HOUSING

CONDEMNATION OF PATRONAGE PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing necessity.

Given the fact that, against the advice of the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has established within that Crown corporation a system of Liberal patronage, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemn the attitude of the minister in this matter and demand that he immediately put an end to such partisan practices.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the presentation of this motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST SYDNEY STEEL CORP. MANUFACTURE PIPE PLATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and important matter. In light of the continuing high unemployment rate as a result of lay-offs at the Sydney Steel Corporation, in view of the fact that the Alcan pipeline will cost an estimated $10 billion and will use millions of tons of steel, and because the Sydney Steel Corporation produces slab steel capable of being rolled into plate for pipe, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That the Sydney Steel Corporation plant be included in the provision of slab steel for the production of pipe to be used in the aforementioned pipeline.

If such a motion is approved it will put a lot of people back to work at the Sydney Steel plant.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be made, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

CALL FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPROVE INDUSTRY CONDITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. In view of serious economic problems within the farming industry, accelerated by inability to acquire reliable help due to Department of Employment and Immigration regulations, and in view of the fact that many farmers' working hours in two days equal those of one week in other industries, with overwork and frustration forcing them to cut back production, ultimately pushing up food prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration immediately amend government regulations to alleviate this worsening, intolerable situation.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

EMPLOYMENT IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women, who was appointed August 8, 1974, and made responsible for implementing and co-ordinating programs of equal opportunity for women in the public service.

● (1117)

In view of a recent report from the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and the report yesterday from a group of concerned public servants about the very real deterioration in the number of positions available with respect to the employment of women in the public service, in view of the rapid increase in the job ghetto, at the clerical level, of some 10 per cent during the time the minister has been in office, and in view of the virtual exclusion of women at senior SX levels, with only 20 appointments of women, compared with 185 appointments of men at that level during the same period, can the minister indicate what action he has taken; or what explanation can he give for the very serious situation that exists in our public service?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for showing an interest, at long last, in this very important issue, on behalf of his party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Lalonde: This is an issue about which this government has shown concern for several years. The government has announced very many policies and put them into effect. As far as the question of equal opportunities for women in the public service is concerned, the hon. member knows that the appointments system in the public service comes under the Public Service Commission, which is answerable to this parliament and not to the government as such. Parliament has enacted rules concerning the merit system which are very important to the whole system. In addition to this, I remind the hon. member who is interrupting rather rudely that there are women at senior levels in the Public Service Commission, including commissioners, who are outstanding public servants.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that the Public Service Commission itself has an Equal Opportunities for Women section and an anti-discrimination office, which was set up several years ago and deals with the question of promoting opportunities for women and making sure there is no discrimination. It examines every case. We have set up a Human Rights Commission which examines all cases of discrimination on the basis of sex. Two out of three of the permanent commissioners are women—outstanding women at that. I would also indicate to the hon. member that if he would look at the record—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the minister is on the defensive over this, because his record is a shocking one. If the Prime Minister wants to answer and be accountable for the whole of the government, I hope he will do so—because this is a crucial issue. He can smile, he can laugh and make jokes about it—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am just coming to it. I find it simply incredible that he is unable to explain. Why has the minister taken no concrete steps to offset the serious erosion of employment and advancement for women in the public service? In particular, in view of the human rights legislation which the minister indicated will be proclaimed shortly, providing for equal pay for work of equal value, what steps has the minister taken to deal with the very great inequities which exist in the public service, where men are paid, in some cases, twice as much as women and more than women are paid in traditional female occupations such as dieticians, nurses, librarians? What explanation does the minister have?

Mr. Lalonde: If the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member will give me a moment, I will be very happy to answer him, Mr. Speaker. First of all, as far as order in council appointments are concerned—that is, appointments coming under the authority of the cabinet—they have increased by close to 50 per cent in the last two years.

Mr. Gillies: From two to four.

Mr. Lalonde: These are decisions taken by this government. Secondly, in the autumn of 1975, the cabinet decided on the revised equal opportunities for women policy in the government. Under that policy, every department is now required to file with Treasury Board, on a yearly basis, its plan of action for improvement with regard to the status of women.

● (1122)

In addition, every department is now required to put forward a five-year plan, upgraded from year to year, with regard to the question of equal opportunities for women. The first year of the program was concluded a few months ago. Treasury Board is reviewing these proposals with the departments to determine what steps can be taken to improve the situation.

Third, we are in the process of putting forward and developing within the federal government and with the provinces, a national plan of action which will involve both the federal and provincial governments in all areas of equal employment opportunities for women. Once again, I am very happy to see that at long last the opposition is awakening to this very important issue and will support the action of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If that is the best the minister can do, I will direct my supplementary to the Prime Minister, as he seems to express some interest in this question. He has now been briefed by the President of the Treasury Board. In view of these so-called plans of action which have been formulated by Treasury Board for each department, and the very serious request from a group of public servants concerned about this important problem, will he state publicly, on behalf of his government, the actual situation in the public service, rather than the kind of window-dressing and irrelevant remarks that are being made?

I am directing this question to the Prime Minister, not the minister responsible for the status of women. I ask the Prime Minister, as the minister in charge of every department, whether there will be a report to this concerned group of public servants with regard to what is happening to women in the public service.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, quite clearly, has just awakened to this very important issue. Those figures are public; they come out in the Public Service Commission report on a yearly basis. They have been made public every year for a number of years. I have made dozens of speeches about this, pointing out areas where progress needs to be made. If the hon. member is concerned about not getting figures, I will be quite happy to provide him with all the figures that have been released in the past two years.

SUGGESTION WOMEN NOT APPOINTED TO SENIOR EXECUTIVE POSITIONS IN MANY DEPARTMENTS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the extent of the minister's rhetoric indicates the weakness of his case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I would like to refer to the report made yesterday by this group of concerned public servants, and to the statement that of 43 federal departments and agencies listed in the report, 27 have no females in the senior executive category, including such crucial departments as Employment, Secretary of State—which is responsible for women's programs—Justice and Labour. How does the minister reconcile this with his statement of over a year ago that "within a reasonable period" the government would make sure that men and women were represented in all departments, occupational groups and levels in protection to available numbers of qualified people of both sexes?

Given the fact that there are 27 departments with no women in senior executive categories, how does the minister who is responsible for the status of women reconcile that fact with his statement that women would be appointed within a reasonable period? What is the minister's definition of a "reasonable period"? Does this situation not concern him?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. member that, rather than relying upon an anonymous report, she check her facts and examine what the situation is, department by department. For example, in the Department of Employment and Immigration I know that there are several women occupying very senior positions. Several of them are above SX positions.

Before relying upon an unsigned document which originated from anonymous persons, the hon. member, as a responsible parliamentarian, should check her facts and find out what the situation is. As far as the policy of this government is concerned, it is exactly what I stated. This government stands by the statement I made a year ago in this regard. The steps we have taken concerning plans which every department now has to file with Treasury Board, on a regular basis, concerning the national plan of action which is being developed, with the co-operation of about 30 different departments and about 100 experts, are clear evidence of the government's commitment to the promotion of women in our society.

● (1127)

Miss MacDonald: It would be more satisfactory if the minister himself would present some facts. He referred to the report and the fact it was presented anonymously by a group. Probably the most disturbing aspect of this report is that it includes the statement, "fearing repercussions and even retaliation, the authors have opted for anonymity."

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Miss MacDonald: I ask the minister why he responded by saying, "If these people have any specific grievances, they should take them to the Human Rights Commission." Does the minister not distinguish between his role, which is to prevent the occurrence of discrimination, and that of the Human Rights Commission, which is to rectify discrimination after the fact? In advising this group to take their grievances to the Human Rights Commission, is the minister simply abandoning his responsibility in this regard?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. lady has distorted what I said yesterday. I said that if there are clear cases of discrimination which can be supported, they should be drawn to the attention of either the anti-discrimination office of the Civil Service Commission or to the Human Rights Commission, which will investigate them under a law proposed by this government and passed by this parliament, and see that proper action is taken; that sanctions are imposed.

The second option is to work through the administrative system, to reform and adapt that system to ensure that women are provided with full opportunity for upgrading in the public service. The Public Service Commission is aware of the concern felt by the government in this respect. I have, for the third time, indicated specific policies which have been developed, to show the government's commitment to this purpose.

An hon. Member: But no action.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member should realize what actually has been done.

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? On Monday of this week, my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, sought to present a motion under Standing Order 43, which was followed up later by a question from the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton to the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the government's failure to promote Miss Marguerite Ritchie to the position of chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal.

Since Miss Ritchie's record is widely acclaimed, and since she seems to have all the qualifications necessary for promotion to the top position, would the Prime Minister tell the House why Miss Ritchie was passed over and a man appointed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am informed that the Deputy Prime Minister has already given an answer to that question in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is precisely because the Deputy Prime Minister did not answer the question that I raise it again today. He gave us some words, but they added up to the fact that a man was appointed instead of a woman. Will the right hon. gentleman, as head of the government, reconsider this matter and even consider rescinding this appointment and putting Miss Ritchie in as head of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal?

Mr. Trudeau: The government did consider the matter. When we make appointments by order in council, we inform ourselves with respect to prospective appointees, and this appointment was made after consideration of the qualifications of Miss Ritchie and of other candidates. The candidate appointed to the job was one who responded to the necessities of the task. He had experience of economic matters, which, in the particular circumstances of today, are of extreme importance to the work of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. For whatever it is worth, he has seniority in the public service over Miss Ritchie.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CALL FOR STUDY OF PENSION PLANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I trust the Prime Minister realizes that he has torpedoed the fine rhetoric of the minister who spoke just a few minutes ago. In view of the fact that not only in the Public Service is there continuing discrimination against women, in terms of employment, but that they also suffer extreme discrimination in matters of pensions, will the Prime Minister direct that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is responsible for pensions generally, the President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible for pensions in the public service, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is responsible for pensions in his field, study the entire question of the pensions of survivors—in most cases they are women—with a view to achieving pension equality between men and women both in the public service and in Canada generally?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, the question of pensions generally and pensions for women has been under review. There is work in progress between the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to this issue. Some steps have been taken with regard to the Canada Pension Plan, as the hon. member knows, to ensure better rights for women in this particular field. We are awaiting the final conclusions of the studies which are taking place.

BILINGUAL BONUS FOR SUPERVISORS AND MESSENGERS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that most civil servants holding positions where the knowledge of both French and English is a prerequisite, with the exception of supervisors and messengers, are entitled to receive the bilingual bonus, although the latter may sometimes have more opportunities to speak either French or English, due to the nature of their functions, would the minister consider the possibility of granting supervisors and messengers the bilingual bonus entitlement already granted to most other civil servants?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have directed his question to the President of the Treasury Board who seems anxious to answer.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat my question for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that most civil servants holding positions where the knowledge of both French and English is a prerequisite, with the exception of supervisors and messengers, are entitled to receive the bilingual bonus, although the latter may sometimes have more opportunities to speak either French or English, due to the nature of their functions, would the minister consider the possibility of granting supervisors and messengers the bilingual bonus entitlement already granted to most other civil servants?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the provision of bilingual compensation is based upon the designation of the position itself as being required to be bilingual. The process of re-examining the designated positions throughout the public service is under way now. Where a position is designated as requiring bilingual competence, in terms of service to the public and other related matters also, the person occupying that position has to be qualified for it in order to receive the bonus. Whether a messenger would be involved or not would be based on the decision of the various departments of the federal government in their re-examination of whether the position does, in fact, require bilingual competence.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

McDONALD INQUIRY—REPORTED EXPANSION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It results from the announcement made earlier this week that the McDonald commission was going to expand both the scope of its inquiry and the staff to conduct that inquiry, which will result in its final report being delayed. In terms of the scope of the inquiry, the McDonald commission is going to parallel the Mackenzie commission of 1969 and inquire into whether the security service should be a separate unit of government. Is the expansion which is taking place in the scope of the inquiry occurring at the direction or with the concurrence of the Solicitor General?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the commission has not sought from me any formal increase in its mandate. I heard the news report to which the hon. member referred. I am sympathetic to that report and their attempts. I should like to study the matter further.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, now that we find the Solicitor General in a sympathetic mood, I will ask another question. With regard to Bill C-26, which is the legislation to permit the legal interception of mail, perhaps he would assure the House today that the standing committee which will be dealing with that important legislation will have the benefit of the evidence and experience of the McDonald commission to date. Therefore, will he undertake that there shall be a preliminary, or interim report from the McDonald commission relating to operation Cathedral, so that the standing committee will not unnecessarily duplicate matters and will have the advantage of the evidence presented to the McDonald commission?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, of course, the hon. member is raising a very interesting question with respect to the introduction of Bill C-26 and the ongoing committee. I would not like to confuse the two contexts and the two bodies. I invite the hon. member to address himself to that question when we are dealing with second reading of Bill C-26.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I am addressing myself exactly to what the Solicitor General requests. In order to make not only the legislation meaningful but the deliberations of the standing committee, and in view of the fact that the legislation deals exactly with the matter which the McDonald commission is investigating, will the Solicitor General not take advantage of my question today to indicate very clearly to the House, either in the form of a report or orally, that the McDonald commission will have a very high input into the deliberations of the standing committee when it is considering Bill C-26? Surely we can ask for nothing less than that.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would not want the hon. member to give the impression that the scope of the McDonald commission does not extend beyond the subject of Bill C-26, and on that I would simply like to indicate to him that as far as debates on Bill C-26 are concerned there is no doubt that some of the issues which have been examined by the McDonald commission might be of interest to hon. members when debating that matter. We are concerned only with the substance of the matter, and there is no question of trying to involve the McDonald commission in the legislative process.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF AIRCRAFT AT CRANBROOK, B.C.—STAGE OF INVESTIGATION INTO CAUSE

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the variety of conflicting statements made in connection with the Cranbrook airport crash of the Pacific Western airplane, some of which amount almost to the staking-out of positions in advance of an inquiry. Can the minister advise the House whether the preliminary investigation of the crash has advanced to the point of decision on setting up an independent review board for the accident?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it has not yet reached that stage. Indeed, the evidence is complicated in this particular case. The analysis is continuing. When I have a report, I will be in a position to make a decision.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, there are already so many disquieting questions being raised, as well as the divided jurisdiction among the Department of Transport, the municipality and the airline, that it should not take much longer—particularly in view of the news that the apparently indestructible black box has been destroyed, and the question raised by an hon. member opposite a day or two ago regarding the computer scramble of the passenger list. Does the minister know whether a complete list identifying the 42 fatalities has been issued?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that a complete list has yet been issued. It is unfortunate that so many partial statements are being made, in the nature of things, at this stage. But I hope to have a complete report. Of course, in the meantime I do not want to engage in further speculation regarding the matter.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, the crash at Cranbrook airport was not the only air transport accident in British Columbia during that sad weekend. I ask the minister whether his department is reviewing the regulations for helicopter flights, in light of the growing recreational activity of glacial skiing, following the news of an almost simultaneous accident which occurred north of Revelstoke, with the loss of four lives and considerable injury.

● (1142)

Mr. Lang: I am sure we will want to review carefully the nature of the use of helicopters. That will be done in conjunction with, or at the end of the investigation into that matter.

Oral Questions

ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN—QUALIFICATIONS FOR POSITION

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On Monday, when I questioned the Deputy Prime Minister about Dr. Ritchie's appointment to the Anti-Dumping Tribunal, the Deputy Prime Minister said:

> In this particular case, because of the tribunal's requirements in relation to international trading concerns it was felt that the present appointee would be best qualified.

In view of the fact that Dr. Ritchie has been vice-chairman for five years, and would have acquired the fullest possible understanding and knowledge of the tribunal's requirements over that period of time, will the minister assure us that Dr. Ritchie was informed of this new requirement being created, and was she invited to provide the minister with information about her knowledge of such "international trading concerns"; and, most importantly, was Dr. Ritchie's name on the list?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the appointment was made by order in council. Many candidates were considered. Dr. Ritchie was considered. The cabinet concluded, through the order in council, that Mr. Kirkwood should become the commissioner.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, some wag has noted that it should be called the "aunty-dumping tribunal". In view of the fact that the Anti-dumping Tribunal is expressly required by the Anti-dumping Act to concern itself only with finding whether there is material injury to the production of goods in Canada as a result of the dumping of goods, will the Minister of Finance indicate whether the Anti-dumping Tribunal is now supposed to ignore the law and the problems of Canadian industry and be concerned just with the welfare of foreign companies?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think this question is entirely irrelevant. We have appointed the chairman, and Dr. Ritchie is still the vice-chairman.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO ACTION COMMITTEE—PROGRESS REPORT ON STUDY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Some two years have passed since the multilateral Potato Action Committee was established to develop and implement a Canadian marketing plan in the eastern provinces, including Ontario. Is the minister now in a position to review the progress of that group, particularly in view of the catastrophic situation in which the producers find themselves this year, with barrel-bottom prices? If not, when—if ever—can we expect an interprovincial pact? In fact, is the Potato Action Committee still functioning?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Potato Action Committee has made recommendations. But it cannot force the provinces to do anything the provincial producers do not want to do: it is up to them. If they want a healthy marketing system or a proper sales program for their products, it is mainly left to them; and they seem to be satisfied. I understand one of the provinces has seen fit to continue with the sales program it has at the present time, which is giving them approximately $2 to $3 per hundredweight less than they are getting for potatoes in Alberta.

URBAN AFFAIRS

DISTRIBUTION OF CMHC FUNDS BY MPs

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It is my understanding that last summer the minister contacted CMHC, asking them to send all municipal incentive grant cheques to his office so Liberal MPs could distribute them. I have before me a copy of a letter from Mr. Hession, of the department, saying:

I am also concerned that it does not lay itself open to criticism of political partisanship—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House whether this practice exists, and, if so, will he stop it immediately?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what document the hon. member is quoting from but I do know that following the directions I gave the procedure concerning the distribution of these cheques has been changed.

[English]

I make no apology for the step I took in making better known the Canadian government's contribution in helping to solve the financial difficulties of municipalities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: When a federal civil servant sends a cheque by mail to a municipal civil servant, nobody knows about it; but when an elected representative makes an official presentation to another elected representative, there is publicity about it and then the Canadian public learns that federal money is at work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether, in fact, he can tell us who was presenting the cheques in the ridings of opposition members? Was it, indeed, a Liberal candidate? Just what is the process?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the procedure is that the minister is trying to make as many presentations as possible, but obviously the minister is unable to be everywhere. Indeed, I have been asking some of my colleagues in this House to represent me from time to time. Now that I see the hon. member might be interested in representing me on some occasions, I will see if it is possible for him to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of State for Urban Affairs could inform the House whether he has asked any member of the opposition to present these cheques, ever; or does he only approach members on the government side of the House on this matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, most of the cheques which have been presented so far were in the province of Quebec. Hon. members will understand very well how important it is for the people of Quebec to know that the Government of Canada distributes vast amounts of money in their province. Everybody in Quebec should be clearly aware of the fact that the government of Canada is useful to Quebecers and that the government of Quebec is not the only one to be able to do something for the people of Quebec. Most of the cheques have been presented in ridings represented by hon. members from the government side, and if we have the opportunity to present cheques in constituencies represented by hon. members from the opposition side, I shall see with these hon. members whether they can take part in the ceremonies. I shall be very pleased to see them at these ceremonies.

OPPOSITION NOT INVITED TO ATTEND MUNICIPAL MEETING ON GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, given the desire to have federal members participate in this way, would the Minister of State for Urban Affairs tell the House why, when he held meetings with officials of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton regarding grants in lieu of taxes, the only members from the Ottawa area who were invited were the hon. member for Ottawa West, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre and the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Somehow or other—perhaps the invitations were delivered by mail—the hon. members for Grenville-Carleton, Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton, and Ottawa-Carleton were not invited. Does the minister not think that is just a bit cheap?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, not at all, Mr. Speaker. I think the meeting was convened at the request of the local authorities who wanted to meet government representatives and, indeed, we responded quite positively. I was glad to see that members of parliament from the Liberal side who are members of the party which forms the government were able to attend that meeting. It was a very successful meeting indeed. At the end of the meeting we concluded it would be appropriate to hold other meetings from time to time. I indicated at the time that it was the view of participants that all elected members from this area be represented and that we would invite the others. However, when the first invitation was made, it was to meet government, not opposition, representatives.

● (1152)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Given the fact that the local municipal area covers the townships of Nepean, Goulbourn, Rideau, Osgoode, Gloucester, March, parts of Ottawa-Carleton, and there is not a government representative in those areas, nor is there likely to be one for some period of time—and indeed there is some doubt about some of the other areas beyond—does not the Minister of State for Urban Affairs consider it in the interests of the people in the area, to have representations from all members of parliament in the area? I realize he is cheap, but could he not have forgotten it on this occasion and adopted another tactic?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUFFIELD MILITARY BASE—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS ON EXTENDING TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence, and it relates specifically to the Suffield military base near Medicine Hat. My question relates to the ongoing ten-year contract between the minister's department and the British ministry of defence for the tank troop training program which is now in its sixth or seventh year. I ask the minister whether negotiations for the renewal of that contract are under way. If so, what stage are they at, or have they been concluded?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the intention is to conclude them. I cannot say precisely the state at which those negotiations are now, but if they have not been concluded, it is my understanding they shall be. I spoke to the British Minister of Defence, Mr. Mulley, and I understand they want to continue that project, as do we. There is the capital cost to be expended there, and everyone must know where they stand. There is the intention to renew that contract.

Mr. Hargrave: Can the minister say whether the government of Alberta has been involved in the negotiations respecting the contract with the British ministry of defence, not about the energy situation but specifically about the renewal of this program, as I think they should be, quite properly?

Mr. Danson: I believe they are involved in those discussions, Mr. Speaker. I am not certain, but I will check and find out. I know the government of Alberta has expressed agreement with the arrangement we have and seems to support it enthusiastically.

KEABLE INQUIRY—SIGNING OF AFFIDAVITS TO WITHHOLD DOCUMENTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It is supplementary to the one asked by my friend, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. In a news report yesterday there was a suggestion that the Solicitor General has turned over two documents to the Keable commission of inquiry in Montreal, and the reason given was that they tended to confirm statements made in the House by a member of the government. Can the Solicitor General advise the House if, in giving affidavits under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act on holding or withholding documents, he equates national security with embarrassment or benefit to the government?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DUMPING OF STEEL BEAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. As the minister is undoubtedly aware, many representations have been made from this side of the House for the exemption of wide-flange steel beams being dumped in British Columbia. Can the minister tell the House what decision has been made after due consideration of this matter?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a decision has been made in this regard. It should be announced today by the Minister of Justice.

CRIMINAL CODE

RIGHT OF DEFENDANTS TO HAVE TRIALS CONDUCTED IN OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF THEIR CHOICE

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister with regard to Gérard Filion's case and the fact that, in the Speech from the Throne, it was announced that the government would amend the Criminal Code so as to guarantee the right to a trial in the official language of their choice to all persons accused of a crime.

As Mr. Filion has been accused of committing certain acts in Montreal, and as the RCMP made the accusations in Ontario rather than in Quebec, is the Prime Minister willing to assert to the House that it is imperative that this injustice be righted, that the fundamental right be proclaimed and that the necessary steps be taken so that the rights of Mr. Filion, as well as those of everyone in similar circumstances, may be protected throughout Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am willing to state that unequivocally. The policy of the government is identical to that suggested by the hon. member. We said so at the time when the Speech from the Throne was read, we stated it again in the House on the government side a few weeks ago when we studied a private bill to grant those rights to Canadian citizens. Unfortunately, that bill was not passed because hon. members of the opposition chose to speak rather than to vote on it.

Mr. Speaker, no matter, for the government has completed the announced series of consultations with the provinces and the bill, an amendment to the Criminal Code allowing citizens to have a trial in the official language of their choice, will be introduced, and will apply in all those provinces willing to avail themselves of that right within their own sphere of jurisdiction, that is the administration of justice.

URBAN AFFAIRS

DISTRIBUTION OF CMHC FUNDS BY MPs

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It relates to the question raised by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. It is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker. The point which I think the minister avoided answering is this: he has received the strongest representations from the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation decrying the political tone which the minister is giving to CMHC. The president also put forward two alternative proposals so that the publicity which the minister seems so anxious to get will be given to these municipal incentive grants.

I ask the minister now, in a serious vein and in the interest of CMHC, whether he will implement either of the two alternatives given to him by the president, or whether he will demonstrate no interest in supporting the president by carrying on in this political manner?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member did not quite understand the answers I gave previously. He refers to a document which I do not know of. I do not know what he is talking about. It may be only an internal document, a draft paper coming from the president of the corporation.

However, there is one thing I am sure of, and that is that the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and I have established a procedure which was confirmed and approved by the president of the corporation, and under which we are giving more publicity to Canadian government financing of Canadian municipalities.

If the hon. member is not satisfied with the fact that the Canadian public be made aware that its government is active and present in the municipalities of this country, that is his business, but that is certainly not the position I will support.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, on the basis of his answer, I take it the minister is saying to the House that he denies having received any suggestion that the present method be changed, or that he received two alternative proposals. In view of his past lack of judgment, leading to his dismissal from the cabinet, I ask whether, if the circumstances are determined to be otherwise, he will resign his position in the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DEPARTMENTAL POLICY RESPECTING FOREST INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Environment. In a speech given in Vancouver on December 13, the minister told foresters that they had better lobby Ottawa if they want to see the government paying more attention to the forestry sector. Does that mean he will only carry out his mandate if he is pressured into it by the public sector?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): No, Mr. Speaker; the message was that the forest industry and everyone who was involved in it should notify politicians at all levels, not just the government. I do not need pressure; that will not make my position easier. They have never before been active in the political process. I think it is up to them to make sure governments at all levels recognize the plight they are now in.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement made by the minister in Vancouver, and the report prepared for the government entitled "Forest Management in Canada", which indicates that within 15 years to 20 years Canada will have exhausted all economically accessible forests, what does the minister plan to do to ensure that the youth of this country will have accessible forests to harvest in 15 to 20 years?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, it is well known that jurisdiction over forests is with the provinces. I told them that I have no intention of invading their territory, but I also said to them that I am very concerned, especially since I come from British Columbia where the economy is very dependent on forests. We will play our role and I will be making recommendations to my colleagues for an expanded role, especially in the fields of research and development and the use of technology. This has high priority, and it is of great concern to me. That is the way we plan to play our role, especially in the area of silvicultural research. At our meetings, some provinces told me very clearly that they do not want me to invade their territory, and I am not going to do so.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARKE—MINISTERIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS MADE OUTSIDE PARLIAMENT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am always reluctant to rise on a matter such as this, but I feel that today we have seen a further example of treatment of the opposition by the government in a manner which basically infringes upon the rights and abilities of members of parliament to do their duties. I refer specifically to the fact that a representative of the government, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), is in Vancouver. We were informed about this by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) a few moments ago.

I asked the minister what action the government is planning to take to relieve the problems of steel fabricators in British Columbia in connection with the anti-dumping ruling and the resulting tariff imposition. The Minister of National Revenue obviously has the answer, but has failed to inform parliament. Hon. members on this side of the House have raised this matter in the House many times. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has raised the matter. All hon. members from British Columbia have been very concerned about this problem, particularly the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), who is ill today.

The government has not had the courtesy to answer the question in the House. In addition, instead of permitting the Minister of National Revenue to give the answer, which he obviously knows, the government sent another minister to Vancouver to answer the question out there. It is obvious that hon. members on this side of the House cannot carry out their responsibilities when the government makes announcements outside the House. Furthermore, this action is taking place at noon on a Friday after question period is over, and nothing can be done, nor can comments be made, until next week. If Your Honour finds that this is in fact a question of privilege, I ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thought that the opposition would appreciate my giving at least an indication that there would be an announcement made today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I did not indicate that anything has been finalized, but I did indicate that I am aware that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) is making an announcement. I stand by what I have said. I hope the opposition will appreciate the fact that an announcement is being made today, and I will wait for the news release put out by the Minister of Justice this afternoon.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) knows about this, I wonder if he will make the announcement. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is here. If it is his responsibility—and he is available—why does he not make the announcement now in the House?

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make sure that Your Honour is aware that the minister did say specifically that a decision has been made, that he is aware of the decision, and that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) is assembling a select group of news people in British Columbia so that he can make the announcement there. This matter has been raised in the House on several occasions over the last few weeks. This matter affects national unity and the economy of British Columbia.

My privilege is affected. The announcement in British Columbia is scheduled to be made at 12 noon today. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Clarke) said, that denies us the opportunity to discuss this matter in the House. If Your Honour finds that our privilege has been offended, I will move that the minister avail himself of the opportunity on motions to make his announcement here before the House adjourns for the week end.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see that other hon. members want to participate in this discussion. This is not new ground. We have been over it many times before. The precedents are absolutely crystal clear that the actions of a minister, in making or failing to make a statement in the House and choosing some other locus for making a statement or in timing such a statement in a certain way, have never been considered a question of privilege. The precedents are abundantly clear, and the Chair has really no control. The choice is to be made by the cabinet.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I do not challenge your ruling, which I respect, but my role as a member of parliament is affected. Presumably the announcement today is based on a decision of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. The decision affects not only British Columbia but Newfoundland as well. I am entitled to hear the announcement in the House. In all likelihood the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has flown in the face of parliament and gone west at public expense to make the announcement in British Columbia. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) refuses to give us the information which his colleague is announcing on the west coast. If I had had an opportunity, I would have wanted to ask if that announcement concerns recommendations for Newfoundland as well.

Your Honour referred to the fact that the precedents are quite clear, that this is merely a grievance and that the Chair is not able to act, but surely there is more than a grievance involved here. When a minister leaves parliament at public expense to make an announcement, denying the House, which is sitting, the information contained in the announcement, that is contemptuous. That is grave contempt of the House, and that contempt is aggravated when the Minister of National Revenue stands in his place in reply to a question and says that there will be an announcement made outside the House today and that he has the information and yet the information is denied us. At the present time it is being given outside the House by one of his colleagues. I think that is the worst kind of contempt, and I am surprised that the Minister of National Revenue would be party to it.

Mr. Brisco: I'm not.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Minister of Justice is at the moment. I would like to tell hon. members opposite that I do not agree with their allegations. I will answer any questions they want to put to me on Monday.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the precedents Your Honour is using today are quite different from the situation in the House today. We have in this House a minister who got up and said, "I know what the minister is going to say but I will not tell you." That seems to me to be substantially different from the precedents Your Honour is using to rule that there is no question of privilege here.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the grievance that hon. members have. I have let them air it as fully as possible in the circumstances, but I am sure the same hon. members understand that there is no action the Chair can take in circumstances of this kind. I have no power to compel any minister to make a statement in this House or to answer questions in this House at any time, and that is well known. Whether I sympathize with the grievance or however fully I sympathize with it, I have no power to do anything about it. I am afraid that is well known and well established.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NYSTROM—MINISTER'S REPLY DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During question period today, on a question put by me and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) wondered what documents or letters we were referring to. I want to send the letter over to him from Monsieur Hession which was written to the minister on August 31. If he wants further documentation I can provide it at a later date.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member can send the document over to the minister without raising a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DICK—ANNOUNCEMENTS RESPECTING ALLOCATIONS OF FEDERAL FUNDS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In the House on October 24, 1974, the then minister of state for urban affairs, now the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson), in a speech on his estimates said as reported at page 719 of Hansard:

I think it is important to members in all parties to make certain our constituents know where these funds are coming from,—

In other words, that is the same thing as the present minister indicated—that federal funds are involved and it is federal people who are providing these funds.

He continued:

—because if our provincial counterparts do not let them know, they may think that you and I are not concerned or are not interested.

At that stage I rose on a point of order. In part I said:

On this specific point I happen to agree with the minister that it is most important that people in our constituencies should know where the funding is coming from. However, I was wondering whether the minister would explain his policy as to when an urban affairs program is being opened up.

As reported at page 723 I said:

I should like to put a couple of questions to the minister. One refers to a matter he raised in his speech in reply to an hon. member, namely, that he wants people in the constituencies to know that federal funds are being made available. I suggest that if he happens to finance a building in a constituency represented by someone other than a member of the Liberal party, he can still make the announcement, rather than send a Liberal from the far end of the province to represent him. The constituents would at least know that it is a federal member who is representing the government. I wonder whether the minister is prepared to use that tactic, rather than trying to find a Liberal senator or Liberal member far away from the area to go in the minister's stead if he is not able to make it, and if he is prepared to use the present member of parliament for that purpose.

The minister replied as follows:

I am already working on procedures that will be automatic and will involve the local member, because we all have an interest in showing the federal presence. We represent the federal government and it will be the local member, regardless of his party, who will undertake this work.

I rise on this point because this matter was put to the then minister of state for urban affairs and I have on record what the policy of the department is. Now I hear from the present minister that he will send in Liberals, that he is only using members from that side. He also indicates that he will only invite Liberals to a meeting with the regional officials in Ottawa. I happen to represent part of the region but I was never invited by that minister. His actions are purely partisan. He does not represent the Canadian people—his party only got 44 per cent of the vote, not a majority. I think they should return to what has been urban affairs policy as indicated by the previous minister and that the local member should participate.

I think the present practice is an affront to all members of the House of whatever party and it should be corrected now. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in order that a full discussion can take place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please—

Mr. Dick: Is the gutless minister not willing to talk?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows it is questionable whether he would be able to bring the subject matter within the confines of a question of privilege. In any case, if he could, he knows very well, I am sure, that several times in the past under well established precedents, a motion has been rejected on a question of privilege to the effect that "this matter" be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. "This matter" is a term which encompasses such a very wide subject that it would not be possible to determine the specific responsibility of the committee in the circumstances. This does not seem to be the type of grievance that is fixed in time as relating to today's answers. It may be a matter that the hon. member would want to consider further and then frame a more specific motion. Under the terms of the present motion, however, I have no choice except to set it aside.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, may I reserve and present a motion later?

PRAIRIE RAILWAY ACTION COMMITTEE

Question No. 366—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What are the terms of reference for the Prairie Railway Action Committee?

2. Is the PRAC authorized to review the Hall Report recommendation on 2,165 miles of railway line recommended for abandonment?

3. What is the estimated cost of setting up the PRAC?

4. Has action been taken on the Hall recommendation for June 30 abandonment and, if so, in what manner?

5. Are there subsidy costs for not carrying out the abandonments on time and, if so, what are they?

6. Will subsidies be required if the Prairie Rail Authority is not put into operation as recommended by the Hall Commission and, if so, in what amount?

7. What is the cost of the less expensive procedure of contracting for services as recommended by the PRAC?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Prairie Rail Action Committee—Terms of Reference:

The objective of PRAC is to recommend to the government of Canada the disposition of each segment of branch line placed in the further evaluation category by the Hall Commission. This involves a total of 2,343.6 miles out of the present grain collection network of approximately 18,700 miles. It will also advise on the priorities for rehabilitation of the basic and the PRAC category lines and will further evaluate the Prairie Rail Authority concept as proposed by the Hall Commission.

To meet these objectives PRAC will:

Assess the Hall Commission proposals with regard to the PRAC lines and initiate discussion between the grain companies and other interested parties to determine the feasibility of designating lines to the basic network or otherwise resolving the uncertainties concerning future operation.

Consider relevant aspects of rehabilitation programs for both basic and PRAC lines and review where necessary the role of selected basic network lines.

Monitor the performance of each of the PRAC lines (traffic levels and patterns, periods out of service, maintenance problems).

In close consultation with the railways and grain companies identify ways of improving the level of service where feasible by making recommendations relating to:

Changes in train runs and methods of providing train service;

Elevator consolidation;

Revised maintenance standards;

Partial or complete abandonment of certain lines and the scheduling thereof;

The economic and technical feasibility of relocating existing elevators;

The feasibility of establishing off-line elevators.

In assessing the future role of each PRAC line before December 31, 1978, options will be: (a) Inclusion into the permanent network guaranteed until the year 2000. (b) Abandonment at a date to be specified by PRAC.

PRAC will recommend the format and responsibility of any on-going mechanism required beyond December 31, 1978 for the purpose of resolving any remaining issues pertaining to PRAC lines.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Estimated cost is $300,000.

4. Yes. As of December 6, 1977 the Canadian Transport Commission has issued orders authorizing abandonment on the following June 30th Hall branch line recommendations:

	Branch Line	From	To	Miles
CN	Tonkin	Russell	MacNutt	32.7
CN	Bolney	Paradise Hill	Frenchman Butte	12.8
CN	Sherness	Cessford	Wardlow	7.4
CN	Endeiang	Byemoor	Nevis	40.3
CN	Kingman	Tofield	Kingman	13.0
CP	Colonsay	Euston	Dilkie	21.8
CP	Asquith	Sonningdale	Balgennie	15.1
CP	Suffield	Hays	Suffield	35.3
CP	Cassils	Cassils	Scandia	23.2
CP	Rosemary	East Coulee	Finnegan	23.1
CP	Lyleton	Lyleton	Dalny	15.3
CP	Carman	Kronsgart	Plum Coulee	6.6

5. Yes, these are normal items of costs as submitted in subsidy claims in accordance with the cost order R 6313 e.g., Train operations, Roadway Maintenance Cost of Capital, net salvage value etc. (Refer to pages 430-438 of R 6313).

6. The branch line subsidy programme will continue on the basis of the mileage submitted for subsidy. As the extent of this mileage is presently unknown it is not possible to determine the amount of the subsidy payable.

7. The PRAC has not made any recommendations.

ATLANTIC PILOTAGE AUTHORITY—PERSONS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 406—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Atlantic Pilotage Authority and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Atlantic Pilotage Authority advises as follows: 1. Two; neither of whom are retired public servants.

2. (a) 1975, $17,996.63. (b) 1976, $26,706.32 of which $2,790 was paid to a retired public servant.

EXPENDITURES IN CONSTITUENCY OF NEW WESTMINSTER

Question No. 461—Mr. Leggatt:

In each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the constituency of New Westminster by the Department of Transport and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The department's financial records are not maintained in a manner that would provide this information by constituency. However in 1976-77 an amount of $1,005,741 was spent in the city of New Westminster under the Railway Relocation Act.

RAIL TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDIES

Question No. 533—Mr. Howie:

In the fiscal year ended March 31 (a) 1976 (b) 1975 (c) 1974, what amount was paid by the government as a rail transportation subsidy to (i) CNR (ii) CPR, in respect of service in the Province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: Passenger train subsidies paid pursuant to the Railway Act in respect of services in the province of New Brunswick for the three fiscal years indicated are as follows:

CN	5.6	6.9	7.0
CP	0.8	0.9	1.3
Total	6.4	7.8	8.3

Although it is not the CTC's normal practice to pro-rate "through" services, the above figures include these services along with those which serve New Brunswick only. The pro-rate was performed on a route mileage basis. Payments were also made in respect of grain movements in bulk for export to eastern ports from inland points. However, owing to the multiplicity of the movements involved pro-rating these subsidies would be a very onerous task. There appears below a tabulation of payments received by Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Rail Limited, under the provision of the Maritime Freight Rates Act for the period in question. These payments are in relation to the traffic handled by the companies involved within and westbound from the "select territory" as defined by the Maritime Freight Rates Act. On the basis of the information available to the commission it is not possible to segregate amounts for individual provinces located within "select territory".

	Maritime Freight Rates Act
	Canadian National Railways	CP Rail Limited
1974	$12,525,681.00	$1,212,394.55
1975	$13,115,781.00	$1,162,585.10

NUMBER OF WOMEN IN PUBLIC SERVICE EARNING MORE THAN $20,000

Question No. 823—Mr. Howie: (Revised)

On November 1, 1977, how many women in the government, excluding Crown corporations, were earning (a) $30,000 and over (b) $20,000 to $30,000 annually?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I have been informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: on September 30, 1977 (the latest date for which figures are in hand) there were, in the public service subject to the Public Service Employment Act: (a) 248 women earning $30,000 or over; (b) 4,076 women earning $20,000 to 29,999 inclusive.

INLAND VESSELS STAMP SERIES

Question No. 913—Mr. Brisco:

1. (a) Was the Inland Vessels stamp series limited to 24 million copies and is the series no longer available from the Post Office Department (b) is the government aware that a Toronto stamp dealer and others, have advertised in the Canadian Stamp News, September 5, 1977, the availability of the stamps in pads of 50 at a cost of $325 and, if so, what does the government intend to do to rectify the situation?

2. Were post offices across Canada sold out of the 12 cent Christmas stamp by the end of November, 1977 and did they indicate that the stamp would not be available during December, 1977 and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): 1. (a) Yes, but only in the sense that 24 million copies was the usual printing quantity at that time for a first class domestic letter-rate commemorative stamp. In keeping with the practice of retaining new commemorative stamps on sale to collectors for a maximum period of twelve months from their first day of issue, the Inland Vessels stamps are no longer available from the Post Office Department. (b) No.

2. A sufficient quantity of 1977 Christmas 12-cent stamps was printed to meet the anticipated needs of Canada Post Office. However, it is possible that local demand could have depleted a specific post office stock before the end of the Christmas rush. Christmas stamps are a one-time printing and when the entire inventory has been distributed, further supplies would not be available.

CRISIS CENTRE STUDIES

Question No. 960—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1976, were studies made for the Department of National Health and Welfare by outside consultants regarding crisis centres?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No.

AIRPORT SECURITY COSTS

Question No. 976—Mr. Howie:

In the fiscal year ending March 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977, what was the cost of (i) facilities (ii) personnel used by the Department of Transport to check passengers and carry-on baggage at airports?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): (i) (a) $841,-127.00; (b) 739,298.20; (c) 781,392.40. (ii) Cost of personnel used to perform these duties is the responsibility of the air carriers.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 159 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

COMINCO LTD.'S POWER EXPORT LICENCE

Question No. 159—Mr. Leggatt:

1. What are the terms of Cominco Ltd.'s power export licence?

2. What amount of power has the Company exported from British Columbia and to what jurisdictions, over the past five years?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, once again I should like to bring it to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that question No. 147 in its original form was set down during the second session of the Thirtieth Parliament. It deals with the expenses incurred by the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) through the use of a Falcon aircraft in Europe for some 22 days. I asked what the cost of the trip was, and I was referred to another question. When you work out the cost on a 24 hours a day basis it comes to $378,504, which is a bit much to pay for the vanity of any member of cabinet. I feel the 24-hours a day basis may be unfair, and I should like to have that clarified. I cannot understand the unseemingly delay in providing an answer to this.

The Department of National Defence is noted for the accuracy and completeness of its records. I should like to know what it cost to send that aircraft to Europe for 22 days so that it could carry the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) around during the hockey series a year ago. I cannot see any reason for this continuing delay, and I would like to have an answer as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—RCMP ACTIVITIES CONCERNING 1970 OCTOBER CRISIS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain) moved:

That this House deeply regrets that the government, through neglect or because of its connivance with the police, allowed the whole of Canada in general and Quebec in particular to be engulfed in a crisis such as the one we experienced in October 1970, and therefore directs the Solicitor General to disclose in public all the facts and circumstances pertaining to the authority given to the RCMP to act as they did before, during and after the October 1970 events.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to put this motion in its context and fully understand the purpose of its presentation today, one must remember that, one day in 1970, we woke up in a nightmare and we have not been able to determine as yet who was responsible for those events which not only traumatized the population of an entire nation but cast reflections on a particular province of this country which, in my opinion, represents a people and a nation as well. And we can say that never in its history this people and this nation have participated voluntarily in any conflict, even the one in 1755 which opposed both parent states and not those Canadians who were here at that time.

Mr. Speaker, when this nation had the opportunity in 1775 to join the American colonies in their rebellion, they chose not to do so. They were placed in similar circumstances in 1812, and more recently during the Boer War, World War I and World War II, but the people in Quebec have never accepted violence as a means of settling any conflicts and even less as a means of promoting its emancipation and development.

Mr. Speaker, such a people could not create the terrorist movement that led to the famous October 1970 crisis. We must therefore denounce those responsible in order to save the pride and dignity of the Quebec and the Canadian people. Our country should not have faced such a situation. Mr. Speaker, the serious suspicions we have about the federal government can be substantiated, and this is what I shall try to do while discussing this motion.

Before dealing more specifically with this motion I wish to conclude those preliminary remarks by referring to an incident that should be explained some day to prove that Quebecers are not really responsibile for the terrorism outburst that took place in our country in the sixties and reached its climax in 1970. The founder of the FLQ is one Georges Schoeters. He was neither a Quebecer nor a Canadian but an individual who came from Belgium and who, after visiting our country and Cuba, decided to start that movement. That man was also an ardent supporter of the British monarchy. At least he was during the first ten years he spent in this country. Now, the founder of the FLQ who was convicted in the early sixties for bomb attacks, that individual convicted for criminal offences is today at large in Belgium. I would like to know why the Canadian government agreed that this terrorist be released on parole and sent back to Belgium.

Why has the Belgium government agreed to admit a terrorist formally convicted of criminal offences here in Canada? Mr. Speaker, those questions regarding the circumstances surrounding the release and extradition of that Georges Schoeters, the FLQ founder, must be answered. Why has Belgium agreed to his repatriation since he had the Canadian citizenship? Mr. Speaker, this requires an explanation. But rather than make accusations, we should kick out of office those who are actually responsible for the chaotic situation we went through. I would even go as far as to say. Mr. Speaker, that our present economic and financial difficulties might also be due partially to that confusion. That is why the motion specifically says "through neglect or because of its connivance".

Mr. Speaker, in 1970, more specifically on December 10 of that year, I had all the reasons in the world to inquire about the actual circumstances surrounding that famous crisis, that famous crisis which upset the whole country, that famous crisis which led to the adoption of war measures and put the Canadian armed forces on a war footing, that crisis when an insurrection was apprehended. It was even said at the time that the then editor of Le Devoir, Claude Ryan, headed a parallel government. He seems in fact to be accomplishing this now by running for the leadership of the Quebec Liberal party. On December 10, 1970, Mr. Speaker, I asked the government just how far the RCMP had infiltrated the FLQ. The reply was as follows, and I quote:

In answering his question, may I say that in accordance with long-established practice it is not in the public interest to reveal this type of information.

That was the reply given. I had every reason to demand to be told who exactly was Pierre Séguin, alias Yves Langlois, or the opposite, Yves Langlois, alias Pierre Séguin, of the cell responsible for kidnapping Mr. Cross. Who was this Séguin? What was his relation to the RCMP? I received no answer! I was told it was because of "State security". More recently, when little by little the former Solicitor General told us about certain somewhat irregular activities of the RCMP, I was told that if I had something to say, I should simply appear before the Macdonald Commission.

Mr. Speaker, if through neglect or its connivance with police authorities, this government contributed to the state of affairs which finally led to the October 1970 crisis, how can this same government, which appoints its friends to this commission, tell us the truth. How can we get at the truth if the terms of reference of this same commission repeat the answer that I was given on December 10, 1970? How can we have confidence in this commission if its terms of reference are:

to advise and make such report as the Commissioners deem necessary and desirable in the interest of Canada, regarding the policies and procedures governing the activities of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to protect the security of Canada—

This reason is always invoked to keep something secret. But how can we know this? Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a situation ten times worse than the Watergate affair in the United States. If the truth came out in the United States, it is because American institutions allowed for proper scrutiny. But how can the suspects be at the same time the investigators and the judges? How can we discover the truth?

The terms of reference then say:

—adequacy of the laws of Canada as they apply to such policies and procedures, having regard to the needs of the security of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps everything was cooked up and that story of terrorism in Quebec was kept alive in order to cast reflections on honest Quebecers who wanted to promote the emancipation and the development of their country.

The War Measures Act was invoked under the pretence of national security and of a state of apprehended insurrection. Mr. Speaker, how many people were sentenced as a result of the October 1970 crisis? Ten. The whole army was put on alert, we were told there was a state of apprehended insurrection and yet only ten persons were actually involved in these FLQ cells. Still some 3,000 persons were harassed for all sorts of reasons. At one time even I feared I could be intimidated because in 1963, having been accused of terrorism, I had had the opportunity to learn a little about the methods of the police. That story made headlines in Quebec newspapers in 1963.

At that time I had learned quite a few things and this is why today, I can speak knowledgeably about these events. Yet, Mr. Speaker, out of these 3,000 persons who were harassed and out of the 500 others who had a taste of what our jails are like, only ten had done things for which accusations could be laid against them. However, I repeat, we have recently discovered that the RCMP allowed itself to commit burglaries, something which has been admitted by the Solicitor General and the government itself. It has also been discovered that the RCMP allowed itself, always according to that special committee, to set criminal fires. It has been candidly revealed to us that the RCMP took the liberty of stealing dynamite! Mr. Speaker, let me elaborate on that: what was the purpose of stealing that dynamite? If the authorities needed dynamite, they only had to get the necessary permit to buy it; why steal it? Mr. Speaker, how many times has this been done during and before the October 70 crisis? The former minister called me irresponsible because I voiced my suspicions about the procedural methods of the RCMP and even sometime alleging that some individuals might have been liquidated, before making any inquiry about it. Right then he said I was irresponsible. He had himself said that there had been no such event before 1972 and 1973 the year the break-in took place. Now, on January 9, once again the Solicitor General very candidly confessed that in 1971 the Royal Canadian Mounted Police took upon itself to issue a communiqué in the name of the FLQ which invited the population to commit acts of violence and insurrection. Mr. Speaker, this is just too much. Soon the inquiry will bear on things which happened in 1970. The inquiry has now gone back to 1971 and soon it will study 1970. That is why the Solicitor General should ask himself the following questions and above all answer them: When did the RCMP start closely monitoring the activities of separatists, FLQ sympathizers, independentists and so on? At the instigation of which authority and which representatives of that authority did it undertake to infiltrate these movements? How were the results reported to the authorities?

Is it possible to know all orders or counter orders that have been given or received at the higher level since 1960 concerning any criminal activity the RCMP was responsible for monitoring, preventing or uncovering, particularly in the area of separatist activities that were viewed as illegal by the federal government? What was done after evidence was received from the City of Montreal authorities in 1969? Mr. Speaker, we have a federal police with a tremendous reputation. And when the minister announced, barely 15 days ago, that the RCMP had succeeded in breaking a Soviet spy ring, I was as proud of our national police as everyone else. They are competent, I am even told they are one of the most competent police forces in the world. How come such a competent police force, capable of competing with Russian spies, could not uncover and arrest terrorists from 1962 to 1970?

Mr. Speaker, this issue is extremely serious. The force's reputation is at stake, and I could not be satisfied with the answer that what happens in Quebec does not concern the RCMP. We have ample proof that the RCMP were aware of terrorist activities as early as 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963. Mr. Speaker, when the former solicitor general responded to my allegations concerning Michel Viger, he simply dismissed this as idle talk. Mr. Speaker, I received a letter dated December 14, 1977 from Mr. Jean Viger, Michel Viger's brother, which was indeed published by the newspaper Le Devoir. I would like to quote from it the following paragraph pointing to questions for which we will need answers. I quote:

> I must say the circumstances surrounding the death of my brother Michel, on my St. Nazaire farm in the summer of 1975, while mowing hay, are particularly disquieting. On that day I had gone to Longueuil. Michel was alone on my farm. When I came back his family was worried because he had not come to supper. Also worrying, I went directly to that part of the farm that remained to be mowed. There I saw the tractor but not my brother; but then I saw him motionless, lying on his belly under the humming tractor, his arm crushed under the weight, his left leg caught to the break pedals, his neck broken under the pressure of one of the tractor's back wheels. There was no tightness, no trace of struggling or pain. He had died instantly, and many hours before.
> Oddly enough, the tractor was in neutral, oddly enough Michel was lying under his tractor, he who was so prudent with those machines, oddly enough that had happened right when I was absent, shortly after a series of filmed interviews with Louis Martin, a very small part of which was to appear on the program "Format 60" in the fall of 1975. So on the one hand, a purely accidental death could be inferred; however, Michel's history can lead us to suspect things may have been staged to cover up a crime, in view especially of what the CIA, the RCMP and other state polices are capable of because they stop at nothing, including bombings, incidents, murders and so forth, . . . So, Mr. Matte, I am inclined to believe as you do that Michel Viger was murdered by the CIA, the RCMP or people like that.

Mr. Speaker, those are very serious things I am saying but their seriousness must not stop us from finding out the truth so justice will be done.

Mr. Ouellet: That is an irresponsible statement!

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, they will say: Michel Viger is dead. Why don't we go and ask constable Robert Samson, he is not dead but he nearly died too. What was that responsible RCMP officer doing on a Saturday night with a bomb in his hands that exploded? He did not die. Mr. Speaker, those are facts and before they call me irresponsible let us get down to the bottom of things. Was it not following those events that the government and the Solicitor General were forced to divulge the criminal arson incidents—

Mr. Ouellet: Tell us about the Wolfe monument in Quebec City.

Mr. Matte: —the dynamite stealing incidents. Mr. Speaker, when in an otherwise respectable and responsible police department you have committees stealing dynamite, committing arson, issuing false communiqués people are capable of anything. We should, I repeat, ask officer Samson since he is alive and able to talk—

Mr. Lachance: That's a real farce!

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, so we have here a police department that was perfectly aware, and that is why—

Mr. Ouellet: You should tell us about the Wolfe monument in Quebec City!

Mr. Matte: —all Canadians and particularly Quebecers kept wondering about that famous October crisis. That is why we have to know exactly the circumstances prior to the October crisis, during the October crisis and after the Quebec crisis. There are questions unanswered everywhere. Books have been written on this subject. I will not quote them all but there are at least ten literary pieces dealing with that topic.

Mr. Ouellet: It is doing them too much honour to refer to them as literary pieces.

Mr. Matte: There are also strange things going on, like different sentences given for the same crime. In the case of Colette and Richard Therrien, convicted of hiding the Rose brothers, they were given a very light sentence—

Mr. Ouellet: By the same judge?

Mr. Matte: And in the case of Michel Viger, a much longer sentence, five or six times longer. How can this be explained for exactly the same offence? Mr. Speaker, everybody is questioning that, especially after seeing the impact of this apprehended insurrection and the implementation of the War Measures Act. Mr. Speaker, these questions will have to be answered. The RCMP knew what was going on, because that is its job. The 1973 January issue of the Financial Post, on pages 23 and 24, gives a detailed account of the RCMP involvement in a general conspiracy. That question also should be answered and we have a right to know why it has not been done. I made statements in 1972, as I have been trying to get to the bottom of this since 1970. Mr. Marchand, who was then minister, said that René Matte was certainly making Weird statements—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Matte: —and immediately after evidence was given here before the Committee on broadcasting, films and art subventions in 1969, that Mr. Marchand who was then Minister did not know.

● (1252)

Well, let's see. He didn't know anything about it. Mr. Côté, chief attorney for the City of Montreal, had to tell him that was indeed the case. And, Mr. Speaker, when I state that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were perfectly aware of what was happening, it is not I, René Matte, who is speaking. The facts speak for themselves. Some very clear, very revealing testimonies were heard by the members of this House at least a year before the October crisis. The committee proceedings of November 27 and 28, 1969 which explain that the RCMP knew exactly how things stood for a long time, a very long time are also available. I would like to quote here one paragraph drawn from all these testimonies. In one instance, Mr. Côté, chief attorney for the City of Montreal, answers that:

> RCMP agents and Quebec Police Force agents share offices with the Montreal police force. And if they are on the premises when some searches are launched—and they are there most of the time—they usually go along with the Montreal policemen.

Also on November 27, Mr. Saulnier added:

> Yes, and this confirms the cooperation I was referring to in my remarks this morning. I am told that in several cases people work in the same office and searches are made at the same time by the various police forces.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious and I have the evidence before me that we knew of the matter even as far back as 1963, when the first bombs exploded. Further on the report says:

> Ever since 1963, when the first FLQ bombs exploded, we have been in the first stage of the revolutionary struggle which will develop into a total unrest situation which will culminate into an overall economic, political and social crisis. We are very rapidly reaching this critical point especially during the six last months.

This document produced by the Montreal municipal authorities shows clearly that terrorist activities were going on and that something had to be done. Mr. Speaker, that is not all. Mr. Saulnier who is, as everyone knows, a responsible and serious man went even as far as to say before this committee that he had informed the Prime Minister and the cabinet on several occasions, on three instances at least, of the whole situation. Mr. Speaker, in the face of such patent facts, we should wonder to what extent had the government planned the whole thing and therefore how far were they prepared to let terrorism go unchecked in an effort to ruin those advocating a quite normal and indeed very democratic idea.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are ready to rise. It would—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. I can give him one more minute, but in order for him to continue, there must be unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) was not able to continue. He was making some very interesting revelations, but perhaps I can carry on from where he left off. Also I am sorry the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) did not speak prior to me. However, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) will speak after the Solicitor General. Perhaps the Solicitor General will be the ham between two slices of bread.

The reason I would have preferred the Solicitor General to speak prior to me was because of the answer he gave today, which was related to this particular issue in a general way. I asked the Solicitor General if, in the discharge of his responsibilities in signing an affidavit under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, when he had to declare by affidavit or certificate that a document might well be free from disclosure, because it was a matter of national security, he took into consideration whether the document was embarrassing to the government. Most hon. members and most members of the media know that is the first consideration which the Solicitor General, and some of his predecessors, gave to the question of the discharge of responsibility. That having been done, then the Solicitor General can decide whether national security is involved.

I realize hon. members of the government believe national security and the omnipotence and the survival of the Liberal government are one and the same thing. Many millions of Canadians do not believe that at all. The Solicitor General should examine the provisions of Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. As I understood the press release, his counsel indicated that he was releasing three documents to the commission because they tended to corroborate a statement made by the predecessor of the Solicitor General in the House. That is not good enough. Much more than that is required. Extraordinary powers are given to the government to be exercised through the Solicitor General. They must be exercised on a much more substantial ground than the question of benefiting or embarrassing the government.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member should read the entire statement.

Mr. Baldwin: The Solicitor General's statements to the contrary do not impress me at all. I know what the facts are. I know what kind of consideration is given to this issue by the Solicitor General.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member's mind is closed.

Mr. Baldwin: That is not so. After a great many years of practising law in the criminal courts, I know the minds and mentalities of people. This morning prior to coming into the Chamber, I was reading a book published by Mr. Bob Haldeman in which the truth is finally being told. Daily I look over at the government side of the House and wonder if a Bob Haldeman is sitting on government benches. Before much more time elapses, hopefully one might be found.

Mr. Jarvis: The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp).

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) could write a very good book. The hon. member for Champlain deserves credit for the motion he is proposing. He has brought up an issue which should have been ventilated long before now in this country. It is relevant to present matters.

When the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his gaggle of inferior ministers slunk out of the national conference with its collective tail between its legs, having suffered a very disastrous three days at the conference, the reasons were most obvious. One of the reasons was because of issues relating to what the hon. member has said in his motion and in his statements. The people of this country have lost confidence in the government because of its failure to tell the truth and because of its continued disposition to exaggerate, to conceal, and to fail to come forward and tell parliament and the public the facts behind so many of the issues of the day. That has become so obvious that the fog of suspicion, doubt, and disbelief which originates from Ottawa has spread over Canada.

No matter how valid its suggestions, when the government attempts to introduce programs regarding economic and social problems, it faces the insuperable obstacle that people no longer believe in it. Perhaps some of the ideas kicked around the conference were all right, but Canadians reject the statements made by the government and its ministers. When that occurs, the government cannot govern any more. In the type of complex world we live in, there must be a reasonable relationship of trust between the government and the people.

Another reason for the failure of the conference was the Quebec situation and much of the difficulties which exist regarding the question of national unity. Many of these questions in regard to national unity were initiated because of the events in October, 1970.

I see it is the witching hour of one o'clock. I shall continue my exciting discourse some time after two o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, when the House recessed at one o'clock I think I had demonstrated to the satisfaction of most reasonable members that one of the main reasons for the failure of the recent economic conference, and the fact of the Prime Minister and his federal ministers crawling from it in a beaten and disspirited way, could be tied to this motion we have been discussing. I talked about the obsession for secrecy and furtiveness which has turned off most reasonable people in Canada with the result that no longer has this government any credibility; nor will it have credibility at any time, and the sooner it meets its fate at the polls the better for everybody.

The other reason for the failure of the conference is also referred to in this motion, and that is the problem which exists in Confederation because of a movement in the province of Quebec. I do not suggest for one minute that the government has to bear sole responsibility, but it has some responsibility for the situation which exists and which resulted in the failure of that conference. This all stems from the situation and the facts that existed in 1970, 1972 and 1973.

I was here in 1970 and listened to the debates. I was House leader for this party and participated in some of those discussions. To recall the events and refresh one's memory one has only to read what was said by the then minister of regional economic expansion, now a Senator in the other place, but then the hon. member for Langelier. He made a very inflammatory and colourful speech. On October 16, 1970, he talked about several thousand active members of a group and indicated that probably some were armed.

He went on to say:

One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker—I don't know any more than the police, probably much less—there is an organization which has thousands of guns, rifles, machine guns, bombs and about 2,000 pounds of dynamite,—

It is interesting to recall in that context that one of the statements made by the security force was that they had stolen dynamite. It was put in the possession of FLQ so that it could be used as a means of trying to invoke action against them.

The minister went on to say:

—more than enough to blow up the core of downtown Montreal.

Then there was a book written later by the then secretary of state, now the distinguished ambassador to France, Mr. Pelletier, in which he referred, somewhat disparagingly, to the role of the Mounted Police in this issue and the facts leading up to the issue, a book which should be required reading for many of the current members of the House.

But what were the facts? Very simply what happened was that the War Measures Act was invoked. There was the tragic assassination of Mr. Laporte, and the subsequent state funeral manipulated on behalf of the government, as I understand it against the wishes of members of the family, so that it could be made into a media event. Then, because of the wishes of the then government of Quebec—and I think it only fair to say, a government which had been following the characteristic practices of the senior government in Ottawa, being secretive and arrogant and with elements of corruption, certainly a government which did not find favour with the people of Quebec—

Mr. Lachance: That is not for you to decide.

Mr. Baldwin: The people of Quebec decided that, and that was one of the reasons for its defeat. I am a Canadian and I travel and talk to the people of Quebec, and many people in Quebec said to me that that was one of the main factors in the defeat of the Bourassa government—it was too much like the Trudeau government.

What happened after that was that there was some resistence to the act called the War Measures Act being used in time of peace and they decided very wisely, following requests of members of the House and of the province of Quebec, to bring in a substitute temporary measure, a Public Orders Act. As the then House leader I remember participating in arrangements by which it was agreed we would facilitate the passage of the second act and would approve the motion introduced by the Prime Minister, by which the House purported to accept the actions of the government, provided the other act was brought in. There was an understanding at the time that some permanent legislation would later be introduced, and certainly the then minister of justice, Mr. Turner, said that discussions were going on—this was at the time he introduced the Public Orders Act, a temporary act—and it was his intention that permanent legislation be introduced. I think that was very wise. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of the House that many of the problems which exist today would never have existed had the government followed through on its announced intention.

In the spring of 1971 the government set up a special joint committee of this parliament which was to be charged with the responsibility of dealing with all matter leading up to the need to have a law dealing with domestic difficulties which would be somewhat more moderate than the provisions of the War Measures Act, and would not contain the connotation that it was a measure in any way related to war or to apprehended warfare. The motion was first introduced for debate on May 13, 1971, and was debated. The justice critic of this party, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), moved an amendment by which he asked the House to agree that this committee would have the right to examine the facts leading up to the crisis of 1970. Mr. Speaker found that particular amendment to be in order and, the minute that was done, you should have seen the government troops run for the doors.

The then minister of justice spoke on May 19 and he made it pretty plain that, in his mind a motion of that kind establishing a joint committee with that kind of amendment to it was not one which the government would find satisfactory. So they ran away from it. The motion died on the order paper during a session which, you may recall, Mr. Speaker, lasted from 1970 to 1972. It was never brought back, despite requests from members on this side of the House as well as from some members on the other side. I see the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) here. He has been one who has urged the passage of suitably phrased legislation to deal with law and order in a domestic situation which, had it been in place in 1972 and 1973, would not have led to the current situation in which we find it necessary to establish Royal commissions to inquire into these problems. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont made a speech on October 27 of last year in which he called attention to this issue. As reported at page 344 of Hansard of that day he said:

It is important that despite the commitment made by the government leader in the House on October 27, 1975, a bill designed for such situations has not yet been introduced and the government has made no mention of it in its inaugural message.

It is interesting that the next day the Prime Minister was having a press conference at which someone picked up the statement of the hon. member, referred to it, and asked the Prime Minister what he said. The Prime Minister, with what I will call polite sophistry but which was in fact complete deception, said:

Listen, I have no serious objections. In the months following the adoption of the War Measures Act by the government of which I was leader, I even expressed a desire to see this act replaced by provisions, probably added to the Criminal Code, which would enable us to act vigorously each time national security was threatened as it was in October 1970, without having to invoke the War Measures Act.

Then he went on to say that he did not bring it in because opposition members objected. That is an absolute falsehood. That was not the case. Nobody on this side of the House, and I believe I can speak for members of the NDP and the Creditist party when I say that no one from their parties, objected to it. We pressed continuously for the passage of such legislation, and if it had been in place in 1972 and 1973 this would have been a happier country. These scandals, these problems with various solicitors general, and the three inquiries would not have taken place as they did. But the Prime Minister had the unmitigated gall to say he did not do it because the opposition objected. When did this Prime Minister ever fail to take action which he thought he wanted to take because the opposition objected? That is absolute nonsense.

That brings us into what happened in 1972 and 1973. There is no doubt in my mind that the government knew—I do not say it initiated—in 1972 and 1973 what was going on then. I do not know who knew, but certainly people close enough to be part of the government apparatus were aware of what was going on. But they said nothing. The reason they said nothing in the fall of 1972 and 1973 was an issue of some bewilderment to me, until I happened to think about it.

What was the situation in the fall of 1972 and 1973? We had a minority government. What would have happened to the minority government had the Prime Minister disclosed publicly that security forces were engaged in these activities, and in particular had broken into the NDP offices? I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and his then leader, David Lewis, would have immediately dropped the government cold. They are honourable and respectable men. I disagree with them on most things, but on an issue of this kind there is no doubt at all about what would have been the facts and the minority government of the Prime Minister would have been defeated. That is why the government kept quiet about it. "What a tangled web we weave when first we practise to deceive." That is exactly what has developed since then.

However, I think that is the end of my comments about the government. We all know these are facts. We have to look together to what we can do to improve the government. This country will make progress only if we have in it government which is open, honest, and acceptable. I am not saying anything about a new government. That is beside the point. Sometimes we have to do more than change the players; we have to change the rules. This means the introduction of legislation. This party and other opposition parties are committed to open, honest, and acceptable government.

Before this government meets its fate I would like to see it adopt this principle and say that it stands for openness and honesty. That would do more than anything else I know of to restore confidence in this country and a reasonable approach on the part of the people. It would do much to bring about a turn-around in our economic situation, which is essential if we are going to make progress. It is a challenge for this government and for the private members on the backbenches of the government side. Most of them believe in open government. Do they have enough courage to stand up to the Prime Minister and tell him that is what they want? If they do not, God help this country.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in rising to speak on opposition day for the second time since I was appointed to my present position, I did not expect I would be able to participate in the House debates, and I want to thank the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) for giving me this opportunity.

I paid particular attention to the remarks by the hon. member for Champlain, and from the way he worded his motion today I had hoped he would have somehow, suggested ways or means to help me discharge my duties as solicitor general responsible for national security in Canada. Unfortunately I did not hear such suggestions in his speech. Mr. Speaker, I am really sorry he did not because, he is fully aware that the question of national security is of prime importance and that we all like to dwell on that issue which is related, to the quality of life and freedom for Canadians. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) might like to comment on some of the remarks by the hon. member for Champlain, and I will ask him to do so. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I would rather limit my speech to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and national security.

[English]

I would like to make a few comments relating to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), for whom I have great respect. That respect is in recognition of his ability to take advantage of the context of this House and what it provides, namely, an adversarial forum in which partisan interests come to the fore on a regular basis. I have yet to hear an advocate in the opposition who is better able to employ partisan argumentation and precise adversarial comments to carry out his responsibility. I know the hon. member has been around here for some time and has had a great deal of training in his trade in the opposition. He has not had much chance to sit on this side of the House. That is why he has become so competent in what he is doing.

I would like to call attention to the first point he made relating to a press release, a statement which was made by my counsel yesterday before the Keable inquiry, and the production of three documents which previously had been subject of an application under Section 41(2) by my predecessor.

If the hon. member had read the press release further, he would have seen that they were produced as a result of some confusion which had arisen and that had the circumstances of today been the circumstances when they were produced, those documents would not have been included within the affidavit under Section 41(2). At the time my predecessor did not know of any illegal activity, and he did not have any knowledge of the "Ham" operation. It was all made clear by my predecessor. The hon. member is quite free to draw the partisan conclusions he has drawn. All I want him to do is recognize that there are additional comments which he did not draw to the attention of this Chamber to explain the circumstances surrounding the production of these documents.

I would like to deal with the matter of national security. The hon. member for Champlain has indicated in his motion that there is a crisis today which is similar to that of 1970. I listened to his comments, but I did not hear him indicate any events similar to the events of the late 1960's and the early 1970's. Where are the riots, bombs, and kidnappings we experienced at that time?

I am quite concerned about any indication that there could be a recurrence of the 1970 situation because one of my primary responsibilities is to avoid such a recurrence. I have been in my present portfolio for approximately two weeks. I have had a large number of briefings, and at my insistence there is an exchange of information on a regular basis. I am very well satisfied that the RCMP security service is an excellent service which discharges its responsibilities seriously.

I recognize that Canada, among all the countries with which we deal, is perhaps one of the most peaceful internally. It is one of the most inviolate in terms of external interference. It enjoys a very high reputation within the international community.

We have a large number of allies with which we exchange information on a regular basis. That exchange of information is a result of the confidence our allies have in our ability to preserve our own internal security and to protect our own national sovereignty. If there is one instrument which has been fundamental in securing that protection and reputation, it is the RCMP.

The RCMP is responsible for protecting us against subversive activities designed to undermine the confidence of Canadians and of our allies in our governments and institutions and designed to bring about governmental change by violence, force, terror or other criminal means. The RCMP is responsible for protecting us against the kind of trans-national terrorism experienced in less fortunate countries, a problem we do not have. I submit that the RCMP security service, by conscientiously doing its job, has protected Canadians from violence, from those who would weaken our NATO alliance and from those who would subvert our governments at all levels, as well as our institutions.

In October, 1970, action was taken by the government to establish the rule of law, a fundamental principle of our way of life, to ensure that the tragic events of that time did not occur again. It was clear that a proper intelligence on subversive activities was required. In gathering such intelligence certain unlawful acts were committed. I need not elaborate on those acts. They are now being considered by the inquiries set up by the federal government and the provincial government of the province of Quebec, and the acts themselves have been referred to the attorneys general of the provinces involved. I am sure that you would agree that, in the total scheme of all RCMP activity, which is an ongoing process by a large force, there were very few unlawful acts and those were committed by very few people. I am not trying to condone them but simply to put the whole of the operations in perspective. We are dealing with acts that took place in the early 1970's, although we are now in 1978.

I would now like to address myself to the legal and constitutional aspects of our national security operations. As you know, many things have been written about the relations between the government and the Quebec Commission of inquiry chaired by Mr. Jean Keable which is considering some aspects of the RCMP activities in that province. When the PQ was elected in November 1976, the new Minister of Justice logically assumed the responsibilities of his predecessors with respect to the charges of allegedly illegal operations of the RCMP in Quebec. Mr. Bédard, in his own right, decided to set up a commission of inquiry chaired by Mr. Keable to shed light on the matter.

The federal government has recognized that commission and promised its full co-operation. However, some problems came up with the various redefinitions of the terms of reference granted to the Keable Commission and then the commissioner demanded the right to investigate, in my opinion, all RCMP operations. The federal did not and will not accept such terms of reference, as interpreted by the commissioner. It is also on the basis of that disagreement, that the question of legal responsibility in matters pertaining to national security of Canada has been raised.

I want to be clear on that point. All the allegedly illegal activities of the RCMP in Quebec known to the federal government have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice in that province, since he is responsible for the administration of justice in that province. Quebec has on hand all the facts of which I am aware and of which the RCMP is aware and if new facts were brought to the attention of the McDonald commission, they would also be referred to Quebec or any other province involved. Such is the procedure required under our constitution which we intend to follow.

If the Quebec Minister of Justice or the Attorney General of any province have sufficient grounds to delve any further into certain activities of the RCMP, it is their right to do so, but, Mr. Speaker, I think that a provincial Minister of Justice or Attorney General does not have the right to use such offences as a pretence to examine or inquire into all RCMP activities. The government as well as myself do insist on the difference between a possible illegal act committed by a member or a group of members of the RCMP and the regular ongoing activities of that police force, which is committed to protecting national security, and which is a federal body.

According to the government, this disrespect or unwillingness to admit this difference is the important factor in the debate which is presently going on between us and the Department of Justice of Quebec and the Keable Commission. The government has made its opinion known in court with respect not only to the way the Commission inquires into the alleged illegal acts committed by this police force, but also to the way they attempt to delve into all the activities of the RCMP. The RCMP is a federal agency and the federal government denies not only the government of Quebec, but also the government of any other province, the right to examine the day to day operations of that agency. One needs not draw before you, Mr. Speaker, the absurd parallel whereby the federal government would inquire into activities of a provincial government.

Mr. Speaker, if that principle is not upheld, any federal institution remains at the mercy of provincial governments. How could we expect Confederation to work in such circumstances? That is why, Mr. Speaker, the federal government has tried to have a restraining order issued against the Keable Commission. It was not, as it has stupidly been alleged by some people, because the then Solicitor General or the federal government want to evade justice or put a check on the PQ through the Keable Commission.

As a matter of fact, the Keable Commission and the PQ government want to do a detailed examination of all legal and illegal operations of the RCMP in Quebec. We do not intend to let them do it, Mr. Speaker. In the course of this debate, we are also aware of a confrontation between federal and provincial responsibilities in matters relating to national security in Canada. The Canadian government believes that he has the responsibility to safeguard national security in Canada against any threat whether from the inside or from the outside. Spying activities in Canada are part of the foreign policy of some countries and are closely linked with their perception of their own political, military, economic and cultural interests. Such is the case in Canada. Consequently, they must be seen in the Canadian national context and stopped by federal agencies which have jurisdiction under the Constitution on matters involving foreign countries and Canadian Defence.

Mr. Speaker, I do not feel it is possible to share with the provinces a responsibility which is totally within federal jurisdiction, pursuant to Section 91 of the Canadian Constitution. The same thing may be said about international and home bred terrorists who have given their all grance to foreign and international ideologies and who, judging from their outlook at least, are part of a terrorist conspiracy. Mr. Speaker, I cannot even imagine a situation where each province would claim the right to deal as it pleases either with the KGB or the Japanese Red Army or any other terrorist organization.

It may well be that the areas of responsibilities on matters involving national security are not well defined on account of the changes which have been taking place recently in Canada as far as police operations are concerned. In many respects, we and our allies are operating differently, as in a number of them there are major structural differences between law enforcing agencies and such groups which are responsible for national security.

Historically, in Canada, both those responsibilities have been assumed by the RCMP. It will doubtless be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Security, to which the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) made reference this morning, recommended the setting up of a security service separate and distinct from the RCMP. At that time, the government did not share that opinion but, following the report of the McDonald Commission, a similar recommendation may be made again. If such is the case, the government could reconsider it.

Mr. Speaker, one can certainly find arguments in support of both these previously denounced with regard to the security services. What must be remembered however, is that the federal government is responsible for ensuring the best possible mechanism to safeguard Canadian security against all foreign threats and most domestic dangers. In that regard, I want to stress that those threats to Canada are real, as we found out last week; because of them, Canada cannot do without a national security agency, and the one now responsible, though grappling with the problems now afflicting it, has done remarkably well, for the sake of our country, as I said before. Hundreds of foreign agents are operating in Canada in the intelligence field. Terrorists have entered Canada and others try to do so constantly. It is mostly thanks to the conscientious work performed by the Canadian groups in charge of security that our country has been unscathed by international events.

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, the days of the Olympic Games in Montreal, when we were scared stiff that the events that took place in Germany during their own games might happen again. Thanks to the efforts and industry of the RCMP, there was no trouble, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the people who organize such games would be willing to entrust to the provinces part of the responsibility for guaranteeing the security of the participating athletes against attacks planned by foreign terrorists.

[English]

In closing, I wish to offer some views on the issue of security operations and individual human rights. Of all the issues involved this one is, I believe, the most critical. I should like to refer to an action in the Court of Appeal, civil division, in the United Kingdom in March, 1977, where a lower court judgment on deportation for security reasons was reviewed.

In his judgment, Lord Denning, a justice who is highly regarded and for whom I have the utmost respect, noted, "where national security was involved the rules of natural justice were liable to be modified". That is a strong statement but one which, I think, best exemplifies the seriousness of the business of ensuring national security.

What we cannot allow is covert or secret infringements of rights such as that of privacy. I say that for the hon. member for Peace River who, I am sure, agrees with that statement. At the same time we cannot hide our heads in the sand while others exploit that right to privacy covertly to plan activities harmful to us all. The balance between the two, since the infancy of democracy, has been a mature assessment of where collective well-being overrides individual desires. The forum for deciding where one begins and the other ends and the rules which must apply to ensure a maximization of both is, in our system, parliament. What we need, through parliament, is a thorough, non-partisan examination of what tools are needed to provide for tough, effective, and openly understood powers for Canadian security units. Everyone has to know the nature of the problem such as what we may lose as individuals, we gain as a community. But it should be clear that we cannot have it both ways.

If there is no wiretapping in Canada, do not fault the police for an inability to combat organized crime. If there are no provisions for surreptitious entry into Canada, do not fault the security service for rampant espionage. If there is no provision for selective opening of the mail, blame yourself for its usage to distribute heroin, or as a conduit for messages between terrorists.

Let us not agonize about this. Police and security powers should be, must be, only those that Canadian citizens allow. I say that, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that I practised law for seven years, with only one prosecution, as a defence counsel in the criminal courts of this province. In my responsibility it is a question I plan on analysing with ever-increasing seriousness. But those thoughts which I am advancing now I fully believe ware justified. If there is no provision for those measures that are required for the implementation and the protection of national security, then we can blame no one for it but ourselves for any infringement of that national security. Police and security powers should be, as I indicated, those that are presented by parliament. We should not advance more than one drop necessary in order to get the job done. But at least recognize that there is a job to be done, Mr. Speaker, and an important one at that; one which cannot be realized without full citizen commitment and understanding.

Some members of the RCMP exercised powers which were not given to them. They broke the law. That is unacceptable and that is why we have a Royal commission of inquiry looking into the matter; a commission of inquiry requested by the opposition and appointed by this government. But the fact the RCMP used authority they did not have and that they will have to answer for doing so, does not negate the reality that they ought to have such power. Indeed, I believe that to be the case, and so does the government.

If nothing else, the controversy surrounding RCMP operations has brought home to Canadians the importance of security activity in this country. It has underscored the reality that the requisite to citizen control is citizen awareness. In that sense we are growing up. The world is, and always has been, an imperfect place. One has only to look at the opposition benches to recognize that reality, Mr. Speaker.

Canada is not isolated. We continue to be the target of many threats. That is inevitable and must be accepted. Understanding that, as we have not done before, we must accept responsibility collectively for ensuring that aspect of Canadian security. We cannot continue, as we have done, to leave the responsibility to others to improvise and do the best they can. That is the invitation to excess and those who were involved in the excess really reflect an abdication, on all our parts, of not having faced up to the issue of national security long ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) requests permission to ask a question.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am so delighted to hear that news. The Solicitor General expressed admiration for the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and I agree with him. Does he have the same respect for the decision of the Lord Chief Justice who, in the Crossman diaries case, repeated these comments about security but said that when there was a dispute it was for the courts to examine the document to see if it should be produced, and not for the minister to have the final decision. Does he accept that as being wide and sensible?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the Crossman judgment to which the hon. gentleman refers. Undoubtedly if Lord Denning was referring to a law specifically requiring the examination, that law must be in existence.

● (1452)

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, this debate which is so serious calls for something beyond simple conventional criticism. My colleague from Champlain (Mr. Matte) has been denouncing for a long time this outrageous and shocking way of dealing with changes that are necessary in this Canada that we would want to reflect the deep aspirations of its people.

The present leaders of this beautiful country did not understand a thing. They closed their eyes to see what they wanted to see. This narrow-mindedness, Mr. Speaker, can only generate tremendous difficulties. Besides seeing only what they wanted to see and hearing only what they wanted to hear they remained deaf to legitimate warnings, adequate recommendations and fair and reasonable claims. So it is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the government should have remained deaf to the reports it was getting on the illegal, illicit and criminal activities perpetrated by a small group of terrorists.

Those allegations made by my colleague from Champlain are serious, very serious indeed. They are based on facts and true documents which can be readily consulted. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, by referring to the official issue of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts of November 14, 1969, to quote the extract of the testimony before that committee of the testimony before that committee of the then chairman of the Executive Committee of the City of Montreal, Mr. Lucien Saulnier, and I quote:

Mr. Chairman, and members of committee. I would like the subject to be clearly understood within its context. I will therefore read some passages that are in the document that has just been distributed to you, and which reports the observations I made, Saturday, October 11 last.

We now know that in Canada, individuals and groups are working actively to implement a plan which will carry the destruction of freedom, of our form of democratic government and, in this plan, the people's will, as expressed in the ballot box, is excluded.

These individuals and groups are inspired and financed, in many cases, by foreign political powers related to an "international" that does not share our notion of man's fundamental liberties.

In other cases, the same ideas and the same plan of action are supported by the government of Canada through The Company of Young Canadians.

For many months now, we have made the seizure of a substantial quantity of documents which justify the preceding statement with the greatest certainty. It is enough to-day, and it is my duty to do so, to raise publicly a corner of the curtain.

The partial revelations to which I will limit myself to-day are but a small example of things I know and of which I have privately informed the Prime Minister of Canada a few times in the past year.

Mr. Speaker, please note this was on November 27, 1969. Mr. Saulnier, a sensible and responsible man, comes to Ottawa to force the federal government to act, as he himself stated, after having previously informed the Prime Minister of everything. He does not understand the government's almost reprehensible indifference. He understands all the less as the federal police force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is actually aware of all terrorist activities going on in Quebec. Once again, I would like to restrict myself to Mr. Saulnier's statement, and I quote:

On the other hand, I am informed by reliable sources that the RCMP has all the information at its disposal that is in the hands of the Montreal Police Department and we are of the opinion that the Government of Canada can no longer leave the whole weight of this effort to ensure the safeguard of its democratic institutions as the sole responsibility of the Police Department of Montreal.

I suggest most respectfully to your Committee that it assure itself that the RCMP has informed the Solicitor General of Canada and the Minister of Justice of the facts of which it is aware, and if it has done so, what matters the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice have taken in this regard; and if not, why the RCMP has not reported to the ministers responsible.

Mr. Speaker, we have to be very concerned about these statements. Since the RCMP was fully aware of the illegal and criminal activities of terrorist groups, how can we believe that the Solicitor General and the entire cabinet were not also aware of them? In any case, Mr. Saulnier gave firm evidence that proves that the Prime Minister was informed of this situation well before the date of this committee meeting. Once again, Mr. Speaker, to make my point, I would like to quote further from the evidence of Mr. Saulnier. These statements can be found on page 74 of the Minutes, Proceedings and Evidence of this committee. I quote:

I must add that several months ago, the Director of the Montreal Police Department drew my attention to the nature of this information concerning these activities, and he emphasized the aspect which involved the federal authorities. I actually communicated with the highest officials of the government of Canada.

Mr. Sheppard, counsel for the committee, then asked Mr. Saulnier:

When was that?

Mr. Saulnier replied:

From memory, I would say it happened from 9 to 12 months ago. I informed the federal authorities, namely the Prime Minister of Canada. Since I was advised that the information we had was also in the hands of the RCMP, I suggested that the federal authorities obtain them.

[Mr. Allard.]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, even though this might seem incredible, the government, or at least the Prime Minister, was well aware of the conspiracy that led to October 1970 at least two years before those tragic events. I say two years at least, since my colleague for Champlain also proved that the RCMP was aware of all the activities of the FLQ since the very first outbursts of terrorism. It is difficult to imagine that the senior officers responsible for this police force thought it advisable not to inform government authorities.

Let us not be childish and believe those fairy tales. The government took full advantage of the opportunity it had to discredit an honest and democratic movement which was only arriving at Quebec emancipation and fulfilment. They would indirectly control those subversive activities. How could the infiltration of the Compagnie des Jeunes Canadiens by former FLQ members be otherwise explained? What made a police force as efficient as the RCMP unable to find and disrupt those terrorist groups for ten years? How could the fact that criminal action by the police was disclosed by the Solicitor General himself be accounted for? Mr. Speaker, I believe that like any ordinary citizen, a police officer should obey the law, all the more so because he is responsible for its enforcement. Otherwise, we would have to infer there are two kinds of police: One involved in the protection of citizens against criminals and the other committing offences under the Criminal Code while pretending to ensure national security.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that our police officers generally behave like gentlemen in their routine daily tasks and that is not always easy, I must admit. But, the worst part, to my mind, is that some high ranking senior officers sometimes seem to indulge in low political intrigues. This is the key to the whole thing, Mr. Speaker. This government, under the pretense of national security, attacked a nationalist party that was legitimate in Quebec as if it were a crime to aim at rebuilding Canada according to the wishes of its people. Of course, as they needed an excuse to fight a sound and legitimate movement, they had to make out it was a subversive and criminal organization.

Instead of setting upon terrorist criminals, they attacked an ideology. So, they have let circumstances and events happen when they could have been prevented of eliminated. This is a terrible action that will have to be explained sooner or later by those responsible. In conclusion, I stress once again the necessity of knowing the whole truth concerning those obscure events of October 1970. A whole population was traumatized and unfairly disparaged because of the failure of a government more interested in constitutional wrangles than in the welfare and freedom of the people. Let justice and truth prevail. Such is the purpose of that motion moved by the the hon. member for Champlain that I am pleased to support.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as has been suggested by the hon. member who has just spoken, the plea in this motion, like the plea in the very effective speech made by the hon. member for Peace River

(Mr. Baldwin), is in these words: tell us the facts; tell us the truth.

I believe very strongly that the hon. member for Peace River was stating what needs to be said, namely, that no government can govern effectively unless it has the confidence of the House of Commons, the confidence of the people of Canada. If the credibility of this government has suffered to the point at which many people are losing faith in it and are losing faith in the governmental process, it is largely because of the secrecy, sometimes the deception, which the government insists in practicing with respect to police affairs and with respect to what goes on in the province of Quebec.

I regret very much that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), in the speech he made a few moments ago, gave no indication that he got the message the motion was put down to convey to him and that he had no appreciation of the message which the hon. member for Peace River directed to him as well. His speech was simply a defence of past and continuing secrecy in matters of security, a defence of the demand for more rights and powers for the police, and I would say it showed an utter failure on his part to recognize how important it is to turn things around and move in the direction of open government.

The motion itself, of course, is drafted with reference to the events of October, 1970, which all of us remember so well. I remember in particular the decision which we in our caucus took a few hours before the matter was discussed in parliament. We knew when we decided we would have to oppose the use of the War Measures Act in that situation that, for a time at least, we would be very unpopular, not only in this House but throughout the country. And that was the way it turned out, too. But as the years have gone on, many people have come to realize that it was too heavy an instrument to use in that situation and that we were right in our opposition to the proclamation of the War Measures Act in October, 1970. Indeed, I think that one of the most statesmanlike utterances made in recent years was the comment by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) a while ago in which he commended the then leader of this party, my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), and the then deputy leader of this party, Mr. David Lewis, for the leadership they gave on that occasion.

Time has passed by and other things have happened. There were the events of 1972 and 1973, shrouded in secrecy. The hon. member for Peace River was quite right, in my view, when he said that had we known what was going on the political history of this country might have been changed sharply. In addition, Mr. Speaker, some of us think that the national unity crisis we have today has been made sharper because certain situations and forces in the province of Quebec were exacerbated by the heavy hand of the War Measures Act.

I regret very much that the speech of the Solicitor General today shows no indication of realizing the seriousness of the situation. It is all very fine to say we have a beautiful country with less violence and less disturbance than most countries in the world, but we are suffering a traumatic crisis in terms of national unity and a good deal of that arises from the way in which the situation was handled in October, 1970. I am sorry that the Solicitor General, instead of responding to the one specific thing that is in the motion, chose to defend the way in which he and the government are running affairs.

I said that there is one specific request in the motion, and I draw it to the attention of the Solicitor General. In the opening part of his remarks he said he was sorry the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) had made no proposals and had said nothing positive. He said the hon. member had just ranted and raved about things in this country from his own point of view. Has the Solicitor General not read the motion? The key words after the usual words of preamble are these, that the House—

—therefore directs the Solicitor General to disclose in public all the facts and circumstances pertaining to the authority given to the RCMP to act as they did before, during and after the October 1970 events.

That is the request in the motion. That is what our party wanted in 1970. I remind the government opposite that several times during October and November of 1970 the then minister of justice, Mr. John Turner, promised the House that when it was all over we would be told the whole story. We are still waiting.

The hon. member for Peace River referred earlier today to the extravagant speech which was made by Mr. Jean Marchand when he was a minister on the other side of the House. There were some pretty strong statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as to what was going on, to the extent that many people feel today that the country was misled as to the nature of the situation. The answer to our complaints about this sort of thing back in 1970 was that when it was all over the full story would be told. Now, when there is a motion before the House asking that the full story be told, the Solicitor General does not even comment on that appeal.

The hon. member for Peace River was quite right in drawing attention to the parallel between 1970 and 1972 and 1973 in terms of events which were going on and about which we knew nothing. Secrecy is still the way this government believes it has to run things. Mr. Speaker, this is an old issue—freedom of information, open government, the basic principles of democracy. I heard the fine philosophy the Solicitor General indulged in about where you draw the line between national security and freedom, but it seems to me the government has shown by its practices that it leans the wrong way.

I cannot and do not go along with all the things the hon. member for Champlain put forward in his speech. He was talking about many things of which I have no knowledge, but in terms of the basic appeal in the motion itself, namely, that the House should call upon the government to give us the facts about the October crisis of 1970, I am glad the motion is before us. I am glad the hon. member for Peace River addressed himself to it in the way he did and I join with all who take that view in saying that I hope we may yet get out of the government that which was promised in 1970, namely, the full story.

Furthermore, let that become the principle of government. Let that become the way things are run in Canada; let the government govern not in secrecy, not by giving the police more powers but, rather, on the basis of openness of the kind which will enable the people to trust government, to trust the parliamentary process. We would be a lot better off that way than we are the way things are now being run by the government across the aisle.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, we are today facing a huge scrambling operation. In fact, I think that the motion before us today in the House is futile and dilatory, and it is not in a lighthearted manner that I take the floor to join the debate. I think that the incongruities uttered by the member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) have to be staunchly denounced.

Mr. Speaker, this morning the hon. member for Champlain made all sorts of insinuations, slanderous remarks and accusations, he mixed up some facts, dodged other facts and drew his own conclusions. Mr. Speaker, what is he actually seeking by presenting such a motion today? I am asking myself the following question: Why is it that a member whom I otherwise respect very much, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), associated himself with such muck raking and confusion breeding tactics? Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, objectivity is a rather scarce commodity these days. Some will say that it is even more scarce in the field of politics. It may be so, I agree. Some people look at things through a magnifying glass. They scrutinize the facts, blissfully ignoring the context of a given situation. Some look at the facts through the small end of the scope. They are so general in their remarks that they forget what is important as well as the details. But in the case of the hon. member for Champlain, Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that he looks at the facts through a frosted glass. His vision is so blurred that you end up asking yourself what is he getting at. You can even ask yourself the following question: What does he actually want to accomplish by presenting the facts that way? Is he trying, Mr. Speaker, to resuscitate the dead? He referred to the history of Quebecers throughout the years, he stated that they are peaceful people who respect institutions, who are law abiding, who like order and he immediately jumped to the conclusion that it was impossible for insurrection to take place in our country, in our province, because of that peaceful and quiet history. Mr. Speaker, there is no causal relation between the two. I do not understand very well how he intellectually proceeds to arrive at such a conclusion. In any event, he mentioned a whole series of facts chosen at random, he tried to relate these facts in order once again to derive fallacious conclusions. Mr. Speaker, I have had a lot of difficulty following his thought and this is why I am saying that what is left of that whole issue is nothing but a blurred and unhealthy hodge-podge.

Mr. Speaker, the member for Champlain referred for instance to the Samson affair. He stated that Samson is not dead. But he did not go on with his argument. He planted doubts about the activities of officer Samson, and regarding the orders he was supposedly complying with. This is why I say that this way of presenting facts draws dangerously close to some form of intellectual dishonesty. This is why I feel obliged today to take part in this debate, in order to try and denounce this situation as strongly as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I definitely will not endorse the contents of the Opposition motion presented today by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) on behalf of the Social Credit party. I think once again that the confusion in the terms of the motion—and I urge all hon. members to reexamine this motion—cannot but lead me to ask very serious questions first, about the facts that are stated, second, about the conclusions drawn by the member, and third, about whatever he is asking the government to do.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, what is the gist of that motion? It is the War Measures Act. I was not a member of this House in 1970 when it approved the government motion for the proclamation of war measures. The hon. member for Champlain was a member at that time. Where was he? Nowhere. I looked, Mr. Speaker, and I stand to be corrected if I am wrong, I looked for an intervention from the hon. member for Champlain when the War Measures Act was discussed in this House. I found none whatsoever, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, his leader was in the House and he accepted the arguments put forward at that time. He said, Mr. Speaker, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, of course the measures we intend to approve today make poor publicity for us abroad. However, we must cope with the situation. The government can rely on our support to prevent recurrence of such acts as have been perpetrated.

Mr. Speaker, when the vote was called for implementation of the War Measures Act, the Social Credit party did support the government but the hon. member for Champlain was not there. If at that time he thought there was no state of apprehended insurrection, why did he not say so? Why did he not vote against the motion at that time? Or must have realized later on that supporting the War Measures Act had been like using a steam-roller to crush an ant-hill. This is possible, and I recognize that it is questionable.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why he comes to us today, in 1978, and implies that there was no apprehended insurrection and, this is even more serious, I ask myself questions in the light of his statement that the RCMP stirred up these disorders. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, to refer to Constable Samson, to try and relate this thing to the theft of dynamite he mentioned, to try and relate both events to other unfortunate incidents which are at present being investigated by a Royal Commission—he carefully avoided saying that there was such an inquiry on this matter, but implied, and once again, it is easy to imply, that nothing would be known of the conclusions of this commission since it is in the government's pay, is merely jumping to conclusions.

It is very easy to do that, Mr. Speaker. Insinuations can be made by the dozen but, Mr. Speaker, one cannot necessarily draw conclusions from insinuations, and I am afraid that the hon. member is systematically drawing his own conclusions, one by one, and, setting himself up as an accusator, an arbitrator and a judge he states: as the RCMP acted illegally in the past, there was no apprehended insurrection in Quebec, there were just one or two score trouble-makers and the War Measures Act was perhaps simply a tool in the hands of the government. And there, we do not know exactly what he means or what he is suggesting. Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to something more important. Let us not forget that the hon. member for Champlain takes pleasure in ambiguity, Mr. Speaker. Let us not forget that the ideas of the hon. member for Champlain on our institutions are not as clear as they ought to be, and it is his prerogative to behave in such a way. He talks about a Quebec community, a Quebec nation, but very seldom refers to our federal institutions.

Mr. Speaker, in an effort to reflect upon the RCMP, would the hon. member for Champlain not be playing another game? I do not know. Yet, having heard the remarks he made this morning, I cannot help wondering, Mr. Speaker, which is unfortunate in a debate such as this. In fact when you make gratuitous accusations, or hastily draw wrong conclusions, or make nebulous suggestions, you sow the seeds of doubt in the public's mind something which I feel is extremely dangerous, Mr. Speaker, and should be exposed.

Mr. Speaker, I referred a while ago to the War Measures Act. I was a student at the time, and I must say that I had then and still have serious reservations about the implementation of that legislation. As I was saying, in view of the way the events were described at the time, the government may very well have overreacted—something which is debatable—in its use of the judiciary.

We were not aware of this in 1970, Mr. Speaker. We heard about it later! When the Prime Minister of Canada appeared before this House and asked for support of the motion, he did state that actual events as well as the information he had received pointed out to a potential danger. That is what he claimed at that time, after reading a letter from the Quebec prime minister requesting, and I emphasize the word "requesting" federal intervention. His Honour Jean Drapeau, the Mayor of Montreal, also wrote a letter stating that, in view of the circumstances, additional forces were needed to restore order. Mr. Trudeau, who was Prime Minister at that time stated on October 16, 1970, and I am quoting from his speech:

> In spite of this political climate, a handful of fanatics is enough to . . .
> We are not talking in terms of hundreds of people—
> . . . a handful of fanatics to show us how fragile a democratic society can be when democracy is not prepared to stand up, and how vulnerable to blackmail a humane and tolerant people can be.

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker. Again, the fact that there has been a few dozen convictions does not justify our jumping to conclusions after the fact—it is easy after eight years—and to say there was no apprehended insurrection, indirectly alleging at the same time that the RCMP was there to stir up trouble and speed up the passage of this measure. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but it is very difficult for me to understand the reasoning and the mental process that lies behind all this.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances I believe I have established clearly enough that the allegations of the hon. member for Champlain are unfounded, at least so is the inference he derived from them.

I would simply like to remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that in his long list of supposedly seditious acts by the RCMP he included the death of Michel Viger. He quoted at that point a letter published in Le Devoir of December 20, 1977. However, Mr. Speaker, he quoted only what was convenient for him to quote, and I shall now complete his quote because I think it is important for the record and for the information of all Canadians. I will simply quote the rest of that letter addressed to the hon. member for Champlain, Mr. Matte, and signed by Jean Viger:

> I would therefore ask you to either elaborate and prove the basis of your allegations, or retract your statements which tarnish the memory of my brother Michel.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I have anything else to add, this proves adequately that the accusations made by the hon. member for Champlain are groundless.

[English]

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, before I deal with the substance of or the implications arising from the motion, may I be permitted to make one or two comments, the first of which is directed to my colleague who has just spoken, the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). He and I obviously interpret the motion or its implications in different ways, because, if I understood my colleague correctly, he found this debate very distasteful or abhorrent, though I forget his exact words.

I make no comment on his interpretation of the speech by the hon. member in whose name the motion stands, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte). Nor will I attempt to comment on his interpretation of the facts that arose during that very unhappy period of our history. However, I do not find this debate distasteful. I wish we were permitted the luxury of debating things which are not quite so difficult to come to grips with, and if I misinterpreted the hon. member's remarks I apologize.

That hon. member did participate in a careful examination of terror in Canada, but terror of a different kind—terror in our prisons. I think he found that, while the subject of the motion was not an easy thing to come to grips with, at least it is productive and a responsible thing to do. If I misinterpret what the hon. member said I hasten to apologize, but I got the impression he found this motion a distasteful subject to bring to the floor of the House of Commons. That was obviously a misinterpretation.

May I deal very briefly with what the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) said, or did not say. Unfortunately he would not come to grips with what I think is the issue here. I will just make one or two comments on his remarks.

Firstly, he was very disappointed that an atmosphere of partisanship had been created. For a Solicitor General to be living in a glass house such as that is difficult to understand. He has come to his present office through a very unhappy and regrettable set of circumstances which created the vacancy there. I can only presume that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in seeking to fill that vacancy, did not ask himself who was best able, through experience, for example, to deal with the present system, or who was most sensitive to the pressures and responsibilities that flow from becoming Solicitor General, or who has served the longest on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Those were not the criteria used in the selection of a successor. The criterion was: where could the Prime Minister find a good, tough, hard-nosed debater who could stonewall and sandbag in the House of Commons? That was the criterion and that is a matter perfectly within the responsibility and judgment of the Prime Minister. That is not the criterion I would choose, but I do not deny him that right.

The present Solicitor General has dedicated himself to tough, partisan debates in this House for five and a half years. He is good at it; that has been his style and his responsibility in this House. But let us not try to mislead the House into thinking there has been a remarkable transformation on the part of the present Solicitor General, when all of a sudden overnight, or within two weeks, we see a move from what was a very tough, partisan Liberal backbencher to a completely non-partisan, sensitive and delicate Solicitor General. That is simply incomprehensible. Let us remove that part of his contribution, or lack of it, from this debate.

The other thing that the Solicitor General preoccupied himself with, for whatever reason I do not know, was the excellence, on the one hand, of the security service, which no one is debating, and, on the other, the very delicate line between civil rights and the necessity to preserve our national security. That is not an issue in this debate. Let me say to the Solicitor General, in respect of mail interception, for example, that I support in principal the legal interception of mail in certain special and specified circumstances, given adequate safeguards and when other more usual law enforcement measures are ineffective. There is no quarrel there.

It is very regrettable that the Solicitor General did not come to grips with what I believe to be the implication of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Champlain. The implication as I understand it is the continuing inability of Canadians to know the full facts and truth about a very unhappy part of Canada's history. That is the implication I understand from this particular motion.

I was not a member in October 1970 and I did not live in that part of Canada which was most directly subjected to these events. However, I share the concern of the mover, and I think of all Canadians, that we do not know and are unable to know what were the events and the facts that surrounded and led up to that very unhappy situation. I say this because the Prime Minister has set the style in the context of our times in 1978. I will come to that matter in a few minutes.

