they were taken down to the visitors' centre. That practice has been modified and now they are only required to be handcuffed and to have one escort. The fact that one of these prisoners had a hammer when he went into the visitors' unit shows that they are not being frisked properly. It seems to me that visitors and correspondence ought to be under the jurisdiction of security rather than under the socialization section, as is the present arrangement.

The B.C. penitentiary has a walk-through scanner that would electronically frisk visitors as they come into the unit. They have had it for two years but it is in storage. I do not understand why the scanner is not installed in the visitors' unit to check the people who come in.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred to the need for meaningful, creative work for prisoners. I agree that this is one of the substantive recommendations that the subcommittee presented that ought to be following right away. I think it is time we realized that for them work is therapy, not punishment. It is a way of working out frustrations and could be a meaningful, creative and satisfying outlet for prisoners.

For some time staff at the penitentiary, especially in the visitors' unit, have been trying to get locks changed. The administration agrees, yet nothing is done about it. When the prisoners ask for new sports equipment, however, they get it. Mr. Speaker, something is rotten in the state of Denmark.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not the prison system that is rotten.

Mr. Friesen: Of course, the hon. member is right. The Farris commission recommended that there be a daily inspection of the list of inmates going to the classification section and to the visitors' centre. It should be known in advance who is going to those areas. If that list is inspected, how did it happen that five of these people got into the visitors' centre? They knew two days in advance that Andy Bruce was going down there. It should be easy enough to match that list with those who had made appointments to come there.

To digress, Mr. Speaker, I might add that it has come to my knowledge by way of the prison grapevine that while Andy Bruce spent that week or so in the visitors' centre he destroyed all the files. Before he did that, however, he got a lot of information from them, and according to the grapevine he is willing to share that information with prisoners in the general population area. I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) should inform himself of this matter.

The simplest dictum regarding a sense of security in any administrative body, not only prisons, is that you must know without question who is in charge. I refer specifically to the comments in this regard of the hon. member for New Westminster. The warden should be in charge and everybody in the institution should know that the warden is in charge. There should be no interception of orders. He should not need to refer to the regional centre for a modification of orders or to check the orders, he is in charge and everyone should know it. The chain of command means just that.

Just recently in the question period, Mr. Speaker, I asked about hiring practices at the B.C. penitentiary. I realize that the subcommittee had a monumental task as it toured the country and could not possibly look into all matters that required examination. One reason I think the committee should be reactivated is so that it can go into places like the B.C. penitentiary and the regional centre in Vancouver to examine areas that could possibly lead to the kind of mismanagement we are facing now.

One of the important questions relates to hiring practices. The present practice is that the Public Service Commission sends someone to act as a commissioner. A board is formed, but three or four members of that board are drawn from within the system. I believe that in other services the Public Service Commission is entirely in charge of the competition, but for some reason or other in this case they send one commissioner who is assisted by three or four members of the penitentiary service. It seems to me this could lead to an obvious conflict of interest. Perhaps we need a complete audit of the staff at regional headquarters, their qualifications, their experience within the system. I do not mean shuffling papers but rather their going into the penitentiary and working there, knowing what it is like to walk on the range and work in the SMU. I think this aspect should be reviewed as well as the hiring practices.

I should like to give the Solicitor General a list of people who have been hired and promoted with indecent haste. I shall not use names as that would not be fair. I will give a copy of the list to the minister, however, if he wants it. I do not say these people are not qualified, but I do say there are people within the system who could be just as qualified and who perhaps should have had an equal opportunity of promotion, which it seems to me they may not have had because they were apparently facing undue competition from people coming into the system.

One individual was transferred from Ontario to British Columbia as a WP3 in September 1973 and by June, 1974 was promoted to WP5 and subsequently to acting WP7. Another individual was hired in 1974 at the WP3 level and subsequently promoted to WP4, a position which requires a university degree. Since this person had only a grade 11 education a grievance was filed and the promotion was withdrawn. When the regional reception centre opened this person was promoted to WP5. Again, it was grieved and the promotion was withdrawn. I understand this person has now been made acting director and at the present time is on temporary assignment with the Parole Board. People within the system with university degrees had competed for that job. A third person went to the B.C. penitentiary service in 1974 from the YMCA as a WP3 and one year later was a WP5, without any previous penitentiary experience.

Let me refer to another person I have met on several occasions and like very much and who may have all the necessary qualifications. This person, a school teacher, came to the service in 1972 as a casual employee and was promoted to associate director of occupational development at about WP5 level in 1975. As of October, 1977, the position ceased to exist. He is still there, in effect having no job officially. He is in charge of changing the B.C. penitentiary to the regional reception centre. Again I say I like this person. He is a good person. However, it seems he may have had an advantage over some others.

I mentioned another case in question period the other day. A former psychiatric nurse was hired at the WP3 level and promoted in 18 months to WP5. He is now assistant director of inmate programs. Despite short tenure, he won the competition against two others in the system who had an accumulation between the two of them of 14 years' experience as a supervisor and acting director of socialization. I mentioned the other day someone who had worked there for only a year who was promoted from WP1 to WP3 to WP4.

Finally, one man who was hired has now been promoted. One of the astounding things is that, by his own admission, he has had 35 jobs in 30 years. Now he is one of the supervisory personnel at the B.C. penitentiary. Something that bothers me is that the people who sit on these boards of examination for competitions sit for people who work for them later. I wonder whether there is some kind of conflict of interest here.

Are we developing a corps of people who are forming specialist interests in the hiring system which appears by design to exclude resident employees? That is the operative question in the whole system. It is easy to say we need new blood in the system. I agree. You cannot operate a system year after year with the same people having inbred ideas about the way the system ought to operate. We do need new blood in the system periodically. However, it seems we are developing a trend which defies everything that would be sound administrative sense in overlooking the talent that exists.

It may be true that we need sound professional training. I do not deny that. I support it all the way. However, one of the extra ingredients we need if we are going to have effective personnel in any part of the penitentiary service is an awareness such as is gained only by exposure to the atmosphere and the kind of personnel with which you are dealing in the penitentiary service. This is why I support the resolution, which reads as follows:

That this House deeply regrets the failure of the Solicitor General to adopt and implement the sixty-five unanimous recommendations of the Subcommittee on the Penitentiary System in Canada, and therefore directs the government to adopt and implement forthwith the whole of these recommendations to promote meaningful penitentiary reform and to prevent further hostage incidents.

I would like to conclude my remarks with this observation particularly to the Solicitor General. Almost every time there is a hostage taking incident in the B.C. penitentiary, some of my constituents seem to be involved. I have visited them. One is a cook who had a knife pointed at his throat for a while. Some of them were in the classification centre in 1975 when Mary Steinhauser was killed. So I personally know what is going on. However, I hasten to add, lest the Solicitor General wants to ask some discreet questions about the system, that I did not get this information from my constituents. Therefore, I hope there will be no scurrying around to try and find out where the information came from, because it did not come from my constituency.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I have seldom been so proud of being a member of this House. The tone of the debate today, its content, its seriousness, the lack of partisanship are an indication of the real concern shown by the House for the problem of the penitentiary system as well as the fact, and I think it is an essential one, that the House can on some unfortunately very few occasions give excellent performances.

Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for his motion and his introduction. It is rather noteworthy that all members who have risen to make comments up to now have basically endorsed the concerns stated in his motion. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps an indication that what should be a basic character of this House, that is an enlightened debate on our institutions with as little partisanship as possible, can only be found in such circumstances.

Several of the former speakers, Mr. Speaker, have stressed the fact that the Subcommittee on the Penitentiary System produced a unanimous report and that its deliberations were, much to its credit, devoid of political considerations. I myself, Mr. Speaker, found it a fascinating experience, as a member of Parliament, as a parliamentarian and as a man, to work with people who are normally political opponents but who managed to set aside those political differences to reach unanimous conclusions on a problem which, though not political but rather institutional, is very serious and demands a quick solution. A solution must be found quickly, Mr. Speaker, and of course, I support the recommendations of the report.

I could not but accept the subject of the motion of the hon. member for Yukon because, once again, I support recommendation I of the report which states that the penitentiary system is in a state of crisis, and the unfortunate incidents in the last few weeks prove that. Despite the efforts made until now to improve the atmosphere, despite the recommendations and changes brought to the system since we have been working at it, the situation is still very serious, and we must give it our whole attention.

Mr. Speaker, that committee worked as a team. That committee, once again, solved internal differences to achieve a unanimous report and I think it is the duty not only of the government but also of the penitentiary system itself, of the administration, to give serious consideration not only to the report itself, for I think the predecessor of the present Solicitor General took this report very seriously, but also to the prompt and extensive application of its recommendations, in order to improve the system by making a number of changes in its operation and particularly in the attitude of the people who work there.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important to change the attitude of the people because you can always change the institutions or establish new ones, but it is always the people who are part of them who see that they work or not. I also believe that the committee fully realized that the main problem with our penitentiary system was a problem of permanent misunderstanding between the various constituents: the guards, the directors and the prisoners. There was and, as far as I know, there still is a wall of mutual misunderstanding we want to break by implementing our recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important at this point to mention the major role the press has played in the work of the subcommittee. Indeed, there is no doubt in my mind that if the press had not covered the work of the subcommittee on a daily basis and if some press members had not covered the work of the committee and developed an expertise in this area, the committee, Mr. Speaker, could certainly not have achieved the credibility it has been gaining as its work kept progressing.

Indeed, when the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) tabled its report, the newspapers, the electronic media, and the editorials lavished their praise for days on the committee for its work and urged the government to implement its recommendations as soon as possible. And then the matter fizzed out and we heard no more for several months until this week, when, following a very legitimate question by a member of the opposition, the press hinted that not only had the report not been implemented but that it had been shelved and not made public.

Mr. Speaker, we know, of course, that the press has to cover many areas and sometimes fails in its responsibility to seek proper information and make a thorough examination of the problem. We are used, Mr. Speaker, to the press sometimes jumping to conclusions and sometimes making irresponsible comments. But in this case, Mr. Speaker, I was deeply shocked to read that the media were suggesting the report of the subcommittee on penal matters had been swept aside, and more could possibly have been done while hon. members know fully well that over the past six months members of the subcommittee, the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, have been working in co-operation first with the former solicitor general and hopefully with the present incumbent towards their implementation on a regular, continuing basis. To date, over 50 per cent of the recommendations have been implemented.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the credibility gained among the population was ruined by the irresponsible comments that appeared in the Canadian press in general. Having said that, I would hope that after today's debate, an enlightened debate if there ever was, the necessary corrections will be made, so that the Canadian people will know that the work of the subcommittee has not been useless and that the government must implement its recommendations and follow them up.

I do not intend to deal at length with the detailed recommendations. Several of my colleagues have touched on certain points but there is one I had more particularly at heart at the time and which still concerns me. It relates to the tendency of the penitentiary system in the past to operate in an unhealthy climate of secrecy. Some of the recommendations of the subcommittee, particularly those relating to the institutions themselves under the title "Organization and Management of the Penitentiary Service", tried to remedy the situation, to find ways, and here again the debate is open—there are perhaps other ways—to put the penitentiary system in the public eye.

Because, in my opinion, when in a system you have people who exercise control over other people, this opens the door to many abuses. We have personally witnessed what these abuses can do to some people. We hope that abuses will stop with the implementation of our recommendations. This implies that the public will know what is going on in penitentiary institutions and will understand the nature and the reason of the policies. This also implies that the hide-and-seek policy used in the past by the Penitentiary Service will stop.

I know that this is a serious charge but I have made it before. This has been said in the past, it has been said by the committee itself, and I repeat it not because there is a illwill on the part of the service, but simply because when things go wrong, there is a tendency to hide things. This is normal. This is why the subcommittee was instituted. This is why we made our recommendations. I think that all the members of the subcommittee will agree with this. We continue to believe that if we implement the main recommendations which aim at opening up the Canadian Penitentiary Service, the problem will automatically be solved.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer in particular to a recommendation which was not rejected by the previous solicitor general and which is still being considered. I hope that it will eventually be considered favourably by the authorities. I am thinking, and one of my colleagues has already talked about this, about the question of a five-member board. The committee made this recommendation deliberately. It is part of a whole series of initiatives which aim at withdrawing as much as possible the Penitentiary Service from direct and sometimes deplorably partisan political influence, as was the case in the past.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that we recommended that the employees of the Penitentiary Service no longer belong to the Public Service Alliance in the same way. We recommended, too, that a five-member board be established and be responsible for appointing the commissioner of penitentiaries. We recommended the appointment not of a general controller, but of someone like a general director who would ensure that the guidelines and general policy be followed at all levels of the administration.

Mr. Speaker, we submitted a whole series of recommendations in an effort to streamline the system and to suppress the kind of nebulous atmosphere which still surrounds the policy of the Penitentiary Service.

That commission of five men is not a sheer product of the imagination, Mr. Speaker. It exists in other jurisdictions and in other areas. I therefore urge the Solicitor General to seriously consider this recommendation, to examine its performance, and if needed to propose alternatives. The main thing is results rather than ways and means, if we are to achieve the opening to the outside world we are advocating.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, my intention is not to be too long on this subject. In my view, the report is self-explanatory. Mr. Speaker, the 65 recommendations should be considered in toto, as a whole. It is a package, and any partial implementation would only go part of the way towards meeting the objectives. Of course as my colleague indicated earlier, I realize and accept that institutions as heavy, as big as the Canadian Penitentiary Service cannot be changed overnight.

I accept that studies are needed, and implementation planning. In his remarks, the Solicitor General referred to an assistant commissioner for this implementation. I accept that this may take some time, I accept that over a few months, or even a year, deeper recommendations be gradually phased in. But I would find hard to accept that it be brushed off. I will therefore be waiting anxiously for the Solicitor General's appearance before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs with the third interim progress report. Mr. Speaker, after nine months have gone by, we will be in a position to assess the Canadian Penitentiary Service's earnestness, when they suggest they have a firm intention of doing everything in their power to ensure rapid implementation of the report's recommendations.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks I said I was feeling proud to be a member of this House. I really am, because work in committee, today's debate in this House, and especially the high level of speeches are so many proofs that our parliamentary system is working when we enjoy the confidence and are given the tools needed for its successful performance.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply conclude by quoting, as has been the habit of all speakers in this debate, from a speech made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, who chaired the Subcommittee on the Penitentiary System, before the National Association of Active and Criminal Justice, on January 27, 1978. And I regret there is no procedure for a backbencher to table as exhibit if I may so say—that speech where the chairman summarized the sub-committee's views in such a magnificent way. On page 10 he had this to say, which I fully support:

● (1632)

—the continuing pressure of the members of this committee on the Solicitor General and the Canadian Penitentiary Service that has led to a fuller acceptance of the report than was initially apparent. This pressure occurred in hearings on the supplementary estimates in November, during the private sessions of the Committee on its special reference in December, and in numerous outside contacts between committee members and those involved in implementation. The Solicitor General has publicly welcomed this process and has even looked forward to its continuance during the consideration of main estimates this spring. In this respect the substance of recommendation 65, that the standing committee should have a permanent reference to enable it to review the implementation of the report, has in fact been achieved, even though this recommendation was the one which was perhaps most strongly rejected by the Solicitor General from June 7 on. It is now clear for all to see that the minister's only objection to recommendation 65 was as to the form of review recommended, and that he welcomes continuing attention to the substance of the implementation of the report.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what we are now doing in this debate. We are putting all the pressure we can on the Solicitor General and the Canadian Penitentiary Service to implement as a package the recommendations in the report submitted by the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada. I would like to repeat that it has been a fascinating experience to work in such an environment, and I thank the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for putting forward the motion now before us.

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, since I have come to parliament this is the most constructive and interesting debate in which I have had the opportunity to participate. As many hon. members have mentioned, it shows that the committee system of the House of Commons, if utilized properly, can indeed produce an outstanding piece of work, which is precisely what these recommendations are.

I would like to pay a personal tribute to the chairman, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), not only for the work he did in pursuance of the arduous and thorough way the committee under his direction went through their appointed task, but for some of the excellent speeches he made which sought to further the committee's work.

As other members have mentioned, the chairman spoke to distinguished bodies such as the 1977 World Congress for Mental Health and the Canadian judges conference and indeed to the centre of criminology here at the University of Ottawa on November 28 last year. These are not all of the speeches he made. They were excellent speeches and provided a valuable adjunct to the work that the committee was doing and sought to achieve.

I wish to pay my personal tribute to members of all parties who worked on this committee. I did not have the opportunity to do this, but I followed their deliberations with a great deal of interest, and as has already been said, the House of Commons and the country owe these dedicated members of parliament a real debt of gratitude for what they have done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacKay: I hope the new Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) will take advantage of the high degree of unanimity that exists in the House of Commons and will bring forward some legislation in the near future, although as is often the case passing legislation is a tortuous process. It seems to me, that if legislation were brought forward—and it is essential that that legislation embody all of the recommendations set out in this report—it could be passed through this House with unprecedented speed. It would be an opportunity to demonstrate to the House and the country that, when there is a need for good, constructive legislation, this chamber can provide that kind of expedition and provide it quickly. I hope the Solicitor General will consider this very carefully. It is obvious from the support he has for the concepts effected in the speeches of many members of parliament here this afternoon that he would be able to achieve something quickly which would be long remembered and would be useful to the country.

In her well written and sensitive book, "Kind and Usual Punishment—The Prison Business", Jessica Mitford points out that:

> It is surprising to learn that prison as a place of confinement for the ordinary lawbreaker is less than 200 years old, an institution of purely American origin, conceived by its investors as a noble humanitarian reform befitting an Age of Enlightenment in the aftermath of a revolution against ancient tyrannies.

It is heartening to see that the efforts of this distinguished subcommittee were directed toward bringing some humanitarianism into what has become, a very degrading and brutal system in recent years. In order for this report to be effective I believe it ought to be accepted as a package. Accepting only certain parts of it will waste the thrust of the entire concept.

The key recommendation is the last one. It bears repeating that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs should have a permanent reference during the remainder of the thirtieth parliament, and for the thirty-first parliament, to enable it to review the implementation of this report in the context of the criminal justice system. This continuing mandate would have a constructive and stabilizing effect.

While this committee was conducting its deliberations there was a marked lessening in hostage-taking incidents and the general state of unrest in the prison systems. As a matter of fact, as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has just pointed out, there were none. Surely the government can see the wisdom of allowing this committee, which has achieved such a degree of expertise and obviously respect from those people who are part of the prison system and, indeed, victims of it, to have some continuing and direct influence in such an important area of social and government policy.

There have been in the past great abuses in prisons connected with experiments in which inmates were used to test antibiotics, how they responded to psychiatric and neurosurgical techniques, and things like this. This is something, however, that has not been prevalent to my knowledge in Canadian prisons, or at least to the degree it has been in other countries.

One might also quote Lord Byron in this respect:

This is the patent age of new inventions for killing bodies and for saving souls, all propagated with the best intentions.

One of the things that has always astounded me as a man who has sometimes visited prisons and who has practised criminal law is the degree of lawlessness that one finds within prisons. It seems that somewhere along the line our system has broken down completely when it comes to giving people who are to be confined in prison some degree of stability and discipline and a chance to improve themselves in an area where there is a degree of stability and lack of lawlessness.

As Richard Kelly, a judge of the sixth judicial circuit court of the state of Florida said in testifying before the select committee on crime of the House of Representatives in December, 1971:

I would like to say one thing this committee should consider, that one of the astounding facts about prisons is this: That they are probably the most lawless places in our society. This is a dominating factor in every place that there are laws.

Based on my observations, one of the most demoralizing aspects of prison life to an inmate is the fact that in many cases he does not know exactly how long he will be incarcerated. Another thing that demoralizes inmates is the arbitrariness with which disciplinary procedures are carried out, and the way that their privilege of parole is sometimes snatched away in a most arbitrary way for the most trivial of reasons. The committee deals with this in its report which was tabled last June, as, indeed, it deals with practically everything of value. Recommendation 34 rather sets the stage for the part I am going to quote from the committee report:

Institutional libraries must provide adequate material for legal research, especially in the field of criminal law.

I suggest it is important for people who are incarcerated to fully understand the basis of the law that put them there. Also the report goes on to state:

When an inmate enters the penitentiary system, he should not only be instructed clearly and precisely about rules of conduct and the expectations of prison authorities—which is not generally the case now—but he should also be able to know the length of time that he may expect to be in prison. His conduct in prison is significantly affected by the way he defines and understands his goals.

The report goes on to state that it is extremely important that an inmate be able to calculate his sentence, or be able to get a reliable and accurate calculation at the reception centre. If he cannot, as is sometimes the case, the demoralizing effect of this situation is reflected in his own conduct in prison as well as adding to the general level of unrest and hostility.

Let me refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) in his address of January 27 of this year, only a few days ago, to national associations active in criminal justice. He said:

The more time that passes since the report of the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada last June 7 the more completely it appears that the government will implement the 65 recommendations of the report.

I sincerely hope that is the case. Because if the government does not implement the thrust and the intent of this report, then a great opportunity will be lost. In this context I would like for a few moments to make some suggestions that fit in for the most part with what the report recommends. I must in so doing pay tribute to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who was the guiding light behind many of these recommendations which have found general favour with our caucus. Some of them, I think, are particularly appropriate in the humanitarian as well as in the administrative sense.

The CPS should establish a clear, concise inmate disciplinary code which will be available to, and understandable by, both inmates and staff. There should be no catch-all phrases, and it should spell out the kind of punitive action to be taken against each specific offence. Too often in the present system there is a great latitude that allows for individual vindictiveness on the part of staff as a result of personal animosity built up between certain staff or guard members and inmates.

Disciplinary boards are very important as well, and we feel that the hearings of these disciplinary boards should be presided over by independent chairpersons. It would be the responsibility of such an individual to determine the guilt of the inmate and the proper sanction to be used against him. Local magistrates might make suitable candidates in certain instances for such positions. No inmate should have to wait more than two days before his case is heard by a disciplinary board.

As far as punitive segregation is concerned, this is a very drastic disciplinary measure and should be used very sparingly. Inmates should not be subjected to extended periods of such isolation.

One of the objectives that I think is admirable is meaningful inmate counselling. This should be emphasized more and more. Whenever possible, I suggest that the officers who provide this kind of counselling should be selected from the older and more experienced staff.

Another thing that inmates find very demoralizing is the lack of contact visiting. It seems to me that, unless an inmate demonstrates otherwise by his anti-social behaviour or uncooperative attitude, with proper security arrangements contact visiting should be allowed at all institutions. Any inmate found abusing the privilege should be compelled to receive future visitors in a visiting booth only.

Another feature that so far has been almost, I guess, a complete "no, no," is conjugal visits. It seems to me that if you treat people like animals you will be rewarded by an attitude similar to that of an animal. I see no reason that there should not be, on an experimental basis, a greater attempt to arrange this type of program in the prisons of this country. After all, we have the dubious distinction, I believe, of having more or our people per capita in penal institutions than any other country in the world.

Mr. Nielsen: And it works in the United States.

Mr. MacKay: As the hon. member for Yukon says, the program works in the United States and in other countries.

Leaving that rather delicate topic for a moment, one of the programs I have watched with some interest is that program which has been carried out with the co-operation of the Scott Paper Company in my native province of Nova Scotia. It consists of allowing inmates to work cutting pulpwood for wages and under conditions which are comparable to those applying to ordinary contractors. In speaking to some of the officials of that company I am informed that this particular work camp, called Shulie Lake, is located about 30 miles west of Parsboro in Nova Scotia. The inmates and the guards live in the same quarters. The inmates are considered to be employees of the company during the time they work.

There are two phases: phase I involves 12 weeks of training and phase II involves a further 12 weeks during which time the inmates work cutting pulp and are trained at the same time. The inmates are paid under the regular system of the industry: they are paid per cord for the wood they cut. They have to buy their own saws and clothes. As they accumulate money, they pay for their equipment. Also they are allowed to put money in the bank. When they are allowed to go home, they are able to pay their own fares from that money. On some occasions they are allowed to send money home for the support of their families. This type of program should be expanded.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) referred to the Dorchester penitentiary in British Columbia. Based on my visits to that penitentiary, it is one of the best institutions of its kind in the country. I was interested in the references to this institution. I see the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) listening as I refer to this particular institution. Perhaps he is closer to it than I am, and has visited it on occasion as well. The committee noted the following:

> Although it is about the same age as the B.C. penitentiary, Dorchester rates as one of the better maximum security institutions in Canada. The director, Humphrey D. Sheehan, attributes this to his staff:

It is very interesting to note that. Perhaps it is one of the better institutions because of the relationship which exists between the director, the warden and the staff.

Mr. Nielsen: And the inmates.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, the inmates as well. I should like to quote what Mr. Sheehan said:

> They are pretty basic down-to-earth people who can get along with others. They recognize that there is a job to be done and that you can do it both ways: you make it tough or you make it easy. I think the stability of the staff, the fact that we do not have a large staff turnover, contributes to this. There is considerable staff experience here and they are familiar with dealing with inmates.

Also I should like to return to what the committee noted, which reads as follows:

> The PSAC representatives similarly praised Mr. Sheehan whom they considered to be the "best director in the penitentiary service."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: That type of tribute is very heartening to people who are interested in the prison system. My impression of Millhaven is based on far briefer visits and less observation than Dorchester. When I visited that institution, I found it was much more modernistic in many ways. It was a more attractive prison to look at superficially, but there was an air of tension and unrest which seemed to be almost tangible when walking through the halls of that institution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in today's Globe and Mail. It indicates that this is a very current matter which occupies the continuing attention of leading newspapers all over Canada. The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) quoted the excerpt which first caught my eye. There is another section of the article which is almost as important. It is based on observations made by the ombudsman for Ontario, Arthur Maloney. In his day he was one of Canada's best criminal counsel.

Mr. Cullen: And a member of parliament.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, he was a member of parliament, as I have been reminded.

Mr. Paproski: He was on our side.

Mr. MacKay: I did not know that.

Mr. Cullen: He must have made quite an impression.

Mr. MacKay: I point out to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that I am not as old as he is and I do not have the recall of parliamentary jurisprudence. According to the editorial, Mr. Maloney makes it obvious that we are sending far too many people to jail. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> He points out that during the fiscal year 1976-1977, "the ministry housed 59,362 prisoners in its jails and detention centres prior to trial." (So much for our so-called soft bail laws.) He quotes the Law Reform Commission of Canada to the effect that this country "is one of the harshest western countries when it comes to prison sentences."—

We must protect our citizens but, as the subcommittee has pointed out, there is a better way to do this. There is a way to treat more humanely people who have run afoul of laws and regulations. This will not only benefit them but society as well.

Since it is nearing five o'clock and the end of this debate, I close by saying that I trust the new Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and all hon. members in the House of Commons will do their utmost to bring forward legislation which will embody these excellent recommendations as a package. I hope the government brings them forward in a well-drafted bill, and gives the highest court in the land an opportunity to deal with them swiftly and in the same spirit which has characterized the committee deliberations and this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are not many hon. members left in the chamber who have not taken part in today's debate. Speaking for the listeners and the observers, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) and I would like to echo what has been said several times today, that this has been an excellent debate. We congratulate the hon. member who proposed the motion. We congratulate those who took part in the debate. We recognize that behind the excellence of this day's debate was the work and the report of the subcommittee. We extend to that subcommittee our congratulations.

Finally, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre and I say that we hope the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) will pay attention to the motion and to what has been said today on both sides of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of sad but pressing necessity. In light of the terrible tragedy of the crash of a PWA 737 at Cranbrook, British Columbia, on Saturday, February 11, resulting in the death of 41 passengers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That this House expresses its deepest sympathy to the families and friends of the victims and its encouragement to the survivors.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be presented to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

PROTEST AGAINST APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the discrimination being practised by the federal government in appointing a male chairman of the federal government's Anti-Dumping Tribunal, a decision just learned about on the weekend, passing over Margaret Ritchie, a highly qualified person who has been the tribunal's vice chairman for five years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to rescind its recent decision in this matter, reverse its discriminatory practices and appoint Margaret Ritchie as chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRASH OF AIRCRAFT AT CRANBROOK, B.C.—REQUEST INDEPENDENT COMMISSIONER INQUIRE INTO CAUSE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, arising out of the tragic air disaster which occurred at Cranbrook, B.C., last Saturday. Inasmuch as the Ministry of Transport will once again be investigating an incident involving loss of life which occurred within the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Transport itself, in order to remove or preclude any possible perception of conflict of interest in the investigation of this tragedy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Minister of Transport forthwith name an independent commissioner of inquiry from a senior court with competent jurisdiction, together with the necessary support staff, for the purpose of conducting an impartial examination of all the facts related to this disaster.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

GOVERNMENT INFORMATION ON TERRORISTS TRAINED ABROAD—FUNDING THEREOF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, with regard to confirmation made on a national television network last night on facts I raised in this House in June, 1977, concerning the training of terrorists at Finsterwalde, East Germany, and questions asked in 1974-75 concerning a double-agent at one time operating in the Prime Minister's office, and whether Pierre Levasseur was the individual involved, all of which was denied at the time by the government. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk):

That the Prime Minister make an immediate statement giving all information possessed by the government of terrorists trained abroad, of the attempt by the Soviets to infiltrate his office a few years ago, of funds being transferred from France since 1958 through certain Canadian companies acting as agents in Canada, with the amounts involved, whether the funds originated from the KGB and were subsequently funnelled through Jacques Foccart of the French intelligence service; and, finally, that he explain the statement on television last night by Robin Bourne, head of the police security planning analysis group, to the effect that a terrorist act will eventually occur in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous agreement of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALL FOR PRORATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS WHERE VETERAN'S DISABILITY PENSION LESS THAN 48 PER CENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last this House gave unanimous consent to a motion having to do with legislation respecting veterans. I hope the House will be in the same mood today. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House takes note of the deep concern of all veterans' organizations with respect to the rule under which a veteran's widow receives no widow's pension unless the veteran was in receipt of a disability pension of 48 per cent or more, and this House calls on the government to correct this situation, without further delay, by providing prorata pensions for widows of veterans in cases where the veteran's disability pension was less than 48 per cent, as recommended by the Woods commission, the Hermann commission and the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT NOT GRANT FUNDS FOR QUEBEC REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to present a motion on a question of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the importance and the seriousness of the referendum on the constitutional future of Quebec;

Considering the need to let Quebeckers entirely free to chose objectively the appropriate structure for their emancipation and their evolution;

Considering that the most elementary justice and simple logic should lead us to put this debate well above the chauvinism and partisanship inherent in electoralism;

Considering that it would be inadmissible for the federal government spokesmen who do not reside in Quebec to campaign directly or indirectly within the province;

Considering finally that it would also be absurd and unfair to have the taxes which are levied among Quebeckers by the federal government used against their very interests;

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That the House order the government to stop fighting against the growing awareness of Quebeckers concerning their future and consequently to abolish immediately the Tellier committee which has been created to this end.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION INTO SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity relating to last week's revelation of Soviet espionage activities in Canada in which the Soviets clearly demonstrated their continued disrespect for Canadian relations with their country. Because of allegations by a number of sources that terrorist and subversive espionage activities by foreign interests in Canada are far more widespread and far-reaching than has been generally known—as witnessed, for example, on CTV's "Prime Time" program aired last night—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the government initiate forthwith a comprehensive, over-all investigation into terrorist and subversive activities in Canada as a whole, during which time all travel or movement of so-called Soviet diplomats operating in Ottawa be restricted to the national capital region, as well as those diplomats from any other nation that may be implicated during the investigation; and, further, that the screening process of incoming personnel from such nations be improved in such a way that no individuals who have previously, in any way shape or form, experienced guerilla or espionage training with the KGB or any related agency or organization, be allowed entry into Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Whereas by a resolution of this House the Canadian flag stands unfurled beside Mr. Speaker's chair; and

Whereas the federal presence is now more than ever required to be seen, in particular the principal symbol of nationhood and unity;

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT SURVEILLANCE OF RUSSIAN AND CUBAN-TRAINED TERRORISTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, may I direct my question to the Minister of Justice, whom I presume is the Acting Solicitor General? Will he advise the House whether, as has been reported, there are more than 300 Russian and Cuban-trained terrorists active in the Montreal area, and does the government intend to wait until acts of terrorism break out, or is it its policy to keep these people under surveillance so immediate arrests can be made at the first sign of any terrorism?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not see the program to which the hon. member refers, but I should like to say that the RCMP is reviewing the allegations made. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the House that in my view the RCMP are fully familiar with what is going on and are able to take action against it.

● (1417)

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Solicitor General. What action is being taken to identify former strong-arm members of the infamous Deuxième Bureau, in Algeria, who according to reports are now relocated, or were relocated, in Montreal? Will these people lose their citizenship if untruthful statements are found in the applications for citizenship?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be unwise to answer the first question, and the second question is hypothetical.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, what action is the government taking in order to ensure that Canadian security services have adequate personnel and resources in order to cope with and contain what appears to be a most serious threat to the national security of Canada?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, by supporting the security service, as we have throughout the history of this government.

GOVERNMENT POLICY TOWARD TERRORISTS AND ESPIONAGE AGENTS OPERATING IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Since it is apparent that it is the government's policy to continue to allow terrorists and KGB espionage agents to operate in Canada, despite last year's government policy as stated to the House by the former solicitor general, can we now receive assurances from the government, through the Minister of Justice, that this irresponsible policy will be changed forthwith and appropriate action will be taken to reverse these permissive trends?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think appropriate action is taken when that action is appropriate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: One more time.

Mr. Basford: As the action taken last week indicates, when these matters are documented by the security service, action is taken.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, on March 24, 1976, the then solicitor general of Canada very clearly stated in the House of Commons that the government, as well as the RCMP, were well aware of KGB activities taking place right under our noses and that it was the policy of the government to allow these people to continue to operate in such an event. In view of the minister's answer now, can we take it that the new policy of the government is not to allow into Canada any individuals known to have espionage training with the KGB, and to get rid of any agents who are currently operating in Canada, whether it be in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto or elsewhere? Is this the new policy of the government?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the policy was clearly stated last week by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

SEVERING OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES GUILTY OF SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we can receive assurances from the Acting Prime Minister, rather than the Minister of Justice. He may be a bit more realistic. Can we have assurances from the government that should foreign countries continue to practice terrorist or subversive activities in Canada or, for that matter, any illegal actions such as the importation of arms from Cuba, diplomatic relations will be terminated on a temporary basis with countries which do not respect the laws of our land?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I realize the seriousness of the points made in the hon. member's question, but certainly I cannot give an undertaking that in every case we would terminate diplomatic relations with the country involved. An incident occurred not too long ago which was brought to the attention of the House by the minister. It is not our intention to terminate relations with that country but to attempt to build for the future and maintain relations with the country concerned.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST SECOND READING OF BILL DELAYED UNTIL PIPE SIZE KNOWN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister's sombre exercise in deception last night on television reiterated the truth that the Alcan pipeline proposal will be the largest construction project of its kind in Canadian history. Considering that the National Energy Board has not yet made the crucial decision on what kind of pipe is to be used, and since that is central to the question of Canadian jobs, would the Deputy Prime Minister reconsider the government's position and not proceed with second reading of the pipeline bill today? It would be an affront to parliament to ask us to make a decision on the pipeline well in advance of knowing what kind of pipe will be used.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is under a misapprehension, because the House will not be asked to make a decision on the pipeline prior to receiving this information. The House will be asked to debate at second reading the many other issues involved in the pipeline. As I indicated last week, in order to meet the general concern expressed by the hon. member, I will ensure that the bill does not come to a decision at second reading until this information becomes available to hon. members. No decision is being called for before hon. members have that information.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has gone beyond the usual bounds of Liberal sophistry: he says we will not have to make a decision on the kind of pipe that is going to be used, in reaching a decision on this bill. Does the Deputy Prime Minister really believe that we can have a serious debate at second reading, in which principal spokesmen for all political parties, presumably, will commit themselves one way or another, before we know what kind of pipe will go into the pipeline and, therefore, before we know whether Canadians are going to get the jobs to which they are entitled from this project?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is possible for hon. members on both sides of the House to debate many principles of the bill.

Mr. Broadbent: But not the essence of it.

Mr. MacEachen: In fact, if one where to take a procedural point of view, the point to which the hon. member is referring would generally be dealt with at the committee stage. However, I am not making very much of a point of that because I believe it will be very possible to deal with the principles of this bill at second reading without this information. I have assured the hon. member, because that was the concern expressed in his first question, that he will not be asked to make a decision at second reading until he has this information. I undertake that the bill will not come forward for a decision at second reading until the hon. member has that information. I believe that is an accommodation which ought to be satisfactory, in the circumstances.

Mr. Broadbent: Surely the Deputy Prime Minister knows that we cannot proceed with a number of days' debate on the bill without knowing whether we are going to have the kind of pipe which is absolutely essential from the point of view of Canadian interests. However, it is clear that the Deputy Prime Minister has no intention of changing the government's position on that matter.

Is the real reason we are proceeding with the bill today, instead of a week from today when we will have the requisite information, due to the fact that just down the street the Prime Minister is having a conference with all the provincial premiers; and is it not the government's real view that the news media of Canada should be concentrating on that conference instead of on the sell-out involved in this piece of legislation?

Mr. Speaker: The President of Privy Council is perfectly able to answer that question if he wishes. However, I must recognize that the question does contain some argumentative elements.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, while I was reconsidering the view of the New Democratic Party as to whether I ought to proceed with this bill today, I happened to be watching the televised proceedings of the federal-provincial conference and I became persuaded by Mr. Blakeney that it would be a great mistake not to proceed today.

SPORTS

REQUEST DOCUMENTS EXCHANGED BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND QUEBEC REFEREES' ASSOCIATION BE BILINGUAL

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport).

As a result of pressures which are now exerted by the Quebec Referees' Association, could the minister tell the House if she has asked that the unilingual documents and especially the rules used to teach youngsters of 13, 14 and 15 years of age to become referees be bilingual, in our country which is now experiencing problems about the spoken language?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the National Sport and Recreation Administration Centre is striving to create a situation where all the documents issued by it are printed in both official languages. That has not been fully possible as yet, due to the fact that certain of the sports are not yet in Quebec. But we will be working on improving the number of sports. I believe the hon. member said "arbitrators", but I think he meant coaches, in asking that all coaches be supplied with bilingual material. We are working toward providing more bilingual material in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

The minister mentioned certain sports in the House. While hockey is surely the national sport of Canada, I do not understand why the National Amateur Hockey Association sends only English questionnaires in Quebec. I therefore ask the minister whether it would now be possible to correct that situation and send a French copy of the rules to the Val-d'Or Minor Hockey Referees' Association.

[English]

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I beg the hon. member's pardon: I thought he was talking about coaches, but he was talking about referees and officials. The governing body for amateur hockey in this country is the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association. If there is any concern on the part of the hon. member about the functioning of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, I would be pleased to bring it to their attention. Certainly, bilingual clinics for referees and officials were conducted in connection with the recent junior hockey tournament. A considerable amount of money has been spent on upgrading referees and officials in the French and English languages.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that put by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley and is addressed to the Acting Solicitor General. Would the minister tell the House how the government intends to prevent foreign nations from carrying out subversive activities in Canada in future, in view of the real possibility of subversion by the Soviet KGB of individuals in high places in the government?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we intend to do this by the support of the security service and by their constant surveillance of activities.

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's inability to give me any real assurance, and since such surveillance has not in the past prevented these activities, can he tell the House how we can have confidence that the drive for separation in one of our provinces is headed by provincial nationalists rather than by agents of foreign governments?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on that sort of question. I think those running in the movement are quite entitled to speak and answer for themselves.

INQUIRY WHETHER FILES REQUESTED BY KEABLE INQUIRY CONTAIN INFORMATION ON SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Deputy Prime Minister, or to the Minister of Justice, in view of the fact that there are very serious concerns about the security of the nation, particularly following the statement last week by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

First, do the security service files now being requested by the Keable commission contain information about illegal activities of foreign governments in this country? Second, do these files contain information about Russian, Cuban and French recruiting or subversive activities? Third, can we be assured that information of this type will not, under the circumstances, be given to a commission or public body if the security service has reason to suspect that these groups may be unreliable? I would further ask that this not be done until each person who could possibly obtain access to sensitive material has undergone a complete security check and has been unconditionally cleared for access to top secret information.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have not signed any of the affidavits given to the Keable commission as to the material that went to them, or the material that is being withheld under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. Therefore, I would ask the hon. member to allow me to take notice of his question so that the present Solicitor General or the previous solicitors general who signed those affidavits can answer.

I am delighted, if I may say so, Mr. Speaker, with the tone of the question. It indicates quite clearly the hon. member's view that certain material of a national security nature should be withheld from the Keable commission. That has been the position of the government for many months.

POLICY OF DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION ON ENTRY INTO CANADA OF KNOWN SUBVERSIVE AGENTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am always happy that the minister thinks my questions are responsible. We have never suggested for one moment that this type of information should go to the commission. We have suggested that the information sent should demonstrate ministerial responsibility, which has been irresponsible.

I would ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to answer this question which is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley. Is it now definitely the policy of the Department of Employment and Immigration that from now on any known KGB agents will, either directly or indirectly, be refused admittance to this country? I refer to agents such as those in the recent spy ring, which one could almost classify as creating a complex in this country.

An hon. Member: The CIA.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't worry about that. We know where you stand.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the accreditation of those who work at particular embassies is, of course, within the purview of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In so far as others who hope to emigrate to this country are concerned, they are given very careful scrutiny before being granted admission, particularly on the grounds of security. This was true under the former act, as it is under the new act.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to understand why the minister cannot say "yes" or "no", instead of the verbiage which he uses. Is the answer "yes", or is it "no"—that his department is taking the position from now on—

An hon. Member: Verbiage.

Mr. Woolliams: I see that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is here. I thought he would be advising the Prime Minister, at the conference, as he has become so important to western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I will allow the minister from Crowfoot to keep on crowing, because he will crow himself out of his constituency.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Now may I put this question to the minister, Mr. Speaker? Is it now the policy, after there have been security checks, to say "no" to any KGB agents trying to enter this country? Is the answer "yes", or "no"?

An hon. Member: Both.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we will add up the verbiage of the question and the verbiage of the answer, and see who comes out ahead on that particular issue. I tried to indicate to the hon. member that if an individual seeks accreditation to a particular embassy, that is within the purview or jurisdiction of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If someone makes application for landed immigrant status, and we determine he is an agent, obviously he will not be allowed to enter Canada. He will, also, not be allowed to be accredited to an embassy, if we have that information in advance.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT ARMS BEING SMUGGLED INTO CANADA—SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister, since it concerns government policy. In view of the statement made on national television last night by Robert Bourne, head of the security planning and analysis branch of the Department of the Solicitor General, to the effect that a terrorist act will inevitably occur in Quebec, I ask the minister: Does this represent the conclusion of the government based on information which it possesses? Specifically, what steps is the government taking to meet this situation and to deal with arms smuggled into Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity of listening to or reading what Mr. Bourne stated. But I can tell the hon. member it is not the policy of the Government of Canada; we have not concluded that there will be a terrorist act in the province of Quebec. That suggestion is quite new to me.

Mr. Cossitt: Having had very little luck with an answer in that regard, Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary to the Minister of Justice, who I hope can be a little more direct. Is the government prepared to name the companies, along with their locations, which have been receiving large sums of money from abroad for the promotion of terrorist and guerrilla warfare activities in Canada, and will he tell the House what part the French, Cuban and Russian intelligence services have played in this situation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, we would not reveal names unless and until charges were laid or people were expelled from the country.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF AIRCRAFT AT CRANBROOK, B.C.—REQUEST INDEPENDENT COMMISSIONER INQUIRE INTO CAUSE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is in a very serious vein and arises out of the Standing Order 43 motion which was put to the House by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville. I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared, now, to indicate if he will appoint a member of a senior court of competent jurisdiction to inquire into the relevant facts surrounding the tragic air accident which occurred in Cranbrook, B.C., over the weekend.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the ordinary procedure is to have a preliminary investigation first. This is now taking place. Of course, we do have an independent accident review committee which also could play a role. At the conclusion of the preliminary examination, I would ordinarily be in a position to decide whether a further investigation of the type to which the hon. member refers is necessary.

Mr. Forrestall: In light of the fact there has been a clear indication from the government of Canada, referring back to the throne speech of 1974, that sometimes members of the opposition do have constructive ideas to put forth, I ask whether the minister could be spurred on by these events to bring in legislation—which we understand is pretty well drafted—to establish an independent commission of inquiry into all modes of transportation accidents, so as to ensure removal of any potential conflict of interest.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, yes. As the hon. member implied, there may not be grounds for concern in this particular case. But wherever that might occur, because of the relationship between Transport as an operating department and as the investigating body, we have put forward a proposal for an independent review board. That proposal is at the discussion stage and was put before involved members of the public and industry. Their comments are coming back now and the drafting is going forward at the same time. I hope at a very early date to bring forth legislation.

LABOUR RELATIONS

B.C. TELEPHONE DISPUTE—PRESENT SITUATION

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister advise us what the situation is regarding the B.C. Telephone labour dispute that has been going on for a number of months between workers and management?

An hon. Member: It was settled last week.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I am very happy to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. Maybe the hon. member for Nickel Belt will be interested to know, in view of his partisan remarks last week, that the strike is settled. Some workers turned up for work today, and all employees will be back on the job within three days.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO EXTEND PROVISIONS OF PENSION ACT RESPECTING PRISONERS OF WAR—WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs? In view of the fact that when the House, on Friday, gave unanimous consent to a motion calling for an extension of the prisoner of war compensation to include veterans of World War I and some others, the minister himself joined in that consent, can he now confirm to the House that there will be legislation at this session to amend the Pension Act to extend the prisoner of war coverage? While he is answering that question, can he also say whether any such legislation to amend the Pension Act will also restore the basic rate of the war disability pension to the average take-home pay level of the five categories in the public service agreed to in 1973?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the hon. member's question is presently before the government and I expect to have some information before too long. As to the second part of the question, no, we are not considering that legislation at this time but it will be looked at at a later date.

● (1442)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the department is studying amendments to the Pension Act, will it consider including in any such amendments at this session a provision for prorata pensions for the widows of veterans, where the veteran's pension at the time of death was less than 48 per cent, as recommended so often by various commissions and by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): This question, also, is under consideration by the department. I should inform the House that widows of veterans who are entitled to pensions and who are in receipt of a 48 per cent pension, or a lesser amount, are entitled to pension should death occur from the effect of service. Furthermore, widows of veterans whose husbands were not in receipt of disability pension can also receive assistance.

ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT—MEMBERS' STUDY OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): In view of the fact that two motions under Standing Order 43 on the subject have received unanimous consent, and since the estimates are due to be considered soon, would the minister discuss with the House leader the possibility of bringing forward the annual report as soon as possible, so we could discuss the many inequities which exist in the Pension Act and in the veterans' charter?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I do not see any difficulty at all about that. The reason it has not been brought to the attention of the House leader so far is that some of the high executives in the veterans' organizations are out of the country. They have requested—and I have so informed members of the other parties who are especially interested—that consideration of this matter be delayed until such time as they are available to appear before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

RELOCATION OF VETERANS' HOSPITALS—JOB SECURITY OF STAFFS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary arises from the transfer of two veterans' hospitals—Westminster, in London, and Camp Hill, in Halifax—which underlines the concern which has been expressed about job security for hospital staffs. Since announcements are being made by regional officials involving staff amalgamation and reduction, which is of concern to veterans employed on the staff of Veterans Affairs, would the minister clarify, for the benefit of the staff across the country, previous assurances that job security would be maintained in accordance with the commitment made in 1973 when agreement was reached to hand over these hospitals?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this has not presented any problem for us in the past and we do not expect it will in the future. There is provision in our agreement with the provinces that job security will be maintained. As far as the Westminster hospital is concerned, every employee of the federal department had an option to transfer to the provincial administration. Hon. members will recognize that there are positions under the provincial government which do not have their counterparts under the federal administration. The total number involved there is 45, 19 of whom are unemployed. The situation of several others will not be known until the end of 1978, but we have every reason to believe they will be employed at a later date in some other capacity under the federal government.

APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHAIRMAN

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It has been widely reported in the press that the outgoing chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, Mr. Guy D'Avignon, recommended that the vice-chairman, Dr. Marguerite Ritchie, succeed him as chairman of the tribunal. Can the hon. gentleman confirm that Mr. D'Avignon did make such a recommendation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not have any information bearing on that point, so I am not able to comment.

Mrs. Pigott: Since the government has shown its confidence in Mr. D'Avignon by appointing him to chair the newly created Special Committee on Merit in the Public Service, would the Acting Prime Minister explain why the government failed to follow his recommendation of the appointment of a woman with such an outstanding record as Dr. Ritchie? Does the government have any intention of accepting any further recommendations by Mr. D'Avignon with regard to ending discrimination against women in the public service?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, without commenting on whether or not Mr. D'Avignon made any such recommendation, may I say, first of all, that I agree with the hon. member that Miss Ritchie has had a distinguished career in the public service and has a well established reputation as a lawyer. In this particular case, because of the tribunal's requirements in relation to international trading concerns it was felt that the present appointee would be best qualified. There is no tradition in the public service, to my knowledge, that the vice-chairman automatically proceeds to the post of chairman.

An hon. Member: That goes for deputy prime ministers, too.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that recently we appointed Miss MacDougall chairman of the Tariff Board when the vice chairman, in the context of this discussion, might have expected to be promoted. I want to assure the hon. lady that there was no element of discrimination whatsoever. The appointment was based on what the government felt was the job required at the time. We shall continue our efforts to increase the number of appointments made from among the competent women who serve in the public service.

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT'S PRIOR KNOWLEDGE OF KGB AGENTS OPERATING IN CANADA—RESTRICTIONS ON TRAVEL PERMITS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Solicitor General. It relates to the KGB and to the staff of the Soviet embassy in Ottawa and to the implication contained in a statement made on March 24, 1976, by the then solicitor general, now Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, the RCMP are aware that certain members of the Soviet Union Embassy staff in Ottawa are with the KGB.

In other words, the government was aware, possibly at the time they came into Canada, that they were with the KGB. Can the minister confirm whether this was the case? Were they under surveillance at that time? Further, can the Acting Solicitor General inform the House whether or not restrictions are being placed upon the right of people so identified to travel within Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I am not familiar with the statement to which the hon. member refers, so I think I will allow the Solicitor General to answer the question, if he wishes, when he is next in the House. As to whether there are restrictions on travel, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made it clear the other day that there are some restrictions.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DEPARTMENT'S ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN TO REDUCE DEFRAUDING OF FUND

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I should like to thank him for naming the firm of Vickers and Benson as the faithful firm which will be the recipient of the contract to place the advertisements relating to unemployment. May I ask the minister what professional advice was obtained which resulted in the department being persuaded that this kind of campaign was desirable?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): In addition to the information already sent to the hon. member, outlining the many and varied reasons for conducting this campaign at the present time, it seemed appropriate, given the fact that a lot of people were suffering under the misapprehension that people are cheating on unemployment insurance and getting away with it, while nobody was taking any action against them, to point out that we collected some $60 million out of a total of $65 million in overpayments. There were more than 7,000 instances in which we were able to enforce repayment; but in my opinion it would be better to work on preventive measures rather than the enforcement aspect.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Employment and Immigration found such success with this kind of advertising campaign, can we expect other ministries of the government to come forward with other advertising campaigns to persuade Canadians to stop committing other types of crime?

TRANSPORT

FERRY SERVICE IN MARITIMES—SUGGESTION CN MARINE REDUCING STAFF

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As the minister knows, on January 1 CN Marine, a new organization, took over the assets of the government in connection with the ferry service and coastal service in Newfoundland and the maritimes. Is it correct that CN Marine are about to transfer out of Newfoundland the staff, or make redundant the jobs of the staff in the office and accounting department? If that is the case, how many, why, and what is afoot with CN Marine? The minister knows the very high unemployment situation there.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any such transfer in the works. The proposal by CN Marine has included the desirability of looking at a number of centres within the Atlantic area where their operation might be located. I would like to identify further the suggestion the hon. member has made and come back with a definite answer on it.

Mr. Crosbie: Will the minister agree to recommend to CN Marine that in addition to being cost-effective it should be human-effective and, since most of their work is involved in the Newfoundland coastal service, Labrador service and ferry operations in Newfoundland, that their head office should be in St. John's, Newfoundland or somewhere in Newfoundland, and not Moncton, New Brunswick?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree that the prime objective of CN Marine is to provide good service to the public. That always is true. I believe one can produce efficient operations, try to minimize waste and lower costs at the same time. Certainly, if one has to choose between the two, my direction to CN Marine would be to give good service to the public.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

INQUIRY WHETHER ONTARIO RECEIVED FAIR SHARE OF FEDERAL FUNDS FOR LANGUAGE PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

The Ontario premier reasserted last week his refusal to recognize officially or even symbolically both official languages of Canada. Since Mr. Davis has also scorned the efforts of the federal government to achieve linguistic equality, can the Secretary of State tell the House whether Ontario has received its fair share of federal funds allocated to support official language training and utilization programs or whether the substantial efforts and contributions of the federal government to promote the official languages were supposed to be purely symbolic?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, to this date, the Ontario government has received nearly $150 million to support minority education programs in Ontario as well as second language education. This is why I greatly deplore the fact that the Ontario premier has said that we have not supported the development of the education system in the province of Ontario. This is completely inaccurate.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CANADIAN RAILROAD WORKERS EMPLOYED BY UNITED STATES RAILROADS—ENTITLEMENT TO BENEFITS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A number of Canadian railroad workers are employed in Canada by United States railroads and do not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits; rather, they must accept the benefits accorded by the United States unemployment insurance system. Will the minister undertake to examine the possibility of being included in the scheme to receive Canadian benefits, which are superior to those of the United States?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the hon. member's representation and I will look at it.

RIGHT OF FISHERMEN TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING PROCESS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Was the minister speaking on his own, or after consultation with his colleagues—in particular, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment—when he told the United Fishermen in Vancouver recently that he would do everything in his power to obtain for that union the right to represent all fishermen on the west coast for collective bargaining purposes? Further, does he consider that it is within his ministerial responsibility to give such an undertaking?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. What I did say was correctly reported in any press reports I have seen. I have no idea what the hon. member is reading from. There have been submissions from the fishermen that the Canada Labour Code be amended in such a way as to give them the right to certification, which they do not now have as a result of various interpretations of sections in the Canada Labour Code as it is now worded. I told them that I was taking to my colleagues in government proposals to amend the Canada Labour Code so that they, like other unions, if they had all the other qualifications in terms of support, and so on, could apply for certification to obtain bargaining rights.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): When considering this question, will the minister also take into account the representations made to him by the Pacific Trollers' Association and by the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of the province of British Columbia. They are small businessmen and not necessarily capable of or desirous of entering into a union arrangement?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): As I say, this would give them the right, if the code is amended, to obtain certification if they have the qualified support in terms of necessary percentages, and so on. They are all elaborated in the act. I do not think any group of workers should be denied that right, nor do I think they should in this particular instance. May I also say, yes, to the hon. member; I have taken into account the concerns of the people the hon. member mentioned.

TRANSPORT

RETURN OF CANADIAN RAILWAY CARS NOW IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Transport. Some Nova Scotia pulp operations, and perhaps operations in other provinces, are being affected by a shortage of suitable railway rolling stock. Is the minister aware of this situation? Are plans being implemented to secure a more efficient and businesslike way of returning railway cars to this country that are now in the United States?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the railways have been aware for some time of a problem developing in the return of railway cars from the United States for servicing that market from Canadian plants and sources. This led the other day to CNR placing an embargo on further cars going to the United States. The problem may have been building up. It was certainly greatly aggravated by severe storms in the United States which prevented the normal movement of cars on to sidings for unloading purposes. A very high percentage of CN lumber or pulp cars is now in the United States. An effort has to be made to bring them back. The railways are very much aware of this, and will do everything they can to try to shorten the period during which there is a shortage of cars.

NATURAL RESOURCES

LOCATION OF URANIUM REFINERY IN SUDBURY BASIN TO ALLEVIATE LAY-OFFS IN NICKEL INDUSTRY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—the do-nothing minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: This past weekend, 3,000 jobs went down the drain and this minister refused to do anything about it. These lay-offs will have a very serious effect on the Sudbury basin, which is a one-industry economy. The regional council of Sudbury, with Your Honour's support and instruction, petitioned the cabinet to ask Eldorado Nuclear to locate a uranium refinery in the Sudbury basin. Will the minister advise whether he and his cabinet colleagues have reached a decision with regard to this request from Your Honour and the people of the Sudbury basin? If not, when can we expect such a decision?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a number of areas around the province of Ontario have expressed an interest in the second Eldorado uranium refinery. While the government has considered a number of these, it is not yet in a position to make any announcement. Departmental work is going on at the present time. There have been discussions with regard to the Sudbury area. That is about as far as I can go at the moment.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT'S DISCUSSIONS WITH AUTOMOTIVE MANUFACTURERS RESPECTING LOCATION OF PLANTS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the points I raised earlier with regard to the effect of the lay-offs in the Sudbury basin, and the fact that in this House, on February 2, the minister announced he was having discussions with the three major automotive producers with regard to the location of auto parts plants in Canada, and the fact that one was slated for Windsor, can the minister advise whether in those discussions they specifically discussed other locations in Canada, and in particular in the Sudbury basin?

● (1502)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, other locations have been discussed. I think that in conjunction with the province of Ontario, a number of spots, including Sudbury, were discussed with the automotive companies.

Privilege—Mr. Broadbent

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PRESENCE OF MINISTER IN HOUSE RATHER THAN AT FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. In view of the fact that there is a conference being held down the road a little way, at the Convention Centre, involving federal-provincial relations with the various provincial premiers, is the presence in the House today of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations a conscious act in the hope that this will help resolve some federal-provincial problems, or has he been told to stay away?

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—REPLY OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to an answer in the House today by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) indicating a continuation of the government's decision to proceed with Bill C-25.

I should like to say at the outset, because the premier is not here to defend himself, that the Deputy Prime Minister misinformed the House completely when he cited Premier Allan Blakeney of the province of Saskatchewan as supporting the government's position. Today at the first ministers' conference the premier of the province of Saskatchewan reiterated the common concern of the New Democratic Party that the pipeline be proceeded with on the basis that jobs for Canadians are guaranteed. This is just the opposite to what we find in this bill.

The point of privilege I have is that by proceeding with this bill this afternoon the government is insulting the intelligence of every member of parliament and making a sham of debating procedures in this chamber. If debate means anything in the House of Commons in relation to a piece of legislation, we are supposed to have before us the essence or substance of the material we are debating. The answer given in the House this afternoon by the Deputy Prime Minister was in fact extraordinary.

The logic of the Deputy Prime Minister's argument is that we can debate this measure today, tomorrow, the next day and presumably ad nauseam, but we have his assurance that we do not have to reach a decision on the debate until the National Energy Board makes its final recommendation. How absurd can we get? If we follow the Deputy Prime Minister's reasoning this means that potentially we are going to duplicate the whole process of debate after we hear the decision of the NEB.

A number of members of the House could take a certain position on this legislation which affects the future of Canada in a profound way if we consider the amount of capital resources proposed to be allocated to the project. For example, members from the province of Saskatchewan, or from western Canada as regional spokesmen, and those of us who have a national perspective anyway—

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): What about Hamilton?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, and what about Hamilton as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) says. If we go ahead on the assumption that this bill is to be proceeded with if, and only if, low pressure pipe is to be used on the pipeline, that kind of pipe can be produced at the Ipsco plant in Regina, then a number of members in the House of Commons may well be disposed to support the bill on the ground that that assumption would prevail.

What happens if the National Energy Board in its wisdom, and God forbid, a week from today makes the decision that the kind of pipe to be used is high pressure pipe, pipe that cannot be produced at the Ipsco plant in Saskatchewan, but pipe that can be produced only in limited quantities in the province of Ontario? I suggest then, Mr. Speaker, that these members will have to reverse themselves in the debate if that factor were a predominant consideration to them in reaching their decision.

The serious point I want to make is that I am scandalized by the Deputy Prime Minister who, after all, has been around for a few years and is a rules expert, because he would get up and say to the members of the House of Commons that we can debate this for a number of days, taking up the time of the country discussing this capital project which will involve anywhere from $10 billion to $14 billion, but the debate means nothing because we do not have to vote on the bill until the National Energy Board makes its ruling. How absurd that is, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that makes a mockery of what debate in the House of Commons is supposed to be all about. We are supposed to engage in serious debate about which members on both sides of the House know the relevant facts before making up their minds.

I do not have a precise motion on the question of privilege before me and I want to hear what other members of the House have to say about this important question, but I will be happy to present one. In terms of the rules, to put it frankly, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to draft a motion that would be procedurally acceptable. I acknowledge that. The standard privilege motion is to refer a matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, asking it to report back, recommending when the matter should be debated. That is the procedural way of doing it. That does not seem to me to be an awful lot better than the kind of crazy decision the cabinet has already made.

What I am doing through this question of privilege is attempting to appeal to the common sense of the Deputy Prime Minister. If he is serious in wanting to have a debate that is meaningful to the people of Canada, on this project which is the largest in the history of Canada, then why does he not postpone it for a week? Why does he not say that he understands the NEB is to make a decision a week from today, hopefully, so we should have that information then, information which could affect hundreds of thousands of jobs, and we can hold the debate at that time? For God's sake, why does the government not proceed with other business today, and then when the NEB makes its decision we could call second reading and have a serious debate about the future of this project which will seriously affect the future of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has put forward his thesis which, as he has acknowledged, is procedurally outside the acceptable grounds of privilege. He has put it by way of an appeal to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), and it is not the first such appeal. It may be the subject of considerable other discussions under other procedural forms as this matter unfolds. However, as the hon. member has recognized, it is the prerogative of the government of the day to call the legislation that is properly on the order paper in whatever order it wishes. There seems to be no connection with the classic definition of privilege, and I think it would be stretching that definition to the extreme to try to include it in that. Therefore I have to set aside this question of privilege.

LEASED AND CROWN-OWNED BUILDINGS IN NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Question No. 559—Mr. McKinley:

1. Does the Central Real Property Inventory of the Department of Public Works list all leased and Crown-owned buildings in the National Capital Region?

2. Is such information recorded on computer tape?

3. Which departments, agencies or Crown corporations do not report their property holdings and any changes in the status of such property as they occur to the Central Real Property Inventory?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. All leased and Crown-owned buildings in the national capital region are recorded with the exception of the following: buildings or leases administered by Air Canada; buildings administered by the Bank of Canada; buildings administered by the Canadian National Railways; leased buildings when the term of the lease is for a period of less than one year.

2. Yes.

3. Canadian National Railways; Bank of Canada; Air Canada.

TASK FORCE ON NATIONAL UNITY

Question No. 759—Mr. Howie:

1. How many persons were appointed to the Task Force on National Unity and for what term?

2. Was a date set for the Task Force to report?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister): 1. Eight commissioners have been appointed to the Task Force on Canadian Unity until conclusion of the inquiry.

2. PC 1977-1910 of July 5, 1977, establishing the Task Force on Canadian Unity states in part—"adopt such procedures and methods as they may from time to time deem expedient for the proper conduct and conclusion of the inquiry within one year and sit at such times and in such places in Canada as they may decide from time to time". The period of one year has been extended by six months to December 31, 1978, (see order in council PC 1978-157 dated January 19, 1978).

PENSION FOR WIDOWS OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 966—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1976, were studies made by the Treasury Board regarding the cost of continuing the full pension to the widow of the recipient of a Public Service pension?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Yes. The most recent study indicates that the cost would remain the same as it was in January, 1976—2.5 per cent of payroll, excluding the cost of escalation. This would amount to $105,850,000.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS IN NICKEL INDUSTRY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the lay-off this weekend of some 1,600 workers in the nickel industry as part of an over-all plan of 3,000 lay-offs which will cause severe dislocation directly to at least 10,000 people, the communities involved and the Canadian economy as a whole, as well as creating a social cost of between $150 million and $200 million which must be borne by government, thus creating the necessity that this matter be debated in parliament.

● (1512)

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has given the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26, which has provided me with an opportunity to examine the terms of the motion, to examine the terms of the Standing Order, and to examine the several precedents which were brought into consideration in the recent past.

As has been described, the purpose of the motion is to enable hon. members to bring matters before the House, by way of emergency debate. Standing Order 26(1) reads as follows:

Leave to make motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration must be asked immediately before the calling of government orders.

The terms of that order have been referred to many times. In terms of individual communities and industries, the Chair has often been in a difficult position when attempting to adjudicate upon these matters because the terms of the Standing Order, as such, are to give leave or an opportunity to hon. members to bring matters of a crisis nature before the House which would not otherwise come before the House. Yet, it is not envisaged that that rule ought to be used to bring what are considered crises from individual constituencies or industries before the House. Obviously the difficulty which would follow from that is that if the rule were to be used in that way, it would become the function of the Chair, on an almost weekly basis, to attempt to adjudicate the relative impact of difficulties in individual constituencies.

Certainly, to grant a motion with respect to one industry in one particular area of the country, even if it is my own, would only invite the same kind of application on an almost weekly basis with respect to other areas of the country. That would put upon the Chair the difficulty of trying to attempt to adjudicate in some way the relative impact of, for example, the closure of a linerboard mill in Newfoundland as opposed to a lay-off of some 3,000 people in the nickel industry in the Sudbury basin.

As tempted as I may be to be sympathetic with this particular application, I have to refer back to some precedents which I will cite now to the hon. member and to the House. Upon examination of my own precedents, three of which I will bring to the attention of the House, to grant the application would be reversing very directly my own rulings on these previous occasions. Therefore, I remind the House, for example, that on January 27, 1975 the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) made a very similar application under almost precisely the same circumstances in respect to the automotive industry and lay-offs in the Oshawa area. At that time the remarks of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby included the following:

—the crisis in the automotive industry manifested by the announced lay-offs on the week end which will bring the total of unemployed in this sector to more than 40,000.

I reviewed the matter and, among other things, I said:

The subject matter of the motion, while it concerns a very serious problem, has, in fact, to do with problems related to one industry, and even that aspect is one symptom of a larger problem, that is to say, the economic condition of the country in general—

The reason I express concern is related to my resistance to setting a precedent of interrupting the regular schedule of business of the House, to permit consideration of a one-industry problem of this sort; because, it seems to me, to do this would be to put other members who have already expressed similar concerns into this position: that, if they were to do less than seek the intervention of the House in these matters, they would not be fulfilling their responsibilities as members.

There was another precedent in December, 1975, which related to some other aspects of the problem. These were raised by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) who, at that time, was the parliamentary secretary to the postmaster general. The specific and important matter to which he referred is quoted in Hansard of December 4, 1975, at page 9715. It reads as follows:

The specific and important matter is the nation-wide strike in the pulp and paper industry, a strike involving some 25,000 members of the Canada Paperworkers Union, and lay-offs of the same order in the bush and allied operations.

In adjudicating on that problem, I said the following:

—there is the additional difficulty that except by virtue of the reference to the anti-inflation measures which are, of course, matters of federal jurisdiction, the fact is that it appears to be a work stoppage in the private sector involving private companies and unions which are not in any way subject to federal jurisdiction.

That was the problem at that time, and some of those aspects certainly are present now.

On October 21, 1977, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) raised another problem. His remarks included the following:

—because of the ruthless and unexpected decision by the Inco metals company drastically to cut back production and mining operations in Canada, resulting in the loss of between 3,500 and 4,000 jobs—

I said that the subject matter before the House at that time was, of course, not only the Speech from the Throne, which gives the widest latitude in debate, but an amendment which would permit even more direct focus on that particular problem.

The first two precedents I have cited to the House indicate that previously the Chair has had to resist, although each had equal merit, the application for an emergency debate on a one-industry or a one-location type of problem.

Furthermore, Standing Order 26(5) calls upon the Chair to determine whether or not the matter might be brought before the House in some other way. In dealing with the application previously made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, I cited the opportunity for participation in the throne speech debate. A number of members took advantage of that. Subsequently on November 23, November 29, and December 8, debates have taken place on allotted days which were addressed directly to that problem; on November 23—loss of jobs in mineral industry; on November 29—unemployment resulting from importation of foreign goods; and on December 8—lack of industrial strategy. Furthermore, a number of questions have been posed and a number of answers have been given during the oral question period. Some of them have been referred to the adjournment debate. That occurred as recently as Thursday of last week. It provided the opportunity for an expanded question by the hon. member for Nickel Belt and an expanded answer on this particular problem.

In terms of the subject matter, I have to refer to precedents on which I have ruled already. To find that it would be a proper subject, would be a direct reversal of my previous reasoning. On examining the use of time in the interval, since the first application by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, and the subsequent application with respect to the Falconbridge lay-offs by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the House in fact has taken extensive opportunity to address itself to this problem and to deal with it in the best way it can.

I do not want to get into detail about the shared responsibility with the provincial government, particularly in light of the very extensive work the provincial government has done in its select committee, but perhaps there is some merit in addressing ourselves to the problem of jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction is not significantly or primarily provincial, certainly it is shared. Recognition of that has been taken by Queen's Park, which has set up a special committee in that regard.

However, my main reason for setting aside the application is because I had to do the same thing to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby with respect to the automotive industry, and to the hon. member for Fort William with respect to the pulp and paper industry. It would be in direct contradiction of my own precedents if I were to do otherwise, despite all the sympathy I have with this particular problem.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council) moved that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this historic bill, which is before the House today for second reading, provides legislative authority for Canada to join together with the United States in one of the largest private projects ever undertaken.

Bill C-25 paves the way for construction of a $10 billion northern pipeline stretching over a distance of nearly 5,500 miles to transport natural gas from the Arctic to meet the pressing needs of millions of consumers in both countries.

This legislation to create a northern pipeline act implements the terms of the co-operative agreement to serve the mutual interests of our two nations which I had the privilege of signing, together with the U.S. Energy Secretary, Mr. Schlesinger, here in Ottawa last September. The terms of that agreement have already been overwhelmingly endorsed by the United States Congress.

Mr. Crosbie: You bet they have. You gave it all away.

Mr. MacEachen: The legislation also establishes a northern pipeline agency to provide a single regulatory authority, armed with the necessary powers to exercise all federal responsibilities directly related to the building of the system by the Foothills companies.

The primary objective of this agency, together with other complementary provisions in the bill and further supportive measures we plan to adopt, is to ensure that this gigantic project is planned and implemented in a way which will maximize the potential economic, industrial, energy and social benefits for the Canadian people, while at the same time minimizing adverse social and environmental effects.

I believe the policies embodied in the legislation, together with the other measures we will be instituting, will fully achieve the broad objectives expressed by hon. members on all sides of this House during the debate on the issue early last August. Let me briefly outline some of the principal elements involved.

The proposed pipeline system will enable the United States to transport more Arctic gas to markets in the lower 48 states where it is urgently required more cheaply, more quickly and with less environmental impact than the alternative all-American pipeline, the LNG tanker system proposed by El Paso.

For its part, Canada will be assured access to its own reserves in the Mackenzie Delta by the only economic means currently available, a lateral line connecting the main system at Whitehorse to transport gas as and when it is required to meet the growing needs of Canadian consumers. Access to these gas reserves is an important part of the national strategy we have adopted to meet our goal of energy self-reliance. Provisions in the bilateral agreement, in this legislation, and in the undertakings we will obtain from Foothills are all aimed at ensuring that this lateral line is ready to go into operation at the time we need to draw on this frontier gas to supplement that from western Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would the hon. gentleman give us the latest estimate of when it is now thought we are going to require the frontier gas?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the estimate which has been given by the National Energy Board has not been altered by any recent events. We all know that there is a welcome acceleration in the rate of new gas discoveries in western Canada, but their extent is still far from firmly established, and we cannot responsibly take the risk of not ensuring access to those reserves of gas in the Mackenzie Delta.

My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), will be speaking in more detail about this question later in the debate, and undoubtedly he will go into more detail on the question just raised.

Proven gas reserves in the Delta are already sufficient to supply some 10 per cent of projected Canadian needs in the mid-1980s, as compared to the 5 per cent of U.S. consumption that would be supplied from Alaskan reserves. The access to Canadian gas in the western Arctic provided by construction of this northern pipeline, together with a number of other complementary government policies, should provide a strong stimulus to further exploration and development in that part of our frontier by private industry and by Petro-Canada.

As a result of the negotiations with the United States the cost of transporting Arctic gas to southern markets would be significantly lower, particularly for Canada, than under the system originally proposed by the National Energy Board.

Routing of the trunk line directly to Whitehorse rather than diverting it to Dawson, the U.S. undertaking to pay between two thirds and the total cost of moving Canadian gas between the two points, depending on the extent to which capital outlays exceeded estimates, and adoption of a higher capacity pipe design, would reduce United States shipping costs by about 7 per cent and Canadian shipping costs by between 11 per cent and 15 per cent.

If construction expenditures are within 35 per cent of estimates, and the United States consequently pays the full cost of transporting Canadian gas over the 277-mile line between Dawson and Whitehorse, Canada would save about $1 billion alone on the transportation of current reserves of more than five trillion cubic feet. The savings will, of course, increase with the development of additional reserves.

The conclusion and implementation of the bilateral agreement are important also as a means of further strengthening the bonds which have traditionally linked Canada and the United States closely together. This unique association has led in the past to the construction of more than 1,700 miles of Canadian pipeline through the United States to transport Canadian oil and gas to markets in both countries. Undertaking of this major new project could well provide the basis for further co-operative efforts in the future that serve our mutual energy interests.

Meanwhile, the launching of this mammoth northern pipeline project will provide a much needed boost to consumer and business confidence in both countries, one that will go beyond the very considerable real impact it will have in stimulating production and employment directly and indirectly.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

On the basis of the procurement targets laid down by the principal sponsors of the Foothills project, which have an excellent record in employing Canadian goods and services, we estimate that nearly 100,000 man-years of employment will be created by construction of the total pipeline system in Canada and by indirect economic activity generated by income arising from pipeline outlays.

Excluding the Delta lateral, direct and indirect employment created by the pipeline is estimated at some 68,000 man-years. I will return to this issue later, but just let me assure the House that the legislation contains a number of provisions which are aimed at ensuring achievement of the highest Canadian input that is reasonably possible.

From recent discussions I have had with senior officers of Foothills, I am satisfied that the company is just as anxious as the government, and as hon. members on all sides of the House, to see that this objective is realized. I am sure these officers are fully prepared to come before the special committee we have established to consider the bill in order to reaffirm their determination in this regard.

I should add that Canada's international balance of payments position would also receive a strongly positive boost both from capital inflows associated with the project during the construction period and subsequently from tariffs levied on U. S. gas transported through the Canadian section of the system.

There is no doubt that some dislocation and disruption will be created in the Yukon territory during the construction period. On balance, however, I am confident that these unavoidable problems will be significantly outweighed by both the short-term and long-term benefits of the project.

• (1532)

The pipeline company will be required to give preference to Yukon residents in training and hiring both for construction and operation of the system in the territory. It will similarly be required to give preference to Yukon enterprises in the procurement of goods and services for the project. Although permanent employment opportunities in the operation of the system in the Yukon will not be large, there is every likelihood that the project will serve as a catalyst in promoting other industrial activities, including accelerated petroleum exploration and development in the western Arctic.

The agreement that we propose to conclude with Foothills with regard to possible electrification of compressor stations in the southern Yukon could, in particular, provide the base for the expansion of electrical generating capacity which is necessary to facilitate further industrial development.

The training and experience provided by participation in the pipeline project would, in turn, enhance the opportunity for employment of the growing Yukon labour force in such developments.

Our ability to offset the unavoidable social and economic costs created by the pipeline project in the Yukon and to realize significant net benefits will be substantially enhanced by the terms the agreement concluded with the United States and further financial arrangements we intend to conclude with the Foothills company.

Under the latter arrangement, the Yukon government will be able to draw on an advance payment from the company against future tax liabilities of up to $200 million between 1978 and 1982 to provide any additional funds that it may require to meet socioeconomic costs resulting from construction of the pipeline in the Territory. At the same time, however, it will also be open to the Yukon government to borrow from other sources if it considers it more financially advantageous to do so.

Under the terms of the Canada-U.S. agreement Foothills will be required to pay $35 million in Yukon property taxes prior to the completion of the line by the target date at the end of 1982. After the system goes into operation, it will be required to pay annual property taxes of $30 million, which would be escalated annually by the increase in the gross national product price deflator. Even if the Yukon government borrowed all of the $200 million to meet added socioeconomic costs, which seems unlikely, it is estimated that the proposed tax system would still yield more than $1 billion in net revenue after amortization of principal and interest over the 25-year economic life of the system. That is substantially more than was proposed either by the National Energy Board or the Lysyk inquiry. The result will obviously significantly strengthen the financial position of the Yukon government.

A further long term benefit would be derived by the people of the Yukon from the amount of up to $5 million that the company will be required to put up to build lateral lines for the distribution of gas to communities along the pipeline route at the Alberta border price.

I want to comment now on another important element of the pipeline project, the timing of construction.

Under the Canada-U.S. agreement, both governments are committed to do everything reasonably possible to ensure the expeditious construction and operation of the pipeline. The timetable established in the agreement provides that the laying of pipe will not begin in the Yukon until January 1, 1981. This starting date, which is just seven months earlier than that proposed by the Lysyk inquiry but later than planned by the company, will enable advantage to be taken of a construction period that is critical for achievement of the completion timetable established in the bilateral agreement. In our judgment this period of nearly three years will still provide time which the members of that inquiry properly considered necessary to allow for a settlement of Yukon Indian land claims and the fair start on the implementation of that agreement. In addition, it will provide ample time for the completion of further studies required to minimize the environmental impact of pipeline construction.

The Lysyk report considered that good progress had been made in moving toward final agreement on a settlement and concluded that deferral of construction of the Yukon pipeline until 1981 would provide the time necessary to complete the process and make a start on implementation of the agreement so that Yukon Indians would be in a favourable position to realize the benefits offered by the pipeline project. For our part, we in the federal government will bend every effort to arrive at a fair and just settlement of these claims just as quickly as is reasonably possible. At the same time, however, we remain firmly committed to our obligation to ensure the expeditious construction and operation of the pipeline system in accordance with the timetable laid down in the agreement with the United States.

Against this background, Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak more specifically about the terms of the bill itself.

The central provision of the legislation is that of providing for the establishment of a northern pipeline agency. Working in close conjunction with the National Energy Board, this agency would provide a central regulatory authority or window for the exercise of all federal responsibilities related to planning, monitoring, and controlling the system throughout Canada.

Under the bill the governor in council will be authorized to transfer federal powers now exercised by various departments to the agency to the extent they are required for the purpose of the pipeline in order to maintain central control over the project. This might include the authority to issue land use permits under the Territorial Lands Act for pipeline related activities, for example, or powers under the Fisheries Act for the control of project developments that could affect fish habitats. In addition, the legislation provides for the amendment of a number of other relevant statutes in order to expedite and facilitate the project.

The agency itself will be responsible to a designated minister in the same way as any government department. Acting under authority delegated by the minister is a commissioner who would serve as deputy head of the agency in Ottawa and have prime responsibility for advising the minister on matters of policy.

An administrator will be appointed to assume responsibility for day to day operations of the agency's office in Calgary, which is also the headquarters of the Foothills' parent company.

To provide for close co-ordination with the National Energy Board a member of the board is to be appointed to the agency as the designated officer, serving either as the administrator or a deputy administrator. Under the powers delegated to him by the National Energy Board, the designated officer will have the authority, subject to the concurrence of the responsible minister, to exercise a broad range of powers provided for under the National Energy Board Act. These include approval of detailed pipeline designs, routing and specifications; approval of certain proposed contracts, and the issuance of guidelines, orders, and directives with regard to detailed terms and conditions that must be complied with by Foothills.

Certain responsibilities that bear on the long term operation of the pipeline will continue to be exercised by the Board itself. These include the power to approve, in conjunction with the minister, Foothills financing plans, to make orders with respect to traffic tolls and tariffs, and to grant leave to open the pipeline. Both the Board and the designated officer would be subject to direction in the exercise of their responsibility by the governor in council.

An integral part of the agency's role is related to the broad terms and conditions laid down in the legislation that Foothills will be required to meet in order to comply with the certificate of public convenience and necessity that will be deemed to be issued with the enactment of the bill. The bill lays down certain general terms and conditions relating to such matters as the input of Canadian manpower, goods and services, the design, specifications and routing of the system, and the avoidance or minimization of adverse socio-economic and environmental impacts.

The Foothills companies would also be required to submit extensive information and, in many cases, to obtain federal approval with regard to such factors as costs, financing plans, shipper and producer contracts, operating and safety manuals, and collective agreements. The general terms and conditions set out in the legislation require Foothills to comply with all undertakings it made before the National Energy Board to achieve the greatest possible economic and social benefits from the project and to minimize adverse social and environmental effects.

These general terms and conditions will be supplemented and reinforced by detailed guidelines and orders to be issued by the northern pipeline agency. It is our intention to have the detailed terms and conditions relating to socioeconomic and environmental matters published in draft form this summer in order to obtain the views of various interested public groups and of the provincial and territorial governments concerned before they are formally adopted.

Foothills is already in the process of preparing an environmental impact statement in response to guidelines laid down as part of the second stage of the environmental assessment and review process, which will contribute to the development of the detailed terms and conditions in this area. The company may also be required to submit further information to assist in the preparation of supplementary terms and conditions relating to socioeconomic concerns.

As in the case of those dealing with other matters these detailed terms and conditions relating to socioeconomic and environmental issues will also be subject to revision to take account of concerns expressed by various groups. In addition to the obligations imposed directly on Foothills, there is also a responsibility on governments to adopt measures that may be required to avoid or alleviate potentially adverse socio-economic impacts which are beyond the control of the company. In the case of the Yukon the responsiblity for developing mitigative policies and programs will be shared between the territorial and federal governments, as my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner), will explain more fully when he speaks later in the debate.

Earlier in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the terms and conditions laid down in the legislation would include extensive provisions relating to the input of Canadian labour, goods and services in the planning, procurement and construction of the pipeline in this country.

This is an issue I want to deal with very directly in view of the unrealistic and unfounded allegations made by some members of the opposition. The term "sell-out" comes easily to their lips. Indeed, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) made this charge even before we had concluded our negotiations on the agreement with the United States. Opposition members in fact, Mr. Speaker, are attempting to create an artificial issue where no issue exists.

During the hearings before the National Energy Board, Foothills stated its objective—and I stress the word objective because it was not and could not possibly be a flat guarantee—was to achieve Canadian input into the system in Canada of more than 90 per cent. During the intervening months Foothills has repeatedly restated that objective. On the basis of past performance of the sponsoring companies and of our own assessment of Canadian supply capabilities, there is every reason to believe that this target will be achieved.

The Canada-U.S. agreement itself asserts in its preamble that the system will be built so as to "advance the national economic and energy interests and to maximize the related industrial benefits of each country." The agreement also stipulates that each government will endeavour to ensure that the supply of goods and services for the pipeline project will be on generally competitive terms having regard to price, reliability, servicing capacity, and delivery schedules.

For some members opposite, that is the rub. They contend we should not stand ready to compete. They contend that we should have demanded a guarantee of a very high Canadian content regardless of price and regardless of its effect in escalating the costs of gas to Canadian consumers.

For the benefit of members let me point out that in the first place for Canada to have formally required, either in the bilateral agreement or the legislation, that Foothills purchase a guaranteed percentage of their materials from Canadian suppliers would be in clear violation of our international obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. There is no doubt about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That agreement stipulates that imports should be treated no less favourably than domestic products "in respect of all laws, regulations and requirements affecting their internal sale". That, in effect, is exactly what some members opposite have urged us to do.

The New Democratic member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has suggested, according to a column by Geoffrey Stevens in the Globe and Mail of December 2—I hope I am not incorrectly quoting the hon. member, if I do I will be glad to apologize—that in failing to secure such a buy-Canadian guarantee we bought a pig in a poke. What he appears to be suggesting is that we should have tried to sell the United States a pig in a poke by demanding that it will join in the construction of a pipeline with an open-ended price.

Had we insisted on inclusion of the kind of guarantees being bandied about by opposition members, I firmly believe that our chances of achieving a satisfactory agreement would have been seriously jeopardized. In fact, even the provisions with regard to general competitiveness that were included in the agreement have been criticized in Congress. In its report to the Senate, the energy and natural resources committee called for what it termed "open competition" between Canadian and U.S. suppliers over the entire project and urged the administration to "go back to the Canadians to resolve the content issue".

Let me remind members as forcefully as I can that if we had been unable to secure an agreement with the United States because of a demand for a guaranteed Canadian input, or if that agreement were subsequently rejected by Congress, there would be no opportunity for Canadian workers to participate in this gigantic project, and there would be no opportunity in the foreseeable future for Canada to gain access economically to its own reserves in the Mackenzie Delta.

Let me point out another important factor, Mr. Speaker. Those who are proponents of such a buy-Canadian policy seem to be going on the assumption that we in this country do not need to concern ourselves about costs. Their view seems to be that this is primarily an American pipeline to carry American gas to American markets and, therefore, Americans should be required to pay a premium in exchange for the right to run the system across Canadian territory.

Nothing could be further from the truth. As I indicated earlier, the construction of the lateral to the Mackenzie Delta could, on the basis of currently established reserves there, be supplying some 10 per cent of our own gas needs here in Canada by the mid-1980s. By contrast, natural gas from Alaska is expected to meet only 5 per cent of U.S. demand by that time. In relative terms, therefore, Canadian consumers have a considerably greater stake in the cost of deliveries of gas from the Arctic than those in the United States.

● (1552)

Quite apart from our general interest in the cost of building the system, we have also a particular interest because of the formula in the agreement under which the United States' share of the cost of transporting Canadian gas between Dawson and Whitehorse is determined directly by the capital cost of the system in Canada as a whole.

While some members are demanding establishment of a monopolistic preserve for Canadian pipeline suppliers, Canadian companies in the related industry have themselves sought no such protection.

It is rather interesting that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) should have become the protector of these companies which themselves have sought no such protection whatsoever. The fact of is that over the years in Canada we have developed highly efficient companies in these fields and they ask no more than the underlying assurance provided in the legislation, namely, that they have a fair and competitive opportunity to participate in the supply of goods and services for the pipeline.

An hon. Member: Why don't you—

Mr. MacEachen: I will be happy to deal with questions later if I can, but I wish to finish my statement. While some hon. members may not agree with every point I make, there are some aspects that I believe it is important to deal with in order to clarify our thinking, particularly the terms of the bill before us.

The supply of pipe for the system has been a particularly contentious issue in the minds of some opposition members. Much of the argument has been totally overlooked with respect to the competitiveness of the Canadian industry. In fact Peter Gordon, the chairman of Stelco, has emphasized that his own company is not only confident of its ability to supply a substantial portion of the pipe for the system in Canada, but also to compete for some of the pipeline to be installed in the United States as well.

In this connection I should advise the House that I am hopeful I will be in a position to announce our intentions with regard to the question of pipe size and the pressure of the system between Whitehorse and Caroline before the conclusion of this debate. In fact the bill provides authority to the National Energy Board, with the subsequent approval of the minister, to make a decision with respect to pipe size.

It should be borne in mind that no decision can be made by the NEB or with the concurrence of the minister, on pipe size, until this bill is enacted. What I have agreed to do is to declare our intention as soon as possible on this particular item. I hope that it will be done either this week or not later than the first day of next week, and that the hon. members will not have to make a decision on the bill even though the terms of the bill provide that the decision can only be made, after the bill has passed, on the pipe size. Notwithstanding the provisions of the bill, I am quite prepared to declare our intentions within a time frame that I have mentioned earlier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Let me point out that under the terms and the conditions there is a very important feature specified in the bill where Foothills is required to submit a procurement program covering all goods and services for the approval of the minister responsible for the northern pipeline agency. This program must be aimed at achieving the company's own objective of providing for a level of Canadian input that is as high as practicable. It must also be designed to ensure that maximum advantage is taken of opportunities to foster Canadian research and promote the long term development or expansion of viable Canadian suppliers.

Foothills will be required to submit to the minister an outline of the procedures that it proposes to follow to implement its procurement program and would be obliged to comply with the plan after its approval.

In addition, certain proposed contracts received by the minister will require his approval before they are awarded. If the minister has reason to believe that a prospective contract might involve dumping, or other unfair trade practices, he could require the company to establish to his satisfaction that this was not the case prior to approving it.

Foothills will also be directed to obtain the minister's approval for a detailed manpower plan designed to ensure that maximum use is made of Canadian labour in the planning, construction, and operation of the pipeline.

I think it should be very clear that the legislation provides ample safeguards for achievement of the highest level of Canadian labour and industrial content consistent with our further objective of ensuring that the system also serves the interests of Canadian consumers through its construction at reasonable cost.

I am sorry about the length of this statement, but this is a very complex bill and subject. I should like to touch further on some of the other important provisions in the legislation.

Under this bill, the minister responsible for the agency is authorized to undertake consultations with the United States government and the governments of the provinces and territories in Canada, as required, to co-ordinate all aspects of the project as they effect different jurisdictions.

The legislation also envisages the establishment of a federal-provincial consultative council composed of officials, on the provincial side from the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and on the federal side there would be one representative of the agency and one representative from the Yukon government. The function of this council will be to supplement and complement the day to day liaison and co-ordination between those who have the primary responsibility for overseeing the project in the various governments. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a continuing round of discussions with provincial and territorial governments over a period of many months with regard to many aspects of the pipeline project. These consultations will continue and they will be formalized through the establishment of the mechanism which I have mentioned.