There was a time in this House when all of the facts could have come out very properly in a forum constituted for that purpose. This was in the days following May 13, 1971 when the then minister of justice, John Turner, made this motion:

> That a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to examine, inquire into and report upon the nature and kind of legislation required to deal with emergencies that may arise from time to time in the future by reason of lawlessness or violence in Canadian society and that endanger the existence of government or the maintenance of the peace and public order;—

The motion goes on to say that there shall be 12 members of that special committee, which will have the power to sit during the adjournment of the House, the power to report from time to time, and so on. That motion was moved on May 13, 1971, and of course it was prompted by the need to repeal the temporary Public Order Act. It was also prompted by the void that existed between, on the one hand the Criminal Code and, on the other hand, the War Measures Act, a very obvious and continuing void.

On that same day, May 13, 1971, an amendment was put by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). It read as follows:

> That the motion be amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof the following: "and, for better assuring the purposes of such report with respect to emergencies that endanger the existence of government, inquire into and first report upon all the circumstances anticipatory of and giving rise or purporting to have given rise to the proclamation of the War Measures Act on October 16, 1970, as well as all the circumstances thereafter following and thereto related which may have or presently or in future may endanger the existence of any government, whether federal, provincial or municipal".

There was a debate on the admissibility of that amendment. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) put it succinctly in one sentence—and I ask him to excuse me for quoting him while he is here in the House—when he said:

> How in the name of heaven can a joint committee examine what it proposes to do in the future regarding emergencies of this kind unless it examines the procedures of the past?

Mr. Speaker ruled that the amendment was in order, and John Turner and his colleagues ran for cover. There is no other way to describe what happened than to say it was a simple retreat in disorder from an obvious responsibility of the government of the day. They had no idea that that amendment would be in order, and the minute it was, they went full speed in reverse. Because they did not believe that Canadians should have the right, through their elected representatives, to have a properly constituted, special committee to examine this crucial area. Therefore, not only do we not have a special committee, we have no legislation.

Five months later, the hon. member for Calgary North tried again to resurrect this government order but was turned down. Seven months later, in December of that year, the hon. member for Peace River tried to get some assurance that that particular matter would stand over into the next session, but he was turned down. Therefore, we have no legislation. To the everlasting shame of this government, we have no legislation to fill the void between the Criminal Code and the War Measures Act.

Why do we not have this legislation? Not for purposes of national security; that is absolute nonsense. This information is not being withheld for purposes of national security. It is being withheld because of the government's paranoia and passion for secrecy. They do not know what is secret any more. They have forgotten the original reason for keeping information secret because every report and every communique is presumed to be secret unless someone can prove to the contrary. The presumption is secrecy, not openness, and if you start from that point, almost everything will be secret. As I said, I will put it in the context of today. What is the context of today? Is it the peaceful and quiet Canada that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) spoke of earlier this afternoon? It is not peaceful and quiet. We are a peaceful and quiet nation by tradition and through our heritage, but it is not peaceful and quiet in Canada today. We have just witnessed the expulsion of 13 Russian nationals. We have reports of 300 Russian and Cuban trained terrorists in our country. We have reports of the funding of terrorist activities. We have, as the Solicitor General said, the danger of foreign agents operating here or coming here to operate. We have arms smugglers. And, to use the Solicitor General's words of earlier this afternoon, we have real threats. The result is, not panic, but concern, and so it should be. But we find it so distasteful that we are not willing to come to grips with it.

In Germany they are coming to grips with it. Today's issue of the Journal contains a headline which reads "Bitter Bonn Anti-terrorist Debate". I presume that our colleagues in Germany are not relishing that debate, but they are coming to grips with it. Some members voted against a particular piece of legislation because they thought it went too far, while others thought it went not far enough; but they are coming to grips with it. We are not. We do not even have a piece of legislation in place which would fill the void I spoke of.

What has this led to? It has led to the concern I mentioned but, what is far more dangerous, it has led to cynicism. People are cynical about national security, and of all issues where we do not need or want cynicism, it is in terms of law enforcement, law and order and national security.

The Solicitor General said—I believe I quote him almost verbatim—that he deplored the motion and the speech of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) because what he was looking for, or what he wanted, was suggestions for improving the Solicitor General's ability to deal with his responsibilities and with national security matters, but that we had made no such suggestions.

I will give him one suggestion and I will give him an opportunity to stand up on a point of order and reply to it. I call on the Solicitor General to resurrect the Turner motion of 1971 with the amendment. He cannot possibly say that one cannot look at the events of the past to determine what legislation we will have in the future. He cannot have the McDonald commission making recommendations without investigating activities which have led to those recommendations. So I will give him that positive suggestion upon which he can act. Let him bring in the motion which Mr. Turner brought in 1971, perhaps in more compatible terms with today's activities but certainly pursuing the same end, and from which he retreated with full force along with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the rest of the cabinet when they thought there might be some disclosure of facts leading to the necessary legislation. That is a positive suggestion, and we will support it on this side.

Let him not say this is a matter more properly to be considered by the McDonald commission. This has nothing to do with the McDonald commission. I agree with the Solicitor General that the law enforcement agencies of this country need the necessary tools and legislation to fulfil their serious responsibility. What we are talking about is, what legislation does the government have for a situation in which we would have terrorist activity with which we would have to deal quickly? There is no point hiding behind the McDonald commission when it comes to resurrecting that particular motion and the amendment to it. If the Solicitor General is serious in looking for means to aid law enforcement agencies and fellow Canadians in dealing with security matters, surely nothing is more self-evident than to put faith in members of the House to deal with the proposed legislation to counter terrorist activities once they have occurred. It is as evident today as it was in 1971 that he, as this country's senior law enforcement officer is responsible for national security, has the obligation to fill the void that existed in 1970 and which continues to exist today.

Surely that is something which cannot be shunted aside or subjected to a shroud of secrecy. Surely there cannot be a plausible argument against constituting that committee, which was a great idea, according to Mr. Turner and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in 1971, until they realized that some facts would be disclosed. I call upon the Solicitor General to bring before this House a government order constituting either a special joint committee or a committee of this House to study the events before and after the crisis of October, 1970 with a view to recommending legislation to the House of Commons and to the other place which would properly fill the void which exists now between the Criminal Code and the War Measures Act.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be worthwhile to look at a few of the assertions in the motion because I have not yet heard in this debate anyone comment on the following one:

> That this House deeply regrets that the government, through neglect or because of its connivance with the police, allowed the whole of Canada in general and Quebec in particular to be engulfed in a crisis . . .

I think we should look at that statement carefully because it attacks the government as well as the police. The motion does not single out the Quebec Provincial Police, the RCMP, the Quebec city police or the Montreal city police. It refers to the police generally.

Although I am not a lawyer, I believe that negligence consists of doing something a prudent person would not do. I suppose the negligence referred to by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) is the imposition of the War Measures Act. I have to assume that because I cannot tell from reading this motion.

The second allegation is that if the federal government was not negligent, it connived with the police to cause a crisis in Canada in general and in Quebec in particular. In other words, the government somehow contrived to bring about a situation so that it could impose the War Measures Act. I have listened to hon. members opposite make speeches on capital punishment and on other things, and I know that they are very much aware of the need for law enforcement and for strong legislation to protect law-abiding citizens. However, this motion states that the government may have connived with the police to cause a crisis.

I do not think the government allowed a crisis to come about with its knowledge. I suspect that a group of terrorists, the FLQ, perpetrated acts of terrorism such as bombings and kidnappings without the by-your-leave of the federal government. I suspect that these things were done at murky levels, if I may use that term. Certainly these things were not done in the light of day. The government of Canada was not able to prevent that situation because it cannot grab people off the street for things they think or plan. There has to be concrete proof that people are breaking the law.

The motion alleges that if there was not negligence, the federal government connived with the police so that it could create a situation in which it could bring in the War Measures Act. I do not think that is what happened. I think that 50, 100 or perhaps 200 people—I am not aware of the number, and I understand it was not very large—brought the situation about. We have seen what can happen when one or two terrorists hijack an aircraft, kidnap a wealthy industrialist or do a variety of things. One or two people, let alone 100 or 200, can cause panic.

With hindsight we wonder whether the government overreacted to the situation or, as some people might suggest, did not go far enough. I know that the New Democratic Party opposed the War Measures Act, but it also voted as a group against the retention of capital punishment. The philosophy of the NDP is different from mine. I have always believed that those who break the law, whether they be terrorists or premeditated murderers, should be dealt with very severely. The NDP does not believe that, and that is its prerogative.

I was not a member of this House in 1970, but I was a resident of this country, and although I lived in B.C., far from Quebec, I felt that whatever affects one province or area affects the whole country. A sore thumb or hand affects the whole body. In 1970 the people of Canada felt that acts of terrorism such as kidnappings, bombings and political assassination were foreign to our country and that the government should proceed with despatch to ensure that acts of that nature did not spread. I respect the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I wonder what guarantees he could have given in 1970, if strong measures were not taken or if a strong federal presence was not apparent, that the crisis would not have spread. If it is perceived that in a crisis prompt action is forthcoming, that tends to stop the spread of that crisis. If terrorists see that their fellows are dealt with effectively, does this not indicate to sympathizers that it would not be in their best interests to become involved? The very fact that strong action was taken perhaps prevented the terrorist activities of others.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Such as arresting 500 innocent people?

Mr. Anderson: I cannot give figures any better than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to what effect the War Measures Act had on the situation. However, I perceive that most Canadians, whether they be in British Columbia or Newfoundland, believe that those who transgress the laws of the country should be dealt with effectively, especially in a situation in which there is a group dedicated to the violent overthrow of the government. Most people feel that groups like that should be dealt with firmly and effectively. I suspect the people of Canada still feel that way not only about the FLQ in 1970 but about the whole question of preserving and maintaining our society for law-abiding citizens. Most people do not think there should be special concessions or exemptions for people who may be involved in criminal activities, whether that be the sale of heroin or any of the activities that we know exist in Canada through the efforts of organized crime.

I realize many people in this House and across the country may say that we must have due process of law, and I agree with that. But surely it should be the duty of government to protect our law-abiding citizens above those who transgress against the law. Surely the people of Canada expect this House to protect their interests. I know members would certainly protect the interests of law-abiding people above those who transgress against the law.

There is some question about whether a crisis existed in 1970. I suggest that bombing, rioting, kidnapping and political assassination constitute a crisis and that the government of Canada not only has the right but the duty to respond to that crisis. If that is not the case them I am willing to listen to argument, but I suggest that a crisis did exist.

To explore in hindsight the question of how much pressure should be applied is fruitless. I suspect the only one who comes out ahead in this argument is a premier of a certain province very close to us.

I was very surprised to see members from the province of Quebec stand up and criticize the police and government and at the same time have the backing of the two opposition parties. I realize that in a democracy one can say whatever one wishes, but going strictly on the politics of this I do not think it has hurt the Liberal party. According to statements made in this debate it is the Liberal party that turns out to be the law and order party of Canada, not the Conservatives.

We have provided some more ammunition for the press of Quebec to use tomorrow and on Monday. The member from this side who spoke ahead of me asked what the point was of bringing this motion forward at this particular time. Of course, the opposition parties thought it was a good time to hit the Liberal government, forgetting about national unity and the Quebec newspapers; just get the Liberals because an election is coming. Are they more interested in obtaining power than in keeping this country together? From some of the things that was said it seems that certain people are more interested in political gain than in keeping the country together. That is why I applaud the remarks of the hon. member who spoke before me. He was the first to put this motion in its proper context, the political one. It will give Mr. Lévesque ammunition and will hurt the federalist cause in Quebec.

I say that in all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, and wish to dissociate myself from the remarks of those who attacked both the federal government and the police force. This gives Mr. Lévesque another free ticket. Why not just send money to him for his campaign to separate from Canada? He is grabbing at every speech made regarding the police and the events of 1970 and claiming that is what he is saying in the province of Quebec, that people cannot trust the police so they have to get out of confederation.

This position is aided and abetted by members of the opposition. Perhaps we will get down to the context in which we should be debating this rather than dealing with points of order about what should have been done in a legalistic sense eight years ago.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to participate in this debate. I strongly support the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance).

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) referred to an excerpt from the speech I made in this House on October 27, 1977, when I repeated parts of a speech I had made previously about the need to reconsider the War Measures Act and the advisability of making substantial amendments with a view to ensuring that in this country civic and political liberties be always guaranteed by the judicial institutions, whatever the political context in which they are exercised.

The hon. member for Peace River read an extract from my speech. He also referred to an answer given by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) in his press conference which followed the debate, and it is following that answer from the Prime Minister that I wrote to the hon. member for Peace River on November 22, 1977, and also to the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), asking them what was their party's position on the need to reconsider the advisability of leaving the War Measures Act as is in our statutes to face emergency situations such as we had experienced in 1970.

The leader of the New Democratic Party answered me on January 23, 1978. Since that letter has not yet been made public, I will take the liberty, with the permission of the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Knowles) of reading it to you, because in my opinion it is crucial to today's debate. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby wrote as follows: In answer to your letter of November 22, 1977, I should like to restate the position that the New Democratic Party has always taken towards the War Measures Act, a position which has not changed since 1970. If one refers to the debates which took place in this House following the implementation of the War Measures Act, it is quite obvious that the NDP strongly advocated that this act be amended or repealed.

We think that the War Measures Act could lead to an abuse of parliamentary powers, a derogation of the Constitution of Canada and the violation of rights and freedoms Canadians enjoy. In fact, Mr. Lewis, the former leader of the New Democratic Party, opposed the motion to set up a parliamentary committee, the main purpose of which would have been the drafting of a special legislation similar to the War Measures Act. In the remarks he made in this House, as reported in Hansard on May 13, 1971, on page 5795, Mr. Lewis made it clear that, in his opinion, special legislation was not an answer to urgent situations. The New Democratic Party always maintained that the government should have the courage to introduce a bill in this House. We did not see the need for a special legislation but we were in favour of amending or repealing the present act. The motion introduced in the House in 1971 said that a special act was needed and therefore did not provide for a prior consideration of its need nor mention human rights and liberties.

Although we felt that the provisions of the Criminal code allow an effective intervention in urgent cases, we introduced amendments to replace the War Measures Act. As you will undoubtedly remember, Mr. Douglas tabled in October 1970 a bill which would have forced the government to inform the country of the circumstances that call for the application of the War Measures Act. It suggested that these special powers granted under the act should be limited to the right, first, of searching without warrant, second, of making arrests without warrants if there are valid grounds to suspect that a person is participating in the apprehended insurrection and, finally, to detain a person without charges being laid for a maximum of seven days. The proposals also contained other important aspects, such as the protection of several liberties by means of the right to consult with a lawyer and the safeguard of the rights granted under the act. The New Democratic Party did not depart from that position taken in the early 70s.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) did not answer in writing the letter I sent him on November 22, nor for that matter the letter I sent him on January 19, 1978 as a follow-up to the previous letter, asking him to define the position of his party, and perhaps alos his, on the proposed amendment or repeal of the War Measures Act. He rose that afternoon and I note the answer he gave. It will be found, in Hansard and it will certainly be useful during the debate that that will take place on that matter, for that debate will at least give us an opportunity to know clearly and precisely the position of the two main opposition parties as far as the advisability of amending or modifying the War Measures Act is concerned.

The need, Mr. Speaker, to further discuss that matter appears more obvious following the comments made by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) in an interview with the CTV private television network at the end of 1977. Indeed the Prime Minister gave hypothetical answers to hypothetical questions. But his answers did illustrate the importance of eliminating from our statutes the causes of potential abuse of power. Of course several elements relating to the October crisis of 1970 remain difficult to understand. It seems that we get more and more information. Last January we had the opportunity to read a letter from two exiled FLQ members who, through a Montreal daily newspaper, informed us about their new views relating to the events that occurred in October 1970.

Mr. Speaker, it still remains that even if we set up a royal commission, as long as the main actors of the events of October 1970 are not allowed to appear, here in Canada before a royal commission or before a regular court to give evidence of those events, of what they did at that time and of their responsibility in connection with those events all the debates that we might have to discuss what happened and to judge people who directly or indirectly were involved in those events will always remain partial answers.

However, we have gained something from these events. Surprisingly enough, Mr. Speaker, what we have gained can be found in the legislation which has been passed by Parliament since 1970. I am referring to the concept of national security. Until the events of October 1970, national security had never been a great concern for Canadians. Of course, we had the Mackenzie Commission who had been set up a few years earlier to investigate all the implications of national security in federal agencies and especially of Canadian commitments to some foreign countries, but several of the recommendations made in this report were not implemented.

Several members mentioned a recommendation concerning the opening of mail, which emphasized the need for the government to amend certain legislation, such as the Post Office Act and the Criminal Code of Canada. So the year 1970 saw the birth of the concept of national security. This concept is rather strange and very vague. It is hard to defined and is fairly wide encompassing. In fact, it was devised by modern democracies. This is a concept that we are attempting to define through legislation to fight what is now called revolutionary warfare or urban guerillas—and countries like the Federal German Republic are now facing much more crucial situations than we had in Canada in 1970. Attempts to define this concept through legislation have always been cautious. When it is mentioned in Canadian statutes it is always in passing without complete definition. For a better understanding of the term, it is necessary to refer to the authors or to the doctrine that initiated the concept of national security.

The most recent and commendable work on this subject is, in my opinion, Joseph Comblin's "Ideology of National Security". The Solicitor General of Canada should certainly read this work which gives the history of this concept in the legislation of some countries over the last 30 years. Comblin defines national security as follows, and I quote from page 41 of his work:

> National security is the authority given to the nation by the state to impose its objectives on all opposing forces. Naturally, such an authority is powerful. It is therefore the power of government able to counter all opposing forces and to ensure that national objectives prevail.

The counsel of the Solicitor General of Canada was in the gallery earlier this afternoon. He had the opportunity to define the national security concept in his plea before the Court of Appeal in January in a procedure to invalidate or dispute the terms of reference of the Keable Commission in Montreal. He defined the national security concept as the protection of the state and the territory. I consider that definition incomplete because it does not take into account the essential purpose of national security. The purpose of national security is not to protect the state or the territory first. It is to protect the individual and collective freedom of citizens.

It may seem like a semantic emphasis, but I believe it implies a notion completely different from that of a definition oriented towards the territory or the state. In fact, if one refers to the Canadian laws passed since 1970 concerning national security, one realizes that each time this concept is invoked, the judicial protection or the control and review capacity of the courts yield to the absolute discretion given to those responsible for national security to appreciate its extent and content. For instance, In the Federal Court Act, section 41 refers to national security and removes from the review and control power of the Federal Court any dispute about the content of a document allegedly concerning national security. Also the legislation we have passed in the previous sesion to create the Human Rights Commission and to protect privacy contained a similar provision, the result of which was to remove any document concerning national security in which an individual might be interested, from the protection of the Privacy Commissioner.

We have also passed an immigration bill by which the courts have no longer jurisdiction over the request of any person residing in Canada who wishes to acquire citizenship, but who is prevented from doing so on grounds of national security, and also deprived of any right of appeal. There is also before the House a bill respecting telecommunications in Canada which also deals with national security. In this case once again, the protection granted by the CRTC disappears entirely. There is also before the House a bill that has already been read the first time which will allow the opening of mail. Again, the protection granted by the courts in the first part of the legislation disappears completely when national security is invoked.

Mr. Speaker, I think these reminders are eloquent because we realize that over the past eight years the concept of national security has been constantly recurring in the Canadian statutes and almost constantly taken outside the purview of the courts. This is disquieting. Indeed when the 1970 public order bill was enacted, a provision in that legislation clearly pointed to the implications of national security when the arm of the state uses it. This is section 12, and I quote:

It is hereby declared that this Act shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights.

This means that despite any constitutional safeguards for the most essential freedoms and liberties, national security comes before anything else, even the constitution. This, Mr. Speaker, is a very significant feature. Because other countries where internal and external security was endangered to a much greater degree than was Canada's, these countries had to face situations that were no less difficult and implied more control operations than the RCMP had to perform here.

The United States of America had to review completely over the last three years the way civil freedoms and liberties in the American constitution are protected. A number of Senate committees worked on this and I would simply refer to the Senate committee meetings of October 21, 22 and 24, 1975 on the opening of the mail. These Senate meetings finally led to an executive order that was made public by President Carter on January 26, 1978. According to the press conference that followed, it is reported in the newspaper Le Figaro, on page 10, of Monday January 29, 1978, that:

President Carter has undertaken to follow it up with a legislation in Congress.

It may be interesting to refer to the contents of the American government commitment in matters of national security. I read from section 2-201 of the executive order. It discusses at length, the concept of national security at a time when the House must discuss two pieces of legislation dealing with the same subjects and a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate are discussing a green book tabled by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) on freedom of information and which also refers, in the exceptions of course, to national security. So I quote part of the executive order which very clearly shows that our American neighbours have extended this concept we sanction in our courts.

[English]

The activities described in Sections ... shall be undertaken only as permitted by this order and by procedures established by the head of the agency concerned and approved by the Attorney General. Those procedures shall protect constitutional rights and privacy, ensure that information is gathered by the least intrusive means possible, and limit use of such information to lawful governmental purposes.

Activities described in Sections ... for which a warrant would be required if undertaken for law enforcement rather than intelligence purposes shall not be undertaken against a United States person without a judicial warrant, unless the President has authorized the type of activity involved and the Attorney General has both approved the particular activity and determined that there is probable cause to believe that the United States person is an agent of a foreign power.

And, in the list of activities governed by the issue of a judicial warrant, we find in section 2-205 Mail Surveillance, which I quote:

[English]

No agency within the Intelligence Community shall open mail or examine envelopes in United States postal channels, except in accordance with applicable statutes and regulations. No agency within the Intelligence Community shall open mail of a United States person abroad except as permitted by procedures established pursuant to Section 2-201.

That Executive Order of President Carter is very complete; not only does it make the jurisdiction of the court conditional upon the issue of a warrant for opening mail, but it also governs all spying activities on the part of American citizens provided those citizens are not suspected of being foreign agents.

Mr. Speaker, therefore the debate we are now having today can give rise to a whole lot of questions about which we may not have all the required information. I mentioned, a while ago, speaking about the October events, the fact that the main protagonists of that crisis are not in Canada. Still, this is not a reason for the Canadian democracy not to question the worst legacy left us, that event namely a concept of national security that does not come under the jurisdiction of our Canadian courts.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention to participate in this debate today, but the overstatements made by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) regarding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have prompted me to say a few words. The slanderous remarks and above all the absurdities professed by the member for Champlain certainly do not meet with the approval of the members of his own party because one can see in this House that three quarters or even perhaps 90 per cent of his colleagues from the Social Credit Party of Canada have decided not to be present in the House during this debate. The hon. member for Champlain is undoubtedly aware that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been operating in the interest of all the citizens of Canada for a period of over 100 years. This security force which is unsurpassed throughout the world has been going through difficult times in recent months.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the hon. member for Champlain and some other members of this House realize that one of the first steps to be taken by a movement which wants to sabotage or destroy a country is to undermine the credibility of the security forces of that country. I am now asking myself why the hon. member allows himself to play that game? Some two weeks ago, Mr. Louis Laberge lashed at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and behaved as some kind of anarchist. It is not the first time that this man speaks like an anarchist, but his statements reinforce my conviction that we are now witnessing a deliberate and organized effort on the part of separatist elements to denigrate and damage, by all possible means, the image and the credibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We have in Canada, as I said earlier, one of the best security forces in the world.

[English]

When the NDP had an opportunity to take part in this debate today, no one in that party took the trouble to at least dissociate themselves from the wild exaggerations which one of their political colleagues, Louis Laberge, made a couple of weeks ago with regard to the RCMP.

I entered the debate today because, frankly, I feel that the campaign of vilification directed at the RCMP has reached such a level, in my province at least, that one is obliged to come to the conclusion that it is nothing less than a deliberately orchestrated campaign by pro-separatist elements to destroy the effectiveness of the RCMP within the province of Quebec.

What I find amazing and sickening is the willingness of both the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the leader of the New Democratic Party to lend themselves to this game. Over the years the RCMP have served Canada well. There is no question about the fact that they are the best security force that any country in the world is fortunate to have.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Speak the truth.

Mr. Watson: That is the truth, and members of the opposition know it. The RCMP has been under attack for the last number of months in connection with things that happened in the province of Quebec in the course of a long history of security activities. These activities are now being brought within a more modern framework which will allow police work to be under more adequate civilian control.

The government has announced its intention to proceed in this direction. I think people have the common-sense to realize that any government of Canada would move in such a direction following reports of the kind which have come to light. We are moving toward a framework which will allow the security forces to protect the country from both internal and external threats within a completely legal set of rules. This process has been proceeding, though I must say it has been interrupted by political activity of various kinds in the last few months.

[Translation]

I would like to read or at least draw the attention of the House to what the Quebec minister of Justice, Mr. Bédard, said in January 1977, long before the setting up of the Keable Commission. At that point, he questioned the presence of the RCMP in Quebec. He also questioned the necessity of maintaining a federal police force in the province. It has since then become obvious that the expulsion of the RCMP from Quebec is one of the objectives of the government in power in Quebec. It is with this objective in mind that the Keable Commission was set up. I have nothing to say against the Keable Commission because I think that Mr. Keable has done an excellent job of conducting this enquiry. He did what he had to do. He did his job with honor. But the objective which was pursued when the Commission was established was a political one, and that has to be said because it is the truth.

[English]

I want to respond to two or three things which have been said today about RCMP activities during the period the War Measures Act was used in 1970. I had the opportunity to vote for the War Measures Act at the time. I certainly did so with the conviction that it was the right thing to do, as did so many other members, and 87 per cent of the Canadian people also felt it was the right thing to do. We now hear a different opinion from some agonizers who think it was a mistake. I still think it was the right decision taken at the right time. Of course, if we had known then everything we know now we might not have used a tank to crush a fly. But at that time we did not have information allowing us to make any decision other than the one we took.

At that time the criticism was not that the RCMP were sticking their noses into everyone's business in Quebec or that they were infiltrating Quebec organizations. The accusation was that the RCMP had not infiltrated to a sufficient extent. Now the force is under fire because it took the lesson of 1970 seriously. Members of the force infiltrated and in doing so they committed certain irregularities which were not covered by any framework of rules. We are now establishing a framework which will allow the RCMP to be covered legally in the future if they are called on to attack an internal security problem.

I am speaking heatedly about this matter because I believe all this anti-RCMP propaganda we have heard in the last few months is having a bad effect on the ability of the force to protect Canadians. The force has been under the gun for several months now. It is uncertain about what it can do and what it cannot do and its members would be less than human if their work was not affected. I am sure these attacks have had a bad effect on the ability of the RCMP to protect Canadians from external or internal threats.

There are some who pretend that the situation in Quebec in 1970 did not require strong action. I take a different view, and in support of that view I would draw the attention of the House to the experience of an acquaintance of mine who was for some reason or other making a survey of a town in the Province of Quebec during the week prior to the War Measures Act being proclaimed. He told me that normally, while engaged on this work, he would find the doors of the houses unlocked, but in that particular week every single door was locked or barred. This showed what the sentiments of the people in the Montreal region were. They were highly alarmed.

I am confident that had the government not moved when it did and as strongly as it did we would have found ourselves in a state of civil disorder. Incidents would have occurred provoking actions and counter-actions. We would have been in a terrible mess in Montreal had it not been for the firm action taken by the federal government. Those who pretend that somehow we could have avoided taking such a decisive step do not have any alternative to suggest.

It is true, more people were arrested than need to have been arrested. That is very unfortunate.

[Translation]

However, I should remind the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) that the RCMP lists were not the ones used for arresting these people, but rather those in the hands of the Provincial Police which proceeded with most of the arrests. The RCMP was no doubt there on some occasions, but the lists drawn up by the Provincial Police were used. I regret that too many people were arrested but it must be pointed that those who were arrested, illegally as it was learned afterwards, receive at least a partial financial indemnity for their unfounded arrest.

● (1632)

[English]

In conclusion, I reiterate my personal confidence in the RCMP. This force is going to serve Canada in the future as well as it has in the past. The government will establish the legal framework which will allow it to work effectively and within the discipline required by modern society. We must have total civilian control over the activities as well as total political knowledge of what goes on. This is the government's objective. It will be achieved without the campaign of vilification the opposition parties have lent themselves to.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I did not have some respect for the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), I would not bother answering him in the debate today. In fact, I did not intend to enter into it. The hon. member made some considerable misrepresentations in his speech relating to a very important aspect of history.

The motion before the House threshes an awful lot of old straw. He referred to our history in the 1970s. Perhaps those of us who live through this era are not the best judges. He missed the point of the motion and should be brought back to it. The motion is not with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is with respect to the Government of Canada. In part the motion reads as follows:

That this House deeply regrets that the government . . .

It is deeply regretted that the government of Canada connived. That is the issue of the motion. I realize the hon. member is warmed up and heated. Sometimes when that is the case, an hon. member says things in the House and elsewhere which, upon reflection, he realizes should not have been said. The gist of the motion is simple. After the part about the connivance of the government, the motion directs the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais)—

Mr. Anderson: With the police force.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) referring to the police force. The motion directs the Solicitor General to "disclose in public all the facts". If an hon. member opposes the motion with respect to the disclosure of facts, he must be holding himself back for one of two reasons. Either he has a suspicion that the government conducted itself improperly, or there is some doubt in that person's mind as to the position of the RCMP. If the government had done nothing improper, the facts would sustain it.

I have no doubt about the work of the RCMP in 1970. I was not a member of parliament at that time, but I am sure the force acted with respect to the question of national security as directed by the government of the day. It the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has that doubt, he should express it.

I was concerned with what the hon. member for Laprairie said when he indicated that the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) attacked the RCMP. I ask him to check the record in that regard. That is factually wrong. The Leader of the Opposition said that what has been neglected, throughout this entire matter involving the security forces of Canada, is the question of ministerial responsibility. It is important to mention that in the dying moments of this debate. The doctrine of ministerial responsibility means that a minister is answerable in the House of Commons for whatever an agency does, whether the action was right or wrong. It is not proper for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or any other minister, to indicate that he does not know what the security service or any other agency of government is doing when purportedly carrying out its duties imposed by statute. That is not the doctrine of ministerial responsibility under the British parliamentary system. That is the doctrine of ministerial ignorance. Perhaps that applies in the congressional system where there is no such thing as ministerial responsibility, but it does not apply here.

Members are hamstrung with respect to questioning ministers of the Crown in the House respecting their former responsibilities when they were ministers or when they were solicitors general of Canada respectively. The actions of the present Solicitor General, who moved to that post from that of postmaster general, do not help the situation. The Speaker of the House of Commons indicated the other day that the present Solicitor General is on probation with respect to the manner in which he exercises his ministerial responsibility.

The guts of the motion is not an attack on the RCMP. It is dangerous for hon. members to indulge in this kind of wayward chicanery. It is a demand for information. The demand has been made elsewhere than the House of Commons. The demand is: what happened in 1970? If there was disclosure, perhaps we would not have to fear the involvement of the RCMP, as was suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. In fact, he appeared not to direct himself to the motion, but rather skirted around it.

I hope no member believes that the security services should not be responsible to someone who, in turn, is responsible to the House of Commons. I hope no one in this Chamber takes the view that it is inappropriate for the security services to be in the hands of the RCMP. I do not share that view. That is where it should be.

Somewhere along the line a shadow agency was established called the security and intelligence advisory group, or some such name. Its lines of communication and responsibilities were not clear by tradition or practice. Someone used to call them "Goyer's gumshoes". Those things ought not to be left hanging with no communication to either the head of the government or a minister of the Crown, and that is the problem here. The whole basis of accountability in respect of a ministry and in respect of this activity has been damaged as a result. The RCMP in the minds of some people in the public, not mine, is carrying the can for what I think is wilful maladministration and misdirection on the part of the government of Canada. That situation now is being remedied, I think, and I hope this continues.

The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) then dealt with the Keable inquiry. He said it was set up as a political inquiry—

Mr. Watson: With political objectives.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, with political objectives as the hon. member has corrected me, and I agree with him that this is exactly the purpose for which it was set up. The interesting thing is, and if my friend will check Hansard he will discover this, that at the time it was set up the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) expressed concern to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the inquiry. The response by the Prime Minister was that it was a great thing, but that was only because it was convenient to him. He said it was appropriate for the administration of criminal justice in the province. Then, of course, when the Keable inquiry, unfettered in any way by anything at all, began to move in, because it was, and is, a political inquiry with political objectives the Prime Minister and the then solicitor general changed their tune, and we had four separate actions commenced to withhold information from the inquiry. That is the situation.

What did the government do? Certainly members of the opposition asked for the appointment of a royal commission, and I was one of them. If your Honour checks the record, you will see that this was a much different royal commission from the one that was set up, now known as the McDonald commission. I do not have the references with me but I invite hon. members to check on the kind of commission we asked to be set up. It was a commission to be established by the Chief Justice of Canada, not the government of the day. I want the record to be quite clear. The government chose not to do that. It wanted to set up its own commission which is the commission now set up under Mr. Justice McDonald. I do not know the man, but the commission is now being accused of being a little slow and not very comprehensive.

What happened to the RCMP before that commission? As the commission moves slowly day after day after day, the evidence is coming out in little bits and pieces, and every day's operation of that commission is damaging to the reputation of the RCMP. Mr. Speaker, just read your paper this morning in that regard.

That might not have happened, because I have great faith in Chief Justice Laskin. I think from him there would have been some terms of reference and conditions that would have meant at least speed, not the slow, meandering pace that is beginning to shake the confidence of the people of Canada, and certainly mine, in the McDonald commission.

When I look back and consider the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in respect to penitentiaries, and how members on all sides of the House, in dealing with that report, moved with swiftness, honesty and complete impartiality in examining that matter of urgent and pressing moment, I am convinced it would have been best if that committee or a subcommittee had moved in this direction. That committee would have examined this matter more swiftly and honestly here in the House of Commons than anywhere outside, and with perhaps less damage to the RCMP.

I know there is a place for royal commissions, commissions of inquiry and a whole host of things, but what has happened in Canada is that we are knee-deep in commissions and task forces. Whenever there is a problem or something a bit ticklish in this country we sweep it under the rug and appoint a royal commission or task force. I really think, on reflection, that members of this House of Commons on all sides are just as capable—

Mr. Anderson: Of being impartial?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, of being impartial, that is true. The committee on penitentiaries is proof of that.

An hon. Member: How many committees are there like that?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I guess I have a much higher regard for my colleagues on all sides of the House of Commons than does the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). We are not utilizing this House to the fullest extent. This House is accountable to the people of Canada in a way that no royal commission is. I really think we made a mistake in respect of this matter. The hon. member for Laprairie is right regarding the objectives, but the Prime Minister cannot have it both ways. The Prime Minister found it convenient to answer a question one day by saying the commission was doing its job; but when it was convenient to change that he said it was a dreadful thing and brought lawsuits against its operations. Surely that is inconsistent.

I look upon this motion as directing the House of Commons to ask for the facts. The government should not refuse that from its own point of view. I believe the RCMP, in respect of the part it played in 1970, would be prepared to stand or fall on the facts, and I am prepared to bet it would stand. We ought to consider very carefully the objectives and what we in the House of Commons can do in respect of agencies. No minister of the Crown, and not even the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, as blind an apologist for the government as he is—and I say that with respect because he supports the government—should allow the government to hide behind ministerial ignorance of situations in place of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility which has served the country and parliament well. As long as we have a parliamentary system then certainly a burden falls on ministers and the Prime Minister, and no one can deny that. This has been the issue over the course of this situation in this parliament.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. It was not my intention to participate in this debate until I listened to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and felt there were some situations and some information that ought to be set straight, particularly regarding his interpretation of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said about ministerial responsibility. The Prime Minister has never said or implied that ministers are not responsible for their departments. He has said, and I paraphrase him, that solicitors general, who are responsible for the RCMP, should not actively be involved in the day-to-day activities of that force.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): "Have a right not to know", is what he said.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I think that that is a perfectly defensible statement. The RCMP is involved in many investigations and on occasion they have had to investigate people who are connected with, or are even members of, this chamber or who are friends of the government of the day. For the solicitor general of the day to be involved in those kinds of investigations would be dangerous and tantamount to political interference with the investigation of suspected or real criminal activity. I do not see how the opposition can fail to accept that kind of argument.

The other point I want to refer to very briefly is the point which the hon. member made with regard to the McDonald and Keable commissions. With regard to the Keable commission, he has chastised the government for not giving to that commission all the information it requested on its "fishing trip" for the separatists in Quebec. I do not think the government should have to do that. I do not think the Keable inquiry should have more power than the government that established it. The hon. member cannot pretend that the government of Canada is thwarting the effort of the Keable inquiry by refusing to give it authority which it does not have under the constitution of Canada.

The other implication in the hon. member's remarks was that the McDonald commission was set up simply as a cover to get the solicitor general off the hook.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I did not say that. I really did not say that, even by implication.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is the way I understood the hon. member's remarks. However, I am prepared to accept his denial of that implication and I am glad he made that denial.

In the course of his remarks he referred to the setting up of a commission of inquiry by the Chief Justice. That seems to me to be a rather unusual suggestion. I do not pretend to be an expert on the Inquiries Act, but I cannot recall any incident of an inquiry being launched under the authority of the Chief Justice of Canada. I can just imagine the cries that would have come from the opposition if the government had followed such a course and asked Chief Justice Laskin to do that which the hon. member has suggested. The opposition would have cried out again that the government was afraid to take the responsibility for such a commission and had sloughed off their ministerial responsibility to the Chief Justice of Canada. Again I say they cannot have it both ways.

Again the hon. member might not have been imputing motives to the commission, but I think he was very careless in his choice of words, to say the very least, when he said that a committee of the House would have proceeded with honesty, impartiality, and speed. It seems to me that the implication there is that the McDonald commission is not proceeding in that manner. I do not think it should be left to the public to infer from the hon. member's remarks that the McDonald commission is proceeding with deliberate slough, without impartiality or without honesty. I hope that is not what the hon. member was implying.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—MINISTERIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS MADE OUTSIDE PARLIAMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. After the question period a question of privilege was raised arising out of an answer given by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke). The matter at issue was the manner in which an announcement was being made in Vancouver but which should have been made in the House respecting a Tariff Board ruling on wide flange steel beams entering Canada, a matter raised earlier in the House by, among others, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle).

It is my understanding that during his press conference in Vancouver today to announce the government's decision on this matter, the government spokesman, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford)—who just by chance, happens to be the member for Vancouver Centre—added that, according to his belief, a parallel announcement was to be made simultaneously in the House.

We all know that is just not the way things happened. Worse than that, we all know that we were denied this information in the House today.

Therefore, on my own behalf and on behalf of my party I want to reserve the right to return to this question of privilege on Monday once all the facts are before us. Because here is an outstanding example of the contempt shown to the House and its members by this government, not the first such incident but one which illustrates more than most the fact that power can corrupt absolutely.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. First of all, let me say I have the utmost regard for the hon. member and I understand his frustration as well as that of any member of the opposition when a minister decides he will go to a province or location which is affected by an announcement he will make. Such announcements do generate a certain amount of enthusiasm. Since we are being political, let us be political. It happens on occasion that a minister goes out to a province and announces something that affects that province. I see nothing wrong with going to the people in that area and making an announcement to them about a matter which will affect them. There are many members of the House who do not represent the province of British Columbia, but the minister goes out to B.C. because that province, the premier and the people of the province, are vitally concerned. What other place is as appropriate as the region concerned?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is this a debate?

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this debate. Is it five o'clock or can I take part in the debate?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thirty seconds!

Mr. Pinard: I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Speaker, what strikes me in the comments we have heard from the opposition House leader is his interpretation of the motion moved by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte). The hon. member suggests that his motion is aimed only at the government and not at the police. If he would read it carefully, he would realize that the motion of the hon. member for Champlain is aimed at the RCMP.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Prior to adjourning the House I should like to inform the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) that the Chair has taken notice of his question of privilege and will bring it to the attention of Mr. Speaker.

It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. Monday, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CONGRATULATORY MESSAGES

HON. ELLEN FAIRCLOUGH—TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF DATE SERVED AS ACTING PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. If hon. friends would listen to the motion, I am sure they would agree with the sentiments expressed in it. Given the fact that 20 years ago today the Hon. Ellen Fairclough was Acting Prime Minister, being the first and only woman in Canadian political history to hold such a position, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House extend its sincere congratulations to the Hon. Ellen Fairclough for the significant contribution she made to Canadian political life, for being, 20 years ago today, the only woman in Canadian political history to serve as Acting Prime Minister; and requests that the Speaker write a letter of congratulations to the Hon. Ellen Fairclough on this very significant anniversary.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to the Standing Order, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

HERITAGE DAY—REQUEST GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a significant day in yet another way. I hope the House will all agree with the motion that I should like to present. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House, taking note of the fact that today is Heritage Day, warmly commends those who are recognizing how great is our heritage, reprimands the government for having refused to proceed with its own Bills C-30 and C-32 of last session that would have made this day a holiday, and calls on the government to proceed with the necessary legislation during the course of this session, so that in February, 1979, Heritage Day will be celebrated in fact as well as in spirit.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

PROTEST AGAINST REDUCTION OF MAIL DELIVERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move the following motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the announced intention of the Postmaster General to carry on the ill-conceived freeze on postal delivery to new urban subdivisions on the basis of the size of the deficit in the Post Office, and in view of the fact that this growing lack of service will cause a shift to alternative services, thus exacerbating the growth of the deficit in the Post Office operation, and also in view of the heavy representations made to the Postmaster General typified by petitions from city council and citizens of Saskatoon for full delivery service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House direct the Postmaster General to implement immediately steps to provide full delivery service to Canadians and repudiates the position taken by the Prime Minister that consideration be given to terminating postal delivery service.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ONTARIO—EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL REHABILITATION DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity. Because of the fact that the agricultural rehabilitation development agreement of the government with the province of Ontario ran out in 1975, was extended to 1977 and has been extended again to 1979, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the government negotiate the normal term agreement before this latest extension runs out, and that the province of Ontario be offered agreements on projects similar to those given to governments of some other provinces in Canada.

Anything less would be nothing short of outright discrimination.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Considering that many members of the House have already expressed the desire that, for maximum efficiency, the sessions of this House be held on dates fixed in advance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with a family reunification problem. Mrs. Xenia Elfvengren, now a Canadian citizen, has been attempting through all channels to bring her German-born daughter to Canada from the Soviet Union where she is being held against her wishes for reasons unknown. Since this attempt for family reunification has been going on unsuccessfully for 2½ years, I move, for humanitarian reasons, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House direct the President of the Treasury Board to order all federal government departments and agencies to put an immediate halt to making temporary employees permanent, and that all his cabinet colleagues follow out his directive immediately to put a stop to the state of utter confusion over hiring in the federal civil service.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in light of the continuing drop in the value of the Canadian dollar, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance which he declined to answer last week. Can the minister tell us whether it is the intention of the government to trigger higher interest rates to stem the flow of funds from Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not refuse to answer that question. If we changed the policy of the government, we would announce it in the usual way.

USE OF STAND-BY CREDIT TO BOLSTER VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has declined to answer the question again. Let me try another question related to the problems being encountered with the Canadian dollar. As the minister will recall, last September the government announced the negotiation of a stand-by credit of $1.5 billion. Is it the intention of the government to draw on that stand-by credit in the foreseeable future?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the major problem in the country now is lack of direction on national economic policy. It is always possible that some kind of direction might come with a new budget. Can the minister tell the House, either specifically or in terms of the month, when he intends to introduce a new budget?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as we stimulated the Canadian economy, mostly beginning January 1, to the tune of $3 billion in tax cuts, we will have to wait to see the results of that stimulative policy before coming forward with another budget. I have stated many times that I am not planning to introduce another budget before the end of March.

Mr. Clark: Just so I might be clear on this point, is the Minister of Finance now telling the House that he intends to wait a fairly long time before deciding whether he is going to introduce a budget? In other words, is he delaying setting in motion the process for preparing a budget until he has some sense of the stimulative impact of such measures as were taken last fall?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, less than five weeks after I was named Minister of Finance I came into the House with what some called a mini-budget, some called a budget and others called an economic statement. When I say there will be no budget before the end of March, I do not think I will be short of time with regard to preparing a budget. The very diligent members of the Ministry of Finance are always working on the fiscal and monetary policies of the government.

[Mr. Clark.]

STEPS BY GOVERNMENT TO REDUCE RATE OF INFLATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the dollar is dropping in the foreign exchange markets, and every one dollar drop causes the rate of inflation to rise four-tenths of 1 per cent over two years, how does the minister plan to start getting the inflation rate in this country down, as long as the devaluation of our dollar continues?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have shown what we are planning to do in that field. We had a conference last week on the fiscal, monetary and economic policies of the government. We stated our policies to the provincial governments at the ministerial meeting three weeks ago, and again last week. There was no quarrel with the economic policies of the government.

Mr. Gillies: It must be apparent to everyone, and certainly to the Minister of Finance, that the continued devaluation of the Canadian dollar is having an enormous impact on the inflationary rate in this nation. As long as this continues, and as long as the government is not prepared to change the framework within which the value of the dollar is set in international exchanges, we will have more inflation. It makes no sense for the minister to talk about a declining inflation rate unless he is prepared to do something about the external value of the dollar. Is something going to be done about this problem, or shall we have to count on more inflation during the next six months?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is very evident that the Canadian position, in terms of our competitive position and the Canadian economy, has suffered over the last three or four years. We are in a process of adjustment which is being determined at this time by the marketplace.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—CANADIAN CONTENT AND EFFECT ON CANADIAN JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. The National Energy Board, in its decision today, has recommended the use of low-pressure pipe for the Alcan route. The only significant benefit to Canada in the Alcan pipeline project is jobs that may occur in this country. It is in this context I would like to ask my question.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that an American government interdepartmental study estimates that approximately 30 per cent of the pipeline, with regard to durable equipment for the Canadian section, will be produced in the United States? That is not from the Wall Street Journal; it is from an American intergovernmental study. Is he aware of that? If so, how does he square it with his assurance to the people of Canada that 90 per cent of such products will be made in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, no decision on pipe size can be made by the National Energy Board until Bill C-25 is enacted. However, in the report of the National Energy Board which I shall table at three o'clock, the board states its intention, subsequent to the enactment of the legislation, to include within its specifications for the pipeline approval of 56-inch, low-pressure pipe.

It should be borne in mind that this particular pipe size can be manufactured both in Hamilton and Regina and is not presently manufactured in any plant in the United States. That ought to be of some assistance to the hon. member in realizing that the high Canadian content which I have predicted will be possible and will be achievable, notwithstanding the interdepartmental report to which he has referred but which I have not seen. I prefer to rely on statistics given in Canada, rather than those from the United States.

Mr. Broadbent: I find it an extraordinary admission from the minister, who was in charge of negotiations for Canada, that he has not seen the report. I have a copy of it right here and would be glad to send it over to him. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it is an American government interdepartmental study which estimates they are going to get 67 per cent, up to two-thirds, of the business—if not more—in the United States. The minister has not seen that report. I also have here the study done by our Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which reaches precisely the same conclusion as the American study.

Mr. Alexander: Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The Canadian study says, on page 9:

Unless there is effective control ensuring Canadian content, 67 per cent may be a more realistic projection.

In other words, the Canadian study agrees with the findings of the American study that without guarantees the minister's promise to the Canadian people is hogwash. How does the hon. gentleman account for this?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there are two points one must make in reply to the hon. gentleman's question. The first is that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion developed a "worst possible" scenario. This indicated the vulnerabilities to which Canadian competition might be exposed. It seems to me it was very wise for the department to make that kind of "worst case" scenario in order that it could be avoided. The hon. member quotes from the report as saying that unless effective control or effective monitoring—

Mr. Broadbent: Control.

Mr. MacEachen: All right, effective control. He says unless effective control is possible, then 67 per cent might be the worst possible result. I want to assure the hon. member that when he reads the bill presently before the House, he will realize there is a provision in the legislation giving the agency, and finally the minister, a very obvious way of maintaining effective control over Canadian content. Certainly, I would not bring a bill before the House of Commons and ask that it be passed unless there were to be effective control by the agency and the government over the Canadian content provisions.

Mr. Broadbent: My final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, is this. The minister has misinformed the House about the DREE report. The DREE report refers to the minister's estimate of 90 per cent content as being wishful thinking. It is the minister who has taken the most optimistic forecast of possibilities and has made a promise to Canadians. The DREE report, produced by his own government, said it would be more like 67 per cent, and that this was not a "doomsday" forecast; it was a more realistic projection. So the minister has quite categorically misinformed the House about what this report says.

By way of a final question to the minister, having had some discussions with leaders of the steel industry in Canada, is he aware of the fact that our steel industry is not concerned about competition from the U.S. steel industry, but is very much concerned about the Japanese steel industry which produced the pipe for Alaska, and about the Italian and German steel industries which produced the pipe for the Soviet Union?

Mr. MacEachen: I find it surprising that the steel companies now find the hon. member to be the appropriate interlocutor to serve their interests. The "corporate welfare bums" have now become the "corporate welfare chums" of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM WILL BE DISCONTINUED AFTER MARCH 31, 1978

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Representations were made to me by several groups following publication in a newspaper of an article according to which the New Horizons program is due to expire on March 31, 1978. I promised those organizations to put the question in the House, which I am doing now.

Will the New Horizons program continue beyond March 31, 1978? Are credits now before the Treasury Board which would ensure its application and continuation?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to answer that question in view of the presence by my side of my predecessors who would never have had the bad taste of presenting cabinet with a plan providing for termination of the New Horizons program on March 31, 1978. I can therefore assure the hon. member that the New Horizons program will continue, though I must frankly point out to him that after two consecutive renewals each of eighteen months a group of senior citizens must apply for a new and different project if it wants to obtain a third grant.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for her excellent answer. Now, could she tell the House whether the groups which have already received two grants are aware of what the minister has just said, which would enable them to prepare their third application and achieve their ends? By the way, I must tell the minister and her predecessor that this program is of great interest to elderly people, because I feel it is completely free from political patronage, I must say. I would like to know if these groups are aware of the procedure to follow in the third phase?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, some time ago, I met in Montreal as well as in Quebec city with all the departmental officials and we discussed in detail their animation works with senior citizens. Of course, they pursue their policy of openness and explain the rules, the procedures, the means of obtaining grants, of redefining projects so as to be eligible for grants. Here is a question which might interest the hon. member and about which I would welcome the opinion of the House: only about 25 per cent of senior citizens in Canada benefit from grants, and I feel it is my duty to take steps in order to diversify the distribution of grants and reach the people who do not succeed in forming themselves into groups. I would appreciate any suggestions in this regard.

MEASURES TO PREVENT DUMPING OF STEEL BEAMS—DEFINITION OF "FAIR WORLD PRICE"

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The temporary hoist, under section 17 of the Financial Administration Act, of the 30 per cent dumping duty on wide-flange steel beams gives needed and just relief to steel fabricators working on fixed-price contracts. However, as the minister must know, it does absolutely nothing to resolve the present and future injury to the economies of British Columbia and Newfoundland, and it does nothing to remove the uncertainty facing some 1,000 to 2,000 steelworkers jobs in British Columbia.

Can the minister help clear the uncertainty that clouds the B.C. scene by advising whether, in using the f.o.b. Portland price as the definition of "fair world price", that f.o.b. Portland price will be free and clear of any effect the U.S. trigger price formula might have on it for Canadian purposes?

[Miss Bégin.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we said in our statement that we have to remit a dumping duty to give relief in that field until June 29, because we have to go by the decision of the Anti-dumping Tribunal which established that this type of steel was being dumped on the Canadian market. After that date, any steel that will be coming into Canada will have to be at the international price.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to consider the question asked. I thank him for the answer he has given. We know that the government, as a result of its decision, recognizes the very serious situation that exists in certain parts of Canada in this respect. As we all know, the final determination of duties can go on forever. Could the Minister of Finance remove the continuing uncertainty that is leading to a crisis situation in steel fabricating industries in some regions by announcing what the final dumping duty will be? In other words, will it be nominal, at 3 per cent, for example, or will it close the lid on regional steel fabricating industries by remaining at 30 per cent?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if the steel is not dumped, there will be no special duty applied; it will be just the normal duty.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I would like to direct this question to the right hon. Prime Minister. The heart of much of the regional antagonism caused by federal rulings on matters like the dumping duty on wide-flange steel beams seems to be in our failure to recognize that often more than one market can exist in a country as vast as Canada.

Can the minister, or the Prime Minister, advise whether the government is negotiating an amendment under article 4(A)(ii) of the GATT agreement to reflect the fact that transportation costs and other regional marketing factors may create in Canada two or more markets, where in at least one Canadian producers sell none or almost none of their goods?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would like the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to answer that question. I have replied already to it. We have recognized that there is a short-term problem in British Columbia. Of course, when we have one Canadian market we have to maintain a tariff and have an adjudication by the tribunal when it looks into a dumping case—whether it be steel or any other product—because we cannot accept dumping of products on the Canadian market. I am sure the hon. member would not be pleased if we did not protect, in the eastern market, the price of plywood that very often comes from B.C.

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT TO REVIEW ANTI-DUMPING TAX

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, following the answer to the question of the hon. member for Capilano, I would ask the Minister of Finance whether it is the intention of the government to review the imposition of this import tax as it affects the steel industry, and whether such review will be carried out against the background of the realities of our country, namely, that there are legitimate interests in both eastern and western Canada in the steel industry? Also, will these interests be protected against the central domination of the industry?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government had nothing to do with the imposition of that duty. It was as the result of a decision by the tribunal set up by this parliament. It made the decision that steel coming into the western ports was dumped. We welcome steel from any country in the world, as long as the price at which it is offered to Canadians is the price at which it has been offered in international markets. Of course, B.C. producers will always have access to international steel as long as it is not dumped on the Canadian market.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS IN YUKON—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CHANGES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council concerning the attention that the national media is now giving the matter, an indication that the government's concern is serious in respect of the controversy swirling around the heads of senior officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the Yukon.

Since these controversies involve the minister's officials not only in matters concerning interference with the judicial process, but with the current RCMP investigation into allegations of forgery and the swearing of false affidavits—both indictable offences—regarding the alleged involvement of the minister's commissioner in the Yukon and Senator Lucier of the other place, is the minister at least considering requesting, or having his colleague request the commissioner to relinquish his position on a temporary basis until these matters—that is, the Stratton inquiry and the RCMP investigation—are concluded; and bringing back ex-commissioner James Smith on an interim basis in order to restore public confidence in the government and revitalize the very urgent planning required for the pipeline project?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, these matters are within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I will draw them to his attention.

An hon. Member: That's a great help.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, because I am sure the government is concerned that these matters will cause delay in the pipeline project which could very well prove fatal to its viability, and having regard to the very serious responsibility of the minister and the government to ensure that the pipeline project, so vital to the national interest, is not allowed to fail by their own failure to recognize the seriousness of these events in the Yukon and the extent to which vital planning and preparation for the pipeline is being imperilled by the credibility cloud that is hanging over the present administration in the Yukon, can the minister or the Minister of Justice inform the House whether any positive action is being taken to bring these matters to a head, that is, the investigation and possibility of charges being laid under the Criminal Code? It is necessary to clean house as quickly as possible to restore confidence there.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have undertaken, with the government of the United States and, indeed, with the House of Commons, that we will do everything possible to ensure the construction and operation of this pipeline within the time-frame that is proposed. That objective will apply to all the activities of the government of Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: One short, final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Stratton inquiry has been adjourned from time to time and its official report probably will not be in until some time in April—perhaps late April which is beyond the tolerance time, as I understand it, which the construction industry is conveniently prepared to accept—will the government immediately look into these matters with a view to finding a solution such as the one I have suggested, temporarily suspending the commissioner, without any admission of guilt or whatever, much along the same lines as the McMurtry example during the Hamilton harbour episode, and bringing in the credible ex-commissioner to put things back on the road and allow the proper and urgent planning to be done now?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, without prejudging the decision that might be taken by my colleague, it would seem to me that the suspension of an official, anywhere, while his conduct is under examination might not be a very fair or wise thing to do. I will certainly refer the hon. member's question to the minister for final judgment.

POST OFFICE

REMOVAL OF FREE MAILING SERVICE FOR WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. I ask him to confirm or deny rumours apparently circulating through weekly newspaper associations that he intends to remove the free mailing service for weekly newspapers within a 20-mile radius of their publication.

● (1442)

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a decision having been made, and I do think such rumours are unfounded, but I will inquire into this matter and give a relevant answer.

[English]

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest, by way of a supplementary question to the minister, that he might give us the assurance that no change is about to be made, since it is widely believed at the present time among weekly newspaper associations that this is the case, and since the weekly postage for some of the smaller weekly newspapers will increase from $12 to $260.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I strongly doubt such a conclusion will be reached, leading to such a high raise, but again I will inquire to find out if those rumours, as the hon. member so aptly put it, are founded or not.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION INTO FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It concerns the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and stories appearing in the Winnipeg press regarding activities of the corporation in changing labels, the destruction of tens of thousands of pounds of fish, and fish being returned by government inspectors with freezer burn due to four and five years of storage. Can the minister tell the House what his investigations have found and what action he has taken?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time this matter has been brought to my attention. I will be pleased to look into it and report to the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE INVESTIGATION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact this is not the first time the matter has been raised in the House, nor is it the first time the matter has been raised with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, would the Prime Minister undertake to consult with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and ask for an immediate investigation into the financial practices and marketing procedures of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I heard the minister deal with this question last week: my recollection is that he gave the hon. member a very satisfactory answer. When he returns, I will remind him that the hon. member has asked the question again.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

SALE OF PRODUCTS BEARING RABBINICAL SEAL

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker. I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In his investigation of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, would he not only investigate the changing of labels to make the product appear to have an age other than it actually had, but indicate to the House if the products, which were to be sold with a rabbinical seal, in fact received that seal without the proper authority and without a rabbi being present?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will obtain information on that matter as well.

CRIMINAL CODE

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO ALLOW CHOICE OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES IN COURTS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Last Friday the right hon. Prime Minister told the House that consultations with the provinces to amend the Criminal Code to allow all Canadians the freedom of choice of language in the courts would be tabled soon. Can the Minister of Justice tell us when he intends to table this bill?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I read the Prime Minister's answer and I agree with it. We cannot specify a precise date the legislation will be introduced, because it is being drafted and is subject to further discussion in cabinet as to the precise language. I hope it will be introduced soon.

NATIONAL UNITY

TASK FORCE REPLACEMENT FROM ONTARIO

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he tell us how soon, or even when, an Ontario replacement will be made on the Robarts-Pepin task force on national unity to replace John Evans, Q.C.?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not been notified formally by Mr. Pepin and Mr. Robarts that they have accepted the resignation of Mr. Evans. If they seek a replacement, I will gladly oblige them.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister be good enough to confirm or deny the ugly rumours which are circulating that because he was promised a position in order to move him out of the House, the new replacement will be Mr. Joe Flynn?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think Mr. Flynn would be immensely more capable than the hon. member who asks the question.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED FIRING OF CALGARY POSTMEN FOR DELIVERING MAIL TOO SOON

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General a question. There is some question about postmen in Calgary being fired because they have delivered mail too early. With the service we are receiving from that department, either deliveries are delayed or they never take place. Why are postmen in Calgary being faced with this situation?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is quite simple. The reason for the dismissals, or at least the suspensions, is not that the mail was delivered prematurely but simply that the employees had not obeyed their supervisors' instructions.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, do I take it from the Postmaster General's answer that it is now a crime, or a sin in his department to deliver mail on time or too early? Is that the policy? Everyone in Canada is complaining about no delivery at all, or late delivery.

Mr. Alexander: Or they throw the mail on the street.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, it would be very easy for me as Postmaster General, with Treasury Board, to settle all the problems in the Post Office in five minutes.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Lamontagne: But that would mean a complete sell-out of all the conditions asked for by the unions and it would be a policy of administering the Post Office at any cost. I do not think this is what Canadians want. I am not that kind of administrator, nor is the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

GLACE BAY, N.S.—SUGGESTED DISCRIMINATION IN AECL PAYMENTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, to whom I have given notice. At the outset, I wish to express my happiness at the $17 million expenditure which will be made to upgrade the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. According to a statement made by the mayor of Glace Bay, the town of Glace Bay is being discriminated against by payments in lieu of taxes from Atomic Energy of Canada, when compared with communities in Ontario, such as Deep River, and in Manitoba, such as Pinawa. Will the minister please explain why this discrimination against Glace Bay is being carried out by this federal Crown agency?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is no discrimination. As the hon. member perhaps knows, there is nothing in law which requires the Crown corporation to pay municipal taxes, but grants are made in lieu of taxes. Normally, with a corporation of that kind, taxes would be payable when the corporation was viable. As the hon. member knows, the government of Canada acquired ownership of the corporation some years ago and set about the stripping down and rebuilding program. That is well advanced now, but is not yet complete. Thus, it is quite clear the corporation is not yet viable. I am happy to say, however, that negotiations have taken place with the municipality and with the government of Nova Scotia. I believe a solution has been worked out whereby there will be an increase in the municipal taxes paid by AECL.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I agree that renegotiations have taken place, but according to the statement of the mayor of Glace Bay it has been far from satisfactory because it is not retroactive from the 1972 to 1977 period. If a Crown corporation is not making money in a particular area, is it normal that that affects the payment in lieu of taxes, as the hon. minister has indicated is the reason for the discrimination against Glace Bay? Is that normal across this country?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as I made very clear in my opening statement, there was no discrimination in this instance. I pointed out to the hon. member that the corporation was not viable when the government of Canada took it over and started the rebuilding process. During that period of time, municipal grants were paid in lieu of municipal taxes. Those grants have now been increased in size.

TARIFF ON TOMATOES—AMOUNT AND DURATION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister's predecessor, together with myself, processors and producers in the tomato industry, arranged last year to have a three-cent tariff on Taiwanese tomatoes. Now that the processors and producers are planning for this year's crop, can the minister tell us if he intends to have the tariff increased from three cents to five cents, or perhaps even to four cents? Second, will the tariff be extended beyond the August 10 deadline, which would come much too soon to allow this crop to be handled properly?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire, I do not have the information at this time. I do not know if the rates will have to be changed. I would ask the hon. member to wait. I could give him an answer in a few days.

ENERGY

CANADA-U.S. STUDY ON STRATEGIC OIL STORAGE—USE OF CANADIAN SITES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister give the House an assurance that the recently announced joint study by Canada and the United States on strategic oil storage in Canada will not, in fact, virtually eliminate consideration of a decision to use one of at least two sites in Canada, including Bell Island, Newfoundland, for phase two of the U.S. strategic oil storage program, and even for phase three?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member that assurance. The joint study which has been undertaken by the federal government and the United States government will establish the need for such a facility. That study has to take place in any event. In all likelihood, the study will also bring forward the time when such a facility can be used.

Mr. McGrath: Has any decision been made with regard to Canadian participation and Canada's having access to these strategic oil storage facilities for emergency purposes; and is this a factor in the delay of this feasibility study?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, again I would like to emphasize that there is no delay involved. The process has been accelerated through the agreement between the two governments to enter into the joint study assessing the feasibility of the two sites. The study will also address itself to the question of the proportion of the total that might be made available to Canada, and under what conditions.

DEVALUATION OF DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have just one clear question for the Minister of Finance, and I hope his answer will be just as clear. Can the minister advise the House whether he is content with the alarming devaluation of the Canadian dollar? If not, what steps does he intend to take to reverse this dangerous trend? If he is content—as he appears to be—what reasons can he give for not resigning and allowing a responsible minister who is concerned about the matter to take some action in this regard?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am following the situation very closely. I have stated the policy of the government many times and I have nothing to add at this moment.

AIR TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING CHARTER FARES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister probably knows, Suntours Limited of Toronto is seeking to provide passenger air service for most major Canadian cities at charter prices lower than anything now available. The company wants to take its proposal to the Canadian Transport Commission. Since the plan seems sensible, and since it is certainly long overdue to have Canadians travelling in their country at fares which are as equitable or as cheap as fares outside the country, will the proposal which Suntours will be putting to the CTC receive full government support?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not want me, as a member of the government, to interfere with a quasi-judicial body like the Canadian Transport Commission. The proper course established for that, under our guidelines, is that if communication is to be made with a quasi-judicial body, it should be made by the minister responsible for that body. I therefore assure the hon. member that the Minister of Transport, who is presently meeting with the Canadian Wheat Board in the west, will consider this representation.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister undoubtedly knows that the CTC in the past has been an arm or an extension of the cabinet. Since the cabinet has exercised authority over the CTC in the past, will the Prime Minister assure the House, because this particular plan is attractive and sensible with regard to travelling in Canada, that the government will consider this kind of action on behalf of the Canadian travelling public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, or should know, that the government has taken many steps to permit Canadians to visit each other and to know their country better. We took such a step about a month ago with reference to a decision referred to us by the Canadian Transport Commission. But I repeat that there is a procedure for this type of government position becoming known by the CTC, and that is through a representation by the Minister of Transport.

REQUEST FEDERAL SALES TAX BE REDUCED

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister ask the government to take specific steps to reverse the industrializing process by adopting a program of some federal sales tax reductions at this time, or in the immediate future?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed with my provincial colleagues the possibility of cutting sales taxes, but we felt it most effective to cut provincial sales taxes. I made an offer to the provincial ministers of finance but they were not in agreement, so we decided to choose another route. In January and February we are cutting the income taxes of 7 million taxpayers by $700 million. I am afraid that cuts in the federal sales tax are not necessarily felt by the consumer, because the consumer does not pay the tax directly and would not feel the effect of such a cut.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.K. ON RECIPROCAL PENSIONS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last June, the then minister of national health and welfare assured the House that he had obtained an agreement in principle with the British concerning reciprocal pensions, but that the United Kingdom government pleaded economic weakness as a reason not to conclude an agreement at that time. In light of the recent and impressive economic recovery of the United Kingdom, will the minister now undertake to approach the British government immediately with a view to bringing this matter to a successful conclusion?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I met with my British counterpart on January 9, in London, and used that occasion to discuss what the pound was doing on the stock exchange. That was a few days after the first major recovery. I made a strong recommendation in favour of unfreezing British pensions payable to Canadians, and the minister promised to bring that subject to his colleagues in cabinet. I am expecting his answer in the near future.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, three months ago, with considerable fanfare, the Prime Minister signed an agreement with the Italian prime minister to extend reciprocity of social security benefits between Italy and this country. Will the minister tell the House how soon reciprocity of pensions between Italy and Canada will be in effect, or is this another of those ill-fated promises which Liberals tend to make in Toronto just before elections?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the second part of the question is absolutely needless. We signed an agreement, on November 19 last I believe, with Prime Minister Andreotti, and our officials have already had their first meeting to discuss technicalities, because administrative agreements between the provinces, the federal government and the Italian government on each of the systems must be described in a detailed manner.

PROVISIONS OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING MAIL-OPENING

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It concerns the provisions of the mail-opening bill. Can the minister advise the House why in that legislation there is provision for reporting to the House in cases where the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act are involved, but in the case of the Official Secrets Act there is no requirement for the Solicitor General to report to the House the number of mail openings which take place? Can the Minister of Justice advise why there is this discrepancy in the bill, and why it is required that there will be reporting in one instance and not in another?

● (1502)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to examine the provisions of the bill very carefully, because it was our intention that the scheme now set out in the Criminal Code should apply mutatis mutandis to the measure that is now before parliament. I should like to examine the specific wording very carefully, before answering.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF EXPORTS ON ECONOMIC GROWTH

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As part of the government's strategy, the minister's department has forecast modest growth in the Canadian economy being dependent upon strong exports, particularly to the United States, and as the United States economy now seems headed for a recession, what effect will this have on these forecasts? Will they still be valid? Or did the forecast take into account the possibility of a growth of recession in the United States.

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE TECHNICAL QUALITY CONTROL OF MAPS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-421, to amend the Resources and Technical Surveys Act (map quality control).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, this bill is aimed at standardizing the quality control of the maps which are published on behalf of the government of Canada. This way it would be possible to avoid embarrassing errors or omissions, such as the transfer of half Madawaska to the Republic of the United States as a result of badly traced border lines, as well as the mysterious disappearance of Magdalen Islands from the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The bill would also do away with artistic licence in cartography.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, before resuming my comments on this bill I should like to thank the minister and his officials for providing me with the guidelines which had not been distributed—and I underline they had not been distributed—prior to the beginning of this debate though, according to the date I have here they were issued in December, 1977. They ought to have been available to all members participating in the debate, but I found them on my desk when I returned to my office after speaking last Wednesday. It is a deferred acknowledgment and I am sorry it had to be this way, but we now have the guidelines and I think they are very important.

When I called it six o'clock on Wednesday evening I had reached the point of examining the provisions of the bill that will permit more extensive inquiries into the environmental impacts that are likely to occur and the inquiries that will be carried on under the provisions of the bill that were mentioned either in the Lysyk inquiry or in the environmental assessment and review panel study.

I think it ought to be mentioned as a general comment about the Alaska Highway part of the pipeline that there has been reference to the need to take permafrost into account. Those who have not been in the Yukon may not be aware that the permafrost problem does not apply all the way along the Alaska Highway. It is the Dempster cut-off that would have the problems of permafrost.

I think it should be said, however, that perhaps partly because of the short time available to Dean Lysyk to prepare his report, he devoted little space to the environmental problems likely to arise, whereas the Berger inquiry, which had more time at its disposal, covered environmental problems more fully. The other reason the Lysyk inquiry did not deal with environmental issues was that its terms of reference provided for representation from the environmental assessment and review panel which allowed those elements to be taken into account. It may have been that Dean Lysyk felt that the strictly environmental problems could be left to be dealt with by the panel.

I feel it is necessary to point out that one of the principal differences between the Lysyk and the Berger inquiries is that the Berger inquiry covered all aspects of the matter, while there is no reference whatsoever in the Lysyk inquiry, or by the panel, to British Columbia or Alberta. The Lysyk report dealt solely with the Yukon. I think this oversight will have to be taken into account. Fortunately, a clause in Schedule III of the bill requires that the pipeline company carry out the necessary studies into fisheries, environmental and socio-economic problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this historic debate dealing with one of the largest undertakings ever addressed by a group from the private sector. In many ways I think it is not only an historic debate but an historic project in the development of our country—to link the third sea, the Arctic Sea, to the Atlantic Ocean; indeed, perhaps of linking the Arctic Sea to the Atlantic Ocean. I will have more to say about that in my remarks to follow.

● (1512)

In the time available to me I shall attempt to deal with three areas, first of all the size of the pipe, secondly the need for Canada to gain access to Canadian natural gas resources in the Mackenzie Delta area, and thirdly I will talk about the attractiveness of the option which has been opened up for Canada as a result of the pipeline treaty negotiated with the United States.

The President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has already tabled the report of the National Energy Board dealing with the question of what should be the appropriate size of pipe for the section of the line from Whitehorse to Caroline. There may have been some surprise that the stated position of the National Energy Board came down in favour of the 56-inch option rather than the one which has received a good deal of attention in the press, that is to say, the 54-inch option and the option included in the pipeline treaty with the United States.

I would like to take a few moments to deal with the question of the 56-inch pipe. Its origin comes from the initiative of United States officials during the December meeting of the technical committee which addressed itself to these questions. At that time the suggestion was made that a 56-inch pipe at 1,080 psi should be considered as an alternative to the 54-inch pipe at 1,120 psi because there was more world experience in manufacturing and installing 56-inch diameter pipe than in the 54-inch diameter pipe. While at the time Canada and United States negotiations were continuing, 54-inch diameter pipe had been shown as the appropriate larger diameter pipe for consideration, Foothills agreed that it would have been just as logical to have selected the 56-inch diameter pipe in relation to the 3.6 billion cubic feet a day of gas anticipated as the throughput.

The United States response included the consideration of the use of 56-inch diameter pipe as one alternative. This has been taken into account in the Board's analysis. I understand that it was concluded in the U.S. reply that any of the systems under consideration, high pressure or low pressure, could be built and operated with equal safety and reliability. It is the view of the National Energy Board, however, that selection of the 48-inch high pressure system, because of the extensive new technology involved and the lack of experience in its use, would present risks.

The Board states in its report that safety and reliability are matters of primary concern to it. There has been a good record in the Canadian pipeline industry in this regard. Also there has been steady improvement in standards related to quality of steel, manufacturing procedures, pipe welding and other construction procedures.

The Board believes that moving from the general operating pressure of 1,000 psi, which is the present practice in North America, to that proposed of the 48-inch 1,680 psi system represents a large step in new technology. The Board would require thorough testing of the 48-inch 0.72 inch wall thickness before approving that design. Foothills has estimated there could be a delay of up to two years in completion of the pipeline in order to carry out such testing before ordering the pipe. This would not be in the interests of the United States or of Canada. On the other hand the board is prepared to approve the use of .54 inch wall thickness pipe of the specifications proposed by Foothills, in 48-inch, 54-inch or 56-inch diameter pipe subject only to confirmatory burst testing prior to commencement of construction. From a design point of view this means there would be no delay in ordering pipe and that planning for all other aspects of the pipeline construction could proceed.

As has been pointed out on many occasions in the House, Mr. Speaker, another important feature in the selection of the .54 inch wall thickness pipe is the fact that two Canadian pipe mills could supply pipe of the quality required and in diameters up to 56 inches. In the case of the heavier wall pipe only one Canadian mill has the manufacturing capabilities, thus reducing reliability and possibly affecting Canadian content. The Board has concluded that from a safety and reliability point of view the final choice of pipe to the pressure range achievable with .54 inch wall thickness, that is to say the 48-inch diameter pipe, the 56-inch diameter pipe and 54-inch diameter pipe should be chosen on the basis of economics. I should add that the 48-inch low pressure pipe should not be considered an option because the pipeline itself, that is the Dempster connection, will be needed before 1990.

The United States response indicated, as I have already stated, that based on the design volumes of 2.4 billion cubic feet a day from Prudhoe Bay, and 1.2 billion cubic feet a day from the Mackenzie Delta, its first choice would be the 48-inch high pressure pipe with its second choice being the 56-inch 1,080 psi pipe.

With respect to the choice of pipe, mention should be made here of paragraph 10 in the Canada-United States Agreement. This particular provision allowed for consideration of any combination of pressure and diameter of pipe which would achieve safety and reliability and economic efficiency. Annex III to the Agreement relating to cost allocation contained cost estimates for 48-inch and 54-inch diameter pipe. If 56-inch diameter pipe was chosen it would require an addendum to Annex III to include costs for the 56-inch alternative which had been agreed on by the two parties to the Agreement. It is the understanding of the government that such an addendum would be considered a technical change. This could be accomplished by an exchange of notes following a meeting of Canadian and United States officials to agree upon the appropriate figures to include in the annex. Inasmuch as the Canada-United States Agreement is contained in Bill C-25 as Schedule I, a corresponding amendment would be required in the bill as well. This could be introduced when the bill is considered by the committee.

As was pointed out to the House, Mr. Speaker, on February 13, no decision could be made by the National Energy Board regarding pipe size until Bill C-25 is enacted. However, in its report the board has indicated that subsequent to enactment it intends to include in its approval of pipeline specifications the 56-inch 0.54 inch wall thickness pipe for that portion of the pipeline between Whitehorse and Caroline. That could provide significant economic benefits to the United States in the order of close to $100 million based on the assumption over 20 years with the choice of 56-inch pipe over 54-inch. Taking the value of the gas at $1.60 mcf and assuming an additional throughput of 65 billion cubic feet, there would be a saving to the United States consumer of roughly $100 million.

There would be a comparable saving to the Canadian consumer, again assuming the same time period, but assuming that the gas is not made available until five years later than it becomes available in the United States, using the same figure per 1,000 cubic feet and an additional throughput of 25 billion feet, a saving of $40 million. In summary, economics favour the 56-inch over the 54-inch diameter pipe, with potential savings collectively of $140 million.

I would now like to move to the part of my remarks dealing with the questions of, first, the need for the pipeline and of access and, second, the full question of cost and benefits to Canadians. There have been a number of suggestions to the effect that the Alaska Highway pipeline will do nothing for the Canadian energy situation, that it is designed solely for the United States. It has also been suggested that Canada has no need for the frontier gas, that we already have enough gas in Alberta. I believe that both of those statements are false. I wish to review some of the reasons for believing that to be so.

The bill before the House is designed to give effect to the Canada-United States Agreement. I am sure hon. members are aware this agreement was reached after many, many hours of negotiation with our neighbours to the south. One of the most important issues in those negotiations, perhaps the one most difficult to resolve, was the terms under which Mackenzie Delta gas would be connected into the Alaska Highway pipeline system. The problem is that Canadian gas from the Mackenzie would be expensive. For example, it would be more expensive than gas which is available in the southern basin, although less expensive than gas from the High Arctic and some other alternate energy sources in Canada.

The objective of the Canadian negotiators was to ensure that Canada could obtain access to Delta gas at costs that were not prohibitively high. The Canadian team was able to strike a very good bargain for us in this regard.

The present bill assures Canada the cheapest possible access to our own Delta reserves. It provides that U.S.A. consumers will pay the full cost of shipping the Canadian gas from Dawson to Whitehorse if the Canadian section of the line through the Yukon comes within 35 per cent of the estimated cost of that line and will pay not less than two thirds of the total cost of building that spur from Whitehorse to Dawson if the escalation is greater than the amount I just mentioned. The exact share will depend on the final cost of the completed pipeline. In any event, Canadians will be able to get Mackenzie gas in Canadian markets transported from the Mackenzie Delta to southern gas markets at a lower cost than Americans would be able to get American Alaska gas transported from Prudhoe Bay to their markets. That is clearly a significant benefit to Canada.

The existence of the Alcan pipeline, the Foothills (Yukon) pipeline, is the only way at the present time of ensuring access to presently proven reserves in the Delta. These reserves will provide a significant addition to Canada's proven accessible reserves, but they are simply not large enough to justify a Canadian pipeline at the present time.

My first point then is that this legislation assures Canadians of access to our own Delta gas. Without the pipeline, there is no such assurance. It also assures us we will get that gas at a lower cost than the Americans will get their Alaska gas in the United States. It assures us the lowest possible cost. These benefits clearly are not insignificant. Hon. members who suggest this pipeline does nothing for Canada's energy needs are simply misrepresenting the facts.

I now wish to turn to my second point. Many people are saying that access to gas in the Mackenzie is of dubious value, that we have as much as we possibly need in Alberta and this will look after us until at least the 1990's. There are a number of basic flaws in that argument. There are three basic flaws I want to attack.

The first flaw is that that argument confuses short-term deliverability surplus with long-term reserve availability. Second, that argument ignores the large extent to which natural gas could reduce our reliance on imported oil, is assured long-term supplies of gas were not available. This is a very important point. The third flaw in that argument is that it ignores, by implication, the gravity of the world oil supply problem. I will deal very briefly with the latter point first, the gravity of the world oil supply problem.

A few statistics might place this problem in context because Canada is very much involved in the international oil context. The western world is now consuming about 50 million barrels of oil every day, about 18 billion barrels in the course of the year. Second, the largest oil accumulation ever discovered in North America, that is to say at Prudhoe Bay, ten billion barrels of oil, works out to not much more than six months' supply in terms of the world's consumption at current consumption rates.

The North Sea accumulation was roughly 23 billion barrels. In terms of world supply at current consumption rates, this would add another year and a half. Taking these two very significant discoveries together, they add no more than two years to world supplies at current consumption rates.

All discoveries in the last 15 years, those in North Africa, West Africa, the North Slope, and the North Sea, amount to about 100 billion barrels. That is no more than six years' supply at current consumption rates. Perhaps I have said enough to indicate the horrendous dimension of the oil supply problem in the western world.

More often than not, we are using more oil than we are discovering. More often than not, at the end of the year there is less oil available than there was at the beginning of the year. At the same time, at the end of the year we are consuming more than we were at the beginning of the year. Quite clearly this will lead the western world to an oil crunch, and that crunch may not be far away. Estimates indicate it could occur about 1985, give or take a year or two.

Also, new oil discoveries are proving more expensive. Accumulations are smaller. Canada is no exception to this general rule. Current projections indicate a continuing decline in production from conventional sources over the next ten years, which means increasing reliance on costly unconventional sources such as the tar sands. All this has to be seen against the background of the western world's massive consumption of oil, its apparent inability to decrease its demand, and the reluctance of oil-rich countries in Arabia to increase supplies.

This situation leads inexorably to one conclusion: our dependence upon oil supplies from the Middle East must be reduced. I need hardly remind hon. members of the instability of the area—the tragic events in Cyprus over the week end are, in themselves, an illustration. Take the situation affecting the Horn of Africa, a confrontation between two nations on the edge of the Red Sea right opposite Saudi Arabia. This is yet another reminder of the vulnerability of oil supplies from the Middle East. Saudi Arabia is presently pumping about nine million barrels of oil a day. The best estimate I have seen is that it would be required to produce between nine million and 16 million barrels by 1985. Then there is a big jump from 1985 to 1990, a jump which could take the requirement to 23 million or even to 35 million barrels a day.

On the basis of nine million barrels a day, Saudi Arabia is presently generating something like $50 billion a year in foreign exchange. Figures like these stretch the imagination and there is no point spending much time on them except to make the fairly obvious comment: why would a small country of some six million people, which cannot even use the foreign exchange it is generating from oil sales today, want to increase its production significantly in the future? Why would not the leaders of that small country say to themselves, "We would much prefer to keep this important resource in the ground, under our own control rather than exchange it for bank accounts in foreign banks which we do not control." Much of the current debate on the world oil situation focuses on questions of this kind.

Will Saudi Arabia produce at the levels required to meet rising international oil demand? Quite simply, we do not know. But I do not believe Canada and the rest of the western world can afford to take a chance. We have to look to ourselves in order to protect our interests. We have done this collectively through the International Energy Agency and we have set an import target of no more than 26 million barrels a day by 1985. Canada has participated in agreeing to this collective target.

We in Canada have set ourselves an import target of one third of our consumption, or 800,000 barrels a day, whichever is the lesser. That goal will not be easy to reach. We are already net importers of some 200,000 barrels a day. Between 1980 and 1985, Canadian conventional oil production is expected to fall off quickly, perhaps by 500,000 barrels per day. And, inevitably, demand will continue to increase. To reach our import target we shall have to move on several fronts.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Hon. members will be familiar with the three basic principles of Canada's energy policy. First is conservation. We have to accelerate our efforts to conserve and develop renewable energy supplies. Second, we have to develop new, indigenous supplies of oil from sources such as the tar sands. Third, we must direct increasingly more attention to energy substitution. This latter process will involve massive sums of money; many of these projects were identified last week at the first ministers' conference. Natural gas offers the greatest possibility at the present time of decreasing our present dependence on foreign oil. Let me give the House some indication of the way in which this might work.

There is a wide variation across Canada in terms of total energy consumed from oil by the various regions. For example, Albertans consume only about 30 per cent of their total primary energy in the form of oil. But as we move further east, dependence upon oil increases. In Quebec, close to 70 per cent of the primary energy consumed by the population is in the form of oil, and further east still, in the Atlantic provinces, between 80 per cent and 90 per cent is consumed in the form of oil. Roughly two-thirds of that oil is foreign oil. In other words, the region east of Ontario is most vulnerable to any cessation of that foreign oil supply. This does not exclude Ontario because, as conventional sources become depleted, Ontario too could be affected. That pipeline, which was built to be reversible, may yet be used as such. All of which means that the centre of the country would be more dependent on foreign oil than in the past.

Natural gas is one of our great opportunities to reduce dependence on imported oil. By moving natural gas, whether from the Mackenzie Delta or Alberta or the High Arctic into eastern Canada by means of the pipeline presently under consideration, as well as by others which may be built, such as a Quebec and maritimes pipeline, a project which the first ministers endorsed for early application at their meeting last week, a pipeline could carry gas from the Mackenzie all the way to Halifax, a pipeline which could be reversed so that if significant finds of natural gas were proved off Sable Island or off the Labrador shore—

An hon. Member: That's more like it.

Mr. Gillespie: —liquefied natural gas from the High Arctic could be brought into Canso, or Lorneterm at Saint John, for instance, and that gas could be moved back, and the pipeline would be forging a new band of steel across the country. But before this can happen there has to be an assurance of supply. A bubble is not enough. That is why this bill addresses itself to the most important aspect which we are considering, the reduction of our reliance on imported oil.

But some hon. members might still say: Surely Alberta has all the gas we need; why go up to the Mackenzie? In the report of the National Energy Board tabled today by my colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), we find this reference to the pipeline on page seven:

While recognizing that there has been continuing exploration success in the western Canadian sedimentary basin since the time of the board's report, it is the board's expectation that a detailed review of gas supply and demand in Canada, which will undoubtedly be undertaken within the next year, will still indicate a need for the Dempster lateral prior to 1990.

The words "prior to 1990" are tied in to the question of the 48-inch low pressure pipe which was raised by certain members of the technical team on the U.S. side. My answer is that we cannot rely solely on Alberta. We have to distinguish between a long term deliverability shortage and a short term deliverability surplus. I should expand on those two particular distinctions.

First, I should like to comment on the long term outlook. Alberta has sufficient long term deliverability to satisfy current levels of Canadian consumption, plus small levels of demand growth, but only until the mid-1980's. Our most recent estimates suggest that with modest increases in the share taken by natural gas, long term deliverability from Alberta will only be sufficient to meet demand until the mid-1980's. With luck, the results of the intense drilling now taking place in Alberta will enable us to extend this date by a few years, but not by much.

Even Alberta's resources are finite. The new discoveries being made there are similar to the oil and gas discoveries being made elsewhere in the world. The pools are smaller; they are harder to find; and recovery is more costly. These facts only serve to confirm the belief that the long term availability of gas is still very much in doubt. This is one of the basic constraints that is at present inhibiting the expansion of gas markets in eastern Canada. It is one of the basic reasons why substitution of natural gas for oil is not taking place at a rate that would be consistent with Canada's long term interests.

This fundamental point is often missed, however, because of the second phenomenon now being experienced in Alberta; a short term deliverability surplus. Alberta could now supply, for a five or six year period, more gas than is required to meet Canadian and current export needs. This is why several proposals have been made to increase gas exports to the U.S. on a swap basis.

This short term deliverability surplus should not obscure the basic facts, however. Canada still does not have enough gas to meet its long term needs, where "need" is here defined so as to include a rapidly increasing market share for natural gas. The current rates of discovery in Alberta are certainly encouraging, and it would indeed be fortunate if large, new accumulations proved up in Canada's western basin. But I do not think we can afford to take such a gamble. We cannot afford to say we are sure that these reserves will be proved up. It is quite clear that we need to develop other gas producing areas in Canada as well, and we have to take advantage of every opportunity we have in this country. The Mackenzie Delta-Beaufort Sea region is one such area of large new potential, and Canadians simply cannot afford to ignore it. Access to the gas in the Mackenzie-Beaufort is crucial to Canada's energy future. It is for this reason that I urge an early passage of the bill now before us.

The Alaska highway project will provide Canada with much more than employment and industrial benefits. It will also play a key role in the attainment of our long term energy objectives.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give my support to this historic piece of legislation. It offers tremendous economic potential for Canada as a whole, including my constituency of Hamilton Mountain and the Hamilton area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacFarlane: A pipeline would involve 2,000 miles, requiring about 1.3 million tons of steel. The money involved would be about $800 million. It would require about 4,000 man-years to make the steel plate and employ 675 people for four years to turn it into pipe. These are rough figures, but they are very important in my area.

No one can really estimate the demands that would be generated by the increased production of turbines, trucks, housing, etc., associated with a pipeline.

The basic steel and pipe making jobs might be divided between Stelco, Algoma Steel and Ipsco. We are talking about a $700 million order with Arctic gas, and of course we expect to figure strongly in that, perhaps one million tons for the Hamilton and Welland plants—approximately 3,000 man-years in Hamilton plus several hundred man-years in Welland. Ipsco would probably get the rest in its Regina and Edmonton plants. Dofasco, which would be involved in lighter gauge steel, could not expect that kind of production, but any spin-offs in the auto industry and other industries would benefit. Estimates indicate that at least 100 jobs will be created as a result of the spin-off benefit. All of this is a guessing game, but, after all, it is guessing in the right direction. It is guessing and, I hope, working toward a bright new future and toward a technology of which Canada could have command. As we all know, if we ourselves can be involved in the development of that technology, that is where the jobs are. Also the jobs are in the new technology which produces new jobs which the rest of the world can observe.

In addition to the production of pipe for the main lines, there are the 300,000 tons which would be needed for the Dempster. Once Canadian gas was being brought on stream, another 900,000 tons would be needed to expand or loop the TransCanada pipeline. All this depends on the building of the Dempster.

In addition, there is Westinghouse to consider in my area. At least one of their turbines would be used in the pipeline. This is important as a stimulus to Westinghouse overseas sales where difficulties are created by the fact that there are no demonstration projects of its highly efficient equipment in Canada. Even Canadians are overly influenced by foreign technology.

Approximately 90 gas turbines will be needed for the pipeline. Each turbine order Westinghouse receives means about 60 man-years for the company in Hamilton. These figures are conservatively estimated but they are very important. When you argue about the pipeline, you should realize that the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is working on behalf of all Canadians. Indeed, it is very appropriate that a man from Cape Breton should be the one who is involved in this, with his negotiating ability, and his ability to talk with a foreign power such as the United States and to discuss with them terms which would achieve an agreement.

Let me say a few words now about job guarantees. We hear much said about job guarantees. Stelco and the rest of the Canadian steel industry want to compete on a purely business like basis. So long as the government enforces anti-dumping regulations and watches out for steel producers from other countries who receive substantial government subsidies, Stelco believes it will get the lion's share of the pipe order. In fact job guarantees can hurt our steel firms since other countries will retaliate with similar guarantees on their projects, thus depriving efficient Hamilton steel firms of the chance to secure international contracts. Stelco and the other Canadian firms want the business, but they want it because they deserve it in terms of service, price, and quality.

Stelco believes in the free enterprise system. It has never said that the pipe must be produced in Canada no matter how high the price. The steel firms are efficient, and the competition for the order, plus the increased production resulting from it, will make them even more so. Surely that is one of the goals of our evolving industrial strategy. I know my comments are narrow, very limited to the Hamilton area. But, after all, that is one of my privileges in representing my constituency, as other hon. members represent theirs. That is not to say that in the larger sense we do not all have a great deal more to say to the rest of Canada and to each other when thinking of the total Canadian situation, but we should not forget that it is important for us in our areas and in our ridings to talk definitely of the benefits that can come from any Canadian project to us, and particularly to our people.

This bill was not developed overnight; it is the culmination of many studies by numerous private sector interests as well as government related bodies. It has been known for years that oil and gas reserves were located in the Arctic. In the 1920's oil wells were drilled at Norman Wells and a U.S. navy petroleum reserve was established in Alaska. However, the remoteness of the area discouraged development in favour of more accessible reserves.

The latest interest in the Arctic occurred following the 1968 discovery by the United States of major oil and gas reserves in the Prudhoe Bay area of Alaska. Interest grew rapidly as the easily tapable reserves ran low. Actually, a year earlier, in 1967, the northwest project study group was formed, and in 1972 it became part of Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Limited.

Exploration, production, and transmission companies formed study groups to examine various routes and technologies involving Prudhoe Bay and the Mackenzie Valley. The federal government as early as 1970 established pipeline guidelines for establishment of a pipeline corridor for oil and gas transmission. It was almost four years ago, in March, 1974, when Chief Justice Berger was appointed to investigate the environmental and social impacts of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline route as proposed by Canadian Arctic Gas.

The National Energy Board held hearings for over a year, from April, 1976, to May, 1977, to consider a northern pipeline to supply U.S. gas to Americans and Canadian gas to Canadians. In July of last year the NEB favoured the Foothills or Yukon Limited proposal along the Alaska Highway with some re-routing and other conditions. It is this proposal which we are considering now, one that is also known as the Alaska Highway project and the Alcan route.

Meanwhile, the Berger Report recommended a ten-year moratorium on a Mackenzie Valley pipeline, and the Lysyk Report concluded that undesirable social and economic consequences could be kept within acceptable limits through several key conditions. Therefore I believe the government has had the pipeline proposal thoroughly studied and has followed closely the various recommendations made. This pipeline route is cheaper, quicker, and will have less environmental impact than the El Paso tanker proposal which the Americans might have undertaken had we not approved the joint line.

The National Energy Board sees Delta gas as the lowest cost new large source of energy over the period 1980 and onward. It considers the environmental and social problems of the Foothills proposal solvable due to the existing transportation corridor, and the National Energy Board points to the key factors of majority Canadian control, no government back stopping, and an accessible construction and supply route.

The figures as to manpower requirements, size, and economic impact are most astounding. It is estimated that, directly and indirectly, the pipeline development will create 100,000 man-years of employment. This includes about 28,000 man-years for construction and 40,000 man-years to manufacturers. The objective—

An hon. Member: That does not mean too much to the million who are unemployed.

Mr. MacFarlane: I did hear one remark, but I do not like to reply when I am reading figures. I am really an arts man and not quite as adept as many others in amassing a great number of figures, but in reply to that interruption about the one million unemployed let me say I always remember the beggar who said "You only dropped a penny but I appreciate it because nobody else dropped anything". I do not think I should knock the jobs that might be created because of the fact people are unemployed. I hope we can create more and more and more, but surely we should not knock the jobs that might be created through the 100,000 man-years.

The project involves construction of 2,765 miles of pipeline in Canada, slightly more than one half of the total of 5,487 miles. Cost of construction in Canada is estimated at $4.2 billion, excluding the Dempster lateral, or almost one half of the $10 billion estimated total cost of the pipeline.

The government is not rushing into this enormous project, yet is placing all urgency on keeping a tentative schedule of construction commencement in 1980-81 in northern B.C. and the Yukon, together with a start on pipeline laying in the Yukon by January, 1981. The beginning of operations is expected by January, 1983.

I am saying, coming from my area and thinking of the jobs the hon. member opposite mentioned, it is not too soon to start immediately building stockpiles. I say that knowing my voice will be listened to and considered by as honourable a man as the Deputy Prime Minister, who is concerned about Canadians. Let us start the stockpiles as soon as possible, let us start the storehouses of pipes because we need them all across the country so that we will have the pipe when we commence the pipeline.

It is significant to note that a northern pipeline agency is to be created to maximize economic benefits and minimize social and environmental impacts. Legislative powers now exercised by several other governmental departments and agencies will be transferred to the northern pipeline agency in order to create a single regulatory authority over this project. Designs, specifications, and routing will be subject to approval by this federal agency.

I will not repeat in detail the administrative plans which include a designated officer and a deputy head in Ottawa, together with an administrator in Calgary responsible for day-to-day operations. Foothills (Yukon) is required to cover the cost of this agency and the National Energy Board planning and overseeing until one year after project completion. The minister responsible for the project will be undertaking consultations with the United States, the provinces and the territories in Canada concerned, in order to co-ordinate all aspects of this project. An immediate appeal procedure will be provided through the Federal Court of Appeal.

Companies involved in the project will be required to provide extensive information on such matters as cost, financing, and shipper producer contracts. In the words of the Deputy Prime Minister, "the effort will be to maximize Canadian input and also look after the critical interest of Canadian gas consumers in seeing that the pipeline is built as efficiently and cheaply as possible".

Indeed, consumers in Canada will have a relatively greater stake in the pipeline than their American counterparts. By the mid-1980's Arctic gas will supply about 10 per cent of our domestic needs while Alaska gas will supply only about 5 per cent of the United States needs.

There is ample provision in the legislation to protect the interests of the Yukon. The territory will receive up to $200 million against future tax liability, and $35 million in property taxes before completion of the project. In addition, Foothills will be required to spend up to $5 million for lateral lines to supply gas to areas along the route. Preference will be given to Yukon residents in training and hiring for construction and operation of the pipeline.

Access to Mackenzie Delta reserves provided for in this legislation is an important part of our national strategy. Provisions in the bill call for the lateral to be ready to go when the need arises to draw on this frontier gas. The pipeline should provide a strong stimulus to further exploration in this area.

I must note that Canada and the United States, through this pipeline agreement, already overwhelmingly approved by the U.S. Congress, have joined in one of the largest private projects ever undertaken to satisfy the pressing energy needs of consumers of both countries. This, we all hope, will be the basis of further co-operation between the United States and Canada.

If there were no agreement with the United States on this pipeline it is unlikely there would be any opportunity in the future for us to gain access to Delta gas reserves. As my colleague, the President of Privy Council, said, the pipeline project will provide a "substantial stimulus to Canadian production and employment and assist in the achievement of Canada's national goal of energy self-reliance."

This will give Canadian personnel and suppliers full opportunity to compete in goods and services for the construction of the project. It should provide a needed boost to consumer and business confidence in both Canada and the United States. Our balance of payments position will get support through capital inflows to this country and tariffs on American gas transported through the Canadian system.

Canadian companies sought no monopoly, as would have been inherent in a guaranteed percentage of Canadian content. As the Deputy Prime Minister said, we have in this country highly developed companies in these fields that have requested no more than a fair and competitive opportunity to participate in the supply of goods and services for the pipeline.

I should like to echo the comments of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) when he indicated that we should build this pipeline cheaply, efficiently, and make certain there are no unnecessary delays. In today's economy, delays cost dearly, considering what inflation can do to the construction dollar. The hon. member for Welland also indicated that Canadian companies are not worried about the thickness of the pipe, or about its diameter and whether it is high or low pressure. We should get on with this debate, without undue attention being paid to needless haranguing.

We have shown that our friends to the south are indeed our friends. We have shown that we have the kind of person who can deal in a foreign affairs manner not only with the President of the United States but with many of his representatives. It is a proud moment for me, representing the riding of Hamilton Mountain, to stand with the Deputy Prime Minister, a man from Cape Breton, who has stood so strongly for Canadians and who is now able to bring forward a proposal in a bill which will produce many, many jobs for Canadians in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) represents a change of view from his first public utterances about the capabilities of the Canadian steel industry. It struck me as strange when he publicly announced that the Canadian steel industry did not have the capacity to build the pipe. Earlier he admitted to being an arts man and uncomfortable with numbers. One would think by osmosis he would come to realize the Canadian steel industry is at the technological forefront of the world. As a general rule, Canada is far more advanced than most of its competitor nations.

Given the situation where governments do not become involved in oddball ways in subsidies and so forth, there should be no great fear that the Canadian steel industry cannot compete under normal market circumstances. I am pleased the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain now realizes the error of his ways and has corrected himself.

I regret that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) did not remain in the Chamber after making his remarks. He offered his impressions to the House as to the value of the pipeline, the reasons for the 56-inch pipe decision, and why the pipeline will be of benefit to Canada. He made a lot of observations which indicated that he has been reading the policies put forward by my party, as well as correcting his previous position. I see the minister for unemployment is chuckling. Perhaps he should read the last few publications of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, in particular the energy policy of 1973 and the energy strategy which followed. If he did so, he would notice a remarkable change in view from what the government published as a policy and what was articulated today. We welcome that change in view, but four years have been lost. Government members should have read our speeches earlier.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the pipeline would provide easier access to Delta gas. In view of uncertain world supplies, uncertain domestic supplies in southern Canada, uncertain political situations and so on, he indicated that it would be necessary to use that gas. I could not agree more. It is vitally important, but more important is the land use regulations, the royalty structures, the permit structures, and the licensing structures which will pertain to nothern Canadian lands under federal jurisdiction. Canada can have the most beautiful pipeline in the world, but it cannot deliver anything unless someone explores for stocks of oil and gas to fill the pipeline. That will not happen unless the government does something soon with respect to royalty structures in the Northwest Territories and the High Arctic.

The royalty regulations which were brought in by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) were kept in place until April, 1970. At that time the government withdrew them and indicated that it would be making changes. Approximately 7½ years later the government introduced a new set of regulations which are totally hopeless in terms of encouraging exploration. These were introduced last August through an order in council. If anyone makes a cursory examination of what is happening in the north he will find that exploration is tailing off substantially. The people of that region realize a pipeline company is coming, but exploration is not being increased by them because, under the present rules, it is not worth attempting to find oil and gas in the north.

The minister has indicated quite accurately that Canada needs oil and gas to satisfy its needs and to protect us from the vagaries and uncertainties of a world which is running short and is politically uncertain in some areas. When he makes that case he should realize that for anyone to have confidence in the government it is necessary to put rules and regulations in place which will encourage industry representatives to find oil and gas in the north.

I see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is re-entering the Chamber. He seemed to state a new policy of the government, but it was previously articulated on this side of the House, namely, that the nation should pursue an energy policy of displacing the consumption of crude oil with natural gas.

Mr. Gillespie: Is that new to the hon. member?

Mr. Andre: I have just found out that the hon. minister has been reading the speeches of Conservative members. I am pleased to see a change of mind on the part of the minister. The minister had great confidence in the exploration activities taking place in southern Canada, and in particular in Alberta. He indicated that those activities were producing fair volumes of natural gas. He expressed the thought that we could not rely on that effort to produce all our gas requirements, and that we would need more from the High Arctic and offshore.

In his discussion of the so-called gas bubble in Alberta and the exploration effort there, the minister failed to acknowledge that many of the explorers are small Canadian companies, the so-called independents. These companies are without large cash flows from existing production. They raise their money to a large extent through new investment and, as such, do not have the capability of discovering reserves of gas and leaving them for five, ten or 20 years, until such time as the market opens up so that they can sell them. In other words, they need cash flow from their discoveries in order to finance further exploration.

Waiting until 1983 or 1985 or beyond—until 1990—when Delta gas may be brought down to pursue this policy of replacement of natural gas and to work toward increasing the consumption of natural gas as opposed to crude oil, has the effect of denying these independents cash flow at this point in time when they are able to go out, and want to go out, to continue to explore and discover more gas. What I am leading up to is that if the minister felt, and was genuine in his feeling, that it is in our interest as a nation to pursue replacement of crude oil with natural gas, in other words, to increase the total proportion of national consumption of gas—we should be negotiating a swap arrangement with the United States right now or accelerating existing exports in order to provide these small independents with cash flows so that they can maintain their current, aggressive exploration efforts.

I am absolutely convinced that these small independents need more cash flow. Let us remember that with a swap arrangement or an acceleration of existing exports we do not at all diminish our long term security position. We simply provide cash flow at this point to those who are demonstrably using it to find more gas, so in fact we increase our security by finding more natural gas. If it is government policy that Canadians will use more natural gas, this seems a logical and sensible extension, and I hope the minister will pursue that policy.

We hope Bill C-25 will eventually lead to the construction of this pipeline, but as we look back at the process involved, expressions like "horrendously expensive", "political sham", "world's largest poker game" and "hodge-podge" come to mind. When we look back at the whole process the overwhelming impression which is left is one of incredible size and magnitude. It has been an incredibly inefficient way to reach a decision. The costs have been staggering. Canadian Arctic Gas is estimated to have spent $130 million on its unsuccessful attempt to secure the right to bring Prudhoe gas to the United States border. It is estimated that the Foothills group spent about $40 million. If we add up all the money spent by the National Energy Board, the Berger Commission, the Lysyk Commission, and internal government operations, it is not unreasonable to come up with a total of about $250 million in basically a non-productive exercise. Granted, some money was spent on accumulating engineering knowledge which will be used in the pipeline project, but only a small portion. The remainder was spent just on reaching this decision. If we had the same kind of decision-making process then as we do now, I wonder if we would ever have had the CPR.

There have been some suggestions, although they are abating these days, that the National Energy Board made a political decision as opposed to a technical or correct one. Frankly, I have read the documentation quite thoroughly and I find little evidence of that. I do not think such a position can be substantiated, but there is an extremely unfortunate perception of the integrity of the National Energy Board when we consider the way the decision was made. I hope that never again will we have in this country two or three separate boards or inquiries looking into the same question.

The government should be eternally thankful that the NEB did not make a recommendation contrary to the recommendation of Mr. Justice Berger because, if there had been two or more government commissions or boards making opposite decisions, the political chaos would have made life just a little uncomfortable. I wonder what discussions have taken place in the cabinet in this regard, and I wonder what decision-making process was involved.

We have had various ministers stating various things. One stated that no pipeline can be built until land claims are settled. Another stated that land claims settlements are quite a separate question and that one does not necessarily have to precede the other. In his speech on the resolution introduced by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) last August, my leader referred to what I think is an "Alice in Wonderland" attitude with regard to the decision-making process. My leader said the following:

> Mr. Justice Berger, having studied the Mackenzie Valley route, prefers the Alcan route, which he has not studied. The NEB, having studied Berger, recommends access to the Dempster route, which it has not studied. The Lysyk group, the third inquiry in a venture conceived, originally, to achieve Canadian access to the Canadian reserves, recommends a route which gives American access to American reserves, with the possibility of connection to Canadian reserves, assuming the viability of the Dempster connection, which nobody has studied.

The way which has been used to arrive at a decision is incredibly complex and bizarre. The only thing more bizarre is the way in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has assigned responsibility. One might describe the northern pipeline as a northern development project, yet the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) has not had any responsibility, nor did the previous minister, the current Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand).

If it is not a northern project, it seems logical that it could be an energy project. Indeed the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did try to negotiate a pipeline treaty with the United States about two years ago. However, when the resolution of the House of Commons was passed and when the decision of the NEB came down and it was time for the government to sit down with our friends and neighbours, the Americans, to negotiate a pipeline treaty, it was not the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who participated. It was not the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), even though international relations would normally come under his authority. It was not the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), even though trade and commerce are related to this.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did you want any of them?

Mr. Andre: It turned out to be the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council who, in the years I have been here, has never to my knowledge had anything to do or say with regard to energy or pipelines. Perhaps there is something magic in the background of a Cape Breton economics professor which makes him so superior to the other options available to the Prime Minister. Frankly, I wonder about the esteem of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that they would take this slap in the face from the Prime Minister, who clearly indicated he had no confidence in their abilities and turned to the Deputy Prime Minister and asked him to negotiate this treaty. The Prime Minister has treated his ministers shabbily. The Deputy Prime Minister has obviously taken that as an example to follow in the treatment he has given us in the House of Commons with regard to this bill.

As indicated by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), there was no reason for this bill not to have been introduced in November or December. It was ready. Negotiations with the United States had been conducted. Nothing substantial has changed between then and now. Why has there been delay in bringing forward this bill, which we are now told is vitally important and must be passed quickly? One cannot help but speculate on the possibility that there may be some ulterior political motive in the mind of the Deputy Prime Minister. That is sad from a couple of points of view, sad that he would treat the House of Commons in that manner and sad that he would play politics with a project so important to the nation.

A further example of the lack of common decency shown by the Deputy Prime Minister is that when the bill was introduced the press release and background material which accompanied it were not made available to members of this House until a week later. That is either an example of sloppiness in the minister's office or of the disdain he feels toward the House of Commons. Perhaps he hoped to derive some political gain from this course.

Another example of disdain was the tabling of the National Energy Board's report regarding the size of pipe to be used at three o'clock today when, at 2:40 this afternoon, the Canadian Press had already issued a bulletin on the subject. In other words, the people of Canada knew the decision some minutes before this House knew it. If the minister has a genuine interest in working with members of the opposition so that the business of the country may proceed in an efficient manner, why did he show this lack of courtesy?

An hon. Member: Tradition.

Mr. Andre: I suppose it is tradition. They treat each other that way and perhaps feel they should treat us in the same way.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources then read a prepared text dealing with the National Energy Board's recommendation. Again the House of Commons was relegated to a position of low priority by that minister. This hardly creates a mood conducive to the rapid conduct of business. One has to ask if it is a deliberate attempt by the government to create friction so that it can then go to the people claiming that it must get rid of the opposition and elect more Liberals in order that the country may be run more efficiently.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: I see the Deputy Prime Minister nodding in agreement but I do not think that little sham will turn the attention of the people away from the performance of this government over the last ten years. We are not worried about the outcome of the election, whatever it may be. I am confident we will be given the responsibility of clearing up this mess within the next few months.

This is an important project for Canada and we want to co-operate. In August we agreed that the pipeline should go through, and we have not changed our view. Several members on this side have given details of things we would like to see modified in the bill. We hope there will be more flexibility and willingness to co-operate when it reaches committee than have yet been demonstrated by the government. We want to pass the bill with dispatch and efficiency and this is possible if there is a willingness to co-operate on the other side. If that is not the case, however, it may take some time for the bill to go through. That would be unfortunate for the country, but it would not be the fault of this side.

This project is important for the country psychologically, Mr. Speaker. It is a $10 billion project, but we must remember that the Canadian portion only amounts to $3.8 billion. It is not as complex, for example, as the Syncrude tar sands plant in terms of the technology, the construction and environmental impact. The hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain referred to exciting new technology but, Mr. Speaker, it is the oldest technology in the world. As a matter of fact, building pipelines is a simple engineering task, and Canada is probably one of the world's best at it. We can do it quickly, effectively, and more efficiently than any other country. We are also in the forefront of the communications industry, so to describe this as some big research and development project just is not correct. It is something that Canada has been doing well for a number of years and we have no need to be frightened of it.

A very small portion of the project will go into territory that has not had pipeline before, and that is the part in the Yukon. Northern British Columbia has all kinds of pipeline already so they know how to lay and maintain pipe. It is not a frontier in any sense of the word. Alberta has thousands of miles of pipe. Indeed, I think the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) probably has more pipe running under his ranch than will be running in territory that has not been pipelined before. We have no need to be concerned about the magnitude of the project.

I wonder why the National Energy Board, or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or the President of Privy Council has not referred to the Energy Resources Conservation Board in Alberta or its equivalent in British Columbia for guidance on the operation and management of the project. Both provinces have thousands of miles of pipe. This would seem to be a good area for federal-provincial co-operation, and since these provinces already have the expertise, their help could mean a substantial saving in expenses.

A stimulus of $4 billion to the Canadian economy is of great importance but I want to point out, particularly to members of the New Democratic Party, that the money will not be spent primarily in British Columbia, Alberta, or even the Yukon. Most of it will be spent in the rest of the country.

Some years ago an economist at McGill University undertook a study of what happens to a dollar spent for oil exploration in Alberta. Some 65 cents of that dollar ended up in central Canada in the hands of suppliers, bankers, and transportation companies. That is from oil exploration only. For pipelining, the spread of money will be much larger. Out of that $4 billion a very large percentage will end up in other regions of the country apart from where the pipeline itself is located. With co-operation for the government, the benefits of the pipeline could easily be expanded into Quebec and Atlantic Canada where there is a real need for jobs today. The government could help in locating suppliers, removing transportation bottlenecks and in acquainting producers and manufacturers and service operations with the opportunities; the government could bring together the contractors and the suppliers from Atlantic Canada and Quebec, and this could ease the serious unemployment problems they are experiencing.

The government could do a lot toward spreading the benefits of this project right across the country. That is what I would call positive government action. That is the sort of effort it should be directing itself toward now. It does not need legislation, or new hiring of hundreds of civil servants. It does not need to create new authorities or regulations. All that is required is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) to get to work and do their jobs. They can spread the wealth across the country.

Another aspect of this project I will just touch on because it will be discussed in greater detail by my friend, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have heard of the proposal from this party to provide an opportunity to Canadians to participate in the equity position of this pipeline. It will be a good investment. There has never been any pipeline which has lost money. However, that is not to say pipelines are free from risks, they are not.

Who will have the chance to invest in this venture? Clearly the Foothills and AGTL group have put a lot of money into this project and they deserve an opportunity to participate. If other people are to be given an opportunity to participate in the profits and equity position, to whom should it be given? Our proposal, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain will point out, is that all Canadians should be given that opportunity as was the case in 1957 when the government of Alberta gave its citizens the opportunity to participate in the Alberta Gas Trunk Line shares when that company was formed.

In fact if members opposite would read my speech on February 2, an allotted day, they will see that this party is encouraging that kind of approach to be used in many activities. Instead of creating Crown corporations or granting special privileges to special groups, use the Alberta Gas Trunk Line model and let individual Canadians participate in the equity position.

The hon. member for Yukon in leading off our party's debate on this issue indicated the importance of parliamentary monitoring of the activities of the pipeline authority. One aspect of this bill troubles me. That is the discretionary authority given to government. It is a typical theme which is included in a lot of legislation put forward by this government. We find it offensive in general for governments to ask parliament to give them discretionary authority to do whatever they want. It is a principle which the government applies far too frequently. It may be too late to do anything in this regard now, but one of the checks we can impose is that of parliamentary monitoring of what is happening. It is an after the fact method, that through knowledge the activities of government will be exposed to the light of day through a parliamentary committee. We feel that it will provide a control on potential abuses or misuses of the power we will be granting by the passage of this bill. We strongly recommend that when this bill goes to committee the government give favourable consideration to our amendments in this regard.

We do not intend to delay this bill, Mr. Speaker. We think the project is important and we think it will have tremendous advantage to Canada. It is important to Canada's long term energy situation. The process the government used in coming to this point was abysmal, to say the least. It was extremely costly and chaotic. It took it a long time to arrive at this juncture. We do not quite understand how the Prime Minister could have an energy minister and yet not allow that minister to have anything to do with the largest energy project that this country has ever undertaken. We cannot understand why an energy minister would take that slap in the face and not resign.

Finally, I take off my MP's hat and put on my chemical engineer's ring and talk about a 56-inch pipeline. I cannot see how the National Energy Board could have arrived at any other decision. Once they had decided on capacities, the size was dictated. To have gone to a higher pressure pipeline would have represented a step out in terms of technology that had too many risks associated with it. The problem, in my opinion as an engineer, is less pipe than it is everything else—valves, fittings, compressors. I am sure we can build a pipe, weld it and install it, a pipe which will withstand those kinds of pressures. We do not know how much extra precautions would be necessary and therefore costs might escalate. There are always unforeseen costs in making that kind of technological advance.

Frankly, as an engineer, what would have scared me most of all in choosing these very high pressure pipes was the questions of valves, compressors, etc. This is especially so in the northern sectors where there are extreme climate changes. It is difficult to have equipment that will operate properly even under moderate situations. When you experience great temperature changes and a technological step like that is made to very high pressures, the risks are inordinate.

The 56-inch size pipe, of course, is based on a decision to provide now for the capacity to bring down Delta gas through the Dempster line. Having made that decision there is no reason for any delay in proceeding with the study of the Dempster Highway connection to the Mackenzie Delta. If you are installing 56-inch pipe it is because you expect the Dempster lateral to be built. They follow one after another. It would be stupid to instal 56-inch pipe if there was a significant possibility that the Dempster lateral would not be built. Money would be wasted. By adopting a 56-inch pipe the government is saying the Dempster lateral has a very high probability of being built. If that is the case let it come out and say it, and we can proceed with the necessary studies and analyses to make sure the time lag between now and when it is built, with the costs involved, and disruption, are less significant than they have been in this instance.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. I wish to make a few comments on Bill C-25 for the building of the Alcan pipeline. It will be the largest and costliest in the history of this country and will have far reaching implications, particularly for those in the north, far reaching, socially, politically, economically, and environmentally.

My colleagues in the New Democratic Party have raised a number of very serious issues in this debate. I join with them in stating that, as the pipeline legislation now stands, this project will be one of the biggest sellouts in our history. If that happens to be the case, there are not many of us here today who will be proud to have been a part of allowing that to happen.

A great deal has been said during the debate on the economic aspects of building the pipeline. I strongly support the criticisms of the legislation that have been made by my colleagues. I am not happy that the government has introduced this bill at this time as it offers no guarantee that this project will generate jobs for Canadian workers. I say this particularly in view of the fact that there are now over one million people in this country who are unemployed.

There is only one guarantee in the legislation. That is that within a few years time a pipeline will run through Canada moving American gas to American markets. As the bill now stands, that is the only guarantee.

Leaving aside the economic issues for a moment, I wish to address a few remarks to the human aspects of this legislation. This area of concern has received very little attention. The government seems to have overlooked this important fact. I refer to those who live along the proposed route in the Yukon, northern British Columbia and northern Alberta. They are the ones who will bear the brunt of this project both during and after construction.

I do not know how to get this fact across to the government. Following their planned show in Alberta in March of this year, perhaps it would help if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his travelling cabinet visited Whitehorse and other parts of the Yukon. In any event, the lives of those in that part of the country will be very deeply affected by the building of this pipeline.

The impact on the local economy will be disruptive and lasting. How will the people of the Yukon minimize the adverse effects of the project on the people themselves and the economy as it is now?

There is no way the Alcan pipeline can be justified in terms of benefit to the local economy. It cannot be justified in terms of benefits it will bring to people of the Yukon. It appears the Yukon communities will not even benefit from cheap fuel supplies as a result of the pipeline. There will be the same situation as occurred in Alaska. That pipeline brought Alaskan gas past the doorsteps of people who paid very high rates for fuel to heat their homes. It was exported to the lower 48 and they had to buy it back. That is exactly what will happen to the Yukon.

The Foothills construction schedule calls for roughly 2,000 or more workers to be employed on pipeline construction during the peak period, and the majority of these workers will come from outside the Yukon. Although the Yukon Territorial government is making some preparations to see that Yukoners will be hired for work on the project, the job situation remains in a shaky position. We have no real guarantees that Yukoners will be given preference in hiring. The skilled construction workers necessary for pipeline work do not exist in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

All we have is a statement by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that he expects arrangements will be made with the pipeline companies to have interested Yukon residents sent out for training and experience on pipeline jobs. This is definitely not the kind of guarantee on which people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, especially in the western Arctic along the Mackenzie Valley, can rely.

Furthermore, it seems very unrealistic that the companies are going to lay off skilled pipeline workers who have been involved in the project in the southern section in British Columbia and Alberta when they reach the Yukon border because of some definition which states that these workers are not sourdoughs.

There are no guarantees that Yukon workers will have first crack at pipeline jobs. The government has not said how it plans to enforce any regulations that will guarantee jobs to people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Nothing in the legislation is strong enough. If those in government have given this serious thought since debate on this bill started, perhaps we will hear about that today or within the next few days.

Yukon communities will have to accommodate the needs of in-migrants at considerable financial and social cost. Most of the workers will leave the Yukon when the project is finished. We have seen that happen time and again. It happened with the building of DEW line sites, the town of Inuvik, and the building of a few gravel highways. What was left behind was usually not good.

During construction of the Alyeska pipeline in Alaska, the influx of people led to the disruption of local economies, an increased demand for government and commercial services, and a rate of inflation that was double the United States rate of inflation at the time the pipeline was built. There is no sensible reason to suggest that the Yukon experience will be any different.

Surely we have something to learn from the Alaskan experience. During the period of pipeline construction several important changes occurred in the city of Fairbanks, for example.

This affected drastically the lives of the local people. Unemployment rose, prices went up, nearly one half the work force suffered a loss of real income, taxes increased, and inflation went crazy.

● (1652)

Migration into a community causes serious shortages. There is an increased demand for services, utilities, and commodities, not excluding housing. This is what the people of Whitehorse, one of the largest communities along the route of the proposed pipeline, have to look forward to now. There is no way in which one can justify the building of the pipeline in terms of benefits it will bring to people of the north.

The Lysyk inquiry clearly stated:

The Foothills project relative to the Yukon economy is at least comparable to the size of the Alyeska pipeline in relation to the Alaskan economy.

Is this what the government has in mind for the people of the Yukon—higher prices, unemployment, and a drop in real income? For example, public service accounts for between 25 and 30 per cent of the Yukon work force. Public servants have endured the inflation of recent years. They have been obliged to pay steadily increasing rents because no rent controls were enacted in the Yukon, even after the formation of the Anti-Inflation Board. Now public servants may be left out in the cold, their wages frozen despite the rapid inflation we can expect in the local economy during the construction period.

Evidence before the Lysyk inquiry suggested that a significant increase in the cost of living in the Yukon could be expected while wage increases would not be uniform. This was the experience in the Fairbanks area of Alaska. Incidentally, I understand that banks, police forces, and even schools were affected by the project. People left their jobs to take on temporary work at higher pay. Police forces lost some of their men who preferred to take on jobs as security officers along the route. This is not the kind of thing which brings long lasting benefit to an area.

There is only one Canadian city where the cost of living is higher than in Whitehorse and that is Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories. However, it seems the people of Yellowknife can expect to lose that dubious distinction because the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and his collegues seem determined to ensure that Whitehorse experiences the highest cost of living in Canada; he and his party want this legislation even more than do members on the government side of the House.

So far I have not mentioned the social problems. We shall be facing many of these in the building of this pipeline. It is inevitable that social problems will accompany high unemployment, a loss of real income, increased abuse of alcohol, increased drug abuse, prostitution, family breakdown, mental strain and, most probably, increased criminal activity resulting from in-migration into the Yukon.

Health, social and educational services will be strained to the breaking point and beyond. Most of these services are already strained to the limits of their capacity. Government services will expand, and the people of the Yukon will end up paying for them. During the construction of the Alaska Highway the Yukon witnessed the effect of the migration of some 30,000 people. One presentation to the Lysyk inquiry estimated that as many as 30,000 people could be drawn into the Yukon during the peak period of pipeline construction. Whitehorse still bears traces of the planning problems which were encountered as a result of the building of the Alaska Highway some 30 years ago.

Today, Whitehorse is a city of some 12,000 people. I remember when they extended the boundaries. They boasted about being one of the largest cities, in area, in Canada. Whitehorse has an area of about 162 square miles, and the operation and maintenance of services in such an area require considerable expenditure. So services will be strained to their limit, or beyond, during the peak period of the building of the pipeline.

I have mentioned the Lysyk inquiry several times. I should now like to ask this question: what has happened to the recommendations of that inquiry? In the short space of just three months the commission was able to respond quite effectively to the concern of those living in the Yukon by putting forward a number of specific recommendations. First, what happened to the undertaking to hold a second stage inquiry? I would remind the government that the native people and the environmental groups took part in that inquiry on condition that there would be a further investigation, a second stage inquiry. The government promised that such an inquiry would be forthcoming, bearing in mind that Lysyk had only three months in which to do his work.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

WESTERN CANADA DEVELOPMENT CENTRE

SUGGESTED DATA COLLECTION AND MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a western Canada development centre to assemble and monitor, on a continuing basis, data concerning energy, construction, transportation, investment, housing, education and population as the basis for federal and provincial government policies to ensure integrated economic and social development in western Canada; such centre to be funded by a partnership of the federal, western provincial and northern governments and business, labour and academic bodies, who would prepare an annual report and public conference on growth in western Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the focus of my address this afternoon in this private members' hour is on improving the quality of life in western Canada, not just the quantity. The new west contains within its vast areas perhaps the highest potential for personal fulfilment the world has ever known, provided we find a way to integrate economic and social planning to make a more human society.

When I use the phrase "new west", I mean the four western provinces, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, a region that covers 70 per cent of the total land area of Canada and has a population of six million, or 27 per cent of the population of Canada as a whole. Here is found 80 per cent of Canadian farmland, more than half the merchantable timber, and almost all the proven economic reserves and potential resources of oil and gas.

By now everyone has heard that the new west has taken off on an economic boom so strong that the financial centre of gravity in Canada is moving westward. The list of construction projects is dazzling. They involve the $10 billion Alcan gas pipeline, which the House is now debating, the largest private construction project in history; the $2.15 billion Syncrude plant at Fort McMurray, now almost ready to start oil sands production; the $2.5 billion steam injection oil sands plant to be built at Cold Lake; huge coal and uranium mining projects, and petrochemical plants.

These energy projects are truly spectacular, but the new west is more than a storehouse of mineral resources. It has an enormous food production capacity, an unlimited supply of fresh water, and growing entrepreneurial and management skills. The benefits are already felt throughout British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba where the gross provincial product for the four provinces in 1976 was $8,850 per capita, which exceeded the Ontario and Quebec per capita of $8,280.

It is clear that the economic balance of power in Canada has shifted. We have the resources, the technology, the talent, and the money to keep expanding. The Alberta Heritage Fund has accumulated nearly $3 billion and will soon be growing at the rate of $1 billion a year. The new west is an attractive investment, and thus we are emerging as the principal economic force in Canada. In fact the strength of Canada as a whole now depends on the west. Last fall's Financial Post conference on western Canadian development, "Think West", was well named.

Western development is all the more remarkable considering that national economic policies have always been directed to the benefit of central Canada. The development of federally assisted petrochemical plants in the industrial heartland of Ontario, rather than policies directed toward upgrading at the source, is but one example. Inequitable freight rates have been a longstanding sore in western Canada.

Our resources in energy have enabled the west to emerge, but the new wealth will prove fleeting if industrial diversification does not follow. The west needs more industrial and processing diversity to upgrade and add value to its rich agricultural and resource base, to provide permanent jobs and business stability, to avoid vulnerability to big-project boom-or-bust cycles and the growing instability of farm and other primary product prices. This is why Alberta's premier, Peter Lougheed, is now calling for a new national economic policy involving "co-operative federalism in the fullest sense of mutually agreed upon economic policy and direction".

The idea of co-operation is well understood in western Canada. Indeed the western provinces have found sufficient common ground on which to base a lasting environment for strong co-operation and collaboration. The most prominent rallying point among the western provinces which sparks this co-operative spirit is our desire to pursue the economic destiny which we feel is ours. By having the opportunity to develop to our fullest potential, the western provinces feel this is the manner in which we can make the maximum contribution to Confederation.

Reviewing the history of western provincial co-operation, Dr. Gerry T. Gartner has written in Canadian Public Administration that it is becoming increasingly more difficult for a single province to muster the resources necessary to research, plan, and develop policies and programs. "To some extent, western provincial co-operation is a creature of necessity".

As far back as the first meeting of the prairie economic council in 1965, the western governments have seen the benefits of co-ordinating economic development policies on a regional basis. The one prairie province conference in Lethbridge in 1970 focused on wide constitutional, political, social, economic, and regional development issues. When the Western Economic Opportunities Conference was held in 1973 the west was ready to present Ottawa with a single regional position on agricultural, energy, and transportation policies that transcended their diverse political ideologies.

The Western Economic Opportunities Conference was not, of course, a flaming political, or economic, success. But it showed westerners themselves, as well as Ottawa, the shared common interests in the west. All four provinces want greater interprovincial trade and a larger role in Canada's export of manufactured goods. They want an efficient, economic, and stable grain handling and shipping system. They want a shared power of determination in federal-provincial cost-sharing programs. Undoubtedly the future of Canadian federalism will depend, in large part, on the resolution of these problems which threaten national unity.

Because of gains through co-operative economic analysis, it is distressing to note that similar progress has not been made on issues that have a social theme. Dr. Gartner and other analysts have concluded that the least effective co-operation is found in the social area: social policy, cultural policy, educational policy and justice. Topics such as social service costs, native problems, billingualism, school curriculum content, and corrections and law reform have been discussed by the western premiers, but little in the way of co-operation has resulted. This is unfortunate because the spectacular economic growth of western Canada is obscuring deep social problems. The evidence is mounting to convince anyone who still needs convincing that economic growth alone does not make a healthy or beneficial society.

Consider just the situation in Alberta which is the cutting edge of western growth. In 1976 Alberta led the nation in the rate of both drugs and sexual offences and in violent crimes. Drug offences jumped 55.8 per cent over the preceding year. The rate of sexual offences, 60.57 per 100,000 population, was well above the national rate of 46.07.

Social problems are by no means confined to the criminal element. Though Alberta is one of the most blessed spots in the whole world, the divorce, alcoholism, abortion, and suicide rates are the highest in the country. There is discrimination against native peoples. Welfare rolls have soared. Major transportation bottlenecks have occurred in Edmonton and Calgary. Real estate prices and rentals have risen at unconscionable rates. Farmers are alarmed at the rate at which prime farmland is being gobbled up by housing and industrial developments. There is a desperate shortage of accommodation for senior citizens. Four thousand people a month are migrating to Alberta in search of jobs; and because the western boom is principally technological, not labor-intensive, many unskilled and semi-skilled remain unemployed, thus swelling the demand for social services.

In the midst of boom, there is not enough money for social services. What a paradox! Is it any wonder that family breakdown has become the most serious social problem of our time despite new-found wealth? As the Edmonton Journal drily observed:

> We have not been very successful in coping with the negative aspects of economic growth.

It is imperative that we upgrade the quality of life in western Canada by more attention to the social factors affected by economic boom. The problem is not wealth; the problem is people: people being increasingly excluded from what should be the real benefits of wealth while a few are increasingly favored. It is undeniable that people in all walks of life feel excluded from work, from status, from identity, from meaningful living.

When I talk about "quality of life" I am not talking about some vague comfort. I mean those areas that are regarded internationally as social indicators of the quality of life: health, individual development through learning, employment and quality of working life, leisure, command over goods and services, physical environment, personal safety and the administration of justice, and social opportunity and equality.

In the development of Canada so far, the accent necessarily has been on building and growth. Our success has been measured in the production of goods and services. But the conditions of modern society have changed dramatically in the past few years as a result of the technological and cultural explosions. Technology has brought many benefits—communications and transportation are just two examples—but it has also been a chief source of anxiety and spreading frustration that characterize modern life. The acquisition of more goods has not by itself made us a happier people.

Affluence makes sense only if it leads to increased social justice and personal fulfilment. In this way economic growth may become a means to the end of an enhanced quality of life. We are not without human concern in our institutions including this one, but we frequently express it in the wrong way. We add on humanizing factors to public policy rather than starting from the base of the human being, his rights and dignity. Our social security policies in pensions and unemployment insurance allocations are a prime example of this "adding on" humanization. In other words, we create a system which generates casualties and then add on another huge system to compensate the casualties.

These disorders stem from a distortion of values. The value of the human being is measured by his ability to buy, and hence consume. Those who are materially poor have failed. Measuring the worth of persons by their income level and buying power encourages social discrimination that compounds that harm. A subtle discrimination segregates rich and poor in housing developments, schools, law enforcement and health care. It is easy to enunciate a clear principle of justice:

every member of the Canadian society has a right to a share of the national wealth sufficient to enable him to participate fully in society. But it is very difficult to put this principle into practice while there is so much public confusion and resentment of the present social security system.

A more human society in Western Canada cannot be brought about solely by the relentless march of technology any more than by unfettered individualism. It can only be brought about by an orderly co-operative approach in which the individual and special interest give way to public concern for the common good. As Harleigh B. Trecker points out in "Goals for Social Welfare", 1973-1993,

> The individual must be seen and understood in society in a much more complete way than in the past. The intervening act of helping must focus not only on the individual but on the interaction of the individual in his groups and in society. Many of the pressures on the individual are societal in origin and no amount of working on or with the individual alone can relieve these pressures. Society must be changed.

We have to begin somewhere. The new west, because it is a dynamic that will affect all of Canada, is the place to start. I am calling for the development of an independent organization that will not only analyze the economic factors of growth in the four western provinces and the north but will promote sound social policies. It must speak courageously of values and desirable social objectives, but remember that resources are not unlimited. It must remain non-partisan but skilled in the work of governments which have the final responsibility for public economic and social policy. The organization must have enough financial support to operate with a high degree of professional competence.

In short, the time has come to co-ordinate systematically all the data concerning energy, construction, agriculture, transportation, investment, housing, education and population so that a clear picture emerges of what is happening to society in western Canada. Then, as my motion proposes, this complete picture would serve as the basis for federal and provincial government policies to ensure integrated economic and social development in the west.

Here I wish to pay tribute to the Canada West Foundation, a small, independent group of business leaders formed four years ago in Calgary to conduct research programs into western problems and to stimulate greater public awareness of the future of the west. Headed by Arthur J. E. Child, President of Burns Foods Ltd., the Foundation concentrates on an orderly development of the resources of the west. It has so far completed eleven research projects and its study of the energy and mineral resources of Canada is the definitive work on the subject. In process now are studies on agriculture, water resources and coal. Valuable though it is, Canada West Foundation, as Mr. Child himself has described it, is "an elitist organization" because it is small and highly specialized. Nonetheless, it is not a closed organization and its executive director, L. A. Thorssen, recognizes that a wider approach is necessary for material and human development and says: a co-ordinated and well-planned, total Canadian strategy could provide all Canadians with an enhanced quality of life.

The aims of the organization I envisage are contained in the name I am proposing: a Western Canada Development Centre. For me the word development signifies not only things but persons. Development means not only acquisition but victory over social scourges; the growth of knowledge, an expression of culture. Development is a whole. It is an integral, value-loaded, cultural process. It encompasses the natural environment, social relations, education, production, consumption and well-being. The development I seek for western Canada is an integral humanism. This requires the involvement of business, churches, universities, ethnic groups, credit unions, social agencies and others.

I should like to refer to one example of a human problem looming in the west. An economic boom has traditionally meant jobs. The trek of the unemployed to the west is well under way, but the chief characteristic of the new boom is that it is capital intensive and not labour intensive.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their co-operation. The major projects require more than $1 million of investment for each job created. Because of the boom, people are trekking west for jobs only to find that it is a capital intensive boom and not the kind which creates many permanent jobs. Construction jobs to start up resource extraction are short lived. No wonder the Alberta labour movement wants permanent secure jobs which will allow the work force to live the kind of meaningful, dignified, and orderly community life which we all have the full right to expect. I believe the answer to this problem is found in the housing construction industry, which is the greatest source of long term jobs.

Family formation and earning power are strong factors in the west. What is needed to stimulate the housing industry is better mortgage financing and more government action to make land available for housing. There is a joint responsibility of private enterprise and government to do an in depth assessment of the kind of industrial growth which will support future breadwinners and be good for family life. That is one example to indicate the integration between economic and social development. On one hand, the economic factors which have led to this boom are studied and, on the other hand, what the boom does to family life is studied, as well as what should be done to help family life achieve the true benefits of the boom.

In this new economic era the west will be challenged as never before to create secure jobs and to maintain stable communities. Public participation in the work of the Western Canada Development Centre is therefore essential. This can best be promoted through the publication of an annual report on the west by the development centre, which would provide the basis for an annual public conference to enable a flow of ideas and reactions concerning western growth to reach government leaders. Parenthetically, should the west really have to depend on the eastern based Financial Post to hold a conference in the west to tell them about themselves?

It is possible to tap the knowledge and wisdom of a wide range of individuals and organizations in western Canada whose common goal would be to promote the development of the new west as a centre of excellence. Canada West Foundation could indeed be a core group. The information already acquired on the people, land and heritage of the west by the Canadian Plains Research Centre at the University of Regina would surely be a valuable academic basis.

With a credible community base, a flow of funding should be available from the federal, western provincial and northern governments, business, labour and academic bodies. It is in the interests of all these groups to continue and enlarge the process of co-operation which was begun early in this decade. It is especially in the interest of the federal government for such a western Canada Development Centre to come into being because in the future our confederation will undoubtedly see wider sharing of jurisdiction between Ottawa and the provinces. The west wants not only a marked reduction in interference by the federal government but a shift westward in decision-making on public policy. As the west becomes a stronger component of Canada, our entire country benefits. The improvements in the quality of life which will come about through integrated economic and social planning in the west will benefit surely our whole people. The role of the federal government, then, is to leave the management of those centres to the local people.

The complexity of modern government has often been called a jungle. Here is a way to promote co-operative federalism, at the same time as restoring the belief of people that they can share in creating their own future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) for his very thoughtful and excellent presentation on the subject of his motion before the House today. His speech reflects his very genuine and deep concern for the improvement and betterment of human opportunity in western Canada, as well as elsewhere in the world. His speech was very worth while, although it was somewhat in a different direction than I anticipated when I looked at motion No. 12. Perhaps that is a reflection of our experience in this place where we tend to look more at hardware and economic aspects of development.

The debate which is ongoing now as to whether there should be a pipeline and, if so, on what terms, etc., is an important aspect of the development in western Canada, from which flow many of the social problems that were highlighted, pinpointed, ant outlined so clearly in the hon. member's remarks. He touched upon problems common to all prairie provinces, as well as British Columbia. Perhaps these problems are more common to Alberta, and if some of my references stem from my somewhat better knowledge of Saskatchewan than Alberta, I am sure the hon. member will understand that.

The hon. member is attempting to provide a format for a human resource development effort which will parallel the natural resource development taking place in the new western Canada. He elaborated by giving a number of specific examples of that. One point which clearly comes to mind with respect to Saskatchewan—and perhaps to a lesser proportion and extent in Alberta and Manitoba—is the growth in the population of Indian, Metis and native people in northern centres all across the northland of the prairies. These people are seeking jobs and economic opportunities on their own home ground. Despite all of the economic activity ongoing in western Canada, the federal and provincial governments have not yet been able to incorporate those people into some of that economic development. There are problems concerning different value systems, traditional lifestyles and so on. All of these things tend to complicate the situation.

Society has tended to resort to the modern day solution of more welfare and more income support, which is not the correct direction. Many of the present day leaders of the native people are very much aware of that fact and are looking to the federal government, provincial agencies and other agencies for the correction of that particular direction. Whether it is through an agency such as that proposed by the hon. member or not, I hope something is achieved.

I support the objectives and the theme put forward by my hon. friend, although I expected his remarks to relate more to hardware and economic aspects. I am not convinced that the western Canada development centre he proposes is the best route. Having said that, I have no better alternative to offer. I suppose some of my reservations stem from the fact that I have watched both federal and provincial governments for a number of years, and I tend to be a bit cynical when we set up more and more structures, agencies and frameworks. We have many of them in place now, and one problem referred to at the conclusion of my hon. friend's remarks was the problem of a jungle of agencies, whether they be governmental, intergovernmental, private or whatever. The public is confused by the wide variety and scope of agencies. Hence, my concern is whether another major agency covering a broad range of activities and interests would highlight the problems and zero in on them. Would it work fast enough and soon enough? Perhaps an expansion of some of the present agencies would be beneficial.

I recall that the Saskatchewan Research Council at one time was looking very hard at whether it should expand into the social side of things as well as looking at research only from the point of view of economics, pipelines for solids and other topics which had been studied and worked on by both the Alberta and Saskatchewan Research Councils. They were trying to decide whether there should be some mixing of the social problems referred to in this debate. That was explored but was not proceeded with, unless that has been done in the last year or so.

As far as the agency being a western Canadian agency is concerned, I support that. As a matter of fact, at the present time the federal government, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the western premiers and western farm groups are considering the advisability of establishing a prairie rail authority which would handle some of the functions which are now in the hands of the Canadian Transport Commission. In other words, it would bring a better regional flavour and hopefully a better regional appreciation to the problems of rail and railroads in western Canada. If that idea goes forward, there is a precedent in that respect, perhaps not in the same sense that Judge Hall and his commission reported on, but something close to that idea, although expanded somewhat. Here again we have the concept of a former all-federal agency being broken down to look at western Canada alone.

The pipeline debate indicates the very timely nature of this motion. My hon. friend outlined a number of other energy related projects, the magnitude of which is very difficult for most of us here or most Canadians in the west, in the east or in central Canada to comprehend fully. If we are going to proceed with such a centre, I am convinced that it must be a top notch, high calibre institution comprising very capable people who have earned their credentials elsewhere. This is necessary if their work or pronouncements are to have any real effect. Anything less would be of no real value. We have had enough ministerial committees, subcommittees, ad hoc committees and so forth. Some of that is necessary on a time to time basis, there is no question about that; but if this agency is to do the job my hon. friend holds out for it—and I share his objectives—it has to be an agency with some real statute. Of course, that will not happen overnight. That will take some time to develop, but I suppose a beginning must be made somewhere.

Perhaps there is a lack of private, independent spokesmen or agencies in the social field. We can look to the Science Council of Canada, to the Economic Council of Canada, or to the Conference Board. There are a number of agencies in the economic field, but there is not a long list of primarily social agencies, at least any which have any tremendous clout. There are federal energy regulatory bodies, provincial energy regulatory bodies and so forth. As everyone recognizes, the track record of those bodies with regard to energy supplies over the last few years has certainly not been good. The entire energy picture in this country was clouded, first of all, by the OPEC cartel of several years ago which brought about dramatic increases in prices which, in turn, brought about bickering and fighting between the federal and provincial governments about who should get all or most of the tax revenues from the various resource companies. That has tended to cloud the whole question of energy development in the country over the last few years.

Again I compliment the hon. member for raising the social side of the whole question. As far as western regional matters are concerned, I think we have done not too badly. We can look back to the PFRA of the 1930s. We can look to the Prairie Economic Council of 1965. I was with the provincial government of Saskatchewan when the first meeting was held. It was interesting to see premiers of diverse political views at that time—and that has not changed very much since—continuing that work and that liaison. We can look to what has resulted from those beginnings. We now see the premiers of the prairie provinces getting together. The PFRA and the concerted efforts of those years were seen again last year when it did not take the various governments and federal authorities very long to zero in on the 1977 drought threat which faced many parts of western Canada. The machinery was there. Work experience and the idea of getting together to tackle problems were not new to anyone.

Another agency which has come along but perhaps has not yet zeroed in on the social side of development in western Canada or, indeed, elsewhere in Canada, is the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion which, as hon. members know, was set up in 1969. DREE has zeroed in on specific industrial enterprises and assistance in terms of job creation. It has gone a considerable distance. The general development agreement is now signed with each province. We can go from there and point out specific things, such as a coal agreement with respect to British Columbia and a steel agreement related to Saskatchewan. The development of Ipsco has been timely because that company is now in a position, if there is further expansion, to take advantage of some of the opportunities which will be coming to western Canada if the pipeline project is proceeded with. That is another example of federal-provincial co-operation. It is the result of effort and study on the part not only of provincial and federal governments but also of other groups and agencies located in the prairie provinces. I think we should give some credit to officials in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for developments in this area in recent years.

My hon. friend referred to the conference that took place in Lethbridge. I believe the mere fact that people came together and discussed the various subjects that came up without concern about provincial rights and so forth is a good omen. The Western Economic Opportunities Conference was mentioned as well. That was also the product of hard work and effort on the part of everyone concerned. Of course, like the conference that took place just last week, it could be called either a success or a failure, but I believe the WEOC which took place in Calgary in 1973 was a good beginning. A number of good things came out of that conference and action is being taken in many areas, such as transportation, agriculture and the western Canada northland agreement in the three provinces. These are what we might call "hardware" programs even though some are related to energy. But they create a climate for co-operation.

I should like to turn to my personal concern about whether an agency of the type suggested by my hon. friend will ever be established. I think we need to hear from the provincial governments and their agencies as well as the Canada West

Foundation as to whether they support this concept or would rather expand existing machinery. I cannot help but be a little concerned about establishing a sort of blanket agency. I think something with clear-cut objectives would have more chance of success. I support the concept in principle, however, although I think it needs further consideration about whether it is the correct route to follow. I commend the hon. member for bringing the motion forward and I hope the idea can be pursued not only in this House but in other fora.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a sense in which the debate this afternoon is typical of the kinds of debates we have in private members' hour. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), a member of the opposition, has put forward an excellent idea and backed it with a very effective speech. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), a member for the government, has found no course but to agree with the ideas put forward. In fact, his speech was also a very good one in which he strengthened the case; but in the end he says he is not sure that we should let the motion pass because, in his view, it sets up another body or agency. I suppose that means that my hon. friend from Edmonton-Strathcona will get praise for the rest of the afternoon but that at six o'clock the motion will not be passed; it will be talked out.

Not only do I think the motion is a good one and that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona made an excellent speech, but I believe the House ought to pass the motion this afternoon. I emphasize that even if it were passed it would not set up the development centre. All it would do is to express the opinion of the House. It would be up to the government whether it acted on that opinion.

As for the criticisms from across the way to the effect that the motion seemed to talk too much in terms of hardware, I emphasize that the gist of the motion was to have an institute that would be concerned about policies to ensure integrated, economic and social development in western Canada. The whole proposal is concerned with the quality of life as opposed to the hardware that dominates the way we live.

I am reminded of the debate we had seven days ago on the motion presented by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—one that used to be presented from time to time by the former member for Malpeque, Angus MacLean. In that case, he was concerned about a certain aspect of life, namely the environment; he was concerned because of what it does to the quality of life.

This afternoon the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is likewise concerned about the quality of life. I thought his dissertation was first rate when he tried to find a balance between the material and the spiritual, between whether we should try to get individuals to become perfect or reform society to make it possible for us to become individuals. I subscribe to the philosophy he presented. If I might be so presumptuous as to sum up what he said, he was saying that man cannot live by bread alone, but man cannot live at all if there is no bread, and perhaps there has to be a quite a bit of bread if we are to have the kind of life that is possible today.

As the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley pointed out, there are plenty of agencies that deal with so-called hardware matters—the Economic Council of Canada, the Conference Board in Canada and various research bodies. The country is full of them. But there are not very many instances where studies are made, under government auspices, of what our economic development is doing to the quality of life of human beings in this country.

I belong to a generation that long ago was deeply concerned about the indignities human beings were suffering because economics went completely haywire. I think I can say for that generation that in our younger days we were determined not only to solve the economic problems but to build the kind of Canada in which human beings would not suffer the terrible indignities and heartbreaks that we went through in a decade, four or five decades ago.

I believe that today, even with the greater affluence that is around, mixed as it is with unemployment, there is a subconscious realization that we have to build not only railroads, pipelines, transportation and all the rest, but also a real quality of life. It would not hurt us in this House this afternoon to pass a motion saying that, in our view, the government ought to consider setting up a western Canada development centre to be concerned about the quality of life in this new and growing part of the country. I am pleased with the speech my hon. friend made this afternoon. I support his motion.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief because, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I should like to see this motion come to a vote and pass. All three parties have expressed the opinion that this is a very reasoned and responsible motion, with a well thought out and researched speech delivered by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche).

It would be appropriate for me to try to qualify what are a couple of misconceptions put forward by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac). I want to commend him because his reply to the motion was responsible comment and his reasoning was one that we on this side of the House would want to applaud. He said that one of the things in this country which we do not need is a proliferation of agencies; that is not a direct quote but the gist of his remarks. It is also the mutual feeling of the majority of members in this House.

There is a misunderstanding of what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is trying to propose in motion No. 12 today. First of all, he is asking the government to give consideration to establishing such an agency, which would be an all encompassing group, but in essence its input would be from the grassroots and from the conferences the agency would hold throughout the provinces. In other words, it is not an attempt to establish something that is bureaucratic in nature, but rather is information collection for recommendation to governments at all three levels.

Because that is the principle, we are not looking at something we can really refer to as being of bureaucratic nature. It is not an attempt to establish some new branch or department of the government. It is not an attempt to develop a several tiered bureaucracy. It is simply a case of trying to establish an agency which sets up a mode of communication through which the people of western Canada can touch bases with governments at all levels.

I have several pages of notes, but I do not want to delay a vote on this issue. I just want to illustrate one example of the importance of what the member for Edmonton-Strathcona has been saying. We have talked about the pipeline labour pressure. We predict they will be there with the pipeline coming from Alaska, the Yukon and the province of Alberta and with it its accompanying influx of labour. Fort McMurray is a town in the province of Alberta. Fort McMurray is a wealthy town with a lot of money per capita. There is a very high ratio of males over females. It is also a place no one really calls home. In the supermarkets, stores and hotels of Fort McMurray, people when they meet and greet each other ask: "Where are you from?" The answer will be that they are from Oklahoma, Texas, Ontario, and so on. They are not from Fort McMurray. Many of these people have lived there five, six and 10 years, but they do not think of it as home. The result is a community with a lot of money, and unbalanced sex ratio and a high crime rate. It houses one of the busiest police forces in Alberta. That is one example of an economic boom taking place without concern for the social stress that it will cause for a community.

I would like to conclude by asking that all members of this House cease speaking at this time and let come to a vote a very worthy and justifiable motion, one that should receive the consideration of this House.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to compliment the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) for the second point which he stressed in his dissertation, that being the quality of life. Many of us in this House do not consider that question as much as we should. I congratulate him for his continuing interest in an area which I consider important.

Someone said to me a short while ago: "There is an interesting situation that is happening in this world, Mr. Anderson. We have aircraft which can fly at twice the speed of sound. One can fly from Paris to New York in four hours and save five or six hours in travelling time. What is the point in getting there that fast if when you arrive you have no purpose in being there early?" In other words, we have developed a society where technology perhaps has outpaced our values in life. As a result, some things happen in society as a result of our not paying attention to the quality of life which the hon. member has stressed.

I agree with the comment which the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) made that there has been a long history of co-operation in western Canada. There has had to be, I suppose. It was the situation of necessity being the mother of invention. It is also true that the west has not had the same amount of economic clout and attention which central Canada has had for a number of years. I can understand why that economic clout has not been there. The day is coming where the centre of gravity in this country will move to the west. The potential of the west is being realized. The hon. member is right in pointing out that as a shift occurs there must be more attention paid to the area which has not received the same amount of attention from various groups—the Economic Council of Canada, for instance.

In the province of British Columbia we have a grassroots situation where regional districts are being funded by DREE. Economic advisers are paid for by the federal government so that at the regional level as well as at the municipal and city level there are people making decisions in small communities which are appropriate only to their own area. Councils, regional districts, municipalities, provinces and the federal government are all becoming involved in a variety of economic chores and economic decisions which each one has to make in its own sphere of activity. At this point is it wise to bring in a further group?

I am not speaking against this suggestion, but I am saying we have these groups established at the present time. Should we have another body involved in economic decisions in western Canada? The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona realizes the difficulty we have in getting provinces to agree with the federal government. We are aware also of the sometimes confrontation situation that exists between provincial and municipal governments. And now, in the case of British Columbia, we have regional districts, which is another form of government.

I wonder if, in view of the good intentions of the proposals in the motion the hon. member has put forward, he has a solution—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Alexander: You are talking it out, sir.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. The hour allotted for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in my earlier remarks on Bill C-25, I referred to the Lysyk report. I asked questions regarding the second stage inquiry. Evidently we are not going to get this. The second study to be conducted by the pipeline monitoring agency is not the type of second stage inquiry that the Canadian people, specifically those in the Yukon, were promised.

The second question I asked was what had happened to the strong, unanimous recommendation that, in order to avoid prejudice to a just settlement of the Yukon Indian land claims, pipeline construction should not proceed before August 1, 1981. If those in the government and the people to my right have their way, construction will begin prior to that. Indeed, judging from their remarks, many of those to my right would like to see the building of that pipeline start tomorrow morning. Settlement of the land claims will not be accorded the priority and urgency they deserve.

Third, what happened to the $200 million heritage fund which was recommended by the National Energy Board? We did not get that. Instead, the people in the Yukon got the right to borrow up to $200 million. They will have to pay interest on that loan. I do not know what the people in the Yukon can expect other than, as I mentioned earlier, the building of this pipeline through their territory and not too much good along with it.

There is provision in the legislation for the establishment of an agency to monitor construction of the pipeline. Such an agency was called for by the Lysyk inquiry and by the leader of my party when we supported the Alcan proposal in principle last August. At that time we demanded as much public input and scrutiny over the project as possible. However, the monitoring agency which this bill proposes is not at all what we had in mind.

What we will get is another government body responsible to a minister. We will get a group of bureaucrats in Ottawa & Calgary who will operate beyond the scrutiny of parliament. What we will have is a very powerful instrument in the hands of the government, with a very limited appeal procedure which stops at the Federal Court.

What is missing from this legislation is far more important than what is included. We do not have the grassroots participation of those in the Yukon in the monitoring agency. We do not have massive participation on the part of the Yukon people or on the part of people along the route of this pipeline.

There is no public involvement in the establishment of the conditions and terms of this agency. Instead, there is token participation on the advisory council. I am afraid as much attention will be paid to the advisory council as was paid to the recommendations of the Lysyk inquiry. I ask: How is this agency going to protect the rights of Yukoners? What steps will be taken to prevent environmental damage? How will the agency be staffed?

Will the government appoint as commissioner a person who has good understanding of the northern people and of the land of the north as well as having proven administrative capabilities? I think, for example, of Mr. Stewart Hodgson who is presently Commissioner of the Northwest Territories. I believe the government should have a talk with him and find out whether he would agree to take this position. If he did, it would create a vacancy in the administration of the Northwest Territories. The government could then move to bring in legislation whereby the position of Commissioner would be up for election. This would mean a greater degree of autonomy for the Northwest Territories. If the present Commissioner would like to head up this monitoring agency, I think he would do a good job.

What of native claims? The legislation makes no mention of them. During the debate in the Commons on August 4 and 5 last, concerning a northern gas pipeline, my party moved an amendment to the motion before the House as follows:

> That no pipeline construction precede a fair settlement of native land claims.

That is still our position. As things stand, the Yukon Indians are being asked to negotiate under duress. I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a statement made by the United States secretary for energy on September 23, 1977:

> The Canadian government has made a clear public statement that settlement of native claims in the Yukon will neither delay the project nor increase costs.

I need not repeat the recommendation of the Lysyk inquiry with regard to native claims. As recently as January 25 of this year I sought to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

> That this House is of the opinion that the government should begin negotiations immediately with a view to settling the land claims of the Yukon native Indians in principle prior to the commencement of the construction of the proposed northern pipeline.

Again I strongly urge the government to reach a settlement in principle with the Yukon Indians as soon as possible. This should be done not only quickly but efficiently and to the satisfaction of all parties. I cannot help thinking of the recent first ministers' conference which was held here in Ottawa recently. Although major topics were under discussion, northerners were not represented at the conference. The government continues to treat the northern territories as colonies to use as Ottawa sees fit. The elected councillors in the Yukon and in the Territories are not treated by the government as governments but as an administrative extension of the federal department concerned. This is not satisfactory to the people who live in the north.

Finally, since the government and hon. members to my right are determined to build this pipeline regardless of the adverse effects the project will have on the Yukon, I can only say that the bill in its present form is a shameful piece of legislation. The long term effects will be seen in the years to come and I am not at all sure they will be anything to be proud of. Surely, legislation could be brought down which would be responsive to the concerns and needs of northerners. My hon. friends and I will continue to speak out on their behalf.

Has the government really thought about the way in which the lives of the people in the north will be affected by the Alcan project? There are a number of guarantees which should have been written into this bill. My leader has been talking about one of them across the country for months. I refer to a guarantee of jobs. Guarantees should have been written into the legislation ensuring first priority for the people of the north—and here I am talking not only of the population of the Yukon but of those who live along the Mackenzie Valley. Arrangements should have been made for the shuttling of workers between the Mackenzie, the Western Arctic, the Arctic in general and the Yukon. Travel facilities should be upgraded. Improvements should be made at a number of airports. We need more VOR's as soon as possible to improve the safety of navigation, particularly one at Mayo and another at Fort McPherson. Also, I think it is necessary that the Alaska Highway be paved. The United States should be asked to defray a good deal of this expense because Alaskans make a lot more use of the highway than does the Canadian public. The highway will be used very heavily during the construction of the pipeline.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you and the House that although I have not been in the chamber for much of this debate I have been following it very closely and have read many of the speeches which have been made. I listened to most of the debate on the northern Canadian pipeline last August and I was particularly unimpressed by the ability of some hon. members to sit on the fence to determine what decision would be made, so that they could rely on their ability to be in a position to criticize. I recall in particular the speech made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). After he had finished I found myself wondering whether he was for or against a pipeline.

Mr. Nielsen: That was the way you used to be in caucus!

Mr. Horner: I listened to the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). He was against the bill. He thought it was a terrible agreement. Then he ended up by saying he wanted to have the jobs. Well, it is hard to have the jobs without the project.

• (2022)

I sympathize with the hon. member for Yukon because in his speech to the House of Commons he demonstrated beautifully the difference that exists between one who is in the opposition and one who is in the government making decisions. He likes being a member of parliament and he would like to take part in making decisions, but he does not really want any of the responsibilities involved in making the decision as to whether or not a pipeline should go through the Yukon. That was clearly evident in his speech made in August.

The main thrust of his speech to the House was to require the pipeline authorities to report to a parliamentary committee every three months.

Mr. Nielsen: That is what you once wanted.

Mr. Horner: In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we have had too many regulations and controls in the private sector in the past number of years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I have consistently attempted to remove many of the regulations and controls and to let people get on with their work. The government has made the decision that there will be a northern pipeline going through Canada delivering American and Canadian gas. Parliament can question that decision, but surely requiring pipeline authorities to report to a parliamentary committee on a quarterly basis would only hinder and handicap the building of this pipeline. Certainly, once the pipeline is built, if the hon. member for Yukon wants to set up a task force to inquire into whether or not the pipeline is well built and whether or not overruns were necessary, he has the right to ask for it and it is within the jurisdiction of the government to grant such a request. But I do not see the necessity for the business community, the financial community and the pipeline authorities to run to parliament every three months asking: "Mother, is it all okay?" I want to say to them: "It is your responsibility to build the pipeline. Build it under the criteria established and we trust you will do a good job".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The minister has the floor. I suggest we all listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The agency we are setting up will do an admirable job in policing the work and ensuring that the pipeline is built to the specifications laid down in the agreement.

With regard to the speech made in the House by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), my only regret is that I was not present in the House to hear it. I would call it one of those terrific speeches of which the hon. member has been capable during his long career in politics in the last 40 or so years. He was at his best in that speech. He lamented the fact that we in Canada were the little guys, that those terrible Americans, our enemies, were the big guys and there was no way we could make a deal which would benefit us, the little guys. If they were hard bargainers, he said, then you would know because they would have stolen your shirt, or something like that. It was a typical speech of the kind he used to make in his early days in Saskatchewan when he was premier of that province. He continues to be afraid of development, fearful of being the small participant who might eventually be robbed by the big guy.

His party speaks of creating jobs. No other province in Canada lost more jobs than Saskatchewan when the hon. member was premier of that province in the early days of his premiership. They left in droves. I cannot believe he was particularly concerned about jobs at that time. Nor does he seem to be concerned about them now. He is still, as he was in those days, a tremendously entertaining speaker, a very concerned member, but has little confidence in Canada and Canadians and in our ability to deal with those who may appear to be bigger than we are.

I read the speech of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) with regard to native claims. I looked through it carefully in search of his solution to that difficult problem, but I failed to find it. He dealt with the subject but failed to come up with a solution. It is easy to complain about a problem. It is far more difficult to find a solution to it. I admit the problem is a difficult one.

Last but not least I come to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). He has been crying out in the House for jobs, more jobs, yet his party cannot even say whether or not they are in favour of the pipeline agreement. The NDP must make up its mind. Do they want to see development, do they want to see Canada make the best of what we have available so that we can enjoy some of the benefits that jobs can bring?

The hon. member has tried his utmost to create a climate of insecurity and instability with regard to the building of the pipeline. He lamented at length the small Canadian content in the project and spoke about the big steel corporations in Canada not being capable of meeting world competition. Yet if we give the big steel corporations a chance to make a profit, he will be the first to claim on the hustings that they ripped us off in some way or another. His lamenting is discouraging investment in Canada, and yet it is investment in this as in many other projects that is needed to create the jobs to employ those who need work today.

Let us look at this decision to build the pipeline. There is no question in my mind that one of the reasons for choosing the Alcan route is that it would make more jobs available to Canadians.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not what you said in Inuvik.

Mr. Horner: I am telling the hon. member why the decision was made. If he does not like to hear it, he can go back to the Yukon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: There is no doubt in my mind that one of the reasons the Alcan route was chosen was to ensure that the maximum number of Canadian jobs would be provided. I am certain that Canada has both the management and the engineering capability to carry out this project as well as other such major projects. Major contractor groups in charge of design, procurement and construction and major pipeline operating companies are available in Canada to perform these tasks. More practical pipelining and northern experience is available in Canada than anywhere else in the world.

The magnitude of the projects and the anticipated difficulty of construction provide a significant opportunity to Canadian industry. The proven capability of Canadian firms in the international marketplace would be enhanced by their successful completion of this project. I should emphasize the last sentence, because it is important for us all to contribute to the successful building of this pipeline now that we are about to embark on it. It can only benefit our nation if we can assure the world that we can undertake projects of this magnitude and succeed in carrying them out.

Mr. Nielsen: Put on your hard hat, Jack.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member suggests I put on my hard hat. Let me inform him that I am a competent welder and could well be in the Yukon making big money in that capacity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: You've got a hard enough head for it.

Mr. Horner: There has been much talk about Canadian content. The hon. member for the Northwest Territories spoke about the 200 man agency which will be set up. I should like to assure hon. members that the machinery division in my department will be working in close conjunction with that agency to ensure the maximum Canadian content in the pipeline project.

Mr. Alexander: How do you ensure that? I want to hear it, Sir.

Mr. Horner: Countervailing duties could be imposed on those imports which benefit from export credit subsidies from the exporting country. A regulation promulgated only in the last year or so permits Revenue Canada to impose countervailing duties in such cases. In this regard I am particularly referring to DISC and the advantage a competing company may have in bidding on pipe for this job in Canada. We could set that advantage aside. In essence, I think that was what the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was worried about.

Action under the Anti-dumping Act could be taken in cases where exports into Canada are financed under more favourable terms than are available to the foreign manufacturer for its domestic sales. Under regulation (11A) of the Anti-dumping regulations, credit and other financing terms can be taken into account in determining the normal value, export price,

It should be noted that neither (11A) of the Anti-dumping regulations nor the imposition of countervailing duties for reasons of export financing subsidies appear to have been tested as yet. Moreover, the anti-dumping option would really only come into play after the fact, which renders its use, other than as a threat mechanism, somewhat ineffective.

Let me say too that the northern gas pipeline project is primarily intended to deliver gas to U.S. customers. Therefore, there should be little or no subsidization of U.S. consumers through the mechanism of financing the construction of the pipeline. It is not in the interests of the Canadian and U.S. governments to subsidize their own consumers in respect of energy costs at a time when it is the policy of both governments to emphasize energy conservation and discourage energy use wherever possible. For the United States to provide concessional financing through the Export Import Bank on the grounds that the transit pipeline is in another country would be contrary to the policy objective.

The main section of the northern gas pipeline to be built in Canada is being designed to accommodate—this was spoken about before and I am attempting to cover those things which were not covered as yet—2.4 Bcf of Alaskan gas and 1.2 Bcf of Canadian gas to the southern markets. The Prudhoe Bay supply will represent approximately 5 per cent of U.S. consumption. Canada is currently producing about 8.5 Bcf's a day of natural gas, 2.7 Bcf's of which are exported to the United States.

An hon. Member: What does "Bcf" mean, Jack?

Mr. Horner: You should know. The total system, excluding the Dempster lateral, will consist of some 4,700 miles of pipeline, 2,000 in Canada, 700 in Alaska and 2,000 in the lower 48 states. On that point, let me point out quite clearly what the 56-inch diameter pipeline really means. From the Alaska-Yukon border it is estimated that the line will be 48 inches in diameter, .54 inches thick, a distance of 265.6 miles with a total tonnage of 191,917. From Whitehorse to James River the pipe will be 56-inch diameter, .54 inches thick for a distance of 1,080 miles with a total tonnage of 912,000. The pipeline from James River to Monchy—and this is a point I would like to bring to the attention of those who are concerned about 56-inch diameter pipe—will be 42-inch diameter, .473 inches thick for a distance of 394.6 miles with a total tonnage of 218,486.

I might add for the benefit of those yapping jackals over there that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Horner: —the Stelco steel mill at Camrose is quite capable of rolling—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Horner.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest we listen to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Did you hear what he called us?

Mr. Horner: I might add, Mr. Speaker, for those who appear to find this whole subject matter rather humorous, the 42-inch line from James River to Monchy, a distance of 394 miles, could quite conceivably be rolled at the Camrose steel mill. Camrose being in the new constituency of Crowfoot, of which I am the member, naturally I am interested in that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: From James River to Kingsgate the pipe diameter is estimated to be 36 inches, .405 inches in thickness, a distance of 281 miles with a total tonnage of 114,457. One can readily see that there is something in the neighbourhood of 700 miles of the 2,000 miles of pipe in Canada less than 56 inches in diameter and which could quite conceivably be rolled by some of the smaller pipe rolling mills, one in Edmonton and the other in Camrose, as I suggested.

An hon. Member: Who wrote this, Jack?

Mr. Horner: Wouldn't you be surprised. The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) flatters me by suggesting that I am reading a speech this well. That is a compliment, because—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You can't read!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Because I can't read, you are right. I suppose that, because it is flowing from me so well, this tends to make the hon. member think I am reading, but it is just that I know the subject that well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The interesting thing to me, which I wanted to point out, has reference to the manufacturing content of this pipeline. As I just pointed out, about one-third of the pipeline, in fact about one-half if you add it up, will consist of pipe less than 56 inches in diameter.

An hon. Member: Say that again.

Mr. Horner: About half of the length of the pipeline will be less than or about 56 inches in diameter. The total rolling of the pipeline will represent only 58 per cent of total manufacturing involved in constructing the pipeline.

An hon. Member: How much of it is going to be laid?

Mr. Horner: I would like to think that the hon. member would realize that if you are building a pipeline the whole distance has to be laid before it can be used.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That's a little difficult for them to understand.

Mr. Horner: There are many other component manufacturing parts that go into the building of a pipeline which should be of great interest to Canada in that they will create a great many jobs in many parts of Canada, some as far away from the pipeline as Nova Scotia. I am thinking particularly of compressors, valves, pipeline fittings and other things. The main line compressors will amount to something over 7 per cent of the total manufacturing bill of the pipeline itself. There are also generators, compressors and turbines required to move the gas, all of which are within the capability of Canadian manufacturers to make. We also require refrigeration units for that part of the pipeline which has to be in the permafrost area. We also require coating on the inside of the pipe, which can and will be done in Canada. We require coating on the outside of the large diameter pipe, and Canadian manufacturers have the capability of doing that. This will also be done in Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: "Liberal sugar coating".

Mr. Horner: The hon. member suggests that these are both "sugar" coatings. I suppose in the mind of someone inexperienced they are something like that, but they are far more permanent than a little bit of sweetness. The pipeline and the manufacturing of the pipe means a great deal to Canada. The pipe manufacturing accounts for approximately 58 per cent of the total manufacturing bill. It is one more thing the Canadian steel industry is capable of doing.

● (2042)

The total amount of tonnage required will be 1,436,000 tons of steel rail. That steel rail will be required to construct the line with 56-inch pipe. If one refers to the summary of the Canadian primary iron and steel industry, which was prepared by my department seven weeks ago, one will realize that only accounts for 3.5 or 4.1 per cent of the projected Canadian steel consumption. That should give hon. members some idea how large the Canadian steel industry is, how competent it is, and how well it can meet the challenge presented to it by the pipeline bill.

Concern has been expressed as to whether our industry is competent and can compete pricewise. I should like to put some figures on the record in regard to that.

Mr. Woolliams: Sure you do!

Mr. Horner: I know the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) will be interested. I should like to refer to a document entitled "Historic Price List Relationships For Canadian and U.S. Pipe Mills". With respect to September 1977, 42-inch diameter by .5—

Mr. Woolliams: By five what?

Mr. Horner: By .5 inches. I thought everyone was versed in the terminology. I am sorry if I take it for granted that hon. members opposite are as well informed as myself. With respect to September 1977, 42-inch diameter by .5, the Stelco price was $551 per ton and the American price was $646 per ton. Of course, I am rounding these figures off. With respect to the larger pipe, the same difference exists, but it is very difficult to get. Also it is very difficult to get prices from the United States on larger sized pipe because they do not have the capability to roll any pipe larger than 48-inches.

I wanted to draw that to the attention of hon. members to indicate that the Canadian steel mills are competitive with the American ones. Certainly we are prepared to meet that competition. If those who are vitally concerned with the cost of production of steel had looked at the iron and steel industry profile prepared by my department, they would see a table outlining the cost of production. If anyone wants to check my figures, he can turn to page 6 which indicates that Canadian iron ore scrap is indexed at 22.5 and the United States scrap is 23.3; the cost of energy going into making that steel is indexed in Canada at 17.35 and is indexed in the United States at 17.65; labour in Canada is indexed at 23.1 and in the United States is indexed at 27.04; the amortized capital is indexed at 36.81 in Canada and at 31.94 in the United States. Canada falls short in the amortized capital area. This is affected by the amount our steel mills are used in comparison to the American ones, as well as the fact that our mills are new and the ones in the United States are somewhat old. The Americans have lower amortization costs with respect to the manufacture of steel because their mills are used to supply a larger market, are a little older and do not have the same high cost of capital charged against the making of steel.

Those figures indicated that Canada can compete. We have a number of pipe building mills which can compete. Those informed on the subject matter regarding the rolling of large diameter pipe will realize that Stelco may be short of pipe steel. However, this shortage could be offset by the Algoma steel mill in Sault Ste. Marie.

I look forward to the pipeline going ahead. As the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) pointed out, Canada will benefit a great deal from the construction of the pipeline. It will provide us with an access to Delta gas. Our gas will be brought down from the Delta cheaper than the American gas will. With respect to the benefits alluded to by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories, the pipeline will increase substantially the tax bases of the Yukon, British Columbia and, to a certain extent, Alberta.

Mr. Nielsen: You will not let us have them.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member indicates that we will not let them have them. We are advancing $200 million on that tax base.

Mr. Nielsen: A line of credit.

Mr. Horner: One interesting thing about this pipeline in relation to the Alyeska route is that the Alyeska route was taxed at a depreciating value.

Mr. Woolliams: With Japanese pipe.

Mr. Horner: I am not talking about the pipe. I wish the hon. member for Calgary North would listen. I was referring to the tax base.

Mr. Woolliams: You mentioned there was never a pipeline built—

Mr. Horner: I said that there had not been a pipeline built with Japanese pipe recently in the province of Alberta. If the hon. member would return to Alberta and inquire about that, he would find out that is true. I was dealing with the difference between this pipeline and the Alyeska route. The Alyeska route pays taxes on a depreciating value. This pipeline will pay taxes on an increasing value, because an inflationary factor is built into the capital cost of the pipeline and taxes are charged accordingly. There is no question this pipeline will bring substantial long term benefits to Canada and will bring some immediate benefits to the Canadian manufacturing industry.

From time to time I have heard hon. members opposite express concern. If the House gets on with the job, and the bill reaches committee stage, some advance contracts could be made with the steel-making empire of this country in order for them to commence rolling plate and pipe. We want to see jobs created in this country. We want to see immediate action to create jobs in this country. If hon. members who are demanding jobs in this country want to do something concrete, they could pass this bill. In later years they could look back and realize they knew the bill would create jobs. There are a large number of people unemployed. We should get on with the job and pass this bill. It should be passed through committee stage quickly. All suggestions and advice will be listened to in the House of Commons during the oral question period from time to time. The minister in charge of this pipeline will be more than willing to listen to constructive advice which hon. members opposite may want to lay down.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is very exciting for me to be able to participate in what is obviously an historic debate.

Mr. Horner: I can't hear anybody talking.

Mr. Malone: This will be the largest project in Canadian history. It will be bigger than the St. Lawrence Seaway. It will be bigger than the construction of the CPR. It will be a very great project for Canadians because it will contribute to the prosperity of this country.

I am privileged this evening to follow the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), that gentleman who made Judas look like an amateur. Many of the things I want to say tonight are things with which the minister cannot disagree. We know that the pipeline will extend prosperity to Canada. I also know that is the position the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will take, because on January 8, 1976 he stated:

Stopping (Trudeau) is the duty of every Conservative in Canada. It is the task of every Canadian who cares about the freedom and prosperity of our land.

The minister obviously is concerned about the prosperity of our country. In his speech tonight he said that hon. members on this side of the House, in asking for a parliamentary committee to review the project from time to time, are really trying to obstruct the private sector of this country. I was appalled to hear that because the minister knows very well that this party has been attempting to restrict the government of this country and its heavy hand. In this regard I would like to quote what the minister once said about this government and its high-handed tactics. On a previous occasion the minister likened the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Napoleon, but he also saw a similarity with Hitler. He stated that on January 15, 1976.

Mr. Alexander: Did he say that about the Prime Minister?

Mr. Andre: Shame.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has just quoted something which I have never at any time said. I have always denied saying that. I cannot keep up with the kind of garbage hon. members opposite keep repeating. There is an indication that hon. members read my speeches, and I am flattered. I do not mind their reading my speeches, if they can show me what I said and where I said it. I would like them to read the end of every speech I have ever made in this House, because when I was in the opposition I offered constructive solutions to the problems of the day. But I have never said what the hon. member just quoted me as saying.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the minister that that is a matter of debate and not a question of privilege.

Mr. Alexander: That is just what I was trying to say. You have no question of privilege, sir.

Mr. Harquail: You are not Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: I did not say I was. The minister said that, and he knows it.

Mr. Horner: I did not.

Mr. Alexander: You did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the point that our party would like to have a parliamentary committee which could review from time to time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) has the floor for the purpose of making a speech, and I suggest hon. members listen.

Mr. Malone: I would like to point out why there is a need for a parliamentary committee. Here again I find that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in complete agreement, because he stated at a Toronto press conference on January 13, 1976 the following:

> Trudeau considers Canada a nation of spiritless, helpless and faceless people in his game of national socialism.

It is because of that national socialism that we distrust the government opposite, and that is why we want a parliamentary committee. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce fully agrees with the kind of position we are taking. In case there is some doubt that he is convinced that we need a parliamentary committee to review monthly or quarterly, I would like to point out what is recorded in Hansard on page 6662 for June 11, 1975. At that time the minister said:

> In the past six or seven years we have seen a tremendous shift in the Liberal Party's philosophy, a shift away from belief in the individual and a shift towards governmental involvement in the individual's business. The Liberal Party thinks that the government should interfere as much as possible in the individual's business and no longer be content to play the part of referee.

Mr. Alexander: Did he say that?

Mr. Malone: We have been asking for a parliamentary committee which could review the progress of the pipeline and report back to parliament on a monthly or quarterly basis. The reason for that is that we want to have some control and some checks on the government itself. Tonight the minister confused his thoughts with the stable thoughts he had some years ago. He told us that we are trying to muzzle the private sector. The whole purpose of this proposed parliamentary committee, which has been recommended by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), is to free the private sector from the heavy handedness of a locked up and secretive cabinet, with which we know the minister himself fully concurs. On that basis I ask again that a parliamentary committee be set up.

It is unfortunate that some sanctimonious members are attempting to filibuster this bill. I refer to members of the New Democratic Party, who state that United States companies need this legislation prior to the end of March. We know that that is the situation, but filibustering this bill will cause more jobs to be lost. If the pipeline does not go through, the New Democratic Party's holding out for extra guarantees will result in no jobs at all. If this bill is not passed through the House quickly and through the committee stage as a result of the filibustering of the New Democratic Party, that party will set an example of gross irresponsibility. Having that party involved in major money matters is like sending a tom cat to guard mice.

By their actions the Liberals have dangerously delayed this bill, and I want to emphasize "dangerously". The Liberals have risked the destiny of Canada with the political game they have been playing and with what I submit they have been attempting to do with this bill. It was drafted and prepared before Christmas. The bill was not brought to this House until just this past week. I submit that what the Liberals were attempting to do was to bring this bill in late in the hope that, because of its complexity, the Conservative Party would, in an attempt to get answers, debate it long enough that there would be a risk of losing the pipeline.

I submit that the Liberals might play that kind of politics in the hope of demonstrating to the people of Canada that we on this side killed the bill. We have news for them. We are not going to shirk our duty. We are going to study this bill, but we are not going to filibuster. We will let this bill pass as soon as we can, but the government knows that it must go to the committee, that there must be a report stage and third reading, and that if it is not passed by the end of March this pipeline might never be constructed. One of the facts to which this government must face up is that, because of its delay in introducing this bill, it has risked losing the largest project ever in Canadian history. I think that albatross has to rest on the necks of members of the Liberal party, and it will certainly be theirs to wear if this bill is passed too late and if that pipeline is not built. The Liberal party hoped we would drown the bill in our own oratory, but I assure the House that that will not be the case. The project is too big. It means too many jobs. It means too much hope, too much opportunity for Canadians.

While the official opposition will not neglect its duty, it will be putting up only a few speakers who will not speak for long. The partisan political engineering of the Liberal party will be their own albatross—theirs to wear if this pipeline is delayed.

In my role as ground transportation critic for Her Majesty's loyal opposition I have a few specific comments to make in that domain. First of all, I should like to refer to the Foothills gas studies which indicate that the Welland-Stelco pipe may well be shipped through the Panama Canal to Alaska, rather than overland by rail through Canada. The reason for this is that overland rail transportation in this country is far too expensive. It may be a surprise to many people in central Canada to learn what the west has always known—that Otto Lang does not seem to know anything about running a railway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I would suggest to the hon. member that he refer to a member of this House by this title or his riding, and not by name.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your admonition very much. I shall never use those foul words in this House again.

The report that Stelco is considering shipping pipe to the north by way of the Panama Canal gives the reason as the high cost of rail transportation in Canada. If there is any truth in this report, then U.S. steel production at Baytown, Texas, being closer, would have a distinct competitive advantage.

We must recognize the advantages of water routes over railways. In this connection the following information may be useful. The most recent statistics issued by the Canadian Transport Commission show that in 1973 users of railways paid 74 per cent of the cost, users of highways paid 64 per cent of the cost, users of civil aviation paid 31 per cent of the cost, and users of marine services paid 19 per cent of the cost.

With respect to your comments of a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) knows nothing about running a railway when he has a user-pay system where railway users pay 74 per cent of the cost and marine service users pay only 19 per cent of the cost. With these costs we are liable to lose the chance to ship steel by rail across the country and see it go instead through the Panama Canal, that being the cheaper route.

The lesson is simple, Mr. Speaker. First of all, let us pass this bill and then let us have an election so that we can get a government that will allow Canadians the opportunity to afford Canadian products.

This is an expensive project, Mr. Speaker. We note that it is going to cost $10 billion and could run up immense interest costs through borrowing on the foreign money market. Today, we have an 89 cent dollar which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner)—Your Honour will note that I did not use any abusive language that time—says is good for us even though we know it is costing us a tremendous amount of money just to pay interest on our foreign debt. We must remember that even if this is to be a Canadian project it will involve an infusion of foreign capital and that we will have to pay for the money that we have borrowed with a cheaper dollar.

The Progressive Conservative party demands that the bill include effective monitoring capability of the proposed pipeline agency by parliament so that the Canadian content requirement might be met. We expect that the agency would make available to parliament both monthly and quarterly progress reports, outlining the specific Canadian content objectives of the agency and its progress in achieving such objectives. We note with concern that the aforementioned government report on Canadian content concluded that Foothills' commitment to Canadian content could be achieved only if the government instituted appropriate guidelines, controls and monitoring. Mr. Speaker, we believe that but we also believe that those monitoring controls must be out in the open. That will only happen if we have a parliamentary committee make the decision, not if it is left to cabinet.

The decision on the size of pipe was solely the responsibility of the National Energy Board. I appreciate that and have no quarrel with the fact that they decided on 56-inch pipe, as this will be of benefit to Canada. Naturally I think that the community of Camrose will benefit from some of the spin-off coming from the main pipeline. It is also important that plants in Camrose, Regina, Edmonton and Welland be given the opportunity to produce pipe. I am sure that the pipeline will be a real boost to the economy of the country as a whole.

Before I conclude I should like to comment on some aspects of the Alaska Highway. The Liberal government has been derelict in its duty in regard to this highway and has shown a miserable lack of vision when it comes to the north and its resources.

The Alaska Highway was built in nine months in 1942. For years Canada was blind to the potential of the north and failed to recognize the potential to the economy of resources and tourism in that part of the country. It was a former government under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that built the "roads to resources" and started paving sections of the Alaska Highway. A former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, referred to that program as the government spending money in the Yukon like a drunken sailor—"building highways from igloo to igloo." That was being short-sighted, Mr. Speaker. Today, we have a major highway there and plans for a major pipeline. Before the highway is paved there will undoubtedly be changes in its route.

Pipe will not be laid in the Yukon before 1981. Meantime the government should study the highway in the Yukon immediately and consider its route before it is all paved. It does not make sense for a pipeline to dictate where the highway should go, nor does it make sense for them not to run parallel. Had the previous plan been followed, the Alaska Highway would be paved today; but as it is not, there is still time to survey and reroute it if it is considered necessary.

For the information of this government, Mr. Speaker, tourism makes money. Our present tourism deficit is approximately $2 billion but we could attract many American tourists were it not for that dusty, rocky road. A paved road through the Yukon would bring many more American dollars to this country.

There are others in my party who want to speak this evening. I conclude by emphasizing that the pipeline should be an investment opportunity for all Canadians. I believe in the concept of equity participation. An example of this is Alberta Gas Trunk Line, in which the people of Alberta were allowed to buy shares. We do not need another Crown corporation; this government already have so many that they cannot count them all. The people should be allowed to participate in a venture like this by subscribing for shares. When Alberta Gas Trunk Line put their shares on the market they were soon oversubscribed.

I note the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is still talking quite a bit. He may want a seance with Mackenzie King. I would like to give one more quote to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I note tonight there is a significant change in his position. On September 20, 1977 in a press interview with the Calgary Herald he said that——his department will ensure Canadian companies have the inside track on bidding, as well as insisting on a high degree of Canadian content in the manufactured goods used on the project . . . intends to play an integral role—

Mr. Horner: Right on.

Mr. Malone: We discovered that the minister in his negotiations did not in any way ensure that Canada would receive any guarantee of content. Now the pipeline debate is before us and we have to take it as it is. The Canadian content requirement came as a result of the National Energy Board's recommendations or by chance. The minister is here to applaud that the luck happened to go his way. He is not to be applauded for anything that he did. Let us hope that the minister's luck continues. This bill must pass and the pipeline must be built. We need some assurances in committee, and we will be seeking them at that time.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure all hon. members at the outset that my intervention this evening will be a brief one. There are people who are more expert than I in the technicalities of building pipelines in this country.

An hon. Member: Not on your side.

Mr. Young: There have been some very good speeches from this side, and particularly the one made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) who has just spoken.

An hon. Member: I used to say that too.

Mr. Young: Let me hasten to assure some of my detractors on the other side, Mr. Speaker, that I do not pretend to have full range of knowledge concerning pipelines which they may have. However, let me point out that I have been a pipeline layer. I have worked in trenches. It may not have been an oil or a gas pipeline, but a few years ago I did spend—

An hon. Member: You are the Art Carney of the Liberals.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, there is a chap on the other side who shoots from the lip far too fast. I have spent some time in the trenches laying pipe in this country, whether it be water or services piping, and I know what it is like to be in the trenches and to work outside in temperatures at eight or 10 degrees below zero.

In this debate on the pipeline issue there are those on the other side of the House who have been saying for so long there is too much control, too much government intervention in the lives of people in this country. To me that is ironic. For suddenly the NDP are saying: "Come on, government, you must guarantee our workers these jobs and you must guarantee a certain amount of Canadian content. You must reach into our lives and pocketbooks and guarantee our livelihood for us". I find it strange that people who, on certain days of the week, do not want controls, on other days, when we debate the pipeline, such as today, do want controls, guarantees and everything else handed to them.

An hon. Member: We want jobs for Canadians.

Mr. Young: We are all interested in jobs for Canadians, Mr. Speaker. To those who spend so much time badgering for job guarantees for Canadians, I say I have yet to hear them talk about the ultimate cost to Canada if it was to provide those guarantees, what it would amount to in terms of contracts to be signed as well as involvement in the livelihoods of Canadians. Even those with the least amount of common sense in this House, looking at the question of guaranteeing work, putting an absolute guarantee on these jobs and on content, would see that the first thing that would happen is that the lid would blow off the cost of the pipeline. The moment a guarantee went into the jobs, the content or whatever, you could well expect that the cost would substantially escalate. Everyone would want to grab the biggest piece of the pie that they could. There would be no control left. How long would it be before the cost of that pipeline would double or triple?

The government has said to workers and to companies in this country: "There is every opportunity for you to obtain work on this pipeline, there is every opportunity for you to supply Canadian goods which go into the building of the pipeline and there is every opportunity for Canadians to come off the unemployment rolls and secure jobs in building the pipeline or making parts for it. But to do that you must stay competitive."

This pipeline is not only important to this country between now and 1982, 1983 or 1984. What will happen to our economy when the pipeline is completed and when we begin to ship the oil and gas? We have to have a sound economy, and we cannot continue to do so if, during the course of building the pipeline, wage rates, the cost of equipment, goods and so on completely skyrocket and get out of line. This will destroy the prosperity not only of people who work on the pipeline or who make products for it, but the rest of the economy as well, because so much of our economy is fed by the energy which is delivered to run plants that produce other products.

All of us in this House have a common interest in Canadian plants doing work and in Canadian workers getting jobs to build a pipeline. Everyone is I am sure very hopeful that the maximum benefits to Canada will result from the building of the pipeline. It is a joint project between two countries, and when you have a situation like that no one country can expect it to go all one way. I have a lot of confidence in what the Canadian worker can do on the pipeline and what good Canadians can produce for the pipeline. When I look at the cost of the pipeline and see that two-thirds is taken up in building the United States portion and about one-third in building the Canadian portion, I would like to think that Canadians could be competitive enough, and are competitive enough, not only to bid for, build and work on the pipeline in Canada, but that they will be able to look forward to bidding for, building and working on a portion in the United States as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member wish to ask a question or rise on a point of order?

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but the hon. member indicated that his speech would be short.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the parliamentary secretary allow the hon. member to ask a question?

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate its being asked at the end of my remarks, if the hon. member would allow me two or three more minutes.

We have a good deal in this pipeline. If we manage to stay competitive and manage to build the Canadian section of the pipeline with no more than 35 per cent cost overrun beyond our present projections, we will virtually have the Canadian side built and maintained for nothing. That is a good deal for this country and a compliment to the hon. House leader who negotiated the arrangement. We also receive an insurance protection fund for the Yukon and the northern territories which is far greater than what Dean Lysyk expected would be coming forward.

It is important that the Canadian people understand one thing. The gas Canadians will eventually receive via the pipeline once the Canadian section is built will be twice as important to us as the gas which will be shipped to the Americans in the lower 48 states.

I am afraid I am competing against the rest of the House. I beg their indulgence for about two minutes. That gas being shipped through the pipeline to the United States will be sufficient to serve 5 per cent of their energy requirements. Canadian gas shipped through that pipeline to the Canadian market will supply 10 per cent of Canadian energy requirements. Therefore, the gas going through the pipeline will be twice as important to us as that going to the United States. If our costs go up through the building of that pipeline as a result of letting them get out of control and not remaining competitive, the ultimate effect will reflect twice as hard upon the Canadian economy as the American economy. That is something we cannot stand and do not need.

I will sum up by asking a few short questions of my friends from the New Democratic Party. For weeks they have been saying there must be a flat-out guarantee of jobs for Canadians, of Canadian content going into the building of the Canadian pipeline, and of Canadian workers being employed. Has anyone yet heard the leader of the NDP or one of his spokesmen offer corresponding guarantees in return, not just to this House, but to the Canadian people? They are asking for guaranteed jobs for Canadians and a guarantee that Canadian pipe will go into the pipeline. Has anyone from the NDP yet said to the Canadian people they will guarantee workmanship going into the pipe? Has anyone yet said that they will guarantee to keep the cost of the pipe down, guarantee delivery on time and guarantee workmanship? I have not yet heard one guarantee corresponding to the guarantee for which they ask.

Not one of us would hire a doctor, plumber, lawyer or any artisan to do work for us, saying that we will give him a blanket guarantee, without asking in return for a guarantee of workmanship, quality and delivery. We would also like to be assured that workers will not go out on strike, so that the job will be done on time. No one in the NDP has offered a guarantee like that in return for the guarantee for which they are asking. The best guarantee, the best way to achieve that, is to leave it up to the free enterprise system. When you have people competing for the jobs, wages and the products going into the pipeline, the best result comes from allowing the free marketplace to prevail.

[Mr. Young.]

I agree it is necessary to put on controls so that the Canadian competitor has a fair and equitable chance. We do that by setting up the control and review agency as expounded by the House leader. That is the guarantee of control. It ensures that Canadians get a fair deal in this pipeline project.

I find it strange that our friends in the NDP who purport to act for the little guy, who represent the workers of this country, have less faith in the ability of the Canadian workman, less confidence in his competence and desire to do a job, than the president of the steel company. I find that very strange.

I said I would be short, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) wishes to ask a question which will be accepted by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to get into polemics. There is one question I wish to ask the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young). He talked about competition with regard to equipment and contracts for the pipeline. He made a very fine case for free enterprise competition among the various steel corporations.

How can he reconcile what he calls a good, healthy, free competitive market for pipeline material, which in turn means jobs for Canadians, when steel companies in Japan, West Germany, Italy, and indeed the United States through DISC, have decided advantages and in some cases are very heavily subsidized by taxpayers through government aid? If he can say that our steel companies are in the same competitive position as those in Japan, West Germany, Italy and the United States, I will accept his argument. I want him to substantiate his charge that it would be a free competitive—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a statement, not asking a question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Put a question mark on it and sit down.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks I stated that I believe the Canadian steel industry is competitive. I believe Canadian workers can do the job. The companies can turn out the products, whether it be Stelco, Ipsco, or the myriad of smaller companies that will in fact be making parts that go into the pipeline. I believe they are competitive.

In my remarks I stated that it is essential to create a situation where the free enterprise system would prevail. We must ensure that everyone remains competitive and that Canadians remain just as competitive for the long run improvements in our economy as the short run improvements. I also said that I am not naïve about what goes on in the world, that there is international commerce, trade and competition and that it is necessary to have a control mechanism, a watchdog body or review agency. We have in terms of the legislation set one up which can look at the bids as they come in. It will ensure that Canadians get a fair chance to bid competitively and equitably on the materials that go into the pipeline; that is set up by the control mechanism. Since the permits given are conditional on the proposal made and the proposal says we are trying to reach at least 90 per cent Canadian content, we will watch the progress in that regard. We will ensure the companies do their utmost to do that. We will ensure they are not faced with unfair competition.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my speech tonight is on how to make money. I have listened to some very fine speeches in the House, all dealing with the amount of Canadian content, the man working in the steel mill, the man who makes the valves, pumps and so on in Quebec or the Atlantic provinces. That is all good material to be talking about. However, for too long this House has forgotten the main objective that this pipeline gives us.

As I said in August, I speak with great sadness on this subject because never has there been a crime committed against the Canadian people greater than the crime that the Liberal party of this country has committed on the subject of pipelines over the past 25 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I am old enough to remember, as is the House leader, that when Canadian companies tried to build a pipeline from the Peace River in British Columbia to service Canadians who lived in the city of Vancouver and needed a few extra thousand cubic feet of market to make that pipeline a paying proposition, they got that market. They got it because El Paso came in from the United States and said: We will buy that extra 200,000 cubic feet if you will give it to us for 50 per cent less than Canadians pay for it. The men who formed this company took all the risks of building that pipeline through high mountains—the highest mountains a pipeline has ever been built through—and did it without any protection from the government of Canada. Before they could get that extra sale they had to accept a price of 22 cents a thousand when Canadians closer to the source had to pay 33 cents.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Moreover, the Liberal government of that day sat here and did nothing when that same American company asked for 50 per cent of the shares in addition as a sweetener to the low price they were paying. It finally got 25 per cent. So great was the outrage among those of us who were beginning to take an interest in these matters at that time that an attack began to develop on the federal Liberals, culminating in the debates surrounding the trans-Canada pipeline which was the Liberals' next great hurdle.

The head of the Department of Trade and Commerce at that time believed that Canadians were not competent to finance a pipeline or to build a pipeline or even to run a pipeline. And almost all of the trans-Canada pipeline, which ran from the border of Alberta and Saskatchewan right down to the heartland of our industry in Toronto and Montreal, was built; not only with American financing by way of bonds but with American equity money. Finally, toward the end of that campaign, to get the government to speak up for Canada and Canadians they finally allowed Canadian citizens to buy a few million dollars worth of equity. If you bought a $100 bond they would let you buy five shares at $10 apiece. The issue was oversubscribed many times; we never even found out by how much we had oversubscribed it. These are memories of the sell-out of the Canadian people to the Texas buccaneers by those who sat on the other side of the House in 1956.

Mr. Paproski: That includes you Allan!

Mr. MacEachen: I was so far away on the backbenches you couldn't even see me.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): When I heard the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) stand up and read a statement prepared by people who had given him a lot of figures to quote, it was hard to realize that the minister comes from a proud political family, a family proud of its services to this country, proud of being devoted to principles for which they have always fought. Better the hon. gentleman should have been back out in Crowfoot trying to save himself than be associated with a group of people like those around him now on an issue such as this. I felt very sorry for him. I felt very sorry for his family which for four generations has fought for the fundamental principles which have put this country together. I was sorry he had to make a speech like that. And all he could do, with the name-calling which went on across the House, was to lose his temper. I do not blame him, thinking, as he must, of all the men who have gone before him and carried his name. Birds of a feather must flock together. The "same old bunch" all over again.

This bill, as has been explained by the minister, carries out, in effect, one of the duties of the National Energy Board, namely, to give a certificate of convenience and public necessity to this pipeline. It has been made very clear to us that primarily we are talking about a pipeline of convenience intended to move American gas to Americans. It is true that a few cubic feet will be supplied to towns in Canada along the route of the line. We are doing this as a good neighbour should to provide a convenience for our American friends. They were ready to assist us, too. In 1966, just 12 years ago, we wanted to build a loop in our major pipeline across from Manitoba into Ontario passing through their territory. We got a pipeline through there. But notice what they did: they asked for and got, as they thought was their due, 50 per cent of the equity. This brings me around full circle to where we stand tonight.

This bill suffers from the fact that it was not brought in last fall when it should have been brought in. Had that timetable been followed, we could have used the power of this House by putting in one or two conditions which would have helped this Canadian consortium composed of Westcoast Transmission and Alberta Gas Trunk. This consortium could have used some help. The Canadian portion of the line was going to cost less than $4 billion. To many people this looked like a big project. But Canadians can carry it without too much sweat if we pull together. We could have helped this Canadian company to get the necessary financing if we had done certain things for which there is a precedent.

During this debate almost every speaker for the official opposition has mentioned the technique—that is, equity. A great majority of people, I am afraid, do not understand the significance of equity when it comes to pipeline financing. I think it can be best understood if one realizes that the people who put up the equity must wait for a return on their money; the first charge on the earnings of a pipeline company goes to pay off bond holders. We have in place, thanks to the government of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the National Energy Board Act of 1959 which provides that in future a National Energy Board shall lay down conditions which ensure that a private company operating a pipeline is working in the interests of Canada—and those interests include many things, among them financing.

Where do we find in this bill any mention of conditions laid down with regard to the financing of the pipeline to make sure that Canadian content where it really counts—ownership—will be protected? There is nothing of that kind in the legislation. It never crossed the minds of members sitting on the treasury benches opposite, those great minds still living in awe of C. D. Howe who thought Canadians were not brainy enough, not gutsy enough, not sufficiently well financed to build a pipeline. This group of people opposite, this crowd of nitwits, are surrounded by experts who know nothing about anything, as we saw tonight by that speech given by the minister.

An hon. Member: Experts anonymous!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, had it known what it should know—because at one time pipelines were within its jurisdiction—should have provided the minister with a series of speeches setting out all that had been done during the negotiations with the Americans and with the private companies to show, above all, that they were backing up this Canadian company and securing for Canadians the first opportunity to finance it.

I do not intend to examine the whole of the financial structure of Westcoast or Trans-Canada Pipeline or Great Lakes in detail. I have lived through the events connected with each one of them. Now I am living through the fourth one. And when I see a government which has not learned from these mistakes, when we have to work with a government which has no shame, a government which will not take advantage of the possibilities open to it, I can only shake my head. The real value of a pipeline is not in hardware. It lies with the person who owns it. It lies with ownership of the equity shares.

The Conservative party from time immemorial has been the only party which clearly states that our objective is to have Canadians as individuals owning this country.

I congratulate the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). Thank goodness that, with all his experience and knowledge, he had enough brains to come to the House and say he supports this equity approach, that he does not support doctrinaire socialism, not when it comes to his country. He gave his promise in 1953 in Saskatchewan as a premier that so long as he was premier he would see to it that the oil and gas companies, which had promised to develop that province, would never be nationalized or socialized. He has lived long enough to see doctrinaire socialists break his word. He has seen how Saskatchewan has been put on its back. But here he stood up and said that equity is worthwhile.

He supported the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Neilsen) who said that we must have some parliamentary control, not so much over the companies but over this crowd of people who have a record of 25 years of selling out the Canadian people at every opportunity they get. There has been no greater demonstration of this than in the pipeline fiasco over the last 25 years.

Fortunately for this country the National Energy Board Act is in place. Fortunately for this country, even though the National Energy Board has been emasculated by the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce who have not given the board an opportunity to carry out its full functions, the board is still there, even though it has been pushed around and interfered with by this government. When the board sets its rate of return on the rate base for this pipeline for the partners in Canada, it will make certain that the rate of return on equity is based on the full amount of money borrowed plus the amount of equity. That is called the rate base. So the money that equity gets, if they want to get more money, depends on the size of the rate base.

It is true that the National Energy Board over the years has assumed that when the pipeline is built and is operated it will not be a risky enterprise but a success, and they do not give a rate of return that is as high as it used to be when interest rates were 6 per cent. I am simply pointing out that sooner or later the National Energy Board will discover what is the true function of setting the rate of return, namely, some relationship to competitive risk costs around the world. Today if you want to know what risk money draws, you should go and look at countries such as the United Kingdom. They have been developing the North Sea fields at great speed, which got them off the economic hook. What rate of return did that socialist government in name offer to private industry to develop the North Sea oil? They offered approximately 25 per cent on the rate base.

The effective rate base we have in Canada, on the basis of most decisions I have seen, is around 14 per cent or 15 per cent. Sooner or later that rate of return has to match the rate of return in other countries. I am simply saying that the only chance Canadians have—whether they live on a farm, work in a factory or work at any other white collar or blue collar job, apart from steel workers, construction workers and a few others—to make any money out of this is if an opportunity is provided them to buy that equity.

The companies that I have mentioned, such as Westcoast and Alberta Gas Trunk, are both Canadian. They know what I am talking about because one of them was gored in 1954 and the other happened to have a government in charge in Alberta which put in statutory terms what we should have in front of us here. Sure enough, the statute of 1954 was replaced. I may mention a few of the changes later, but now I will ask members on the government side to follow the precedent set by the government of Alberta, composed of a mixture of farmers, professional people and average folk such as we have in this House. I should like to read a clause from chapter 37 of the 1954 statutes. It reads:

Capitalization

5. The capital stock of the company shall consist of

(a) eight million Class "A" common shares of the par value of five dollars with no voting rights attached to the shares, and

(b) two thousand and two Class "B" common shares of the par value of five dollars with voting rights attached to the shares.

The ordinary people of Alberta were authorized under this statute to acquire eight million common shares at $5 apiece. All the big companies that were out finding the oil or gas, distributing it and selling it, were allowed 2,000 shares, and the act specifically allocated the number of shares to each class.

People who were expert in financing in those days said the Canadians were not able to finance a pipeline. I happened to be in Alberta on that day, as were a large number of Saskatchewan residents, all of us trying to pass ourselves off as Albertan residents to get access to these common shares. Because the regulations said that first chance would be given to the residents of Alberta if they appeared in person before a branch of the treasury office, which exists in every town in Alberta, or a branch of a national bank.

I found every type of person, working people, waitresses, truck drivers, doctors, lawyers, preachers and even a few school teachers, lined up trying to get access to those shares. The figures are not precise but they are close enough. So heavy was the subscription to the shares available that they had to divide them among all the adults who appeared and each adult received a maximum of 20 shares at $5 apiece. So great was the demand by over 100,000 adult Albertan citizens that they could only give them $100 worth of shares apiece.

That is not the end of my story. I have the financial records of that company up to the last year. After years, those shares at $5 were split four ways. At one time the shares reached a peak of $45 and $50, and they were split five ways. Now they are averaging $14 and $16. So if you still have shares for $5 which you bought in 1954, and you now have four, at $16 apiece they would be worth $64. That ain't bad, Mr. Speaker. That $5 has got you $64 in 20 years. In the meantime dividends were paid and on the $16 share today the last dividend I saw was 60 cents. Sixty cents on one of your four shares is the same as $2.40 on your four shares. Any time you have a hot little share in your hand that you bought for $5, it will give you $2.40 dividend every year. That ain't bad, Mr. Speaker.

When you take a look at the total value of the investment in the pipeline you see that large amounts went to pay the interest and pay off the capital on those orginal bonds. But who got the money? The millions of common people, each of them, got as much as 2,002 shares at $5 apiece. So if you were a big company in those days finding gas in Alberta, you probably got 50 shares at $5 apiece. Those of Class B type were multiplied by four, so there would probably be 200 shares. All the dividends they would get would be on the 200 shares.

I am simply suggesting that we should have done as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested last August when we met here and in effect approved the route. The minute the negotiations were over in the United States the government should have brought in legislation including some of these clauses and we could have had financing arranged similar to this precedent. Time has passed and I am sure these Canadian companies have gone out and arranged the financing of this pipeline with other companies. It they followed the usual precedent, with a total cost of roughly $4 billion, $1 billion will probably be the equity and $3 billion the amount of bonds.

Every one of us here, representing, as we do, every Canadian, should be asking ourselves whether these Canadian companies who are going to take the risk of backing up this equity of $1 billion will make any of these shares available to us and to every other Canadian as an individual. That is the question we should be asking. It is too late now to bring in an amendment to this bill and to get it into law, which I hope will be next month, because I am sure the financing has already been arranged.

I would like to see a monitoring committee of this House representing the people. Whether it sits every three months or two and a half weeks is immaterial, just so long as there is somebody representing the people and reminding not only the government but this company of their many promises. The company promised that if it ever got this certificate of convenience it would give Canadians a chance to invest. We want to know how the company financed the project and if it has made the shares available.

I happen to believe that the working man in Hamilton wants the extra 2 per cent or 3 per cent of business this project will bring to him next year. He is the most efficient steel producer in the world and he knows it. He can match any steelworker in the world for price per unit, and he knows that. He also knows he gets better wages than most of them too. He will accept that 2 per cent or 3 per cent of extra income in business next year.

What he would like for the next 30, 40 or 50 years, as long as gas goes through the pipeline—and whether it is U.S. gas or American gas is immaterial—is an opportunity to share in return on equity. Every time the pipeline is repaired or restored the equity life is extended. I do not think one will ever get the amount of return one could get from the Alberta Gas Trunk because that was a brand new situation.

However, what we should be thinking about here as members of parliament is not just the failures of this government in respect of Westcoast 25 years ago, in respect of Trans-Canada Pipelines 22 years ago, or in respect of the Great Lakes application ten years ago; rather we should be thinking about all the other pipelines we are going to be building over the next ten or 20 years. These pipelines will be built not just to bring gas or oil from our remote areas, and not just to move the products of the forest in gas and oil form from east to west, west to east and north to south, but to move coal. We are going to move coal and a whole variety of products like potash in liquid form. We will have the pipelines. We have the best track record in building pipelines in the world. Above, all let us keep our eye on the ball.