In addition, the governor in council will also be empowered to establish one or more advisory councils of up to ten persons to be drawn from outside of the government service in order to provide a two-way means of communication and consultation between interested public groups and the Northern Pipeline Agency. While it is not possible, at this point, to anticipate how many such councils might be created, it is certain there is the expectation that an advisory council for the Yukon will be established. As we see it, one of the tasks of this and any other councils would be to provide an organized channel for public input with regard to the detailed terms and conditions that will be proposed for consideration by the agency.

The National Energy Board Act will be amended by the bill to permit the National Energy Board, in future, to recover from any company all costs incurred by the regulatory authority in scrutinizing and monitoring the planning and the construction of any pipeline from the time of certification until one year after leave to open the system is granted. As a result of this amendment, which is in line with the practice followed in the U.S., Foothills will be obligated to cover the related costs of both the Northern Pipeline Agency and the NEB.

The bill creates two forms of penalties. Failure of Foothills to fulfil any term or condition included in the certificate of public convenience and necessity would make it liable to assessment of a fine by the minister of up to $10,000 for each day of non-compliance. The company could require the minister to reconsider his decision, or appeal it to the Trial Division of the Federal Court. In addition, any person who fails to comply with the terms and conditions of the certificate or an order issued by the NEB, or one of its members, would also be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine of up to $10,000 for each day the offence was continued.

In the case of any person directly affected by a decision relating to the pipeline by the NEB or its designated officer in the agency which had been approved by the governor in council, recourse will be available to the Federal Court of Appeal. The court could consider an appeal on the grounds that the board erred in law or in jurisdiction. The Federal Court is required to hear and determine any such appeal without delay, and the bill stipulates that the disputed decision may not be suspended in the interval. In its decision, which would be final, the court could confirm the order or refer it back to the board as the designated officer for reconsideration. In our judgment this procedure will ensure that the ends of justice are served, while at the same time reducing the possibility of the project encountering crippling legal obstacles which could add enormously to its costs. It was because such obstacles proved so very costly in terms of time and money in the case of Alyeska oil pipeline in Alaska that the United States has also adopted similar procedures with respect to the northern gas pipeline.

The bill contains a number of provisions with regard to tolls and tariffs. The governor in council, for example, would be empowered to make regulations to give effect to the provisions in the Canada-U.S. Agreement that relate to this question, as well as to prescribe the method to be adopted by the Board in establishing a rate of return on equity related to project costs. The definition of tolls in the NEB Act will also be revised to permit the board to authorize the imposition of such a charge at the time a pipeline is capable of transmitting oil or gas.

Under the bill, those sections of the legislation establishing the northern pipeline agency and delegating certain authority to it and the designated officer would terminate within one year following the granting of leave to open the pipeline for which a certificate of public convenience and necessity is being issued. These sections may be continued in force, however, by a joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament if a certificate is also issued for construction of the Dempster lateral to the Mackenzie Delta prior to the granting of leave to open the main system.

Let me hasten to emphasize that this terminating provision does not reflect any present doubt on our part about the need to press forward with development of a link to the Delta within the foreseeable future. Members of the official opposition will be pleased that we have adopted the Sunset provisions recently advocated by members of that party in the debate with respect to this agency and that it will not be financed by the taxpayer, but the companies involved.

This great project on which Canada and the United States are preparing to embark is the outcome of a long and dynamic process that has intensively engaged the private sector, governments, and the public on both sides of the border. Each has had, and continues to have a crucial role to play.

The various applicants competed vigorously for approval of their respective projects for transporting Arctic gas to southern markets, and in the process added immensely to our fund of knowledge. The Alcan-Foothills group of companies that eventually was successful proved itself to be energetic, resourceful, and responsive to issues of public concern. And those public concerns were very capably and forcefully registered by a wide variety of interested groups and organizations in both countries. It should be noted that Foothills' spokesmen themselves have acknowledged the beneficial role played by these public groups in their own corporate interest and in the national interest.

Governments have inevitably had a major role to play as well in view of the extreme importance of energy to the national interest, the international character of the project, and the inherent need for a legislative and regulatory framework to control all aspects of pipeline construction and operation.

Following the enactment of this legislation there will still remain a number of challenges to be met and overcome. The project companies, the suppliers of pipeline goods and services, financial institutions, public interest groups, and governments at every level all have a continuing and important role to play in ensuring that the system is developed and built in a way that will best serve the national interest in the years that lie ahead.

As the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) anticipated in putting a question to me shortly before the first reading of the legislation, this is a lengthy and complicated bill. I appreciate that members will want to give it careful study. Yet it is also important that we deal with it as expeditiously as possible so as to establish the legislative framework that will govern the project and create the Northern Pipeline agency that will have such a crucial part to play in its implementation.

On balance, Mr. Speaker, we are convinced that this immense undertaking will yield very substantial short and long-term benefits for all Canadians. It will provide us access to a major new source of energy from the frontier that is both secure and cheaper than any other alternative. It will provide a substantial stimulus to output and employment throughout many parts of the country. It will have a strongly positive impact on our international balance of payments, and it will play a vital role in fostering the long-term development of the economy of the north. For all these reasons I very much hope that this legislation to give effect to the project will command the full support of all parties in this House, as I believe it will command the support in general of the Canadian people in all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a very short question. It relates to experiences encountered by Syncrude in Alberta. When Syncrude asked for bids on the construction of pipeline from Fort McMurray to Edmonton, a low bid came in from a Canadian-owned company which employed non-union labour. The international union leadership at Syncrude objected to this. Syncrude bowed to the pressure and awarded the contract to an American-owned company at a considerably higher price. Does this bill and the authority granted to the minister and the National Energy Board ensure that Canadian-owned companies will have an opportunity to bid on the construction of this and the construction will not end up in the hands of American-owned companies at higher prices as a result of these artificial pressures?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in answer to that I would say yes, the legislation certainly provides for that.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest we are getting into a debate on this issue. I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent to permit the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) to answer questions. Otherwise I will have to recognize the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on behalf of the official opposition. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1612)

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) would answer a question relating to the option now being studied as to 48-inch low pressure pipe, 48-inch high pressure pipe, or 54-inch pipe. Would he indicate to the House at this time any estimate of what differences there would be in the estimates that so far have been put forward in terms of man-years available on this project if, for instance, the selection were other than the 48-inch low pressure pipe, which the company has recommended from the start, or the 54-inch pipe, which is also capable of being produced in Canada, as opposed to the 48-inch high pressure pipe, because the 48-inch high pressure pipe cannot easily be produced in Canada and may have to be obtained from the United States or some other country? Can the minister give us any estimate of what difference it would make in total man-years of work?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the estimates which have been put forward, and to which I have referred since the announcement in respect of the agreement, are based upon the current plans of Foothills which in turn submitted the proposal based on low pressure pipe. I have not had any estimates as to the man-years of employment that might occur against the possibility that the National Energy Board would recommend high pressure pipe. I do know quite well that the plant in Regina is interested in obtaining business and, as was pointed out this morning by the premier of Saskatchewan, its ability to get that business might be very directly influenced by the selection of the pipe pressure. Certainly I have not any prepared estimates on the basis of high pressure pipe.

This is very a complicated subject, but just let me say that the National Energy Board will make its recommendations and its intentions known, and it must take into account, in addition to the economic factors, the factors of safety and reliability. The decision or recommendation of the National Energy Board is one for that board within Canada, but I have no estimate of the labour cost.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have just a brief question for the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). Since the minister signed the agreement with the United States on behalf of Canada and has said several times today that the National Energy Board will announce the specifications, I would point out that under the provisions of article 10 of the agreement, which established a technical study group for the purpose of testing and evaluating various kinds of pipe, the last sentence states that it is understood the decision relating to pipeline specifications remains the responsibility of the appropriate regulatory authorities, and "authorities" is in the plural form. Do I take it that the technical committee will not make this recommendation, but that the National Energy Board, which will be part of the technical committee, will make that decision solely on its own?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that is my understanding. It is my firm understanding that the National Energy Board, under the terms of this proposed bill, will be making its recommendation on the basis of the results of the technical study. In fact we have been in continuing consultation with the United States. On the basis of all the information and proposals of the United States it will be the chairman of the National Energy Board who will convey to me, either this week or the first of next, its conclusions, and I will make them known. It is the National Energy Board that will make that recommendation.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister, and I do not fault him for this in view of the complexity and length of the bill, has taken some 50 minutes to put the government's position on record. Let me say one kind thing about that presentation, and that will probably be the last kind thing the minister will hear from me regarding this bill throughout my remarks. I accept the understanding he gave today in respect to informing members of the House concerning pipe design, pressure and pipe size, before we conclude this debate. That is surely essential.

Having said that, I find myself in disagreement with a great many things the minister believes the bill contains. Before going on to those I want to criticize, with all the force I can muster, the stance being taken by the NDP on a bill so vital to the national interest as is this one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: When the minister is describing remarks being made by members of this party, the opposition, and I will not use the term "official opposition" because, as the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has been around long enough to know, that is a term invented by Mackenzie King to split the opposition, he should single out the party whose members have been making remarks that lead him to believe they are going to encounter unconscionable delay in getting this legislation through. Let me make it abundantly clear that this party does not in any way intend to delay unduly the passage of this vitally important legislation through this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) has said things today, as he has been doing ever since we came back after Christmas, along with other members of that party, which clearly indicate they are going to marshal their entire forces for the purpose of deliberately delaying or filibustering this bill. I am sure that is what the government can expect. I hope those members will change their minds because the matters at issue here are far too important to Canada to have that kind of irresponsible attitude adopted by the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The spurious question of privilege raised today by the leader of that party was more than adequately answered by the Deputy Prime Minister, and any member with any conscience at all would accept his undertaking for what it means in a House composed, as it is, presumably of honourable members. If those members had done their homework they would be knowledgeable on matters the Deputy Prime Minister was trying to explain. However, they did not believe him.

We had the good fortune to hold several meetings of great assistance to us in obtaining information and education on the subject matter of this bill. I want to compliment the officials of Foothills pipeline who went to the expense and took the time and trouble of coming here and sitting with us for one full day, from nine in the morning till almost six in the evening. The same kind of request was made by the government party and the same kind of co-operation was extended to their members who expressed an interest in the legislation. I dare say that members of the NDP did not even take the trouble of requesting that kind of enlightenment, and I would be very suspect in regard to heavy and intelligent participation in this debate by members of that party.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You are wrong again.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister is aware, I am sure, that there are proceedings which were commenced today in the Federal Court in Vancouver, brought by the Yukon Conservation Society as plaintiff. That action has been joined by the Council of Yukon Indians. Counsel for CYI was generous enough to send me a copy of the pleadings in that action. I have examined them very carefully with respect to the possibility that they might prevent this debate from proceeding. I have satisfied myself that those proceedings are confined to the question of the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board, namely, whether it was intra vires its powers to require Foothills to submit an application to build the Dempster lateral by next July. Since the pleadings are confined to that issue, I am satisfied it does not offend the sub judice rule with respect to the construction of an Alaska pipeline, which is the subject matter of this bill.

The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party has labelled the bill a betrayal of Canadians. We put no such label on this bill. The bill has its weaknesses. There are several which I will speak about, as will other hon. members in their areas of speciality and responsibility. We do not believe we have been negotiated down the tube by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council. Perhaps he was the minister with the least knowledge who was conducting negotiations with our friends across the border. We speculate as to why that was and why the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) seemed to have his nose pushed out of joint in the conduct of these negotiations. At times the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources seems to be more knowledgeable in these matters than the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council.

The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council quoted the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) as having said, "We bought a pig in a poke". I think that was the expression he used. For those familiar with pipeline parlance, perhaps it could be described as buying a pig in a pipeline. My comment does not make the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council smile. Perhaps he does not know what a pig in a pipeline is. By way of explanation to him, it is a device for cleaning out the pipe.

Members of my party cannot advance amendments which will cause irreparable harm to the viability of this project, nor can any amendments be advanced which would go beyond the provisions of the international agreement that has been negotiated. Amendments are possible, and we will attempt to assist the government in a constructive and positive manner to clean up a very badly drawn bill.

I want to be critical of the government in regard to the manner in which it has treated the opposition. The statement of President Carter, made in the decision and report to Congress on the Alaska natural gas transportation system, reads in part as follows:

> Unnecessary delay would greatly increase the total cost of the pipeline system. I urge the Congress to act expeditiously to approve this important project.

That statement was dated September 22, 1977. The Congress acted quickly. I fault our government for its serious delay and foot-dragging. After my perusal of this bill, there seems to be no earthly reason why it could not have been before the House prior to Christmas, instead of giving hon. members so little time to consider its provisions with experts in the field. Opposition members have been deprived of a fair opportunity to examine the provisions of the bill. Indeed, it was not until late last Friday that hon. members were privileged to have the minister's press package release. Both the bill and the press package release were in the Yukon before I received them in Ottawa. I do not know whether hon. members have that press package release as yet.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: It came this morning.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear some hon. members indicating that they received the press package release this morning. Certainly that type of action does not engender any good will in terms of support from the opposition with respect to the minister's plea for quick passage.

The hon. Leader of the NDP and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands are taking a wholly impractical position when they indicate that guarantees, with respect to Canadian labour content and industrial content, must be written into the bill. I agree with the minister in his assessment of that. If that position were taken, the agreement would have to be renegotiated. In itself that is a reason for it being an impractical suggestion. In addition to that, it would be subject to many problems in connection with GATT, as the minister has pointed out, and in connection with the financing of this major undertaking. That would probably cause Foothills to abandon the project.

At committee stage we will suggest that a quarterly monitoring process can be embodied in the bill in order to ensure that the intentions, which are spelled out in the appendices to the bill with respect to Canadian content, are adhered to. There is no parliamentary input provided in a continuing way during the construction of this project. We feel that is essential.

Can the minister ever forget his own shame for the vacuum which was his contribution to the debate in August? On August 4, 1977, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicated that we are confronted with a government which is running the north like a colony, and has known, for at least a decade, that the society and the economy of that region were bound to be profoundly affected by a pipeline possibility. I will say it is a probability. The hon. Leader of the Opposition continued by indicating that despite that warning, and despite Ottawa's absolute jurisdiction, we have to make the decision as to whether there should be a pipeline in principle, without a northern energy policy, without a national energy policy, without a northern development policy, and without any clear or consistent approach to native rights or northern ecology.

That is just as true now as when the hon. Leader of the Opposition uttered it on August 4.

What did the government do when it knew the United States had to make a decision as to whether the Prudhoe Bay oil should be transported by the Alyeska route, via the El Paso route, or via the Mackenzie valley route? The government knew well in advance that some mode of transportation was required to move that oil. It fiddled and fumbled about. Finally in approximately 1972 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made an announcement on the eve of an election, which was coincidental, that a $100 million Mackenzie highway was going to be constructed. The intention of the government in making that announcement which, incidentally, was verified by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), was to induce the American decision to move that oil down the Mackenzie. Unfortunately, they fiddled so long that the day after they made the announcement the United States government announced that it was going to be the Alyeska route.

● (1632)

What happened after all sorts of clearing and grubbing had been done prior to the announcement by the Canadian government was that they abandoned the route, similar to an earlier abandonment. The then prime minister accused the Diefenbaker government, in which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) was minister of northern affairs, of spending money like drunken sailors on the Dempster Highway. So in 1963 construction was stopped. It was the vision of the government of that day, which did not foresee what was going to happen at Prudhoe Bay and what was going to happen in the Delta and in the Yukon where we are now active again in the Eagle Plain and the Peel Plateau. So they cut it off. Then as soon as Prudhoe Bay was discovered, bingo, they were right on the ball again, and they started building the Dempster Highway. That was some vision! It is a tired, bankrupt government which comes to that kind of conclusion. It is a government of reaction instead of action.

Mr. Foster: I thought you would be more charitable today.

Mr. Nielsen: I would like to hear the interventions, but with this new electronic control we have in this chamber one does not enjoy the full exchange we used to enjoy and which used to make debates much more exciting. Now members are shut off by a button. We operate like electronically controlled puppets.

One of the truly great bargaining factors which could have been discussed by the minister when he negotiated this agreement with the Americans is that the Yukon has some six million horsepower in hydroelectric potential which is run by a Crown corporation. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) will say more about the nature of that corporation and its habit of sitting on its backside through most developments of this nature. I might add that it is still there.

Six million horsepower is capable of development by reversing the flow of the Yukon River watershed under the plan known as the Taiya project. If such a project went ahead—and it was proposed to the Liberal government of the day in 1953—it would require the development of industrial sites on the Panhandle, which is United States soil. I recall that we negotiated away, albeit in terms of an urgent situation, 99-year leases, several of them in Newfoundland, and those leases are still extant in Newfoundland. Why could the minister not have negotiated on behalf of the Canadian people a corridor through the Panhandle for the purpose of that kind of hydroelectric development, twice that of the St. Lawrence Seaway project as it now exists? It would have provided all the power needed for the near future. It would have provided power for export to the rest of Canada, with our present knowledge of transmission lines. Why could Canadian industrial sites not have been negotiated as part of this package, in view of the fact that the minister has described it in terms of such magnitude? That is one of the areas he could have negotiated. Perhaps we were shoved down the tube, and I mean all Canadians, not just those in the Yukon.

The minister gave some figures with respect to Delta Gas. I rather doubt those figures. It does not seem to me that they are in accord with those which were given in evidence both before the Berger and Lysyk inquiries. However, I am prepared to be corrected on that. I am told, though, that whatever is in the Delta now is not sufficiently commercial to permit its transportation at this stage nor, indeed, at the completion of this line in 1983.

I have said that we intend to introduce a measure in committee which hopefully will be accepted by the government. That was suggested by our leader in his speech on August 4. He suggested that parliamentary input should be the responsibility of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. He said we should have a continuing right to monitor the pipeline question. That can be found at page 8040 of Hansard for that date. My leader also urged the government to bring in the legislation not later than last fall. We will be proposing that the monitoring process be on a quarterly basis. It might well be that that standing committee is not the proper forum for that.

I do not think hon. members on this side would argue that there should not be monitoring to ensure that the intentions expressed in the agreement are carried out. It may well be that the government will accept the proposition that the committee which has been set up to study the provisions of this bill should be the instrument by which we can achieve that monitoring. However, I seriously suggest that monitoring is the right of parliament and of the people of Canada.

The minister spoke about the advantages to the Yukon at some length, and I am very happy he did. It is not my purpose to confine my remarks to the Yukon simply because I represent that vast area. It is my responsibility to put forward the position of this party on a national basis, which I intend to do, but the minister did make some fairly wild statements about Yukon procurement, Yukon labour content, and the like. I do not find any such provisions in the bill. I may again be mistaken, but I have studied the bill fairly carefully, and I do not find that there.

The minister spoke of setting up a federal-provincial advisory council. On that council will sit one nominee from each of the western provinces plus the pipeline commissioner, but who appoints the Yukon representative to that federal-provincial—not federal-provincial-territorial—advisory council? The cabinet. What voice do the elected representatives of the people of the Yukon have with respect to that appointment? None. I ask the minister, where is the input? We do not consider the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) to be very knowledgeable about the social, economic, environmental, educational, and municipal problems this pipeline will cause the Yukon.

My advice to the minister—if he does not follow it, an attempt will be made in the committee to alter that, and there is ample precedent for it—is that the Yukon nominee on that council should be nominated in the same way provincial nominees are nominated, namely, by obtaining the recommendation of the elected members of the Yukon Legislative Assembly. There is precedent for that in the inland northern waters legislation and in other legislation. I need not belabour that point. That is one part of the bill about which we intend to advance suggestions in the committee.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw will be speaking about NCPC. The minister speaks of great benefits to the Yukon. I would like to have his attention once again.

I spoke of the press package. When I look around I see that the office of the pipeline commissioner is listening. Notwithstanding the fact that we have made several inquiries of the office of the pipeline commissioner, of the minister's office, of the pipeline's branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and on the NEB, we have yet to receive the list of commitments made to Foothills when they appeared before that body, with respect to the contents of the bill. We have been informed that there must be a list of commitments somewhere, but it cannot be produced. Surely we should have it at this stage of the debate, and certainly should have it not later than committee stage. I believe those commitments are essential to an intelligent study of the bill.

I should like now to deal with the $200 million fund. I do not know whether the minister did not understand what he was saying or whether what he was saying was deliberate—but he is wrong. I hope he misunderstood. The recommendation of the Lysyk Inquiry was that a Yukon heritage fund be established with up-front money, similar to that in Alberta. That was negotiated away by the minister in the United States. The fund was intended to recompense the people of the Yukon for the undoubted harmful effects the construction of this line will have on every aspect of their lives. Schools are needed now. There is no point in starting to build them when construction of the pipeline begins. The fund would have meant that the assets of Northern Canada Power Commission could be transferred to a Yukon power commission. We should not repeat the mistakes made by the Aishihik project with overrides of $36 million on the original estimate of $11 million.

The minister has negotiated a deal with the United States, which is embodied now in the agreement, whereby we get back-end money—an advance on taxes. The minister speaks of the people of the Yukon using this advance through their government. That is a fiction, since all financial decisions are made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I do not know why the government continues to abuse Canadian intelligence by trying to create the idea that there is some kind of separate government in the Yukon. Mr. Speaker, it is a colony. The cabinet and the minister govern the affairs of the Yukon from time to time as they see fit.

The minister's press release of September 9 stated that Foothills is obliged to make an advance payment as required between 1978 and 1982 of up to $200 million which, together with the interest charges, will be offset against the company's future tax liability. The press release assumes that Foothills will be able to raise this money at 10 per cent. In fact, Mr. Speaker, a book is being written now by Francois Bregha who points out that this government could borrow the money at a little over 8 per cent. The difference between approximately 10 per cent and 8 per cent over the retained period of 25 years could mean a loss of $50 million to Yukoners out of that fund. Not only has the minister thrown away the heritage fund, and the NEB went along with him, but by inept negotiation he has caused that $200 million to fall to $150 million.

The Yukon, in the meantime, will have to pay all the bills for schools and for the municipal infrastructures which will have to be put in place long before laying of the pipeline starts in January, 1981. The minister knows that construction, grubbing, clearing, surveying and engineering will have to be done a good year ahead. Foothills estimates that they will begin in 1979, so there is not much time to get these things in place. Where is the money to come from? The government has told the Yukon not to look to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for it. In effect, it has said not to bother planning schools or municipal facilities because it will not be advancing the money. It encourages them to borrow elsewhere if they can, and in that respect, Mr. Speaker, the deal is very harmful to the Yukon.

I should like to move to something else now. Knowledgeable as he is, my friend, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, may not be familiar with these things and I have not had the opportunity to discuss them with him since I received the bill. First of all, the justice facilities will be seriously taxed by the influx of 2,200 or 2,500 workers. I have written to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) suggesting an increase in the Supreme Court in the north—I should say I am not carving out a sinecure for myself even though I might be favourably considered by this government. There will be great law enforcement problems as a result of this construction.

The minister says it was a good deal that Foothills were required by the agreement to instal feeder lines to supply communities in the Yukon, British Columbia, and elsewhere along the route. Unlike British Columbia and Alberta, the Yukon does not have any utility companies to look after distribution, and I hope the government does not intend to impose that responsibility on NCPC. That would not be a good arrangement.

The minister also said that there will be time for the necessary studies to be made and some will be published in June. More important, he said that the timing will permit the settlement of native land claims. Mr. Speaker, those negotiations have been going on since 1973. In 1968 the Prime Minister made a speech in Vancouver in which he reaffirmed his belief—which was strange, coming as it did from a professor of law—that there were no such things as aboriginal rights and that no more treaties would be signed with the native people of Canada. Someone got to him, Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the debates in this House, or perhaps through the council of the National Indian Brotherhood. Local associations were not set up until they were funded by this government. By its funding and policies it lifted the lid on Pandora's box. Members of the government do not know where they are now on Indian policy, they do not know where they are going, and when they get there they probably will not know where they have been. The matter is totally, completely, and utterly out of control, with no guidance being offered by this government to bring these claims to quick settlement.

As recently as two weeks ago the CYI put the government on notice when they visited Ottawa that they are going to bend every effort to prevent this project from going ahead. I do not agree with that. On more than one occasion the leader of this party has stated our policy as believing that negotiations of these claims can proceed hand in hand, without one prejudicing the other. The position of the New Democratic Party is quite the reverse. There is no reason for the negotiation and settlement of Indian land claims going ahead at the same time as this or any other development, with one rider, that the development should not in any way prejudice the just settlement of these claims.

The government is in for a shock if it thinks that it is on the verge of settling any land claims with the Yukon native people. It will not happen unless it legislates them out of existence and that is precisely what I think it has smuggled into this bill. Unless I am mistaken on a combined reading of clause 16 together with clause 25(3), the bill deprives the right of the native groups to use a judicial device which they would be tempted to use in order to prevent construction from going ahead.

To illustrate I will quote some words said by a prominent member of our party on this side of the House. "In all my years at the bar and in all my time as a legislator here I have never seen a more gross intrusion of government control in any legislation." This is the first time I have seen anything like these repulsive clauses in a bill. It gives the governor in council, the cabinet, virtually the power to amend any regulation made under any act of parliament affecting any aspect of the pipeline or any person working on it. I believe I have that accurately. The Deputy Prime Minister nods his head. He is nodding his head in the affirmative. I hope he is not going to sleep.

This is one of the more important and most offensive points of this bill. It practically places the power in the hands of the regulatory agency to make a decision with respect to any matter it chooses. If there happens to be a law contained in a regulation under an act of parliament which conflicts with that decision of the board, we have to change it. It does not make any difference what act it is, unfortunately. I have not as yet looked carefully to see whether it offends the Bill of Rights, I do not think that it does.

Let us consider the example of CYI wanting to appear before the board to obtain a decision with respect to the route of the pipeline crossing lands which they have traditionally occupied as an established village for a few hundred years. If the board says to the native groups in the village, "I am sorry the pipeline has to go through the centre of your village; you have to take your pump and so on, that is it," what recourse does the group have? They have the power of appeal under clause 23(5). What appeal does that give to the offended citizen? It gives the Federal Court, and only that court, the right to confirm the board's decision or the right to refer the matter back to the board for further consideration. In my opinion that is a denial of a fundamental right of British justice guaranteeing the citizen free access to the courts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The normal provision, and the Deputy Prime Minister is aware of this, provides that any legislation affecting jurisdiction of appellate tribunals is to provide in that appellate tribunal the power to quash, alter, refer back, or confirm. If that power in clause 23(5) were broadened to include in the power of the appellate tribunal the power to alter the decision of the board, it would be more acceptable. But the way it is now, it is totally unacceptable. We will be making every effort, short of any filibuster, to convince the committee members, and perhaps the government, prior to hearings in committee that it should do the proper thing and amend that clause, or declare its intentions so to do, so as to include that normal power of the appellate tribunal in this bill.

There are enormous transfers of power under the bill which can be transferred from one minister to the other. I assume that the Deputy Prime Minister will be the minister designated under the provisions of the bill—if he can patch up his differences with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—at any time he can transfer his powers or any privilege. As far as the powers of the National Energy Board which are contained in this bill are concerned they are such that the National Energy Board is emasculated if the cabinet so chooses to decide. It can tell the National Energy Board to do anything it pleases. I think it does now anyway.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: But this bill certainly is like the opening of the mail bill—they are going to make lawful now what I strongly suspect them of doing anyway.

It has not been satisfactorily explained to me yet why the National Energy Board itself could not be the single regulatory agency in this instance. It has the skills, the expertise, the historical experience in matters of this nature; it has dealt with it for years. If the National Energy Board does not have sufficient personnel at present to cope with the added responsibility, no one has explained that.

I know the Deputy Prime Minister in his press release thought that it would be staffed by 200 personnel at peak—I think that is what he said. But having regard to the track record of this government in keeping the lid on the growth of bureaucracy in this country, I am afraid I do not have much confidence in that statement of the minister's. The bill does not make any provision for a maximum number that will serve on this proposed new board. If the Deputy Prime Minister's estimate is wrong, and I am sure that it will be, instead of 200 there will be 1,000 bureaucrats working for that agency.

There is a further provision. The bill provides for the setting up of advisory councils. The number on these councils is limited to ten, but there is no limit to the number of advisory councils which can be set up. It could be one or it could be 100. What a refuge for goodness knows how many friends of the Liberal party that will be, having regard to their track record lately. I think I speak on behalf of my party on this side of the House when I say that the government must give some consideration to limiting the numbers required in the regulatory agency.

If the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) would like a pillow I will be happy to provide it. Perhaps I can call it five o'clock in order to allow the hon. member for Nickel Belt to have a nap.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SUGGESTED INSTITUTE OF HUMAN ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of setting up, in co-operation with the provinces, an Institute of Human Environmental Studies to determine, among other matters the (a) degree of air, soil, water and noise pollution the human species can tolerate without serious effects on physical and mental health (b) type of environment which stimulates the most desirable qualities of physical and mental health in the human species (c) type of national development which would give satisfactory environment to the greatest possible number of Canadians (d) minimum of modifications to the present day indiscriminate and largely unplanned growth of our metropolitan areas necessary to put within reach of the inhabitants of these areas a quality of environment which would provide adequate (i) housing (ii) recreational facilities, including parkland (iii) social infrastructure, such as transportation, education, hospital and recreation facilities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion there are two things I should like to make clear at the outset. First, I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of the House, that the original drafting of the motion is not my own.

The original drafter of this motion is a former colleague of ours in this House who represented the constituency of Malpeque, a minister of fisheries for many years in a former government who is now leader of the opposition in the Prince Edward Island legislature. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have spoken to our former colleague about this matter; I had the privilege of being in the House on the last day he took part in the discussion of this motion, which was on October 18, 1974. I was impressed by the spirit of the motion and by what it seeks to accomplish in terms of the human condition, and although I realize that many private members' motions lead to nothing concrete, it is nevertheless important, in my view, that from time to time an opportunity should be provided to discuss matters affecting the human condition.

I am happy to report to the House that this motion does not involve the setting up of a bureaucracy which would take any part of the decision-making process or advisory responsibility out of the hands of the public service. But it does give credence to the proposition that there is a split jurisdiction in environmental matters, among others. It is not intended to be an attack on the work which the federal Department of the Environment is doing, or on the work which any ministry in any provincial government is doing. As I said, it is brought forward so that members of this House can address themselves to a very important subject. This is not to say I would not be delighted if the motion, broadly based as it is, were to receive the approval of the House. But I do not rise in any anticipation that it will.

Mr. Angus MacLean, then member for Malpeque, introducing his motion on October 18, 1974, had this to say as reported in Hansard at page 537:

Mr. Speaker, I have no illusions that what I am about to say will cause a sensation ... however, I feel a strong urge to put forth my views—

Anyone who knows the hon. member will appreciate the sincerity of his feelings on this subject. About the greatest compliment which could be paid to him was paid by the House leader of the New Democratic Party a few moments ago; just before we began this debate he indicated that this was an all-encompassing motion and inquired whether there was anything our former colleague had forgotten. I assured him he had not.

One of the things which concerns all of us today in this country is our preoccupation with bigness, whether it is big government, big organizations or large communities. This has created problems both for those who are directly involved and for others outside big complexes who have seen their populations and opportunities diminish. The sad fact is that today almost three quarters of our population live in cities and towns. This is not necessarily bad in itself, but it is predicted that by 1980 almost two thirds of the Canadian population will live in 29 major communities, almost one third of them in the three cities of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. Whereas at one time cities were places where communication was easy, transportation was readily available and services could be supplied in an inexpensive way, this is not the case today. One has only to speak to a city planner or to a transportation expert to be told that cities everywhere, even the national capital area in which we live, are plagued by shortcomings in the services I have mentioned. So we have to consider carefully the direction in which we are moving and try to decide whether or not that direction is appropriate. We must attempt to decide whether or not the fixing of an optimum size for city growth is appropriate and, if so, whether development should be restricted. Are we neglecting the virtues which are to be found in the smaller communities of Canada?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Industrialists are gregarious. They like to move to places where other industries are already established. Thus, from year to year our problems are compounded and the development underlined in the statistics I have quoted is reinforced.

Many writers have pointed out that the rural areas are beginning to suffer from decay; they are exporting their best people to the cities where jobs are available. Consequently, the agricultural community is increasingly less able to provide commodities upon which other sectors of the economy rely. It is important we should not assess blame. We have simply allowed this to happen.

• (1712)

The problem is compounded by the shortage of agricultural land in the vicinity of great cities. Those who provide the sustenance of life, as far as our weather allows it to be produced, are leaving the farms. We tend to rely on technology to which there is a limit. Plainly, we have to look at where we are going.

The object of this motion is to create an institution outside of the political necessities of government. There are political necessities regardless of what political party one may be talking about. One level of government must discuss in co-operation rather than in opposition with the other the problems that we face.

We have come to regard the trend of centralizing in large cities as so much a part of our national make-up that our heads are down. We really are not looking at what we are doing. We should look at the experience in the United States with some of their cities. I know that none of ours have reached that size. All levels of government in this country must look at this problem while there is time. The purpose of this proposal is to ask the government to consider ways in which a new direction can be found, or at least a new insight into our problems.

With very few exceptions, communities around the rim of the city of Ottawa are growing as residences and ancillary to the city of Ottawa. Rather than growing in terms of themselves, they are becoming dormitories.

Small towns which have amenities which are useful to people who would live there and establish businesses with resultant employment are not growing to any great extent as the movement to urbanization continues. This is important to the kind of lifestyle we want in our country. It is important to the lifestyle of those who by necessity or otherwise must reside in our cities.

I am also concerned about the environment the cities create and the housing problems that are there. Whether it be housing for men and women with young families or housing for senior citizens, in the smaller communities of Ontario on a per capita basis there is a better quality and a greater number of senior citizen residences in the smaller communities than in the cities. There is an atmosphere of concern. The problems are apparent. That is part of the goodness of living in a smaller community. In spite of this, we still develop large cities with large problems. It is to this question my motion directs itself.

Quite frankly, we are getting to the point where if a community in this country, or indeed in all of North America, boasts that it is the most rapidly growing community, it is like someone saying he has the fastest growing cancer in town. The ravages of growth are all around us.

The proposal in my motion is to couch the problems that we face as a nation, as a part of North America and as part of the civilized and now urbanized world. Appropriate policies must be designed not only to improve the existing environment but to ensure that we do not forget there may be an alternative. That alternative may well come through a form of co-operation that has not existed here before.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on the remarks he has made today and, in particular, for paying tribute to a former colleague who first spoke on this motion in 1974. The motion was also presented by our former colleague in 1976. He was very persistent. It is now again before the government.

I wish to point out to the hon. member that there have been some significant results because of this coming before the House of Commons in that the Environment Contaminants Act was passed in 1975 or 1976. Much has been done and much more will be done. However, it is timely that this matter is again before the House of Commons.

I thank the hon. member, not for the practicality of the suggestion, because I do not think it is either practical or necessary, but because the motion demonstrates a real concern for our environment.

I do not think it is necessary to restate this government's concern for a clean, healthy environment. Rather, the record of the government speaks for itself. This is our best evidence. The measures the government has adopted, particularly since the establishment of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, have been strong, positive measures designed to yield tangible results. I am pleased to say that we are beginning to see those results.

One of the best examples perhaps, only because it has been such an obvious pollutant, is sulphur dioxide. As a result of guidelines established by the Department of Fisheries and the Environment and the cooperation of the industries concerned, we are beginning to see a reduction in sulphur dioxide levels in the air. The same is true of particulates. All told, there have been guidelines established now for emission into the air of five significant pollutants and further guidelines for the discharge of five others into our rivers, lakes and streams.

Polychlorinated Biphenyls or PCBs, which are especially persistent in the environment, are being phased out of use and fluorocarbons are being carefully studied to determine their real effect. Progress through research is also being made on the problem of the long range transport of air pollutants. This is a particularly insidious problem that enables air pollutants from one source to have a detrimental effect hundreds or even thousands of miles away.

I mention these achievements, not simply to oppose the motion, but to demonstrate that concern for the environment is being translated into action. At the same time, however, I believe there there is one element in the motion that deserves some discussion.

The motion before us is praiseworthy in that it looks at the environment in a comprehensive way as a web of interdependent, complex, relationships. This government, largely through the Departments of the Environment, National Health and Welfare, and Urban Affairs, has been looking at the environment in the same way for many years. One of the humbling aspects of this approach, really the only approach, is the realization that we do not know all we should about the environment and the delicate relationships that comprise it.

One example that springs to mind is that of the Canadian chemical industry. That industry is now undergoing exceptional growth, growth that we all welcome. At the same time, however, we know that such growth must inevitably mean the planned introduction of thousands of new chemicals into industrial processes. Needless to say, our scientists cannot even hope to be able to keep up with the monitoring of these chemicals in the environment, either locally or on a wider scale. Unfortunately, I suppose progress dictates that this scenario is repeated time after time as our society expands and develops.

Clearly, neither this government nor any other would simply say that development must stop. Still the problem remains and, to my mind, there are only two solutions to it; research, and the establishment of mechanisms to prevent the introduction of potentially harmful substances into the environment, not after the fact but before.

• (1722)

We have already heard about the research programs now being conducted in the Departments of National Health and Welfare, and Urban Affairs. The Department of the Environment, as the lead department in environmental matters, also has extensive research programs aimed at discovering the kind of basic information and data asked for in the motion before us today. These are long-term, comprehensive research programs that have produced a great deal of knowledge in the past and will continue to do so in the future.

Additionally, the department has an excellent relationship with many faculties of environmental studies in universities across the country. There, more valuable research is being carried out and, I might mention, a great deal of it funded by the Department of Fisheries and the Environment.

Before I leave the question of research, however, I should like to emphasize that the investigations conducted both by and for the department are not carried out in a vacuum. Because I believe this is the primary intention of the motion, I can assure you there is a very real and useful exchange of information both between government departments and between those departments and the academic community.

Essentially then what is being asked for in the motion is already being done, and because this is so I can see little value in adding another largely redundant bureaucracy. Such an action in these times of restraint and difficult economic realities would be irresponsible. In terms of real progress toward a cleaner environment, the establishment of the institute would be far more symbolic than real.

As I said earlier, research is necessary to enhance our knowledge of the environment. In the meantime, however, we must have mechanisms, not simply to clean up after ourselves, although those are necessary, but to prevent the introduction of harmful substances or to restrict potentially harmful activities.

In this respect, the Environmental Contaminants Act, passed by this House in 1975, is one of the world's leading pieces of legislation. It establishes the precedent that chemical or other potential contaminants must be approved for use before they can be introduced into processes through which they might enter the environment. I believe this to be an extremely important approach and one that reflects the concern of this government for our environmental well-being. No longer is it enough that a new chemical may make an industrial process cheaper or more efficient. Environmental destruction is not an acceptable price for higher profits.

Finally, in the area of potentially damaging activities, the government has also taken an important step through the establishment of the environmental assessment review process. The objective of the process is to determine the impact of federal projects before they are carried out rather than having to deal with the impact after the fact. Although the actual conduct of the process is still being refined, it is working, and there are now 22 separate projects under review.

In conclusion let me say that these are significant measures. More important still, they are positive action designed to prevent and solve problems—real problems. I do not think yet another institution will increase our ability to do that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is good to have the Angus MacLean motion before us again, and I congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on giving notice of it so we could have this discussion.

As the member who moved the motion indicated, I made a comment to him just before he commenced in which I indicated the terms in which I see the resolution, but it is obvious that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson) did not see it at all in those terms.

My friend across the way made the surprising statement that we do not need this motion because everything it calls for is being done. How could my friend, a reasonable, decent, and honest fellow, make a statement like that? I think the reason he did it was that he thought in terms of the environment, as relating only to things like clean air, clean water and so on, and because he can claim the government has a department working on these things he says the same things are already being done, so we are on the road.

[Mr. Robinson.]

When I look at this motion it seems to me that what is being called for in the title "An Institute of Human Environmental Studies" is a body that will consider everything which relates to the human condition. Most of the bodies we have for studying things are cast in economic terms. We have the Economic Council of Canada, the Conference Board in Canada, and the C. D. Howe Research Institute. Most of these bodies make assessments and report to parliament or the government in economic terms. It would be a really good idea to parallel these bodies with this kind of institute that would be concerned about everything which affects human beings.

As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has pointed out, this would include not only clean air and clean water, but decisions as to the sizes of our cities, the spaces between our cities and towns, green belts, and all of that kind of thing. I suggest it includes matters having to do with conditions under which people live at various ages of their lives, what we do about education, about recreation for people during their working years and, as well, includes the question of whether older people should be maintained in their own homes or should be maintained in institutions of various kinds. This would include the effect on life of things that have to do with social security, and mental health comes into it, as well as the effect on our society of more crime than is tolerable, and so on. It literally affects everything. As I say, the thing I like about this motion is that very universality I see in it.

Like others, I recall very well speeches made by Angus MacLean when he was the member in this House for Malpeque, particularly his very strong presentation of the case for small being beautiful. I am glad, as I say, that the motion is before us again. I think the House might consider supporting it in one way or another because it seems to me what it seeks is for the government, parliament, and people in public life to think not only in cold, crass, materialistic, economic terms, but to think in human terms, and in terms of what everything that touches our lives can do to advance the human condition. That is our purpose surely in this life and in this country, not just to have a country that one can boast of as being prosperous and able to solve its economic problems. Surely what we want is a society that is a good place for human beings. For that reason I am very happy to join with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton in supporting once again the Angus MacLean motion.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the motion put before the House by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) concerns an issue which is both comprehensive and critical. If my memory serves me correctly, we have had a similar type of motion before the House on more than one occasion. At least in the time I have been here I remember participating in a debate on a private member's motion regarding the same suggestion being put forward here this afternoon. I cannot help but mention the sad position taken by members of the Conservative party, in that they speak on the one hand about too many Crown corporations, suggesting that we must cut back, conserve and be conservative, yet on the other they want us to support a suggestion today that would create another agency for the expenditure of money, this makes no sense at all.

As the motion suggests, the human environment encompasses a broad range of factors including elements of the natural environment such as the purity of air and water, the condition of the soil, and the level of noise, as well as elements of the constructed environment such as the quality of housing, access to open space, and the availability of social services.

● (1732)

This wide spectrum of consideration touches the lives of individual Canadians in diverse ways. Our physical health can be impaired by the high decibel levels we must endure, the high concentrations of nitrogen dioxide in the air we breathe, the contaminants in the water we drink and the harmful additives in the food we eat. In corresponding fashion, our daily activities and levels of satisfaction can be affected for better or for worse by the design of our homes; the internal layout of the dwelling, the amount of living space available, the use of appliances, amenities and private outdoor areas. Similarly, our psychological well-being can be influenced by features of the neighbourhood where we live; the presence of greenery and open space, as well as the absence of stressful situations such as crowded city streets. Finally, the lifestyle we choose can be enhanced by the provision of social services, leisure programs and recreation facilities such as daycare centres, fitness classes and community social functions.

In a larger context, Canadians as a group also have been immeasurably affected by the rapid, seemingly haphazard expansion of this nation's largest cities. A few of the consequences of unbridled metropolitan growth have been the conversion of fertile farmland from agricultural production to urban uses; the competition for, and resulting price escalation of, scarce serviced land; low-density suburbanization which fosters excessive dependence on the automobile; ill-conceived and poorly located development which squanders our natural environmental resources; and rapid increases in public expenditures for urban services. The outward sprawl of metropolitan centres has also influenced life in core areas. Inner city neighbourhoods, which are generally the homes of low income groups, are usually marked by congestion, pollution, a scarcity of recreation facilities and a deteriorating housing stock. Finally, urbanization focussed on the largest urban centres has also exacerbated regional disparities in income and opportunity.

In short, the government recognizes that the complex array of factors which comprise the human environment are of vital importance to all Canadians. In recognition of that importance, the government has had in place for some time units within a number of federal departments which conduct research, administer programs and regulate activities concerning the human environment. In many instances, federal efforts in this field are either carried out jointly or conducted in close consultation with the provinces.

Therefore, the question must be posed: is there a pressing need to create another institution—an institution of human environmental studies—to duplicate the work already conducted in this field by existing public agencies? Although it may seem attractive to create a new organization each time a new problem rears its head, the creation of a new institute would be an inappropriate and unnecessary response. A high profile and a comprehensive approach are some of the potential advantages of a new institute. However, the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of External Affairs and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are working already in a focussed and effective way to study, improve and protect our natural and built environment.

In support of this viewpoint, I will review briefly some aspects of the research efforts and action programs of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Urban Affairs. The intent is not to provide an exhaustive list of the agencies' programs and activities, but rather to illustrate in a selective manner the wide array of environmental issues considered and the progress made toward alleviating problems and enhancing opportunities in the fields of housing, recreation, neighbourhood improvement, public participation, urban growth management and over-all quality of life concerns. First I will describe the agencies' research activities; then I will discuss the program currently in place.

The research activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Urban Affairs may be considered as comprehensive yet focussed. A broad array of human environmental concerns are under investigation, but each research project zeroes in on a particular problem, whether it be to determine the most effective means for public participation or to assess the consequences of urban sprawl. Also it is important to recognize that the research is not conducted simply to expand our knowledge of the urban environment, although this undoubtedly occurs, but rather is directed specifically toward the development, assessment and further improvement of public policy.

The list of research efforts is quite impressive. Basic up-to-date information on the adequacy, suitability and affordability of housing in Canada's largest urban areas has been gathered and analysed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation through the 1974 survey of housing units. The study revealed that Canadians in the urban part of the country are well housed by almost any measure. The majority of the stock is less than 25 years old, is of good quality, has most of the facilities generally thought necessary, and provides a relatively high average amount of space per person.

However, housing involves more than bricks, mortar and mortgages. Even as an increasing proportion of the Canadian population has come to live in apartments, there continues to be a perception of high-rise as a spawning ground for alienation, isolation, crime and other forms of social pathology. In response, the Department of Urban Affairs has sponsored several investigations into the social and psychological consequences of living in high density conditions. The evidence thus obtained suggests that modest crowding, such as may exist in Canadian housing units, as a rule does not adversely affect the health, family life, or behaviour of the inhabitants.

Discernible emotional stress or physical illness, however, need not be the prime criterion for determining the suitability of a particular housing form—high-rise apartments—for household-type families with children. Less stringent criteria, such as dissatisfaction with the living environment, also must be given due heed. In this vein the studies have, as an example, found that the arrangement of space—the design and layout of rooms in the dwelling unit—is at least as important to the satisfaction of the occupants as the total amount of space available. Though tentative, the evidence further suggests that certain dwelling types are better suited to particular stages of a person's life cycle, with apartments being more suited to the lifestyles of single adults and the elderly, while low-rise single-detached units are more conducive to the needs of families.

Lest the wrong impression be created, government research related to the urban environment extends beyond the dwelling unit and the residential area. Thus, in recognition of the fragmented and unco-ordinated approach taken to open space planning in many Canadian communities, a set of guidelines for urban open space planning has been developed and widely disseminated by the Department of Urban Affairs, in conjunction with the Canadian Parks and Recreation Association. Guidelines are provided for the selection of locations and planning of uses for a diversity of open space areas ranging from small pocket parks through to neighbourhood playgrounds, community sports fields and regional conservation areas. The guidelines indicate that some factors which should be taken into account in developing open space areas are the size and spacing of areas, the frequency and intensity of use, the sociodemographic composition of the population and the prominent natural features.

The need to provide a better environment for children caught in the midst of rapid urban growth has prompted several government activities. At CMHC the children's environment advisory service was established some four years ago to provide information on creative day care centres, playground facilities and play areas in residential projects. On a longer term project basis, urban affairs is associated with the University of Toronto and the Hospital for Sick Children on "The Child in the City" research program. The project team is currently exploring how the health, opportunities and well-being of children are affected by the physical environment and social changes in cities.

Nor has the importance of public participation to effective urban planning been overlooked. It has been widely acknowledged that involvement by citizens in expressing their needs and establishing community priorities can increase the responsiveness of urban plans, heighten the citizens' sense of personal efficacy and reduce their alienation with big government. As a consequence, the Department of Urban Affairs is currently performing research to determine the types of circumstances and range of techniques that would allow for a more effective citizen participation in the urban decision-making process.

Research into problems inherent in the management of urban growth have been tackled from several angles. As an ever increasing number of Canadians have chosen to live and often work outside the traditionally built up areas of cities, the downtown areas of many Canadian urban centres have declined in a physical, social and economic sense. In response, the department has begun to explore the various options available for revitalizing central areas, including a study of how the residential component can be retained within the urban core area.

Another pressing issue facing urban centres is the increased demand for adequate housing coupled with a continued decrease in the supply of suitable serviced land. To preserve agricultural land and to provide housing, the ministry has begun to examine the potential that previously built-up residential areas have for accommodating additional growth through the introduction of infill housing which utilizes existing infrastructure and amenities.

Inquiry into the causes and consequences of urban growth often takes the form of a joint endeavour with the provinces. Urban sprawl, a pattern of settlement characterized by a small number of scattered communities, ribbon development and large, thinly populated rural areas, can encroach on productive farmland, engender excessive use of the automobile, despoil natural areas and severely strain the financial capacity of government. The ministry, in co-operation with the province of New Brunswick, has therefore embarked upon a full investigation of the broad fiscal, social and environmental costs and benefits of urban sprawl to governments and individuals in New Brunswick. It is anticipated that the study will provide policy options and suggest alternative settlement patterns suitable to the province.

In a similar vein the federal government and Saskatchewan have recently agreed to support jointly the study of development in the areas surrounding Regina, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and Prince Albert. The studies will encompass concerns such as agricultural use, urban sprawl, small community development, housing and regional services.

Last in this description but by no means least is the research effort that has touched on the broadest array of aspects of the urban human environment, namely, the development of quality of life profiles for Canadian cities. Under development for Canada's large and medium-size centres are statistical portraits of the health, education, work, leisure, housing, income and other aspects of residents' lives. Also measured are city differences in the provision of urban services such as health care, police and fire protection, recreational facilities and cable television. In order to expand public awareness and stimulate discussion on quality of life issues, some results from the nation's metropolitan areas have been reported in the publication "Urban Indicators: Quality of Life Comparisons in Canadian Cities".

Quite apart from the engrossing but somewhat frivolous pastime of determining which city is the best read, most cultured or best educated, the development of quality of life profiles for urban centres serves more serious purposes related to policy development, namely, to identify deficiencies in the provision of services and infrastructure in specific cities and to monitor conditions over time in order to assess improvements or deterioration in various key aspects of urban life.

To complement the work on quality of life profiles, the human environment directorate within the Department of Urban Affairs is currently completing a research design to survey the perceptions that urban Canadians have about the environment in which they live. The survey will inquire about people's satisfaction with their homes, their neighbourhood setting, the community services they receive, the recreation facilities available to them, their downtown area and other salient aspects of their city. Also investigated will be the aspects of the environment that residents consider most important, the services that they most wish to see improved and the role that they think various government levels should play in the betterment of their urban area. The study design for the proposed survey of people's urban concerns is currently under consideration by Treasury Board.

The list of research activities described is long, somewhat longer than I had intended, but it serves to emphasize that investigation and analysis of human environmental issues by existing agencies at the federal and provincial levels is already extensive. This suggests that the initiation of a corresponding research program within an institute of human environment would prove somewhat redundant.

But government agencies do more than investigate human environmental issues; they also implement programs to manage development of and facilitate improvements to the environment. A few examples drawn from the activities of CMHC and the department should prove sufficient to make the point.

Communities which dump raw sewage directly into rivers and streams are major polluters of the nation's waterways, but the high cost of constructing sewage disposal plants and trunk lines places excessive financial burden on small municipalities. This problem has been tackled at CMHC through both technological innovation and financial aid. From a technological standpoint, the corporation has supported the development of the Canadian Water Energy Loop—CANWEL. The system, which renovates household waste water and recovers energy from domestic garbage, is being introduced as a demonstration plant in a Toronto apartment building. When completed, the plant will treat half the sewage and all the garbage generated by the building's one thousand occupants. On a wider basis, the municipal infrastructure program provides financial assistance to provinces and municipalities for sewage collection and treatment installation, water supply system and trunk storm sewers.

Designed to overcome water and soil pollution as well as to increase the supply of serviced land, the program has seen more than $1 billion in financial assistance extended since its inception in 1961. Perhaps the most highly profiled programs found at CMHC for the improvement of the urban human environment are the neighbourhood improvement program and the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. NIP is designed to help municipalities and local residents preserve and improve the amenities and living conditions in older and low and moderate income neighbourhoods. Through a wide range of grants and loans the program assists designated neighbourhoods and eligible municipalities with a broad array of action, including the provision of social and recreational activities, the clearance of substandard properties, the redevelopment of clear land for social housing and the improvement of municipal services. Designed primarily to complement NIP, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program provides funds for the improvement and repair of substandard dwellings to bring them up to locally accepted standards of health and safety.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). The motion describes the activities of an institute of human environmental studies for the country working in co-operation with the provincial governments. The proposed institute is very much along the lines of an institute of environmental and occupational health related to the production of uranium to be located in my constituency. This concept was developed two or three years ago after the Hamm royal commission inquired into the health and safety hazards related to mining and also the production of uranium especially in the Elliot Lake area.

● (1752)

Subsequent to the report of that commission, several of us have worked to establish an environmental and occupational health research centre to be located at Elliot Lake, sponsored by the federal government, the provincial government and the mining industry. Companion to it would be an information centre dealing with providing information on various aspects of nuclear energy and uranium production. During this past year the federal government sponsored a study by the Elliot Lake centre into the design, function and operation of the proposed centre at a cost of some $200,000. It is encouraging that the mining companies and labour unions are very supportive of this proposal. When we consider what the demand for uranium will be in the next 30 to 50 years I believe the amount of money spent investigating the hazards is small. The Hamm royal commission report specified several areas where research should be done, such as safety standards, silicosis, dust levels in the mines and radiation levels in the mining environment.

Tremendous expansion of this industry is just beginning, Mr. Speaker. Elliot Lake has a population of about 12,000 at the present time and within eight to twelve years it is expected to reach around 30,000. A royal commission in Saskatchewan has mentioned the prospect of several new mines being developed in that province. Expansion of the mines means deeper levels of deposit of ore and greater problems of production.

I support the suggestion of the hon. member for Grenville Carleton with regard to this industry, Mr. Speaker. In the past, the difficulty with health and safety research has been its fragmentation between various governments, departments and agencies such as the Atomic Energy Control Board, Atomic Energy (Canda) Limited, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of National Health and Welfare and others. At the Provincial level research has been done by the department of health and the ministry of natural resources. Industry has also carried out some research. What we envisage is an independent research center with people drawn from both levels of government, from industry and labour.

The government, through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, has undertaken to provide $500,000 per year for the operation of the occupational and environmental research centre and there is some indication that the five underground uranium mining companies will match this. The federal commitment was made on the basis that the province of Ontario would provide an equal amount, but although the request was made in the spring of 1977 and the provincial government said it would indicate its intention by the fall, no support has been forthcoming. The project is thus delayed even though the initial stage is complete.

I think this institute is vital to carry out research and development for the safe expansion of the uranium industry in Canada. It should study community and environmental hazards, disposal of waste from the milling operation, occurrence of natural uranium within town sites and such problems.

The institute I have been speaking of could be very important to the health and safety not only of uranium miners but to people in the communities related to the production of uranium in Ontario and Saskatchewan, as well as in other provinces where it will be found in the future. The mines will expand from the production of a few thousand tons of yellowcake today to about 10,000 tons within eight to ten years. This kind of research facility could ensure that we will be able to cope with the problems of rapid expansion in the industry in Ontario and western Canada and, indeed, throughout the world. Each area of the world has different problems. Australia's problems, for instance, are not the same as those in Ontario, and Ontario's problems of deep underground mining are different from those of Saskatchewan with open pit mining.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to talk out this motion. While one cannot but applaud the good intentions attending this motion, one is moved to question the wisdom of creating yet another agency to study environmental questions of the kind raised in the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the hour allotted to the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada, and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking at the adjournment I called it five o'clock a minute or two early to enable the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) to have a nap, because he seemed to require some rest. I think he has slept in because I do not see him here now.

I regret that, although the spokesman on the issue for the NDP undoubtedly is here, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). As he usually does, he listens with judicious attention to what I have to contribute to these debates, as I do him. It would be my hope that what I have said thus far will convince him to convince in turn the members of his party that any attempt to delay the passage of this beneficial legislation in the best Canadian interests will be avoided here on second reading and in committee.

I want to draw to the attention of members that are here in such unfortunately small numbers—I could say the more important members are here—that before the drastic changes in the rules and the electronic conversion of this place to a very unexciting forensic forum a debate such as this would command the attention of two-thirds of the members of the House at least. There are not that many members attending committee meetings tonight who could not be here, and with legislation of this magnitude, it is rather shameful that members could not be present in greater numbers than they are tonight.

Again I castigate the government, if the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) would just pay attention for a moment. I have already drawn attention to the fact that the bill itself was in possession of members of the public before it was in possession of members of parliament. The press package was not even in the hands of most of the members until this morning's mail. Tonight members can accuse me of whatever they wish, but I was in the government's lobby looking for sugar for coffee and I found that the notes for the remarks of the minister, in both official languages, on the second reading of the northern pipeline bill are supplied in that lobby in stacks a foot high. There is nothing in our lobby that would enable members to have recourse to the actual words the minister used in the debate. This is the kind of attitude this government adopts with respect to informing members of parliament. If it was convenient for the minister to make these publications available in the governments' own lobby, why on earth did they not have the courtesy to make them available in the opposition lobby so that we on this side could have access to them in order to participate in the debate?

Before the adjournment, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking of the intent which is expressed in the appendices to the bill. Admirable as those intentions are, we have suggested that there should be some kind of regular quarterly monitoring process by parliament. I simply add that regardless of what degree of trust members throughout the House might hold with respect to the intentions of the government to follow through, the road to hell is paved with good intentions. It is essential, in our view, that that kind of monitoring process exist.

The Deputy Prime Minister accused the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) of charging that we have been sold out. He charged the member with labelling the bill as a sellout before it was exposed to parliament. I reject that contention of the Deputy Prime Minister. We do maintain, as I am sure my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands will maintain, that in certain areas we have been sold out, particularly those areas which affect my constituency. There are others which are more important and which I intend to mention briefly in a moment. Since the hon. member for Nickel Belt is not here, I do not have to be concerned about concluding too quickly.

An hon. Member: You will put him to sleep with that speech!

Mr. Nielsen: Before this electronic surveillance was introduced in the chamber I could hear that kind of intervention and reply to it. In any event, most of the interventions which come from that rump end of the House are worthless, so there is not much point attempting to listen to them, let alone reply to them.

Mr. Gilbert: The same applies to your end!

Mr. Paproski: Forget it. He can't hear you!

Mr. Nielsen: I want to reiterate the ground for this debate which was staked out by our leader on August 4—the conditions upon which we agreed in principle during that debate to accept the construction of the pipeline.

We have these reservations about it. Some of them have been covered by the Deputy Prime Minister in his remarks. Our leader said on that occasion that we agree in principle with the construction of that pipeline, but that before that construction commenced we would insist upon the following conditions.

That the $50 million advance impact payment to Yukon communities to the native peoples be in place.

That the $200 million heritage fund paid by the pipeline consortium to the Yukon government, up-front money, as recommended by the Lysyk inquiry and the National Energy Board, be in place for the purposes of planning.

That the investigation of temporary export permits for the sale of so-called Albertan "bubble gas" to the United States in return for future gas be in place.

That there would be pipeline capacity to handle future Canadian supplies; this is absolutely essential.

That a comprehensive study of the Dempster route, including the environmental and socio-economic impact and all of the other factors that go into such a study, be undertaken.

That there be no Canadian government financial guarantees. Such an undertaking has been forthcoming from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as well as from other members of the government sitting on the treasury benches.

That there be maximum possible participation by Canadians in jobs and the supply of material for Canadians. This, we contend, can only be accomplished through parliamentary input initiated by such a process as we have suggested or some modification thereof. I am sure with co-operation we can achieve this unless the government adheres to an arrogant denial of the possibility of any constructive suggestions coming from the opposition.

We must insist that there be access to northern gas supplies by northern communities. We insist upon the creation of a single agency to deal specifically with the socio-economic impact of the pipeline. In this connection, may I say, there was an order in council setting up the Lysyk inquiry which had the full force and effect of the law, with the inclusion of a term in that order in council that there would be a second stage inquiry. The Lysyk inquiry repeatedly, throughout its hearings, led people of the Yukon to believe that the representations which they were making before it would come before a second inquiry. That is the law as expressed in the order in council.

I know the government may abandon or alter or ignore an order in council at their will; that is also the law. But as the CYI has pointed out, this reneging on the government's promise amounts to betrayal. I understand from the replies to certain questions addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) and the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) that there is no such intention to hold any formal second stage inquiry but rather that it is the intention to allow the regulatory agency to accomplish this purpose. We want to consider that and make suggestions in committee with respect to how it can be accomplished. This idea of delaying the production of certain studies which are now under way until next June will not help the government's commitment that was made to provide this second stage inquiry.

Last, and most important, we insist there be a standing committee of whatever nature may be necessary to monitor pipeline conditions. Those are the conditions which we set forth on August 4 during debate. The minister really said nothing during that debate with respect to the government's plans, which they well knew at the time and which we insist upon knowing now. In case there be any doubt about what I have said with respect to the Yukon input by its people, let me just refer to a special delivery letter mailed from the Yukon only five days ago which I received only this evening thanks to the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne). The minister in the Yukon responsible for pipelines is directly at odds with the views of the commissioner and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in this government.

The report in the Whitehorse Star quoted Mr. MacKinnon as saying:

> The pipeline legislation presently before the House of Commons reflects a growing and powerful federal presence in the Yukon.

He refers to the clause of the bill calling for a single regulatory agency with respect to the pipeline construction, and calls attention to the fact that the Yukon representative will sit on the federal side of the council and will be appointed by the federal government. He said he objected to the concept of the Yukon not being treated equally with provincial counterparts on the council. This is apropos of the parliamentary secretary's comment that this government would not lose any face if the Yukon adopted the views of their elected representative, which I have put forward today.

The commissioner-in-council indicated that a legislative assembly should make legislation which could be accepted. Mr. MacKinnon pointed out that the Yukon should be totally involved in all matters pertaining to the pipeline through the territory and that it should not be confronted with complete and absolute federal control. The commissioner of the Yukon, viewing federal civil servants appointed by the minister, says—it is not true—that this advisory council—referring to the federal-provincial advisory council—will allow Yukoners to make an input, and added that this view was put before the Lysyk inquiry and was completely ignored in the legislation. He also pointed to the provisions for second stage environmental hearings and further socioeconomic hearings, misleading the people of the Yukon into believing that there would be that second stage public hearing and opportunity for input. This is false.

The commissioner further said that the Yukon representative would be selected by the executive committee and would reflect Yukon policy, which he claims makes the appointment a political decision that follows the wishes of the Yukon representatives. This is false. That is not what is provided in the bill.

With respect to this commissioner, and previous commissioners in terms of the colonial status of the Yukon, when the minister says to his commissioner "Jump!", what the commissioner says is "How high?". That is exactly what is going to happen unless amendments are made to the bill.

● (2022)

The native position has been betrayed by the reneging of the government on their promise, embodied in the law, of a second stage inquiry. I can foresee grave difficulties being encountered in dealing with that situation in order to give quick and efficient passage to this bill.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) will be the next participant in this debate. He will deal with the labour problems involved in this legislation and the utter lack of any plans being in place by the government regarding training. Private enterprise, through AGTL and others, have been in the process of training northerners, particularly native northerners, for six and seven years to assume operative skills once that pipeline is completed. What has the government done? Nothing. My friend from Vancouver South will deal with that at great length.

I was interested in a television program last night in which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) participated. The subject under discussion was the pre-build of the Alberta section. I ask him to correct me if I am wrong, but I gathered it was his opinion that this would delay the Yukon construction some ten to 20 years. I am not that pessimistic.

We were assured by the Foothills officials with whom we spoke in our studies prior to this debate that there would be no delay. We were assured by the Deputy Prime Minister that it was the intention of the government to adhere strictly to the schedule which set forth the international agreement that pipeline laying would begin January 1, 1981 in the Yukon. If I were a gambling man, I would not bet on that because of the financial implications inherent in the pre-building of the Alberta section, enabling the more facile financing of the northern sections.

It is likely that the construction schedule will be delayed. That is of great concern to me, as it should be to all members. Complete financing will not happen; it will happen section by section. However, assuming complete financing at once, the implication could be as much as $100 million a month in interest alone on a project of this magnitude.

I want to mention something in passing, but with no less sincerity for it being mentioned in such a style. It is essential that the fovernment include in its overall Canadian content planning and Canadian participation in not only pipe and steel but all the related industrial requirements in terms of supplies such as valves, fittings and the like, the province of Quebec, their steel industry and their manufacturing capability. They should be very positively involved in a most encouraging way in this whole project. I can see very positive implications in this project of interest to all Canadians with regard to encouraging the process of national unity.

It concerns me that there may not only be governmental but financial pressures brought to bear with regard to tendering practices and the bidding for the supply of goods and meterials and labour on this project. The intentions are spelled out. They all sound very well, but again the monitoring process is an effective parliamentary check on malpractices that could develop.

I wish to make a personal suggestion here, not as a party position. Perhaps the government might consider a provision in the bill similar to that inserted in the AIB legislation. Upon the petition of a given number of members, say 50, the progress of the project might be reviewed from time to time by a debate in parliament. That would at least accomplish exposure of any unfair practices or irregularities.

On the same television program, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands also discussed the gas swap in terms of the Alberta pre-build. There are two points of view. The one he expressed contained an inference that there was a split in cabinet. I think that is putting it mildly. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member in the expression of that view, which is the way I understood it.

There is a body of opinion which believes it is impossible to arrange that pre-build without paying market prices now in terms of exports to the United States, and market prices three, four or five years from now in terms of the cost to Canada on the return of that swap. My own personal viewpoint, again not expressing the policy of the party, is that it should be gas for gas and volume for volume. In this regard I agree with the very sensible position adopted by the hon. member. I hope he is just as sensible in working toward the achievement of that kind of condition so that in the interest of Canadians generally we do not delay passage of the legislation.

Imagine the plethora of orders in council with which we are going to be confronted. Enormous powers will be granted under clauses 14, 15 and 16 of the bill. In the years of the Diefenbaker government, a gentleman's arrangement was made. The Deputy Prime Minister will remember this. Orders in council were to be tabled monthly, and they were. Since 1963, that practice has been discontinued. Unless you ask specifically for the tabling of an order in council, you never see it. Under the sweeping provisions of clauses 14, 15 and 16, we are going to be confronted with numerous orders in council that will not be tabled unless they are specifically requested.

I request from the government, if not an embodiment in the legislation, at least an assurance that once a month copies of orders and decisions of the board and any orders in council made under this legislation will be tabled in this House. In that way we will be informed of the manner in which the regulatory agency is conducting this project.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) will be dealing with the judicial features of this aspect of the debate. He will deal with clauses 16 and 23 at greater length.

I am sure the minister unintentionally misled the House. I ask for his attention because I hesitate to speak about misleading the House when he is not listening. He unintentionally misled the House when he spoke of the judicial appeal provisions in clause 23 of the legislation. If I read him correctly, not having had the opportunity of studying the release in his lobby, he said that the American legislation had similar provisions. That is not correct. Close examination of the American legislation will reveal they have provided that there will be a court of appeal. That court of appeal will be district court of appeal for the District of Columbia in Washington. But there is no limitation whatsoever spelled out in the United States legislation with regard to the appellate tribunal. They may quash, alter or confirm. They have the ordinary full powers of an appeal tribunal. However, as I say, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) will be dealing with that in a more detailed fashion.

I have dealt with the second stage inquiry, and I would now like to conclude this debate, as far as I am concerned, on this note. I am sorry I did not hear the intervention about Solomon, or whatever it was, and again I blame the electronic puppetry we have in this place.

I think it is absolutely vital to the Canadian interest that there be an opportunity for Canadians as a whole to share in the equity investment of this project—that is essential. That is what the 1956 debate was all about. In those days the shares were to go to Americans for something like $10 apiece and had to be bought back by Canadians at something like $40 apiece. That is why the government fell on that occasion, that great sellout of the Canadian position.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I would suggest that the railroad spokesman for the NDP down there is off the rails.

An hon. Member: What about a used car?

Mr. Nielsen: I would not buy a used car from anyone in that government.

Mr. Goodale: Now they have derailed your train of thought.

Mr. Nielsen: They have not derailed my train of thought, for the benefit of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), one of the few over there from out west.

An hon. Member: A growing number.

Mr. Nielsen: There must be that opportunity for more equity investment by Canadians. It was denied to Canadians in 1956. If ever there was a betrayal, that was it.

We have a shining example of how this situation can be handled in the manner in which AGTL was set up, where the citizens of Alberta exclusively, because the resource was in that province and the action was there, were given the right to participate fully in the equity stock of that company.

It is my understanding that Foothills from the beginning has said that all of the equity would be held by Canadian firms or individuals. This is to that company a fundamental factor in the presentation of its plan for equity to Canadians. I am also informed that the company has not yet designed its final share offering or how it is going to split it because it involves tax and financial problems, all of which have to be overcome. However, at the moment it would appear that a 25-75 equity debt system is envisaged by the company. The president of Foothills, Mr. Blair, has said there will be a share offering to the Canadian public in an equity way. I would commend to the minister, if he has not studied the matter yet, a reading of the AGTL legislation setting up that company, which in magnitude is far and away less than this one; but nonetheless, we have seen some very sound participation by Canadians in principal and equity stock.

The National Energy Board Act, as I understand it, stipulates that Westcoast and AGTL must retain 51 per cent ownership of Foothills. That does not cover the situation we envisage. We want to see Canadians as a whole participate in the largest possible equity sense. There is no doubt in my mind that a great many more than Foothills might anticipate would in fact invest in the equity. This is a very attractive investment and, goodness knows, there are enough savings in the fiscal system of Canada to be invested in a project of this nature.

The best I can say here is that we will be advancing at the committee stage suggestions which will be more specific and designed so as to ensure that in the bill there are positive requirements allowing the widest possible participation by Canadians as a whole throughout the country in the equity investment of this project.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I see that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has finally awakened and is back in his seat. I welcome him back. Again I say it is a pity I cannot hear those hon. members but this new electronic suppetry we have here prevents that.

We believe, like the deputy minister, this bill with improvements will command the support of the Canadian people generally, but the government will have to amend its ways and soften its arrogance and intransigent attitude in respect of positive, meaningful and constructive amendments from this side. We too have studied the bill. We have gone into it in some depth. We have a modicum of information and some idea of what might be in the best Canadian interests. Normally we would reject it, but we think we can help to improve the bill and make it more meaningful and more positive. We will be making proposals and suggestions in the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Unlike hon. members who are heckling from the rump to my left, whose interjections—

An hon. Member: We are just trying to be helpful.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure the contribution that will be made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) will be useful. I know he has some knowledge about the subject matter. I have listened to him for too many years to think otherwise. I am sorry I cannot share that same confidence in respect of the other members of that party in the rump, and that applies especially to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) whose tongue is always in gear when his mind is not functioning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: This bill can do more to accomplish a sense of national purpose and unity in this country than anything that has transpired during ten years of Trudeau musings and of a tired and worn out government. I beg the government to approach the matter in that sense, and I ask the NDP to join with us in that purpose because it could contribute to that sense of unity. A project of this magnitude could do more for unity in this country than anything that has happened in the last ten years. We on this side urge members throughout the House to approach the debate with that overriding purpose. We urge them to give second reading reasonably rapid approval. Let us get the bill into committee, advance our arguments and amendments there, and eliminate unnecessary delays. The hon. member of Nickel Belt is crying about unemployment in the Sudbury basin and so on. Just think what this bill means in terms of employment and industry to this country. Let us not adopt an obstructionist attitude. Let us get the bill through second reading and into committee where we can possibly, get our amendments passed. The Liberals have the majority. If they do not want them, they will reject them; there is nothing we can do about that. If we do not adopt that attitude, the shock waves in the financial community and the political environment in the United States could very well kill this project, which is so vital to the national interest of all Canadians.

● (2042)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for the Yukon permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. member for the Yukon permit a question by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Neilsen: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon, as I am sure all members have. Would he summarize in 50 words or less exactly where he and his party stand on the second stage inquiry?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member has not been listening. I have described it as a betrayal by the government. The order in council setting up the Lysyk inquiry contained a term of reference promising a second stage inquiry. Throughout the inquiry, Dr. Lysyk repeated to the people of the Yukon that such an inquiry would be held. The native people relied on the second stage inquiry. They did not appear before the first inquiry, relying on the fact that they would be able to appear before the second stage inquiry. Hon. members opposite are in trouble because of that.

Mr. Milne: Where does the hon. member stand?

Mr. Nielsen: There should have been a second stage inquiry. With proper direction, it can be embodied in the agency process, but it cannot be part and parcel of the over-all responsibilities of that agency. It has to be directed toward hearing the views and opinions of the people of the Yukon, who were promised that they would be heard on the second stage inquiry.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-25 seeks to give effect to the Canada-United States agreement, which was signed in Ottawa on September 20 by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) on behalf of Canada, and by Mr. James Schlesinger, President Carter's energy aide, on behalf of the United States. Despite the fact that it has taken the government four and a half months to formulate legislation which the United States Congress has ratified already, the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council is now urging us to expedite this legislation as quickly as possible. I can understand the minister being very anxious to hurry this legislation through the House. What I cannot understand was the vehement attack which was made on the New Democratic Party by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who started out by saying that he had spent a great deal of time with representatives of the oil and gas companies. Also he indicated that they had informed him and educated him on this subject. I suggest a refresher course might be in order.

Then he went on to say that he was absolutely certain that hon. members of the New Democratic Party had not met with any of the officials of these companies which, like so many statements he makes, is entirely unfounded. As a matter of fact, members of my party met with all the groups concerned. They met with Arctic Gas when they were promoting the Mackenzie Valley pipeline; with Foothills when they were pushing the Maple Leaf line; and during the last year with Foothills (Yukon) Limited, both before the decision of the National Energy Board and since. As a matter of fact, we have met with them two or three times in the last two or three weeks. Just as much as the Progressive Conservative party, we have sought to familiarize ourselves with all points of view.

When the hon. member for Yukon accuses both the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and myself of attempting to filibuster the legislation, he is talking absolute nonsense. As a matter of fact, if he visited this place more frequently, he would know differently.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): He would know that under our system of parliamentary procedure there is no way in which a party of our size can filibuster legislation. I have great difficulty attempting to decide on which side the hon. member for Yukon is on this question, as well as on which side the Progressive Conservative party is.

It seems to me the hon. member for Yukon, like the people of a very old profession, was playing both sides of the street. He started out by attacking the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby because the latter had said, on the items which we had been promised with respect to the proposed pipeline, that most of them had gone down the tube. Then the hon. member for Yukon proceeded, item by item, to show that they had gone down the tube. He read the list of the conditions which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had propounded on August 4 as being the conditions to which the government should subscribe if it wanted the support of the Progressive Conservative party. Then he proceeded, clause by clause, to show that none of those conditions has been met. He wants to be in a position where he can say that his party voted for the pipeline because it will have some benefit to the Yukon, at the same time as being able to say that his party criticized the government for all its failures and deficiencies in this project.

Let me put the position of the New Democratic Party very clearly. In the first place, we suggest that this is the biggest and costliest project which has ever been undertaken by Canada in its long history. We are being asked to embark upon this project without knowing what the exact route is going to be. It has not been fully surveyed. It has had none of the environmental study which went into the Mackenzie Valley pipeline route. The Dempster spur has not even been studied, let alone surveyed. There are no gas contracts yet formulated and no prices yet set for the gas.

Most seriously, today when we are at the second reading stage of the bill we do not even know what the specifications for the pipe will be. I was appalled when the President of Privy Council stood in his place and suggested that, as long as we have that information before we take a vote, it is not necessary to have it while we are debating. The specifications will decide the cost of the line, for one thing. It will cost, by the government's own figures, $545 million more if high pressure pipe is used. The specifications will determine what the Canadian content will be and how much of the steel pipe will be processed in Canada, because we have very limited capacity to process high pressure pipe. These specifications will determine what orders will go to Canadian companies and what jobs will go to Canadian workers, but the President of Privy Council says that is not important and that we ought to be able to carry on an intelligent discussion about a project of this magnitude without having this information. That is also the position of the hon. member for Yukon, who says, "Hurry this thing through, you don't have to have this information."

Mr. Nielsen: I didn't say that.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is he suggesting, like the President of Privy Council, that we should buy a pig in a poke? All the vituperations of the hon. member for Yukon and all the urgings of the President of Privy Council will not persuade us to shirk our responsibility to insist that the government make clear all the terms and conditions which will apply with respect to a project which the Canadian people are going to have to live with for many years to come.

Let me look first at some of the events leading up to this pipeline agreement. For two or three years most of the ministers of the Crown had been supporting—some vigorously and some more than others—the application of Arctic Gas, a consortium of American companies which wanted to build the pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley. The most outspoken advocate was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) who on every occasion implied that it could virtually be taken for granted that the National Energy Board was going to approve a permit for Arctic Gas. Members of the New Democratic Party opposed the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and we did so for good and sufficient reasons which I have given to the House previously, and there is no need for me to repeat them here tonight.

The New Democratic Party was the first party to propose very serious consideration for the Alcan route through amendments and motions we moved on February 23 last and on May 13 last. We pointed out why we thought the Mackenzie Valley route would be disastrous for Canada, why it would be uneconomic and would hold no advantages for the Canadian people, and why we thought the government and the National Energy Board should give serious and favourable consideration to the proposed Alcan route. I must say that every reason we gave was fully vindicated by the decision of the National Energy Board, which emphasized many of the points we made in this House.

The leader of the New Democratic Party pointed out on August 4 last when this matter was last discussed the reasons we advocated very serious consideration for the Alcan route. The first was that it was the most preferable route with respect to the options we had before us. We had already stated our strenuous objections to the Mackenzie Valley route. That left two other options, the El Paso route or the Alcan route.

Most people do not realize that Canada was not the sole arbiter in this matter because the Americans did not need our permission to follow the El Paso route. We felt that the El Paso route—particularly the prospect of the LNG tankers going down the Pacific coast where we already have huge oil tankers moving between Valdez, Cherry Point and points south in the United States—would add to the problem of congestion on the west coast. Therefore, we thought that of the three options which were under consideration by the two governments certainly the Alcan route seemed to be preferable.

We were also impressed by the fact that Foothills (Yukon) Limited was a Canadian company and that it was going to raise its equity here in Canada, although it would have to go outside Canada to raise its loan capital. We were impressed by the fact that Foothills asked for no financial backing from the federal government, whereas Arctic Gas had made it very clear that its application was contingent on the federal government's backstopping its project in the event of cost overruns.

However, I think what impressed us most about the Alcan route was that Foothills (Yukon) had committed itself to Canadian content with respect both to the steel in the pipeline and to the laying of the pipeline.

The working paper which Foothills sent out says, and I quote:

> Line pipe represents the greatest single expenditure by any of the applicants. Foothills (Yukon) proposes to purchase all its pipe in Canada.

Before the National Energy Board the representatives of Foothills said again and again that they would purchase over 90 per cent of their pipe in Canada and that all their construction work would be done by Canadian firms and by Canadian workers. That appealed to us. We were impressed by the recommendation of the National Energy Board that a $200 million compensation fund be set up to alleviate some of the problems which the Yukon would have with respect to the infrastructure which must be built because of the influx of construction workers into that area. We were impressed when we were told that, whereas in the Northwest Territories the matter of native land claims was not nearly settled, in the Yukon an agreement in principle was expected in a matter of weeks or months.

We were also impressed by the suggestion which came from the Lysyk commission that $50 million should be paid to Yukon Indians in order to compensate them for dislocation until such time as their native land claims were settled. Those were the reasons we gave on August 4 for supporting this project.

It should be remembered that the primary purpose of this pipeline is to take American gas from Alaska to the United States, and if no Dempster spur is built Canadians will never get a cubic foot of that gas. This is a neighbourly gesture to the United States. Therefore, we have taken the position that, if we are going to provide our American neighbours with a land bridge by which they can take gas from Alaska to an energy-hungry nation, then Canada has a right to certain benefits accruing from that project.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2102)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What happened to those benefits, Mr. Speaker? The Canadian government started to negotiate with the United States. It had all the cards because the United States desperately needed that pipeline. We did not need it. In spite of all that has been said about the fact that we are going to get gas over the Dempster spur, the fact remains that we are not desperately in need of gas from the Arctic. In 1976, five trillion cubic feet of gas was found in western Canada. In 1977 another five trillion cubic feet was found; that is ten trillion cubic feet in two years. Preliminary discoveries this year indicate we will get more than that in 1978. This means we will have well over 60 trillion cubic feet, almost 70 trillion cubic feet of gas in Canada. That is not an unlimited supply but it certainly means we are not pressed for natural gas. The United States needed the pipeline. We could resolve their problem and so held the trump card.

The United States wanted the Alcan line in the first place. As President Carter told the press conference in Washington when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was there, the Alcan route would save them $6 billion compared to the El Paso route. Second, the defence department in the United States was horrified at the prospect of having a large section of their people dependent upon gas which was being brought by tanker in time of war, so because this is a safe route the United States wants it.

When our negotiators—the operation might have been labelled "Innocents Abroad"—sat down with the United States negotiators, instead of pressing the natural advantages they had, they went on the defensive. If press reports are correct they began by stressing that there must be provision for a Dempster spur so that we could bring gas down from the Mackenzie Valley if and when we want it. There was no need to make that the number one issue. The President of Privy Council stressed again and again today that this was going to be a great asset. As a matter of fact, I doubt if any gas will come down the Dempster spur much before the middle of 1990 and probably not until beyond this century.

It is true that Foothills is committed to making application by July 1, 1978. It is true they are committed to making a survey. The fact remains, however, that you do not build a pipeline until you have contracts and nobody is going to buy Arctic gas at twice the cost of gas in southern Canada. You are not going to get gas contracts until gas is in short supply in southern Canada, and that is not going to happen for several years. There was no need to press that point, Mr. Speaker.

The second thing we stressed was that we had to justify the $200 million compensation fund because this was setting a precedent. Again there was no need to throw that card away, but we did. On the other hand, the United States negotiators played a marvellous game of poker. They bluffed the Canadian delegation completely out of the game. Reports kept coming every day. Columnists in the United States were writing to the effect that there was no doubt the United States was going to choose the El Paso route; they were not going to pay $6 billion more than they needed to get Alaskan gas. It was a good game of bluff.

It was not hard to bluff some of our Ottawa trained bureaucrats. For as long as I can remember they have been trained to believe that you must never stand up to the United States, because if you do they will resort to economic retaliation. I have listened to that for four decades—"We will get economic retaliation if we do not jump every time they snap their fingers."

We got to the final stage of negotiations in Ottawa and that took some 17 days. Then we got to the last stage when the President of Privy Council took charge. A lot of people wonder why the President of Privy Council was chosen. I do not know the reason unless it was to make sure that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was not put in charge. If that was the reason I certainly endorse it.

Mr. MacKay: It is like putting Custer in charge of Big Horn.

Mr. Douglas: Those negotiations went on for 17 days between officials, and then the President of Privy Council and Mr. Schlesinger, the economic adviser to the President of the United States, took over the final negotiation. That lasted seven hours. That is an exhausting negotiation, Mr. Speaker. Any trade union boss who took only seven hours to negotiate an agreement would be fired. Somebody suggested that was why the minister's hair turned grey during that period. We are glad to see it has resumed its raven hue.

The agreement was signed on September 20. Mr. Schlesinger praised the President of Privy Council for being a tough negotiator. President Carter praised the Prime Minister for being a tough negotiator. Mr. Speaker, when a Yankee trader tells you that you are a tough negotiator, you know you have been taken to the cleaners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Let us examine what happened as a result of these negotiations. The fact is—I do not say this with any pleasure—that the Canadian government was outmanouvred and outwitted. Canadians will pay a heavy price for their incompetence. I think the best summary of the negotiations is contained in the statement which Mr. Schlesinger made before the United States Congress on September 23 last, when he said:

> The proposed Alcan system will deliver Alaska gas at the lowest possible cost of service to U.S. consumers—below the cost of imported oil and substantially below the cost of other fuel alternatives.
> —But the agreement is particularly advantageous to the United States by providing ceilings on every aspect of potential U.S. liability while creating new incentives for efficient construction on a portion of the project that would normally be subject to exclusive Canadian jurisdiction.

In a single sentence Mr. Schlesinger is saying: "We have succeeded in maximizing the advantages to the United States and minimizing the benefits to Canada." Let us look at it closely, Mr. Speaker. First of all, there were the provisions with respect to the Canadian content which are so ambiguous and so weasel-worded as to be meaningless. When the treaty was signed the President of the Privy Council's office issued press releases telling the Canadian people that this would mean an expenditure of $4 billion in Canada and it would create 100,000 man-years of employment. But if you read the small print, as I understand it this includes the Dempster spur which may not be built for 15 or 20 years. It may not be built in the lifetime of most of us here—

● (2112)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I expect the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), like Moses, will live to be 120.

An hon. Member: He is already there.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): So we are not talking about $4 billion and 100,000 man-years of employment; we are really talking about $2.5 billion and 68,000 man-years of employment—if we get it. I say "if we get it" advisedly because there is no assurance in the treaty or the legislation that we will get it. As a matter of fact the treaty, in my opinion, says just the opposite.

When the House gave first reading to this bill the minister had a press conference, and according to the press reports he is supposed to have said the government could block any contract being granted. That is only true, as I see it, if he can do so under the provisions of article 7 of the agreement.

Let me put on the record article 7 of the agreement because it is germane to the whole problem. It says:

Article 7—Supply of Goods and Services.

Having regard to the objectives of this agreement, each government will endeavour to ensure that the supply of goods and services to the pipeline project will be on generally competitive terms. Elements to be taken into account in weighing competitiveness will include price, reliability, servicing capacity and delivery schedules.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is perfectly clear. One may look at the provisions in clause 10 of schedule III in the legislation, but they are merely pious hopes, an expression of expectation. If the minister or anyone else blocks a contract which is competitive, it occurs to me that under article 7 he must show that it is ruled out of court on the grounds of either price, reliability, servicing capacity or delivery schedules. If he cannot do that, there is no way that the minister or anyone else can block such a bid.

I listened today to some strange statements made by the minister. He said one of the reasons assurances could not be put into the agreement was because this would interfere with GATT. I thought this was an agreement between Canada and the United States. Surely Canada and the United States can make any arrangement they want with reference to this. Or is the President of Privy Council suggesting that this has international ramifications and that the market is to be open to Japan or West Germany or anybody else? Is that what it means?

How much they know about it is shown by the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), when he was appearing on the Patrick Watson program the other day, said: "You know, Japan cannot make large pipe." Are the government unaware of the fact that every bit of the Alyeska pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez is Japanese pipe? These are the brains we trust!

Surely it was not beyond the ingenuity of the Canadian negotiators, first of all, to recognize that there is not a provincial government in Canada which does not have included in all its contracts for highways and public buildings a preference clause for its companies and its own workers. Everyone has this preference because they are the people who pay the taxes in that jurisdiction, and they should have some preferential treatment. There is no reason why this could not be provided.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

If the government did not want to do that, there was a simple means by which the company, Foothills (Yukon) Ltd., could take any bid which came in from a Canadian company, and if it was too high and it was apparent that, by giving a preference to the Canadian companies method, they were taking advantage of the situation, they could submit it to the minister or to the commissioner and that bid would be thrown out and competitive international bidding would be installed.

I see no reason why Canadians should not have that market for the steel and pipe exclusively to themselves as long as the company in question is satisfied they are not being taken advantage of by the steel mills. What did the government do? The most amazing thing of all is that they proceeded under article 10 of the agreement to agree to the setting up of a technological study group for the purpose of testing and evaluating different kinds of pipe. It says at the end of the clause that it was understood that the decision relating to pipeline specifications remain the responsibility of the appropriate regulatory authorities. I asked the minister about it this afternoon and he said that the National Energy Board will make the decision. I hope he will consult the lawyers and table an opinion from the law officers of the Crown before we finish this debate. I know that the chairman of the National Energy Board will convey the decision of the committee to the minister, but when the clause speaks of "regulatory authorities", I take it that the American regulatory authorities working with the National Energy Board will have to reach some agreement with respect to this matter.

Why was it necessary to refer this matter to a joint technical committee of Canada and the United States? The National Energy Board had already set the specifications. The applicant, namely Foothills (Yukon) Limited, had already put those specifications in its application. Why did the matter have to go to a joint committee? I will tell the House why. If hon. members read the transcript of Mr. Schlesinger's remarks before the congressional committee they will see he was under pressure from two sides. The steel-producing states wanted him to give them a piece of the action. Secondly, he was under pressure to ensure that, during the time the pipeline was being built, they would be able to get Canadian gas.

That is why Mr. Mondale came to Canada. He too, of course, praised the government. Who would not do so if he was looking for some several trillion cubic feet of gas? He had done so well in negotiations before there was no reason why he should not expect to come here and with a little flattery get some gas. Unfortunately he made the mistake of going to Edmonton and ran into a negotiator as tough as he was. He went on his way, without any flattery and with no bouquets.