The thing that gives Canadians the deepest satisfaction of all is not just the fact that Canadians own the pipeline but that Canadians get these dividend cheques every three months. One thing that the Americans have taught us is to go after the equity, because that is where you get the money. It comes in year after year after year. Just try to find on the stock markets of the United States or of Canada today any single common stock that has almost a guaranteed return of 15 per cent or more, as will be the case under this National Energy Board power to set the rate of return on the rate base. I hope it will be a lot more than 15 per cent.

In the case of Alberta Gas Trunk Line the regional guys can still get 100 per cent a year. If you get $5 a year including capital gains on a stock worth only $5, that is 100 per cent. Even if the fellow only had a couple of hundred dollars' worth, that is better than anything else he can see or buy. He will never get that again.

Maybe the next pipeline will be built as a brand new venture right here in Canada. Maybe the next time this government will be thinking of Canadians owning these things, and will have brought in changes to the capital gains tax and changes to the deferral of incomes sections of the Income Tax Act. If the government says to a man or a woman that it will defer the tax on up to $1,000 a year if they put the money into a retirement savings plan for their old age, on which the returns are pretty hairy these days, then surely it can allow the same persons to put that money into stocks in respect of which the government cam make sure they cannot lose. If that were done the workers would soon let you know where they stand. A worker knows now that on a fixed pension he is doomed when he reaches the end of his working period. He wants something indexed so it will grow with inflation; his pension will not. This is what the working man in Canada wants, and what a glorious opportunity this government had; but it failed to take advantage of it on this occasion.

I would think that if it has not learned the lessons of the last 25 years there is not much hope that this government will ever learn them. That is why I know in my heart that 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the people who live in the western part of this country pray every night: "Dear God, let's get rid of this outfit. Please God, no matter how terrible the opposition is, change the government".

Those people know that in the last 50 years the only hope they ever had was during the five years under the right hon. member for Prince Albert. They want another chance to have five, ten or 15 years of growth instead of this "stagflation". This government ran out of steam 35 years ago. It relied entirely on the mandarins of the civil service to direct it. The civil service died in 1948 and hasn't come alive since. It is still hanging on to ways of doing things that are wrong. We took the wrong fork in the road during the war years; we must have a change in government to get back on the right road so that Canadians can restore their pride in their own ability to save for their old age and, at the same time, produce the things that make this country grow and be strong.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—RELOCATION OF CIVIL SERVANTS—EFFECT ON ECONOMY OF OTTAWA AREA

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on February 14, 1978, I raised a question with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) involving the economic situation facing the national capital arising from the fact that property owners and renters in the Ottawa area are facing a double inconvenience as a result of the relocation plan of the federal government.

First of all, many of them are having to travel an extra distance to work, and there are some considerable inconveniences and adjustments there. Perhaps more important, there is an increase in their tax load, which is likely to continue and grow, as a result of the shrinkage of their tax base by virtue of this relocation program, to the extent that there is expected over the next 15 years to be a $500 million loss.

I asked my question in view of the requirement we have requested for a long period of time, namely the grant in lieu of taxes statute which the government promised would be changed and upgraded. The promise is not new. On December 20, 1976 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replied to the mayor of the city of Ottawa by indicating that effective action was being taken. In a letter to the mayor of the city of Ottawa on July 18, 1977, the Prime Minister indicated that he was hopeful legislation would be brought in during the lifetime of this parliament. If I am to judge from the propaganda I hear from the government side of the House, we are getting close to the end of that lifetime. Meetings have been held recently with municipal officials at which the promise was made again. Many people in the national capital region are awaiting an answer as to when this belief will be forthcoming.

Although the question was related to the national capital area, it is a national problem in that it affects every municipality in which there are formidable federal institutions. It hits Ottawa particularly hard because its major employer is the government of Canada. The federal government does not pay a business tax or anything like it. The government of Canada owns 40 per cent of the land in the area. In 1977 the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton suffered a shortfall in projected revenue of $18 million. As the cost of doing local government business increases, the burden increases.

It is not just a burden on the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton but also on people who own property and pay rent. The mayor of the city of Ottawa has estimated that the burden on his ratepayers is approximately $150 per household as a result of this. Throughout the townships of Nepean, Gloucester, Rideau and Osgoode it varies, but it approaches that figure.

This problem was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister. Two years ago he responded to it by indicating the legislation was forthcoming. When, in what form and to what extent will this relief be forthcoming? It has been promised. I hope the promise will not be recycled by announcing once again in or around April that relief is on its way. That would cause the people of Ottawa-Carleton to wonder.

The decentralization program, which is a rather perverse form of patronage, coupled with the relocation program has aggravated the situation. The Woods-Gordon report indicates a $500 million loss over the next ten years; an economic crisis which may last 15 years; $13 million in lost office revenues over the next ten years; and property value decreases, as a result of lost revenues, of approximately $30 million in that same period.

Clearly it is a serious problem for Ottawa. It means the tax base of the Ottawa-Carleton region is shrinking; the burden on the homeowner and the renter is correspondingly increasing. The federal government has promised to assist in solving the problems of the area. We would like some action on the promise which was made when relocation was announced. The federal government said it would give us assistance.

I know the parliamentary secretary is not blind, deaf or dumb. He must understand the difficulties which are faced by small business people and restaurateurs. There are problems with respect to buildings. The government of Canada pays something equivalent to property taxes. It pays water rates, police rates and so forth to a fairly large extent, but not in full. There are certain government buildings, particularly cultural ones, which should be brought within the ambit of those property taxes, and somehow the way has to be found within a short period of time to commence the process of rectifying this situation. The government should finally accede to the wishes of the people and local government and bring to our area some equity to match the immense power and influence it has. For many years the government has not been paying its way completely. On behalf of ratepayers and tenants in the Ottawa area, I ask that that legislation be brought forward quickly so that the House and the public can examine it.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance intends to introduce a bill amending the Municipal Grants Act in 1978. There is no draft bill but the Department of Finance is already working hard and systematically considering the various decisions to be taken before preparing the bill itself. The Minister of Finance has asked his officials to be ready to introduce such a bill at the beginning of the session this fall. The legislation will be retroactive and enforced for the municipal taxation years from January 1, 1978.

The grant program in lieu of taxes is a national program and the amendments which will be suggested by the Minister of Finance will benefit municipalities throughout Canada, including the municipalities in the national capital area. The minister has received representations about amendments to the act from the City of Ottawa, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and many other agencies.

All these representations are being considered. It will also be necessary to review carefully many technical problems. Everyone understands that these questions will polarize much time and resources in a year that promises to be a busy one. I can, however, assure hon. members that the schedule I have prepared will be followed. The grants in lieu of taxes program was introduced several years ago by a Liberal government and since that time more than 2,000 municipalities across the country have taken advantage of it. The new act will update the program and Canadian municipalities should welcome it.

AGRICULTURE—POTATO ACTION COMMITTEE—PROGRESS REPORT ON STUDY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on February 17, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) what has become of the federal-provincial committee which was responsible for setting up a marketing plan for potatoes in eastern Canada. That group is called the Potato Action Committee or PAC and that is the abbreviation I am going to use whenever I mention it. The minister told me that this committee had made recommendations but could not force the provinces to do anything. Fine, and I too agree on the principle that we should let producers organize together and decide on the best means to take to market their product in each province.

In his answer, the minister also stated that because they had refused to establish a marketing board, producers of one of the provinces are now getting $2 to $3 dollar per hundredweight less than they are getting in Alberta. Without naming that province, the minister was referring of course to my province of New Brunswick. But Prince Edward Island and Ontario are in no better position.

The minister knows as well as I do that it is not the lack of a marketing board which can explain the difference in prices between New Brunswick and Alberta. Do they have a marketing board in Alberta? Unless I am mistaken, the answer is no. Moreover, the minister himself stated before the agriculture committee two years ago that a distinction had to be made between eastern and western Canada. He even went so far as to suggest that two different potato marketing boards were necessary, in order to take fully into account the particular circumstances and markets of both regions. Therefore the minister's argument is a sham. The problems and challenges involved are quite difficult and cannot be met simply by setting up marketing boards. The situation varies from one region to the next. No universal panacea exists in this area. This brings me back to the PAC which was my original concern. Last Friday, the minister did not reply to my question, and I hope his parliamentary secretary can tell us tonight whether this committee still exists, what it is doing, and whether its objectives have changed since its creation in April 1976.

One thing is sure, Mr. Speaker: The PAC will never succeed if the producers are not seriously involved in those discussions. The days when the farmers were presented with a fait accompli are a thing of the past. If they do not participate in the decisions, they will refuse to co-operate in the implementation of any proposal, no matter how good it seems to be. Should some provinces be taken to task for not having set up a potato marketing board, for having failed to find a formula that would appeal to the majority of producers? When one knows the sad story of the potato growers in New Brunswick, can the farmers be blamed for being overly careful, for not having reached a consensus? They did reach a consensus in Prince Edward Island; yet, did they get a better price for their produce this year? Not much better than in New Brunswick, and what has happened in Ontario? I shall read to the House what Farm and Country, an agricultural paper, published recently, on February 14, under the title "Potato Growers Study Board Idea", and I quote:

> Both American and Prince Edward Island potatoes found their way onto the Ontario market and forced local prices below cost of production.

That is what happened, Mr. Speaker. Is that a healthy situation, when one has to sell below cost? The same newspaper also quoted Mr. Harry Fraser, editor of Fraser's Potato Newsletter of Prince Edward Island, and I quote:

> New Brunswick's crop should not be a factor in the Ontario marketing decision. New Brunswick is now shut out of quality markets.

Nothing could be further from the truth, nothing could be more irresponsible. After having read that comment, I cancelled my subscription to that paper. That type of gratuitous statement only leads to chaos. It is said, and the minister can confirm it, that Quebec and Ontario have been increasing their potato production considerably in the past few years in order to be in an excellent negotiating position if ever this happens when the quinquennial production averages will be distributed to establish provincial quotas. Where will that leave New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island whose domestic market situation is worsening year after year? If these two provinces do not have access to the central Canada market, the only solution will be processing, and here we are dealing with problems of another nature.

There is a serious problem this year, Mr. Speaker, just as there was two years ago, four years ago and so on. Cycles come back with the same frequency and potato growers disappear at the same rate. Family farms are vanishing from the picture. The point I want to make here is that marketing in itself will not settle anything. It is only an important starting point. We will have to come to an agreement in New Brunswick and elsewhere. The provinces will also have to agree among themselves, and this will not be easy. We will have to face the other problems of transportation, storage, quality of seeds, inspection, negotiations and arbitration, disease control and so on. If the PAC is always in operation, I hope it will give the leadership which is necessary to the potato industry in order to establish the consensus which all parties concerned are so eagerly seeking.

I think that the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) can and should show leadership too. It will be a wasteful exercise to blame here and there or at random. Therefore, I urge the minister to stop taking shots at New Brunswick. This province is not the only one in the picture. New Brunswick probably deserves better leadership at the provincial level, and here I agree with him. What should be done is to inspire confidence, to lead the way, and New Brunswick farmers are able to carry out their responsibilities.

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer the questions of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin). And I am particularly pleased, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria is one of those in the House who rise the most often to discuss and defend the interests of the potato producers of New Brunswick and eastern Canada. He rises because he has a good knowledge of their marketing problems and a true desire to find a solution as soon as possible, with the help of the federal Department of Agriculture.

As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said, the Potato Action Committee, to which I will refer as the PAC, as my colleague from Madawaska-Victoria did, made a number of recommendations and proposals regarding the establishment of potato marketing facilities for eastern Canada. The establishment of these facilities has unfortunately been delayed by its dependence on provincial authorities and by the fact that a number of producers and provinces have been unable to develop appropriate organizations in their own field. Following considerable research on this subject at the producer level in the five participating provinces, the PAC got the approval of potato producers' representatives to set up a project, on July 9, 1976, in Fredericton. The essential part of this project is first to establish in each of the five provinces an agency representing the producers; second, a regional agency whose members would be delegated by the provincial organizations. The latter would be a forum and a means of coordination for regional and interprovincial aspects. It is apparent that the formation of a provincial producers' body is crucial. At the Fredericton meeting it was decided to form a producers' committee to help the PAC implement the report of the conference that took place in Montreal in 1975 and the committee at that time in fact became the proposed regional board. The board met on several occasions and is united and supported by provincial and federal officials who work in co-operation with the management of the PAC. At the beginning there was only one potato marketing agency—in Prince Edward Island. Subsequently, considerable progress was made in the development of producers' organizations. I am certain that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria will be as concerned as I am about the situation in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. During the 1974-75 season those provinces received substantial financial assistance through the work of the PAC, and in New Brunswick marketing remained disorganized, as it has been for the past three years.

And it is that unfortunate fact that is the main cause of the economic problems presently facing potato producers in that province, and also the main obstacle to the PAC and the interprovincial agreement that is being sought. I must reassure the hon. member that the Potato Action Committee is very much alive and active. Its next meeting will take place on this coming March 2.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member because I tried to give him a little time but he is taking a bit too long.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ROSEAU RIVER PROJECT—VIOLATION OF BOUNDARY WATERS TREATY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, today I want to expand on the question I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) on February 14 which appears at page 2833 of Hansard. It related to questions I asked the minister many, many times about the position of the Canadian government with regard to the so-called Roseau River project.

The Roseau River project primarily is a channel-widening project of the Roseau River south of the forty-ninth parallel in the state of Minnesota. The purpose of that project is primarily twofold: first, to add additional land through drainage for purposes of agriculture; second, to control flooding in the state of Minnesota, especially during spring runoff.

The effect of the Roseau River project as visualized by the U.S. army corps of engineers would have two influences on Canada which are not acceptable to Manitobans. First, the volume of flow would increase by approximately 25 per cent during peak spring runoff. We have had difficulties with flooding along the Canadian portion of the Roseau River. Second, the speed of flow would increase, especially during peak runoff periods, thus adding to erosion and to the carrying of silt along the river.

As is the procedure of the International Joint Commission, hearings were held in Manitoba in order to get the reaction of Manitobans to this project. The previous New Democratic government generally favoured the project, despite the fact that officials of the department of mines and resources and environmental management in the hearings at Dominion City on January 14, 1976 admitted under questioning that there was a possibility that article IV of the Boundary Waters Treaty could be violated if the project were to go forward as planned by the U.S. army corps of engineers.

Further, after a second study, the International Joint Commission recommended that if the project were to go ahead, the United States would be obligated to pay approximately $3.1 million in mitigating works. This figure was later increased to $4 million. This was not acceptable to Manitoba. The U.S. army corps of engineers was ready to modify the program, namely through an impoundment system whereby dams and dykes would be built and the water would be released during the low runoff period.

My question is simply this. With the change of government in Manitoba, the present Manitoba government, and I as a member of parliament throughout the years that the Roseau has been discussed, have objected to the plans because we see absolutely no benefits to Manitoba. In fact, the amount of money that would have to be paid for mitigating works simply is not sufficient, not even for the known factor projects that would have to be put into place, much less the unknown ones.

Therefore, on February 14, I specifically asked the minister what was the government of Canada's position on the Roseau River project, whether they still supported the position of the government of Manitoba, namely that the Roseau River project had no benefit to Manitoba and in fact had many detrimental effects. The minister replied at page 2833, as follows, and I think it is important to put this reply on the record:

> Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to withhold the answer on that question for at least 24 hours. I had a preliminary discussion with the responsible minister from Manitoba this morning. As soon as question period is over, I will be meeting him at the Conference Centre to discuss these questions, so I might be in a better position to elaborate tomorrow or the next day.

I am not standing here accusing the minister for not having given me the answer. Possibly the parliamentary secretary can explain to Manitobans, specifically the constituents of Provencher and their member of parliament, the position of the government of Canada at this time. Does the government of Canada still support the position of the government of Manitoba, namely that the project should not go forward until all mitigating works are in place and are clearly understood? Are they also taking the position that, if these mitigating works are not regarded as adequate the recommendation should be forwarded to the International Joint Commission and to our American counterparts that the project is not acceptable? That is the issue and I await the reply of the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having brought this question forward again so that a further answer might be provided to him.

Discussions with the United States regarding the effects on Canada of proposed flood control works along the Roseau River in Minnesota have been under way since the 1920's. An International Joint Commission report was released last fall on works planned by the U.S. corps of engineers. The report recommended that the project be allowed to go ahead, but that the United States pay $3 million to $4 million for the construction of control works in Manitoba to protect the province from possible increased flood damage. The U.S. has agreed in principle with this recommendation and has forwarded a draft agreement on the question for our examination.

The IJC was, it should be noted, requested to perform essentially an engineering study of the effects of higher flood flows. In its report, the Commission also noted, however, that there might be other significant environmental effects above and beyond the question of flooding.

Last month, the Manitoba government indicated to the SSEA that the province had concerns over this question of unforeseen environmental effects, and that it wished to suspend further talks with the United States on Roseau until the matter had been resolved. The Canadian government is fully aware of the importance of the environmental aspects of Roseau, and has suggested that federal and provincial officials work together to clarify the matter.

We have informed United States authorities that we are currently reviewing the question of environmental effects. We have also requested further clarification of the exact form of the proposed works. The corps of engineers is currently modifying its original plans to reduce wetlands drainage, and there have been suggestions for modification of the whole concept of the scheme. The current absence of precise information on that design of the system makes it difficult for us to assess exactly the project's potential impact on Canada.

Given the forthcoming attitudes of the parties involved in the Roseau question, there is no reason to believe that a mutually satisfactory resolution cannot be achieved. We will continue to ensure that Canadian interests are fully protected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

POST OFFICE

REQUESTED STUDY OF POST OFFICE SYSTEM BY HOUSE COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of extremely urgent and pressing necessity which I am sure will receive unanimous support from both sides of the House. In view of the vital importance of an efficient and reliable postal service to the economic well-being of Canada, and the apparent inability of the government to effect any significant change other than changing postmasters general, a process that only adds to the growing confusion indicated by lost mail, late and disrupted service bringing about the threat of a law suit, decline in house to house delivery, thereby reducing the number of letter carriers at a time of rising unemployment in Canada, continuing confrontationist labour-management relations, and all of this in the face of repeated illegal postal rate increases, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government set up immediately a special parliamentary committee as recommended in the motion put before this House last May 18 to investigate all aspects of the Post Office system and bring in recommendations for urgent reform, and in particular to do this before the postal system collapses completely under the weight of its own incompetence.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE FOREIGN EMBASSIES FREE OF SUBVERSIVE PERSONNEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, concerning a number of Soviet agents alleged to be operating within the Russian diplomatic service in Canada, according to an RCMP report which at the time it was compiled showed that 28 out of 61 Soviet officials were involved in intelligence work. I am prepared to make public this information today. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Solicitor General state why the government failed to act when in possession of the knowledge that almost 48 per cent of the Soviet diplomatic establishment in Ottawa was composed of intelligence officers, the fact that subsequent removal of those expelled still leaves a minimum of 15 agents in the Soviet diplomatic service and, finally, that the minister outline when the government will expel those remaining and what steps will be taken to assure replacements who are not legitimate diplomats will not be permitted to enter Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCE FUTURE DAIRY POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that a large number of milk producers are in total uncertainty as to what the next Canadian dairy policy holds in reserve for them and that many of them have had no income for several months in the absence of a production quota, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to announce as soon as possible the government's dairy policy for the oncoming months in order to allow producers to adjust their production accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can only be put to debate with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADA-U.S. SEA BOUNDARIES ON WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the position taken by the Canadian representatives at the Canada-U.S. sea boundaries negotiations with regard to the A-B line in Dixon entrance on the west coast, which would abandon Canadian internal and territorial waters as set by the Alaska Boundary Tribunal in 1903, and in view of the fact that Canada's bargaining position continues adversely to affect our hopes for a fair settlement of all boundaries in the event of arbitration, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

● (1412)

That this House instructs the Secretary of State for External Affairs to reaffirm Canada's boundaries in the Dixon entrance and to abandon the concessions made to the U.S. on this boundary.

TRANSPORT

SUBSIDIES TO NEWFOUNDLAND FOR FERRY SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is threatening Newfoundland that Canada will cease to provide the subsidies necessary for the operation of intraprovincial ferry services in Newfoundland to St. Brendan's, Greenspond, Fogo Island, Long Island, Change Islands, St. Barbe-Blanc Sablon and Portugal Cove-Bell Island, to save some $617,000 in subsidies, despite obligations undertaken under the terms of confederation and in exchange for the discontinuance of regular coastal boat services to those communities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to cease browbeating and bullying Newfoundland into taking over ferry services which are the direct responsibility of Canada, and that the minister be directed to cease his terrorist transportation tactics immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF PASSPORT OFFICE IN SASKATOON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of considerable urgency. In view of the fact that Saskatchewan is the only western province without passport office facilities, and in view of the fact that approximately 12,000 passport applications are received from Saskatchewan annually by the Department of External Affairs, more than justifying a regional office in Saskatchewan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who represents a province with a similar problem:

That this House requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to direct the establishment of a passport office in the hub city of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES FOR PROGRAM FOR CHILDREN WITH LEARNING DISABILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that provincial facilities for children with learning disabilities are presently inadequate, and in view of the fact that the learning disability of a child is often health related, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn):

That this House urges the Minister of National Health and Welfare to immediately meet with the provincial ministers of education with a view to offering federal financial assistance to the provinces, so that adequate facilities for children with learning disabilities may be provided.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—SIZE OF PIPE TO BE USED AND CANADIAN CONTENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Media reports state that the United States government is disappointed at the National Energy Board's recommendation that a 56-inch, thin wall pipe be used for the mid-Yukon to mid-Alberta portion of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline. The same reports state that a U.S. embassy spokesman said the initial United States government reaction to the NEB proposal is one of disappointment.

We were told yesterday by the minister, as reported at page 3014 of Hansard, that the origin of the suggestion for the 56-inch line "comes from the initiative of United States officials during the December meeting of the technical committee which addressed itself to these questions." How does the minister explain the expressed disappointment of the U.S. government with the NEB proposal of 56-inch pipe, when the minister assures us that the origin for the use of 56-inch pipe "comes from the initiative of the United States"? Where is the truth here?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the suggestion came from members of the technical committee on the U.S. side. I suppose one could explain it by indicating that there are a number of different interests in the United States: not everyone in the United States who looks at this pipeline will view it in quite the same way. It might also be because there will be significantly more Canadian content in the 56-inch over the 54-inch.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister also told us yesterday that annex III to the agreement relating to cost estimates would require an addendum to include costs for the 56-inch line, and that such addendum, according to the understanding of the government, was a mere technical change. That is what the minister said yesterday. Will the minister now tell us whether the U.S. government has the same understanding, or whether the whole agreement will be opened up, resulting in further inept negotiations by the President of Privy Council collapsing in the face of U.S. demands for more benefits to them and even fewer to Canada as quid pro quo for agreeing to the use of 56-inch pipe?

Mr. Gillespie: It is my understanding that this is regarded as a technical change on both sides of the border. But if for any reason the United States takes the position that it is more than a technical change and wants to reopen negotiations, we would have the fall-back position of proceeding with 54-inch diameter pipe.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister is quite agile in avoiding the central issue in these very difficult questions. He told us yesterday that inasmuch as the agreement is contained in the bill as schedule 1, a corresponding amendment would be required to the bill. What he did not tell us is that paragraph 10 of the agreement would require amendment, since that paragraph makes no mention of the use of 56-inch pipe.

The amendment of such a vital provision in the bill cannot be passed off as mere technical change. Has this matter been discussed with the U.S. government? Can the hon. gentleman assure us that his government will stand firm in the face of any U.S. demands for alterations in the agreement, against Canadian interests? Would he, indeed, take the opportunity to require the establishment of the monitoring agency proposed by parliament to guarantee maximum Canadian labour and industrial content?

Mr. Gillespie: We think we have a good agreement and a good bargain: we have no interest in reopening the agreement.

VALVES AND FITTINGS FOR PIPELINE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to address a supplementary to the President of Privy Council, the so-called chief negotiator of the pipeline agreement. Two challenges have just been brought to our attention in connection with the recommendation of the National Energy Board regarding the use of 56-inch pipe. The board reports that Canadian companies have little or no experience in making the necessary valves or fittings for 54-inch or 56-inch pipelines, and this would have a significant adverse effect on Canadian content. Has the hon. gentleman considered this report in light of Canadian capability to provide valves and fittings? Has he discussed the report?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I was pleased to notice that following the announcement regarding 56-inch pipe, the president of Stelco stated yesterday that we could produce it. We foresee no difficulties in connection with pipe of this size. The president of the Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Corporation, of Regina, also expressed his delight and is considering expansion plans in order to take advantage of this particular economic possibility. I say this to put at rest any concern the hon. member may feel about where the pipe is to be produced.

Mr. Alexander: What about the valves and fittings?

● (1422)

Mr. MacEachen: I thank the hon. member for reminding me about valves. I discussed that question yesterday with the associate vice-chairman of the National Energy Board, who is of the view—based upon the knowledge of the NEB—that it would be possible, in the time-frame available, for Canadian firms to get into this business.

Mr. Clark: Possible!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Deputy Prime Minister has finally answered my question. Having discussed this matter with the presidents of the respective companies, can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that we will need at least 12 months to 18 months lead time in order to be in a position to produce the necessary valves and fittings? Is this the conclusion our chief negotiator reached in the discussions he had with the companies involved?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member misunderstands me. I did not have discussions with the producers of valves and fittings; I had a discussion with the associate vice-chairman of the National Energy Board. It is not the intention of the government, through the pipeline monitoring agency, to produce valves and fittings; it is the intention of the government to create the possibility for private enterprise to do so.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I understand, as a result of reports from the NEB, that we do not have the necessary capability regarding valves and fittings. This would certainly affect Canadian content, because this hardware would have to be imported from offshore. Further, the NEB indicated that because of this situation, producers of this hardware will need some 12 months to 18 months lead time. All I am asking is whether these allegations by the NEB are true. Can the Deputy Prime Minister answer that question?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already answered the question and expressed the view of the associate vice-chairman of the National Energy Board. But because the hon. member has related the question of valves and fittings to over-all Canadian content, I believe I can further assure him by telling him that yesterday the vice-president of Foothills, upon hearing the recommendation of the National Energy Board, stated that he still believes Foothills can meet its target of 90 per cent Canadian content.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED CONTRADICTION IN GOVERNMENT STATEMENTS ON JOBS TO BE CREATED

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In a speech delivered on his behalf in Toronto on Thursday, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated that jobs in the manufacturing sector, and I quote, "will not be able to make a larger direct contribution to the rise in total employment". I ask the Prime Minister whether the minister's statement reflects government policy. If so, how does he explain to the Canadian people this blatant contradiction with the forecast of the Minister of Finance that 74,000 new jobs in the manufacturing sector are required annually in the next four years, almost four times the annual average in the last four years? How does the Prime Minister explain this grotesque anomaly?

[Mr. Clark.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to review the speech made by the minister and see if he has been quoted accurately.

Mr. Blackburn: In the same speech, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated quite unequivocally that the proposed Canadian tariff cuts in the current negotiations at GATT will cause the loss of many jobs in the manufacturing sector, particularly—as the minister outlined—in organic chemicals, household appliances, footwear, textiles and clothing. Again I ask the Prime Minister whether he is proceeding with the government's policy in this area. At a time when 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed, this policy will, according to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, only increase unemployment levels in Canada, particularly in the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my previous answer, it would be very important for me to see the speech and the context. Depending on whether the minister was talking about proposed tariff cuts by other countries, or Canada's wish for cuts, obviously the meaning would be completely different.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister whether to his knowledge the present program will, in fact, increase employment by up to 74,000 jobs annually in the next four years, when one considers that in the last four years in the manufacturing sector the annual increase in the number of new jobs has only been 17,000.

● (1427)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, one of the objectives of the premiers and myself at the first ministers' conference last week was to ensure that in the production of goods and services by Canadians, the Canadian economy would be competitive. Also, we agreed that there should be a certain growth path in the area of 5½ per cent which would permit the economy to produce the number of jobs forecast.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING OFFICE IN TOWN OF GATINEAU

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, as a member of parliament is elected to represent the Canadians, and as representations were made at my office with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, my question will be directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Can the minister tell the House whether he intends to have an unemployment insurance office built in the town of Gatineau to serve that area or does he intend to get the proper studies made in order to pass judgment on its advisability?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I am taking note of the question of the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As it is now apparent that there has been a distinctive change of approach by the Bank of Canada in its handling of our foreign exchange, with frantic buying by the bank in the marketplace and the loss of tens of millions of dollars in an attempt to maintain the dollar at a value around 89.5 cents, can the minister inform the House what the change of attitude or policy has been? Is it fair to assume that when he said last Thursday, "We do not intervene in the marketplace and we let the value of the dollar fluctuate according to the market situation", that is not necessarily so today?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policy is still the same. Our operation in the exchange market is limited to maintaining orderly marketing conditions, and will remain so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. If what the minister has indicated is true, that the dollar is floating, would he indicate why we have lost almost $2 billion of our foreign exchange reserves in the last year or so, almost one-third of that outflow being in the last six or seven weeks? If we have a floating dollar, as the minister has indicated, why did he feel it necessary to put up a $1.5 billion line of credit with our banks?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing else to add. I have made an announcement on the change of policies of the government, and I said in answer to previous questions that the operation at this time is done by the bank in the ordinary fashion. The Bank of Canada intervened to ensure the maintenance of orderly marketing conditions.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. With the dollar hovering at 89.5 cents today, and with the Bank of Canada having expended approximately $500 million of our reserves so far this month, would the minister indicate if he has ruled out the possibility of high interest rates, or would he at least level with the people of Canada and admit that his government's economic policies have led us to this plight of having to defend the dollar yet our reserves are dwindling day by day?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should talk to the five Tory premiers who last week agreed with the policies of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ECONOMIC POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that we now have the worst run on the Canadian dollar in 40 years, does the minister not believe it is part of his responsibility as Minister of Finance to make a statement about the economic policy of this country so there can be some reassurance for people around the world that the government will attempt to do something about this situation? Is the minister planning to make a statement or announce changes in our economic policy?

The judgment of the international community respecting the first ministers' conference was clearly that it had failed; it did not bring any feeling of security or sense of change in this nation at all. When will the Minister of Finance make a statement about the economic policy of this country, in an attempt to reassure people around the world that something is going to be done about our serious situation?

• (1432)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I prefer to hear the views of the premiers to the one of the hon. member. There has been a lot of effort to stabilize the Canadian economy. We stimulated the economy to the tune of $3 billion in the form of tax cuts on January 1. We spoke to the premiers for three days last week, and to the ministers of finance the previous week.

Mr. Lawrence: You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Chrétien: I think, Mr. Speaker, they have shown a lot more responsibility than we have seen demonstrated from the other side.

Mr. Gillies: Does the minister have no appreciation of the seriousness of the economic situation this country is facing? It is a matter of total irrelevance to me whether the minister agrees with what I say, but the facts are on the table: we now have the worst run on the dollar that we have had in 45 years. Is the government not even prepared to make some sort of statement about the situation, let alone do something about it?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member does not realize, for example, that in the last two quarters of 1977 the performance of the Canadian economy was about 5 per cent—

An hon. Member: It is the dollar we are talking about.

Mr. Chrétien: We went from no surplus in trade to a $3 billion surplus last year. We are now in a period of adjustment. We discussed this with the premiers of all the provinces, who represent different types of politicians and parties, and they agreed that we must carry on with the policies we have established for the country.

Mr. Gillies: I have never heard of such a situation in any country that has had a run equivalent to the run that is on the Canadian dollar today, where the minister of finance has not considered it his fundamental responsibility to explain to parliament and to the people of the country that the government has some position in this situation. It is disgraceful, absolutely disgraceful, that the minister should do nothing about it.

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately, I did not recognize the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) for his supplementary. The hon. member therefore now has the floor.

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As several persons and even the town council of Gatineau feel that there should be an unemployment office in their area, can the minister tell the House whether it is possible one may be built in Gatineau and given some priority by his department?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have received the representations of the hon. member for Gatineau, and I shall have to examine the situation with regard to the possibility of having an unemployment insurance office at Gatineau.

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIERS AND AGREEMENT REACHED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister telling the House that there were discussions between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, representing the government, on the one hand, and the premiers of the provinces on the other hand, regarding federal government policy concerning the run on the dollar? Is he telling us that there were discussions with the premiers relative to policy concerning the support of the dollar, and that the premiers explicitly agreed with the policy that the minister is now putting forward in the House?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the treasurer of Ontario put forward at the last meeting of the ministers of finance, I invited the governor of the Bank of Canada to attend discussions with the ministers of finance. It is the first time in years that this has happened. I presume that the conversation which the ministers of finance had with the governor of the Bank of Canada has been reported to the premiers. I did this in collaboration with the Tory minister of finance of Ontario.

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Finance can wiggle and squirm and attempt to change the subject as much as he wants, but he told the House of Commons moments ago that there was agreement by the premiers of Canada with the policy of the government relative to the value of the Canadian dollar. I see he is being prompted by the Prime Minister. Will he tell us now whether he has any evidence at all for that assertion—which was not covered in the communique—and can he tell us whether there was, as he suggested—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: They can try to shout me down as much as they want, on the other side, but we want to know if the Minister of Finance is deliberately misrepresenting the position of the premiers of Canada. We want to know if there was, as he said there was, explicit discussion and agreement on the part of the premiers with the policy of the government of Canada relative to the support of the Canadian dollar. Yes or no?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain very nicely to the hon. member that when we say economic policy, we mean indeed the fiscal policy, the monetary policy, and all the other policies of the government. In my opinion, the hon. member should have understood that, and he might understand in French now what he did not understand in English.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in answering minor questions of minor ministers, it is at least discourteous to try to evade or mislead the House of Commons. On a major question, it is absolutely irresponsible for a senior economic minister of this country to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The government of Canada called the first minister's conference to attempt to share the blame with the premiers for the failure of the economic policy of this country. Now the minister is trying to get the premiers of Canada to share the blame for failure of the policy respecting support of the Canadian dollar. I ask the minister whether his department is now considering contingency plans which he might be announcing within the next few days or weeks concerning support of the value of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if we have to make such an announcement, we will make it in the normal form.

An hon. Member: What is the normal form?

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to tell the hon. member that the premiers have shown much more responsibility than has been shown here in the House in an effort to try to extract from me some comments. I am not very old, but I know that there was a minister in the Tory administration who speculated on the dollar in the House and who was clobbered for that.

Mr. Clark: This minister, on whose word confidence in the Canadian economy depends, moves from irresponsibility to irresponsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Is the minister prepared to stand in the House now and say that he has any justification at all for implicating the premiers of Canada in supporting the position of the government of Canada relative to the dollar? Did he discuss it with them explicitly, and did they agree? That is a simple question to which a yes or no, clear answer will do.

Mr. Chrétien: For the first time in years, I have instigated a discussion between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the provincial ministers of finance. It was the first time, and it was a very good suggestion which came from the treasurer of the province of Ontario. The governor has explained the monetary policy of the government. This question has not come back and nobody has disagreed with it.

POWER

NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN POWER PROJECTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on the assumption that this project remains under his supervision. Would the minister tell the House whether the government of Canada has approved the Gull Island project submitted to the government in March, 1974, which was a proposal to develop 1,800 megawatts of power on the Lower Churchill River, transmit the power from Labrador to Newfoundland and sell the surplus to Quebec, or through Quebec to other customers, a project for which the government of Newfoundland requested financial assistance from the Government of Canada. Is that project now approved by the government?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. member will be aware of the decision taken by the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland to form a corporation, namely, the Lower Churchill Development Corporation, for the precise purpose of reviewing the cost and engineering data, conducting marketing studies and a marketing plan for the generation and transmission of very close to 2,000 megawatts of power from the Lower Churchill Falls area back to Newfoundland, on the one hand, and from the site through Quebec to other markets. That was a decision taken by governments; to that extent the hon. member would be right if he said the Government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland had taken a decision in principle to move forward with this massive project in the national interest.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is a most important question in terms of jobs and economic development in the Atlantic provinces. Last week the first ministers said they had agreed on investment and job creation immediately that would include certain projects such as Gull Island hydro and the Saskatchewan project. The minister issued a weasel-worded release on the same date which stated that the minister and the Premier of Newfoundland both emphasized that, while they are hopeful that Gull Island and other suitable projects will be found economically and technically justifiable, the very large investment requires careful review, market investigation and negotiation of sales agreements.

Which is correct, Mr. Speaker? Is it the release issued by the minister which says nothing is agreed, or is the minister committing the government of Canada to go ahead with this project? He cannot be right both in his release and in his statement to the House. Thousands of people in Newfoundland who are unemployed want to know the answer. Is the project going ahead this year? Is it approved by the government of Canada?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, it was made very clear in my first answer to the hon. member that the Premier of Newfoundland and the government of Canada agreed that the project should go forward and that work needs to be done. The hon. member may feel, when we are looking at a $2 billion project, that we should just sign our names and forget it. There are some rather important questions that have to be updated, however, such as the engineering costs involved, rather important questions with respect to markets, and some rather important questions about how that power will be wheeled through the province of Quebec.

The hon. member may think these are weasel words. I would ask him if he would put the same question to the Premier of Newfoundland, because it was the Premier of Newfoundland who joined with me in making that announcement.

Mr. Crosbie: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The person who has the big hammer in this situation is the government of Canada, with its billions of dollars—and that is who I put the question to. I will ask the question again. This is a proposal which was put forward in March, 1974, so the minister has had three years to look into its feasibility and cost.

Is he now prepared to commit the government—as the Prime Minister pretended to last week—to go ahead with this project, or is it still in doubt because these investigations might show it cannot go ahead? What is the situation?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the hon. member were to cast his mind back over events, he would realize that the Premier and the government of Newfoundland decided they were not prepared to go ahead with an offer then placed on the table by the Government of Canada. That offer of something like $353 million is still on the table with respect to the transmission of power from the Lower Churchill.

The hon. member might also remember that the Newfoundland government was not able to work out an arrangement with the government of Quebec respecting the recall of power, and decided to go to the courts. He might also remember that during that time we were pressing for movement on the part of the Newfoundland government to get the Gull Island project running. It was only last week that the government of Newfoundland decided they were prepared to go ahead even though the issue of the recall of power from the Upper Churchill had not been decided upon.

AMOUNT OF FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? Apart from the $5 million seed money the government of Canada is prepared to offer to the new federal-provincial Crown corporation, is the minister prepared to revise—on the basis of the inflation that has overtaken the project in the past two or three years—the original offer of $353 million? If that stands, is the minister prepared to revise it in light of present cost estimates? In other words, is that still a firm offer based on 1978 dollars?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think events have overtaken that particular offer. We are not withdrawing the offer: I do not want to be misunderstood on that. I think events have overtaken that offer, but the federal government has said we are prepared to enter into discussions with the government of Newfoundland on the generation as well as the transmission of the Lower Churchill power. The hon. member will recall that the offer until now handled only transmission and did not include generation.

We have also indicated that we are prepared to enter into the development of the whole Lower Churchill complex, both generation and transmission, as an equity partner. The government of Newfoundland has said they want to be the majority equity partner. We have told them that is perfectly satisfactory to us and that we want to get on with this massive project.

GOVERNMENT OFFER ON CLEARING OF GULL ISLAND SITE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that events have overtaken the minister and his colleagues in the government. I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Is the minister prepared to proceed on his offer under the Canada Works Program, or any other make-work program, for clearing the Gull Island site, knowing that this could create a number of badly needed jobs in Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces?

• (1447)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a result of representations from my colleagues, we indicated that we were prepared to go ahead some time ago with this particular operation and that it is under the aegis of DREE. We have indicated that we are prepared to make funding available of up to $8,100 per job. It is a question of working out the details with the province of Newfoundland at the present time, and my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, is at the negotiating table now, I understand.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BENEFITS TO PERSONS AGED 65 AND OVER

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Could the minister advise the House if and when the government will direct the Unemployment Insurance Commission to deal honestly with the 18,000 Canadians who are over 65 years of age and who, after having been granted insurance entitlement in 1975, have been unable after January 1, 1976 to collect the benefits to which they were still entitled, as it was duly recognized later on, and who see their applications turned down now by the commission on the grounds that they have received benefits under the Quebec or Canada pension plans, benefits for which they had applied on the advice of the very officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been one of the strongest advocates of this particular position. It was in part because of this kind of representation that we brought in Bill C-52 which brought about some amelioration of the problem for approximately 500 people in addition to those who had launched appeals under this section. The decision of the Federal Court judge, however, indicated that we could not go beyond what the law provided, that is, we could not pay a topping-up of funding from unemployment insurance to those who had received benefits under the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan. In endeavouring to ameliorate this problem with Bill C-52, we think we have gone as far as we can under the law, given the policy decided by this government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S. BOUNDARY NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the present status of the Canada-United States boundary negotiations. I hope the minister has received notice of the question. Can he confirm that it is now Canada's position in those negotiations that we are going to abandon, in this respect, the waters six miles south of the Dixon entrance A-B line to the United States? This is a line set by the Alaska Boundary Tribunal in 1903. Have we now abandoned part of Canada's territorial waters to the United States in these negotiations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since the negotiations are still proceeding, obviously nothing has been abandoned or gained. The negotiations are in the final stages, as I told the House a few days ago. Additional meetings will be held in Washington within a few days, and I believe there is to be another meeting in Ottawa early in March. Until such time as the two negotiators have concluded these talks, clearly I would not be able to say anything specific on the question.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could take us into his confidence and tell us if that proposal has been made to the United States. In view of the fact that at the first ministers' conference the government of British Columbia took a very strong stand, both on the A-B line and on the Juan de Fuca trench, which was in direct opposition to the position this government has taken on these boundaries, can the minister advise us whether the government of British Columbia is represented on the negotiating committee in determining the boundaries of British Columbia waters, or are they still unrepresented?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to square the hon. member's request for information with the fact that he draws conclusions based upon pretty firm assumptions which he must already have. The fact of the matter is—and I hope I can respond to him satisfactorily in this regard—that there is no position of the government of Canada in this matter which is not fully in line with representations from and participation of the British Columbia government and other parties. It is still a matter under negotiation; therefore, obviously a number of items are being discussed back and forth.

I repeat, until such time as we know that those negotiations are successful, I do not think it would be appropriate for me, nor would it be in the Canadian interest, to indicate clearly what matters are being discussed. I should add, of course, that the British Columbia position is transmitted to us in confidence, as are all of these representations.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I might say that the confidential position of the British Columbia government was on national television at the first ministers' conference. It is obviously confidential to the minister and not the rest of the country.

My final supplementary is this. Has the minister received the assessment of the negotiators for Canada as to the ultimate result in the event of arbitration in these disputes, and can he advise whether there has been some assessment, given the compromise, feet-up position that we have taken on these boundaries? Has he had an assessment yet as to how we will ultimately lose if we go to arbitration?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand why every time one of these matters comes up, hon. members—particularly hon. members of the NDP—assume that we are always the ones to lose.

An hon. Member: That is because you have in the past.

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. member says, "in the past". He is talking about the A-B line as though it has been there a long time. In terms of an assessment, of course there have been a number of assessments made. I can assure the hon. member and the House that the fall-back position of the Canadian government is very well protected in the event that arbitration is necessary. Yet I still believe, as I am sure my colleagues in the United States do, that if we can arrive at a conclusion on this matter which is satisfactory to both sides without having to go to third party or to any other from of arbitration, it will be the better course of action.

But it is wrong, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that there is some kind of speed-up action which could imply that we are prepared to make unreasonable concessions in order to get an earlier kind of settlement. It is, however, very clearly in the interest of Canada and of the United States to have this matter settled; and hopefully settled definitely, as quickly and as amicably as possible.

CANADA-U.S. SHARE OF OIL RESOURCES OF GEORGES BANK

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the minister's attention to the east coast for a moment with respect to the boundary question. As he is aware, there is great concern in Atlantic Canada over the sharing of the resources on Georges Bank. At the moment, Canadian fishermen are limited in their quotas of fish on the bank, and scallop fishermen are limited on the same bank. There is concern about the fisheries resource.

The question I would like to direct to the minister is as follows: I understand that licences are now being issued by the American government to American oil companies for oil exploration on Georges Bank. Before these permits are issued, I would like to ask the minister this question. Has there been any consultation with him or with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on this matter, and what will be the Canadian share of any discoveries of hydrocarbons on Georges Bank?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could confine myself to the second part of the question, since I answered the first part earlier to the effect that no agreement on fish stocks has been reached.

With regard to hydrocarbons, seabed mining and related questions, once again no agreement has been reached. Furthermore, to the best of my knowledge—unless the hon. member has more recent information than is available to me—the plan announced in the United States some weeks ago, regarding the possible calling of tenders on certain sites in the east coast area has been withdrawn by the United States authorities. Those areas are not now out for tender. That is the last word I have, and I am satisfied that is the situation. However, something may have occurred over the weekend which has not yet been drawn to my attention.

UN DISCUSSIONS ON FUTURE OF SOUTHWEST AFRICA

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister returned recently from the UN where a further round of the five-power talks with South Africa over the future of Southwest Africa took place, I wonder if he can report to the House the results of those talks?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I can say the talks moved, but not very much. There are still very substantial and substantive differences between the government of the Republic of South Africa and the representatives of Namibia, namely, SWAPO. However, I believe that the five western countries did put forward some proposals which moved things ahead and succeeded in generating some concessions from each side. Talks are still going on, and perhaps the most encouraging fact is that neither side has yet broken off such discussions.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, if the five powers put forward proposals, does that mean the western group is no longer insisting that SWAPO be recognized as the sole voice of Southwest Africa, and does he know whether the South African government has reached any agreement with that organization?

Mr. Jamieson: With respect to the latter part of the question, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member means an agreement between the government of the Republic of South Africa and SWAPO, no such agreement has been reached. Obviously, if it had, there would be no further problem. Respecting the question of recognition, the position of the five, as reflected also by the majority of the United Nations, is that all the parties concerned in Southwestern Africa should be involved in the terms of the election campaign, and that there should be full and free elections with one man, one vote.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RUSSIAN INTELLIGENCE AGENTS IN CANADA

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General which arises from security figures showing that the number of Russian intelligence agents in the Soviet diplomatic service here in Canada since 1970 has averaged between 48 per cent and 50 per cent annually. I would like to ask the minister why the government did nothing concerning the matter until its recent expulsion of the 13 agents. Also, could the minister give all the reasons the government is not doing anything about the rest of those in the Russian diplomatic service who they know are members of the Russian intelligence service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As long as the hon. Solicitor General can give all the information on all those counts within the next minute and a half, I will permit him to go ahead and try.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I really do not know what the hon. gentleman is attempting to accomplish. Last week he made some statements which fall directly within the question of national security. I invited him at the time, if there were any representations he wanted to make relating to matters which came within national security and could be under the supervision of our national security service, to provide me with such information. I am suggesting to the hon. gentleman—and I am repeating my statement—that he is doing the country no service by making this sort of allegation in public. I would invite him again, if he has any information, to offer us his co-operation in that regard.

STEPS TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT TO CHECK ACCREDITATION OF FOREIGN DIPLOMATS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): I direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Even though I have the figures, it is obvious the minister will not respect them. Has the U.S.S.R. nominated replacements for those who were expelled? Whether they have or not, what steps will the government take, or is it taking, if such nominations have been made, to ensure that they are bona fide diplomats and that any further trend to allow people into the country as diplomats who are not diplomats is stopped.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many hypotheses are in that question, but I will try to pick them all out. From my personal knowledge, I do not know whether any applications for replacements have been received. I will make inquiries. However, I can say, as a matter of general information—as I indicated to the House some time ago—that in terms of the normal investigation of nominees to replace diplomats from any embassy, but particularly in this case the Soviet Union, we will be very careful to ensure that their services are needed in Canada for the specific purposes outlined in the request. We will also, of course, take the necessary steps to ensure that once they arrive in Canada, they confine their activities to those clearly spelled out in the authorization for them to enter.

IMMIGRATION

INTERPROVINCIAL MOBILITY OF IMMIGRANTS LANDED IN QUEBEC

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister has now completed an agreement on immigration between the province of Quebec and the government of Canada. With regard to immigrants who have landed in Quebec pursuant to Quebec criteria but do not qualify under Canadian criteria, has the minister received assurances from the other provinces that such immigrants will have full interprovincial mobility? Does he have an agreement from the provinces, and do these immigrants now have the right of interprovincial mobility, as opposed to the statements he made earlier that they might have to wait a period of time before moving from Quebec?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question of mobility is written right into the Quebec agreement, as it is and will be in others; specifically, the agreement with Nova Scotia which we have already signed, and as well the agreement with Saskatchewan which we will be signing. We are conducting negotiations with other provinces. It is absolutely essential that in setting up an immigration agreement with any of the provinces, we do nothing to affect mobility, so that this right of immigrants will, in fact, be protected.

Mr. Epp: The minister referred to the agreement he signed with the province of Nova Scotia and the tentative agreement with other provinces; specifically, Saskatchewan. I understand the new act is to be promulgated on April 1. Under the terms of the new act, will the provinces receive provincial selection criteria or will those agreements, as with the Nova Scotia agreement, only confine themselves to provincial-federal consultation, a position this party has taken for a long period of time and has promoted in discussion of the bill? Or will the agreements specifically give each province of Canada, if they so desire, specific selection criteria as the Quebec-Canada agreement does?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, every concession and every agreement we have reached with the province of Quebec is available to each of the provinces of Canada. Some of them expressed the desire to move a little slower because Quebec is already in the field with foreign service officers abroad. Some are not interested in getting into the selection criteria at this time. Whatever agreements we may enter into with Quebec, whatever conditions we may impose upon them, whatever arrangements we make with them, are in fact available to all the provinces.

ENVIRONMENTAL STANDARDS AND RESTRICTIONS STUDIES

Question No. 926—Mr. Herbert:

Are any studies in progress or contemplated into the effect on the competitiveness of domestic production versus foreign imports of environmental standards and restrictions in Canada?

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): As new environmental standards and regulations are developed, or existing ones reviewed, considerable attention is directed to the related economic impacts. In most cases decisions result from the work of joint industry-government task forces; a number of such initiatives are currently underway.

Because of the complex factors related to international competitiveness it has proven exceedingly difficult to isolate and quantify the impact of environmental measures. However, studies conducted in the U.S., Japan and in Canada concluded that such measures are relatively insignificant and non-inflationary. The OECD considers that environmental standards are not significant in international competitiveness.

[Mr. Pinard.]

Under the government's announced new program designed to promote a more thorough and systematic economic analysis of all major regulations which are primarily social in nature, social and economic analyses will be undertaken to assess the impact of DFE environmental regulations under development.

EYEDROPS AND OPHTHALMIC OINTMENTS

Question No. 928—Mr. Herbert:

What guarantees are required by the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare to ensure that Visine eye drops and ophthalmic ointments imported into Canada are manufactured under the same sterile conditions required of the domestic producer?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In Canada, ophthalmic preparations must be sterile according to the test specifications of the Standard on the label. Canadian importers of eye drops and ophthalmic ointments are routinely requested to furnish evidence that these products have been manufactured under conditions that are identical to those required in Canada. Failure to supply satisfactory information results in import refusal.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE RECIPIENTS

Question No. 1,156—Mr. Marshall:

Are veterans on WVA/CWA allowances receiving income from Workmen's Compensation, CPP or social assistance and, if so (a) how many (b) what is the average income from such source?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Effective December 31, 1977:

	Workmen's Compensation	CPP
(a) No. of WVA/CWA recipients	1,150	15,783
(b) Average monthly income	$98.55	$96.53

Records of WVA/CWA recipients in receipt of social assistance are not kept because this source of income is not assessed for allowance purposes. In most cases, social assistance terminates when the veteran or survivor is awarded an allowance.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed, from Monday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very interesting and intelligent debate. I hope I can follow the same track. Seriously, coming from the city of Calgary, which is the oil centre of Canada, I am very proud to take part in this debate today. I think I can restate carefully and correctly this party's policy with regard to this pipeline.

From questions put today by the opposition and answers given by the government, we believe that one of the ways to turn around the lagging economy of Canada is to get on with the building of this pipeline. Everyone is on all fours in that regard. However, we have been presented with a bill and an agreement which forms part of the bill. That needs to be examined. When we are passing a bill in parliament we want to do the right thing for the good of Canada, the good of the industry and, in particular, to start Canada back on the trail from the lagging economy which is being caused by the government's economic policies.

By way of introduction, it is interesting to note that when we are dealing with pipelines we must deal with the whole ball of wax, the oil and gas industry. I have in my hand a copy of a report from the Canadian Petroleum Association which presented a brief some time ago and which I have incorporated into many speeches.

The western petroleum industry, exclusive of refining and marketing, currently spends, and has done so for ten years, approximately $1 billion per year. Over 85 per cent of that money is spent in Canada for goods, services, and payments to the government. Of the major expenditures made for oil and gas pipeline, gas plants, fittings, pressure vessels and pumps, over 80 per cent was spent in eastern Canada, a large part of it in the province of Quebec. The majority of its capital expenditures were made in Canada as a result of tariff protection.

Oil and gas revenues paid to the western provinces have directly, and this is the point I want to make first, benefited all Canadian taxpayers in savings to the federal government in federal-provincial equalization payments. In addition, the federal government is the major recipient of income taxes on the corporate profits of all companies directly or indirectly affected, not only the oil and gas industries but all the tertiary industries that supply the pipes, valves, fixtures and other parts that make up the pipeline of which Canada has good experience building in the past.

I listened to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), whom I have known for a number of years, dealing with natural gas. He mentioned, and I endorse those figures, that we produced in western Canada five trillion cubic feet of gas in 1976 and five trillion cubic feet of gas in 1977. I remind the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that most of that finding was in the province of Alberta at Suffolk where they drilled over 100 short gas wells and at Elsworth, which is close to Grande Prairie, where they have drilled some very large wells. In that area alone they have found two trillion cubic feet of gas. That is the proven reserves. The reserves in that area will rise to between seven and 15 trillion cubic feet of gas.

Alberta has a surplus of gas. We have heard a lot of pessimism from various speakers in the House that we are running out of energy. There are 3,000 gas wells shut down at the present time in the province of Alberta alone. Hundreds of millions of dollars were spent drilling those. In the Elsworth area alone we can produce one billion cubic feet a day, yet 3,000 of these wells are shut down at the present time. If there were a market at the present time—there is a demand in the United States—with a trade-off, that would net Canada in taxation $1 billion per year to the federal government and a half billion dollars to the provinces. This is all brought about by exploration and development.

As we know, this is a big risk industry. When the federal Liberal government brought in and implemented the white paper on taxation, exploration and development dried up. It was only after the scare of an energy shortage in this country that they listened to the Progressive Conservative party and changed the tax structure of the nation to encourage exploration and development.

You cannot expect exploration and development to take place if you take 100 per cent of the profits away from the corporate body which is taking the risk. You need to have corporations in this industry because it is big business. It costs a lot of money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I hear my friends to the left. They voted to shut down exploration. The reason I mentioned the development and exploration, as well as the great reserves now built up in Alberta, is because there is encouragement there. Compare the royalty system to the taxation system in Saskatchewan and you get the exploration where the action is, and that is in the province of Alberta.

An hon. Member: It has something to do with resources.

Mr. Woolliams: If you are going to hunt partridge, you have to go in the grass and find them. You cannot stay in the house beside the fireplace. I do not want to get off track on this, but not very long ago some people were saying that there is no oil and no gas, that the pools have all been explored and developed. I have set those figures out to show what can be done on the basis of good economic policies, first in Alberta and now as suggested by my party in connection with exploration for gas and the development of this source of energy.

● (1512)

As to the bill itself, questions were put today by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in relation to the approval given by the National Energy Board for the use of 56-inch pipe. I think everyone agrees with that decision because it gives us some assurance that the pipe will be made here in Canada, either in Hamilton or in Regina. It ensures that despite the lack of any guarantee there will be favourable opportunities in Canada. The United States does not favour a 56-inch pipe. The people there would prefer a high pressure pipe. If hon. members would look carefully at the agreement they would see that this decision may mean, as the hon. member for Yukon suggested in his questions, that the agreement will have to be renegotiated. That would be unfortunate, because, as a number of members have pointed out, it is already late in the day; the bill should have been before us very much earlier. Then again, questions were asked by my hon. friend from Hamilton West about the supply of valves and fittings, and we hear it would take about 18 months lead time if they are to be manufactured in our factories. This just cannot be done if we intend to move rapidly so as to improve our lagging economy.

As I say, it has been an intelligent debate, but before I get into committee matters may I say I was shocked when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) lost his temper last night, with my hon. friend from Hamilton West particularly. He was irritated. I have a lot of quotations I could read but I do not want to take up time reading remarks he has made against the Liberal party. But I would like to read something else into the record. Maybe a debate on a pipeline is not the time for poetry, but I thought the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands would like to be reminded of this poem—no doubt he is familiar with it. It is called "The Lost Leader". I think it fits the hon. member for Crowfoot very well. I shall not quote it all, and, by the way, I have changed one word. It reads:

Just for a handful of silver he left us,
Just for a ribbon to stick in his coat,
Found the one gift of which fortune bereft us,
Lost all the others she lets us devote . . .
One more wrong to man, one more insult to parliament
Life's night begins, let him never come back to us!

Which means, night begins for him.

After the minister lost his temper yesterday I was reminded of the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he said "The path of glory leads but to the gravy." Well, they certainly led to gravy but they led also to an emotional disturbance last night, and I am glad Hansard did not put his swear words on record because even in Crowfoot it would have looked very bad for the hon. member who, I am sure, is in deep political trouble.

I want to deal with the judicial process set up to adjudicate disputes which are likely to arise from time to time, particularly in connection with clauses 14 and 15 which set aside any judicial review as to native claims, citizens' rights, disputes between contractor and contractor, employers and employees. I say this, and after I have dealt with the agencies which are to be set up, hon. members will understand why. I make the point right now that any process of judicial review is being taken away. the whole matter will be directly under the minister who will have power to authorize these agencies which are being set up to solve all disputes of the kind I have mentioned.

What does the bill provide in this regard? Well, there is to be an administrator described as the administrator of the agency. The administrator will be all-powerful. By "agency" is meant the northern pipeline agency, all of whose powers would be defined by order in council. The agency will be the complete master of the pipeline project, the biggest this country has seen since the building of the "national dream", the CPR.

All appointments are to be made by order in council. Under clause 5, the governor in council has the power to appoint the administrator. The administrator will exercise and perform all the duties and functions of a Czar minister. The minister who is chosen for the job, I do not know who he will be, will be appointed by order in council and he will be the minister responsible for the pipeline. If hon. members read clauses 14, 15 and 16 of this bill they will find that this special minister can be removed by the same process as that by which he was appointed. He can be appointed one day and removed the next to be replaced by another minister. And on the following day a third minister can replace him. Then, according to the rules of the House, should we in parliament see that something is going wrong with the project it might be impossible for us to address questions to the minister who is responsible for what had occurred.

We have been promised 80 per cent of the content, but I still do not believe this figure will be achieved. It is a promise. There is no guarantee. There is no provision for control. There is only the hon. gentleman's word. I may say I have always accepted the word of the minister, but he is only one member of a government that is wishy-washy—

An hon. Member: He may not be there.

Mr. Woolliams: No. He may retire to a better climate, and I would not blame him. What I say is that we could try to clear up mistakes by putting questions to ministers but we would not be allowed to question a minister who had made the mistakes and who had been replaced. His successor would probably not talk to him. We have seen this happen with respect to the office of solicitor general. What we have before us is a very complex, autocratic approach to a question involving land claims, disputes between citizens, and other important issues affecting the public interest.

As I have said, we must have the pipeline. But surely we could be given a bill which would serve all Canadians better. We want this development because today there are one million unemployed in Canada, more unemployed than there were during the worst depression of the thirties. And no one, as far as I know, has suggested there is a world recession today although there is certainly a depression in Canada.

The minister to whom I have referred will be entitled, under this bill, to exercise all the powers of the National Energy Board. In other words, this agency would not only be all-powerful, exercising its functions by order in council without reference to parliament, but it would take over the powers and functions of the National Energy Board itself. The powers of the minister will be unlimited. It is he who gives direction to the agency. The agency dances to his tune. Moreover, as I say, the minister can be changed from day to day by order of the Privy Council. He can oversee all surveys, enforce the agreement between the United States and Canada, force land expropriations, and conclude land claims settlements, without any right of appeal.

Only on a question of law can there be an appeal to one judge of the Federal Appeal Court of Canada. What kind of nonsense is this? This is all hidden because everybody in Canada wants the pipeline and the employment it would generate to get the country moving again. Canadians are solid thinkers.

Calgary is a city of affluence because of two major industries, the gas and oil industry and the agricultural industry. Coming from Calgary and living in that environment I want to see this pipeline project developed. People in Calgary and Edmonton know better than people in any other city that jobs depend on the development of this project. However, they will think twice before they will give approval to this bill.

We know what will happen in the committee. The Liberal government has a majority in the committee. The chairman is probably appointed by the cabinet, but he gets the nod from the majority of Liberals. The chairman of the committee will say, "Eldon, go ahead with your ten minutes of cross examination", or, "Move your amendment in ten minutes". This is a serious matter. In the committee a member can ask one question of the minister and the minister can talk nine and a half minutes, and that member's time is up.

Clause 14 of this bill grants to the governor in council the right to transfer to a minister—not specified—such of the powers, duties and function of any minister, department or agency and the right to exercise those powers and duties, and there is no right of appeal from the authority of the agency or the minister unless a question of law is involved. The minister can make law, rescind law, change law, legalize the illegal and make illegal the legal. That is the mess we are in.

Clause 15 merely restates that the all-powerful Liberal pipeline czar has the right to dictate to all concerned. Clause 15 states:

> The Minister may, to facilitate the exercise of such of the powers and the carrying out of such of the duties and functions of a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada or any department or agency of the Government of Canada as are transferred to him, enter into an agreement . . . and carry out the duties and functions . . .

And be a czar. Clause 16 is even worse. That clause compounds the powers of the governor in council by decrees and edicts. There were no appeals from the decrees and edicts of the dictators in European history, and there is no appeal here either. Regulations can be made to modify any existing regulations under any act of parliament or under any act in reference to any person or corporation engaged in the development. What does that all mean? How can Canadians know the law if some unknown appointed minister, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands says, makes a decision and modifies the regulations? That is how the legal can become illegal and the illegal legalized. That is what those clauses say.

Clause 14 transfers power but does not give the courts a chance to review the situation. Orders in council can transfer powers from one minister to another. All that can be done without publicity and without any debate in parliament. It can be done by some unknown body, person or group. No dictator had greater powers.

We saw what happened when orders in council created a secret cartel in the uranium industry. Imagine what can be done with the powers granted in this bill! Everyone wants the pipeline, but we want a bill which will build the pipeline and serve Canadians while it is being built and after it has been built.

Clause 15 would allow the transfer of power from one minister to another. Power can be transferred from minister A to minister B, from minister B to minister C and so forth, without question. New agreements and orders can be made, and edicts and decrees can be enforced. Perhaps I should not say this in parliament, but where in hell is there protection of civil rights in this the biggest project since the national dream? Whatever happened to native land claims? What will happen to claims by other people from Alberta and British Columbia? What will happen to provincial rights? This law by order in council should be nicknamed the Liberal gas law. It gases the natives, the little citizen, corporations and public interests without giving any of them the right to survival with a gas mask.

We want accountability to parliament and to the country. We want accountability to natives and to all the citizens of Canada so that their interests can be protected. What accountability will there be if Canadian firms do not get the steel pipe contracts? What can parliament do about that? What can Canadian citizens, factories, and unions do about it? What happens if Canadians do not get the market for by-products? We heard the wishy-washy answer of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen). He said he does not know, that it may take 18 months but that it is up to free enterprise to get geared up. I am sure he has much experience with regard to how long it takes to retool a factory, even in the automobile industry.

Let us be practical. If things go wrong and six months from now we ask these same questions—and God help us if this government is still here—will the answer be that there is provision in the bill, that it is the responsibility of the agency, or that things are done by orders in council which can be modified yesterday and varied tomorrow? Will that be the response if native claims are not settled or if Canadians do not get the jobs? We have no control over United States tariffs. How do we know that the Americans will not buy pipe from Japan?

On other projects the United States has used Japanese pipe. Will cheap Japanese pipe be dumped into the United States, and will the United States bid against our firms? The Deputy Prime Minister says we will have to compete. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did not even know that Japanese pipe has been used to build pipelines in Canada. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said he would have expected more intelligence from that minister. I have never expected any intelligence from him because I have known him for a long time. If inferior pipe and other inferior products are used, where can we go if there is not a question of law?

What happens if the cost of this pipeline escalates from $9 billion to $25 billion, as the national debt has escalated under this government in the last ten years? What recourse will this parliament have? What appeal will anyone have from decisions of the agency which is to be created as a puppet of the minister, who could change from day to day? How can we be sure of accountability? In my opinion there should be the right of appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction, the Federal Court of Canada, or a superior court of any province.

I am not talking about little disputes as to whether welders should go here or there. I am talking about substantial matters which go to the very meat of whether the pipe is manufactured in Canada or whether Canadian workers get jobs. All these tremendous powers granted to the minister will be bestowed by order in council, and there will be no right of appeal except on a question of law, as set out in clauses 14, 15, 16 as well as in other clauses of the bill. Decrees and regulations must be monitored by parliament in a parliamentary committee from time to time. All orders should be tabled in the House so that Canadians will know the law from day to day, even as it is varied.

It was not long ago that the right hon. member for Prince Albert and Mr. St. Laurent made a deal that there would be the tabling of orders in council created by the Cabinet. The monitoring can be done by a strengthened Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, by the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, or by a special committee set up for this purpose, that is, to act as a check and balance on so extensive a power assigned by law to parliament by this bill. We know the difficulties faced by the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments with respect to trying to get a reference out of the House as to orders in council. Every year thousands of laws are passed. Only a third of them were published last year. These safeguards must be spelled out in the bill. No other feathery citation would be adequate at committee stage.

In committee we will fight for a quarterly monitoring process which must be embodied in this bill. As wretched a bill as it is, and in that it lacks the necessary guarantees, the basic intention of building a pipeline to serve Canadian and American interests is present. It provides for Canadian interests to be involved and engaged in the building of the pipeline, the rolling of pipe, the manufacturing of fixtures, valves and all other necessary parts. That is what we will ask for in committee. If there is any delay in that regard it will be the government's fault and not the fault of this side of the House.

We have heard many promises, but there is no national energy policy, no northern energy policy, and no policy to settle native claims. The only appeal is to a federal appeal court sitting with one judge. On any other matter—and we are dealing with $9 billion—this court must sit with three judges. In this case, under this bill, one judge answers the questions. What is his power? He cannot vary the order of the agency. He can send it back with a direction. If the agency indicates that it does not go along with that, then it carries on in the same style and way, excercising its dictatorial powers over Canadians.

What protection do people have who own land? What protection is there for their way of life? The bill is polished like a red apple to create the biggest administrative dictatorial Liberal gang: the law makers, the law interpreters and, at the same time, emasculating the National Energy Board. Unless the National Energy Board is staffed with competent help—and it only expects to have 200 on the job—then even the slight influence the Board will have left cannot be put into action.

The hon. member for Yukon put it accurately and adequately. It needs repeating. He said the following:

Enormous powers will be granted under clauses 14, 15 and 16 of the bill. In the years of the Diefenbaker government, a gentleman's arrangement was made. The Deputy Prime Minister will remember this. Orders in council were to be tabled monthly and they were. Since 1963, that practice has been discontinued.

That was caused by the Liberal government. He continued:

Unless you ask specifically for the tabling of an order in council, you never see it.

Even when it is requested, it must be pried out of the government.

He went on to say:

I request from the government, if not an embodiment in the legislation, at least an assurance that once a month copies of orders and decisions of the board and any orders in council made under this legislation will be tabled in this House. In that way we will be informed of the manner in which the regulatory agency is conducting this project.

I believe that under clause 35 of the bill the commission lands would be virtually wiped out. This cannot stand. As the hon. member for Yukon pointed out as an example, the pipeline could be built right through the town hall at Whitehorse and no one would have the right of appeal.

It is parliament that has and gives the power to delegate subordinate lawmaking by way of regulations and statutory instruments. It should remain there. This power is delegated by means of certain provisions of the legislation or acts it passes. To ensure that this delegated power is not misused, by the Statutory Instruments Act parliament established the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Section 2(1)(d) of the act applies to orders, rules and regulations of all kinds, with certain important exceptions that I will mention later.

The function of this committee is to act as a watchdog. This cannot be monitored under the bill. What watchdog do we have? We have no watchdog.

The second report of the committee reads as follows:

Parliament retains responsibility for the law of the land and to the extent that these detailed rules and regulations are not subject to parliamentary scrutiny, parliament is forfeiting its effective right to settle laws that must be obeyed by the people.

Parliamentary scrutiny of all such subordinate or delegated law is now an accepted part of the parliamentary tradition in the Commonwealth.

But that is not so in Canada. That is what the report indicated. If we ask for a committee to monitor this agency and the powers of the minister, surely that cannot be refused. Surely I, and other hon. members on this side, will be heard. We want this bill as badly as the government wants it. We will listen to reason in committee.

These skeletal provisions delegate excessive power to the minister. Also it is highly questionable whether the subdelegation to the extent allowed under clause 15 of this bill does not contravene the basic legal principle that a delegate may not subdelegate. Blanket delegation of this nature is only permissible, if at all, in emergency situations. If allowed to stand, parliamentary control would be difficult, as would review by the court. There is only review on the question of law. Likewise, it is a matter for serious consideration that the regulation-making powers conferred by this subdelegation would undoubtedly be very broad.

It is a vexed question whether parliament would or could review on a continuous basis, under the Statutory Instruments Act and therefore by a committee, the mass of documentation that would accumulate. The regulations pertaining to this documentation, as we see from clause 16(1) of the bill, may be made before the coming into force of the act. Perhaps they are prepared at this time, without us knowing anything about them. Surely those regulations should be laid before parliament prior to third reading in order for us to have the basic structure. With respect to this area, the bill hands over everything carte blanche to the executive. We are building a house with all the skeletal forms and parts of the rooftop, and at the same time allowing the government to put on the siding and do the interior decorating.

It is important to note, however, that even though the Statutory Instruments Act and the committe are intended as safeguards for the sovereignty of parliament, there is in the act an escape route by way of Section 27 which gives the governor in council the power to make regulations exempting the tabling of any regulation. If we ask for tabling, Section 27 can be invoked and the government can indicate that it does not have to table it. It is secret, like that secret order in council. Surely all hon. members want Canada to become an economically sound nation steeped in the protection of the law.

This is no time to play politics. We are all prone to put forward political ideas at times, but we have endeavoured to give the government some direction. Do not destroy the Bill of Rights, nor the works of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The Bill of Rights indicates that all laws passed are subject to the interpretation of the Bill of Rights, which lays out some of the civil rights. I am talking about the rights of the native claimants. I am talking about the rights of any land owner, and I am talking about the rights in negotiating contracts between contractors and the government and employers and employees. The Bill of Rights is emasculated by this bill.

Now that I have dealt with the legal aspects of this legislation I want to lay down some philosophy. I have spoken in this House for ten years asking that we get on with this job and establish a special committee. I looked at some of the speeches I made when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) was minister, in which I asked that a special committee be set up, but nothing was done at that time.

I would like to quote from "The Future of our Industry", a convention paper presented by J. C. Sproule at a meeting of the Canadian Oilfield Technical Society. He said, in dealing with the development of our resources:

It may or may not make good sense to leave undeveloped a country as rich in natural resources as the Canadian Arctic.

The population of the earth is expected to double in the next fifty years and to double again in the following fifty years. Fifty years is a relatively short time. Some of us can remember that long. Many of our children and grandchildren will be here at that time. Meanwhile, we must keep in mind that it was not the western democracies that are doubling population every fifty years, but is rather the over-populated "have not" countries who will soon be looking for living space. Our surplus living space would satisfy them. If we are not using it, or have not developed it, who has a better right to it than they?

In building this pipeline, in building the Dempster route, and in building the other pipeline and developing our resources, we will be protecting Canadian soil and resources for Canadians for all time to come. Of course we attract many immigrants to this country.

This is a very large project. This is the area it covers: from Watson Lake to the Alberta-B.C. border it is 440 miles; from the Alberta border to Caroline, from Caroline to the Saskatchewan border and from Caroline to the B.C. border, it is 806 miles; from southern B.C. to the U.S.A. border it is 105 miles; and from the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to the U.S.A. border it is 160 miles. On the Dempster route from Whitehorse to Watson Lake, B.C. it is 512 miles, making a total of 2,023 miles if the Dempster route is completed. So you see what lies before us.

Before concluding let me say that this is very important legislation. We are not going to debate it long because we want it to go to committee. We have asked for certain definite amendments to be made to the legislation to protect the native rights, the civil rights of Canadians, the rights of employers and employees in the signing and negotiating of contracts and, above all, the public interest, which takes in the cost of gas, if we are allowed to take that gas, something which we do not yet know, to the communities in the North, because it will be American gas that flows down there.

We are very fortunate to be so richly endowed with all forms of basic energy. History has proven that our industrial progress will be proportionate to our availability of energy. However, in recent years Canada has shown an international trade deficit in energy producing resources. As recently as 1950 we, as a nation, imported more than 60 per cent of all our fuel requirements, but in the 1970's we became self-sufficient.

We have oil and we will find a lot more. We have natural gas in surplus. We have one eighth of the world's supply of coal, and therefore we have energy. Our supplies of energy will determine the cost of energy and how we will conquer inflation. Let us get on with the job and go ahead with the project, but let us build in some safeguards because the people elected us as their members of parliament to guard their interests.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned that this legislation was important and that it was important for the Liberal party to have it passed. Let me point out in my opening remarks that it is not only important to the Liberal party; it is important to the people of Canada as well as to all the provincial premiers to have this legislation passed. A project of this size is important not only to one party. Surely it is important to the people of Canada as a whole.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

May I say that the critics, mainly in the NDP, who argue that Canada should have obtained further guarantees of Canadian content before signing the pipeline agreement with the United States either fail to recognize that such demands would sabotage the whole deal, or else are dishonest with themselves, because there would have been no pipeline and no Canadian jobs, and this debate would not be going on at present, if Canada, in its negotiations with the U.S., had demanded guarantees of Canadian content. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) pointed out, they would have been buying a pig in a poke. I am sure the hon. member who is sitting on the NDP benches would not sign a contract not knowing what would be the cost involved.

There is no doubt in my mind that we would have had no pipeline to discuss in the House had we insisted that Canada obtain the majority of jobs on the pipeline and had we denied competitive bids on it. One cannot expect a rational person to sign a blank cheque to the Canadian people, especially in a situation where there is a cost factor which concerns us, that is, of course, the Dempster connection.

It would be hard to argue, if we were only talking about the Dempster connection, that there should be no competitive bids either on the pipe or on materials going into building it, but I suspect that the rationale behind the thinking of those eminent gentlemen who, as I mentioned, are mostly in the NDP, is that if it is American gas that will be going through the pipeline initially, then we should charge whatever the traffic will bear. I am rather amazed at this thinking because I assume that if we were in a similar situation I would not want our neighbours to adopt an attitude expressed in the words "to hell with the cost; the Canadians will have to pay it". I do not think that we, as good neighbours, should take such an attitude, especially when we have assurances from the companies that will be involved in the construction of this important project that they are competitive and that they are not afraid of the United States, of Japan or of West Germany.

Some members of the Conservative party also have expressed their fear, and yet last week we had a conference here in Ottawa at which the provincial premiers of the ten provinces met with the federal government and expressed the belief that the solution to our present economic problems lies in reliance upon the private sector of our economy. Yet day after day I read and hear in the House that we cannot compete with other countries. I wonder whether we have become a nation of mice, afraid to compete with our American neighbours.

This afternoon during the question period we heard remarks made by members of the official opposition regarding the Canadian dollar. Perhaps it is because I am from British Columbia, an export oriented province, that I think there is an opportunity with our devalued Canadian dollars, for us to export our products to world markets and thus pick up some of the trade lost over the years, perhaps due to foolishness on our part.

I believe that opportunities exist if we choose to grab them, but I will certainly not stand up and say, "Poor us, we do not have the guts or the technology to compete in world markets." I say we do, Mr. Speaker. We do not need guarantees that we must use steel at any price to ensure Canadian jobs. Those jobs will be filled by Canadians, but in competition, and not as a result of an arrangement that we sign a contract with the United States in case they compete against us. I do not accept that, and I do not think the people of Canada accept it.

There is an insidious movement in this country to belittle anything Canadian, whether it be this House of Commons or the ability of our companies to compete in world markets. It seems that we have a tremendous inferiority complex which is being encouraged by those who would like to change the system. That is something that I fear personally, and I will fight against it. Canadian companies have said time and time again that they do not need government intervention, that they can compete with the United States and other countries in the manufacture of pipe. The fact that we do not at the moment have companies manufacturing the fittings required is not a great drawback as they will not be needed for two or three years. It just means there will be opportunities for new companies in that area.

Perhaps I am parochial, Mr. Speaker. When the original discussions about a pipeline to transport gas from Alaska to the United States took place I thought that if we did not seize the opportunity to have this built on Canadian soil we, on the west coast, would find ourselves watching a procession of LNG tankers passing from Alaska to southern United States ports. I can assure this House that no one in British Columbia, and certainly none of the political parties in British Columbia, would support the proposition of increased tanker traffic off the west coast. We are all aware of the problems of oil spills in various parts of the world in recent years. British Columbians fear this because the west coast has the potential to be one of the world's greatest sources of protein as a result of the 200 mile limit on fisheries and because of the recently announced $150 million salmon enhancement program. We certainly do not want these resources destroyed.

Even if there were no aesthetic considerations regarding oil spillage off the beautiful west coast, there is a strong economic argument. We do not wish the blights that have occurred in other parts of the world to occur on our coast line. That is why, in August, I strongly supported the proposal for a pipeline.

This pipeline has tremendous prospects for western Canada—for British Columbia in particular and Canada in total, whether it be Quebec or Ontario that will supply many of the goods and services needed. There are tremendous opportunities for British Columbia since 700 or 800 miles of pipe will go through the province. We should use those opportunities well.

Some hon. members suggested that the GATT agreements would not affect a guarantee system and that we should not allow competition on the line. I was rather surprised that some members from British Columbia would suggest that we do not need to worry about the GATT agreements. With one quarter of our national wealth based upon export sales I fear it would be potentially dangerous for Canada to encourage the deterioration of the international trading system governed by GATT. There may be a loophole but, of course, if there is a loophole for us, there will be for other nations as well.

Coming from a province that is rich in resources I would hate to see our export market damaged because we were shortsighted enough to try to weasel into the GATT agreement a guarantee that was not written into it in the first place. I hope hon. members will look well ahead and not let us fall into a situation where we could be discriminated against in future through some legal flim-flam between nations.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the unreasonable terms proposed by the New Democratic Party would have doomed the pipeline agreement, and the charges of a sell-out which they raised would have been borne out. Such an approach would have sold out the $4 billion project at a time when most Canadians would agree stimulus is needed in our economy. I for one would not wish to go before the Canadian people in an election campaign and say that, in order to obtain guarantees, we lost the project, that it was a matter of judgment and our judgment was bad. I suspect the people would say that we did not have to worry about our judgment in the future because we would not be here.

If the Canadian companies which are vitally interested in this project say they can compete, why do we argue about it? Do politicians know better than businessmen whether they can compete? I think businessmen are able to take care of themselves and do not need the assistance of the New Democratic Party.

Opposition spokesmen have suggested irresponsibly that there will be no provisions to ensure that the 90 per cent Canadian input is achieved. The Canada-U.S. agreement asserts that the system will be built so as to "advance the national economic and energy interests and to maximize the related industrial benefit of each country." Legislation now before this House contains requirements about the input of Canadian labour, goods and services in the planning, purchasing and construction of the pipeline in this country.

The New Democratic Party is either unaware or has hidden under the rug the fact that the companies most vitally involved in supplying the pipeline project have not sought absolute guarantees or some assured preferential system for pipeline contracts. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the steel company of Canada, Peter Gordon, says he is not only confident of Stelco's ability to meet United States competition for pipe in Canada but he indicates that the company may well compete with U.S. suppliers of pipe for contracts on their home ground. To build in guarantees would be to deprive Stelco of the opportunity to compete in the United States.

I wonder if we have lost our senses completely, Mr. Speaker. Just a week ago a conference suggested that the private sector of our economy is our salvation in terms of employment and prosperity, yet time and time again people who supposedly support that argument suggest that we should interfere a little bit here and a little bit there. I am probably the last of the free enterprisers, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who spoke before me wants guarantees. He will give the most eloquent speech on free enterprise and government decontrol of the system, and then in the next breath say that these companies should come to parliament every three months and ask, "Am I doing all right?" It is ridiculous, and you know it is ridiculous. Be honest for once.

The New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker, indicates that Foothills is apparently not competent either, although Foothills has said Canadian content in the pipeline will be 90 per cent. They have constructed pipelines in the west on numerous occasions and have been be able to fulfil the 90 per cent Canadian content. I still hear the "boo birds" say, "My goodness, we must do something to help those poor companies because we know the pipeline companies are telling us fairy stories. They cannot do it, the government must put in a guarantee".

We come back to the same thing, the government must do this and it must do that. We cannot take the word of a company which has been in operation a number of years and which possesses more experience than I have or any other member in this House has. Time and time again speakers on the other side keep bringing this point up as to guarantees of content, guarantees of this and that. I have more faith in Foothills obviously than they do. I have faith also in Westcoast Transmission which has had experience constructing pipelines in British Columbia.

The group of companies recognize, and we in the government agree, that over the past 20 years Canada has developed a number of large and highly efficient firms with the capacity to handle a project of the northern pipeline size. Two of the major companies involved in Foothills, Alberta Gas Trunk Line and Westcoast Transmission, have reported that their own construction in recent years has approached 90 per cent Canadian content. I accept their word. If other hon. members have information which I do not possess that these companies are unable to fulfil these requirements, we would like to know. I have heard no contradiction of the Foothills or Westcoast Transmission statement. They have had no guarantees. They run a competitive market, and I must say I accept their word above the word of someone who is not involved in this business.

The Government of Canada approach goes beyond the realm of good intentions as far as Canadian content is concerned. It should be remembered that the Canada-U.S. agreement stipulated that each government endeavour to ensure that the supply of goods and services to the pipeline project would be on generally competitive terms. Mr. Speaker, I do not think anybody in this country would want a pipeline built on non-competitive terms.

In its report giving Foothills the green light last summer, the National Energy Board said the company should develop its purchasing program so as to ensure that Canadians have a fair and competitive opportunity to participate in all facets of the project. I stress the word competitiveness because that is all that can be reasonably asked in any market, at any time, that competitiveness be involved. It is also stipulated that the level of Canadian content be optimized as far as is practicable, and that maximum advantage be taken of opportunities provided by the project to establish and expand supplier firms in Canada.

I realize other members wish to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I wish to conclude in this manner that, if we are convinced that it is the private sector of our economy which will provide the jobs many Canadians want, then surely it should be the object of all members of this House, regardless of what side they sit on, to ensure a project of this magnitude goes forward and that the stimulus of $4 billion in 1976 terms does occur within our economy.

It is foolish to discuss whether the regulations should be issued now, later or in between. A report should be made to this House through a committee every quarter. I would like this matter to go to committee and I would like to see this bill passed in order that those people involved in the construction of this project have the lead-in time required.

In Canada there are insufficient numbers of skilled workers should that pipeline construction commence tomorrow. Workers would have to be brought in. We need lead-in time to co-operate with the provinces to ensure that, if there is a shortage of skilled labour in this country, classes are set up immediately in schools so that when the pipeline project does proceed we will have the necessary people to provide that labour for those jobs. This will require the co-operation of the provinces and of the federal government.

Following the conclusion of the first ministers' conference last week I saw a ray of light across the country. Some of the opposition members have not learned what the premiers have learned, that it is more important at this time to get on with the job rather than bringing up straw issues because there may be an election this year or next year. The people of Canada do not want us to play politics with their futures. They want us to do what we were elected to do in the first place, which is to ensure that what is best for this country is carried out. The government has a monitoring position to ensure that it gives every assistance and encouragement to private industry.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say something in this debate concerning the proposal of the Foothills Pipe Lines Company and its sponsors, Alberta Gas Trunk Line of Calgary and Westcoast Transmission Company of Vancouver. I would like to pay tribute first of all to these two sponsoring companies which are prepared to take on the largest single project ever proposed by private enterprise in Canada, in the United States, or indeed anywhere in the world. It takes a lot of personal and corporate courage, a lot of stamina and tenacity to do this, and particularly so in Canada today.

Round one of this contest ended last fall when the government made its decision in favour of the Foothills project to build the line along the Alaska Highway instead of by way of the Mackenzie valley. I say to the House, Mr. Speaker, that the energies and efforts so far on the part of this group, Foothills and its sponsors, are likely to be minuscule in comparison to the tasks which now lie ahead.

One of the first and most important steps to be taken in our country is the passing of this legislation by parliament. Ministers of the government have been emphasizing the importance of quick passage of the bill which has been introduced. It is typical, however, of this government that an agreement signed by Mr. Schlesinger on September 24 and the required bill passed quickly through the United States Congress. It is now four and a half months later when it is before our parliament. The minister of energy and at times the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have spoken in Canada about the urgency of energy matters but their actions have never supported their words. This has always been the case in every other matter relating to energy, whether it be northern regulations, agreements with the provinces, or taxation matters.

When I consider the project I have concern about government involvement, not the lack of it, but the over-abundance. This bill and other information available make it clear that Ottawa will be controlling every minute detail of the project. This has been demanded by the New Democratic Party too.

First of all the size of pipe was chosen by the National Energy Board, and thus the key technical specifications and ultimately the capacity of the line has been determined by the government. All of the rates and tariffs on the system and return on investment will be determined by the government. Property taxes on the line will be set by the government and it appears there will be a strong level of intervention over the control of purchasing policies of the company. The financing of the project and every detail of this important aspect will be controlled by the government. The government will be dictating labour policy, where the employees will be recruited from, how they will be qualified and, I presume, how much they will be paid. All of these things will be taken on by the government.

Who in the experience of Canada during the 1970's would have confidence in a government which is proven to be so inept, so slow to arrive at decisions, and so costly in their operations? Just the same, the route of the pipeline, and presumably every bend and twist, will be dictated by government. I applaud the Foothills Company and its sponsors for the willingness they have shown to accept this difficult and onerous demand upon them.

The thrust of the debate and the criticism of the project by the New Democratic Party have been almost solely concentrated on the question of more government control. In addition, this criticism has been demanding in absolute terms that every single man-hour, every pound of material or supplies, every valve, be spelled out precisely as to where it will come from, and at what cost.

The party to my left has in fact taken a stand against the pipeline. This seems incredible in view of the position taken in the past week by Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan, who is in favour of the project.

Last August all parties in this House supported in principle the proposal of Foothills to build this pipeline to deliver Alaska gas to the United States and perhaps to carry Canadian Arctic gas to markets by way of the Dempster route. The demands being made by the New Democratic Party are unreasonable and impractical. I say this as a businessman who has been involved from time to time in large projects, and I can tell you that it is never possible, especially when pioneering as is the case with Foothills, to be absolutely precise in every detail so far in advance.

The question really at this stage is whether there will be a pipeline or whether there will not be a pipeline. If the demands of the New Democratic Party were to be built into the legislation then it is my view that two problems would occur. The first one would be with the United States. I discussed this entire matter just last evening with a United States Senator. There are some misconceptions in the United States and Washington about this line. There is great concern about the undisclosed conditions imposed by the province of British Columbia.

The matter of gas pricing in the United States itself is perhaps the most important ingredient in enabling Alaska gas to move to the lower 48 states. Suffice it to say, while there was an agreement between Canada and the United States to build this line, we are by no means out of the woods, either in Canada or the United States.

The activities of most businessmen have one important ingredient, perhaps above all others, and in a $10 billion project the importance of bankers and financiers is more significant than in smaller undertakings. It is, however, important in any undertaking. I can say that all investors are fearful of investments which can be severely and adversely affected by bad government decisions, or in fact, no decisions, as well as by government regulation. One important policy which is needed in Canada, particularly as it relates to this project, must be predictable and certain rules where they must exist.

There is an opportunity to restore business and investor confidence, and respect in Canada and in the rest of the world for this Parliament. There is an opportunity to perform a meaningful part of the rescue necessary for Canada's economy. Let us face it, we require a boot strap operation.

This government, which had very little to say or propose at the first ministers' conference, did, however, highly tout energy projects for decades ahead. The problem is that long lead times of five, ten or 15 years are required to put major energy projects into operation. The result is that short term benefits, that is, during the 1970's, will not result from most of the plans that were outlined by the government.

There are one or two important exceptions, however, and at the top of the list is this proposal dealing with a natural gas pipeline from Alaska to the lower 48 states.

If this project is to proceed without government backstopping, attractive and innovative proposals must be offered to investors. I believe that the greatest possible threat to the ultimate construction of the line is the difficulties that will no doubt be experienced when the details of financing are hammered out. This financing is by no means, in my view, a certainty, and thus, we in this parliament must, as far as reasonably possible, give to Foothills and its backers flexibility to work around the horrendous problems that lie ahead of them, not only in the banking but in the logistics, the negotiations with sellers of the gas, buyers of the gas, and with our own government agencies.

A great deal has been said about jobs; there are few in Canada, except perhaps this government, who would not say that this is a top priority. Members of this House, however, must recognize that if the choice is a pipeline or no pipeline, or 5,000 jobs rather than 6,000 jobs, or 90 per cent of the steel versus 100 per cent of the steel, then surely, there is no question that most of the pie for Canadians is better than none of the pie. To a large degree the question is the extent to which we Canadians and parliamentarians are prepared to place our confidence in the Foothills group of companies. If we are not prepared to do this, a decision in favour of those companies and their proposal should have been rejected out of hand last summer. I am a believer, however, that their track record and their stated intentions speak for themselves. It would be impossible to work out this project on the basis that every last detail be spelled out in advance. This is always desirable when relationships are developed between parties, even I suppose now-a-days by way of marriage contracts prior to committing to a spouse. I am convinced, however, that no amount of rules or regulations will be as important as the good will, the integrity, along with the willingness of the parties to co-operate and to compromise.I believe that the Foothills group in this regard has been outstanding. In fact I sometimes have concern that they have gone too far in accepting the demands of government.

On the matter of supply of materials by Canadians, I have some experience as one who has spent more than 25 years in an important segment of the oil and gas industry, not only in Canada but in the United States and in other countries. To begin with, a lot of the work that will be carried out on the pipeline will be carried out by the contractors who are the prime people in such an operation and, of course, many subcontractors.

I might tell the House a little about the pattern of American involvement in our Canadian oil and gas industry in the past. During the early part of the Canadian oil boom, from Leduc and in the years following, a large percentage of the drilling rigs in western Canada were owned by U.S. companies. The drilling superintendents and toolpushers on the rigs were in many cases American. There was a significant ingredient from Texas, California, and Louisiana. By the middle years of the 1950's, however, this changed, and this important part was probably 90 per cent Canadian owned before 1960.

What is perhaps even more important is that these same Canadian companies have carried their expertise as well as Canadian goods, technology, and experience to all corners of the world. A meaningful percentage of the wells drilled in Alaska has been drilled by Canadian companies based right in Calgary. The same is the case in California, Texas, Colorado, and the Rocky Mountain area of the United States. I say most emphatically that in this international industry, if Canadians take a parochial view, they could exclude themselves from a meaningful portion of international oil and gas activities.

When I look at the pipeline contracting group, those who have the expertise, I find names such as Majestic, Bannister, and Price, to name three. These companies have been established in Canada for a number of years and all of them employ Canadians virtually 100 per cent. They are ready, willing, and able to take on the task of laying this big-inch pipeline along the Alaska Highway.

Laying a 56-inch pipe is not going to be an easy task. There will be complications. It is a very large pipe and this size of pipe has never been laid before. It will require considerably larger ditches, different set-ups for welding, and there will be a good deal to be learned about bending and laying as well as new techniques which will have to be developed as we proceed. A supreme effort will be necessary if Canadian contractors are to train personnel. At the present time it is reasonable to predict there will be shortages of well-qualified people, particularly in areas of welding, fitting, and millwright work. Canadians must be trained and the companies should be prepared to fill every job with Canadians. There will, however, be a shortage of good people and an opportunity will thus be provided to every Canadian who really wants to work.

Any delay in the construction of this project would increase the probability of bunching the demands in the labour market. There are a lot of projects ahead and some of them have been mentioned in the past week or so, both by the first ministers and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). They include the construction of another Syncrude plant, a heavy oil plant in northwest Saskatchewan, and many other labour-intensive projects. Thus it is important that construction be kept on time and that no delays take place. Otherwise start-up problems will be plagued by labour shortages. Where possible every preference should be given to the employment of local personnel. I refer to the Yukon, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan through which the pipeline is to run. I suggest that all those in Canada who want the opportunity to work will have the opportunity to do so.

We have heard a good deal about pipe and its supply for the pipeline. A considerable amount of know-how exists relating to pipeline and other oil-related projects, and it is likely that with appropriate lead-time and planning a significant amount of valves, fittings and all other requirements, particularly compressor station needs, can be supplied from Canadian fabricating plants. There is no doubt in my mind that the largest benefit will accrue to plants and manufacturers in central Canada—Ontario and Quebec. But this project, because of its size, will have a tremendous impact, and a favourable one, on virtually every province in our country.

As we look at the projected activity, the central core it is certain will be Edmonton. Since the modern history of the west was written, Edmonton has been the embarkation point for northern Canada. The Alaska Highway was built during World War II and was staged from Edmonton. It was the base for earth-moving companies during early oil industry days when Swan Hills and Alaska Highway oil activities were under way. It has aviation companies, transportation companies and communication companies, as well as a large pool of trained personnel.

Alberta has built up a nucleus of pipeline and oil and gas engineers and technicians and welders since the first big-inch pipelines were laid in the early 1950's. A number of important Canadian pipeline companies were spawned as well during the 1950's; I think of such names as Westcoast Transmission, Interprovincial Pipe Line, TransCanada, the Alberta Gas Trunk Line, Trans Mountain and others. Their expertise and experience cannot be surpassed anywhere in the world. Most of the half dozen major pipeline contractors now based in Alberta have, over many years, qualified themselves as the best, most efficient, and economical builders anywhere in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bawden: In addition, through construction in northern Alberta, in British Columbia and in the Yukon these same companies have a wealth of knowledge about northern operating conditions. They are experienced in operating at extremely low temperatures, handling difficult logistics, and working with local labour in these areas, as well as touching at times permafrost construction conditions.

In Canada we have developed a number of vehicles specifically designed to serve the oil and gas industry. Some of these will be in heavy demand in the construction of the pipeline. I think of vehicles such as the Nodwell, the Skidoos, the snowmobiles coming from the province of Quebec, air-cushion vehicles and four-wheel drive vehicles especially equipped to deal with northern conditions, all of which will be required when the project goes ahead.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has not only the expertise to deal with this project. It has the experience, it has the companies, and it betters the qualifications possessed by other parts of the world including the United States. I therefore have no doubt that the Foothills group, which must seek competitive prices for its goods and services, will find substantial savings by dealing with Canadians virtually all the way. I do not, however, feel that any further demand should be placed upon the Foothills group to utilize any Canadian content greater than has already been spelled out by the government.

I listened carefully to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday when he spoke on the matter of Canadian energy supply. It now appears that the government has finally understood the problem. However, nothing it has done has indicated any capacity to deal with it. Obviously, all the potential energy projects which have been outlined are possible for the future. What is needed, however, is enabling legislation to make it possible for investors to proceed with the projects. Tax incentives with respect to tar sands projects, improved regulations affecting northern lands and so on, would provide the proper climate. All these things have been so slow in coming that our future energy supply has been prejudiced.

One of the facts of life, however, is that in the 1980's the price of crude oil will likely rise to $25 a barrel or more. At the same time the price of natural gas will track very closely. This will take place at a time when supplies of oil and gas from traditional OPEC sources will be tapering off, if they are available at all. The world today has become so dependent upon OPEC oil that massive power over the world economy has been transferred to those states. Canada and the United States, which today are the biggest energy per capita users on earth, sharing some 40 per cent of energy consumption, are in a very vulnerable position.

We in Canada are in precisely the same boat as the U.S. We are facing an increasing dependence in the decade ahead on imported energy from the OPEC countries. Alaska's Prudhoe Bay oil, which has been flowing for the last year, will relieve the problem to some degree. Alaska gas and gas from the Canadian Arctic will slow the trend toward increased dependence on imports. But even if rapid decisions are forthcoming with respect to transportation methods, financing and construction, supply of the resources involved is still many years down the road.

The fact is that by the mid-1980's Canada will be importing approximately half of its crude oil despite all the protestations by the government about energy self-reliance. The United States will be importing approximately half its oil, so our problems are almost identical. The development of the reserves in the Canadian Arctic and the considerable reserves in the North Sea will make an important contribution to the free world.

I point out, however, that if we are to have any leverage whatsoever with OPEC countries and with those who set the price, and if we want to be immune from world blackmail, it is absolutely vital that not only do we find reserves of oil and gas but also that we produce the transportation systems to bring them to market. Our frontier reserves are of absolutely no use to us whatsoever if they are locked under the permafrost and if no transportation system exists.

It has been stated many times before that Canada's present economic crisis, brought on by the Trudeau government opposite, might seem small in comparison if one adds the imports of perhaps 1.2 million barrels of crude oil a day in the 1980's at a price of close $25 a barrel. This would represent a further drain on our own foreign reserves in the order of $30 million per day or close to $10 billion a year.

Notwithstanding the animosity the government has shown to investors in recent years, surely there is a strong case to be made for increasing the return to Canadian or even American risk takers who are prepared to search for oil and gas reserves in our country, versus the alternative of paying exactly the same amounts to those in distant parts of the world where security of supply is so uncertain.

As I look at this proposed pipeline project I hope that in the years ahead we will see shares offered to Canadians. As we sat down with the financial experts who have been considering this it was explained that there is almost no equity market for shares in Canada at the present time, and the reasons are pretty obvious. Through tinkering as well as massive and destructive changes in our tax laws, the government has virtually driven Canadians from the ownership of their own country. There have been some improvements in recent years, but I say they have been far too little and far too late.

In the early 1960's in Australia there was a desire to have Australian participation in their own mining and oil and gas industries. That country made the purchase of shares in resource companies purchased from the treasuries of those companies fuly tax deductible. Literally tens of thousands of ordinary Australians had a stake, and in many cases a meaningful stake, in the resources of their own country. However, it takes bold and imaginative moves, not the picky little things our government comes out with every year or so and, as I say, far too little to get anything moving. It will take bold and courageous moves if problems regarding Canadian investment are to be solved.

On the question of security of supply, which I think is paramount to this whole matter, the Alaska Highway pipeline which will carry natural gas to American markets is almost as important to Canadians as it is to Americans. In the event of a national emergency or of a conventional war—and the Russians are building their conventional weapons at a rapid rate—there would undoubtedly be an urgent demand to devote all energy supplies to our mutual defence effort.

Due to Canada's complacent role in defence matters during the Trudeau years and because of the weapons capabilities of the United States we would have to turn to our neighbours to a large extent for our total defence and weapons needs. This means that we Canadians, in spite of our cold climate, would be faced with turning our thermostats down, perhaps to the freezing level, so that our protector, the United States, could undertake our mutual defence responsibilities. It is very much in our interests, therefore, that the United States properly manage its own energy policies. At times I have been concerned about whether the United States has done that or maximized its energy policies.

This Alaska energy artery is an important and vital contribution to the mutual defence needs of Canada and the United States. In addition, any alternative consideration, such as tankers to carry natural gas down the west coast, as is presently the case with Alaskan oil, in the event of war would be a disaster.

It must be remembered too that while 50 per cent of our oil needs during the 1980's will be met by imports from OPEC countries, this oil will be largely from Iran and the Middle East, thus traversing the sea lanes of southern Africa. This security of supply is related to our ability to keep these routes open as much as it is to the willingness and ability of OPEC nations to continue supplying us with oil. The disastrous policies of the western and oil consuming nations, including Canada, relating to South Africa and Rhodesia add significantly to the uncertainties of our oil supply routes in the future.

As I look at the question of our relationship with the United States, I come back to 1941 when the Portland Pipeline was constructed from an American port to Canada as a war measure to supply Canada's Montreal refineries. This avoided difficulties as a result of the freeze-up of the St. Lawrence and the limited season, and it avoided a great many problems for Canada. This line, which travels about 160 miles through the United States, has carried, as recently as 1965, up to 550,000 barrels of oil a day, and it is presently putting through almost 400,000 barrels a day.

During the war when Canada was faced with oil supply problems the United States undertook to supply our domestic oil needs from its own short supply. There was one simple condition: that Canada ration on the same basis as the United States rationed its citizens.

At the present time a large portion of Canada's oil and gas from western Canada travels through the United States by way of the TransCanada Pipelines for gas and the Interprovincial Pipe Line for oil. There are further elaborate plans under way between our two governments to construct joint oil storage reservoirs on the east coast of Canada. The Alaska Highway pipeline project is just another element in this important master plan, but the point is that when the shoe was on the other foot and we were constructing pipelines to suit our needs and to preserve our security, the United States was there and co-operated willingly.

I would like to comment on the complex regulatory agency which the minister has proposed and he stated will be staffed by 200 people. It is interesting that this figure is precisely the figure given in this House by the then minister of finance at the time the Anti-Inflation Board was established. Within two years the staff of the AIB exceeded 900. The cost estimates of the AIB doubled in the first two years.

I think the government must place itself in the position of not asking what the Foothills group can do for it but what it can do for Foothills. If it does not, Foothills may fail. The pipeline may never be built. This massive and difficult undertaking will require a degree of industry and government co-operation never before seen in our country. In addition, the arranging of financing will be a massive undertaking. It will be difficult to accomplish, and some say even dicey in the outcome.

When I look at the bill before the House I believe that the greatest single potential obstacle to the project's going ahead may well be the unwillingness of bankers to produce a blank cheque to cover the costs of the northern pipeline agency. If the government's freewheeling spending patterns are any indication, this could be one of the largest, most uncertain and unfathomable costs in the total project.

Hon. members and others must ask themselves if they would invest in or lend to a company which hands blank cheques over to this government. I will be proposing an amendment in the committee and a formula to limit the amount of cost which can be charged to Foothills for the activities of the regulatory agency.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) have made much of the Dempster connection. I say that there is an excellent chance that the Dempster lateral will never be built. I agree, however, that at the present time it is a good standby. It is perhaps the only standby alternative we have, but the Dome Petroleum Company, which has followed a courageous exploration course in the Beaufort Sea, appears now to have the reserves which could present a threshold level to construct what was originally proposed as the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Notwithstanding this, however, it is also likely that early deliveries from this area will be by tankers, which require less than the threshold volumes required for a pipeline.

In conclusion, the proposal put forward by the Foothills company is simply for a transportation system. It is the transportation of energy in the form of natural gas, and the customer is the United States. This task is not dissimilar to the provision of transportation by other methods such as rail, ship, or air. In this case it is over a land bridge between states of the United States.

Transportation is big business in Canada, and so is the pipeline business. The latest years for which comparative data are available in this country indicate that pipeline transportation of oil and gas yielded revenues of $1.3 billion. This was 16 per cent of the combined revenue of the transportation of all goods by air, rail, ship and truck transport. Pipelines are nothing new in this country. In fact they have been around for more than 100 years. Today Canada has nearly 100,000 miles of pipeline, compared with some 60,000 miles of railroad track.

The Interprovincial and TransCanada systems are respectively the world's longest oil and gas pipelines. These and other pipelines have provided Canadian engineers with tough challenges and the opportunity to pioneer technology. For instance, the Trans Mountain Pipe Line which carries oil from Edmonton to Vancouver, traversing both the Rocky Mountains and the coast mountain ranges, still today represents a remarkable engineering feat.

I believe that the contribution in dollars and cents to Foothills, a transportation company, for the task of transporting American gas is sizeable and impressive. Commencing with the first full year of the Foothills Alaska system, and excluding Dempster, it is projected that the company will realize a net profit of $170 million after tax. Total cash flow before tax and before depreciation will be in the order of $500 million per year. This is some 10 per cent of our present balance of payments deficit. The Government of Canada will collect in the order of $150 million per year in federal income taxes from the Foothills Company. Thus, over a period of ten years the income collected by the government will approach $2 billion from the company, and the contribution to Canada's balance of payments will be in the order of $50 billion.

When we have an opportunity to pass a bill in parliament to assist an enterprise of such tremendous importance to Canada as this, we had better not pick and debate matters which are insignificant in the total and may well contribute or result in the downfall of the entire project. We have an opportunity to demonstrate to the world that Canada is capable of undertaking the largest pipeline ever undertaken and completed in the world, in terms of dimension as well as total dollars. A positive and helpful approach is required on the part of parliamentarians and the government. A vital step is required by the Trudeau government to indicate to the investment community world-wide that the follies of this government are a thing of the past.

We have the opportunity to establish Canada's credibility as a country in which to invest. We have an opportunity to assist our neighbour and protector, the United States of America. That country is our largest trading partner. We can contribute significantly to our mutual energy and defence security.

Therefore let us move forward and not bicker over the division of the pie as to who receives 5 per cent or even 10 per cent more, one way or the other. Let us ensure that the pie is baked and the project goes ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I enter into this debate for a number of reasons. Before getting into the context of my address, however, I should like to make a few corrections to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) earlier this afternoon. In fact he rather flattered me and the New Democratic Party, as he devoted almost his entire speech to criticizing what some of our members have said. When that happens on the government side of the House, then I know a lot of what has been said by members of the New Democratic Party must be correct, and government members must be somewhat worried.

He mentioned the problem of guarantees, which has arisen in a number of debates. Yesterday the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) indicated that we cannot have built-in guarantees that all material and manpower will be Canadian. My party is not demanding a guarantee that every person working on the job and every piece of material which goes into the project be Canadian. If one looks at the current world situation, it is patently obvious what we are concerned about. Of course one area is jobs. Top priority for jobs has to come from Canada. There must be Canadians working on that pipeline. That is paramount.

The other area is: when we are talking about guarantees we are not talking about unfair competition. We are not saying that Canadian corporations, whether it is Stelco, Ipsco or some other small producer, should be given a carte blanche opportunity to fleece the Canadian government, Foothills, or any other manufacturer or contractor involved in this project. We want to caution Canadians. Other countries such as Japan, Italy and Germany produce steel. In those countries steel corporations are heavily subsidized by their governments. Therefore we may end up in a situation where there is unfair competition and very unfair bidding when it comes to the pipeline and the various material components which go into it. This is what we are concerned about.

We are not asking for a special status for Canadian corporations in order for the price to be bid up in their contracts. We are not asking Canadian workers to demand exorbitant labour wage rates. We are asking for fairness and a close look at how corporations in other countries bid. That is our basic concern. I attempted to make that clear yesterday when I asked the hon. member for Niagara Falls a question at the termination of his speech.

Also we are very concerned about the environmental impact. I will have a great deal to say about that later on. As well we are concerned that some hon. members in both the Conservative and Liberal parties are criticizing and condemning the New Democratic Party for being opposed to the pipeline and, for some reason or other, being anti-American. Both of those criticisms are absolutely wrong. Members of the New Democratic Party are not anti-American. But when Canada enters into a deal with the wealthiest nation in the world, which saves that nation $6 billion, because it is not necessary to liquify gas and take it down the container route to the American west coast, and when it is indicated that the best deal possible has been negotiated, there is a question in my mind as to whether that is so.

After negotiations on September 23, 1977, Mr. Schlesinger, who is in charge of United States energy, indicated that the agreement is particularly advantageous to the United States by providing a ceiling on every aspect of potential United States liability, while creating new incentives for efficient construction on a portion of the project which would normally be subject to exclusive Canadian jurisdiction. That type of statement makes me somewhat suspicious that perhaps we did not get the right deal. Be that as it may, we are not opposed to the co-operation the government has entered into with the United States. We are concerned about the nuts and bolts, literally and figuratively speaking, of the entire operation. After all, this is the greatest financial undertaking of a project in the history of our country.

Whether or not the Liberals or the Conservatives have read their history, we know what happened when the other great project was being undertaken in this country back in the latter part of the nineteenth century, and what a hosing the Canadian public took at the hands of the CPR. What we are saying today is that we do not want the next generation or the generation after that to look back and say, "The men and women sitting in the House of Commons in the year 1978 sold us down the river". We want to prevent that kind of thing from happening. We want a fair and equitable deal with Foothills and with the investors, and we want fair and equitable wages to be paid. We want the pipeline to be built, but we want to make sure that at least that portion that runs through Canada has top Canadian content and will benefit Canadians.

There is one thing we must keep in mind. I think many Canadians at present are under the illusion that this is a totally Canadian operation, that we will bring Canadian gas from the northwest to Canadian consumers. I am amazed at some of the phone calls I receive. Let us put it on the record that, initially and perhaps for the next 20 years, this project will be basically an American project, not Canadian. The project is to bring American natural gas through part of Canada to the United States. We are providing a service. We should have bargained in a much harder way with Mr. Schlesinger and with the U.S. government.

It is interesting to note that in the past three or four years the cost of natural gas to the consumer, to the home owner, and to the person who rents an apartment, has skyrocketed, and yet we have an over supply of natural gas in this country. The most reliable estimates say that we have enough natural gas to last us into the 1990's. What we are doing right now is providing a land corridor for U.S. natural gas to come through Canada to the U.S. I want to make that point very clear. If and when we need Canadian gas we will have to look again at the Dempster spur to find out whether or not we will build a pipeline at that time and to make sure that we can supply our own consumers with our own gas.

A few moments ago I mentioned the environmental aspects of the operation, of this giant project. Environment means two things: it means the physical or natural environment, and it also means the human environment.

I can recall growing up in northern Ontario. We lived in Sault Ste. Marie at the time of the great uranium boom at Blind River and Elliot Lake, Lake Lauzon, in that area, and I can recall the terrible social and economic upheaval at the time of the boom when hustlers and hucksters operated and the cost of a hot-dog shot up from 10 cents to 25 cents. Prostitutes walked the streets, taxi drivers doubled their fares, and houses of ill repute popped up all over the place at Blind River and Elliot Lake. The crime rate soared and the murder rate soared. The police force consisted of only two policemen in those days.

I remember my father talking to the chief of police who said he was literally afraid to go out in his patrol car on a Friday or Saturday night. At that time the cost of food and rents soared. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) will remember that when the pipeline was built in Alaska, the net or real income of people who lived in that corridor dropped because prices became inflated as a result of unscrupulous individuals who moved into the area to exploit the people who lived there.

The other aspect which is very important is native land claims. This is a very important subject which has been postponed for so long that it has almost become part of our history, and a very tragic part at that. I suggest to the minister that we should not proceed with the pipeline until we get at least a memorandum of understanding from the native community. I am not suggesting that within the next few months we can settle all the land claims, but I think that there should be some agreement made before the first bulldozer goes in, although I understand that many of them have already gone into the area. I believe that native land claims are paramount at this time.

We all know what our forefathers did to the natives in that part of Canada. They stole their land, they squatted on it, they assumed title to it, and before they knew it it was theirs. This is why the native people of the Northwest Territories today will not tolerate that kind of intrusion and will not tolerate the shacktowns that develop during the building of a pipeline so that in 10 or 15 years' time they will end up with virtually no land at all. We have to keep that in mind.

Another thing we must ensure is a strong local labour content in the building of this pipeline. I am not suggesting for a moment that it is possible to supply all the experts from the Yukon or from the Northwest Territories, from northern British Columbia or indeed northern Alberta. What I am suggesting is that on-the-job training programs should be started, not six months from now or a year from now but right now. Those should be on-the-job training programs both in theory and in practice so that the native people there will have a fair chance in competing for the jobs that will be available in the construction of this tremendous project. Unless we do that we will create the same bitterness, the same hatred, and the same misunderstanding that were created in the process of many other projects in the history of our country, such as the CPR, the Elliot Lake development, and so on.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker? I will continue after the supper adjournment.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABDUCTION OF CHILDREN

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was all party agreement that a certain subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs during the second session of the Thirtieth Parliament. The subject was child abduction. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the subject matter of Bill C-221 from the second session of the 30th Parliament, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (Abduction of child), standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), and referred during the second session to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be again referred to the standing committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. I would have to seek the unanimous consent of the House because it is difficult to propose a motion on a point of order. Perhaps we could have unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to second the motion on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen). I know he will be very pleased when he returns to the chamber later this evening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I might add that the parliamentary secretary has a letter from me saying I agree to this, and I do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Robinson) agreed to and subject matter of the bill be referred to Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABATEMENT OF NOISE IN HUMP YARDS

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East) moved that Bill C-224, to amend the Railway Act (noise abatement), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise an acute environmental problem this afternoon, and that is noise occurring in rather special locations, certain large railway yards concentrated in eight metropolitan centres in Canada. These are known as hump yards. There is one in Edmonton, two in Toronto, and others throughout the country.

The problem is causing polarization in a number of communities, including my constituency of Scarborough East, between the community and the railways. Only in Edmonton are efforts being made to correct it. The CPR in Toronto is doing nothing. The alderman in my constituency receives complaints continuously from residents with respect to the noise. It is a problem that has to be addressed by the federal government since under our constitution railways are a federal responsibility.

Some people may wonder why I raise the question in the form of proposed legislation and not through some attempt at co-operative action. The reason is that there is no federal jurisdiction available over noise. The jurisdiction lies with the province. If the province wishes to do something about noise in the hump yards it is inhibited by the fact that it is the federal government's responsibility, and if the federal government wishes to do something about noise it is stalemated because it has no legal authority.

In face of the failure of the railways to make any attempt to tackle this noise problem I have turned to the only course left, a private member's bill. I hope hon. members will listen to my reasoning and send this bill to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

We should get it clear in our minds what a hump yard is and what the particular noise problem is. A hump yard is a major classification yard where new trains are made up. Existing trains are broken apart and cars are put together in a new fashion.

The particular characteristic of a hump yard is that a man-made hill is built in these yards, perhaps the height of a three-storey building. Two locomotives push cars up this hill two or three at a time. There is a certain noise involved with the whining of the locomotives but that is not the real problem. Those cars roll down the other side of the hill by gravity at quite some speed on their way to any one of literally dozens of tracks where they bump into trains being made up, at speeds up to four miles an hour, forming new trains.

As the cars roll down the hill by gravity, large steels beams about the length of this chamber—in the Scarborough yards they measure 106 feet—rise up on both sides of the tracks and, operated by computer, squeeze in and out against the wheels as they run down the hill. They grip the wheels tightly but the wheels keep turning. They grip, release, grip, release, while the computer retards the speed so that the car will go to the end of the track to its final destination and bump into the train being made up, at exactly the right speed.

It is not difficult to imagine the noise called "wheel screech" as these steel beams rise up and grip the steel wheels of the cars. It is steel on steel. There is a vibration sound, a high pitched screech, which reaches the threshold of pain in terms of decibels. Fortunately, it diminishes over a distance.

There are practical means of reducing this wheel screech. My point is that the CPR in Scarborough does not use the available practical technologies for reducing the noise. It is true that scientists have not yet told us exactly what produces the noise. We do not know if it is the retarder, if it is in the wheels, or if it is the vibration between the two. For our purposes it is not necessary to have the practical explanation of the noise. It is sufficient for our purposes to know that the noise level is intolerable and that it can be reduced by available technology which is not being used.

If the railways, which have the primary responsibility, do not undertake to utilize the available technology on the grounds that they were there first and the homes have been built since, or on the grounds that their major responsibility under the Railway Act is to provide transportation, or that reduction of noise does not eliminate it, then they are not co-operating.

The practice followed by our own federal Ministry of Transport of seeking a co-operative approach between the municipalities, the railways and the departments of environment in the provinces, will not work. It will not have credibility unless there are legal sanctions which can be used.

My bill is a practical means of giving legal power to the Canadian transportation commission—the regulatory agency—to back up the federal government which has no authority over noise at the present time. That is the purpose of the bill.

Let me explain the major provisions of this bill. They are not very difficult. This bill would be an amendment to Section 215 of the Railway Act. It would be known as "Abatement of noise in hump yards". It is focused, not on railway noise in general, but on those eight hump yards in Canada. It would give the Canadian Transport Commission the power, after looking at each situation, to direct the railway company to construct and maintain works for the abatement of noise emanating from hump yard operations which, in the opinion of the commission, caused a severe noise problem adversely affecting the community.

Secondly, the noise must be capable of significant reduction by the use of available technology. Measurements are not mentioned. It says, "Is there a noise problem?" If there is a problem, is available technology not being used? And if there is, the commission could order it to be installed. The bill would provide in the language that is appropriate to a private member's bill since we cannot call for expenditures of funds, that the transportation commission could, if it felt advisable, request the Ministry of Transport to contribute up to 30 per cent of the cost of the noise abatement works in the hump yard.

It also provides that if a municipality is an applicant for noise abatement, before proceeding the municipality would be required to agree that it would participate up to a maximum of 10 per cent of the cost of noise control. There is no authority for the federal agency to direct a municipality to spend money. All it says is if a municipality requests noise abatement works it ought to be prepared to participate in a small way because it controls the zoning which brings residences into the area.

Finally, the bill will provide that research into acoustic problems could be ordered with the federal government sharing, upon the request of the CTC, up to 50 per cent of the cost of new research into noise abatement. That is what it says. It is authority to the regulatory agency which at present has no authority over noise. We know for example that the regulatory agency can order the railways to spray weeds on the railway tracks and to remove weeds, to build fences and other things. It cannot say anything about noise. We are left helpless by the negative attitude shown on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian National Railways has co-operated.

What technologies are available? For example, sound baffles could be built along the length, 100 or so feet, of the steel beams that rise up on both sides of the tracks, to soften the noise. Tests prove these baffles will reduce the noise by some 25 decibels, which is around 40 per cent of the total noise at the point of the noise emission. That is a significant reduction. Should the railway employ that technology if the community is affected adversely? I think it should. If it does not and we say "Let's co-operate" and it fails to co-operate, where is the lever? We do not have one. My bill simply says put in a lever which will give credibility to our responsibility in railway functions to handle this question.

There are other technologies available, some of them good and some of them not so good. For example, an oil and water emulsion has been sprayed on the wheels to help deaden the noise, which has had some effect. There are other methods described in technical bulletins which are now available. The Burlington Northern Railway and the Westinghouse Brake Shoe company have done significant research in noise reduction in these special circumstances.

We know that railway classification yards, even though they have moved outside of the major urban centres, are now inside as urban growth takes place. Fifteen years ago in my constituency when zoning made possible this railway hump yard, noise was not the serious community concern that it is today. We must face it in today's terms. When zoning was put in for the railway hump yards there was also zoning for residential uses, homes that were not yet built. Houses are now there and the noise problem is with us. I am seeking a way of coping with it. Is the province doing anything about it?

The Ontario provincial ministry of transport and the CPR convened a seminar one year ago on the subject of railway noise. They concluded that it was a matter for a federal authority. We have no authority because of the gap in our legal capacity.

The province of Ontario is currently issuing new regulations covering new homes in the Malvern area and around the hump yard in Scarborough East. These new regulations deal with sound baffles in new communities, in the siting of homes, in earth berms to break the noise and in heavier insulation in the homes. It has been estimated by some that the cost to homeowners and developers will be between $2,000 to $3,000 per home to meet the noise problems of highways and railway yards.

Can we leave the railways without responsibility to act when the province is acting, when the municipality has zoned the area residential at the same time that it is zoned industrial for the yards, and when this new problem of noise emerged?

In conclusion, this bill is an effort to provide the federal authority through its regulatory agency with the legal power to research a noise situation only in the hump yards. I am not taking a broad approach. It may then order remedial works to reduce noise if there is technology available and it is not being used. It may request the government to share in the cost and it may, if a municipality has applied, ask that municipality to share in the cost in a minor way. It may sponsor and pay some costs of research into noise reduction. I hope it will commend itself to my colleagues in the House and that they will agree to send it to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications where the federal Departments of Transport, Northern Affairs, Environment, the provincial departments and railways can be called to explain their role in the present situation.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) for bringing forth Bill C-224. We have had the same problem in the Edmonton-Calder area for many years. In 1969 and 1970 the same issue came up in the Edmonton-Calder area. There was the squealing of steel on steel in the hump yard which could be heard within a radius of approximately 30 miles. The unfortunate part of the problem was that most of the boxcars came in at one, two and three o'clock in the morning when people were sleeping. It was difficult to get the culprit, CNR, to do something about it. We did manage to get them to build barriers around the trackage for something in the neighbourhood of three miles. This is the buffer for the area.

Every two or three years, I receive letters from my constituents telling me it is time I started getting after the CNR again because they are not doing their job properly. There is a continuous program of the CNR together with the Department of the Environment, both in the federal and provincial field, which checks the decibel rate as far as this particular hump yard is concerned. I think the only solution is the one the hon. member mentioned. I will not go into it because he has described the whole process.

At one time this was on the outskirts of the city. It is now in the middle of an urban area. This is as a result of urban sprawl. These hump yards should be taken out of city areas, or at least the humping should be done during designated hours such as in the afternoon or right after the dinner hour.

I will not take any more time of the House. I know that all members will give their consent and this will be put through as quickly as possible and sent to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. We look forward to speedy passage of the bill. I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) will go along with this because he is in a very reasonable mood this afternoon. I sincerely hope this very important bill will be given speedy passage today.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the introduction of this bill by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell). I must say I welcome even more the statement of support just given by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). I am happy to make it unanimous, so the bill ought to go through.

Like the hon. member for Edmonton Centre, I am concerned about this problem. There is a CPR hump yard between my constituency and that of my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). We know what this squeal is. I am glad that the hon. member for Scarborough East has squealed about it in the House. I hope this bill can get through this afternoon.

I see the hon. member looking at me rather quizzically. Usually, when he brings in a bill on a Thursday afternoon, he has trouble, but this is Tuesday. He is wondering what has happened to the New Democratic Party that we are not treating this bill the way we treat Bill C-1001. This is a good bill. We support it.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join hon. members who have spoken before me in congratulating the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) for introducing this bill. In my riding of Richmond, shunters in a marshalling yard have no consideration for people living in the vicinity and at three or four o'clock in the morning they do as much as they can to wake them up. I suggest a bill such as this will help railway workers and officials think a little more of the public and respect the people living in the vicinity. Once again I want to congratulate the hon. member and I hope the House will adopt his bill as this afternoon.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, if the question can be put one minute before six o'clock, there is a good chance this bill can be passed.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to speak and I am pleased to take this opportunity to make a few comments on second reading of Bill C-224, which contains amendments to the Railway Act and aims at reducing noise. I am happy to support the bill and I would like to offer my sincere congratulations to its author, the distinguished hon. member for Scarborough East.

I am well aware of the reasons which brought the hon. member to move this bill. I must admit frankly in the House that I have not discussed this bill with the hon. member for Scarborough East, but I will show in my comments that we are of the same mind and that the hon. member was motivated basically by the same reasons that would have moved me to introduce a bill somewhat similar to this one. When you have grown up near a railway, when your father was a railroad worker and when you yourself have worked for a railway during your summer vacation, it is easy to understand the importance and the complexity of the problem that the hon. member for Scarborough East would like to rectify today.

Of course, we could talk for several weeks about noise in general and for several days about noise caused by various railway activities. If we talk too long about this and do not choose to act as soon as possible and do what is required to correct the various sources of noise pollution, we would greatly compromise our credibility as parliamentarians. Some jokers would even accuse us of adding to noise pollution.

I understand very well that the hon. member for Scarborough East wished to concentrate his efforts on only one aspects of this source of pollution even though he could have mentioned many others.

This immediately brings to mind the CPR's engine whistles and the CNR's locomotives. In my home town, Grand Falls in New Brunswick, they wake up the people twice a night between twelve and 6 a.m., practically seven days a week. There are three level crossings in less than a mile, so we may easily understand the anger of citizens waking out of peaceful sleep, babies crying, children in tears in this small town with a 6,000 population.

Mr. Speaker, in this day and age I understand the concern of the bill's sponsor for public protection against the noise from railway hump yards or the unending movement of cars going through automatic retarders. The hon. member brought this particular problem to our attention because he figured this problem could be solved more easily through a bill. He explained a moment ago why we should amend the Railway Act. As many other hon. members, he has gone through the frustrating experience of trying to put the problem before MOT officials, railway companies and the CTC. He has been confronted with repeated refusals from all quarters, because nobody wanted to take final responsibility for instituting remedies or taking the decision of solving the problem once and for all, and as fast as possible. This is why he had to put this legislation before Parliament. This is why I am in full sympathy with him.

I went through that kind of frustration, Mr. Speaker, when I endeavoured unsuccessfully to put an end to the nightmare of night-time engine whistles in Grand Falls. I could refer to countless letters showing that the legions of Julius Caesar would be needed to overcome the barrage and often fictitious impediments put up by the federal bureaucracy. I understand the hon. member for Scarborough East, after being confronted with that kind of refusals, having used all possible approaches, had to prepare this legislation as a last resort to solve the problem and that of the constituents he is so aptly representing here.

I wonder however if the hon. member would widen the scope of his bill to include all sources of noise pollution from railway operations, which are a real nuisance to the public and this is putting it reasonably.

And to think that the locomotive was invented in 1803, that the noise has not really diminished since then, and that we have not found a way to lessen the noise created by automatic retarders, or to silence those blasted night train whistles, taking into account for security reasons at level crossings: one cannot talk obviously of astounding technological advances, and that is certainly not to the honour of our railway companies or the Canadian Transport Commission which completely wash their hands of this situation.

The hon. member for Scarborough East and myself should perhaps invite the members of the Canadian Transport Commission and the boards of the railway companies to sleep every night for a week near either hump yards or in my native town of Grand Falls which is crossed by two railroads. Perhaps that would shake them out of their bureaucratic lethargy, and prompt them to set up a task force which would examine seriously these and other sources of noise caused by the railways and which, one must emphasize, considerably lower the quality of life of many Canadians, and many Canadian communities. I know of some commissioners who would simply say: But you don't have to live near a railroad, ladies and gentlemen. They are probably the ones who live comfortably in the high-class sections of Ottawa West, Alta Vista or Rockliffe.

The time has come to have the Canadian Transport Commission and railway companies carry out fully their duties and obligations toward the Canadian community.

For too long members of this House had to be satisfied with answers like: It is a known fact that the use of locomotive whistles in certain areas like Grand Falls poses a few problems for the people in the area. This is the kind of dumb answer we get from the Canadian Transport Commission. So there is a whole lot of small but very annoying problems to be solved and it is time that someone dealt with them seriously. The Canadian Transport Commission must stop shunning its responsibilities and stop using arguments like: We are not empowered to change the requirements. Any amendment to those requirements must be made through an act of Parliament.

Is the commission really responsible for those many problems and complaints it receives regularly relating to noise pollution, did it point those problems out to the government, did it discuss them with the Minister of the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang)? Not that I know. If it did, how is it that in 1978, 171 years after the locomotive was invented, we have to put up with the noise made by whistles or automatic retarders in railway hump yards, in the middle of the night to bother everybody? Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a minute or two to deal with sub-clause (2) of clause 215.1 of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Scarborough East on municipal financial commitments as contributions to the solution of problems relating to the noise generated by railways.

A large and wealthy area like Toronto or Scarborough can afford to pay for part, even a very tiny part, of the cost but several small municipalities across Canada which are too poor and without good taxation resources do not have the budgets to pay for any part of the cost of installation of such equipment, no matter how small it is. Yet the formula presently contained in the Railway Act is applied evenly all across Canada, irrespective of the capacity of the municipalities to pay. Poor municipalities, we are sorry to say, are still going to have to put up with the noise of screechy locomotives for many years to come.

Even if this bill is not referred to a committee of the House for further consideration this afternoon—and I sincerely hope it will be—I think we will have accomplished something useful: we will have identified a serious problem and asked the federal government, its departments, its agencies, its commissions, provincial authorities and municipal governments to use the enormous research resources we have in this country for the solution of the problems we raised this afternoon.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to intervene very briefly in support of this private member's bill put forward by my hon. friend and neighbour from Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell). As stated, the purpose of the bill is to provide for the protection of the public from the noise and inconvenience caused by railway hump yards. I want to make it clear that I am in favour of the bill and that I congratulate my hon. friend for having sponsored it.

I am familiar, in some measure, with the problem which confronts him. I recall the situation which arose in connection with my own private bill last session; the hon. member is attacking a different aspect of the same class of problem. The dilemma is this: The use of railway facilities in increasing and at the same time communities across the country are continuing to grow. The two trends are not being co-ordinated. In my own case, in Scarborough West, the railway was planning to expand its marshalling yards, a process bound to result in increased noise, greater danger to traffic, higher pollution levels and so on. Yet no notice of this intention was given to the area in advance, just as I am sure no warning was given to people in the neighbourhood of hump yards that construction was due to take place. At least there is a law on this. The Railway Act was amended so that people are now informed of what is about to take place. They have an opportunity to let their objections and concerns be known.

There is a need, however, for much more co-operation between the railways and communities of this country. The present level of co-operation is not satisfactory, as the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) and other speakers have said. The railways should not take the position "we were here first", or that their lines were in place before certain communities ever came near them. The railways are performing a public service, and because of that they must interact with the public in the way any major public service should interact.

I support the bill. The residents of Scarborough East and all Canadians deserve every consideration possible, and I commend my colleague from neighbouring Scarborough East for having sponsored this bill.

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have the unfortunate duty of now speaking until the end of the period. In ordinary language, the tactic of speaking to a private bill until six o'clock is known as killing the bill. The expression is not very pleasant, but I think that for reasons I shall have the opportunity of mentioning later on in my speech, because of the difficulties the application of such a bill would entail, unfortunately I feel that it would not be easy to implement the bill proposed here by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell). However I do think that this debate on the important matter of noise pollution in marshalling yards is very important, and that it should be held because, as the hon. member pointed out, some big companies at times turn a deaf ear to the problems of the citizens in a given area, and in this case, the citizens who live close by the shunting yards of railway companies.

The problem resulting from the noise caused by the various means of transport in residential areas is inevitably worsening with the simultaneous growth of transport and urban areas, two phenomena whose coexistence is marked by numerous problems. The considerable efforts made to reduce the noise of airplanes certainly do not have their counterpart in the field of railways, and as the hon. member for Scarborough East pointed out technology is not quite as advanced in that field as it is in that of aeronautics.

However this problem is serious, particularly in some areas like Edmonton as the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) said, or in any other area where you have those hump yards. And the circumstances justify a debate on this matter today, Mr. Speaker, so that those corporations become more responsible and ready to co-operate more than they do now.

As the hon. member said in his remarks, there have been some initiatives or technical adjustments on the part of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific to reduce noise in co-operation with the Ontario Department of Environment which has sponsored a conference to study the best means to reduce noise in hump yards but there is no satisfactory solution yet.

However, the seminar held last year has been the occasion of a positive exchange of views that has helped clarify the issue. Mr. Speaker, I think that this seminar is a good example of co-operation between railway company representatives and provincial, municipal and regional officials who met to find a practical answer to a mostly technical problem.

I am also pleased to mention that the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) has taken himself a very active part in this research. The hon. member also had many discussions with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on that important issue and through such forum and dialogues between all interested parties and at every level we should find technical solutions to deal with that problem in spite of its complexity. However, we cannot find a remedy without a better understanding of those real and increasing problems. First we should establish their origin and who is responsible for them, whether the railways, urban centres or urban planning. And I think that by continuing our research in that direction we will eventually end up by finding out the best means to solve these problems. These difficulties arise, Mr. Speaker, in the shunting yards, particularly those related to the industrial use of lands and residential areas when shunting yards and residential areas grow simultaneously and close to one another.

Such situations can happen because urban planning is the prime responsibility of the provinces and the municipalities while railway companies fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government and are not therefore subject to provincial laws. So sometimes—and unfortunately all too often—we witness a lack of coordination when it comes to getting an integrated urban planning system. Consequently, as the hon. member pointed out, conflicts may arise and actually do. Given the fact that planning affecting land is primarily the responsibility of the provinces, they should be in a position to see to it that no parallel development of land takes place when they are incompatible. However, as I mentioned previously, the two national railway companies are not subject to provincial laws. The federal government is then indirectly involved in issues relating to the use of urban land, if we may say so. This is why when he studies a request by Canadian National to obtain permission to build new facilities the Minister of Transport requires that the company back its request by letters from the municipality or municipalities involved as well as letters of authorization from Environment Canada before moving any further toward granting the request. Because of the nature of their services, railway companies would rather build their shunting yards in industrial areas which are closer to the users of the means of transportation.

However this is not always possible, even in the case of shunting yards which originally were not located in residential areas. Problems have sprung up with the extension of the residential zones as well as with the extension or changes that railway activities have themselves undergone, beyond all expectation. In the present circumstances, we can classify the noise problems deriving from shunting operations into two groups: those that already exist and those that can be avoided if necessary action is taken.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation which is submitted today to the House suggests a legislative solution to the existing problems. The hon. member moved to amend the Railway Act in a way which would give the Canadian Transport Commission authority to direct the railway companies to take measures for noise abatement. The bill also provides for a cost sharing agreement among railway companies, the federal government and the municipalities but there is no mention of provincial financing.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier such federal legislative action would give rise to some difficulties. First, although several groups have suggested various steps to reduce noise in shunting yards and even if there was a symposium on the problem, as mentioned a while ago, current technology is not sufficiently advanced to warrant compulsory enforcement. It would be difficult to compel railway companies to apply those procedures without the necessary technology to do so effectively. If we compel railway companies to use the most recent technical methods, however inadequate they may be, nobody will be satisfied because the problem will not be entirely solved in spite of huge expenses. In short, Mr. Speaker, I think our intervention would be premature and would not allow us to achieve the objective we have set for ourselves.

The responsibility for the real origin of the problem and consequently the measures to be taken to correct it are controversial or at least very complex issues. Railroad companies are the source of the noise but they are not solely responsible for the various decisions which have been made and have led to conflicts between them and municipalities with regard to that ecological factor. So it seems to me that those companies should not be forced to defray the noise abatement costs. Municipalities or provinces, or both, should also accept responsibility for the problems stemming from the coexistence of marshalling yards and residential areas since they allowed that promiscuity. Although this matter does not really fall within its jurisdiction, the federal government should become involved in it to the extent that it encourages the railway companies to discuss their plans with municipalities.

This incentive has now become an obligation through a legislation introduced by our colleague from Scarborough East. From now on railway companies must advise the public of the proposed extension or changes to their facilities. People who live near these facilities now have the opportunity to express their views on these projects. Therefore the noise problem of hump yards in residential areas will be reduced because the railway companies will have to discuss their projects as well as their possible effects with municipal authorities.

CP Rail went deliberately further in the pursuit of this spirit of co-operation by sponsoring the conference which was held in May 1977 and by spending, without being forced to do so by any legislation, $1 million to replace the equipment of Agincourt hump yard in order to reduce the noise caused by wheels. Mr. Speaker, I think we should express the hope that the spirit of co-operation which was shown at Agincourt by CP Rail will be pursued and accelerated, as requested by the hon. member. Railway companies have often shown their willingness to take appropriate steps to reduce the noise nuisance from which the people who live along the facilities suffer, provided municipal authorities are prepared to co-operate, to share the cost and to admit that the noise problems are not always due to railways.

Many factors are involved in the impact of a noise level on a community. The importance of each factor varies in each case and all the effects are not known yet. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, unanimity has not been reached as to what noise levels are acceptable in one residential area or another. It is less than likely that a legislation or a standard might be equally applied in all cases. For example, it would be extremely difficult to draft a general list of standards which would apply in any situation. The other solution proposed would be to give wide ranging authority to some regulating body as the Canadian Transport Commission.

However, this body would not have the necessary authority to control all parties involved. For example, the commission could give orders only to federal bodies but not to the provinces or their bodies responsible for planning and problems related to land use. Considering these technical and jurisdictional uncertainties, it would be difficult to achieve this objective through legislation. The Canadian Transport Commission does not have the necessary authority to order provinces or municipalities to spend money, although, I believe, these are partly responsible in land use conflicts.

For the Canadian Transport Commission to consider the participation of a municipality, it would have to conclude beforehand an agreement with the railway company and the municipality concerning the cost sharing procedures. According to the bill, the commission can order a municipality to spend money only if it is one of the parties having filed a request. The other solution would be the establishment of a cost sharing fund similar to the fund for relocating railroad tracks or railway crossings; this solution is proposed in the bill.

This solution would entail the establishment of evaluation, budgeting and project control procedures and coordination with the provinces and other interested parties. But in the past the provinces have not approved cost sharing programs such as the fund for relocating railroad tracks and railroad crossings because it forces them to spend money in areas which are not in their priorities. Taking into account the dissatisfaction of the provinces towards the present sharing cost fund, it is not likely that such a procedure might be used. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that a federal legislation is not the ideal solution to the problem raised by the hon. member today. We should rather endeavour to do research on the control and reduction of noise levels and to obtain better co-operation from the parties concerned. Of course, the federal government has a role to play in this area.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I realize the hon. member will have a difficult time attempting to talk this bill out, in that he has only two minutes left. He is trying to indicate the he would like to do something for us, but because the minister disallows his doing so, he will not pass this bill or put it into committee for further study. We will pursue this further. We will go after the minister to make sure he gets a hump yard in Saskatoon-Humboldt so that he can see how the people of that area like it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: I do not think that you have been very generous to give my hon. friend leave to rise on a point of order on this subject. I do not think it was a point of order, however I was pleased to hear his remarks. I must say, Mr. Speaker, and I explained this at the beginning of my speech, that I intended to speak till six o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are not talking it out. You are reading it out.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Perhaps we could do without the remarks of our friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) at this time, as we are getting closer to six o'clock. I would like to tell the hon. member from Edmonton Centre that when a bill such as this one is put forward we should seek of course whether it can be implemented within the administration.

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the course of his remarks, the hon. parliamentary secretary mentioned, as an illustration of the co-operative attitude of the CPR, that it was spending $1 million in those hump yards to restore the tracks. I realize he does not want to leave the impression that they were spending that money on noise reduction. It is simply a standard replacement of worn out tracks. It has nothing to do with the question in hand with respect to preventing noise. They should not be given credit for rehabilitating the yards in any sense. We would object to that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The time allotted to the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying earlier in my address to the House this afternoon—and I want to re-emphasize this at this time—contrary to what some members on the government side may think, the NDP is not opposed to the pipeline. We are not opposed to most of the agreements that have been entered into. But we are deeply concerned about Canadian content, the not unreasonable guarantees that Canadian workers get the biggest share of the work market, and because it is a Canadian enterprise that Canadian corporations get a fair chance at bidding on contracts. As I said earlier, we do not want to see the Canadian taxpayers fleeced through some kind of phony guarantee situation whereby Canadian corporations, large or small, can inflate their prices and overbid on contracts.

Let me reiterate for a moment what I said before the supper break. We have a strong suspicion—in fact, it is more than a suspicion; we know—that steel corporations and other manufacturing firms related to this kind of huge project are heavily subsidized in countries such as Japan, West Germany and Italy. We want to make sure that our own companies and corporations, and flowing from them the workers of Canada, have an opportunity for fair bidding. There should be some kind of control mechanism built into this legislation to make very sure—I do not know exactly how this could be done internationally, but at least it is something for the government to consider—that we as a government know whether or not a corporation in Japan, Italy, West Germany, England or any other country, is giving us an honest bid; and by that I mean wage rates, interest rates and productivity rates that are relative to Canada. Unless our government knows exactly how the competitors have arrived at their figures, Canadian corporations and hence their employees will be in jeopardy.

There is one point I wanted to raise before the supper adjournment regarding a few comments that were made by some of my friends in the Conservative party about letting the free enterprise system operate in this project, letting the independent corporations compete and letting the chips fall where they will, in the hope that Canadian corporations will get a great deal of the work and the contracts. However, I did not hear any member of the Conservative party—I may be wrong—mention the fact that when Canadian corporations, great or small, find themselves in financial difficulties, it may not be their own fault. In fact, in many cases in the last two or three years it has been the fault of the government.

When they find themselves in financial difficulty, Mr. Speaker, where do they go? They may go to their bank or they may go to their shareholders and stockholders; but ultimately if they are in trouble they come to the government, whether it is the federal, provincial or municipal government. They come to the public purse and say: "Unless we can get some financial assistance from the various federal or provincial programs, we will go broke, we will go into receivership".

I am not personally opposed to this. If a company is potentially economically viable but is running into hard times within a few months or perhaps a year and a half, in such cases I think it is the duty of the country to assist that corporation. But what I dislike about what I have heard from some members of the House in both the Conservative and the Liberal parties is that one would think that the only people who come running to a government agency, whether it is for welfare, unemployment insurance or the Industrial Development Bank, are the down and outs, people who have been laid off or who are on welfare. I want to state now for the record that personally I am not opposed to government hand-outs to business which will assist the business to remain viable; but I am opposed to hearing only one side of the story, which is what happens very often in the House.

A few years ago this party coined the phrase "corporate welfare bum", and I know it hurt a lot of people. I do not want to refer to the corporate sector or to any individual as a corporate individual bum. I just want to point out that when corporations or individuals find themselves in trouble these days, they go to government. As members of parliament we know that, because they come to us for assistance.

Earlier this afternoon I spoke of the social problems that will affect people living in the Yukon. I do not profess to be a specialist in the social environment of the Yukon but I have read something about it and I have been there. When I was in my teens I saw what happened at Elliot Lake, Blind River, Spragge and Cutler and other places in northern Ontario during the uranium boom. I also saw what happened after the boom when the economy dropped to nothing. During the boom hucksters and hustlers came in, made a fast buck and the cost of living went up. That is one thing that I hope will not happen to native born Yukoners and people from southern Canada who have made their homes there.

This bill should provide for some kind of agency not only to monitor the cost of the pipeline but to monitor the cost of living and social effects of the pipeline on the Yukon. I sincerely hope we will also go a lot further in settling land claims before the pipeline gets under way.

We have heard a great deal about the financing of the pipeline. Members on both sides of the House agree that this is an important matter and that we should get on with it. But I emphasize that we must be cautious. We must not march into what could be a huge, horrendous undertaking without certain guarantees for the Canadian people. I am not talking now in terms of narrow nationalism. I suppose the fashionable word today is nationhood, or love of nationhood, as propounded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Love of nationhood refers not only to Quebec but to Ontario, the maritimes and certainly the Yukon. We must make sure that the people of the Yukon understand they are an integral part of this country and that people from southern Canada are not going north to exploit them, to rip the shirts off their backs, whether they be native born Inuit or others living there.

We must make it plain that we are there for two reasons: first, to develop a gas pipeline to deliver United States gas to that country through Canada. The second reason is that eventually, perhaps 10 or 20 years hence, the pipeline might benefit Canada even though we have an abundance of natural gas at the present time. In my riding consumers complain that their natural gas costs have been mounting in the last two or three years. I do not think that even the economists can understand that unless it is because of the cost of delivery via the TransCanada pipeline.

When we talk of a pipeline, Mr. Speaker, we talk of development, development which will affect most Canadians. I hope it will provide needed jobs and an opportunity for investment in our country for those people who have the money. Unfortunately, the vast majority of Canadians do not have the money to invest. For that I blame this government which has been in power since 1963. That is the main reason that the majority of Canadians do not have money to invest. Members of the government can talk all they like about being proud of this country, investing in this country and all the rest, but people just do not have the money to invest in a pipeline.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) made an excellent speech in the House last evening. It was a business oriented speech. I stand to be corrected but, in effect, he said: "My speech is based on making money." He did not mean making money himself, of course. He went into all the arguments of how a pipeline could be financed. He spoke of the average Canadian taking pride in developing this great undertaking. If my memory serves me correctly, one thing he omitted to mention, however, was that probably 80 per cent or 90 per cent of Canadians will never have the opportunity to contribute financially to the pipeline and get a decent return on their investment. It will be left to a few people, groups of people, consortiums or organizations, to make money if there is money to be made. And I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that there is money to be made eventually in this undertaking.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) says that the government is committed to maximizing the economic benefits of the pipeline to Canada. Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to do that why are there no provisions for Canadian content or Canadian jobs in the negotiated agreement with the United States or in this legislation? I know the word "guarantee" is a nasty one to free entreprisers and to entrepreneurs except when it comes to guaranteed loans from the government; then it is a different story.

I think this is endemic to this country. On the one hand we want to develop our great resources, but the financial imput comes from a very few people and the benefits go back to a very few people. The increase in the price of gas and oil today is an example. We are supposed to have an abundance of gas. However, we are told to be patriotic about it. The New Democratic party is criticized for being anti-American and against the pipeline. Mr. Speaker, we are not. This party is for the people of this country. We want a share in that as much as anybody else. We must address ourselves to that point and that point alone.

We are not intending for a moment to hold up this legislation. It is very interesting to note that we are being labelled in the press as the party which is filibustering; I am not pointing my finger at any specific colleague in this House. Granted there are only 16 NDP members in the House, but if you look at the list of speakers there are just as many Liberals and Conservatives speaking in this debate as there are New Democrats. So I hope the press will realize that it is not we who are filibustering this bill. We want to extend to this House constructive criticism. We do not want to stop construction of the pipeline; we want to make sure there are basic guarantees that will benefit Canada. What is wrong with being patriotic either at this time—or, for that matter, at any other time in the history of our country—when we are being torn asunder vis-à-vis Quebec and the rest of Canada?

What happens after the pipeline is built? It is not for me to delve into the financial details because I am not an expert in economics. There may be 2,000 to 2,500 people working on this pipeline, but what happens after it is finished? Is it going to be the same old story? Are we to have the same old shanty towns we had before in other parts of Canada? Are we going back to the days of Charlie Chaplin and the gold rush—the dog eat dog approach to the development of this country? It makes great poetry. Charlie Chaplin became a hero in the short time he lived in the Yukon. Surely today we can organize ourselves better as far as the social and personal implications are concerned.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that those who ultimately become powerful in regulating the development of this pipeline will make sure that the human aspect is taken into consideration, and I am quite sure the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) shares this point of view. I hope that by regulation, an act of parliament or by changes or amendments to this bill, there will be guarantees not only of Canadian input but guarantees against human exploitation. To me this is just as important as manufacturing pipe and creating jobs.

When it is all over the people of the Yukon and the northern part of British Columbia will still be there. They will have to live with the remnants of a boom era. If that boom era is similar to what happened in other parts of Canada, such as Elliot Lake and Blind River, then the toll in human terms will be almost unbearable.

I spoke for approximately 15 or 20 minutes before the supper break and I will not take up too much more time. The New Democratic Party does not want to prolong this debate. We will have amendments to present in committee. This pipeline will be the greatest development this country has ever known, both in financial and human terms. I hope we do not end up with the same kind of package which our forefathers ended up with respecting the CPR—a sellout to the pioneers of this country. I am referring to the western pioneers, of course. I hope the day will not come when the people of the Yukon and northern parts of Canada will say: "You sold us down the river", or in this case "down the tube". I hope we will use this development as a unifying force in the country, not as a divisive force.

I hope we will also be able to benefit Canadians. Let there be no mistake, Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to fear from the United States. They are close friends. Geographically they are along our border. Seventy-five per cent of all Canadians live within 100 miles of the United States. Americans are tough bargainers. American businessmen respect toughness in negotiations and bargaining. I believe we have not been tough enough in negotiating this agreement with the United States. Mr. Schlesinger and other members of Mr. Carter's cabinet believe they got a better deal than we did. You cannot have respect for somebody who caves in. You cannot have respect for a relative or a neighbour who says: "Fine, go ahead, we will take this, you take that", and so on. I am not trying to be a prophet but I predict that in the long run Canadians will realize in seven or 10 years that this was not the best of deals, although I am not saying that their comment will be that it was the worst of deals. If we are not tough with our friends to the south, then as the Toronto Star said in its major editorial with respect to foreign ownership, I believe in yesterday's edition—this does not relate to this bill but I think it is cogent—"We can do better on our own".

This comment means we must make it abundantly clear to our friends to the south that we are second class North American citizens. We have resources. We have oil, natural gas, water, timber and all kinds of base metals. We have to bargain on an equal basis. Just because Americans outnumber Canadians 10 to one in population, and because their economy is bouncing back because of government intervention, something the Canadian government has been extremely reluctant to do, we should not take second place. We should bargain as North Americans sharing a continent, and making sure we get as good a deal as they do. That is the way we must bargain respecting this pipeline. I believe my time is up, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Don Valley is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions to permit the Minister of Finance to come to the House this evening and discuss the very important announcement which was made at seven o'clock tonight. The announcement stated that the Government of Canada is to borrow money from abroad to stabilize the Canadian dollar and that it is drawing down the $1,500 million credit they had established with the Canadian commercial banks.

This action on the part of the government is probably one of the most significant that has taken place in the last decade in Canadian history. It is a matter of great urgency that the Minister of Finance make a statement tonight before the markets open tomorrow. I ask for unanimous consent that this matter, important to every Canadian, be brought to the attention of the House this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Hon. members have heard the question. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent.

● (2032)

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, after that little interjection, I guess we can get back to the business at hand. I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) on this bill. I was relieved and somewhat encouraged to see the apparent turnaround that he and, hopefully, his party are taking in their attitude toward this pipeline project.

I am not suggesting anybody in the House is attempting to filibuster. However, the only reason a number of us on this side are taking an opportunity to participate at this point is that there is continued intervention in the debate on the other side. We would be quite happy to see the bill moved into committee and discussed in detail there. We will participate as long as the debate carries on.

An hon. Member: That's democracy.

Mr. Martin: That is democracy. We are members of parliament as well as those on the other side.

The hon. member for Brant indicated he has some reservation with regard to the benefits of this pipeline to Canadians. I will touch on that later. I would also like to deal with the speech of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) whose remarks I was privileged to hear earlier. I was encouraged by the positive approach that he took with regard to this major project which will have such an important impact on the Canadian economy in the years ahead. The way his party is now supporting this project is indeed an interesting turnaround.

When this session resumed after the new year, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicated that in 1978 the Canadian economy would be buried or come to an end. Obviously the official opposition has since seen some kind of light. Perhaps they feel some degree of responsibility in presenting themselves to the Canadian people as an opposition which finds the odd bright spot in a potentially very exciting economic picture. Presumably they have taken the pipeline project as something they should support.

This is indeed an historic bill. As has been stated previously, the Alaska Highway pipeline will involve some $10 billion in all, representing some 5,500 miles of pipeline construction. By way of simple comparison, this compares with the project some 20 years ago of TransCanada Pipelines. It involved a total expenditure at that time of something in the neighbourhood of $375 million, less than one tenth of this amount. There is no question that the project in this legislation is the most exciting project to face this nation and the private sector in North America for a very long time, and perhaps the largest ever.

The project has been overwhelmingly endorsed by the United States Congress. This is important. There is nothing to be ashamed of when the Canadian government can come to an agreement with the U.S. on a project of this magnitude which will mean so much to Canadians in terms of Canadian jobs in the immediate years to come. This is commendable. The fact that the U.S. Congress endorsed it overwhelmingly in the way they have is an indication of the type of united effort that can help make our joint economies tick.

The purpose of this bill is to establish an agency to ensure that this gigantic project is planned and implemented in a way that will maximize the industrial and social benefits for the Canadian people. From it Canada will be assured access to its own reserves in the Mackenzie delta in the long-term future by the only economic means currently available. We will have substantial assistance from the United States in building part of that link. It is obviously important to Canadians that we can and will preserve access to this important frontier area as we attempt to meet our long-term goal of energy self-reliance.

It is worth placing again on the record that implementation of the agreement with the United States is an important step in further strengthening our bonds with that country. There is no point in anyone on this continent pretending that he lives in a complete vacuum. Obviously it is important, where feasible and in our national interest, to undertake projects in joint partnership with our very large neighbour to the south.

The pipeline will provide a boost to consumer and business confidence in both countries. The words of the Leader of the Opposition earlier this year indicated that he saw nothing on the horizon to provide any boost in confidence for Canadians. He knew this bill was coming. I guess he and his party did not have time to take a good look at it. Now that the bill is before the House the are supportive of it. We are glad they are. It is obviously something that is of substantial benefit to all Canadians. It is somewhat reassuring that the opposition see that now that the bill is before them. It is estimated that some 100,000 man-years of employment will be involved in this project. Eventually our international balance of payments will be improved. These are two areas of concern to thinking Canadians at this time.

There is another matter of concern. Preference will be given to Yukon residents in terms of training and hiring for construction work. In turn, this training and experience will enhance employment opportunities for the entire Yukon labour force. The federal government will have to move in the direction of settlement of claims as quickly as possible. When introducing the bill for second reading, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) clearly indicated that every effort will be made to arrive at a fair and just settlement of these claims. This will be done in as quick order as possible.

The establishment of this northern pipeline agency is very important and I wish to spend a few moments talking about some of the important aspects of it. First, I want to deal with the matter of a government guarantee. This has been said before, but it is worth repeating. It is surprising that the NDP is anxious to see us create a monopoly in pipeline construction.

Mr. Woolliams: There is not one of them in the House.

Mr. Martin: Indeed, they are not all satisfied that we should be doing anything to create a really competitive situation. I have been with members of that party in committees at various times when we have been talking about matters involving business in general, small business or medium sized business, and they have always been most anxious to ensure there has been an adequate form of competition in the country. However, in this case they are speaking against the concept of competition. It must have taken some very deep thinking to arrive at that conclusion. I presume that only within their deepest research background are they able to satisfy themselves about this.

Canadian suppliers will have to sharpen their pencils. They may have to cut some costs to be competitive on this matter of pipeline bidding. That is the way it should be. We as a government would be extremely guilty if we did anything to put forward a project of this magnitude and told Canadian suppliers that they could have the business, with no need to worry about the costs; simply supply the pipe and the bills will be paid. That is no way to promote efficiency in the production sector.

The fact that we have ensured that the competitive aspect must be present before Canadian manufacturers can win these contracts is extremely important, and rather than blame the Deputy Prime Minister for not securing guarantees which would have locked us into a monopolistic situation he should be highly commended for declining to take what might have seemed an easy nationalistic route and for taking the action he did.

This having been said, I would point out that there is provision in the bill for the government to block contracts which fail to provide what is considered to be an adequate Canadian content. So there is an override. These contracts must come before the government which will then have an opportunity to examine them and satisfy itself that the concept of Canadian content is being adhered to, as the Foothills group has indicated it has every intention of so doing.

Another important point has to do with the cost of the agency. Many people are complaining about increases in government expenditures. The cost of the agency will be borne directly by the pipeline companies and, of course, will eventually be reflected in the price of gas to consumers in the U.S.

In addition, the monitoring agency will be able to review the manpower plan to ensure that it makes maximum use of Canadian labour in all phases of the project. It will also be examining the procurement proposals put forward by the companies to see that there are fair competitive opportunities for maximum Canadian participation. The agency will be overseeing the financial arrangements and will ensure that any plan which the companies may come up with provides for majority Canadian control and that the debt is not conditional upon approval by the lenders of construction of a lateral to the Mackenzie River delta. This is an extremely important point.

There will also be provision in the rules governing the agency for the minimization of legal delays which could be occasioned by various objections during the course of the project. I think it is important that, if we do intend to go ahead with this scheme, we should do so with the minimum of legal delays while at the same time ensuring fair play and a fair hearing to those who may object.

Hon. members have talked about the direct and indirect benefits which will be derived from the pipeline. I noticed today one item of incidental cost. Some $21 million is to be spent on a series of frost heave and pipe burst tests in areas of northern Alberta and Alaska. Although this is only incidental in terms of the total expenditure it is, nevertheless, a tremendous amount of money, because when such a sum is injected into the economy it does a tremendous amount by way of providing jobs. And this is only one small item which I have taken from the group of many such items.

Another question which has been asked is this: How much labour will be moving in from the south? Well, I have stated earlier that preference will be given to the hiring of people from the Yukon, and to ensure that this is the case, southern labour will be recruited through hiring halls located in the south. This in itself will prevent a massive influx. We know that the number of workers in the Yukon could reach 2,700 by mid-1981. The Foothills group has given assurances in all its public comments that it will be able to meet the 90 per cent content factor. It seems to me that as long as the companies can give that kind of undertaking it should, in itself, be an assurance to us as parliamentarians that they mean what they say. The figure I have mentioned has been repeated on many occasions at various times.

Still talking about direct effects, we note that $10 billion worth of construction is anticipated, resulting in about 100,000 man-years of employment; and that in the construction sector—

Mr. Woolliams: Man-years? Why don't you talk about the number of unemployed who will get jobs? There are a million unemployed.

Mr. Martin: I am not talking about a million unemployed. I leave it up to the official opposition to talk about gloom and doom. I am talking about new jobs which are being created. It is the government's job to create jobs and not to run around the country telling people how poor things are when in fact they are not.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Read Chrétien's release!

Mr. Martin: The opposition wants to go back to gloom and doom. They want to go back to January 23. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) must be hiding in the wings. They don't want to talk about this important project which will have such a positive impact. It bothers them because it is good stuff. It is government stuff and is being promoted by this Liberal government.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't get uptight. Just talk about how many jobs will be created.

Mr. Martin: I should like to refer now to some of the indirect effects. The pipeline will stimulate secondary areas of construction. Electrical manufacturing is just one. There will be all kinds of spin-off right across the country as a result of this gigantic project. It is true there will be some environmental disruption but the agency created by the bill will balance potential disruption against any potential benefits. I might add that the pipeline size announced by the National Energy Board has at last removed all doubt that we are indeed able to produce in this country the pipe which will be used in the project.

Mr. Woolliams: What about the valves and the fixtures?

Mr. Martin: Nations of the world must build their future co-operatively. The fact that we are co-operating with the United States in this project is nothing to be ashamed of. It is something we can be proud of provided we are doing it in the national interest, as I believe is the case in this instance.

We have a great deal in common on this continent and no amount of breast beating will ever change that situation. Last spring, along with other members of the House, I was privileged to take part in inter-parliamentary group discussions with members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives in Victoria. At that time we gave consideration to some of these energy issues and I was impressed to see the degree of goodwill which existed among us, the eagerness to work together on projects of this nature.

We should bear in mind that in the future co-operation will take place not only between Canada and the United States but between North America and Europe. One had only to attend the World Energy Congress in Turkey last fall to have become aware that the energy issue is very much a global situation. The fact that we are involving ourselves so heavily with another country at this time is an indication on our part that we understand the global nature of our over-all energy problems. We must look to the future. The oil and gas question is only one of the areas which must be dealt with. Let us get it out of the way now so that we can turn our attention to the solution of other energy problems.

There is no question that we need oil and gas from our northern frontier. Those of us who are members of the national resources committee and who had the opportunity to visit the north two years ago were overawed by the tremendous potential which exists in that part of the country. In order to encourage people to take advantage of this potential a start on a major project must be made. And this is where the current northwest pipeline project is so important.

There are questions about nuclear energy with which we have to deal. In the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works we are discussing matters relating to nuclear waste and other related aspects, and we cannot spend all our time on oil and gas pipelines. However, this is still the first step in our policy of energy self-reliance, and for that reason I think it is important.

In conclusion, I would like to refer to some comments I made during the pipeline debate last August. At that time I indicated that there are three important things we should obtain from a pipeline arrangement. I spoke very much in favour of proceeding with this project. The first important point I made was that this project would have a positive effect on the Canadian economy. I think that has now been proved to be the case. We have the figures. We are now talking in terms of real dollars which are going to be spent. There is no question that there will be a tremendous impact on our economy.

My second point related to the opportunity we have to participate in this project along with our neighbour to the south. I felt it was important for us to endeavour to enter into a joint project if that could work to our mutual advantage, and particularly to the advantage of Canada. Obviously that will be the case, and the negotiations so ably carried on by the Deputy Prime Minister are indicative of that.

The last thing I mentioned was that there is a need for us to do everything we can to stimulate investment in the north. We need the potential oil and gas reserves that are in our frontier areas, and a cancellation of the project would obviously have had a very negative effect on the potential for new investment to move in. The project will now go ahead, and I think the potential will be tremendous and will augur well for the possibility of finding additional reserves in the Mackenzie delta which in time may justify the type of pipeline that was earlier proposed but at this point is simply not feasible.

In summary, it is good to know that there is considerable support for this project coming from different parts of the House. There is a realization from time to time that parliamentarians of all parties must stop talking about all the things they perceive as not happening and start supporting some of the projects this government is putting in place that are indeed making things happen and making the economy tick. There is a clear realization that elected representatives should stand behind some of those projects and support them.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin), who prefaced his remarks by stating his reluctance to take part in this debate and then went on for some 20 minutes—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply want to make it clear that at no time did I indicate a reluctance to participate in the debate. I indicated an interest in participating. I said that the reason I was able to participate was that the opposition was continuing to debate the issue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That surely does not constitute a point of order.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I think that indicates the truth of what I was saying earlier, that that kind of defence is put forward when a weakness actually appears.

However, important as I think this debate is, and as anxious as I am to take part in it, I would gladly stand aside if the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) could assure us that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) would come into this House at this time and explain his announcement contained in the press release just put out regarding the intention of the Government of Canada to borrow funds outside Canada.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the Chair has difficulty relating her remarks to Bill C-25, which we are presently discussing.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, in speaking in this debate and in dealing with the legislation concerning the Foothills pipeline project there are certain aspects of the bill which I would like to see strengthened. Although I support the bill in principle, I certainly hope that by specifying those aspects which I want to see strengthened and by pointing out shortcomings in the bill I can thereby urge members of the special committee to incorporate certain changes in the bill at the committee stage or at later stages so that the bill can be unanimously supported.

The reason I am pleased to be taking part in this debate is that the whole matter of energy, energy supplies and especially energy conservation has been an ongoing concern which I have had for a long time. In addition, I am given this opportunity to look at certain problems of northern development and aboriginal rights which have been and are of ongoing interest and great concern to me. However, most importantly, at this time when the unity of this country is in question everywhere, this mammoth project which is shortly to be undertaken must be one which becomes a symbol of unity for all Canadians, a catalyst which will help pull us together and a monument to our shared interests whether we live east or west, north or south. It must not be allowed to become an element of tension or a divisive element between groups, whether racial or geographic, at this crucial time in our history. There is always the possibility that that can happen.

During this debate we have heard a great deal about steel, pipes, jobs and energy needs. We have heard what this project means in economic terms. All these things are important, but for a few minutes I would like to stand back and try to understand what this pipeline means to Canada as a country of the north.

As Mr. Justice Berger pointed out in the report of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry, "We look upon the north as our last frontier". He also said: "We think of ourselves as a northern people". It would not be an exaggeration to say that, to a great extent, the way in which the Canadian north is developed and the way in which this project in particular is developed will be a reflection of what we are as Canadians and what our values are. It is not an exaggeration to say that the pipeline and all the issues surrounding it are a reflection of what Canada is all about.

This project is about people. It is about native people, non-native northerners, Canadian entrepreneurs and interested southerners. It is about reconciling the various interests of all these groups of people. As such, it reflects the multicultural nature of this country as a whole. However, more than that, it reflects in a very real way the tension between the dominant interest group in this country and a special minority group, a tension which, in another form, presently exists between Quebec and the rest of the country. Our experience with that latter situation and the crisis that has developed in our confederation as a result should make us more sensitive to the needs and wishes of the native people of the north. We must not do anything at this point in our country's history that would add to the problems of national unity by further alienating a minority group of people who already have cause for resentment because of past injustices.

Many of the injustices spoken about by our native people are based on broken promises. They are based on different interpretations of so-called agreements and on an erosion of good faith. Those things must not be permitted to happen again with this project. Whether it is real or just perceived as real, there is a legacy of bad faith that needs to be healed. We have all read about it, we have all heard about it and we have all had it explained to us. Many of the native people came before the Lysyk inquiry and their testimony to that inquiry prior to the decision about this pipeline reflects, according to the words of that report, "a common Indian distrust of white promises". They use these words:

What is going to happen when the pipelines come through . . . How can you as a government promise our people will not be affected? You promised before and these promises have been broken.

Again another Indian representative said:

My people haven't recovered from the impact of building the Alaska highway. They have lost their self-respect, identity, their lifestyles have changed and with it came problems—

That is part of the testimony before the Lysyk inquiry and it refers to a legacy of broken promises. This trend of exploitation and of bad faith must be reversed, and now we have the opportunity to do so. Great time and effort has been expended to collect the impressions, opinions and demands of the native northerners. The expensive reports presented to the Berger and Lysyk inquiries must not be ignored. That legacy of broken promises must not be perpetuated.

I will mention one particular promise that has been made to the native northerners, and that is the promise of a second stage socio-economic inquiry which was given to the native people by the government to secure their participation in the first stage of the inquiry. That promise must be kept. It must not become another broken promise in the tradition of the government.

Having regard to the second stage inquiry, when he was speaking of it just last week the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) said:

This recommendation has in principle been accepted by the government.

What does he mean by that? The dichotomy that prevails in the history of this government between principle and practice does not make us very optimistic about the acceptance of the so-called "principle".

The minister talks about a review process and about bringing to light public concerns, but he carefully avoids any specific commitment or any reference to a second stage inquiry. He very explicitly states that we do not need more studies, more research, more lawyers and consultants and TV cameras. But, in fact, it sounds as though the minister is really saying that what we do not need is a second stage inquiry.

I get very nervous when I hear a minister of this government say, as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said last week, that what is needed is for the government to decide upon a range of concrete measures and then put those proposals out for public scrutiny and debate. I have seen the government put its proposals out for public scrutiny and debate before. I do not like to be cynical, but public scrutiny and debate have had very little impact on the government's actions in the past, and there is very little indication that they will do so now.

As a result of that I would like to see built into this legislation, when it goes to committee stage, provision for a second stage socio-economic inquiry and for protecting native claims. The government's fine words about recognizing claims and being in full sympathy with these aspirations—again the words of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—are not good enough. Sympathetic recognition is one thing; legislative recognition is quite another thing. I am sure the native people of the north have become sufficiently cynical about the former—that is, about sympathetic recognition on the part of this government—that they would appreciate more of the latter, namely legislative recognition on the part of the government.

As well as being about people, this pipeline project is about political and constitutional processes. It is really about the transition of the Yukon from what for far too long has been a kind of colonial status to full responsible government. That is what this project entails as well. It is about co-operation between federal and provincial governments. Here again it reflects the country as a whole. We badly need a revitalized system of federalism, one which recognizes the full partnership between the two levels of government.

As we all know, there is much resentment among the provinces at the way in which the federal government has too often run roughshod over their needs and concerns. We have to ask ourselves whether this pipeline is to be another major project in which the province and the Yukon are involved, but in which they have to bend to the wishes of the federal government.

The legislation as we look at it provides for the establishment of a federal-provincial consultative council to which the Yukon representative, I note, is to be appointed by the federal cabinet. Is this the way the government assures itself that the voice of the Yukon will be heard—by its own decision? It seems to me that if the Yukon nominee were to be chosen by the elected representatives of the Yukon legislative assembly, then the federal-provincial aspect of the council would certainly be far more credible than when the federal government takes it upon itself to appoint that nominee. That would be a proper step in our evolving federalism, and that is something I hope the members of the special committee will insist upon when they are dealing with this bill in detail.

As part of the political process of which I spoke, close to $250 million has already been spent in studies and inquiries by private and public sectors on this project. It was only after great pressure that the government held inquiries which involved the public in the kind of debate which allows the country to arrive at a national consensus. It was not that the government set up this kind of inquiry, or instigated it on its own. It was pressured into finally setting up both the Berger and Lysyk inquiries. One can only wonder whether the decisions we are faced with today would have been taken with more confidence if the government had sought such participation from the beginning; if the government had explored openly the alternative from the start. At the present time we are launched upon another road in this process of decision making.

There have been injected into this debate a number of proposals which will have to be adjudicated further down the road; proposals for the Dempster lateral, for the polar gas route, for liquified natural gas tankers and for an Arctic railway. All of these have been thrown out for public discussion, and some of them, indeed, are very questionable.

It should not be necessary to drag the government into the arena of public discussion, as was the case with the Foothills route. The government should begin now, openly and with public participation, to examine all of these other proposals and explore other alternatives, so that we have the full range of information before us on which to base these serious decisions. That is the commitment the government should make now, so that all Canadians have full access to information about the viability and desirability of such huge projects long before any decision to proceed has been undertaken.

Another aspect of the pipeline project is the environmental and ecological one. Again a national perspective will be reflected in what goes on in the development of this project in the north. Future generations will judge us harshly if we perform poorly in this area. The questions here involve more than the pipeline. They reflect a basic attitude about how we will and do treat the land and its life, which so much embodies Canada's strength and identity.

Last August during the pipeline debate, the leader of my party pointed out that we were being asked to make certain decisions without adequate information. He pointed out that we were forced to make decisions at that time without a northern energy policy, without a national energy policy, without a northern development policy, and without any clear or consistent approach to native rights or northern ecology. We must not allow that kind of thing to happen again and again. Otherwise, we will never have any kind of consistent, realistic energy policy.

The whole area of energy, both renewable and non-renewable, is a very complex one that requires very definite policy formation if our energy needs of the future are to be met. I am greatly concerned that the energy debate in Canada continues to be a fragmented and confused one; that it is based on individual projects such as this one, rather than on a comprehensive evaluation of all our major alternatives. We need to recognize our alternatives, set out priorities and realize that decisions which are being made now will directly enhance or detract from the lives of future generations of Canadians. It is our responsibility, in the way in which this project is carried out, to make sure the decisions we take today enhance those future lives. We are custodians of this land. We must pass it on to future generations as intact as possible. We can only exercise this stewardship through an ethic of conservation and not of exploitation.

Even the National Energy Board recognizes the practicality of conservation. In a recent report the following was stated:

> A vigorous conservation program should be a prime goal of Canadian energy policy, and that conservation appears to offer the lowest cost option for balancing the energy budget in the near term.

It is of great concern to me that so little emphasis has been placed on the theme of conservation in this debate. Little mention has been made of it. When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) spoke in this debate yesterday, he devoted but one line to conservation policy. He stated simply, "We have to accelerate our efforts to conserve". The rest of his speech pointed out how we can use gas to fill the gap left by dwindling oil reserves. If the entire purpose of northern gas and northern pipelines is no more than a stopgap to give us another 25 years of over-consumption in energy, then we have failed miserably.

There is an international aspect to the pipeline which brings to the fore the ever present question of Canada's independence vis-à-vis the United States. We must not forget that this pipeline is being constructed to bring American gas to American markets. As the Lysyk report pointed out, the main benefits from the pipeline will be concentrated outside of the Yukon, largely south of the 49th parallel, whereas the most significant costs, in terms of both economic and social disruption, will be experienced in the Yukon.

Given this situation, it is mandatory that the government ensure that Canadians derive whatever benefits are possible in terms of jobs and supplies. There must be provision for the maximum possible Canadian content in materials and labour. We must use Canadian pipe, valves and fittings. This would be beneficial to the steel industry all over the country as well as the workers. It would bring Canadians into the project, whether in their own locale or on site. Whether they come from Cape Breton, Quebec, Hamilton, the western provinces or the Yukon, Canadians would be involved in that project. I am convinced a project of this magnitude, properly carried out, serviced by Canadian labour and supplies, and shared by all of us, can be a boon to national unity as well as to the Canadian economy.

But instead of recognizing this potential working to maximize it for Canada, the government's questionable bargaining in this matter has left us with absolutely no guarantees about Canadian content. Instead of guarantees, we receive the repeated exhortation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that Canadian industry must be competitive. Seemingly the Prime Minister is more concerned with the cost to the American consumer than with the Canadian labour market.

This pipeline will traverse 2,500 miles of Canadian territory. From much of what has been said by the government—the lack of guarantees and the lack of definite details—it appears that Canadians are not in charge. Is the government content to play the role of an absentee landlord—while the tenant takes over the house? Or is it going to stand up and demand that the tenant obey the landlord's rules? There are ways in which these rules can be monitored and policed to see that Canada receives the best out of this agreement. Hon. members on this side of the House are asking that a parliamentary committee, either the special legislative committee or the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, monitor the Canadian content of the pipeline project. It is in the interest of all Canadians to get the maximum benefit for Canada from this venture. This can be best done on a continuing basis through a parliamentary body. That is the best way to meet the needs of Canadians.

We do not simply want an annual report to be presented to parliament. We want a quarterly monitoring process which will provide for parliamentary input on a continuing basis. It is essential in such a mammoth undertaking that the people of Canada, through their elected representatives, have some voice in what happens during and after pipeline construction. I hope and trust that this kind of arrangement will be built into the agreement when the bill goes to committee, or at a later stage in its study.

As I have said, this bill is of such magnitude that it requires special scrutiny and study at every stage. We on this side of the House intend to do everything in our power to see that this project brings the maximum benefit to all Canadians. If properly carried out, this project can be a source of pride for all of us, the kind of pride which can pull us together emotionally and psychologically, the way the building of the railroad did geographically 100 years ago.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that the pipeline is, in a sense, what Canada is all about. It is about people; it is about our land; it is about our political system; it is about our sovereignty in the face of our powerful neighbour to the south; it is about national unity and confederation; and mostly it is about our industrial, consumption-oriented economy and about our past mistakes and future options. We have to ask ourselves: Are we going to be content to exploit our northern territories and their people as has been the case all too often in the past? As Mr. Justice Berger pointed out in his report:

> The north has become our frontier during the past few decades; it has been a homeland of the Dene and Inuit peoples for many thousands of years.

That is the difference. They have been there; they understand and work in harmony with it. We are relative newcomers, looking at it as our new and last frontier.

In an age when frontiers are at a premium, when non-renewable resources are running out, and when we are confronted every day by the often drastic social and environmental effects of past excesses, we must learn to tread more lightly on our environment. Our approach to this project will show just how much we have or have not learned in the past decade about the limits of technology. It will set the pattern for future northern development. The north is our last frontier. If we lay waste to it, there will not be another. We must not sacrifice its resources, human, animal and mineral, to one last futile extension of the wasteful practices now followed by ourselves and by our neighbour to the south. In working out the details of this bill, in seeking to improve it and in seeking to strengthen it, that is what we should keep in mind.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to participate in this most important debate. It was a week ago on Monday that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) spoke on second reading on this important bill. The response of the official opposition was to the effect that they supported both the principle in the bill and the project. The following day the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) set out in his speech some of the aspects relating to this project, its importance to the native people, the second stage inquiry, and some other announcements that were contained in his speech.

It is my intention this evening to comment on some of the points that were made in both the speech of the Deputy Prime Minister and in that of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which were responded to in the intervening time by hon. members opposite, and particularly by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) outside the House. These comments related to the pipeline's impact, its benefits and the ability of the Yukon people to handle them, the second stage inquiry, the question of land claims, and the co-operation and co-ordination between the Yukon territorial government and the department in planning this large project.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development emphasized the importance of this project to the north and to its people. The northern pipeline offers the Yukon the prospect of a boost in its economy and the expansion and improvement of social services, not the least of which would be the possibility of natural gas being made available to a number of communities which, in my view, would give them cheaper energy and the opportunity to develop some industries which would have available to them not only electrical energy but other forms of energy also. The revenue which the pipeline project will generate for the territory and the manpower training it would necessitate should mark the beginning of a new era of economic and social development in the territory, and, most of all, it will give the Yukon territorial government the opportunity to show some real leadership in the planning and preparation of policies and programs associated with the pipeline.

There has been some misunderstanding of the bill in the debate and unfortunately a willingness to distort the meaning of some of the provisions and to ignore the obvious benefits on the part of certain members opposite, particularly the hon. member for the Yukon as evidenced in some of his comments made outside the House which were quoted in the press recently.

There has been an underestimation, not only of the benefits flowing to the Yukon as a result of its active participation in the project, but of the good sense of Yukoners and of their ability to co-operate with the government in promoting the interests of their territory. It is time that the opportunities outlined in Bill C-25 and the terms of the agreement between the United States and Canada on this important project, perhaps the most important project in Canada's history, were pointed out.

First, I should like to comment on the heritage fund and the $200 million advance on tax revenues. The government realizes the importance to the Yukon territorial government of dealing with the social and economic impact of the pipeline on the territory. The first step that the government took was to appoint a fourth member to the executive committee to deal exclusively with pipeline planning and with native affairs. There is no question that there will be a substantially increased demand for schools, municipal services and social services such as health care which are the responsibility of the territorial government and which will be dealt with, as I suggested, through the appointment of a fourth member.

The Lysyk inquiry in its report pointed out that additional funds must be made available to deal with the increase in these public services. It also suggested that funds for this activity come from the tax revenues appropriated from the pipeline project. This is exactly what the government has done through the provision in the bill for a $200 million advance on property tax revenues which the territory may borrow against. This borrowed revenue will be an immediate source for the funding for the projects and services that will be essential to the Yukon when the project commences. It is important to note that this will be up front money. This is the point that the hon. member for Yukon refuses to acknowledge.

Construction will mean an influx of workers and a large scale migration into the territory. The funding provided by loans negotiated by the territorial government will mean money for schools, hospitals, and improved social and municipal services. The important point is that these facilities will remain for the Yukoners to use long after completion of the pipeline and the movement of many workers elsewhere after completion of the project.

Some critics of the bill have said that the territorial government will have no funding to supply the wide range of social services that pipeline-associated growth will cause in the Yukon. But the government will be able to borrow up to $200 million through this funding, which is more than adequate to meet the projected needs of the Yukon in this regard. At present, as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has pointed out, it is estimated that no more than $70 million will be needed to meet these costs up to about 1983. So I think it can be said forcibly that the property tax scheme negotiated with the United States will provide the territory with some $35 million before the pipeline ever goes into operation and $30 million annually thereafter on an escalated basis, with the result that over a 25 year period net benefits could exceed $1 billion, assuming a 5 per cent inflation. This is nearly three times that which would have been produced under the NEB proposal for a $200 million payment, and roughly twice that which would be produced under the Lysyk proposal involving a heritage fund and an increase in property taxes. The $30 million property tax payment can be seen in better perspective if measured against current property tax returns in the Yukon of around $2.5 million, or the current operating budget of the Yukon territorial government of around $64 million.

The Yukon would benefit substantially from the $50 million heritage fund announced during the debate by the minister and from the substantial progress that it would make toward financial independence from the federal government. This is a strongly cherished objective of the territory.

The comments made by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to the effect that there would be a $50 million loss to the Yukon through the $200 million loan arrangement is an overstatement. First of all, it will not be necessary to borrow up to the $200 million level. The Yukon territorial government will certainly have the opportunity to borrow at the best available rate, which could conceivably be less than was anticipated when they considered borrowing this money from Foothills.

In developing a policy on the pipeline project the government has demonstrated its agreement that the territorial government must be able to meet the demands for social services that will be placed upon it. It has also shown an understanding of and sympathy with the special social and cultural characteristics of the Yukon and a desire to help the territory preserve its unique quality of life while it experiences the full impact of the pipeline. That is why the minister announced the trust fund called the Yukon heritage fund which will be capitalized to $50 million. Whether the capital of this fund is used or only the interest, the fund is sufficiently large to cover many of the things that are important to the Yukon on a cultural level.

The Lysyk report pointed out that the heritage fund was never intended to cover social, economic and impact-related conditions but was to be used for improvement in the quality of life in the Yukon and for programs to protect the special qualities and characteristics of individual communities. Having studied both the National Energy Board report and the Lysyk report it seems to me that, with the possibility of $200 million "up front" by borrowing and the establishment of the $50 million heritage fund, we have the best of both worlds. I think this is the right course for the government to follow.

I should like to comment on the urgency of the pipeline project. The fact that the United States needs natural gas means that, in the short term, there will be very large industrial benefits to Canada which will substantially increase employment. There is also the possibility of eventually transporting Canadian gas to Canadian markets through the Dempster lateral.

The Lysyk final report stated that Yukoners saw in the proposed pipeline an opportunity to improve economic and social conditions in the Yukon and pointed out that if the opportunity was not grasped the result could well be frustration, anger and recrimination from the people of the Yukon. The urgency still exists. There are opportunities for economic growth to be realized from the pipeline. Decisions must be made on governing the pipeline companies so that the adverse effects of a boom can be minimized.

I should like to read a portion of the Lysyk report, as follows:

All Yukoners are eager to ensure that neither they nor their children will ever feel obliged to leave the Yukon for the lack of employment. If the youth of the region are prepared by education and technical training for careers that they cannot follow in the Yukon, their inevitable departure will frustrate the personal preference of those individuals and run counter to the best interests of the economy and the society as a whole.

I think the point is that if the pipeline goes ahead and the proper steps are taken to train people and upgrade their skills, the objectives set out in the report can be achieved.

I should like to make a couple of comments on the second stage inquiry that the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) referred to. The twofold objective of the government in expediting the pipeline project and settling the socio-economic terms and conditions has resulted in agreement to a second stage inquiry. As the minister said, this is an agreement in principle with the concept put forward by the Lysyk report. Under the leadership of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development proposals for terms and conditions which will govern the pipeline company as it begins work on this project are being drafted. These will be open to public response through the pipeline agency and could be available for comment and review by the public as early as next spring.

This second stage inquiry has been termed by some members as a betrayal for not being the type of inquiry recommended. It seems to me the time has come to cross the bridge and decide whether the project should go ahead. What we must do now is decide on the terms and conditions under which the pipeline will be built. I think it is preferable to follow the course set out by the minister and have a set of draft proposals prepared which would be available to any group for comment. They might be amended following such perusal and the project could then go forward. In my view there has been no betrayal of the Yukon people and their interests under these specific terms.

Critics have objected to the fact that the pipeline regulatory body will conduct such an inquiry but I think that is in line with what was suggested in the Lysyk report. If hon. members checked the Lysyk report they would see it recommended a second stage inquiry to be carried out by the pipeline regulatory agency. One of the reasons for this would be to co-ordinate the many inquiries that will be going forward and avoid a proliferation of inquiries in the Yukon in the next few years. That is why we recommend that these further inquiries be assigned to the pipeline agency. Clearly the Lysyk inquiry recognized the need for a co-ordinated approach to a study of the impact of the pipeline and perhaps opposition critics could follow this example.

As the minister pointed out, there will be a number of investigations into the environmental, social and economic implications of the pipeline project. The environmental assessment panel of the Department of the Environment is continuing its study of environmental concerns under the terms and conditions set out in Schedule III, in the appendix to Bill C-25. Inquiries that Foothills or their consultants undertake will have to be submitted to the pipeline agency. The largest role of the agency will be to co-ordinate the many inquiries.

The Yukon people will be given a chance to voice their concerns on specific terms and conditions drawn up by the government and they will therefore have a better grasp of measures to be implemented to protect their interests. Co-ordination will also allow the pipeline project to be expedited so that once construction begins Yukoners will be ready to take full advantage of it and to participate in the work and the supply of materials required for the project.

The numerous and wide-ranging inquiries into the social and environmental issues relating to the pipeline have served the important and valuable purpose of focussing the concerns of the federal, provincial and territorial governments as well as the pipeline company on the quality of life and the integrity of the land. These things are certainly important to Yukoners. It is necessary now to turn to specific proposals for the protection of these interests, to test public opinion and proceed with them. All this is surely in the best interests of the Yukon as well as builders of the pipeline. Legislation will create the pipeline agency and its passage will allow it to proceed with these important matters as soon as possible.

As the minister stated in the House, Mr. Speaker, a just and speedy settlement of native land claims is in the interests of both the native people and the government if they are to have their proper share of the benefits of the project. Since pipeline construction will not begin until 1981 there is time to make good progress on the settlement of land claims.

The opposition has expressed doubts that negotiations between the government and the Yukon Indians will result in a settlement in the near future and that delay in the reaching of a settlement will result in delay of the pipeline project itself. They have said that the land claims matter is out of the government's control and that no guidance is offered to bring the claims question to a quick settlement.

There are difficulties involved in these types of negotiations, but good faith has been generated on both sides, especially in the past year. The negotiations have been going on for quite a period of time and I believe substantially in good faith. Members of this House should understand that this is an extremely complex and difficult question with a lot at stake. It is natural to expect that both sides will bargain vigorously. It seems to me, in responding to the approach taken by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), that the proposal to proceed with establishing the terms and conditions under which the pipeline might be built can go on at the same time as land claims can be negotiated. Hopefully the deadline before construction would be such that the terms and conditions could have a very thorough airing under the process set out by the minister and would provide ample opportunity to conclude the land claims on a fair and just basis.

The government has agreed to give consideration to a $50 million advance on the land claims settlement once agreement in principle has been reached so that the Yukon Indians can use the financial resources available to institute programs and policies, not only to deal with the pipeline, but to improve the long range quality of life in the territories. Hopefully they would also be able to use that money to set up the type of business which would allow them to tender and be involved in construction of the pipeline in a meaningful way. As the minister said in the House, it is hoped that agreement can be reached as soon as possible.

The government is also aware of its responsibility to the Indians of northern British Columbia. It has already begun discussions with them about how they can participate in planning in preparation for the pipeline. These discussions will lead to the establishment of programs to provide manpower training and to maximize employment and business opportunities for native people in the area.

Surely this is worthwhile undertaking. If manpower retraining results in the Indians being able to participate in the skilled areas, it also means they will be able to compete in the future for higher skilled jobs than the types of employment they are engaged in at the present time. Without minimizing the importance of land title and land expropriation for utilities, a point raised by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), these matters have no direct bearing on the question of native rights in British Columbia with regard to the actual pipeline route. No claims have been received regarding lands on the projected pipeline route. If they are forthcoming, they will be dealt with in the same good faith as evidenced in the Yukon claims situation.

The question of northern B.C. Indian interests and the environmental implications of the pipeline must involve the participation of the government of British Columbia. It is the hope of the government that its negotiations with the Yukon Indians continue in good faith to a settlement. Such good faith can only be maintained by responsible discussion of this question, especially as the legislation moves through parliament.

It is important that the negotiations and discussions not be prejudiced by irresponsible forecasts by opposition members that the government will disregard Indian interests in its anxiety to proceed with the pipeline project. This is not the spirit in which the government has approached land claim negotiations at all. Nowhere is the opportunity for Yukon participation in the pipeline project greater than in the area we have been talking about, as well as in the area of employment. There is provision for preference of Yukoners to be employed in pipeline jobs. The minister pointed out in his speech that some several hundred jobs in preliminary work might become available as early as 1979 for work such as clearing and surveying. Yukoners under the provision of the bill will be given preference for this work. This is a point the hon. member for the Yukon refused to accept and continues to make comments to the contrary.

Clause 21(2) of the bill provides that the pipeline company, in order to receive its certificate of public convenience for each portion of the pipeline, must adhere to the commitments it made at the National Energy Board hearings at the time the Alaska Highway route was discussed. These terms included preference to Yukon residents in hiring for pipeline construction and also for the procurement of materials as far as possible. These details would have to be worked out by the pipeline agency.

One important aspect of the Foothills undertaking is the proposal to provide manpower training programs which would be carried out in consultation with the government and which basically will be an extension of the northern training program which was instituted in 1970 by AGTL. This would open up skilled jobs for Yukoners and lead to the long term benefit of teaching northerners skills which could be put to use in future projects in the north. Preference to northern workers could also help lessen the impact of an influx of workers from the south. It is also the company's undertaking to do its recruitment of outside workers in the south.

Finally, I want to comment on the statements made in the House by a number of members that the Yukon government has had very little opportunity to participate in the planning of this project. I have a document here, which I could table if requested, indicating the extensive consultations that have been held between the territory and the minister, members of the government and many of the different agencies.

I might outline some of the discussions that have taken place relating to pipeline matters, such as the whole question of the upgrading of roads, establishment of business opportunities, monitoring of pipeline impact and providing manpower information, preparing property tax review forecasts, exchange of views regarding the impact information centre, a survey of native people to update the department's 1969/70 manpower survey for pipeline manpower planning, the environmental social program and the research proposals. There were many meetings held to discuss manpower delivery systems and manpower policy systems relating to the pipeline. Certainly with the amount of input that the territorial government has received and the attitude taken by the minister as well as many other people, we are hopeful that the territorial government will take some leadership in many of these issues.

The territorial government has had every opportunity to participate in the planning of this project, not the least of which would be the establishment of an agency office in Whitehorse, the exploration of the idea of an information and impact centre, the appointment of a fourth member to the executive committee, the consultative council, and the forwarding of all pipeline related correspondence and documents.

I might just take a further moment to elaborate on a few areas of the pipeline in which I am interested myself. It would seem to me that we should be careful of the impact on existing communities of a large influx of construction workers into the Yukon and the northern part of the province of B.C. I hope that the terms and conditions which will be set out will indicate that the construction camps will be some distance from these communities so that there will be a good deal of isolation associated with the construction forces. It would seem to me that demands on existing communities would be rather large if the pipeline people were to construct these camps close to communities and therefore rely on the amenities in the communities to serve workers on the pipeline project. It would be the responsibility of the pipeline contractors to supply most of these services themselves and the best way would be to have these construction camps located some distance from existing communities.

My purpose in intervening in this pipeline debate is to cover some of the points that should be responded to in terms of the impact of the social and economic issues and the ability of the Yukon to handle them. I also wanted to deal with the question of the second stage inquiry, the question of land claims and the co-operation between the Yukon territorial government and the federal government.

This may be one of the largest and most important projects ever undertaken in Canada, and there has probably been more study of the environmental impact and the impact on people and on the communities associated with the pipeline than of any other project in Canada. This is good.

The majority of speakers I have listened to went to some length to point out the tremendous benefits to Canada from an industrial and employment point of view. Having studied these points, the time has come to move forward. We must make the decision that the pipeline will be built and pass the bill.

The minister should continue the leadership he has given in drafting the terms and conditions under which the pipeline will be built. They should be available to anyone who wants to study them in an objective way. We can then conclude the arrangements under which the pipeline might go forward. Taking this approach on the second stage inquiry is very correct.

The opposite approach has been put forward by a number of members, and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands articulated it very well a few minutes ago. She said this approach would bring a tremendous degree of uncertainty to the whole project. It would draw into the debate many issues that have already been settled. Therefore, the time for that type of inquiry has in fact passed. I again emphasize that the point we are making there has been well taken.

In terms of land claims, this is a very complex and difficult negotiation that we are undertaking. It would be a good stance for all members of parliament to try and create an environment that is conducive to negotiations. It certainly does not do any good to have made the kind of statements one or two members have been making. First, it is a tremendous put-down of the Indian people in terms of their approach to it. Second, there will be times when both sides will want to negotiate seriously at the table. There will be times when both sides will want a period of time to re-evaluate their position. They may want to take that position to the people they represent. They may reappear at the table with either an updated position or a confirmation from the people they represent that their negotiating position represents their point of view and it should go forward.

I am hopeful, as is the minister, that the negotiations will continue in good faith. There is a very decided advantage to the Indian people to bring to an early conclusion at least the principle of the land claims negotiations. One commitment of the minister is the possibility of establishing an immediate $50 million up-front fund which the Indian people can use to establish themselves in types of business which will become involved in the pipeline. It is preferable for the Indian people to establish types of businesses that will enable them to contract for the pipeline. After the pipeline construction, they will be able to continue in business, something they could not do if they were simply employees of the large pipeline contractors.

One difficulty that has been encountered with regard to projects such as pipeline construction has been that those who normally work for low wages receive very, very high wages during the pipeline construction. After the construction is complete, that source of income is eliminated. This has led to enormous social problems. It would be preferable for those involved in these settlements to use this money immediately to become involved in a type of subcontracting on the pipeline. This could have a lasting benefit.

The land claims could be prejudiced in many different ways, particularly by those who want to use them for political purposes. This could delay the settlement to the point that it would not give the Indian people long enough to organize the types of businesses that could be of value to them before the construction begins.

I again want to assure the House that the territorial government has been participating in the pipeline project on a very regular basis. The commissioner met with the minister and other members of the cabinet who have responsibility in the pipeline project some time ago in order to participate in the early stages of the planning of the project. We are most anxious that the territorial government take a real leadership role. No one can suggest they are not being given an opportunity to participate in the many important decisions that lie ahead of us.

When the pipeline comes closer to being a reality, there will be enormous pressures. A very significant number of people will move to the Yukon. This will require very good administration of housing problems, health care facilities and so on. I encourage the territorial government to work effectively on these plans in a cool, rational manner rather than in a crisis situation, as has happened with other very large construction projects both here and in the United States.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call it ten o'clock.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

URBAN AFFAIRS—DISTRIBUTION OF CMHC FUNDS BY MPs

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I make this intervention on the basis of a rather unsatisfactory answer I received last Friday from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). Unfortunately, this is typical of the way he has dealt with many matters in many portfolios.

The minister attempted to mislead the House by stating that he had not received the memorandum and information about which we were questioning him. This was a memorandum from the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the minister expressing deep and justifiable concern about the possible allegation of political interference with the operation of CMHC by this Liberal government. He gave a most inane response to a very serious question about the policy of this government relating to the distribution of funds under the Municipal Grants Act.

The facts are simple. There is in existence a memorandum from the president of CMHC in which the minister was told in no uncertain terms that CMHC was concerned about a possible interpretation of political involvement because of the way in which the minister wanted to handle the payment of cheques to municipalities in this country. After mentioning that the minister wanted to hand out these cheques, the memorandum says, in part:

If this is to be the pattern of involvement you wish to follow I want to make sure that it will not affect the discharge directly by the corporation of its full responsibilities in administering the program. I am also concerned that it should not lay itself open to criticism of political partisanship by arranging ceremonies for or otherwise involving selected federal members in the grant payment process.

Mr. Speaker, these are strong words from the president of a Crown corporation established to run the housing policy of the federal government. I need hardly call attention to the fact that the reason for the establishment of a Crown corporation in this field was parliament's wish that there should not be political involvement in the administration of these programs but rather that decisions should be made on the basis of need and equity.

What do we find now under this Liberal government? We see a continuation of a practice whereby they seem to treat the Canadian people as though they were a bunch of illiterates who believe the myth that all good things come from the government by way of the local Liberal member. The idea is that he should stand up at a ceremony and hand out benefits in the form of cheques to the municipalities. In taking this approach I believe they underestimate the intelligence of the Canadian people and especially the intelligence of the Canadian electorate, if they think this attitude is going to win elections for them. There have been many occasions on which this kind of sleazy and shallow practice has been followed by the Liberal government, handing out cheques rather than going through the corporation which was set up to place money into the hands of municipalities on the basis of equity and fair play.

I can recall one example. It happened in Saskatchewan. A ceremony was arranged to mark that opening of a facility in Regina funded in part by CMHC. The minister was not able to be there and it appeared that no Liberal member of parliament was able to fit the occasion into his schedule. So we witnessed the spectacle of an MLA who happened to be a candidate for the federal Liberals in the next federal election—his name is not important—representing the government. It happened he was a relation in law of a minister of the present cabinet. People generally resent the narrow, partisan attitude the Minister of State for Urban Affairs takes to everything he touches.

If the minister thinks that in the province of Quebec it is better for Liberal members to hand out cheques, he is seriously mistaken because this kind of attitude toward the province of Quebec has led to some of the difficulties we are now experiencing there. It has been the tradition of Liberal governments, both federal and provincial, to treat the province of Quebec like a feudal fiefdom. In other words, the idea of this government is to pretend that all good things come from the Liberal party and that any other party is not in the same category and will not have the beneficence to hand out moneys to the province of Quebec. This kind of attitude does more to foster cynicism with respect to politics in that province and in other provinces—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is about time the Canadian people were made aware of what the federal government and CMHC are actually doing in terms of housing. There is one fundamental problem the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has this evening, and it has to do with the memo to which he referred. The problem is that his comments with respect to the memo were absolutely false. This is not the first time we have witnessed hon. members opposite making reference to documents whose authenticity has not been verified. I would have thought the hon. member would want to stay in the good graces of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and not show disrespect for parliament such as the disrespect he showed last Friday and this evening.

In the short time I have I would like to set the record straight. The minister explained to the House on Friday that to make better known to Canadians the federal government's contributions in helping solve the financial difficulties of municipalities he, being unable to make all presentations personally, had on occasion requested members of this House to present cheques on behalf of himself and the department.

Since the inception of this program the Canadian government has given over $38 million in grants to municipalities. That figure represents 38,000 new housing units for Canadians. I think it is important to underline the point that in applying for grants under this program all eligible municipalities are equal. Whether a municipality is represented by an hon. member opposite or by a government member, it is treated fairly and on the merit of its application.

The procedural change in this regard was discussed at a weekly meeting of the minister and his officials on September 6, 1977. A follow-up memo was sent from the president of CMHC on September 12. This was the first and only memo sent to the minister on this subject. I would like to read to the House the contents of this memo, which are as follows:

> At our last weekly meeting of September 6, you asked to establish a procedure for the delivery of the municipal incentive grant payment cheques. It is understood that the minister's office will advise CMHC of those cheques with which it will be involved. The corporation will send those cheques to the minister's office together with the date by which it is committed to provide the cheque to the municipality. The minister's office will arrange for transmission of the cheques to the municipalities concerned.
> This course of action will permit you to make the payment in any way considered appropriate. It will also be required that your office establish procedures to receive and transmit cheques.
> I should remind you that this course of action would not apply to British Columbia where cheques are transmitted by the corporation through the provincial government.

The memo was signed by the president of CMHC and dated September 12, 1977. I think it becomes obvious—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

POST OFFICE—SUGGESTION POSTAL RATE INCREASES POSTPONED UNTIL LEGISLATION INTRODUCED

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I raised a question on February 14 with respect to the further move of the government through the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) to increase postal rates illegally. It is a process which began back in 1968 when the postal rate was four cents. At that time the postmaster general was the Hon. Eric Kierans. He proceeded as is prescribed in the Post Office Act to increase rates by amendments to that act. We have had five postmasters general since that time, and in 1974 when it became necessary again to raise postal rates, this question was specifically asked of the then postmaster general, the present Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). He still recognized the validity of the Post Office Act when he said:

● (2212)

> Rates of postage for domestic letter mail are set out in section 10 of the Post Office Act. Changes in these rates, therefore, are possible only by act of parliament.

Then we came to the time of the Hon. Bryce Mackasey, the gentleman who started the present illegal activity. In a statement in the House on May 21, 1976, he said:

> For some time I've insisted that any increase in postal rates shall only come after I'm satisfied that the Post Office has achieved a satisfactory level of efficiency . . . Recent surveys indicate that the level of service achieved by the Post Office is becoming more and more acceptable to the Canadian people.

That was back in 1976, two years ago, and, I am sure everyone will agree, was a gross misstatement. The then postmaster general went on to state:

> Post Office customers have been asking for a definitive statement on just when rate changes will take place so that they can undertake their own planning. We intend to introduce changes to the Post Office Act which will deal with this question in its entirety.

Mr. Mackasey recognized the legal procedure and what was necessary. He went on to say:

> Meanwhile, there are certain interim measures we must take now in order to give as much notice as possible to allow post office customers to plan ahead.
> To this end, under the authority of the Financial Administration Act, I am introducing an interim change in the basic First Class postal rates on September 1, 1976, from 8c. to 10c. and a further increase in this rate on March 1, 1977 from 10c. to 12c.

That was when we moved into the slippery margin of illegality in respect of these matters. Let me just demonstrate further the evidence to this effect. It is conclusively shown by the Post Office Act itself, in section 10, 1970 RSC, which states as follows:

> The rate of postage on each letter posted in Canada for delivery in Canada is six cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and four cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

That is specifically stated in section 10. There was an amendment to section 10 in 1971, and I remember the debate in parliament which reinforces that same viewpoint. Section 10(1) states:

> The rate of postage on each letter posted in Canada during the period commencing on the 1st day of July 1971 and ending on the 31st day of December 1971 for delivery in Canada is
> (a) seven cents for any letter weighing one ounce or less;—

It specified an increase in January 1972 to eight cents, but all within amendments to the Post Office Act.

We then come to the report of the Statutory Instruments Committee which roundly condemned the government for acting illegally in the matter. The joint chairmen were Senator Eugene Forsey, an eminent constitutional authority, and representing the House of Commons was Mr. Robert McCleave, now a distinguished judge in his native province of Nova Scotia. They jointly brought in a condemnation of the government for its illegal action in this regard.

Notwithstanding this, the postmaster general of last fall, the Hon. Jean-Jacques Blais, made an announcement in this House that there was to be a further increase under the Financial Administration Act. That was notwithstanding the fact that he himself, when before the parliamentary committee last spring in replying to Mr. McCleave, suggested the Post Office Act should be amended in order to legalize the situation. He said:

I fully agree. We have already bitten the bullet on that. We are preparing some amendments and we are going to remove all questions of doubt.

Notwithstanding his promise, he has not done that. As a matter of fact, he approached me last fall and indicated that he was going to introduce amendments to the Post Office Act making it possible to increase the rates from 12 to 14 cents. Having made that announcement to me privately, he then stood up in the House and proceeded on the former illegal basis. The Post Office Act is to legalize what was once illegal with respect to mail openings. Perhaps we will have something further to say when that takes place. Not only has it been done illegally, but it has been done without consulting the major users of the postal system. I have had conversations with representatives from Comac Communications. A letter was sent from their office on December 8, 1977 which arrived in Ottawa on December 20, 1977. That is typical of Post Office delivery.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) would like to reassure the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) that the announcement by his predecessor that increases in mail rates, and in particular the rate of first class mail, would become effective on April 1 of this year was taken in the best interests of both the Canadian public and the well-being of the Post Office itself.

At the time of the announcement it was stated that the increase was warranted, in the light of the fact the Post Office was headed towards an estimated deficit of $717 million in the 1978-79 fiscal year. Cost increases in transportation, energy and labour, and inflationary pressures in general, have resulted in an ever-increasing deficit. It would have been folly to have allowed the deficit to increase uncontrolled. As his predecessor argued in the House, the government used provisions of the Financial Administration Act, namely section 13, to achieve a measure of control on these rising deficits.

The extra revenue generated by the increases will total about $126.5 million. Most of this will come from corporations and little directly from the pockets of the individual taxpayer. Without the announced increase, the Post Office could be operating at a deficit of about $717 million. Surely the hon. member would agree that the current postal deficit is being too heavily subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. The taxpayer is paying a higher percentage of postage costs, and the postal user is paying less. Clearly it is time that we began to restore the balance. The hon. member will understand the government's reasons, reasons which involve operating the Post Office along lines as close as possible to business practices, while still serving Canadians as efficiently as possible.