The difficulty I see is that although in clause 10 of schedule III it says the minister can ensure that the procedures followed by the company will not involve unfair trade practices, there is no definition of "unfair trade practices". Is the DISC program in the United States, by which the government subsidizes companies going into export trade, an unfair trade practice? Is the fact that the government gives transportation subsidies or tax credits or tax exemptions an unfair trade practice? Is the fact that a company in the United States buys its steel pipe from Japan and then acts as broker to sell it to Foothills (Yukon) Limited an unfair trade practice? We do not know. I do not think the minister knows and certainly the legislation does not answer that very vital question.

Some of the other things which we had hoped for and which my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), enumerated on August 4 as being, in our opinion, absolutely essential if we were going to support legislation putting this agreement into effect included, for example, consideration of the route. The route which was recommended by the National Energy Board, of course, has been altered. That alteration could save the Americans some money. It could also save Canadians some money, but only if we build it in the first place, and, if we do build it, if we keep over-runs down to 35 per cent. It is interesting to note that Mr. Schlesinger said of this clause:

It provides a formidable incentive for Canada to build the main line as efficiently as possible, and decrease the overall cost of service to U.S. consumers to the maximum extent.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what we have got by agreeing to bring the line from Whitehorse and not through Dawson: we are committed to an incentive to keep cost over-runs below 35 per cent. But the most serious defect is that there is nothing said about the $200 million compensation fund, an idea which apparently has been rejected. There is nothing here about settling the native land claims: nothing about the $50 million which was to be given to the Yukon Indians; nothing about the second review of the sociological and environmental problems, though this was promised by the government.

Finally, and most serious of all, this legislation sets up an agency which will become a bureaucratic smokescreen behind which this whole project will be continued and operated beyond the scrutiny of parliament. Parliament will have no control. There will be no estimates. Whole sections of the powers given to departments would be relegated to this group—a minister, a commissioner, an administrator, probably a deputy administrator, a consultative council and a number of advisory committees. What control will parliament have over this project? What accountability will there be to parliament and to the people of this country?

The day we pass this bill, unless substantial changes are made, we shall lose control of a $10 billion project. I want to say on behalf of this party that though we support the building of a pipeline it is apparent that the promises and conditions which were set forth on August 4 have not been implemented, and unless they are implemented we have very serious reservations about whether this legislation should be passed by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. In the last portion of his remarks he appeared to be suggesting that parliament ought to be running this project on a day to day basis, as it were. In my view that would be one of the most foolish policies we could possibly adopt. Parliament has a hard time running its own business without trying to manage the construction of a pipeline.

Earlier in his remarks he emphasized the importance of cost over-run provisions. Certainly this is important. It is extremely important that we should build this pipeline cheaply and efficiently, because we get the Dempster line for nothing. If we do not get it for nothing, if we exceed the 35 per cent, the line will still be built when the time is opportune, so we would not have lost anything. The decision made by the negotiating minister was a very wise one.

I was interested, too, in the remarks made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). He recalled that the President of the United States said on September 22, 1977, that unnecessary delay would increase the cost of the pipeline a great deal. We must make sure there are no unnecessary delays.

I enter this debate because I have been a member of the energy committee for five years and also because Welland is the home of the biggest pipe mill in Canada. It has a competitor in Regina called Ipsco and I understand there are one or two others. There are certain differences between these companies but they will all be kept very busy making pipe if we get on with the job here. The main thing is that under the northern pipeline agency we want to maximize Canadian content. But, of course, these pipe mills want to maximize their own content. These companies are different from their American competitors. The great United States Steel Company, which is situated in Texas, has much further to ship its pipe than our own industry in central Canada.

Perhaps I should say a few words about Stelco, the Welland company. Stelco (Welland Tubes) built a 7.5-acre plant two or three years ago. The company was wise, expecting the pipeline to be built. Another two acres was recently added to the plant, which is all under one roof; it cost more than $50 million but all those concerned knew they had great competitive ability and the most modern type of machinery. The company is known throughout the world for the quality of its products and this has been the case ever since the time of the second world war when Page-Hersey Tubes came into being.

Some of the union members from Stelco came down to see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) recently. They told me that if this pipe mill were to start up on the basis of three shifts a day, each shift would put out a mile of pipe. The Welland pipe mill offers certain advantages when it comes to the assembly and bending of steel plate and welding the spiral type of pipe. It can use plate not only from Stelco but from other companies and produce pipe up to 80 feet long. Any diameter of pipe can be turned out and the mill can use all specifications of steel. Each 80-foot section can be moved into one of four bays in which the welding is done. Thus, it is not necessary to hold up the assembly line. According to the company manager, they are not worried about the thickness of the pipe. There has been talk about the fact that the National Energy Board has not brought out specifications with regard to the thickness of pipe. This does not matter to the Canadian companies; they can use whatever thickness is required.

Second, it has been said that the National Energy Board should have decided what kind of steel it wants, the diameter of pipe and whether it is high or low pressure. The Canadian companies are not worried about specifications. They can compete with anyone.

The United States Steel Company has a huge plant, but it is not used to making pipe larger than 48 inches. It makes a straight weld down the centre of the tube. By lobbying, the United States Steel Company could influence the United States to use its steel in their section. However, the big point in that they are used to making only that kind of pipe. Stelco has been able to sell pipe in the United States right under the nose of the United States Steel Company.

There is also the question of pressure. It should be made clear that high pressure pipelines have never had extensive testing or use anywhere in the world. There has been some small amount of testing, but that is all. Nobody has yet built 500 or 1,000 miles of high pressure pipe, which is 1,600 pounds per square inch, to carry gas. This is very important to remember, because the National Energy Board has to ensure that it is not risking trouble for the future. If this pipe has never been used extensively anywhere in the world, it would be taking a chance to use it here.

We know that large diameter pipe can be built. We also know that low pressure pipe of 800 to 1,000 pounds p.s.i. could very well carry gas. All it needs is proper compressors. This is a chance for more Canadian industry. We in Canada are rather good at building turbines, compressors and pumps. No doubt our industry could be competitive with any company in the world.

Having said all this about the matter of specifications, I wish to emphasize that the specifications decided on by the National Energy Board should not be any excuse for holding up this debate or the pipeline act. We should get going on this great project for Canada. In our local situation, and I am being very parochial, there are reasons why I am most anxious to speed up this matter. I know that eventually our mills will get the business. I would like to see delay reduced as much as possible, and I will state why.

I live in a very industrialized part of the country. We have had our setbacks. We do not have the benefits of DREE. In fact, there is no body set up anywhere that I know of which will help municipalities in any area which have had setbacks as a result of plants closing and that sort of thing.

We have had all sorts of discussion in the House with regard to Inco. Port Colborne felt that situation very badly. Between 300 and 400 people have just been laid off. This has had a very adverse effect on the city's economic life. Algoma Steel has shut down its plant entirely. One hundred and fifty to 200 people were put out of work. Atlas Steel in Welland has had some bad news. Cuba is building a stainless steel mill. This communist country, obviously a tool of her great partner, the U.S.S.R., is to come into direct competition with Atlas Steel.

Finally, false fears have been fostered by the chambers of commerce in some municipalities regarding increased tolls on the Seaway, particularly on the Welland Canal. We are all convinced that raising the tolls will play no large part in increasing the costs of any of these companies. In fact, the suggestion that there will be any effect whatsoever on increased costs is really a bogeyman and is deluding the public on the economic outlook.

Locally, the Canadian content of manpower, materials and services will be maximized. This will amount to a large sum. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has stood by his earlier assertions that it will amount to at least 100,000 jobs or 100,000 man years.

I would like to bring a few figures to the attention of hon. members. They seem very simple. The length of the pipeline in Alaska will be 731 miles. The length of pipe in the lower 48 states will amount to nearly 2,000 miles. The pipeline in the Yukon will be over 700 miles. The Dempster lateral and the pipe in British Columbia and Alberta will be over 2,000 miles long. In other words, Canada is building just about half of the line. This amounts to a Canadian figure of $4.2 billion. Of course, with the Dempster lateral, it could be a great deal more.

This work is going to be farmed out to a great many Canadian firms, not just to pipe mills, steel mills, iron ore producers, and producers of all the other minerals which go into the making of steel. In addition, there is going to be earth-moving machinery, trenchers, cranes, camps, construction of roads, airports, helioports, work for welders, truck drivers, probably increased length of railway lines, shipping of all types and relay stations. Think of the requirements for compressors, pumps and turbines which we are pretty good at building in Canada. Add the pipe itself and the labour to make it and finally you have a huge sum of spin-off.

Hon. members may be getting tired of hearing the comparison of this being the biggest private undertaking since the building of the CPR. In any event, it will add a great deal to the stimulus of our recovery in Canada from the rather slowly improving economic picture which we have now. In other words, the economic improvement generated by $4 billion to $6 billion will be greater by far than the $1 billion to $2 billion which we have injected recently into the economy with tax removals and make-work projects.

One of the greatest reasons for benefits to Canada is the way this pipeline act has been drawn up. I differ from the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). We need to have a powerful agency headed by a minister who is tireless in his efforts to bring this undertaking to a successful conclusion. He has to have veto powers. We have to make sure that the tenders and contracts are reviewed. I realize that Canada's attempt at national energy self-reliance will improve. This will open the way to further development in the high Arctic, after we get the Dempster lateral route producing.

The Northern Pipeline Agency will have the advantage of being a single regulatory window on all the undertakings under federal responsibility. The commissioner will run it from Calgary. He will be closely in touch with the Foothills company from day to day. There will be discussion with departments. For example the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Public Works and Treasury Board will all be brought together under a single agency by having people seconded from their departments. Through the agency, the terms and conditions of manpower procurement plans which the Foothills company is considering will have to be submitted.

There will be public sessions held by these advisory councils that are to be set up. There is the requirement that the Foothills company has to make an application to build the Dempster line by July 1, 1979, and no later. In other words, they have to apply to do this while this line is being built. I certainly think it is very likely we are going on to greater and greater economic things in Canada.

The fact that more gas is being found all the time in Alberta does not worry me. It pleases me a great deal. In fact, in Ontario just recently there has been a rumour that a deep gas well has been drilled and large quantities of gas discovered near Sarnia and Windsor. As the House knows wells were drilled all over southern Ontario and a number of shallow gas wells were found, producing at a few hundred feet. They were all around the Lake Erie area and up into the Lake Huron area. As hon. members will remember, the first oil well in the world was drilled when they were looking for gas at Petrolia, Ontario, about 100 years ago. It is just possible that these areas of Ontario might also produce gas in huge quantities; who knows? This is all to the good in order to make Canada self-reliant in energy. But it will be a long time before we can develop any of these speculative fields, so it is very much to our credit to get busy making use of what we have already found by building a pipeline from the delta.

I think hon. members must realize that there are penalties involved in this legislation. This agency is pretty well all-embracing. The penalties apply not only to Foothills, which is constructing the pipeline, but also to other individuals or firms who have contracts. The penalties are as high as $10,000 a day for non-compliance. Even appeals from the decisions of the agency are looked after by ensuring that the Federal Court will hear these appeals without undue delay.

I do not want to go into a lot of uninteresting things like tolls and tariffs, but they are well looked after. The National Energy Board will be able to authorize the imposition of charges which are related to the project cost when the pipeline is capable of starting up and when it is actually transmitting gas.

Finally, there is the self-destruct provision that the whole agency will be taken out of action about a year after the pipeline begins to function. I think the major fact is that the powers of this agency, which seem huge to some people, will allow the minister to make sure we have a pipeline that is economical in nature. It is important also that it is built with private money, that of the people of Canada. The people generally are not again to be billed for a huge public project.

This matter of guarantees is a very vexatious one. If we asked for a guarantee of 90 per cent or more Canadian content, men, material and services, including pipe, this would have almost meant a handout or a real come-on to private companies to gouge the government and the company. Even union members themselves know this and accept it readily. It is up to Canada to see that we not only have the most efficient use of manpower and services, but also that it maximizes Canadian content. It is important to keep efficiency in mind as well as cheapness, and if we can keep the cost of over-runs down to 35 per cent or less we will get that Dempster line completely free. That is not a small thing; it will amount to $1 billion or $2 billion. It will free some cost in this way, but we will still get the line even if we cannot manage to do that.

Another wise idea, which is new to me and I think to most Canadians, is that the Foothills company is asked to pay the cost of this national pipeline agency, which could amount to anywhere from $5 million a year or more for the next three to five years. This does not seem too much when you are thinking in terms of $10 billion to $15 billion for the whole pipeline cost, but this is a new departure. It has been used in the United States in the past but not in Canada. Since we know the minister is definitely anxious to make this suggestion work, I wonder if, in respect of future pipelines, we could make Crown agencies or corporations pay for their monitoring bodies, such as the CBC paying for the cost of the CRTC and the railway companies paying for the cost of the Canadian railway commission.

These are matters which are worth considering, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion we have a huge but worthwhile project here. It will take a strong hand to make sure that Canada gets proper treatment. It will take a strong hand to make sure the Yukon natives and the Yukon itself will be assisted and helped by this project. It will take a strong hand to make sure we maximize Canadian content, both in respect of labour and materials. I think the best action we have taken is putting the present Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) in place as head of the northern pipeline agency.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I think it would only be appropriate if I said at the commencement how much we in this party have appreciated the help of the officials of the Foothills company and also—and I say this especially in respect of the help I received personally—from representatives of the labour movement in Canada. They have been very generous indeed to me in conversations I had with them, as well as giving me advice and assistance, helping me to come to a better understanding of what are the issues regarding the pipeline itself, and particularly in regard to the terms of the bill before the House this evening.

I regret having to say that in many respects we have received a lot more help from the company and those interested in the work and services that will result, and the material that will be supplied to this pipeline, than from the government itself. I say that advisedly. Nothing could symbolize more the neglect with which the government has treated hon. members in this House on this matter than the fact that even a day or two after the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) held his press conference and made his announcement describing the terms of the bill my office made inquiry as to whether the kit or material were available, and we were told that members of parliament would get it in due course. The initial distribution was to senior public servants. I am told by some hon. members this afternoon that they still had not received the material.

I have to say to the government, Mr. Speaker, that this is really not good enough and there is no excuse for it. This government comes to members of the opposition, whether in this party or in other opposition parties, and constantly asks us to help get legislation through. Members tell us they need help to keep things in the House moving. It would not take very much to remember some of the fundamental courtesies. When telephone calls were made to the Deputy Prime Minister's office, a very courteous but, unfortunately, not helpful secretary said there were no kits and no material available. This is just a little thing. I recognize, as my good friend the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) has said—I listened to him carefully—that this is a very big undertaking. Other hon. members in the House realize that. But quite frankly, the trouble with this little act of neglect by the government is that it is symbolic of the manner in which this act has been approached.

In 1972 in British Columbia, the then minister of the environment for the government indicated that we did not need to worry about tanker routes down the west coast because the trump card was the overland Mackenzie pipeline. It was not clear from that whether he meant an oil and gas pipeline, but clearly the thinking with respect to the supply of energy in this country was confused. In 1971 it was decided deliberately not to encourage our American friends to count on any Canadian co-operation for an oil pipeline. I suspect Americans got the message in those days, and no doubt they had reason to believe that would apply to a gas pipeline as well.

The record of backing into a phony energy crisis in the winter of 1973-74 does not put the government in a very good light, looking back on it in hindsight. Generally speaking, the entire approach of the government to the energy problems we are facing seems to be symbolized by the fact that not even hon. members received copies of the material which had already been distributed in the Yukon, to the press and to senior members of the public service.

The Americans have managed to deal with this problem more expeditiously than the government of Canada. I do not want to inject a note of irritation at this late hour, but it is nonsense to listen to anyone on the government side suggesting it is the fault of the opposition that this bill has not been passed days or weeks ago. The American Congress passed its bill weeks ago. In the middle of the summer, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked the government to introduce legislation as quickly as possible. For reasons only the government knows, suddenly we are faced now with the bill. We are told it must be passed immediately. The inference is that if anyone wants to ask any questions about it, somehow he is working against the national interest.

To further illustrate the necessity of hon. members of the opposition asking questions, I should like to refer to the matter raised by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton). He discussed the specifications as to pipe size, which are apparently in front of the National Energy Board, at the same time as they are in front of an American regulatory authority. The inference was that we must not become disturbed about this, and that basically any of the pipe can be made in Canada. Perhaps this is so in so far as size is concerned, but the hon. member for Welland pointed out that the question of high pressure indeed is something different. The hon. member for Welland indicated there was no reason to doubt the estimates of 100,000 man-years of employment that this project would provide for Canadians.

I realize the hon. member for Welland is not given to making incautious or inaccurate statements, but what is forgotten is that the estimate of 100,000 man-years was received by the government from the company itself. I am not criticizing the company for giving that estimate. I am not criticizing the government for saying that is an estimate which should receive serious consideration. But that estimate is based on the manufacture of 48-inch low pressure pipe, which was the pipe advocated by the company from the start. If some other pipe is to be made—and I am not talking about 54-inch pipe which can be made in Canada—such as the 48-inch high pressure pipe, perhaps it can be manufactured by one plant in Canada, but there will be severe problems from corporate and union sources in the installation of this pipe and the expertise which is required. As the hon. member has pointed out, there is very little experience in the handling of that pipe.

This afternoon I asked the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) the following:

> I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council would answer a question relating to the option now being studied as to 48-inch low pressure pipe, 48-inch high pressure pipe or 54-inch pipe. Would he indicate to the House at this time any estimate of what differences there would be in the estimates that so far have been put forward in terms of man-years available on this project if, for instance, the selection was other than the 48-inch low pressure pipe, which the company has recommended from the start, or the 54-inch pipe, which is also capable of being produced in Canada, as opposed to the 48-inch high pressure pipe, in the sense that this may not be easily produced in Canada and may have to be obtained offshore from the United States or some other country? Can the minister give us any estimate of what difference it would make in total man-years of work?

I asked him how the changes in the specifications would affect the number of man-years of work. He replied that he did not know. Presumably the government has not studied this at all, yet we are asked to hurry this debate. My responsibilities are for labour in this caucus; thus this question is of great concern to me. We do not know what the difference in specifications will mean to the number of man-years of work.

The statement of the Deputy Prime Minister on the first day of this debate was quite incredible.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Railton: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since it is ten o'clock, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) requires the unanimous consent of the House to ask a question of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Vancouver South ready to receive the question?

• (2202)

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, of course I am always prepared to answer a question from my hon. friend.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the hon. member for Vancouver South if he realizes that the United States steel industry does produce 48-inch pipe but not necessarily high pressure, and that Canadian pipe mills can produce 48-inch pipe just as well as U.S. mills, either high pressure of low pressure.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I would not make the mistake of pretending to be an expert in these matters. What I have been able to learn is that there is grave doubt among both management and labour that 48-inch high pressure pipe can be produced easily. There is certainly doubt about the feasibility of this and the expertise available. So I must say that that is all I have learned to this moment. That is why I am raising the question, and surely my hon. friend will assist me and speak to members of his own party to be sure that the question we have raised and discussed tonight is adequately answered in the interests of all Canadians.

PUBLIC WORKS—DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF POST OFFICE IN ROUYN, QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on February 2 last, I put a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) about the construction of a federal building in Rouyn. I experienced some difficulty in trying to remind the minister that in 1972, the decision had been taken to build a post office in Rouyn.

In a letter dated March 16, the then postmaster general, the Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté, indicated that the construction was expected to begin in 1972-73. On May 11, 1972, the Minister of Public Works replied that an amount of $200,000 had been earmarked for 1972-73, $300,000 for 1973-74 and $250,000 for 1974-75. On December 12, 1972, Public Works officials met with the civic authorities of Rouyn and Noranda. On July 9, 1973, a letter was effectively sent to the architect indicating that his services were required for the construction of that building and on January 24, 1974, a letter confirmed the right of the architect to hire consulting engineers. But of course we should not forget that an election was held in July 1974. Apparently that occasion was used to play politics. On June 23, 1976, that is a year after the election, we suddenly realized that the government has decided to hire a different architect. The first one was dropped and a new one appointed to spread confusion.

On July 13, 1976, as a result of representations made by my predecessor, the mayor of the city of Rouyn and the local chamber of commerce, a retraction was made and finally it was confirmed that the contracts were being given to the architect who was first contacted in 1973. To summarize, on December 5, 1977, in reply to my letter, the minister advised me that Treasury Board had in fact approved the project on May 20, 1976. Note that this is four years after the initial decision.

Unfortunately, on January 20, 1978, a Public Works civil servant got in touch with the responsible architect advising him that there would be a one-year delay, that construction would probably not start before February 1, 1979, and that the offices would most probably be ready by August 1, 1980. So, on February 2, I put my question to the minister asking about the moneys involved. What has been done with the credits voted in 1972-73, 1974-75 for a total amount of $750,000? What has happened to them? I have had no reply to that question. And with regard to the unemployment problem we are now studying, statistics dated February 7, 1977, indicate that in northwestern Quebec, the unemployment rate is 25.8 per cent.

So I asked him a second question: could he accelerate the construction of that post office particularly in view of the circumstances prevailing in northwestern Quebec where the unemployment rate is as high as 25.8 per cent? I asked the minister that simple question but I got no answer. This is why I decided to ask the same question tonight to get an answer. I do so to get a real answer and not only a partisan answer. We know there will probably be an election in 1978 or in early 1979 and the letter from Mr. Havor of the Department of Public Works makes me believe that once again the building of that post office will serve political interests. As I said earlier, after the 1974 election they hired a different architect. So we the people from that area are asking that the initial undertaking be met and that local architects be hired as would be justified.

Is the minister trying again to play political games or is he waiting for the next election to delay that project once more? And I sincerely wonder if in northwestern Quebec they are playing the same game as in the Gaspé Peninsula where 15 elections have been run on Gros-Cacouna harbour, for which people are still waiting.

Mr. Speaker, these are the comments I wanted to make this evening about a matter which greatly concerns us in northwestern Quebec, and especially in Rouyn. I repeat that since we have 25.8 per cent unemployment, I believe it is time to grant exemptions and start as soon as possible to build this post office in Rouyn.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in 1972 representatives of the Post Office Department asked us for a first group post office: consequently, we had expected to build in Rouyn a one-service post office. However, afterwards, other federal departments also requested facilities at that location, and after examining the various alternatives, we submitted the present suggestion which was approved by the Treasury Board in May, 1976, and which provides for the construction of a new Canadian government building which will have a total area of about 56,000 square feet and will cost approximately $4,482,000.

Expenditures to date on this project are as follows. In 1972-73, $4,000 for miscellaneous; 1973-74, $61,000 for land purchase and miscellaneous; in 1974-75, $351,000 for land purchase and miscellaneous; in 1975-76, $3,000 for miscellaneous; in 1976-77, $12,000 for miscellaneous; in 1977-78, $120,000 is projected for consultants, demolition and miscellaneous. That gives a total of $551,000.

Proposed expenditures for future years will be reflected in the 1978-79 main estimates "blue book" when tabled in the House. The present schedule is as follows. Tender call, November 15, 1978, contract award, January 31, 1979 and in service June 30, 1980.

The schedule for this project cannot be significantly advanced because of the work remaining to be done on the plans and specifications and the availability of funds for capital expenditures in the department's program in 1978-79.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—BUILDING OF DEFENCE RESEARCH CENTRE IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the last four years I have been asking the Department of National Defence and the government when they will finalize the purchase of 111 acres in the Tuxedo area of Winnipeg where the federal government is supposed to be building a national defence research centre. I have received a series of evasive answers, and the old Liberal runaround is the best way to describe it.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Last Friday in the House I questioned the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) once again as to where the federal government stood in regard to the purchase of the property, and the minister replied:

However, the negotiations are continuing and alternatives are being pursued.

Are these alternatives to be explored to eternity, Mr. Speaker? I am asking the parliamentary secretary tonight, will the federal government stop playing political games with the city of Winnipeg and withdraw from this transaction, and give the land back to them so they can do something constructive with this 111 acres in Tuxedo? If the 111 acres are returned to the city the federal government can negotiate with the city fathers for an alternative piece of land, or negotiate a settlement in a reasonable length of time. There is much land available in the city of Winnipeg. If they cannot find appropriate acreage in the city, they can approach the provincial government. We have land available in Manitoba. Certainly 111 acres or the amount of acreage which the department may require is available without placing the city of Winnipeg in the frustrating position they are in.

To reiterate some background, in February, 1974 the then minister of national defence announced plans for locating a new research defence facility in Winnipeg. Nothing materialized. In October, 1976 I raised the question again in the House and the parliamentary secretary to the minister of National defence said: "I am pleased to inform the hon. member that the new research establishment in Manitoba will be constructed in his constituency". Here we are in 1978 and nothing has materialized.

In February, 1977 the Minister of National Defence informed me that plans to build the $25 million facility had been deferred for six months to one year. The next statement which the minister made was on February 28, 1977, when he said that Winnipeg was advised to use the land, that the federal government is not releasing the city of Winnipeg from this land purchase transaction. The minister said at that time that Winnipeg should not hold its breath in expectation of the long promised defence research establishment. According to the Winnipeg Free Press of February 28, 1977:

He said in the House of Commons that it doesn't expect the city to hold on to the land it has earmarked for the research centre, suggesting that city council might as well use it for other purposes.

Those are very bold statements, Mr. Speaker. The federal government has not released the city of Winnipeg from this land purchase agreement; they are playing political games with the city. Their stalling tactics have put the city of Winnipeg in the position where for over four years they have had 111 acres of land which has not produced one cent of revenue during that time because of the procrastination of the Liberal government. It has also put an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers of that city.

If the Department of National Defence is serious about its intentions to purchase the land in Winnipeg, they should immediately reopen negotiations with the city. The value of the land has increased three times from the original asking price of $1,200,000. The government cannot continue to act in this way. Let them abandon the plan and look for a different site.

● (2217)

One of the excuses put forward by the government is the existence of a number of 65-year-old caveats. Well, the federal government has the power to overrule any of these caveats. I might add that there has been an endless list of correspondence by letter and telegram over the last four years. The situation amounts to a complete charade and it is time this nonsense came to an end. I have a copy of a telegram the former mayor sent to the Minister of National Defence on January 18, 1977, in which he said:

> I have again been asked by my colleagues what assurances your ministry has given that will allow this project to proceed.

Nothing has proceeded, yet we are well into 1978.

In closing I wish to state that if the land were returned to the city it could be a source of much-needed revenue to finance municipal projects such as the Tuxedo golf course. If this land reverted the city would get $3 million or $4 million and could use the money to purchase the golf course or for other municipal projects in the city. There has been a great deal of disenchantment among residents of the area, many of whom assert that the land could be put to better use as a site for new homes. As things are a valuable source of income has been denied.

I feel the government has no choice at this point but to abandon its plans and choose a less contentious site. In the four years during which there has been delay in purchasing the land, the city has received no tax revenue at all. I hope the parliamentary secretary will provide a satisfactory answer tonight without further evasion.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think we must first of all recognize that the hon. member has perseverance. He has come back to this question many times and I can at least congratulate him on his tenacity in defending his cause. Unfortunately, I do not think I can give him this evening a much better answer than that given by the minister last Friday in reply to his question.

Negotiations are still going on with the authorities of the city of Winnipeg and various alternatives are being considered by the department for the various projects that it wants to carry out in the Winnipeg area. The agreement which provides for the purchase of the 111 acres of land mentioned by the hon. member has been in the hands of the authorities of the city of Winnipeg since December, 1977. As he said himself, I understand that various complications have caused the delays. Nevertheless, the building program of the Department of National Defence for this area is now being completely reviewed for several reasons, including the representations that the hon. member has been making for some time. As soon as the decision is made, it will be announced in due time.

AIRPORTS—EDMONTON INTERNATIONAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, at a time when Edmonton is experiencing a vigorous boom and is in need of improved transportation facilities, it is difficult to understand the government's refusal to link transportation policies with development in this key commercial centre of western Canada.

First, the government reneged on its promise to fund urban rapid transit, a promise made on the eve of the 1974 general election. Then came the announcement that the urban transportation assistance program would be terminated in 1983 leaving massive deficiencies in road, rail and grade separation financing, particularly along the Yellowhead Highway corridor. Now the government is refusing to make structural changes at Edmonton International Airport although the Ministry of Transport states that such changes are necessary.

It is time this House was informed that the city administration, the chamber of commerce and, indeed, the travelling public are angry at the way our representations are being dismissed by the Liberal government. It is not one bit more concerned about the problems in western Canada than it was before the dubious acquisition of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

The fact is our airport was built for an age which has gone by. It is severely overtaxed now with 1.7 million passengers per year. By 1980, the number of users will be 2.2 million. Chaos will prevail unless we get some action now. As the Department of Transport's own study shows, and I quote:

> The present air terminal building, completed in 1963, was designed to accommodate aircraft such as the Vanguard which carried 90 passengers and the early DC-8 and 707 aircraft which carried up to 120 passengers. Today's passenger jets carrying anywhere from 100 to 450 passengers have created passenger and aircraft handling problems. Therefore, Edmonton International's basic aircraft handling capability is a mismatch for today's large jet aircraft.

The growth of Edmonton's airport usage was noted by the department as far back as 1975 when studies began, particularly following the signing of a bilateral treaty between Canada and the United States which would provide for preclearance facilities in both Edmonton and Calgary.

Because of the unique situation in Alberta where both Edmonton and Calgary operate international airports, many routes are operated with Edmonton and Calgary as co-termini. It therefore became essential that preclearance facilities in Alberta had to be instituted simultaneously in both cities. Edmonton was repeatedly assured it would receive this consideration, but it has never happened.

The $28 million program proposed by the Department of Transport in 1975 was turned down. Ultimately, $5.8 million was approved last fall. However, this program will only permit improvements to the external part of the building, such as parking lots.

We are now left with the situation where the airport will have customs facilities that can barely meet 50 per cent of the present demands. It will be prevented from having the institution of preclearance facilities. We will be maintaining intolerable passenger flow configuration per international, transborder and domestic passengers. We will be maintaining insufficient airside capacity for the amount of aircraft arrivals. It is a totally insufficient operation.

In the closing days of 1977, the government grudgingly announced $417,000 for temporary customs facilities. This was because of the impending arrival of Commonwealth Games travellers. That small amount is not going to meet the demands of the airport as it tries to service a city and a province growing in Canada's transportation and development needs. Following the $417,000 announcement, the Edmonton Journal commented, and I quote:

> For the 1.7 million people who now use the airport, baggage facilities will still be unreal, there will be no customs preclearance, and services for arriving passengers will still have all the charm of a department store during a Boxing Day sale. By 1980, there will be 2.2 million passengers trying to make do with a building ill-designed for another age.

I ask the government on behalf of the city of Edmonton to give reconsideration to the request for the very needed facilities of a structural type to improve the Edmonton International Airport.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to pinch-hit for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe), tonight. I understand that he was with the minister in Quebec city today dealing with matters relating to the Old Port of that historic city and I am pleased to take his place in responding to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche).

The continued strong economic growth experienced by the province of Alberta generally, and the city of Edmonton specifically, has created a demand for air travel which cannot continue to be met by the existing terminal facilities at the Edmonton International Airport. To quantify the need and to obtain the necessary approvals to proceed with detailed planning and implementation, Transport Canada prepared a comprehensive plan for the expansion of the terminal building and for the provision and upgrading of related facilities. This expansion program was designed to accommodate the forecast growth. In particular, more capacity would have been available for the processing of international passengers and preclearance facilities would have been provided for transborder passengers. As the minister indicated in reply to the hon. member's question on January 30, those improvements will be made when our financial position permits.

• (2227)

A number of the most pressing related projects have been approved and include an extension to the aircraft parking apron, a new central utilities plant and a project to upgrade the water and sewage system. This work is scheduled for completion in 1978-79 at an estimated cost of $5.8 million.

In recognition of the expected influx of visitors and participants for the Commonwealth Games in 1978, approval has been given to an interim plan for expansion of the capacity of the terminal building for processing passengers, especially international passengers.

From the description I have given of current work, work which, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, is estimated at $5.8 million, I believe it is readily apparent that these projects at the Edmonton International Airport are not in the nature of cosmetic improvements but, rather, will provide the facilities which are essential if we are to meet our immediate responsibilities to the air travellers of the Edmonton area.

ODDS IN FAVOUR OF WINNING LOTTERY PRIZE COMPARED TO OBTAINING JOB UNDER GOVERNMENT POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion is concerned with the fact that under this government which has created the just society, among other things, the chances of winning a prize in the state lottery are 1 in 9, while the chances of getting a job are 1 in 26. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House directs the Prime Minister to explain to the premiers the inner workings of the "casino" economy which his government has created, and in particular to elucidate the philosophy of government which has led him to create a society where it is three times as easy to win a prize in the government's lottery as it is to get a job out of the government's economic policies.

RECOMMENDED CREATION OF MERCHANT MARINE TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a very important matter, especially for the unemployed.

Considering that the Lauzon shipyard could easily provide work for over 3,000 employees but that it has slowed down operations with very few workers, which is worsening the unemployment problem on the south shore area, and to cope with those conditions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That this House suggest the establishment of a special committee to consider the possibility for Canada of creating a merchant marine as soon as possible to provide work for the large number of unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ALLEGED MISLEADING BY GOVERNMENT RESPECTING NUMBER OF JOBS CREATED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday the Prime Minister of Canada, at the federal-provincial conference of first ministers stated, "our economy generated 250,000 jobs in 1977". At the same conference, the Minister of Finance stated, "the number of Canadians with jobs rose last year by more than 250,000". In view of the fact that Statistics Canada, the official, objective record for such information, reported that only 182,000 jobs were created last year in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House of Commons condemns the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance for uttering such blatant, dishonest, misleading information to the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

CONCURRENCE OF PROVINCES TO CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The urgency of my intervention arises out of the debate currently before the House in respect of Bill C-25, the Northern Pipeline Act. Having regard to the requirement contained in the bilateral agreement between the government of Canada and the United States to achieve concurrence from the provinces in respect to certain limiting provisions in the bill, in light of the fact that the government of British Columbia has attached certain conditions to its statement of acquiescence, and in light of the fact that these conditions are not embodied in the text of the bill but are pertinent to the debate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

S.O. 43

That the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council table immediately British Columbia's communiqué of August 31, 1977, which contains the aforementioned demands and conditions.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which directly relates to the conference being held today. In view of today's agenda at the first ministers's conference, which deals with sectors of the economy affecting all parts of the country, yet the proceedings are being televised only over Radio-Canada by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House immediately directs the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to televise the proceedings of the conference on both the English and French networks of this public corporation.

NFU MEMBERS OF WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE TO ATTEND GENEVA CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Negotiations for a new international grains agreement are getting under way in Geneva. Because this multilateral trade agreement is so vital to prairie farmers' interests, members of the producer-elected Wheat Board Advisory Committee have been invited to attend the talks as observers, that is, all members except the advisory committee's chairman and two other committee members who are members of the National Farmers' Union. Because it is important that all producers be represented at these vital negotiations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

REQUEST GOVERNMENT REQUIRE ITS CONTRACTORS TO USE CANADIAN PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering that the unemployment rate continues to be particularly high in some underdeveloped regions; considering that this situation could be corrected if the government banned imports of foreign goods which can be produced easily in Canada; and considering that concrete cases coming under the federal government—such as the contract between the CNR and the Laurentide plant in St. Tite which led to employees being laid off for three weeks pending the import of 800 dozens of gloves to respect the contract—point out the necessity of banning imports of that product, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government order that any contract under its jurisdiction be exclusively fulfilled by Canadian products whenever possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT THAT HOUSEWIVES "TECHNOLOGICALLY UNSOPHISTICATED"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very pressing and urgent necessity. My motion concerns a paper circulated by the Minister of State for Science and Technology which epitomizes the arrogance of this government toward the people of Canada. I refer specifically to the report's conclusion at page 7, which is that because the household labour force is technologically unsophisticated, it cannot always make the right decisions when it makes its purchases. In view of this gratuitous insult to my wife, the minister's wife, Your Honour's wife and all those who work at home, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this unsophisticated minister apologize to the millions of Canadian housewives for his arrogance and slurs on their intelligence.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—CANADIAN CONTENT OF PIPE—REQUEST BORDEN REPORT BE TABLED

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. As the Deputy Prime Minister must be aware, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce prepared for the government a study outlining expected Canadian manpower and manufacturers' content in the pipeline project, entitled "Canadian Industry and Manpower Requirements and Content for a Northern Gas Pipeline". The study was finished in July, 1977. It was headed by Dr. Borden. The report suggests that 82 per cent Canadian manufacturing content is the maximum that can be achieved under perfect conditions, and that the Canadian content may vary substantially from that percentage, for various reasons, including pricing conditions, tied and concessional financing, government monitoring, corporate attitudes, and other factors.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm the existence of this report? Will he release copies to members of parliament so that we can have them while the debate on the pipeline is under way, and does the government accept the conclusions in that report as being correct?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I know that various documentary material has been prepared in connection with the negotiations for the pipeline and various estimates have been produced. I would have to verify the name and content of the report to which the hon. member refers, and consider whether in the circumstances it could be made available.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister will agree that he gave us no new information yesterday. Does the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that members of parliament are entitled to information on the important question? This study deals with the manufacturing content of the pipeline project and what percentage of that, and manpower requirements, can be Canadian. Is this not the kind of information members of this House should have, together with information on pipe dimensions that was promised us yesterday? Could the minister assure me that we will have this report once he verifies its existence?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is perfectly reasonable to have as much information as possible. We will be going into committee and we will make every effort to provide information on questions of manpower possibilities and the rather enormous job opportunities that will occur as a result of the construction and operation of the pipeline.

Mr. Crosbie: A final supplementary question. When the Deputy Prime Minister checks, he will see that apart from the pipe to be used in this project, the report says the project can only obtain the Canadian content figure that the government indicates if appropriate guidelines, controls and monitoring are instituted. Will the Deputy Prime Minister indicate whether the government is prepared to have the proposed pipeline agency make available to parliament quarterly reports on the objectives of Canadian content and the progress being made toward these objectives, and have those quarterly reports referred to a standing committee of this House so that we can ensure there is proper monitoring in this area?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in his speech yesterday, the hon. member for Yukon made a suggestion along these lines and asked that it be considered and dealt with in committee. I am not sure if we want to deal with matters in the question period that will be dealt with by the House during orders of the day and when we go into committee on the bill.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—TABLING OF REPORTS RESPECTING CANADIAN CONTENT OF PIPE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister dealing with the exceptionally shoddy behaviour of the government and the manner in which members of this House have been treated with regard to information relevant to the pipeline debate. To be fair, I had a call today from Colin MacDonald, of the minister's office, for the first time offering assistance.

Arising out of the question put by the hon. member for St. John's West, will the Deputy Prime Minister now table the report which has been referred to and any others he may have up his sleeve and is keeping secret by tomorrow at the latest, so we may have this information in front of us during the remainder of the debate? Or is it his intention to continue the 1956 tactics of hiding reports?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will consider what the hon. member has said, but I do not think I can add anything further to what I said to the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Nielsen: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is not the only report the minister is hiding from hon. members and the Canadian people. A report prepared by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion states that under policies identical to those the government has embodied in the legislation now before us, Canadian content could be reduced to 67 per cent. Will the Deputy Prime Minister now come clean and release this report immediately, so that members may compare his statements and promises of yesterday with the prognostications of his officials?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that there are all sorts of memoranda, reports and information prepared for the use of the government. It is not normal to table documents which are prepared for that purpose. However, I will consider what information can be made available. With respect to the particular report which has been referred to in the House and elsewhere, it is true that the department did prepare a "worst possible" scenario which, in the worst possible case, could result in Canadian content of the percentage mentioned by the hon. member. It seems to me this was a very useful thing to do because it provides us with information on where we are vulnerable and the steps we can take to overcome these difficulties.

As far as I am concerned, I have not changed the statement I have made so often, which has been confirmed by the proposed builders of the pipeline, that we will be able to produce approximately 100,000 man-years of employment as a result of this project.

● (1422)

Mr. Nielsen: If the Deputy Prime Minister and the government have nothing to hide, I find it difficult to understand this cover-up. Will the Acting Prime Minister, in his capacity as House leader, now unequivocally give the House the assurance that the government will unconditionally support any and all requests made by the select committee that has been set up to study the provisions of the bill concerning the pipeline for the subpoena of material and witnesses during its consideration of the bill?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker; I do not propose to anticipate proceedings that will arise in the committee and give unqualified undertakings concerning unknown requests.

URBAN AFFAIRS

WATERFRONT DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM FOR QUEBEC CITY—APPLICATION OF PROGRAMS TO OTHER CITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering the receptive, if belated, questions about the government's cover-up on the pipeline, I cannot understand why the hon. member for Yukon gave the government assurance yesterday that the Conservatives would give speedy passage to the bill.

I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, plus five other cabinet ministers who were in Quebec city, announced a $42 million waterfront development program for that city.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Given the need for precisely such programs at a time when more than one million Canadians are unemployed, will the Deputy Prime Minister indicate to the House whether this is to be part of a package of proposals which will include other cities in Canada, or is it simply traditional Liberal pork-barrel electioneering in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is already part of a package of projects to ensure additional jobs in the country. The hon. member might himself update some of the positive proposals that were made at the federal-provincial conference and were so well supported by the Premier of Saskatchewan, including the Alcan pipeline which he said was a key project and ought to get under way at once.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NORTHERN PIPELINE—JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR CANADIANS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister is really ready for the Senate. I remind him that the Premier of Saskatchewan said yesterday, at the conference to which the minister alluded, "provided job guarantees and preferential treatment are given to Canadians". This seems to have escaped the memory of the Deputy Prime Minister. More specifically, in 1974 the Prime Minister promised, on one hand $290 million of assistance for urban transit which would help cities, other than those in Quebec—for example, Halifax, Vancouver and Toronto. Also, in 1974 he promised the city of Winnipeg an aircraft maintenance-facility that would guarantee 800 jobs. Winnipeg has an empty hangar as a result of that promise, and no city has received money for urban transit assistance.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, in all seriousness, given the commitment made in Quebec city yesterday, whether the government of Canada intends to live up to this four-year old promise made to other cities in Canada, before the next election?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member does not spruce up his information-collection ability, he will be ready for the back bench.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I will read to him what the Premier of Saskatchewan said. He made absolutely no reference to legislative guarantees. He said if the federal government made sure that the pipe could be made in Canada, the steel plant in Regina could expand its capacity, creating both construction work and nearly 500 permanent jobs. There was no suggestion of legislative guarantees. We are now assured that this pipe can be made in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Deputy Prime Minister would not bring in irrelevancies. If he would discuss the matter specifically with the Premier of Saskatchewan, he would find out that the Government of Canada does not guarantee it, and that is what he means.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: Will the Deputy Prime Minister now answer the question he was asked with regard to the government's intentions? Does the Government of Canada intend to live up to its promise and provide $290 million in urban transit assistance to the municipalities of Canada? This would help many cities across the country. Specifically, does the government intend to live up to the commitment made to the city of Winnipeg to provide the new aircraft maintenance facility that was pledged in 1974?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the government usually lives up to its promises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INDUSTRY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF USING DISCARDED AUTOMOBILES IN MANUFACTURE OF PIPE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. During the last few years, I have had the opportunity to travel with a former environment minister and other parliamentarians in the vast northern regions and we have seen large quantities of pipe that had been manufactured for the construction of a pipeline. Those pipes had been made in Japan. Given the fact that Canadians sell their used cars and that these cars are crushed and shipped to Japan and that these recycled materials are used in the manufacture of pipe that Canada buys for the construction of the pipeline, could the minister tell the House whether he would encourage Canadian industries to use these old cars and manufacture pipe that could be used in the construction of the pipeline which is proposed in Bill C-25 and which is the subject of our discussion here today?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to comment on the technical feasibility of the hon. member's suggestion. However, I am confident that Canadian steel producers and manufacturers can produce the pipe that is required and will produce the pipe that is required. The companies that are preparing to build the pipeline are confident, on the basis of past performance and their knowledge of current prices throughout the world, that Canadian producers can provide this pipe. In circumstances where there is dumping or unfair trade practices, it will be possible for the pipeline agency that is proposed in the bill, and the minister, to take steps to ensure that such bids will not be accepted.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I gather from the minister's answer that the matter has already been considered but I would like the minister to tell the House whether this question was examined when the agreement with the United States was signed in order to protect the interests of Canadian industries and contribute indirectly to alleviate the unemployment plague in Canada?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the question f the use of Canadian manpower and Canadian materials was foremost in our minds during the negotiations. One of the objectives of the pipeline agreement was to ensure that each country would maximize its industrial and energy benefits. I believe the legislation that is now under discussion will make it possible to ensure that Canada will, indeed, maximize its industrial and energy benefits from this particular project.

[Translation]

NORTHERN PIPELINE—JOBS GUARANTEED TO CANADIANS IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since the minister indicated that the agreement provides for guaranteed employment in both countries, can he tell us precisely what guarantee has been given to Canada in the agreement concerning employment in the construction of the pipeline?

● (1432)

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the basic guarantee of employment in Canada is the competitive capacity of Canadian producers. In our view, no such guarantee as the hon. member mentioned was necessary, because already Canadian producers of pipe are able to capture this market on a competitive basis. Indeed, in addition to their ability to compete in Canada, the Steel Company of Canada—

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In Hamilton.

Mr. MacEachen: —has indicated its intention to secure some of the market in the United States for the pipe to be laid in that country. It seems to me the hon. member can be assured that Canada is in an extremely good position to gain great benefits from this project.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—DISCREPANCY IN ESTIMATES OF EMPLOYMENT CREATED

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): The Deputy Prime Minister has consistently referred to 100,000 man-years of employment. The study to which two of my colleagues referred the estimate of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which includes both Alcan and Dempster speaks of not 100,000, but 69,078 man-years. If the Dempster link is not constructed and a reduction of 30 per cent is made, the figure is brought down to 46,000 or 47,000 man-years. Is the minister prepared to table this report and explain the divergence between the figures of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the figures he himself has been using?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): The Foothills company itself, in its estimates placed before the National Energy Board, made an estimate of the manpower required. I am sure that on the basis of varying assumptions, one could reach different conclusions and I am not surprised if reports such as the one referred to by the hon. member for Yukon, prepared by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, indicate that, given the worst possible assumptions, the employment content would be at a different level.

As I say, I am not surprised if that should be the case. But I will have no hesitation about attempting to deal with these varying estimates before the committee. However, it does seem somewhat futile to attempt at this stage to engage in battles over the estimated number of jobs which will be provided. What we ought to do is get this project under way and make it a reality.

Mr. Fraser: I must say we would progress a lot faster if the Acting Prime Minister would come clean with the House. Yesterday, asked how the number of jobs would be affected by the type of pipe selected, he said, "Certainly, I have no estimate prepared on the basis of high-pressure pipe." Is the hon. gentleman prepared to put before the House and the committee the government's own, independent assessment of the number of man-hours of employment which will be created by this project, and stop this fluffery, these statements that there are perhaps some low-basis calculations floating around which the government has not found out about yet?

Mr. MacEachen: We have not hesitated to put before the country our projected estimates of the number of jobs which will become available. These estimates were made public after the agreement was announced in Washington by the President and by the Prime Minister. They reflected our view of the total man-hours which will be derived from the pipeline system as a whole, including the Dempster as well as from the pipeline system excluding the Dempster. Contrary to what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, none of it was put in small print; it was all in the same large-size print which even the hon. member can read.

Mr. Fraser: In view of that reply, can I ask the minister why he made it quite clear yesterday in this chamber that the only estimates he was using were those he had obtained from Foothills? How can the hon. gentleman now say that he has given the government's figures to the House, the country or anybody else?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member misunderstands the situation. Yesterday he asked a question with respect to estimates prepared against the possibility that the National Energy Board would recommend the use of high-pressure pipe. I am not prepared at this stage, for obvious reasons, to begin issuing estimates on the basis of high-pressure pipe being used.

ESTIMATES

DELAY IN INTRODUCTION—TOTAL FIGURE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. As we have heard much rhetoric from the other side of Wellington Street concerning fiscal restraint at the federal level, would the hon. gentleman tell us why he has chosen to delay the introduction of his estimates into the House, by comparison with former years? Will he tell us whether those estimates in total will amount to a figure below $45 billion, on a national accounts basis?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the estimates would probably be tabled on February 22. As far as I recall, they were tabled last year on February 16. I regret the six days' delay. There is nothing significant about it. As to the figures, they will be made known to the House when I table the estimates on February 22.

Mr. Stevens: Bearing in mind that fiscal restraint is an important discussion point at the first ministers' conference, would the President of the Treasury Board not at least consider allowing that meeting to know what, in fact, will be the figure of total government spending for fiscal 1979, bearing in mind that in October when the Minister of Finance brought in his so-called budget, he did not choose to show the 1979 figures, as had been the custom in former presentations?

Mr. Andras: The tabling of expenditure plans for next year goes on at different dates for different jurisdictions throughout the country. Ontario is planning to make its figures public on or about the first week in March. This is a normal process. I do not intend to make a statement at the federal-provincial conference when the proper place to do so is right here in the House of Commons.

BUDGETARY DEFICIT FORECAST FOR 1979

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My supplementary is addressed to the Minister of Finance, who laughs at the question of fiscal restraint. Would the hon. gentleman indicate what he anticipates will be the budgetary deficit for fiscal 1979, bearing in mind that it is $9.2 billion estimated for fiscal 1978? Does he expect it to be more, or less, than that figure?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): First, Mr. Speaker, may I say I am very surprised that there is no question from the official opposition today with regard to the inflation rate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Could it be they do not want to acknowledge that there is a big reduction? As far as cash requirements for next year are concerned, we have acknowledged that there will be a special problem next year because we shall be obliged to cope with the expenditure of $2 billion in interest payments on Canada Savings Bonds. The total cash performance will be known when I present my budget.

NUCLEAR CONTROL COMMISSION—UNIONS' REPRESENTATION

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or to the acting minister if the former is not here.

In light of the fact that Bill C-14 on nuclear control will increase membership on the Nuclear Control Board from five to nine members, does the minister intend to appoint a union representative on the board as was requested by the Director of the United Steelworkers, Mr. Docquier, in order to make sure the workers have their say regarding safety on the job?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I will take note of the representation and pass it on to my colleague.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMPENSATION BY U.S.S.R. FOR COST OF RECOVERING DEBRIS FROM SATELLITE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Further to the talks the minister had over the weekend at the United Nations, may I ask him whether he has officially submitted a claim to the U.S.S.R. in order to compensate for Canada's expenditures in recovering the debris of Cosmos 954 which fell on our soil?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no official claim has been put to the U.S.S.R. So far, we have notified the Secretary General. Initially, I did that by way of a formal letter, and I did it in person with Mr. Waldheim yesterday. We have also notified the Soviet Union. Incidentally, I received some clarification yesterday from the Secretary General on this matter. The next step is to determine the technique through which the costs can be identified as being related to this activity. Of course, also we are awaiting a response from the U.S.S.R., which has not arrived as yet, indicating what their reaction is to our note in this regard.

I suspect it will be some time before there is any further clarification. Also, I should add that the search is continuing; therefore, at this point we would not want to identify a final cost. It may be possible to put in some kind of interim billing, but we would not want to cut ourselves off from the availability of presenting these charges and costs for as long as the operation is continuing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DAILY COST OF RECOVERING DEBRIS FROM SOVIET SATELLITE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary but it is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Because of the government's apparent ignorance of what is in treaties 6 and 7, and the resultant bungling of the notification, it appears likely we will be stuck with the bill. Can the minister tell us how much the bill is as of now, and how much it is increasing, on a per diem basis?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give those precise figures. We know it is well in excess of $1 million. Actually, it is beyond $2 million at this time, if the full recovery costs are taken into consideration. That is difficult to define specifically, as the search is continuing. My last report, received yesterday, was something over 1,000 hours of flying time. This is continuing. Decisions are being made on the extent of the search and at what level it must be continued. The teams in charge of this operation are now on site and in the area. I will have more information, when they return to me with their report, on which to base my instructions to them.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR DIFFERENCE IN PRICE FARMER RECEIVES FOR BEEF AND COST TO CONSUMER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Obviously, the Minister of Finance was pleased with the 9 per cent inflation rate. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question about that. The Canadian price index indicated that the price of beef in this country went up by 33 per cent last year. Meanwhile, the producer price has increased by 19 per cent over that of last year. A 1,000 pound steer brought the farmer an extra $80, and the consumer paid an extra $180 for the same steer. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, or the Minister of Finance for that matter, if they can explain the gap. Why is there a $100 gap between the farm and the table? What will be done about it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course, with regard to costs being passed on to the consumers, controls played their part for two years and a half. I know full well the hon. member represents a party which wants us to lift controls, and feels we should never have had them. But part of the market cannot be controlled while the other is not. I believe that some companies dealing in the consumer goods sector were forced repeatedly to return some of their profits to the consumers; however, the NDP saw fit not to take that into account.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, obviously, controls did not work here. The farmer received an extra 19 per cent for the steer, but the consumer was paying an extra 33 per cent. Why is there such a spread? What will the minister do about it?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, obviously the distributing and marketing companies exaggerated in that field; come the end of the year, when the AIB reviews their profits, they will of course hand over their excess profits to the consumers.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture said that if we needed it in this country, he would bring in an act to set up a meat trade authority. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether we can expect to see such a bill before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of the question and shall convey its contents to the Minister of Agriculture whose responsibility this is.

[Mr. Danson.]

FINANCE

REQUEST PREMIERS RECEIVE CANADA'S PROPOSALS AT GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since the economy of every province is profoundly affected by the Gatt negotiations, will the government accept the request of the premiers and forward to them, on a confidential basis, the negotiating list Canada is presenting at Geneva?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this matter was discussed this morning at the first ministers' conference. The Prime Minister agreed that, on a confidential basis, information would be transmitted to the various premiers for the tariffs which affect their provinces.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, this information will be transmitted to the premiers: will it be on a piecemeal basis? In other words, are we going to let one provincial premier know what is going on in his province, or are we going to let all the premiers know what is going on in all of Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think there was general discussion and agreement among the premiers this morning that the responsibility of those negotiations is the responsibility of the federal government. There was an agreement that there should be exchange of information between the provinces and the federal government. I think that is the proper course to follow.

INFORMATION ON GATT PROPOSALS AVAILABLE TO PREMIERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is he telling the House of Commons that the government intends immediately, today or tomorrow, to make available to the premiers of Canada all, or a part of the GATT negotiating list which Canadian officials are presenting at Geneva? Is that what he is telling us, or is he telling us that information will be made available to the premiers at a later time, which is quite a different position?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, several consultations have already been held between the provinces and the federal government on the subjects discussed. Of course, the question put to the Prime Minister this morning dealt with whether or not the provincial first ministers would be advised of the American position. The Prime Minister of Canada said that he was thinking of conveying part of that information to the first ministers concerned.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance would want to reconfirm what went on at the federal-provincial conference this morning, because that is not what happened. I would like to know from the Minister of Finance—or from any other minister who might be prepared to enter into this question—whether or not it is the intention of the government to make available, now, to those provinces which express an interest in knowing it, the negotiating position Canada will be presenting at GATT? Will that information be made available now, or is some other kind of information going to be made available later on a confidential basis?

● (1452)

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has already been said by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and by the right hon. Prime Minister. This morning the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada have had a very frank discussion and I understand they have reached an agreement.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

Could the minister tell me if he had an appointment yesterday to meet the representatives of Canadian police associations and, if so, why was he unable to meet them, and did he know what they wanted to talk to him about? In the meantime, did he have the opportunity today to meet the representatives of these Canadian police associations?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an appointment to meet this association yesterday and my agenda makes it impossible for me to meet them. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I will be attending the federal-provincial conference after the oral question period.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Did the minister's executive assistant advise him that they tried to meet him yesterday with regard to this issue?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I was not made aware that someone tried to meet me yesterday. I was not there anyway.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTION POSTAL RATE INCREASES POSTPONED UNTIL LEGISLATION INTRODUCED

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. I congratulate him and sympathize with him as he becomes the sixth person to hold this office in as many years. In view of the promise of his predecessor that postal rate increases shall come only after the Post Office has achieved a satisfactory level of efficiency, and the further promise that there will be consultation with major postal users before any announcement of rate increases is made, will the Postmaster General postpone the rate increase announced by his predecessor last November, to take effect on April 1, until such time as the conditions outlined in the preamble to this question are met?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the decision to increase postal rates was taken before I came into office. I think these increases were quite wisely planned for they will greatly help reduce the $600 million deficit. That will not in any way prevent us from making postal services more efficient and solving current labour problems.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, is the Postmaster General aware of the reply of one of his predecessors, the present Minister of State for Urban Affairs, to a written question in the House of Commons, appearing in Hansard for March 13, 1974, when he said:

> Rates of postage for domestic letter mail are set out in section 10 of the Post Office Act. Changes in these rates, therefore, are possible only by act of parliament.

In light of this opinion expressed by the minister's predecessor, and in face of a $600 million deficit, will the new Postmaster General now agree to increase postal rates legally, by act of parliament, rather than illegally by ministerial decree?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, since I am the sixth Postmaster General in seven years, I cannot be aware of all the statements made by my predecessors, however, I will take notice of the question in order to give an adequate answer.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

DENIAL OF INFORMATION TO OPPOSITION MEMBER

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister. Given the fact that there is far more openness in the United States as a result of the Watergate scandal—a similar scenario we watched with interest developing in Canada—can the hon. gentleman indicate if he will facilitate the work of a member of this party in trying to secure, under the freedom of information act in the United States, the information which the hon. gentleman personally, and the government, has denied to the hon. member for Yukon and other hon. members of this party? If he will not facilitate such an application, will he at least indicate that the government will not frustrate an attempt to secure information in that way, as was done in connection with the atomic energy cartel case?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the question has been couched in such an obscure way that I feel like answering "yes and no".

FINANCE

RELOCATION OF CIVIL SERVANTS—EFFECT ON ECONOMY OF OTTAWA AREA

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the report of Woods-Gordon on the economic crisis facing Ottawa as a result of relocation, the effect of which will be an estimated burden of $250 million on Ottawa and surrounding municipalities over the next ten years. In view of the fact that property owners are facing a double inconvenience, the inconvenience of travelling a greater distance to work as well as an inconvenience caused by an increase in their tax load as a result of the shrinkage of the tax base—that is the essence of the report—when does the government intend to bring in its grants in lieu of tax legislation, so that property owners, tenants and others in Ottawa and surrounding municipalities can expect some kind of relief? This was caused basically by the government's decision to relocate.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my meeting with the mayor and other officials, I said I would look into some aspects of the legislation referred to by the hon. member. I said I was prepared to consider some changes, and we are in the process of looking into that matter at this time. However, I would like to point out to the hon. member that he is confusing two policies. There is a relocation to Hull, but there is also a policy of moving some of the bureaucracy out of the national capital region and into other areas of the nation. I would like to tell the hon. member that that was one of the main topics of the program of his leader in his campaign for the leadership of the Tories.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about the politics of the situation. The minister has proved that with respect to decentralization, he is a great political animal but a very poor equitable animal. When is the minister going to match with deeds his promise to the ratepayers of this area? When does the government intend to introduce this bill? Has the bill been drafted and, if so, when will it appear on the order paper? There has been a lot of wind, but not very much substance, to the minister's promises. He is hardly believable any more.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in talking about wind, I have an example to follow from this hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: We met with the municipalities as recently as two or three weeks ago. We are working on this problem at the moment, and we will be pleased to table the bill as soon as it is ready.

ENERGY

CAPE BRETON—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT ON OPENING OF NEW COAL MINE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, who is from Cape Breton. Since he is from Cape Breton, and since he is the Deputy Prime Minister, I am sure he will have the answer to my question. Can the hon. gentleman advise this House if tomorrow the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Premier Regan are going to announce the opening of a new coal mine in Cape Breton or, if not tomorrow, how soon will it be announced?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the interest of the Cape Breton Development Corporation in opening a new mine. As I understand it, drilling activities have been very promising and have established the reserves which would make possible the consideration of a new mine. But I also understand that at the present time there must be an engineering design study in order to estimate the cost of such a new mine, and I think it is early, despite the promising possibilities, to confirm that construction will begin as soon as the hon. member and I might wish.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, may I ask my hon. friend if, as the date for a provincial election in Nova Scotia draws closer and a date for a federal election draws closer, there will be a multiplicity of these announcements, which have been advocated by the opposition over a period of years?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton.

TRADE

DISCREPANCIES IN RETAIL PRICE OF GASOLINE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns discrepancies in the retail price of gasoline charged by various oil companies. As there is often a variation of up to 16 cents per gallon for the same grade of gas in a given area, and as this places the major chains in an advantageous position, will the minister undertake an investigation into possible collusion between major oil companies and further monopolization of this industry?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that aspect of marketing gas has been studied extensively by both the Alberta government and the Ontario government in the past. The hon. member's representation will certainly be noted.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, I asked this question of the government in February, 1975, and also in July, 1975, and received a very similar answer. Perhaps this question should be directed to the Minister of State (Small Business), but I will direct it also to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I know we are all aware that small operators in this country are being forced out of business at every turn. Can the minister indicate if his department plans any action to protect the small and independent retailer from further absorption by the major conglomorates?

● (1502)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are working closely with small and independent retailers in order to assist them. The question of the marketing of gas falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL WALKS FOR NEW SUBURBAN AREAS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. For the past three years members of parliament from all large urban centres have been endeavouring to get postal walks added to the new suburban areas of their cities. The minister's two predecessors always replied that because of restraints, none could be added. Now we find that in the riding of Scarborough West, 355 homes received a new postal walk at the request of a Liberal member. Can the Postmaster General advise the House when other large urban centres can have the additional postal walks which are needed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that the question is in precisely the terms of a question previously put and answered.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROSEAU RIVER PROJECT—VIOLATION OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? In view of the fact that the government of Manitoba has taken the position that the Roseau River project will cause damage in Manitoba, and in view of the fact that the governor of the state of Minnesota has restated his support for that project and is campaigning in Congress for additional funding for it, can the minister indicate whether the government still supports the position held by the government of Manitoba, that the Roseau River is in violation of article 4 of the Boundary Waters Treaty?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to withhold the answer on that question for at least 24 hours. I had a preliminary discussion with the responsible minister from Manitoba this morning. As soon as question period is over, I will be meeting him at the Conference Centre to discuss these questions, so I might be in a better position to elaborate tomorrow or the next day.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST)—PARLIAMENT HILL—USE OF FACILITIES FOR LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION

Mr. Speaker: There remains outstanding from last Wednesday some questions relating to a matter of privilege raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Perhaps the background should be recalled briefly.

The motion related to the intention to use the buildings of parliament for the purposes of holding a reception coincident with the forthcoming national convention of the Liberal Party of Canada, in a few days. Several months ago, as I have already indicated to the House, an application was made through me, which is in keeping with our regular practice, for the use of the premises for this purpose.

Over the last two or three years I have had ongoing discussions with representatives of all parties in this House as to the appropriate policy in respect to the use of these buildings. I formulated a policy some time ago which attempts to balance, on the one hand, the appropriate use of these buildings for the reception by elected people of their constituents and other visitors, for indeed that is a legitimate aspect of our function as elected members. We have to balance the use of the premises for those purposes against the other conditions that ought to be met here constantly, and that is that these are parliamentary and not commercial premises. They ought not to conflict with events that ought to be held in the area of commercial enterprise. Anything taking place in these buildings certainly ought to have a parliamentary connection and ought to be in keeping with a number of conditions that respect the dignity of the premises.

When the original application was made to me I examined the precedents and the dimensions of the request. I granted permission, which I felt at that time was in keeping with principles which had been established along those lines, and I directed my attention at that time to something in the nature of the dimensions of the requirement of this particular reception. I had researched the precedents in respect of the use of the Hall of Honour which, in addition to the use of the Confederation Room in the West Block, would certainly indicate the size of the reception. After that, as I have indicated, I gave permission and the matter proceeded.

Last Monday morning some concerns were raised with me as a result of some publicity or other information that had come to the attention of some hon. members who brought the matter to my attention. I immediately contacted the organizers of the event to receive their assurances in respect of the conditions I had previously laid down. Having received those assurances I informed all House leaders, by letter on the following day, that the original permission was under certain conditions, and that I had received assurances that those conditions would be met not only as to the use of the premises but also as to the recovery of cost, which in every case would be a full recovery of cost, in order to make sure that nothing would be taking place at public expense which was for a private purpose.

That permission was granted, and I think hon. members will understand that it would not be my intention to withdraw that permission at any time, particularly close to an event, even if it meant a re-examination of the policy would have to take place. I think that would have been an abdication of the responsibility I had originally assumed, and would have been an injustice to the organizers of an event which would perhaps have left them unable to complete the arrangements they had in mind on the basis of the permission which I had earlier given.

In any case, on Wednesday further concerns were raised, and the hon. member for Edmonton West raised a formal question of privilege in the House. Extensive discussions were held on that question of privilege, during the course of which the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), representing the government in this matter, indicated a willingness to discuss it with me. The matter was therefore held under reserve. I should indicate that while the matter was under reserve there was a fundamental difficulty with the question of privilege, in my mind. That was, of course, that having given my decision and my permission, if I were to give a preliminary decision on the question of privilege in such a way as to put it to the House, I really would be asking the House to send to a standing committee a matter which would place under scrutiny my own decision. I frankly did not have much relish for that. I would likely, therefore, have had a good deal of difficulty in granting the question of privilege.

I recognize the merits and concerns in the point that was raised, however, and it would have led in any event, and will lead to discussions about this policy and the feeling of members about it, as well as, perhaps, an attempt to formulate something more exact.

I am happy to say the matter largely becomes academic now; because of the discussions offered by the President of Privy Council last week I may now inform the House of a letter I received this morning from the minister. It is available in my office for members who wish to read it in its entirety, but I think I should quote only from two paragraphs. The letter sets out the background as I have cited it to the House, and the guidelines and principles that I have exposed to the House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The last paragraph on the first page reads as follows:

> In spite of compliance with these guidelines, the proposed function has caused concern among some members and has placed you in a position of having to make a ruling on a question of privilege. This seems to me to exaggerate this matter out of all proportion in relation to the time the House of Commons should be devoting to the important issues before it. As I noted earlier, no final decisions have been taken on the location and the nature of the social event in question. I should now like to advise you that the members of parliament involved are withdrawing their request to you and will choose one of the other alternatives which were also under consideration.

The letter goes on to request further discussions in respect of the policies to be followed in this case, because the difficulties remain that access to these buildings for the purpose of meeting with, sometimes on a partly social and partly parliamentary accasion, elected members, is still a valid use of the premises. On the other hand, there are the other principles that have to be followed such as an assurance that this does not come in competition with commercial enterprises in the city, and also that any event that takes place here respects the privileges and rights of other users of the buildings and, of course, respects the dignity of the premises.

I will be inviting representatives of all parties, as they have always done in the past, to cooperate to establish and formulate clearer guidelines in respect to the use of these premises in the future.

MR. HNATYSHYN—PRESENCE OF MINISTERS IN HOUSE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I will attempt to make my interjection brief at this time because we have important business to carry on.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, certainly members on this side of the House have attempted on every occasion to take steps to expedite matters and to try to do things with respect to the order of business of the House generally. In this connection part of my responsibilities on this side of the House involves the arrangement of question period, that portion of the day involving the questioning of members of the government and members of the treasury bench, and we have followed a policy of attempting to notify individual ministers who might be asked questions from time to time so that they would know in advance they will be asked questions and that their presence would help facilitate the business of the House. Indeed, we went to some trouble on this side of the House to contact individual cabinet ministers who might be involved in respect to the question period on a specific day.

As a result of this particular effort, which I thought was a courteous gesture on my part, there were a number of complaints raised with my office and my staff that we were in effect bothering individual ministers by asking that they be telephoned during the course of the day to determine whether they would be in the House. Whereupon I was subsequently informed that henceforth an arrangement would be entered into with the chief government whip's office by which one phone call in advance of the opening of the proceedings of the House would allow me to obtain a list of those ministers expected to be present in the House from the whip.

That situation was satisfactory as far as we were concerned. It allowed us to circumvent the procedure of phoning each minister. It also provided a simple way by which the government could let us know, not too soon before the question period commenced, who might be in the House, and it would also result in facilitating the business of the House.

My office has been informed by the office of the chief government whip that henceforth there will be no notification, and in fact we will not be apprised as to which minister will be in the House during the course of any question period, and also that this information is of a confidential nature and should not be disclosed. Aside from the fact that this is in line with the paranoia and determination of secrecy on the part of the government with respect to almost everything it does, I suggest it has very serious consequences for the way in which this House will operate. If the government is to take this position, childish and poor as it is during the course of an election year, it would seem to me in line with the ruling that you yourself made with respect to the obligation of ministers to be present and receive questions, as opposed to answering them. I believe this particular practice will affect the ability of members on this side in carrying out their functions as members of parliament. I bring to your attention, Sir, the extent the government is prepared to cover up and hide from answering questions in this House.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I may be accused of many things but seldom of lack of co-operation.

I would like to say that the first time I heard about this matter was a few moments before entering parliament. One would presume if I was involved in any kind of agreements that someone would have spoken to me before that time. Certainly no request of any nature has been made to me personally. My House leader has not informed me of any kind of agreement which exists. My staff are quite loyal and would follow the strict instructions which say that at no time do you discuss with the media, with the opposition or with anyone else, attendance in the House. Those are strict instructions which I have issued. Even if someone phoned our office concerning some of the opposition's attendance, it would be no one's business. I am sorry if it in any way has destroyed any kind of agreement that would help the House. If an agreement was wanted I would presume a little person like myself might have been spoken to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Essentially the point, of course, establishes private arrangements. It concerns matters of discussion and negotiation about House business and does not constitute, in any way, matters of privilege.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Wednesday, February 8, 1978, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) wishes to make a point at this time with regard to the regulations and statutory instruments committee.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief intervention to make on this important matter. It is important because it constitutes a situation where all members of a hard-working committee, without regard to partisan politics, have produced this report, as they have produced other reports.

This particular report provides for the reconstituting of the criteria under which this Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments examines orders in council, regulations, and decrees. Having in mind the debate in which we have just been involved and other things, members should be aware of some of the criteria which we have adopted. I mention that because two and a half years ago this House and the other place adopted such a report. It was for that specific session and we are now reintroducing it. I hope the government House leader might give some thought to having these criteria made legal every session. He might introduce the criteria as amendments to the Statutory Instruments Act which can then become part and parcel of the basis under which that committee operates.

I will read some of these criteria and ask hon. members on both sides to take a note because many of us in committee have had discussions with our colleagues who have sometimes challenged orders in council and decrees on the basis on which they are made. We have said that here is a vehicle by which it is possible to examine regulations and let the committee have an opportunity of providing it with material to do so on their behalf. I will not go over all of them. There are 18 points in the criteria contained in 15 orders. Some of them are as follows. We object to a statutory instrument if it, and I quote:

4. makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute or by the prerogative;

5. trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject;

6. (a) tends directly or indirectly to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts without explicit authorization therefor in the enabling statute; or

(b) makes the rights and liberties of the subject dependent on administrative discretion rather than on the judicial process;

8. appears for any reason to infringe the rule of law or the rules of natural justice;

10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provision—

11. without express provision to the effect having been made in the enabling statute or prerogative, imposes a fine, imprisonment or other penalty, or shifts the onus of proof of innocence to the person accused of an offence;

13. is not in conformity with the Canadian Bill of Rights;

14. is unclear in its meaning or otherwise defective in its drafting.

I have taken a few minutes of the time of the House to read those for the benefit of civil servants and members of the bureaucracy engaged in the drafting of orders in council and regulations, looking at the pipeline bill about which the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) is concerned. He will agree with me that there is very great scope in the bill for drafting orders in council. It may well be essential. I hope that he and other ministers will draw to the attention of the bureaucracy and the members of the civil service who have any involvement in the drafting of orders in council that these are the criteria which this parliament, operating through both its Houses, has laid down as being conditions precedent. These criteria must, in our opinion, be met before there is a proper order in council.

I make that point not in a partisan sense because every member of the committee on both sides of the House in all parties feels exactly the same way. Having in mind that we are getting to the stage where there is so much governing by regulation and decree, it is imperative that these criteria be printed and put in the high offices of most of the public servants in this country who are involved in any way in the drafting of regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed from Monday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, when I finished at ten o'clock last night, I was referring to the problem that we have because apparently the government has either not done any independent study of the probable number of man-years of work that will result from the pipeline project or, if it has, it is deliberately keeping those particular studies from the scrutiny of hon. members.

Hon. members will recall that a few minutes ago there were a number of questions asked of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) which revealed that there are in fact several studies of which we have some knowledge. I am sorry to say that, at least from the comportment of the Deputy Prime Minister this afternoon, it would appear he had no knowledge of them whatsoever.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Oh, I don't know.

Mr. Fraser: One of my colleagues has indicated he does not know.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They have been available since last August.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, this is a problem that we on this side have to struggle with when trying to determine what ministers know or do not know. We do know one thing, however. Ministers seem to go out of their way to make things as difficult as possible for members of the loyal opposition to find out fundamental facts that we have to know in order to do our job.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in making this portion of my remarks specifically on the question of Canadian labour content in this project, that we want this project to go ahead. We do not want to be associated with the suggestions and untoward allegations made by members of the government that honest inquiry into what the aspects of this project may be amount to delay. I am sure all hon. members realize that this is not so. As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, my remarks are along the line of the obligations we have as members of the opposition. These obligations are pertinent.

Under schedule III of the pipeline bill, referring specifically to paragraph 9 on page 51, the company must submit to the minister a detailed manpower plan designed to ensure the maximum possible use of Canadian labour. Apparently the company plan can be amended by the minister, but once this is done the company must comply with the plan.

Curiously, on page 3 of the minister's release dated February 3, 1978, which is entitled "Outline of Northern Pipeline Agency", the following words appear. Hon. members would do well to consider them carefully. I quote:

> Other responsibilities of the agency such as the development of detailed procedures and guidelines relating to Canadian content, and the co-ordination of the development of an appropriate manpower training and delivery system will also be undertaken by the commissioner in the interim.

These words are pertinent:

> —co-ordination of the development of an appropriate manpower training and delivery system will also be undertaken by the commissioner in the interim.

What does this mean? Under paragraph 9 of schedule III, the responsibility clearly lies with the company to establish a manpower plan. The words in the minister's release clearly infer that the government will be involved in the co-ordination of the development of an appropriate manpower training and delivery system. Does this mean that the manpower training and delivery system is the responsibility of only the company, or does this mean that it is only to be done by the company subject to the approval of the government; or does this mean that in addition and complementary to the company's manpower plan the government is accepting responsibility for training Canadian workers so they will be available to fit into the company plan?

The reference in this regard in the minister's release is not consistent with paragraph 9 of schedule III. It raises the very important question of just who is responsible for ensuring that Canadians get the jobs. I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the company can, with the best of good will, submit a plan that calls for maximum Canadian content in labour, but if trained Canadians are not available the plan may never be fulfilled.

The only specific mention of Canadian labour content in the material that we have in front of us is in schedule III of the bill where, as I pointed out, the company must supply a detailed manpower plan. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that in the Canada-United States agreement, in paragraph 7, there is a provision that states:

> Having regard to the objectives of this agreement, each government will endeavour to ensure the supply of goods and services to the pipeline project will be on generally competitive terms.

It goes on to say:

> Elements to be taken into account in weighing competitiveness will include price, reliability, servicing to capacity and delivery schedules.

Assuming for the moment that labour content can be included within the word service, it could be argued that this is a reference to labour content. But even if it is—and this is certainly not clear because the word services is not defined in the bill—this clause in the agreement could actually work against Canadian labour content because, in some circumstances, if foreign labour were more competitive within the meaning of that term as set out in clause 7, it would result in precluding Canadian labour content rather than including it. It is all very well for the Deputy Prime Minister—I see he is now back in the chamber—to talk about competitiveness. There is no way Canadian labour can compete if this clause is relied on by the government as the basis of Canadian labour content. It does not guarantee Canadian labour content, and may even preclude it.

● (1532)

I know the Deputy Prime Minister will agree with me when I say there is no way in which the agreement can be re-negotiated to obtain a guarantee with regard to Canadian labour content. Apparently the Canadian negotiators assumed this was not necessary on the basis of the confidence of the company that it could employ 90 per cent or more Canadian labour. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that it is devoutly to be hoped that this assumption is correct.

Officials of the pipeline company are confident they can achieve the objective of maximum Canadian labour content. This view is based on their experience of past projects as well as on their experience of training manpower for pipeline construction. Union officials have quietly and unofficially indicated that they believe the major unions involved in pipeline construction will be able to provide a large proportion of the labour required. Again, it is to be hoped that this confidence turns out to be well placed.

What is missing in any discussion of this issue is corroboration by independent government studies of the estimates made by the company and the opinions of certain labour leaders. The Deputy Prime Minister stated in September that the project would create 100,000 man-years of employment in Canada. According to his release of February 3, 1978, entitled "The Northern Pipeline—Facts and Figures", if the company's objective of achieving 90 per cent input of Canadian goods and services in the project in this country, including the Dempster lateral, is realized, the hon. gentleman's earlier estimate of 100,000 man-years would be fulfilled. But this depends on three things. First, that there is in fact a 90 per cent input of Canadian goods and services; second, that the Dempster lateral is, in fact built; and, third, that there is presently available, or will be available by the date on which construction begins, sufficient trained Canadian workers to do the work which is on offer.

The estimates which have been put forward depend on all three assumptions being valid, and in these circumstances the government has an obligation to be completely open with parliament both during the present debate and in the committee hearings. Questions must be asked in addition to those which were asked during the question period today and in the course of the debate last night.

A study has been prepared by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which puts the total number of man-years at 69,078. This is a far cry from the 100,000 man-years the minister has told us will be created. There may be an explanation for this lower figure. Indeed, if the study were available in its entirety we might find that it contained an explanation. Clearly, it demands one. This study was referred to during the question period a few minutes ago. It is not a simple statement. It is headed "Estimates of Canadian Man-Hours Related to Pipeline Construction." It refers to the joint project and is broken down into the construction phase, engineering, project management, transportation and related services, and so on. There is also a separate item for the manufacturing phase, and the total number of man-years estimated is 69,078. It is common knowledge that if the Dempster link is not built, a reduction of about one third is to be expected which reduces the number of man-years according to this still secret study to about 47,000. I hardly need point out to the Deputy Prime Minister that this is less than one half of the estimate he has been giving the country for some months.

An Ottawa columnist, Mr. Richard Gwyn, recently published an article disclosing that a further study exists with respect to Canadian content. This was carried out by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Noting that the figure 100,000 man-years is based on the assumption of 90 per cent Canadian content, Mr. Gwyn cites this study as saying Canadian content could be as low as 67 per cent. The author quotes the study as follows: "Unless there are more effective controls to ensure Canadian content this 67 per cent may be the more realistic projection." The Deputy Prime Minister has told us he does not intend to get into debate about what might happen upon the basis of the worst possible assumptions. But if this study, which remains unavailable, is correct, then the estimate of 90 per cent content being equal to 100,000 man-years for both Alcan and Dempster is just not realistic.

A further cause for concern are the words "unless there are more effective controls to ensure Canadian content—" What do these words really mean? Do they mean that a government department believes the controls are not effective and that some officials in government are concerned that in the absence of more effective controls—we do not know their nature—pressures will build up to by-pass Canadian content during the construction period? Again, this situation should be clarified to the satisfaction of parliament and of the labour movement during this debate.

Then again, the question must be asked: will the Dempster line be built? As of today its construction does not seem to be completely assured. According to the press the Department of Energy said recently that Canada has enough gas in the south to meet all its needs into the middle of 1990-2000. What is the government's response to this assertion? What is the position of the government on the likelihood of the Dempster link being built in the coming years? Obviously this is important because, as I have pointed out, without the Dempster link the estimate of the 100,000 man-years, even if accurately based, drops by 30,000.

There is a third important consideration. Assurances must be given by the government that its own department of manpower has under way, or will have in place in time, an adequate training program. At present there is considerable confidence that the principal unions involved can supply the manpower needed now to be sure of maximum Canadian labour content. We want to know that the present capacity will in fact be available in 1980 and throughout subsequent construction years. I might add that inquiries of the Department of Manpower by my office and myself have not resulted in any information on this point. We understand that certain training programs in the field of skilled work on pipelines have been in place for sometime but, as far as I can determine, nothing is in place specifically for the Alcan pipeline project.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), in a speech reported in the Globe and Mail on February 10, said:

● (1542)

—he expects arrangements will be made with the pipeline companies to have interested Yukon residents sent south for training and experience on pipeline jobs.

The article continued:

There will be major pipeline construction for this training in Alberta and British Columbia during the next few years involving two of Foothills companies, the Alberta Gas Trunk Line Co. Ltd. of Calgary and Westcoast Transmission Co. Ltd. of Vancouver.

It is interesting that the minister, in his recent speech, seems to be putting the entire onus for training on Foothills or its associated companies. Perhaps this is satisfactory, but surely parliament should know whether the company alone can provide the training required.

Despite assurances from the company, based on its own experience, we really do not know whether a sufficient and satisfactory manpower training plan is either in effect or being planned. This question must be clarified, especially in view of the newspaper report to which I referred.

It continued:

Mr. Cullen said that, depending on the demands for skilled workers by other projects, the gas pipeline might require the use of foreign workers in certain trades.

If the Minister of Employment and Immigration made this statement as recently as last week, I should think someone on the government side owes us an explanation. How many workers might this involve? What categories of work are involved? What unions are involved? Does the government have information which casts doubts on company assurances that the highest degree of Canadian labour will be used? All these questions need to be answered. Most certainly they were not answered by the Deputy Prime Minister in his speech opening the debate yesterday, nor today in answer to questions posed in the House.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) put the position of the Progressive Conservative party exactly, when he said that there is a need to have some sort of monitoring of Canadian content. It is all very well to be given vague assurances, but the proof of whether these assurances are taking place can come only in the future. No one is suggesting that the company, or for that matter the government, does not want Canadian labour content. Reports should be sumitted to parliament on a regular basis indicating clearly the job situation and illustrating the extent or otherwise of Canada labour content from time to time. Even the government, with its well known instinct for secrecy, should not object to our proposal. As the hon. member for Yukon has stated, we will be proposing an amendment to provide for such monitoring and reporting. Canadians have a right to know, after the promises, whether those promises in fact are being kept.

At this point I should like to refer to an extract from the report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I ask government members to listen carefully. In part the report reads:

> There is sufficient uncertainty about what Canadian content could be achieved . . . some method of monitoring to ensure the implementation of high Canadian content will likely be required.

That is an extract from the government's own study. Either the government knows about it and has not told us, or the government just found out about it today. It emphasizes the position my party is taking. There must be a monitoring on the question of Canadian content in materials, as well as Canadian labour content.

There have been stories circulating which indicate that the American counterparts of international unions intend to send their workers into Canada to seek jobs on the pipeline. Of course this cannot be allowed, except where there is no possible way to obtain Canadian workers. The Anchorage Times of October 2, 1977, carried a story that teamsters from Alaska would be sent into Canada. I am sure this was a misunderstanding on the part of our friends in Alaska. I have been told discussions have taken place within the last two weeks in which Canadian union officials made it quite clear that American workers would not be able to move into the pipeline jobs.

I should like to deal with another aspect of this project which was touched upon yesterday by the hon. member for Yukon. What is the government doing, and what is being done to ensure Canadians have a chance to take an equity position in this particular pipeline? The experience in Alberta clearly shows that this kind of equity opportunity would prove to be very popular, not just with financiers and the wealthy, but with the vast majority of people with modest means who would like an opportunity to take some part in the future of their country through this particular project. It is incumbent upon all government members to ensure that this is given adequate consideration during committee hearings in order to ensure Canadians an equity position in the pipeline.

Yesterday hon. members on the government side indicated that it was important to have a powerful agency to conduct, co-ordinate, and regulate the work. There is no quarrel with that. That agency must have the power to do the job. I ask hon. members to look carefully at the provisions in the bill which only allow an appeal from an agency directive to the Federal Court. The Federal Court may send the appeal back. It can do one of two things; it can confirm the act of the agency, but there is no appeal from then on, or it can send the question back to the agency for reconsideration. What the Federal Court cannot do, which any appeal court ought to be able to do, is to make a decision against the order of the body appealed from. I urge the Deputy Prime Minister, as well as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), to consider carefully those remarks. They are not given in a pejorative sense.

Despite the comments of the Deputy Prime Minister the other day, which indicated that this is a political House and the others are judicial houses, this is still the highest court in the land in the eyes of most Canadians. All hon. members should be conscious of judicial processes. Those processes should not be interfered with in the House of Commons, even with the plea that there must not be undue delay. There does not need to be undue delay, but there ought to be an appeal in the real sense. There cannot be an appeal unless the body appealed to can reverse the decision of the arbitrary agency appealed from.

In closing, I thank hon. members for their attention. Members of my party will study this question of Canadian labour content with great deliberation in the proceedings before committee. We are not attempting to delay this bill. As I indicated today during oral questions, on more of a note of irritation than at the moment, if the government provides us with the facts, we will move the bill along quite expeditiously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1552)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not in the House yesterday to hear the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) or the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). Since my return I have not had a chance to read those speeches, but I intend to do so. I simply apologize for not dealing today with some of the points raised yesterday, and I look forward to dealing with some of those points as they relate to my particular responsibilities at the committee stage, if that is acceptable. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has also raised some interesting questions today, and I assure him that those will be dealt with in the committee as well. Perhaps that is in fact the best place in which to deal with some of them.

I would also like to express my gratification at the expression of general support for the bill and for its expeditious passage offered on behalf of the official opposition by the hon. member for Yukon and reaffirmed this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South. That coincides very much with the general feeling of the government.

My purpose in getting into the debate today is to elaborate on certain questions which are a particular responsibility of my ministry and which affect, directly or indirectly, the planned northern pipeline. It is to be hoped my remarks will assist hon. members in understanding the direction of our planning as it relates to the pipeline.

First, let me say that I personally believe we can set terms and conditions for the building of the northern pipeline which can maximize potential benefits and minimize adverse effects. I believe we have the time to plan. I think we have the time to involve communities, but equally I think it is important to make the point that we have very little time to waste. We have very little time to agonize over the challenge. This pipeline is a national undertaking and must be viewed with that in mind, and we need the time which is at our disposal to do the job properly.

Second, let me say that although this is the largest capital project undertaken by private industry in Canada, it is certainly not the most difficult. It poses nothing like the serious problems associated, for example, with an oil pipeline.

Much more challenging, I suspect, will be a project like the LNG project in the eastern Arctic or other large scale, high technology energy projects proposed for various parts of Canada.

Let me turn to the implications of the proposed legislation. The northern pipeline bill is without doubt one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this parliament. The project is of great significance to the national economy and should provide a much needed stimulus, as others have pointed out. In the longer run it will also facilitate access to Canadian reserves of gas in the Mackenzie Delta. As minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I am particularly conscious of the effects the project will have on the lives and expectations of those who live in the north and close to the route of the pipeline. Economic activity has been at a low ebb throughout the north in the past two years. Unemployment and a stagnant investment situation prevail. I see the decision to go ahead with the pipeline changing that in a fairly dramatic way.

A project of this scale will give a boost to all sectors of the economy in the Yukon through the generation of new and permanent employment opportunities. In addition, I am optimistic that some of the economic stimulus of this project will extend into the Northwest Territories. There is, Mr. Speaker, a very distinguished member of the Northwest Territories Ex. Comm. in the gallery, but parliamentary procedures do not allow me to recognize him formally beyond that.

At the same time, it must be recognized that people living both in the Yukon and in northern regions of the provinces of B.C. and Alberta look upon the pipeline with mixed feelings. I think we have to be quite candid about that. Many people, especially natives, have real concerns about the potential for seriously disrupting their lifestyle and their economy. Some see employment and business opportunities but are wondering whether they will be able to realize these benefits. The Indian people in the Yukon have all these concerns plus an additional one regarding the possible affect of the pipeline project on the settlement of their land claims.

These questions are a very real concern to me and represent, I suspect, the most difficult challenge we must meet if this project, which is to be carried out in the national interest, is also to yield net benefits for the north. To me this is central to northern economic development policy.

Last month I had the opportunity and honour to address the Northwest Territorial Council on this very subject, and I believe my remarks there were germane to the Yukon. In the past we have too often seen northern development in terms of economic growth. Most commonly this has meant exploitation of northern renewable resources to meet national or foreign needs. All too frequently such projects have yielded little or no lasting benefits to the local people living in the north. My own objective in economic development is that it must be for the north, not just of the north.

The bill before this House, and the Canada-U.S. agreement it incorporates, provide the statutory basis for unprecedented benefits to the Yukon. The bill provides the legislative framework for my commitment to make the Yukon a full partner in this undertaking.

I should like to set out 12 key points about the project which are of particular importance to the Yukon. One, the pipeline itself will provide economic benefits to the Yukon. That does not seem to be disputed. Two, the creation of a single window regulatory agency to ensure efficient construction and full compliance. Three, a second stage inquiry to be conducted by the agency to review the proposed terms and conditions with the Yukon public. Four, an agency office in Whitehorse headed by a top official to be established under clause 10 of the bill. Five, Yukon representation on the federal-provincial consultative committee under clause 17 of the bill. Six, an advisory pipeline council for the Yukon Territory to be created under clause 18. The main reason that provision is in the bill is to help us take account of the special concerns of the Yukon. Seven, a major role and major responsibility for the Yukon territorial government is mitigative impact planning for the pipeline. I will have more to say about that later in my remarks.

Eight, the addition of a fourth elected member to the executive committee of the Yukon territorial government specifically to deal with pipeline impacts and native affairs. This I authorized in November. Nine, the establishment of a pipeline impact information centre located in Whitehorse to disseminate reliable information about pipeline impacts. Ten, substantial taxation revenues for the Yukon Territory including financing of essential mitigative measures and the creation of a Yukon pipeline heritage fund. Eleven, in addition, as soon as agreement in principle is reached on the Council for Yukon Indians land claim the government is prepared to create a $50 million advance on the land claim settlement. Twelve, the bill makes specific provision for the construction of a Dempster lateral when the necessary pre-conditions are met. The point I am making is that these 12 points constitute a substantial package of participation and benefits for the Yukon Territory. It will ensure that the interests of the Yukon are met in building the pipeline.

Let me now deal further with these 12 points. The building of the pipeline itself will provide a major boost to the economy of the Yukon, as it will to the economy of Canada as a whole. Because a major part of the route will directly cross the southern part of the territory, the Yukon stands to reap major economic benefits in the form of jobs, new businesses, permanent additions to infrastructure and new energy sources for Subsequent to the approval of the Alaska Highway line by the Canada-U.S. governments last fall, the environmental assessment panel was reconvened and has since issued guidelines for the preparation of the environmental impact statement. The panel will be continuing its work over the coming months and will be holding public hearings in the Yukon.

With regard to socioeconomic matters, the Lysyk report recommended that the second stage of the inquiry be carried out by the agency that was set up to regulate the planning and construction of the pipeline. I want to make it clear to the House that this recommendation has in principle been accepted by the government. We intend, however, that the public review process should be focused on a specific set of proposals and be designed to help us reach concrete decisions.

Wide ranging examination of the implications of pipeline construction in the north have been carried out in recent years by the Berger inquiry, the National Energy Board, the Lysyk inquiry, the Alaska Highway pipeline panel, financed by Foothills, to name only the most promiment. The analysis provided to the government from these quarters has been of a very high quality. In addition, many aspects of northern pipelines have been under study by departments of the federal government since the first major discoveries were made at Prudhoe Bay in 1968. What is needed now, in my judgment, is not more studies, more research, more lawyers and consultants, and TV cameras. What is needed is for the government to decide upon a range of concrete measures and then to put its proposals out for public scrutiny and debate.

The process we have in mind is as follows. Work is currently in progress within departments of the federal and territorial governments on a wide range of socioeconomic terms and conditions for the construction of the pipeline. The coordination of this work is being carried out by my department in consultation with the northern pipeline commissioner. We expect that a draft set of terms and conditions will be ready by this spring, at which time the agency will assume responsibility for carrying out a public review process which will include public hearings in communities along the route of the pipeline. I would expect this process to bring to light public concerns about any major deficiencies in our proposals. On the basis of this public scrutiny, the agency would, by the end of the summer, make the necessary revisions and additions to the terms and conditions, after which they would be issued to the company in legally binding form.

The provisions we are making for effective public and local access to the management process do not end there. The bill before the House provides for the creation of advisory councils. We will be establishing such a council in the Yukon at an early date to represent all the major Yukon interests, including the Indian people. The role of the council will be to provide effective two-way communications between the public and the agency beginning this spring and continuing throughout the life of the project. The advisory council will be kept fully informed of the activities of the agency, and be in a position to make recommendations to the commissioner of the agency on a continuing basis concerning the project.

I would like to turn now to the challenge this bill and this project pose to the Yukon territorial government. The terms and conditions will govern the actual construction of the pipeline by Foothills. What they will not cover are the myriad secondary, indirect impacts that will result. It is in many of these areas that the Yukon territorial government has primacy under existing legislation and program arrangements. The elected members of territorial council have a special responsibility.

Senior members of the territorial government have been involved in the pipeline decision from an early stage. The Commissioner of the Yukon territory participated in discussions with ministers prior to the negotiations with the United States. The full executive committee of the Yukon territorial government was invited to Ottawa to meet with ministers prior to the pipeline decision in August. I have myself met with members of the territorial council, the executive committee, and the executive committee member responsible for pipelines on more than one occasion, and there has been a continuous series of meetings between officials of the two governments since last fall.

It is no exaggeration that managing pipeline impacts will be a major challenge for the Yukon territorial government. It has a clear responsibility to start planning now in areas where it has primary responsibility. I am referring to such critical areas of probable pipeline impact as education, welfare, the control of rental accommodation, and municipal services.

The eyes not only of the people of the Yukon but of all of Canada and of the members of this House will be focused on the Yukon during the critical pipeline construction period. The government and my department have already taken several steps to support the territorial government in preparing for the pipeline construction period.

In November I expressed my willingness to support the establishment of an impact information centre for the Yukon. I note that the Lysyk report also recommended independent monitoring of social impacts. As was confirmed in my recent fact-finding visit to Alaska, an impact information centre can play a useful role in disseminating reliable information about pipeline impact, before, during, and after the construction period.

In addition, at the request of the territorial council, the elected membership of the executive committee, or Ex. Comm., was expanded to four. This was specifically to provide for expanded initiatives in the areas of pipeline planning and native affairs.

Previous speakers in this debate have charged the government with failing to respond to the Lysyk recommendation for the creation of a heritage fund. In fact, in my judgment, we have done better. We have negotiated a tax régime with the United States which represents a tenfold increase over revenues anticipated by the Yukon government. It will generate a net return of over $1 billion over a 25-year period. This is after Yukon communities. There will be significant economic multiplier effects.

● (1602)

Let me quickly summarize the scale and scope of the project. The plans of the company call for some preparatory work, requiring a work force of a few hundred, to be undertaken in the Yukon in 1979, and to continue on an expanded scale until 1980. This work will include surveys, preparation of gravel pads, and clearing rights-of-way. The laying of pipe for the first construction spread is scheduled to begin in January, 1981. By the summer of the same year large scale activity will be in progress and will continue until the project is completed in 1983. Foothills have estimated that their peak labour force in the Yukon will number about 2,200 and that the total in-migration will be short of 5,000. That figure is open to some argument. It may be conservative.

Some hon. Member: Conservative?

Mr. Faulkner: Demographically conservative.

For the benefits to be achieved without unacceptable environmental social and economic costs would require systematic compliance with regulatory standards. But it is equally important that pipeline construction costs not be pumped up by overblown, overlapping regulations and competing regulatory agencies. For this reason the government has established the concept of a "single window" regulatory agency. This will bring all the relevant regulations under one responsible, responsive, umbrella organization. This, in my judgment, is the central thrust of the northern pipeline bill before this House.

The concept applies for the whole of the Canadian portion of the pipeline, but it has special importance to the Yukon. The Yukon is especially sensitive to environmental and social impacts. The ecology of the Yukon is very delicate. A significant portion of the Yukon native population is dependent upon the land for food and other basic needs. The Yukon wilderness is a priceless national asset as well as for all Yukoners, native and white. It must not be crippled or destroyed by the construction of this pipeline. The Yukon population is small, only 22,000 people.

An hon. Member: But the quality is high.

Mr. Faulkner: With some exceptions.

The economic and social impact of pipeline construction, if not properly managed, could wound the Yukon deeply. It could leave permanent scars. We should have no doubts about that. The construction of the Alaska Highway has left scars. We must ensure the construction of the Alaska Highway pipeline does not do similar permanent harm. That is the challenge which faces the pipeline company, the regulatory agency, and the federal and territorial governments.

I would now like to turn to the terms of reference for the second stage of inquiry which has been the subject of some dispute, some controversy, some discussion, and some observations—some of those observations accurate, some inaccurate. To ensure that the benefits will outweigh the adverse impacts, firm and imaginative action will be required. The potential negative impacts are clear from the experience of the recently completed oil pipeline in Alaska. They include a significant influx of southerners, some as employees of the pipeline company, some as employees of the secondary enterprise, and some as transient work seekers and speculators and camp followers. We can also expect that high salaries, extensive overtime income, and a swollen population will produce a degree of regional inflation.

In moving to meet these problems we will have the benefit of valuable work done by the Berger commission and the Lysyk inquiry, the National Energy Board, the pipeline company, various interest groups, and departments of the federal government.

There are two main elements to the government's approach. First, we intend to contain the foreseeable impact to the fullest possible extent through terms and conditions of construction that will be enforced by the agency. As an example, we intend to discourage an influx of job seekers into the Yukon by requiring applicants for work on the project who have not already established residence in the north to present themselves at the hiring hall south of 60°. Wide publicity is to be given to this measure and I would contribute to a better understanding of it today by saying to anyone in Fredericton or Winnipeg or elsewhere who was thinking of going to Whitehorse to look for a pipeline job, "Don't. They will just send you back to Edmonton or Vancouver to make your application there. In any case, it will be two years or more before hiring in the Yukon begins on a large scale."

Other terms and conditions will include preferences for northerners in employment and contracting, and measures to insulate communities from the work camp. We expect to define a northerner in such a way that native people and permanent residents of the Northwest Territories as well as the Yukon will be given substantial opportunities through such preferences.

General terms and conditions have been set out in the bill, but these are not fully comprehensive. It is now necessary to work out precise and concrete conditions to be applied on the project.

At the request of the northern pipeline commissioner, work is in progress in my department, together with the territorial government and other interested federal departments, on developing the full range of socioeconomic and environmental terms and conditions that will govern the construction of the pipeline.

If the past month or so some confusion and controversy have developed over the question of whether second stage inquiries into socioeconomic and environmental issues should be held in the Yukon. Let me begin by recalling that last spring and summer preliminary assessments of the socio-economic and environmental impacts of the Alaska Highway were respectively carried out by the Lysyk inquiry and an environmental assessment panel established by my colleague, the Minister of State (Environment), (Mr. Marchand).

the Yukon has funded the additional programs required as a result of the project; these are currently estimated to cost in the region of $70 million up to 1983.

In 1983, the first year of operation, Foothills will pay taxes of $30 million. In each succeeding year this figure will be escalated by the GNP price deflator. The construction of the Dempster line in the 1980's would expand revenues still further, and, coupled with further mining development, should bring the Yukon close to a position of fiscal independence from the federal government. With fiscal independence would inevitably go a greater ability to Yukoners to manage their own affairs.

In the initial years, if we applied all the new tax revenues against the annual federal deficit grant there would be no net gain to the Yukon. I do not believe this is just, and therefore I accept fully the concept of a heritage fund first proposed in the Lysyk report. I wish to announce that to establish this fund the federal government is prepared to exempt a portion of the pipeline revenues, and all other new territorial taxes, from the calculation of the annual deficit grant. The fund would be capitalized to an eventual total of $50 million and the moneys used by the territorial government to provide lasting benefits to the Yukon.

I have also informed the territorial government that we wish to negotiate an agreement with them relating to other pipeline matters and, in particular, the provisions of loans to pay for pipeline related expenditures in advance of the funds becoming available from pipeline taxes. I am proposing that the territorial government be free to borrow up to $200 million from Foothills or from any alternative source it may choose, thereby ensuring the best possible rate. This will be the first time that a territorial government has had the right to undertake independent borrowings. Such borrowings would supplement the very substantial expenditures which the federal government expects to incur on its own account in the Yukon.

I have outlined several major steps which are already being taken, Mr. Speaker. As minister responsible for northern affairs, I stand ready to co-operate with the territorial government in other ways. For example, clause 17 of the bill before you makes specific provision for a representative of the Yukon on the federal-provincial consultative council. I look forward to co-operating with the territorial government in the selection of this representative.

The people of the Yukon and the federal government are looking to the territorial government for leadership in the management of pipeline impacts within its areas of responsibility. I urge the territorial government, and particularly the elected members of council, to take up the challenge. It will require political courage to make the tough decisions that lie ahead. Specifically, they will be called on to commit significant financial resources to meet pipeline needs, particularly in such areas as housing, social programs, and municipal services. In the measures announced today and the action previously taken, the federal government is meeting some of its major responsibilities. In addition, the fiscal measures we have developed will ensure the territorial government has the resources to play a leadership role in the management of pipeline impacts in the Yukon territory.

It will be clear from what I have said thus far that the interests of native people in relation to this project are very much in my mind. This is true, not only of the Yukon Indians, but of those in Alberta, B.C., and Saskatchewan as well. Pipeline co-ordinators have already been designated in the regional offices of the Indian Affairs program in the three western provinces plus the Yukon. They will be working closely with Indian leaders and the company to ensure that Indian interests are protected, and that Indian people are able to take advantage of the economic opportunities inherent in the project. The results of their work in the next few months will be reflected in the socioeconomic terms and conditions we are preparing. Alberta Gas Trunk, one of the principal members of the Foothills consortium, has established an excellent record in working with native groups, and our discussions with its president, who is also president of Foothills, has left us in no doubt that we can count on full co-operation from the company.

I would now like to look specifically at the Yukon Indian land claim. I have purposely left the most pressing issue to last, and that is this issue of the Yukon land claim relative to the pipeline. The pipeline is a reality which cannot be avoided. It is therefore in the interests of both the government and the Yukon Indian people to ensure that the land claim is settled quickly and fairly, and that both sides do everything possible to avoid prejudicing the negotiations toward the settlement of the claim. We have three full years before construction starts in earnest in the Yukon, and I believe this should be sufficient to achieve a just settlement of the claim and to make a good start on its implementation.

• (1622)

The Yukon Indians presented their paper, "Together Today for our Children Tomorrow", five years ago today. Three years ago the government made an initial offer for the settlement of the claim. A sustained set of negotiation meetings was held during the course of 1977, and by the end of the year there was agreement on both sides that an agreement in principle should be attainable by the spring of 1978.

In the past few weeks the Yukon Indian leaders have informed us that they wish to reassess and consolidate their position, and that they intend to present a new and comprehensive statement of their claim before the end of March, 1978.

I fully recognize that northern claims, including the one in the Yukon, have to do with more than land and cash, important though these may be. The claims reflect the legitimate desire of native people to establish for themselves a more effective role in northern society and northern institutions; they are an attempt by people who have been virtually powerless to gain effective control of their lives. The federal government is in full sympathy with these aspirations.

The government has made clear its willingness to consider modifying existing institutions and systems, and to develop with native people ways of providing special protection for their interests, whether through legislative or other measures. Indeed, special protection for native interests may be particularly important for Yukon Indians because they are a minority and there is danger that their position will be eroded further as the pipeline and other major development projects proceed.

I am confident that, with trust and good will established on both sides, measures can be developed that will give native people in the Yukon both political and cultural security, together with substantial and lasting opportunities for economic development.

The Lysyk report proposed that a fund of $50 million be established in order to enable implementation of the settlement to begin in advance of the final agreement. I informed the council for Yukon Indians last November that we are prepared to give very serious consideration to a proposal whereby such a fund would be established as soon as an agreement in principle was reached. While the principal would be held by the federal government—and this is in the spirit of the Lysyk recommendation—pending signature of the final agreement the Yukon Indians could set up a corporation to use and manage the interest accruing from the fund. These interest moneys, which might be of the order of $4 million or more per year, could be used to establish Indian enterprises that could take advantage of economic opportunities arising from the pipeline project, to carry out community improvements, and to provide programs for the protection and enhancement of Indian culture in the Yukon.

In summary, I believe that the pipeline project, although it is being undertaken for national reasons, can be managed in a way that will provide substantial and lasting benefits to the north—that it will be consistent with the objective I stated at the outset of promoting development for the north, that it will be consistent with the objective I stated at the outset of promoting development for the north as opposed to simply development of the north.

In particular, I believe that through the development of effective terms and conditions for pipeline construction, through the enhancement of government programs, through the creation of a heritage fund, and through the benefits that could result for all Yukoners from a just settlement of the Indian claim, we can produce a better order of things in the Yukon. South of the sixtieth parallel, the project can create significant economic opportunities for Indian people.

The agency that will be created by this bill will have a key role to play in combining firm regulation with simplified and expeditious management of the government's role in the project. It is important that the measures in this bill receive the earliest possible approval so that we can all get on with meeting the challenges that lie before us.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, before the minister sits down, may I ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister will have to give his permission.

Mr. Faulkner: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last year when we were discussing this matter it was suggested that the native land claims were close to settlement. There was a real possibility that by the month of September, 1977, a settlement in principle would be reached. September has come and gone.

The minister seems to be reasonably hopeful that a settlement will be reached in the spring of 1978. I would like to ask the minister if any discussions have been held within the past six months, or are presently being held, concerning the native people of the Yukon regarding their land claim? If not, has the whole process been stalled so that no hearings or discussions are being held at all? What stage are the negotiations at with the native people on land claim settlement?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, what I referred to in my remarks was that we had hoped to have an agreement in principle by March of this year. This was agreed to on both sides in the fall of last year. Negotiations have been going on fairly regularly. I cannot give the hon. member the actual number of meetings, but I would be pleased to get it and provide it to him privately. With the government putting forward a more precise proposal in December, 1977, it moved away from the general terms of the settlement to some specifics.

In the process of negotiations a few weeks ago, the CYI indicated to us that they would like to withdraw and review their position with a view to coming forward in March of this year with a comprehensive statement of their position. This is in juxtaposition to the position that we put forward in December, 1977. I will be visiting the Yukon in early March, and I hope to have meetings with the leadership of the CYI, and others, who are responsible for the conduct of the negotiations from the native side. I cannot give the hon. member a firm prediction of the date for settlement. I can only give him my best judgment at this point in time. There is a general interest, on the part of the leadership of the CYI, to settle.

It is evident there is a clear understanding of the potential opportunity that is associated with the pipeline if the land claims are settled, and compensation worked out.

There is opportunity within the pipeline, as I have said in my speech, for natives to participate. I believe they realize that. They are also conscious of the fact brought out in the Lysyk report that for this issue to continue for any length of time does not benefit the Indians particularly because it runs the potential risk of aggravating relations in the Yukon. It cuts down the amount of time between the settlement and the beginning of construction, that is, the amount of planning time available to them to take advantage of it.

We have to recognize there are differences. They have definite goals they want to achieve. They do not just relate to the question of land and compensation. In fact, those areas present the least difficulty for settlement. They relate to the issues that I raised in my speech. What is the position of the Yukon Indian and Métis within the political institutions of the Yukon? What sort of influence will they have over matters that concern them, such as education and a host of other questions? These areas are the ones which present difficulty in settlement but, in my judgment, they can be settled if there is good will and flexibility.

It is in that spirit that a satisfactory settlement will be reached. There is a disposition on both sides to try to settle it. I do not wish to minimize the negotiations that lie ahead, but I believe those issues can be resolved.

● (1632)

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat disturbed to learn this morning of the existence of two reports, one put out by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and another by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which seemed to contradict the figure which has been bandied around by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). This, to my mind, underlines the need for freedom of information legislation such as has been advocated for so long by my hon. friend from Peace River.

The bill we are discussing today is an important piece of legislation. It affects all the people of Canada, and in dealing with it we should have all the facts before us. Nothing should be hidden. If we do not have all the information in our possession as parliamentarians how can we make an intelligent decision on the issue? As my friend, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has said, it is not the intention of members of this party to delay the legislation. If the pipeline is in the interest of all the people of Canada, whether they work in the industrial plants of Ontario or Quebec or whether they work on the prairies or whether they are looking for jobs in the maritimes, we are prepared to give relatively quick passage to the bill, but only after expressing our concern with regard to a number of aspects and the presentation of amendments which we believe to be necessary.

I listened to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) a few minutes ago. I shall not comment at length on his remarks but I should like to refer to one of the statements he made. He said, and I believe I am quoting him correctly, that the bill "makes the Yukon a full partner in the project." Well, I have read the legislation several times, and it certainly does not appear to me that it makes the Yukon a full partner. In fact it detracts from the powers of the Yukon. The minister talked about the appointment of a member to the advisory council. But that appointment will be made by the governor in council, not by the legislative assembly of the Yukon. If you go through the legislation, Mr. Speaker, you will find many clauses which have the effect of placing power in the hands of the governor in council without right of appeal.

I intend to restrict my remarks to the subject of northern development. The Conservative party over the years has maintained a consistent and progressive policy toward the economic and political development of the north. On September 26, 1958, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who, incidentally, was the first Canadian prime minister to travel north of the 60th parallel, stated "Eventually the area of the Yukon will surely be a province. It is my hope that by the time of Canada's centennial, in 1967, the Yukon and Mackenzie will have gone a long way—if not all the way—toward self-government."

The right hon. gentleman had a vision of the north, a vision so powerful that it captured the imagination of the people of Canada. Twenty years later that vision has been eroded and obscured by successive Liberal governments which continue to ignore the seriousness and sensitiveness of Indian land claims, along with need to provide leadership and assistance in the economic and political development of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. The peoples of the north are looking and working toward provincial status. Their aims and aspirations are dedicated to this goal, and they will receive provincial status when the Conservative party forms the government after the next general election.

On August 4 of this year, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) speaking on the northern gas pipeline motion, stated as reported at page 8037 of Hansard:

> The Government of Canada, which runs the north like a colony, has known for at least a decade that the society and the economy of that region were bound to be profoundly affected by a pipeline possibility. Yet, despite that warning, despite Ottawa's absolute jurisdiction, we have to make this decision without a northern energy policy, without a national energy policy, without a northern development policy, and without any clear or consistent approach to native rights or northern ecology.

The key words of the above quotation are, I would submit, "The Government of Canada which runs the north like a colony"—a colony, I might add, in respect of which direction is given and decisions are made by experts in Ottawa who, while they might have all the data at their fingertips, have little if any intimate or personal knowledge of the north or of the hopes and aspirations and feelings of the people who reside within the territory.

When the Leader of the Official Opposition visited the territories two years ago, he gave a firm commitment to the people of the Yukon. He explained that if it was the expressed wish of the Yukon residents to become a province just like the others, he would, within his first term of office, pass the necessary legislation to give the Yukon provincial status. His is a progressive attitude, in complete contrast to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has had to say regarding provincial status in the Yukon.

I would like to quote from the editorial page of the Whitehorse Star dated Monday, August 8, as follows:

> Mr. Trudeau said on the CBC Friday that for the Yukon to become a province it would require a massive injection of federal funds.

The editor went on:

> Trudeau seems to be ignoring the Yukon territorial government's good record of paying its own way for operating and maintaining its programs and departments. In the past year the Yukon taxpayer met over 80 per cent of the territory's expenses. That's better than most provinces. If he applied the argument to Canada's provinces, seven of them would immediately become territories.

I am advised by a member of the Yukon legislative assembly that when the pipeline is constructed, taking into consideration the taxes that will be paid to the Yukon territorial government and using the same formula as is presently used for the provinces, the Yukon, if if were a province, would be one of the few have provinces in Canada.

You may be wondering, Mr. Speaker, why, in a debate on a pipeline, I should be discussing self-government in the Yukon. The answer is simple. Of all the areas the pipeline crosses, it is the Yukon, with the exception of northern B.C., which will be most directly affected and where the greatest strain will be placed on the population and on the local and territorial governmental structures. It is an area where decisions must be taken which will have a lasting effect upon the people and the territory, decisions which will require an intimate and complete knowledge of the effect then are likely to have. I do not believe the government has recognized this fact.

If one examines the provisions of the bill, specifically clause 17, one will note that this clause provides for the setting up of a federal-provincial consultative council. This council will consist of representatives of each of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Each of these provinces may nominate, by lieutenant governor in council, the person who sits on that council. In effect, the cabinet in each of the provinces makes the choice and designation. However, when it comes to the Yukon Territory, it provides for the commissioner, who is a federal government appointee, to be a member of the council. It provides for the other representative to be named by the governor in council, in other words, the federal cabinet.

From reading this specific clause, I gather this representative will not necessarily have to be a resident of the Yukon Territory, but could be an individual chosen by the governor in council from anywhere in Canada. I would suspect that the appointee will be one of the top public servants, presumably from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The representative of the Yukon Territory on the federal-provincial consultative council must be named and appointed by the executive council of the Yukon Territory, which represents the people of the Yukon. It is my party's intention in committee to propose an amendment to this clause which gives such power of appointment to the executive council. Not one person, nor a group of people from the south, can represent the interests of the Yukon. They lack both the feeling and sensitiveness which is necessary to understand the problems and concerns of the north.

The pipeline minister, Mr. Ken McKinnon of the Yukon legislature, said a few days ago, as reported in the Whitehorse Star, that the pipeline legislation presently before the House of Commons reflects a growing and powerful federal presence in the Yukon. He pointed out that the Lysyk report indicated that the Yukon must be involved totally in all matters pertaining to the pipeline through its territory.

Is the federal government going to continue to treat the Yukon as a colony, or is it going to respect the wishes of the people and grant them responsible government? Will it allow active involvement by the people in the territorial council in decision-making with respect to the impact of the pipeline? It would almost appear that the attitude of the government is to become more and more involved, and that its policy is to move further away from, rather than toward, responsible government. Certainly it did not have the interests of the Yukon in mind when it failed to negotiate the $200 million heritage fund for the territory recommended in the Lysyk report. As the hon. member for Yukon stated yesterday, this fund would have given the people of the Yukon the money to enable them to purchase the assets of the Northern Canada Power Corporation and set up a new corporation of their own.

Time will not permit me to go into a detailed discussion of the Northern Canada Power Corporation, but it is sufficient to say that it was set up by an act of this parliament in 1956 to service the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It was based on a user-pay concept. Each project undertaken must be self-sustaining. Therefore rates charged must provide sufficient revenue to cover interest on investments, repayment of principal over a period of years, as well as a contingency reserve. The NCPC is operated by federal appointees, and it is not popular in the north. Its power rates are high, its planning is poorly done, and recently it was faced with a cost over-run of $36 million on the $11 million Aiskik power project. If the Yukon were able to acquire the capital assets, future planning could take place by the people of the Yukon.

There is tremendous hydro potential in the territory. There is one of the largest bodies of iron ore in the world in the Snake river area, as well as coal. These two resources, combined with power, could result in a large and almost fantastic steel industry. One must remember it was the steel industry which made the United States what it is today. There are other large ore bodies of lead and zinc, as well as a potential for an aluminum smelter in the Whitehorse area. It is interesting to note that Kaiser Aluminum showed a keen interest in such a smelter, but received no encouragement from the federal government.

Some might say that I am stressing development too much and that I am not concerned about the environment. This is not so. Development can go hand in hand with environmental and ecological protection. Development of resources must and will come. During the past few years I have met many people of the Yukon. They are vitally concerned about the environment and the ecology, as well as the socioeconomic problems. They are responsible people. They are the ones who should be making the plans and participating in the decisions, not the top senior officials of government who do not possess the same personal concerns.

Basically, the Alcan route will be constructed to deliver American gas from the North Slope and Prudhoe Bay to the lower 48 states. It is an accommodation for our neighbours to the south. It is only if the Dempster spur from the Mackenzie Delta is constructed and connected that Canadian gas will move down the line. Whether or not a Dempster spur will be built will depend on numerous factors, such as the reserves which will be discovered in the delta; the environmental and ecological effects in the area which the pipeline will transverse; and whether or not a smaller line down the Mackenzie valley will be less costly or of greater national interest and value to the settlements in the valley.

Bearing these facts in mind, one wonders why the Deputy Prime Minister, when he was negotiating with the American authorities, did not do so on a quid pro quo basis and obtain some major benefits for Canada. I will refer to one benefit specifically, and that is a corridor from the Yukon through the Alaska Panhandle to tidewater. This was touched upon briefly yesterday by the hon. member for Yukon, and in the earlier pipeline debate by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) and the Leader of the Opposition. The question of a corridor through the Alaska Panhandle is one which the Americans may have looked upon with some favour because there has been some feeling in Alaska in the past that such a corridor should be established.

● (1652)

I need ony refer to House Joint Resolution No. 119 in the legislature of the State of Alaska, Sixth Legislature, 2nd Session, which was introduced in the legislature on April 13, 1970, and referred to the Committee on State Affairs. The resolution was a request for a negotiation of a treaty between Canada and the United States for the establishment of a Canadian port at Skagway and Haines. The resolution is very short, and I would like to read it into the record:

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Alaska whereas the State of Alaska has established, at its own instigation and expense, a modern marine highway system connecting Alaska and the 48 contiguous states through the Port of Seattle; and

Whereas the Alaska Marine Highway System was devised and has operated to take the place of a highway because of the impossibility of actual roadbuilding in southeastern Alaska; and

Whereas there is a tremendous movement in commerce, trade and tourism between the south 48 states and Alaska; and

Whereas better to handle all the traffic, the Alaska Marine Highway System purchased a foreign-bottomed vessel, the M. V. Wickersham; and

Whereas presently, due to the provisions of the Jones Act, the M. V. Wickersham is prohibited from transporting passengers and vehicles between U.S. ports, thus creating an unreasonable burden on the residents of the state, on the flow of commerce and on the visitors to Alaska; and

Whereas under international law every government which is sovereign within its sphere of action possesses as an inherent attribute the power to acquire territory by agreement or treaty;

Be it resolved that the Sixth Alaska State Legislature respectfully requests the Department of State to negotiate with the Canadian government with the object of establishing by treaty or other agreement a portion of the ports of Skagway and Haines as Canadian ports.

Copies of this resolution shall be sent to the Honourable Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States; the Honourable William P. Rogers, Secretary, Department of State; and to the Honourable Ted Stevens and the Honourable Mike Gravel, U.S. Senators, and the Honourable W. Pollock, U.S. Representative, members of the Alaska delegation in Congress.

I grant that the resolution was proposed at a time when the Jones Act was an issue, but certainly the resolution does indicate some sympathy for a corridor through Alaska.

A copy of the resolution I have just read was handed to me by a very concerned resident of the city of Whitehorse. When he learned of the resolution introduced into the house in Alaska he took the trouble to obtain a copy immediately. He forwarded a copy of the resolution, along with a letter to the then secretary of state for external affairs, now the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), and suggested that the Government of Canada look into the matter with a view to opening negotiations for such a corridor.

I am advised by the individual that he was not even accorded the courtesy of a reply from the then minister. I suggest that the interest is there and that we had an opportunity to negotiate for a corridor, but the opportunity was not taken by the then minister.

I would like now to turn to some of the clauses of the bill pertaining to real property and the Land Titles Act. Certain clauses of this bill amend two other acts. Under the present system, Crown land in the Yukon may be appropriated to the commissioner of the territory, and the disposition of that land is determined and carried out by the commissioner. This is the manner in which land has been set aside for cities, municipalities, towns, settlements, et cetera. According to clause 37(1) of the pipeline bill, the commissioner's power with respect to so-called block land is taken away and vested in the governor in council if the governor in council or the minister is of the opinion that such lands are required temporarily or otherwise for the construction, maintenance or operation of the pipeline, including lands for camps, roads and other related work. The management of control of such lands then evolves to the minister.

Effectively, control of block lands, which was vested with the commissioner, has now been taken away and vested entirely with the minister, who may allocate these lands for any of the purposes set forth in this clause. According to this clause, in conjunction with sections 16 and 23 of the act it amends, there is no right of appeal. The rules of natural justice has been set aside, and control of the lands is in the minister's hands rather than in the hands of representatives of the people of the Yukon. If one examines the amendments to the Land Titles Act at page 22 of the bill, one notes here as well that powers with respect to easements have been widened to include works which in many instances go beyond anything contemplated in the construction of a pipeline. How frustrating all this must be for the people of the Yukon.

In today's mail I received a letter from the Haines Junction Businessmen's Association. Their local government started in 1968. They have a boundary which covers 367 acres, 90 per cent of which is Crown land held in right of Canada, and the other 10 per cent is privately owned. In 1975 a 50-unit trailer park for permanent residents was to be developed by the Yukon in an area which was part of the original local government district, but this was blocked by the federal government. The association says the land is desperately needed for private and government housing projects and commercial enterprises, but it cannot get any satisfaction from the minister or anyone—

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT USE OF ANIMAL STEEL LEG TRAPS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria) moved that Bill C-221, to amend the Criminal Code (Cruelty to Animals), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised to find myself speaking on this particular bill on this particular afternoon. It will be apparent to readers of Hansard that having drawn a low number on the order paper, I was refused unanimous consent to discuss another bill of mine on the reform of the Senate and selection thereto. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) did not see fit to give unanimous consent to proceed with that bill, and consequently I shall speak on the lower priority bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) on a point of order.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It was not only I who did not give unanimous consent to that bill. In case the hon. member who has the floor could not see, it was also other members of the House. I think I had the right to object and not give unanimous consent. Furthermore, I do not like this idea that a bill which is slotted for a certain time be substituted by the member. He should be prepared to go with the bill which was—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I had asked for unanimous consent previously for Bill C-340. That was refused, and I sought unanimous consent for Bill C-221. That was granted, and we are proceeding at the request of the government with Bill C-221 in the name of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon).

Mr. Jones: The point of the order is that I do not know if Hansard showed who said no. There were persons other than myself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That was done at the request of the government.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I feel certain that anyone reading Hansard will be completely baffled about what has gone on. I think it would not be an exaggeration to say that it rarely happens that we speak on the bill that is at the top of the order paper. The exact degree of co-operation we have had today will no doubt be remembered.

Mr. Speaker, I introduced this bill which would ban the steel leg hold trap in April of 1975 when it received first reading. I submitted it again when we started the new session. Subsequent to first reading of my bill, my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), introduced a similar bill although I thought his was more flexible. In the luck of the draw his bill appeared ahead of mine and was debated on November 16, 1976. It was withdrawn by agreement and the subject matter was referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry which has prepared a report, although it has not been tabled. I see no indication on the order paper that any further action is going to be taken. I had intended to wait a while longer before discussing my bill, but fate determined otherwise today.

Another committee existed ahead of the referral to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and it was to look into the problem of steel leg hold traps. Its fate was like that of the Cheshire cat in "Alice in Wonderland"—it faded gradually away leaving nothing but its smile behind. Certainly nothing has been done by that previous committee. In the unlikely event that this bill is to go to committee today I would be prepared to accept amendments to the effect that the bill become effective at the date of proclamation. I say this because there is some difficulty in the period of time between passage of this bill and the time the trappers would be expected to have Conibear traps or whatever other type of traps they obtain if they must find a substitute—which has not been done so far.

The bill is nothing, if not simple. It consists solely of a small amendment to section 402, (1) of the Criminal Code which is headed "Cruelty to Animals". I believe it was written in the days when we were worried about people beating horses to try to get them to pull enormous loads.

Section 402.(1)(g) reads as follows:

Every one commits an offence who

(g) being the owner, occupier, or person in charge of any premises, permits the premises or any part thereof to be used for a purpose mentioned in paragraph (f).

Paragraph (f) reads as follows:

Everyone commits an offence who (f) promotes, arranges, conducts, assists in, receives money for, or takes part in a meeting, competition, exhibition pastime, practice, display, or even at or in the course of which captive birds are liberated by hand, trap contrivance or any other means for the purpose of being shot when they are liberated, or

The simple effect of this bill is to delete the word "or" at the end of paragraph (f) and add the word "or" at the end of paragraph (g) and then add the following paragraph:

(h) uses leg traps to snare or trap any animal.

I understand that the penalty under this section of the Criminal Code is a $500 fine or six months in jail.

I have received a great deal of correspondence since putting this bill down for first reading, although the mail has slowed down somewhat because people perhaps thought that parliament was doing something on the other bill, the subject matter of which went to committee.

One letter I received is so typical of the hundreds of others that it would not hurt to read it into the record. It arrived about three days ago and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. McKinnon

I am writing on behalf of the Association for the Protection of Fur-Bearing Animals . . . I fail to see why the matter of leghold traps seems to be ignored in parliament, in B.C. and federally. I am sure that there are a vast majority of citizens who feel that the method presently enforced for trapping in B.C. and other provinces is certainly not the best. Members of parliament encourage us to write to them on occasion, so I decided to write. I hope you give this letter and others on this subject your requested attention.

Sincerely,
Lynn McAllister

• (1712)

I think that Lynn, a former pupil of mine, has summed it up very well. This is a cruel treatment given to animals. There is a great deal of public attention which has been fastened on the seal hunt which takes place off the east coast. The seal hunt cruelty is minimal compared to the leg-hold trapping of wild animals, particularly muskrat and the smaller rodents. I am sure all of us who have taken an interest in this matter can relate countless stories about animals which have chewed off their own legs trying to escape the traps. Some of them have even been caught twice and have gone through the same process on two separate occasions; they eventually freeze to death if they are caught above water. It is time something was done in Canada to stop this situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not trapped, but I would like to take part in the interesting debate on my hon. colleague's Bill C-221, through which he would like to amend the Criminal Code so as to punish those who snare or trap animals with leg traps. I read the suggested amendment and I must say that, at least in the French version, one is aware that the wording is so general in nature as to lend itself to abuse where it says that "everyone commits an offence who", and I quote:

(h) uses leg traps to snare or trap any animal . . .

To my mind, this should be more specific because, in the mind of the hon. member, some animals must be excluded from this provision; I presume he is alluding to animals other than thinking animals. Moreover, I agree that saying that the use of leg traps "to snare or trap any animal" is not specific enough in that of course we must mean animals with legs.

From a practical point of view, it remains that the text of the act could be more specific, though the principle of the bill is worthwhile in that its objective is to fight against cruelty to animals and I congratulate the hon. member for his good intentions. He mentioned a while ago that this subject has already been discussed by one or several committees. I believe that because of the play of parliamentary procedure before adjournment of the session, and because of the attitude of hon. members on the committee, this bill did not come back to the House. That is why the hon. member introduced a new bill on the subject today, that is Bill C-221. If the government of Canada had to choose between humane and inhumane methods of trapping or snaring, needless to say it would opt for the less cruel methods.

Traps are inhumane when they do not kill the animal immediately or when they hold it prisoner and needlessly cause it stress. I agree that the trapping industry would be the first to benefit from a more merciful trapping method. Indeed, the fur of an animal which has struggled is often damaged. If it succeeds in getting free and loses a leg, the animal stays lame and its fur is lost. However, even though the national conscience and the industry can benefit from more suitable trapping methods, no trap or group of traps can yet be considered truly humane. Among those who want to promote humane trapping methods, some state that by prohibiting leg traps and other inhumane practices, we would inevitably promote the development of an alternative method. They say that only such drastic action can force those responsible to do something. However, we might well wonder what would happen if existing traps were prohibited before alternatives are suggested.

Many trappers, most of them native people, have incomes which put them just above the poverty level. Prohibition of these traps would force these people to give up their hunting income perhaps to draw welfare, or to continue illegally their activities in spite of the threat of prosecution. There are already instances of people who violate the regulations and who cannot be punished, and this causes the law to be ignored. Even if there were only a period of one or two years between the interdiction of those traps and the development, testing, manufacture and distribution of generally acceptable traps, what would become of trappers during this time? And what if this period should be extended? What are the chances that generally accepted traps or series of traps could be developed? Have the efforts made so far been successful?

Even though about 3,000 trapping mechanisms have been patented in the last 125 or 150 years, it is only recently that inventors have considered the humane aspect an important factor in the design of traps. The rewards offered for many years have not always gone to the inventors of humane trapping methods; this is now the case of the award previously of $10,000 and now of $20,000 offered by the American Humane Society since the twenties. However, it must be recognized that there has been very little publicity to make this reward known to those who can design such traps.

Through trap exchange programs, a number of attempts have been made to change the attitude of trappers about new techniques. But these exchanges may have come too soon. For example, a trap tested under this program is still in the development stage some 40 years after it has been designed. We can learn from this experience. The new approved trapping techniques must meet the requirements of the groups that are concerned with the question of humane trapping, because trappers cannot be required to replace their traps several times over. There are now some traps and trapping techniques that are less cruel than others. But no alternative program can be implemented before we reach a definition of what a humane trapping technique is.

In spite of these various difficulties, the federal government has committed itself to finding an alternative. The fact that this government participates in the proceedings of the federal-provincial review committee for humane trapping techniques is a step forward in this direction. This committee was set up in 1973 to promote the development of less cruel techniques and to assess their relative advantages.

[Mr. Pinard.]

● (1722)

More that 160 proposals were sent to the federal-provincial committee, of which the 22 most promising have undergone trials to date. A number of the proposed designs were already on the market under a "humane" label and in popular use. Mechanical tests have been conducted by the Canadian Standards Association and the engineering department of the University of Guelph. The Veterinary College of Ontario also conducted biological tests in Guelph and the provinces proceeded to experiments in the field. Mechanical, biological and practical test data are being assessed for a wide range of factors,including humane and method selectivity features, such as the effects on the animal's fur, easy portability as in a packsack for instance, the safety aspect in respect of both trappers and children and pets in some areas, mechanical durability and cost.

Minimum standards will soon be established on the basis of test results. Those standards will be amended as needed in light of further tests. Always on the lookout for new inventions, the federal-provincial committee issued a brochure on humane trapping for inventors. The Department of Fisheries and Environment is encouraging industry and inventors to co-operate with the government in the search for a solution to the problem of cruel trapping methods.

If a less cruel trap or series of traps is finally uncovered, the next question will be what type of program should be established to replace and take out of use the five million traps or so that would become obsolete in Canada. Should trappers be expected to bear alone the financial burden? The government is concerned with both animals and trappers. The department is therefore committed to support efforts to solve that further problem, trap replacement.

Even if a trap or a series of traps were developed to replace the present types of traps, it would still be necessary to ensure their judicious use. Indeed the most sophisticated traps can still be inhumane if badly used. It is therefore necessary to establish a program to teach the right way to use traps. Even if we do not succeed in finding a ideal way of trapping, the present traps could be made less cruel if the trapper knew how to use them. Acknowledging this fact, the provincial and territorial authorities have developed for the benefit of the trappers, information programs, some of which are partly subsidized by the federal government. The Canadian Trappers Federation is distributing a guide for trappers and resources from the federal government have been used to finance this information campaign.

A training program should help teach unexperienced trappers the art of trapping so that the preys may be killed as quickly as possible, taking into account the limits of the device being used. Professional trappers know how to practise some form of selection of the species, by using specific twigs or baits for instance. Their knowledge should be transmitted to other trappers. The federal government could institute such a training program for trapping carried out on native people land and other federal lands. If the provinces need assistance to increase the scope of their own training programs, the federal government will put its own specialists at their disposal. The issues of a general nature dealing with the responsibilities related to the implementation of the various aspects of the trapping method humanization program will be studied jointly with the provinces as soon as the standards applicable to humane trapping methods are established.

The government is pleased to see that people calling for the humanization of trapping methods are trying to speed up the development of an improved trap. The federal government strongly hopes that a merciful method of trapping will be found and is allocating resources to efforts made in that respect. It must also ensure that the trapping and fur industries do not have to suffer from modern advancement in this area.

Trapping still has a role to play in this new age but it is no longer limited to fur harvesting. Close to human settlements the trapping of certain species helps prevent eventual conflicts with man. A certain balance between the viable fur animal population and its environment can also be maintained today through the use of traps. This aspect of the management of the ecosystem is certainly profitable while not requiring any expenditures from the government.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that trapping cannot endanger any animal species. The number of trapping permits is determined by the provinces based on the level of optimum population to be maintained in each area. Animal overpopulation leads to the depletion of habitat resources, fights between species, sickness and long term depopulation. That is why the maintenance of a balance between animal populations can be considered a form of humanization in itself because it protects the species against those scourges. Those asking that all forms of trapping be banned should take those factors into consideration in their fight.

Furs are a renewable resource of which Canada can be proud. Those who want to replace furs by synthetic products are de facto advocating the use of petroleum by-products which are non-renewable resources. Just the development of those by-products often destroys habitats which can lead to an irreparable disappearance of wildlife. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that we consider all aspects of the issue of humane trapping methods rather than limit ourselves to the one advocated by the supporters of the formal banning of leg-hold traps.

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the parliamentary secretary reading, quoting and paraphrasing a document published by Fisheries and Environment Canada, dealing with inhumane trapping, "The Desire and The Reality." I would like to quote from a piece of correspondence by The Association for the Protection of Fur-Bearing Animals. The association said on January 31, 1978, that the publication to which we have been exposed is an interesting article that devotes approximately two and a half lines describing its desire to develop humane traps. The remaining six and a half pages seemingly are devoted to justifying the reasons for not developing humane traps. They think this speaks volumes for itself.

I heartily concur with the position taken by the organization, but I must say in the same breath, Mr. Speaker, that while I am opposed to inhumane traps, and specifically the leg-hold trap, I am not opposed to trapping per se. I should put on record a comment by Dr. N. S. Novakowski, program coordinator of the Canadian Wildlife Service, Department of the Environment. His comment was, and I quote:

> Because this topic has been discussed and argued for many decades with little result, we should make every effort to solve it. To ignore it would be to turn our backs on a large body of public opinion.

That statement made by the program co-ordinator of the Canadian Wildlife Service, the federal Department of the Environment, was made in the year 1958.

The real issue surrounding the development of a humane trap can best be summarized by advancing a quote from a letter that I have received from a Mr. Leo Rutledge of Hudson Hope, British Columbia. He says:

> It seems highly improbable that a practical killer trap will ever be devised for the wary ones of the dog family. But then one might well ask: is it an absolute essential that we should kill the possible maximum of these? (or of anything else for that matter). To strike a pose as removers of predators and so benefactors to the livestock and poultry industries seems an improbable reason. It lacks credibility. The price of fox and coyote furs has only recently emerged from a 25-year state of depression when relatively few were caught because it did not pay to trap them. Rather that being "alarmed" it is doubtful if the livestock people noticed the difference. At any rate traps, leg-hold or otherwise, would be a doubtful agent of control. The northern canines increase and decrease in their own time. Traps and snares are not an influence of consequence.
> Finally, while still discussing Mr. Priest's defence of the leg-hold trap; how apt is the quote from the president of the Canadian Trappers Federation, Mr. L. Cook's report, "You can fool some of the people some of the time but not all of the people all of the time".
>
> The leg-hold trap must be considered the ultimate in barbarism but if the development of a "humane" trap is to mean the total exclusion of pain and frantic anxiety, there can never be one. At best there can be only those less inhumane.

● (1732)

> No trap can ever be the answer to all needs because the constraints and variables contingent are infinite. So be it. Let us then proceed with what we have now devised and that which we know can be done.
>
> There have been killer traps available for many years capable of practical use on animals up to the size of the fisher, and these in the bigger sizes may also be used successfully on some of the larger animals such as beaver and wolverine. Wolves, being now classed as big game, need not be considered. In other words we have nearly all the essentials now—and perhaps all we are likely to get. So there is really little to wait for.
>
> The higher price of one of the better known killer traps has been one of the averred objections to conversion. An argument of some validity, perhaps, while fur prices were resting in the doldrums, but with some of the fur bearers trading at $100 and occasionally even better, the cost-benefit ratio is now entirely different.
> Price, weight, bulk, dependability, ease of setting and ability to kill are among the factors to be considered in devising a "humane" trap. Strangely enough, none of these were problems to the deadfall of yesteryear. Perhaps it would be well to take a second look here lest it should hold a partial solution. Improved trigger assemblies of various sizes and perfect in design could now be mass produced for pennies; with the aid of the small modern power saw the woodwork would be simple. Some trappers may have spare time in the summer. If so, it could be done then and building a thousand deadfalls should not seem an unreasonable objective. No special skills are required and once built they would remain serviceable for years.

Cruelty to Animals

The government funds made available to various aspiring "humane" trap builders have been rather well publicized. Therefore, results, per dollar expended, may well prove to be politically rewarding but other yields are likely to be unimpressive. All too often and easily, our leaders, our decision-makers, tend to defer the decision to further study, more research, the consultant's consultant, the committees, the subcommittees and all the other devices to stall for time, the more opportune political climate, the diffusing of responsibility, the guise of something productive being done, the "peace in my time" and ultimately the dead end. In the real world it is called "passing the buck".

The article "They take so long to die" sees the present government funding for the development of a "humane" trap "as only a scratch on the surface" because someone has estimated that it will require $150,000 per year "To get the job done". The estimate did not include how many "per annums" were deemed essential. How these conclusions were arrived at will forever remain a mystery to me. Really! Estimators should be more careful lest they trigger something—like a rash of government grants. In my opinion, $150,000 per annum or any other additional "humane" trap funding can only serve to buy a bigger pile of procrastinations. If legislators will now proceed to enact in a decisive manner, the marketplace will react and builders of better traps will beat a path to our door.

I suggest there is sufficient evidence at hand to act and that legislators should now do so. The facts are in and the time has come. The leg-hold trap—useful to our survival in its time—has served its purpose. It can no longer possibly be held as acceptable to the mores of our contemporary society. It has become an anomaly to our way of life. It is out of step. Already it is very late. The leg-hold trap has been able to outstay its time only because it operated in relative obscurity. Most were used well removed from the mainstream of society.

But though the leg-hold trap has become foreign to our culture, we should not be unduly harsh and speak of it despairingly. It served us well as a useful and dependable tool in our time of need. Instead, let us now take it to the museum with some decorum and place it with our other many and varied anachronisms—the thumbscrew, the wheel, the rack and the garrotte. The end is inevitable. So let us now acquiesce—sooner rather than later—while we can still do so with some grace.

I am quite aware that new rules and implicit compliance are not one and the same thing. There may well be some leg-hold traps in use two decades after being outlawed. All the more reason for an immediate start. We must act if legislators are to react and so ultimately enact. If we, as a people, do not express disapproval we thereby imply approval. We condone. There is no room for fence riding here. By a land stand of no dissent, we in fact give tacit consent.

British Columbia's attitudes to the raw-fur resources have been traditionally progressive. 1925-26 saw trapping areas of defined borders established throughout the province. These borders were recognized by the "Game Department" and their contained areas became known as registered trap lines. This system was the first of its kind and intelligent resource utilization was thereby ensured in lieu of former haphazard exploitation. This was a major breakthrough and undoubtedly among the most enlightened wildlife legislation ever enacted in Canada. It would now be fitting if B.C. again led wildlife legislation in an enlightened way by relegating the leg-hold trap to the past. Young people in search of causes to champion need look no further than this. And they could slay this dragon overnight if they choose to do so.

Finally, as a point of information—and lest it be thought that I might be little, old and wearing tennis shoes—I have spent 42 years in northern B.C. as a big game guide and outfitter. For 15 of the earliest years I also ran a 13-cabin trap line and made thousands of sets with leg-hold traps. I entered the north when options were few and easily defined. If one did not wish to leave he could stay and hunt or stay and starve. I elected to stay, hunt and live. The economy was fur. Trappers were either good hunters or they were not. The criterion of "good" was ability to consistently return with a sizeable catch of fur. Hunters, whether two or four-legged, hunted to live and the method was not a consideration of the time.

Leo Rutledge
Hudson Hope, B.C.

When Mr. Rutledge talks about a deadline it should be noted that his letter is dated March 25, 1974. Since that time the committee on humane trapping has appeared before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and has made a report of a buck-passing nature. The Department of Fisheries and the Environment has, it is true, produced a pamphlet on the subject and the "motherhood statements" contained within that literary exercise are truly amazing. The suggestion that the federal government should teach trappers how to trap shows a total lack of understanding of trapping and trappers. The suggestion that the federal government might control the Crown land in which the trappers operate and constrain them in some fashion other than the way in which it is done in British Columbia is another indication that the government would like to impinge upon men who are probably the freest spirits in Canada's north.

● (1742)

In many instances trappers are concerned about the inhumanity of existing leg-hold traps. Experienced trappers are more equipped for obtaining their furs with little damage and with more humanity than inexperienced or novice trappers. That does not remove from us, the trapping industry or the trapper the responsibility of resolving this problem. This problem has been in existence as long as the leg-hold trap has been in use.

I support the private member's bill of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). I am sure many trappers in my constituency will realize that I do not want to deny them an opportunity to earn a livelihood. The federal-provincial committee has one of the best boondoggles going for it: a budget of several hundreds of thousands of dollars, as well as an opportunity to delay decisions. This nonsense has been going on for years. If I was lazy, I would want to be associated with that committee. I do not wish to wallow in the public trough in that fashion, or in any fashion for that matter.

I conclude by indicating that I support the private member's bill before the House today.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), I feel trapped. I was under the impression that he had lived in a trapping area for many years. The letter the hon. member was quoting from was signed by another gentleman. When I heard him so indicate, I felt courageous enough to rise to speak on the very controversial issue of leg traps.

Mr. Brisco: I am from a trapping area.

Mr. Stollery: Generally speaking, the problem with respect to trapping humanely leaves one with a slight feeling of unease. Many of the people who are concerned with the inhumanity of trapping—and I exclude the hon. member for Kootenay West—basically live in urban areas.

Mr. Brisco: I do not live in an urban area.

Mr. Stollery: If the hon. member opposite would listen for a moment, he would realize that I excluded him. I do not suppose listening is one of his characteristics.

The hon. member used up a lot of time explaining his position. I will attempt to make my comments in as few words as possible. Many of those people who express concern seem to come from urban areas. They wear leather shoes, and there are other differences. When one refers to trapping, obviously an animal is going to be killed. Fur-bearing animals are killed in order to adorn people. There are few furs which are needed for real purposes. Basically they are used to make people more attractive in the eyes of someone else.

There seems to be a contradiction in this entire area, as well as some hypocrisy. People who live in urban areas often wear fur trim themselves, as well as leather shoes. They have views about how other people in different parts of Canada are living. In this case, they have views about trappers who are using the leg trap and are promoting a more humane method of trapping. There is no question that everyone wants more humane trapping. The question seems to be: is there a more humane and practical form of trapping which is readily available?

Various brochures have been published, such as the one on humane trap development and the one à la recherche du progrès, referring to testing systems for humane traps. There is some contradiction in the opinions of people who are knowledgeable in this area. But then I have always found a contradiction in the definition of the term "humane killing". No one can kill something humanely. I realize people are omnivorous and eat meat, but most of them would find it offensive to spend an afternoon in an abattoir, especially those who are not accustomed to it. I am from the city of Toronto, but on occasion I have had to butcher animals when I was living in the country. I have lived in areas where it was necessary to butcher goats and sheep, and I have never found that process to be attractive. It is necessary to slit the goat's throat. How can that be done humanely? Either you do it or you don't.

In preparation for rising today, I had occasion to look at that section of the Criminal Code dealing with cruelty in trapping and cruelty to animals. It seems to me that it would be more important to argue against killing animals rather than working toward arriving at a more humane trapping method. I argue strongly in favour of not killing fur-bearing animals for decorative purposes, rather than arguing in favour of killing fur-bearing animals for decorative purposes in a more humane manner.

Somehow the logic of this argument escapes me. I have had occasion to visit northern Canada as well as other parts of the world. The hon. member for Kootenay West talked about wolves and other animals. There are places in the tropical world where people kill everything that moves, and the furs are sold to Canada where coats are made. Ocelots and other exotic animals are killed for this purpose. An hon. member pointed out that snakes are also killed for their skins. The crocodile population is being wiped out. The skins of some of these animals are used only to hold up somebody's trousers. Alligator skins are used to make extremely expensive shoes for very wealthy people.

Mr. McKinnon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not want to misinform the House and the nation. The alligator population has increased considerably lately. They are now being marketed, and I hope the hon. member will bear that in mind while he is talking this bill out.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member has been visiting the southern United States recently. Perhaps he went to an alligator farm, but maybe he does not know the difference between an alligator, a cayman and a crocodile, all of which are from the same family. In some parts of the world their population is increasing, but in most parts of the world they are practically extinct. The hon. member probably goes to the southern United States for his Christmas holidays, and that is probably where he gets his information.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I suspect the hon. member has a guilty conscience about Christmas. I spent Christmas in my constituency, and I hope the hon. member did the same thing.

Mr. Stollery: It seems somewhat beside the point to discuss whether animals are killed humanely. They are being killed, and the Inuit and native peoples who live in the Mackenzie district and in other areas of the Northwest Territories earn a considerable amount of their income at this kind of business. I prefer to argue the question of whether killing is needed at all rather than whether it is done in a certain way.

I know many countries have game laws which are very lax or practically non-existent. Those countries have allowed various species to become practically extinct. The people who wear expensive coats and belts to hold up their pants are often the people who have very strong views on how animals should be trapped in Canada. I do not think there is an hon. member in this House who does not want to see humane trapping, but the fact remains that many people earn a large part of their living trapping. They may not be in the city of Toronto. But I do not think I should impose my views in this matter because I do not come from an area where people trap to earn a living.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in this debate on Bill C-221 the advantage of having representatives from all sectors present is obvious as it brings a viewpoint from all regions. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) was able to give us the benefit of his views as an urban dweller. I am surprised, however, that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), who introduced this bill, did not consult his colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), who on November 16, 1976, brought forward Bill C-208 on this very same subject. This matter has been referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. A good deal of time and money has already been spent on an approach to this serious question. I am surprised that once again we are using the time of this House on this matter. Five or ten minutes were taken deciding whether we should deal with Bill C-340 or Bill C-221.

I agree with the hon. member for Spadina, who says that all hon. members are in favour of a humane approach, if there is such a thing, to trapping, and of improving technology in traps which are used to kill. There is a good deal of interest in hunting and trapping in Canada. In the area I represent in northern New Brunswick there are many expert hunters and trappers. I am satisfied that they use the latest techniques and that where possible they make every effort to live up to what is contained in this bill.

I wonder if this matter should be dealt with in the Criminal Code. It may be that it should fall within provincial jurisdiction in terms of game laws and regulations respecting trapping. This activity is probably already somewhat controlled by provincial legislation in game laws, and I wonder if this is the proper time for us to be discussing this matter.

I have one other suggestion. Perhaps this House could make a reference of this matter so that all the time and effort which has already gone into it will not be lost.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada, and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, when five o'clock was called I was referring to a letter I had received from the town of Haines Junction in the Yukon and putting on the record the problems they are encountering in trying to obtain land not only for government purposes but for the purpose of building a trailer court and other things. I should like to read the following three paragraphs of the letter:

> The Alaska Highway paving program (Shakwak Project), a ten-year program, is scheduled to begin in June this year, with between 80-100 employees in our community. The Alcan pipeline route is also scheduled to pass within a few miles of our community, our portion is presently scheduled for 1981. How can this community even begin to have a hope of accommodating the impact of these projects when land is not being made available for development by people, nor is land being made available for utilities such as water, sewer, larger lagoons etc. If some action is not taken immediately the results can only be tragic.

They say they have written to the present minister and to former ministers on numerous occasions. They are faced with an influx of people but cannot get land on which to build the necessary housing or trailer court to accommodate them. This shows a complete lack of understanding on the part of the federal government and indicates the need for the people of the Yukon to have an opportunity of determining their destiny.

Another matter that I should like to touch on briefly with respect to the pipeline is the question of Canadian equity. This is a subject which was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). The pipeline project is one of the largest in Canadian history. It will require large amounts of capital, something in the neighbourhood of $4.5 billion to $5 billion, which will come from Canadian and United States markets.

If one examines the history of Alberta Gas Trunk Line, one of the partners in the Foothills project, it will be noted that when AGTL was set up Alberta residents were given the first option to purchase shares in the company. They acquired an equity that over the years has been an excellent investment due to the appreciation in the shares and the dividends that accrued.

If an arrangement were worked out in the present instance whereby Canadians could purchase equity shares, it would mean that less money would have to be borrowed on the foreign market, at substantial savings in interest to the people of Canada. We speak of foreign investment in our country and the outflow of Canadian capital to the United States and other countries. What better way to keep capital at home than to allow Canadians to purchase equity shares in the Foothills pipeline?

I should like to make one further recommendation, Mr. Speaker, and I must emphasize that I am expressing a personal opinion and not necessarily the policy of this party. Why not arrange for Canadians to purchase equity shares in the company and, to encourage such an investment, amend the Income Tax Act to provide for the waiver of capital gains tax in cases where the shares purchased are held for a period of two years or more, or, alternatively, allow the amount of the purchase price of these shares to be an exemption for income tax purposes? Canadian equity investment is vital. This party will insist that the government allow the widest possible participation by Canadians in the pipeline financing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: In closing, I would like to say that concern about the environment, the effect of a pipeline on the ecology, and the socioeconomic problems that exist, has been expressed by Berger, Lysyk, and numerous individuals and organizations who have appeared before various bodies which were holding hearings. All of these questions are important and must be looked at in perspective. The Yukon has faced many of these problems before and has had experience dealing with them. There is a population of 24,000 in the Yukon but each summer there is an influx of some 350,000 visitors. Foothills advise that at its peak construction period the maximum number of employees who will be working in the Yukon will be 2,200. If you add to that their families, the maximum number of people who will be resident in the Yukon specifically with respect to the pipeline will be some 5,000 people.

The Yukon has seen the construction of the Alaska Highway built with guts and tractors by the U.S. Army Corps. of Engineers. The work was begun in March 1942 and completed in nine months. In the early 1940s it saw the construction of the Canol pipeline, involving 1,600 miles of pipe and 1,000 miles of road. This cost $137 million and took 20 months to complete, excavating beneath the permafrost through the Mackenzie mountains while at times temperatures fell to 70 degrees below zero. The construction of the Haines-Fairbanks pipeline took place in 1954-55. It was 620 miles long, with 292 miles in Canada, and carried 12,000 barrels a day. There are other projects as well. I mention these few examples to indicate that in the Yukon the residents and local authorities are able to cope with fairly substantial projects. These projects have had minimal impact and the area remains a relatively beautiful and virgin territory. The people in the Yukon are able to adapt.

My plea through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government is to give to the people of the Yukon, through their elected representatives, the power and responsibility to deal with and solve problems that arise as a result of the pipeline construction. Let us not see a massive influx of federal civil servants involving themselves in problems that can be dealt with by the people who are native to or who have lived in the north for many years, and who have the ability to understand and solve the problems associated with pipeline construction and development of the north.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to take part in what I consider this most important debate on Bill C-25, but it is with some concern that I see the government forging ahead with the debate on this bill before the National Energy Board has published the contents of its report. As we have always demonstrated, the energy matter is always a matter of big money, without regard for the environmental and socioeconomic aspects which we must learn to appreciate, as soon as possible, for our own survival. Had it not been for the foresight, the objectivity, and the rigor manifested by Justice Berger during his three-year inquiry on the environmental and socioeconomic effects of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline construction, once again, as a nation, we would have infringed on the individual freedom of natives, and caused irreparable damage on an extremely delicate environment to which we are total strangers.

The recommendations made by Justice Berger take into consideration the opinions put forth by the two main groups who fought this project, namely the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee and the Committee on Justice and Freedom. The former categorically requested abandonment of the project, while the latter argued for a ten-year moratorium on the entire question of northern development.

As we know, the commission of inquiry chaired by Justice Thomas R. Berger was set up in March 1974 as a result of the enormous difficulties, financial, technical and social, created by the project in which two companies, namely Arctic Gas and Foothills Pipeline, had already invested considerable amounts of money. Contrary to what usually happens, the commission took an active part in the debate during the meetings through advisors who repeatedly stressed that the applicants, that is the companies, were in a position to prove their claims, particularly where engineering and construction were concerned. For instance, the commission produced the theorical testimony of Dr. P. Williams of Carleton University in Ottawa according to which the underground pipeline of the Arctic Gas would be subject to differential upheavals that could damage it seriously, and technical methods to reduce or avoid such continuous uplift of the buried and refrigerated pipeline were still in their infancy. To our mind, that was a weighty argument in favour of putting off the project to a later date.

From the social point of view, the methods used by Justice Berger to collect the testimony of the indigenous populations was also remarkable since, far from limiting himself to those of the inhabitants of big cities, the centres of economic and political power such as Yellowknife, Inuvik and Fort Smith, he went to the trouble of travelling 1,700 miles throughout the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, using all means of transport including the canoe and the dog sled, to listen to 1,317 witnesses in 300 days of public hearings and give an opportunity to the native Dénés and Inuit who represent most of the inhabitants of the towns and villages to state their opinion while the members of the commission paid close attention to them as if they were experts.

The position of the natives on the pipeline is well summarized in a few words found on page 11 of the lengthy Berger report. It will cross lands that are claimed by Canada's native people, a region where the struggle for a new social and economic order and political responsibility is taking place.

Canadians remember that unhealthy incapacity of the federal government to remain unbiased in its decisions about the development of energy resources, an incapacity which we pointed out on several occasions and which is due to the fact that it is entirely dependent on oil companies for its information. Regarding this, Justice Berger was very critical in his report of government industry co-operative efforts. Although it is neither realistic nor financially feasible to duplicate all industry services, there is a solution to that basic problem. According to Mr. Lewis Auerbach, scientific advisor to the Science Council of Canada, it would be possible to selectively reproduce key data for the evaluation of projects put forward by the federal government.

There again, the Trudeau government cannot say it is not aware of such possibilities, because the council with which Mr. Auerbach is working is directly subsidized by the federal government. In his conclusions, Justice Berger paid no heed to Canadian economic needs for Mackenzie Delta gas. In order to show another facet, we now refer to an economic study of the Arctic pipeline which takes no account of environment, social nor other ramifications for the north and its inhabitants. That study by Mr. John F. Helliwell of the Economics Department of B.C. University was tabled with the National Energy Board and is reported on in the summer 1977 edition of the Journal Analyses de Politiques.

Concerning the over-all effect of an Arctic pipeline on the national economy, Mr. Helliwell feels that barring fortuitous circumstances, there is no assurance the implementation of such a project will help stabilize economic growth. But in the same breath he adds that such a project, however big, can be implemented if the public and private sectors give it top priority and agree to slacken the demand for other resources, which confirms our view that the money and human resources needed for such projects are so huge it is impossible to develop at the same time other energy sources, including renewable sources. This therefore inevitably leads to an energy impasse.

According to our economist, cost estimates submitted by the applicants are grossly understated, in an attempt to prove the project is viable, in the face of small proven reserves in the Mackenzie Delta. He feels real costs were 125 per cent higher than stated by the oil companies, a type of evaluation error responsible for the fact that a project such as the Trans-Alaska pipeline, that was to cost Canadians $2 million per mile before 1970, will in fact cost the taxpayer $10 million per mile, with unforeseen overspending accumulating day after day. As opposed to the 8.5 per cent annual growth forecast made in 1975 by the National Energy Board for natural gas demand, the Helliwell study covering the period from 1974 to 1980 puts the estimated annual growth at 3 per cent.

From 1974 to 1976, actual demand increased only by 2 per cent and not by 8.5 per cent. We must therefore seriously question the intentions of the National Energy Board in this regard. The board is very conservative as concerns gas supplies, and this attitude also prevails among the applying companies which, according to Helliwell, are "pessimistic in their estimates of potential supplies and take no account whatsoever of supplies located in areas of the country other than frontier areas, even though all parties recognize that there are proven reserves in these areas".

When we look at gas supplies estimates, we note that the shortage expected will occur only in the mid-nineties. We are therefore wery far from the figures quoted by the applying companies which predict that by 1985 we shall have a deficit equivalent to one million barrels of oil a day. Because of all these factors, and always according to Helliwell, Canada would be wise to postpone construction of a pipeline in this area of the country. Helliwell also adds that it is not at all obvious that the Alcan route, which is the route recently approved by the National Energy Board for the construction of a pipeline, will avoid the problems caused in the case of the Mackenzie Delta project, and this from an economic viewpoint, even though this route seems to have the advantage of avoiding any trouble with native land claims and of being less damaging to the environment. What greatly concerns the economist is the pressure exerted by the urgent needs of the United States on Canada's decision, which pressure could impose on us costs which do not justify the expected benefits.

We, of the Social Credit Party of Canada, believe that the government should see to it that the Americans do not reap all the benefits of this endeavour and let us support the consequences of all the environmental damages. The government should negotiate with the natives with all due consideration to their rights as native owners of the territories concerned. They should get the opportunity to assert themselves without being forced to live a way of life that is unsuitable to them, and as our natural gas requirements are very uncertain we should not saddle them with time restrictions as we did for the James Bay Inuit. We know what happened in James Bay. The government should consider without delay any source of energy that could more safely and progressively replace natural gas so as to satisfy social and conservation needs rather than political or economic requirements.

The government should consider more seriously than it did until now the long-term factor with a view to protecting our energy and environmental situation in the future. The government should delay any pipeline construction in the untouched wilderness of the northwest as long as adequate environmental protection measures are not developed and that negotiations with natives are not fairly settled.

Mr. Speaker, the energy crisis we are facing now will end only when governments realize that renewable energy is the only solution. If the backward state of our technology is due to economic reasons it shows once more the incompetence of our political leaders. The main factor in all projects desirable for the community is the human factor itself. Mr. Speaker, again, this government becomes the accomplice of big oil corporations to make more profits from a natural resource that, after all, belongs to every Canadian citizen.

● (2032)

Lately, scientists have searched into history to find what might well be a way to deal with the alleged shortage that is threatening us. They remembered that some 40 years ago Germany waged war during a period of four years while not having any natural petroleum resources at its disposal on its own territory. As a matter of fact, the Germans accomplished this remarkable feat by using techniques for the conversion of coal, which their country has plenty of, into gas and oil in sufficient quantity to wage war for a period of four years. Our country and North America as a whole being endowed with huge deposits of coal which are estimated at 60 billion tons, I think that modern technology could provide us with a solution to our energy problem. There is no need to search through the documentation of foreign countries because the technology used by Germans is not well known by all countries in the world.

There is no doubt that successful exploration for traditional oil resources has declined more rapidly than anticipated by the National Energy Board. Nevertheless, the federal government must anyway satisfy the energy needs of Canada inasmuch as possible by drawing from our own resources. Regarding this subject, Mr. Speaker, on April 27, 1976, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tabled before the House a document entitled "An Energy strategy for Canada." To accomplish this goal, the federal government anticipated that Canada could reach an energy self-reliance within ten years. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I well remember that almost five years ago, in June of 1973, this same government had published a document regarding its energy policy which was to make Canada self-sufficient around 1983. Some four years only after the release of this publication, we are now being told again that Canada will be self-sufficient only around the year 1986.

It is then easy to realize that the ten-year objective that the Canadian government had set for itself has had to be revised year after year. Mr. Speaker, I have sought on many occasions from this House, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the unanimous consent to debate some measures which the federal government should introduce to save as much energy as possible. As usual, my suggestions did not get unanimous consent. The proposals I had made included one to maintain daylight saving time the year round.

I am sure that if we were to keep daylight saving time the year round, the federal government could save thousands of barrels of oil, not to mention electricity. To achieve that objective, one has only to consider the experiment which was conducted in the United States in 1973, a few years ago, five years at the most, and which proved to be very conclusive if one considers that an energy saving of up to 2.5 per cent had been achieved. In addition, wind energy is right there and seems to be a viable alternative, especially for a country like ours where the winter season restricts the potential of solar energy. Mr. Speaker, since the era of cheap oil is over or just about and the era of oil is coming to an end, why not take advantage of the energy potential provided by the wind and the coal which is really enormous in this magnificent country?

Mr. Speaker, what I find really strange in all that is the fact that the federal government does not have genuine mechanisms to scientifically assess the Canadian reserves of oil and gas which up to now have been overestimated. We, from the Social Credit Party of Canada, are seriously considering that the present government should establish, with the consent and the participation of the provinces, a board on Canadian energy resources. Such a board would be responsible for assessing energy requirements for the next 25 years and availability of adequate supplies to meet those requirements.

At the present time, as I was saying a few moments ago, our energy resources cannot be scientifically assessed; yet it would be really urgent to do so in view of the fact that we consume much oil and that that energy source is not renewable. In mid-April 1976, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) also announced that the price of Canadian oil would edge upward nearer the world price. One way or another it had to be expected since this government has always been improvident as far as I recall, and because of this government's incapacity for developing an efficient energy strategy, Canadians taxpayers will again have to pay more for their oil. It is undeniable that a real policy is indissociable from a global economic policy.

Now, as should be expected, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is anticipating stiff increases in oil and gas prices; but before announcing such increases, has any thought really been given to the fact that this would have a direct impact on inflation in Canada, that that so-called energy policy is simply going against the price and wage control policy of the Trudeau administration?

In his paper the minister urged the taxpayers to save energy, particularly oil, when the policy of the Department of Transport favours the use of the plane rather than the train. Can you make sense out of that? I cannot—it is so contradictory it is astounding. We can say, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is now at a road crossing where the future of not only its oil industry but its whole economy will be determined. Can we seriously continue to produce enough oil from Canadian sources to meet the domestic demand or will we be forced to become increasingly dependent on foreign oils as is the case now? We all know that huge quantities of oil and natural gas have been discovered in the Arctic and that we have the necessary technology to extract the oil from the tar sand deposits and at the same time reprocess it into heavy oil.

Indeed, our great country has enormous potential sources of crude oil and natural gas; it also has colossal reserves of coal that can be processed into gas or synthetic oil but to be really able to develop hydrocarbon supply resources in Canada the Canadian government will have to spend over $50 billion to reach the objectives it set for itself for the year 1986. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful to remind the House that on the whole less than $2 billion was spent on development in recent years.

And what about the inflation of construction costs that are going up at the rate of 40 per cent to 50 per cent a year and keep getting worse. Mr. Speaker, let us be frank about it, the economic policy continually promotes the increase in capital to the detriment of work and the purchasing power of our fellow citizens. In any case, it is readily seen that under the existing laws the rich accumulate billions of dollars of net profits which has the effect of reducing considerably the purchasing power of Canadians. Those who suffer most from that, Mr. Speaker, are the small wage earners and those who do not have adequate purchasing power, and all that simply because the present financial system does not reflect reality. Indeed, the present system is not based on the facts of reality and perpetuates a misconception about money in a human society.

The price for gas is now 47 per cent higher than in 1975 and this is the beginning of a new year but the old story of inflation continues unabated, and the good news in this respect are rare.

Indeed, the federal government has already allowed the oil companies to increase their prices next March over and above the increase they got at the end of last August.

A small tin of shoe polish of just over one ounce now costs 47 cents. Last time I bought some, I paid 39 cents for two tins of the same size. Last week my wife bought one pound of Fry's Cocoa for $3.85. Last spring the same thing cost $1.37. Finally, the price control is a monumental fraud. As a matter of fact, since the fall of 1975, prices have been constantly rising and the main culprit for all this is this very government. Let us take for example the rise in the price of stamps to 14 cents. It will come just 12 months after the last one.

Before making any further remark, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote an extract from an article published in Le Soleil of March 25, 1976 where it says: "The pressure of interests is very much like a huge financial cobweb which envelops us and tightens around us, leaving us with just our life—or almost". These interests snowball, accumulate and centralize money in favour of a small group of financiers. On the other hand, caught from all sides, the little people are divided, abandoned and ever more exploited by avid leaders who are hungry for profit. They are left to the mercy of those unscrupulous heartless, top hatted men of finance who, from the height of their ivory tower, without a gun but with more power than a whole army, make us accept insidiously an impossible, repugnant and sickening way of life in which all human values are despised and money is everything.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the present financial system prevents consumers form truly living. It prevents them from benefiting from their association, because this system sees to it that the fruit which should be falling to each and every citizen is taken away from him. If Canadians are to benefit truly from the fruit of their association, we must relate financial credit to real credit, or to the Social Credit Party of Canada. In other words, we should relate money and credit to what is produced by Canadians. Further on, in the same article, one could read: "These financiers who represent chartered banks are cleverly camouflaged by the Bank of Canada, which draws its pocket money at 8 per cent on all cash reserves of the country, and they take care of the rest, namely 90 per cent of the credit of the country".

It should be said that in a country money should not be bought; the country should create it itself without owing anything to anyone. This is a strictly sovereign right of the state. In other words, a government should not administer a country if it continues to buy money from abroad, which makes a false and unbalanced economy. Mr. Speaker, I think my allotted time has nearly expired, but it remains that the federal government had better make some amendmends to Bill C-25. It should wait in particular for the National Energy Board to submit the result of its studies on Bill C-25. Bill C-25 now provides for the fees to be paid to the federal government but it omits to mention or does not mention anything on what the government will do with the funds received. We know that this will perhaps be used in the next election.

I wondered whether the purpose of this bill is not to reduce domestic consumption in order to stimulate exports. As I said earlier, we should insist mainly on research to discover technologies to exploit fully our coal resources which are tremendous, and also wind energy forces, which would result in enabling the federal government to delay the pipeline project and at the same time to come to an agreement with the natives of this area to avoid disturbing their way of life which is beautiful indeed. It is different from ours because it is natural. Thus, I think the government had better delay the study of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have the opportunity to participate in this historic debate on the northern pipeline, Bill C-25. It will authorize and make provision to regulate the northern Alcan pipeline which will provide a land bridge or source of transportation for gas from the Alaskan-Prudhoe Bay fields to the lower 48 states and, at the same time, make provision for a connection for the delta and Beaufort Sea gas to be transported to southern Canada at a later stage.

This pipeline is historic in many ways. I do not believe there has ever been an engineering project that has received so much attention, so much planning and so much construction engineering as this one since the discovery of gas and oil in Prudhoe Bay in 1968. Perhaps no project has had so much money spent on it as well in terms of study. The Arctic gas company spent something like $140 million just to lose the nod of approval to Alcan.

Perhaps no project has received more study through royal commissions and environmental impact statements than this project which, of course, was the subject of the Lysyk and Berger inquiries as well as hearings by the environmental assessment panel of the federal government. Perhaps no project, at least in the history of Canada, has received more study by such a great number of governments, including the territorial governments of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, the several provincial governments concerned, as well as the federal government, and, on the United States side, the government of Alaska and the U.S. federal government. Surely the National Energy Board hearings that were held were among the most lengthy ever. I believe the length of the project, over 5,000 miles of large diameter pipe, is a first. So by all measurements this is one of the largest projects in the history of Canada or any other country.

Perhaps the largest aspect of it is the financial dimension of the project, now estimated at $10 billion. To put that in perspective, that is about 20 times the cost of the St. Lawrence Seaway when it was constructed in 1952.

This project, in the early years at least, will be designed to transport gas to the lower 48 states from the Prudhoe Bay fields. From Canada's point of view it becomes an important project in terms of providing economic activity in our country and a service to our U.S. neighbours; Alcan estimates some $400 million to $500 million in services per year to transport that gas across Canadian territory.

Surely at this time when we see projects of this magnitude costing, in this case, $10 billion, and when more projects are on the drawing boards for nuclear plants, for oil and gas exploration, for uranium mine development and for coal development costing hundreds of millions of dollars—literally billions—this should make us more conscious of the need for energy conservation.

It is nice to know that this aspect is going forward as well in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week I met two young people who will be working in my constituency at conservation community clinics. They had attended the conservation office of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Ottawa taking the intensive training program. I must say they were very enthusiastic and very determined that they were going to make a real contribution toward the Canadian and world energy crisis. Although this is not spectacular—unlike the spending of $10 billion for this northern pipeline—surely it is terribly important that we learn conservation as well, because the habits developed now are ones that will last forever and do not represent a one-time expenditure.

If we have to make expenditures of this magnitude for energy projects in this country, even though it is for our U.S. neighbours initially, now is a good time to be doing it. We are going through a period in the next two years when we will have a very large number of people coming into the labour force in this country. Toward the 1980s that will taper off and the number of people coming into the labour force will be reduced. Therefore, during the next few years we should be taking on and carrying out these massive national projects which will provide employment, capital investment and economic activity in our country, resulting in a long-term benefit as well.

Certainly the economic benefits to our country of this project are very significant. The Foothills company projects that 90 per cent of this project on the Canadian leg will be spent on the cost of services in Canada. This means that at the escalated price of $3.3 billion, some $3 billion will be spent in Canada for Canadian work. Some 68,000 man-years of work will be created over the five to seven-year period of construction. If we take into account the total Dempster link as well, as the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has estimated we are talking in terms of 100,000 jobs. If we look at just the manufacturing aspect of this construction project, we envisage some 30,000 jobs alone being created.

The company estimates that one-half of one per cent of the gross national product will come from this project during the period 1979 to 1981. During the period from 1977 to 2005, it is estimated that $500 million per year will accrue to Canada in terms of balance of payments benefits. Also the company has estimated that during this 28-year period approximately $13.6 billion of benefit will flow from the United States to Canada. The purchase of pipe alone will involve over one million tons of pipe costing $1.2 billion. The 30 compressors required can be produced in Canada. They will cost $158 million, according to the company's estimate. Thus, the economic benefits are significant.

In terms of jobs to the Yukon, it has been estimated that there will be 2,200 jobs during the peak period, and approximately $177 million will be spent in that territory. In the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, approximately $1.6 billion will be spent. In Ontario and Quebec some $1.2 billion will be spent. The economic benefit is not just in the west but is spread right accross Canada. It will help communities like Hamilton and Welland. Surely the benefits will spill over to a company like Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie, which is located partially in my constituency. In terms of construction, approximately 7,800 jobs will be created on the project at its peak.

The government and the bill commit this project to having a maximum of Canadian content. The objectives of the bill spell this out very well. The minister, through his powers of approving the procurement program of the company, ensures there will be a maximum amount of Canadian content. At the same time, it is in Canada's interest to have competitive bidding so that the project can be carried out within the estimated cost. If the project is constructed within 135 per cent of the estimated cost, that means American consumers of gas will be responsible for paying the transportation of gas between Dawson Creek and Whitehorse, which is a distance of approximately 277 miles, for the entire history of the operation of the Dempster link. Canadian steelmakers have welcomed the competitive bidding arrangement. They are not concerned about competing with American companies. Indeed, they have projected that they will bid successfully on some of the pipe in the United States and Alaskan sector as well. Regularly our steel industry bids and competes successfully against United States companies.

Surely the final decision as to the size of the pipe for the Canadian section of the pipeline must rest with Canada. The consultations which are ongoing with the United States now are necessary. We must make provision for the size of pipe which will carry gas from the Mackenzie Delta to southern Canada. Provision for adequate capacity must be made. Since Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Corporation, Ltd. and the Steel Company of Canada, Ltd. are able to meet the requirement for low pressure pipe, surely the ultimate decision of the National Energy Board and the government must be to choose a pipe which can be manufactured in Canada. When Ipsco has completed its $80 million expansion program in Regina, it will be able to provide approximately one-third of the required pipe, and Stelco has the capacity to provide approximately two-thirds. The naturally desirable arrangement would be for these companies to provide the pipe.

Initially the pipe will transport American gas to American consumers. At a later stage when the Dempster link is connected and the sources of supply in the delta and Beaufort are tapped, the pipeline will supply gas to southern Canada. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, when that link is connected, it will provide approximately 10 per cent of the gas supplied to the Canadian market. Surely at that time it will be more vital to Canada than to the United States.

In the short term, the economic benefit to Canada will be the provision of jobs. The bill makes it clear that there will be a great deal of benefit provided to the Yukon. The people in that territory will be given the first opportunity for work and the provision of supplies. The company has indicated that it will provide a gas supply to the major communities of the Yukon. One report indicated that this will save the average household $200 per year; that is, through the use of natural gas rather than oil to heat their houses.

In his negotiations with the United States, the minister has been able to make a very favourable arrangement in terms of providing a $200 million advance payment to the Yukon to cover the socioeconomic costs there, as well as to provide for advance tax payments up to 1981 of some $35 million, and beyond that, payments of $30 million per year. Over the 25-year projected life of the project, that will amount to approximately $1 billion of benefits to the Yukon Territory, which surely is a significant gain.

The central aspect of this bill is to provide a northern pipeline agency, a single window agency, to regulate and control all aspects of the development of the pipeline. This is a good idea. It will provide for the delegation of authority from the National Energy Board, the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It will provide for consultation with the provincial and territorial governments as well. This agency will be concerned with the physical aspects of the pipe, as well as the native questions, the social and environmental aspects and Canadian content. It will be a situation where one administrator will report to a commissioner, and ultimately to the minister in Ottawa. Surely the socioeconomic and native questions will be of as much concern to that agency as the physical aspects of the pipeline.

One question which the committee will want to study will be the relationship between the designated minister and the minister responsible for the National Energy Board, if they do not happen to be the same minister, because ultimately the responsibility for this pipeline will revert to the NEB. I think that interplay between the two ministers will be an important aspect which we will want to have clarified in the committee.

The idea of a single agency is a very good one because in 1975 the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works did a very extensive study on oil and gas supplies from frontier regions and on transportation systems. During the course of that study we went to Alaska and met with senior officials who were carrying out the construction of the Alyeska pipeline. That was just at the period of time when the Alyeska pipeline was about two-thirds complete. They described the mechanism under which they were working. Authority from the various agencies of the federal government and the various agencies and departments of the state department was delegated. There was one person at ground level where the decision to proceed with construction was made. The senior people with whom we met said that without this delegated authority to a person actually on the ground the pipeline would never have been completed. It would have bogged down in red tape.

The establishment of this kind of central agency is a very good idea which will ensure that this kind of authority is delegated to people actually on the construction site, so that the project can move forward, be completed on time and not be bogged down and held up.

Another important aspect which is provided for in the bill is consultation and agreement with the provinces and territorial governments. Many of the provincial governments, like Alberta, have extensive expertise in regulating and controlling pipelines, so it is natural that the federal government will want to have a liaison with those groups and take advantage of their expertise. A formalized structure is laid out in the bill for a consultative mechanism. Consultation every three months would not be a very practical arrangement, although it might be good for long-term discussions.

It seems to me that the direct consultation with the minister which is provided for would be beneficial. However, surely consultation with the territorial governments will be even more important, especially with the Yukon in the initial stages, but also with the Northwest Territories when the Dempster link is dealt with, because proportionately this will a very much larger project to the Yukon than it will be to the provincial governments involved. I met with several councillors and assemblymen in the Yukon in early December. I had a chance to discuss this, and they were very concerned that there might not be adequate consultation and that they might not have an active part in the discussion and development of this pipeline.

Likewise, when the Dempster link is established there should be a very good liaison and consultation process with the Northwest Territories Council. One councillor told me recently that a resolution was passed in October proposing an alternative to the Dempster link, the Canol line. Under the proposal the line would run from Johnson's Crossing on the Alaska Highway to Norman Wells, along the Mackenzie River and to the delta reserves. I am not sure of the details of that proposal, but if there is adequate consultation with the Northwest Territories Council, there will be an opportunity for the proposal to be fully explored.

Another aspect of the bill which I think is very important and very good is that the cost of the agency will be borne by the Foothills company. This will ensure that there will be constant pressure on the company to complete the line on time, and that they do everything in their power to avoid strikes and delays. The company will not only bear the financial cost of delays, but will also bear the cost of the regulatory agency if the project is held up because of the company's lack of foresight or organization.

In conclusion, it seems to me that the northern pipeline bill is a reasonably good piece of legislation with which to develop this northern project. It is designed to ensure that the pipeline is built efficiently through the use of a single window agency.

The bill will ensure the maximum number of jobs for Canadians, that environmental precautions are taken, that the social needs of the people of the north are met and that precautions are taken to ensure the financial integrity of the project. It will provide a good consultation mechanism and provide for agreements with the various provincial and territorial governments.

I hope the bill will not be unduly delayed by debate in the House, that the project can be discussed in the special committee and the beneficial economic effects of the bill are passed on to all Canadians at a time when they are very greatly needed.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I must say that this bill disturbs me and gives me much cause for thought. I will expand on that in my remarks, but first let me deal with the sentiment expressed by the previous speaker. He hoped the bill would not be unduly delayed in the House. Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard such poppycock? We have before us a bill involving $10 billion, and we are now on the second day of debate at second reading, approval in principle. I did not say millions, I said billions, and the previous speaker had the audacity to say he hopes the bill will not be unduly delayed. I do not know what that hon. gentleman's definition of undue delay is, but I think the bill would not be unduly delayed if we debated it for at least four weeks. That would not be an undue delay. What poppycock we are hearing from this government when it has delayed the project for months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The government did not bring the bill to this House until just this week. That was the first delay. Second, when the government was dealing with the Americans it did not have the guts to say that we should set the specifications for the pipe, so it has to weasel around for months on that. A pipeline is being put through Canada, and Canada does not have the last word on what size and thickness the pipe will be. That question has delayed us for months. Third, the prices for gas are not yet approved. The gas producers in Alaska have not said what they are going to sell it for. The American authorities have not said what they are going to buy it for. That is holding up the project, and it will for months to come. Yet when we poor, paltry, elected parliamentarians dare to say a word on this bill or to speak for a few moments, the government tells us we are delaying it unduly.

Mr. Nystrom: Why do you support it?

Mr. Crosbie: I have not yet said what I am going to do. I will not support anything until we have properly considered it, until it has gone to the committee and comes back with a few healthy amendments. I am not saying I am supporting this $10 billion project.

The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) referred to a list of great projects the Liberal government has in the energy field. Today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) read a list to the conference of Premiers, trying to titillate the public with the trillions. It was a list of projects that will cost trillions. It was read out as though these things were going to be done in the next three to five years by the Liberal government. The list included such projects as the Kitimat oil line, just as though the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) had not put the kibosh on that. The people up there told her that if she allowed the pipeline to go through they would hang her up by the heels. They are also going to put the Gull Island project through no matter what Quebec says or thinks or does. It is "titillate with the trillions". The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not the $6 million man now, he is the $6 trillion man!

The people of Canada are not going to swallow that, Mr. Speaker. They are going to regurgitate that. They are going to be like those birds that pick things up and regurgitate them. I wish we would get to the election and get this farce over with.