While first class letter rates for a one ounce letter will go from 12 cents to 14 cents, we can still say with some satisfaction that expressed in Canadian dollar equivalents the Australians and the French pay 21 cents for a first class letter, it costs 16 cents in Great Britain, and 14 cents in the United States. Remember that no increase in first class letters was announced for nearly five years, from January 1, 1972 to September 1, 1976.

When the previous postmaster general made his announcement last year, he said that customers would get sufficient advance notice of the rate adjustments to accommodate their business planning. That is why the increases have been delayed until April 1.

I trust the hon. member understands that we do not increase postal rates lightly, but only when imperative if the Canadian taxpayer is to be well served.

FINANCE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADIAN STEEL EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES NOT HAMPERED BY TRIGGER PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, on February 7 I raised a question and an issue with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) concerning the threat the American trigger price system would be to Canadian steel exports to the United States. This system would apply a duty on all imported steel to the United States in order to make foreign prices equal to American steel prices. The price of Canadian steel is lower than steel of the United States. That is not because we are dumping our steel in the United States; it is because our steel industry is more efficient and has lower costs, including lower labour costs.

The minister said in reply to my question that the Canadian government was discussing this issue with the United States, but that no agreement had been reached. I should like to know whether the minister can now report progress on this matter, and if not will he pursue it with the utmost dispatch and vigour?

My second question was related to the point that the United States trigger price system will necessarily divert foreign steel from areas such as Europe and Japan away from United States markets, thereby posing the threat of dumping in Canada. The minister had no answer to my concern expressed on February 7 referring to this issue. Algoma Steel has already brought to the attention of the government the problem of Japanese steel being dumped in Canada, especially in British Columbia.

I made many representations to the minister about the threat that dumped steel poses to the Canadian steel industry and the 40,000 workers employed in that industry. As well, there are 9,000 steel workers in Sault Ste. Marie alone who are very concerned about unfair foreign competition and the threat this poses to their future employment. I believe the minister has something positive to report on my second concern about steel being dumped in Canada. I hope that this will mean the government will be able to act quickly to stop any dumping resulting from the trigger price system.

I therefore ask the minister to respond in more detail to the two concerns that leaders of the steel industry as well as I myself have raised. We must do everything possible to keep our steel industry healthy and viable.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) has expressed his concern about the impact on the Canadian steel industry of both the American trigger price system and the possibility that imports of steel from foreign sources might increase dramatically. This points out the difficulty in governing a country of this size. Our colleagues in the House from British Columbia from his party as well as the official opposition and the government side have made representations in recent weeks with respect to the exemption of wide flange steel beams in the Anti-dumping Act.

In the face of the actions taken by both the United States and the European Economic Community to protect their own steel industry, our government has been active in its consultations, both with the Canadian industry and with the U.S. and European authorities, to assess the possible implications for Canada of these decisions. There have been frequent contacts between officials and the Canadian steel industry to establish the facts.

The hon. member is right to bring to our attention the possibility that the measures adopted by other countries may have some adverse impact on Canadian steel exports. I want to reassure the House that discussions will continue with a view to obtaining as much assurance as possible that normal steel shipments from Canada to these markets will not encounter undue difficulties as a result of these measures.

As to the situation in Canada, it is important for the House to recognize that the Canadian anti-dumping system is working to ensure that dumped imports will not injure Canadian producers. In the case of steel beams, steel angles and stainless steel sheet, the department of National Revenue moved early last spring to initiate investigations of complaints of injurious dumping of these products. Preliminary determinations of dumping were made early last fall and provisional anti-dumping duties were applied on imports of these products from a variety of sources. In December and last month, the anti-dumping tribunal, in three separate decisions, found that indeed in most of these cases the dumped imports were injuring production in Canada of this type of product.

These decisions have, in my view, helped to reassure the Canadian steel industry that the government can and will act effectively to prevent injurious and unfair competition from imports of steel products.

The Minister of Finance indicated to the House on February 7 that the government was examining these issues carefully to see whether additional steps were necessary. That examination has been completed and, as hon. members know, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) announced yesterday a series of measures to prevent diverted foreign steel from adversely affecting the Canadian steel industry. Briefly, these measures will involve the monitoring of all imports of steel mill products into Canada, the establishment of a task force to collect and analyse necessary data, and accelerated investigation procedures for anti-dumping purposes which will result in preliminary determinations of dumping and the application of provisional anti-dumping duties where appropriate within three months of the start of an investigation. The minister also indicated that the deputy minister of national revenue would use, where necessary, his authority to initiate anti-dumping investigations in the absence of formal complaints.

Hon. members will also have noted that the minister said that the various trigger prices and basic prices in use in the United States and the European community would be among the elements taken into account in deciding whether or not to initiate anti-dumping investigations in respect of steel products.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that my comments demonstrate that the government is thoroughly familiar with the issues referred to by the hon. member, is following these developments with care and, indeed, has already taken steps to ensure that this important Canadian industry will not suffer as a result of the developments to which he has alluded.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:26 p.m.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on Monday, in reply to a question posed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as to whether it was the intention of the government to draw on the stand-by credit of $1.5 billion arranged last September, that "The answer is no, Mr. Speaker", and in view of the statement of the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons yesterday, when asked by the member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) whether he stood by his statement of last Thursday, that "We do not intervene in the marketplace and we let the value of the dollar fluctuate according to the market situation", and "Mr. Speaker, the policy is still the same", and in view of the completely opposite actions announced last night by the minister that foreign loans were to be arranged for support of the sagging Canadian dollar, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That this House unanimously resolve to award the Minister of Finance the Baron Munchausen Award for the most extravagantly mendacious story of this present parliament, and that the Minister of Finance have the length of his nose checked on an hourly basis in order to attempt to avoid the Pinocchio virus that at one time afflicted the hero of the famous Italian saga.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

APPOINTMENT OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES AS TERM EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the museum division within the Secretary of State Department, and the Department of Employment and Immigration in Toronto, are rushing to make temporary employees term employees before the April 1 deadline when DSS will become the sole contracting authority for temporary help services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott):

That this House direct all subject matter to the appropriate standing committee to immediately examine the practice of making temporary employees term employees before the April 1 deadline and that the committee call the Public Service Alliance and the President of the Treasury Board as witnesses.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

REQUEST BANK OF CANADA HAVE ENLARGED POWERS RESPECTING FEDERAL BORROWINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the Canadian government is about to borrow huge amounts of money abroad to support the Canadian dollar; as this will do much to increase the national debt and its financing; and as it is more than high time serious steps were taken to put an end to that ruinous method of financing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That this House urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that he take the necessary steps to amend the Bank of Canada Act, whose main objective is to control credit in the interest of the economic life of the whole Canadian population, so as to allow the bank to grant the Canadian government the long term loans it needs to ensure the economic development of this country, instead of having to beg for foreign credits as it now intends to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CANADIAN CULTURE

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO CULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last year, directly as a result of the Secretary of State's freeze on federal assistance to the arts in Canada, the result of which was, to quote the chairman of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatre, Dr. Gregory Poggi, "in spite of ticket price increases, 67 per cent of our members have had to cut back the number of their productions, 55 per cent have had to lay off staff, 74 per cent have had to reduce the number of actors employed, and 55 per cent have incurred a greatly increased deficit", the Secretary of State was subsequently able to convince Treasury Board to allocate an additional $13.6 million for the pet cultural projects of his department, none of which went to sustain the very cultural institutions of our country which have time and time again proven their worth in promoting cultural expression and dialogue across Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion, would he please put it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a motion, Mr. Speaker; I was just coming to it. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

● (1412)

That the Secretary of State appear before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts to justify his diversion of funds from such cultural organizations as professional theatre companies which Canadians strongly support in their contribution to our national sense of identity and harmony.

USE OF FRENCH LANGUAGE IN ONTARIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present the following motion.

Considering the oppressive tactics designed to deprive Franco-Ontarians of their most fundamental rights, I move, seconded by the hon. members for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) and Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House condemn the federal-provincial coalition of the Conservative Party which refuses to recognize French as an official language in Ontario and regret more particularly the association of Mr. Joe Clark, leader of this party, with this point of view.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST ACCOUNT OF PEIGAN CRAFT LIMITED BE PAID IMMEDIATELY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that a Crown corporation, Canadian Indian Marketing Services, owes a very small Indian handicraft enterprise on the Peigan reserve, by the name of Peigan Craft Limited, the sum of $19,301.20 for goods purchased, and that this account has been outstanding for five months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That this account, plus interest, be paid immediately to save this small industry, which employs 24 people, from brankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ACQUISITION OF NORDAIR BY AIR CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since the application of Air Canada to purchase Nordair has been followed by a combine investigation and since Mr. Robert J. Bertrand, director of investigations and research at the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs published yesterday a press release in which he states his concern about the very large concentration in the air transport industry as a result of that purchase application, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this house discuss that possibility and direct the government and the Canadian Transport Commission to hold public hearings to explain that purchase application by Air Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING PSYCHIATRIC TREATMENT FOR CHILD MOLESTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. At the present time, when a person has been convicted of a child molesting offence and commits a similar offence while on probation, the court does not have authority to place the offender in a psychiatric institution for the duration of the period of probation. The view of many of those involved in the administration of justice is that the courts should have this authority. I therefore seek the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin):

That the government introduce legislation to provide that when a convicted child molester commits a similar offence while on probation, the court may place that person in a psychiatric institution for the duration of the period of probation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MINISTER'S STATEMENT OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question—if he will return to his place—is for the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask the minister why he said one thing here in the House of Commons relative to government policy concerning the dollar, and later, outside this House, made a contrary statement.

● (1417)

I would also like the Minister of Finance to tell the House of Commons why, when he made a statement outside the House which directly contradicted one he had made here, he did not have enough courtesy toward the Parliament of Canada or the people to come into the House of Commons and ask for an opportunity to make a statement on motions, which would have been granted by this side and would have allowed the minister to be subjected to questions about the very vague and troubling statement he issued last night?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I explained to the House the policies of the government, which remain the same.

An hon. Member: You did not.

Mr. Chrétien: The announcement I made was after the closing of the market. I would have expected the Leader of the Opposition to understand there is a market in this field and that I had to wait until it closed to make this announcement. With regard to any announcement of the borrowing intentions of the government, we do not come to the House of Commons to make these statements. So there was absolutely nothing improper in what I did. Of course, the exchange rate of the dollar is always a very delicate matter, and I would expect the opposition to show some responsibility about these things rather than to start with doom and gloom presentations which annoy the people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I was amazed to hear one member of the opposition tell the House that I was protecting the dollar too much and other members telling the House I was not protecting it enough. I have done the proper thing, and the policy remains the same as the one I enunciated yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister has a curious view, if he thinks that the markets of the country allow him, or somehow condone the act of giving the House of Commons information which is false. Also, of course, he did not answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: He did not answer the question as to why he did not come to the House of Commons to make his statement, to answer questions and dismiss any of the concern that his very vague statement might have raised.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My next question to the Minister of Finance is the following: In the very brief statement that he issued last night, the minister said that the government "would shortly be making a drawing under the revolving stand-by credit". Would the Minister of Finance tell the House of Commons and the people of Canada when he will be making that drawing?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to make this drawing in the next few days. When the amount is known, I will make it public. At this time we are in discussion with the banks.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that there is a requirement of at least two days' notice to the banks before recourse to this stand-by credit. Will he tell us when the first formal, or informal advance notice was given to the participating banks relative to the intention to draw upon this stand-by credit?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when the arrangements have been made, I will make them public; but I have nothing else to add at this time.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no reason, relating to confidentiality or anything else, other than a determination to keep facts from this House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is no reason why the minister could not tell the Parliament of Canada when the first formal, or informal notice was given to participating banks. He may well have misunderstood the question; that is always possible, as he misunderstands a lot of things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I would like to give him an opportunity, again, to tell this House when the first formal or informal advance notice was given to the banks relative to the intention to draw upon that credit.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if I were to make a list of the things that the hon. member does not understand, I would need a lot of the time of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I have nothing to add to the previous answer.

An hon. Member: That is sad, sad.

[Mr. Clark.]

BANK OF CANADA ACTION TO BOLSTER VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance, who has repeatedly assured this House that the government's operation in the exchange market is purely an ordinary market maintenance process. In fact, in this House only yesterday he made that statement. At 4 p.m., at a committee of this House, he went further and reconfirmed that the Canadian dollar is a floating dollar. Would the minister, in the context of what he represented yesterday, indicate whether he was aware that on Monday and Tuesday the Bank of Canada became an aggressive buyer of Canadian dollars and showed an entirely different approach to the Canadian dollar than had been seen up to that time?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have always said that the governor of the Bank of Canada intervened so that the market would work in a normal and orderly fashion. That is what he did on Monday and Tuesday. Of course, the government policy remains the same and we do not intend to peg the Canadian dollar which is floating at present. Today, it did fluctuate slightly upward.

● (1422)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement that we have nothing but a floating dollar, would he indicate if he is aware that the Bank of Canada lost something over $200 million in trying to chase the dollar up on Monday and Tuesday? Does he regard that type of outflow as far as our reserves are concerned as simply ordinary maintenance of the marketplace?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that fluctuations in the exchange reserves are known on the first Tuesday of the month. Hon. members and Canadians generally will know at that time what fluctuations there were in the reserves in the month of February. The law does not permit me to say more.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my further supplementary is also directed to the Minister of Finance. As the dollar responded very little this morning to the announcement by the minister yesterday, and as there is continuing uncertainty in the marketplace, triggered to a great extent by the inept handling of this subject by the minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: —would the minister try to give a little clarity to the situation and indicate now what the nature of the foreign borrowing is that he is referring to? Who will he borrow the funds from? What is the term and the interest rate? In short, will he set it out more fully in a statement to the House, as he should have done last evening?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when the news hit the market this morning, the dollar performed very well; it went up to 89.80 cents.

Some hon. Members: Where is it now?

Mr. Chrétien: It is only when a rumour hits the market to the effect that the Tories were to bring about a big scandal, and there were rumours in the marketplace that three ministers were to resign, that the market deflates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I think if the next minister of finance were to be the former president of the Bank of Western Canada the dollar would go down very rapidly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT'S INTENTIONS RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the manner in which the Minister of Finance is coping with this serious crisis makes his predecessor look like an economic genius.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister rather than to the Minister of Finance. Considering that the dollar crisis we are facing abroad is directly related to the crisis in confidence that the government is experiencing at home, which is directly related to the 1½ million people who are looking for jobs, can the Prime Minister indicate if he will take steps to finally show some economic leadership, instead of sitting there smirking his way through a crisis, and bring in a budget which will stimulate the economy and produce some jobs?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members opposite are very ill-advised when they talk about a crisis. In fact, in the month of February the dollar had moved only one point, more or less, and it is not a case of crisis. They are not rendering any service in throwing around a doom and gloom image of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: You are the doom and gloom.

Mr. Chrétien: I have said many times that I do not intend to bring down a budget before the end of March. Since January 1 we have stimulated the Canadian economy as no other western country has done. We have to see the effect of that before moving again. I think it would be perfectly irresponsible to bend under pressure that looks very weak from the other side.

• (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: Who does the minister think he is kidding? When the dollar is at its lowest in 45 years, compared to the American dollar, every person in the country knows it is a crisis and it is time the minister recognized it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the figures released by the minister's own government yesterday show, for the fourth quarter in a row, that manufacturing is only operating at 83 per cent capacity—which means, incidentally, it is three years in a row that more than 15 per cent of the manufacturing capacity in Canada has not been used—will the minister, in the budget that he will bring in, lower taxes for medium and low income earners in order to stimulate the provision of jobs in this country?

Mr. Chrétien: We just did that, starting January 1, when we cut taxes by $100 for seven million taxpayers in Canada, plus the indexing of the income tax exemption, plus a lot of incentive for the industry to grow. We have stimulated the economy through tax cuts starting January 1 by $3 billion. I do not think the hon. member can expect the Minister of Finance to come up with such cuts every three months; it would not make sense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that the very proposals which the minister just rattled off were announced by him in the mini-budget which preceded the Christmas break by two months, and ever since that time the dollar has gone down and unemployment has gone up, I would have thought the minister would have recognized he was wrong last fall and would have decided to bring in a new budget which would stimulate the economy.

An hon. Member: That is a speech, not a question.

Mr. Chrétien: What is the question?

An hon. Member: Resign, Pinocchio.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT MUST BORROW ABROAD

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question stems from the statement made last night by the Minister of Finance to the effect that the government intended to borrow abroad to cover the international trade deficit and support the Canadian dollar. The minister stated a few days ago at the first ministers' conference and also in the House of Commons and elsewhere that Canada's performance was the best among industrialized countries. In that case, would he tell the House why he feels obliged to go and humiliate himself in front of those same countries before the Canadian economy collapses?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have decided to borrow on foreign markets because we have a deficit in our current balance of payments and contrary to what was being done these past few years, provincial governments did not seek substantial loans on foreign markets in 1978. To meet our obligations, we have felt necessary to borrow on foreign markets to compensate for the effect of the deficit in our balance of payments. There is nothing humiliating in that, since it is recognized that savings in Canada are high at this time and that provinces do not have to borrow abroad. So the federal government had to compensate for that situation.

Mr. Laprise: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Judging by his answer, the Minister of Finance seems to think it is necessary to borrow on foreign markets every year.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he intends to consider, before it is too late, the possibility of using a well established Canadian institution—the Bank of Canada—to support the Canadian dollar by making our exports acceptable to other countries.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I issued a release yesterday after consultation with the governor of the Bank of Canada.

SURVEILLANCE OF MPs—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last October, in a letter to the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister stated:

> I can, however, state unequivocally, that as long as I have been Prime Minister of Canada no member of the federal parliament, without his consent, has ever been the subject of authorized surveillance, including electronic surveillance, carried out by the security service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I ask the Prime Minister whether that unequivocal assurance still remains, in view of sworn information that a minister of the Crown and a member of the New Democratic Party were, in fact, subjected to that kind of electronic surveillance.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my letter was written on the basis of the information I had received from the security service, and that information still stands. I understand that as the House opened, the hon. member indicated that he might have some contrary information for the Solicitor General. If that is so, we would like to follow it up.

[Mr. Laprise.]

SURVEILLANCE OF MPs—INQUIRY AS TO EXCEPTIONS TO POLICY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, before I ask the Solicitor General a question in this regard, I would like to say that I corresponded with his predecessor, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, last January 12 but did not receive any response at that time; nor have I received any response since.

A man named Warren Hart has indicated—I believe the Solicitor General has information at this point, and perhaps has had it in the past—that exceptions to what the Prime Minister has indicated still exist. Does the Solicitor General wish to make any statement to correct the previous assurance given the Leader of the Opposition and other party members?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the first point raised by the hon. gentleman, if I recall correctly a letter is on its way relating to the gentleman whom he has identified. On the second point, I have just received the document to which the hon. member refers. Allegations are contained in that document and, as the Prime Minister has indicated, I would like to follow them up.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he intends to make every attempt to have Mr. Warren Hart appear before the McDonald commission, since on my advice he has already corresponded with the commission and, I understand, recently received an acknowledgement.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. gentleman's representations into consideration with all the seriousness they deserve.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—LEVEL SOUGHT BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the Minister of Finance. I ask the minister if the intervention yesterday by the government of Canada in foreign exchange markets means that the policy of the government is to have the dollar supported at 90 cents?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, in that case I would ask the minister why the intervention took place.

Mr. Chrétien: I have explained that the governor of the Bank of Canada has intervened, or operated in the market to make sure that the market operates in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying that going to the commercial banks to borrow $1.5 billion, and making arrangements for foreign credit, are normal operations in the money market? Does he not think it is his responsibility to indicate to the community and to world markets the level at which the government of Canada is prepared to support the dollar, to avoid the kinds of fluctuations that are taking place now?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government is to have a Canadian dollar that floats, and it is floating. The only intervention the governor makes is to make sure that fluctuations are made in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING INFLATION MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I want to ask the minister about a 40-page draft of a bill dated January 12, 1978, which I am holding in my hand and which was drafted in the name of the Minister of Finance. This bill would have serious implications. It is entitled "An act to establish an inflation monitoring agency and to provide for the reporting of financial and other information".

I gave the minister a copy of this bill yesterday in committee, even though he was not sure at that time that he wanted to receive it. Has the minister reviewed the draft, as I have asked him to do, and determined who authorized its drafting and its distribution across the country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this draft was seen by me for the first time yesterday. I have never authorized such a bill. It was circulated to some people but it was never circulated as a draft approved by the Minister of Finance. We have discussed a monitoring agency for the last three years.

Many propositions were put before the last first ministers' meeting. It was agreed that we should ask the Economic Council of Canada to monitor prices and wages after the control period. We have not as yet received an answer on that. However, the bill referred to by the hon. member has not been approved by us, will not be approved and will not be tabled.

DRAFTING AND RELEASE OF BILL ON INFLATION MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Justice. I would like to welcome him back from Vancouver, where he has been doing the job of the Minister of National Revenue. The bill to which I have referred carries the name of D. Maurais, who is an employee of the legislation section of the Department of Justice. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice who in his office instructed D. Maurais to draft this bill, and who authorized the release of the bill across the country?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the officer's name; therefore, I will have to find out who he is in order to ascertain from whom he received his instructions.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF ACTIONS OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I would like to question the Minister of Finance, not on Canada's credit but on the minister's credibility. There is no question that he misled the House on Monday and Tuesday and we want to ascertain whether that was done intentionally or unintentionally. Unquestionably, the Bank of Canada was attempting to stop the financial haemorrhage of this country on both Monday and Tuesday afternoons by massive expenditures to bolster the Canadian dollar. Were those actions of the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Bank of Canada without the minister's knowledge and authority, or with the minister's knowledge and authority?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be careful about the terms he uses. There was a transfer of money, not an expenditure. There was a trading of Canadian dollars and American dollars, not an expenditure. The hon. member wants to create the impression that there was an expenditure. As I have said many times, the governor of the Bank of Canada intervenes to make sure that markets operate in an orderly fashion. The policy has not been changed; the policy is the same.

I explained in French earlier that we want to borrow because, as everyone knows, at this time of the year the borrowings of Canadian institutions abroad are not enough to cope with the balance of payments problems we are having. That is why we have decided to borrow abroad. That is not at all related to fixing the rate of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, the minister told this House that the actions of the bank were ordinary and normal. There was a transfer of $65 million on Monday and a transfer of over $200 million yesterday afternoon. Transfers like that are not normal or ordinary. There is no question that the minister misled the House.

Mr. Lawrence: The question is whether the minister misled the House intentionally, or unintentionally. Did the minister know of those extraordinary transfers on Monday and Tuesday when he was speaking in the House? Did he know, or did he not know, at the time he was speaking in the House, about those extraordinary transfers?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the figures used by the hon. member. Figures with regard to the quantity of reserves in the month of February, and their fluctuation, will be known when that information is tabled on the first Tuesday of next month. I admit that there was some intervention by the governor of the Bank of Canada on Monday and Tuesday and last week; I am aware of that. I met with the governor of the Bank of Canada on Monday, as well as on Tuesday. I met him today.

Mr. Clark: You met him on Monday?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, I meet him regularly. He is a very able person. I am not at all embarrassed to consult him, and I think he gives me good advice.

Mr. Lawrence: The minister is now admitting that there were extraordinary transfers on Monday and Tuesday. They were certainly not normal. He came to this House and deliberately attempted to give the impression that there were not extraordinary measures being taken on Monday and Tuesday. I ask the minister now either to apologize to this House for intentionally misleading it, or to give a far better explanation of the fact of political cowardice in not coming to this House last night and telling us the truth—one or the other.

● (1442)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there have been questions in the House on this topic since the beginning. I have stated the government's policy. Yesterday I had to wait until the market closed to make the announcement.

Mr. Stevens: Why didn't you announce it on Monday?

Mr. Chrétien: Because we made that decision yesterday, and I could not announce something on Monday when we made the decision yesterday afternoon—

Mr. Clark: Why yesterday?

Mr. Chrétien: On top of that, I was in a committee of the House yesterday afternoon; the chairman allowed members of the opposition to ask me questions on that subject, and I replied to those points. Whenever the government decides to borrow money, never in the past has the minister been obliged to make the announcement in the House of Commons.

Mr. Stevens: It is ludicrous.

Mr. Chrétien: I love the House of Commons. I am always here because the opposition make sure I look good.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Lawrence.]

INDUSTRY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT APPROVAL OF EXPANSION OF STEEL MILL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Foothills company has asserted there can be 90 per cent Canadian content in the construction of the Alcan pipeline and the Deputy Prime Minister has said there are 100,000 man-years of employment in that project, and in view of the supreme confidence of the Deputy Prime Minister in Canadian capacity and capability, I ask the Prime Minister whether his government will give immediate approval to the $80 million expansion of the Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Company operations in Regina and Edmonton so that, in fact, Canada will have the capacity it needs to compete and obtain the 100,000 man-years of employment.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had given me notice of his question, I could have followed it up with the minister responsible for regional development. Currently there is an application which will be processed in the normal way.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this application has been pending for several months, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion replied to me on February 1 that it was going to take many more weeks, contrary to the confidence the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have expressed about Canadian capacity and capability, will he now have his Minister of Regional Economic Expansion approve the $80 million expansion of the Interprovincial Steel Company plant? Without that expansion, Canada could not operate with sufficient capacity to provide the man-years of employment that the Deputy Prime Minister says we can obtain.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course, this government has the confidence, and the minister has the confidence, stated by the hon. member. But so has the president of the corporation. I think it is only the hon. member's party that does not have the confidence that these jobs will be created, and they say they will be going to Japan, the United States or somewhere else. We have confidence they will be created here. The hon. member should get together with his leader, who seems to say that we are not going to sell any of this pipe; therefore, why should we lend money to a company that wants to build it?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES FOR INDUSTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The recent performance of the dollar makes it obvious that international opinion regarding the way the economy of this country is being run is pretty much the same as the opinion in Canada, where the latest Gallup poll shows that 27 per cent of Canadians think the government is running the economy satisfactorily, and 59 per cent say it is being run very unsatisfactorily.

My question to the Prime Minister is: Does he not consider that the time is long overdue to introduce productivity incentives to be paid in direct proportion to increases in productivity, to make our products more competitive, and in that way restore confidence in the economy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I agree with the hon. member. I indicated in the House not so long ago that productivity in Canada had improved, compared to that of the United States; we were beginning to close the gap. The United States is still more productive than Canada, in relative terms, but the situation has been improving here. The decisions taken last week by the premiers of the provinces and myself have added to the determination by all governments to make sure that the private and public sectors are competitive.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the government's own paper, produced by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and released within the last ten days, states that productivity in Canada remains 20 per cent below that of the United States—showing that it is not moving up and it is still far too low. As the Prime Minister said last Thursday in this House that our price and cost performance is still very unsatisfactory, will he not now do something in the interest of getting the economy of this country moving and introduce these incentives, which are the only measures that will improve productivity, make our products more competitive and restore confidence in our economy?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I agree that productivity must improve in Canada. I disagree with the hon. member when he says it has not improved: it has improved.

Mr. Hees: Your own paper says it has not improved.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is stating a static figure, Mr. Speaker; he should refer to the facts.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—USE OF RESERVES TO IMPROVE SITUATION

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Could he tell us how long the payment of some $1.5 billion out of our contingency foreign exchange reserves will successfully support the Canadian dollar, if its value continues to drop?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is an agreement between our banking institutions and the government of Canada. I do not know exactly how many years it will last, but I should say seven or eight years, and we can avail ourselves of these additional funds at any time. I indicated yesterday that for a while we would obtain a line of credit from these institutions and the agreement we have signed with them will run for at least seven years.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADORS TO AND BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs: it is in connection with his recent and highly commendable announcement regarding the establishment of a Canadian embassy in the Emirate of Kuwait. I ask the minister if he can advise whether it is the intention of the Kuwaiti government to appoint an ambassador solely accredited to Canada. Further, can he advise if progress has been made on another suggestion of mine, namely, the establishment and appointment of resident Canadian ambassadors to Amman and Damascus?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer definitively whether the government in question is going to establish an embassy in Ottawa. I will make inquiries. Of course, the fact that we are establishing an embassy in Kuwait indicates that they will be entirely welcome here, and I hope they will establish an embassy in Ottawa. I will get an answer for the hon. member.

The other two posts to which he has referred are on our list for consideration as early as possible. But, as I think the hon. member knows and as I explained in committee, we have certain constraints from a financial point of view which affect the speed with which we can move in opening up these highly desirable missions.

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—POLICY ARRIVED AT WITH BANK OF CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When the Minister of Finance answered the hon. member for York-Simcoe yesterday, he said, as reported at page 3055 of Hansard:

Our operation in the exchange market is limited to maintaining orderly marketing conditions, and will remain so.

When he said that to the House of Commons yesterday afternoon, had he met with the governor of the Bank of Canada, and did he know there was a change in the marketing operations?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the intervention of the governor of the bank yesterday was to make sure that the market would operate in an orderly fashion. That is the policy of the government; it has not changed, and it is still the policy today. I have absolutely nothing further to reply. Unfortunately, I do not know why the hon. member finds a contradiction in that statement. I did nothing to contradict myself, and was quite open with the House on this subject.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the reason I was glad to be recognized by Your Honour was that the minister mentioned that he loves the House. If he loves the House of Commons, he must respect it and therefore tell the truth to the House. I ask the minister to answer my question and not ramble around it.

My simple question is this: When the minister made the statement to the House of Commons yesterday, had he met with the governor of the Bank of Canada, and did he know there had been a change in the orderly marketing conditions that he said were going to remain the same?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I stated a while ago that I had met the governor of the Bank of Canada on Monday and Tuesday. I even met him again at noon today at a purely social function, not to discuss business matters. The governor of the Bank of Canada intervened yesterday afternoon in the marketplace just as he always does, because it is his responsibility to make sure that the market operates in an orderly fashion, to ward off the effects of undue speculation. Such has been the government's policy. It will remain unchanged, although our tactics may vary from day to day.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, this question is very important, and I am not trying to use too many adjectives. At the time the minister met with the governor, was he advised by the governor that the bank was going to become an aggressive buyer of Canadian dollars and there was going to be a change in policy? If that advice was given, was it given before the minister gave his answer in the House yesterday?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know who told the hon. member that the bank was an aggressive buyer: they were intervening yesterday, as they do regularly, to ensure that the market operates in an orderly fashion.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

CANADIAN CULTURE

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO CULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. It relates to the very real concern of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres, a group that the Secretary of State met with yesterday. Since two-thirds of the members of this group have had to cut back productions, and more than half have had to lay off staff because of the freeze over the last two or three years—a situation they describe as intolerable—what did the minister propose to them, in view of the present situation and the disastrous impact of the policies of his department? In light of the fact that the December 16 letter from the president has not yet been answered, what action is the minister prepared to take to deal with this difficult situation?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I met with them, not once but three times yesterday. The letter to which the hon. member refers has been answered. I answered it last night; I gave it to the president of the association. I am, of course, extremely concerned about the impact of restraints on funding of theatres. There has not been a freeze, as the hon. member has suggested. There has been an increase in funding to the Canada Council through which the operation of theatres is funded. This increase is equivalent to the level of increase which has generally taken place in government departments.

Nevertheless, since theatres are peculiarly subject to the impact of inflation, there has been restraint in real terms. I hope that representations such as the one the hon. member has made will make governments at all levels more sensitive to the need of funding for these people.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the minister's sanguine reply, this situation is being described as intolerable. Some 100,000 people intend to send a series of petitions to the minister to relieve the situation. The only announcement the minister has made was last fall with regard to the $13.6 million. That amount is being heavily questioned by members of this group and others as being used for purposes other than the legitimate development of Canadian culture. Did the minister alleviate fears in that regard? Can he indicate how this new money that was given, in light of previous budget constraints, is going to help this very serious situation?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear because there seems to be some confusion on the other side of the House. Our increased funding was not a diversion, as one of the hon. member's colleagues suggested earlier, from the regular funding which has in the past been received. It was, as the hon. member correctly stated, new funding, a great deal of it to the Canada Council, the Film Board and other cultural agencies which will receive assistance, albeit indirectly—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Not this group.

Mr. Roberts: It will assist this group because a significant portion of the money is directed to supporting theatre in Canada.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—INTEREST ON STAND-BY CREDIT DRAWN BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance with regard to the stand-by credit he referred to in his statement last night. At what rate of interest was this stand-by credit available to the government of Canada? How much did it cost, in his estimation, per day, per week or per month? What has it cost the government of Canada to draw on this stand-by credit since last September?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the answer immediately. I answered in precise terms other questions asked in the House of Commons when we established that line of credit with Canadian banks, but I will find the specific answer. The cost was ⅜ per cent, but anyway I would not want to quote a figure at random, and I will give the hon. member the exact figure when I get it.

[English]

REASON FOR BORROWING FROM ABROAD TO BOLSTER VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my qustion is for the Minister of Finance. The minister said that what has been going on is ordinary and normal. For the past ten years the government has not had to go abroad to bolster the dollar. What is ordinary and normal about that? Why did the Minister of Finance yesterday completely misrepresent the situation, and then come along today and say everything that is happening is absolutely normal and ordinary? I ask the Minister of Finance to answer that question.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that we have to borrow in foreign markets because the provinces and other Canadian institutions are not borrowing in foreign markets as expected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: That is the explanation I am giving. It is exactly what I have reported. I cannot be more frank about this subject than I am being at the moment. I do not think I can give any further explanation.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the minister has just said he cannot be more frank than he has been. He is a lot more frank than he was yesterday, and the explanation is different. The fact is that nobody in this country believes this government with regard to anything the government is saying in terms of economics. My question is this—

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the opposition. If I had given some explanation of that before the market closed, the hon. member would have been the first to complain that I was not being careful enough. A little bit of pressure from the opposition will not prevent me from being responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Are we going to go through a number of weeks, perhaps months, listening to a complete exposé in terms of what the government's version of the economic situation is, knowing that at any time we can have a complete contradiction put forward no matter what was said in the question period? Is the Minister of Finance prepared to tell this House, in not equivocal but unequivocal terms, what the situation is and what the government plans to do about it in the coming months, if not the coming year?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have replied many times on what is the policy of the government. We do not intend to fix the rate of the Canadian dollar; we are floating the Canadian dollar. Intervention of the banks is always done under a policy that has been established for a long time in order to maintain orderly marketing positions. It was the same on Monday, Tuesday and today; I have not changed my policies. I do not know why the hon. member wants me to change something I have not changed.

REDUCTIONS IN HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT REASONS FOR CHANGE IN POLICY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, after listening to our financial problems I know how important this question is. It is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of mounting health care costs and the health care cuts that have been announced, necessitating major changes in administration from active care to chronic care to extended care as quickly as possible without prolonging the illness or a decline in the quality of treatment, which will mean a fall of $150 a day to extended care of $14.10 per day—and obviously extended care will have to be used more—has the minister conferred with her counterparts in the provinces to see that they have oxygen for patients with chronic heart diseases and emphysema, and minor illness can be treated, avoiding the trauma and cost of transferring a patient to hospital by ambulance for a few hours of treatment in many cases?

Committee Report

● (1502)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member and will be pleased to transmit it to my colleagues in provinces other than the hon. member's province.

I should make it clear, however, that each province is at a different stage in the development of extended health care service, and for that reason we could not impose upon all the provinces the minimum standards that were applicable under the hospital insurance and medical care programs. It is the responsibility of the provincial authorities to define what will be the less costly programs and equipment for them.

GOVERNMENT POLICY DISCOURAGING PROVINCES BORROWING FROM ABROAD—REASON FOR CHANGE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when the government changed its policy of discouraging the provinces from borrowing abroad, as this was the announced policy of this government and the minister is now complaining that the provinces are not borrowing enough from abroad.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I have stated the facts, Mr. Speaker; I said that at this time the provinces are not borrowing enough from abroad: that is all.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. Since the minister refers to the current account deficit in connection with his reason for borrowing abroad, can I assume he must have a pretty up to date estimate of what the current account deficit will be during the fiscal year? Can the minister give us that figure?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will examine that question and give an answer if one is required.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1978-79

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1979, was presented by the Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the main estimates of federal expenditures for the fiscal year 1978-79, which I am tabling today, reflect the government's determination to ensure that Canada's economic recovery will be sustained and that the growth trend of federal spending will remain below the growth trend of the gross national product.

I am able to inform the House that the government has lived within the expenditure framework I made public last February. Total expenditures for the fiscal year 1977-78 were set at $44,450 million and, as was the case in 1976-77, we fully expect total spending to be at or below this ceiling.

This is the third consecutive year that the government has disclosed its over-all expenditure framework, including both budgetary and non-budgetary outlays, amounts set aside for supplementary estimates and those submitted in the main estimates. It also includes all expenditure transfers to provincial governments and all transfers to individuals.

I point out that the percentage increase in total federal spending declined from 28.3 per cent in 1974-75 to 18.4 per cent in 1975-76, down again to 10.2 per cent in 1976-77, and dropped to 8.2 per cent in 1977-78. In short, Mr. Speaker, the government committed itself to restraint three years ago, has lived up to that commitment, and will continue to abide by that commitment. Restraint is, and will remain, a key concern of ministers in their ongoing review of policies, programs, and proposals.

Major changes have been introduced in the budgetary allocation process to improve further the effectiveness of cost controls, and to ensure that spending decisions conform even more rigorously to government priorities. Further changes are under consideration.

Treasury Board dealings with federal departments and agencies during the past year have provided ample evidence that the spending psychology within the government has been significantly altered. Of course we still face a number of rigidities in our attempts to stabilize federal expenditures further, some of which I will later draw to the attention of the House.

The notion that restraint is a temporary posture, a bitter medicine that we all have to take in this or that year but not in later years, the notion that the Treasury Board is somehow obligated to find additional funds for every worth-while program expansion or new program, and the notion that all is needed to get these funds is to join the spending queue—these notions, Mr. Speaker, have been definitely shattered. As a result, those who might have expected the government to splurge in this new, pre-electoral fiscal year will be disappointed.

As already noted, I am disclosing today, for the third consecutive year, not just the main estimates proposed for federal departments and agencies in fiscal year 1978-79, but the total expenditure framework established by the government for the same period.

Main estimates include budgetary outlays of $46,476 million, to which must be added net investments and advances of $1,774 million, for a total of $48,250 million.

The inclusion in main estimates of several expenditure items of a recurrent nature, which were previously submitted to parliament in supplementary estimates, has enabled us to set realistically the reserves for contingency outlays at $1,550 million for the rest of the year.

Taking into account the usual lapse of spending authority, total expenditures in 1978-79 for the full year are forecast at $48,800 million. This amounts to an increase of 9.8 per cent, less than the presently expected increase in the value of the gross national product for the same period. It also means that, in real terms, federal outlays will increase by about 3.5 per cent.

Even though we expect inflation to abate during the next 12 months, the government sector, as all others in the country, will still have to bear cost increases.

I am pleased that the first ministers reached a consensus last week on the need to limit the growth of expenditures by all levels of government to less than the nominal growth rate of the GNP.

Hon. members will recall that the fundamental goal set by the federal government regarding spending restraint was not limited to its own expenditures. On the contrary, it was made quite clear, as the former minister of finance reiterated in his May, 1976, budget speech, that the trend in total spending by all Governments in Canada should not rise more quickly than the trend in the gross national product. This goal has now been endorsed by all levels of government in this country.

There will be some who will choose to emphasize that our spending growth target for 1978-79 is somewhat higher than that one for the current fiscal year. Hon. members will recall that we went out of our way last spring to indicate that the very low percentage increase of 8.2 per cent shown for 1977-78 reflected, to some extent, structural changes in the budgetary system. It reflected not only the government's efforts at restraint, but also changes introduced in financing of a number of well established shared-cost programs with the provinces, particularly the shift in such financing from direct payments to tax transfers.

Had it not been for these one-time, non-repeatable changes in our budgetary system, the percentage increase in 1977-78 outlays would have been about 10 per cent as, indeed, was noted by opposition critics at the time of my tabling of the estimates on February 16 last. Accordingly, the target of 9.8 per cent adopted for 1978-79 is very much within the spending trends set when the government's restraint program was introduced. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this ceiling is below the trend in nominal GNP growth.

Mr. Stevens: Including inflation?

Mr. Andras: Yes, as the hon. member opposite has said, including inflation, a factor and a formula recognized by all 11 first ministers of this country at their conference the other day as being the appropriate target.

Although federal expenditures will be contributing during the next 12 months to the growth of aggregate demand in Canada, we are not relying on more spending to give a major push to the economy. To the extent that additional short-run stimulus has been judged necessary, the government has acted mainly through tax reductions so that the recovery may be sustained through private sector expansions. Past experience has shown that any attempt to hold the economy up by federal spending alone is in fact self-defeating. Such stimulus is inevitably short-lived and soon leads to a renewal of inflationary pressures.

The government has therefore resisted the urging of some hon. members opposite to increase its expenditures by more than is required to maintain federal services and to sustain the economic recovery. At the same time we have resisted pressure from other quarters to cut savagely federal programs and apply some rigid form of fiscal rigour.

As much as anyone, the government wants the federal public service to be lean and trim, and we are cutting the fat wherever we can, but we are holding our hand whenever we realize that in cutting deeper we would be sticking the knife into somebody else's guts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: I would have liked federal expenditures to grow even less rapidly in the next fiscal year, but I had to recognize that at this time an abrupt retrenchment of federal outlays would have played havoc with provincial finances, would have pulled the rug out from under private consumption, and would have deprived Canadian business of orders which they critically need to raise production and productivity.

To understand why this is so, one must look at what I call the anatomy of federal spending growth. It has been repeatedly pointed out in the past that more than 40 per cent of so-called federal expenditures actually take the form of transfers to provincial governments and individual Canadians.

Over the years the federal treasury has taken on statutory obligations and commitments, duly approved by this parliament, to share in the financing of provincial activities and programs. These transfers are what I would call the provincial dimension of federal spending. This year they will absorb more than $9.8 billion which, I repeat, are included in our total expenditure plan of $48.8 billion.

Fiscal payments, particularly equalization grants, can be used to finance the full spectrum of provincial programs.

Others, such as grants for hospital and medical care, social assistance and post-secondary education, are made with the understanding that provincial governments will maintain those essential services.

These payments to the provinces are an essential component of Canadian federalism. They are a fundamental premise to Canadian unity. The government and, to a degree, parliamentarians on both sides of this House are frequently criticized for the level of federal expenditures. But the fact that right off the top about 20 per cent, this year almost $10 billion, of our resources simply pass through the federal treasury to the provincial governments for these governments to spend, is a fact that is not generally recognized.

These transfer payments occasionally give rise to some recrimination from the provinces, particularly the wealthier ones, which argue that they introduce an element of rigidity in their expenditure planning. Yet so far no one has been able to come up with a workable and equitable alternative.

Tax transfers alone will not do the trick, since they would mostly transfer tax revenues to the wealthier provinces and violate the government's commitment to the principle of equal access to basic services for all Canadians, wherever they may live, in whatever province they dwell.

I must point out as President of the Treasury Board that the so-called rigidities of transfer programs to the provincial governments are not in fact one-sided. These programs give rise to a built-in growth factor in federal outlays which must be taken into account in assessing the extent to which the federal government has managed to restrain its own expenditures. In the 1978-79 main estimates, which I am tabling today, for example, federal payments to provincial governments under six major programs will increase by almost $2 billion, about 46 per cent of the increase in our total spending. In other words, were it not for this provincial dimension in federal outlays, the projected rate of growth in our main estimates in 1978-79 would be about 4.8 per cent rather than 9.3 per cent.

One of the reasons why provincial governments will be in a position to ease, or at least increase only moderately this year, the burden on provincial taxpayers is that the federal government will continue to transfer more than one fifth of its resources to these governments.

A still higher proportion of federal outlays will finance a variety of direct payments to individual Canadians; more than $10.3 billion, or 21 per cent of total expenditures during the next fiscal year. These payments supplement the incomes of millions of Canadians, senior citizens, growing families, workers temporarily unemployed or acquiring new skills, native citizens and veterans. These payments are largely spent on food, shelter and other basic necessities. In other words, old age pensions, family allowances and other federal payments to individuals finance a significant element of private consumption in Canada. Furthermore, the steady growth of private consumption is required, as we all know, to stimulate business activity, production, and employment.

Accordingly, both current economic considerations and general concern for the well-being of Canadians have led the government not to propose changes in statutory provisions that require an additional $926 million this year be provided to maintain the value of social benefits and to extend those benefits to the growing number of Canadians eligible for them in 1978-79.

Had we chosen to propose changes so as to hold at current levels the aggregate value of payments to individuals as well as transfers to the provinces, the increase in main estimates this year could have been limited to a mere 2.7 per cent. Let there be no illusion that social benefits could have been transferred overnight into tax benefits, because that simply is not so.

There is nothing sacred about social programs. They have been revamped before, and they will no doubt be revamped again. We have resolved that, in this area as in others, spending restraint will be implemented to the benefit of Canadians and not to their detriment. This means that restraint in social programs must at all times take into account the real needs of Canadians as well as general economic conditions.

I would like now to draw the attention of hon. members to further evidence of the government's commitment to restraint, namely, its over-all policy on manpower requirements and compensation for the public service in 1978-79.

First, I am pleased to announce that for the second consecutive fiscal year the increase in authorized man-years subject to Treasury Board control will be held at six tenths of 1 per cent. This represents an increase of 1,848 man-years, for a total authorized level of 325,120.

I point out that authorized man-years are decreasing in 18 departments and agencies, while 18 others have been allocated the same number of man-years as in the fiscal year 1977-78. Additional man-years have been authorized for 33 departments and agencies. These increases are concentrated in a few labour-intensive and generally service-oriented government operations, such as the Post Office, the Department of Public Works, the Department of National Defence, Correctional Services and the RCMP.

It should be noted that the six tenths of 1 per cent increase in federal Public Service manpower requirements will be only one quarter of the projected growth of the Canadian labour force in 1978-79. Despite impressions to the contrary, our records during the past ten years show that the Public Service growth trend has remained below that of the labour force. I am able to announce for the fourth consecutive fiscal year that the total number of senior personnel man-years in the departments and agencies under Treasury Board man-year control will remain at the same level.

This freeze is being extended for a second consecutive year to a key component of the senior personnel categories, the senior management complement, which is comprised of senior executives and officers in equivalent positions. As in the past, provisions have been made for a measure of flexibility in the re-allocation of authorized senior personnel man-years and senior executive and equivalent positions between departments and agencies, in order to meet the tasks of highest priority.

Finally, I am pleased to be able to inform hon. members of the compensation policy to be adopted for collective bargaining in the federal Public Service during the post-control period. It will be recalled that in the green paper entitled "Agenda for Co-operation" the government outlined the policy to be adopted. In the months since that paper was published the Treasury Board secretariat has been developing means of implementing that policy. In the process, my officials and I have consulted with Public Service bargaining agents, provincial ministers and officials, and spokesmen for the private sector. The result of this process has been to confirm the government's belief that the policy proposed in the green paper is the right way to proceed.

Briefly, the government intends to change the emphasis in its previous bargaining policy. This change of emphasis will involve explicit consideration of the aggregate value of pay and benefits in relation to hours worked. In our terms, that is described as total compensation. It will also involve much more emphasis on comparisons of total compensation with private sector employers wherever possible. Where comparisons with private sector employers are not possible, for example in the case of teachers, the past practice of making comparisons with other public employers, or taking into consideration established internal relativities, will continue.

In addition, it is intended that compensation in the Public Service will not lead compensation levels in the private sector to ensure that the federal government will not fuel wage inflation. To this end, where compensation for public servants in a bargaining unit is significantly greater or less than that of their outside counterparts, the Treasury Board will seek to negotiate rates of increase which will allow comparability of total compensation to be achieved over a reasonable period of time, taking into account the magnitude of the difference. I hope this strengthens public perceptions of the government as an efficient provider of essential services at reasonable cost, all of which are fundamental goals of the government expenditure policy for fiscal year 1978-79.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not take as long as the minister. I have no need to build a forest of verbiage behind which to hide. I will just expose the facts and let them speak for themselves.

We have just seen performed this year's version of the annual estimates medicine show, that great show put on by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) each year. By using his best flim-flam, he tells the House how moderate and restrained the government is with taxpayers' money. Every year since I have been here, I have heard successive presidents of the Treasury Board using the same type of flim-flam. They have had to use more of it lately. Frankly, the medicine they are attempting to sell is enough to make you sick.

Ten years ago, for fiscal 1968-69 the total federal government expenditures were $13.3 billion. In these estimates we see projected expenditures of $49.8 billion, which is nearly $50 billion, or four times as much as the expenditures ten years ago. There are cancers which do not grow that fast.

Last year's deficit, the difference between expenditures and receipts, was estimated to be approximately $9.2 billion. That is more than the total expenditures the year before this administration assumed office. Obviously we cannot afford the type of spending which was carried on last year. How can we afford the expenditures called for this year amounting to approximately $49 billion? It is small wonder that the Canadian dollar is of little value on the international money markets. Our government treats Canadian taxpayers' dollars with no respect at all. How can we expect the international money markets to treat it any differently?

There is an explanation in these estimates as to why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) chose last night to announce that he is seeking foreign aid to prop up the Canadian dollar. I am sure when international money markets see this particular document, the government's plans for next year, what little confidence they have left in the Canadian dollar will be diminished.

In October, 1975, the government indicated that inflation was getting out of hand and that we are living beyond our means. At that time it imposed wage and price controls. It ordered corporations to keep their profits flat. Also it ordered that no individual wage earner could receive more than 8 per cent in the first year, and subsequently down to 6 per cent. During that period, if a wage earner earned the maximum allowable increase, his salary would have risen 22 per cent. During that time, government spending rose 44.4 per cent. In other words, what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) peddles to the rest of the country is too strong for the government.

The supporting documents produced by the President of the Treasury Board are literally full of flim-flam. The minister claims that spending will increase by only 9.8 per cent. He arrives at that by indicating that last year's main estimates, budgetary and non-budgetary, were $44,142 million. He had a reserve figure of $1,850 million, as well as normal lapses of approximately $872 million. Therefore the total spending was approximately $45,102 million. This year the estimates call for $48,250 million, budgetary and non-budgetary; the reserves are $1,550 million; and the lapses are $1 billion. That is what produces the round figure of 9.8 per cent. If we use the same estimates this year for reserve and lapses as were used last year, instead of these cooked up figures which the President of the Treasury Board has put in this document, then the increase is 10.9 per cent and not 9.8 per cent. Also the flim-flam is exposed in the budgetary expenditures. We are assuming that the loans described in the blue book are in fact loans and not some flim-flam. So we are talking about money that is being spent; we are not lending it.

If you compare expenditures for the coming year with expenditures for the fiscal year just ending, the increase this coming year over the last year is 12.96 per cent, or close enough to 13 per cent for the government to make the honest claim that spending this year is going up by 13 per cent. That is not restraint, and it is flim-flam to claim anything else.

This document is full of flim-flam. There was the claim that last year the increase was only 8.2 per cent. The minister said there were structural adjustments and the increase might have been 10 per cent, which is the same as this year. The structural adjustment which he was able to claim on behalf of the government, the great restraint in growth of only 8.2 per cent, was in fact the transferral of the burden on the provincial governments, amounting to $1 billion.

At the bottom of page 4 of the minister's statement he states how the government has had to cut the fat. What it has done is to take the cherry off the top of a double malted deluxe chocolate sundae. On page 6 there is an attempt to blame the provinces for the increase. The minister states that if it were not for all these funds which we have to send to the provinces, our growth rate would only be 4.8 per cent in increased expenditures. Every one of the programs referred to is a federal one. They are in areas of provincial jurisdiction and the provinces are administering them, but they are federal government programs, and to blame the increase on the provinces is plain flim-flam.

At the bottom of page 6 of the minister's statement there is an attempt to blame the recipients of social benefits, old age pensioners, and those whose benefits have increased by $926 million this year. The reason those expenditures have had to go up is to allow those persons to have an opportunity to catch up on inflation caused by the profligate spending of this government over the last decade. It is a chicken and egg situation. You caused the inflation through profligate spending, and the result is that sort of increase. But the implication that somehow these persons who receive social benefits are to blame and are at fault for increased government spending is, in my opinion, irresponsible and plain flim-flam. I do not think the Canadian public is going to buy that medicine.

We do not think the medicine which the flim-flam man is trying to sell us will cure the problems facing the country. It will not make us well, it will make us sick, and we strongly suggest that the President of the Treasury Board look at the debate of February 2 when our party laid down part of a program which, if implemented, will result in substantial reductions in government spending. I would advise the government to take a look at some of the speeches given by my leader and others in my party indicating what it is possible to do, and I would also advise the government to do something about the estimates procedures. In a sense, the whole thing is an exercise in flim-flam.

Parliament has no real control over government spending. All we can do is expose the situation to a little light. In fact the funds are committed. It is a charade to suggest that parliamentary approval will be given, because we have no opportunity whatsoever to influence the spending habits of this government. The only resource people have if they want to put spending under control is to change governments, which I hope they will do.

I would also like to re-emphasize the importance of the government and the Treasury Board dealing with the recommendations of the Auditor General respecting the form of the estimates. As the Auditor General stated in 1975, and in 1976, and in 1977, the procedure for passing the estimates is totally hopeless in terms of providing parliament with an opportunity for meaningful examination. Let me quote paragraph 2.18 in the latest Auditor General's report. It reads:

> . . . a comprehensive study be made with a view to revamping the form of the estimates so that the information they contain would be more meaningful and useful to parliament and so that the approved estimates would be the cornerstone for a fully effective government expenditure control system . . .

If we are going to bring government expenditure under control, we must do something with the estimates procedure, with this charade and flim-flam in which we engage every year with apparently little impact upon the spending habits of this profligate government.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is a pretty sad and perverse document we have been handed today which holds no promise that the government either understands, or cares to deal with, the serious problem and scandal of unemployment.

I should like to paraphrase the minister's statement to make it read in a more likely way when he says that the statement today reflects the government's determination to ensure that Canada's economic recovery will be sustained and that the growth trend of federal spending will remain below the growth trend of the gross national product. Unfortunately, about the only thing that the statement seems determined to do is to make sure that this country continues at the highest level of unemployment in its history. This is an irony and I do not blame the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for being upset. I am upset myself, but for other reasons. I can see why the hon. member for Calgary Centre would be upset because, when the election comes, we will have the strange picture of the Liberal party running on the Tory platform.

Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, what the government has done is to cut its expenditures. It is fine to say that the government has not done it and to point to the growth in some of the figures, but in real terms expenditure has been cut, and to that extent the stimulation that is required in the economy has been reduced. At one time the Liberals used to have better taste; they used to steal ideas from the NDP. But now all we see is the government rushing as fast as it can into a Conservative position.

The problem extends beyond what has been tabled today by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). There is a current wave of conservatism in this country which has placed the total burden of responsibility for unemployment and slow growth on government spending. It is the new and mistaken orthodoxy of our day, and the government has bought this error holus-bolus in an effort to appease the electorate. Rather than live up to its responsibilities—sometimes responsibility and leadership involve telling the public the truth instead of knuckling under to the current prejudices—it has opted out. It has become a chicken. That is why we have the present document before us.

Let me put some figures on the record in addition to the statement I have just made. Let us take a look to see what the relationship is between unemployment and government spending. It is very instructive to do this, and I apologize that the figures I am using are not exactly correct because the unemployment figures are in annual percentages and the estimates are on a fiscal basis. However, the figures are close enough to give the kind of picture which I think is important to see.

In 1974-75 the increase in estimated government expenditures was 28.3 per cent. Unemployment was at 5.4 per cent. In 1975-76 the government really worked hard, bought the new conservativism and reduced the increment in government estimates and expenditures to 10.2 per cent. Unemployment went up to 6.9 per cent. In 1977-78—the government's proudest year—the government held its spending down to an increase of 8.2 per cent, but at what a cost! Unemployment went up to 7.1 per cent. If we plot the pattern of government expenditures with unemployment, there is a clear relationship. As government expenditures are reduced, especially in a time of recession, the unemployment rate goes up.

What we see today is a government which has lost its capacity for leadership. It has knuckled under to a conservative reaction—which will change—in order to get votes in the coming election.

The government has abdicated its responsibility to the army of 1.5 million unemployed. I think that is a shameful and disgraceful way to behave.

Let us go on to another theory to which the government has been subscribing. This theory is reflected in the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board. The theory is that as you cut government expenditures, give bonuses to industry, and give corporations tax concessions, they will provide employment. It is a very simple theory. Perhaps I should say it is a simple-minded theory under which the government gets out of the way and private employers are supposed to rush in to fill the vacuum, except that despite the billions of dollars which have been given away in the last three budgets to the private sector, the private sector simply has not responded. When the government gets out, there is nothing to fill the vacuum.

I am not saying that the government should be in a spending position all the time or that it has to stimulate the economy all the time. What I am saying is that when we are faced with the problems associated with 1.5 million unemployed, that is not the time for the government to get out of the economy. This is not the time for the government to abdicate its responsibility because there is nothing to take the government's place. The private sector will respond only if the stimulus comes from the government. It is unfortunate that the private sector does not understand this. Who is going to invest if people are not working? Where is the purchasing power going to come from if people are not working?

At the recent federal-provincial conference the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) stated that there were billions of dollars worth of energy projects, public expenditure projects, to put forward in order to create jobs, yet the President of the Treasury Board comes to this House a few days later, gives the lie to that statement, and says the government is getting out of the spending business completely and that the private sector is going to take over.

In politics it is important for people to get elected. Everybody wants to be popular at any given time, but it is also important for people to live up to their responsibilities. In this case the responsibility is that of the government. It might have done the government some good and made it look as if it had some integrity if it had lived up to its responsibility.

The statement made today seems to indicate that the government does not feel it important to provide leadership. By getting out of the economy the government will not solve our problem, and it has displayed its cowardice in its presentation today.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for letting us have a copy of the statement he made in the House a moment ago as well as the papers that accompanied it which enabled us to have a quick look at the estimates for 1978-79. We cannot conceivably examine very objectively such a large volume in a few minutes but I would still like to deal mainly with three points that caught my attention while I was examining the papers I just referred to and as a result of the statement by the President of the Treasury Board.

I would also like to congratulate the officials of various departments who worked on the preparation of these estimates. I feel this book is written in very small print and very small figures. I recognize that there were certainly thousands of hours of work put in this and I think that Canadians at the end of the year will realize that we were dealing with billions of dollars because this is a budget of $4.35 billion. Today we talk about billions of dollars as we used to talk about ten dollars. Nothing frightens us much anymore as figures also come under the pressure of inflation. The effect of inflation is felt not only in consumer prices but also in the area of debt servicing.

With respect to inflation it is regrettable that a cut of $323 million should be made in the budget of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at a time when we need further funding in this area to properly meet the demands and needs of Canadians. The cut is unfortunate. The government might tell us: Canadians did not use all the funds made available to them. That is possible. But if they did not, it is because interest rates are too high in relation to their capacity to pay. This is due to people being a little worried over their future, and a lack of confidence. They dare not go into the building industry at a time when housing should be encouraged, and in all aspects of the construction industry which plays a major and decisive part in the economic development of any nation. With a buoyant building industry far more tradesmen with all kinds of skills would be employed and I need to go through the whole list of them, ranging from foundation diggers to roofers, chimney workers and so forth. This is why I think this is a very important area which should have been encouraged through lower interest rates. That way, the government would have been able to get back part of the interest it has to pay out to promote development in this area, as was the case, for example, in the Maritimes and eastern Quebec, through tax credit. The idea behind all that was to help industries in this part of our country.

Another point I would like to talk about is the debt. I was shocked when I looked at this earlier. It is terrible to see a responsible government, which has all the tools to do something truly useful—we have to read this to believe it— according to the table, in 1975, which is not so long ago, the net debt of our country was $19,275 million. From the start of Confederation in 1867 to 1952, over a 100 years, the debt grew to $11,185 million, and from 1952 to 1975, our debt increased by $8 billion. This is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, when we consider that in 1975 the debt was $19 billion and that in 1978, it will reach $38 billion, which means that it will have doubled. There has been no war, no disaster, we did not develop a merchant navy, we have done nothing very special, and our national debt has doubled.

This is the criticism that I want to make, but at the same time I would like to make a practical suggestion that the government can follow if it wishes. If not, I wonder what the national debt will be in four years since it has doubled in the last four years. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, it costs us $25 million a day, the debt grows by $25 million a day. The figure would be even more shocking if this were broken down into hours and minutes. I do not have the time to do it, but others who have the time can do so. I invite the unemployed of Canada to consider this. They have the time to figure it out and they will understand why they are unemployed because it is shocking to see that we have come to the point when we pay $25 million a day on the national debt and when we are not even able to know to whom the interest is paid. I understand that there are people who own bonds, but that interest is paid to big financiers.

I see here that there will be an increase of $1,150 million this year for interest alone. The hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) could build a merchant marine with this and we would get something out of it. This is a cancer. Someone talked about a cancer in his speech earlier, and he was right.

Mr. Lefebvre: The opposition is a cancer!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The hon. member says that the opposition is a cancer, but if it is, we have a seriously cancerous democratic system because it has happened that the cancer has changed sides and this can still happen. But this remains a cancer, a necessary cancer. The opposition is not there only to criticize, but also to inspire wisdom in those who are responsible for public funds, that is the members of the cabinet. It must be a very discouraging situation for a finance minister who will have to get all the money that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) requested today in his estimates. It will have to be an income budget to pay the expenditures. In a healthy administration, expenditures and income should be balanced, and when they are not, we get into debt. For individuals, getting into debt means that you are not able to balance your budget, which is not a good thing. This is no good for a municipal government, let alone a provincial or national government. I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and hon. members of cabinet the solution would be to amend the Bank of Canada Act. You feel this is funny. You are making fun, but if your former leader Mr. King was here now, he would tell you: well boys, you have not made much progress over these 50 years. Because he said there had to be a Bank of Canada, a bank for Canadians, a bank to serve Canadians, a tool to manage the nation's credit in order to create a healthy monetary system in Canada. He said so. If we are to succeed, we should therefore amend that. Let us be up to date. In 1978, the Bank of Canada can only make loans to the federal government up to certain percentages of the estimates, and for six months. How far can we go on that?

The Minister of Finance proposes to go and borrow abroad, in order precisely to protect our Canadian dollar. I read in a newspaper today the Canadian dollar will soon drop to 80 cents. This will happen for the precise reason we are doubling our national debt; if we owe more than we have, creditors will become tougher. We will soon learn about that. Creditors are beginning to lose confidence in this country's economic stability and our Canadian dollar.

I therefore very sincerely urge the minister to propose an amendment to the act to allow our own bank to lend the money our government needs. We would be lending ourselves money. Figures computed here at home by ourselves and for ourselves are as valid as those borrowed in Italy, Germany or New York, because this is only figures. So we have means, we can do so because we are a responsible parliament. In view of this, we should change our ways of financing the public sector to prevent such huge and discouraging debt increases.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think it is appropriate in the circumstances to understand the importance of the step taken by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) today in the tabling of the estimates. They are, of course, central to the whole process of the examination of the estimates by parliament. His remarks are important, and it was for that reason that extensive participation took place by members opposite. It must be remembered, however, that the purpose in tabling the estimates and in referring them this afternoon to the standing committees is that extensive questioning will take place at each of the standing committees on the separate estimates.

Although the Standing Orders under which we are operating provide for questions to be put in circumstances of statements on motions at this time, if there are any questions at all I would think that they ought to be of a very general nature since the whole subject of the government's spending program will be the subject of questions in the standing committees. I would not necessarily eliminate the questioning at this time, but I would expect that if questions are to be pursued they will be minimum in number and of a very general nature.

Mr. Lincoln Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly conduct myself accordingly with respect to your remarks. But I would say with all due respect that it is a little unusual; we did have fairly extensive questioning the last time. Notwithstanding that, we know the minister has perpetrated a further con job on the Canadian people, and as my friend from Calgary has indicated it is the biggest flim-flam that he has seen.

There are a few things which need explaining and I will try to speak to my area which is the Public Service. The minister indicated from here on, I hope this is what he said but I do not know what he said in this regard, that salary increases were to be based on total compensation. This is a new principle about which not much is known. I wonder if the minister can give us some indication of what he is talking about in terms of total compensation. When does he expect it to come into play, or is it in play now? Can he advise whether the provincial representatives with whom he and his officials must have met of late have also accepted this phenomenon, or principle as the case may be, of total compensation?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to elaborate now, or at a future date in more detail. We have in fact been bargaining in the federal Public Service since about 1967 on the concept of wages and salaries and some identifiable benefits on the basis of comparability with the private sector where such comparisons could be established. We now intend to widen that to include all quantifiable forms of remuneration, not simply wages and salaries, although they obviously remain the most significant, and to establish comparative compensation levels on a total compensation basis in the private sector wherever that is possible.

In discussions with the provinces, they have agreed with the concept of bargaining on a total compensation package basis. They will have somewhat more difficulty in establishing comparability than we will because the make-up of our federal service is such that we think we can establish comparability for about 80 per cent of our people, whereas they have more firemen, policemen, and that kind of content in their make-up. Therefore they will have somewhat less. In some provinces they say that no matter what the comparability might be, their basic problem is simply that of ability to pay. The concept is being discussed with the bargaining agents. We hope to institute it soon, more precisely probably after April 14 at which time the current sanction controls come off.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, there is another problem that has certainly exercised public servants, particularly those who are making over $30,000. I hope the minister can clarify this right now. When the minister was asked questions about this matter, particularly by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), he once again flim-flammed the hon. member. I want a specific answer so that those involved in the Public Service will understand what is in the mind of the minister. They believe that all those above the $30,000 salary bracket will be removed from the bargaining unit. That is a simple statement in the form of a question. Can the minister give us an assurance, one way or another, on what is happening in this regard?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not make such an announcement on this occasion. I will take this opportunity, however, to state that I have noted since I replied to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) that I made reference to the Finkelman report the other day. I have since been advised that is incorrect. The Lambert Committee on Executive Compensation did use it, but the other gentleman did not. I apologize for that. In answer to the hon. member, I will again say that if and when we have made a decision on the question of management or other exclusions, we will make it known in the House in the usual form.

Mr. Alexander: Before the minister makes a decision and announces it in the House, I hope he will take the unions involved into his confidence in order that we do not have heavy-handed unilateral steps. The minister said we are talking about a 9.8 per cent increase in terms of government spending. My colleagues will want to pursue this further. At the present time we are asking labour to restrain themselves to the extent of 6 per cent. As I understand it, under the AIB, the government, once again wrong in terms of its prognostications, indicated that the inflationary rate would be about 4 per cent this year. We all know that is way out of line. I would like to know whether those figures were given any consideration. What part of that 9.8 per cent is related to the inflation rate? Why was there no consideration given for using the inflation rate of 4 per cent which the government indicated through its AIB would be the guiding principle for this particular year?

Mr. Andras: The hon. member, as is only rarely the occasion, is mixing apples and oranges and grapes and bananas and coming up with the usual mélange of a very strange salad. To get to the point, as I indicated the 9.8 per cent represents about a 3½ per cent real growth. The rest is attributable to inflation which is applicable to government expenditures as to all other expenditures in the country. I do not see how he can possibly relate the 9.8 per cent to the wage guidelines which are one component of inflation but not the only reflection of costs related to cost increases.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) whether he will answer one of the questions put to him by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) which escaped him. Considering the two matters which he has discussed with regard to public service salaries on compensation, on the one hand a new approach or a new total package and, on the other hand, the possibility of setting a level above which there is to be no collective bargaining, can the minister say whether these two matters have been discussed with the bargaining units, the representatives of the employees? If not, will there be such discussion before a policy is finally determined?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes to both questions. Discussions have begun, are continuing, and will continue before any final decision is made with regard to possible amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. I assure the hon. member of that. I regret I missed it in the question of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) a few minutes ago.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my questions to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) begin with respect to his estimates fact sheet No. 3. On page 5 of that fact sheet he sets out various increases and decreases, summarized as to the major changes in his estimates. I would first draw the minister's attention to the decreases.

Included in those decreases, for example, we have the Export Development Corporation showing an amount of $365 million less compared to the current fiscal year. Will the minister indicate if any account has been taken into consideration of the fact that the Export Development Corporation is borrowing externally? They have traditionally borrowed through the Minister of Finance, but they are now borrowing in the general public market. It is on the covenant of the Government of Canada. I wonder if included in that decrease is an allowance for the amount they will be borrowing externally as opposed to borrowing directly from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Andras: I think it is quite clear that we intend to permit the Export Development Corporation to go to the private market for certain funds. We have named a target amount here. If he is talking about borrowing externally, it is under the authority of the Minister of Finance to permit the Export Development Corporation to do so. That is the intention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: As the president of the Export Development Corporation, Mr. John MacDonald, had indicated that they may be committing themselves this year to a further $2 billion in export financing, and he anticipates that will be totally financed externally in the sense that he will not be drawing on the Minister of Finance or the Consolidated Revenue Fund, will the President of the Treasury Board quantify for us what would be the amount that the Export Development Corporation increase would be as opposed to the decrease if that adjustment were taken into account?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I regret I cannot give the hon. member the exact detail. I am familiar with the area. There are some plans under consideration which either the Minister of Finance or myself will be making known in more detail soon. The final details have not been set out yet. I will try to get that for the hon. member.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker: I will allow a final supplementary to the hon. member for York-Simcoe, and conclude questioning with the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

Mr. Stevens: Surely in the over-all context of Treasury Board figures, they have some figure for the external borrowing that will take place in the Crown corporations listed here? Perhaps an easier way to express it would be all the non-budgetary amounts that heretofore would have been included as an estimate, but now, because they are being borrowed in the private sector, will not be included. Am I correct in assuming that certainly $1 billion will be added and it could be as much as $2 billion?

Mr. Andras: In these estimates and these statements that have been made, the fact sheet limits the identified amount which we have clearly flagged and the hon. member noticed it—that is the $365 million that we have identified with regard to the Export Development Corporation. At the moment there are no other specific items that we have identified in respect of the spending plans for 1978-79. The $365 million is flagged, and the hon. member noted it.

Mr. Nystrom: In the remarks made by the minister he said words to the effect that he was concerned about sticking the knife into somebody else's guts. Since I thought he was concerned about programs that affect ordinary people, may I ask why the government chose at this time to eliminate the consumers' skim milk powder program which amounted to $17.9 million last year and helped low income people?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I think that kind of detail could be conveyed to the hon. member in committee by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) or, if he is involved, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) on an appropriate occasion.

Mr. Speaker: I shall invite the hon. members for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) and Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) to put a question. The hon. member for Richmond has the floor.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Can the President of the Treasury Board tell the House, since the national debt went up by $9 million from 1977 to 1978, increasing debt servicing charges by 20.3 per cent, whether he intends to propose new restrictions to parliament with a view to putting a stop to this extraordinary growing indebtedness?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is known, of course, that the debt will increase this year. I would point out to hon. members that as a percentage of the economy, or as a percentage of government expenditures, it is still much below what it was 15 or 20 years ago. While it is rising now, it is not at a level which has not been sustained or is not sustainable in an economy the size of this country's which will probably reach $233 billion in the coming fiscal year—that is the total GNP of the economy. The federal public debt is a portion of that but is not, in our view, an alarming proportion at this time.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the well known and traditional propensity of successive Liberal governments to buy their way into power in the province of Quebec, I wonder if the minister could explain to the House the very obvious imbalance, in respect of major capital public works expenditures? In the province of Quebec public works expenditures and the National Capital Region expenditures together total over $164 million in this election year. In contrast, in the province of Ontario the public works capital expenditures and the National Capital Region expenditures total $41.5 million, that is, $164 million against $41.5 million. Can the minister explain such an obvious imbalance in these figures?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to let my colleagues, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) or the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), who is responsible for the National Capital Region, note this question and deal with it in great detail for the hon. member. There are many factors involved, however, commitments for the completion of buildings, and obviously there is a fairly major expenditure involved in buildings in the city of Hull, as part of the National Capital which happens to be in the province of Quebec. This is a decision which was made some years ago and on which work is being completed now. I shall ask my two colleagues to reply in detail, and I am sure they will look forward to it.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Introduction of bills.

Mr. Lawrence: May I just—

Mr. Speaker: First reading of Senate public bills.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have just finished denying a supplementary question to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin). If I grant one, I have to grant two. I think there has been adequate questioning.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please; order, please.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 56 to 60 inclusively, 550, 694 and 1,298.

[Text]

YUKON NATIVE BROTHERHOOD—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 56—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Was any financial assistance given by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or any other department to the Yukon Native Brotherhood since the Brotherhood was organized and, if so, by year, what was the amount?

2. How much of the amount was used to pay legal fees and/or other technical expert consultants?

3. How much money went to native people participating in the work of the Yukon Native Brotherhood?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is concerned: 1. Yes. Contributions: 1971-72, $130,506; 1972-73, $205,650; 1973-74, $510,-726; 1974-75, $485,697; 1975-76, $181,764; 1976-77, $373,-720; 1977-78, (commitments) $9,772. Organization and Maintenance, 1977-78, (commitments) $15,000.

2. Approximately $60,735 was expended on consulting and legal fees.

3. The department does not have the records required to repond to this question. While the Yukon Native Brotherhood accounts to the department that funds are spent for the purposes for which they were requested, the accounting does not reflect whether a consultant, a lawyer, or a supplier hired by the brotherhood is or is not a native person.

In so far as the Department of Employment and Immigration is concerned: 1. 1974-75, $8,220; 1975-76, $10,200; 1977-78, $6,406. Total, $24,826.

3. $24,826.

In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: 1. Yes. Year, 1976-77. Amount, $3,700.

2. None.

3. $3,700.

In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. The following amounts were granted to the Yukon Native Brotherhood under the department's core funding programme: (b) 1971-72, $155,000; 1972-73, $155,000; 1973-74, $155,000; 1974-75, $176,325; 1975-76, $186,555; 1976-77, $186,555.

2. (a) Generally 5 per cent of the amount granted each year is required to pay for technical consultants such as auditors and financial advisors.

3. Core Funding Programme: Core funding grants are given to status Indian, Métis and non-status Indian and Inuit associations with demonstrated support of their declared constituents for costs in the following areas: (a) staff and salaries, (b) travel expenses, (c) office costs, (d) expenses of meeting, (e) professional services. The Yukon Native Brotherhood received the grants indicated in 1 above primarily for its work with its constituents.

In so far as other Departments are concerned: Nil.

INDIAN BROTHERHOOD OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 57—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Was any financial assistance given by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or any other department to the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories since the Brotherhood was organized and, if so, by year, what was the amount?

2. How much of the amount was used to pay legal fees and/or other technical expert consultants?

3. How much money went to native people participating in the work of the Indian Brotherhood?

Finance

FINANCE

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 26

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the notice I sent to you earlier today I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 26 to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the fact that the decline in value of the Canadian dollar has reached the point where government intervention has become necessary.

For the last 15 months the Canadian dollar has been falling steadily. This week it was at the lowest point since 1931. The Minster of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has announced, deliberately outside this House, that extensive borrowing is being arranged to halt its further slide. In view of the high cost of maintaining the dollar and the inflationary pressures that will result from a further decrease of its value, I think it is essential that the House of Commons should consider immediately this very serious economic emergency.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At almost exactly the time I received the notice pursuant to Standing Order 26 from the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), I received a similar notice from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the crisis of confidence in the Canadian dollar as reflected in the dropping of the Canadian dollar to the lowest level since the great depression of the 1930's and the announcement made last night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that Canada, for the first time in ten years, will have to borrow internationally to protect our falling Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier, both hon. members gave notices to the Chair pursuant to Standing Order 26 of their intention to make this application at this time. Of course that gave me the opportunity to examine the provisions of the Standing Order and the subject matter in order to determine, as is required of me, whether I believe that the subject to be discussed is a proper one to be discussed within the terms of the rule.

Standing Order 26 reads as follows:

Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration . . .

Those are the basic terms to which I must address myself. I have to give consideration under paragraph (5) of the rule in determining whether the matter should have this urgent consideration, and whether an opportunity to discuss it in a satisfactory fashion is likely to come up in the ordinary course of business of the House in the near future.

● (1622)

Having examined both of those provisions, and the other relevant provisions of the rule, I have initially come to the conclusion, subject to what I am about to say regarding paragraph (16)(a) of the rule, that all of those conditions appear to be met by this matter, which indeed is a matter of great importance, and an important matter involving the administrative responsibility of the government.

However, I think I should refer briefly to the provisions of paragraph 16(a) because they have formed an important part of the decisions under this rule in the past, that is, the right to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of this rule is subject to a number of conditions, the first of which is, under subparagraph (a):

> The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration;

In the past I have had occasion to set aside applications under this rule on the ground that the matter was a continuing problem and not one of an urgent nature. Certainly by taking a very restrictive stance in respect of the interpretation of the word emergency in that subparagraph I could very easily frustrate the operation of this rule altogether.

However, as I have also said many times in the past, there is one very important aspect of debates pursuant to Standing Order 26, and that is that they are always on a topic that is immediately relevant, of attention and concern throughout the nation, and therefore provide members of this House with an opportunity to discuss matters of importance at a time when they are immediately relevant and on the mind of the Canadian public.

Therefore I am reluctant to take too restrictive a stance in such a way as to frustrate the operation of the rule, for I have said in the past that if a rule is on the books it obviously means there are occasions on which it must be permitted to precipitate a discussion. Yet, in order to do so, I am called upon to make a value judgment, it seems to me, as to whether or not a situation is an emergency.

Of course the provisions of the rule are such that I cannot hear any argument. Invariably in situations of this sort the basis of the very central argument that will occupy most of the debate quite probably is that the matter is not in fact an emergency, but is a regular occurrence and has been treated in the ordinary and regular way. Certainly those are the answers that have been given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) today.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Chiar is in a rather invidious position. To take too restrictive a stance, again, as I say, would mean it would be almost impossible to get the benefit of this rule and to bring the House to a discussion of a matter which is important and requires urgent consideration, although it is not necessarily an emergency or a crisis, as the words have been used.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In the particular circumstances of this case, and I think everyone will understand that each case has to be examined on its own merits, having satisfied myself that every other aspect of Standing Order 26 has been met, and having some doubt in terms of the application of paragraph 16(a) and the specific word emergency, I have concluded, after very serious reflection, that I ought to give the benefit of the doubt to the applicants in this case in order to precipitate a discussion of this very important matter in this House this evening.

In accordance with paragraph (8) of the rule I am obliged to ask whether the applicants have the leave of the House. In these circumstances both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby have made applications to put a motion, the text of which is formalized by the rule, so fortunately I do not have to pick and choose between those motions. The motion will be "That the House do now adjourn", and it would be my proposal to consider that the motion, when it is taken up, will have been moved by the hon. Leader of the Opposition and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Clark: That is certainly agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the terms of the rule I see no reason not to invoke the provision for setting the debate at eight o'clock this evening. I am obliged by paragraph (8) of the rule to ask whether the hon. members have leave of the House to proceed with the debate at that time. Shall the hon. members have leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to quarrel with your decision, but on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The only question now is whether the hon. members have leave to move the motion. If not, I have to ask whether they have the support of a certain number of members. Do hon. members have leave to put the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: If there is any question as to whether they have leave I am obliged to read paragraph (8), which is as follows:

> If Mr. Speaker is satisfied that the matter is proper to be discussed, the member shall either obtain the leave of the House, or, if such leave be refused, the assent of not less than twenty members who shall thereupon rise in their places to support the request; but, if fewer than twenty members and not less than five shall thereupon rise in their places, the House shall, on division, upon question put forthwith, determine whether such motion shall be made.

Do the hon. members have leave to put the question later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Are there 20 members or more who support the application?

And more than 20 members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 26 there will be an order granted that at eight o'clock this evening the motion will be moved by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, "That the House do now adjourn."

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I got up because I welcome the debate. The only difficulty and puzzlement I am having is in the fact that the opposition has had about four or five occasions in the last two weeks to debate this thing and it has not considered it important enough to raise the matter at those times.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling orders of the day and recognizing the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Milne), the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) rises on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—STATEMENTS IN AFFIDAVIT ATTACHED TO PETITION TABLED BY HON. MEMBER FOR CENTRAL NOVA

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Earlier today the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. Mackay) tabled a petition in the House to which there was attached an affidavit by one Mr. Hart. In that affidavit there are certain statements made which I find rather disturbing, and I think there is need for some further investigation on the part of myself and my party regarding certain activities of surveillance in respect of my person in conversation with other persons.

Since the petition was tabled in the House the hon. member for Central Nova has shown me a picture of the person who made the statements in the affidavit, and I identified such person as being the one who chauffeured a car in which I was a passenger with another person and we did conduct a conversation. I would, therefore, at this time reserve my right to raise this matter at a later date after my party and I have fully examined the contents of the affidavit and all the relevant material attached to that deposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have not had an opportunity to examine the contents of the petition that has been put forward, and now referred to by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). I certainly take his intervention at the moment as notice regarding the preservation of his right to raise a question of privilege in respect of anything that may be contained therein.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this important bill before the House, a bill to establish the authority to proceed with the northern pipeline, or the Alcan pipeline as it is called.

Last year the NDP argued for the Alcan pipeline route as opposed to the Mackenzie Valley route to bring natural gas down from the Arctic, primarily for United States markets. We argued that the Alcan pipeline route through Alaska, the Yukon, British Columbia and Alberta would be far superior to the so-called Mackenzie Valley route from the High Arctic southward through Canada to the United States.

In that debate last August we outlined the conditions we felt had to be met in order to protect people living in the area and to ensure that Canadians got the major benefits in terms of contracts and work. Our position has not changed in that respect.

What worries myself and my colleagues is that the bill before us incorporates an inadequate treaty which has since been signed between Canada and the United States concerning this matter of a pipeline. The treaty has a large number of very important deficiencies which mitigate against the best interests of Canada. That is why my party objects to the bill before us. It merely ratifies a treaty which has some very serious flaws in it.

The Alcan pipeline is one of the largest construction projects which Canada will ever experience. It has the great potential of being a project which will benefit Canada in terms of employment, steel contracts, and making Canadians enthused about its success. It will be a unifying force. At the same time the project is fraught with many disadvantages.

Unless this bill is changed and amended, we will have a bill, and hence a treaty and a project, that will not maximize benefits for Canadians. I do not think any hon. member should be in a position of having to vote for a piece of legislation which does not maximize benefits for Canadians. This project will cost $10 billion in total. The Canadian portion will cost $4.2 billion. There will be 730 miles of pipe in Alaska, 2,025 miles in the Yukon, British Columbia and Alberta, and over 1,000 miles in the United States south of the 49th parallel.

This is a pipeline designed primarily to bring American gasoline to American markets. As Canadian natural gas consumers we will not benefit from this pipeline unless at some point in the future a lateral spur line, called the Dempster lateral, is built to tap Canadian gas in the Mackenzie Valley. Canadian consumers will not receive gas from this pipeline once construction is completed, and indeed may never receive gas from it. Therefore we are doing our American friends a favour. We are providing a land bridge for them to move Alaska gas through our territory to the United States markets.

If everything goes on schedule, the pipeline will be completed in 1983. At this stage the pipeline is envisaged to bring American gas to American markets. Indeed the Americans owe Canada a great favour for allowing this route to exist. If we did not allow it, Americans would have to liquefy the natural gas from Alaska, put it in tankers, and move it by ship down the west coast of the United States. That would cost the Americans much more than the proposed project. In return for that favour it is legitimate for Canadians to demand some sort of benefit. Once the project is completed, Canada will not receive gas from it. Therefore it is quite logical that Canadians should receive the benefit of the maximum amount of construction and steel contracts necessary to complete the Canadian portion of this natural gas pipeline.

The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) promised that the pipeline treaty and this bill would mean Canadian manufacturing firms in the steel industries, and in other areas such as the manufacture of valves, compressors and so on, would receive 90 per cent of the contracts for goods and services. Also he promised that we would get 100,000 man-years of employment in manufacturing, construction, and other related economic activities. One must remember that 100,000 man-years does not mean 100,000 new jobs.

If the Dempster lateral line between the Alcan line and the Mackenzie Valley is not built, it is important to remember that we will receive only 68,000 man-years of employment. That must be kept in mind when reading newspaper headlines which indicate that Canada will be guaranteed an automatic 100,000 man-years of employment because of this project.

One has to ask the question: will the Dempster lateral be built? On the basis of my research it appears very doubtful the line will be built. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board have indicated that 1990 is the earliest we will require the Dempster spur line to bring Canadian gas from the High Arctic to Canadian markets. Recent discoveries of natural gas in western Canada may push the need for Arctic gas even further into the future. Approximately ten trillion cubic feet of natural gas have been discovered in the past two years in western Canada alone, and there is optimism for more discoveries this year and the year following, which will total approximately 60 to 70 trillion cubic feet. With that 70 trillion cubic feet of natural gas in western Canada it is unlikely we will require the Dempster spur line in 1990 or even in the year 2000.

When we talk about the so-called rush to get Arctic gas we should remember that it is at least three times more expensive than western Canadian gas. It does not make economic sense to move more expensive gas from the Arctic down to southern Canadian consumers, if there is the potential in western Canada at one third the price. It is only logical to proceed on the assumption that the project will be the Alcan route without the Dempster lateral. Therefore the investment reduces from $4 billion to $2.5 billion, as well as meaning a reduction to 68,000 in the number of man-years of employment for Canada.

Perhaps at some future date the Dempster lateral will be constructed. Thus it is wrong to say that this project is a $4 billion investment and a 100,000 man-year project for Canada. It is a much smaller project than the Deputy Prime Minister and the government would have us believe. Even if it is a smaller project, it has a potential to help the unemployment situation and the sagging economy we are now experiencing because of a decade of economic mismanagement under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues.

Will Canadian steel companies get the contracts to build the line? That is my very important concern, coming as I do from a steel community where Canada's third largest steel company is located, namely, Algoma Steel. When I look at article 7 of the pipeline treaty between Canada and the United States I find that it states that the supply of goods and services to the pipeline project will be on generally competitive terms. What does that mean? To illustrate what it means and why I am concerned about it, I should like to quote what the American secretary of energy said when the treaty was negotiated between Canada and the United States. He told the American Congress on September 23 of last year:

> The agreement is particularly advantageous to the United States by providing ceilings on every aspect of potential U.S. liability while creating new incentives for efficient construction on a portion of the project that would normally be subject to exclusive Canadian jurisdiction.

In other words, what Mr. Schlesinger is saying is that the advantages to the United States will be maximized while the advantages to Canada at best will only be optimized or, at worst, minimized. When we say that the bidding has to be on generally competitive terms, that means of course we are opening the bids not just to Canadian steel companies but to American steel companies, as well as to companies in Europe and Japan.

My fear, the fear of the NDP, is that without guarantees in the bill before us which will provide that Canadian steel companies will have the lion's share or the majority share of the contracts to supply the pipe and associated parts, Canadian companies will not be able to win the 90 per cent of the contracts that the Deputy Prime Minister promised us. I do not say we will not win them because we are not competitive. Indeed we are. Our steel industry is one of the most competitive in the world. We are able to sell our steel cheaper than the Americans are, for example, because we have modern plants and equipment, our labour costs are lower, and the cost of many of our raw materials is lower. But the key phrase here is "fair competition".

If we are guaranteed fair competition, as the president of Stelco said, he has great confidence that Canadian companies will win the contracts. But out in the hard world of international trade this concept of fair competition is one that is quickly eroded. What happens is that foreign governments have various means, through subsidies, tax policies and transportation policies, of subsidizing their steel companies to the point that they can sell their steel products at below the cost at which Canadian companies are able to produce steel here at home. That is what worries me, the ability of foreign steel producers to underbid Canadians because of unfair competition policies.

I am not drumming up some bogeyman, some imaginary case. We know this has happened in the past. But Algoma Steel has demonstrated before the Anti-Dumping Tribunal that in the past Japan has been dumping steel on the Canadian market as below cost. It is important therefore to the Canadian steel industry which employs 40,000 steel workers, and to the company in my constituency, Algoma Steel, which employs 9,000 steel workers and which will benefit indirectly by the Alcan pipeline because it will be able to supply steel for fabricating by Stelco and the other plants and it will be able to take up the slack in other areas, that we do everything possible to ensure that our steel industry gets the contracts and the jobs for this massive pipeline project.

There is a long history of unfair foreign competition in steel. There is, of course, the outright dumping which Japan has practised. That is easier to spot and easier to take action against. But also, as I have mentioned, there are hidden subsidies by government, and other forms of assistance, which make foreign steel often cheaper than we can produce here at home. I would remind the House that it was Japan, not the United States, which won the contracts to build the U.S. pipeline, the Alyeska route through Alaska. That shows to what degree the Japanese have been able to corner contracts once we get out into competitive bidding on the world markets. I would also remind the House that U.S. steel in the fall of 1977 bid on a gas pipeline from Mexico at 20 per cent below the cost of a comparable Canadian pipeline. So in the past Americans as well have been able to outbid Canadian companies on pipeline contracts.

We know that the National Energy Board has recommended a 56-inch diameter low pressure pipe, which of course is good news for Canadian companies. Stelco and Ipsco will be able to manufacture that kind of low pressure wide diameter pipe. But let us not forget that the Americans as well were the ones to ask for the 56-inch pipe as an option, contrary to what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is telling the public. He told us that U.S. firms cannot produce 56-inch pipe, but the U.S. technical committee said that that should be one of the options and there is a U.S. company, namely, U.S. Steel, which has the capability of producing a 56-inch pipe. Also, Japan, Italy and West Germany will be able to produce this wide diameter pipe. It is not only Canadian companies which will be manufacturing this pipe.

I should like to draw to the attention of the House what the National Energy Board said in its report when it recommended a 56-inch diameter pipe. This is what the NEB said at page 6 of the report:

> The choice of 54-inch or 56-inch diameter systems over 48-inch might result in minor diminution of Canaidan content of component parts. To some extent this will depend on the lead time available for Canadian manufacturers to respond to business opportunities.

The point there is that that should sound a warning which the National Energy Board acknowledges when it says there may be a minor diminution of contracts. Knowing the world trading scene and the experience other countries have had in the past with building pipelines and component parts, we must not forget that.

Our factories have not had an opportunity to build compressors and valves for this kind of wide diameter pipe, so there will be a race to see who can build them the fastest and the cheapest. When we get to world competition it may be that Italy, Japan, Germany, or even the United States, because of the greater size of their steel industries, will be able to produce the component parts cheaper than the industry in Canada. I worry that we might lose out on these component parts because of the increased diameter of the pipe.

Another point we should remember is that the Canada-U.S. pipeline agreement contains a clause which may limit Canadian content in the project. I do not think this has been raised by previous speakers. There is a clause in the treaty that provides a formula whereby the Americans will pay the cost of the Dempster spur line, but the cost-sharing clause says, in effect, that if the costs on the Canadian portion of the pipeline go beyond the estimates, the United States obligation to pay for the construction of the Dempster line will diminish accordingly. That would have a very important impact.

There is more incentive for the builder of the pipeline, the Foothills company, to buy goods and services abroad than would be the case under different circumstances. In other words, there is a built-in incentive in the treaty whereby costs must be held down on the Alcan portion of the pipeline if Canadians want to get Americans to pay for the Dempster spur. What way is there to keep the cost of the Canadian portion of that pipeline down? It is to go onto the international market where there is often more expertise and, because of the development of foreign technology, there is a chance that the component parts will be produced cheaper by foreign companies than by Canadian companies.

I remind the House that Canadian companies have had no experience in building some valves and compressors for 56-inch diameter pipeline, whereas foreign competitors have much more experience. In these circumstances can we assume that our costs for this new technology will be lower than those of our foreign competitors? I have my doubts, so I am therefore skeptical of the assurance of this Liberal government that guarantees are not needed to ensure that Canadian companies get 90 per cent or more of the work.

I am skeptical when I am assured by this government, which sold us out on the Columbia River treaty and on the Canada-U.S. auto pact, that Canada can negotiate a good deal with the Americans when it comes to such things as the pipeline treaty we are now considering.

I am skeptical of the assurance of the Deputy Prime Minister that clause 10 of Schedule III of this bill will protect us from unfair trade practices. For example, nowhere in the legislation is there a definition of unfair trade practices. Is the United States DISC program, whereby the American government subsidizes companies in export trade, an unfair trade practice? Are government industrial and transportation financing and tax measures in Japan an unfair trade practice? We have no definition in this legislation, and without a definition my fear is that we will not have a fall-back which says there will not be unfair trade practices working against our steel companies. We cannot afford to delude ourselves with regard to this important project.

The president of Stelco says his company can compete on a fair basis, but given the past history of foreign competition where so much of it has not been fair, and given the fact that we have a government which is afraid and unwilling to build in guarantees that Canadian companies will get the work, my fear is that we will not get the lion's share of the contracts. The concern of my party is that we might not maximize the benefits of this Alcan project. We should be more than just optimistic.

If this bill passes unamended, and we rely on the assurance of the steel industry that it can be competitive, I am afraid that we will not maximize the benefits. There is no doubt that we will get some of the work, but we should get 90 per cent of the work or more, not less, because we are going to suffer the environmental and social effects of this pipeline. The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) outlined those effects earlier in his speech. We will be providing a land corridor. We will not benefit from the gas. Surely with a clear conscience we can demand the majority of the contracts.

I read the report of an American intergovernmental study which estimates that approximately 30 per cent of the durable equipment for the Canadian section of the pipeline will be produced in the United States. The Deputy Prime Minister tells us there will be 90 per cent Canadian content.

I would like to quote from page 9 of a report produced by the Canadian government through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows: "Unless there is effective control ensuring Canadian content, 67 per cent may be the more realistic projection". Unless we have control or some form of guarantee, the minister's optimistic prediction of 90 per cent will in reality more likely turn out to be 67 per cent. We have an American government study on the one hand, and the study of a Canadian department on another, both of which take a more pessimistic view than the Deputy Prime Minister as to what the percentage of Canadian content will be. We in this party are not content with 67 per cent Canadian content. We say it should be 90 per cent or more.

The bill before us contains no provision to ensure that the Canadian government, and hence the Canadian taxpayer, will not end up paying for cost overruns on the pipeline. When we remember the Alaska oil pipeline experience where the cost of that pipeline was over double the original projection, I think we can expect that the Alcan gas pipeline will also experience cost overruns. The American president was wise enough to say, as part of the American commitment, that the American government would not pay the cost overruns on this pipeline. We do not see the same provision here in our legislation to ensure that the Canadian taxpayer will not bail out the Foothills company when it finds that cost projections are exceeded by a great deal.

In addition, there is no provision in this bill for the settlement of native land claims before the pipeline is built. There are no provisions for expanded environmental studies. Indeed, the government has backed off. These problems were outlined by the hon. member for Northwest Territories, and I do not have time to go into the details at this stage.

It seems to me we have an obligation to Canadian workers, whether they are in the steel or construction industry, that Canadian content and Canadian employment be maximized by means of this project. We have an obligation to the people of the Yukon and northern British Columbia who live in the areas most affected by this construction. They should have a say and they should have adequate compensation for any disruption or damage caused by the pipeline.

But, most important, we say that unless the legislation is changed we will not have these guarantees. We may end up, not with 90 per cent Canadian content but something more like 67 per cent or even less. As it pertains to steel and other associated projects we will have betrayed the 40,000 steel workers and the tens of thousands of people who may work in construction. Indeed we will have sold out this very important potential for growth in the economy and for growth in job creation if we do not have these guarantees in the bill.

We are in favour of a pipeline, but we are in favour of the conditions that Canada gets the contracts and the employment opportunities. As the bill stands now, we do not have those guarantees. I do not see how any hon. member who calls himself a Canadian, who is interested in the welfare of Canadians and the Canadian steel industry, could support this bill as it is written.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by referring to the problems that are inherent in the pipeline proposal. It seems to me my province is a forgotten area for the pipeline. I have listened with care and I would like to second the remarks made by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) who I see is here, on the question of the attention that we have paid to the Yukon.

I would argue that we should pay more attention to the Yukon, but we seem to have forgotten that there are 540 miles of pipe which will run through northern British Columbia. The problems inherent in the pipeline construction are just as important in British Columbia. The native population can be affected just as adversely in British Columbia as they can in the Yukon. Yet this government did not remember that the environmental impact and the sociological impact could be just as disastrous to British Columbia. The government seems to have forgotten that this area is one of the most remarkable parts of the country. It is the great beautiful northern frontier in British Columbia, in fact British Columbia's last frontier.

When we look at the Lysyk inquiry and the Berger report, we will regret that we embarked on this project without accepting and adopting the total recommendations, particularly those included in the Lysyk report. The chance that we have in our last frontier to deal with the native population in a unique and civilized way makes us somewhat proud as Canadians. In fact up to now people from western Europe have tended to exploit the aboriginal peoples wherever they have come in contact with them. Our record in Canada is not spotless but I suggest it is better than that of the United States.

What Mr. Justice Berger, and Dean Lysyk to a lesser extent, asked us to do was to take another look at the problem to give us a new opportunity to define ourselves as Canadians and develop northern Canada. We can develop our last frontier and we can develop it in a civilized way. We can also develop it without tripling VD rates and without creating an alcoholism problem all over the north by avoiding these sociological problems.

Neither Dean Lysyk nor Justice Berger suggested we should put a fence around the north and create some kind of museum. They said we should develop the north in co-operation with the native people. We should ensure that the native people play a meaningful part and thus have pride in their culture. They can maintain the skills and work in which they excel. We will then not have a problem of the native people trying to emulate a white culture and in the process taking several generations before they have pride in themselves as a people.

When Mr. Justice Berger suggested that we should use the native people to guide and run a northern park, it is because they do those tasks better than we do. When I was in Inuvik looking at the Mackenzie Valley route, I remember sitting in a beer parlour with an Inuit who suggested to me he wanted to see the pipeline built because he had welding skills. He also said to me, "If you and I go out on the ice, I will come back alive and you will die because you cannot survive." He said, "Please do not take that away from us because then you do not leave us with anything. You do not leave us with pride in our culture". The result is the massive problem of alcohol as well as the problems we have in our prisons where the number of native people is far out of proportion to the population as a whole.

Because the proposals of Dean Lysyk, which were to some extent more modest than those of Mr. Justice Berger, were not accepted by the government—they have not been accepted in the treaty—I intend to vote against this bill on second reading. This bill is not acceptable to me.

What were those proposals? Let us think of some of the key ones. One was the $200 million which would be available to the government of the Yukon in terms of the sociological impact of the pipeline. That money is not available. Let us not forget we have been conned completely out of that $200 million. That $200 million was to be up front money, not money to be borrowed. It was to be plus money, and the typical little switch—

An hon. Member: Little!

Mr. Leggatt: All right, it is a big switch. "Here is the $200 million, but we will put it up front and take it off at the back end." The $200 million is a big round zero as far as this deal is concerned, and the minister knows that. It is not $200 million at all; it is nothing.

• (1712)

There is something else. I am sure this has been dealt with by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It is important. What will happen to the Yukon in terms of present federal government financing when that money starts to roll in to the Yukon council? Will the federal government then be in a position to say they are doing great, they are now on their own and it does not need to help them any longer? The pipeline will be in and there will be the tax flow. The Yukon council may be rubbing its hands now, but it could be disappointed down the line when it sees how much money goes into the Yukon after the money comes in from the pipeline.

Mr. Nielsen: It still will not give us responsible government.

Mr. Leggatt: I happen to think that is a matter for Yukoners to decide. I am pleased that additional revenue will go into the Yukon. It may help in terms of developing their own responsibilities and provincial status. However, I am not going to stand in this House and tell the people of the Yukon what they should do in terms of their style of government. That should be a matter for the Yukon to decide.

I do not think that anyone in this House should try to tell the Yukoners, except perhaps the representative of that area who may have more intimate knowledge.

Mr. Nielsen: I wouldn't dare.

Mr. Leggatt: This may bring self government or provincial status closer to the Yukon. However, let us not kid ourselves about the amount of revenues, the $200 million and the fact that down the line the federal government will probably back out of its present financial commitments to the Yukon as a result of the pipeline proposal.

There is reference in the Lysyk report to the Dempster spur which was proclaimed by this government to be a fantastic deal. After all, that line could ultimately tap into the Mackenzie gas reserves. Let us examine again the question of the Dempster spur. There has been no environmental impact study on the Dempster spur.

Environmentalists in the Yukon say that the Porcupine caribou herd will be in real jeopardy if the Dempster spur is proceeded with because it will interfere with the calving ground. In that very sensitive northern ecology, one of the most fantastic purposes of nature and great natural assets of Canada is the Porcupine herd. I hope every one in this House will have a chance to see it by air, but not during calving time because there must be no interference with that herd. If the line is brought down from the Mackenzie on the Dempster spur, there is a real chance of that herd damaged.

Mr. Nielsen: No, no!

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member for Yukon does not agree. However, there are many people in his constituency who are very sensitive to this problem who do agree.

Mr. Nielsen: The calving grounds are too far west of the line.

Mr. Leggatt: In any event, we should certainly have a meaningful environmental study of the Dempster spur before the pig in the poke connection up to Dawson.

Mr. Nielsen: Pig in the pipe.