If we speak on this bill on second reading for three or four weeks I would say we would not be speaking on it "unduly". If it goes to committee for another few weeks before it comes back to the House, that will not be speaking on it "unduly". The United States Congress passed their bill because it was given to them three or four months ago. I am not listening to "unduly", Mr. Speaker. No Liberal government is going to "unduly" me. I am going to have my say here, at report stage and on third reading, and if I am on that committee I will have my say there as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Did you hear that, Erik Nielsen?

Mr. Crosbie: That is, unless the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) does not want me to. In the Progressive Conservative party we are free to speak our minds, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We are not like the New Democratic Party or the Liberal party who have to stick to a party line.

I want now to touch on an aspect that particularly affects the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to this project. I was very disappointed with the remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) when he introduced this legislation. It was as poor a performance as was given last August. He gave us no new information. He had no enthusiasm. He read his speech with a platonic lack of pleasure—a script prepared for him by civil servants or by somebody who should be rotated, made redundant and revivified. If it had been written for me I would not have read it in the House. The Deputy Prime Minister does not appear to be enthusiastic about this project.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has not spoken, and neither has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). They do not want to give the House or the people of Canada any information. Any information they have they kept secret until we discovered it today and brought it to light. We are discussing a $10 billion bill and the government will not even give us any information. This could be the $10 billion bungle if it is not watched closely by parliament. All we know about this project is that it is going to bring United States gas to United States consumers and it might or might not bring Canadian gas to Canadian consumers some day.

Yesterday I asked the Deputy Prime Minister when it is estimated we will need frontier gas here in lower Canada. His answer was just mumbo-jumbo. He said he is sticking with the NEB. Anyone sticking with the NEB is on a sticky wicket. We know that frontier gas is supposed to be needed by the mid-1980s but now it seems it may not be needed until the 1990s. We expect a fair answer from the Deputy Prime Minister. We ask him when frontier gas will be needed in the southern part of Canada and the poor gentleman cannot answer. All he has to say is: "We are still going with the NEB." I would hate to have the NEB around my neck. It would be like the albatross around the neck of the ancient mariner.

We do not know whether the Dempster line is going to be completed in three or four years or not. All we are assured of is that this is the line to bring United States gas to United States consumers.

I shall not deal with the labour aspect, as that has been done with great distinction by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). Let me say, however, that I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). I thought he was right yesterday when he said that if we passed this bill as it is, parliament will have no control. He was telling the exact truth. Any self-respecting parliament that would pass this bill with its present provisions and pass the whole thing over to the executive branch should be arrested for criminal negligence. This bill provides for nothing except an annual report to be filed in parliament. Clause 13 provides for an annual report to be filed, but it does not say what should be in the report, just that the agency shall prepare a report relating to its operations and that the minister will cause it to be tabled in parliament.

If the legislation is passed as it stands, all we can get in the future is an annual report. We do not even dictate what is to be in the report. We do not even say that the objectives for Canadian content and how that is being realized shall be in the report or anything about the financial arrangements.

I know that the official opposition will be putting forward amendments to correct that when we reach committee stage, so that the agency will have to report at least quarterly on specific matters. If that provision is not included I am sure no legislator here will accept the bill. If there are no substantive amendments then parliament gives up all its rights in connection with this huge project.

The bill does not specify which minister is responsible for it. If I were the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources I would not put up with something in my bailiwick being given to another minister—the land grabber, the pipeline grabber, the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is responsible for all oil, gas and energy development, but when the biggest project is snatched from him and put under the jurisdiction of the Deputy Prime Minister, he does not even resign. What is the matter with him?

Of course, I understand why it was done. They could not trust the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with it. He is suffering from gas as it is. The project was given to the Deputy Prime Minister who went to Washington and surrendered everything. His theme song in Washington to Mr. Schlesinger was "I surrender, dear." He surrendered to Schlesinger. He got into a game of strip poker with Schlesinger and was left naked as a newt; barefoot in the park, was the Deputy Prime Minister. The result of his efforts of last September 20 are attached to this bill. If I were he I would leave the House and not come back. If I were responsible for the agreement that is attached to this bill, if I had given away all the bargaining cards that Canada held and came back with this piffle, this less than nothing, I would certainly leave this House. The bill went from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources into a deeper dungeon. We have the results before us.

Here is a bill before us for a $10 million project and we do not know which minister is going to be responsible for it, which of the 34. That is an insult to parliament. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should have his title changed to "minister of energy, mines and resources excluding gas piplines".

Now I come to the question of secrecy. This government intends to bring in legislation so that the RCMP and the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) can open mail if they want to. When it come to giving parliament information about what the government is doing, nothing is forthcoming. Not even a writ from the supreme court would force them to give us information. Secrecy is paramount.

In the last couple of days we have come across a report prepared last July by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources under the supervision of the director of energy policy for the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce. It was prepared before the minister surrendered on September 20 and signed the agreement, and before the debate on the pipeline on August 4. When asked a question during the question period today the Deputy Prime Minister looked around, bewildered, toward the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, as if looking for information. Mr. Speaker, anyone who does that is an extremist, yet the Deputy Prime Minister looked desperately to him to see if there was such a report or not. Santa Claus said: "Yes, Virginia, there is such a report". I hope the Deputy Prime Minister now has the report and has seen some of the things that are in it which should be before this House.

● (2122)

What are some of the things in this report? In terms of impact on the economy, the project is small. The peak year demand represents about .3 per cent of the labour force and less than 1 per cent of the GNP. However, these benefits gained by construction may be in jeopardy, depending on the combination of Canadian content before financing. Do we hear anyone from the government side tell us that? Not on your life.

It goes on to say that there will be an appreciation of 2.35 cents in the Canadian dollar. The Canadian dollar has gone down to 90 cents. If it appreciates 2.35 cents this would virtually wipe out the employment generated in the peak year of construction. In other words, because the government is borrowing money outside Canada it has to borrow billions. If it is done too hurriedly and at the same time it may cause the Canadian dollar to rise 2.35 cents, Canada will lose more jobs in industries such as textiles, pulp and paper, etc., which are affected by the exchange value of the Canadian dollar, than it will gain in the whole construction. That is what this report from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce says. But do we hear about that in the House? Not on your life, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Not from Crowfoot.

Mr. Crosbie: Not from Crowfoot nor from Cape Breton or anywhere over there. I do not mind not hearing about it from the Deputy Prime Minister because he obviously knows nothing about this project. What else does the report say? It says that concessional financing could endanger Canadian content objectives and should not be a determining factor in awarding bids. It is suggested that Canada and the U.S.A. could agree there because no concessional financing would be offered for this joint transit pipeline. In other words, the government should forbid tied financing. They should not be allowed to approach the United Kingdom or here or there outside the country and receive financing tied to our using foreign goods and services. That should be forbidden. That is what the report says, but we have not heard that from the government.

Then the report says that the Canadian content actually achieved can vary substantially from estimates because of competitive pricing conditions, tied and concessional financing, government monitoring, corporate attitudes, and other factors. We did not hear that from the government.

Then it has tables which show that the best we can expect in Canadian manufacturing content is 81.3 per cent. Table 12 shows estimates of Canadian content. There is a percentage of total expenditures for the construction of Alcan-Dempster; it is 81.3 per cent Canadian. Not 90 per cent, not 85 per cent, not 88 per cent, not 84 per cent, not 82 per cent, but 81.3 per cent. We go on through the table and the figure is $2,299 million. If we add on the construction side of the table, there is a total of $3,367 million Canadian out of $3,940 million which is 85.4 per cent. That is the maximum, and that is if everything goes perfectly; and everything is administered to the utmost perfection. So is the most we can have is 85 per cent with absolute perfection.

What does the Deputy Prime Minister tell us in his speech of yesterday at page 2790 of Hansard? He said this:

> During the hearings before the National Energy Board, Foothills stated its objective—and I stress the word objective because it was not and could not be a flat guarantee—

The Deputy Prime Minister is cagey; he is the cagiest cage in the government. He goes on:

> —was to achieve Canadian input into the system in Canada of more than 90 per cent.

We have been warned it is only an objective. You cannot catch the Deputy Prime Minister when he says that. Then he goes on to say:

> During the intervening months Foothills has repeatedly restated that objective. On the basis of past performance of the sponsoring companies, and our own assessment of Canadian supply capabilities, there is every reason to believe that this target will be achieved.

The Deputy Prime Minister went a bit further than he thought he was going when he said that there is every reason to believe that we can achieve over 90 per cent. Because the report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce states the most we can achieve is 85 per cent—if we are perfect. God knows this is not a perfect government. We have to be harsh and say there are a few imperfections here. The Deputy Prime Minister is not properly briefed. He is saying we can achieve 90 per cent, but the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, headed by our late comrade, has said the best that can be done is 85 per cent. Our manufacturers will achieve only 82 per cent.

I hope, therefore, that the Deputy Prime Minister will retract his statement at the first opportunity, that he will come before this House is sackcloth and ashes to retract that statement. The government is so secretive. It is governed by stealth and secrecy. It is government by the unknowing doing the unknowable. They do not know what reports they have prepared. Some ministers are in the federal-provincial conference and some are here. They give this "boffle" to the House. It is government in the dark. It reminds me of the old Cole Porter tune "Dancing in the dark". I hope that when government members have their little drinking session here they will sing "Government in the Dark".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: As I understand it, of this $10 billion there is about $3.8 billion to be spent on the Alaska part of the project and $2 billion in the United States. Since our leader on this matter is not shaking his head, I assume that is right.

Does anyone think Canada is going to get much business in the United States? What a joke! What a laugh! Does anyone think we will get much business in Alaska? The Americans are not shy sticking up for their own rights or shy about gaining their own national objectives. They are not scared of Canada. They are not the "good old neighbours". They have "buy American" legislation. Protectionist pressures during 1977 resulted in the emergence of new "buy American" proposals at all levels of government.

Our government is cowering here in Ottawa, afraid to have a buy Canadian policy. Our own pipeline, which we do not need in the first place, we are building as good neighbours. The U.S. public works employment act amendments of May, 1977, tied a "buy American" requirement to state and local government public works projects to be funded with the $4 billion authorized under the legislation. This represented an extension of normal "buy American" act practices which apply only to purchases by and for the use of the U.S. federal government.

A similar restriction is now included in the U.S. water pollution control act amendments involving $13 billion in federal funding for state and municipal water projects. Canada was concerned and protested to the state department, but these efforts proved to be unsuccessful. So we protested and our protests were brushed aside. When it comes to our own pipeline we cannot even insist on buy Canadian content restriction.

In a more recent development, another bill has been introduced into the U.S. Congress and, if passed, will cut off all kinds of things. Anything that the U.S. government finances, except for defence matters, such as state, local government purchases, housing, mass transit, urban renewal, highway construction, public works, will have to be "buy American" purchases if these new amendments pass.

Is the U.S. congress cowering and asking us if we approve, or if we are going to be bothered, or will we feel hostile if they pass these amendments? They are not. They do not give a damn what we say in this House. I say here is a chance for us to pass some legislation which says "buy Canadian". But we do not do so. We have all this charade going on with specifications. The government should resign. The government should be driven out of office by the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We are hearing a lot about GATT. The Deputy Prime Minister said today that we could not put anything in the agreement about Canadian preference, that this would violate GATT. Are the Americans worrying about GATT? It is "rat-a-tat-tat" to GATT. The Americans legislate a "buy-American" policy, which means a complete surrender of Canadian interests.

The industry, trade and commerce report says that if we word it carefully we would have no problem with GATT. But this will not solve the project engineering services that are not affected by GATT. Japan, Germany and the United States don't care about GATT. The only ones who care about GATT are those in this "GATT government". The Canadian people have to get this GATT government so that it will not get them.

We all know Foothills propose a 48-inch pipe, half-inch thick, 1,260 p.s.i. That is fine for Canada. There is a 48-inch pipe, three-quarters of an inch thick, 1,680 p.s.i., which Ipsco cannot make, but which the Americans want because they can make it. We know there is a 54-inch pipe, one half-inch thick, 1,160 psi, which the Americans cannot make but the Canadians can, Ipsco in Regina and Edmonton and Stelco in Welland and Camrose.

Should there be one second, one week, one month or any time taken to make a decision? I do not give a hoot what the NDP recommended. It is the 54-inch pipe that only Canadians can make which is the pipe we want. If there is some technical reason 1,260 p.s.i. pipe is unsatisfactory, there is the 48-inch pipe that Foothills recommended in the first place.

When it comes to the pipe which is important to Canada, what do we find? If this was not Canada, I would not believe it. If Stelco makes its pipe in Welland, in order to be competitive it has to transport it through the Panama Canal to get to the site of the pipeline. It would be too expensive to transport it by rail. It is unbelievable, but I am told that Foothills are actually having a study done to see what is the best way to transport pipe and other materials.

This country has a railway, but we cannot ship the pipe by rail cheaper from Welland to the Yukon and Alberta. We have to send it through the Seaway, down the seaboard, through the Panama Canal, up the west coast and then by truck or rail. No wonder the British Columbia members are going berserk about the wide flange steel. I would be a "flangist" myself. In fact, I am. We are in the same position in Newfoundland. The freight rates are such that it is cheaper to get steel from Japan rather than central Canada. What a crazy country! We talk about DREE. That is one of the problems.

If the American plant in Texas is going to be able to compete and the cheapest way of getting the materials there is through the Panama Canal, that will be cheaper than shipping from Ontario. According to my atlas, it would be cheaper to ship from Texas. They will have the advantage. Any government that permits that to be done should be strung out and strung up. They should not be permitted to exist. They should change the freight rates or do something to reverse the situation. I just draw the attention of the House to this anomaly.

What is apparently being considered is to use B.C. pulp and lumber carriers which now go east through the canal to the eastern seaboard and return empty. They are to return west filled with steel. That is the proposal being looked at. The United States steel plant is at Baytown, Texas. That is certainly closer to the Yukon if the Panama Canal must be used. That is certainly a strange kettle of fish, as we say in Newfoundland.

There is no reason why we ought to be having a debate in Canada as to whether we should use Canadian steel. It is ludicrous. No other country in the world would have such a debate. There would not be such a debate in Japan, Germany or the United States. Are they raging with debate in the U.S. as to whether they are going to allow foreigners to build their pipeline, supply the pipe and all the rest? They are not. The debate they are having is whether they are going to grab ours. We are wondering whether we are going to save a little bit for ourselves. What kind of a country is this? I would sooner go down fighting than put up with that kind of humiliation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: There are other items to be considered in addition to the pipe. We must consider the valves, pipe fittings, gas turbine drivers, compressor assemblies, pressure vessels and generator sets. On and on it goes. For supplying some of this the Canadian content can only be 50 per cent. I presume there are technical reasons for that.

There are a lot of items apart from the pipe that can and should be Canadian right to the limit, as set out in table 12 of this report which we have not got. We are not supposed to have it because we are not supposed to know anything about this project.

There is another piece of hypocrisy that had slipped my mind. I refer to clause 3(f) on page 3 of the bill. One of the objects of this act is, and I quote:

—to advance national economic and energy interests and to maximize related industrial benefits by ensuring the highest possible degree of Canadian participation in all aspects of the planning and construction of, and procurement for, the pipeline while ensuring that the procurement of goods and services for the pipeline will be on generally competitive terms.

That is stated to be an objective. The rest of the bill contradicts the objectives. It kisses the Americans' you know what in practically every clause.It is given up altogether when we get to section 7 of the agreement, which is annexed to this bill, dealing with supply of goods and services. I quote:

Having regard to the objectives of this agreement, each government will endeavour to ensure that the supply of goods and services to the pipeline project will be on generally competitive terms. Elements to be taken in to account in weighing competitiveness will include price, reliability, servicing capacity and delivery schedules.

Each government is going to give the other a preference. Each may, and I quote:

—institute consultations with the other in particular cases where it may appear that the objectives of subparagraph (a) are not being met.

This is contradictory to the objective in clause 3(f).

Remedies to be considered would include the renegotiation of contracts or the reopening of bids.

You can bet your bottom dollar, Mr. Speaker, that with the first contract that goes to a poor old Canadian supplier, the Yanks will be objecting under clause 7 stating that we must renegotiate. Is this parliament going to surrender its right to check on that? We will never know unless somebody squeals to us. Under this legislation, the government does not have to come back to the House. They need only give an innocuous report once a year. I am sure members of this House will not agree to that.

What will happen? When a protest is made, Canadian bids will be reopened. We will have to give the Americans more because they are our big, strong neighbour. We cannot stand up against them. The opposition will never know about it. That is what will happen if we leave this in the shape it is in now.

We in the official opposition want the pipeline, but we want some assurance that it will be constructed properly. We want some assurance that this parliament will be able to check to see that it is done properly. There must be adequate discussion before the bill goes to committee.

If this government is sensible and agrees to the reasonable amendments we suggest, it will be completed in time before the Americans agree to the gas prices, the producers agree to the gas prices and all the rest. Let us not hear that foolish word "unduly" spoken here again for at least a month.

We want a strategy that will give Canada some long-term benefits. The report from industry, trade and commerce states that there will be $226.7 million in Canadian taxes and duties. If the project goes ahead, that is what the government will get. That is the estimate. Some of that money should be used to ensure that Canadian industry gets well established so that we can become foremost in the world with regard to pipeline building, construction, servicing and supplying. When this pipeline is nearly completed, we should be ready to go on to the next one no matter where it is in the world, whether it be in Saudi Arabia or the Carpathian mountains. We should be prepared to do this work, not only protect what we have in Canada.

The government must have an industrial strategy that will take advantage of what comes our way, rather than hiding its head in the sand and prevaricating, as this government has been wont to do.

We have been told that 50 per cent of the content will be Canadian, that no one can interfere with that 50 per cent. No one can stop us having our labourers on the job or using our own gravel and sand. With regard to the other 50 per cent, we are told by the experts that we should concentrate on 35 per cent. I am going by the industry, trade and commerce report and making some suggestions of my own.

We are willing to accept advice from government departments if we think it is wise. What we want is long term industrial benefits. We want what the Science Council has called an industrial strategy for Canada. We want Canadian technological superiority for our northern nation. Our former prime minister had the northern vision which has been so sadly lacking since 1963. Since then we have had nothing but the Liberal vision.

• (2142)

An hon. Member: Lack of it!

Mr. Crosbie: Liberal balls and Bacchanalian orgies. Thank God I saw the light. Thank God I am reborn as a PC.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: We want a strategy which would develop a framework of opportunity to increase the capacity of Canadian industry to produce. We have already put money into industry, trade and commerce to help develop larger gas turbines and I think Westinghouse will be able to do the job. We must see to it that gas turbines are made here in Canada and if some assistance is needed let us whack out a few dollars from the $260-odd million we would be getting in taxes, as I have explained. Then we should negotiate with one of the international heavy equipment manufacturers for the establishment of plant to produce at least one of their product lines here. We know we cannot have them all but why could not Caterpillar be induced to set up a plant here? We should be developing our own industry in this country.

Never mind that bluff about bids and competitiveness. Let us try and get established in Canada a large dimension ball-valve facility. Of course, I do not know anything personally about these machines but they are all involved in pipeline construction and I know we cannot presently manufacture in Canada large-diameter ball-valve facilities. That is what I am told. I understand there is $20 million involved in that one area alone. There are other things of this nature which do not immediately come to my mind tonight. Never mind all this ballyhoo and nonsense about letting the Americans bid and do this and that and be nice Nellies. We should not even be contravening article III of GATT.

What we want is a policy of developing a pipeline-oriented industry, a strategy to develop industry in this country using the money we are going to get from import duties and taxes so that we will be able to compete anywhere in the world. We want people like the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) in charge of this pipeline project. He is the type we want. With my hon. friend in charge we in Canada would get everything out of the pipeline that we should.

My last point, Mr. Speaker, is that parliament needs a monitoring agency such as that which the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) spoke about. Such an agency should produce quarterly reports setting out Canadian content objectives, the degree to which they have been achieved, and so on. The reports would go before a standing committee; every three months the committee would examine them and raise hell if things were not satisfactory. The reports should state precisely what value has been added, who owned the companies which were doing the business, and so on. The Americans have a pipeline reporting mechanism and we can look to that as a precedent.

Then again, fluctuations in value of the Canadian dollar are so important that there should be a report made to the committee every three months about the way in which financing has been arranged. If some of this information has to be kept confidential, that can be arranged. We do not want them rushing in with a billion dollar bond issue pushing up the value of the dollar by four or five cents. The effect would be too dangerous. It isn't all roses in the buttonhole, as the Prime Minister tried to tell us yesterday. He will find out about the thorns under the roses later this year. I suppose the greatest coup of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was forcing the dollar down to just about 90 cents. And I further suppose that if he remains in office the dollar will stay down. Be that as it may, a rise of just two or three cents in the value of the dollar would mean the loss of more jobs that we would get from the construction of the line. That is what the IT and C report says.

My hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) reminds me to mention the equity which should be made available to Canadians who invest in this project, to give Canadians a chance. As you might gather from what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am supporting this bill in rather lukewarm fashion. I do not want any Liberal in this country to go around twisting the facts and saying we are not supporting the bill. We do support the bill.

An hon. Member: After all that!

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Gilbert: No wonder. He is a Liberal retread!

An hon. Member: He makes Horner look good!

Mr. Crosbie: If somebody were to put a rooster in that barnyard they would soon shut up!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We are supporting the bill and the basic principle enunciated therein, but we hope it will be improved in committee. If it is not we shall reassess our position. So the responsibility lies with the Deputy Prime Minister and his colleagues. We are not satisfied with what they have done. It was an execrable job. We are hoping they will show some sense and improve it in committee.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened last night to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and spent some time today reading in Hansard for last November and December questions which were raised in this House by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I have just listened to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie).

If anyone gave a speech to show why this bill should not pass in its present form, it was the hon. member for St. John's West. If anyone ever asked questions in this House to which we have not received satisfactory answers, it was the hon. member for Hamilton West. Anyone reading those questions and the replies made to them will understand why we should not push this bill through, as the hon. member for Yukon would have us do.

I am sick and tired of watching, since the fifties, successive Liberal governments trembling at the knees whenever they were in negotiation with the United States. Two things happen to them. They tremble. They get U.S. dollar signs in their eyes while any idea of our own national sovereignty and self-respect goes down the drain. I am glad the hon. member for Hamilton West raised the questions he did last December and I am glad the hon. member for St. John's West made the speech he did tonight, even though he told us he would support the bill—having given us lucid reasons why we should not.

● (2152)

Last night the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) condemned the NDP and our spokesman on energy, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). He said:

> The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party has labelled the bill a betrayal of Canadians.

The hon. member for Yukon said:

> We put no such label on this bill.

Those quotations are to be found at page 2795 of Hansard for yesterday. The hon. member went on further to say:

> After my perusal of this bill, there seems to be no earthly reason why it could not have been before the House prior to Christmas, instead of giving hon. members so little time to consider its provisions with experts in the field.

The hon. member for Yukon then went on to say:

The hon. Leader of the NDP and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands are taking a wholly impractical position when they indicate that guarantees, with respect to Canadian labour content and industrial content, must be written into the bill.

I agree with the minister in his assessment of that.

Let us look at what the hon. member for Hamilton West had to say. It was not just the NDP that was talking of guarantees and it was not just the NDP that was talking about a sellout. On October 27, as reported at page 313 of Hansard for that date, the hon. member for Hamilton West said, in the process of directing a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner):

In light of the fact that the agreement calls for implicit understandings . . . and refers to being competitive, and given the fact that the minister has said Canadian interests will be given every opportunity, which means that some room is left open for international bidding, can the minister advise, together with his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, whether he will see to it that there will be guarantees in order to protect the interests of our steel industry and those who provide goods and services which play a major part in this pipeline?

When talking about the matters of guarantees and reinforcement, let us again look at what the hon. member for Hamilton West said on November 21, at page 1062 of Hansard for that date. He was directing a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and this is again related to what the hon. member for Yukon said last night about sellouts. The hon. member for Yukon said at page 2807 of Hansard of yesterday:

The Deputy Prime Minister accused the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) of charging that we have been sold out. He charged the member with labelling the bill as a sellout before it was exposed to parliament. I reject that contention of the Deputy Prime Minister.

To quote what the hon. member for Hamilton West said in his question to the Prime Minister on November 21 at page 1062:

—my question is for the Prime Minister regarding what I call that great sellout by this government in terms of the northern pipeline and the evasive answers given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and others. Given the fact that Dr. Stuart Smith, leader of the opposition in the province of Ontario, has indicated by way of a letter to the Prime Minister that he is very, very concerned about this matter—

The hon. member for Hamilton West on that occasion referred to this matter as "that great sellout". I am glad to have the views of the hon. member for Hamilton West in this regard on the record, which are contrary to what the hon. member for Yukon had to say last night about this bill.

There are a number of quotations I could refer to which appear in Hansard regarding what has been said by the hon. member for Yukon in contradiction to what has been said by the hon. member for Hamilton West. I am sure a reading of what the hon. member for St. John's West said tonight will be further evidence of statements contradictory to those made by the hon. member for Yukon. This would indicate there are at least some Progressive Conservatives who assess this bill as a betrayal or a sellout, and look at the bill as completely lacking guarantees for Canadian manufacturers of this pipe and Canadian contractors for the pipeline itself.

The hon. member for St. John's West was primarily correct when he said that when the United States government, Congress, decides on an exercise or an enterprise, whether it be public or private, it in fact protects, gives preference to, subsidizes, ensures and guarantees United States manufacturing and labour content.

The Deputy Prime Minister, who is responsible for this bill and was in charge of the negotiations with the United States, behaved in a way that we have seen many times before in the history of our country; his knees trembled, he forgot to keep his back to the wall and his gun loose in his holster. He could have obtained, and I believe still could, guarantees through this legislation, unless the United States wishes to pay an additional $6 billion to $10 billion by going another route. If that is the case it is welcome to do so, but you, Mr. Speaker, I and everyone else in this country knows it is not about to do that.

Guarantees to Canadian manufacturing and construction could be written into the legislation. If by some remote chance a Canadian manufacturer or contractor, one or more, attempted to tender or bid with unreasonable prices, we could put safeguards in the legislation, or provide the safeguards by legislation, stating that where in the opinion of a monitoring agency, or in the opinion of the minister, or in the opinion of anybody else, tenders by Canadian manufacturers are unreasonable, tenders will be called for from anywhere else in the world. This would apply to manufacturers of steel pipe in the United States, Japan or western Europe, who would then be able to tender. This would be the case if our pipe manufacturers were stupid enough to attempt to charge all the traffic would bear by tendering at unreasonable or exorbitant prices.

In light of the more than one million people out of work in this country and the fact that this pipeline is going under Canadian soil, surely it is incumbent upon us to see that there are guarantees. We could earn the respect of the United States and do something about our own nationhood if we make sure we get most, if not all, of the work here in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—GOVERNMENT PLANS TO CLEAN UP OIL SPILLS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, ever since my election in 1974 I have been pressing the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) for an assurance that the Department of the Environment has some kind of operative plan to protect the people of Surrey and White Rock and, as a matter of fact, all the people of the coast of British Columbia, against the future inevitability of a major oil spill.

I recall the spill in 1972 at the Argo plant, and I know we are always vulnerable to that kind of disaster off our shores. As a result of that awareness I began pressing the minister, early in October, 1974, for some kind of assurance that there would be contingency plans that would be operative in the case of a major spill. As a matter of fact, I asked the then minister questions so frequently about that particular issue that she became exasperated with me and on one occasion presented me in the House with a computer print-out list of all the equipment in place in Vancouver. That list contained the number of peat bales, booms and so forth, and this surely was a highly irrelevant thing to do.

In November there was a report in one of the Vancouver newspapers under the headline "No government agency capable of major oil cleanup, GVRD told". I had always doubted somewhat the minister's statements to me. When I received that report, I made certain I had a copy of the report which prompted that headline. On January 24, 1978, as reported at page 2176 of Hansard, I asked the following:

● (2202)

In the months of October and November of 1974 I posed a series of questions to the former minister of the environment and asked for the tabling of contingency plans in the event of a major oil spill on the west coast. The former minister assured me, as recorded in Hansard of November 6, 1974, that plans in the Vancouver area were very adequate and, in fact, computerized.

In response to that question, the minister said:

I assure the hon. member that we can deal effectively and quickly with oil spills on the west coast, and on the east coast as well.

I have a copy of the plan which was presented to the GVRD by Mr. Chris Hatfield, the former Pacific region environmental emergency co-ordinator for Environment Canada. This man has credentials and knows what he is talking about. I should like to present to the House some of the items which he mentioned to indicate major deficiencies of contingencies in the GVRD area. The first one reads as follows:

Although all the contingency plans contain much useful information, they are really spill notifications and general policy plans. No site specific action plans are included that describe such things as which local areas have priority for protection or clean up, where field co-ordination centres will be located, or what methods will be used for cleanups in the different areas.

The next item reads as follows:

No comprehensive communications system exists to link all federal government agencies, air and waterborne support, provincial and municipal truck and equipment fleets and contractors together, in order that they may communicate effectively. This results in gross inefficiencies, delays and isolation of many working groups from each other during incidents.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

It continues by indicating that the Department of National Defence is not included in the contingency plan, although a large body of manpower and communications is available in the event of such an emergency. Another item contained in the plan reads as follows:

Little risk analysis has been carried out in order to give priority in spill control planning to areas having higher exposure to the occurrence of spills. As a result, spills in obvious high risk areas such as Boundary Bay, Vancouver Harbour and Port Moody Arm, are not planned for.

It continues:

No provision has been made for the mock exercise testing of present contingency plans. As a result, when an actual event occurs, details such as telephone lines becoming overloaded, lack of keys for important buildings, or lack of air transport, become critical delay problems.

A few days ago I received a letter from the minister as a result of my urging him to provide some equipment for Surrey and White Rock. The letter indicated that there is a plan for mock exercise some time in 1978, together with American departments. It seems to me that is very indefinite and far too loose. Another indication of a deficiency reads as follows:

There is at present, no provision in current contingency plans for updating. Most existing plans are, therefore, put on shelves, where they become obsolete as personnel and phone numbers change, material suppliers go out of business, and clean-up methods improve.

The closing paragraph of the plan ends on a note of some wry humour. It reads as follows:

To end this section on a positive note, it should be pointed out that the federal government has spared no cost to acquire tremendously sophisticated equipment for communicating information about spills to Ottawa. Any word uttered, picture taken or story printed, can be whisked to Ottawa within milliseconds of its release. Computers, telecopiers, mag card selectric typewriters, telex, multiple speaker telephone conference call hookups and suitcase portable computer access terminals are all used to keep headquarters informed of events—during Ottawa working hours.

●• (2207)

The fundamental question is who is in charge in the event of a spill like the one we had in Richmond last summer? We had all the equipment there. The booms, the peat moss and the skimmer were all there, but who is in charge? The final and ultimate question is: Who is going to make the decision to send the equipment out to the site? It looks to me as though we have all kinds of equipment spread along the lower mainland by government departments as well as private industry, but there is no one on site who is the ultimate person in charge and who says, "send it out". As a result, it appears that people are waiting for someone else to do it, and it does not get done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) has over the years quite correctly posed a series of questions regarding contingency plans for dealing with a major oil spill on the west coast and specifically in waters in the lower mainland area. Ministers responsible for the environment have answered his questions and provided copies of the major contingency plans prepared by departments of the federal government. If the hon. member had read these plans, particularly the joint Canada-United States marine pollution contingency plan, he would realize that the Department of Transport's Canadian Coast Guard is the lead agency for ship originated spills and for those which could affect the Canada-U.S. boundary waters.

Mr. Friesen: I know all that.

Mr. Anderson: The Department of the Environment has lead agency responsibilities for spills from shore sources which do not affect boundary waters.

At this point I must emphasize that those federal departments that have a duty, or are called upon to respond to spills, do have effective contingency plans. They are exercised in real and in simulated spills, and they do work. Accepting the "polluter pays" principle, our problem is to ensure that potential polluters and other levels of government are equally prepared to respond to spills within their jurisdictions.

The major oil companies and oil spill co-operatives formed under the aegis of PACE, the Petroleum Association for the Conservation of the Canadian Environment, have good contingency plans and have effectively demonstrated their capability to respond to spills for which they are responsible. However, the capabilities of municipal and provincial governments range across Canada from excellent to non-existent. This situation clearly indicates that some provincial and municipal governments accurately perceive their responsibilities for spill response while others do not.

I am pleased to advise the hon. member that a municipal government and industry co-operative called Burrard Clean is actively involved in spill responses in Vancouver Harbour. We welcome the initiative of the GVRD in examining its emergency measures requirements and are prepared to advise and assist them in developing contingency plans and response mechanisms to complement existing federal arrangements. We wish that more jurisdictions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but his allotted time has expired.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—INFORMATION PROVIDED MINISTER

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have reason to be concerned about the security of their nation. Our depleted yet competent military has lost confidence in the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson). The apparent confusion and ineptitude of the minister has been only too well documented in the recent Soviet nuclear powered satellite affair. The Globe and Mail put it very well as follows:

> Mr. Danson appears unwilling to complain. Loyal to a fault to his subordinates, he is willing even to make their excuses for them: "The senior actors can be kept out of the picture until they are needed."
> Which is utter nonsense. A man who has been kept as completely out of the picture as Mr. Danson obviously was is not a senior actor, or an actor of any sort, except in the role-playing sense. He is, to put it plainly, just a flack.

● (2212)

The final paragraph of the article reads as follows:

> How many other pictures is Mr. Danson being kept out of? What else will he know nothing about until it is too late? We know that Russian and American satellites are competing over our heads in a war of spy and counterspy. We know that each side is developing "killer satellites" to knock out the other's space snoopers. Yet the Government of Canada, linked in a defence partnership with the United States, appears content to be left out of the picture—at least until it is needed to explain the next disaster. And Mr. Danson will go on being treated like a flack, until he works up the nerve to stop acting like one.

That is an outside assessment, Mr. Speaker. I could put it more strongly. Canada needs leadership, not the "followship" of the Minister of National Defence. Emergencies require clarity and decision. The recent satellite issue shows that the minister is lacking on both counts. Perhaps the minister should be placed on the back bench until his confusion clears.

The recent communications failure saw the President of the United States providing information to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who, in turn, informed the Minister of National Defence, when the reverse should have been the case. Word should have gone from our Canadian commander to the Minister of National Defence, then to the Prime Minister and then to the President of the United States.

I questioned the former minister in committee regarding the speed and efficiency that would be required for consultation and consolidated defence procedure in emergencies within NORAD that would assure the protection of the sovereignty of the United States and Canada as well as initiate prompt protective measures. The minister's response was that procedures are secure but they are not public. My scepticism at the time has proved unfortunately to be accurate. I want to know what measures the minister has taken to ensure that this communication gap will not occur again. Perhaps the minister should provide an in camera briefing in order that, as representatives of the Canadian people, we can tell them that corrective action has taken place to assure their security to the maximum degree possible in spite of the imperfections of the minister and his "busy" systems.

Perhaps since the Prime Minister as well as the Minister of National Defence failed to grasp the significance of Canada's participation in NORAD, that does in fact give Canada access to United States space surveillance information and points to the fact that parliament, and in particular the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, needs further briefings on the purpose and functioning of NORAD. Will the minister refer this matter to that committee for further study and investigation?

I want a strong, secure Canada. Since Canada cannot defend itself I want our ties with our allies in NORAD and NATO resecured and strengthened. I know we have time-tested friends within these agreements, and perhaps through discussions we might even determine if there really is any threat or enemy and, if so, who that threat and enemy is and where they are. I asked the former minister of national defence and the former secretary of state for external affairs who our enemies are, and neither could tell me.

Can the present minister tell us who the enemies are that we are defending ourselves against? Where is the threat? Has he told us in a recent statement, where he declared that the Soviet Union had a grand plan to impose its will on Canadians by force if they were unsuccessful through non-violent methods? Quite frankly, I do not think even the minister believes that, or does he? Can we take his word or is this ministerial irresponsibility again? Or is it just one more government deception as a decadent and crumbling government makes one last desperate grasp for power; as it attempts to give three loud cheers for the constitution, three more for the United States and the RCMP, and three kisses and boos for the Russians, the spendthrift provinces and the opposition?

When the minister—or whatever hon. flack the minister has chosen to respond to me tonight—stands to answer my question, let him address the issue, identify our internal and external enemies and assure us that we have taken corrective procedures for the security of Canada. Let us recognize that while in the short term we will have to rely on strengthening our defences through NATO and NORAD, in the longer term these are but functionary vehicles currently possessed of the evil of confusion and power lust.

The real danger and enemies of this world are hate, anger, fear, bigotry, selfishness and perverted violence in whatever vehicle or in whatever place or person or country they might be found. Let us recognize that our defence against these enemies must be attacked first by individuals with an inner strength of spirit, of love, peace, truth and natural justice, acting without fear and with courage and clarity. Let these be the common values that will unite Canadians with a will and a way to build a nation that is worth defending.

I call now on the person chosen to speak on behalf of the minister to stand and speak strongly and clearly and to assure this nation that we are secure.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is probably because we are nearing election time that my friend and colleague from Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) has the inspiration to make a speech such as we have just heard, which is more or less an election speech we would normally hear in the public forum once hostilities between political parties have started. There must be special circumstances indeed when a very secondary event reported in the newspaper, namely the contention that the minister and the chief of defence staff were not quite in contact, leads to such diatribes.

For my part, I find myself in a privileged position as parliamentary secretary to the minister to know exactly of the close ties which exist between the minister and his departmental officials. I find absolutely groundless the contentions of my hon. friend to the effect that the minister does not play an important role in defence, in Canada, and that he is removed from his officials. To prove him wrong, I shall read a document that was given to me by the officials, and which only serves to prove that they maintain very close relationships with the minister and his parliamentary secretary.

[English]

In response to the hon. member's question in the House on January 30, 1978, concerning lines of communication between himself and the chief of defence staff with regard to information on Cosmos 954, the minister stated that they were in constant communication and were working in close concert, and any difference on the information given was that of timing.

It was and is the minister's wish that information on events concerning the Cosmos 954 be given freely as they occur. The contradictions of information outlined by the hon. member did not, in fact, take place. At a briefing just prior to the minister's departure for Toronto on the Friday afternoon of January 27, 1978, both he and Admiral Falls, the chief of defence staff, were advised that a significant "hot spot" had been detected. This information remained unchanged until just five minutes before Admiral Falls' scheduled press conference at 3.30 p.m. the same day, at a time when the minister was airborne enroute to Toronto.

In accordance with the minister's instruction, Admiral Falls properly proceeded with his press conference, in which he disclosed that the hot spot was not confirmed. This information was relayed to the minister when his aircraft landed in Toronto.

That is the sense and the gist of this whole big event that the hon. member is trying to blow up into immense proportions. In reality the minister and the senior members of the defence staff are constantly working together, and I know of no other civil servants who work in a comparable fashion respecting the authority of the minister than those we have in the defence staff.

INDUSTRY—PLASTICS—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on December 8 I asked the minister about requesting aid for the plastics industry. He said at that time that he felt the 10 per cent discount on our dollar would be of sufficient help and that we would be using our own raw materials.

When I asked about cutting interest rates and cutting capital aid, he said that Treasury Board would have to pay for this. Well, that is the taxpayer of Canada. That means all Canadians who are now paying for about one million unemployed. I leave it to reasoned judgment which we would prefer.

I want to speak about the economic mismanagement of this government. Our industry has gradually priced itself out of world markets. Our exports of manufactured goods have fallen simply because of the burden of increased taxes on labour and management. This burden could not be met without increasing the price of the article that was manufactured and paying more to labour to meet the demands of inflation and increased taxation.

I do not believe anyone would seriously argue with me the incompetency of the present government in the economic debate. Perhaps I would not be too unkind if I said that it is the most incompetent of all governments in its field since confederation. As an example, let us compare what it has done in the labour field. A Canadian workman would probably receive $1 per hour more than his American counterpart. However, because of our heavy taxation the American has more take-home pay. In addition, his living costs are 15 per cent less. Added to this is the fact that his dollar is worth 10 per cent more.

No wonder we are selling less and less goods outside of Canada. A reduction in tariff protection in Canada would endanger some industries. I speak of the plastic industry in particular. If present conditions are allowed to exist, with government taxation at an all-time high, a million unemployed and a high inflation rate, this country will keep on losing its exports markets and factories. For this reason industries are leaving Canada almost weekly.

Many industries have moved out of the province of Quebec into the New England states and Vermont, where labour earns less but people are employed because the production can be sold. They also have more take-home pay which enables them to purchase more goods and services.

This is the situation in the plastics industry today. There are 1,400 manufacturing establishments, a market of around $2.6 billion, one-third supplied by imports. The industry input goes into various markets. About 150 pounds of plastics go into an automobile. By 1982 or 1983, it is estimated that this will be up to 550 pounds. Plastics represent 6 per cent of the manufacturing components of Canada's gross national product. The plastics industry employs directly nearly 50,000 people and has increased its employment 6 per cent per year up until last year.

The general need is to be internationally competitive. That is impossible if protection is not given or incentive programs such as tax credits are not used in every way possible to stimulate productivity and efficiency.

This situation is now more acute. Petrosar at Sarnia is turning Alberta oil and gas into petroschemicals, into pellets used by plastics fabricators, and into a growing list of products such as insulation, pipes, drains, cups and so on. If conditions are not made more favourable, most of the petrochemicals will be exported and we will be buying back from those companies our manufactured articles.

● (2227)

I appeal to the minister. He knows full well that Canada is the largest importer of plastics per capita in the world. Canada imports more plastics products than any other country in the world, more than the United States which has ten times our population. Does the minister fully realize that Canada imports more finished products per capita than any country in the world and that our total deficit trade balance in manufactured goods in 1976 amounted to $10.2 billion, roughly equivalent to 500,000 jobs?

In the absence of a manufacturing industry the role of the risk-taker disappears. Unless changes are introduced along the lines I have outlined, our only role would be that of an exporter of natural resources, thus admitting to the world that the government, and we as parliamentarians, cannot make the grade. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have seen too many smart Canadians holding top jobs south of the border to listen to that lament. What have we got to offer? In the absence of manufacturing, research will dry up. And that is progress in reverse.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, our department has co-operated closely with the main association of the plastics industry, the Association of Plastics Industries, and the provincial governments, to make an in-depth study of the plastics industry in Canada. This study aimed at identifying the problems and the potentials of the industry in the next few years.

The main facts are as follows: Between 1964 and 1974, the industry's part of the total production of manufacturing industries increased from 3 per cent to 6 per cent; it should be noted that this pattern is expected to continue. Indeed, it is anticipated that between 1975 and 1985, the demand for plastic products will increase on the average by 10 per cent a year, which is a much higher rate of growth than for the entire sector of manufacturing industries.

Because of its high rate of growth, it is not surprising that this sector has all the characteristics of a youthful and inexperienced industry, including fragmentation, overly rapid development and underutilization of its facilities. These negative factors have forced the Canadian plastics industry to suffer higher losses than its American counterpart.

Study of this sector shows that capital expenses excluded, the difference in costs is of about 15 per cent and that if we take into account the difference in capital costs, the difference is 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent more. It should be underlined that this analysis is based on equivalence between Canadian and American currencies. The major factor in the difference in costs is the fact that raw materials required for the manufacture of plastic resin are more expensive in Canada. When petrochemical complexes are opened in Alberta, Ontario and Quebec, this will considerably increase the Canadian plastic resin production capacity. The Canadian price of resin is already becoming increasingly competitive with that of the United States and other international markets; this may result from the implementation of a more energetic marketing policy by Canadian resin producers who anticipated the opening of these new facilities.

Fragmentation and overcapacity constitute the other factors which explain the cost differential between Canadian and American industries. It is very difficult to solve this problem because of the high rate of demand for plastic products, of the relatively low costs of the addition of new facilities in anticipation of an increase in the demand and of the ease with which new manufacturers can enter that industry. It will have to play a prominent role if it becomes necessary to reduce the costs brought about by its overcapacity. It will have to carry out more thorough studies to determine if new facilities are needed before building them.

The department and the Association of Plastics Industries also believe that it would be useful to carry out a certain regrouping within that industry through mergers and agreements calling for specialization; they are actually now getting prepared to study this issue in a more detailed manner.

It is worth noting that the department and the Association of Plastics Industries will look for means to increase Canadian exports of plastic goods particularly to the United States; this will be another way to enhance the efficiency of that industry. The tariffs applied to plastic products entering the United States are relatively low and could again be reduced through GATT negotiations now under way. The creation of export consortiums and the use of better technology for export development will also be studied.

The Canadian plastics industry is one of the sectors in Canada which has experienced the most rapid growth; in that respect, prospects are excellent for the coming decade. If prices of raw materials get closer to those of American industries, if we use our plants in a more rational manner, if we set appropriate Canadian tariffs and if we facilitate the access to foreign markets, particularly the United States, and if we get a favourable exchange rate, this sector of the Canadian industry will be able to expand so as to meet the very high demand for plastic products which will exist in Canada by the year 1985. For that purpose, it will be necessary to reduce inasmuch as possible, disparities between costs; furthermore, the industry and the government will have to work more closely. We believe that at the present time, only the first steps have been made in that direction and we hope to have permanent and fruitful discussions with the representatives from this industry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

FUNDS SURREPTITIOUSLY FUNNELLED INTO CANADA TO PROMOTE EXTREMIST ELEMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in regard to certain interests who over a period of years have funnelled money into Canada for the promotion of alleged extremist elements, and further information I have received from beyond reproach intelligence sources indicating certain entities who will obviously deny any such actions committed by persons within their employ. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the Prime Minister reveal all knowledge possessed by the government concerning millions of dollars sent into Canada by means of Air France phony billings, Renault automobile company phony billings, funds distributed by the French consulate in Moncton, New Brunswick, through an insurance company located in the maritimes and, finally, whether or not funds are now being sent into the country via Manila, in the Philippines, for similar purposes.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST MINISTER CONCENTRATE ON IMPROVING LABOUR SITUATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the existing labour unrest in Canada, resulting in an unprecedented number of man-days lost due to strikes and walkouts—in fact, over 3.5 million in 1977 alone—and because the minister responsible has over the past month or so seen fit to concentrate his time and effort on professional football in Canada, instead—who knows, Mr. Speaker, perhaps "Happy Harold" will be able to rejuvenate the Hamilton Tiger Cats to give competition to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski)—I move:

That this House instruct the Minister of Labour to stop meddling into the Canadian Football League, leaving those responsibilities where they belong, and instead concentrate all his efforts in returning a semblance of order to the confused labour scene in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MELVILLE, SASK.—LAY-OFFS BY CANADIAN NATIONAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Canadian National has announced that it will end truck service from its servocentre in Melville in June, throwing 21 men out of work and disrupting trade for many small businesses in the city. Because of the serious economic effects of this closure and the betrayal of the commitments CN made when it closed its stations in the area years ago, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemns CN for failing to live up to its promises and instructs the Minister of Transport to urge the company to fulfil its long-standing service commitments.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT TRANSPORTATION PLATFORM FOR NEXT ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That the Minister of Transport make a statement on motions stating whether or not the Liberal 1978 urban transportation platform will consist of warmed up, left over, unfulfilled 1974 Liberal promises, or will it be a brand new set of deceptive Liberal platitudes?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HEALTH

FLUORIDE POISONING OF PLANTS AND WILDLIFE ON INDIAN LANDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the report prepared by Dr. Carnow and Dr. Conibear for the St. Regis Indian band council indicates that fluorides originating at Reynolds Metal Company have affected all the life forms on the island, including plants, insects and cattle, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of National Health and Welfare take immediate steps to investigate and correct this serious matter, and in particular, approve the request for an epidemiological study which to this point has been rejected by the government.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT URGED NOT TO ACT TO DETRIMENT OF INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present the following motion. In view of the fact that Canadian agriculture has been sacrificed time and time again in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations among Canada and other trading nations of the world, to the detriment of all facets of agriculture and its labour force, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley):

That the Canadian government immediately instruct its people who are in charge of such negotiations now going on to exclude any dealings on agriculture that will be detrimental to the industry and that will endanger in any way a labour force which comprises 40 per cent of the direct and related jobs in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LIBERAL PARTY SUPPORT INDICATED IN GALLUP POLL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns directly the dwindling number of Liberals across Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government House leader to take this opportunity to deny the malicious rumour that is being circulated, namely, that the most recent Gallup poll indicates a drop for the fourth month in a row in Liberal support across the country, this time by a further four points.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POSSIBILITY OF USING FRENCH IN PROVINCIAL COURTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House dispatch at once the Clerk, accompanied by the Sergeant-at-Arms to the Conference Centre to deliver the following resolution to the first ministers' meeting. Considering that the Bill of Rights has precedence over symbolism; considering that the right to be prosecuted in one's native language has no political connotation, but is based on the most elementary concept of justice; and showing its apprehension as a result of the argumentation made by the Ontario Superior Court to deny Gérard Filion a bilingual prosecution before judge and jury, the House of Commons voices its concern over the excessive slowness of governments to establish the necessary legal infrastructures and calls on the first ministers to put that question on the order paper of the conference and asks that it be considered before the adjournment expected today.

CONSTRUCTION OF DRY-DOCKS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, because of a sense of urgency with respect to creating jobs today, not ten or 15 years down the road, I should like to move a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, dealing with the capacity of the government to call now for the construction of two loading drydocks, one for the east coast and one for the west coast. My motion, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), would read as follows:

That this House direct the responsible government ministers, the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and others, to make known their decision and to move forthwith in implementing that decision so that jobs may be saved and jobs may be created.

REQUEST MINISTER OF FINANCE BE GIVEN DIFFERENT PORTFOLIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, considering the continuing attacks that the Minister of Finance of Canada is launching against the government of Quebec;

Considering that in doing so he maintains a climate of suspicions which greatly affects the normal progress not only of Quebec but of Canada as a whole;

Considering that such an important position as the one he occupies requires, in addition to genuine competence, statesmanship so as to stay above contingencies of narrow and sterile partisan spirit;

Considering that his action is causing prejudices to those who sincerely want harmony in a renewed Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House ask the Prime Minister to transfer his Minister of Finance to a position more in line with his capacities.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT NEW TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Since it is now some three years since the federal and provincial ministers of transport in western Canada agreed upon the five major principles which affect transportation policy in western Canada, which was described as a breakthrough, since the government does not have now any legislation on the order paper to implement any of these principles—particularly as they relate to the redress of freight rate anomalies and to the incorporation of a new transportation policy in the form of legislation—can the minister tell the House if we can expect a modified version of Bill C-33 to be introduced in this session? Or are we simply to assume that the public will be treated to another list of pie in the sky promises similar to those which were floated during the election campaign of 1974?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Vegreville said, we had Bill C-33 on the order paper in the last session. It was subjected to the beginnings of a filibuster, and as a result of consultation there was a clear indication that the filibuster would continue for a long time. That time was simply not available. If the hon. member would now give me an undertaking on the ease and speed with which the bill would be passed, I would be delighted to bring it forward now.

Bill C-33 contains extremely important measures in relation to the important issues of long-haul, short-haul and minimum-maximum freight rates so the railways cannot overcharge where people are captive in fact, although not in law. I think it is an important bill. I will be glad to have consultations with hon. members opposite, and if it looks as though we can move the bill forward, I will certainly bring it back immediately in the form it was in. If a modified form would speed things up, I would be delighted to do that, although I am afraid I would be running into two different views, even within the Conservative party, as to which modifications to make.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, since the objections from this side of the House centred largely around the fact that the Minister of Transport wanted to set himself up as a transportation czar, and because the minister would not shake his nasty old habit of favouring the user-pay concept, this party took a very strong position against that bill. Unless the minister is prepared to modify those parts of the bill, we will again take a strong position against it. If the minister is not prepared to bring in legislation with those modifications, he should say so: he should come clean and tell the House what we can expect by way of a comprehensive set of legislative proposals to deal with the very serious problems which affect transportation in this country from coast to coast.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there was nothing in the bill which related to the so-called user-pay concept or any other such concept. Indeed, the only element which was of fundamental importance with regard to freight rates was an assurance that the user would not have to pay too much, which is, I would like the hon. member to know, a great concern of mine as well.

When the hon. member for Vegreville talked about interpreting certain clauses as setting up the Minister of Transport as a czar, he was giving an indication of the kind of filibuster that was being carried out, when in fact all the bill did in that regard was make it very clear that the minister would have to take responsibility for policy issues and not be deflected from his responsibility by the actions or role of the CTC. I think that is a very important principle.

However, the bill had complicated matters in it. It had in it some statements of principle, in clause 3, which were the result of discussions not only with western transport ministers but also with Atlantic transport ministers. Obviously, that clause was capable of a good deal of argument. I am quite prepared to come back without some of that material, if I can have some assurance that the clauses regarding long-haul, short-haul and maximum-minimum rates would be dealt with quickly in this House.

Mr. Mazankowski: Since it is important to provide a mechanism with which we can redress the anomaly of freight rates in this country, and since the third major priority of the new transportation policy as enunciated in the election campaign of 1974 is the removal of regional inequities in freight rates—and there has not been one freight rate change since that proclamation was made—are we to assume now, from what the minister is saying, that the government has abandoned the policy of removing inequities in regional freight rates? Is that what the minister is telling the House?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am telling the House and the hon. member exactly the opposite. The imposition of maximum rate control on the railways, so that they cannot charge whatever the market will bear in cases where they have a monopoly position, is very important to me. The hon. member is saying I should bring on the bill. If we bring in just those clauses which deal with that question, and if the hon. member says members of his party will not make 120 speeches about all the things which are left out and which were in Bill C-33, I would be glad to do that. I will be glad to discuss this matter with the hon. member, and if we agree on being able very quickly to pass the clauses with regard to long-haul, short-haul and maximum-minimum rates, I will bring the bill before the House within two or three weeks.

HALIFAX—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE RATE FOR CONTAINERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put at least one supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. I remind him that he has had four years to do something about inequities in the freight rate structure. A confidential report prepared by the Arthur D. Little firm in the United States, which was released within the last 24 hours in Halifax, indicates that the rate structure of CNR will very shortly price the port of Halifax out of the container business altogether unless something is done. That, in light of what the minister said, is a little hard to swallow.

● (1422)

We want to know when the minister is going to take his responsibility seriously and do something about the 115 per cent increase in the cost of moving containers out of the port of Halifax, and when he is going to do something positive to enable the Atlantic provinces, the producers, processors and industrial interests, to compete in the central Canadian market, where they can no longer compete because of increasing freight rates.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-33 is to make sure that railways do not have complete freedom in rate setting in areas where they have practically monopoly control over freight movement. I say again to the hon. member, as I did to the hon. member for Vegreville, that if there is agreement to move forward with those provisions, I will be glad to bring them forward.

I should also point out that the thing we have to cure in the law is something which was overzealously done by a government some ten or twelve years ago, following upon a royal commission set up by a Conservative government. That was a mistake that I think we probably ought not to repeat on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. Forrestall: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That is the type of utter damn nonsense the people of Atlantic Canada will not put up with any longer from this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Is the minister aware of the Arthur D. Little study? Is he aware of its implications? Does he agree with its conclusions? Also, can he tell the House why it was as cheap, three or four years ago, to move a container from Halifax to Chicago as it was to move it from Montreal to Chicago, and today the same container shipped from Halifax costs $500, as opposed to $350 from Montreal? Can the minister tell the Atlantic users of container service and our international customers who use the port of Halifax why that is the case, and why he is not directly responsible for it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is not altogether obvious why at one time a rate should have been the same for a long distance as for a short distance. That is a principle that one would have to examine. In short, the reason freight rates are what they are is that after the MacPherson commission—set up by the right hon. member for Prince Albert—the minority parliament enacted legislation which gave, essentially, freedom to the railways to set rates on the principle of what the market would bear, on the theory that competition would control the situation.

I am convinced that competition, in many cases, cannot control the situation, because the mode of transportation may be completely limited to rail by the nature of the product and its movement. In such cases, we need additional protection—legislative protection. I have the instrument to do it, and I will be glad to see it supported when it comes forward.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC PLAN TO PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Considering that we have been watching show business posturing by the federal government for 2½ days at the federal-provincial conference which is taking place down the street, and we have been waiting to hear what proposals the government would offer to provide jobs for the more than one million unemployed, I ask the minister whether he can tell the House the economic game plan or the specific proposals put forward, in either public or private session, that would provide jobs now for Canadians who need them.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am, personally, very pleased that it has been possible to show the Canadian people the proceedings that are taking place currently in Ottawa—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: So are we.

Mr. MacEachen: —and to show the Canadian people, without benefit of the editorial jibes of the hon. member, what is actually taking place at the conference, the many constructive proposals that have been made by the provinces and the government of Canada to deal with the medium-term future of Canada. I understand the conference will conclude today. Obviously, there will be a summing up at the conclusion, and it will be possible for the hon. member to draw his own conclusions later today or early tomorrow.

● (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I, too, am delighted that the people of Canada have had an opportunity to witness the incompetence and inaction of this government which we have seen here for four years. The Deputy Prime Minister said there will be a summing up this afternoon. Would he now deal with the question. I am not talking about the proposals put forward by the provinces; I am asking him what specific proposals his government has put forward, either in private or public session, to provide jobs for Canadians who need them now, not at some distant point in the future.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is threshing old straw. The question of the immediate-term and short-term economic policy of the government has been dealt with frequently during the question period in the House. There undoubtedly will be certain short-term achievements arising from the federal-provincial conference. But I believe all the first ministers of all the provinces of Canada are agreed on one point, and that is there has to be some advance planning in order to achieve the immediate-term goals of the Canadian economy. In that connection I would refer the hon. member to the rather lucid speech of the Premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would, indeed, agree with the Deputy Prime Minister that there was at least one lucid speech. All the proposals made by the hon. gentleman he mentioned were ignored by the federal government and were not even seriously discussed. In view of what the Deputy Prime Minister has said—and he has not provided any information about proposals—would he admit that all he has confirmed is that the only light shed, from the federal point of view, on the economic problems of the people of Canada was that provided by the television cameras at the conference?

NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC ON RENOVATION OF CERTAIN WHARVES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Considering that Quebec and Ottawa are negotiating the transfer of a number of communication wharves from the federal to the provincial, could the minister tell whether these negotiations have come to a deadlock or whether we will be able eventually to negotiate an agreement so that these wharves be renovated before it is too late?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that question should have been directed to the Minister of Communications.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Considering that the minister refers to the Minister of Communications and that the Minister of Public Works is beside her, perhaps one of them could answer my question.

I should like to know whether the negotiations which were started a few years ago under the Bourassa government continue under the Lévesque government, and whether we will eventually hear the good news that the negotiations have been successful and that we will be able to renovate those wharves before it is too late.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a last supplementary.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Considering the time it takes to answer my question, Mr. Speaker, I shall accept a written answer.

[English]

INQUIRY WHY TRADE MINISTER OBJECTED TO PROVISIONS OF BILL C-33

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I refer to the minister's answer to my friend, the hon. member for Vegreville, and his suggestion that there was some question of a filibuster when Bill C-33 was before the House last session. If there was anything like a filibuster, it was somewhat inspired by one of the minister's new colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who at that time was the transportation critic for the opposition. The minister obviously desired to remedy these gaps in transportation policy and they were, as my hon. friend from Vegreville mentioned, defined in the election campaign of four years ago.

● (1432)

Since the minister had the desire to do something, has he yet spoken to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to find out what his objections were to Bill C-33, so that a bill could come before this House which could receive expeditious treatment?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member, with regard to matters such as that concerning a region of western Canada, that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and I work very closely together toward producing a better result for western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that on the surface, at least in terms of rhetoric, they may be working together. I asked whether the minister had discussed with him the implications of Bill C-33, to see what changes might help that bill move through the House. Has the minister had an opportunity to discuss with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce his meeting with the three ministers of transportation from western Canada on Tuesday last, when transportation problems, not trade and commerce problems, were discussed?

Does the minister agree with the quotation in a report which says that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce feels that too many people in the west are obsessed with the Hall report? Does the Minister of Transport agree that people in the west are obsessed with the Hall report? Has the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce reported to the Minister of Transport what he has found out about transportation problems in the west, so that something can be done for the west, let alone the rest of the country, as the hon. member for Vegreville said earlier?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have discussed the meeting which was designed essentially to deal with industrial development in the west. Of course, transportation is involved in that issue as in almost every other important issue in the economy of this country. I do not know that I checked the particular quotation to which the hon. member has referred.

It is clear that the Hall commission report is an extremely important document for western Canada and, of course, with respect to transportation needs. We are working in very important ways to make sure that in its most important aspects it is implemented promptly. We have in investment right now, $100 million to repair rail lines throughout the western Canadian territory—this at a time of serious fiscal restraint. The hon. member opposite should recognize the importance of that. We intend to honour this very important document.

IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that the $1 million Hall report tabled in May, 1977, resulted in 92 individual recommendations, of which only six have been fully implemented, three have been partially implemented, 58 have not been implemented at all and 24 official statements have been made on the rest, calling for further study, and noting that the western premiers bypassed the Minister of Transport and tried to meet the Prime Minister with a view to persuading the government to implement the recommendations speedily, I ask the minister, when will he implement the action recommendations by Hall, instead of further stalling and impeding the improvement of transportation and grain handling in the west?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously a good number of matters which are recommended in a royal commission report involve very significant expenditures. These have to be weighed. Sometimes engineering designs are required. These have to come before action—as the hon. member calls it—can take place.

In fact, what we did was immediately transfer lines to the basic rail network which Mr. Justice Hall's commission wanted there. We have begun the rehabilitation work, which is the most important, immediate action to take place. We set up an action committee, which has made recommendations on some additional lines. Indeed, we are taking very rapid action on most of the important recommendations, not with the approval, it is true, of the three provincial governments which happen to be in a different partisan field—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is true that our form of action has been endorsed almost entirely by the Alberta pool, the Manitoba pool, the Saskatchewan pool and most other key organizations in the west.

An hon. Member: Not the NFU.

Mr. Lang: Not necessarily by the NFU, but by every key organization in agriculture in the west.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the minister just said that he has taken no action at all except the abandonment of railways. On August 15, 1977, the minister stated that the total cost involved in implementation of the Hall report must be carefully analysed before a proposal is put before the federal cabinet. Can he tell us today whether those cost analyses have been made? Have any recommendations been made before cabinet, or are we going to have another situation in the next federal election like the $290 million rapid transit promise, which will simply disappear?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, some of the analyses have been made, some recommendations have gone before cabinet and have resulted in action being taken. Others are before cabinet at this very time; for example, in relation to Prince Rupert and the whole question of the future of the branch line system in the prairies. The hon. member misunderstands the importance to the prairies of the transfer to the basic rail network of about 70 per cent to 80 per cent of the lines there, so that their future is secure.

In addition, there is the investment of $100 million and what it means to communities such as Beechy and Lucky Lake, Saskatchewan, where after 50 or 60 years of seeing nothing done on their rail lines, they now see new ballast, new ties, and they are going to see new rail, as our dedication is to a rail handling system that is good, solid and for years to come will give assurance to farmers in the west.

INSTRUCTIONS TO ANDERSON COMMITTEE RESPECTING INCREASING RAIL TRAFFIC ON PRAIRIES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to continue this line of questioning of the minister, in view of the fact that he is wearing his Transport hat. The Hall commission report had a main thrust to it, namely, that the way to get the railways on the prairies operating in the black again was to increase their traffic. Did the minister, or any of his colleagues, give the Anderson committee any instructions not to consider any positive proposals that would increase traffic on the prairie rail lines?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I did not find that recommendation, as such, in the Hall report. The Hall report had a major recommendation, that the government pay to the railways approximately $200 million a year, which is the difference between what it costs for them to carry grain and what they receive for carrying it. We have not been able to approve, at this time of fiscal restraint, that additional $200 million a year for the railways. I am not sure hon. members opposite would have rejoiced had we done so. What we did, instead, was find $100 million and offer it for specific programs of rehabilitation; therefore, we are obtaining firm rehabilitation for it.

The Prairie Rail Action Committee has recommended that an additional line be transferred to the prairie rail network. That is the first of their recommendations. They considered the line into Spiritwood and Glaslyn and decided that it should remain. A decision on that question was needed so that the elevator companies could go ahead with building plans. They recommended that it be transferred to the basic rail network. We have transferred it to the basic rail network, and at least one elevator company has announced its construction plans at Spiritwood. That is the kind of action that really counts in relation to the grain handling and transportation system.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I simply asked whether any instructions had been given not to consider proposals. As a prelude to my question, I wish to quote from a letter dated September 15, 1977, from Mr. Anderson to the Golden West municipality in Corning, Saskatchewan. I quote from one paragraph:

> Your brief represents broader action than our committee can recommend. I note you have sent copies to Messrs. Lang and MacMurchy. These are the gentlemen who best are prepared to consider your proposal.

My question to the minister is obvious. Has he received this positive brief to build up tonnage so that the railways can make more money by carrying goods in Saskatchewan for both domestic and export markets, and has he responded to that brief?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of the Anderson commission are available: there is no doubt about what they are. That question would not ordinarily be seen as being within them. While I am not sure I have seen that particular brief, there have been a number which have recommended attention to the situation so that more grain may move. I have been one of the strongest advocates of the view that there will be much more grain moving out of the prairies in three, four or five years. I suggested, three or four years ago, that we should build for the export of a billion bushels of grain a year. That is the basis upon which I am operating, and it is the basis upon which we ought to review the adequacy of the rail system and the grain handling system.

● (1442)

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have been trying to talk about what the Hall commission recommended, namely, that the railways should put more traffic on the rails than is the case now. Has the minister considered the possibility of putting in the small lines which are required to move our potash out of Saskatchewan by rail instead of by truck? Lumber, coal, gravel—all these things could be hauled over rail lines which are presently in existence, but the railways are not hauling them and our roads are being wrecked. We could make enough money to enable the railways to pay for themselves, if they would let these other products get on the railways. It is not just the grain we are interested in.

Mr. Lang: I do not know from what source the hon. member receives his information, but in almost every case the railways are presently moving Saskatchewan potash to the west coast ports. There is one potash mine where, as a result of a dispute between the railway and the potash company, the potash is being moved out by truck. But even in this case the rail lines are in place, I believe, and are available. So the product can be moved by rail as soon as appropriate arrangements are made between the company and the railway.

TRADE MINISTER'S COMMENT ABOUT MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to intrude into the discussion which is going on, but the fact that the minister found it necessary, first, to endeavour to delude the House into believing that my government had anything to do with the legislation to which he referred leads one to believe that the rest of his answers are equally a perversion of the truth.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is of interest that as soon as the Minister of Transport began to speak about the part played by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce disappeared: he left the chamber. Another perversion of the truth to which I wish to refer concerns this western grain story—"The Ode by Otto", from Otto, for Otto.

I want to ask the minister this question. In that wonderful, new relationship between himself and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, have they been able to clear up the description given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on November 26, 1974, which was five years after the minister modestly says in the "Western Grain Story" that everything has improved since he took over. Has he discussed with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the words used on November 26, 1974, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with reference to the Minister of Transport, "I shall see Otto Lang tarred and feathered and driven out of Saskatchewan." Then we have the generous words, "I'll pay for the oil and I'll pluck the chickens".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Once again, if the record of what I said is checked, it will be clear to the right hon. gentleman that when I first referred to the MacPherson royal commission I made it very clear that it was acted upon by a minority government, and I indicated that I took some responsibility, in a broad sense, for the error of following the recommendation of a Conservative royal commission. I made that very clear.

So much for his statement implying that I was misleading hon. members. The second misleading thing in the right hon. member's remarks comes in his reference to the "Western Grain Story". That is a very important analysis, for our grain producers, of all the policies, showing how they have fitted together over many years. It is one of some 29 pieces of correspondence I have had with the producers on the prairies since I took over responsibility for the Wheat Board. I consider it extremely important to keep them informed. It is true that there are a couple of pictures showing myself speaking with farmers. This is to emphasize my desire to hear from them. That was another purpose of this particular booklet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Incidentally, there are pictures of Mr. Hall and Mr. Snavely and, as far as I have heard, they are not yet Liberal candidates in Saskatchewan. As far as the remarks of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, are concerned, I would say that before this place was electronically recorded, hon. members were used to hearing colourful ways of referring to one another, even when later in the day we referred to one another quite sincerely as friends. That happens to be the nature of this institution. I am delighted to admit that I was a principal target for my colleague's colourful and effective wit over the years. I am equally delighted now that we are side by side and that the targets are over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have now seen the personification of the immortal words of the Prime Minister, "Love one another." We have had an example of it here this afternoon. I simply ask whether the words I have quoted concerning the minister, after five years of office and uttered by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, did not rather shock the finer sensibilities of the hon. gentleman and cause him to have some doubt as to whether the two were friends at that time.

Mr. Lang: Over the years, the right hon. gentleman himself has been, of course, recorded as predicting time after time, on the eve of an election, that the campaign would be his last. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce joined this party and the cabinet, I thought it was delightful that we could be both speaking to the west about the interests of the west, for the very reason that, as may have been noted, we may speak in some ways to different audiences and in different ways. It is very desirable that both of us are there, speaking in that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

THE ENVIRONMENT

KITIMAT PIPE LINE LTD.—REQUEST APPLICATION BE POSTPONED PENDING ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could depart for a few moments from the story of the lion and the lamb lying down together.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which is which?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Environment. In view of the fact that the Kitimat Pipe Line company has reactivated its application to construct a pipeline from Kitimat, British Columbia, to Edmonton, and that this matter is to be reviewed by the National Energy Board in the next few months, I should like to ask the minister why the west coast oil port inquiry, headed by Dr. Thompson has not also been reactivated, and why no arrangements have been made for community hearings or for the funding of public interest groups who were promised an opportunity to put forward their views on this important matter.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): A decision was made that we would consider this matter after

Dr. Thompson had submitted his interim report to us. He made the request that the hearing be reopened pending seeing what was done with the Kitimat application. We want to wait until he submits his interim report, so we can decide whether to reactivate the hearings or call an end to them.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Surely, that is a complete evasion of the issue. When the application by the Kitimat Pipe Line company was held in abeyance, scores of community hearings which has been planned by Dr. Andrew Thompson were also suspended. Are the people of British Columbia, who were promised an opportunity to be heard in this connection, to be completely ignored?

● (1452)

If, as the minister said, he is going to wait until after Dr. Thompson makes his report at the end of April, this matter will be before the National Energy Board long before the people who are vitally concerned have the opportunity to express their views.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I expect to receive the report from Dr. Thompson within the next few weeks. I am sure the hon. member will not have to wait very long before a final decision is made one way or the other.

TRANSPORT

CRASH OF AIRCRAFT AT CRANBROOK, B.C.—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RECORD NAMES OF PASSENGERS ON FLIGHTS

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the names of passengers on the PWA flight which crashed in Cranbrook, B.C., on the weekend apparently were lost by a centralized computer system, causing unnecessary fear and anguish for many families, does the minister have any plans to require airlines operating within Canada to provide in future a fail-safe or, at least, a back-up system for recording the names of passengers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. In respect of this tragic accident, the delay in dealing with the names is a very important matter indeed. I propose to ask my officials and the Canadian Transport Commission, within their appropriate jurisdictions, to look at the question of making sure that ways can be found to avoid this happening in the future.

REDUCTION IN SUBSIDIES FOR CERTAIN PRODUCTS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, we can see the evasion of ministerial responsibility by one cabinet minister after another, and the epitome of that evasion has been evidenced here today as the Minister of Transport has looked for scapegoats rather than being willing to accept blame for the slow passage of his bill as a result of his own obstinate position.

I should like to ask the minister whether he would explain to this House the economic justification for the change and reduction in subsidies as they relate to the intraprovincial movement of forest and agricultural products in the Atlantic area, at a time when both industries are suffering economic difficulties and when unemployment in both industries is extremely high. Does he think it is timely to reduce the subsidies at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the change in subsidies in the Atlantic freight program results from long discussions among the Atlantic transport ministers, the premiers and myself, and from a five-way agreement among us that the subsidies can be selectively used and should be retained wherever this does, indeed, promote development and, therefore, jobs in the Atlantic region. It was also our agreement that where those ends are not met, this money was better used in other ways in the Atlantic region. That is what we are doing by building airports immediately and, I hope very soon, making improvements to bus transportation and to highways.

It is true that today we are announcing a proposal for changes in those subsidies in accordance with that agreement. I say, again, that this is a reduction in certain areas where it has been found, by the agreement of five governments, the four provincial governments in the Atlantic area and ourselves, that this will not have any adverse impact on the development of jobs in the Atlantic region, particularly when the five governments agree that the money could be better spent in other ways for the benefit of the Atlantic region.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, having an element of familiarity with the negotiations between the less favoured provinces and the government of Canada, I am quite familiar with the pressures that have been exerted by the federal government for the acceptance of the reduction in these subsidies. I ask the minister whether he has at any time studied the economic impact of the massive increases in freight rates as they apply to the maritime provinces, particularly in respect of goods for export, for intraprovincial and interprovincial movement, and is he satisfied that each of these transportation cost increases is justified and have had a favourable impact upon the economy of the Atlantic area?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, of course, as with other freight rates in the country, cost increases inevitably will show up in certain freight rate increases. I am not trying to justify every increase by the railways, by any means; I do not say they are all justified. But our current legal framework gives the railways certain freedom in that regard, and that is a matter about which I should like to do something.

The hon. member asks whether we have studied the impact. We certainly have. The five governments together had officials at work for a long time identifying the exact list of goods which should remain under the subsidy program. I would remind hon. members that, whereas in many other areas of the country freight rate increases are borne in total by those upon whom they are imposed, because of the various programs we have in the Atlantic region a good number of these freight rates are borne to the extent of 50 per cent by the people of Canada through payment of the transportation cost by the government. Therefore, 50 per cent of the increases and, indeed, of the whole rate is very frequently borne by the people of Canada as a whole. I think this is a good thing, because it is part of our commitment to the development of the Atlantic region and I will continue to support that kind of program.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, the impact is virtually unbearable and beyond the increases which have taken place, particularly as they relate to export rates. The minister overlooks the fact that the Government of Canada, in its wisdom and when it chose, could take steps to alleviate the impact of freight increases; but this it has not done recently. Does the government anticipate, in its policy, that it might take those steps, in a time of economic difficulty in the Atlantic area, in order to reduce the impact of massive increases which have taken place while this minister has been in the saddle but has failed to exercise his capability as minister?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think, again, the notion that costs can somehow simply be ignored, or that they will go away by being transferred to the taxpayer, is a popular notion among opposition politicians. But it is neither true nor is it good for the economy of this country or the taxpayer. It is not sensible for us to transfer to the taxpayer all the freight costs and ignore the realities of those costs. In the Atlantic region, however, we do have a program whereby there is significant assistance to modify that impact, by bearing 50 per cent of certain of those freight costs in the treasury, and I support that program. More than that can only be done if we are willing to put much more in the way of tax dollars into transportation, and thereby lessen the rigour with which all our entrepreneurs have to examine the best way of producing.

An hon. Member: You are lecturing.

Mr. Lang: I am lecturing, the hon. member for Vegreville says. What I am trying to get across is the point that it is often better for us to recognize the real cost of transportation and, where possible, as a result refine the product, process the product and ship a lighter product a further distance, to leave the jobs back at the source, particularly when it is in the Atlantic or the western regions of this country.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE AIRLINE DISASTERS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It relates to air safety. In May, 1973, there was a fatal crash involving a DC-3, at Rimouski, Quebec, with the loss of four lives. In the MOT accident report it is stated:

> The carrier did not comply with the Ministry of Transport standards in pilot training, dispatch, flight watch, and operational control as specified in Air Navigation Order—

[Mr. Lang.]

There was also the crash of a DC-3 last May. In the just released accident report on this incident at Pickle Lake, Ontario, it is stated:

> The carrier's maintenance and operational control procedures were below standards specified by Transport Canada.

It would appear there have been no improvements in procedure over the last four years. I ask what measures the minister's department has taken to see that airlines are adhering to MOT standards and that operational control procedures are up to standard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should recall that only about a month or six weeks ago I indicated in the House the steps we had taken, following the investigation in northwestern Ontario, to improve the inspection approach throughout the aviation industry. Because I recognized that this was not an isolated matter in relation to western Ontario, we made these improvements right across the country. We have begun the appointment of many more inspectors and have improved their procedures. We have given more authority to the regional offices throughout the country, as was recommended in that investigative report.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, in the Rimouski accident report it is stated:

> The Ministry of Transport had been aware of the carrier's non-compliance for some time but had not effectively enforced the provisions—

Also in the report on the crash at Pickle Lake last year, it is stated:

> Inspection and enforcement actions by Transport Canada was not effective in correcting the deficiencies of the carrier.

Can the minister give a complete assurance to the House and the travelling public that he will take immediate action to see that carriers comply with MOT provisions, and that the Ministry of Transport will start enforcing and correcting safety regulations relating to Canadian airlines?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers back to the practice of making it appear as though those reports came after the action to which I referred, and they did not; they came before, long before, that action. Action has been taken since that time. I wish the hon. member would not try to mislead the public with regard to that matter. This action is important.

● (1502)

Of course, the prime responsibility for carrying out the regulations rests with the carriers themselves. Most of them are very responsible and very respectable. They are attempting to carry them out in every way they can. Even then, there will be gaps and deficiencies, because human beings are involved and there are bound to be some errors from time to time. Our inspection process is meant to ensure that anyone with bad will or bad intentions is certainly weeded out. Those who have the good will, have the knowledge which leads them to do the job in the right way. We are trying to do that with an extremely able group of transport officials, inspectors and agents throughout the country. As a result, I think it is fair to say that we have a safer aviation system in this country than any country of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM TO IMPROVE GRAIN HANDLING

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a number which were asked earlier. It is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. A little over a year ago, I asked the minister what his position was with respect to his responsibility for the grain commission regarding the port at Prince Rupert which, if brought up to its potential, could save farmers in the northern part of our country, in the Peace River region of British Columbia and Alberta, $25 million in freight rates. At that time, the minister said that the elevator was to be upgraded and sold. Can he tell us today to what extent his program has progressed, and whether he has an updated report which would tie in with some of the verbiage the Minister of Transport gave us today?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to put a correction on the record, because the hon. member indicated that I said it would be sold. We said that we had asked for tenders. None of the tenders that we received was satisfactory. We asked another engineering group to make a study of the elevator facilities. That has been finished now and we will be making a decision on what to do with the elevator, whether we should upgrade it to bring it up to the standard the hon. member and I think it should reach. That decision will be made shortly.

I am sure the hon. member is aware, but in case he is not I should say that the elevator has been used more this year than in the past. It is providing good service at the present time. We think it can do even better, and it is our intention to make it so in that port area.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, having lived through another season of incredible bungling, where we have seen 600 rail cars piled up on the main line trying to get into Prince Rupert, and 40 ships in Vancouver harbour trying to get loaded, can the minister tell us when he expects a decision on this most important issue which has plagued the grain industry and the western transportation system for so long?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows full well that a lot of ships that went into the port of Vancouver, went in there without placing orders within the proper time limit. They went in there asking to be loaded with grain. More grain has been shipped out of these ports than ever before. Prince Rupert has been used more this year than ever before. We think it can be used even more in the future.

FEDERAL COURT ACT

PRODUCTION AND DISCOVERY OF DOCUMENTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-420, to amend the Federal Court Act (production and discovery of documents).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in brief, this bill amends the Federal Court Act. It amends section 41(2) in which ministers are able to deny the right of statements becoming admissible as evidence in that court on various grounds of public policy and other policy. Under the proposed amendment the judge can demand to see the document, in proceedings in camera, and examine it. If on the grounds of an affidavit filed by a minister he considers the matter as one against public policy, then he allows the document to be declared inadmissible. On the other hand, if he wants to clear up the secrecy of government, he admits the document.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? Next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY

Question No. 55—Mr. Brisco:

1. Has the government considered using Article 14, section 4, of the Columbia River Treaty and subsequent protocol of 1964, to charge or empower British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority with the specific duty of ensuring the greater stability of the Arrow Lakes and the suspension of all progress on the Kootenay River Diversion project and, if not, for what reason?

Order Paper Questions

2. Has the government made any use of the provisions of section 4, Article 14, to better effect the implementation of the Treaty insofar as Canadian interests are concerned and (a) if so, on what dates and what is the wording of the exchange of notes, if any (b) if not, for what reason?

3. Does the government recognize any continuing residual or supervisory role with respect to the implementation of the Columbia River Treaty signed by Canada and the United States and, if so, what is the nature of the role and in what manner has it been carried out of late?

4. Did the government, by Order in Council P.C. 1964-1407, designate the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority as the Canadian entity for the purposes of Article 14 of the Treaty and, if so, under what considerations?

5. Is the government satisfied with the performance of the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority in whatever capacity it might have under the Treaty and, if not, in what respect has its performance been less than satisfactory?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. No, because the lakes and rivers of British Columbia are a provincial resource and the purpose and function of the Columbia River Treaty was to facilitate development of that resource having regard to the international aspects of such development.

2. No. (a) Not applicable. (b) There has been no perceived need to do so.

3. Yes, to ensure that the objectives of the treaty are being met and that the obligations imposed on the designated agencies by the treaty and by the Canada-British Columbia Agreement of July 8, 1963, are being fulfilled. It has been carried out by the establishment and continuance of the Columbia River Permanent Engineering Board and the Canada-British Columbia Columbia River Liaison Committee.

4. Yes, in accordance with the provisions of the January 8, 1963, agreement between the Government of Canada and the government of British Columbia.

5. Yes.

CNR FREIGHT AND PASSENGER SERVICE—GENERAL MANAGERS

Question No. 65—Mr. Jones:

1. What are the names of the general managers of CNR responsible for freight and rail passenger service across Canada and, in each case, what are his/her qualifications?

2. Were any of them involved in other transportation companies in the United States or Canada which have gone bankrupt?

3. Were any of them a shareholder or connected in any way with any transportation company other than CNR and, if so, what is the financial status of the company?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. The relevant officers are: Atlantic Region: Mr. G. J. Frontain, Regional Manager Marketing, Canadian National Railways, CN Terminal Building, 1234 Main St. Moncton, New Brunswick. Mr. A. W. Sturgess, Regional Manager Marketing, Canadian National Railways, Tower Building, Edmonton, Alberta. Mr. F. R. Wildy, Regional Manager, Passenger Sales and Services, Edmonton, Alberta. These persons have the general and technical skills and qualifications required and appropriate for the above positions.

2 and 3. This is not information which appears on the staff records of CN. All CN officers are subject to internal regulations designed to prevent "conflict-of-interest" situations.

MULTICULTURALISM—EXPENDITURES IN CONSTITUENCY OF NEW WESTMINSTER SINCE 1970

Question No. 440—Mr. Leggatt:

In each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of New Westminster by the Ministry of State (Multiculturalism) and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): The multiculturalism directorate provides grants and services to voluntary organizations whose membership and activities are usually spread over an area greater than any one electoral district, and records are not maintained on the basis of these districts. Similarly, expenditures by the federal cultural agencies on multicultural subjects are not recorded with reference to electoral districts. Accordingly, it would be extremely costly and time consuming to calculate the information requested.

PERSONS EMPLOYED BY MINISTRY OF STATE FOR SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Question No. 502—Mr. Howie:

As of November 1, 1977, how many persons were directly employed by the (a) Ministry of State for Science and Technology (b) National Research Council (c) Science Council of Canada (d) Medical Research Council of Canada and, in each case, how many were earning (i) $30,000 or more annually (ii) $20,000 to $30,000 annually?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, the National Research Council, the Science Council of Canada and the Medical Research Council of Canada as follows: (a) 135. STUDIES TO DETECT MINERALS ON OCEAN FLOOR

Question No. 526—Mr. Howie:

How many studies are now in progress and being funded by the government to detect manganese, copper and other minerals on the ocean floor?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: there are no studies being conducted and funded by the government to detect manganese, copper and other minerals on the ocean floor. However, the Geological Survey of Canada is collecting geological information to provide a basis for the identification, characterization and distribution of possible mineral resources on the ocean floors and the continental shelves, and for formulating national mineral policies. This information is being collected under two GSC projects at a cost of $48,000 for the fiscal year 1977-78.

FUNDY TIDAL POWER STUDY

Question No. 743—Mr. Howie:

Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: the study has been completed and the Bay of Fundy Tidal Power Review Board's report is now in preparation. The report is expected to be available for tabling and distribution early in 1978.

TASK FORCE ON SERVICE TO THE PUBLIC

1. Has the government established a task force on service to the public and, if so, on what date was the task force established?

2. To which minister does it report?

3. What are its terms of reference?

4. Who works for the task force and in what capacity?

5. Is the task force (a) reviewing departmental revenue policies and the fees that are being charged for services offered to the public (b) reviewing the cost of offering various services to the public (c) assessing public satisfaction with services that are being offered?

6. Will the task force concern itself with postal rates, the cost of postal service or public satisfaction with postal service in the country?

7. Has the task force been asked to make recommendations regarding possible new services to the public?

8. What initiatives are being taken to ensure public participation in the work of the task force?

9. (a) On what date will the task force make its report (b) will it be tabled in the House of Commons?

10. What is the total anticipated cost of the task force?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. Yes. The Task Force on Service to the Public was set up in June, 1977, as part of the government's ongoing concern with this issue.

2. The task force reports to myself and the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

3. The terms of reference of the Task Force on Service to the Public are to study and report on the quality of the federal government's service to the public and the public's perception of that service.

4. The task force is directed by Dr. F. Schindeler of the temporary assignment pool in the Treasury Board secretariat and has been staffed at various times by eight professional and three support staff. With the exception of two of the support staff, the personnel have been drawn from federal departments on a temporary basis.

5. (a) No. (b) In the consideration of possible improvements in the quality of service, the task force is taking their costs into account. (c) Yes.

6. No, the task force has not been concerned with postal rates or with the cost of postal service. Nor has it studied public satisfaction with postal service, per se, but only as part of the general subject of quality of service.

7. The task force may recommend new ways of delivering existing services but it is not expected to suggest new programs or services.

8. Public opinion has been sought across Canada through personal interviews and discussions to ensure that the views of the public are taken into consideration in the development of recommendations.

9. The task force is reporting to me and to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment on a regular basis. We anticipate a concluding report by mid-summer, which we hope to make public.

10. The anticipated total cost of the task force is $84,000, exclusive of the salary costs for those public servants who have been assigned to the project for varying periods of time, some on a part-time basis.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, almost four months ago, on October 18, I put five questions on the order paper having to do with payments made to people like lawyers who have worked for native groups and whose payment obviously came from funding from the federal government. I asked for information as to the amounts they received and so on. Perhaps it is embarrassing for the government to admit how much money has gone to some individuals, but I think four months is long enough. Can the parliamentary secretary give me some idea when I might receive answers to my questions?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it often happens that the replies are more embarrassing for the opposition than for the government. In this case, I asked the hon. member some two weeks ago to wait for three weeks because we had to gather the documents requested. That period is not over yet and I am confident that within a week or two we should be able to meet the hon. member's request. Unfortunately, I cannot make any commitment in this regard until I have seen all those who are doing the research involved.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I hope the parliamentary secretary will look at today's Hansard. The questions I am asking about are not the questions which he promised me answers to three weeks ago. It is a different series of questions. I hope I will receive some answers.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COPIES OF ALL REPORTS, STUDIES AND CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO EXPANSION OF SKI AREA IN BANFF NATIONAL PARK

Motion No. 59—Mr. Clark:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all reports, studies, documents, memoranda, and correspondence prepared between 1973 and July 1977, by the office of the Western Region of Parks Canada in which officials of that office informed the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of their recommendations as to whether expansion should or should not be allowed at Sunshine Village ski area in Banff National Park; the probable effects on the environment of additional lifting facilities, further buildings, and parking lots, and the terms and conditions under which such expansion should be allowed to take place.

[English]

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, documents of the kind requested by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) containing recommendations to the minister by senior officials are of an internal departmental nature and are not available for public release. Under the circumstances, would the hon. Leader of the Opposition agree to withdraw the motion?

Mr. Paproski: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Milne: Mr. Speaker, may I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all the remaining notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, as reported at page 2815 of Hansard dated February 13, 1978, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said the following:

I want to say on behalf of this party that though we support the building of a pipeline it is apparent that the promises and conditions which were set forth on August 4 have not been implemented, and unless they are implemented we have very serious reservations about whether this legislation should be passed by the Parliament of Canada.

● (1512)

Yesterday the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) made a most convincing speech. Contrary to what the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had to say, he emphasized the reservations pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. In my preliminary remarks last night I quoted the questions asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and others in the official opposition about guarantees and sellouts. The hon. member for Yukon says that we cannot have guarantees. He agrees with the government position as stated by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) when he was answering a question in the House a few days ago. When the hon. member for Yukon says there is no sellout, I want to remind him that the hon. member for St. John's West interjected during the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister to the effect that in their negotiations with the United States they gave it all away. I concur with that statement. The government have been out-manoeuvred; they continue to tremble when they are negotiating with our friends south of the forty-ninth parallel.

With regard to the whole issue of our nationhood, our sovereignty and our being masters in our own house, I find it passing strange that our government can acquiesce to what is called generally competitive bidding for pipeline construction and any of the infrastructure which may be needed, such as pressure stations and so forth, while at the same time not only are our friends in the United States guaranteeing to protect their industry and their workers but countries in western Europe and Japan do the same thing.

The hon. member for Yukon says that if we were to do that it would be in violation of GATT. As my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, pointed out very accurately, there is nothing in GATT to prevent bilateral agreements or understandings. I want to illustrate this by citing the case of the Interprovincial Pipe and Steel Company in Regina and Edmonton, a Canadian company. Majority ownership in that company resides in the hands of the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the company wants to do an $80 million expansion. DREE has been studying the case and has made reports. Now they are trying to make a decision on whether to approve that expansion. The problem is that the Interprovincial Pipe and Steel Company is caught in a Catch-22 situation. As I understand it, DREE is saying, on the one hand: "If you get contracts for the manufacture of the pipe, we will approve this expansion, and you will get $80 million in advance". On the other hand, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is saying: "If you can show us you have the capacity to make that pipe, you will get some contracts".

So there sits a Canadian company in western Canada which has a 2,000 or 3,000 mile advantage in North America in terms of manufacturing and delivering the pipe, which has the potential to provide a majority portion of the pipe for that 5,500 miles of pipeline, but which cannot exercise that advantage unless it can assure DREE that it will get the contracts, and it cannot assure DREE it will get the contracts until it can assure the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Deputy Prime Minister that it has the capacity to produce the pipe.

If that is not a stacked deck against a Canadian company and against Canadian employment, I have never seen one. I would like to see who started all this about a high pressure, three quarter-inch pipe. Certainly it was not Ipsco, nor was it Stelco or Algoma. It was nobody here in the opposition and I do not know of anyone on the government side who could have started all this. But somehow or other the matter of having a high pressure, three quarter-inch pipe came up during the negotiations between Canada and the United States. There is no high pressure pipeline anywhere in North America, so far as I am aware, and there is no corporation capable of producing such a pipe, with the exception of one plant in Texas which can make a three quarter-inch pipe. It may well be that the U.S. steel industry has the capacity to move quickly into manufacturing that size of pipe, and if they have that capacity, one can hardly blame them for placing an unholy amount of pressure on the United States administration and on the U.S. Congress to arrange their dealings and negotiations with the government of Canada in such a manner that they will get a significant part of the action which they would get if there was a specification for a high pressure pipe.

Even if the National Energy Board were to come out with specifications which called for a low pressure pipe, under the terms of the agreement, in the phraseology of the minister's speech, in the government's statement and in the agreement about being generally competitive, the United States steel industry can be reasonably assured of a significant portion of the manufacture of the pipe. It would be interesting to know what chance, if any, Canadian steel pipe producers would have on contracts for this pipeline which is being made in Alaska or south of the 49th parallel. We can talk about general competitiveness all we like. The reality is the kinds of benefits which the public provides for the steel industry in the United States. Canadian contractors or Canadian bidders, the steel pipe manufacturers, if they were to bid competitively, do not have a chance of a snowball in hell of getting any of it.

I know of no other country which would allow itself to be made a new Panama. Once and for all Canada should stand up for Canadians, for Canadian workers and for Canadian industry. When will we have a federal government which will have the spine to do that? Even banana republics now stand up to the great U.S.A. They do not stand up with loaded guns or with the intention of starting wars. They are willing to be good neighbours. They are willing to help the U.S.A. out. But work done in Canada should be done by Canadians and controlled by Canadians. Canada should not, however, hold the project up for ransom with regard to prices.

Since 1867 we have had 46 years of Tories and 65 years of Liberals. They continue to betray our nationhood and undermine our capacity to do more and better. The Liberals and Tories bow at the altar of the Yankee dollar far more than any banana republic of third world country. They weep, moan and tremble, and if there is a difference with our friends south of the 49th parallel or if we want to do something the way we want to do it, somehow the old line parties feel that will destroy the great friendship and neighbourliness which exists between us and the United States. They feel that somehow any disagreement will harm investment. That is a myth which is continually perpetuated by members of the old line parties.

We must put guarantees into this legislation. We must insist that Foothills live up to what the government said on August 4, that there will be 90 per cent Canadian content. The Deputy Prime Minister is going to be in charge of this project. He says he is not interested in establishing a Canadian monopoly or cartel. It might be news to him, but neither are we. But we are determined that any project undertaken in Canada will be undertaken by Canadians. Any decision made should be the decision of this parliament, of our government, of the minister in charge of the project and of the company responsible for installing the pipeline. "Competition" means that United States industry will get a major portion of the benefit of this project. No self respecting Canadian member of parliament should hold still for that.

In addition, if any Canadian manufacturer or contractor is stupid enough to try to make unreasonable charges for the construction of this line, then and only then should contracts be open to competitive bidding. This could be provided for in the bill, or the minister could be authorized under the bill to make that decision. There are people in several government departments and certainly people with the Foothills company who know when there is unreasonable bidding. They can assess tenders from Ipsco or Stelco. They are not stupid.

The government is trying to tell us that there cannot be any guarantees because Canadian companies are dishonest and Canadian workers will be unreasonable. The government says that it must be possible for the Japanese to supply pipe and that it must be possible for steel plants in Pittsburgh, Chicago, Texas or elsewhere to supply pipe. The government has been out-manoeuvred. Unless these kinds of guarantees are put into the legislation, we will be another Panama.

I am trying to get in touch with Canadian companies who will tender on the installation of the pipeline to find out what they know about this, but I understand that there is in excess of $1.2 billion worth of pipeline construction equipment staged in the northwestern United States. It is left over from the construction of the Alaska pipeline. It has been written off. It has been bought and paid for. American contractors are buying it up or will buy it up at firesale prices, and they will submit competitive tenders for the construction of the pipeline in Canada. As far as I am aware, there is no Canadian company which will be able to compete against those kinds of tenders. We are not interested in getting fast bucks from American consumers of American gas. When Canada tries to help out a neighbour, we are interested in seeing that work done in Canada will be done by Canadians. There is no excuse for not saying that to our good friends south of the 49th parallel.

I am ashamed to say that our good friends to the south do not respect us. I do not want them to fear us. They have nothing to fear. But we do not get their respect because we do not have the courage to stand up for ourselves.

We have tried for many years to establish an industrial base to support the agricultural economy of western Canada. We have tried very hard, privately and publicly, but just when we get it going nicely opportunities to expand the industrial base further are poorly handled.

● (1532)

I want to invite the hon. member for Yukon to come with me on Friday to meet the board of directors of the Interprovincial Pipe and Steel Corporation. More particularly, I should like him to stand at the plant gate of Ipsco in Regina or in Edmonton and tell the steel workers that he agrees with the government that there should not be any guarantees in this legislation. I would like to see any Liberal or Tory candidate have the nerve to show up at either place during an election campaign. The meeting, I suggest, would not be political because not all the workers in those steel plants are NDP. But the workers will be angry. They will feel the same kind of shame that I feel as a Canadian when my government—even though I voted against them they are still my government—and my parliament allow what has been going on for decades to continue. The terrible price we are paying for being a branch plant country and the terrible price we are paying for unemployment was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), on another issue several years ago when he said that because of our supine acquiescence we will always pay.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing wrong with nationalism if it is positive nationalism, not the nineteenth century kind when countries used nationalism to exploit and defeat others. I mean a nationalism that has to do with our own nationhood, the kind that earns us the respect of our friendly neighbours. I mean the kind of nationalism that says to our friends in the United States, particularly when we have over a million people out of work: Look, we are happy to make Canadian soil available for a pipeline to take your gas from one part of your country to another, but on our soil the pipeline will be built by us, we will install it and put up the compressor stations. We will not overcharge and we will see to it that delivery of gas is secured. If we want to put some of our gas through parts of it ten or 20 years from now, there will be no problem.

We should not give away the store every time we deal with our friends the United States. A few years ago a senior officer of a United States operation told me: "The trouble with you Canadians is that you do not know what you want to do, how you want to do it, when and where you want to do it. I am getting sick and tired of you guys complaining about the Americans." In fact, the analogy he used was that of a hound dog sitting on a cactus, with all the spines sticking up his backside. Yet he is just too lazy to get off it, so he just sits there and howls.

If we do not grab this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, others will. Under this legislation others certainly will. Surely it is incumbent upon this parliament to put guarantees into the bill that the pipe will be manufactured in Canada, that the construction will be done by Canadian companies and that the installation of compressor stations and all the products needed for that will, as far as possible, be manufactured in Canada.

When the United States assisted the Soviet Union to instal the large pipeline that runs from the Soviet Union into eastern Europe, they provided technological help, construction foremen and private companies to help out. I never heard of the United States requesting competitive bidding on pipe. In fact, when Coca Cola puts up a plant in Africa or anywhere else it is African production, manufacture and labour that is used. Of course, Coca Cola gets a percentage of the profits but even those small countries stand up for themselves.

Sometimes there is disagreement, but even families disagree. Neighbours disagree. Sometimes neighbours do things you do not like. But you do not tell a neighbour that the next time he wants to put a lawn in you will do it for him and send him a bill. Countries are just the same, Mr. Speaker.

I do not think this legislation should pass in its present form. I do not think it should pass second reading unless and until the Deputy Prime Minister can assure this House that guarantees will be placed in it at committee stage. Not only should there be guarantees of Canadian content, but in order to show our neighbourliness it should be provided in the legislation or in the regulations that excessive bidding or attempts by any Canadian company to extract more than is reasonable and just will be ruled out.

The hon. member for the Yukon and the Deputy Prime Minister have sounded like two of a kind in this debate, contrary to what the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has said. When will they have the courage to say "Oh Canada, true north strong and free," and to say it in a manner that demonstrates belief in the words? I have a great deal of regard for the Deputy Prime Minister. If he wants to do something about Canadian unity, about a new confederation, he could show by example, not only people in French Canada but people on the prairies and in the Atlantic provinces as well, that we are doing something about our nationhood. Nationhood may mean something different to each of us but it is extremely important. It is not a question of whether a steel plant in Regina makes 2,000 miles of pipe. It goes beyond that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, at first glance this bill strikes me as fulfilling the yearnings of most Canadians in two vital sectors of our community, that is energy and labour. We know that the purpose of the bill is to make available to Canadians in the shortest possible time and at the best prices the energy resources which are found in the Mackenzie delta. We also know that the bill promotes the construction of a pipeline by free enterprise, an undertaking which will no doubt create tens of thousands of jobs in Canada, whatever reservations members opposite may entertain about it.

This negative position taken by the parties opposite is not new. However, under the present circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised. As soon as we learn that Statistics Canada has published the monthly unemployment rate as soon as we hear about a lay-off in a Canadian plant, we see members opposite, especially from the NDP, blaming and criticizing the government for doing nothing to create employment. Yet we have here a bill which is historic, a great bill through which we intend to create many thousands of jobs in Canada. Perhaps the fact that we saw fit to leave to private enterprise the responsibility of making this important project a reality was contrary to the philosophy of the NDP, but given our current economic predicament I would have thought those people intelligent enough to accept and recognize that the government is making a concerted effort towards job creation to help Canadians and improve our economy. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, this pessimistic attitude on the part of the New Democratic Party in particular is indeed an insult to our industry and to Canadian workers. I do not understand the lack of confidence of the members of that party in the ability of our industry and workers to compete with other countries in the making of pipes for the pipeline. I see there a token of small-mindedness and an overt lack of self-confidence.

For instance, would they want to include a clause stipulating that only Canadian industry can bid on the Canadian section of the pipeline, thereby excluding industry and our workers from participation in the construction of the American section of the pipeline? In order to provide for such a possibility, it is necessary to have an open mind and to be confident in one's own capabilities. I wish the members of the New Democratic Party would think about that and realize that we have anticipated that possibility to allow our industry, which is perfectly able to compete with the American industry, to participate not only in the construction of the Canadian section of the pipeline which is proposed in this bill, but also in the construction of the American section as well.

But it is mostly the negative attitude on the part of the NDP that I noticed, in spite of the loud protests from the hon. member who just spoke and who does not seem to understand what I am telling him. I accuse them of being unrealistic and inconsistent. I believe they seem to ignore that what they are advocating would likely preclude this agreement between Canada and the United States on the construction of the pipeline. So, were it not for this agreement and the legislation before us, there would not be any job creation in that sector in Canada. What they preach today by way of their futile protests is unrealistic. If we were to believe them and implement what they preach today, the United States would never have accepted the construction of the pipeline without any consideration for the cost. And in that sense, I say that the NDP in particular is being unrealistic and irresponsible.

Last night, I listened to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who, in his monologue—to use a polite expression—was saying: But I for one intend to see to it that this debate keeps on going for three or four weeks on second reading if need be, because an amount of $10 billion is at stake, and I intend to take part in the discussion in committee to talk at the report stage and also to participate in the debate on third reading so that we take as much time as possible to study this bill because $10 billion is involved I am afraid he did not read the bill: the pipeline is not paid by the Canadian government, by Canadian taxes but the entire building cost is paid by private enterprise. After the few days of debate we had on second reading of this important piece of legislation, I feel that members of the official opposition did not read the bill and do not know its contents as regards a certain guarantee for Canadian participation and the beneficial effect it will have on energy consumption in Canada and job creation.

Therefore, I think it is advisable in this context to refer this bill to committee and to highlight the main points in the hope that this will have the effect of avoiding statements which are not based on reality and which do not take the needs of the Canadian people into consideration during these times when we have an urgent need of new jobs and must act quickly to get the most out of our energy resources.

Mr. Speaker, this is an historic bill which we are now discussing on second reading. Its purpose is to authorize Canada legally to co-operate with the United States in the achievement of what the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) rightly called yesterday in the House one of the most ambitious projects ever undertaken by private enterprise. Bill C-25 provides for the construction in the north of a $10 billion pipeline, of some 5,500 miles which will be used to transport natural gas from the Arctic to meet the pressing needs of millions of consumers in the two countries, Canada and the United States. This bill therefore authorizes the construction of a northern gas pipeline, as stipulated in the Canadian and American agreement; in addition, it provides for the setting up of the Northern Pipeline Agency to formulate and supervise the plans with a view, first of all, to maximizing the economic benefits of the project for Canada and, second, to minimizing its adverse effects of social and ecological nature.

The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council is the minister responsible for this bill in his capacity as chairman of the special cabinet committee on the pipeline. How right he was in saying that this huge joint project, which passing of this bill will allow, will stimulate considerably both production and employment in Canada, will help to achieve the objective of becoming self-sufficient in the field of energy, by giving aceess at a reasonable cost to the main new reserves of natural gas in the Mackenzie Delta.

I would recall, Mr. Speaker, that near the end of last year the American Congress approved by a strong majority similar proposals brought forward by President Carter for the implementation of the bilateral agreement signed by our two countries.

I think it can be useful at this stage to give a brief description of the pipeline to show its importance as well as a number of statistics and to indicate its cost. The pipeline will start at Prudhoe Bay, Alaska, and will go south to Yukon. This of course is the American section which will run for 731 miles. Then the pipeline will go from the Alaska boundary to Whitehorse, Yukon, which is the site of the proposed 737-mile lateral spur which will reach the Mackenzie delta where our natural gas resources are. Later it will cross the northeast part of British Columbia, heading southeast, through Alberta, up to James River, near Caroline. The pipeline will then divide into two sections: the western leg, up to Kingsgate, British Columbia, and the eastern leg up to Monchy, Saskatchewan. The pipeline, including the Delta lateral, will stretch over a total distance of 2,765 miles in Canada. In the 48 continental states of the U.S., the Pacific Gas Transmission Company and the Pacific Gas and Electric Company will undertake to build the western section going down to California, which will parallel the present system, and the Northern Border Company will build the eastern section to the central western states, for a total length of 1,991 miles.

So the pipeline, including the Dempster lateral going to the Mackenzie delta, will cover a total distance of 5,487 miles over Canadian and American land. It will cost approximately $10 billion. The Alaska section is estimated at $3.5 billion, the Canadian section, except for the Dempster lateral, will cost about $4.2 billion and, in the 48 continental states, $2.3 billion.

Mr. Speaker, it is expected that in the beginning the complete system will carry up to 2.4 billion cubic feet per day of American gas, and up to 1.2 billion cubic feet of Canadian gas.

According to the work schedule, Mr. Speaker, construction of the pipeline, in northern British Columbia, that is on the Canadian side, would not start before the winter of 1980-81, and under the Canada-U.S. agreement, construction would not start in the Yukon before January 1, 1981, as the deadline for the system being operational is January 1, 1983.

The proposed Northern Pipeline Agency will work in close co-operation with the National Energy Board, and will serve as the only regulatory agency in charge of all federal responsibilities with regard to the Canadian part of the pipeline. Under this legislation, a member of the National Energy Board would be sent to the agency as designated officer, and the board will delegate to him the authority to exercise certain of its powers as regards the project, subject to the approval of the responsible minister and the general power of direction of the governor in council.

The deputy head of the agency will be the commissioner whose head office will be in Ottawa. He will be the minister's principal advisor on matters of policy. An administrator whose head office will be in Calgary will be responsible for the routine administrative duties, within the authority delegated to him by the minister. He will report to the minister through the commissioner, and the designated officer of the National Energy Board may be appointed administrator or deputy to the administrator.

Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of the pipeline, the bill authorizes the governor in council to transfer to this agency the legislative powers now exercised by several other departments and agencies, which must ensure that the relevant federal responsibilities fall under a single regulatory agency. The bill also proposes amendments to a number of acts to facilitate the accomplishment of this objective, as well as the rapid construction of the pipeline in this country.

Moreover, the legislation replaces all certificates of public convenience and necessity certificates required to authorize the project. It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that the Foothills group will have to comply with the many conditions set out in the legislation. The plans and specifications, the exact route taken by the network, as well as other matters, such as the location and the nature of temporary camps and the training and employment requirements of northern residents will all be submitted to the approval of federal authorities.

The group will have to prove to the satisfaction of the minister responsible for the administration of the pipeline and the National Energy Board that it has obtained the financing required for building the network and has adequately ensured against the risk of incompletion. Foothills will have to meet all the commitments made during the hearings of the National Energy Board which aimed at maximizing the economic benefits of the project and minimizing its social, economic and environmental negative impacts. In addition, it will have to comply with other specific conditions to be established under the legislation by the designated administration officer. These policies, instructions and orders will be subject in certain cases to additional studies that the company will have to make, such as that on the statement of environmental effects that it has already begun as part of the second stage of the examination process in this area. The detailed conditions will first of all be published in draft form to enable the public to examine and comment on them before they are given final approval by the designated administration officer.

The terms and conditions of implementation also give specific details about the comprehensive information that Foothills will be asked to submit to the approval of the administration concerning its hiring and supply plans. These provisions aim at ensuring that the Canadian staff and suppliers will have an opportunity to offer the goods and services required for carrying out the project in compliance with the objective of Foothills to ensure approximately 90 per cent Canadian content. Moreover, under the conditions set out in the legislation, Foothills will have to increase the capacity of the main pipe if necessary for carrying Canadian gas from the Mackenzie delta once the Dempster link is completed, in order that these new reserves may supply Canada's increasing energy needs in future years.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation empowers the minister to hold consultations with the United States government and Canadian provinces and territories when needed, to coordinate all aspects of the project involving various jurisdictions.

The legislation also provides for a Federal-Provincial Consultative Council to meet as required and which will be charged with strengthening day to day liaison and co-ordination between officials of various governments charged with overseeing the pipeline project.

The bill also authorizes the establishment of one or more advisory councils consisting of not more than ten members from outside the government to ensure communications and consultations between the various public groups involved and the Northern Pipeline Agency.

As the Deputy Prime Minister pointed out the Yukon has already shown it was interested in the establishment of such a council, which will give the general public a well-organized forum to make its views known on the nature of implementation parameters that are in the Yukon's best interest. The legislation amends the National Energy Board Act to permit the board to recover from any corporation the costs incurred by the regulations agency in overseeing and surveying the planning and construction of any pipeline from the issue of a certificate until one year after leave to operate the facility has been granted. Under that amendment, Foothills will bear the costs incurred by the Northern Pipeline Agency and the board in overseeing and surveying the project, from the day the act is made applicable until one year after the project has been opened. And that aspect seems very important to me. Not so long ago in this House, on an opposition day, some members, especially from the Conservative side, called for the creation of Crown agencies or corporations of a temporary nature and at the lowest cost possible.

Now, we have here an example of an agency which is set up for a limited time, as I have just explained, and furthermore its cost is fully borne by private enterprise without any charge to the treasury. So I think that in addition to attaining all the major aims I mentioned previously, the fact that this type of temporary agency grouping in a rational manner of some elements of various other departments involved in this tremendous project, and above all, that its cost will be borne by private enterprise is in my opinion an innovation and at least meets the wishes of many government and opposition members. When it considers the matter of tolls and tariffs, the National Energy Board should take into account the relevant clauses of the Canada-U.S. agreement. The bill also authorizes the governor in council to make regulations regarding the tolls and tariffs in order to implement this agreement and prescribe the method by which the Board will establish a rate of return on equity investment in the project. Another clause suggests that the National Energy Board Act be amended so that the definition of tolls may be changed. As a result, the NEB will be authorized to collect such charges when the pipeline is ready to transmit oil or gas. This bill provides for the repeal, one year after the issue of the licence to operate the pipeline, of those sections of the act establishing the Northern Pipeline Agency and delegating to it as well as to designated officials certain powers. I stressed this point earlier.

However, those sections may be repealed by a joint resolution of both Houses of Parliament if a certificate of public convenience and necessity is issued for the construction of the Dempster spur before the authority to operate the main system is granted. Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister explained that this line of action had been taken because it was considered prudent to provide for the dissolution of the agency one year after the beginning of the operation of the main system in case no certificate would have been issued for the Dempster spur which would be the only reason justifying the retention of the regulating body. That method also leaves parliament the choice to authorize the agency to undertake the responsibility for the planning and the monitoring of the Dempster spur if the required certificate is issued within the prescribed time period.

This bill will impose an impressive set of terms and conditions for the proposed northern pipeline to be built by the Foothills group to carry Canadian and U.S. natural gas from the Arctic to southern markets. This bill on the northern pipeline specifically requires participating companies to meet general conditions relating to varied matters such as the procurement of Canadian labour, goods and services, the design, specifications and route of the system, the elimination or reduction of adverse socioeconomic and environmental effects.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the companies will have to provide detailed information on things such as costs, financing plans, contracts to manufacturers and shippers, operation and security guidelines, collective agreements, and, in many cases, they will be required to secure the approval of the federal government. The general terms set out in the bill will be complemented afterward by orders, guidelines and specific requirements, the proposed drafts of which setting out the conditions in detail should be made public early this summer so the public will be able to comment on them before they are put into effect.

The policies dealing with the procurement of goods and services needed for the construction try to maintain a good balance between two crucial objectives: first, the maximm input from Canadian industry, second, the construction of the pipeline in Canada at the lowest possible cost.

The reasons we want to maximize Canadian input are obvious, but we must take into account the fact that Canadian gas consumers want the construction of the pipeline to be as efficient and economical as possible.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) made that statement when he tabled this bill for second reading.

According to the bilateral agreement signed with the United States, Canada is directly interested to limit costs. U.S. users will have to pay the total transportation costs for Canadian gas on the Dempster lateral that willl be 277 miles long if the total expenses for the main pipeline built in Canada do not exceed estimated cost by more than 35 per cent. If they do the U.S. share will be reduced accordingly.

It was interesting to hear the minister state and I quote:

Except for that particular point, Canadian consumers are to be more directly affected by the total cost of the system and the delivery cost, for it is expected that by the mid-1980s, Canadian Arctic gas will meet some 10 per cent of our requirements while Alaskan gas is expected to meet only 5 per cent of U.S. demand.

It should be noted that the Foothills group is required, under the terms and conditions specified in the bill, to submit a procurement program covering all goods and services for the approval of the minister responsible. This program must be aimed at achieving the maximum level of Canadian input for the supply of goods and services and maximum advantage should be taken of opportunities to foster Canadian research and promote the long-term expansion of viable Canadian suppliers.

The company is required to submit to the minister the outline of the procedure it intends to follow to carry out its Canadian goods and services procurement program. Once the minister has approved the goods and services procurement plan, the company will be required to carry it out under the pipeline agency supervision. Some proposed contracts, specified by the minister, would have to be approved by the minister before being awarded. If the minister has reasons to believe that a proposed contract with a foreign supplier could result in sales losses or unfair trade practices, he may request the company to produce proof to the contrary before giving his authorization.

Foothills will also be required to obtain the minister's approval of a detailed manpower plan designed to ensure maximum possible use of Canadian labour in the planning construction and operation of the pipeline. According to the general conditions outlined in the bill, Foothills must also comply with the undertakings given to the National Energy Board regarding social and economic matters, problems concerning ecology, animal life, fisheries and farm lands and act toward solving them as well as comply with any other direction made by the designated officer of the pipeline agency.

All these requirements will be recapitulated in the detailed conditions issued pursuant to the general provisions of the bill after having been reviewed thoroughly and submitted to the public for its comments. Moreover, Foothills must seek the minister and the National Energy Board approval for the network plan, including pipe diameter, wall thickness, and maximum allowable pressures. It must also have the final plan for each section approved by the designated officer of the pipeline agency, submit detailed estimates on the cost of these sections and prepare an operation and security guide and inspection plans to the satisfaction of the National Energy Board.

The companies participating in the work are also bound, under the general terms and conditions, to file with the minister and the National Energy Board, documents establishing satisfactorily that a source of financing has been found, that debt instruments do not contain any provision requiring the consent of their holders to the financing of the Dempster line, and that the major part of the financing is Canadian, within the terms of the Foreign Investment Review Act. Foothills must also convince the minister and the National Energy Board that it is protected against any risk of non-completon of the pipeline and interruption of its construction. To comply with its commitments and the Canadian and American agreement, Foothills is also bound, pursuant to the provisions of the bill, to construct the spurs required to transmit the gas to remote communities along the main pipeline. It will have to spend up to $5 million to build the secondary lines needed to distribute gas in the Yukon.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this vast endeavour will generate considerable benefits, over both the short and the long terms, for all Canadians. First, it will give us access to a new and important source of energy, at once more sure and more economical than any other; second, it will stimulate considerably both production and employment in many parts of the country; third, it will certainly have a bearing on our international balance of payments; and four, it will play a vital role in the long term development of our northern economy. That having been said, and those specific details given, I therefore hope, in the interest of all Canadians, that the parties of the opposition will facilitate the adoption of this important bill as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I am delighted to make a brief intervention in this most important debate. It is not my intention to review the importance of the pipeline, which has been adequately described by my colleagues, the deficiencies, which have as well been described by hon. members, or, indeed, many of the positive proposals suggested by those on this side who spoke earlier in the debate. I want to concentrate on the specific issue of land claims in the Yukon which the minister indicated yesterday was a specifically important factor relating to the pipeline, and in particular to the people who live in the north and who are really the most directly affected by the project.

I listened with great interest and, I must say, astonishment yesterday to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner). Let me make two or three observations—and there are many I could make—in relation to the speech he made in this House.

First, in spite of the minister's attempt to emasculate the government's position on a second stage inquiry, which was promised by a previous minister of Indian affairs and northern development and, indeed, Dean Lysyk when he was in the communities of the Yukon, who pointed out very clearly that there would be a second stage inquiry, there is no doubt in my mind that the minister has not changed his position and that in fact there is still no promise of a second stage inquiry.

Second, if I understood the minister correctly I am sure he was suggesting that land claims represented a most important component in this entire debate. He also gave the impression to this House of Commons that negotiations were proceeding very smoothly, that there were no problems with negotiations, and implied they were almost on the verge of obtaining a settlement with the native people of the Yukon territory. That just does not live up to the facts.

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, the Council of Yukon Indians was in Ottawa not too long ago discussing the problems it was having with this government relating to the pipeline issue, specifically the problems in respect of land claims. Let me quote from page 3 of this press release:

> We are now faced with some clear choices. We can continue to oppose a pipeline until our land claims are settled and be labelled as radical and anti-development. Or, we can compromise, thereby, sacrificing our rights to self-determination on our home land.
> We have decided not to compromise but to fight!
> We will take our case to the Canadian people. We will demonstrate the humanity and justness of our position. We will use every legal means at our disposal to ensure that we achieve a fair and just settlement. On February 13, the Federal Court will rule on our opposition to the National Energy Board recommendations. Our struggle to achieve self-determination will not stop there.

All I can say is that that does not sound to me as though negotiations are proceeding smoothly, and it does not sound to me as though they are on the verge of agreement in principle.

An hon. Member: That was two weeks ago.

Mr. Holmes: I realize that, but that statement to me is self-explanatory of the situation that exists in the Yukon.

Another very brief comment that astonished me yesterday was the statement by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as recorded at page 2846 of Hansard, in which he indicated very clearly the position in respect of the $50 million which had been suggested in the Lysyk report and by other members on this side. The minister stated:

> I informed the Council for Yukon Indians last November that we are prepared to give very serious consideration to a proposal whereby such a fund would be established as soon as an agreement in principle was reached.

This is astonishing because somewhat earlier, in the Globe and Mail of January 25, there appeared an article entitled "Ottawa acts to speed land claims", in which reference was made to a $50-million advance into a Yukon native trust; but there was nothing about an agreement in principle. This is a brand new concept the minister introduced into the debate yesterday. This is one of the difficulties we have experienced, and certainly that the native people have experienced in the Yukon vis-à-vis their relationship with this government.

When Canada and the United States signed an agreement in principle applicable to the northern natural gas pipeline they signed a death warrant to the way of life in the Yukon. Whether Yukoners view the pipeline as synonymous with progress with no significant adverse effects, whether they view the pipeline as an evil intrusion of southern influence which will disrupt and permanently change one of the few remaining frontiers, or whether they accept the inevitability of development providing certain conditions are adhered to, they all agree that significant changes are inevitable with the construction of a pipeline. With the introduction of the legislation the federal government, whether by accident or design, has polarized and hardened the position of Yukoners.

The pipeline may be an engineering feat unexcelled in the world. It may be a success in delivering gas to the United States, and there are undoubtedly economic benefits that will accrue to Canada, with convincing arguments that job opportunities are significantly important at a time when the number of unemployed in Canada rivals that of the depression years. But however valid these or other reasons for the construction of a pipeline may be, these potential gains may be overshadowed by discontent and divisiveness in the Yukon unless the government acts responsibly to create harmonious relations between all the segments of society in the Yukon. I am not convinced that the government of Canada recognizes the significance or magnitude of this particular problem. More importantly, sir, there is little tangible evidence that the government cares about the individual whose home is in the Yukon.

This government's record to date in dealing with the native people has been virtually non-productive in spite of the fact that negotiations of land claims have been underway since 1973. In addition, the constant feuding with the territorial council and other responsible groups in the Yukon has bred discontent. The government's insensitive attitude to the wishes of all Yukoners, native and white alike, will be aggravated as the various agencies become more preoccupied with the design and construction of the pipeline. This will occur at the expense of the issues that are potentially divisive among the people of the Yukon.

The implications of the problem were prophetically described in the document "Together Today for Our Children Tomorrow" by the Yukon Indian people, who state at the beginning of the chapter entitled "Today":

In 1973 the picture of the Yukon Indians is not a pretty one. The Yukon Indian people are not a happy people. Both the white man and the Indian are becoming more and more disgusted with each other. The communications gap, the social gap, the economic gap—all these are widening. Both Indian and white are getting nervous because of the lack of understanding and tolerance among both groups.

To a great extent, a good deal of the uncertainty that exists in the Yukon is related to the government's handling of the comprehensive land claims and the ability to arrive at a just and equitable settlement. Let me emphasize, if I may, the importance of this issue of land claims and their settlement. Mr. Justice Berger during his inquiry in the Northwest Territories in relation to the Mackenzie Valley pipeline made a comment that is relative to the situation in the Yukon when he stated:

● (1622)

If the pipeline is approved before a settlement of claims takes place, the future of the north—and the place of the native people in the north—will in effect, have been decided for them.

In his report entitled "Alaska Highway Pipeline Inquiry", Dean Lysyk indicated that native land claims was a major issue. In part, it reads:

With respect to the Yukon Indian land claim, we should like to emphasize that, contrary to the expectation of some observers, there is no significant element of public opinion in the Yukon that either challenges the validity of this land claim or doubts that it is important and desirable to settle the claim quickly and justly. Everyone understands that the settlement of the Indian land claim will not merely prepare the way for future economic developments that may be financed from southern Canada, but that substantial financial resources and the specified rights that will be placed in the hands of the Indian people will, of themselves, provide a strong and long-lasting stimulus to the local economy that cannot fail to be of benefit to everyone living in the Yukon.

In preparing its position paper entitled "Meaningful Government for all Yukoners", the government of the Yukon Territory clearly recognized the validity of native land claims. The introduction to that document reads as follows:

The object of this paper is to discuss how government in the Yukon Territory can be made more meaningful to all residents, native and non-native alike. This entire package is a necessary element that must be considered along with other aspects of the Indian land claims negotiations.

It continued:

In this paper there is no discussion on the Indian corporations which will be concerned with controlling and developing any assets that native people will receive. Nor is there discussion on other native organizations that may be concerned with aspects of Indian culture, society and human resource development. This is because these areas are primarily of native interest and the governments should not be directly involved with them although assistance should be available if necessary.

Mr. Robert Blair, the president and chief executive officer of the Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company and Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd.—the company responsible for building the Canadian portion of the Alcan pipeline—spoke of the rights of northern native residents during the hearings before the National Energy Board. On November 8, 1976, he stated:

I feel sure that the issue of "land claims" alone will be a factor of great importance to the timing of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline and is a factor whose effect on timing has not been quantified at all successfully. I put the words "land claims" in quotation marks because this factor is far more; it is the determination of the residential and employment and economic rights of the majority of the permanent residents of the large part of Canada through which a Mackenzie Valley route would proceed. I have personally given considerable time to work on this factor.

While appearing before the National Energy Board on December 10, 1976, he stated:

You don't ride over the citizens to push through an industrial development.

Also on the same date he stated:

Until there is settlement of those matters, I do not believe that a manageable project can be carried out.

In its report, the National Energy Board emphasized that the settlement of comprehensive land claims was a major factor in the construction of a pipeline.

The observations in support of the settlement of land claims by the previous individuals and groups I have mentioned is by no means complete. I am sure many more could be added. I assume it provides sufficient background evidence to support the very obvious fact that the federal government should honour its commitment to settle the native land claims in the Yukon. The government should have been acting in a far more responsible manner to achieve that end.

Why the delay? Why so little progress in view of the fact that negotiations commenced in 1973? Obviously it is to the advantage of the native people to arrive at a just and equitable scttlement before the onslaught of a major development project in the north. The reasons revolve around two basic issues, namely, mistrust and the deliberate attempt of the federal government to slow the progress of the negotiations to serve its own political ends.

In 1969, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) introduced the controversial white paper on Indian policy which rejected aboriginal rights. Despite the fact the white paper was withdrawn following intense reaction from the Indian community across Canada, and the Prime Minister was forced to qualify his position on aboriginal rights following the supreme court decision on the Nishga case in 1973, the Indians across Canada continue to distrust the motives of the present Liberal government. The concern of the native people was reinforced when the federal government assumed a very passive role, abrogating its constitutional responsibilities in the James Bay agreement.

In 1972 the Grand Council of the Cree were attempting to negotiate with the Quebec government following the proposed James Bay hydroelectric project. The Quebec Boundaries Extension Act of 1912 clearly indicated negotiations should take place, and yet the federal government refused to intervene despite its constitutional authority under the British North America Act. When the negotiations failed, the Grand Council of the Cree and the Northern Quebec Inuit Association took the James Bay corporation to court. Following lengthy trial proceedings, once again they returned to the negotiating table. In a restricted time frame, the Cree and the Northern Quebec Inuit Association were confronted by the James Bay Power Corporation, the James Bay Development Company, Hydro Quebec, and the province of Quebec. Although the federal government was a party to the negotiations, it failed to intervene and counteract the adversary role of the large corporations.

On one occasion just prior to the deadline for the signing, I was asked by the Northern Quebec Inuit Association to seek a one month extension of the negotiations. That extension was not to negotiate a five-cent per hour raise; it was to negotiate the lifestyles and entire future of Eskimos in northern Quebec. The following day I asked a question in the House and I was refused by the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development. He refused to grant a one month extension.

When Eskimos in the northern part of Quebec were experiencing grave difficulty in finalizing their land selection, once again the federal government refused to take action to protect the interests of the Inuit. The most devastating testimony regarding the lack of concern on the part of the federal government with respect to native rights was its refusal to insert a clause in the bill which would protect the rights of non-signatories to the agreement.

Subsequent testimony during the hearings of the standing committee clearly identified a number of Indian, native and Inuit people who perhaps had rights to that area. The argument was very simple: if the group had aboriginal rights, then a grave injustice was being carried out by extinguishing those rights unilaterally. Yet a simple amendment which would have extinguished the rights of those signing the agreement and protected the rights of others who may or may not have a claim to the area was defeated by the government. Is it any wonder that the native community across Canada mistrusts the government?

It was in the context of this background that the document entitled "Together Today For Our Children Tomorrow" was presented to the government in 1973. The Prime Minister's initial response was positive, yet negotiations between the Council of Yukon Indians and the federal government was painfully slow. Federal negotiators refused to respond to that detailed document. In reality, those negotiators had no authority to negotiate unless they had clearance from Ottawa.

On March 3, 1975 the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), arrived in Whitehorse and made a unilateral public offer of settlement. The government knew this announcement violated the negotiating process, and not unexpectedly the native people rejected the offer and the methods employed by the government.

● (1632)

Negotiations remained in limbo despite pressure from the Council of Yukon Indians. Finally in October of 1975, the minister appointed a one-man negotiating team, Mr. Digby Hunt, the former assistant deputy minister of northern development.

Mr. Nielsen: The worst mistake.

Mr. Holmes: He was one of a small group of federal architects which had been formed to develop, prepare for, and promote the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

Although the second round of negotiations commenced, they were clouded with uncertainty. Because of his background and involvement in northern pipeline development, Mr. Hunt's appointment was viewed with suspicion. Concern about his appointment to this important position fell on deaf ears in the government and our fears that additional time would be wasted in settling the land claims became a reality with the suspension of negotiations in 1976.

Negotiations commenced for a third time in 1977 and on July 19, 1977, the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), reported from Ottawa substantial progress with Yukon Indian claims. The report, which I think is very significant, stated the following:

> Indian and Northern Affairs Minister Warren Allmand stated today that he was very encouraged by the release Friday, July 15, of a "settlement model" for the Yukon Indian claim. The model was made public by the Planning Council for the Yukon Indian claim, following lengthy discussion between planning council members who consist of representatives of the Council for Yukon Indians, the government of Canada and the Yukon territorial government. The model describes the goals of the Yukon Indians and outlines ways in which they could be achieved. "This is a significant step forward in the resolution of the Yukon Indian claim".

The former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said:

> I am confident that the settlement model, which has my personal endorsement as well as that of the board of directors of the Council for Yukon Indians and the executive committee of the Yukon territorial government, will lead to an agreement in principle and ultimately to a final agreement.

The minister said he had been following the Yukon discussions closely through his special representative and the federal negotiator, Dr. J. K. Naysmith, and he emphasized the value of the "co-operative planning process" which has provided an effective framework for reaching agreement. He said:

> The preparation of this settlement model is proof of the substantial progress that has been made by the Council for Yukon Indians and the two levels of government by co-operating and dealing openly with the issues involved.

He said also:

> The process could well serve as an example of how complex elements in native claims might be handled in other parts of Canada.

The minister was optimistic that an agreement in principle between the Yukon Indians and government may be reached by the end of 1977. He reiterated his position that the resolution of the Yukon Indian claim is a high priority with the government and that every effort must be made to resolve it in an equitable and realistic manner.

Where is the agreement in principle that was promised by the end of 1977? Why have negotiations stalled once again? Are we to believe the resolution of the Yukon Indian claim is a high priority with this government?

In light of events in recent months, broken promises, loss of trust and inevitable confrontation, the obvious conclusion is that the Yukon land claim is not a priority but an issue to be engulfed by the gigantic pipeline project as it gains momentum. We witnessed a similar struggle with the James Bay agreement, and this government, by virtue of its actions in the recent past, has set the stage to impose its will rather than honouring its commitment and constitutional responsibility to negotiate a fair and equitable agreement.

On April 19, 1977, the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development announced the establishment of a board of inquiry on the socioeconomic aspects of the proposed Alaska Highway gas pipeline. The board was chaired by Dean Lysyk with a mandate to submit its report by August 1, 1977. In an effort to allay the fears of the northerners, including the native people, and to avert a boycott of the natives who viewed such a short inquiry as a whitewash, the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development assured Yukoners and the Canadian people that a second stage inquiry would be held.

Mr. Nielsen: It was part of the order in council.

Mr. Holmes: Indeed, the above report goes on to declare:

> The inquiry is to submit its report, including the preliminary impact statement, by August 1 in order that its findings may be taken into account by the government in decisions it expects to take concerning northern pipelines in the early autumn.

The minister said that if the Alaska Highway application should receive approval, the government would establish a further inquiry to assist it in developing terms and conditions for the construction and operation of the line. As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, let us make no mistake; Dean Lysyk, when he was travelling through the community, gave the message to every Yukoner, Indian and white alike that in the event that an Alcan pipeline was approved, there would be a second stage inquiry.

It is perfectly clear that this government made a commitment to have a second stage inquiry if the Alaskan Highway application was approved, and yet both the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) and the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) have said no to a second stage public inquiry.

Is it any wonder that the Council of Yukon Indians during their visit to Ottawa stated:

> Throughout the inquiry, our people in the communities stated their strong objections to the pipeline proposal. And in every community our people listened as Dean Lysyk repeated the promise of a second stage inquiry. We believed the government and their agent but now we are advised by the Minister of Indian Affairs, Hugh Faulkner, that there will be no second stage inquiry. We have been denied participation in all pipeline discussion. Our hopes for establishing a relationship of trust and co-operation are gone. The wound is deep and the hurt deeper.

On Saturday, February 4, the Toronto Globe and Mail reported the President of Privy Council as stating a second stage inquiry into the impact of the pipeline on the north would not take place. Instead, as reported in the paper, an advisory committee would be established to obtain public input.

The minister knows such an advisory committee is similar to the "citizens' advisory panel" recommended in the report from the committee on interior and insular affairs of October 25, 1977, entitled "Approving the presidential decision of an Alaska natural gas transportation system and for other purposes." The minister knows that, irrespective of the merits of an advisory committee, it will not replace the second stage inquiry promised by this government that is so crucial to the communities in the Yukon.

Again, Sir, during the fall of 1977, following the decision to build the Alcan pipeline, the Union of B.C. Chiefs, under the able direction of George Manuel, the past president of the National Indian Brotherhood, requested that the second stage inquiry as promised by the government be carried out. With the signing of the agreement between the U.S.A. and Canada, it was now apparent there would be a significant impact on the Indian communities, particularly in the north and east of B.C. in such places as Fort St. John and Fort Nelson.

In anticipation of the disruptive changes which would occur in these Indian communities the Union of B.C. Chiefs made a very sensible and responsible request for a second stage inquiry, which was initially, and I must re-emphasize this, promised by this government. The minister and the government again said no to the B.C. request. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Deputy Prime Minister and the government know that with this change in policy the government has broken its promise. Indians and native people have been betrayed. The government has lost the confidence of native people and, what is more important, the government has imperilled the prospects of a fair and just settlement.

I want to serve notice that at the appropriate time during debate or study of this bill I intend to pursued the important matter of a second stage inquiry, and I hope that during this debate or committee hearings we will be able to convince the government that it should honour its previous commitment to all those in the Yukon and in the northeast part of British Columbia.

When the United States and Canada signed the agreement in principle applicable to a northern natural gas pipeline in September of 1977, agreeing to a timetable for beginning construction of the pipeline in the Yukon by January 1, 1981, they ignored a very significant recommendation of Dean Lysyk. In his chapter on Yukon Indian land claims the third recommendation appearing at page 121 declares, and I quote:

> For the reasons stated in part E of this chapter, some additional time is desirable to avoid prejudice to a just settlement. Construction of the pipeline should not commence before August 1, 1981.

Dean Lysyk was not recommending a moratorium. He was not recommending some unrealistic time delay; his was a responsible position. He was recommending a responsible time in keeping with the complexities and sensitivity of the issue in the Yukon Territory. Yet this government chose to ignore this important recommendation. As I indicated, that is reminiscent of the days when I asked the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development for a one month extension to complete negotiations on the James Bay settlement.

The legacy of broken promises and delaying tactics of this government unfortunately has transformed negotiation into confrontation. Witness the application for leave to appeal the recommendations of the National Energy Board submitted by the Yukon Conservation Society and the Council of Yukon Indians. If I understand the legislation before us correctly, it blocks entirely a move by any group, including native groups, to have hearings before courts in the future.

The government's game plan is obvious. With the passage of this legislation the momentum of the project will impede efforts to conclude a fair and just settlement. The rights of individuals can be conveniently shunted aside in the name of progress. Dean Lysyk stated in the Alaska Highway pipeline inquiry:

> With respect to the Yukon Indian land claim, the proposed pipeline represents both an opportunity and a risk.

The government has failed to understand the significance and importance of that statement. If the past has taught us anything, it is simply that pre-conceived views and unilateral action bear little relation to the real problems of the Indian and native people in Canada. Through broken promises and deliberate attempts to delay the negotiations which commenced in 1973, this government has impeded the prospect of allowing Indian and native people to choose a future path which they, their children and their children's children wish to follow.

The native people are not asking us to determine what the Indian was, what the Indian is today or what he may become in the future. They are simply asking us to accept him as he is and to provide him the choice to develop without interference. I regret to say that that has not occurred under the administration of this government.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the construction of a natural gas pipeline I would like to paraphrase a statement made by the hon. Mr. Justice Berger, who said, and I quote: "The risk is in Canada; the urgency in the United States." I prefer to think that the urgency is in the United States and the opportunity is in the Yukon.

Traditionally pipelines have been powered by the resource being transported through the lines. For example, much of the Alyeska pipeline is powered by the oil running through it. In the case of the proposed natural gas pipeline the intention is to bleed gas from the line in order to operate the driving motors, the compressors. The amount of gas required to drive these motors would be approximately 8 per cent of the gas in the line, or enough gas to heat 750,000 homes annually. At a time when there exists a critical national shortage of natural gas, 8 per cent of the gas in the line used simply to operate the motors is a tremendous waste which would be better used in the marketplace.

An Anchorage engineering firm, Retherford and Associates, has come up with a more economic means of driving the motors, that being to electrify the pipeline. Electrification of the pipeline in the southern Yukon was previously mentioned by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) in his speech opening the debate on this bill on Monday. Electrical energy, either by means of coal, oil, geothermal heat or hydro-electricity, could be used to power the natural gas to its various destinations. Each basic resource was examined to determine the most viable and economic method for electricity production to be used instead of the fuel gas in the gas transport system. The high price of oil, the rising price of coal and the lack of research and development in the area of geothermal heat made it clear that hydroelectricity would be the most feasible and competitive fuel to power the pipeline in the Yukon.

What are the reasons? First, hydroelectric energy can be developed in sufficient quantity at competitive cost. Second, hydroelectric energy is a renewable resource, the fuel of which is descending water, which does not escalate in price and which is not depletable.

Third, the use of hydroelectric energy reduces the pressure on other energy sources and extends the life of non-renewable fuels, the future value of which may lie in other uses more important than energy, such as food.

Fourth, the hydroelectric process is non-polluting.

Fifth, hydroelectric projects have long lives, and their major structures are relatively maintenance free.

Sixth, hydroelectric energy can easily be used instead of fossil fuels such as gas, oil and coal, which can be used in other market areas.

The Yukon has hydroelectric potential, and therefore it is essential that we take this opportunity to capitalize on such an energy swap. In short, the use of hydroelectric power to drive the natural gas pipeline would ensure that an additional 8 per cent of the gas resource would reach the marketplace. Once there, the value of this gas would more than pay the cost of the use of electrical energy.

Moreover, the construction of a dam on the Yukon River to generate this hydroelectricity would give strong assistance to the infrastructure of the Yukon economy. The abundance of hydroelectricity generated would not only drive the motors of the pipeline but also serve the community.

● (1652)

The market for the electricity assured by the electrification of the pipeline would justify the construction of a dam that would generate twice as much electricity as is needed for the pipeline. The remaining 50 per cent electrical capacity would be an extremely valuable aid in the development and advancement of the already existing lines as well as attracting secondary industry, which would not have otherwise come to the area. It would diversify the economic base of the Yukon and would be assured of being readily accepted by the Yukon. For both the dam and the pipeline I feel Canada has the capacity to undergo such an enormous project at a competitive price. We have the Canadian know-how, the competent engineers and technicians; we have the Canadian manpower, a sufficient and able labour force, and we also have Canadian materials sufficient to meet the needs of the proposed pipeline.

I urge the people making the decision on the means of driving the natural gas from Prudhoe Bay to southern markets to investigate very carefully the suggestion of using hydroelectricity as the source of energy. The people of the Yukon await the decision. We have the Canadian talent. We must maximize the potential economic, industrial, energy and social benefits for the Canadian people, while at the same time minimizing adverse social and environmental impacts. This is an excellent opportunity to help in the development of the Yukon and also of Canada.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am terribly excited about the performance of my friend from across the aisle. He has been painting this Utopian dream for the Yukon that we have always known about, and that this government has procrastinated with for the last 100 years. If they had just listened to the Yukon Territorial Council and to the hon. member from the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who has spoken about these things for the last 20 years, we would probably have achieved some of these projects long before now.

It is my intention to confine much of my remarks today to purely parochial interests, and I feel justified in doing that, because my constituency, Mr. Speaker, encompasses about one-third of the geography of British Columbia in which 540 miles of this pipeline will be placed. The section which I am concerned with is described in the bill as entering British Columbia near Watson Lake, on the B.C.-Yukon border. It will follow the general route down the Alaska Highway, touching all the small communities along the route, such as Lower Post, Fireside, Summit Lake, Trutch, Fort Nelson and Fort St. John. It will traverse and touch the Stone Mountain and Muncho Lake provincial parks, areas, Mr. Speaker, that have traditionally been the domain of native hunters and trappers, all of whom will be affected by this pipeline, as well as a number of very sensitive game sanctuaries and breeding grounds. Closer to the Peace River country, Mr. Speaker, the pipeline will go through some of British Columbia's most productive farmland before it enters the province of Alberta near Dawson Creek.

Very few of my hon. friends in the House, Mr. Speaker, have heard before all of these exotic places, but that comes as no surprise to me. Unfortunately, there is not enough time for me today to make more than brief reference to this great area of our country.

My hon. friends here will recall my repeated efforts to convince the government to extend the terms of both the Lysyk and the Berger inquiries to study the impact the pipeline will have on the area that I have described; but, as you know, Mr. Speaker, the government chose, as it does in so many things, to hold the provincial governments in this particular matter responsible for whatever planning or preparation will be necessary to minimize the obvious negative side effects, and, on the other hand, to maximize the positive benefits that could accrue to the area touched by the pipeline. In so doing, the federal government abrogated its clear responsibility in a number of very important areas of their own jurisdiction, and I want to touch on these, Mr. Speaker.

Firstly, the Alaska Highway, or that portion of the highway, namely 600 miles, which travels through British Columbia. As you know, Mr. Speaker, that highway is entirely under federal jurisdiction. It is owned and maintained by the Department of Public Works and will, of course, be the major staging and access route for the pipeline contractors. To a great extent, Mr. Speaker, the highway is used by travellers from the United States since it offers the only road link between Alaska and the other states south of the 49th parallel.

Many thousands of visitors from all across our country and, indeed, from every corner of the globe travel the highway every year. They come to take part in a unique experience, to see part of our country and its history which most Canadians have already forgotten. They find fulfilment in the rugged wilderness and go to hunt and fish and enjoy the many wilderness scenes and wildlife species, such as the mountain goats, mountain sheep and grizzly bears which still abound in the area. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the tourist sector of British Columbia's economy of which the Alaska Highway is a most vital component, is probably the most important industry in that province next to wood fibre and maybe mining.

All of British Columbia's oil and gas deposits are serviced from the Alaska Highway, which provides access for a significant portion of the forest and mining industry in the province as well. The number of people who service and cater to all these industrial and recreational activities is greater than the total population of the Yukon. Every single person will be affected by the pipeline. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there are twice the number of people living in the areas of northeastern British Columbia—which I have described—who will be directly affected by the pipeline than there are in the area of our country which was studied by the Berger and Lysyk inquiries at a cost of tens of millions of dollars. Some of these people, Mr. Speaker, are of native ancestry, and again the numbers are at least equal to those to whom all the attention of the inquiry was directed.

Now surely, Mr. Speaker, the government cannot deny its direct responsibility, at least in the area of native concerns. If there is such a thing as special rights and aboriginal title for native people, the government of British Columbia has never heard of it. If there is a special deal for native people, Mr. Speaker, it is a deal they must address to the federal government. As far as British Columbia is concerned, even the reservations that have been set aside for the native people in that area can be expropriated for railway rights-of-way, roads and power installations. That has been done. As my hon. friends know, there were no treaties with the Indians in most of British Columbia. As far as the Peace River country is concerned, however, we do have treaty No. 8, and it will form the basis on which the natives of northern British Columbia are beginning to build their case—and I hate to say it—against the pipeline.

I fully understand all of the difficulties the companies will experience if they do not receive approval by March of this year to finalize their plans and to start working on the logistics of building the line. I understand as well the problems the government faces if the pipeline agreement is not ratified by parliament before an election is called. But, Mr. Speaker, I am at this time in no position to sympathize with these problems. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I was one of the first to greet the National Energy Board's decision to opt for the Alcan route instead of the Mackenzie Valley route with a great deal of excitement and enthusiasm. You will also recall, however, Mr. Speaker, that I urged the government repeatedly to begin their discussions with the government of British Columbia and assess the problems, in socioeconomic terms, in the areas affected by the pipeline.

On April 22 last year I raised a question in this House to find out whether the terms of reference of the Lysyk inquiry in the Yukon could be extended. I asked the government this question on July 18, October 6, October 26 and December 19. Twice within the last couple of weeks I have used my time in the House during question period to remind the government of their direct responsibilities in this regard. I have asked the government to table the agreements which they have reached with the province of British Columbia so that we can intelligently and adequately discuss them here in the House. I have asked the Government through local, regional and municipal authorities as well as citizens groups to safeguard against any unnecessary and negative side effect.

Unfortunately these legitimate requests have so far been ignored. There has been no dialogue as far as I am concerned with the agencies I have mentioned. Whatever discussions have been held with the province have been held behind closed doors. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the agreement with the United States requires a statement of acquiescence from the provinces affected by the pipeline. The B.C. government gave its approval without any consultation with local governments and without any formal study or inquiry into the possible impact of the project.

I am put in the position today of making a judgment on behalf of my constituents without even knowing what demands or conditions the government of British Columbia has placed on the building of a pipeline or approval of it. As part of the agreement between Canada and the United States these statements of concurrence must be issued. Let me state what the bill says in respect to the British Columbia situation:

Specific details of this undertaking will be the subject of a federal-provincial agreement to be negotiated at as early a date as possible. Such agreement should guarantee that British Columbia's position expressed in its telex of August 31 is protected.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I asked the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) whether he would be prepared to table the communiqué. On two occasions, the hon. gentleman preferred not to make this document public. Whenever the government is reluctant to pass on information, I am suspicious that they have something to hide. From the point of view of myself and my constituents, it would appear that the bill will have to wait until the two governments consider it timely to tell those people who have to live with this extravagant scheme, both during and after construction, how their environment, their lives and their future will be affected.

I do not trust either this government or the government of British Columbia with such an important and far-reaching decision. In northern British Columbia we have been disappointed before. For instance, we were told that the total work force of 6,000 men, which at one time was working on the Peace River dam project, would find work in industry attracted to the area by the government. They would be able to take advantage of the special on-site power rates. As well local municipalities and communities would have access to the preferred power rates, easing the burden of building the required infrastructure.

Over 600 square miles of land was flooded, with monstrous environmental and ecological consequences. None of the promises was kept. Power rates in the Peace River country are still higher today than they are in Vancouver which is 700 miles away. The federal government failed to exercise any of its jurisdiction when whole settlements of Indians were forced off their land without compensation. These included registered reservations. The massive body of water has affected the climate and atmospheric conditions in the area to the point where it has seriously threatened the viability of certain industries. The growing of certain cereal crops in the Peace River area is a marginal endeavour today. I am always sceptical when this government makes any deals, the terms of which cannot be made public.

My concern in respect to this project is somewhat different from those expressed by most of our colleagues. Like the territorial council of the Yukon, I worry about the impact on the local labour market as much as I do about assuring Canadian content, which is most important. I want similar assurances to those granted to the Yukon in respect to preferential treatment of local workers, businessmen and entrepreneurs.

On the other hand, I know what it means to local employers. Local industry will not be able to match the lucrative labour contracts. Machine operators and workers will enjoy higher wages as a result of these contracts during the pipeline construction. Labourers of all categories will seek work connected with the pipeline construction and will quit their present jobs. Local businesses will be forced to raise their wages in order to equal wages being paid by the pipeline companies. Alternatively, they will close down for lack of workers.

I took a trip last summer through Alaska and the Yukon to study the impact of the pipeline on the communities along the Alyeska route. I was told that in Fairbanks 80 per cent of the municipal police force left their jobs to work on the pipeline construction just at the time when the drug peddlers, gamblers and prostitutes arrived. An acute shortage of labour will occur in the local area whenever such a large project commences. Local residents will be denied their most essential services.

Experience along the Alyeska route as well shows that the contractors like to use local supplies and service facilities as much as possible. However, these facilities are always inadequate, and there is a lack of time to gear up for the influx of new business. When the projects are completed it will take months if not years to get everything back to normal, as was the case in Alaska. During construction of the pipeline it will be worth one's life to travel the Alaska highway. The term "highway" is too generous a description of the road which was built in 1942 by the United States army as a defence project. For the most part it is a dirt road. The federal government has plans to upgrade and pave the road; however, this has never been a priority. My hon. friends and colleagues will recall the many interventions I have made in the House in support of an accelerated upgrading program for the highway. The paving from Fort St. John to Fort Nelson was to be completed this year, but it will now take an all-out effort to come close to completing that section to coincide with the completion of the construction of the pipeline.

The adjustments that will have to be made by the smaller communities is a concern of mine. They must accommodate the influx of population required to maintain and operate the line once it is in place. We know of the commitment made by the provinces not to levy additional taxes or fees, which was commensurate with the commitment made in the bilateral agreement. There is no mention made of who is to pay for the additional services required by towns, cities and villages along the way, including schools, hospitals and recreational facilities which the newcomers have a right to demand. Will their cost be borne by the local taxpayers? We do not know that. We expect cost is a component of the behind the door agreement reached with the province of British Columbia.

Again, Mr. Speaker, our previous experience provides us with little comfort. Governments have always been more preoccupied with calculating royalties and taxes than with assuring those people who manned the frontier and maintained the facilities in remote areas of equitable living conditions.

I would be remiss if I did not recognize the exemplary corporate citizenship demonstrated by one of the partners in the Foothills consortium, namely Westcoast Transmission. This company, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is taking part in the pipeline construction. It has built and it maintains hundreds of miles of pipeline in British Columbia. Where the government neglected their responsibility, the company took over, providing housing and recreational facilities, co-operating with local municipal councils and community groups, encouraging their employees to integrate, to take part in the social affairs of their new towns.

In some cases brand new small communities had to be built, but wherever possible the employees live in existing towns, adding to their vibrancy and viability. This company has a unique and enviable relationship with their employees as well. Their industrial relations process could serve as a model to most other industries, and even to the government in its dealings with the public service.

I encourage hon. members to study what Westcoast Transmission is doing for its employees. It was the the officials of Westcoast Transmission who made the first and only contact with the municipal and regional officials, discussing the new project and its implications. However, this dialogue is limited in the sense that the company as well can only speculate on the terms of reference the government will eventually dictate and the guidelines that must be followed. At this point they have not been told what size of pipe they must use for the project. They have been told that they must bear the costs of the monitoring agency, but there is no indication of the size or dimension of the bureaucracy. The company knows that the British Columbia government will attache certain conditions on the permits they must issue, but no one knows what these conditions might be.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the private sector still gets involved at all in such risky schemes. The risks are not any abnormal or changing market conditions or unknown factors in respect to the technological challenges connected to the resource harvest in the new frontier and hostile environments, but rather the risks of dealing with governments which make their own rules as they go along, usually after irreversible commitments have been made by the resource sector, governments that regulate and change at whim every aspect of market conditions.

Government estimates on which their policy decisions in the public interest are based are consistently and hopelessly wrong. A year ago, for instance, we were told that we might be experiencing serious shortages in natural gas in the early eighties. That was only five years after the government declared that our domestic requirements are secure for the next 100 years. The latest estimates announced by the policy-makers of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources show that we will have no trouble meeting both our domestic and export commitments with reserves already identified until at least 1990.

I wonder what impact those latest inventory figures will have on pipeline decisions. How firm, for instance, is the agreement with the U.S. which is annexed to the bill under schedule I? With respect to the schedules of construction, we do not know and probably will not know until long after this bill is passed in this House just what is involved.

The passing of Bill C-25 will not answer any of the questions that need to be answered before the companies can proceed with their final plans. The passing of this bill will not facilitate the assembly of the capital required to build the line.

What it will do, however, is give the government the opportunity to make all other remaining and critical decisions without the scrutiny of parliament. It will give the government the option to make final decisions respecting Canadian content of labour and supplies, and critical decisions respecting timing and the staging of the various sections in a manner that accommodates their political objectives and the timing of this year's election.

Most of my constituents welcome the pipeline. We in northeastern British Columbia have learned to appreciate the major influence this industry has had in the economy of the north and the quality of life. The industry has helped to stabilize small and fragile communities, adding an important tax base to the marginal source of finances available. The pipelines and processing facilities have added an important dimension to the job markets. They have opened up the country, helping to provide access to other resources in the area.

While there is always an upheaval during construction, it can well be said that there are no harmful side effects in terms of the environment. Even the wildlife has adjusted well to the rights-of-way which provide additional food and trails for the animals to get around. But in spite of all that, we do not want the pipeline at just any price. We must have some assurances, similar to those built into the bill for the Yukon, that the existing communities will receive adequate help to cope with the pressures and social tensions that will accrue during the construction period.

We want local residents to have preferential treatment when applying for the construction jobs. Local business entrepreneurs must be given the opportunity to supply all those services they are capable of supplying. We must insist that the contractors and the companies operating the system once it is in place will make every effort to train young people, particularly young native people, in the skills they require; and, most important, we want the infrastructure around the project built to accommodate the needs and the legitimate aspirations of the people already in the area.

With regard to the labour component, one of the most necessary matters that has not been mentioned is the fact that there needs to be an agreement with the unions for access to their membership on the part of local residents so that they can be placed on these important jobs.

Ironically, most of these demands can be met without any additional costs to the project. As a matter of fact, with the least degree of foresight and planning the objectives of all concerned could be made to complement each other. For instance, the operation of the system will require a very sophisticated communications system employing the latest technology. This system, if properly planned, could, without much additional cost, carry radio, television and telephone channels and signals which could service the residential settlements along the route. These services are presently not available for the most part of the highway area. With a small number of strategically located breakout systems, the whole area could be serviced with these essential amenities which other Canadians have taken for granted for two generations. Similarly, access routes and transportation infrastructure could be planned commensurate with other interests.

Without the benefit of an impact study which would directly relate to the pipeline, I must rely on my experience in municipal and regional governments and on the studies that have been made by the various authorities in the areas affected, such as chambers of commerce and councils.

I must assume, that we can rely on the province to provide and advance the funds required for the initial adjustment that local settlements must make. The sum of $200 million, which is the figure used in the Yukon, is not unrealistic for northeastern British Columbia.

We must insist on a firm commitment to build in the cost of laterals to service the settlements north of Fort Nelson and to adjust the rates charged in Fort Nelson commensurate with Alberta border prices.

There must be an immediate assessment of any land claims that may arise and an effort to begin negotiations. In addition to that, however, there must be a clear commitment by the federal government to accelerate the reconstruction program on the Alaska Highway to the point where it is paved to mile 315, which is the junction with the Liard Highway. As well, we want to know the role the B.C. railway will play in the staging and transport scheme. There is a great deal of uncertainty about the future of that part of the railway which spans the stretch from Fort St. John to Fort Nelson. In view of the importance of this rail link to industries in Fort Nelson, we want the rail bed upgraded not only to accommodate the pipeline contractors but also to assure continued service to the vital resource areas of the north. I can only hope that all these points are incorporated in the provincial shopping list when it is finally made public.

• (1722)

As you know, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of my party to expedite the bill in every way possible having regard to the many opportunities which can accrue to Canadian business and labour as a result of the project. I would point out, however, that the government has had this legislation ready for four months. It could have been debated at the time the United States Congress dealt with the matter. We are now called upon to proceed with almost indecent haste in our consideration of the bill while assuring adequate safeguards for Canadian interests. My hon. friends have drawn attention to many areas in which the bill is imperfect. As one editorial said this morning, there are so many holes in this bill it could accommodate a pipeline.

I serve notice on the government that ministers will have to be much more co-operative during the committee proceedings, much more free with information, if they wish to ensure our support. To those members on the government side who would like to blame us for holding up this bill, I say that the people who will be holding up the bill will be the natives in the Yukon and in northeastern British Columbia who will be sitting in courtrooms and in front of bulldozers because they realize that, once again, their last chance of seeing the promises made to them by the government fulfilled has gone by. We on this side intend to insist on significant changes being made in this bill, so it is really up to the government to decide when the legislation will leave the House and when the contractors will be able to get on with their work.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the note on which my hon. friend from Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) concluded is the note on which I feel I should begin. This is beyond any question one of the most questionable operations the government has tried to pull off. I refer to the manner in which the introduction of the bill has been delayed.

Mr. MacEachen: Delayed?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Delayed. The government has delayed the introduction of this bill. Do I have to say it again? It has delayed the introduction of this bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Thank you!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The agreement with the United States was signed on September 20 in this city. The bill was introduced on February 6. There was plenty of lead time, even as the agreement was being concluded, to have prepared a measure for implementation in legislative form to be placed before the House.

I have noticed that this is not the first time the government has exercised a delaying device of this sort for the single purpose of trying to secure a political advantage by forcing the opposition to make hasty decisions. We have had six days only in which to examine this legislation. It is an important bill. Aside from the other bill which we considered earlier this session in relation to the budget and granting the government authority to borrow $10 billion, it is the only bill to come before us which deals with a sum of this magnitude. Here is another bill which involves $10 billion. Not all of that sum, it is true, is to be raised by Canadians but we are dealing with issues of a magnitude which cannot be overlooked.

This party, the party to our left and the party down at the end of the chamber have had six days in which to study the implications of this bill, yet we are being pushed to allow the measure through. We have given an undertaking that we shall not delay the measure in the House. But I still believe every member on this side should make it clear that bills of this importance should not become the political playthings of the government. This is not the way to govern a country as delicate as Canada. I find it shameful that there should be members sitting in this chamber today who can accept that sort of thing. It is deplorable. It is a form of blackmail.

[Translation]

Aside from that, I have other remarks to make and having commented on that matter, I would like to add that we all want to be sure that Canadian manpower and industries will be involved to the highest degree possible in the construction and maintenance of the proposed pipeline. It is a huge project, Mr. Speaker, since it is expected to cost $10 billion and require a construction period of two to three years as well as the use of pipes in Canadian territory over hundreds of miles—I do not remember exactly how many—a number of miles in Yukon, my colleague just said 600 miles in British Columbia and the rest in the province of Alberta. It is therefore a huge project and we on this side insist, as do government members, I hope, that Canadian manpower and industry take maximum part in that project.

We want the construction company to be obliged to hire manpower in every part of Canada and also order the needed materials from each of our regions. Let us take advantage of the expertise and steel technology developed not only in Ontario, in Saskatchewan and the west, but also in the province of Quebec and in Nova Scotia. All Canada, Mr. Speaker, must benefit from that huge project. To be sure that it will be so——that the future may unfold as it should, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

[Translation]

—we, of the Progressive Conservative party, will propose to the committee that a monitoring agency accountable to parliament, whether it is a select committee or one of the standing committees of the House, be set up to make sure that the company is complying with the provisions of the bill.

• (1732)

[English]

Before turning to another aspect for which I am responsible, namely the environmental problems relating to this matter—and that is my principal task—let me speak of another concern I am most anxious to get on the record. I refer to the opportunities Canadians ought to have of acquiring equity shares in the company responsible for the construction and operation of a pipeline project of this sort and size.

This situation did not arise in the first instance as a result of an earlier pipeline construction, but it did finally occur as a result of a good deal of effort on the part of this party. Our party down through the years has been in the vanguard of those who have sought ways to assure that Canadians have an even, and even a better than even, chance to participate in the fruits of this country's good fortune, not through agencies such as FIRA, but through an ability to participate in projects which have Canada as their base.

A method of assurance would be to require that there be an offer of equity shares in the Foothills pipeline project. Probably Foothills will set up another company in which Canadians should have the opportunity of sharing. This will be a gilt-edge investment if we believe in the future of this country. Why should Canadians not be given the first opportunity to share in and enjoy the benefits that will be accruing to our country once gas begins to flow through the pipeline we are now discussing? The investment will be even more gilt-edged once Canadian gas is flowing through the pipeline, as is hopefully foreseen down the road and I will return to that later. I should like to see assurances built into this legislation which would give that right to Canadians to participate financially in this great venture and draw profit from it. This is a matter we might well examine more closely once we get into committee.

In referring to the matter of Canadian input of work and material, I would mention the need for a parliamentary monitoring agency which would be required on a quarterly basis to keep under scrutiny the manner in which the many varied terms and conditions imposed on the construction companies and others under the bill are being carried out. This project is too vast to think that parliament in a matter of a week, two weeks or three could discuss it, pass it and forget about it, going on to something else. We have to be able to come back to this project to make sure that what we have stipulated is being carried out. We cannot just say: "There you are, we have passed the bill, now you get on with it". We have to be able to assure ourselves and Canadians that those who are authorized under the bill to do the job will do it in a manner that is wholly and in every respect consistent with the requirements of this bill. Nothing can be left to chance or to a monitoring agency that cannot be called to account.

The monitoring agency that is envisaged in the bill is an agency which, under these provisions, cannot be called to account. We as members of parliament can and ought to be called to account. That is why we are here. We cannot authorize a project of this size on the basis of allowing things to go ahead without being sure there is some manner in which we can call the company or companies to account for their actions in relation to the legislation. We as parliamentarians should be ready to provide answers when we are called upon to do so. The only way we can do that is by making sure there is an agency in place that will allow us to determine whether, in each particular area of construction, progress is being made along that foreseen critical path, and in accordance with the provisions so loudly being touted regarding the competitive capability of Canadians to provide the materials and workmen.

There must be a more than equal opportunity for Canadians to participate in that construction in Canada. These are matters for which we in this House will be held accountable, and we must be sure we have all the answers. We do not want to be like this government which stands up during the question period and sidesteps questions. We cannot sidestep questions on a matter of this importance. We have to know what is taking place and that it is taking place in a proper way and at the rate it should be taking place in order to produce the greatest economic return possible to this country. A monitoring agency composed of members of this parliament is essential to this whole deal.

We have been talking in general terms about some of the problems that will be faced during construction. Let us consider the things that have yet to be done before the project can get underway. What provisions are there in the bill which give an ironclad assurance that these things will be carried out before the project begins? What about all those things that have to be done before the project materializes?

Let me quote briefly from one of the reports that fortunately was prepared by the environmental assessment panel which in itself was rushed into preparing its assessment of the impact of the project in federally owned territory. I have with me the Hill report. It is an interim report of the environmental assessment panel sent to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) in July 1977. It was commissioned, if I remember correctly, in February. The panel had a matter of three or four months to examine and outline those areas where there could possibly be an impact, and then submit recommendations to the minister on what might be done. At page 3 of this particular report the authors state:

The short lead time available made a normal environmental assessment of the project impossible at this time.

That suggests to me that if it was impossible at that time there must be a further study in order that a full environmental assessment can be made. Instead, the panel was instructed to review the existing data, seek public and professional information and submit an interim report by August 1. It did that, but this was purely an interim report.

Yesterday, if I am not mistaken, I heard the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) make reference to guidelines following the publication of this report. As yet I have not seen those guidelines. A lot of documentation has crossed my desk relating to the pipeline, among other things, and perhaps I overlooked the guidelines. This environmental panel studied the situation as carefully as it could in the time available. If it produced a set of guidelines which would be of assistance to the construction company, then they should be available to all hon. members who are considering this important piece of legislation.

How can the government expect the House to pass the bill as quickly as possible when some of the documents are not available? There are some things which all hon. members must know before considering this piece of legislation. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River referred to the position of British Columbia which was sent in a telex to the federal government on August 31. As yet, we do not know what the position of that province is.

It will be necessary to conclude three agreements between the federal government and the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Surely the conditions under which those three provinces agree to the construction of the pipeline are relevant to this debate. Yet we do not have that information. In fact, there are many lacunae in the documentation which is at our disposal. Even so, we are expected to approve this legislation on a crash basis.

I should like to refer to the environmental concerns which the Hill panel laid before us. As I have suggested, the panel was under the gun just as hon. members are. It is unfair to parliament and it is cynical of the government to push the passage of this bill. The importance of the concerns expressed in the Hill report should not be underrated. Environmental concerns are of prime importance. It is only within the past 20 or 30 years that the true significance of the effect that developmental projects can have on the environment has come to light. It is not easy to define the dilemma faced by our modern society when developmental projects begin to manifest an impact on the environment of an affected area. The trouble is that some of the environmental effects need not be immediate. It may take years for the effects to show. The environment must be safeguarded and the developmental change must be allowed.

I happened to notice a cartoon by Norris of the Vancouver Sun which appeared in an Ottawa newspaper. The cartoon depicted a cave situation. There was a bush fire at the mouth of the cave. There were a couple of hairy boys entering the cave wearing goatskins and carrying clubs over their shoulders. At the same time, an equally hairy individual was leaving the cave. Obviously he was an egghead, a man who had been thinking. He had produced an object which the other cavemen were looking at. The caption under the cartoon was: "You can call it a wheel if you like, but to me it is development". Following that, the other cavemen went through the process of breaking it up. Surely that is not the attitude toward development we have to adopt.

I wonder if the definitions of the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) should be applied to environmental problems. After the federal-provincial meeting of industry ministers on January 30, the minister said that the over-zealous protection of the environment costs jobs. Is that the definition used by the government? Also he said that we, the Canadian people, have to be fully aware of that, and that minimum standards of environmental protection across the country are not necessary, that over-zealous maintenance of minimum standards hurts the regions. Then the minister went on to explain that in areas where there is no industry, standards designed for urban Canada would be inappropriate. Perhaps a pragmatic approach has to be taken. However, there are minimum standards which must be followed. It is a very delicate balance.

I should like to refer to some of the problem areas indicated in the Hill report. The report indicated that there would be damage in various areas that could be mitigated. Also in the final analysis it was indicated that more study was necessary and more data had to be collected before a final decision or recommendation could be reached. Because of the size of the project, its impact in environmental terms will be of the same relative magnitude, according to the report.

The panel referred to the potential environmental effects associated with a buried gas pipeline passing through areas subject to permafrost. They were not examining, they were just spotting. Then they spotted another one, the relative importance of environmental problems resulting from the operation of the chilled line, on one hand, compared with the heated gas mode over the remainder of the route, on the other. With the chilled line, frost accumulation could result in heaving of the pipe, while a warm line could result in the degradation of the surrounding permafrost. These are the sorts of problems that the Hill report saw emerging once the construction was underway.

There is also the possibility of a pipeline rupture due to seismic activities. One of the lines went through a seismic area, and, incidentally, that was the Alcan route. The other line does not go through a seismic area, but there were dangers which they foresaw and which they spotted.

When they were examining the company and its knowledge of the various construction problems, they were advised during the hearings that the proponent had limited knowledge of the occurrence, distribution and nature of permafrost along the proposed route. If I remember correctly, the construction is not likely to begin until about January 1, 1981. There is a two-year lead time.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the conversation which is going on across the way might not take place behind the curtains?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. members please carry on their conversation behind the curtains.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This is another area where the Hill assessment group spotted problems that were going to occur. Another one is river crossings. Should the pipeline be buried under the river or should it be carried by an elevated mode across the river? Because by burying it, there could be damage to it and interference with fish spawning, migration and overwintering and possible deleterious effects of siltation on fish and fish habitat, and the possibility of gas leaks under ice cover. All these are matters which must be investigated.

This is one reason among many that I have maintained from the beginning that a monitoring agency should be set up composed of members of parliament, so that we can be assured that the construction company is examining these matters and making sure that the environmental damage is reduced to the minimum, in a manner which will permit construction to go through. If they have to examine rivers for fish spawning, etc., are they doing it now? We do not know that. I think we should know whether or not they have started this.

There is a provision in the bill at page 50, schedule III, clause 7, which reads as follows:

> The company shall, in respect of social and economic matters and environmental, fisheries and agricultural concerns, comply with the undertakings given by Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd., the Alberta Gas Trunk Line (Canada) Limited, Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, and Alberta Natural Gas Company Ltd., and in the submission of the Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company Limited to the board, as amended during the hearing or such orders or directions as may be made or given by the designated officer.

Clause 8 reads:

> Prior to the approval of the final detailed design of each section or part of the pipeline, the company shall submit to the designated officer,
>
> (a) the results of such further studies in respect of social and economic matters, environmental, fisheries and agricultural concerns as may be ordered or directed by the designated officer; and
> (b) the recommendations of its environmental consultants for the protection of fisheries, farm lands and the environment.

These requirements are written into the bill and the provisions are under the general direction of what is known as the designated officer. However, that does not relieve those of us who sit in this parliament of the responsibility to ensure that those requirements are fulfilled. I think in a matter of such importance and size it would be a mistake for us to proceed as though, once the bill has left us and gone to the other place and been given royal assent, it were no longer our concern. It is our concern and it is the concern of the Canadian people. They are going to hold us accountable and we should be in a position to be accountable.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

NATIONAL SECURITY

MONITORING PROFITS OF COMPANIES IN CANADA CONTROLLED BY SOVIET INTERESTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of importance concerning the following five completely or largely Soviet-owned companies operating in Canada: Emec Trading Company and Morflot Freight Liners Limited, both of Vancouver; Stan-Canada Machinery Limited and Belarus Equipment of Canada Limited, both of Toronto; and Socan Aircraft of Calgary. I am advised by intelligence sources that these companies are under surveillance. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack):

That the Solicitor General make a statement as to whether the government has or is presently monitoring the profits of these companies that are being kept in Canada in the form of bank certificate deposits in an amount exceeding $20 million, for purposes of determining that none of this money has or will be diverted to finance KGB activities in Canada or to support extremist elements whose ends are not in keeping with the Canadian democratic process, and that the minister include in his statement similar information with regard to 45 to 50 other companies in Canada that are not completely state-owned by the Soviet Union but which are controlled by Soviet interests.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CALL FOR GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday, all of Canada came to realize that in spite of several months of preparation and coaching by his handlers, the old prize fighter has now become too weary to continue in the big league. We were all disappointed that when it came to the final round, he had nothing left in his bag of tricks. In light of this, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House demands that the old fighter and his entourage resign from office so that the electorate can choose someone who can do the job.

An hon. Member: Who, you?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—REQUEST MARKETING PRACTICES BE REVIEWED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the inability of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation to meet the final payments to fishermen for last year's catch, and in view of the fact that tens of thousands of pounds of fish are being returned to the corporation by government inspectors from retail stores because of freezer burn caused by up to four years' storage, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That this House directs the minister responsible for fisheries to order an immediate market study analysis, cost accounting, efficiency study and a review of the marketing practices of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

COLLECTION AND DELIVERY OF MAIL STREWN ALONG HIGHWAY 401, TORONTO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. A mile of Her Majesty's mail has lain strewn along the express lanes of Highway 401 in Toronto for nearly two weeks. A postal official sent a sample of these wind-blown, frozen letters by registered mail a week ago to what he termed "our investigation people", but that mail has not been delivered either, it being in the postal system. I have retrieved some of this mail, preventing its obvious destruction, and I will turn it over to the Postmaster

General (Mr. Lamontagne) today in the hope that he might have it delivered. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That this House asks the Postmaster General to supervise, personally, the collection and delivery of the balance of the letters that are still deliverable and report back to this House, when his mission has been accomplished, as to why there should have been such careless non-delivery of Her Majesty's mail.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE CONDITIONS IN INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the recommendations submitted by the provincial ministers of agriculture to the federal-provincial conference recognize the serious problems which exist in the agricultural and food industry, and in view of recommendations for upgrading the processing of agricultural products, a "Buy Canadian" food campaign, a grain marketing strategy, an improvement in agricultural research funding, an expansion of international markets for agricultural products, and an improved transportation system—all of which are in keeping and consistent with Progressive Conservative positions and policies—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

● (1412)

That the ministers of agriculture and transport bring forth appropriate legislation immediately to deal with these urgent and pressing problems.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HALIFAX—FREIGHT RATES—ALLEGED BIAS BY CNR AGAINST PORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of pressing urgency to the port of Halifax. Given the revelation of extreme bias on the part of Canadian National toward the port of Halifax, as contained in a report for the government of Nova Scotia prepared by the U.S. consulting firm of Arthur D. Little, indicating that CN is intent on forcing Halifax out of the container business through the deliberate application of prejudicial freight rate structures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield):

That this House call on the Minister of Transport to make a full statement on motions today explaining the position of this government and its Crown agency, the CNR, in connection with this totally unacceptable bias against the port of Halifax.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST PROGRAMMING BE REVIEWED TO REFLECT CANADIAN INTERESTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas this parliament has charged the CBC with the mandate and the funds to promote national unity and to inform Canadians on issues affecting their lives and their livelihood, and whereas the lead story on the 9 a.m. national radio news on the day following the conclusion of a major conference of first ministers dealt at length with the outcome of the Ali-Spinks boxing match in the U.S.A., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House expresses to the public affairs department of the CBC its dismay at their failure to comprehend their mandate, and their absence of a sense of proportion in assessing Canadian values.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

GRAIN—IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL REPORT TO IMPROVE GRAIN HANDLING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the campaign promise of the government in 1974, to the effect that "the total grain handling system from the granary to the ships in the harbour will be revamped and new systems introduced", in view of the fact that deliveries of grain to the west coast have fallen behind some 25 million bushels in meeting the commitment of 43 million bushels a month through the west coast, and in view of the fact that costs of demurrage are building up and Canada's reputation as an exporter is being seriously damaged, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government take immediate steps to increase efficiency in the grain handling system by implementing the recommendations of the Hall commission report and, further, that the treasury, rather than the producer, bear the costs of demurrage, which liability has arisen through the bungling of this government and through no fault of the producer.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEW JOBS TO BE CREATED RESULTING FROM FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My question is to the Prime Minister. It is on a matter regarding which, I am sure, the government has some firm estimates. Will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons how many new jobs will be created this year as a result of the projects outlined in the document appended to the communique yesterday?

• (1417)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the communique, as the House will realize, covered many pages, as did the announcement of proposed or considered projects. It would be difficult to quantify in exact terms the number of jobs that will be created. That happens to be the case. Our hope, and the hope expressed by all the premiers, is that we will turn the economy around from the position it has been in for the past year or two by creating confidence. This confidence is determined to increase the rate of investment in the country.

The rate of investment will create jobs by bringing the price spiral down to 3½ per cent within three years, which is the resolution we all agreed to. We are making the Canadian economy more competitive. All these factors, put together, will mean more jobs for Canadians. This is a fact which has been accepted by all the governments represented at the meeting, and together they decided this was a step unique in the history of managing the economy.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. The federal government has no estimates coming out of the conference, just as it had no proposals going into the conference. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a specific question regarding one of the projects that was appended to the communique. It relates to the advantage that will now be taken, ten years late, of the 200-mile fishery limit. How many jobs can Canadians expect to be created next year by that particular venture?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, once again, even in his second question, the Leader of the Opposition is asking me to give him a number. I tell him I will not attempt to give him a number. If he wants to ask the people of his province who know something about energy projects if it will be a good thing for the economy and for jobs to advance the energy projects in the west and in the east, then he can ask them. If the number is not one they have in their pockets, they will say so, Mr. Speaker.

He can ask the fishermen on the west coast and on the east coast if it will mean jobs for them, because we have taken these decisions, in terms of building the infrastructure and using the 200-mile limit to our advantage. They will not know an exact figure, but they will know it is important. He can ask the people in Oshawa who know something about the automobile industry if it means jobs for them to have reached these agreements with the province of Ontario and, hopefully, Quebec. They will not give him a figure but they can give him an answer, if he will go and ask them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that reminds me of the applause for Muhammad Ali as he went into the ring last night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister will not give me a number, so I will give him a number; the number of nearly one million Canadians who are out of work in this country and whom he and his government ignored when preparing for this conference. Since the Prime Minister has failed on the fisheries question, I should like to give him a chance on the Prince Rupert question and ask how many new jobs will be created in 1978 by the expansion of port facilities on the west coast.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party have both referred to Muhammad Ali. I can tell them that he could probably take both of them on together with one hand tied behind his back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1422)

Mr. Hees: What about wrestling inflation to the ground?

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has indicated to the House that he can fly like a bee and sting like a butterfly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I would like to ask the Prime Minister, who has failed consistently to tell the people of Canada, one million of whom are out of work right now, how many new jobs will be created by the proposals appended to the communique of yesterday? I would like to ask, in relation to the automotive industry to which he referred, how many new jobs can Canadians expect to have created in 1978 as a result of the agreements relative to that industry, referred to in the communique yesterday?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, apparently the only fall-back position of the Leader of the Opposition is to ask for a specific number. He knows very well that there is no possibility of quantifying a number with any precision. I can tell him, with respect to jobs in the automobile industry, that if the proposal which the federal government is putting forward to one of the majors for building their plant in Quebec, for instance, is accepted, it will mean thousands of jobs. But it will depend not only on the proposals of the federal government; it will depend also on the confidence Canadians show in their own future. If they think the Canadian economy and the country is closing down this year, as the Leader of the Opposition has predicted, obviously they will not create jobs. But this is not the view of the ten premiers and myself who met yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

JOBS TO BE CREATED BY OPENING COAL MINE IN CAPE BRETON

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the severity of the present unemployment situation, I can understand the Prime Minister's reluctance to deal with this issue; but having attended that conference and listened to the flim-flam of a million new jobs that was thrown out by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, surely the Prime Minister can give some specifics today.

I would ask the Prime Minister, in relation to another of the projects included in that list—that is, the opening of a coal mine in Cape Breton—how many new jobs will be created for hard-pressed Cape Bretoners this year as a result of that project? How will that ease the unemployment situation in Cape Breton?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady talks about listening to flim-flam. Maybe the description is one that she sees. She not only has not listened to flimflam, but she has not listened. If she had listened to the minister make his presentation, she would know that the facts she is quoting are not the facts put forward. She is inventing a figure or else drawing it from some imaginative place. He never said one million jobs, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. lady is putting up a straw lady.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Hees.]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I find the Prime Minister's quaint reply just about as amusing as the quaint way in which he refuses to acknowledge that women members of the House of Commons have just as much right as any other person to be addressed as a member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: What do you care about the status of women?

An hon. Member: Chauvinist.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, that mid-Victorian view has gone out. I would ask the Prime Minister a question regarding the projects presented to that conference and attached to the communique. I refer to the Fundy tidal power project, another project which will influence hard-pressed Atlantic Canada. How many jobs will it create in 1978 to ease the unemployment situation? Does he have a figure? Are there any specifics?

• (1427)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, since the opposition cannot describe the conference as a failure, in the face of their colleagues in the provincial governments having declared it a success, their ploy seems to be to ask me to put numbers on the jobs which are going to be created tomorrow. As a result of our meeting yesterday, I am not saying that a million jobs are going to be created tomorrow. But what I am saying is, if they want to talk about the jobs being created today and tomorrow, in the past ten years, for example, we have created in the economy some 2,300,000 jobs.

I really cannot follow the logic of those who say that what we did yesterday has not created jobs today. However, what we did the day before yesterday has created jobs today and will create jobs the day after tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I remind him, at the outset, that he cannot have it both ways. He is chiding the opposition for producing figures. I remind him that it is his government's document which shows that we are going to have an unemployment rate of 5½ per cent in three years, a 7.3 per cent investment increase in each of the next three years, and inflation will come down to 3½ per cent.

In light of his government's assertion with regard to these figures, which require, on the employment side, an increase in jobs—to achieve his government's target—of 300,000 in each of the next three years, which is almost twice the rate of job creation in real numbers, according to Statistics Canada, how does he plan to achieve that target which his government, not the opposition, has set?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the figures which appear in the communique are not the figures that the hon. member has just quoted. He is, once again, using figures which are not those arrived at as a result of the conference yesterday. He is also disputing the fact that we created 250,000 jobs by the fourth quarter of last year over the year before. When there are two ways of interpreting the economic path of Canada, the hon. member prefers to take the most pessimistic and negative one. This is not the view of the premiers who, meeting together, preferred to express confidence in the future of the economy and agreed to objectives in terms of growth and in terms of reducing inflation, which shows they have more confidence in the economy than the opposition parties combined.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am quoting from a document produced by the Department of Finance. It states that unemployment will go down to 5½ per cent by 1981. This is the government's figure, not something that we on this side have concocted. Also, with regard to job creation for last year, Statistics Canada state that 182,000 was the real number for last year, not the bogus figure the Prime Minister keeps quoting.