Mr. Leggatt: There is something which makes the risk to the caribou herd much less, that is, the amount of gas now being found in Alberta. If you examine the figures, you see that the chance of tying into the Mackenzie gas is now much more remote. Therefore that aspect of the bill is bad. It is a nothing part of the bill. Let us not get excited because we had some participation in terms of the spur up to Dawson as a part of the over-all bill.

I believe in going back to what we are trying to accomplish, which is basically three things. We are trying to create jobs in Canada for Canadians. We are trying to create purchasing power in terms of the materials for the line. We are trying to co-operate with our American neighbours to assist them in carrying their natural gas resource to the American market.

We have failed on the question of jobs. That has been dealt with extensively, therefore I will not go into great detail on it. However, if we get 90 per cent of the jobs, that is 10 per cent too few. If we get 90 per cent of the materials, that is 10 per cent too little. There is no reason why it should not be 100 per cent.

The minister is certain we will not get any part of the American section. That is clear from these estimates. The minister shakes his head. He is not sure. Let me give an example of what is occurring.

When the Americans built their pipeline, the pipe-laying machinery was bought. It is now in place in Alaska. It has been paid for as a result of the Alaskan line. Canadian competition is now being asked to amortize new equipment in order to compete in terms of bids.

If the minister talked to small contractors who are seeking small units for this line, they would tell him that there is no competition in this game. We are starting off with a handicap. The American taxpayer has paid for their equipment. It is on site. The equipment is owned by the Americans. Canadians are being asked to come in and capitalize that equipment from day one.

I am assured that the equipment in place is in excellent condition and ready to roll, for the Americans, not the Canadians. This is the kind of deal we have gotten into. Nobody is as sharp a trader as the Yankee trader. This government has again been out-traded and out-bought. We have wound up with not merely a pig in the poke, but with a sell-out.

An hon. Member: What about the Columbia River?

Mr. Leggatt: Someone mentions the Columbia River. The minister does not want that mentioned. He does not want to be reminded of the fantastic amount that has gone down the tube as a result of the Columbia River treaty. The Social Credit government in British Columbia is still trying to cover up. They are totally ashamed of what was done by their ancestor, the W.A.C. Bennett government. The federal Liberal government was responsible for a massive sellout on the resources of the Columbia River.

That is typical of the bargaining that has gone on by our Canadian representatives in terms of Canada-U.S. negotiations. Our typical negotiating stance is feet up, and on our back. The minister will say it is easy for us to stand up in the House and make these statements because we do not have the responsibility. However, one need only look at the record. The record of Canada-U.S. negotiations is bad. The auto-pact is one example.

Let us look where we are going with regard to sea boundaries. We have already offered to take a territorial boundary near the constituency of the hon. member for Yukon, the Dixon AB line. We have offered to give six miles of our territorial water. That boundary was set by the Alaska boundary tribunal in 1903 as the territorial boundary of Canada. We are not talking about boundary extensions, we are talking about Canadian territory. I did not notice the Canadian representatives asking the United States to shift the Strait of Juan de Fuca boundary six miles south, but we are always ready to be accommodating and always ready to compromise. Unless we learn to be independent, to be sovereign and tough in our international negotiations, this will be only one of a continuing series of sell-outs for Canadians.

I am disappointed that we did not get a good deal out of this. This party was the first to appreciate that the Mackenzie valley route was a mistake and it was the first to look at the environmental consequences of the Alaska Highway. I am not saying that the Alaska Highway is not good environmentally, because I believe it is and I think the environmental damage in that area can be reduced to a minimum. I am not satisfied with the sociological conditions and the impact this will have on native communities in the Yukon.

This party was very pleased when the National Energy Board made its decision as it meant we still have a chance to develop the north in a civilized way, particularly the Mackenzie valley. Our pleasure turned to ashes, however, when we examined the deal. Our leader listed the minimum demands that Canada should make on this pipeline. In my view this party has no alternative but to vote against this pipeline. But we are not voting against the pipeline—we are voting against the deal. This is a bad deal for Canada and therefore we are voting against it. It could have been a good deal for this country, however. It could have had the guarantees, the environmental studies that we sought.

The government did not even have the guts to ask the President of the United States for another 90 days to make up their minds—even that was too much to ask. I think they would have received co-operation if they had asked for more time to think about it. We walk with such trepidation when we deal with our southern neighbours, it seems.

There are one and one half million people unemployed in this country, Mr. Speaker. Today we see a hemorrhaging financial situation. To the extent that we will receive substantial income in terms of balance of payments as a result of the pipeline, then it is a positive thing. We often forget that if we add our manufactured goods and the amount of raw resources we export, our balance of payments is on the positive side. When we consider what we pay for those resources in interest, dividends, service payments, and travel discounts, then we are in a negative position. That is why this pipeline was not a first priority. The first priority was to solve Canada's energy needs.

I have serious reservations about the kind of capital inflows that will be raised in Canada for the Canadian section of the line. We should give serious consideration to raising that capital abroad so that we could have more flexibility with our own capital. In this case, since it is a United States line for the purpose of carrying United States resources to the United States markets, I think if the minister had been on his toes he would have raised that as American capital.

Mr. Nielsen: Debt or equity?

Mr. Leggatt: Debt capital. We do not know how much of this is going to be drying up the Canadian capital market and how much will be from the international market. I think we could have built into the deal a proviso for foreign capital for this project so that we could reserve our own capital resources for our own energy needs. Let there be no misunderstanding—this is not going to solve our energy problems.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that in the United States legislation there is a specific reference to no government guarantees. Why was that not in our bill? I think it was because the shrewd American traders have done a very neat job. If there are going to be overruns they know that our capacity to raise capital is more limited than theirs so they want that portion to be open-ended in order that in an emergency situation they could fall back on a Canadian government guarantee.

I do not think this pipeline is going to start for another three or four years, but I am willing to bet that within eight years we will be presented with a bill to cover overruns on the pipeline. We have the example of the Alaska experience, Mr. Speaker, so it is not as though we are operating in a vacuum. I think their estimated cost of construction increased at least three times and the pipeline finally cost in the vicinity of $10 billion. The original estimate was about $3 billion or $4 billion, I believe. We could very well end up in exactly that position. We could end up with the taxpayers of Canada guaranteeing a United States pipeline to deliver United States resources to the United States market. I do not think many Canadian taxpayers want to be placed in that position. Surely our efforts should be devoted to solving our own energy problems.

The initial reaction of this party was positive. It was one of the first political parties to point to the proposal as being more desirable than the Mackenzie valley line. When we consider how we were short-changed in the negotiations, however, there is not much doubt that we have been sold out again by a Liberal government.

Just the other day, in his usual witty way the minister suggested that instead of corporate bums we are now talking about corporate chums. I thought that was a very active line, and with his usual good humour I thought the minister perhaps struck a truth. There are people in my riding in the business community who hope to sell valves for the pipeline and they are rather pleased with the position this party has taken. They are convinced that we have been tough and that toughness has helped us with things like pipe specifications. They are happy there is a party in this House fighting for guarantees on jobs and materials.

I do not expect the president of Stelco, when they put a camera in front of him, to say anything except that he does not need the guarantees, that his company can compete with any in the world. His board of directors would get rid of him if he said anything else. However, I think if you asked him seriously about the positions taken by the various parties, he might say that the position taken by this party has been as supportive or more supportive of negotiating a good deal than any other party. Of course he does not have much choice.

When people say "the corporate chums", we will take part of the blame. We are not dogs in the manger on the question of the corporate sector in this country. We are happy to help them try to get a decent deal with the United States because this government hasn't done so.

Mr. Benjamin: It is our country, it is our land, and we are going to build it.

An hon. Member: God help us!

Mr. Leggatt: I hope this party will be proposing some amendments with regard to this particular legislation. I intend to oppose it. I think the $200 million payment alone is sufficient reason to vote against this bill. It represents nothing more than a fantastic con job that has been done on the Yukon.

The principle of the bill is not the building of a pipeline; the principle of this bill is whether we are in favour of the treaty. That is really what the bill is all about. I want to say that we are against that treaty. It is a sellout of Canadian interests. We must have some hardnosed bargainers in this country before we will get any decent deals.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Goodale: Is this a filibuster, Stanley?

Mr. Nystrom: I hear the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) worrying out loud about a filibuster setting in. I wonder if that hon. member is going to get up and make a speech in the House, asking that the government guarantee jobs for the steelworkers of Saskatchewan. I am sure that with a riding right near Regina he is very, very interested in making sure there are guarantees of jobs for the steelworkers in the city of Regina. Maybe the hon. member for Assiniboia thinks there are not very many unemployed in the province of Saskatchewan. I am sure that after the election there will be at least one more unemployed person in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Goodale: Bill Knight.

Mr. Nystrom: I hear the hon. member for Assiniboia is running scared. He is not running scared about losing, but the fact of the matter is that he is going to run third, and I am sure he will find that rather embarrassing in Assiniboia.

Mr. Goodale: We will see, Lorne. Bill is running last out there.

An hon. Member: It will be goodbye, not Goodale.

Mr. Nystrom: In any event, the bill before the House today is a very important bill. I am sure more members of the House should be getting up to participate in the debate. The Tory party has very suddenly died in this debate and I am wondering why. I know there has been quite a split in their caucus. They have one group in the caucus very concerned about certain aspects of the bill, as are we in our party. We want to make sure we "buy Canada first", that we have a Canadian option in this bill which will make sure we are giving jobs to Canadians for the construction of the pipeline, and giving jobs to Canadians in supplying the steel for the pipeline and so on.

I do know there are a few Tories who have the same concerns we have expressed. I would name specifically the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) who made a very eloquent speech in the House. We also heard from the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Then, of course, we have members of the other wing of the Conservative party, led by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who are very anxious to have this bill railroaded through the House as quickly as possible because they believe it is very good for the international business community, namely, their friends in the United States.

I know why they are so anxious to have this bill railroaded through the House so quickly, but it is going to be quite a while before we actually start construction on the pipeline, so why are they so anxious to have the bill go through the House? Why can we not spend a little more time and get a little more support from the Conservative party in trying to force the government across the way to put into the bill some legislative guarantees which will make sure that the pipeline that goes through Canada is built by Canadians, and that the pipeline is built with materials manufactured in Canada by Canadians?

Mr. Nielsen: That will be done in the committee.

Mr. Nystrom: We have before us the principles of this bill. What we are doing is supplying the United States, our good friends to the south, with a land bridge so it can carry its gas from one part of the country to another. We are supplying that land bridge to the United States of America. It will carry gas from Alaska to the United States, and none of it will be used here in Canada. Surely to God when we are doing something like that, in return for that favour we can have legislative guarantees that we will be building the pipeline and using our materials to do that. I am sure any other country in the world, particularly the United States, would insist that be a minimum guarantee in view of the problems it would put their country to if the pipeline was going across part of that country to supply us or some other country in the world.

I do not think that is asking too much because there are some problems for Canadians. There may be some environmental problems. I am sure, as the hon. member for Yukon would say, there will be problems for the native people in the north. These are problems we will have to face up to. These are problems that we will have to solve if we are to build this pipeline. In return I believe we should be getting more benefits for our country from the pipeline that is about to be built.

I want to say as clearly as possible that the most important items to me are really the following. I believe we should have put into this bill a clause that will guarantee Canadian content and guarantee Canadian jobs. Many people say we do not need these guarantees because we are competitive enough. Let me remind them of who supplied the pipe to build the pipeline in Alaska. It was supplied by the Japanese, and there is not any guarantee, from what I understand, in this legislation that we will necessarily get the contracts.

I do know that some of the steel companies in our country are concerned about this. I refer specifically to the steel company in my own province, one in which the hon. member for Assiniboia should be interested. It is about 20 per cent owned by the people of Saskatchewan and 20 per cent owned by the people of Alberta.

I would remind the House that when the Alaska pipeline was built Ipsco put in some bids to supply the pipe for part of that pipeline. It did not get the contract because of bids put in by the Japanese. I think perhaps, if all things are equal, Ipsco might have a chance of getting some of the contracts; but there is no guarantee that the Japanese government will not intervene and subsidize the movement of pipe from Japan to the location of the pipeline. There is no guarantee there will not be that type of assistance by the government of Japan.

Are we going to sit idly by and watch that type of thing happen when we could be providing jobs in our own country? Are we going to sit by if they subsidize the ships that carry the steel over to Alaska? These are the things that could happen and may happen. This might not be such an hypothetical matter as hon. members think. It might very well happen, so why do we not put into this legislation while we are debating it a clause that will guarantee Canadian jobs on that pipeline, and guarantee for us that the steel that goes into the pipeline will be steel manufactured right here in our own country? Surely to God we have an unemployment crisis in Canada now that is serious enough to warrant having a "Canada first" clause in the bill. We should be buying Canadian goods and we should employ Canadians to build the pipeline that is going across our territory.

There are certain Conservatives who laugh and certain Conservatives who agree with me. I wish those Conservatives who agree with me would get up and speak. I wish also that those Liberals who are not continentalists but who have a little bit of Canadian nationalism would get up and speak in this debate. They are so interested in denouncing nationalism in the province of Quebec they denounce anything that looks nationalistic. I suggest that we have in this country a little bit more nationalism from coast to coast. Perhaps then this country would not be facing the problems we face today. We are such patsies we are willing to bend over and sell out anything we have in this country to the Americans or anyone else because of the power of the American dollar.

Mr. Rodriguez: Don't be pornographic.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is worried about my expression about bending over, but I think that is really what the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) did when he negotiated with the United States. When he bent over something happened, and what happened was not really attractive. It might have been more than just a swift kick that was administered to the Deputy Prime Minister. The legislation that is before the House does not give us these guarantees that are so important. I do not think it hurts us to exhibit some nationalism in this country from time to time. It is something we have lacked in the past.

The only response to that by the government opposite is to criticize the Québécois for expressing their nationalism. A lot of that nationalism was expressed in a positive sense. Perhaps that sense could have been channelled in a different way, if the government had shown leadership instead of letting the country be sold out in Quebec and elsewhere.

I hope the Liberal government puts some teeth into this legislation in order to show Canadians that it is interested in building a strong country. People must be shown that we are interested in building a strong, independent and united Canada. Instead, the government sits around being negative all the time and criticizing other people for expressing nationalism. I find it difficult to believe that younger members of the Liberal party can sit in that caucus and watch such a gutless government dealing with our American neighbours. It is not surprising that some senior members of that party can sit and laugh. They are part of the system. They have been brainwashed by being members of that party, and they sit idly by.

Jobs for Canadians is the number one concern, because approximately 1½ million Canadians are unemployed. Not only will this bill provide a lot of jobs in steel mill communities such as Hamilton, Sault Ste. Marie, Regina and places in Quebec, but there will be a backup in the system to provide mills which did not get contracts for the pipe with other contracts. Thus, there will be a stimulus for the entire steel industry. That stimulation will snowball throughout the entire Canadian economy, and will be of positive benefit to everyone. It will help the more depressed areas such as the Sudbury basin, portions of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. I cannot grasp why the government does not get tougher and include a clause to guarantee Canadian jobs. I am sure the Americans would respect the Deputy Prime Minister if he did that. If the shoe was on the other foot, we could not expect any less from them.

As was indicated by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) a few moments ago, there is nothing in the bill to ensure that the Canadian government will not be roped into any financial involvement or obligation with respect to the construction of the pipeline. The government has indicated that there will be no commitments to bail out the company, to build any part of the pipeline, or to get involved in cost over-runs. I have heard that promise for many years in this country. When Expo was being planned, we received assurances that it would not cost Canadians any money. That was followed by the Olympics and Jean Drapeau. Once again we were told that the Olympics would pay for itself and would not be a cost to the taxpayers of Montreal and Quebec. As a result of the Olympic Games, the people of Montreal and Quebec are now paying a lot of money. It was a big project which cost a lot of money. I have seen very few projects in the world where the projected costs of the economists, architects and engineers actually turned out to be correct in the final analysis.

Apparently this project will cost approximately $10 billion, but I am sure another 10 per cent to 20 per cent will be added to that by the time the pipeline is finished. Who will pay for that? I want a guarantee in this bill that Canadians will at no time assume responsibility for any cost over-runs or any error made by economists or engineers in their predictions. That is not too much to ask. The pipeline is being built as a favour to a good friend. It is nothing more than a bridge over Canada from one part of the United States to another. Being the good businessmen that they are, I am sure Americans would ask for the same thing if the tables were turned.

One can look at the gigantic programs which have taken place throughout the history of Canada and the western world and find a pattern emerging. Not only do many of these projects cost more than the original estimate, but when there is a cost over-run, the private sector and the investors do not bail the company out. The company is bailed out by either the government of Canada, the government of some province or the government of some other country. I do not want to see that happen. Canada has given enough money to its corporations.

I am sure the hon. member for Nickel Belt will rise again to refer to how the government has assisted Inco to develop its mines in Sudbury and Manitoba. They have been provided with grants and subsidies. They were nurtured and fed to make sure their profits were large. Then Inco reinvested those large profits in places like Guatemala and Indonesia, at the same time as laying off thousands of Canadian workers.

The government sat idly by and indicated that the situation was too bad, but that it was part of our free enterprise system. Free enterprise for whom? Is it free enterprise for the large companies? That is really what it is. What about the poor taxpayer who foots the bill? Who will pay the bill if there is a cost over-run on this project? Can the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council guarantee that Canadian taxpayers will not have eventually to pay the bill if there is a cost over-run? Can it be guaranteed that the House will not have a bill before it in the next five or ten years requesting the provision of money to the company for the construction of the Alcan line? If that guarantee can be given by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council, why can it not be included in the legislation? Why should Canadians pick up the tab because of careless negotiations and a sloppy government which has not been tough when defending their rights?

As I have said, the bill provides absolutely nothing for the settlement of native land claims in the Yukon. Those native people are concerned about the pipeline as well as their land claims. They would like those claims settled as quickly as possible. Once the legislation is passed and the pipeline proceeds, there will be a lessening of the bargaining position of the local native people in the Yukon. Those land claims should be settled before the pipeline bill is passed through the House.

Mr. Nielsen: The reverse is true.

Mr. Nystrom: I hear what the hon. member for Yukon is saying, but I should like to point out that it will be difficult to solve the problem once the pipeline is built.

Mr. Nielsen: Similar to what happened in the Mackenzie Valley project.

Mr. Nystrom: We should be thankful the Mackenzie Valley project did not go through. Many hon. members of the Conservative party wanted to see that pipeline built. They would have loved to see the pipeline go through.

• (1752)

Mr. Nielsen: It is a crock of rhubarb.

Mr. Nystrom: It takes a pretty big crock to recognize another one. I believe we should be in no hurry to pass the bill today. I think we would be doing a disservice to Canadians if we did not add three or four strong teeth to the bill.

I have just come back from Saskatchewan. When the minister made the announcement in the House about the size of the pipe, there was general elation in my province and happiness that the decision has been made so that Ipsco will have a chance to bid and perhaps get some contracts. Ipsco, the people of Saskatchewan and people in the steel communities, however, would be much happier if the government had put guarantees into the legislation. For example, Ipsco is now talking about the possibility of an $80 million expansion to the steel plant in Regina.

My colleague the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) put a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding assistance from DREE. DREE has been considering an application from Ipsco for several months for assistance to expand the steel mill. If we had some guarantees in the bill, I am sure Ipsco's case before DREE would be much stronger. So I would like to urge the minister to put teeth into the bill for that reason as well and also to make representations to the Minister of DREE (Mr. Lessard) to process the application as quickly as possible and give the money to the plant so that they can expand their facilities, hire more people and thus bring more industry to the prairie provinces.

This is one of the many opportunities we have in the country to build an economy that is more diversified and to provide jobs to some of the areas which would not otherwise have them. We should be making sure that there will be no financial commitment in the legislation for the people of Canada once the pipeline is built if there are major cost over-runs; and there should also be a settlement of native land claims in the Yukon.

Once again I should like to urge the government to put these guarantees into the bill and to urge the progressive elements in the Conservative party, if there are such elements apart from the two or three members who stand out in that category, namely, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), to do the same thing.

Perhaps we can get the government to act. They will have to go to the polls very shortly, and if they do so with a bill such as this one which does not contain the guarantees that are needed, and which the government can easily put in, then I am sure the government will be defeated. When it is defeated, members such as the hon. member for Assiniboia, who sit by idly, will go under the great tidal wave of Canadians who are concerned about developing a country like Canada. I am glad the hon. member for Assiniboia has just returned from Estevan. I heard about the winter carnival there and how he was the third guy in the parade. People were more interested in meeting the leader of the NDP, who paid a tribute to Estevan; they were cheering the NDP candidate as he went through the streets of that city. I am told they are more interested even in the Conservative party than they are in the incumbent member from the riding of Assiniboia. I am sure the hon. member will be rising to participate in the debate because I know he is very concerned about his riding, about the strength of the other parties in his constituency, and the large turnout at the meetings of the other parties. The hon. member could have held his meetings in a telephone booth. That shows the enthusiasm he has been able to generate in that part of the country.

These are some of the concerns I have regarding the bill before us. I think we need a vision of this country where we can do things for ourselves and not always have to rely on other people. Why do we always have to be so wishy-washy and gutless when it comes to negotiating a deal? As other members of my party have said, there are many precedents we can look back to of negotiations with the U.S. where we have sold out to our American friends. That does not do us any good. That is one reason our dollar is down where it is today. There is no confidence in the economy. That is one reason we have in our country such a high rate of unemployment. We import more manufactured goods than any other industrialized country in the world, and one reason for this is that we have always had a program of selling our resources very cheaply to other parts of the world. We have no vision, no plan. When there is a worldwide recession, it is a country like Canada, which has no vision, no control over its own economy, that suffers first and the most. We have a branch plant economy, and in that type of situation it is the branch that dies, that falls off and withers. This is the type of economy that has been built by the Liberal party, by the government of this country which has been in power for far too long. The time has come when the government should be defeated and pulled down from their smug ivory towers, which I am sure they will occupy for only a few more weeks.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to get involved in this debate—

Some hon. Members: Oh yeah?

Mr. Rodriguez: —but hearing this great silence from the loyal opposition on such an important bill I have decided to take part in the debate. Suddenly opposition members have become very silent and no longer consider their role to be that of examining the principles of the bill, elucidating its provisions for the benefit of the Canadian people and bringing forward concrete proposals.

Mr. Hees: We do not believe in thrashing old straws.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member says they are old straws. These old straws keep repeating themselves far too often in our history. Bill C-25 tends to put into legislation a treaty that has been signed between the world's most powerful country and Canada, a relatively small country in terms of population. It has always been my belief, as I have observed the relationship between the giant and its northern neighbour, that the mandarins in Ottawa must have been brainwashed by the Department of External Affairs into believing that you cannot talk with the giant, that you must always back off; that you must never engage in tough negotiations with the giant because it will exert economic restraints on you and there will be economic repercussions. The treaty that was signed is the latest example of that kind of backing off.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6 p.m. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m., at which time the House will proceed to the question of the declining dollar under Standing Order 26.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

FINANCE

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Leave has been granted to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to move the adjournment of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 26, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the steady decline over the last fifteen months of the Canadian dollar which has now reached its lowest point since 1931, the announcement, outside the House, by the Minister of Finance that extensive borrowing is being arranged to halt a further slide, the high cost of maintaining the dollar and the inflationary pressures which will result from a further decrease in its value.

Accordingly, the motion is as follows: It is moved by Mr. Clark, seconded by Mr. Broadbent:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as is usually the case with debates of this kind, it is a debate which all of us wish would not be necessary because we all wish that the economic management of this country had not led us to the situation where our dollar is falling. Indeed, we wish there were in place in the government of Canada now a minister and a government prepared to be much more forthcoming, direct and straight with parliament and the people of the country regarding the policies they intend to follow in face of a dollar which has been falling consistently.

I think it is fair to say that there are three major purposes to this debate tonight. The first is to find out what the government is doing in the face of a sliding dollar and what it intends to do. That is of interest to us, and it is also important to have that spelled out so that the uncertainty which corrodes confidence will be put aside.

Second, we in this party want in this debate to force the government to realize the seriousness with which parliament views this matter. We think we are dealing with a matter which has virtually crisis proportions, partly because of the nature of the problem itself, but more particularly because of the nature of the response of this government. The response of this government has been virtually to pretend the problem is not there, and then when there are actions to take, to be indirect, vague and evasive about the nature of those actions as well as the motivation behind them.

Finally—and I say this seriously and with some sadness—a major purpose of this debate is to tell the Minister of Finance that it is time for him to take his responsibilities and his position much more seriously than recent behaviour suggests he has taken it. I think it is fair to say that from all corners of this House there is a respect, and at times even an affection, for the minister as an individual. He is an engaging partisan. He is a man who has gone out of his way to cultivate a reputation here and in the country as a street fighter. The engaging nature of his personality and his capacity as a street fighter—

Mr. Railton: Let's get down to the debate.

An hon. Member: Take an aspirin and come back in the morning.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) is making his usual contribution to debate in the House. The personality of the minister is not in question, nor is his capacity as a street fighter. What is in question here, and what even the hon. member for Welland must take seriously—because his constituency among others suffers seriously when the value of the Canadian dollar drops, and if he does not care about that, the electors of Welland will make a change when the next election comes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —is what effect the minister's demeanour and behaviour have upon confidence in the Canadian economy.

I first met the minister when I came into this House as the member of parliament for Rocky Mountain. At that time the minister was, in effect, the mayor of three of my municipalities because he was then minister of Indian affairs and northern development.

It was difficult then to get a straight answer from him, as it is now. The point is that it was probably less dangerous then for the country, and less important if the minister evaded questions and played games with the opposition, than it is now when he is Minister of Finance. It was probably even less important if he did that when he was minister of industry, trade and commerce. But he must recognize that he is now much more than a domestic politician.

The investment community, particularly the international investment community, makes its decisions about Canada in part on the basis of its estimate of the competence and the sense of responsibility of the Minister of Finance. Unfortunately—and it is as well to have it said directly here—the recent behaviour of the minister serves to erode the confidence the international community has in this government and, unfortunately, in this country. It is bad enough that the government keeps pretending that the economic situation in Canada is better than it is. That pretence, which is probably for election purposes, makes the problem worse.

That is a matter to which I want to return because it has also got in the way of some of the solutions this government could be adopting. The minister's determination to play petty politics and his determination to be a street fighter when the nation's reputation is at stake can only endanger confidence in Canada. In recent days the minister has been treating this serious matter like some kind of debating game in this House. In answering serious questions he implied that the ten premiers of Canada had approved the position of the federal government in relation to the dollar. That is not so, and the minister knew it was not so when he said it.

Today he blamed the drop in the dollar on the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay).

Mr. Nowlan: Better than the weather.

Mr. Clark: He also blamed the provinces for not borrowing when it was the policy and the explicit request and position of this government that put the provinces in a position where they were asked by this government not to borrow. He condemned them for doing what he asked them to do.

• (2012)

Again he has been almost unbelievably careless in his statements. On Thursday in this House, in reply to a question from my colleague the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the Minister of Finance said as reported at page 2914 of Hansard:

> —the Canadian dollar has been floating freely for a number of months and the government has no intention of changing its monetary policy. We do not intervene in the market place and we let the value of the dollar fluctuate according to the market situation. Moreover, the government has no intention of determining a fixed rate for the Canadian dollar.

That was Thursday, six days ago. One of my colleagues says that was last week. The policy of the government seems to change from week to week. Certainly on Tuesday, unless the minister was deliberately misleading the House of Commons when he spoke here, it literally did change from hour to hour on that day. But the point is that that careless reply by the Minister of Finance last Thursday created an impression internationally that this government would do nothing at all to bring stability to the dollar. That further endangered the position of the Canadian dollar on international markets.

Again, even when he has not been careless, he has been downright misleading. In this House on Monday, two days ago, I asked the minister a question. I will quote my question and the minister's reply.

As the minister will recall, last September the government announced the negotiation of a stand-by credit of $1.5 billion. Is it the intention of the government to draw on that stand-by credit in the foreseeable future?

That was the question on Monday at about 2.40 in the afternoon. The minister's answer was:

The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

I repeat, that was Monday, the day he admits now he met with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, a day when there was extensive activity by the Bank of Canada to support the dollar. Either the minister was misleading the House or the minister did not know what was being done by officers who come under the general responsibility of himself as Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: Either way, he stands indicted.

Mr. Clark: Yesterday, Tuesday, he changed his policy and announced to the public, to the country, in a press release, a policy diametrically different from the policy that he had announced to the House of Commons earlier in the day. Finally, in another move that must have been a calculated one to undermine confidence in the economy, the Minister of Finance contented himself with a brief, vague statement of position. He did not come to this House to ask for permission to revert to motions, which would clearly have been granted by this House, so that he would have an opportunity to explain to the parliament of Canada the position that his government was now taking. Had the minister done this and answered questions, there would have been some possibility of ending the uncertainty that unfortunately was created by his statement, a statement that should have bolstered the Canadian dollar significantly but did not.

The Minister of Finance has an opportunity tonight to act more responsibly. He has an opportunity now to recognize that "street fighting" is not helping the country. Until he can demonstrate that he deserves respect as Minister of Finance, his own reputation will aggravate the problems of this economy.

We are faced with a matter now that is very serious. Every Canadian in this House and across the country knows how serious it is. The problem is that we still do not know precisely what is the position of the government. The minister was anything but frank today in the House. He issued a statement in a way that shielded him from questions, so that a number of questions remain to be answered, and a great deal of uncertainty exists in the country.

[Translation]

Many questions remain unanswered. Rumours about money markets are kept alive and nobody knows for sure what is happening. We must be informed and the Canadians also have the right to know the answers to the following questions: First, when were the banks officially or informally advised that the government intended to obtain a credit line of $1.5 billion? Second, when will the government use that credit line? Third, what are the interest rates on loans and what are the conditions of repayment? Fourth, was the Minister of Finance well informed and did he approve the interventions of the Bank of Canada which began on Monday afternoon? Fifth, at what level will the government support the dollar to prevent it from falling lower?

[English]

Those are some of the questions the Minister of Finance has an obligation to answer. The failure to answer simply adds to the uncertainty which has eroded confidence in the economy and the value of the Canadian dollar.

One of the things that concerns us deeply, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister has acted as though he does not understand the reasons for the run on our dollar or the solutions necessary to stop that run. As we on this side of the House have stressed for many weeks, this devaluation is a direct vote of non-confidence in this government's ability to manage the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: A decade ago the international community looked to Canada as a model of managerial competence.

An hon. Member: They still do.

Mr. Clark: Someone on the other side, in one of his infrequent interjections in the House, suggests they still do. They look to this economy and to this government now as a source of concern. Perhaps if they have that kind of sense of humour it is a source of entertainment. But the international community certainly do not look to this government of Canada as a model of management, except perhaps bad management. What the international community has seen in the last decade is, in effect, the disintegration of the Canadian economy, an economy full of potential, at the hands of this government. Having seen it, the international community has decided—and it should not surprise anyone—that Canada under this government is no longer a country in which they can invest with trust and with confidence.

The lessons are clear if the Minister of Finance wants to look at them. In previous Canadian experience, and in the experience of countries like Britain and Italy, they point to the dangers which can flow from a situation like this. Speculators feed on uncertainty and indecision. So long as the Minister of Finance allows those conditions to prevail he is encouraging speculation of the Canadian dollar. To stop speculation a government has to be certain and it has to be decisive. This government has been the opposite throughout this crisis.

Last fall when our dollar fell an initial 10 points, we on this side of the House urged the minister to make a decisive response. Instead the minister made light of the situation when everybody else knew it was serious. He insisted then, as he still insists today, on misrepresenting the actions of the Bank of Canada. Even when he has forced to move last October and to put in place a stand-by credit arrangement with the chartered banks, he insisted again on misrepresenting the scope and the extent of the problems which faced the government and the country. In the intervening weeks the minister has been asked dozens of times for a statement on government policy. Instead he has offered nothing but blithe comments about a floating dollar in a free market.

The minister has talked consistently as if the government does not care to what level the dollar floats. Sir, no one believes that is true because no responsible government could take that position. But given the absence of any kind of certainty from the minister, it is no wonder at all that the currency markets have been left to speculate where the real line is in the government's mind.

During the past 24 hours the minister has repeated all of the basic errors he has made in the last six months. Yesterday he misled this House and the country as to the extent of the Bank of Canada's activities in the exchange market. What is so absurd and difficult to understand from a minister who should be sophisticated enough to know is that it is clear that the financial community knows the truth about these activities. What conclusions will they come to when they hear the Minister of Finance, Canada's senior economic spokesman, misrepresenting the situation which they see before their very eyes?

Then having misled us during the day, the minister refused to come before the House of Commons last night to try to set the record straight. Instead he issued a press release which raises more questions than it answers, and which feeds uncertainty at a time when we can stand very little more uncertainty.

This lack of economic leadership has cost this country dearly. An already serious balance of payments situation has deteriorated further. The Bank of Canada has had to put out hundreds of millions of dollars to try and stem the speculative tide. Canadians have had to pay millions more dollars out of their own pockets, be it for imported products in our stores and supermarkets, for travel outside the country, or for assistance to relatives still living in countries from which they have emigrated.

As a result of this lack of leadership, and because up to now the minister has refused to take this situation more seriously than another political street fight, Canadians may well end up paying even a larger price. The minister may not admit this—he has not levelled with us on anything else—but the hard truth is that the government now faces increasing pressure to raise interest rates in Canada as a means to attract short-term investment and thereby prop up the dollar. Higher interest rates inevitably would slow down new investment and further set back our efforts to create jobs for the million Canadians who want to work. Higher interest rates would set off new inflationary pressures in the economy. Higher interest rates are exactly what Canada does not need if we are to get our economy moving forward on any path of sustained growth.

Yet higher interest rates are the price we may have to pay for this minister's refusal to take clear and decisive action to stop the run on our dollar. It is a price that Canadians should not have to pay. It is a price they need not have had to pay had the minister acted when we urged him to do so. It is a price that could have been avoided if the minister had shown any understanding of the problem and any sign of being prepared to deal with it honestly and decisively.

We know that the problems in this country are significant and serious, particularly economically. We know also that it is the strategy of the government to do everything it can to ignore the economy. We probably will not have a budget before the election. The minister will delay it as long as he can.

Economic legislation in the House of Commons has been shoved aside. If there were some way for the government to cut off the question period, they would do that. When the minister has statements to make, he makes them outside the House of Commons in order to avoid economic debate if at all possible.

We cannot ignore the reality of the economic problems facing Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has a fundamental job ahead of him, that is, to get our economic house in order. He might be able to bluff Canadian voters, but the hard fact is now coming home that he cannot bluff international lenders.

The obligation on the minister's shoulders tonight is to come forward and state clearly and precisely what the Government of Canada intends to do about the dollar, its own extravagance and its failure to put Canadian people and Canadian plants to work. For too long this government has been proceeding with its eye on the election. That election decision will come. However, one verdict is already in, namely the dramatic fall of the Canadian dollar.

I hope the Minister of Finance will rise to the occasion tonight and begin to take actions which can win back confidence in Canada's capacity to manage the economy of one of the most fortunate countries in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the debate we are having tonight belies entirely the claim made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) during the question period when he said there was no crisis. For months he has been doing his best to deny the reality that ordinary Canadians are living with, no matter where they live. They live in an economy that, in terms of inflation, has returned virtually to the same level we had when the government brought in controls. We have the same problem with inflation. We have the same problem in a different domain with unemployment, the worst since the depression.

Although the Minister of Finance is new in the realm of economics, I am sure he knows that when the international community respond to the estimate of the value of a dollar of a country, they are providing a collective judgment on the performance of the economy of that country. There is no doubt about it. With the dollar having dropped to its lowest level since the great depression, they are telling the Government of Canada, and indeed the people of Canada, that this government has completely failed to manage the Canadian economy. That is what they are saying.

I said we have inflation. I am not going to produce all the statistics back to the period prior to the controls program, how we have re-emerged and the forecasts, contrary to what the government says, are that things will get worse. Farm prices are down. Farm costs are up. Food prices are up. Almost everything you can mention is up in price for the consumer. As I said, Canadians from coast to coast, no matter in what province, are experiencing unemployment in figures unparalleled since the days of the great depression.

The confidence that is now being withdrawn by the international community is more or less a direct response to the failure of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers. However, the blame rests largely with the Prime Minister because it is he who called the conference which took place in Ottawa last week.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I hear a Liberal scoff. He was probably there with the movie crew that was preparing the election propaganda. The conference was prepared by the national government. They had the obligation to bring to the premiers of Canada, representing all parties, proposals for the short run and long run to deal with both inflation and unemployment. They did no such thing during the three days of electioneering that took place last week.

I want to avoid general statements as much as I can. I want to deal frankly and candidly with an assessment of the economy and the attitude now being expressed not only by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance but, I regret to say, by virtually every premier, with one exception. It will surprise no one when I say the exception is Allan Blakeney of the province of Saskatchewan.

I hope tonight we can engage in a serious debate about methods of managing the economy. I want to provide the case for managing a mixed economy. What dismayed me beyond words about the conference last week was that we heard, time after time, what can only be described at this point in the twentieth century as mindless economic clichés. We heard them from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the premiers of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

What do I mean by that? I mean there is a new convention of wisdom establishing itself at the highest level of political debate in Canada. It is as though we had not lived through the 1920's and 1930's not only in North America but in the world. The prevailing words at the conference in Ottawa, and we hear them from the Conservative party and the government, were that we must get back to free enterprise, that the government must withdraw from activities in the economy. You can hear the cheering on both sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Don't stretch it, Ed.

Mr. Woolliams: I didn't hear a word.

Mr. Broadbent: Let me be clear. A Liberal backbencher is concerned I have left the impression that he is agreeing with the argument I made. I do not say that at all. I am saying that when I used the words magical cliché, free enterprise, and government withdrawing from the economy, some Liberals and Conservatives cheered that notion.

● (2032)

Mr. Woolliams: It is like the gas exploration in Saskatchewan; it is all dried up.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is just incredible. The same phrases were uttered by Herbert Hoover in 1929 just weeks before the stock market crash. He was saying in effect, "We must leave businessmen to manage the economy, and if governments would only do what they are supposed to do"—which for him was nothing—"that would be wonderful."

Just weeks afterwards the stock market crash came. Within months there was the beginning of the greatest depression of the century. What we are seeing now, coming from the alleged spokesmen for the vast majority of provincial governments, for the Minister of Finance and for the Prime Minister, is the same kind of cliche. There was at least a reason for Herbert Hoover thinking that way and there was a reason for R. B. Bennett's view as well—they did not live through a great depression. They did not have the experience that we have had—

An hon. Member: Have you?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the level of ignorance that prevails in this place boggles the mind.

Mr. Woolliams: I could not agree with you more. I have never heard such illiteracy.

Mr. Broadbent: It is as if they were sitting on the Titanic, laughing away, and drinking champagne as was done at that time, and just as Herbert Hoover and his benign acceptance of the market system conveyed the impression that all would be well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It looks as if it is going to be a long night. I suggest we all listen. Everyone has twenty minutes.

Mr. Broadbent: What I say on behalf of my party is that it is time a few people for once uttered the reality that we are living in a mixed economy. The most significant economic force in Canada today, whether it be at the provincial or federal level, happens to be with the governments of the day. That is the reality. It is a reality that has changed much from the 1920's and 1930's. Instead of withdrawing from investment at a time when we have one million unemployed, and instead of saying that we must turn everything over to the private sector—which is not investing and has not invested at significant levels for more than three years—we should be using the public sector with creativity and imagination.

I want to list some of the facts.

Mr. Woolliams: What have we been listening to up until now?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I listened with attention if not exactly commitment when the Leader of the Conservative Party (Mr. Clark) spoke, and I would appreciate the opportunity of presenting our views now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: What are some of the realities that should be conveyed to the people of Canada? Let me speak first of all of investment prospects. Both the government and the Conservative party spoke of the need to have investment in the private sector. Let me point out the past performance of the private sector. The people who produced the lay-offs—Inco, Alcan, Christie Bread—are firms in the private sector. Anyone who pretends the lay-offs in those firms had something to do with government hampering them in some way, is speaking nonsense. The situation is quite the opposite. Governments in Canada have been aiding the corporations that have been laying people off. That is another argument, however.

The reality about investment is demonstrated in a planning document produced by the Minister of Finance in advance of the first ministers' conference. It pointed out that in order to get unemployment down to 5.5 per cent by 1982, we would need to increase investment in the Canadian economy by 7.3 per cent each year for the next four years. Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that for the past three years investment has averaged about 1.5 per cent. The minister gave no reason in the planning document that would lead us to anticipate significant growth in the private sector. How in God's name then does he anticipate we are going to get unemployment down to 5.5 per cent by 1982 if the expected rate of investment continues at the past levels?

Indeed, the planning document forecast no change in the level of investment for 1978 compared to 1977. The minister's expectation about improving the economy by 1982, in terms of investment, is just hog-wash according to the government's own reports.

Similarly the planning document released before the conference said that we need at least 300,000 jobs in each of the next four years. The record from each of the last three years shows that we only achieved 175,000 jobs. Therefore the forecast of 300,000 jobs to achieve the target of 5.5 per cent unemployment is just whistling in the dark. There is no reason why we should anticipate a level of job creation in the next three or four years twice as high as that in the past three or four years.

Things are the same in the manufacturing sector, which is crucial for any industrial society. The document says we need 74,000 new jobs in manufacturing in each of the next four years. In each of the past four years, however, we averaged only 17,000 new jobs. Now the minister is saying we need an increase of 500 per cent in manufacturing in each of the next four years in order to achieve his target. Again, he is whistling in the dark. There is not a shred of evidence that we will get that number of new jobs in manufacturing. It is 500 per cent higher on average that we have had over the past three or four years.

Those are some of the facts that I appeal to members of the House to heed. If I have no hope of convincing them—and I certainly do not—I hope increasing numbers of Canadians will listen seriously to the economic debate and consider the options.

If the investment picture is as bad as the government forecast would indicate, if the prospects for new manufacturing jobs are as poor as past performance indicates, if we have no reason to believe that the private sector is going to do in the next three or four years what it has not done in the past three or four years, then I must ask why we are so reluctant to consider the logical alternatives. We must consider our immediate needs against the history of the century.

The point I am making is that when private enterprise for whatever reason, and there are complex reasons, fails to create jobs, then public enterprise must be brought to bear. Surely that makes sense.

Mr. Woolliams: Nonsense.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) says nonsense. I would remind him that the premier of his own province, Mr. Lougheed, bought control of PWA, one of the largest airlines in Canada. Perhaps when a Tory government buys something that is not public ownership—but we call that public ownership.

Mr. Woolliams: That was to keep Barrett out.

Mr. Broadbent: Nonsense! Mr. Speaker, you can see frivolity that prevails here. The people of Canada will not accept frivolity. That same government led by Mr. Lougheed invested hundreds of millions of dollars in Syncrude. It made sense to have public investment there.

● (2042)

Bill Davis is the premier of a province which was the first in this country to embark on hydro development on a significant basis. That is a public investment that pays off in jobs now by creating energy in the future.

The point I want to make is that of all the times when we are talking about a need to deal with the Canadian economy and create jobs, and in the longer run bring down the level of inflation and therefore influence the international community which has responded in a way that has brought our dollar down, now is the time we must generate some growth in the Canadian economy. My God, I can tell the Prime Minister that one of his predecessors, Lester Pearson, and for that matter even Mackenzie King, recognized changing economics, and I cannot understand why the Liberals have lost their sense of historical perspective.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Again we hear disagreement from a man who comes from Quebec where there are 450,000 Quebecers out of work, most of whom voted for the Parti Québécois. I say to you, fellow, you can blame your government for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The point I am making, Mr. Speaker, is that in a mixed economy we certainly have to concentrate on stimulating the private sector. Where has the leadership been? In France and in Japan, and there are governments there that can hardly be described as social democratic, they have had research and development policies and sectoral analyses which have led to very specific conclusions about where to place their investment over the next few years. As a result, the Japanese have become the leaders in electronics. They did not rely on a free market. The Japanese did not rely on the clichés of private enterprise. They had government leadership, and the government in conjunction with private enterprise made Japan the leading industrial nation in the world.

Meanwhile we sit back with utter and complete banal economic platitudes on the one hand on the part of the people on my right, or facing a sort of economic smug drift as demonstrated by the government with that look of infinite disdain I see now on the face of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I want to conclude with a few examples of what could be done now with imaginative enterprise in the public sector to create some jobs.

An hon. Member: That is disdain without limit.

Mr. MacEachen: For an eternity.

Mr. Broadbent: The government has the Hall Commission report. What does it recommend? It recommends that some $500 million should be spent in the next couple of years to update rail facilities in Canada. That makes a lot of sense. If the government acted on that now it would create jobs now, not only in the prairies of Canada but in Cape Breton. It would stimulate the steel industry, and it would stimulate the boxcar industry in another part of Nova Scotia. It would make sense to allocate public funds now of that kind to create jobs instead of paying people handouts to do nothing. That is one approach, Mr. Speaker.

The government committed itself to urban transit, and that means go-trains, subways, and streetcars in some cities. In 1974 the government said it would spend $290 million in this way. Now, when we have 1.5 million unemployed, this is the time when we should be embarking upon that kind of creative public investment to provide services and jobs for people today.

There are housing needs right across Canada. We could be expanding the housing budget. We could be re-equipping a fishing fleet in eastern Canada because our present fleet is a disgrace to the modern world as a result of neglect. If the government wanted to put some public capital into modernizing the fishing fleet for our eastern fishermen, that would not only create jobs now but would create long-range possibilities for a province like Newfoundland.

I could give some other possible examples such as solar energy. That could use some public investment now which would create jobs today and produce energy tomorrow. I want to conclude by saying simply this, Mr. Speaker. I wish the debate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) that his allotted time has expired. The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please, I definitely heard a no.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speeches by the two leaders of opposition parties. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) referred to responsibility in these matters. I am standing here tonight replying to a proposition of the opposition that we are in a state of crisis in relation to the dollar. Those hon. members say we have to act responsibly. Tonight at the closing of the market the rate was exactly the same as the lowest rate in October 1977, yet they claim we are facing a very urgent crisis.

In regard to matters that are extremely sensitive to the operations of foreign markets, we see the opposition not checking their facts but trying to create a crisis out of a situation that is exactly the same as it was in the middle of October, 1977.

This leads me to quote an hon. gentleman who is very well known in this House, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In the book he wrote called "One Canada", at page 131 he said that one of his problems in 1962 resulted from one of his colleagues in the cabinet speculating on the level of the Canadian dollar in the marketplace. He blamed the situation on the irresponsibility of such a move. Hon. members can verify that in his book at page 131. I was very pleased that the opposition proposed this subject as the matter for debate because I wanted to point out things like that.

The opposition parties speak about a big crisis because since the beginning of the month the dollar has fluctuated from a high point of 90.30 on February 1 to 89.73 tonight. That is a fluctuation of half a point, Mr. Speaker, yet they call it a big crisis. They try to create the impression that everything is very bad in this nation. I was listening to them to see if they would tell me, both parties, what their policies were in respect of the monetary situation. No way, Mr. Speaker. They have not told me whether they want me to peg the dollar or not peg it. They did not speak about it.

An hon. Member: We don't want you to peg it.

Mr. Chrétien: They say the crisis is in relation to the monetary policy of the government. I listened very carefully for the last 45 minutes and they virtually made no reference to that. I did not expect too much from the NDP because they know they are in the opposition and will remain in the opposition forever. But, when the Leader of the Opposition tells me to be responsible in my job, I want to tell him he has a responsibility to be responsible. Some ten years ago when we were faced with such difficult problems in this land I remember that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) acted as a responsible leader of the opposition. He told the Canadian people they must pay a big price in a very touchy situation, and acted as a real Canadian who was concerned about the economic future of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is not what you said in 1974.

Mr. Chrétien: I wish the Leader of the Official Opposition would show the same sense of responsibility, particularly if he wants the people of this land to believe he could be a responsible leader of the government one day. Of course, he prefers to try to score some little political points against the government, and even against the Minister of Finance. I can defend myself. I have no problem in explaining the policies of the government.

The policies of the government in terms of the monetary system have been the same for a long time. We are floating the Canadian dollar, which means that the marketplace decides what is the real value of our currency against another currency. I have said many times that the Canadian dollar has to float downwards, because for years Canadians have put themselves in the position of losing their competitiveness in world markets. We have to adjust to that situation one day or another. Since November, 1976 the Canadian dollar has floated downwards from a beginning of $1.03 in relation to the U.S. dollar.

For many reasons we have priced ourselves out of international markets. The compensation in the Canadian economy was higher than in our main market, the United States, in many fields. In my own riding, for example, workers in the papermills are receiving $1.50 or $1.75 more than their counterparts in the United States. The situation which they faced was very difficult when they were laid off for weeks this summer, because that industry was no longer competitive. We are going through adjustment processes at this time.

On top of those difficulties, everyone must recognize that we are facing a new element which adds to the uncertainty of the economy of our nation. There are a lot of people in the market place who do not know what the future of Canada is. One only has to go to New York, Chicago, Los Angeles or San Francisco, as I have done in the last two years, to find people asking what will be the outcome of this nation as a nation. Some people do not consider that to be serious.

I went to New York twice since January to explain the economic situation of Canada, to speak about the economic prospects of this land and so on. The only question those investors asked me was: What is the situation in regard to the unity of Canada? I am only stating facts. I went there to talk about what I think, that this land has a fantastic future if this problem can be solved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: If we act responsibly, this problem can be solved. I am not afraid of the future. We will stick together. When the level of the dollar today is exactly the same as it was in October, it is irresponsible to talk about a crisis. We had the same problem five months ago. This irresponsibility is not worthy of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who is attempting to become the prime minister of this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: We are having some problems with the Canadian dollar.

Miss MacDonald: No, never!

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, I admit we are having some problems. In the process of floating the dollar, the governor of the Bank of Canada is called upon to intervene in the marketplace in order to make sure the market operates in an orderly fashion. The exchange of Canadian dollars for American dollars, and vice versa, is subject to speculation. It is the duty of the governor to intervene in that field. I was amazed to hear this afternoon a graduate of the London School of Economics, the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, talking about expenditure to maintain the dollar. He should know that it is not an expenditure. It is just an exchange of American dollars for Canadian dollars, and vice versa. There is no loss of money involved. For him to rise and create the impression that we are spending dollars to defend the Canadian dollar, rather than investing that money in jobs, is amazing. I was just a small town lawyer, and I knew that a long time ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: From time to time the governor has to move in the marketplace to ensure the market behaves in an orderly fashion. He has done that every month since the Canadian dollar started to go down from its level in November, 1976. It is his role to do that. That is the mandate parliament has given him.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition is complaining that I did not answer his question on Monday, when he asked me if I was planning to draw on the stand-by credit we had arranged. I had discussed that in the morning with the governor. It was agreed that we were not. Because of the kind of irresponsible questions posed by hon. members of the opposition, the market was not orderly yesterday, and the governor had to move in. In November 1977 we indicated that we had a stand-by credit which we could use when needed.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) asked me a question, and I did not have the time to reply properly to him. It is true that two years ago we asked the provinces not to borrow in foreign markets. At that time there was a very simple reason for that. The Canadian dollar was at $1.03, and borrowing in foreign markets was pushing the dollar even higher. It was substantially hurting the Canadian position in terms of exports.

Today we are not faced with the same situation at all. The Canadian dollar is not worth $1.03 U.S. It is worth 89.73 cents. The situation is different. For economic reasons, the provincial governments are not borrowing on foreign markets. One reason is to offset the balance of payments problem which is always existent in Canada, because we are a developing nation. I am not blaming the provinces. On the advice of my officials in the Department of Finance, and in consultation with the governor of the Bank of Canada, I was convinced that the right move to make was to go into the foreign market at this time in order to borrow money. That was decided yesterday afternoon. I made it public in the usual way: I made a statement after the market closed. We had discussed that matter in my office in the morning, but a conclusion was not reached. After five o'clock I called my associate deputy minister to tell him to go ahead. Even at that time we changed the formula somewhat. We do not announce every borrowing in the market in the House of Commons. I had to wait until the market closed to make that announcement. Every three months we go to the marketplace to borrow money.

An hon. Member: The House is sitting.

Mr. Chrétien: We are sitting every day, but it is not the practice of parliament every time to ask the Minister of Finance to make a statement on his borrowing intentions before the House. There is nothing unusual about what I did.

I am extremely disappointed the opposition is acting irresponsibly at this time by attempting to create the impression that there is a crisis, when the level of the Canadian dollar is exactly the same as it was in October.

We are going through a process of adjustment in our economy at this time. Hon. members speak about more stimulus in the Canadian economy. On January 1, 1978 we stimulated the economy to the tune of $3 billion. I heard the hon. Leader of the Opposition speak about his own budget propositions the other day: $2 billion, son budget de l'an I. He indicated that he would cut expenditures to the tune of $2 billion. He said that he would fire 60,000 public servants.

Some hon. Members: That is not true.

Mr. Chrétien: He is the same man who rose from his seat in the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: That is not what he said.

Mr. Chrétien: He said that.

● (2102)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I know the Minister of Finance would never want to mislead the House of Commons. I am sure he would like to correct the false information which he has just placed with such enthusiasm on the record and make it very clear that my proposal, which I hope the government will adopt and follow, is not to fire public servants but to freeze hiring in the public service. The Minister of Finance will admit that he was wrong in the accusation he made with such delight and I hope that he will accept my rising on this point of order to correct him, not only here but anywhere else where he might be tempted to misrepresent my position without having to face me when I set the record straight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if he does not replace 60,000 people, I admit that they are not fired outright.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad to see the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) here. Will he tell me what will be the effect on this town if 60,000 people are not replaced?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Chrétien: We are removing only 5,000 people in a period of five years, but the opposition admit they will not replace 60,000 people. That means millions and millions of square feet of space that will be vacated in the private sector in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you. That is exactly what I wanted you to say.

Mr. Chrétien: He will make Ottawa, as they say in English, a ghost town. If he is right, I made a little calculation and find that the maximum he can get from this is $240 million. He is still short of $1,750 million. So he came up with two other proposals, great proposals. He wants to close down FIRA. I took a look at the books and found that he would save $4 million. Then he said that he wants to close down the Department of Urban Affairs. I told myself there must be a hell of a lot of money there, but I found that the Department of Urban Affairs would bring only $16 million.

Then he had another great proposal to cut expenditures. He said he wants to transfer Eldorado Mines to the private sector.

I checked the books and I found that this is a crown corporation which makes a profit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: If this is the type of facts we will be faced with, I hope he will come clean on that. Because we have stimulated the Canadian economy by $3 billion, more than any other western nation. Less than six weeks after that the opposition say we should stimulate the economy further by $2 billion. I think this is the most irresponsible proposal I have heard in years.

[Translation]

How can anyone, Mr. Speaker, after just six weeks, pass judgment on the income and corporate tax cuts we offered as of the 1st of January? How also can anyone believe that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) can already judge what effects they have on the Canadian economy? At this very moment, the President of the United States, Mr. Carter, is proposing to reduce taxes by about some $25 billion in 1978, once the Senate has approved his plan. We usually multiply or divide by ten to establish the ratios; this means that our incentives are far stronger than those President Carter suggests. Furthermore, with regard to his proposals, no mention is made of the fact that he recently increased the taxes for social security and taxes on energy products so that in terms of stimulus on the American economy, if President Carter's proposal is accepted, its net results will be only half of what he in fact proposed. It is therefore very easy to conclude that in Canada, thanks to the proposals implemented on January 1, 1978, our economy has been stimulated twice as much as the American economy has been.

And the performance of the Canadian economy is starting to shape up the way we had hoped. Over the last two quarters of 1977—the relevant figures will be published shortly—the net yearly growth of the Canadian economy reached 5 per cent. As for the first quarter of 1978, we do not know yet, because this is only the middle of February. For the months of January and February, however, and as a means of maintaining this growth, we have reduced our income tax revenues by as much as $700 million to maintain and increase the purchasing power of Canadians during the first two months of the year. In the area of remuneration, for instance, Canadians are beginning to realize that we must try to reduce the demands from within the Canadian economy, and the remuneration—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. Minister of Finance—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: May I continue, Mr. Speaker? I hope hon. members will want to hear me speak for a little longer.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There does not appear to be unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We would be delighted to have the minister carry on if he would assure us that he will begin dealing with the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: May I carry on, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I heard a few "no's" from the back benches.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It's tit for tat.

An hon. Member: Simma said no.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I object to the unparliamentary behaviour of the leader of the NDP. He thumbed his nose from across the House. I think there is an apology owing to the members of the House. For a man who leads a party to thumb his nose so rudely is most unparliamentary. It was seen by everybody on this side.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have enough problems with words that are said and heard in the House without having to rule on gestures.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit to you, Sir, that it is better than having the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) with a finger up his nose.

An hon. Member: So much for the NDP.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) with great interest, and I was particularly interested in his opening references when he said that somehow he could not see any crisis in the situation of the dollar today.

As I recall, the Minister of Finance said that some time in October the dollar was roughly at the same level as it is now, according to him, so where is the crisis? Let me say two or three things about that. First, if the minister felt there was no crisis, why did he announce last evening foreign borrowings to an extent still undetermined? Why did he indicate in the same announcement that he intended for the first time to draw down a portion of the $1.5 billion line of credit which was established last October to defend the dollar?

If the minister is honestly unaware of the crisis which exists in this country with respect to the dollar, I am more alarmed now than I was when this debate began. To have a Minister of Finance come in and say, "What is the crisis?" without admitting that between September, 1977, and the end of January he had lost $447 million of our reserves, I say is unforgiveable. For that same Minister of Finance to come into this House and deal in misrepresentations to the degree he did this evening, without revealing that in addition to the $447 million of our reserves that had been lost up to the end of January a further $500 million has been lost so far in February, and to ask us, "What is the crisis?" is also unforgiveable. The crisis is that our reserves have run down to an unacceptably low level in terms of reserves among major industrialized nations. That is the crisis. The minister knows it, but he did not level with the people and with this House tonight.

However, the most alarming thing in the minister's address tonight was his choosing of certain convenient dates to compare the dollar. The minister did not refer to the level the dollar was at when he became Minister of Finance. At that time the dollar was at 93.17 cents. That is when the minister became Minister of Finance. His record between September 14 and approximately the middle of October was so unnerving to the international community that in one publication on October 13 we found the following headline, "Dollar Plunges Again to 27-year Low Amid an Increasingly Nervous Market".

Within a month of this minister's taking office our dollar had plunged to a 27-year low, and that was partly due to his inept handling of our economy. In order to gain time the minister at that time announced a $1.5 billion line of credit. Now that minister comes into this House and uses the low point he helped trigger last October as a basis for comparison for the dollar today. That is nothing short of shameful. I do not doubt that the minister wishes to leave.

The minister tried to tell us tonight that somehow the economy is in relatively good shape. He wondered why everyone is getting excited about the dollar. The minister has not levelled with the Canadian public. I suggest that that is one of the most significant reasons for the difficulty we are in, and it may cause the dollar to fall further. Let me be specific.

I referred to an article published on October 13. The article was written by Hugh Anderson, and this is what he said:

> The foreign exchange markets are having difficulty interpreting the Bank of Canada's recent announcement that it has lowered its target range for growth in the narrowly defined money supply (M-1) to between 7 and 11 per cent, from between 8 and 12 per cent.
> The confusion over official policy was increased by Finance Minister Jean Chrétien's repeated statements that the government does not intend to defend any particular rate for the Canadian currency. "When you have a floating currency, you have to let it float," Mr. Chrétien said.

Once again tonight the minister has put that view forward. Once again he has told the international market that the federal government is indifferent to where our dollar is going to end up. With that attitude prevalent among the minister's staff, those staff members have attended meetings of foreign exchange dealers. They have told foreign exchange dealers that they do not care where the dollar settles. In answere to the question "are you willing to have it settle at 80 cents?" they are saying that if the market says 80 cents, 80 cents it is. The minister's staff cannot undermine public and international confidence in a thing as delicate as our dollar without seeing the consequences we are debating here tonight.

I have referred to the loss of reserves since this minister took office. Unfortunately that also occurred prior to his taking office during the latter days of the former minister. For example, on December 31, 1976, we had U.S. dollar reserves of almost $3.5 billion. As a result of the deterioration in our reserves we now find that we have less than half that amount available to help defend the dollar or at least control its rapid fall.

In short, I think it is fair to say that upon this minister's becoming Minister of Finance he perhaps triggered the first run on the dollar with his unfortunate speech to the International Monetary Fund. Dealers have estimated that that speech alone cost half a point as far as the Canadian dollar was concerned. The minister's continued references to a floating dollar have cost dearly as far as our dollar is concerned.

Mr. Chrétien: Are you for pegging the dollar? Tell us. Are you?

Mr. Stevens: Let me refer to another comment which has helped undermine our dollar. On September 10, 1977, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated, "It's good that international money markets have forced down the value of the Canadian dollar." Those words came from our illustrious emperor, the Prime Minister. I could refer to various quotations to show how the international market has reacted to some of the unfortunate comments made not only by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance but also by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). That latter minister is recorded in Hansard as saying that the 90-cent dollar is good for Canadians.

Frankly, I am disappointed that tonight the minister would not grapple with the serious issues facing the country. He told us in his communiqué last night that he is proposing to borrow foreign funds in order to offset our current account trade deficit, but we have not yet had any indication—certainly not tonight—by this government of how it intends to narrow down that current account trade deficit.

This is a serious matter. Sometimes I feel that we overlook it, but in a Wood Gundy review dated January, 1978, covering the years 1975 to 1980 it is pointed out that from a current account trade deficit in 1975 of $4.7 billion we are heading for consistently increasing levels right through to 1980. These are the facts, and if the minister was telling us last night and presumably again tonight that they intend now to use the federal covenant to borrow foreign funds to cover that current account trade deficit, what he is telling us is that as long as we can see ahead, certainly to 1980, that requirement is to continue in Canada, putting a tremendous load, I suggest, on future generations who have to pay off that debt that this government is incurring to cover its own deficiencies.

I have referred to the carrying of that debt. Take a look at how Wood Gundy estimate the cost is to increase. In 1975 they say the interest and dividends pouring out of this country amounted to $1.9 billion. In 1978 they estimate it will be $4 billion. They estimate it will be $4.9 billion by 1980. The total service account deficit by 1980 according to Wood Gundy will be $9,100 million.

The minister in his remarks asked for some proposals. He asked what would we be doing. Let me assure him the first thing we would be doing is not making irresponsible statements as he has done as Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Would you peg the dollar?

Mr. Stevens: The minister did not touch on how they intend to regain our competitive position in the world market in order to ensure that that current account trade deficit will not continue to plague this nation. We have a program to get productivity moving in this country. We have a program, when we form a government after the next election, which will bring the current account trade deficit down. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) has been asking all night for that. I do not doubt that he is getting a little desperate in that party realizing that they are absolutely void of any ideas themselves.

I am glad the Minister of Finance has returned to the House. What he and the government of the day have to do is present a package not only for domestic consumption but for international consumption that will once again restore the confidence of the international world in Canada. That is the first task this government must accomplish if it is to bring our dollar into proper balance.

You cannot continually tell the international world that you have a floating dollar when the international world knows you are losing money at the rate of $100 million a week to defend that dollar. You cannot fool the international world when they realize we have an inflation level substantially above our main competitor, the United States. You cannot fool the rest of the world when they know we have a $9.2 deficit in our own federal spending accounts this year and it is likely to be $11 billion or $12 billion next year.

An hon. Member: What about Ontario?

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member asks about Ontario. I wish the hon. member would look at the collective position of all our provinces. He will find they are in surplus. They are not in deficit.

The minister asks for a few ideas. When I try to give a few ideas we find members in his party interrupt. This country has got to face reality. The rhetoric of the Minister of Finance will not regain our prosperity. Every time he is asked an economic question, simply wrapping himself in the flag will not regain our prosperity. The minister's main responsibility is to get back to work. Let me assure you that if the minister thinks he can paddle to New York, U.S.A., or London, England, and expect those nations to give hundreds of millions of dollars of credit to this country without a package of solutions to present to but his house in order, he has a big surprise coming to him. The fact is that the hard nosed international lenders are going to take a solid, slow look at Canada before they push in to give this minister the support he apparently intends to seek.

Mr. Railton: Doom and gloom.

Mr. Stevens: I notice the hon. member for Welland, and I did not prompt him to give me these leads. He says "Doom and gloom." I refer him to the Chase Manhattan periodical published in October, 1977. Surely the minister likes that month, he has already put it on the record because he thought it might help him in his plight tonight.

The Toronto Star reports an article by Chase Manhattan which in a devastating and pessimistic way talked about the Canadian economic outlook saying there is virtually no hope of solving pressing economic problems. Canadian economic policy is between a rock and a hard place, it says. It calls wage and price controls a drag on the economy. We have some hard problems to solve in this country, Mr. Speaker. The time has come when this Minister of Finance, instead of pretending there is a 5 per cent real growth when his own advisers have told him he is overly optimistic, instead of pretending that we are heading for a 6 per cent inflation level when his own advisers are telling him that is not so, instead of pretending that somehow unemployment is going to be less when his own advisers are telling him that it is not so, must level with the Canadian public. It is time that he asked them, "What is the package that will correct the inflation that we have in the country, get our real growth moving?" When he can do that he will perhaps get a more satisfactory dollar and we will not have this type of debate to encounter.

The minister began by asking what is the crisis? The crisis in Canada today is our future. If we do not right our economic self our economic future will be taken from us.

Let there be no doubt the first step in our plight was the $1.5 billion line of credit. The second step down the slippery slope we are on is this proposed borrowing in foreign lands to help prop up our dollar. The third step will be into the clutches of the International Monetary Fund. If we go to the International Monetary Fund it will mean we have lost control of our economy. In short, there is a coming discipline. The coming discipline will be the regulations and control of the International Monetary Fund that will be forced on this nation if we wish to continue. That future is not needed. If this government would accept the responsibility, if it would be more disciplined and if it would stop bringing in estimates as it did today contemplating spending increases of 10 to 12 per cent, increasing the spending of this government by $5 billion, we would not be getting into the clutches of the International Monetary Fund.

Judging from the remarks of the Minister of Finance tonight I do not think he has learned the lesson. He is still talking vaguely about floating dollars and saying all is well. The fact is that, if he persists, we will have still a lower dollar and, unfortunately, all of us will suffer. It was pointed out last October that the fall of the dollar by about ten cents at that time cost Canada $2.8 billion in terms of the $28 billion of foreign debt that we had outstanding. That is indeed a costly price for any country to pay for a government led by Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, plus ça change, plus c'est pareil. I remember—

An hon. Member: The same old gang! In English, the same old gang!

Mr. Allard: The same old gang, yes! As far as I know, our dollar has already suffered from a number of colds. We have only to remember that in 1962, 1968 and 1970 our dollar suffered from very severe colds and we prescribed remedies very much like those we are using today. We tried to apply the same remedies whereas we should come to the conclusion that, in our present system, the same causes produce the same effects.

Mr. Speaker, in a country the government is the authority which can introduce legislation applicable to all citizens. We live in a democratic system and each citizen who is 18 or more is part of the sovereignty of the country. That is the gist of true democracy. Inflation, unemployment and poverty are only the external manifestations of an inequitable distribution of a remarkable gross national product of $190 billion in 1977, which means an average amount of $8,300 per citizen. This economic lack of balance could be corrected by putting into practice a new monetary and economic system which can be done within the limits of our present political and monetary system, through a number of simple adjustments in various areas.

All this can be done by this government, Mr. Speaker. Even if Canada plays an important role at the economic summits of the 7, 15 or 125 most fortunate countries in the world, there is certainly place in this country of our 24 million citizens who are longing for a monetary reform which would bring about a better distribution of our national wealth.

Here in Canada, homemakers get no salary for rearing the children and look after the house. The student in our education system gets no salary either. Citizens and workers are more heavily taxed than most corporations.

So, Mr. Speaker, in a country as rich as this, citizens require and demand that their national government come back to some balance between themselves and the leaders. The Canadian people put their hopes in this government, so they expect responsible action from that same government that has been getting warnings from the opposition and from our party. We have been sounding warnings for a long time but, as I said, by its subservience to those who maintain it in place it is reluctant to do so, it cannot make up its mind to press the Bank of Canada or put forward an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act impowering the bank to make loans to the national government, provinces and municipalities, at administration cost rates, as it has been lending for years to a number of countries that get interest-free loans for periods of 60 years and over. However, for the good operation of our institutions those loans should include the cost of administration.

The government in my view should be ashamed of posting a deficit in the order of $9 billion, when the people know for a fact that over the same period the 11 chartered banks accumulated net assets in excess of $25 billion. If my arithmetic is right 9 plus 25 are $34 billion, the difference between private banks and both the Canadian people and the government administering the Canadian people.

So who is the most efficiently governed? The banks or the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker? I leave the answer to hon. members.

The way things are going, low and medium income people are gasping for air, and sooner or later everything will bust as the saying goes. The only way out is simply for the government to regain its sovereignty and to re-establish control over the economic blood of its country. Otherwise, we are finished.

This afternoon, my colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), who was taking part in the debate, reminded the government that nearly 40 years ago, the leader of the Liberal government said that a government which lacked control over its credit and its money is not up to representing a country; that man was the hon. Lyon Mackenzie King. As far as I know, he was not and never was an advocate of Major Douglas's philosophy, but he was indeed speaking the truth. And his words are even truer today than they were then. Unfortunately, the government always lends a deaf ear, and always faces the same problems for lack of listening to the wise words of their beloved leader of old.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, Canada will have a deficit of $9 billion and perhaps more this year which is really $4 billion over last year's. We must ask ourselves who will pay these $4 billion plus the interest charges. Who will pay this back? You, Miss, you, Sir, you young man, you, Mr. Farmer, you, Mr. Industrialist, you, Mr. Professional, it is all of you, you, Mr. Speaker, and all of us. This is not easy to face when we consider that our national debt already exceeds $40 or $48 billion. As I said this afternoon, we are now paying $25 million a day in interest alone. This should make us think since there are no improvements foreseen for the future and the government does not seem to want to change its mind.

Mr. Speaker, our dollar is in a critical state and it is not the remedies administered each year by the government that can make it better. What is the use of constructing large buildings, like the hospital across Wellington Street in Ottawa? What is the use if we cannot use it to cure our agonizing dollar? Mr. Speaker, we should endeavour to make the symbol of our natural resources being built on Wellington Street the symbol of our true wealth. We should endeavour to make the institution of the Bank of Canada operate as it should and issue the credit required for the development and the betterment of each Canadian citizen, and this should be done in accordance with our great production, our gross national product, which is, as I said earlier, about $190 billion.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the words of wisdom and good sense which will be spoken during this debate will spur the government and make it understand that in the present system, as I said earlier, everyone is a loser. It is essential that the government amend the Bank of Canada Act to enable it, as I said before, to finance all public and para-public works, as this would necessarily reduce our taxes.

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak about the economic performance of my own province of British Columbia. The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his partner in sin, the leader of the New Democratic Party, feel that—

An hon. Member: What is this sin business?

Mrs. Campagnolo: The leader of the New Democratic Party is the partner in sin of the Leader of the Opposition. They feel that by embarking on this emergency debate they can create an illusion of crisis that will reflect badly on the government. They will find, of course, that honest figures will put the lie to the outrageous and irresponsible approach that they have brought forward tonight. In fact, the only person they are harming is the personification of Canada, and the hon. member from the Western Bank knows that very well. Although Canada with the rest of the world faces the consequences of an economic downturn—

An hon. Member: Who wrote that speech for you?

Mrs. Campagnolo: I write my own speeches, my friend. I wish you could do as well. You cannot even stand up and make your own comments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: This country's economy has performed remarkably well and shows every sign of being on the upturn. That attests to the economic good sense of my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who spoke so forcefully in this chamber just a short time ago.

I am happy to be able to say that in British Columbia the economy is particularly healthy in most sectors. It is outpacing the Canadian economy at large because it has been the direct beneficiary of a number of federal government programs designed to stimulate the economy, and because certain British Columbia industries have also benefitted from the very phenomenon the Conservatives are so strongly denouncing tonight—the devaluation of the dollar. Devaluation has made the exports of British Columbia much more attractive to other nations. The devaluation of the dollar was very much desired by the government of British Columbia. You will not hear Bill Bennett or Grace McCarthy speaking the kind of heresy we hear tonight.

This House has heard some very critical statements from across the way. I find it shocking that a few days after a federal-provincial conference, where we saw the people concerned with the economy of our country move into a new and co-operative arrangement in order to find solutions, we see the opposition trying to refute what five governments sought to improve.

During the coming year British Columbia is expected to outperform its enviable record of the past two years. Economists in the provincial and federal governments, together with such groups as the Employers Council of British Columbia, predict a real growth rate that will exceed 5 per cent.

The recovery of the British Columbia economy from its low point in 1975 can be directly attributed to exports. Of the province's commodity production, more than 60 per cent is now exported. This level has been reached through the boost made possible by the drop in the value of the dollar.

On the west coast our major markets have been the United States, Japan—that favourite country of the leader of the NDP—and the European Economic Community. All three of these economies promised to be stronger in the coming year and all three will consume increasing quantities of Canadian goods. Many of them will be shipped through the ports of British Columbia.

British Columbia commodities that have been particularly important in this advance are first, lumber, which led the way with a gain of 29.9 per cent in volume and 48 per cent in value in the first nine months of 1977. Just a year ago the purveyors of gloom and doom across the way said lumber would not rise. Then there is natural gas, which grew by 16.9 per cent in volume and 37.1 per cent in value; aluminum at 13.2 per cent in volume and 35.7 per cent in value; and coal at 10.3 per cent in volume and 14.5 per cent in value. Other commodities have also recorded these sorts of advances.

The British Columbia fishing industry experienced an exceptionally good year last year due in part to good management by God and much of its product being exported to foreign consumers. The dollar value of the catch last year exceeded $300 million.

The provincial tourist industry recorded an increase in receipts of the order of 10 to 15 per cent.

Factors cited for this remarkable one-year advance include good weather, a low inflation rate and the decline in the value of the dollar. While perhaps the Minister of State (Environment (Mr. Marchand)) cannot claim responsibility for the good weather that brought tourists to British Columbia, the government has acted with courage to keep inflation down, courage that we do not see demonstrated across the aisle too often, I might add. The government has wisely allowed the Canadian dollar to reach its own level on international money markets. These are the reasons industries in my province have performed very well and why Canada is so attractive to foreign visitors at an ever-increasing rate.

Hon. members across the floor, of course, wish not only to make the impossible argument—

An hon. Member: You had your turn.

Mrs. Campagnolo: You are not on camera; you are not on a microphone. I did not interrupt you and I expect you not to interrupt me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Hon. members across the floor wish not only to make the impossible argument that our economy is far on its way to self-destruction, but they also argue that foreign investors have lost confidence in Canada. This is the crisis the opposition wish to see and may yet create with the sort of black murmurings and mutterings we have heard this evening. They say they have a plan, Mr. Speaker. If they had, the Conservative provinces in this country would all be behaving quite differently than they did last week at the federal-provincial conference. In my province the facts point not to crisis but to confidence and to a preparedness to make long term investments in Canada's united future.

Last year as the dollar dropped below its unusually high level and sought an equilibrium more in keeping with its true position, private and public investment in British Columbia reached $7.2 billion, a 12.6 per cent increase over the previous year. This investment was spread through the whole spectrum of business activity with almost $2 billion spent on new equipment and machinery and close to $4 billion on the construction of primary industry, utilities and factories.

People who fear for the future do not invest this sort of money. It suggests that investors know something that the opposition either does not wish to see or, for political reasons alone, refuses to see, namely, that Canada is a good place to invest for excellent returns in both the long and short terms.

There are many other measures of British Columbia's economic health I could list, including a much improved labour situation, promising developments in the energy field, a buoyant consumers' service market. But to go into these in detail would be to belabour the obvious. I repeat for the benefit of the opposition that by no stretch of the imagination can we be said to be facing an economic crisis. In this country today we have unity on the verge of achievement if we can only get these doom and gloom people to look at the major moves we must take together as a unified group. In spite of the missionary of monetary disaster over there, we will make it.

If the hon. Leader of the Opposition were to say that some sectors of our economy require special attention because world economic conditions have created hardships for them, then I would agree with him. There are examples of this sort and I have them in my own riding of Skeena. They are of immediate concern to me. I think it is important to rise and debate this sort of question, which I have been doing since I came to this honourable House.

As an example of this pressing concern I would like to draw members' attention to the plight of one-industry, one-resource mining communities. These communities have suffered as a result of the temporary downturn in certain metal markets.

An hon. Member: Get to the matter of the floating dollar.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Such communities have known a boom or bust cycle—

An hon. Member: Come back to the economic question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Are you not interested, hon. members, in the plight of a one-resource town?

An hon. Member: We are very interested in the economic situation.

Mrs. Campagnolo: I am delighted and I hope hon. members will stop and listen to what is being done. They are always asking for solutions.

An hon. Member: Who wrote your speech for you?

Mrs. Campagnolo: They are always asking for improvements so I will tell them about some. These communities have known a boom or bust cycle for as long as they can remember. Let us use as an example the town of Stewart in my riding, perched at the head of the Portland Canal on the border of the Alaska panhandle. Stewart has been a mining community since the early 1900 when it first drew more than 10,000 treasure seekers anxious to denude the territory of its gold and silver, all southerners, I am sure.

When the easily accessible veins of these metals were exhausted most of the population just drifted away, some with their pockets filled. The discovery of an anthracite coalfield in nearby Groundhog Mountain briefly restored interest in the community in latter years. It was not until the 1940's or the 1950's that interest in copper set Stewart's future.

An hon. Member: It sounds like somebody is in trouble in Skeena.

Mrs. Campagnolo: It has since been a small but prosperous copper mining community which has contributed more than its share to the health of the B.C. and Canadian economies. However, the mid-1970s recorded a dramatic slump in world copper markets. Refiners unable to sell their finished product stopped buying ore concentrates in quantity, and an over-supply caused prices to plummet. In Stewart production was cut by half in 1975 with the loss of 600 jobs. As we sit here tonight it is entirely possible that some New York owners could with the stroke of a pen close the mine altogether, if that is their choice or if prices and volume do not improve dramatically.

An hon. Member: Speak about the dollar.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Stewart is faced by another bust of the sort that took place when the gold seekers went home and, yes, of course, some pockets were filled. In the face of a threat like this what can be done and what should a government do? Indeed, what have we done?

An hon. Member: Yes, what have you done?

Mrs. Campagnolo: As this government is not of the mind that private companies should be nationalized at the first sign of trouble, the answer lies in the diversification of the economies of such communities. This can be done first by ensuring the community has the infrastructure it needs to meet the demands and needs of new industries which can be encouraged to locate there.

To this end the federal government has entered into a road improvement scheme with the province of British Columbia to provide the town of Stewart for the first time with what will soon be first-rate road access to the outside world. Already a number of inland mining companies are considering using, or have decided in fact to use, Stewart as a transshipment point to help diversify its economy and improve transportation access, providing two-way traffic which cuts incoming food transport prices.

Road access to this beautiful part of the country will result in an upgraded tourist industry, increasing the number of tourists who will be able to come to Stewart and resulting in immediate and sustained growth.

An hon. Member: Where is Stewart?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Oh, well, people across the way from the south have never heard of some of these towns, but then people in my area have never heard of the town which the hon. member represents.

An hon. Member: Are you having trouble at home?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion the government declared part of northern B.C. a designated region eligible for five different types of DREE assistance. Under three distinct but integrated programs the government has made money available to municipalities to develop sites suitable to industrial expansion—

Some hon. Members: Get back to the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the yapping hyenas across the way are still at it, and the supercilious smile on the face of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is really as appalling a thing as one could see. He is that economic cheshire cat. If he feels that the debate tonight is a joke, well, he called it so perhaps it is. So we move into the various other ways—

An hon. Member: Tell us about the 89-cent dollar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Meow!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I believe that aside is very apt for the hon. gentleman across the way. These five programs which I have listed tonight are ones which will help diversify the small one-resource town and promise to pump more than $100 million into the economy of that single, isolated part of northern British Columbia. This is action, Mr. Speaker, not messianic mumbling by that pathetic group across the way. Canada is not prepared to listen to them. Canada saw good action last week in the federal-provincial conference. I hope hon. members will look at the reviews on their television sets to see what happened, because obviously they missed even their own Conservative member's responses.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Pembina on a point of order.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. minister would permit a question?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Yes.

Mr. Elzinga: I thank the minister and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, because I am bootlegging this question in. I would ask the minister whether she does reply to her correspondence. I sent her a letter three months ago and to date I have not had a reply.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I think the question is more appropriate for the question period. I hope the Speaker will have a chance to recognize the hon. member from the oil-rich part of southern Canada. I promise I will research to see if that gentleman's letter has been misplaced.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Now we will hear the truth.

Mr. Gillies: This is really "Alice in Wonderland."

An hon. Member: No, it is "Iona in Wonderland."

Mr. Gillies: We have a situation this evening in which the Parliament of Canada has been called together at a special session to talk about a very serious problem and we get a constituency speech, to be delivered at home, I suppose, to help the election of the hon. member. This is the most disgraceful thing I have ever seen in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: Absolutely disgraceful!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: It is absolutely outrageous that the government would put up a member to make a constituency speech on a problem as important as this.

An hon. Member: That's what you call hypocrisy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of State rises on a point of order.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman if he truly feels that the real heart of Canada is his own constituency, since he answers for it every day in the House, and speaks for it during every question period? There is a time when we must ask where the heart of Canada is located. I submit it is located from sea to sea to sea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, some people believe the Parliament of Canada is important. Some people believe that when there are important issues facing this nation it is not an excuse to get up and not talk about the problems that are facing the country.

An hon. Member: Talk about the issue.

Mr. Gillies: I will talk about the issue.

An hon. Member: Talk about southern Ontario.

Mr. Gillies: I will not see this parliament demeaned on an evening like this when we have a serious problem that presumably you haven't the intelligence to understand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: We had a speaker get up and make a constituency speech. It is unbelievable for a minister to talk so naively about the economic problems of this country. I cannot believe it when I experience this happening in the Parliament of Canada.

● (2202)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Get on with your speech.

Mr. Gillies: The hon. member opposite has a cabinet posting because he is the only Liberal who was elected from the province of Manitoba. Another indication of Alice In Wonderland was when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicated that the dollar is at the same level as it was last October. He seemed to ask what the problem was. The reason the dollar is at that level today is because it has been supported for two days. The government has gone to other countries in order to get support. The government has gone to the commercial banks and asked for $1,500 million to support the dollar. That is the problem with which Canada is faced. Where would the dollar be today if it had not been supported? That is the question which is really significant, important, and counts.

The rapid drop of the Canadian dollar in the foreign exchange markets is a symbol of the attitude other nations have about this country. It is an indicator of the true shape of the Canadian economy. Markets have no political values. The market reflects the decisions of hundreds of thousands of people all over the world in regard to the Canadian economy. People who have any interest in our economy are indicating that it is in trouble. That is not a political judgment. It is a judgment of the market. That is why the dollar is falling.

The dollar floats in response to the forces of supply and demand. The manner in which the forces of supply and demand operate depends upon the economic policies followed by the government. The economic policies of this government over the past few years have been disastrous. Our economic condition, as viewed by independent forces in the market, is very serious. It is appalling to see hon. members coming into the Chamber and laughing. It is beyond any sort of comprehension.

Mrs. Campagnolo: What about the economists?

Mr. Gillies: I have outlined the problems hon. members should speak about this evening. We do not need to talk about the problems of the economists.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. minister does not know anything about international economics.

Mr. Gillies: Apparently the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) is a marvellous addition to the cabinet. She seems to think that 1½ million people unemployed is no problem. The fact that the inflation rate is 10 per cent does not seem to matter to the minister. The Canadian inflation rate is almost as high as that of Great Britain. For years Great Britain was used as an example of how badly an economy could be operated. Our growth rate has slowed down, our retail sales are off, and the operation of our plant and equipment is at approximately 83 per cent capacity. What other indicators are needed?

Everyone around the world is asking why a rich country like Canada should be in such desperate shape. The resource rich countries of the world are getting richer, but Canada is not. How can that possibly happen? The answer to the question is obvious. It is the manner in which the economy has been managed. Our difficulties are not because of lack of resources or people. Our difficulty is the manner in which the economy has been badly operated. Consistently we have been running deficits.

The deficit of the federal government this year will be close to $10 billion. One should remember that ten years ago in 1968 the total budget of the government was $10 billion, and today the deficit is about that amount. A country can handle that situation as long as there is real economic growth. Canada is not experiencing any growth. Thus, Canada cannot continue to operate with the amount of spending that is taking place.

For the last few years the government was paying for the things it gained through inflation. We have been faced with a serious inflation rate. As any economist knows, the time comes when things cannot be financed any longer through inflation because people will not accept the currency. That is the situation we are facing in Canada. If our expenditures are to be increased, as was indicated in the estimates today, and if the government is not going to tax in order to pay them, there will be serious economic problems. That situation is made dramatic by the drop in the value of the dollar.

The government has had no courage to face up to reality. How long does the government think it can spend far more than it has in revenues? At some point the courage must be found to deal with the situation. Like other hon. members in the House, I have an interest in parliament and the history of Canada. What has happened? Is the government more interested in power than in solving problems? Is it afraid to tackle the tough issues before us at this time? Will politics always be placed before prudence in the management of the economy? Is there no situation more important than being elected? Is Canada not to adjust to the world economic situation?

The former ministers of finance, and in particular the hon. John Turner, were not willing to put any restraint on the economy. They were not willing to tell Canadians that major changes were necessary to take care of the problems. They were more interested in receiving political bows for finessing their way through difficult situations. The government cannot say that it did not know what was happening. The problems Canada is facing at the present time were not difficult to predict. Anyone could foresee that those problems were coming.

A year ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) pointed out that if the government insisted on following policies which would result in large deficits in the balance of payments, there would be a serious decline in the value of the dollar. When there is a large devaluation, there will be an enormous amount of inflation. Thus, our inflation rate was predictable. A great deal of that inflation is as a result of the devaluation which is being experienced at the same time. The net result of this situation is that in the eyes of the world we have a discredited government. That is being expressed by the manner in which the dollar has devalued during the last two or three days. There is no confidence in the economic management of Canada. If there were confidence, there would be no problem.

Mr. Anderson: It is travelling.

Mr. Gillies: It is not travelling. There is no confidence anywhere in the world in the economic management of Canada.

● (2212)

The great question is: why has our economic management been so bad? Part of the responsibility has to rest with the Department of Finance. Forecast after forecast they made has been wrong. The monetary policy of the Bank of Canada in the mid-1970's was disastrous. The increase in the deficits against the falling rate of growth has been lunacy and, as anybody could observe, would create enormous problems for the country.

For several years many members of the House have been calling for changes in the way in which we make economic policy. It should be open and it should have countervailing forces going. Almost every country in the world has a committee system which examines estimates in a meaningful fashion, or has debates on budget-making before the budget is brought down. These things are done before, not after the fact. But in Canada we still have a closed in, locked in way of making economic policy, and we have certainly seen the consequences of that.

We have heard a lot of talk about the first minister's conference which was held a week or so ago. The reaction of the world to that conference was rapid. As soon as people assessed what really happened at that conference and what the federal government was really going to do, it was reflected in the money markets, and the dollar fell. You can say what you want about the conference, but the evidence is clear that the assessment of world money markets was that it failed because no hard policies were put forth at that time to deal with the situation we are facing in this country. There is no secret about those things; they are not hard to understand, but you have to take some action about them.

There is something unreal when you listen to the government members talk about the economic management of the country. Just before the first ministers' conference the government put forward its short term economic forecasts. They were ludicrous. The short term economic forecast is for declining inflation. At the same time that they are forecasting declining inflation, the dollar is falling. When the dollar falls, it means higher inflation. It does not make sense.

The government is talking about decreasing unemployment. At the same time it is talking about increasing investment. You cannot have increasing investment when you have increasing inflation. It is ludicrous to put forth proposals of that sort. That is exactly what the world markets have been saying about the conference and about the dollar.

An integral part of the operation of an economy in any country is confidence. You really cannot do much in a country if you do not have confidence in it. Indeed, without it almost any economic policy you put forth will be difficult to operate. It is interesting to note what people were saying about confidence in the Weimar Republic in the 1920's. We know what happened in the Weimar Republic because people did not have confidence in it. In the 1930's, until the inauguration of the first term of Franklin Roosevelt, no one had confidence. His admonition that "we have nothing to fear but fear itself", is, I suspect, more important than any economic theory because what the people in the U.S. needed at that time was some confidence. I say as seriously as I can that the way in which the Minister of Finance is managing our economy is destroying the underlying essential and most significant ingredient we must have to get this country moving again, that is, confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: No one believes the things he says. The Minister of Finance is not like any other minister, and I say this with no pejorative connotation. He has to be careful about every single word he utters. He cannot have a wry sense of humour, because bankers in Switzerland may not know what he means. People read and listen to what the Minister of Finance says. If it becomes apparent that one cannot believe what he says or one cannot understand or make sense of what he is saying, then his credibility is lost, and with that goes the confidence in his economic management.

I say as seriously as I can that confidence in this government is shaken to its foundations so far as any economic aspects are concerned. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance can regain his credibility. You can laugh all you want, but I tell you that this is the most serious problem in the country today, the lack of credibility of the government and the lack of confidence in what the Minister of Finance is saying. I tell you that confidence is shaken. Confidence in the government's economic policies is shaken, because it reverses itself. But those things work themselves out. What does not work itself out is the day-to-day trading operations of the exchange markets. Those dealers, whether the Bank of England, the Government of the U.S., or the trading banks in the U.S. markets, watch and listen to what the Minister of Finance is saying.

I say that no one could watch the performance of the Minister of Finance in the last couple of days and have confidence in the economic management of this country because the minister literally said today that the Government of Canada was not intervening in the market and what they are doing is normal. But the last time they did what they did yesterday was ten years ago. Yet he is trying to say this is a normal sort of operation. To put forward such a proposition is ludicrous. There is nothing really secret about it. There is nothing secret about trading in exchange markets. These are transactions and people know what is going on. For the Minister of Finance to say that the Bank of Canada did not take defensive action to support the dollar destroys the credibility of that minister and confidence in his management of the economy. He had to know and, if he did not know, then he should not be doing the job he is doing today.

In his book "The Great Crash" professor Galbraith of Harvard points out that in the years 1927-1928 one of the most disastrous things that was happening was that the statements being made by responsible officers about the economy were not taken very seriously.

The Government of Canada is mistaken in its policy if it thinks the devaluation of the dollar will cure its problems. As the Conference Board in Canada stated today, no country can solve its problems by devaluing its currency. You become trapped in the devaluation inflation cycle, and then you have to do something about it. There is no evidence that this government is about to correct the situation.

I say, with as much seriousness as I can command, that what this country really wants is not more platitudes or political footwork on the part of the minister. What the country wants is honesty and candor. Why can the Minister of Finance not stand up and say "Look, we have this serious problem and we are trying to deal with it. We are willing to take you into our confidence"? The Canadian people have responded to very serious situations in the 110 years we have existed, and we can respond to another one. But Canadians cannot respond if they do not have confidence that they are being told the truth and that they are being told openly about our economic problems, that they are not having these foolish propositions put forward but are asked to search for solutions together with the government.

The decline in the value of the Canadian dollar is quite clearly a question of confidence and credibility. The lack of confidence in the minister and in the government is apparent, but I do not think there is lack of confidence in Canada. I think people around the world are mystified that the Canadian situation should be as it is today. What people really want is a government which will do something about these serious problems. If the government and the minister would forthrightly, openly and honestly come forward and explain the realities of the economic situation to the Canadian people and take them into their confidence, I am sure we could handle the problems we have right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest up to this point, and there have been some very worthwhile contributions. I thank the hon. member who spoke before me for the sincerity and honesty he displayed. Unfortunately, many members of the opposition tonight have not addressed the problem, or given any solutions.

Mr. Alexander: Let's hear what you have to say.

Mr. Anderson: I have listened quietly this evening, and I hope hon. members will do the same while I am speaking.

In his statement this afternoon the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) referred to the high cost of maintaining the dollar. The financial critic of the Conservative party stated that $100 million a day was being drained out of Canada. I wonder if he can table any document to show that that is the correct figure. If he does have evidence to substantiate that, I hope he will provide it to the House because I do not think that figure is correct. Until he can substantiate that figure, I think we are talking about a straw man.

There is no question that in October of 1977—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) advised the House of the creation of a $1.5 billion stand-by fund. That was not something thrust upon us today. It is not something about which none of us has been unaware. At that time the minister said that he was not pegging the Canadian dollar but he wanted to maintain an orderly floating of it. I do not have to hear what the minister said five, six or seven times. He was talking about an orderly Canadian dollar on the market, which seems reasonable. If we had not set up a fund to have an orderly marketing of the Canadian dollar, I suspect that the opposition would stand up and ask why we had not created such a fund, why we were allowing ups and downs, and why we were allowing speculators.

An hon. Member: I can't stand it.

Mr. Anderson: I am sorry the hon. member has to leave. When the government does something, it is criticized; and when it does not do anything, it is criticized.

There is no question that in the last 14 months the Canadian dollar has gone from $1.03 American to 89 cents American. To be exact, the drop is 14 per cent. I wonder if hon. members opposite have considered that the U.S. dollar has declined 50 per cent against the Swiss franc, 34 per cent against the Japanese yen, 31 per cent against the West German mark, and 21 per cent against the British pound. Perhaps the opposition should be telling the American Congress and the American Senate that they face a crisis, an economic emergency. The figures I just related, 50 per cent and 34 per cent, perhaps do not look as bad as our 14 per cent against the American dollar. The difference between Canada and the United States is that in the American Congress and Senate there is no great worry about the economic future of the United States. Those bodies do not cry wolf every time the American dollar goes down a few percentage points against the Swiss franc, the German mark or any other currency, because they know there is strength in their economy, that economies rise and fall, and that dollar values go up and down.

Opposition parties would have us believe that we have an unusual situation in Canada and that this situation is not in existence throughout the world. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) says we have nothing to fear but fear itself. I agree 100 per cent, but do all hon. members opposite believe that? Not from what I heard tonight. What I have heard tonight has been nothing but gloom and doom. Hon. members opposite are experts on that. By no stretch of the imagination is there any group which could be put together in any room and find as many faults with Canada and so little right. However, the opinion of hon. members opposite is not the opinion of the people of Canada.

There is no denying that the 14 per cent devaluation of the Canadian currency has had an effect on our economy. This devaluation has also had an effect on our most important trading partner, the United States. We do approximately $70 billion worth of trading back and forth, but not one hon. member opposite has stated what this 14 per cent means. Looking at it another way, Canada has erected a 14 per cent tariff on goods coming from the United States. By the same token, goods going to the United States have a reduced tariff of 14 per cent. I am not saying that devaluation is the greatest thing since green cheese, but it has made our goods more competitive on the American market, and American goods more expensive on ours. I am not arguing that there should be an 89-cent dollar.

An hon. Member: What are you arguing?

Mr. Anderson: However, if hon. members opposite do not like an 89-cent dollar, do they want a $1 dollar? Do they want a $1.03 dollar or a $1.05 dollar? If the present situation is a crisis, are hon. members opposite saying that it is beneficial to have a Canadian dollar at $1.05 pegged to the American dollar? Are they saying that it would be even more beneficial if our dollar were worth $1.25 compared with the American dollar? If they do not like it where it is, where do they want it? If they do not like the free system, do they want the dollar pegged? There has not been one hon. member opposite who has addressed the question that the opposition itself has raised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Anderson.]

Mr. Anderson: Time and time again I have heard hon. members opposite complain, but they have no solutions. I am used to that, but the subject they raised tonight is very narrow and precise. The Leader of the Opposition spoke for 20 minutes, but said nothing. If he had written a speech like that for the former leader of his party, he would have been fired.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) spoke about the federal-provincial conference. I am not exactly sure what that has to do with the motion, but I hope hon. members opposite who speak later in this debate will say at what level they think the Canadian dollar should be in relation to the American dollar. If they do not like it where it is, where do they want it, or do they know?

Mr. Alexander: Your speech is better than the minister's, anyway.

An hon. Member: Say something.

Mr. Anderson: Hon. members opposite do not like being at the receiving end of catcalls and criticism, and I do not think they will get a chance to be criticized as a government. But I hope they can stand being criticized as an opposition because it is give and take on any day in the House.

• (2232)

Only a few months ago I was in the Fraser valley and I was talking to a group of people in the agricultural business. Those people said they were being forced out of business because of products coming from the United States. They asked the federal government to give them a 15 per cent tariff on vegetables and fruit coming from the U.S. I told them we had already done that. We did not put it in by legislation, but with the devaluation of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Fraser: Would the hon. member accept my question?

Mr. Anderson: Will he wait until I have finished my speech?

Mr. Fraser: I might point out he has been asking a lot of questions, and I would like to ask one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The parliamentary secretary refuses to answer a question at this time. He has indicated he will answer it if he has time at the end of his speech.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to a question from the hon. member. I indicated that I would do it at the end of my speech. I do not want to take time from my speech listening to his questions.

Mr. Fraser: The question is not the problem; it is the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) on a point of order.

Mr. Fraser: I just want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite sure—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Anderson) has the floor, and I will go to the hon. member for Vancouver South at two o'clock in the morning if he wants to stay.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that a fellow member from British Columbia would interrupt a speech concerning British Columbia. I hope that he will allow me to finish the remarks I was making.

There is no question that British Columbia, the province which I am proud to come from, is a resource oriented province. There is no question, on the other side of the coin, that we know that having a devalued dollar does increase the price of goods. Not one person on the opposition side has ever brought up the point that if goods coming into this country are costing more, why buy them? Buy Canadian! The premiers of the provinces got this message. Why do you not understand it?

It may sound like a spurious point, but the consumer realizes it is to his advantage to buy Canadian if the price of goods coming in from the United States or any other country goes up. If the price of bananas goes up because of a lower Canadian dollar, maybe we should buy Okanagan apples. I do not find anything wrong with that.

I know the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) would like me to wind up my speech, but I am speaking the truth. You are not forced to buy one thing or another. I would hope that one of the messages brought across Canada by myself and by other hon. members of this House is that it is time to look at where goods originate. If we buy Canadian, we create Canadian jobs. We create security for those people buying Canadian goods. I would hope for the hon. member for Hamilton West that we buy Canadian steel.

Mr. Alexander: I hope we get some of the pipeline.

Mr. Anderson: I would like members on both sides of the House to make that message clear that it is to our advantage to buy Canadian goods. Members who have brought up the fact that it is inflationary are correct if one purchases imported goods. If the price of coffee goes up because of the devalued dollar, you do have that right to choose whether you will purchase coffee or not.

I realize economics is not a strong point in the New Democratic Party. However, there is a discretionary power in our economy. With the devaluation of the dollar we have a breathing space. If we use that breathing space wisely we must try to become more competitive in our industries. The resource industries cannot continue to provide a surplus of trade balance in the Canadian economy. The breathing space is there. If we do not use it wisely we know some of the consequences that may happen.

The question was brought up earlier regarding the situation of the Canadian dollar being higher than the American dollar. I hope hon. members realize that a majority of those dollars were coming in from the United States through provincial and municipal borrowing, for example the James Bay, B.C. hydro, and other large projects. These projects were the main stimulus to an overly inflated Canadian dollar.

It is rather unique that if we borrow more from the United States our Canadian dollar would go up in value and we would be more in debt. If we borrow less from the United States, our dollar goes down. If the hon. members in the opposition would address themselves to that question, and while they are saying there is a crisis, are they basically suggesting that we should return to the artificially high Canadian dollar which was caused by provinces and municipalities borrowing in the American market? This occurred several years ago. If you do not like the dollar where it is, there is a way to get it up again.

An hon. Member: Change the government.

Mr. Anderson: One of the basic things that has destroyed confidence in the Canadian dollar and the Canadian economy is the takeover of the potash industry in Saskatchewan. That amazed the financial communities not only in the United States but throughout the world. This was an industry that was socialized and nationalized, taken over by the Saskatchewan government. The leader of the New Democratic Party who, I understand, is a graduate of the London School of Economics, surely must realize what effect that wrought on the international markets.

We had a New Democratic government in the province of British Columbia and, in the wisdom or non-wisdom of that government, the former premier decided that he would put a super royalty on minerals. This industry has not recovered yet and it will be a few years before confidence in the British Columbia market will return.

I am sure that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) will be rising to his feet in a few minutes, and I will listen to him with great interest. Markets do change and are affected by the actions of governments, especially when they nationalize industries or set artificially high royalties. If the hon. member for New Westminster wishes to debate that, he will have a chance to contradict the statement that actions by the NDP premier of British Columbia affected the mining industry in that province.

Mr. Leggatt: Absolutely correct.

Mr. Anderson: If he says that, Mr. Speaker, I will excerpt his statement and send it back to British Columbia because there are a lot of people in the mining industry who, I am sure, will be writing letters to him.

There is no question in most member's minds that the devalued Canadian dollar is not the cause of our problems, it is resulting from problems in our economy and is reflecting them. The devalued dollar is a barometer showing us various things, including the fact productivity is not on our side at this moment.

● (2242)

As I said, this is a breathing period, a period when we can catch up and get our house in order. It will not only require the co-operation of the provincial governments, but of the municipal governments and the Canadian people. It may not be the easiest two or three years, regardless of what government is in power.