A document put out by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and a document by the Minister of Finance forecast, in the manufacturing sector, some 74,000 new jobs, on an annual basis, which is about four times the rate which has occurred in the past four years. Will the Prime Minister tell the members of the opposition and, more important, the people of Canada, why he makes the assumption that in the next four years we will have four times as many new jobs in manufacturing than we have had, on an annual basis, in each of the past four years?

● (1432)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of the conference was to reverse the trend of the past two years during which Canada was not competitive in its price and cost structure. The premiers and I agreed that in order to achieve that purpose we had to do several things. One of them was to bring down inflation, the CPI, to a rate of 3½ per cent within the next three years. The second was to keep down the cost of government growth. The third was to create confidence in the private sector so that the private sector would, with renewed confidence in the economy, create the jobs which are needed. The fourth was to specify a certain number of projects which the governments together could get under way now or in the short term.

There are many assumptions which lead to the optimism felt by the premiers and myself. All those assumptions are spelled out in some detail in the paper. The leader of the NDP can regret those assumptions; he can question whether they will be realized or not. All I can tell him is that the ten provincial governments, together with the federal government, are determined to make these optimistic projections a reality. They know they will do it if they can instil into the private sector, by which I mean the unions and management, the same kind of confidence that we in the governments of this country feel.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada want action, not just rhetoric about the confidence felt by the Prime Minister of this country. Considering we all want to bring down the level of unemployment—and I grant that members on the government side want this as much as do members on this side of the House—does the government not intend to bring in a capital works program of the kind all the premiers requested at the meeting in St. Andrews last August? Is the Prime Minister not prepared to cut taxes for medium and low income taxpayers? Is he not prepared to expand the housing budget? All these measures could provide jobs now for the people who need them. I point out that the government made no specific short-run proposals, nor did it set up specific means of achieving its main targets.

Mr. Trudeau: If the leader of the NDP is referring to some suggestions made at St. Andrews by the premiers, I would point out to him that the same premiers, with one change, were present at the conference during the last few days. We looked, together, at capital projects—a substantial list. We took those on which we felt progress could be made either immediately or in the near future and singled them out.

As to the suggestion regarding tax cuts or stimulation of demand, the hon. gentleman must recall—and, more important, the premiers took it into account—the announcement made by the Minister of Finance in October and our budget of last year which have resulted in the injection into the economy of some $4 billion in addition to what otherwise would have happened. All this led the premiers and myself to the conclusion that the economy would not perform in the years to come as it has in the past two years, because steps have been taken and policy decisions have been taken and implemented which will produce better results. This is extremely important in the eyes of all who took part in the conference.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER FORESEES EARLY INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance.

Since the federal government will soon launch a full-scale energy and industrial development program, which means considerable expenses, and in view of the present high rate of unemployment in Canada, could the minister tell the House whether he intends to introduce a new budget or whether he thinks there is a slight possibility that we can do with the present budget?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have injected $4 billion into the Canadian economy and most of the tax deductions for individuals and corporations came into effect on January 1, 1978. It is only seven weeks since we have taken these incentives and we are analysing on a day to day basis the progress of the Canadian economy, but later this spring we will be able to determine whether or not a new budget is necessary. I hope to be able to do so, but as the proposed incentives did not come into effect before January 1, we must give the economy the necessary time to react.

URBAN AFFAIRS

HOUSING—INQUIRY WHETHER STATEMENT OF PREMIER OF QUEBEC IS CORRECT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Considering that in his press conference yesterday the Quebec premier stated that Quebec would lose or had lost $64 million because at the last minute the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation changed the time limit for the presentation of public housing projects, can the minister tell the House whether the figures and the reasons given by the Quebec premier are accurate and, if so, what he intends to do to correct the situation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the House that in fact, on March 21, 1977, the official of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who was the regional director in Montreal at that time, wrote to the chairman of the Société d'habitation du Québec to inform him that all these public housing projects should be submitted before November 30 to be eligible in the last fiscal year. In fact, this limit of November 30 has been applied in all the Canadian provinces. The only exception has been in favour of Quebec since after the representations which were made during the meeting I had with minister Tardif last summer, we were asked to postpone this limit of November 30. At that time, I confirmed in a letter to minister Tardif that the limit would be December 10. Not only was the limit confirmed in writing by myself but it was confirmed again by the regional director last November.

INVESTMENT FUNDS—GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION RESPECTING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As our dollar continues to plunge, with more than $450 million being drained from our foreign exchange reserves in six weeks so far this year, would the right hon. gentleman tell us whether he sees it falling still lower than its present value of 89 cents? Would he confirm speculation in the marketplace that it is the government's intention to trigger still higher interest rates in the hope of attracting investment funds to halt the retreat?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar has been floating freely for a number of months and the government has no intention of changing its monetary policy. We do not intervene on the marketplace and we let the value of the dollar fluctuate according to the market situation. Moreover, the government has no intention of determining a fixed rate for the Canadian dollar.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has indicated that a 90-cent dollar is good. Would the Prime Minister inform us whether, in his view, an 80-cent dollar would be even better and, if so, in what way would it be better?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the question is irresponsible. The hon. member knows that if I were to give an answer, it would set up a wave of speculation which he and his friends might perhaps make money out of, but that is not our intention.

Mr. Stevens: A further supplementary to the Prime Minister, who still believes people listen to him. I will give him another try. Our dollar, having collapsed by 37 per cent in relation to the Swiss franc, 23 per cent in relation to the Deutschmark, and 8 per cent in relation to the U.S. dollar, would the right hon. gentleman tell us whether his government has any shame at all and, if so, at what level does he intend to defend the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am ashamed of the lack of intelligence of a member who begins by saying he is not going to listen to me, and then asks me a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL SECURITY

MONITORING PROFITS OF COMPANIES IN CANADA CONTROLLED BY SOVIET INTERESTS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the following five companies: Emec Trading Company and Morflot Freight Liners Limited, both of Vancouver; Stan-Canada Machinery Limited and Belarus Equipment of Canada, Limited, both of Toronto; and Socan Aircraft of Calgary. Will the minister tell the House whether or not the government is monitoring the profits of these companies kept in Canada in the form of 30 to 60-day bank certificate deposits in an amount exceeding $20 million? Is it for the purpose of determining that none of this money is ever diverted to finance KGB spying activities in Canada or the supporting of extremist elements? How long has this monitoring been going on?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would identify the source of his information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: At this time I simply wish to indicate that I find it most regrettable that the hon. member is advancing information of this nature, in the manner he has done it, without advising me of the nature of the information. This is the first time I have heard the details which he has advanced. If the hon. member were serious about assisting the security service of this nation, he would refrain from making these alarmist interventions and alarmist declarations without identifying the source of information or providing additional information relating to those allegations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I preface my supplementary question to the minister by saying that probably he knows no more about his present department than he did about the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTION MPs SHOULD TAKE OATH BEFORE SECRET INFORMATION GIVEN THEM

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): My supplementary question concerns media statements attributed to the Solicitor General today, namely, his unctuous admission that some of what I have been saying is true. Will the minister explain what he meant when he was quoted as saying, "We are in a very ticklish situation", and that he was prepared to let some members of parliament in on only some of the secrets, but not all, if they took an oath to say nothing afterwards? Is this an attempt to provide only half-truths to members of parliament? Is it an attempt to muzzle members by forcing them to take an oath before they learn the truth, or half-truth?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that it has been the practice in the past to have a security briefing with members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on certain matters presented before that committee. Allegations have been made on national networks and by the hon. member which could be dealt with very well in an in camera meeting of that particular committee. I am informing myself about all the allegations in order to be able to assist in that particular briefing when it is made available.

The reason we are doing that is simply in order to avoid exactly what the hon. member is relishing. Indeed, a massive amount of information relating to matters which come within national security is best not made public. Yesterday, the hon. member made allegations under a Standing Order 43 motion which are completely unsubstantiated. I find it most regrettable that when he was subsequently asked outside the House he did not want to provide any substantiation for his wild allegations which will have a very serious impact on commercial establishments hiring people within Canada and offering jobs to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, instead of indulging in a tirade, I wish the minister would give the facts to the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: At this time, is he prepared to rise in his place and say that nothing I have said is true? I ask him if he dares to do that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oxford.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Surely that question, in its very terms, is argumentative. I am sure that is understood.

INDUSTRY

AUTO PARTS—REQUEST FOR FINALIZATION OF AGREEMENTS TO IMPROVE JOB SITUATION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to whom I gave notice. It relates to potential jobs in the auto parts industry. In 1977, Canada's trade deficit with the U.S.A. in auto parts was approximately $3 billion. Recently, as a result of considerable pressure from the auto parts industry, the third country remission order was given approval in principle by the government. But for it to be effective, administrative action is necessary. When will such action be taken? Why has there been such a long delay in finalizing this simple job-creation program?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are working on that. It will take place company by company.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, will the minister give us his assurance that the remission order will be fully effective in time for the selling program planned by several Canadian automotive parts manufacturers for the European parts symposium in Geneva, Switzerland, in May?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I think it will be ready by then, but it will have to go forward on a company by company basis.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

HALIFAX—RESULTS OF STUDY ON MOVEMENT OF CONTAINERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to give the House any information with respect to the allegations, findings or revelations in the study prepared by the Arthur D. Little consulting corporation, in the United States, regarding the position Canadian National has taken vis-à-vis the port of Halifax, the port of Montreal and the cost of moving containers into the mid and central U.S. markets?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give an analysis of the relative freight rates at this point in time. Indeed, I am not able to confirm the findings of the report at this stage. However, I will look into the matter further. I hope to be able to enlighten the House on another date.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to believe that Canadian National would deliberately create a bias against the port of Halifax, in favour of the port of Montreal, although that is not something I would put past the minister. In investigating this matter, would the minister advise himself, through consultations with Canadian National Railways, why the cost of moving containers through the port of Halifax has gone up 115 per cent since the base rate was struck in late 1969 or early 1970?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House yesterday, another alternative question may be why the rate used to be the same for a much greater distance, as well as asking the question as to why they are now different. I think the hon. member should not leave the impression that there is any concern or doubt about the great future of Halifax as a receiving port for containers. Indeed, our faith in the future of that port was demonstrated recently by the commitment there of very large investment in the development of further facilities for handling containers.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I have contained my anger and tried not to be partisan with respect to this question. If the minister is going to rise and give us nonsense such as that, Dr. Bandeen can be told that he will not get his recapitalization bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: I am very serious about this. I am somewhat fed up with the manner in which we are being treated by Canadian National. Will the minister, not later than tomorrow, rise on motions and advise the people of the role the government and Canadian National will play with respect to the bias against the port of Halifax, in favour of the port of Montreal?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I indicated in my first answer that I will give that information when it is available. I will not give it before it is available: I hope the hon. member understands that. I find it rather strange— although not strange from that party—that the hon. member tries to use an argument in relation to one situation as a reason for filibustering in another case. That is how they deal with the House at all times.

Mr. Forrestall: Let us have some co-operation.

Mr. Lang: It is important for the hon. member to avoid this one-sided pessimism by spreading a certain account about Halifax. He should recognize the fact that the government has not, in a regional way, preferred one port compared to another, as he suggested, or compared whatever it be to another situation. It is true that we have invested in Montreal, in Saint John and in Halifax. It is our determination to try to do a proper economic analysis and produce the necessary port facilities, as we are doing in Halifax, when they are needed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSTRUCTION OF MARRIED QUARTERS AT CFB CORNWALLIS—CONSIDERATION BY GOVERNMENT

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. In light of the fact that more people are joining the armed forces, thus putting a strain on housing at CFB Cornwallis, is the minister giving consideration to the construction of new married quarters at that base?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the problem as a result of representations from the base and also from the hon. member. The matter is under active consideration at this time.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST GOVERNMENT DISCONTINUE USER PAY POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that the user pay theory of the minister was repudiated by the premiers of all the provinces, and in light of the importance of public utility planning and transportation in this country for a balanced economy and balanced economic growth, is the minister prepared to drop the user-pay philosophy and thus do the country a big favour?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): In strict terms, this government and this minister have never had a philosophy of user-pay.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Or anything else.

Mr. Lang: It is a delightful distortion of the opposition to say that is so, but in every statement I have made and, indeed, in the statement of principles respecting Bill C-33 when it was before the House last session the developmental aspects of transportation and the use of transportation as a developmental tool have been recognized. The bill also recognized that we should not allow the user to pay too much, which is my very important concern.

What I have said, and what I will continue to say, is that productivity in this country, and economic organization, will be far better served if we do not treat subsidies from the taxpayer against one particular cost as though it were a light matter, just because the taxpayer is an anonymous individual. What taxpayers have to recognize in supporting this program is that by hiding subsidies in relation to one cost, we distort the position. I do not believe it makes sense for this country to ship a product abroad so that it ends up costing us extra money over the value of the product. Subsidies cannot be treated as a light matter; the taxpayers' money is important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the minister is one user who does not pay. It might not be the government's policy, but it is certainly his policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: I should like to ask him, very seriously, particularly on behalf of the premiers of the Atlantic and prairie provinces, when he is setting transportation rates and freight rates in this country, which is more important to him, the user-pay philosophy or the economic development of those regions?

Mr. Lang: Like all members of the House, in doing my work, my transportation is provided, as it is for the hon. member when travelling between Ottawa and Yorkton, Saskatchewan, for political reasons. That is not surprising.

Development in the Atlantic region, in Quebec and in the northwest, where it is needed, has been a strong objective of this government. There can be no doubt about that being a priority objective of this government now and in the future. Surely, that should be clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I think its success is evidenced by the changes we are making with regard to freight subsidies in the Atlantic region. The fact is that we should look at every transportation subsidy and see if the money could be better used in another way.

As a result of changes in the Atlantic region subsidies, we are taking a certain amount of money away from subsidizing freight costs. We are still subsidizing many of them up to 50 per cent, but we are taking some of the money away from subsidizing freight costs because it was agreed by five governments that that did not help development in the Atlantic region. We are applying that money specifically to other transportation and infrastructure matters which will help the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

COMPENSATION TO EAST COAST FISHERMEN FOR STORM DAMAGE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. It is also of interest to the Minister of Public Works and to the Minister of Transport. Last week's high winds and high tides did tremendous damage all along the coast of Nova Scotia. Damage was done to mariners, wharves, skidways, breakwaters and boats. In fact, in Little Harbour, Smithsville and Shelburne county the federal public wharfs were completely destroyed, along with some 1,000 lobster traps and a number of boats.

In light of the damage that has been done, and the fact that we in eastern Canada have the highest rate of unemployment in the nation, has the minister made any plans to review the damage in the disaster area, and will special funds be made available to repair fishermen's facilities, thereby providing much needed employment right now, as well as new facilities for the use of the fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, following similar representations from the hon. member for South Western Nova, I have directed engineers from my department to assess the damage and report as quickly as they can. We have in our budget a contingency fund which can be allocated for storm damage, and of course this we will do as soon as we have a report on the extent of the damage.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION ORDER ISSUED IN RESPECT OF NINE JAMAICAN WOMEN

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and remind him again about a very serious matter, that is, deportation orders issued against nine Jamaican women who are, I believe, in the city of Toronto. As I understand it, this action by the government has been called excessive, cruel and heavy-handed—a view which I share. Can the minister advise the House whether he has taken steps to quash these deportation orders?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I totally disagree with the preamble to the hon. member's question. Each case is looked at on its individual merits. These ladies knew the situation when they applied to come from Jamaica, and other centres, that if they had children in that country and declared them, they could not be part of this program. They thereby prevented people who do not have children from participating in the program.

At the present time, many of them are coming forward because of the length of time they have worked and lived in Canada. It seems appropriate, when they write down a lie in making an application for a work permit in this country, that it should be dealt with on that basis. Notwithstanding that, we do not adopt a general approach; we look at each individual case on its merits. Where compassion can be shown, or where we can take some action to help them, we do that. We also met, under the aegis of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, with a group in Toronto and discussed with them ideas such as amnesties and matters of that nature which they, too, reject. They indicated we might be talking about 2,000 people in this country with children in Jamaica and other countries. With a problem of that size, I think we should be looking at it on an individual basis rather than saying that we will bring all these people in holus-bolus or send all of them out.

Mr. Alexander: I thank the minister for the lecture, but it seems to me that this government and officials of the immigration department have known for some time that women from Jamaica do have babies out of wedlock. This was known to the minister at the time the program was instituted. All I ask the minister is whether he will quash these deportation orders. Also, given the fact that some of these women have been here for five to ten years and have made a significant contribution to our economy and to the way of life in the city of Toronto, will he not at least at this time stay these deportation orders until a complete review can be made in order that a less excessive penalty may be imposed, thereby showing that in these circumstances the minister and the government have some compassion and sensitivity? Surely, some sympathy should be shown in this matter because of the length of their stay in this country. Can the minister give us that assurance?

Mr. Cullen: Even before proceedings are initiated, each case is looked at on its individual merits to find out if we should even commence proceedings. Having made that determination in a series of cases, deportation orders were made. There is an appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board. If they feel there are compassionate reasons or grounds why a deportation order should not be made, they can appeal. We have made all these procedures available to the people concerned, and I do not intend to quash any deportation order; nor do I have that power.

Mr. Alexander: You can stay the orders.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING RIGHTS BY IMPOSITION OF SALARY CEILING

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister confirm that consideration is being given to the withdrawal of collective bargaining rights from a large number of public servants by imposing a salary ceiling above which public servants would not be eligible to be members of a bargaining group?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe such a proposal was suggested in the Finkelman report and by the Committee on Executive Compensation. Many proposed amendments to the Public Servants Staff Relations Act are under consideration. No final or definite decisions have been made, although we do anticipate presenting something in the House in the not too distant future, as I have indicated publicly on other occasions.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, can the minister give us some indication of the level at which limit is being set, the number of public servants affected and whether the government has fully consulted those who are likely to be affected by changes of this kind?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. member in the House that that, among many other proposals, is being examined. No final decisions have been taken in terms of legislation. There has been consultation about the general range of the changes to the PSSRA which we are contemplating at the present time. If and when such a decision is taken and appears in legislative form, the House will obviously be informed of it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—REMARKS ATTRIBUTED TO SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege concerns remarks attributed to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) today by the news media, a great part of which refers to me. The minister is reported to have said that RCMP security officials approached me for evidence with regard to the matter I raised in this House on June 1, 1977, namely, the training of persons in terrorist activities under the auspices of the Russian KGB at a training camp located at Finsterwalde, East Germany.

The following appears in the media: Asked whether the government is trying to find out who my informants are, the minister is reported to have stated that when security officers of the RCMP approached me, "nothing was forthcoming".

The minister has made an entirely misleading and inaccurate statement which I suggest casts reflections on me as a member of parliament and constitutes a matter of privilege.

The facts are these: I was approached shortly after I raised the matter of Finsterwalde in the House by two members of the security service of the RCMP and, if I remember correctly, their names were Inspector Don MacKinnon and Corporal Dwight Dowbiggin. They asked me if I would give them the name and address of the source of my information. I assured them that I was prepared to co-operate to the fullest extent, but I added that I could furnish the name only if the individual was in agreement. I explained to the RCMP on the day in question that the individual was in Europe travelling behind the so-called iron curtain. I further explained that his ability to travel behind the iron curtain could be severely hampered and, indeed, that his life could be endangered if there happened to be a double-agent within the RCMP who came across the name and passed it on to Soviet sources.

The officers fully agreed, but attempted to obtain the name on the basis of assurances that there was really no possibility of there ever being a double-agent within the RCMP and that, due to recruitment methods followed by the security service, this was in practice impossible. Needless to say, the incident revealed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) a few days ago regarding the expulsion of 13 Soviet diplomats because of attempts to infiltrate the security service of the RCMP, and their belief that they had actually done so, indicates clearly that I had every right to be concerned. It was not a matter of my not co-operating. The situation in England a few years ago in which Kim Philby, head of British counter intelligence, turned out to be a Soviet agent is a further example which speaks for itself.

In effect the Solicitor General has accused me of not co-operating with the RCMP. On the contrary, I eventually contacted my source when it was possible and was refused permission to divulge his identity to the police, and I advised them accordingly.

The Solicitor General is quoted further as saying that we are in "a very ticklish situation at a very ticklish time". While I agree with that, I cannot agree with something else the minister is quoted as saying, which I think constitutes another matter of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member understands that one of the difficulties I have is deciphering what part of his argument is with respect to disagreement with the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and what part, if any, constitutes privilege. The hon. member is now going on to cite another matter about which he just said he disagrees with the Solicitor General. Matters about which there is disagreement between the hon. member and the Solicitor General are not matters of privilege, as the hon. member understands, and I would like to be sure that he confines himself strictly to matters which might relate to privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: I agree, Mr. Speaker. I used the wrong phrase. There is no question about that.

The Solicitor General was quoted further as saying that he was prepared to make information available to members of parliament later in the spring on matters I have raised, but only if they swear to keep details secret. He is reported to have added that some of the information would be given to members of parliament only under oath, but not all of it. This indicates to me an attempt by the Solicitor General to suppress the privileges of members of parliament, who are elected by the Canadian people to run this country, as if they cannot be trusted without having to take special oaths, and the implication is that with respect to some information the government would not trust members of parliament anyway, even under oath.

Finally, I submit that the Solicitor General has done the following things which breach my privileges and the privileges of others in this House: He has falsely stated and implied that I did not co-operate with the RCMP security service, and he has certainly implied that members of parliament are not to be trusted.

I feel justified in demanding that the Solicitor General withdraw his uncalled for remarks with regard to me and other members of this House. This parliament should not tolerate inaccurate and untruthful statements by the man in charge of law enforcement in Canada, who has demonstrated clearly his utter and total incompetence.

I reserve my right to move any motion which might become necessary arising from this matter.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reserve comment on this matter. I would like to read the statement of the hon. member and check the information in it. There has been no intention on my part to indicate that members of this House should not be trusted. There is no aspersion being cast. There is a disagreement in terms of facts, and I would like to check those facts out to see if there is any indication that I should make some correction.

Mr. Speaker: The matter will therefore stand until such time as the Solicitor General examines the record and decides whether any further contribution to this debate should be made.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is acting as government House leader today. The parliamentary secretary is nodding his head, so I would like to put some matters to him with respect to House business.

From the point of view of hon. members in this part of the House there is a possibility that the second reading debate on the pipeline bill might end next week. I wonder if the acting government House leader can give us his assurance that we will have the National Energy Board report on Monday. I understand that it should be available on Monday. That could have a great bearing on the direction of the debate.

Will the parliamentary secretary also tell us which bills will be called after the House has dealt with second reading stage of Bill C-25?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: With reference to the report of the National Energy Board, Mr. Speaker, I cannot assure the House that it will be tabled on Monday, but I shall certainly inquire and make sure that it will be tabled as soon as possible, because it is of paramount importance that hon. members should be made aware of its contents and findings before they deal with Bill C-25. Today and tomorrow are two allotted days. On Monday, we shall resume consideration of Bill C-25, and should the debate on the bill concerning the northern pipeline come to an end some time next week, we should resume consideration of Bill C-17, and then of Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with my hon. friend, his senior the government House leader, with respect to next Friday and the possibility of adjourning the House for the Liberal convention. Does the government intend to bring a motion forward? Perhaps we could see the terms of the motion fairly soon.

● (1512)

Mr. Pinard: I wish to thank the Leader of the Official Opposition for his offer of co-operation in this area. During the next few days, we will indeed contact the House leaders of the opposition parties and try to reach an agreement not to sit next Friday while the Liberal Party of Canada is holding its national convention in Ottawa.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 115, 691, 734, 830, 927, 1,131 and 1,139.

RETIRED DEPUTY MINISTERS

Question No. 115—Mr. Herbert:

1. In the past five years, how many deputy ministers retired and continued to work for the government in another position?

2. What are their names and what positions did they hold after leaving the position of deputy minister?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Post Office Department, the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Energy, Mines and Resources as follows: 1. Three.

2. Mr. Bernard Wilson, retired deputy minister of Labour, provided consulting services in the area of labour relations in 1975 to the former Postmaster General, Hon. Bryce Mackasey. Mr. J. F. Grandy, retired deputy minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, was reappointed as deputy minister by order in council effective January 2, 1975 to March 31, 1975, to accommodate management's need to retain his services until Mr. O. G. Stoner's appointment in April 1975. Mr. G. B. Williams, retired deputy minister of public works, is on a personal services contract in the office of energy conservation in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. All other departments and agencies submitted "Nil" replies to this question.

DREE—JOB CREATION IN ATLANTIC REGION

Question No. 691—Mr. Howie:

From November 1, 1976 to November 1, 1977, how many jobs were created in the Atlantic region as a result of DREE assistance and what were their nature?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: The majority of programs administered by DREE do not lend themselves to job creation figures. However, under the department's Regional Development Incentives program, which accounted for 17.4 per cent of the total DREE expenditures for 1976-77, incentive offers can be related to the anticipated number of jobs to be created. A total of 2,704 jobs are expected to be created in the Atlantic region as a result of accepted incentive offers made under the Regional Development Incentives Act from November 1, 1976, to November 1, 1977. The department does not compile statistics on the nature of these jobs. In addition, it can be assumed that a significant number of jobs will be created as a result of expenditures made for development-oriented projects under General Development Agreements and other agreements.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES RELATED TO FURNITURE INDUSTRY

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): With reference to the Report on Regional Development Incentives for the period July 1, 1969, to December 31, 1976, the breakdown of the 68 projects related to the Canadian furniture industry listed in table II, under SIC codes 261-268, is shown below.

EXCISE TAX ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Question No. 830—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Is the government giving any consideration to replacing the ten cent per gallon excise tax on gasoline used for private purposes with a three cent per gallon excise tax on all petroleum products as recommended by the Canadian Automobile Association and (a) if so, on what date will the change be made (b) if not, for what reason?

2. Has the government undertaken any studies to determine the effectiveness of the excise tax on gasoline in promoting energy conservation and (a) if so, what were the results (b) if not, for what reason?

3. Is the government giving any consideration to requiring motor vehicle manufacturers and their agents to indicate on any bill of sale all federal and provincial taxes and thereby inform consumers where their money is going?

4. (a) Has the government undertaken any studies to evaluate the effectiveness of the weight and air conditioner tax, imposed on automobiles as an energy conservation measure and (i) if so, what were the results (ii) if not, for what reason (b) if this tax is found ineffective, will the government consider removing it and if it is found effective, will the government require it to be clearly stated as additional taxes on any bill of sale?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and Energy, Mines and Resources as follows: 1. The government is continuously reviewing and evaluating proposed legislative changes. With regard to the proposal for replacing the ten cent per gallon excise tax on gasoline for personal use with a three cent per gallon tax on all petroleum products, it is considered that such a change is not a viable alternative at this time. The increase in the price of crude oil is affecting the prices of all petroleum products. The existing excise tax on motor gasoline for personal use provides a further incentive to conservation in an area of petroleum use where it appears easier for consumers to make additional adjustments in consumption patterns. Imposition of a tax on all users would unduly raise the cost of home heating and have adverse effects on Canada's competitive position by raising producers' costs.

2. No. (a) Not applicable. (b) The excise tax was not designed primarily as an energy conservation measure. The ten cent per gallon excise tax on gasoline for personal use is one of a number of influences on the demand for gasoline. These include the increase in the price of crude oil, the mileage requirements for automobiles set by EMR, the excise tax on heavy cars and other excise taxes on energy consuming products. It is difficult to disentangle the effects of all relevant influences on sales of motor gasoline so as to determine the precise importance of the excise tax in terms of energy conservation. It should be noted, however, that there is broad agreement among researchers that consumer demand for motor gasoline is responsive to changes in the price of the product.

3. No mechanism exists whereby retailers can be forced to display federal taxes on their bills of sale to consumers. Federal commodity taxes are imposed at the manufacturer's level and as such become an element in the retailer's cost. This is not unlike other taxes or costs incurred by the retailer, such as realty taxes, tax on corporate profit, the employee's share of Canada pension, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, hospitalization etc., which are passed on to the consumer but are not identified on the bill of sale. With regard to provincial taxes, this matter is the responsibility of the individual provinces concerned and as such is outside the area of federal jurisdiction.

4. (a) The weight tax on heavy automobiles is just one of a number of government measures and market circumstances that bear on consumer and producer choices as to the relative desirability of buying and producing various types of automobiles. For example, the mileage requirements set by EMR and the increase in the price of motor gasoline resulting from both higher crude oil prices and the ten cent per gallon excise tax, make heavier, less fuel-efficient automobiles less desirable. While it is difficult to isolate the precise effects of each individual measure, it is clear that the tendency is toward the use of smaller, lighter, more fuel-efficient vehicles. The $100 excise tax on air conditioners represents a significant deterrent to their purchase. Comparisons of revenue collected and sales of vehicles over recent months with data for the 1975 calendar year (the latest for which actual data on air conditioners sales exist), indicate a significant increase in the percentages of new cars not equipped with air conditioners. While this could be in response to several influences which are difficult to isolate, it is thought that the tax is a significant factor. (b) The question of the identification of federal taxes as a separate item on the retailer's bill of sale was addressed in question 3.

HEALTH PROTECTION

Question No. 927—Mr. Herbert:

Has the Department of National Health and Welfare monitored the effect on domestic production of the enforcement of health protection branch manufacturing regulations?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Monitoring the impact of the enforcement of the Food and Drug Regulations on domestic production of those commodities covered by the regulations is done on a continual basis. When specific regulations are being developed, the impacts of the proposals are reviewed from two positions—effects on the health and well-being of consumers, and the economic impact of the proposed regulations on consumers and the affected industry.

EXPENDITURES IN CONSTITUENCY OF NICKEL BELT

Question No. 1,131—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of National Revenue and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned: 1969-70, $1,245,108; 1970-71, $1,404,788; 1971-72, $1,662,137; 1972-73, $1,898,517; 1973-74, $2,181,375; 1974-75, $2,660,423; 1975-76, $2,853,854; 1976-77, $3,272,602; 1977-78, $2,753,571; (to date).

INCREASE IN MONEY SUPPLY AND PRODUCTIVE CAPACITY

Question No. 1,139—Mr. Herbert:

For each of the past five years, what was the percentage increase in (a) the money supply (b) productive capacity?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): (a) Increase in money supply. Money supply is defined as demand deposits at chartered banks plus currency held outside banks (M1): 1973, 14.4 per cent; 1974, 9.7 per cent; 1975, 13.8 per cent; 1976, 7.9 per cent; 1977, 8.1 per cent. (b) Increase in productive capacity. The data below are annual increases in productive capacity of the manufacturing sector as derived from Statistics Canada published data. Statistics Canada does not publish a corresponding series for the total economy. 1973, 4.1 per cent; 1974, 4.8 per cent; 1975, 4.1 per cent; 1976, 3.6 per cent; 1977, 3.3 per cent.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 476 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The questions listed by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 476 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SOCIAL ACTION PROGRAM GRANTS

Question No. 476—Mr. Elzinga:

1. Under the Social Action Programme of the Department of the Secretary of State, what was the total amount of funds granted, by province and territory in (a) 1969 (b) 1970 (c) 1971 (d) 1972?

2. By province and territory, what (a) were the names and addresses of the organizations who received such grants and what was the amount in each case (b) was the specific reason for each such grant in (i) 1969 (ii) 1970 (iii) 1971 (iv) 1972?

Return tabled.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On several occasions I have drawn the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to the possibility of obtaining an early, complete, and detailed answer to question No. 145. I would appreciate it if he could expedite that.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the last answer I gave him on the matter. May he rest assured of my good faith in my efforts to reply to his question as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

LACK OF PROPOSALS TO INCREASE EMPLOYMENT—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the failure of the federal government to place before the first ministers' conference any concrete proposals either to produce jobs for the immediate future or to establish the specific means for creating long-term economic growth, as a result of which 1.6 million unemployed Canadians are left without grounds for optimism for their future and the Canadian economy will continue to falter.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the relevant provision of Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) gave the Chair notice of his intention to move this motion at this time. This has given me the opportunity to examine the terms of the motion in order to examine first, as I am required to do, whether it is a proper subject to be discussed, which essentially provides the machinery for the establishment of debates on matters of an emergent nature.

I refer particularly to sub-paragraph 16(a) of Standing Order 26 which reads as follows:

16. The right to move the adjournment of the House for the above purposes is subject to the following conditions: (a) The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration;

I think hon. members will understand that I am not about to endeavour to define in a specific and comprehensive way what type of matter will qualify pursuant to this paragraph, but I am able to address myself to the subject matter of this particular motion and say that a motion of criticism of the government's performance at a federal provincial conference does not, in my opinion, qualify under that paragraph, and therefore I cannot grant the application.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKENZIE—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On December 7 I placed a question on the order paper asking whether the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) was being charged for using the DOT Telex network to send out political messages. This is a straightforward question and there has been time to answer it since December.

On December 13 I placed a starred question on the order paper asking whether Air Canada was going to have a flight from Winnipeg to Chicago. In light of the fact that Air Canada has issued a press release to the effect that it will not be flying this route, I submit it is ridiculous that the parliamentary secretary cannot provide an answer to the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, so far we have answered over one third of the questions put on the order paper, which is an excellent average. However, I can assure the hon. member that we will check his questions and try to answer them as soon as possible.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT STRATEGIES FOR EASTERN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government must now renew its commitment to reduce regional disparities by developing and implementing without further delay comprehensive development strategies for eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces including such areas as transportation, energy, primary resources, industrial and service sector expansion.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) proceedings on this motion will expire at the ordinary hour of adjournment this evening.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, before presenting my case for the resolution, I should like to clear away a little piece of debris which also helps to point up one of the things that has been wrong with the general approach in the fight against regional disparities in the area being considered by the House today.

Yesterday in reply to a question, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) gave the impression that somehow a royal commission appointed by the government led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) imposed upon the minority Pearson government the necessity to pass legislation governing freight rates which the Minister of Transport does not approve of today. The minister correctly pointed out that this legislation provided inadequate regulation of freight rates in areas where competition was limited. The minister tried to give the impression that this was somehow or other imposed upon a minority government. He said, for example, that the reason freight rates are what they are is that after the MacPherson commission set up by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, the minority parliament enacted legislation which gave, essentially, freedom to the railways to set rates on the principle of what the market would bear, on the theory that competition would control the situation.

In my opinion this has worked to the detriment of the Atlantic area. I happened to be premier of Nova Scotia at the time this legislation was being drafted and considered by the government and put through the House. All Atlantic governments opposed it on the grounds the minister mentioned yesterday. The Maritime Transportation Commission opposed it, yet the government insisted on passing the legislation in the form it was adopted.

For the minister to suggest that the Liberal government of the day was somehow pressed into adopting the legislation by a royal commission is to suggest that the Hon. Jack Pickersgill, who was Minister of Transport at the time, was a patsy—which he was not, whatever else he was—and that he completely falsified history.

It is the kind of distortion and political falsification which we do not need, particularly in the case of regional disparity and its causes. This is the kind of distortion and falsification that increased my own personal doubts about how much one can believe of many of the statements being made by ministers these days.

I deliberately made that statement at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, because it is not my intention to generate any partisan heat in the course of this debate.

● (1522)

I wish to focus attention on a serious and deepening national problem and the urgency in facing it. As I indicated, the way in which freight rate legislation and the control of freight rates have worked against regional economic development in the Atlantic area is an example of what I have in mind.

First of all, there is much about regional economic disparity we can agree on; it exists as far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned. It is serious, and it is clear the approaches in dealing with it are inadequate. Ten years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a commitment at a time when he had not given it much thought. The problem was how to attack regional economic disparity. He promised the establishment of a department, which became DREE. At that time I expressed some reservations concerning the ability of such a department to co-ordinate adequately the operation of the federal government. I expressed some reservations about the whole approach and I think they were justified. In any event, whether they were justified or not, surely the time has come for a thorough review of the policy and approaches that have been followed during the last decade. I want to do this without threshing over too much old straw and I do not propose to spend much time on statistics.

There is clearly serious unemployment in eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. There is a serious gap in the per capita income in that area as compared with the rest of the country. This gap exists despite very substantial transfer payments. Indeed, in a very real sense the economic weakness of that region is more serious than the income disparity would indicate because transfer payments have, in fact, shored up, and continue to shore up the income figures.

The economy of that region is relatively weaker vis-à-vis the rest of Canada than it was ten years ago. And I say that very deliberately, Mr. Speaker. I do not say this to spread gloom or doom, or anything like that. It is not that there are no opportunities in that region, there are opportunities. There are opportunities in industries such as fisheries, by way of tidal power development and power development generally, and many things that no doubt DREE has under consideration.

It is not a matter of being gloomy, it is a matter of recognizing that far from making progress the economy has slipped in terms of strength relative to the rest of the country. This to some extent has been disguised by the increase in transfer payments from the Government of Canada to those areas. It is time for a thorough review of policies.

I do not think DREE has ever been in the position to develop and implement a coherent strategy to attack economic policies in that area. There have been attacks launched against particular problems. There have been agreements entered into concerning problems in sections of the Atlantic provinces. There have been useful steps taken to help develop the infrastructure in various parts of the Atlantic provinces. I, for one, have never been able to see what seems to me to be essential, a plan or a strategy involving the co-ordinated efforts of all the federal departments and agencies. This should be a plan not imposed on the Atlantic provinces, but worked out with their governments, and followed by their governments, a coherent, co-ordinated and co-operative effort. Whatever else is essential to attack problems of regional disparity in that area, those requirements are essential and we have not met them, Mr. Speaker.

Some are questioning not only the lack of coherency, the lack of co-operation and the lack of co-ordination, but also whether what has been done is moving things in the right direction at all.

In a recent lecture, which was described as deliberately provocative, Professor Thomas H. Courchene of the University of London, has argued that the effect of transfer and other policies in recent years has been to worsen the economies of the poorer provinces. In the introduction to his lecture he says that the current system of transfers, between governments and from governments to persons, is not at all conducive to eliminating regional economic differentials in this country.

Indeed I should argue the current pattern of transfers is serving to rigidify, perhaps even exacerbate provincial and regional disparities. I do not think one has to accept all of that to recognize that there may be some questions to be asked, or to agree fairly substantially with what Professor Courchene declares on page 17 of these lectures, when he says that "The thrust of the above analysis suggests that the economies of the have-not provinces are likely to have deteriorated relatively over time" which is my own view—"deteriorated in a sense they are put in a position where to an increasing extent they rely on federal transfers for their well being."

Put more bluntly, the result of the combined policies with respect to Canada's various regions is such that to a substantial degree Canada has turned several provincial economies into what financial analyst Don McGillivray has referred to as government dependencies. As a native Nova Scotian I do not read that with any great pleasure. It seems to me there is some element of truth and that we have and are creating governmental dependencies. I do not suggest the federal government is solely to blame for this. I believe that George Post, at the time acting chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, hit the nail pretty well on the head when he said to the Chronicle-Herald on September 20, 1977:

> It's never quite the right time for governments to engage in bold new initiatives, ... Some day, governments are going to have to face the disparity issue, ... The problem shows not the slightest indication of going away on its own.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the time has come to take a clear, hard look at what has been going on. Some bold new initiatives and approaches should be conceived and implemented. It is not simply a matter of me expressing opinions or academics like Professor Courchene. A senior Newfoundland minister recently declared that the effort to achieve economic development, as contrasted to what has been done to improve infrastructure, had been a failure.

Surely in view of these statements, and in view of what we can all see, it is necessary to take a hard look at what that minister described as a failure, and try to do something better. As I say, and I cannot repeat it too often, a basic condition for doing better is a thorough co-ordination of federal effort and the thorough co-operation of the concerned provinces with the federal government in attacking the problems of the region.

It may be that the problems and opportunities in Newfoundland, Labrador, and eastern Quebec are sufficiently different from those of the maritime provinces to require, in part at least, a distinctive approach from what would be appropriate for the maritime provinces. However, the federal and provincial governments, and I deliberately say federal and provincial, must have enough political courage to take a regional approach. This would not please every provincial or federal constituency in the region. Any coherent and effective plan to attack the causes of regional disparity may seem unfair for the time being to some sections in that region. The governments must have the intestinal fortitude to face that complaint. They must not be frightened by complaints that another province or another section in their own province is doing better and, as a result, the regional effort is disrupted. No approach will be absolutely fair to all at the same time. Lord knows there is plenty of intraregional disparity now, plenty of economic disparity within the region. It may indeed be as great as the disparity between the region and the rest of the country.

In terms of getting agreement, understanding, approval of an approach within the area, and of getting the people in various walks of life and different sectors of the economy behind a program, the people should be more involved in developing it. I am not suggesting that the ministers of this government should be following absolutely a program such as the one we had in Nova Scotia, called Voluntary Economic Planning. It involved representatives of business, labour, farmers and other people in developing a planned approach. It was not simply a matter of people accepting something produced by the bureaucrats and the politicians, but rather of developing an approach together.

If this is a practical way to proceed in the maritime provinces, it could diminish enormously the distrust between different provinces, the distrust between different sections of the provinces, and could increase enormously the support that any strategy or approach would receive from the total area. It is worth thinking about some variation of that kind of approach, plan, or method of policy. I believe it is worth considering the application of this to the maritimes as a whole.

When I talk about maritime co-operation I want to make it very clear that I am not proposing, at this time at least, maritime governmental union. I want that made clear. It has been recommended by a commission, but it has not yet been adopted and I see no sign of it being adopted. I do not wish to drag any red herrings around at this time.

There has been a degree of co-operation developed among the maritime provinces. However, one sometimes gets the impression that competition is being stressed more than co-operation. When the going gets tough, competition between the provinces takes over. It may not be a big matter, but there has been feuding over the location of the veterinary college. Anybody who has been following the situation can mention other instances where one province is seen to have difficulty going along with the others.

Co-operation between or among the provinces cannot be just a matter of convenience. It must be a governing factor at all times. Newfoundland-Labrador and eastern Quebec may be sufficiently distinct, but surely it makes sense from a national point of view to treat the maritimes as a unit of economic development. That does not mean the federal government should impose on those three provinces a plan of development. It does mean that the federal government should insist on a common plan of development and a common strategy to be developed by the people of the three provinces and the federal government. Once that plan or strategy has been agreed upon by everyone concerned, the federal government, its departments and agencies and the provinces, that strategy or plan could only be changed by agreement.

The federal government must show leadership here. That is not to say the total responsibility rests with the Government of Canada. I do not believe that. However, it must take the leadership. The governments and the people of the region must have their responsibility as well. Let us have an end to ad hoc federal initiatives and an end to ad hoc demands for federal action on particular problems. They have never amounted to an adequate approach and they certainly do not now. In fact, they are creating a complex of dependence.

I do not suggest that all decisions on projects be postponed until there is agreement on a strategy or plan. Far from it. There are measures in particular sectors that should go forward promptly, ones that would clearly be right and appropriate under any plan. Some of these will be suggested today by colleagues who will follow me in speaking, in the areas of fisheries, development and transportation. These specific measures will be full of merit. Many meritorious suggestions have come forth from the maritime provinces. These specific measures in particular sectors will not be enough in themselves to constitute a coherent and adequate plan to lift the economy of the maritimes and the Atlantic provinces as we want to see done.

The governments must do some pretty fundamental thinking about the total strategy. I am not suggesting one should accept all the doubts created by Professor Courchene and other academics, thoughtful men no doubt. Nevertheless, after ten years of government under the present Prime Minister, eight years of DREE, and after what any fair minded person must qualify at best a very limited success, it is surely time to take a very searching look at what has been going on, what has worked, what has not worked, and what is the trouble.

Because of my strong belief about the need for review, I am happy to see the academics looking at this. I was pleased to see the Economic Council of Canada study regional disparity. It published the findings of its study in a report called "Living Together".

This is not the first time the Economic Council of Canada has taken a very comprehensive and helpful look at this problem. When Mr. Deutsch was chairman of the council in the sixties, the council published a very comprehensive study of the problems of regional disparity in Canada. It is my hope that the new chairman of the Economic Council will keep this great national problem very high on her list of priorities for the council to study.

There seems to be, as I will indicate in a few moments, a substantial difference of opinion between the Economic Council and the Department of Finance, to mention one department. For all I know, there may be a substantial difference of opinion between the council and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It is essential that they all get together to do their thinking and try to come together in their assessment of what needs to be done.

At the time of this report last year, the acting chairman described governmental response to it as "underwhelming". That is the word he used to describe the reaction in government circles. The Economic Council highlighted one factor in its report. It noted that unemployment increases more rapidly in the Atlantic provinces than in other provinces during a national economic recession. Simply put, the report suggested that this means that effective demand falls more in the Atlantic provinces than elsewhere as a result of a national recession. The report made some recommendations. It recommended a joint federal-provincial effort to offset this factor through a fiscal stabilization plan, part of which might involve temporary tax cuts, directed to the Atlantic provinces and not to the rest of Canada.

This is not the only point made by the council in this report, but I was interested to find the council pushing hard the view that during a recession the economy of the Atlantic provinces falls further behind than is the case with respect to the economies in other parts of the country. Whatever one thinks about the solution the Economic Council proposed, its analysis of the problem is very impressive.

We in the maritimes have always felt in our gut that economic depressions or recessions slowed down our growth more than was the case in the rest of Canada; that we were usually the first to be hit and the last to recover, and that any momentum we got going during the upward movement of the economy was destroyed during the recession and became very difficult to restore. If this gut feeling is right, if the analysis made by the Economic Council is right, this explains a good deal of the chronic weakness in the economies of the areas to which I have referred. If national recessions—and they come every few years—have a much greater impact upon the Atlantic region than upon the rest of the country, then the effect becomes cumulative.

After reading this report, I wrote to the minister of finance of that day, now the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), asking what the Department of Finance thought about this point made by the Economic Council and about its proposals to correct the situation. The minister was most responsive and I want to thank him publicly now for his courtesy in replying at length. He wrote me a long letter setting forth the department's reaction.

The department did not accept the council's contention that, because unemployment rises faster in the Atlantic provinces during a national recession, the economies of those provinces are necessarily set back further than they are in the other provinces. It stated that unemployment swings down further during recovery than it does in other provinces—not to a lower point, of course—and that consequently the entire cycle does not hurt the Atlantic economy. The department argued that during national recovery the drop in the rate of unemployment was greater in the Atlantic provinces than in the country at large. The former minister argued, also, that although unemployment rises to a higher point in the eastern provinces during a recession, output does not.

I must say I do not find the department's response to the analysis of the Economic Council very convincing. This may not indicate that the department is wrong, but I find myself still siding with the Economic Council. To my mind it does not explain away the effect of recession on the Atlantic economy. As to the council's proposals to stimulate effective demand and employment by a policy of fiscal stabilization, the department pretty well dismisses it out of hand, on the whole, I thought, with arguments which are reasonably convincing. I am not prepared to make a case for the remedial measures the council proposed.

Toward the conclusion of his letter the former minister wrote:

> It is far from clear that the new approaches proposed by the council offer any net advantage over the approaches already being used in the effort to lessen regional disparities. It may be noted that a number of approaches already in use, including DREE grants and the regionally differentiated investment tax creadit of the last budget involve specific incentives to locate economic activity in the target areas. In general, this seems to us likely to be more effective than less direct approaches.

As I have indicated, I accept his criticism of the solutions proposed by the Economic Council but I have to say that while the hon. member for Rosedale was persuaded that the methods being employed were probably more effective than those proposed by the Economic Council, those methods have not yet shown anything which could be considered hopeful by way of results. I believe the Economic Council drew attention to a very serious problem and that its analysis was significant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: I apologize to the House, Mr. Speaker. I will wind up very shortly. To sum up, we have to examine what has been going on in other departments. We have to insist upon co-operation and co-ordination. We have to pay strict attention to the analysis of the problem put out by the Economic Council. And we must pay attention to something else which was said by the hon. member for Rosedale while he was minister of finance.

> The very fact that such a substantial government effort had to be made in order to achieve results would seem to indicate that there are limits to what the government can accomplish when it moves to counter the economic forces producing regional disparities. I am not saying we could not perhaps do more in this regard, but that we should not expect government policies to completely eliminate regional disparities. For this to occur, the proper conditions must exist in the private sector of the economy.

What does that mean? I thought this was what we were trying to create. I thought we were trying to create proper conditions in the private sector in eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. Was the minister suggesting there is something wrong with attitudes or with the organization of industry in that region of Canada? Was he suggesting there are marketing difficulties? What, in the view of the Department of Finance or of the government generally, are the proper conditions? What are the weaknesses which exist today? I think it is time for frankness. I do not expect the government to commit hara-kiri by saying things which are offensive to the people of that region, but if there is something wrong with existing conditions such as to prevent enterprise from developing in the region, I think it should be discussed.

Of course the classic grievance in the eastern provinces arises from the very shape of the Canadian market which at the present time offers such striking advantages to industry in central Canada. I think we ought to be considering ways of overcoming this situation which has been a significant cause of regional disparity. Unless we can do something to change the shape of the market, the areas we are talking about today will increasingly become colonial economic dependencies of central Canada.

What are the weaknesses in the private sector? Granted, the government cannot do everything itself. My colleagues will be putting forward specific proposals.

● (1552)

In summary, my case is very simple. We have not been successful. By "we" I mean the Government of Canada; the Parliament of Canada; the government, the legislatures, and the people of the areas concerned. We have had very limited success, to the degree we have had any success at all, in confronting these problems over the last decade.

In order to have success we must have a coherent, co-operative, co-ordinated policy. Personally I am not happy. Huge sums are being spent, and the economy is not strengthening. I am not happy when I see the governments in the area I come from becoming increasingly dependent on the federal government, nor the increasing discouragement which I sense there. Not just the federal government, the provincial governments, and the people of the region, but everyone should accept their responsibilities and face reality. The beginning of this process is a review of what is going on. Certainly it includes the whole-hearted co-operation of provincial governments. It requires leadership from the Government of Canada, and that is what I ask for today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in rising to compliment the hon. member, and not wishing to participate in the debate, I use the devise of a point of order, and perhaps it may be a question of privilege. I compliment him on a very well-balanced and thoughtful presentation. He was alluding to me when he made reference to my having indicated my feeling that DREE had failed. In confirming his views on this matter, I want to say that I was speaking in that context in terms of new industry in the area. It was not a blanket denunciation. I am sure the hon. member did not mean it to be in that sense.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, certainly I meant to make it clear that the minister thought DREE had done well in terms of infrastructure, for example, but it had not been a success—and perhaps he used the word failure—in terms of economic development. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, my first words are of course directed to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) whose sense of moderation and responsibility in debating such serious issues I always admire. He almost always shows that attitude anyway, I think, and I believe he considers the economic problems prevailing in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec as a very serious issue.

I wish to congratulate and thank him for having given us the opportunity to discuss regional disparities, the particular economic situation of eastern Quebec the Atlantic provinces, as well as the efforts that have been made, the successes achieved and, above all, the important challenge facing us. I thank him for the opportunity he has given us, Mr. Speaker, and I want the House to know that during the time allotted to me I will try to talk the way he has, that is in a general way at the beginning, but also in a rather selective way as regards what we have done in the past, what we are doing now and what we hope to be able to achieve with the co-operation of the provinces in the coming months and years.

[English]

I welcome the opportunity to speak to this motion, particularly in light of the discussion related to regional policies and regional development which took place at the conference of first ministers. As hon. members know, I participated in a number of the sectoral conferences leading up to the conference of first ministers and was represented by senior officials on the federal delegation to others. The DREE input to these conferences was significant and the DREE presence was widely appreciated, indicating as it did the emphasis which the federal government has been giving, increasingly in recent years, to the regional dimension of policies affecting economic development. This dimension received a good deal of attention at the meeting of finance ministers and at the conference of first ministers itself, where it was represented by a separate item on the agenda. The lead speaker for that item was Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick. I should like to refer to some of the comments he made concerning that particular topic. Page 5 of his statement reads as follows:

Looking beyond the cyclical condition, I think that very significant progress has been made in broadening the economic base in many of the poorer regions. It is this longer term improvement which should permit us to make significant gains once the economy returns to more normal levels.

Let me try to illustrate this for the Atlantic provinces.

One key indicator of the basis for growth in the Atlantic region is the amount of fixed capital stock. There has been an impressive growth in the real level of capital stock. For instance, between 1961 and 1974, total fixed capital in the Atlantic provinces increased at an average annual rate of 9 per cent—almost two percentage points higher than the rate of growth in Ontario.

Before the cyclical downturn, when capacity utilization declined across the country, this investment was reflected in impressive growth in output and employment. For example, from 1966 to 1974, the value of Atlantic manufacturing output grew at an average annual rate of 24 per cent—a full nine points above the national average. Over the same period, Atlantic manufacturing employment increased at an average rate of nearly 2 per cent—almost twice the Canadian average.

With respect to the need for modification to the approach of DREE, he said:

Both the investment tax credit and the recently announced employment tax credit have been designed to provide additional assistance in the DREE designated areas.

He referred to other tools, other means, and other departments becoming involved in fighting disparities. He said:

Programs of the federal government must continue to be increasingly designed with regional development needs in mind. The most important method in achieving a co-ordinated approach to regional development at the present time, however, is that of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Also he said:

We should give DREE a good deal of credit for what it has achieved and we cannot blame regional development policies for the setbacks resulting from cyclical difficulties.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, those were the comments of premier Hatfield which, were taken up again by several other Canadian premiers with slight differences of course. I would like to take this opportunity to deal with part of the motion now under consideration in which the hon. member for Halifax is asking the government to renew its commitment to reduce regional disparities. I would like once again to quote from the press release at the end of the conference which is rather explicit on regional disparities, and I quote:

● (1602)

[English]

First ministers strongly affirmed the importance of reducing regional disparities and the continuing need for review and expansion of programs for regional development, based on the longer-run economic development potential and transportation requirements of each province and region.

It was also agreed that we should continue to be the major federal agency for these purposes. So definitely we have a commitment here by both levels of government to carry on our joint efforts in reducing regional disparities.

[Mr. Lessard.]

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am going to spend a few moments dealing with the Atlantic region which presents enough reasons to concern my department. There are enough on going projects to say a few words about them. When this department was established, we have worked in terms of designated and specially designated areas. It was an approach which at the time was in the line of thoughts of the hon. member for Halifax who recognized the potential and the existence of some centers and poles of growth. Both levels of governments identified some poles of growth and established a program of expansion to create in those places a situation which would stimulate the expansion of businesses. We have witnessed the establishment of such centres in each one of the maritime provinces as well as in Quebec, in the prairie provinces, in Ontario and even in British Columbia.

As the hon. member has pointed out, after a few years this approach has proved to be valuable but it also had weaknesses, as a result of which the efforts of the federal and provincial governments were concentrated in very specific areas within the provinces. The hon. member—and I commend him for his position—has recognized that it was always hard to be selective in that kind of action, that while we recognized the growth potential of some regions, we denied such recognition to other areas of those same provinces.

After spending tens of millions of dollars in these expansion centers over a period of three or four years, we finally realized that by doing so—something the Economic Council of Canada has recognized for that matter—we had in fact contributed to widening the income gap between expansion center residents and people in other areas of these provinces. This had become evident, for instance, in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and indeed in Newfoundland: in St. John's where our expansion center was located, the incomes of the local residents increased much more rapidly than elsewhere in the province, therefore we would constantly receive a great many representations for the implementation of similar programs within these regions and sub-regions. While continuing to provide assistance to the expansion centers which we had identified, we had the opportunity, through the General Development Agreements and subagreements we had with the provinces, to open new areas for development in these subregions.

When the hon. member suggests that we should take a more comprehensive approach and have a master plan for all the Maritimes excluding Newfoundland to which he recognizes a somewhat different status, I fully agree with him in principle. One wonders how it would be done while respecting, of course, the provinces' will and authority as well as the potential and the projects that may be carried out. We thought it could be done by stages. The GDA entered into with each one of the provinces is one step which brings us closer, of course to a consensus among the Atlantic authorities on the need for shared costs programs.

The Council of Maritimes Premiers is helped financially by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The department also supports many projects which are jointly decided upon by the three Atlantic premiers. I believe it is a good start in the right direction. The hon. member has pointed out some difficulties. There has been agreement on some projects we have carried out together, but then there was some disagreement. It is not easy, and the hon. member quite agreed.

Now, to come back to that new framework, known as the general development agreement and subagreements, I feel that we have there a new approach for planning, analysing, identifying and coordinating our work which is by far superior to what we had before. It may not be perfect, as I am the first to admit but it will provide us with an opportunity for better co-ordination between both federal levels of government and later on, various departments.

When I took this portfolio over two years ago, we had just a few subagreements in operation. The House may be interested to know that since the model agreement for development has been signed, we have negotiated and signed, with the provinces of Canada, 78 agreements which were amended in 80 instances. Thus, we have been practically negotiating new agreements all the time or amending existing ones. That process may seem cumbersome and slow, but it is one of joint assessment studies.

It is a planning process, one through which the efforts of several federal departments are co-ordinated with a view to maximizing the impact of federal interventions in various regions through the subagreements I have mentioned. As recently as last week, I signed an agreement with the province of Alberta; we travelled up north in that province, to Fort Vermilion, close to the 60th parallel, and met with officials of that community which, for practical purposes is in a sense the capital of the area where the agreement will be implemented. Two of my colleagues joined me in signing that agreement. And together with the government of Alberta we will be able to deal with problems in the northern part of that province, problems affecting small groups of people, whether they are natives of the area, Indians, Metis or white people. This is a co-ordinated effort. But in three Atlantic provinces as a whole—because Prince Edward Island must always be excluded as it has a very special agreement—we now have 38 agreements that have been signed and already amended 55 times for very substantial amounts touching practically every sector of the economy.

In his last remarks the hon. member asked why, when there is an economic recession, the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec—a good part of Quebec—are always more rapidly and severely affected, and when an upturn occurs only after central Canada has regained strength do the Atlantic regions and Quebec start feeling the beneficial effects. This is a matter that other levels of government neglected and with which we are concerned.

What conditions could be achieved in those provinces so that when we have a recession it would affect the Atlantic region less or at least no more than the other parts of this country? I do not think that any of them are being treated more favourably than the others. But what we would like to try and do is find out how we could develop the economic industrial structure in the Atlantic provinces, as the hon. member pointed out, so that when there are hard times in the international context the same area will not always be the one to be affected.

It is difficult to give an answer to that. We think that by improving various forms of infrastructures—and when my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) referred earlier to the statement he made, of course the first years were not a success from an industrial standpoint. A few gains were recorded. In the case of his province, Newfoundland, our greatest efforts were designed to develop the infrastructure and help the province to manage more efficiently its resources: forestry, the mining sector, energy and particularly hydroelectricity, through existing agreements, and there is quite an impressive list of 13 agreements that have been amended 34 times in the case of Newfoundland, as we want that flexibility to adapt our programs to the opportunities identified by the province itself. We want the province of Newfoundland to develop its potential, and this is also true of every province.

It was recognized that if the economy of Newfoundland was to be strengthened so as to be able to weather bad times, its base should be reinforced. In fact, it had a poor highway system and in many places an inadequate school system, and in some municipalities there was no infrastructure at all.

I think we had many reasons to take some action designed to reinforce the position of those provinces. The economic deterioration of the Atlantic provinces is a trend that developed over a period of at least 50 years or even 100 years. It is obvious that we shall have to develop a long-term strategy to remedy the situation. It will require a sustained and significant effort. And then, of course, we may not agree on the level of funding and financial commitment by the federal government to help Atlantic provinces develop their economies and over come their economic short comings.

I will not deal in depth with the case of Prince Edward Island as my colleague, the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) will have an opportunity to raise that issue and I assume that as a representative of Prince Edward Island, he will be willing to speak about his own province. I will therefore limit my remarks to the three other provinces.

A study of the programs now in place in those three other provinces, namely Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, shows that we are now working to develop their forest resources. We have set up procedures to carry out inventories, analyses and careful identification of these resources, and to build access roads and carry out a reforestation program.

Finally, we have helped establish what has been commonly referred to as forest resources management in those three provinces. It did not exist previously or at least if it did, it was very fragmentary. This is an extremely important resource for those provinces and I think we had to tackle these problems and try to develop their potentials.

In other provinces, more particularly in New Brunswick and Newfoundland, we noted that the road ways were run down. In Nova Scotia we conducted three or four major studies on that issue. We found that the situation in Newfoundland is particularly serious. Over the past five years in particular, we kept pouring money in to improve the road infrastructures in that province and provide means for the development and transportation of those resources. This required large amounts of money.

Mr. Speaker, I could mention several other areas. Tourism is a resource that we are now developing after identifying several sectors. In the province of New Brunswick, for instance, 15 existing agreements have been amended 28 times. This shows the flexibility of our approach. We want to be able to plan with the province. Our aim, perhaps on the rather long term, is to achieve a comprehensive planning and recognize the specific nature and advantages of each province.

It is very important to capitalize on the real advantages that exist in these provinces since it may be dangerous to establish industries there which have no affinity with the area. We have tried this approach and it has failed. We have had certain failures, but we have also had some success. There is, for instance, the case of the Michelin company in Nova Scotia. This is an obvious example of a major intervention on the part of the government which has been and still is completely successful. However, there have been other interventions which were not as successful, and we recognize this.

We have the honesty to admit making mistakes occasionally, we recognize that situations have changed. We are not the only ones to have made mistakes, the province too and the private interests which suggested these projects, invested in them and also suffered major losses. It is therefore through the joint efforts of both levels of government, the private sector and the people in the area that we shall be able to gradually correct the real weaknesses of the economic structure of the Atlantic provinces. At first, we must depend on the resources, we must of course depend on the people and we must also consider future possibilities. In view of the 200-mile limit, fisheries have a fantastic potential, but we must not go too fast because we have things to do and we must do them by stages.

Because of its geographical position, Newfoundland is the province which has direct access to this resource. We are also aware of this potential, and my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) is also well aware of this potential, of certain difficulties, of certain prerequisites for an effective management of this resource, both in the short and in the long term, because it requires substantial investments on the part of the governments and the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, we could dwell a long time on what the department has done. I shall not mention any amount of money because that would be the easy way out. The statistics are available to everyone, and I shall not refer to them because I think there is something much more fundamental in the concern we should have today, namely how to co-ordinate our efforts to be able to develop the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

I see the hon. member from Cape Breton. He will take the floor later. Of course, he will refer to the problems of the province of Nova Scotia, and to those of Cape Breton in particular. He knows my concerns very well. He is very well aware of the objectives we are trying to pursue and to fulfill at the present time. He knows very well that in the last few months we made certain decisions. We helped SYSCO to modernize. We see results. We hope that some of the things indicated to us will be confirmed and we can reasonably have some hope in that respect.

As to the energy potential which coal offers to the province of Nova Scotia, which depended so much on oil for its energy, this is obviously a fantastic asset, but we have to act according to our possibilities. Studies are being carried out and we hope they will confirm the possibility of developing a new mine sooner or later. We have been told that the reserves were substantial but a number of aspects regarding the ore contents and characteristics are still to be determined. This will be done soon but we can already assume that in the next years important investments will be made in the energy field of the Atlantic provinces because they have potential resources which will bring along, not only on a short term basis but also on a long term basis, a prosperity which has been absent for too long, although it was there unexploited in our soil, but absent in the way that it did not bring any additional wealth to maritime residents and communities.

Furthermore, the conference indicated that very soon we intended to tackle two or three projects. Several plans have already been publicized and the government has been blamed for not presenting concrete plans or proposals to the conference. We wanted all premiers attending the conference to co-operate, to have a say in the decision taking process and to identify with us the potentialities of each province. We have reached our objectives and I refer to the press release, although it gives just a part of our future decisions which will be considered by both levels of government during the next months on a number of items now under study as regards our responsibilities, on the federal side, and also the joint responsibilities of both levels of government.

I see that time is flying by, Mr. Speaker, and that you will probably ask me shortly to resume my seat. However, I would like to assure hon. members of one thing, namely that I am still pursuing the research with my officials and that I am consulting outside experts. The hon. member for Halifax referred to the Economic Council of Canada and to its report Living Together which I have read, believe me. I have discussed it. I agree with parts of it, I am not quite convinced about others but I do not necessarily reject them. I agree with some criticisms which were made, or with some positive suggestions to the effect that we should develop new tools or new means of intervention besides those which are available to DREE. Obviously we have not used up all the means of intervention, and I hope that during the next months or weeks we will have the opportunity to see new methods added to the arsenal of tools we now have to fight disparities. We have seen a regionalization of unemployment insurance benefits, as well as a regionalization of investment credits.

The unemployment tax credit has been regionalized. This did not come by accident, it resulted from analyses and recommendations from my department as well as discussions with my colleagues so that gradually we draft our legislation on line with the plans of the Department of Finance. I believe we succeeded in breaching the wall. The principle is that fiscal policies must pay special attention to the regions. I agree completely with the hon. member for Halifax when he said we have yet to use the fiscal instrument to its full extent. I considered many suggestions which had been put forward. I have a few ideas which I have discussed and which I continue to advocate. I hope they will be accepted, maybe not completely but in part, but they all convey recognition of a need for intervention through a national policy on a regional basis.

That is why the Prime Minister wanted DREE to participate in all those sectorial conferences in order to take into account that regional aspect in all sectorial policies. I was quite happy because my role in the federal government must be to ensure that all my colleagues in all departments are aware of the regional impact of their policy. Maybe we made some mistakes in the past and we are probably still making some. Maybe some decisions do not recognize enough that regional need but may I say that in our department, there are clear—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse the House's courtesy. Since I have taken all this time to speak of the Atlantic provinces, I would now like to say a few words about Quebec where serious problems are also known to exist. There are also a number of agreements in force in Quebec, nine which have been amended 17 times. They are significant and their content is more substantial than their number indicates. Sometimes I hear criticisms, as I did this week from Quebec authorities, that not enough money is being spent in Quebec on a per capita basis, and it is a fact our spending per capita is not very high in Quebec, despite what is said in certain quarters. In actual dollars, however, more money is being spent in Quebec than in other provinces. But it must be realized that in Quebec the population is very large, relatively speaking. Nevertheless the essential factor to look at is the kind of projects we are involved in.

In that province as elsewhere, we are involved in resources. Mr. Bérubé, the Minister of Forests who is responsible for resources, forests in particular, was complaining Wednesday morning of a lack of support. I do not believe he is absolutely right because two agreements were signed, dealing precisely with forests. Substantial amounts have been appropriated, more than $80 million to help develop Quebec's forests. There are other substantial amounts. More than $100 million have also been appropriated for highway upgrading. We have funds earmarked for the promotion of large industries. Recently we signed an agreement for the development of industrial infrastructures for which we will be paying $46 million over and above the $36 million already invested.

We have stepped in in a rather vigorous way to help Quebec's economy, and I cannot let go unchallenged suggestions that DREE does not contribute its full share. Maybe more can be done. We will try to allocate more funds for specific projects, and I hope that during the coming weeks, the coming months, I hope to be able to get involved in specific problems and still do more in Quebec, because I recognize that an 11 per cent rate unemployment is quite intolerable. But we are prepared to do all we can provided we get the co-operation of the province of Quebec which is extremely important. I would like to point out that if Quebec would co-operate to the same extent as the other provinces, things would go much more smoothly. Ultimatums are not always the right approach.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: The separatist is rising.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, would the minister answer a question? He says that there is a lack of co-operation between the Quebec government and the federal government as regards the funds available in his department. I remember very well that on November 15, 1976, the minister stated that he would be cautious when the time came to negotiate the investment of his department's money in Quebec. Consequently, is the minister himself not responsible for creating the climate he mentioned this afternoon?

Mr. Boulanger: You are undermining the créditiste party. Join the PQ.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I asked the unanimous consent of the House for extended time for the minister. Therefore, if the minister is ready to answer the question, I will accept it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: On this particular point, I could very well answer. If the hon. member examines the agreements I have signed since November 16, 1976, he will see that the moneys appropriated for Quebec projects are substantially higher than those allocated to the previous government, which prompted the Quebec minister in charge of the negotiations to brag that he had squeezed more money out of the federal government, out of DREE, than the previous government. It is just the opposite of what the hon. member has just stated.

Mr. Matte: The minister just said that it didn't work; it proves that it works!

Mr. Lessard: With regard to some actual proposals that are now under study and about which there have been complaints of delays, as I have said before, the Quebec government lays down conditions that are unacceptable to my department; what I do not accept from other provinces, I cannot accept from Quebec. These conditions are unacceptable for a very important reason, because the legislation does not allow me to accept them. This creates a major problem, as the hon. member can realize.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by saying that as far as Quebec is concerned, we have come forward with infrastructures as part of our ongoing auxiliary agreements which, for the federal government, now represent commitments amounting to well over $1,200 million. Some of these commitments will be spread out over the next few years. I will now make reference to industrial assistance, and I insist on dealing with that point because I know that for some of our colleagues, that aspect is more actual, more visible, especially since, as far as Quebec is concerned, that amount is proportionately larger compared to other provinces.

Every year, Quebec companies request assistance under the act providing for assistance to industries. Since Quebec has a greater number of industries, more applications inevitably are received from that province, and because of that we have to provide positive answers to a larger number of applications and, consequently, we spend more money there. It is thus normal that it be so, but if we look at the total commitments of the DREE in Quebec, I do not feel that hon. members from other parts of Canada should have any reason to say that the DREE is investing all of its money in Quebec. It is not true. We strive to balance things out. I think that we are trying to give a positive answer to all sensible applications we receive from all parts of Canada.

I should also like to conclude by saying that, last June, we designated Montreal as a special zone, effective on July 1. There again, people suggested that this system was an exercise in futility, that it did not yield the expected results. I just want to give you the figures, for I think they are significant. Since that program was implemented on February 9, we received 266 applications from private enterprises requesting assistance to expand, update or simply go into business. Of the total number of applications, decisions were made in 103 cases. Sixty-eight offers have already been forwarded to different firms. About 40 of them filed a positive answer, and the fact that the others have 90 days to reply to our proposal may account for certain delays. But everything is doing fine now, and if all those projects were to be carried out, 65 of those proposals, for instance, would require total investments of up to $50 million which would create 1,800 jobs, an end result achieved with the assistance of our total commitments of $9,500,000.

Many projects are now under consideration. In our files in Montreal, there are projects which would cost approximately $700 million if they were all implemented. Of course, companies submit proposals which are studied, some are accepted, others are not, and in some cases they are withdrawn by the companies themselves. The complexity of this situation must be realized. I feel optimistic about the future. We will keep on promoting Quebec's economic development, we will keep on responding positively in most cases to the Quebec government's proposals as far as possible, and I am sure that in the next months, the next years, if only the Quebec government will co-operate, we will manage to lower the unemployment rate in Quebec, but it is not a federal responsibility only. I think that to create a climate favourable to investment, is also a prime responsibility of the provincial government in office. I believe that on that score the Quebec government has not always done its best in the last few months, it has not always made the appropriate statements, and judging by some statements made by the premier himself, it is certainly not the way to attract industrial investments. But we still hope there will be some, there will certainly be some investments, and we will keep on promoting the economic development of the province of Quebec, as well as the Atlantic provinces, the western provinces, the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

● (1632)

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) for introducing this motion today. Both the hon. member for Halifax and the minister in charge of DREE made reference to efforts in the past.

We had the hon. member for Halifax making the statement that, in his opinion, the economy of the Atlantic region is relatively weaker in real terms than it was ten years ago. The minister, in an apparent attempt to meet this criticism, quoted from a statement made by the Conservative premier of New Brunswick, and he used statistics which I do not think proved his case at all. He started from a base of 1961 to 1974 and used percentage figures. That proves nothing except that he started from a lower base with his criteria, especially the criteria of fixed investment in the Atlantic region.

Then the minister made the remarkable statement that Mr. Hatfield said that if it was not for the general down-turn in the business cycle the Atlantic region would be better off. Any high school can tell him that. But this has been a traditional policy and part and parcel of the private capital market system under which we all operate. Even though it is a mixed one today because of government intervention, which was made necessary because of the decline of that system at the time of the depression in the 1930s, we have a situation in which this imbalance is built into the scheme of things. In a federal state it gives protection to the private sector in the centre of the country. When aggregate demands and the total economy keeps going down until we have a national recession, the overflow in terms of the outer region, and especially the Atlantic region, makes us that much worse off.

In that debate I would have to side strongly with the hon. member for Halifax on theoretical, empirical, and historical grounds. The problem is that there is a recession in Canada lasting for four years. Conditions are unquestionably, in my opinion, much worse in the Atlantic procinces, than they were ten years ago, as the member for Halifax states. We know, as the minister pointed out, that the main emphasis of DREE in the Atlantic region was to support what was called a growth centre theory of development.

There are acceptable theories of development ranging from what is called an export base or an economic based theory by which exports from your area should exceed imports. By looking at a nation as a region, then we as a nation have followed this in our line of development. Most of our development has been in staple products to the neglect of a manufacturing sector that could be viable and competitive.

At one time we put too much stress on the staple primary products and at the same time over-protected the secondary manufacturing sector. The secondary manufacturing sector now cannot stand the gaff of international competition. Everyone is surprised that there is low productivity. They try to blame it on wage rates and so on. The biggest cause of the lack of productivity in this country is the built-in protection that is constantly there as a hidden subsidy to central Canada manufacturers. It's called a tariff. Therefore, it is not surprising that the Atlantic region is badly off.

● (1642)

To be fair to DREE, they did move into the growth areas which are the centres of government, namely Halifax in Nova Scotia, St. John's in Newfoundland, Charlottetown in Prince Edward Island and Fredericton in New Brunswick, with an overflow into Saint John which is coupled with the growth of the port in that metropolitan area. The result is very serious for outlying areas.

Recently DREE issued a document on one-industry towns and similar types of areas. It gives due recognition to these areas, but it is only a first step.

I wish to underline the disparity noted by the hon. member for Halifax, and agreed to by the minister, between growth areas in the Atlantic region and the outlying areas. For example, in 1971, the disparity between the Halifax-Dartmouth area and the Canadian average for Canada in terms of per capita income for that area of Nova Scotia was 75 per cent of the national average. That gap has been rapidly closing and it is now closer to 85 or 90 per cent. In Cape Breton, where Sydney is the largest city, the rate was 56 per cent. In Glace Bay it was 48 per cent, and in New Waterford 46 per cent. That is according to 1971 census statistics, the only ones available. This type of information was not gathered during the 1976 census. The trend is there.

If we are going to close the gap, the allocation of human and financial resources will have to be diverted to these areas. They will have to be diverted to northern New Brunswick, the outlying areas of Newfoundland and the outlying areas of Nova Scotia. As the minister noted, Prince Edward Island is a special case because of the small geographic area and the compactness of the product markets, and the labour markets.

I do not want to criticize DREE unduly. However, it is long past time that they zeroed in on these tough areas rather than tackling the relatively easy areas in which development would occur naturally under the growth of government at the provincial level. Now is the time, I repeat, to use the financial and human resources to develop these outlying areas. Opportunities within those regions must be identified so that solid development can take place. There must be government encouragement in the way of incentives, grants and so on. It can be done.

We can look to the example of Scotland, and of parts of England and Wales. As the minister noted, this would be very difficult as well as expensive. Over a long period of time they developed areas that had been considered hopeless from the point of view of being developed. The Labour government started this regional development policy. It has not been a total success, but it has been a major effort toward closing the gaps in employment and income in that nation.

A long term look must be taken at the primary resources in the Atlantic region. As the minister stated, there is a 200-mile fishing zone. Most of us hope that consideration will soon be given to a 50-mile zone for inshore fishing. This should be done after the stocks have been built up.

We must not make the mistakes that have been made in the past. This is a prime case of a region being neglected. There has been a lack of policy by the federal and provincial governments with regard to a resource that was once looked down upon as something that was only good enough for the Newfies, the humble cod. We now know this fishery has immense potential.

Oceanographic possibilities in the Atlantic region have to some extent been recognized by the establishment of the Bedford Institute of Technology in Halifax. It is part and parcel of the whole picture. However, we have to develop more species of fish. Once the stocks are again running true to nature, we cannot just sit back without proper management and care of that resource. That would be neglecting an important part of the national economy, the Atlantic region. It has been neglected in the past as a result of failures of governments.

I can understand the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) finding it difficult to understand exactly what the maritime premiers want. Although the experts are not agreed on this, there seems to be general agreement that we are entering into an era of oil shortages, if not in the physical sense then in the sense that it will be extremely costly. Therefore we should not allocate too much of our natural resources to building huge airports and airplanes.

● (1652)

When one considers the extent to which the operating costs of Air Canada have increased in the past few years due to increases in the price of fuel alone, one wonders how much planning has really gone into the future of transportation—I have in mind the movement of goods and people from 1990 on, well into the next century. We ought to be putting a far greater proportion of our resources into the development of railroads. We ought to be improving the rail beds and bringing up to date the equipment used in railway maintenance and improvement. This will all be necessary from a very practical point of view.

Alberta coal will be desperately needed in Central Canada ten or more years from now. Coal both from the east and the west will be urgently required by the Ontario steel plants and utilities. At the moment they feel secure because they have captive mines in the United States. But that coal will sooner or later run out and our own supplies are at the extremities of the country, on the west coast and on the east coast. The steel industry and the utilities, I repeat, will need that coal, so the rail lines through central Canada will need to be rebuilt. They must be rebuilt from Cape Breton Island through to Montreal and Toronto. This would do a lot, in the process, to help the hard-pressed steel industry in Nova Scotia.

The minister mentioned the recent help given to SYSCO. I was bitterly disappointed at the government's failure to take over that Sydney steel plant when it set up the Cape Breton Development Corporation after the private profit corporation, Hawker Siddeley, walked out on us. Enough studies have now been completed to justify the formation of a special body which would ask the question seriously: is there any hope of building a billion dollar industry down there which would have such a spin-off as to effect not only Cape Breton Island but Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, well into the next century? Nobody is studying such a proposition seriously. The government is content to provide dribs of assistance here and there, guaranteed loans, such as the $70 million to the Sydney steel plant and so on, is an effort to patch things up while the provincial government lumbers along running the plant inefficiently and going into the hole.

That isn't the way to use the taxpayers' money or the resources of this nation. It is not a question of ideology. The fact is, private enterprise has gone in there, communities were built up, and an infrastructure provided. Workers, along with their families, moved to these communities in large numbers. What will be our answer to the threat to this social pattern? When will we be prepared to ask ourselves the question: is it or is it not economically possible under government auspices, with proper management, to build an international, competitive steel plant in the Atlantic region? When will we let the people know, once and for all, what is in store? We cannot act simply as politicians all the time thinking of the short run. That is the lesson of the first ministers' conference. The purposes of this country continue beyond four years. Many of the problems which face us today are those from decisions made by other groups of politicians in the past and taken with only short term advantage in mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT STRATEGIES FOR EASTERN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government must now renew its commitment to reduce regional disparities by developing and implementing without further delay comprehensive development strategies for eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces including such areas as transportation, energy, primary resources, industrial and service sector expansion.

Mr. Hogan: I thank hon. members for allowing me an extra few minutes. A great deal has already been said on the subject of energy, and I am sure much more will be said by hon. members like the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) with regard to energy development in the Atlantic region based on Fundy tides and the increasing use of our coal reserves both in the east and in Alberta.

The minister did mention coal. The potential for this form of energy in Nova Scotia was written off in the short run some years ago. But that was before the Arabs came out of their tents and formed the OPEC monopoly. The situation now is that a great deal of money will have to be spent on the development of our coal resources since there are literally billions of tons of coal in this country which can either be burned or put to other commercial uses. The primary need, in the east, is for $16 million to be spent in Glace Bay refurbishing a coal mine, No. 26, which produces coal of the highest grade with only a very low sulphur content. Indeed, conditions are right at the present time for the reopening of two further collieries. Even though we still need DREE, I would make the following suggestions, bearing in mind the constraints we face in the need to get elected or re-elected every few years and the fact that governments cannot hope to achieve much success by short term solutions which are often not solutions at all.

In the long run, a new institution is needed to probe deeply into the actual and potential resource base of the Atlantic region. I am referring to the physical, primary resource base, excluding the manufacturing and service sectors. As I have mentioned before, some of this is ongoing at the present time in specialized agencies such as the Oceanographic Institute at Bedford in Halifax.

It would be worth while to consider having a body composed of permanent members of the Science Council of Canada, representatives of the Secretariat of Maritime Premiers, a representative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Maritimes Chambers of Commerce. These members could be appointed on a biannual or triannual basis. Also there should be representatives from labour federations of Atlantic Canada, as well as one or two members from the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. Also there should be one or two members from the Atlantic universities as such. It would be strictly a non-political body. Both the federal and provincial governments would provide funds. Its major function would be to examine in depth long term technical and economic feasibilities for maritimes primary resource development. Its secondary function would be to attempt to improve the co-ordination of present existing long range federal and provincial policies for development of the Atlantic region. I propose that such an institution be called "The Atlantic Provinces Research and Study Institute for Long Term Development of Atlantic Canada's Primary Resources".

I make that suggestion because it is in that direction that our future prosperity lies in the Atlantic region, despite the fact the other sectors have a relatively important part to play in our future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) for the very interesting motion which he has moved. It deals with actual present-day problems. I am very much concerned about the problems in the Atlantic provinces, as they are similar to the ones we have on the south shore. This is the reason why I want to congratulate the hon. member for the thrust of his motion in dealing with these specific problems.

The population of the constituency of Bellechasse, which I have the honour to represent in this House, represents 1.37 per cent of the overall population of Quebec. And yet, the manufacturing sector accounts for only .75 per cent of the whole of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, this question of regional disparities has to do with the inadequacy of industrial development which does not allow people to find jobs or earn a normal living in their own province. On the other hand, while 1.8 per cent of Quebec's factories are located in the constituency of Bellechasse, only 0.8 per cent of the factory workers are employed there.

The fact that most industries, in this area, are not big plants but small and medium-sized companies accounts for this disparity. Industries prefer being located closer to our larger cities and to the large North American markets. They could hardly be blamed because in the present state of things, those industries seek primarily to minimize their costs and we know that freight rates would only add to the manufacturing cost of their products and make them less competitive.

A logical solution to this problem would be to grant a special transport subsidy to companies which would be ready to move to outlying areas, far from our major centres. That would be one way of eliminating one of the factors contributing to the concentration of industries in already well-developed areas.

Earlier I heard the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) mention the many benefits that have already been made available. I agree that this led to improvements but the evidence shows that it was not enough. I thank him for what has already been done but I ask him to do even more. If we have intensive development we will be able to maintain in our areas at least the level of population we now have and this will make it easier to lighten the burden of public expenditures for those who must live in those areas. The more people we have, the fairer the distribution.

In a given region it is important and logical to look for industries which have historically been related to it but which have experienced difficult times over the years. An example that comes to mind is the Davie Ship Building yards in Lauzon which have been a large employer in my area for a long time; even if it is in Lauzon many workers from the ridings of Bellechasse and Montmagny earn their living there.

In think an expansion of the yard in Lauzon would provide many jobs so the people in that area would be able to get organized, be more economically active and have less need to fall back on governments to remain afloat. Last week I heard the motion of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) urging the government to give very special attention to the possibility of establishing a Canadian merchant marine. It is not the first time this matter is being raised in the House.

I too had an opportunity to introduce a motion along those lines. I think the last time I introduced such a motion was last Monday when I urged the House to set up a special committee to consider the advantages of using the millions of dollars we are now paying in the form of subsidies for building ships, very often to foreign businesses. This has an advantage. The government has done its best with this policy to protect the level of employment, and in 1976-77, the government paid $65 million in grants to 45 companies. $65 million is quite a lot of money. If we tried to use part of this sum to develop a merchant marine, we would also create employment, but at the same time we would be giving Canada a very important economic tool.

I remember reading a few years ago that at a certain time Canada was the third largest owner of merchant ships in the world. I wonder why we did not continue to support our merchant marine which made us dependent upon foreign companies for our coastal trade. This is certainly a profitable industry since I have never known one of those foreign companies to go bankrupt. They buy ships, they rebuild them, make them seaworthy and then they have a profitable transportation trade.

With regard to the mode of transportation to which I alluded earlier, I have already suggested in the House that a study be made on the transportation of goods by truck or rail between the most easterly point of the country and Montreal to find out what are the actual difficulties and why companies are not able to continue their operations let alone to expand. Under Bill C-11 tax benefits of 7½ per cent are provided for companies in the maritimes and the Gaspé area, but the South Shore area, which also needs this assistance was forgotten. The 7½ per cent benefit was increased to 10 per cent, but still, all the South Shore companies were forgotten even though they greatly need this assistance. I once again bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) so that he may make representations to his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who could perhaps amend Bill C-11 to allow these companies to take advantage of these tax benefits.

Mr. Speaker, a while ago I heard the minister quote the agreements made with the provinces, including the province of Quebec, and the benefits involved. I am very happy about this and I would like these means of communication between the various levels of governments to continue and to improve. However, Mr. Speaker, since we have a very high level of unemployment in our area, I believe that the time has come to extend these agreements or to draw up a special agreement for the South Shore area. Yesterday, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) what progress had been made in the negotiations concerning the transfer of certain communication wharves between Ottawa and Quebec. He was somewhat reluctant to give me an answer. Today, the situation has improved and I have been assured that exchanges are going on and that results will soon be achieved. There again, if there was an agreement to help speed up the building of communication wharves and upgrade them, jobs could be created, while capital projects were being carried out and a problem solved. In Montmagny, in the cove, and I am sure the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion knows what I am talking about, there is an tremendous location to build a marina. People have wanted a marina there for years, and nature has provided us with all those opportunities.

Therefore I hope that with Bill C-2 introduced by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), it would be possible to achieve that objective. But as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion put it so well a moment ago, it often takes the co-operation of two, three or four departments to succeed in achieving an objective. So, while building that marina, it would also be necessary to provide for new highway programs in order to allow easier access to it and to develop the tourist industry, which would be of great benefit not only to the city of Montmagny but also to the whole area.

There is another suggestion I would like to make. Bellechasse is a very beautiful riding. When you travel south to the U.S. border, you see beautiful mountains there and it would be possible to set up a flourishing tourist industry in that area. Farming cannot be further developed and I do not believe we should leave that immense territory unused. Today I received a letter once again from a local resident who asked me if there was a program of federal assistance to help entrepreneurs put up businesses and breed fish by building small dams across the rivers. This would not only create employment directly and allow local people to get involved but it would mean producing goods and selling them. That is the way to create industries and jobs. Of course I had to answer that such a program did not exist at the moment but there is nothing stopping us from implementing one in the future.

So, I think it would be possible to develop that kind of program in that area which would benefit economically, financially and socially. I also wish to draw the minister's attention to the crucial problem of the textile industry. There are textile plants in our area. Again this week I received a brief from three textile companies asking me to press for more specific protection measures. This brief mentioned not the Kennedy Round but the Tokyo Round. I was also sent a newspaper article entitled: "Investments in the United States, Joblessness in Canada." This report is supported by figures showing that this is absolutely true. We should negotiate better trading terms and conditions to protect those industries which are no more inefficient than the others. They have all the facilities to produce. They have good equipment, modern looms and the quality of their product is excellent. However, they have difficulty to make ends meet. But they manage to survive. Salaries are not high but adequate. Of course, it might be cheaper to live on the other side of the border, I do not know, I have never lived there but subsidized transportation and tax cuts would help them tremendously. This is why I ask that this area be included among those who will receive tax rebates; it would help enormously.

• (1722)

Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I would also like to quote from an article published in the February 9 issue of Le Devoir. It says: "Provinces invited to increase deficit". This was at the very centre of the federal-provincial conference that was held earlier this week: each government wants to do great things, each one is extremely willing, but none has enough revenues to meet its responsibilities. That is why the Prime Minister is reported to have said: "The provinces should increase their deficit". But our national deficit will reach the $9 billion mark this year, and this is an increase of $5 billion over last year's deficit which was of $4 billion. All these governments, both at the federal and provincial levels, are caught in a vicious cycle, to say the least. What does the future hold in store for us? We are not accumulating these enormous debts because of any war nor because of any natural catastrophe. How is it that competent and intelligent Canadian management ends up advocating such methods or solutions for Canadian financing in 1978?

Mr. Speaker, we must call a spade a spade: a $9 billion deficit is tantamount to an indebtedness imposed upon our future generations. But if we have a $9 billion deficit, we must borrow money somewhere to write it off. That is why I feel this is our big chance. We must take advantage of our economic and financial difficulties and carry out a reform of our methods of financing the public sector. Never will I relent on this issue, for I am convinced that this reform is a necessity, and as long as we do not get it done, we shall get deeper and deeper into debt. We shall be dragging down with us the provinces, the municipalities, the school boards, and also, indirectly, the Canadian taxpayers who will have to pay higher rates and higher taxes in order to pay up the interests on these debts which are increasing at a frightening pace.

As a matter of fact, the purpose of Bill C-390 which is now before the House is to increase the powers of the Bank of Canada. Which way? Precisely to prevent us from getting deeper into debt next year by another $9 billion, but how? Nobody knows. I, for one, recommend that the Bank of Canada Act be amended to make it possible for the Bank of Canada to grant long-term loans to the federal government. We would undertake to refund these loans to the Bank of Canada in the same way as we refund other loans to our other creditors, but at least, we would be owing that money to ourselves, because the Bank of Canada is ours. In this way, we would be borrowing from our own institution moneys which we would then have to reimburse, but not at the high interest rates that we are required to pay now.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy to take part in this opposition day debate since the subject is most interesting for all Canadians and especially for those living in our own areas of the country with which we are particularly concerned. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). I am quite happy to participate in this debate because it gives me a chance to speak in this House on a subject which concerns me very much and which is of vital interest to Quebec, that is, regional disparities.

Furthermore, I am honored to echo the well thought-out statement made earlier by the former leader of my party, the hon. member for Halifax, a man who has been denouncing and fighting regional disparities throughout his career, both on the provincial and federal scene. If we had listened more to him at that time, perhaps our country would not be today in so much trouble and difficulty, because the hon. member for Halifax has been talking about discussion, cooperation and consultation for a long time.

I also wish to add a few remarks to the speech made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). He acknowledge, much to my pleasure, the objectivity of the statements and proposals made by the hon. member for Halifax. He also acknowledged some valid recommendations, ad I know that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is able to do this with enough objectivity. He also mentioned the federal provincial conference where a great many good intentions were shown. He spoke of the co-operation that is essential with the provinces and with Quebec, and demonstrated, of course, his good will with regard to the efforts his government is willing to make, in view of the problems we know.

I should also like to point out that his department is in fact directly involved in the interests of several ridings, of which mine that benefited from a subsidiary agreement granting it special privileges related to certain investments taking into account the type of industries that may be entitled to those subsidies. I understand, of course, that it would probably have been impossible for all types of industries to benefit from them. Recently I was very happy to learn that a $1 million agreement was signed with the province of Quebec, through which my riding will benefit from an infrastructure for an industrial park that is already quite well installed, but still needs money to attract more industry.

So, Mr. Speaker, I really do not question the good faith or good will of the minister. Before him, when the department was set up, there were times, to my mind, when it was not as well intentioned as the minister seemed to explain to us today. I am sure that because of the situation, the federal government feels compelled to do more consulting and be more understanding of the provinces.

Now, I should like to say a few words about the federal-provincial conference. The minister responsible stressed the importance of speaking the truth, and I feel, it must be spoken in the House. I say this in a positive vein. I should therefore like to invite him, particularly, and knowing that he is capable of doing so, to show more interest than ever before in the province in which I live, as many others do, and especially, not to allow himself to be influenced by some of his colleagues who, whether we like it or not, Mr. Speaker, at times have some difficulty in accepting the recommendations of the Quebec government.

The minister pointed out the dramatic situation in which the province of Quebec finds itself. He recognized, I believe, the importance of giving it a hand. I think it is the duty of the government, of his department, and like him, I have surely no hesitation in promoting a sincere co-operation and consultation and also in urging that province to keep within the limits and criteria set in the legislation. We should seriously consider the possibility of showing to the people in Quebec that the economic climate can and should be restored with the co-operation of the federal government. I am quite pleased to see that the minister has stressed that co-operation so much and I feel that he has truly shown its good faith.

Once again I invite him to exert his influence on some of his colleagues who may not show the same objectivity as he does or may not be able as he is to overcome sectarian opinions to take a real interest in the welfare and legitimate aspirations of the province of Quebec. I am confident that the minister will be able to fulfil the commitments he has taken today and, as a Quebecker, I hope he will do so and I am going to do my best to invite the government and the people of Quebec to show the same goodwill in order to promote the industrial development which has been so badly missed by the people of Quebec until now.

In another vein, Mr. Speaker, in the opening speech the Prime Minister delivered at the conference on Monday, he said at the very beginning that Canadians felt concerned about our present situation and, in the same breath, he added that the unemployment and inflation rates will soon be brought to an acceptable level and that the economic recovery was already well under way, that the conference was the beginning of a continuing consultation between the federal government and the provinces and that, all in all, everything was going well in the best of worlds.

Mr. Speaker, I have never seen the government so open to this type of consultation and good will. We must nevertheless ask ourselves: how is it that in the last ten years we have not felt this deep desire for co-operation and consultation with the provinces such as we have seen in the last few days. They chose to let the provinces choke, and then call up on them to make recommendations, suggestions. However, I have followed closely the federal-provincial conference where the government, echoing some well-known publicity slogans, simply asked the provinces: Now, what can we do for you? Ottawa is on your side and it's good for you. We hardly accept newspaper reports suggesting that for some premiers such a campaign had a pre-election flavour to it. We cannot accept that this idea may have come through their minds!

Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that this conference should not have taken place, as there are rumours about forthcoming elections. Yet I think, like many others, that it should have been held a year ago. Either the government did not hold it last year because it was not aware of the dangers threatening us and of the urgent need for such a conference, which seems to indicate irresponsibility or incompetence, or the government realized that on the eve of general elections it had better get the provinces together and present them with problems that he was already aware of, and know would grow worse, because in this way, the federal government knew it could expect a more favourable response to the well intentioned proposals it had been making over these past three days.

I nevertheless hope that the present co-operative spirit shown by the provinces will be matched by a serious effort of coordination on the part of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, to be truthful, we must admit that it is some sort of a farce when the prime minister feels all he has to do is state that the economic recovery is already under way, which I am not so sure about. I am inclined to think that there has been a wanton abuse of words and media coverage for electoral purposes. The truth is that Canadians are concerned and have every reason to be, even though those concerns were played down at the conference. What is not true is as the present government would have us believe that the people's concern is due to the wickedness of the government's opponents and propagated by the negative remarks of the media in search of striking headlines.

The fact, Mr. Speaker, is that there are over a million unemployed in Canada and it is not the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who is saying that, or even some premier, but Statistics Canada. It is even so much of a fact that according to impartial observers, unemployment went beyond the size of a problem to become some kind of a national disgrace. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, inflation has reached the 9 per cent level which is much higher than in the United States and one of the highest among developed countries, although controls were established in 1975. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had laughed them off when our party advocated them during the 1974 campaign, but he later implemented them, too late however and without adequate consultation, without an overall plan arrived at with the provinces and interested sectors. Those same inadequate controls that let inflation reach its current level, are to be lifted on April 14, and we may wonder what will happen then. The fact also is that according to the Economic Council of Canada our economy, although capable of sustaining a 5 per cent annual growth, only attained half that goal last year. Forecasts by economists outside the government are to the effect that we will not do much better in 1978. The fact is, that today some 18 per cent of our producing capacity is unused; however the government is sufficiently wrapped up in its bureaucratic red tape to suggest that we should avoid too hasty a recovery for fear that it might revive inflation. The fact is also, Mr. Speaker, that last year we paid out in unemployment insurance benefits alone more than $4 billion while during that same period we lost at least $7 billion in potential production Canadians could have put out had they had jobs. Another fact is that our Canadian dollar is faltering, our exports are declining, our balance of payments is increasing at an alarming rate, our budget deficits are getting bigger and bigger, our national debt on a per capita basis continues to increase and reliable sources throughout the world are beginning to cast doubts about the Canadian government's economic capability. In the meantime investors at home have lost confidence for at least four years, they are investing more and more abroad, consumers themselves have become diffident and purchases are on a constant decline. Such are the facts, Mr. Speaker. What concerns the Canadian people at this time is this government's economic performance. Mind you, we might as well be prepared because it is against this background that lies the shape of things to come.

Some businessmen might be impressed by such a management of the economy but I presume that those businessmen are not that impressed. As for me, I hope for something far better to serve my country and I do not want to be told that another government could not do any better. The only way to find out would be to try it, Mr. Speaker. Faced with that failure of the present administration, the Prime Minister in his opening statement before the provincial conference once again resorted to his old trick of comparing the performance of the Canadian economy with those of other countries. That prompted a few people to say that the Prime Minister wanted us to believe that everything was fine in the worst of worlds. But speaking of confidence, Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not with the performance of the present government that one can regain the confidence of Canadian voters or of members on this side of the House who have once too often heard completely erroneous forecasts and projections. And to what extent have we been misled, to what extent have they proved to be incompetent and irresponsible in making forecasts?

But for ten years, Mr. Speaker, millions of dollars have been swallowed up in all sorts of more or less worth-while plans and structures which rarely become reality, millions of dollars which could have been invested in employment producing projects.

The hon. member for Halifax said earlier that five or six years ago, if I remember well, in a tour he made across this country he warned this government of the dangers which were facing us. He said about regional disparities that we had to deal with the problem in a rational way and not with temporary solutions as this government has done. I do not question what the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said today—what he said in the House today is entirely new and encouraging for that matter, I must admit—but I would like very much his predecessors and his government to think like him, that before they set up regional economic policy they establish in close co-operation with the provinces a national economic policy and then see how provincial and regional needs can be fitted into that policy. It is in that contact that we advocated during the 1972 campaign the calling as soon as possible of a conference on tomorrow's priorities.

What I am recalling for the benefit of the House today, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what the hon. member for Halifax who was then the leader of the Progressive Conserative party advocated years ago, and it is exactly what this government refused to hear, with the results that we now know. At present, the government is moving on regional economic expansion, as in other areas, without co-ordination and planning. So he referred to it earlier—this is new. That gave the results we know when we saw plants receive federal subsidies to promote regional economies and those very plants closed their doors a few months later.

The problem of regional disparities is not an easy one to solve. We admit that but I suggest that this party could do a lot better and would have already brought about solutions. When we get to form the government, and the time will come, we will carry out a complete review of all those regional development and economic expansion programs, in consultation of course with provincial governments and the people in underprivileged area. We are also going to launch a massive attack on all fronts where the problems lie, the effects of which will inevitably be felt in the area of regional disparities. This coherent offensive will simultaneously deal with problems of unemployment, cost of living, economic growth, taxation and housing. Allow me to point out some of those measures and if we had been called to govern the country, we would also have created the proposed investment funds to stimulate small businesses and new jobs would already be available here and there.

We realize the incompetence and clumsiness of the federal government, because for too long it has refused to coordinate its policies; it has invested huge amounts in the economics of areas where transport is primitive and shipping costs are almost prohibitive. I think that transport is also a very important question. I would like to say that with a government which is allegedly respectful of regional economic growth, we should have a national transport policy to cope with deficiencies and disparities. In spite of all the projects and plans devised by bureaucrats in their ivory towers, up to recent times, regional disparities have remained one of the main problems in Canada. They are a major problem more specifically because they threaten the success of our confederation and at the same time, they are in a certain way a negation of the concept on which it is based. It is not necessary to be an economic expert to understand that slow growth areas are the first to feel the effects of an economic recession and the last to recover. The hon. member for Halifax has pointed out that danger quite well. As I would like to give my colleagues the opportunity to make a few comments, I wish, before concluding, that the statements made today by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will give way to some genuine short-term action.

This afternoon, my party leader asked the right hon. Prime Minister not exactly but approximately how many new jobs would be created under the projects or objectives which the federal and provincial governments agreed upon yesterday. The right hon. Prime Minister refused to give him any answer. Yet, during this federal-provincial conference, he asked the Canadian public to trust the federal government, a government which has failed in practically all areas and in connection with all the objectives he has been advocating since 1968, from the just society to the control of wages and prices, the fight against inflation and unemployment. How can he ask the Canadian public to trust a government with such an extensive and diverse record of failures. We still hope nevertheless and we shall continue to demand that the consultations which the minister in charge hoped for today become a reality, and he shall then be assured of co-operation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council rises on a point of order.

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT STRATEGIES FOR EASTERN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government must now renew its commitment to reduce regional disparities by developing and implementing without further delay comprehensive development strategies for eastern Quebec transportation, energy, primary resources, industrial and service sector expansion.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in this motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). He has had great experience both in this House and as leader of a party for many years.

I had the opportunity to attend the first ministers' conference, and it was interesting to note the support the first ministers lent to DREE, and how necessary they find that it continues. I would like to compliment my colleague the minister responsible for DREE for the effort he is putting forth. It is a worthy instrument, especially for the part of Canada where I come from. We have many needs in the Atlantic provinces. It is difficult sometimes to determine what the picture would have been like if we had not had DREE. I will spend a few moments later on discussing how the comprehensive development plan functions in Prince Edward Island. As hon. members know, this has been a necessary plan for Prince Edward Island.

During discussions at the first ministers' conference there was some constructive criticism, which we found beneficial. There were some suggestions for changes in emphasis which might be explored. There was also overwhelming support for the basic approach and the principal program instruments of the department. The mechanism, in particular, received favourable comment as the kind of mechanism needed to ensure a co-ordinated federal-provincial approach to economic development.

This support was reflected in the official communiqué issued by the first ministers at the end of the conference. The two related conclusions set forth were firstly, that the first ministers strongly affirmed the importance of reducing regional disparities and the continuing need for review and expansion of programs for regional development based on the longer run economic potential and transportation requirements of each province and region. Secondly, it was agreed DREE should continue to be a major federal agency for those purposes.

In light of developments at the first ministers' conference, it is obvious that the federal and provincial governments have renewed their commitment to regional economic development. We can be assured, therefore, that part of this motion has already been dealt with in a rather impressive way.

● (1752)

The motion also refers to comprehensive strategies for economic development. I certainly have no objection to this reference as long as we have in mind a workable concept. The statements of strategy already imbedded in the general development agreement are based on a workable concept. They carry the support of both senior levels of government and they are subject to regular review in light of changing circumstances. Indeed, one of the important elements of the GDA system is the provision made for annual meetings of the responsible federal and provincial ministers, meetings at which it is possible to review strategic questions, monitor progress being achieved by way of specific subsidiary agreements and make concrete plans for the period ahead.

The motion also refers to eastern Canada, suggesting a need for priority attention to the developmental requirements of eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. That part of Canada is, of course, already receiving priority under the DREE program and under various other policy instruments of the federal government. The Atlantic provinces are subject to a higher maximum than other designated regions under the Regional Development Incentives Act. The Gaspé region of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces are also subject to the newly-announced employment tax credit. In many other ways, under the programs of various federal departments and agencies, everything possible is being done to maximize the economic impact of government activity in these same regions.

I would like to say a few words about Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Marshall: Where is that?

Regional Disparities

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): It is on this side of Newfoundland. When flying to Newfoundland, you come to Prince Edward Island first. Most members of this House realize there is a comprehensive development plan in Prince Edward Island. It is for a 15-year period and began in 1969. It is the only province in Canada that has a comprehensive plan that deals with practically every aspect of development. To my knowledge, this is not so in other provinces. The minister can correct me if I am wrong.

Its purpose is to further the economic and social development of Prince Edward Island. Approximately $225 million was spent in the plan's first phase, 1969 to 1975, to establish a sound foundation for agriculture, fishing and tourism. In addition, the education system was reorganized and schools were consolidated, major improvements were made to the highway system, housing standards were improved, and marketing facilities were strengthened. During this period the economy showed a marked improvement as employment advanced, population increased, and per capita income growth exceeded expectations.

In 1975 the second phase of the plan was introduced, placing greater emphasis on the economic sectors of the province as programs were designed to make use of the improved capacity of the province to respond to development opportunities.

In March 1977 the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) and Premier Alex Campbell signed an agreement on the financial arrangements for the remaining three years of the second phase of the comprehensive development plan. This agreement provides for a contribution by DREE of $89 million over the next three years and a continuation of the phase II strategy. Programs implemented under this agreement are cost-shared on a 90-10 federal-provincial ratio, except for school construction, which is 50-50. Emphasis will continue to be placed on the productive sectors: agriculture, fisheries, and industrial development.

I wish to mention a few other items. One is of recent construction. I refer to the submarine cable link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. A 13.5 miles, $36 million electric cable stretching across Northumberland Strait between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was officially opened in Charlottetown on October 28, 1977. This project began in 1969 to ease Prince Edward Island's energy problems by linking the province to a maritime electrical grid. With a grant of $18 million from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, a $9 million loan from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and $9 million from the Prince Edward Island government, a pair of cables manufactured in Sweden were laid into pre-dug trenches at the bottom of the Strait between Murray Corner, New Brunswick and Richmond Cove, Prince Edward Island.

The link will not lower the cost of electricity to Prince Edward Islanders but it will slow down the accelerating rate of increase. Although the Island will not draw all its power from the cable, its energy future is no longer tied to fossil fuels and to costs beyond its ability to control. The cable will be operated by Maritime Electric Co., Ltd. under lease by the Prince Edward Island government.

There are a few matters on which I would like to elaborate. I wish to make reference to how DREE is operating in Prince Edward Island and to what I feel it has accomplished.

With regard to electrical power, I know there are some in this House who will argue that we do not have the highest electrical bills in Canada. Some of my hon. friends from Newfoundland claim that. However, we are very dependent on oil. This cable is one of the great benefits we have received. It has not decreased our electricity cost, but it is a measure of security. As years pass and there is further development with water power and so on, this will be a very good thing for us.

I wish to make reference to school construction in Prince Edward Island under the development plan. We have a school system like other rural provinces which is rather spread out. Our pupils were attending one-room schools. With the help of DREE, we were able to proceed much more rapidly with consolidating schools, both secondary and high schools. This is a great benefit to us. This is one of the first programs of a comprehensive nature that was developed between the federal government and the provincial government of P.E.I. I think the minister will agree that it was used as a model at that time. However, a lot of things have come and gone since 1969.

Something else that has been very fruitful and beneficial to our province and copied in other provinces is the family farm program. I have a few more comments I would like to make, Mr. Speaker; therefore I will call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, before the House rose at six o'clock I was concluding my remarks about DREE as applied to Prince Edward Island. I might say something now about the family farm program and the benefits derived from it.

As hon. members realize, Prince Edward Island being an agricultural province, the agricultural sector is a very important one. If it were not for DREE, those who live in the farm community in Prince Edward Island and who are able to enjoy some benefit from that program would be in a much worse position than they are at the present time. I am not trying to leave the impression that everything is cream and peaches, but I was closely associated with this scheme at its inception and I worked with it for a number of years, and I will do everything in my power to see that it is carried on and that worthwhile projects are forthcoming.

I might add that the arrangement for reviewing these programs is an excellent one. There is provision for an annual review by a joint advisory board consisting of representatives of both the provincial and federal governments.

Another area in which the government help very much is that of transportation, chiefly through road surfacing and construction. In P.E.I. we probably have more miles of road per capita than any other province. A great deal is demanded of roads today, truck traffic from one province to another being so heavy, so here again I think we would be in a bad position had it not been for federal assistance in highway construction, particularly in the maintenance of the trans-Canada highway.

The fishery is another important sector in our province. Our most lucrative fish is the lobster which brings in many dollars. It is a delicacy sold in many parts of Canada and it is likely that many people come to Prince Edward Island just to eat lobster. My other Atlantic colleagues appreciate this fish also. The government assists in the processing and in the maintenance of freezing units around harbours. Consideration is being given to using DREE money for the construction of boats also.

Something relatively new is taking place in our province. It is known as industrial malls. Industrial malls started in Charlottetown about two years ago through the efforts of the provincial government. What they really do is assist people interested in business. The province itself has a structure in this regard that is assisted through DREE in training and in implementation. When an individual gets to know his business he has an opportunity to expand and often moves on to something else. Someone then starting up in the business will take up the gap in that area.

This has proved to be very successful in this part of the country. There are over 20 in the town of Charlottetown. These employ quite a number of people and it looks like a very good thing to do for the future. The island population is small and there is no sense trying to take on big projects. Actually I think probably this is a return to our yesteryear when the people in our province, and other provinces as well, depended more or less on self-help, doing a great many things for themselves. This is something that looks very encouraging. It is expanding now to another town in Prince Edward Island, the town of Summerside, and we are looking forward to achievements in that area. As the saying goes, nothing is perfect at the onset. We are learning by our mistakes and other parts of Canada will perhaps also learn from some of the mistakes we make.

This is far, far from being all a mistake because there is enough good coming from it that it is bringing our population back. There has been a population change in the last number of years in our province. People used to say in the past that we were more or less an incubator for other parts of Canada. That is very true, but if all our people had stayed with their large families of yesteryear there would not be standing room now and they would have to leave anyway.

A lot has also been done in respect to market development. This is also assisted through DREE in conjunction with the provincial governments. Much is done in advertising and in processing, and this has been quite a help to us. Until we can get into the position in this great country of ours of having more control of production and marketing there will be some problems.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the agricultural sector depends on many things, chiefly the elements. It depends on how much rainfall we have, how much frost there is on some occasions, and how long the growing season is. These are uncontrollable factors, but you do what you can in other areas, such as in promotion, salesmanship and what have you, and this has proved very successful. What we are producing for export are goods in very highly competitive fields. Our products must be very competitive in outside markets, not just in Canada but throughout the world.

Food processing is certainly coming into its own and is highly productive in Prince Edward Island. We have a great potato crop. In the last couple of years we have processed as much as 20 per cent of our potato crop, and that is a lot of potatoes when you consider they are produced on approximately 50,000 acres. This also helps our cash receipts. As the House knows, cash receipts from potatoes have been very, very good. They are not too good this year but last year we enjoyed possibly one of the best in many, many years. This was because in times of drought, as in Europe last year, our production was more saleable.

There are aspects of DREE that assist us in many ways. Going back to the agricultural sector again, one thing that has been very fruitful and beneficial is the potato packaging scheme. We get assistance in that regard through job creation, and assistance for structures. These are all things that help keep people abreast of things and we find this very beneficial.

At one time not too many years in the past, as everyone knows, in our small province we had one of the best forestry stands in the country. It has deteriorated now a long way from that state. One of the chief reasons for this deterioration results from the actions of some human beings. When you cut the perimeter around a very small area like this and expose it to the wind, the rains, the salt spray, and what have you, it has a very bad effect on the forest. Through help from DREE and the provincial government we now have a replanting process, and the day will come when we may have our forests back to the stands that once existed. This is not something that will happen very rapidly because it takes 30 years to grow a tree for pulp and 60 years to make good lumber, so to get a good stand of lumber right across the whole island will take practically a century.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you getting ready to stand so I think I should conclude on that point. There are many more things I could speak about regarding DREE and its benefits in Prince Edward Island and in the Atlantic provinces generally. I want to endorse DREE in every way. Being a landlubber in the past I know what the situation was and can see the good that DREE has done for our province. I want to compliment the minister for his patience and for the very intricate deals he has worked out for the Atlantic provinces. I wish him as well as our province great luck.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member of the NDP, but I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this motion. I commend the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) for introducing it, and also the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) for his contribution in producing this motion, which is significantly timely and in line with the economic conference we witnessed with great national interest over the past few days.

I watched a good deal of the economic conference and what struck me was the fact that everything I heard and read in the papers that were produced appeared to be repetition of things we have heard in the House of Commons over past years. They were the same suggestions and the same solutions to problems. I can only reflect and deduce that the provincial premiers have been reading Hansard over the past years in order to produce these papers.

Another thing struck me as I observed the conference. I wondered what our job was as federal members of parliament representing 264 districts in this place and where is the liaison between ourselves and the provinces. What has happened to the thrust we are trying to make here in the House of Commons as representatives of all Canada? What has happened to the liaison that would permit us to make those representations that should be made to the government? I can only come to the conclusion that some people are not listening to us. I wonder what we are doing here.

Certainly there must be some positive aspects about the discussions that take place between representatives of the provinces and whoever it may be that is interested in this country. I hope we will see some positive results from this conference. As I watched I heard the same clichés we have all heard for years, such as that we have to provide a climate of opportunity; we have to direct more attention to the private and, in some cases, the public sectors; we have to provide direction in the area of restraint on spending. The one that struck me the most was the suggestion that we had to instil a renewal of confidence on the part of our people and the business sector in the government.

It is a well-known fact that our citizens have lost faith in the government, but you cannot instil confidence in the people we are representing by sitting around a table repeating political clichés. You instil confidence in the people and in business by performance, by action, by leadership and by deed. We keep hearing the same problems and the same suggestions year in and year out, yet we have the same distressing situation regarding the economy of Canada, this country which we all know is so prosperous.

Our motion today relates in a few words just what the government must do immediately. It states:

—the government must now renew its commitment to reduce regional disparities by developing and implementing . . . comprehensive development strategies for eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces including such areas as transportation, energy, primary resources, industrial and service sector expansion.

I want to attempt to address my remarks to these areas as they concern my province of Newfoundland.

● (2022)

As a result of my basic military training, I have learned some fundamental lessons. One such lesson was that any advancing army, organization, element or province can move no faster than the slowest or weakest troops. Nothing is more true when that principle is applied to our nation's economic and social direction. Canada will never reach its potential unless the weakest provinces are strengthened to keep pace with the richer ones.

Another fundamental lesson was: in order to maintain progress and win a victory, one must reinforce his success. One must take advantage of his potential strengths and reinforce them for the benefit of all. Newfoundland's strength is in its richness of renewable resources: forests, potential energy, fish, offshore oil, potential mineral resources, tourism, and most important, human resource. In spite of this richness, and in spite of joining confederation in 1949 in order to take advantage of federal leadership, Newfoundland is still embarrassingly categorized as one of the poorest provinces. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been put into Newfoundland by the government for the purpose of development. Yet it still has the highest unemployment rate and cost of living. This is partly because our leaders never developed a long term strategy in order to take advantage of the province's potential, other than on a hit and miss basis. No infrastructure base was provided, which was the first unforgiveable mistake. An adequate transportation system is a fundamental necessity to reach the rich resources of Newfoundland and Labrador.

In spite of that known fact, it probably has the most inadequate rail lines and deteriorated highways in all of Canada. The Canadian National Railways has the responsibility of maintaining its rail lines. It has allowed those lines to deteriorate to the point where they are no longer in use. The CN has turned more and more to trailer trucks in an attempt to compete in the market. That contributes greatly to the deterioration of the province's highways. The cheapest form of transportation, from an energy point of view, is the rail lines, but that is not recognized. The transportation link requires upgrading and strengthening, yet the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) refuses to offer any more than 50 per cent of the cost. Certainly the Newfoundland government cannot afford it.

I commend the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) who is providing 90 per cent of the construction cost for a highway to the Great Northern Peninsula. That highway is being constructed to take advantage of the resources which are in northern Newfoundland and Labrador. How can one minister offer only 50 per cent of the cost while another minister is providing 90 per cent of the cost of the Great Northern Peninsula highway? The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion recognizes the value of Newfoundland's resources. Originally the federal government assisted in the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway on a 90-10 basis. In order to take advantage of the resources which can be found in the Great Northern Peninsula, northern Newfoundland and Labrador, work must be done on the Trans-Canada Highway from Port aux Basques to the jump-off point in the triangle of Deer Lake, Corner Brook and St. Stephen.

I should like to refer to some statistics which were prepared by the trucking associations of the Atlantic provinces. Between 1970 and 1976, rail transportation increased by 3 per cent. It was an increase from 385,000 tons to 397,000 tons. Truck and trailer traffic increased by 424 per cent. Thus, it must be fundamentally obvious that the highway has to be built up, strengthened and reconstructed through the trans-Newfoundland corridor, which is vital to economic development.

Because of Newfoundland's isolation, the cost of living has increased rapidly. Newfoundland suffers more than any part of Canada because of isolation and the high cost of transportation. Hon. members might be surprised if I mention that Newfoundland has an agricultural base. It can produce almost everything required agriculturally and thus avoid transportation costs. I do not understand the policies of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) with respect to the creation of storage facilities in order to lower the cost of transportation and storage of grain.

In regard to the subsidies which are provided by the Department of Agriculture for vegetable storage facilities, in Newfoundland last year there were two applications. Newfoundland can produce almost anything it requires, such as vegetables, beef, poultry, eggs, milk and other food commodities which are imported at greater cost to the consumer. We must have the support of subsidies and the provision of storage facilities. I hope the minister realizes that potential will help Newfoundland.

The Newfoundland Federation of Agriculture produced figures on laying mash to indicate the price spread among the various provinces. The cost per ton in Quebec was $165, in Nova Scotia it was $172 and in Newfoundland it was $187. That is a difference of approximately 15 per cent. Is it any wonder Newfoundland has the highest cost of living? Because of the additional cost of feed, it is necessary to add one cent to the price of a dozen of eggs.

Newfoundland is the customer of every province west of it. In 1974 the total manufactured shipments from Newfoundland to Canadian destinations were $270 million, while imports totalled approximately $740 million. Newfoundland is shipping too much of its products in their raw state, such as iron ore, unprocessed codfish and pulpwood. There is a trade surplus in the paper industry. The deficits in trade for 1977 in Nova Scotia were $68 million; in New Brunswick, $30 million; and in Quebec, $124 million. Newfoundland requires a comprehensive program to develop its resources for the benefit of its people and Canada.

Speaking about the pulp and paper industry, it is in a desperate situation in Newfoundland. Although this is a successful operation, it is threatened by the budworm blight. Unfortunately, because of our distance from markets, the great pulp and paper mills in Newfoundland have difficulties competing. Our exports to the United States which amounted to 80 per cent of our production have decreased to 60 per cent. This is problem which again reflects our need for assistance in transportation.

With respect to the spruce budworm infestation, I had the opportunity, together with some of my colleagues, to meet experts from the Department of the Environment through the auspices of the minister, and we learned from them that the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have reduced the blight through defoliation measures and that only in Newfoundland the infested area has increased last year from three million acres to 3.3 million acres. I know the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) is trying, with the help of the U.S. government, to increase research in that area to find means of fighting the budworm and at the same time recognize the environmental effects which might result. I hope that we will see the results soon, but this work must be given priority because if we lose our pulp and paper industry in Newfoundland, an industry which is threatened now, I do not know what our future will be.

However, there is still much potential in Newfoundland, and I must commend the minister for providing millions of dollars to various sectors of our economy. We talk about our visions in the north. In Labrador and in northern Newfoundland we have a great potential and we must direct our efforts toward developing it. Experts say that in Labrador there are substantial uranium reserves, but the most realistic potential we have is the hydro potential on Gull Island on the Churchill River in Labrador, a source of renewable energy of which we must take advantage, and the quicker the better. I hope that the minister, together with his colleagues, will recognize the fact that with that energy resource we will be able to provide energy to the people of Newfoundland at a realistic price, and at the same time help the Atlantic provinces as well as develop other industries in northern Newfoundland and Labrador.

As I indicated previously, one of our military lessons was to support the weakest troops. If the government wants ideas about producing jobs, let me point to a housing program which, as I have mentioned many times, is so necessary in Newfoundland, a program called residential rehabilitation assistance. It is recognized that in Newfoundland there are 31,000 homes needing insulation, yet CHIP is directed at the wrong people. It does not assist those who need it most, namely, Newfoundlanders who own their own homes, people with less than $6,000 income and people who cannot afford insulation. There is a program right now which would produce one job in every home which needs repairs. Again I say to the minister that the program should be redirected to assist those people who need it most.

What amazes me is that whenever I ask for money to be allocated to the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, the minister tells me there is not enough money; yet the government can turn around and provide $1.4 million for the home insulation program, and the people who need it most cannot take advantage of it. I suggest to the minister that we can produce jobs in the way I indicated and that this is a realistic way of providing employment and helping people to insulate their homes at the same time. Again I say there are 31,000 homes in Newfoundland needing insulation, and for every such home there is a job. This would produce at least 31,000 jobs.

Another problem in my province which distresses me is our inability to take advantage of another good housing program, namely, the Neighbourhood Improvement Program. There is a community in my district called Stephenville which lost a linerboard mill with 2,100 jobs. They were designated as a NIP area, which program provided them with money to build a base for the town. Unfortunately they could not afford it because they could not afford the loan factor. They were given a grant of $400,000, but there was a loan factor of $400,000 attached to it so they had to give it up. This has denied them the opportunity not only to develop their town and to give it an infrastructure base but also to provide the necessary—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with unanimous consent.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) introduced this motion today because it gives us a chance to take a look at programs provided under DREE and also at the ways in which the provinces have put them to use. I will confine my remarks principally to DREE programs in New Brunswick and to the way the government of New Brunswick has put to use money under these programs.

It seems to me that the motion before us is worded in somewhat general terms. It seems to ignore the fact that it would be extremely difficult for the government to do what the motion suggests without the concurrence and active participation of the provinces. Perhaps that consultative and participatory process has already begun earlier this week at the conference of first ministers. I must say I am a little amazed at the virulent attacks which the opposition has launched at that conference and at the participants at that conference, particularly in view of the fact that five of the premiers attending the conference are adherents of the Tory doctrine and one is an adherent of the NDP doctrine, although one would never think that members of the NDP here in the House belong to the same party as the premier of Saskatchewan.

I suggest that in order to develop effective strategies for eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces in such areas as transportation, energy, primary resources and industrial and service sector expansion, the province involved must participate actively, and indeed play a greater role than the federal government, in the planning and implementation stages of such a strategy. Nearly all these areas fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces under our constitution.

Mr. McKenzie: Tell us how you are helping the economy in Florida.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I suggest the hon. gentleman pipe down and listen to what I am about to say, and perhaps he will be more satisfied. Never having been to Florida, I am afraid I would not know very much about the economy there.

Mr. Forrestall: You do not know a hell of a lot about the economy of New Brunswick either.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If you listened you would find that perhaps I know more about it than you would like to hear. I do not know why it is that whenever I speak here in the evenings there are a few hon. members opposite who seem to have great difficulty in accepting the truth of what I say. It seems that they always want to interrupt and create a disturbance in the House. It is a strange phenomenon, but I do not really mind because every time they open their mouths I am given an opportunity to refute another of their contradictions.

● (2042)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): At least I am not reading a speech made by one of my colleagues several months ago. If the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has an original speech to make, I would be happy to sit down, let him make it and then continue mine after he is through.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would give us some statistics on how the government is helping the economy of Florida. We have much detailed information on how the government is driving investment money outside Canada and into Florida. Let the hon. member tell us how the government is helping the Florida economy.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am having difficulty following the hon. member's point. I do not see anything in the motion about Florida. I am afraid the hon. member is lost, and if he does not stop interrupting, I may get lost as well.

The question of priorities and the definition of those priorities must rest with the provinces. I do not think any province, be it Quebec or one of the four Atlantic provinces, would want the federal government to tell it what its strategy for development must be, but it seems to me that that is what the motion is suggesting. I know that the province of New Brunswick would not want that, and I do not think it should. The provincial governments are obviously closer to the residents of the provinces than the federal government can be. It is important to note that in the New Brunswick legislature there are 58 representatives of the people, whereas in the federal parliament there are only ten, so each member of the federal parliament from that province represents a much large area and a much larger population.

What has been happening in the province of New Brunswick is worthy of note. While I applaud the remarks of the premier of New Brunswick which he made at the first ministers' conference concerning the value of DREE, I wish he would tell the ministers of his government to keep their grubby little paws off federal money and stop using it for patronage and for helping out their political friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I hear the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) piping up. If he has any doubt about what I say, I suggest he look at the monstrosity the Conservative government of New Brunswick has built on the Houlton road in New Brunswick. That tourist reception area cost the taxpayers of Canada and New Brunswick almost $3 million. If anyone can justify that, bearing in mind that we need jobs in New Brunswick, I would be glad to listen.

During the sixties real attempts were made by that great New Brunswick premier, the Hon. Louis Robichaud, to bring to the province equality of opportunity for all people of all sectors. Unfortunately, that thrust has been lost. Some areas of the province are now being developed, but little or no attention is being given to other areas.

Two areas of my province are not covered by subsidiary agreements between the federal government and the province. I want to speak about the northwest part of New Brunswick, which is made up principally of Madawaska and Victoria counties, and the area which I represent, commonly known as the Miramichi.

On the Miramichi there is a very high rate of unemployment. We have had great difficulty with our economy for a long time. That has been particularly pronounced in recent years because of weak markets for the primary resources upon which most of us rely for our livelihoods. Very little is being done to enhance the economy of that region or of the northwest region. I understand that DREE is quite prepared to enter into a joint agreement for the development of those regions of the province which are not covered by existing DREE grants, but we cannot get any movement from the provincial government.

I think it is fair to ask why. If DREE is prepared to put money into those areas of the province, what is holding the province back, and how can the federal government work out a comprehensive development strategy for the province of New Brunswick as suggested by this motion? I submit that the federal government cannot act on its own, although it has shown a continuing willingness to do so.

During the period between April, 1966, and the end of March, 1977, total DREE expenditures in New Brunswick amounted to $426.5 million. There are many agreements covered by that amount. Under special area agreements and highways agreements substantial investments have been made in roads, water and sewer and industrial land infrastructure in the Moncton and Saint John special areas. Other efforts have been made to improve the highway network in New Brunswick, but again it is interesting to note that a great deal of money has gone into areas which are already fairly well developed. The Saint John and Moncton areas were undoubtedly in need of a strengthening of their infrastructures to provide broader industrial bases for their citizens, and no one, including me, wishes to take anything away from any other part of the province. What I wonder is why other areas of the province cannot share in the largesse of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion through properly negotiated agreements to give those areas the strengthening they require in order to bring about their own industrial development.

There was the growth centre concept, for instance, and I think it is fair to say that for the entire province the growth centre concept was a failure. There is no doubt that the growth centre concept created some jobs, but the bad side effects outweighed the good effects the concept created. It weakened areas outside the growth centre. Their opportunity to attract industry diminished. Their ability to maintain the industry they had diminished. The growth centre concept caused the reduction of population in some areas. I do not believe that is good policy, so I am glad that it is not being taken very seriously any more.

The FRED agreement resulted in the pumping of millions of dollars into the northeast part of the province of New Brunswick. There have been some spectacular results there as well. The improvement in housing and support facilities for housing development is quite phenomenal. None of this would have been possible or brought to fruition without the assistance of DREE. In the southeast part of New Brunswick we have what is commonly referred to as the southeast agreement which, while not massive in its funding, has been a very worthwhile effort in strengthening the basic infrastructure required for the development of communities and for attracting industry. Unfortunately, those programs have not covered the area between the northeast and southeast known as the Miramichi except for two little sections on either side.

● (2052)

Mr. McCain: Patronage goes everywhere else. Why does it not go there?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member wants to talk about patronage, Mr. Speaker. The government of which he was once a member made a science of patronage in New Brunswick. No government in this country has practised patronage the way the Hatfield government in New Brunswick has. Hon. members opposite complain because of appointments made by this government—because from time to time someone who might have been a Liberal is appointed to the bench, perhaps. The hon. member sitting over there had a situation created for him by his colleagues in New Brunswick. He was called the potato co-ordinator for New Brunswick, whatever that may be. How does one co-ordinate potatoes?

Let me tell you something else about patronage, Mr. Speaker. There is the matter of route 11 in Northumberland county. When DREE forced the Hatfield government to spend some money on road development in Northumberland county last summer, despite the clause in the agreement which said that hiring must be done through manpower, it had to be done through a candidate defeated in the 1974 election. If the hon. member wants to talk about patronage I will give it to him. It is rife in the forestry agreement and worse in the tourism agreement. I could go on and on about patronage but that would take up all the time until the adjournment.

Mr. Clark: Move them all to Shediac.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They had better quit while they think they are ahead. There is a tourism agreement in New Brunswick and I suppose it has done some good. One would have to do a fairly careful search to find out how it is going to help the development of tourism in New Brunswick, though. There have been some rather grandiose schemes like the building of these magnificent reception centres which very few people visit. There is the scandal of Jardin de la République and the scandal of Sugarloaf Park.

I do not want to belittle these projects because they will have some value in the long run, but I cannot accept that we should develop very elaborate structures when we do not have the kind of highway systems we need to bring the tourists in. It seems to me that the highway system should come first. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has offered the province a $100 million program for highway strengthening over three years on a 50-50 cost shared basis—

Mr. McCain: Come back to the motion and be positive about the maritimes.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Do you want to mix it up again? I am game. I would be positive if the government of New Brunswick gave us anything about which to be positive. It has been a negative government which has not shown any interest in half of the province. It is their philosophy that there are two capitals in New Brunswick—Fredericton for the southern, industrial part of the province and Ottawa for the rest. They have ministers saying to the ministers of the federal government, "Why don't you get on and sign these agreements so that we can get on and spend our money in the rest of the province?" Is that an attitude of responsibility?

Mr. McCain: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): If you had kept your trap closed, all of this would not have started. If you want to mix it up politically I can do it and I am prepared to do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps hon. members should be reminded that they should address the Chair at all times and not one person in particular. I would remind the hon. member that he has one minute left.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I neglected to address the Chair. I apologize for that. I will give the remainder of my time to the opposition and maybe if they take a minute or two to reflect they will be able to come up with some positive ideas.

Mr. McCain: A point of order. Let me set the record straight on one thing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. Order, please.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member is seeking the floor on a point of order and he will be recognized, but I do not see why he should establish a point of order before being recognized.

Mr. McCain: For the record, I think it should be on the books correctly that the $100 million—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think I said clearly that I would recognize the hon. member to establish a point of order but not something for the record. That is argument and a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) it reminded me of my former profession and I thought that he was perhaps preaching for a call. Certainly with such fervour and emotion he might be welcome in the seriously depleted ranks of the Liberal party in New Brunswick at the present time.

I want to recognize at the outset not only the contribution made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) when he led off in this important debate but the contribution he has made throughout his career in trying to reverse a very serious trend that has affected the eastern provinces of this country almost since the moment of confederation.

I think the hon. member for Halifax, a former premier of Nova Scotia and former national leader of this party, is one individual who has gained respect on all sides of this House and throughout the country for attempting to tackle very directly the problems confronting a significant proportion of the population of this country.

The motion before us today refers to the need for a comprenhensive development strategy for the five eastern provinces. I think that is the crux of what we are faced with in this debate. Hon. members may have wondered whether the motion was just a series of words without particular meaning or whether it held some special implications for us as federal legislators.

It is important to recognize that the project of trying to deal with regional disparities is relatively new in this country. It is true that since the 1920s there have been attempts to deal in sporadic or specific ways with economic and social disparity. I think it is fair to say that it was not until the time of the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that there was any conscious attempt to deal with economic disparities.

I would like to give two or three examples to point that up very clearly. There was the development of the ARDA program, the Atlantic adjustment grants, and the Atlantic Development Board. Those three instruments recognized that it was not enough just to have a piecemeal response or an occasional subsidy to deal with one element of disparity or economic difficulty. They recognized that a more comprehensive and consistent approach was required to get at the underlying causes of these economic difficulties.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, since confederation economic development in Atlantic Canada has lagged behind the Canadian norm by almost any indicator of economic progress. Recent development efforts since the early 1960s have succeeded to some degree in narrowing the income gap. I might say that this has been built chiefly by very large amounts of economic transfers.

In 1976 the following are the transfers made to the Atlantic region: $550 million for unemployment insurance benefits; $208 million in family allowance benefits; $461 million in old age security benefits and $89 million for the Canada pension plan, the largest amount in terms of equalization grants of well over $800 million. These figures together total something in excess of $2.1 billion.

In that same period when we were transferring, by one means or another, a very substantial portion of basic income to the two million residents of Atlantic Canada, we were spending in direct incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Act something like $23 million. We have heard it expressed during recent days by some of the premiers of the eastern provinces speaking at the federal-provincial conference, that Atlantic Canadians and Québécois are becoming increasingly worried that we are being classed only as consumers and not as producers. That is not a situation this country should accept.

I believe that our region is increasingly in danger of being trapped in its dependency on the federal government for public services, income transfers and even jobs. I am glad that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is here this evening. He is the minister responsible for the very large scale program of Canada Works. I am disturbed at the number of representations I have received from people in my constituency. As the minister well knows, it is one of the areas in the country which has very high unemployment. By varying statistics it is between 15 per cent and 30 per cent.

I am concerned that we have fallen into this continuing round of making funds available for short-term job creation which provides no permanent economic benefit to the region. It provides no opportunity to strengthen and expand the employment possibilities in the basic industries or sectors of the economy, not agriculture, fisheries, tourism or any of the services that support the over-all structure of the economy.

It is more disturbing when you realize that the minister has received representations. I know he has had representations directly from the chairman of my ministerial advisory group saying that if we are to receive these millions of dollars for job creation, then let us make sure the funds that are being expended are not going to create some kind of short-term enthusiasm or interest or opportunity, or long-term frustration and dependency.

I am sorry to say that this government and the minister, while having inaugurated this program some years ago now, are no closer to recognizing that reality as well as the growing economic and social dependency, and the cost included in it, across the country but particularly in the area of eastern Canada which has the highest continuing unemployment. It is too much to expect that the minister would say anything this evening, but I would hope that he would recognize that it is unacceptable to deal with people only in terms of making sure that they have some form of income to continue as consumers, dependent if you like, on the federal handout. It is to reverse that situation that we have this motion before us today.

There must be a development strategy that takes into account both the problems and the potential in the area of transportation, energy, primary resources and the industrial and service sector. Just to look for a moment at the energy question, I was interested in the remarks of the Minister for Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who correctly said that energy costs in Prince Edward Island are among the highest in the country. If I look at the report which was produced some months ago comparing the average annual energy expense in Canada in a number of cities—these figures were for about a year ago and they would have escalated somewhat in the meantime—I find the figure of $305 for heating in Toronto, $80 for hot water, oil or gas, and $140 for electricity. Compare those costs to costs in Charlottetown, which are $410 for heating, $90 for hot water and $480 for electricity, making the over-all figure for a Prince Edward Island urban resident $980 as compared with a Toronto figure of $525. Lower figures would have been reported for cities in western Canada and slightly higher figures would be reported for other cities in eastern Canada.

This is one indication of disparity alone, Mr. Speaker, where consumers in my province must pay energy rates in some instances almost twice that of their counterparts who live in other urban centres in central and western Canada. It is not enough to make sure that we have some level of unemployment insurance as maintenance income, or family allowance, or Canada Pension Plan benefits, or even employment under Canada Works. If we are not prepared to deal with some of the underlying causes of this growing disparity throughout the years as a result of the energy crisis, we are not going to eliminate regional disparity.

Quite frankly, I think the government has not been willing to recognize that it cannot solve these problems on its own with ad hoc programs. They cannot simply toss in RDIA here, or Canada Works there, or an announcement by the previous minister of finance with respect to some special tax rate, unless all of these are included in some kind of comprehensive approach.

Those of us who come from Prince Edward Island, such as the Minister of Veterans Affairs of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood), can say something about comprehensive planning. We have seen one aspect of it since 1969 with the Prince Edward Island comprehensive development plan. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, if one was to gauge one's reaction to comprehensive planning only from that experience, one would have to opt in some instances for anarchy rather than for order and planning.

While the Minister of Veterans Affairs waxes eloquently about the great things that have happened under DREE, with the consolidation of the school system, the rapid change in the educational system in Prince Edward Island, I know the hon. member for Malpeque and myself as well as many others would want to add words of caution as to the enormous difficulties that have been created in rural communities and in the educational system itself in trying very quickly to adopt unilaterally an educational system and model which made very little sense for the present or future social and educational needs for the people of Prince Edward Island.

Of course, the comprehensive development plan was a classic example of unilateral intervention by the government. One of the great things about the modern era is that if anyone wishes to check out what really happened with respect to the P.E.I. comprehensive development plan they can see it all on film. The National Film Board has provided an actual record of the process of negotiations that led to the signing of the P.E.I. plan. It underscored the way in which provincial priorities and imperatives were constantly battled and set aside by a federal bureaucracy that had almost no imagination and less sensitivity to the needs of the people living in Prince Edward Island. Talking about the Prince Edward Island development plan is like talking about history, and despite the remarks by the Minister of Veterans Affairs about a second phase, finding that second phase is like finding the Peking man. We know that it existed once but somehow was lost in the course of a voyage, never to be heard from again. There really is no plan as such today. What does exist, however, are bits and pieces of programs that are the holdovers from the years of the P.E.I. development plan.

What was the reason the plan, which at the outset seemed like a marvellous idea in its basic terms, in terms of development to achieve social and economic goals, seemed to fall so short of success? When it comes right down to the basic reason, it is that the federal government to a large degree, and the provincial government to a lesser degree, did not have faith in the people themselves in terms of their own judgment and participation.

It is now a point of considerable analysis for sociologists and others. However, one aspect of the plan that could have made it work, both in its formative stages and in terms of its implementation, was the opportunity for real public participation. Unfortunately, as anyone from Prince Edward Island knows, there was no participation in the formation of the plan. In fact, we played a game of "blind man's buff" during 1968 and 1969 trying to decide what was actually going to be done.

During the months preceding the unveiling of the first phase of the plan, there were leaked portions of the plan that would more or less titillate public opinion on the island to let them in on what would actually happen when the great government decided what their plan would be all about. When it was unveiled, it said a great deal. Unfortunately, however, it was not a plan which the people themselves had an opportunity to formulate and feel they were part of.

Between the years 1969 and 1972 or 1973 there was participation, chiefly through the agency of the rural development council. Even that agency, which basically had been a voluntary association, felt it was a kind of divided house. On the one hand, they felt they had some role to play in terms of community development because that was their basic mandate. On the other hand, they were receiving considerable funds provincially and federally and therefore felt almost in a public relations job for the development plan. That made life extremely difficult for the staff and officers of the rural development council. Of course, even the RDC was able in some way to effectuate public participation, so much so that when the second phase was on the eve of being signed, the provincial government acted quickly to cut off any further funding.

Now, of course, such a thing as public participation being an integral part of the second phase of the plan is simply a non-existent factor. This means if people are not consulted at every stage of the planning and are not involved in preparing for, and participating in, their own future, that which is imposed upon them will obviously be of very superficial duration and effect.

We have profound problems in the Atlantic region. I noticed an article in the local paper the other day regarding a meeting with the Maritime Farmers Council. Dr. Gordon MacEachern, president of the Canadian Agricultural Economics Research Council, a very distinguished former Prince Edward Islander, uttered very sad words of warning. Quoting from a Canadian Development Association prediction he said, and I quote:

—the Atlantic region will lose 50 per cent of its farmers over the next six to seven years and 80 per cent within about 20 years.

He said there were about 10,000 farmers in Nova Scotia in 1966 but there now are only 5,400. By year 2000 the number would shrink to 1,600.

Nowhere had there been more land taken out of agricultural production in the last 20 years than in the maritimes,—

That is an incredible statement when you think how important agriculture is to the economy and the society of the maritime region. He went on to say:

In New Brunswick, farmland was down 52 per cent in the 20-year period, in Nova Scotia 42 per cent and in Prince Edward Island 22 per cent.

That kind of statistical analysis tells us, especially with growing food needs in our country and in the world, that we must reverse the trend. We must not simply subsidize and basically create efficient units in agriculture. We must turn the agricultural industry into a dynamic, important development component of the Atlantic region. It can and must be done. However, given the direction and the trend of this government's performance, one cannot be greatly encouraged.

In the area of transportation, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) has repeatedly reminded the Minister of Transport and members of this House that we cannot have any kind of overall development strategy unless transportation plays a constructive and useful role.

I know the minister who is here this evening would echo those words very strongly. He knows that his principal problem in some ways is not the effective administration of his own department but trying to get a useful measure of co-operation and co-ordination from other key departments, whether it be transport, finance, energy, or any other departmental policies which have an impact upon the five eastern provinces.

The sad fact is that when this department was established under the minister's predecessor in 1969, hundreds and thousands of words were echoed in this place and in committee about the importance of this new ministry which would, in effect, be a kind of super ministry. It was going to ensure there was a co-ordinated, effective, over-all development strategy. What has happened? All we have now is the minister trying to achieve some kind of bilateral agreement with each of the provinces in turn, trying to shore up an RDIA program that seems increasingly irrelevant to the process of the development of the Atlantic region, Quebec and elsewhere.

What we need is a refreshed mandate that will be committed to a comprehensive program of development. If this debate achieves nothing else, I hope it will remind this minister and the government that they have a major role to play, at least as major as it is possible to play given their performance to date, or until they can be succeeded by a government that will surely do it!

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I was surprised by that sudden interest and astonishing fondness shown by the Progressive Conservative party for Quebec, especially for eastern Quebec. However, I am not so surprised when I consider and realize that the sponsor of the motion is not the Progressive Conservative party, but the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax is, in my opinion, the only former leader of the Progressive Conservative party who has tried to learn and understand Quebec and its inhabitants.

If I could be allowed to make a suggestion—which evidently will not be followed—to the present Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his supporters, it would be to listen carefully, as he did during his speech, to the hon. member for Halifax and act upon his advice on Quebec, because I think he is the best adviser the Progressive Conservative party and more especially the Leader of the Opposition could have at the present time.

● (2122)

Mr. Speaker, after this short departure from the subject, I want to say that I am glad of the opportunity given to me by the hon. member for Halifax to talk about regional economic expansion, the expansion of regions where economic progress is slower than elsewhere in the country, my region among others.

None of the legislation put forward by the various governments, be they federal or provincial, none of the measures they have taken has given perfect results; perfection, as we all know, is not of this world. But, Mr. Speaker, no one can deny that the act of 1969 creating the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has resulted in benefits and important advantages for the communities it was meant to help. So it was to be expected that this legislaon would come up against certain obstacles which would prevent it from reaching its objective—improving the economy of those regions where economic growth was long overdue and did not allow the people to find the proper means to pull themselves up to the same level as other parts of the country.

Besides being isolated from large centres, one of the obstacles which preclude economic growth in some parts of our country is that industry itself, well set up in large centres with all their opportunities as a marketplace and so on, was not naturally attracted by our designated areas. Yet, in spite of this, regions such as Montreal and Quebec city were designated later in an attempt to decentralize towards peripheral areas.

Mr. Speaker, we have no doubt whatsoever about the beneficial effects generated in our regions with the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. When I first came to the House in 1962, at the same time as Your Honour, I was concerned over the lower economic conditions of the area which I have always represented and maybe because of the negligence of preceding governments, our region was in an underdeveloped state and did not benefit from programs available to the rest of Canada.

That is why we had insisted during the campaign on the fact that under a Liberal administration, financial assistance would contribute to the economic development of areas such as ours—and I know there are a great many other such regions in Canada and especially in the Atlantic provinces—and provide our people with decent living conditions.

So it is that following our assuming power in 1963, we adopted for instance the industry incentive policy, which encouraged corporations to establish their operations in areas such as ours. As early as 1963 or 1964, a corporation came to my riding to develop very significantly the forest industry. Without the incentives provided by the then Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, this industry would never have started its operation in the Gaspé area. That was only the beginning, and later, in 1969, we witnessed the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and the first incumbent of this portfolio unless I am mistaken, the Hon. Jean Marchand, now a senator, then a very distinguished hon. member from the province of Newfoundland, and now benefits from the efficiency of the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), the present minister of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion whom, leaving aside all political considerations, I want to congratulate for his interest in regional development and all he had done to date under difficult circumstances to help the development and economic progress of my province.

Not so long ago I was very unhappy to hear that the abolition of DREE was being considered, just as I do not like to hear the opposition say it has served no good purpose, that regional disparities still exist and that the department has done nothing. Well, it is easy to say nothing has been done, but taking the province of Quebec, I have given a few examples in my riding of subsidies to industry. Taking them by area, the Gaspé Peninsula, the St. Lawrence River and the lower St. Lawrence—of course, one always starts with an area close to one's heart—well, where subsidies to industry are concerned the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, therefore the federal government—which is being blamed lately of doing nothing, and again not long ago, a few days ago as a matter of fact here in Ottawa, through the premier of Quebec—has made quite a few grants. As of December 31, 1977, the Gaspé Peninsula and the lower St. Lawrence received grants from the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the amount of $10,849,717; the Saguenay and Lac-Saint-Jean area, $14,000,942; the Quebec city area, $44,116,150; the Trois-Rivières region, $65,381,078; the eastern Townships, $16,604,976; Montreal, $87,707,848; the Ottawa Valley region, $2,713,989; northwestern Quebec, $30,446,784; the north shore, $20,593,354, for a total of $292,414,838; which would make on an acceptable investment of $1,501,446,952 for a total job production of $72,507.

The FODER agreement, which deals mainly with the problems of the Gaspé Peninsula and the lower St. Lawrence, had invested, as of October 7, 1977, $148,575,576 in agriculture, forests, fishing, mining, leasure, tourism, business, urban planning, transportation, social development, administration and participation in forest redevelopment, under an ancillary agreement, revised and signed June 22, 1977, an estimated $3,950,000, $2,370,000 being from the federal government, in land treatment, including drainage, $4,750,000, including $3,000,000 from the federal government.

So it cannot be said, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has not done anything for regional disparities. As for the lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé Peninsula, it is only since the creation of the department, since certain incentives are given to companies for settling there that we have known renewed growth in economic activities. In the field of transportation, for example, we have established a roll-on roll-off ferry system, which has developed the tourist industry in the Magdalen Islands, whose only industry was fishing. Today, the islands enjoy a fairly good revenue from tourism, due to this ferry which is part of the regional economic development program.

I would like to come back to the question of air transport about which everyone has been talking for a long time. For my part, I have been talking about it for ten years in relation with the Magdalen Islands. It is the only means of transport available from December until April in the Magdalen Islands. I have been requesting improvements to the airport since 1968; some improvements have been made, but they still do not meet the needs of the population for adequate transportation. At the present time, the Magdalen Islands cannot be assured of regular service because we do not have the necessary equipment, that is instrument flights, since the present runways and the many hills prevent installation of proper instruments. We have been asking for improvements for ten years and nothing has been done. Numerous studies have been made. The Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau has made certain studies and we have of course kept the Magdalen Islands airport in mind, but we have still not received an answer.

Today I had the pleasure—and for this I would like to credit the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang)—to hear that a private firm, which says that its experts know everything about the socioeconomic conditions of our area, has been commissioned to study the best location for a regional airport in the Gaspé area—some will say that it is just another study, but this one will be made by an independent firm and not the Department of Transport. Some may wonder what this has to do with the Magdalen Islands, but it has a lot to do with the islands since the company now providing service from the province of Quebec to the Magdalen Islands would like to develop the airport at Havre-aux-Maisons in the Magdalen Islands, but this can not be done before a regional airport is built or the Gaspé airport is improved.

This is why we applaud the decison made by the department, following repeated requests on our part, to commission an independent firm to study the most economically and sociologically suited location for this airport within three months. Transport is a major factor of economic development. In this regard, I must thank the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for listening to our complaints and finally accepting to assist in the construction of a road to the Gaspe area. We are satisfied with what has been spent through its financial participation with the province of Quebec to the construction of this road which, we hope, will soon be completed. We are satisfied with this participation but we will be even more satisfied when Gaspé will be able to have an air transportation system meeting its needs for 1978 as well as its future needs, as far as economic development is concerned.

A salt mine has been discovered in the Magdalen Islands. Several of my colleagues in the House have asked me questions after the release of reports in the press and on the radio, people who seem to be against the development of this salt mine. Those who are opposed to it are people from outside who went to the Magdalen Islands to try to convince people that from an environmental and aesthetic point of view the development of a mine in the Magdalen Islands could be detrimental to the tourists who would visit the islands.

Tourism is a part of our economy and lasts two or three months of the year, but Magdalen Islands residents have to earn a living all year long. So the question is: Are the people from the islands opposed to the development of the salt mine? No, they are not. The opposition coming from the Magdalen Islands originates from a group of fishermen who are rightly wondering about the site which will be chosen as the harbour used to get the salt off the islands. It might have harmful effects on the lobster grounds, as I mentioned some time ago when I asked a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) and to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave me an answer.

I am therefore asking for a serious study to be undertaken, but I want to stress the fact that the people from the Magdalen Islands are not opposed to the development of that mine. On the contrary, it will represent a welcome boost to the economy of the islanders, given the present state of fisheries which is getting somewhat better. Such a development could allow a good many people from the Magdalen Islands to earn a living all year round and expect a sizeable income, not to mention other side effects that it may bring about.

The development of that mine depends on another important project in the continental Bonaventure riding which would create from two to three thousand new jobs in the area of Port Daniel. This is why I am making a request tonight to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion while paying homage to him for the magnificent job he is doing for the country and for his province. That reminds me of the premier from that province who was complaining this week of the lack of consideration his province is getting, in his opinion—we saw that Premier slam the door, but any other attitude on the part of Mr. Lévesque would have been surprising for when he comes to Ottawa, it is to laugh at people. He comes to laugh at the federal government because he has made up his mind, he has been a separatist since the November 15, 1976, election. He already considers Quebec as a separate state, so why should he not slam the doors? He comes here to make an act of presence and then drowses off, as it has been reported in some newspapers.

My request then to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is for him to continue his efforts in favour of the economic development of our province as he has done up to now and I am asking him to answer positively any requests that the government of Quebec might submit to him and particularly with regard to the issue in which I am interested, namely the assistance required for the development of the salt mine and any other industry which will come in addition to the development of that mine in the riding of Bonaventure, at Port Daniel.

[English]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is plain to be seen that the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) has learned some of the courtesies of this House, unlike the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne). I compliment the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine for his constructive and positive remarks on behalf of his constituency.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the $100 million mentioned by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi came from two sources: Fifty per cent came from the provincial treasuries and 50 per cent from that which was not to be paid out from the federal treasury in the subsidies to be sacrificed by the maritime treasuries, specifically transportation subsidies. Therefore, the $100 million does not cost the federal treasury one farthing in the long run, and that is not much to brag about, sir.

Secondly, that hon. member remembered that there was a premier by the name of Robichaud in the province of New Brunswick, and well he should, and as I do. But what he did not say or would not acknowledge was that when Mr. Hatfield became the premier of New Brunswick, the deal then in existence with the outgoing premier was no longer applicable to the province of New Brunswick and had to be renegotiated on terms imposed by Ottawa different from those which had been conceded to a Liberal premier, namely, Premier Robichaud. That does not make it sound very much like what the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi said, and that is why I was perhaps a little rude to you, Mr. Speaker, in trying to correct the record.

I want to be constructive in respect of the Atlantic area. Unlike the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, I am interested in its wellbeing and its promotion. I am not interested in petty politics. I am interested in the things which can make the area great and become self-sustaining, and this can be done.

The area is rich in renewable resources and is primarily dependent upon them; that is, forestry, fishing and agriculture. The fishing industry under the direction of successive ministers in Ottawa has had its assets traded away in international agreements with no known return to any part of Canada in any way, shape or form. This resource was depleted in the reckless dealing which took place. We did not impose the 200-mile limit even as early as Iceland, and by the time we did it was almost a matter of locking the door after the horse was literally and completely stolen. There have been steps taken to try to reconstruct this in an eleventh hour repentance, I might add. There are a few things which I think can still be done.

We are losing a generation of fishermen by virtue of regulations in respect of licensing which have been imposed by the government of Canada. On behalf of the Atlantic area, I plead with this government to do one of two things; either restore the licensing privilege to inshore fishermen so that the sons of the present fishermen may also fish, or assess the impact of the renewal of these licences on the species of stock, and explain why they cannot do so.

Even though the catch of the handliner and other inshore fishermen is minuscule, because of the present price of fish this catch is important as a source of income for tens of hundreds of Atlantic fishermen. It is important to restore the licensing fee, or measure the impact upon the stock and justify the restrictions which are presently in place. Perhaps some will not be liberalized, perhaps others can be. In any case, any relief would be helpful. I have proposed this on several occasions. I have asked for an official estimate of the impact, but I have received no answer.

The employment and income possibilities which the fishing industry presents is well worthy of federal investment. Though this is a time of austerity, it is not the time for austerity in investment. There is a difference. Investment in an industry with the potential of the fishing industry will furnish dividends to all Canadians. I am proposing more expenditure of the investment type. Failure to invest will express economic ignorance of the fishing fact. Boats, wharves and processing plants are becoming outmoded. All of these things require federal assistance for replacement. Neglect over the years has put the fishing industry in a dependent position. It can recover and pay dividends to Canada.

This applies as well to the fields of agriculture. Because of time constraints, I have to be extremely brief. In the field of agriculture, the Atlantic area is not self-sufficient in many of the products it is capable of producing. It is not self-sufficient in meat, butter, poultry products and grains. Perhaps it is a little over self-sufficient in the production of potatoes and apples.

The maritime provinces need research. One of the threats the department has held over agriculture in the Atlantic area is the withdrawal of freight rate subsidies on cereal grains. This subsidy goes on only from budget to budget. It cannot be withdrawn unless the livestock and poultry industries in Atlantic Canada fall dead, or until such time as there are alternative grains to grow on a viable basis. To date those grains have not been discovered.

I have pleaded with agriculture to try varieties from foreign sources, because the native varieties are not viable on the east coast. This is not being done. I have pleaded for research in the agricultural industry with respect to potatoes, grain, etc. This research could determine what the climate of the Atlantic provinces had to offer, and what would be required in engineering, farm buildings, farm storage, animal husbandry in the barns, poultry houses and hog pens. What may be applicable in Idaho, Maine or New York State does not necessarily lend itself to the climate of the Atlantic area. We require research into the storing of potatoes and the proper housing of livestock.

It is to this field that the Department of Agriculture and the government of Canada have not directed any attention. Research can help to make the Atlantic agricultural industry self-supporting. It requires leadership and investment. We cannot continue with the uncertainties of a budget to budget subsidy for feed and cereal grains, and at the same time fail to expand the research structure which is necessary. We must explore the world for varieties to find those which will grow viably in our country.

Forestry is perhaps the most important of all our renewable resources. Historically it has been plagued by fire, parasites and disease. Added to this in the last few years has been the economic impact of inflation, the high cost of money, high capital costs and increasing labour costs. No single one of the economic forces is totally to blame, but the industry finds itself in a position where it is difficult to compete in the international markets which are necessary for its prosperity.

For some 25 years the spruce and fir forests have been plagued by budworms. Initially the federal government recognized that it was a specific and isolated program which deserved support. It assisted financially for a short period of time, but research for an alternative was not commenced. That is the key: research to determine the specifics of prosperity in renewable resources. The province of New Brunswick was left to take all the environmental criticism aimed at it for spraying the budworm. The government had pictures in its files that it did not bother to show. Those were pictures of test plots which were not sprayed. As a result of that, there is not a live spill on a coniferous tree in those areas. Therefore, if spraying had not occurred, New Brunswick would have been as fiery red as the deadest tree.

The government did not indicate that there was no known way to control budworm other than by insecticide. The only ways it has evern been controlled is when the budworm eats itself out of house and home and starves to death, or is consumed by the fire which follows the devastation. But the government did not bother to inform the public of those facts. That is not fair to the Atlantic region. That area requires the support of the federal government in this regard.

The government has very gently, and not very effectively, advertised some of Canada's natural attractions. The hospitality of people in Atlantic Canada is unexcelled. Atlantic Canada is where the history of Canada was started. Canada was developed from east to west. Settlers arrived on the east coast for various reasons. Some were starved out of Ireland during the potato famine, some arrived as Quakers because they were unable to practise their religion in their native land.

There is an historic Indian campsite and battleground at Fort Meductic. There is adequate material available to establish a small museum there. Can the island where Champlain spent his first winter be found on a map depicting Canadian historic sites of interest? I do not think so. It is not on the map. The government has done a poor promotional job. If the government developed and expanded Canadian historic sites as part of its make work projects, thousands of tourists would be attracted to the Atlantic area. The opportunity is present. Does Canada want to fulfil its responsibility for developing these sites for the tourist industry?

Two things are necessary for income to be derived from renewable resources. First, there must be a fair trade policy. We cannot accept the position of the Tariff Board when it reported that it would reduce tariffs on potatoes and potato processed products imported into Canada to a level roughly equal to the tariff levied on the same products exported to the United States. Atlantic Canada requires a fair trade policy if agriculture, fisheries and forestry are to survive.

Second, we cannot accept the ever increasing rate of freight rates on products going out. This is particularly unacceptable when we find that the forest industry today is trucking its product from mills in New Brunswick across the border of the state of Maine, putting it on American railroads and shipping it at their freight rates at a saving to the industry. We must be competitive in U.S. markets, and when the freight rate is so far out of line that all goods must go across the CNR and the CPR over into Maine to be loaded on American lines, there is something wrong with our transportation policy.

The other day the minister laid the blame on the MacPherson report. MacPherson put in a report years ago, but today the minister is responsible for policy and for freight rates, air traffic rates, ocean rates and ferry rates in Canada. That is his baby. But, like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) and all other ministers, he accepts no responsibility but rather finds a head on which to lay the blame.

We need positive action, as an investment in Atlantic Canada, in creating competitive and fair freight rates. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went into the first ministers' conference without a single positive recommendation on what could be done for any part of Canada. I suggest that we should adjust our freight rates to a fair and competitive rate, have a policy of free trade, make an investment in our Atlantic ports, invest in our shipyards, and adjust our policy in respect of the export of energy, particularly as it relates to petroleum products. Because every refinery in eastern Canada, from Come-By-Chance to Saint John, New Brunswick, is subject to unfavourable regulations in respect of our exports of refined products, which are an important source of the revenue of virtually all refineries. But the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has created regulations in respect of the export of any petroleum product from eastern Canada, so that from month to month and from year to year the products are exported on an unpromised renewable basis. We are now considered in the United States as another unreliable foreign source of energy.

I ask that we become a friendly and reliable source of energy so that the Atlantic area becomes a refining centre and a centre of employment and income for all of Canada. That does not exist there today. Let us expand our shipyards, let us get a merchant marine subsidized by the government, let us build our naval ships in Canada and expand our shipyards so that we can do that. I only wish time would permit a further expansion of positive ideas for the government because Atlantic people are proud people and we want the proper policies to make us self-supporting.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, being allowed the last five minutes is a dubious honour in this debate, but I would like to participate as a non-maritimer and point out several things which I think should be said. One of them is that many maritime members have spoken today of their individual problems in their individual ridings. Perhaps it is good to have had a mini-throne speech debate—each of the members being first time members they can make that kind of speech—but it does indicate that one problem we have in Canada is having a large disadvantaged area which all Canadians wish to assist and which cannot be assisted by giving everybody everything they want.

For that reason I was particularly interested in the contributions of hon. members regarding the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Government members said they appreciated the work which the minister had done, and opposition members said he has not done enough. DREE was set up to assist the disadvantaged regions in our country. Certainly northern Ontario should not have been left out, because although we are part of the richest province in Canada, the wealth has not rubbed off on northern Ontario. We still have many resources, but they have taken our wealth and given us very little in return.

This raises a problem which is quite self-evident. It seems to me the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) will have to give consideration to making more effective use of his department and his officials. The many experts in his department should not try to make agreements with the provinces and the regions that satisfy solely the political ambitions of these provinces and regions. Rather the department should have enough scope and brain power to decide how best to spend the money provided in the area and how to make the longest term agreement which will produce the most advantage. Undoubtedly we want to help the maritimes. There is some doubt about Quebec, about whether we want to engage in long term projects there. Many of us want to see what will happen there before we do so, but that is not true of the maritimes.

We have had problems with the maritime provinces ever since they became part of confederation. Some of them may be solved and some may not. Many times they have been victims of what the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) and others have referred to as patronage. When the government changes, the minister must immediately negotiate a new DREE agreement with that province. I say nuts to that. We should spend our Canadian money in the most effective way so as to produce the most jobs.

I should like to point out one other problem which exists not only in the maritimes but also in my area. This afternoon I attended one of the committee meetings and listened to a discussion about Syncrude. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that Syncrude would not have existed had we not put money into it. If we put money into any DREE project, what excuse do we have for not taking equity in the industry we assist? In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, or, for instance, in the Ottawa Valley a year or so ago, 50 per cent of the projects in which we put money went bankrupt. What did we do with our share of money which we put into equity? We did nothing with it. If we had had brains in the department we could have said that management was not operating properly. Management does not want to lose money and go bankrupt, but we could not assist them where assistance was absolutely necessary.

This is true all across the maritimes with regard to projects in which we become involved, such as the steel plant, the heavy water plant and the coal mines. In many cases we must give them more than money, we must give them the assistance of our federal and provincial experts. We should not be scared of acquiring equity. We are doing this in many other fields today where we know we will have to give additional assistance and advice. We have started many projects in the maritimes which have failed. They have failed because of the squabbling of the provincial government, the squabbling of the federal government and the squabbling between one region and another. The national government is big enough to provide assistance, direction and leadership, but all too often federal leadership is non-existent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—POSSIBILITY ELEVATOR AT MOOSE JAW ABLE TO SERVICE CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on January 30, as recorded at page 2394 of Hansard, I posed a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board asking him whether he was prepared to carry out a feasibility study to determine whether the Canadian government elevator facilities at Moose Jaw could be used to service the port of Churchill. I followed that question with a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) asking whether he had discussed with the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board the feasibility of using the drying facilities at the Moose Jaw terminal to dry damp grain from the northern part of our province so that there could be sales for that grain.

Neither minister gave a satisfactory answer to my questions. In the Hall commission report it was recommended that a new government elevator be built at Yorkton. That elevator would be capable of cleaning and storing some 25 million to 30 million bushels of grain per year, which could be shipped to Churchill. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board subsequently appointed one Rod Bryden to do a study on the recommended Yorkton terminal, and although I have not seen the Bryden report, it is my understanding that it recommends against construction of such a terminal.

In view of the fact that the Moose Jaw terminal is only about 150 miles further from Churchill than Yorkton and that the elevator at Moose Jaw is capable of a throughput of some 30 million bushels of grain per annum—and that is grain cleaned to export standards, I might add—it seems to me that the Moose Jaw elevator could be utilized to service the port of Churchill. Unfortunately, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board would not undertake to carry out a feasibility study.

The Moose Jaw terminal has a capacity of about 5.5 million bushels. It has up to date cleaning and drying facilities and is capable of loading enough hopper cars in a 24-hour period to make up sufficient unit trains to load a one million bushel grain ship. Yet in the 17-year period from the fiscal year 1959-60 to the fiscal year 1975-76, car shipments from the terminal at Moose Jaw averaged less than 1,000 or, on the average, shipments of about two million bushels per year. Compare that with a possible throughput of 30 million bushels; approximately 7 per cent of the capacity. What a waste!

The annual reports of the Canadian Wheat Board over three crop years, 1973-74 to 1975-76 inclusive, show that demurrage charges in the three-year period totalled some $19,190,808. Admittedly, some of these charges were incurred as a result of rail strikes, derailments of trains or rock slides in the Fraser Valley, but in many instances they were incurred because the proper grade of grain was not available at the coastal terminals. These demurrage charges are a direct charge to the grain producer.

A ship does not suddenly turn up in a harbour looking for a load of grain. A ship is in transit for many days and sometimes for two or three weeks. Its estimated time of arrival at port must be known many days in advance by the Canadian Wheat Board. The estimated time of arrival would be changed only as a result of storms, which are predictable, and news of any delay would be transmitted by radio. If it is known in advance that a boat is coming and what grade of grain is required, and if the grain is not available in terminal position, why would it not be possible to utilize the facilities of a government inland terminal such as Moose Jaw to place the required grain in export position in a matter of a few days?

● (2207)

The Minister of Agriculture, in response to my supplementary question, states as follows:

> We must also keep in mind that there is a private elevator system in the western provinces. This is a government elevator. If the hon. member is suggesting that we put it in direct competition with the private elevator system, he should suggest that and we will bring in an amendment to the bill immediately to allow just that.

While the private grain trade is interested in making its system pay, I am sure that the producer-owned companies are also interested in seeing that their producer members realize as high a price as possible for the grain that they sell. It seems to me that an elevator such as the Moose Jaw terminal, which has a capacity of 5½ million bushels, could be filled to capacity and grain shipped when it appeared that there might be a delay at a coastal terminal because of the lack of the proper grade of grain, and that a ship might have to wait in port with the resultant demurrage charges to the producer.

[Mr. Neil.]

I know the employees of the government elevator in Moose Jaw. The are keen and anxious to work and are frustrated by the lack of utilization of their elevator. It seems a shame to me that the excellent facilities that are available there should be underutilized year by year when there could be a saving to the taxpayer and more money in the hands of the producers if the facilities were properly utilized.

I am sure that if the ministers who responded to my questions would sit down and discuss the use of the Moose Jaw terminal and other inland terminals, as I have suggested, with members of the producer-owned grain companies, some agreement could be arrived at. It is my belief that the officials of these grain companies are sincere and interested in putting as many dollars into the pockets of the western grain producers as is possible.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) had a previous commitment this evening so I am happy to reply to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil.)

We are continually looking at all the ways in which we can improve the use of the port of Churchill. Before considering the economic feasibility of various proposals for collecting grain on the prairies that is destined for export via Churchill, we must make an assessment of several other matters. We must consider, for example, the relative rail costs of shipping grain to Churchill versus other ports. Maintaining a rail line over permafrost such as the line to Churchill poses difficult problems not experienced elsewhere in our grain handling system.

In our current program of rehabilitating prairie rail lines the federal government has allotted $1,610,000 to the line to Churchill. The work involved includes bank widening and drainage, rail relay and extending the sidings. It is likely that large sums of money will have to be spent on this line just to maintain its current capacity, let alone to increase it.

The government of Canada has also allotted significant sums of money to improving Churchill port facilities. In 1978, $5,575,000 in capital expenditures have been allocated to Churchill. This work includes scale automation and metrication, port lighting, winter berthing facilities, repairs and dredging.

In a period when we have limited amounts of capital to spend on upgrading our handling and transportation system, we must ask where our money will be most profitably spent. When one considers that the port of Vancouver can export as much in one month as Churchill does in a season, it becomes apparent that a careful analysis of the market potential for Churchill must be done before large capital expenditures are committed.

A careful economic assessment of this marketing route will have to be conducted. Although the port is closer to some of our European customers than Thunder Bay, insurance rates are higher while the shipping season is shorter.

It must be observed that the present system of primary elevators collecting grain on the prairies for Churchill has performed adequately. The port has approached its practical maximum capacity in each of the last two years. The elevators have done a good job and can be expected to be even more effective in the future as they continue to modernize their facilities. The government can also be expected to construct the necessary facilities to service the future needs of the port of Churchill.

SOCIAL SECURITY—DENIAL OF PENSIONS TO WIDOWS UNDER AGE 65—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the question to which I address myself tonight concerns the spouse's allowance for those citizens who are given the opportunity to qualify for the old age pension at the age of 60 if their spouse is 65.

● (2212)

We have discussed regional disparities tonight, and we have discussed the situation regarding the five million poverty stricken Canadians in the country. Thus it is very difficult to understand the direction the government is taking regarding senior citizens who qualify for the pension on reaching the age of 65 years. If a spouse happens to be 60 years of age, he or she also qualifies. God forbid, though, if the spouse who is 65 dies at 66 and the other spouse is 61! Then he or she is completely cut off from the old age pension. Where is the reasoning for this in this supposed prosperous country of ours?

In my province that particular survivor has to revert to welfare. The amount of welfare could vary from $140 to $191 a month, depending on assets owned. However, the average fuel bill for a single family home—and I believe there are around 11,000 single family homes in Newfoundland—is from $60 to $120 a month, depending upon the condition of the home.

Let me read a letter from a senior citizen to give the House an example. This letter is from a lady who is 64 years of age.

> I am writing to you with another problem. I worked as a gas attendant right up until July, 1976 when I reached the age of 64 years. I filed for my unemployment, but did not receive any moneys until the middle of September. I then sent a form in to St. John's for my spouse's allowance and all I got a month (spouse's allowance) was $36 a month—

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is a person 64 years of age working as a gas attendant in order to earn extra income to provide the basic necessities of life. She was turned down, and I have since learned that she was refused. But this is the situation that exists. It is difficult to understand. I am sure that every member in this House, other than the particular minister responsible, will recognize this is a glaring inequity. I am pleased to collaborate with my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has the same concerns as I about this matter.

Hopefully the very capable hon. member who is to reply will impress upon his caucus, or through other means which are available to him, this extremely serious plight of our pensioners. Let me quote some words of Benjamin Disraeli which are apropos to this situation. They appeared in the National Enquirer.

> Two nations, between whom there is no intercourse and no sympathy; who are as ignorant of each other's habits, thoughts and feelings as if they were dwellers in different zones, or inhabitants of different planets; who are formed by different breeding, are fed by different food, are ordered by different manners, and are not governed by the same laws—the rich and the poor.

I ask the parliamentary secretary who will reply that some consideration be given to those people who, through no fault of their own, cannot manage with the high cost of living. I hope we can impress upon the government in this session the needs of those who depend on us to help them.

● (2217)

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, whereas I am very sympathetic to the problem described by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), I must report that the spouse's allowance was introduced because the government of Canada recognized the plight faced by many older couples trying to manage on only one pension. To help these couples, the government now provides a spouse's allowance to a person 60 to 64 years of age whose spouse is receiving an old age security pension. The amount of this allowance varies according to the other income of the retired couple, and for couples with substantial income, no such allowance is payable.

A spouse's allowance ceases when the pensioner dies. It has been argued that once a spouse qualifies for the spouse's allowance, it should be paid until that spouse qualifies for the old age security pension in his or her own right, to avoid hardship that would arise from terminating the allowance on the death of the pensioner. However, it would be difficult to explain in the case of a pensioner's death why his or her surviving spouse would continue to receive the spouse's allowance, whereas other surviving spouses who never qualified for the allowance are denied it.

The spouse's allowance is also terminated when the spouses separate, is suspended if either or both spouses leave Canada for a period greater than six months, or if either spouse is imprisoned for longer than 90 days. Essentially, the spouse's allowance is paid when the couple are living together on the same income. When these circumstances no longer apply, the allowance is either terminated or suspended.

The spouse's allowance is not available to widowed, single, divorced or separated persons in the 60 or 64 years age range. If the allowance had been made more generally available, this would have, in effect, led to a general reduction of the retirement age in Canada from 65 to 60, and it was not felt that the country could afford such a reduction. Therefore, it was decided that this program should deal with the one specific problem, so that older married couples, with one spouse already on pension, could meet their financial requirements through the old age security program rather than through other programs such as the Canada Assistance Plan.

Adjournment Debate

SOCIAL SECURITY—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF PENSIONS FOR PERSONS IN NEED BETWEEN AGES 60 AND 65

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if my opening sentence is one of criticism, I should like to make it clear that it is not directed to either of the two parliamentary secretaries who are here tonight. I must point out that in my view the practice is developing, almost to the point of abuse, of ministers not being here to respond to questions on the late show; and too often it is not even the minister's parliamentary secretary but some other parliamentary secretary who is called on to do the job. That is not a criticism of either of the two Liberals who adorn the government benches tonight, but I hope the point will be noted.

My question is in the same area as the one dealt with by my friend, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). It was asked on Monday, November 28, and appears at page 1291 of Hansard for that date. The gist of the question was in these words:

In view of the growing number of persons between 60 and 65 years of age, most of them spinsters and widows, who express utter disbelief that there is an allowance for spouses but nothing for persons of single status, will the minister take the necessary steps to see that an equivalent allowance is made available to all persons between the ages of 60 and 65 who need it, regardless of their marital status?

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) gave me an answer which indicated that she understood the question. However, the best she gave me was an assurance that the whole matter, and even more than that, was being studied.

● (2222)

Like the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, I am not at all satisfied with the answer the parliamentary secretary gave to my hon. friend's question. But I will say for him that he did repeat the basis upon which the spouse's allowance was introduced, as stated at that time by the government. He said the whole philosophy was that the government had realized that two persons could not live on one pension. So the government said that where one spouse was over 65 and the other one was between 60 and 65, it would provide two pensions.

We agreed then, and we agree now, that two persons cannot live on one pension. But we asked then, and we ask now: If the government agrees that two people cannot live on one pension, how does it think one person can live on no pension at all? It is usually women between 60 and 65 who get no pension, because they are in that age bracket and are single or widowed. Yet if they happened to have a husband who was over 65, they would get it.

We still feel that basing the spouse's allowance on the basis of marital status is unfair. The parliamentary secretary is quite right when he says that some of the things we advocate would seem to open the door to lowering the pensionable age to 60. Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to push that door open for some time and I shall keep on trying to do so. But until we reach that point I stress that the present system is grossly unfair, especially to women.

[Mr. Maine.]

The government talks about this legislation being equal. It is defined as for the spouse. You get it whether you are a female or a male spouse. Nevertheless, in our culture most wives are younger than their husbands, and when we look at the employment picture we find that most of the single persons between 60 and 65 who are getting no allowance are women. Most of those who find their allowance cut off because the older spouse has died are also women. The letter of sympathy which the department sends out is one of those "either/or" documents which apply whether it is sent to a widow or a widower.

I am not pleading tonight for an overall program. I shall do that on another occasion. I want the pensionable age to be brought down to 60, but I am pleading that in the meantime the government should not be so unfair to single women and to widows. People who encounter this legislation for the first time ask me: Is it possible? How could parliament ever have passed a bill which provides for an allowance to the spouse of an older person but not to a woman in the same age bracket who has no spouse?

The parliamentary secretary came up with another argument—and I agree with him—that to continue a payment to the spouse who has been receiving it and who has become a widow raises the question: What about the woman who is a widow over the age of 60 and who never got it? In my view, this underlines the justice of my whole case—that all women in that bracket who need an allowance should get it regardless of their marital status.

The parliamentary secretary is looking at me, saying he knows what I think. He is right. I want to see the pension paid at age 60 to all persons out of the labour market. But at this stage I think those who need it between 60 and 65, women in particular, should get it without regard to marital status.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will take this matter up with the minister, who is a woman herself. Surely there is someone over there with the heart and the compassion to deal with this issue.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there is the heart and the compassion. There is just not the money.

The hon. member has asked about the possibility of providing a benefit on the same basis as the spouse's allowance to those persons between 60 and 65 years of age who do not qualify for the allowance because they are not the spouse of an old age security pensioner. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has earlier expressed her sympathy and concern for this group of people. As she said, the department is in the process of examining the priorities which must be set when determining where the limited funds available for groups of Canadians in vulnerable situations should be allocated.

● (2227)

It may be of interest to the hon. member that current estimates suggest that the cost of providing a benefit equivalent to the income-tested spouse's allowance for all persons in the 60 to 64 age group, as he suggested, would be approximately $635 million in the first year alone. This would be in addition to the cost of the current spouse's allowance benefit, and would be five times the present expenditures on this allowance.

The department advises me that the spouse's allowance was introduced to cover the situation of married couples with little or no other income who were trying to get by on the single pension. It was considered appropriate to use the spouse's allowance for cases like this, because the married couple already had a connection with the old age security program through the one spouse who had reached retirement age.

It is recognized that many other people in the age range 60 to 65 have need for income assistance also. However, it was considered that these needs would be met through another program, the Canada Assistance Plan, under which the government of Canada shares in the cost of income support granted to people in need under the general assistance program of each province.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Welfare.

Mr. Maine: Of course, when these people reach age 65, they too normally become eligible for the old age security program.

Possibilities for improving income support programs are under review by the federal and provincial governments. The government of Canada is also studying possibilities for providing some form of income supplementation to Canadians who are working at inadequate levels of income. Program changes along these lines may lead eventually to improvements in the income security system for Canadians in the 60 to 64 age range, as well as for other Canadians in vulnerable circumstances. In the meantime, the existing provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan will continue to operate.

In other words, it is our intent to meet the income needs of people under one program or the other, hopefully as effectively as possible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When does "eventually" come?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGES

TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF LUNENBURG, N.S.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The town of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, was settled in 1753 by immigrants from the Palatinate-Wurtemberg and other states in the region, Montbéliard and Switzerland. This year the town and its citizens celebrate their two hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary. Since the initial celebrations of this event begin next week, I move, seconded by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald):

That congratulations and best wishes be extended by this House to the mayor, council and citizens of one of the first real Canadian settlements under British auspices for the significant contribution made by its citizens to the history and economic development of our nation over the past two and one-quarter centuries, as illustrated by the schooner Bluenose on the Canadian ten-cent piece.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

URBAN AFFAIRS

DISTRIBUTION OF CMHC FUNDS BY MPs—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns that blatant and wholly reprehensible manner of the allocation of public funds by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In view of the fact that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), against the wishes of the president of CMHC, has turned the distribution of CMHC funds into a partisan political affair in which taxpayers' money is used to try to grab votes for the Liberal party, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That this House demands that this minister, who on a previous occasion was forced to resign as a result of his lack of judgment, resign permanently.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brant.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SUGGESTED INADEQUACY OF MINISTER'S POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Canadian Football League has approved the purchase of the Hamilton Tiger-Cats by Mr. Harold Ballard, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House notes that the efforts of the Minister of Labour with respect to the Hamilton Tiger-Cats has met with as much success as his efforts in the field of labour relations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Rimouski.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS AND GIS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the cost of living has increased substantially over the past months, becoming a source of concern and economic restraint for old age security pensioners;

Considering that costs are rising more quickly than the quarterly increase of old age security and guaranteed income supplement;

Considering that it is the duty of the government to continue to look after the present and future needs of senior citizens tackling inflation and the ever increasing cost of living;

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

S.O. 43

That the House enjoin the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take all necessary steps to introduce a bill to increase old age security benefits to $225 a month and to raise the guaranteed income supplement accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion can be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

EMPLOYMENT IN PUBLIC SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, caused by the glaring discrepancy between the words of the minister responsible for the status of women and the policies that he presides over, concerning the employment of women in the federal public service. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the Minister of State for Federal Provincial Relations make a statement on motions to explain to the House his recent statement that 'the whole idea of 'men's jobs' and 'women's jobs' is a culturally defined one based on tradition and not on fact or inherent ability', in light of the damning evidence clearly demonstrated by the total failure of this government to adhere to its rhetoric concerning the merit principle in the federal public service.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLICATIONS

WITHDRAWAL OF PORNOGRAPHIC LITERATURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that yesterday, at the University of Regina, a publication entitled "Soldier of Fortune," which glorifies life as a mercenary, was removed from the campus bookstore because it is both inflammatory and racist, and in view of the fact that this action was not construed by the CBC in its report this morning as censorship, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House commends the manager of the bookstore for his common sense and urges all those who are polluting and poisoning society with pornography to take similar action, in the expectation that they will be praised for protecting contemporary community standards, not criticized for censorship.

[Mr. Allard.]