It will require one other thing. I say this with all sincerity. If the opposition parties sincerely believe in our Canadian style of government, our Canadian way of life, and believe that this country has a future, the way to express that is not to say that we are on the edge of an abyss.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we were treated to the annual medicine show by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). At that time I did not know it was only the matinée performance. Tonight we have the comedy acts. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) would have us believe the devaluation of the Canadian dollar is a marvellous thing. Now we can buy Canadian bananas cheaper than foreign bananas, and Canadian coffee cheaper than foreign coffee. It sounds as though it was a master plan by this brilliant government.

One can, of course, forgive the hon. member. He has been taking notes and learning from the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) who had the same thesis. They think it is wonderful that our dollar is being devalued. They believe it is having a marvellous impact. Listening to their speeches, one would think that if we could get the dollar down to a nickel, we would all be millionaires, flooded with Canadian coffee and bananas and other good things.

It is funny in one sense, but tragic in the other. It is not so tragic in terms of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni or the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) because they do not really matter a hill of beans with regard to what happens there or anywhere else. However, it is tragic in terms of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). During the debate tonight he contributed absolutely nothing in terms of plans, policies, programs, or even an acknowledgement of the seriousness of this crisis.

In his opening remarks the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked the Minister of Finance five very important questions. I will repeat them. When were the banks formally or informally advised as to the government's intentions to draw down the line of credit? What will the rate of interest be on the borrowing and what will be the means of repayment? When will be the time of repayment? Was the minister advised, did he consent, or was he asked with regard to the Bank of Canada's action which started Monday afternoon? What level will the dollar not fall below? What is the dead bottom level at which time the government will step in?

Those five very reasonable and important questions were put by my leader because of our interest and concern in this question. What did we get in return? We got flim-flam from the Minister of Finance. He either does not understand the crisis, does not care about it, has no respect for the House of Commons and the people of Canada, or was simply making his contribution to the evening performance of the medicine show.

The Minister of Finance told us there is no crisis. He used specious arguments, picking selective dates to indicate there is no crisis. Previous speakers from my party, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), demonstrated the ignorance of the argument put forward by the Minister of Finance.

There is a serious crisis, a crisis of confidence. The international money markets are saying they have no confidence in the Canadian dollar. That is the message of the slide.

The Minister of Finance says the Bank of Canada has been intervening to keep an orderly market. Well, Mr. Speaker, when you intervene to the tune of $1 billion, $500,000 in the month of February alone, it is not to keep an orderly market. It is to prop up the dollar.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is a salvage operation.

Mr. Andre: Yes; not keeping an orderly market. When you are keeping an orderly market, you are buying and selling in order to remove fluctuations. You are not continually using our reserves of foreign currency, currency which the Bank of Canada cannot print. They can print Canadian currency and use that to finance this government's operations, but they cannot print foreign currency.

They have run out of foreign reserves. We have had to go to the international money markets to make use of the bank line of credit. Now we have to borrow abroad. That action by the Bank of Canada, necessary though it may be, is not a solution to the problem. It is a dressing, merely a band-aid. It may stop the hemorrhage, but it will not heal the wound.

This crisis of confidence will not go away as a result of this type of intervention. It will not go away as a result of current economic plans by the Minister of Finance and this government. It certainly will not go away as a result of the minister ranting and raving irrelevant and erroneous critiques about suggestions made by members of my party.

The international money markets are telling anyone who cares to listen the same thing the American money markets told the city of New York two or three years ago. The international money markets are telling Canada, "Your house is in disorder. We do not have confidence you are managing your affairs. Get your affairs in order." That is the message and that is the crisis in confidence that is occurring. Only a ship of fools would ignore a message like that. It is tragic that this ship of fools who are guiding the ship of state at this time refuse or are unable to heed this message being directed at them by the international money markets.

You do not have to search too far in the Canadian economy to find this. The Canadian dollar is being devalued with regard to foreign currencies in exact proportion to the degree of inflation in Canada with respect to these foreign currencies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Look at the figures. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) is so busy running around protecting the Minister of Finance that he has not had time to do some simple research. The fact is those countries which have low inflation have the strongest currencies, and those which have high inflation have the weakest currencies. It makes sense.

Through our policies we are devaluing and discrediting our dollar at a rate of 9 per cent. We are debasing our own currency. Who wants to hold on to a currency being debased at 9 per cent a year when they can hold on to a currency which is holding its value? You do not need a Ph.D. in economics to figure that out. Even a country lawyer like the Minister of Finance should be able to figure it out.

Then what is the cause of inflation, Mr. Speaker? Let us consider what a big city lawyer says it is. The big city lawyer says you can never spend more that you have, otherwise you have endless inflation. Mr. Speaker, that big city lawyer was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as reported in Maclean's magazine of October 20, 1975, if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance cares to look it up.

Mr. Lumley: I will go out and check on that.

Mr. Andre: He says if you spend more than you take in you have endless inflation. So what is that big city lawyer doing with the government for which he is responsible? Last year that big city lawyer, who says if you spend more than you take in you have endless inflation, and who previously had wrestled inflation to the ground, was responsible for his government spending $44,450 million. That government only raised about $36 billion so it spent $9 billion more than it raised. Of course, it got that money by turning on a printing press across the street in the glass tower. It debased the Canadian dollar, and now international money markets are saying they want to hold on to something more stable, like the Swiss franc or the German mark. And that is what they are doing. Even a small country lawyer could figure that out and should be able to do something about it.

That is the root of the crisis in this country, Mr. Speaker. That is the problem that has to be addressed and the problem that this government refuses to address because it would take political courage to attack government spending in a vigorous way. Not only do they lack courage to attack the problem but they attack vehemently every positive suggestion put up by our side, even it they have to distort what we say in order to create a strawman at which they can flail. It is irresponsible behaviour.

Government spending is totally out of control. The annual increase in expenditures from the year this government took office until now is 11 per cent, 11 per cent, 14 per cent, 7 per cent, 23 per cent, 28 per cent, 18 per cent, 10 per cent, 18 per cent, and this year it is 13 per cent. With that kind of cancerous growth in spending it is no wonder that revenues have not kept pace. I wonder if the House and the country are aware that even if the government raised income taxes in order to meet the deficit of last year, it would have to raise them by a full 50 per cent. It certainly will not do that, but it does not have the courage to cut back on spending either. The $9 billion has to come from somewhere, so it has been borrowing part of it, and printing money to cover the other part. The only problem is that it has to be paid back.

Last year the interest on previous debts amounted to nearly $7 billion. That is more than the annual expenditures of the Pearson government. We spent more money on interest on the debts of this government than the Pearson government spent in total.

We are now borrowing money to pay interest on money borrowed earlier. On and on it goes. With that kind of operation it is no wonder the international money markets are saying they do not want to hang on to our dollars but want more stable dollars. Small wonder our dollar has fallen to 88 cents, and pressure is still building.

All the loans we can get from banks and offshore sources are not going to solve the problem. They may enable the government to survive until an election, however. The problem of an uncontrolled economy that is spending at cancerous rates has to be tackled, and this government refuses to do that.

I would refer the Minister of Finance to the debate on February 2 as he was not present at that time. This party put forward four concrete proposals to aid the government in addressing the problem of government spending. They were positive proposals, and the government would be well advised to adopt them.

I plead with the government to try to bring things under control because this is truly a marvelous country. We are blessed as is no other industrialized nation. We have great resources, a highly educated population, and a well developed infrastructure. We have all that is necessary to give this country a future that no other country can dream of. The only thing wrong is the continuation of the stupid, ignorant policies of this government over the last few years. As the Liberal party said in the election campaign of 1972, "The Land is Strong". We agree, Mr. Speaker. The land is indeed strong, but it cannot endure this kind of mismanagement forever, and the time has come to take corrective action.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the evening it looked as though we were going to get into a great big brawl. Fortunately, it deteriorated into a debate—but this debate is becoming curiouser and curiouser. As my friend, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) would say, "I am just a little old country boy and there are some things I do not understand." I am trying to understand, Mr. Speaker: I am a little old country boy from Waterloo-Cambridge.

What I do not understand is that speaker after speaker from the Liberal side of the House has defended the devaluation of the Canadian dollar and said how curative the whole process has been. It seems as though they were overwhelmed with their success and worried that it might become too much of a good thing, so they stopped it. "The dollar is dropping, and that is a good thing," they seem to say, "But we have to stop it." That approach is difficult to understand.

I see that my friends on the far right are smiling. I suspect they are rather supportive of the proposition I have put forward. But, Mr. Speaker, I find their position to be even curiouser. I have been trying to assess it. My very distinguished friend, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), was haranguing the government, accusing it of not taking the House into its confidence. I think he was right: there should be confidence in the government. I have been listening very carefully tonight to a series of excellent interventions from this side of the House, waiting to learn the position of hon. friends to my right. I am in a very tough position because, I am just a little country boy.

I want to speak about the Conservative position, but I find it difficult because I cannot discern what their position is. In desperation, I may have to ask our favourite country lawyer who is occupying the exalted position of Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I am sure he understands the Conservative position. I wish—just as the Conservative party wishes—with great sincerity that the government would take them into its confidence, and I wish the Conservative party would take the House into its confidence by explaining just where it stands on this issue. Do those hon. members want the dollar pegged, or do they want it to float free? That is a very simple question.

It is very difficult to understand the problem. Let us get back to the shakers and the movers in this House. Let us get some of the irrelevancies out of the way of what is a really a very important and serious discussion. First of all, it is suggested the Minister of Finance should come to the House and take us into his confidence regarding what he intends to do about the Canadian dollar. There is no way that this is important to this debate—that is, whether the Minister of Finance does that or not. As a matter of fact, if the Minister of Finance were ever to leak that kind of information, we would insist that he be thrown out of office. The last thing in the world a minister of finance is supposed to do is tip off the government's intentions respecting its currency exchanges. Let us get that suggestion out of the way.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Let us get that matter out of the way, because it is not important to this debate.

Is there a crisis? There has been a crisis for a long time, and it is difficult to know whether one crisis is worse than another. It is like watching a punch-drunk fighter: you can hit him a couple of times and he does not even feel it. That is the position the government is in: it has been in a continuous crisis for a long time. To use hyperbole, this is the worst crisis we have ever had—but we have had the worst crisis we have ever had every day for a long time.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

The other question is, what is the government doing? The government is talking about trying to even things out. The worst possible thing the government could do, in my opinion—if it believes in a floating exchange rate and is committed to that and realizes the Canadian dollar has to be devalued—is to intervene in the market. If you want the gnomes to step in and speculate against the Canadian dollar, this is the way to do it: that is really the way to accomplish it.

I do not know the special circumstances. I do not know what the governor of the Bank of Canada said to the Minister of Finance to persuade him to do this, but it seems to me he has taken absolutely the wrong course. A lot of problems are associated with devaluation. There is no doubt it had to happen; and it had to happen because the government failed in its responsibility to do anything else.

Over the last period of time the government had one of two options, and only one of two. It could have stimulated the economy to full employment through positive government measures; it could have listened to my leader who has been talking about capital projects: he has been saying for a long time that, rather than putting people on unemployment insurance, the government should find jobs for them. Now is the time to do something about railway debts; now is the time to look at the possibilities of Fundy power; now is the time to consider future energy sources. There are a lot of things to do in Canada. That was an option the government had to deal with—unemployment. The government failed to deal with it; it failed to use the authority and responsibility entrusted to it to get Canadians back to work. Because it failed, the international community had disciplined the government. You can fail only up to a point, and then the chickens come home to roost—and they are roosting now.

This is going to be a corrective measure, but a painful, corrective measure. It is not a corrective measure that should be stopped. The government is to be faulted for stepping in at this time, trying to intervene in the money market. While we may not pay for this over the next month or so, what this policy will do is create a state of speculation against the Canadian dollar. That is just what the gnomes like; that is just what they want: they want to know they are being protected. If the dollar is not protected, you have one gnome speculating against another. When the Canadian government says it is going to intervene, they can speculate against the Canadian dollar without too much fear of losing out. After all, the government of Canada is protecting them to some extent.

Our dollar has been too high in relation to other currencies. This has been costing us jobs. This is not the time to go into the reason our dollar has been too high, but obviously it has been too high and had to drop. When the dollar drops, one does not go out and find a gibbet for the nation. As a matter of fact, the United States dollar, vis-à-vis other currencies, has been dropping even more substantially than our dollar. In fact, what other countries have been doing is not dropping their currency—and that is what the United States have been complaining about in relation to the behaviour of the money markets of Germany and Japan. They have been dropping their currencies too low and, therefore, have been operating at an advantage in terms of world trade. The United States has been insisting that Japan and Germany revalue upward so that they more truly reflect the currency position as against the currencies of other countries.

What appears from the determination to intervene at this time is that it is all part of an election psychology. It seems quite clear that there is to be an election. I wonder whether, in fact, the government would have intervened at this time if that were not the climate or the mood of the country.

The unfortunate aspect of the government's willingness to behave as it has is that it knows, or should know, that the most serious problem facing this country is unemployment. This is an absolutely disgraceful situation facing this country, yet for some reason the public does not perceive unemployment as a most serious problem. The public can be persuaded by all kinds of headlines and by the kind of debate we have heard from our friends to the right—and from Liberal members as well—that the real problem is in relation to the integrity of the dollar, as though that means anything. What does mean something is the number of jobs available. That is what really means something—not the mercantile view that you have gold in the vault and money in the bank. We had plenty of gold in the vault and money in the bank during the great depression, but that did not mean anything because there were no jobs for the people.

This government, at political risk, thought it was better—rather than putting people back to work,—to put some cosmetics on the Canadian dollar which the government itself felt should be lower in relation to other currencies. This is a kind of justice from above. There is a great article in today's Citizen by Charles Lynch. The circumspect hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) took away my article by Charles Lynch; however, I will see if I can do justice to Mr. Lynch. The trouble with reporters like Charles Lynch is that they hang around the press gallery for too long and become memories. They remember things, but what they are remembering is 15 years ago when the Liberal party sat on this side of the House and laughed like crazy at the Conservative party, which was on the other side, for devaluating the Canadian dollar.

An hon. Member: The "Diefendollar".

Mr. Saltsman: Yes. And the Liberals campaigned on that and persuaded the Canadian people that the world was coming to an end and the sky was falling because the first thing the Conservative government had done wisely for four years was to lower the value of the dollar. We now have the same play and the same repertoire. We have a road show with an out-of-town cast of players. We have the reverse of the previous position. I think there is a kind of poetic justice here. I say to you, Mr. Minister and through you, Mr. Speaker, that if you get tossed around a little bit, if you are punch-drunk and your head is ringing, you have it coming to you. You have it coming to you and they have been waiting a long time for it.

• (2312)

Charles Lynch is always around to remind the government: he never forgets anything. Some provinces did not go to the minister; some behaved foolishly: they borrowed money in the United States because interest rates were lower— The money was available in Canada, but the interest rate was higher. When provinces did that, they took a risk. I have used up enough of my time talking about Charles Lynch; I have given him more glory that he is entitled to.

Was it the provinces? Was it the fear of repatriation of dividends? The Minister of Finance should answer these questions. If he were frank, perhaps we would feel differently about the action he is taking. No explanation has been put before the House. Was it pressure from other countries? I suspect that it was. Was Canada becoming too competitive? I suspect that it was.

Mr. Chrétien: No.

Mr. Saltsman: Currencies in other countries of the western world have gone down too much. They did not want that position; they were worried about it.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the hon. member, I can reply to that question. There was no pressure from anyone. I discussed that matter with my advisers and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Saltsman: I have no reason not to accept what the minister says at face value. Whether there were any direct discussions or not, it was forced on Canada. The Diefenbaker government, in 1962, paid a price for the rescue operation of the Canadian dollar. It was to go on a fixed exchange rate. That was forced on Canada; it was not wanted. There has been pressure on Canada not to be on a floating exchange rate and not to allow its rate to go too low. I am sure those views are taken into account in the Department of Finance.

A few days ago, when the minister was before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I accused him of living in a fool's paradise when he told the committee that the inflation rate in the 1980s would be 3.5 per cent. That was commendable, but unrealistic, especially after one considers what people in other countries are indicating; that is, that the inflation rate cannot be brought down below 6 per cent. Given the past history of this government, it would be surprising if the government brought it down to 3.5 per cent.

This government is determined to live up to a silly projection which has very little basis in fact: it is little more than a pious hope. The government refers to this as a real figure; then it attempts to twist and distort the economy on a Procrustian bed in order to make it fit. The consequence is that the people whose arms and legs are stretched are the unemployed, while the government pursues a goal which cannot be reached.

Devaluation has a price. Nothing is costless. The price paid for devaluation is that the dollar falls, exports are improved, imports are reduced, the cost of living is raised and inflation is contributed to. While it has a positive effect on employment, it has a rather less than positive effect on inflation. The government cannot have it both ways. It has to choose whether it will attempt to make its record on a reduced level of inflation at the cost of keeping more people out of work, or whether employment will be looked upon as the most important objective of public policy at the same time as living with a somewhat higher rate of inflation than it wants.

Hon. members of the New Democratic Party have made a decision. The decision was not easy to make, because something wanted is traded off for something needed. There is nothing more important than putting the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians back to work. A price has to be paid for that and the level of inflation will be somewhat higher. Perhaps the government will have to eat humble pie. That is better than 1½ million people remaining unemployed. The New Democratic Party does not like the idea of the devalued dollar: we would rather see a full dollar and full employment. If the choice is to let the dollar fall in order to create more employment, then we are prepared to do that.

I would like to hear the government suggest something constructive, rather than just saying that everything it does is correct and everything the official opposition does is wrong. There should be an evaluation of the kind of costs; then there can be debate and the people can be asked to assess what they want. They would know the prices they are required to pay and the advantages they would receive. No advantage comes without a disadvantage. The government has been asking the opposition where it stands. In straightforward terms, the New Democratic Party stands for full employment. Whatever has to be done should be done.

Devaluation does not hit everyone the same way: the poor do not consume imported goods to the same extent as the rich. At a time when the country has to make sacrifices to put people back to work, we should be concerned about jobs and how the poor are affected. The poor are not able to buy imported stereos or to take trips to the Caribbean. That is the kind of trade-off the country should be willing to accept.

An hon. Member: What about Canadian travel?

Mr. Saltsman: If public policy encourages Canadian travel, it is a good thing. There is a need for more frankness in this kind of debate. I criticize the government because it wants it both ways. It wants devaluation, it talks about the benefits of devaluation, and then for some reason it decides it will not go through with it. I think that is wrong, and it has not been explained to the country.

● (2322)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure of me to take part in the debate this evening, but before I get into the subject matter of the motion under Standing Order 26 I should like to make a few remarks directed toward the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who spoke about an hour or so ago. He launched into one of the most virulent and vitriolic attacks I have heard on an individual member of the House, namely, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo). He criticized her for being a good constituency member. I can tell the House that the hon. member for Don Valley cannot hold a candle to the efforts of the minister.

An hon. Member: Do you want to be her parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Collenette: No, Mr. Speaker. I speak as one of the neighbours of the hon. member for Don Valley in metropolitan Toronto. He also ridiculed the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) for being the Liberal member from Manitoba. But he did not look around at metropolitan Toronto to see what happened to the Conservatives in that city when one of his colleagues, one of the only two Conservative members, namely, the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), is steering away from Toronto and going to Oakville where they do not want him. Let the hon. member for Don Valley remember the glass house in which he lives before he casts stones at some of the members on this side. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I felt compelled to make these remarks because they came up in the cut and thrust of the debate this evening.

Some hon. Members: Tell us about Sun Life.

Mr. Collenette: Our position on Sun Life was morally defensible, I think, and one which did a lot for the cause of national unity in this country. But where was the Conservative party and where was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark)? Anyway, we do not want to get into that this evening.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: What we have here this evening is a debate called by the Progressive Conservatives, and of course the NDP, to boost their sagging popularity, to show their concern, and to get headlines.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: It is true. Look at the Gallup polls. The P.C. party is going nowhere and they are becoming desperate.

I also take exception to some of the remarks of the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent). My colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), made reference to the fact that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby attended the London School of Economics. He was one of my professors at the university about ten years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: So that is the connection! Now we know.

Mr. Collenette: I did not realize what was wrong with his kind of econo mics until I came to the House, as was pointed out by some of my colleagues.

Let us talk about the declining dollar and the economic situation in this country which has brought about the decline in the dollar. I believe that the dollar drop should not cause that great an alarm. A 90 cent dollar, as the Minister of Finance said on a number of occasions, better reflects our trade relationship with the U.S. We should look at one reason which has not been explored fully this evening, although the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) alluded to it. We are all aware that U.S. multinationals control a great deal of our economy, I believe about 85 per cent of our oil and gas industry, and 60 per cent of our manufacturing industry. Because of this extensive U.S. control, much Canadian money is being transferred to the U.S. in the form of interest and dividend payments. Interest payments are necessary because there is much borrowing in the U.S. for Canadian purposes, or at least there has been. Dividend payments are necessary because many U.S. companies operating in Canada are only listed on the New York stock market.

This extensive flow of Canadian dollars into the U.S. is increased by the fact that Canadian tourists spend more in the U.S. than U.S. tourists spend in Canada. Although we have a surplus of trade with the U.S., it is not sufficient to cover this services account deficit.

A year ago our interest rates were 4 per cent higher than those of the U.S. This higher interest rate attracted U.S. capital into Canada for safe investment. This capital more than balanced the deficit we have from interest payments, dividends, tourism, etc. Hence, our dollar was worth more than the U.S. dollar, about $1.03. Today the U.S. has raised its interest rate so that there is only a 1 per cent point spread between the rates in the U.S. and Canada. This has had the effect of drying up U.S. currency flowing into Canada. As we have switched from an over balanced account to an under balanced account, our foreign exchange reserves are low and the dollar hovers at 90 cents U.S.

To display confidence in the dollar, the Bank of Canada has borrowed on the open market. In case it slips too low, the bank can support the dollar by buying up Canadian dollars from the U.S., as it has done in the past few days.

Interest rates are a valuable tool for controlling the national economy. A high interest rate set by the central bank will discourage inflation by encouraging investment from speculative channels into long term yields. Hence, Canada's relatively high interest rate is part of an intentional policy of the central bank to keep inflation down.

Throughout the time our dollar was high, foreign borrowing exacerbated the foreign capital surplus. Lending rates were lower in the U.S. and provincial governments were borrowing extensively in New York, Zurich, and throughout the world, in fact perhaps too much. This borrowing increased the flow of U.S. capital into Canada and kept the dollar high.

Having mentioned this one aspect, which I believe is a new aspect in tonight's discussion on the decline in the value of the dollar, I want to take a general look at our economy which has been attacked on the other side all evening and which was reflected in the value of the dollar at around 89 cents or 90 cents. As we know, Canada moves into 1978 with the expectation that the worst of the recent economic slack is over and that solid economic growth will resume this year. There are increasing signs that the economic recovery has begun in the first quarter of 1978. Most economists believe that in 1978 we shall see better results than last year.

This optimism does not overlook the fact that rates of unemployment and inflation are far from satisfactory. It is not enough for representatives like me merely to talk confidently about the future. What is needed is constructive action to stimulate the economy without contributing to inflation, and measures to aid those who have been dislocated by the economic slowdown. I believe that the government has done that in a series of policy decisions last fall and early winter providing tax incentives to business and consumers. The government has also decided not to wait for the expected recovery to begin but to attack the unemployment problem directly by putting up the money to create jobs now.

The basic dilemma that is facing this country at the moment is one that should be looked at closely. There are many people who believe that the government should adopt similar policies to those developed in the 1930's both in the U.S. and in Canada. Critics of the government such as the Conservatives, the New Democrats, and elements of the media such as the Toronto Star in my city, to name but a few, offer a Keynesian approach which perhaps had some value but which is not the sole answer in the particular economic circumstances in which we find ourselves in 1978. They advocate the cutting of taxes, the stimulation of consumer demand, and spending on massive public works projects. This approach was successful in the 1930's because of high unemployment, which was around 20 per cent in Canada at that time, and massive deflation, in other words falling prices and values of goods. However, today we have a high unemployment rate of 8.5 per cent, but we also have continued inflation of 8 per cent or 9 per cent which we did not have in the 1930's. Therefore, I think it follows that pump priming by the federal government can only be a temporary measure and can only be an incomplete solution to the problem.

The federal government is not the only player in the economy. We saw the truth of that last week at the first ministers' conference here in Ottawa. Since we are not the only player in the economy, it would be foolish to expect that the federal government alone has all the answers. The official opposition advocates federal income tax cuts while telling the government to cut government spending. Hon. members ridiculed the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) this afternoon when he brought in the estimates for the next fiscal year. It is quite evident that the official opposition is trying to have it both ways.

Hon. members opposite are talking out of both sides of their mouths, to use an old cliché. The approach they offer belies a great inconsistency. Cutting taxes means less revenue to the government, which forces higher deficits. The other aspect of cutting government expenditures is that with less revenues generated as a result of tax cuts, some government services must be cut.

I hope that in any federal election campaign which might come up in the next year, the official opposition will be prepared to tell the voters of Canada which services it would cut in the interest of balancing the budget or reducing government expenditures.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You will be the first cut.

Mr. Collenette: Would the official opposition cut unemployment insurance, old age pensions, or veterans' pensions? If 50,000 public servants were eliminated through attrition—not firings, but through attrition from the Public Service—the resulting saving to the Canadian taxpayer would be like a drop in a bucket. Hon. members opposite are not really getting at the root of the problem. The Progressive Conservative party wants to turn back the clock 30 years to that so-called laissez-faire free enterprise era when the weak and the poor in society were the downtrodden, and only the strong survived. I dare hon. members opposite to address themselves to the essential question of what services they are prepared to cut to achieve their economic policies.

I would like to talk for a minute about co-operation with the provinces. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has recognized that there is a need to seek a co-operative approach to solving our economic difficulties. In his recent travels to all provincial capitals, and in talks with provincial premiers, he laid the groundwork for the first ministers' conference which was held last week, where for the first time in Canada's history—certainly in my memory—there was general agreement between the provinces and the federal government on prescriptions necessary for restoring Canada to a more healthy economic situation.

Inflation and unemployment are understandably immediate concerns for all, and have been the major focus of government attention over the past few years. What is needed is an attack on the so-called structural problems facing the country like declining competitiveness and changing patterns in manufacturing and world trade. This is the task which now confronts government leaders, but while the necessary study and adjustments are made the federal government has to concentrate on making it easier for those whose lives have been disrupted most by our economic problems.

It may be scant comfort for those without jobs, but it is generally recognized that the burden of unemployment today is not as heavy as it was in the past, thanks to generous social assistance measures such as family allowances and unemployment insurance. These and other measures provide a basic level of family income. That is one of the greatest arguments we can use for our submission that the New Democratic Party is wrong when it talks about the present situation in Canada being analogous to the 1930's. We have a generous social support system which shields those who are most hurt by economic problems. It is obvious that the Conservative party wants to dismantle those social guarantees.

Mr. Kempling: Don't be dishonest.

[Mr. Collenette.]

Mr. Collenette: It is one thing to talk about getting better value for our dollar and another to talk about productivity in the Public Service, but what the Conservative party wants, and what it is not levelling with the Canadian people on, is that it wants to change fundamentally the nature of this country. I believe this notion will be rejected by the people of Canada in the next federal election.

Getting back to the provinces, in addition to negotiating better working arrangements between the two levels of government, the Prime Minister and the premiers discussed ways of encouraging the private sector to do its part. Hon. members in the official opposition should applaud this. Government action to promote recovery will be of little use unless businessmen take full advantage of the various tax and economic incentives this government has given. However, the business community does seem to be heeding the advice and responding to the help provided in last year's budget and last fall's economic message from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

The business community is now less pessimistic about the future trend to inflation and is thinking in terms of getting ready to meet a resurgence of demand when the economy picks up. Is it not a pity that the official opposition does not show that same confidence? Hon. members opposite are the ones who are creating confusion on the money markets of the world with their continual hacking away at Canadian confidence. They will pay dearly for that when we go to the polls.

It is interesting to note that economic problems are worldwide. It is important to emphasize that most of the industrialized countries in the world are suffering from the twin dilemmas of mounting unemployment and inflation. Economists predict that even those economies alluded to by hon. members opposite, West Germany and Switzerland, will not grow nearly as much as Canada's economy this year.

I would like to talk about the West German and Swiss situation for a few minutes. I am prompted by comments made by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) in an informal chat we had the other day. He brought this to my attention, and I thank him for enlightening me. One aspect of the Swiss and West German performance bears a closer look.

When Canada admits immigrants, it does so by accepting them as equal partners in Canadian society. After three years in Canada landed immigrants have the right to apply for Canadian citizenship. Although we reduce immigration in times of high unemployment, those who are here may stay on to become citizens. That is not so in West Germany and Switzerland. That is why they have lower rates of unemployment. They put immigrants on trains and send them back to Yugoslavia, Portugal, Greece or Italy. That is why they have a lower rate of unemployment. Is that what we want in Canada? Is that what the Conservative party advocates? I dare hon. members opposite to say so.

It is bad enough that the Leader of the Opposition has stated that if a Conservative government is elected, the Department of Multiculturalism will be eliminated. What would the Leader of the Opposition do to all the people who have come here and contributed to Canadian society? He would do the same thing the West Germans and Swiss have done. He would send them all home after they have been milked and made use of here.

When we look at the economic performance of industrialized nations, a clear picture of the strength of the Canadian economy emerges.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope the hon. member will forgive my interrupting his remarks, but surely we should not leave the remarks he just made about immigration on the record. I do not know what immigration into Germany and Switzerland has to do with the devaluation of the Canadian dollar and why that matter has been raised in this debate, but surely the hon. member knows that the immigrants who come into Germany and Switzerland come under contract for a specified period of time, after which time they leave.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) will agree that his remarks constitute an argument which he could include in his intervention.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I hope those remarks, which constitute debate, are not taken as part of my time. It is quite evident the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling is going one step further. He wants contract workers in this country. It is on the record here tonight. When Canadians read that, they are going to take another look at the Conservative party.

● (2342)

An hon. Member: That is stupid!

Mr. Collenette: I know I have a few minutes remaining and I want to make reference to a speech made in Montreal recently by the chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada. He talked about the strength of the economy.

Mr. Mazankowski: I was there.

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) knows full well what the chairman of the Royal Bank said. It was my intention to bring to the attention of the House the worth-while points made by the chairman. However, Mr. Speaker, you think my time is up, and unless the hon. members would be so kind as to let me continue—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There does not seem to be unanimous consent, and there is no time for questioning either. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte.

An hon. Member: Here comes the sardine man.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there are others who should eat sardines and it might give them a little brain food. Evidence from the interruptions to your right tonight indicate they could use a little brain food, so I recommend the sardine to you.

I do not intend tonight to deviate from the subject matter of this debate, namely, what should the government do which might contribute to the improvement of the dollar's position? But I would like to say of the remarks of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) that his remarks were, in the main ill-considered, irrelevant, and non-contributory to this problem and to this debate. The dollar decline is serious, and its cause is serious. That cause is lack of properly considered fiscal and monetary economic policy in the Dominion of Canada by the government which the member just supported. That is the cause, and it is serious. There seems to be no government inclination to call in the economic doctor to get on a path to correct the problem rather than see it continued and accentuated.

No matter what the government has done or how great the hon. member for York East thinks it is, he must accept the fact that its economic policy, or the absence of well-considered economic policies, has precipitated the crisis which we are debating tonight. His historic rhetoric will not dissolve the problem. The problem will not disappear as if by magic or ill-tempered discussion, and his accusation of members of the opposition regardless of the party to which they belong. It must be a debate which remains related to the discussion of the value of the dollar. Another speech has been made for a constituency, abusing the opposition and failing to stay on the subject.

Tonight in Ottawa 1,000 farmers met in the Chateau Laurier hotel. They were mainly from Ontario, but they were supported by representations and messages from every agricultural province in the Dominion of Canada. They made concrete suggestions which I would like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) to note. Those suggestions came in the form of four recommendations and were of importance to the Canadian economy and the Canadian dollar, its value at home and abroad. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) met with that group and he assured them he agreed with the four recommendations which they made. He was sympathetic with the problems they were experiencing and he stated he would adopt policies in an attempt to correct the problems which they cited.

Let me read three of these recommendations.

> The first action required for a healthy agriculture is that markets for farm products must be expanded both at home and abroad.

Another was as follows:

> Thirdly, the Government of Canada must dissociate itself publicly from open pronouncement by some cabinet ministers that the policy of this nation shall be cheap food and must abandon plans to limit the price of food.

The cheap food coming from abroad is taking Canadian dollars, it is reducing farm income, and it is detrimental to all facets of the Canadian public's economic welfare.

Finally there was this recommendation:

> The federal and provincial governments must implement effective co-ordinated and meaningful stabilization and/or income assurance programs.

This last recommendation will increase agricultural production in Canada. It will incorporate a stop loss program and it would encourage production of food which we would not have to import but which we are presently importing to the detriment of the Canadian dollar and our total economy.

From coast to coast in Canada federal policies have contributed to a decline in the export of agricultural products, fresh and processed. I suppose the most stark example of idiotic policy was the failure of the government to hold the international markets which we had, and to combine that with an increase in the quota for cheese to be imported from abroad. We lost the U.K. market, we lost the European Economic Community market, and in turn we increased the imports of cheese to Canada. These are two contradictory measures which, for the benefit of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, have accentuated our unfavourable cash flow differential and therefore have affected the value of the dollar.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that a reasonable and rational duty and trade policy must be adopted by Canada at GATT. We must obtain fair and equal trading opportunities with our world trading partners. We can no longer exist while duties on our products to our friendly trading partners are prohibitive, while our market is traded away for advantages about which the farmers are not informed and which are very unsatisfactory to the total economy.

We have a government dealing in total secrecy at GATT. Its members have had input which they have rejected. They have had a tariff report which has been criticized and for which there were amendments requested by agriculture in Canada. There has been no consideration given to this as far as the public knows. It is totally secret. This is not satisfactory.

We have increased imports and we have generated a weak agricultural economy. For the information of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, we have a decline in the Canadian dollar which has put a temporary protection on agricultural products, but only temporary. We must have a trading pattern which must be permanent. If by chance the fluctuation of the dollar gives a temporary position of advantage to any industry such as agriculture, we know it will be only temporary because, sooner or later, sanity will return to the economists and government, and the dollar will return to its proper value.

The net farm income of agriculture is going down. Imports are going up, whether they be fresh or processed. The Conservative party does not stand for that kind of treatment for agriculture and that kind of effect upon the Canadian dollar's value. This industry has contributed $1 billion in trade surplus historically. It has recently declined to about three quarters of a billion, and it will decline even further if we do not have a marketing structure, with farming representatives of Canada being abroad, something we do not have at this time. In the hundred or more nations where we are represented, we have eight agricultural representatives to promote our agricultural trade. Some of those are located in cities where we could not sell anything unless they had none of a certain product or were starving. Therefore, we are not promoting trade.

Whether it be fruits or vegetables from British Columbia, dairy products from Quebec, fruits and vegetables from the Niagara Peninsula, the potato products of the Atlantic area, or the apple products of Nova Scotia, they have all been seriously affected by adverse trade negotiations conducted by this government in the last ten years. Our party does not stand for that. We believe that the billion dollars of favourable trade balance can be expanded. When it is expanded, it will increase the profitability of agriculture. When agriculture is more profitable, the economy of Canada as a whole will rise.

I suggest to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that he acquaint himself with the curve of prosperity in Canada and relate it to the net farm income of Canada. He will see they are parallel. When agriculture is weak, the Canadian economy weakens. I make that as a concrete suggestion to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, a suggestion which could favourably affect the value of the Canadian dollar. It would increase the favourable balance of payments which agriculture can generate and which we need to restore the dollar to its value.

I want to assure the farmers that we do not and never have associated ourselves with policy of slow stabilization payments, or trading away agricultural benefits for hidden benefits to some other industry, creating low income for farmers. That is not our policy. We wish we had a chance to correct it. We surely would take the necessary measures.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, we say that a man should seek the advice of his pillow. I therefore hope that this debate which is going on into the night will help the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) steer the right course for the monetary policies of our country. As for us parliamentarians, we are supposed to represent the supreme authority in the land. After this debate, we may be able to give good advice to the Minister of Finance and the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, this debate should remind us that a monetary system is a tool which a people devises for itself. In all civilized and well organized nations there is a monetary system which serves to establish as they occur the value of things and services, and to allow the citizens to exchange services and goods. That is the role of the monetary system.

We have succeeded, in Canada. We are about to succeed in transforming our measurement system. We are gradually changing over to the metric system in all spheres of economic activity. Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to make such a change in a country like Canada. However, the government got to work and passed legislation to determine the time when such and such sector of the economy would switch to the metric system. The population accepts this and is ready to co-operate.

I meet many people in the industrial sector and many people who travel throughout Canada to promote sales for such or such a company. Housewives are accepting to change their cooking habits because the Canadian Parliament decided that those changes would be better for Canada. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that the change to the metric system is much more difficult to achieve than a change in our monetary system.

In our country, we have a monetary system based on the dollar. No one questions this. Everyone agrees to evaluate the services of blue collars and white collars in dollars. No one questions this and everyone agrees. Mr. Speaker, it is the same when we want to measure the value of farm production, whether it be dairy production or livestock production. We agree about this. We know that we can make exchanges within our country because every week, in all large supermarkets, many Canadians go to do their shopping and we see women open their purse to pay in Canadian dollars the products they have selected. This is the role of a monetary system, to allow easy and quick exchanges.

Mr. Speaker, what is beyond my understanding, and I believe this should be one of our thoughts for this evening, is that the system of exchanges, this tool that we call the dollar in Canada, has been created by man. From what we see today, the dollar crisis, it seems that this creature has become master of its creator. It is man who created this tool, and man has become its slave to the point where in March 1977, in Montreal, Reverend Father Georges-Henri Lévesque, a Dominican, the founder of the Department of Social Sciences at Laval University in Quebec City, gave a conference entitled "Money, Master or Servant." Well, I would urge all members of this House to read that conference. It is very rational from one end to the other and shows that money has become man's master when man should be the master of money, this instrument of exchange. And it is up to us parliamentarians to see that this instrument is truly the servant of individuals, families, municipalities, school boards, provinces and the government of Canada.

This is a really maddening situation. I cannot get it into my head that such an instrument of exchange, which should simply be a cog in the gear to enable real credit created by the work of men to move around, should be traded among men. Real credit, Mr. Speaker, is created by the work of individuals. The farmer working his farm, selling animal meat, producing dairy products is under our economic organization a creator of credit. He is the one. The worker in the factory assembling parts to make a piece of furniture becomes a true creator of true credit. And chartered banks should be there not to take over real credit, distribute it at their whim but only be an instrument to serve people, and I think when money is created to mint the credit of the nation this should be created not as a debt but as an instrument to enable the circulation of goods. That is the role of money. That is how I understand it. That is why I insist very often that the Bank of Canada which was created by Canadians, by the Canadian Parliament, should fulfill its role as the first minter of the credit of the nation and chartered banks should in my opinion ask the Bank of Canada for the necessary credits to serve the public sector.

That is how things should normally go. It is often said that banks create part of the money supply. I am convinced that it is true and I would like to quote, Mr. Speaker, to support my saying, just excerpts from testimonies given before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs:

Finance

The central government maintains a Standing Committee on Banks, Trade and Commerce. From March 8 to June 1, 1939, this committee held—

And I urge my colleagues to read this——hearings on the Bank of Canada. The witnesses cross-examined were Mr. Graham F. Towers, Governor of the Bank of Canada, and Mr. W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of Finance.

Here are some questions and answers.

Question:

Ninety-five per cent of total business is transacted through so-called bank deposit transfers; they are merely entries by the banks on their books, allowing people to draw cheques.

Answer from Mr. Towers:

This in my view is a valid point.

This appears on page 228 of the volume referred to earlier. And the deputy minister goes on to say:

—this means that money is any instrument of exchange generally accepted in payment of business transactions, debts, etc. It therefore includes all coins, all bank notes, either central or chartered-bank, and deposits.

Hon. members are aware that under amendments passed since then chartered banks no longer have authority to issue bank notes. The Bank of Canada alone may issue bank notes, which are called Bank of Canada notes. Still further there is the following question, and I quote:

But there is not the least doubt that banks create that instrument of exchange?

Mr. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, had this to answer, and I quote:

Exactly. This is their reason for existing.

This appears on page 299. Following question, and I quote:

And they issue that kind of exchange instrument when they buy debentures or extend loans?

This is what the government should be getting from the Bank of Canada rather than chartered banks, or Germany or New York, here at home. And Mr. Towers answered:

Such is the very nature of banking operations, just as a steel mill is meant to manufacture steel.

On page 299.

The process of manufacturing bank deposits is to pen or type entries in bank books, nothing more.

Mr. Towers:

Yes.

Each time a bank grants a loan (or buys bonds) it creates a new bank credit—new deposits—new money.

This was confirmed by Mr. Towers.

Practically all new money comes from a private bank in the form of loans.

Once again confirmed by Mr. Towers and I could quote many testimonies made by the governor of the Bank of Canada on this matter, but I see that the time allotted to me passes quickly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I received today from the parliamentary library some data, or research which I had requested on the monetary mass of Canada and on the gross national product. I was given the following figures:

For the taxation year 1976-77, the gross national product amounted to $194.5 billion, an increase of some $23 billion over 1975-76.

The monetary mass then amounted to $100 billion, including $24 billion in bank notes and coins and the balance, $76 billion, in bank deposits based on fractional reserves.

Mr. Speaker, if we too had the privilege of creating deposits with fractional reserves I think we would be in the right direction. For this reason, if you study the reports of chartered banks since they received special privileges in 1967, their profits have risen considerably while our country went ever deeper into debt which is really discouraging for young people, those who will come after us.

Mr. Speaker, the gross national debt of our country has doubled in the last three years; it rose from $19 billion to $38 billion and this is one of the reasons why our dollar is still floating. But I am afraid it is about to drown because of our excessive debt. I mentioned fractional reserves and it is not an idea of mine. The act regulating chartered banks requires them to keep a 12 per cent demand reserve plus a 4 per cent reserve on 30 days' notice. This is what happened in February 1978: the percentage of the primary reserve was set at $5.84.

It went too far, Mr. Speaker, the situation cannot continue indefinitely. And we talk about the gross national product. We say it is essential to restore our economic balance, to fight inflation and unemployment. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the increase in our national debt, our gross national product continues to improve regularly. Progress is on our side even if we have more than one million unemployed, people fit for work who could produce goods and services to increase the value and the stability of our Canadian dollar. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to continue in that direction. I wish to quote here a question I put on the order paper. I got an answer. It was on February 1, 1977. It is not so long ago. On page 2589 of Hansard I asked the following question:

1. What was the total national debt on March 31, 1976?

The answer:

$38,299 million.

Me, I am curious, and I want to know to whom I owe money. So, I ask another question, and I quote:

2. With reference to Canadian creditors, how many are (a) individuals (b) chartered banks (c) life insurance companies (d) other financial organizations and, in each case, in order of importance (i) who are they (ii) what is the amount of the debt?

Here is the answer:

2. At March 31, 1976 (a), (b), (c) and (d) Statistics on number of holders are not maintained. However, refer to the Bank of Canada Monthly Review Section 22 for distribution of dollar amounts.

Smart reply. Third question:

3. With reference to foreign creditors, in order of importance (a) who are they . . .

Me, when I have debts, I know to whom I owe them. I know who my creditors are, when I must pay them back and also what rate of interest I pay. Now, to go back to my quotation:

. . . (a) who are they (b) what is the amount of the debt in each case?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Answer:

Not available.

Fourth question:

4. In each case of compound interest (a) what is the rate . . .

dates of payment . . .

(b) for how long was the loan made (c) what are the terms of repayment?

Reply:

Not available.

That is the reply of the Department of Finance which is supposed to give us information. "Not available". Is he, the Minister of Finance, available to answer those questions? I hope he will at least have the co-operation of the civil servants of his department to help us find out who our real creditors, the real rates of interest and the dates of repayment all are.

Fifth question, Mr. Speaker:

In each case of simple interest . . .

● (0012)

[English]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You got a lot of applause!

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite says something about a lot of applause when I rose. I find that very interesting. It is always an honour for me to follow the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) in the House of Commons. The official opposition moved this motion to have this debate some hours ago, and now we have hypocrisy. The opposition are now telling us there is not very much applause. The television audience watching this debate may not be aware that there are not very many members in the Chamber at this moment.

Although I accept, as all hon. members do, any decisions the Chair might make on the need for a debate under Standing Order 26, I must say I question this particular decision. I have been here only a short time, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) since 1972, but I can recall when debates under Standing Order 26 were subject to some argument and discussion as to whether or not a matter was an important one, one that would lend itself to keeping this House of Commons—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We have had plenty of discussion.

Mr. Stollery: The hon. member from Victoria cannot wait a moment. Here we are in a practically empty Chamber at 20 minutes past 12 in the morning.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With only four Liberals.

Mr. Stollery: Four Liberals, and two members of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Three.

Mr. Stollery: Where is the third? He must be behind the curtains somewhere. There are also five members of the Conservative party here. I am sorry; I see the third member of the NDP with Your Honour.

Nevertheless, I think the point is clear: this is supposed to be a debate on a matter of national importance, one that cannot be dealt with during the normal question period but requires the House of Commons and all the staff to stay here at this hour. And how many members do we actually have interested in this urgent question?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Where is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)?

Mr. Stollery: We have a handful, Mr. Speaker. Only five or six members of the opposition bother debating the subject.

Mr. Ellis: They will come in when you are finished.

Mr. Stollery: It was Mr. Speaker's decision, and we all acknowledge that he is the Speaker of this place and one of our colleagues. But it seems to me that the party which brought this important, pressing issue before the House of Commons has a responsibility to be here to discuss it.

Just what is it that we are talking about, Mr. Speaker? The motion is this—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): So you have finally found it?

Mr. Stollery: Now one of our few colleagues opposite asks me if I have finally discovered what the motion is. It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that I did check the exact wording of the motion, which apparently is a motion to adjourn so the House can discuss something which cannot be handled in the normal question period or by the usual processes and procedures of the House. I see an increasing number of members opposite are now coming into the Chamber; we now have about eight members interested enough in this especially important, pressing issue, a matter so important that it cannot be handled in the question period.

Mr. Lawrence: You have driven everyone out.

Mr. Stollery: The former attorney general of Ontario says I have driven everyone out. Since there were very few here on his side it was not very difficult.

Mr. Lawrence: No, I mean on your side.

Mr. Stollery: We are discussing Canada's arranging for some credit. I am sure that is an issue with which the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is more familiar, because he was formerly in the banking business. Hon. members who follow financial matters and are close to the banking business understand the question of arranging credit. As is the case with almost every currency, the Canadian dollar has been going up and down since the decision was made to float currencies.

• (0022)

Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made an announcement which indicated that he had contacted banks to arrange credit. As I say, it is fascinating and overwhelming that the Speaker of the House has decided an emergency debate to discuss this issue is necessary. There has been no emergency debate on unemployment. I am sure hon. members would agree that unemployment in Canada is a serious and pressing question. No one would deny that.

Mr. Lawrence: You were out of the country.

Mr. Stollery: Now the former attorney general for the province of Ontario is talking about me being away, or some such thing. I have not been away for a long period of time. The last time I was away, I met the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

There are many issues and arguments which are more important than this one. Fortunately no one is saying the magic word, but here we are at 12.25 a.m. discussing this question of the arrangement of credit. It is not of particular importance to the average Canadian or those unemployed. The young Canadians who are out of work do not place any importance in this matter. In fact, we are discussing something which is of interest to the banking trade only. As far as I can see, mainly bankers would be interested in this particular issue.

Mr. Leggatt: What about the taxpayers?

Mr. Stollery: I realize the hour is late, but most members on the government side of the House sat and listened to hon. members opposite when they were making their speeches. Is it unreasonable to expect silence rather than noise? In fact I hear a member of the New Democratic Party making noise in the corner.

Mr. Leggatt: A storm.

Mr. Stollery: Yes, a storm. The question before the House tonight is not in regard to jobs. The question is what the government is doing to improve the economy. Under the guise of this motion the opposition wants to attack the government's performance with respect to the economy. When the Leader of the Opposition visited Toronto not long ago, his answer to the complex economic problems facing Canada was that he would fire 60,000 public servants.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: His suggestion was to do away with 60,000 jobs, at the same time as injecting $2 billion into the economy. That is what I saw on the front page of the Toronto Star. His first step toward solving unemployment would be to abolish 60,000 jobs. That was rather unique. His plan was hopefully to save enough money, after doing away with those jobs, in order to do something else which has never been made clear.

The question we are addressing ourselves to is what the Canadian government should do for the dollar. It is perfectly clear the falling dollar is one of the best things that could happen to Canada. If the dollar is lower, our exports are cheaper and our imports are more expensive. It is to be hoped that makes us more competitive and has a good effect on our balance of payment and trade. The only question is at what point the government should protect the dollar, as all governments do. The Americans have been involved in doing that for the last two years. Our problems are rather petty when you think of the United States problems with its dollar.

Not many hon. members opposite are aware that in the United States $500 billion are offshore Eurodollars. That country is facing problems protecting its dollar because of the one half trillion dollars which are offshore and the $100 billion owned in the United States by foreigners. If the United States cannot protect its dollar, the most tremendous catastrophe the world has ever known would occur. It is far more useful if the Canadian dollar is relatively low, rather than relatively high. In fact, this debate should be a celebration of the fact that the Canadian dollar has slid, resulting in making Canadian exports more competitive and Canadian imports cheaper.

Mr. Leggatt: Will the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Will the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) permit a question from the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt)?

Mr. Stollery: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Leggatt: Would the hon. member direct his attention to the question of the government's decision to intercede in the free market in terms of the dollar? If the dollar is attractive at an 89 cent level and would be more attractive at an 85 cent level, which appears to be the gist of the hon. member's argument, why did the government intercede and not allow the dollar to continue to slide?

Mr. Stollery: That is a silly question. Because of the kind of trade we do with the United States, many Canadians are psychologically affected by the value of our currency compared to the value of the United States currency. It is nothing more or less than that.

● (0032)

I have not heard any members here discuss the value of the Canadian dollar as compared to the German mark, the French franc, the pound, the yen, or any other currency that is becoming increasingly important. For example, are there members who know the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar as compared with Saudi Arabian currency? The hon. member laughs. Obviously he is unaware of the fact that we have just signed a $500 million contract with Saudi Arabia to manage their telephone system. We have a $100 million contract to electrify rural regions in Saudi Arabia. I do not suppose he is interested in how much money that is in Canadian currency because he thinks it is Saudi Arabia which is a long way away, so that we can worry about that some other time.

[Mr. Stollery.]

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. That telephone order which the hon. member speaks about is in Canadian dollars, and the telephone equipment is coming out of the city of Belleville.

Mr. Stollery: That is very interesting. It is also interesting that 500 Canadians will be hired for that project in Saudi Arabia, and I suspect they are not all from Belleville. Some of them may be from other places in Canada. There are 500 jobs in that single program. One hon. member said it was in Canadian dollars. I suspect that perhaps the people concerned have calculated what the rate of exchange might be between the Canadian dollar and the Saudi Arabian riyal.

It should interest the hon. member for Belleville because there are 500 jobs there and, according to the Toronto Star of yesterday—and I do not know whether that is true—400 jobs will be created in the steel factories in Saskatchewan in connection with the building of the pipeline. That is a pretty good indication of the kind of thing the Government of Canada is doing. I do not think it all relates to the town of Belleville. In fact, as I understand it, the people who will be undertaking the Saudi program will not only not all come from Belleville but will probably be administrators from Montreal and Toronto, and maybe some of them from Spadina, for all I know. The point is that we are tonight at twenty five minutes to one—

Mr. Stevens: That is the first thing you have said that is right.

Mr. Stollery: There we have the banker who is about to give us some of his kernels of wisdom. Here we are at twenty five minutes to one talking about arrangements made for credit with Canadian banks by the Government of Canada, drawings which I am sure will never be made. I am sure there is a pyschological aspect to the speculation in all currencies and particularly in the Canadian dollar, and probably the Minister of Finance has made the right decision to stop that speculation even if he has to deal with people whom personally I do not find terribly attractive, that is, the banking friends of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. But if it is a solution which will help us stop these speculations in all currencies, and recently in the Canadian dollar which has driven it up and down, so much the better.

An hon. member asked why it should not go down to 85 cents. As I said, Canadians have a psychological attitude to their currency that is of some importance. All I would like to say is that I think the Minister of Finance has taken not only the appropriate step of not making his announcement in the House, which would have encouraged the speculators—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Allan B. Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask you what the word "float" means to you. Surely it means to stay on top as a result of the internal buoyancy of whatever it is that is floating. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), ever since he took over in September, has had one refrain only. His policy has been to keep the Canadian dollar floating. Last October 8, he said: "When you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar". Does it sound familiar? It should. He said the same thing tonight.

But is it? Is it really staying on top as a result of its own buoyancy? It is not. The minister is not only wrong, he is being deliberately wrong in the House. He knows that one year ago, for instance, the Canadian dollar in U.S. value was worth $1.03. In October, 1977, in the last crisis, it fell to 91 cents. Within the last week it dipped to its lowest point since 1931; it fell to just under 89 cents. Canada's dollar is not floating, as the minister says, it is sinking.

The reason it has sunk, in spite of massive financial bolstering by the Bank of Canada, should concern all Canadians. First, the Canadian dollar is sinking because we have increased our imports much faster than our exports. Our wages and our prices have been rising faster than those in the United States. Yet our productivity is lower. What happens? We cannot compete at home where imports are continuing to take up a larger and larger share of what Canadians buy and we cannot compete in the export market which is essential to Canada to make up the large Canadian borrowing from abroad.

Second, the Canadian dollar is sinking, not floating, because Canadians are travelling around the world in growing number and fewer and fewer foreign and Canadian tourists are travelling in Canada.

Third, the Canadian dollar is sinking, not floating, because we lack a national energy policy; we have become too dependent on foreign oil. Only a few years ago we exported more oil than we imported. Nothing is being done by this administration to reduce that dependence.

What has been done by this government? It has tried to solve our trade and travel deficits with high interest rates and tight money. This has encouraged Canadians to borrow abroad or to sell their companies to foreigners. Obviously this has added to the problem by hugely increasing the future interest payments we have to make to the rest of the world.

The fourth reason the Canadian dollar is sinking, not floating, is that we are mortgaging our children's future, and this has also accelerated the continuing loss of control over our own economy. However, let us get back to the floating dollar, that dollar which is staying on top because of its own built-in buoyancy. If it was not such a tragedy, the answer would be to laugh at the minister. This country is surely bleeding to death financially right now. Just after this minister took over, things really started to deteriorate. Tonight he compared the activities of the last few days with what happened last October. He said—and he is quite right—that there really has not been much change since last October.

In October of 1977, about 40 days after this minister took office, the Canadian dollar hit the lowest international value it had fallen to in 20 years. Was October, 1977 such a bright spot and such a shining example in our monetary history that it should be a standard with which we compare everything else? That is just what this minister did tonight. The situation was so bad in October, 1977 and the Bank of Canada was so alarmed at the buttressing and bolstering the Canadian dollar needed, that in November of last year the government had to arrange a special $1.5 billion stand-by credit with Canadian banks so that it could be dipped into if the situation deteriorated further.

"But," says the Minister of Finance in his by now tired old speech, "when you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar". By any standard, even the standard of the minister's own advisers, that floating dollar stopped floating with that very announcement. The announcement of that stand-by credit was the signal, obvious to all, that the government desired to keep the dollar from falling below 90 cents, and its purpose, motive and intent was to slow that disastrous speculation against Canadian funds which had already started. Government advisers in the minister's own department readily admit this. Bank of Canada officials agree with it. Industry and banking experts are quite open about it. But the minister continues on: "When you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar."

An hon. Member: You are being disgusting.

Mr. Lawrence: One other matter that foreign exchange traders point out is that because of the lack of national trade, national tourism, employment, productivity and agricultural policies Canada is going to continue to run into the red.

We have a current account deficit of about $5 billion a year. This has been going on for some time. That means we are spending more in international trade and terms than we are taking in, to the tune of about $400 million per month every month. What was the answer of the government? I think the government tried. The answer had to be a campaign to convince international investors and traders that we were capable of turning the situation around ourselves. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has been very conspicuous by his absence here tonight, was prevailed upon by his own advisers to make a few economic pronouncements. The market remains skeptical. The Prime Minister certainly turned nobody on. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was still repeating the same old speech: "When you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar."

Twice since January the minister went down to New York. Both trips were absolute disasters. The minister appeared so unknowledgeable and he was so insulting in his attitude that the dollar was still floating when, of all people, people in New York knew the Canadian dollar was not floating, that within hours of each trip the pressure built up even further against the Canadian dollar.

In spite of massive transfers by the Bank of Canada of reserves to bolster and buttress our dollar, the run was on. The point was reached late last week right in this House when, in answer to a question, the minister again, to almost everyone's disbelief in the face of the financial hemorrhaging we were then experiencing, again repeated: "When you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar". It has not floated since last November, and if the minister did not know or if he still does not know that, he should not be the minister. There was no other stop-gap solution available except to arrange a new line of credit, except this time it had to be a new line of credit from foreign sources. Perhaps this is an indication that even Canadian banks have dried up against this incompetence.

Meanwhile, back at the ranch, what was happening in the House of Commons, the place this minister says he loves so much? Last week the latest rush was started by the minister when he told us our dollar still floated and that there was no intervention. The market itself knew it was being massively buttressed. With that type of deceit or incompetence—it has to be one or the other—the market finally grasped the measure of this man.

The Minister of Finance lost the confidence of the trading community. He finally did it last week, and the run was on again. On Monday afternoon, the day before yesterday, in this House at the very moment the minister was again saying there was no intervention and in spite of the fact that the American market was closed because it was Washington's birthday, in three places, London, Toronto and Montreal, the Bank of Canada was forced to transfer a total of $65 million from the reserve in a vain attempt to slow down the drain. The minister obviously misled the House on Monday afternoon.

Now we come to yesterday, Tuesday. With the opening of the market in New York after the long weekend the run accelerated. Any confidence that this minister was capable of telling the truth—or conversely, and even worse, not even knowing what was going on—completely evaporated in the western European and North American money markets. Why? The feeling was accelerated when, with horror as a reaction, again the Dow Jones tape indicated the ministerial equivalent of "When you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar".

The implication was that there was no intervention by the Bank of Canada in the market and that there was no intervention by the Canadian government in the market. That was the implication, and the market knew the minister was lying. They knew he was lying.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Even worse: intentionally, deliberately overtly and openly the minister misled this House yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): We will take that up tomorrow.

Mr. Lawrence: At 2.15 p.m. on Monday, February 20, 1978 in the House of Commons, as recorded at page 3004 of Hansard, we find the following question by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and answer by the minister:

Is it the intention of the government to draw on that stand-by credit in the foreseeable future?

[Mr. Lawrence.]

HON. JEAN CHRÉTIEN (MINISTER OF FINANCE): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

At 6.59 p.m. on February 20, at the press gallery of the House of Commons, approximately four hours later—

● (0052)

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to ask the member to clarify some point. Is he calling the minister a liar?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let him complete his speech.

Mr. Lawrence: I think even the hon. member for Spadina will appreciate the implication of what I am saying if he will just be patient.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Spadina on a point of order.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, it is most unparliamentary to call someone a liar in the House of Commons. There are other members here who are more knowledgeable than I, but if the hon. member is saying what I think he is he should clearly indicate it. Mr. Speaker, you may have to rule on it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, what the hon. member says, has said, and will say, will stand by itself without any assistance from the hon. member for Spadina. I think he should be allowed to complete his speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There might be an inference, but surely it does not constitute a point of order. A point of privilege can be raised and brought at a later date, but it is not a point of order.

Mr. Lawrence: Let me just repeat it then, if the hon. member cannot understand what I am saying. On February 20 in this House the question was clearly asked of the minister whether "it is the intention of the government to draw on that stand-by credit in the foreseeable future". Unequivocally the Minister of Finance said "No". At 6.59 p.m. there was a press gallery release stamped "Received Ottawa, February 21, 1978" marked "For immediate release" from the information division of the Department of Finance in the name of the Minister of Finance. I quote the last few words of this release:

—the government would shortly be making a drawing under the revolving stand-by credit facility arranged last October with the Canadian chartered banks.

On the one hand the minister says there is no intention to draw on the stand-by credit. Later in his name the release is issued stating the government will "shortly be making a drawing". I say, sir, with outright duplicity like that, with a short but disastrous history of absolute inaccuracy in almost every public utterance he has made on this subject since taking over his portfolio, this Minister of Finance has not only lost the confidence of the international money market—whether the hon. member for Spadina likes it or not—but the minister has surely lost the confidence of the reasonable members of this House and hopefully now also the people of this country.

An hon. Member: He should resign.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be short and I hope snappy. Someone earlier in this debate said it was "curiouser and curiouser." It continues to be curiouser and curiouser. We have been listening very carefully to what various people would do in this House in response to what is admittedly a crisis situation. I am still waiting patiently, Mr. Speaker, to find out what the Conservative policy is in regard to this particular crisis.

We have gone on record and said what we would do in this very difficult situation. We would not have intervened at this point in respect to the dollar. I am waiting patiently now for the Conservative party to take this House into its confidence and tell us what their position is in this debate. I hope the next Conservative speaker will let us know. You would not want us to buy a pig in a poke. You cannot have it both ways in this debate, Mr. Speaker. It is time our Tory friends quit trying to have both sides of the debate. I want to find out where they stand in terms of this decision, and I have been here since the beginning of this debate.

Let me tell the House where the Liberal party stands. I listened very carefully, particularly to the two members from British Columbia. First of all, the hon. member for Skeena, the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo), was delightful. We know where she stands. After all, there is no problem in British Columbia. The minister has told this House we have had a deliberate policy of depressing the dollar. She said we have kept that policy going and look at the wonderful things that have happened in British Columbia. We are selling lumber abroad. We are doing terrifically! She said it has been a deliberate policy to depress the dollar to 89 cents. She said "I cannot understand why they have intervened. What they should be doing is letting it slide further. Imagine if it slid to 75 cents and then down to 50 cents; we will be selling lumber like you wouldn't believe! We will be the richest part of the whole world." That was the position of the Liberal party as stated by the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). It is not lack of confidence; it is deliberate policy.

Mr. Paproski: It is a sport.

Mr. Leggatt: It is a sport, and we have been doing remarkably well at it. What we should have been doing tonight is congratulating the government for the fantastic job they have done in deflating the dollar, according to the minister. The minister had some ghostwriter write her speech. She did not write it. It was written by Grace McCarthy of British Columbia, the Social Credit provincial secretary. I knew there was a coalition and there it is. No one else but Grace McCarthy could have written a speech like that. Apparently everything is coming up roses in British Columbia. Things are so good.

I want to tell that minister, and I wish she were here, that unemployment is up, bankruptcies are up, inflation is up in B.C. British Columbia has not had it so bad for as long as I can remember. It has the third highest unemployment in Canada, yet the minister is saying that her government's great policy in depressing the dollar has made things so great in British Columbia. Oh, the Social Credit coalition is in action! Half of the cabinet are ex-Liberals. They all resigned and got together and decided they had to have this new coalition government to move British Columbia forward.

Then we hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) make a most incredible argument. This argument really blows my mind. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, why the dollar is in bad shape in Canada? The hon. member for Skeena said "We put it there; we want it at 89 cents." Then the hon. member for Comox-Alberni got up and said "Darn it, it is too low; you know, it is that Dave Barrett; he is the one who has destroyed the dollar". So it is Dave Barrett's bad government that caused the dollar to go all the way down to 89 cents. Poor old Davey, I did not know how bad that guy really was. In a short three year term in office he destroyed the country and the dollar.

British Columbia will never recover from that terrible bout of socialism. The poor old hon. member for Comox-Alberni is very nervous about it. I will tell you why those two members are nervous and are grabbing on to what is left of Bill Bennett's coattails. They know they are going down the tube in the next election. That is why there is that element of nervousness. You could hear their voices quivering; you could hear the high pitch.

This was a sad evening for those of us who appreciate debate from the members from British Columbia. We are going to be sorry to lose their voices. The arguments are really curious and strange in this debate.

Mr. Benjamin: Now pick on the Tories. It is their turn.

Mr. Leggatt: No. I want to agree with the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). Very early on he pointed out that the real problem lies in the service account deficit. I could not agree more. The figures he quoted are accurate. In 1975, the service account deficit was $1.9 billion. In 1978 it will be $4 billion. The projected deficit for 1980 is $9.1 billion. If you take our manufactured goods and our raw resources, we are selling more than we are buying. It is the service account that is creating the softness of the Canadian dollar.

We are not going to solve that kind of problem with some long-term strategy. The reason that deficit account is running so high and continues to get worse is because we are paying the absentee landlords too much rent. In fact, the amount we are paying in profits, dividends and interest, both public and private interest, is too high. We cannot eliminate the massive kind of private borrowing that has gone on in Canada in terms of importation of equity capital.

The $8 billion deficit and the borrowing of government on government, borrowing interest to pay interest, is a part of that total softness in terms of the crisis in Canada, the value of our dollar.

Let us not sit here and play games. We know there is a long-term problem. Because we do not own and control the resources of this country, we cannot make the decisions. We have not looked at Sweden and West Germany in terms of their performance with regard to unemployment and inflation. We are running behind every modern western industrialized country in terms of employment creation. The reason is clear. Those countries control and dominate the economic decisions within their own countries. They do not have this blood-letting every year of paying rents, profits and absentee landlord fees that are driving their currencies under. That is where our currencies have gone.

Mr. Stollery: It is relative to both sides.

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) should keep in mind that there once was in that cabinet a fellow named Walter Gordon. Even that mild mannered Canadian could not find room in a Liberal cabinet and had to go. Eric Kierans made some noise about owning and controlling our economy. He did too much. Even poor old Herb Gray sitting at the end of the front benches could not find a place inside that cabinet.

Mr. Stollery: He is still here.

Mr. Leggatt: He is not inside the cabinet because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will not allow disagreement within cabinet. He has come to the point of total arrogance. He cannot stand anyone disagreeing with him on any subject.

We must start dealing with long term industrial strategy in our country. We must control our economy, make our own economic decisions, raise capital inside this country and not have a continual hemorrhaging of profits, dividends, rents and interest going abroad.

Somebody said there is no free lunch. That is true. However, there are a lot of people in New York, Sweden and London with a free lunch because of the rewards they are getting on their capital. I am a little tired of Milton Freedman economics, an economic philosophy that is now conventional wisdom with both the old line parties. They say the poor and the unemployed have been drawing too much. They believe they have been paid too much in social transfer payments and therefore the economy is soft. Are we going to blame the poor and unemployed for the problems instead of those who have been making the economic decisions in the world for the past 20 years?

As I said, I will not accept Milton Freedman economics which is now conventional wisdom in both the Liberal and Tory parties. Even Franklin Delano Roosevelt is a raving radical as far as the old line parties are concerned. They cannot even accept the mild solutions he proposed during the depression. After the first ministers' conference, it seems it is only the private sector that can solve our problems. If you eliminate the option of creating jobs, you will not solve unemployment in this country.

The free enterprise sector can do something, but it cannot provide long term solutions, without the assistance of the public sector, without creating jobs. In this country, we have always had to use the co-operation of the public sector to solve our unique problems in transportation and communications. It is part of our history and heritage. Both the Liberals and Conservatives have abandoned that heritage.

The reason our dollar is in a crisis situation is because of ideological fanaticism, a refusal to accept the mildest kind of proposals that have been made by this party in terms of job creation. They refuse to accept the rational approach. No wonder the gnomes of Zurich are unhappy with us. They recognize this government will not move in even the mildest kind of way in order to put people to work in Canada. It is true there is no free lunch. Everybody has to work.

Mr. Stollery: We heard that before.

Mr. Leggatt: It's a great line. I don't want to lose it. It is time that salaries of deputy ministers were cut in half. The problem of paying deputy ministers $60,000 a year is that they become right wing and rich, losing touch with the ordinary people. Maybe if we cut the salary of Tommy Shoyama a bit, he would be more sensitive to what are the policies.

Mr. Stollery: Let's cut the MP's salary down. I am in favour of that.

Mr. Leggatt: Well, let's not go too far.

Mr. Kempling: Now that cat is out the bag. Here's the fox among the chickens.

Mr. Leggatt: The crisis in terms of the Canadian dollar lies in the mismanagement of this country. We agree with the Conservative party on this. There has been an odour of putrefaction coming from the front benches for a long time. We can smell it. We are watching a government collapse. It is nice watching this come down around their ears because they deserve it so much. This is mismanagement. It is ideological fanaticism. It is a failure to appreciate that until you put this country to work, the dollar will not improve on a long term basis. Canada's balance of payments will not improve. Until we own and control this economy, there is no long term solution.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in the debate on the motion moved by the leader of this party and seconded by the leader of the New Democratic Party. It is obvious that this might be the only opportunity I will have to deliver a major speech prior to the coming election. I wish to share with the constituents of Pembina the gratification I feel for the opportunity of serving in parliament on their behalf, but one cannot help but be somewhat saddened after viewing the opportunity this government has wasted in the time that I have been in this House. They brought in a wage and price proposal. We campaigned on that subject. Their program was very different from what we advocated during the 1974 election campaign. They wasted the opportunity to impose restrictions upon themselves.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to come back to the few thoughts I shared with you on the evening of my maiden speech in this House. At that time I said that the constituents of Pembina had some deep feelings about the governing of their country. I refer to these portions of my speech because one cannot help but be saddened by the way this government has manoeuvred our economy, the moral issues of the day and the national unity debate.

We as parliamentarians have to be conscious of the trust placed in us by our constituents. When we review the leadership this government has offered the Canadian people we find it has been lacking in the three areas I mentioned.

The leadership of this government has not offered any inspiration or courage to the Canadian people. It is still labouring under the delusion that it is possible for a country to spend its way out of inflation. It has not grasped the simple fact that such a policy could only lead to more price increases, more wage demands, more inflation and more unemployment.

Not so long ago, Canada was a nation of people proud of their heritage, confident in their capabilities and purpose and sure of their direction and destiny in world affairs. This confidence and purpose was the cement which held together our federation of widely scattered provinces and racial groupings.

Today, this spirit of national unity and purpose has given way to doubts, fears and uncertainties in every province. Some 30 years ago there were few Canadians who were not convinced that Canada had the capacity, the resources and the will to survive as a strong and independent North American nation. Any suggestions of separation or joining with the United States were ridiculed. Indeed, the Americans supposedly envied the strength of our judicial structure, the soundness of our banking system and economic policies, the integrity and reputation of our police forces, our stability and respect for law and order. Our educational standards were matters of great pride.

In the span of only a few years much of this solid structure has crumbled into decay. We are now groping blindly and wondering just what has happened so suddenly. We are weary of inflation, bureaucracy, political scandals and the false promises of this government. We are tired of this shop-worn government which no longer commands respect.

Canadians today are asking where the answers are, Mr. Speaker. Is a cure possible or must we in sheer stupidity, while having a country rich in resources of all kinds, simply continue down the road to an ultimate bust before we learn a few simple lessons? Past records would indicate that on our present course only a near miracle can save us from a major collapse or some ultimate form of totalitarianism.

The solution does not lie in some magic or secret formula. Nor is our situation entirely hopeless. The road to recovery in fact is really very clear, but nobody wishes to face facts as the path is painful and heavy going. Certainly the distance cannot be covered carrying ever-increasing burdens of unpaid debts, too high a standard of living, increasing social payments, shorter work weeks and increased minimum wage levels.

But speaking of miracles, what sort of miracle do we need now? In Germany in the 1950's, Dr. Erhard was able within a decade to multiply its industrial potential six times, treble its social services and increase its exports to put it in third position in world trade.

While the success of one country does not necessarily have a direct relationship to experiences elsewhere, as Dr. Erhard pointed out, the fundamental policies he adopted then could be studied with benefit in Ottawa today. As he wrote some years later, he was determined not to countenance any further price increases without keeping the public fully informed about the causes and effects of such harmful moves. He said an end must be put to the absurd game of wage increases following rises in prices, and price increases following rises in pay. A stage must be reached when individual sections are ashamed to put forward demands that are contrary to the welfare of the community as a whole.

The false ideas about distribution of incomes he rejected entirely and held that competition was the only means to secure prosperity. His own experience in Germany, he held, was clear documentary evidence that only by firmly rejecting socialist dogma and affirming a free economic order can prosperity and security be achieved.

If a nation fails to face facts and tries to buy more time with controls and a planned economy, he argued, it can only lead to greater bureaucracy, government interference and ultimate totalitarianism. The undisputed success of his policies demonstrated how much more sensible it was to concentrate all available energies on increasing the nation's wealth rather than to squabble over the distribution of the wealth.

Dr. Erhard suggested at that time what I suggest now for Canada. Solutions to Canada's current economic problems cannot be found in still more spending and more borrowing for social services and less individual incentive. If we try to solve long-term unemployment through more welfare, it will simply snare another generation into becoming wards of the Crown. Similarly, our problems will not be resolved outside the country; the essential job is internal. The unity of Canada can never be secured with a sick economy. Miracles can only be achieved when the will of the people can be roused by an inspired leadership.

When speaking of leadership it is interesting to note the stand the Prime Minister has taken and the stand the Leader of the Opposition has taken.

Mr. Benjamin: Horizontal.

Mr. Elzinga: In an article in the November 27, 1976, Canadian magazine Richard Gwyn amplified the kind of leadership the Prime Minister has given us when he wrote:

Canadians, he (Trudeau) said in 1970, must exercise discipline and set aside trinkets like electric toothbrushes. Then he flew off to join the Aga Khan aboard his yacht in the Adriatic.

● (0122)

The Prime Minister has mismanaged the economic affairs of this country to such an extent that he has proved he has no answers to Canada's economic problems. We have had three finance ministers who have failed to bridge the gap between our economic difficulties and the Prime Minister's indifference. Canadians are beginning to believe that there is no solution to this economic mess, and who can blame them when the Prime Minister ignores the situation?

There are answers, Mr. Speaker, and we in this party have offered them to the Canadian people. The Progressive Conservative party, through the voice of our leader, has given clear alternatives and has charted the course that will lead Canada back to economic growth and to confidence in the Canadian economy.

On December 24, 1970 the Prime Minister told the Canadian people that inflation no longer existed, that he had wrestled it to the ground. He said he had cured the problem. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the problem has not been cured. The only thing the Prime Minister has wrestled to the ground in this country is private investment.

In another interview on December 28, 1975 the Prime Minister stated that Canada had not been able to make the free market system work, that the government would have to play a larger role in running our institutions and that there is going to be more authority in our lives. Yet when the premiers came together for the recent economic conference in Ottawa, the Prime Minister said exactly the opposite. We cannot believe the words we hear from this man because he contradicts himself so often.

Let me compare his statements with those of our leader, who on May 11, 1977 in Toronto said that during the past decade we have wasted away our economic strength. He said Canada now has a larger portion of its economy devoted to services, including government, than any other western nation. He said that every fifth Canadian worker is employed directly or indirectly by government, that governments' share of the gross national product, the unproductive portion of our gross national product, has doubled in the last decade to 43 per cent.

The trend today is to less government involvement. We find that the policies we have advocated through the many years are now being adopted by the present Liberal administration simply because they are finding that they are being accepted by the Canadian people.

On the issue of unemployment I wish to share with you, Mr. Speaker, statements which the two leaders of our major parties have made. The Prime Minister said that there are people on unemployment insurance who prefer not to work, and they have a perfect right to make that decision. He said a man who lives in society should be able to enjoy his own possibilities to the maximum, but work is perhaps not the way to do it.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Let me compare that with the statement made by the leader of our party. He said the current unemployment insurance system is wasteful, inefficient, and in many cases a practical disincentive to work. He said that young people are going to develop attitudes to jobs that are very unhealthy in the long term, and that we will be paying the social cost for years to come. The Leader of the Opposition said that in the next four year we are going to have to provide jobs for more than a million people who are not now in the labour force, and that we have to have economic growth in this country so we can find nearly two million jobs. We in this party are committed to that, Mr. Speaker.

I am not sure how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to share with you a few excerpts from a book that has been researched and compiled by Edward Murphy called "A Legacy of Spending". In so many ways the back cover of this book exemplifies the problem of Canada's economic situation: the headline is "Federal spending still out of control".

The major difficulty we in Canada are facing is that the federal government has lost control of its spending. I wish to give the House some examples of that. In this publication there is an article dated January 17, 1974 in which a member of our party, our present national president, indicated to the House that the Prime Minister has spent $61,000 on office furnishings in his office in Ottawa. He has spent some $297,000 on his own home. This is paid for by our taxpayers. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) flies around the country at great expense to the taxpayer but advocates user-pay when it comes to the carriage of freight.

Another area in which the government is deeply lacking is moral leadership. I want to refer the House to certain Canada Council grants, of which many prime examples are given in this book, but first let me put on the record some of the expenses incurred by the Prime Minister's office at a time when he was telling Canadians they must exercise restraint. Certainly he showed none himself. The cost of operation of the Prime Minister's office for the year 1977-78 is $2,500,000.

Mr. Benjamin: Fire them all.

Mr. Elzinga: That is what we plan on doing after the next election. Let me compare that with the year 1968-69 when the cost was only $767,000. I am amazed how the government can preach restraint yet not exercise it.

On returning to the lack of moral leadership, we find that through Young Canada works the government has financed a documentary film on homosexuals to the tune of $6,600. This is how our government is spending our money.

An hon. Member: It has to be the Liberals.

Mr. Elzinga: Yes, it has to be the Liberals. An article reprinted from the Vancouver Sun for September 2, 1972 carries the headline, "Are gays urging boy seduction with federal money?" That is the kind of thing Canada Works grants are funding. Another article reprinted from the Victoria Colonist for June 25, 1974 carries the headline "Homosexual centre opens on OFY grants". I say disgraceful.

Mr. Benjamin: What has that got to do with the dollar?

Mr. Elzinga: When a government wastes money on things like this it shows it is being irresponsible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

• (0132)

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate at this early hour in the morning. I came to Canada from a third world country, after having observed for a long time the development of the banana republics. Now I am part of this great country, and as the years go by I realize Canada is becoming a more sophisticated banana republic. In those republics the main objective is to invite foreign investment in order to sell off resources as quickly as possible. What do we find in Canada? We find exactly the same thing being done today. Our economy is based on selling off resources as quickly as we can.

The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said in Toronto that it is not shameful to be a hewer of wood and a drawer of water. Canada must give up the idea of becoming a manufacturing country. Our resources must be sold off as quickly as possible. The entire scenario is clear. In 1976 the selling off of resources in raw form provided a surplus of $3 million. Indeed, it was the only sector which showed any surplus. The drop in the value of the Canadian dollar is advantageous to those producing raw materials. It will be necessary to sell more resources in order to make greater surpluses. We should find ourselves in an irreversible position of selling off resources more quickly.

A prime example is the Canadian nickel industry. I am not a capitalist, as some other hon. members of this House are. There is a market system in effect. Supply and demand determines the price. When there is an ample supply of goods and the demand is low, the price should go down. When there is an inadequate supply of goods and the demand is high, the price goes up.

How does this work in the nickel industry? For the last year and a half the price of nickel has been $2.15 a pound. We have been told that there are approximately 420 million pounds of nickel stockpiled which must be unloaded. Why has there been no drop in price? It is still $2.15 a pound. That is an anomaly capitalists such as Chairman Zink find difficult to understand. Chairman Zink is a cousin of Lubor Zink. Why has the price of nickel not been dropped to see if it will move? I do not know anything about those things.

There is no question in the minds of many Canadians that the government has mismanaged the economy. The two old-line parties are not able to change the direction in which Canada is moving in terms of its economic structure. In January 1975, in an interview with Bruce Phillips, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dared to say the free market system was not serving Canada and that the government might have to interfere in that market system. All hell broke loose in the country. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, chambers of commerce, members of the Tory party and members of the Liberal party came down on the Prime Minister.

Nowadays we are told that the private sector will have to bring us out of the doldrums and create jobs. We cannot do any more for the private sector. We have given them concession after concession, tax break after tax break. The latest was in the amount of $1 billion. Now the government is going to relax in terms of environmental requirements, but still there are no jobs.

Everything possible has been done for Inco and Falconbridge in the Sudbury basin. No government could do any more. Yet we do not have jobs to show for the investment of taxpayers' money in this sector. There has been a lot of mismanagement by the government and by government run corporations. There was mismanagement by the private sector as well. With regard to Inco and Falconbridge, there has been a great deal of mismanagement. With respect to MacMillan-Bloedel in Vancouver, a portion of the surplus generated by the production of the plant was never ploughed back in to modernize the plant. The plant was allowed to run down. Because of that, it was no longer economically viable, and it had to be closed down. It was the same situation with Falconbridge in the Sudbury basin. Smelter processing was never improved or modernized, and suddenly, more money is being spent on maintenance. Now they have turned around and indicated that it is not competitive.

It is necessary for them to find a scapegoat. The scapegoat is the workers. They are being accused of not being productive. If workers are given modern equipment, they will produce. That has been done in the steel industry in this country. That industry provided its workers with equipment. The net result of that is that those workers out-produced their counterparts in a comparable industry.

The Canadian steel industry is far more competitive and productive than the American steel industry, because we modernized our steel plants and introduced modern techniques into that sector. That was not done in the Canadian pulp and paper industry. There is the shameful example of Temiskaming where the paper mill was closed down because it was not competitive. In fact, the plant was not modernized and therefore could not be competitive.

We seem to be headed toward ripping out our resources from the ground and shipping them out. It appears that to try to balance the deficit in our payments what we will do is to ship out more of our resources and thus earn more foreign currency in the hope that we will regain confidence in the money markets. This party has said—clearly it is different from the two old line parties in the House—that instead of extricating itself from the economy, the government must put itself in the middle of the planning process of the economy of this country. That is fairly obvious.

In conversation with the president of Noranda in a program called "Sunday Morning" I was told by him that had INCO not gone into Indonesia, some other company would have done so, so in effect it is better that a Canadian mining company went there. Apparently we gave them some $57 million in EDC loans at low interest. In response, I said that it was fine and I had no problem with that. I understand that INCO has a goal which is to penetrate the Japanese market, and this has led them to locate their plant in Indonesia. INCO has a plan and a goal and it will achieve that goal.

My next question to him was whether those are the goals for Canada. Who does the planning for Canada? In effect, no one does the planning for Canada, no elected leader. The directors or officers make the decisions for Noranda and for INCO and other such corporations. They have their mandate from the shareholders. But who sets the goals for Canada? The government has received a mandate from the people, but the government sets no goals, does no planning or evaluation, has no five year or ten year plan. They have all sorts of estimates of unemployment rates. The new thing now is estimates for the inflation rate. But there has been no structural planning in which the government is involved with the working people of this country and with those who invest money. There has been no planning of the economy of the country and no such thing as sector plans.

There is no planning in the mining sector. I know that the motto of Ontario Hydro says that to the people belong the resources. That may have been true when Ontario Hydro was set up, but we cannot say that today. What are the goals for the mining sector in this country? If the goal is that ore must be used to unlock other sources of wealth for future Canadians, then you start putting into place the kinds of taxation programs that are directed at achieving this goal. You put into place incentive programs, you set up evaluation processes and you put into place programs to help you achieve that goal. We have none of this. There is no sector planning and there is certainly no economic plan.

Let us take a look at those industrialized countries which are at the moment enjoying lowest unemployment rates. Let us take a look at the Japanese economy. There is economic planning there. If you look at the French economy, there is planning there, a five year plan, and they evaluate their programs as they go along to see if they are achieving the goals they have set for their economy.

What do we have in Canada? A government which says that the private sector will do it all. Indeed, the government looks upon the unemployed as the means of bringing down the inflation rate when it is high. In Toronto the other day at a Liberal conference, when the Prime Minister was asked what he intends to do with increasing inflation, he said he expects the inflation rate to go down because workers will demand less in wages next year because there is a large pool of unemployed and they will feel less secure about their jobs. That is Liberal philosophy for you. What they do is to fight inflation on the backs of the workers of this country. There is no set strategy or plan. They are just following some old fashioned idea that you cannot have high unemployment and high inflation at the same time. That is living in a pipe dream because no plans have been laid out and no goals have been set. All we do is to stumble from crisis to crisis.

Here we are in a crisis where we find the value of the Canadian dollar has dropped to some 89 cents. As I said at the outset of my remarks, I am reminded of the banana republics. You can go to some of those banana republics where for $1 American you can get a good exchange. For example, in Mexico for $1 American you can get 13 pesos; and in Argentina you can get perhaps 325 pesetas or whatever.

That is what Canada is coming to. Very shortly we will be paying $2 Canadian dollars for $1 American. What has happened is that the government have prostituted our currency so that we are reduced to being no more than another banana republic where the resources are taken out very cheaply because the value of our Canadian dollar is at rock bottom. It could very well be that they have discovered the printing presses and are selling off our resources very cheaply, in effect mortgaging the future of Canada, because at the moment the government is borrowing to pay interest on money borrowed before. This results from relying on one's resources and literally tying them up in 25, 40 or 60 years and mortgaging the future of Canada for the short term.

Some pretty tough decisions must be made in this country, but I do not think the government has the backbone to do it. I have often thought they have a wishbone where their backbone should be. They do not have the backbone necessary to make the decisions that must be made in this country. So far as the Tory party is concerned, they are the pretenders to power. I see chairman "Sinc" smiling. I do not really think we can entrust—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest the hon. member should refer to members by their titles, not by their names.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hardly think we should turn over the economy of this country to the terrible twins in the Conservative party who aspire to become the twin ministers of finance. That will be the twin-headed monster of finance. It should be quite something to see—the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), Jecky and Hyde.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

● (0152)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter into this debate except to say that there are no more speakers from Her Majesty's loyal opposition with respect to this matter; and on behalf of all of us in the House I would like to express thanks to the staff who have served loyally, as always. This includes the officers at the table and others who have been with us through this long night, following in the highest traditions of the service of members of this House. I am sure I am joined in this by all hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with the House leader of the official opposition in the words of thanks he has expressed. It is true that just about every time we have one of these debates something like this is said at this time of the morning, and sometimes much later. Even so, I think it ought to be said. We appreciate the extra hours that those at the table and in the Chair have had to be with us. We are glad that the page boys were allowed to go home at midnight. We thank all others, including the protective staff and the television crew. I think perhaps it should be said—indeed I have a hunch—that those who have had to work the hardest have been the members of the Hansard staff, who have been taking down what we have been saying since 12 hours ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We thank them all, and we hope the debate has been worthwhile.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, having sat here since one minute after eight o'clock I would like to echo what the House leaders of the opposition parties have said.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley). However, hon. members will agree that it is a rare occasion when an application under Standing Order 26 is approved by the Chair, and I want to spend a few minutes bringing us back to the matter of whether we should have a floating dollar or a pegged dollar. I thought that was what this debate was all about.

Of course we appreciate the work of the Hansard reporters and the page boys, but none, including my good friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), and the speaker prior to him, mentioned a word about the purpose of this debate. I listened and watched, but I do not think they mentioned it.

As we shut this place down for whatever is left of tonight I would like hon. members to think about whether we should acquiesce in a demand of the United States or anyone else to shore up our dollar when it starts to hurt them. I remember the fabulous fifties when the Canadian dollar was worth 90 cents American. They were the fabulous fifties because we had very little unemployment. Our cattlemen did not do half bad, and I am sure the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) will not disagree with that. Our grain producers were not doing too badly either.

There was a difference in motive and intent between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the leader of the New Democratic Party in moving this motion. When Canadian dollars are spent in Canada, they are spent by Canadians, and goods are purchased at Canadian prices. When we purchase goods in Canada, we pay so many Canadian dollars for so many pounds of beef, so many ounces of vegetables or whatever. When the United States government put pressure on West Germany, Japan and Switzerland to upgrade their currencies, those countries said they would upgrade their currencies a little bit as long as they had marbles in their markets. Their markets were in the United States and Canada.

I wish the financial critic for the Progressive Conservative party would stick around because I would like him to explain why it is so important that the Canadian dollar be at par with the American dollar.

Surely the value of our Canadian dollar has to do with the value of our productivity and the value, worth and content of what we produce in competition with people in other countries.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) permit a question?

Mr. Benjamin: Of course.

Mr. Elzinga: When the hon. member began his remarks, he said he would state his opinion regarding whether he felt our dollar should be pegged or floated. I am curious as to his position on whether the dollar should be pegged or floated. Would he be kind enough to share that opinion with us?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I was just getting to that. We are not in favour of a pegged dollar. The value of Canadian production and productivity will be challenged by our competitors in the rest of the world. I do not know why we should throw several hundred million into shoring up an artificial price for the Canadian dollar.

What we are really saying to our competitors, whether they be the Americans, the Japanese, the West Germans, the Swiss or whatever, is that since our products might be shoddy and our productivity might not be very good, we are going to shore up our dollar and give them an artificial value of our dollar. If we are really to find out what the value of our dollar is—which really relates to the value of our production and productivity—and if we really are free enterprisers we will take our chances in our relationships with other countries of the world.

We are against a pegged dollar. I mentioned the fabulous fifties. I thought that would get through to the hon. member who just asked me a question. If we are going to have a clean float, it has to be clean. It has to be like Caesar's wife; it not only seems to be clean, but it is clean.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Can you verify that?

Mr. Benjamin: When the Leader of the Opposition raised this matter in his application under Standing Order 26, his motivation was different from that of the leader of the New Democratic Party. The motivation of the Leader of the Opposition is that of R. B. Bennett all over again. The Leader of the Opposition would blast his way into world markets. Neither he, nor any other spokesman for his party, has told us whether he is in favour of a floating dollar or a pegged dollar. I hope one of them will get up for a minute or two and tell us if they are in favour of it. As my colleague from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said the other day on another bill, they are like the oldest profession in the world; they are going to work on both sides of the street.

● (0202)

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I should share with the chamber that I was just about to get to that point before I was so rudely interrupted by the NDP and they would not allow me to elaborate on our position on the pegging or floating of the dollar.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would like to suggest to the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) that according to rule 26(14) speeches will be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. Benjamin: I will not take that as an invitation to use up the whole 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker. Canadian industry and production has to stand up. We do not need artificial propping up of hundreds of billions of dollars of reserves. If the Canadian dollar drops another five cents tomorrow, which it will not, that gets a message through to us. In fact, if that were to happen I am sure my hon. friend from Medicine Hat would be very happy for our beef and grain exports, which would stand to benefit. In fact, the employees at the Massey-Harris plant in Brantford would be happy because the drop in the Canadian dollar will mean they will be selling farm implements out of Brantford, Ontario instead of Brazil.

A country has to earn its own way. I wish the Leader of the Opposition or someone in the Conservative party would please tell us whether they want a floating dollar or a pegged dollar. We have said we want a floating dollar. We will produce and we will make good quality merchandise and farm products. When the rest of the world decides "these guys are not doing half bad", they will buy from us at a good return. But we have to sit around at the behest of the U.S.A., who has been putting unholy pressure on the boys on the government side to prop up the Canadian dollar. They tried it with the West Germans, the Japanese and the Swiss. They put pressure on them through the International Monetary Fund and through every mechanism they could think of to increase the value of their currency. Why? So it was better for American manufacturers and producers to compete with economies which were more productive and more efficient.

The president of the Bank of Canada should say to the president of the Bank of America: "Look, we are not propping up our dollars just to help out your manufacturers and your farmers; our Canadian farmers and manufacturers are going to raise, produce and manufacture."

We have been debating the pipeline issue. Do hon. members want to put the Canadian dollar up to par? Ask the boys in the steel plants in Edmonton, Regina or Welland what their chances are. Do we want to play into the hands of competitors who are much bigger and have more muscle than we have? We do not need artificial support for inflated dollars. We have enough trouble with that domestically.

My hon. friend asked about the cost of our imports. The penalty we pay for a devalued Canadian dollar falls on those who can least afford it. I am thinking of fresh fruits and vegetables which we have to bring in from Mexico and California during the winter. There are other products as well. There is no reason in the world why we could not protect our old age pensioners and veterans and the poor. We could raise old age pensions $50 a month and protect them from higher imported food prices over which we have no control. At the same time we say to the rest of the world that we are going to make our own way with our production and our efficiency on what the value of our dollar is worth to them. We can say to the poor of this country that, through one way or another, whether it is through a tax benefit, food stamps or equalized prices on milk, we can protect the poor and disabled. We can protect the unemployed and we can protect the old from the cost of a devalued Canadian dollar.

Surely that is part of a civilized society. Surely that is part of what a civilized parliament will do. If we are to shore up the Canadian dollar to help American manufacturing capacity, to help American export capacity and to help American corporations who can shut down branch plants in Canada, then we do not want any part of shoring up an artificial price on the value of the Canadian dollar. We will earn our own keep and make our own way.

If that makes me sound like a small "c" conservative, then I do not apologize for that. I am sick and tired of Liberals and Conservatives. It was Diefenbaker in the sixties and Chrétien in the seventies. In Zurich, Frankfurt, London, New York, Washington, Chicago and anywhere else you want to name in the world, with this decline in the Canadian dollar, which the Minister of Finance has said is so minute, speculators last night and today gambled on some kind of a prospect that the government of Canada will pour in $500 million of the $1.5 billion dollars bought at a quarter or one-third of a per cent less Canadian dollars than they will sell them for tomorrow. We will have shored up the Canadian dollar through the governor of the Bank of Canada. Speculators are competitors in the free markets of the world and they will have made some bucks. Why? Because we are going to prop up the Canadian dollar. Speculators will clear one quarter of a million dollars overnight on a million dollars between yesterday and today.

We have said we are opposed to a pegged dollar. The Leader of the Opposition moved a motion today and neither he nor his colleagues have yet said which way they will go, whether they are in favour of a pegged dollar or a floating dollar.

We think our nation can do a good job in competition without the support of an artificially high dollar. I invite my friends in the official opposition once and for all to say whether they are for or against a floating dollar. Do they want it pegged? If so, they should say so. If they want it pegged, what do they want it pegged at, where do they want it pegged, and when? These economic dinosaurs expect to operate with 1897 and 1917 ideas in the 1970s. Even the Minister of Finance knows better than that. He at least tried to keep his cool.

● (0212)

We support a floating dollar. We have repeatedly stated that if Canadian industry and agricultural producers, who are very good at their work, are going to have a fair chance against those countries with which they are competing, they must have value for their Canadian dollars. I do not care what the governor of the Bank of America does about their dollar. I visited Germany, England and a few other countries this past summer. Both the Canadian dollar and the British pound were bouncing around. No one cried about that. I do not see why this government and this parliament should panic, cry or acquiesce to pressure from the United States treasury.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I hope the opposition respect the fact that for the past two hours there has not been a quorum in this House. I thank my colleagues, the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), who acquiesced to the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas) not calling for a quorum in the last two hours. I hope the opposition respect that fact.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I really do not think that is a fair remark at this time of the night. There has in fact been a quorum throughout the evening. If members were not here in the chamber, they were in the lobby watching the proceedings on the monitor. That is an unfair statement.

At this stage of the evening, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you and the staff—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that is not a point of order.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I am just trying to thank you and the staff for your courtesy in remaining with us this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): As I said before, I love you all! Pursuant to Standing Order 26(13) I am satisfied that the debate has been concluded, and I therefore declare the motion carried.

This House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. this day, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 2:14 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROTEST AGAINST REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON POWDERED SKIM MILK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) at the Food Conference that there is a nutrition crisis in Canada, in view of the fact that prices in Canada have risen by 15 per cent in the past year, and in view of the fact that low income earners already hit by food price inflation will have to pay approximately 34 cents more per pound for powdered skim milk as a result of the removal of the consumer subsidy by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and, further, that this will adversely affect already declining farm incomes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That in the opinion of this House the government should not remove the consumer subsidy on powdered skim milk.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION INTO REOPENING OF WEST COAST OIL PORTS INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House. In light of the findings recorded in the interim report of the west coast oil ports inquiry, suggesting that there is confusion surrounding the need to continue the inquiry, and in view of the restraints placed upon the commissioner by the order in council of December 22, I move, seconded by the hon. member Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Standing Committee on Fisheries and the Environment be charged with investigating the problem of whether or not the west coast oil ports inquiry be reactivated, under what terms and conditions, and that Dr. Thompson, the present commissioner, be amongst the first witnesses to be called.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON POWDERED SKIM MILK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has dropped the consumer subsidy for skim milk powder from his estimates, without warning or explanation. Because this will mean a 40 per cent increase in the cost of skim milk powder for large, low income families that depend on it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House directs the Minister of Agriculture to revise his estimates to include the consumer skim milk powder subsidy or other measures to subsidize milk for low income families in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion is required. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REASON RUSSIAN MEMBER OF PRESS GALLERY NOT EXPELLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 with regard to an intelligence report of March, 1976, furnished to the interdepartmental committee on security and intelligence—the intelligence advisory committee and the security committee of the cabinet—concerning Alexander Aleksandrovich Palladin, a representative in the parliamentary press gallery of the Russian Novosti press agency, who is named in this intelligence report as a member of the Russian intelligence service. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Solicitor General state all details why Mr. Palladin has not been expelled from Canada for activities not consistent with his occupation as a journalist including, among other things, an attempt to cultivate two special ministerial assistants for purposes of obtaining highly secretive cabinet documents with the assistance at the time of three Russian intelligence agents, Y. A. Smirnov, Y. A. Usaty and the present first secretary of the U.S.S.R. Ottawa embassy, namely, G. I. Zolotov.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

URBAN AFFAIRS

EXTENSION OF RRAP ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that, despite repeated promises to assist transients and other low income individuals living in slum housing conditions in areas such as the downtown east side of Vancouver, and in view of the fact that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) specifically promised legislation during the 1977-78 fiscal year now rapidly coming to a close, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instruct the government to immediately introduce amendments to the National Housing Act, extending eligibility for assistance under the residential rehabilitation assistance program to the owners of hotels and rooming houses serving low income tenants, and that such assistance be available up to a ceiling amount of $4,000 per room, with provision for forgiveness clauses in loans offered under the program.

REQUEST MEASURES BE TAKEN TO PROTECT PRISON EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the murder of Archambault Institute's former director Michel Roy on February 7 last and since his successor, Mr. Gérald Marineau, was replaced by an administrative committee and that, according to the Journal de Montréal dated February 21 last, Mr. Marineau has been threatened, these not being the first threats made against loyal employees within and outside our prisons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne):

That this House strongly condemn threats made against the employees of our penal institutions and direct the government to take immediate steps to protect the lives of those employees, according to the recommendations of the sub-committee on justice and legal affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTION TAX CREDIT BE GRANTED INDUSTRY FOR RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important matter.

Considering the lack of sufficient measures which would improve on the present economic climate; considering that subsidies granted for research will never provide for an industrial strategy essential to permanent job creation; considering finally that recommendations contained in the brief of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association are part of the solution to the problems we are faced with, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Finance to grant to industry a tax credit of 25 per cent for at least 10 years for the purpose of industrial research and development.

PROVINCES REQUESTED TO UNDERTAKE EDUCATIONAL REFORM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion related to an important issue.

As on this very day the provincial premiers are meeting in Montreal to reach an agreement on important and urgent reforms in the field of education for the minority groups of the official languages; recognizing that education is, under the Constitution, a matter of provincial jurisdiction; and considering the strong current of national interest in the matter, and the fact that millions of Canadians are now living in the expectancy of a solution that will contribute to their cultural and social survival, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House send to the provincial premiers in meeeting a message indicating that we are at one with the objectives of equal linguistic rights in matters of education, and that the House of Commons supports them in their search for a genuine reform recognizing that all Canadians, in every province, have the right to be educated in the official language of their choice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

MESSAGES OF SYMPATHY

WILLIAM IRVING—NICKEL MINER FATALLY INJURED AT WORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that last Thursday Mr. William Irving, a miner with 31 years experience with Inco, was killed while working in a double-slicing operation at Frood Mine in Sudbury, that Mr. Irving and his fellow co-workers had vigorously protested what they considered to be a highly dangerous environment, that their immediate supervisor ordered them to continue to work under threat of job loss, that Mr. Irving leaves a widow and five children, and that this House congratulates beauty queens and expresses sympathy for the families of policemen unfortunately killed in fulfilling their duties, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House extend its sympathy to the Irving family.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RESERVES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who indicated in the debate last night that he felt there was no crisis with respect to our dollar. Our reserves have been falling very dramatically in recent weeks. Based on OECD figures for last November, which pointed out the Canadian foreign exchange reserves, relatively free reserves, were $1.6 billion at that time, compared to $16 billion in the case of the United Kingdom, almost $7 billion in the case of Italy, and even Ireland had more in foreign exchange free reserves according to OECD, would the Minister of Finance indicate if he does not feel at this point that our reserves are unduly precarious in their size?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the reserves of the Canadian government are published on the second working day of the month, and they are satisfactory just now. Last fall, we obtained a line of credit of some $1.5 billion with the Canadian banks, and I feel we are in a very good position with respect to the Bank of Canada reserves.

EXTENT TO WHICH BANKS HAVE DRAWN ON LINE OF CREDIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My question is directed, again, to the Minister of Finance, who has referred to the $1.5 billion line of credit with which the minister gained time in our last crisis in October of last year. On Tuesday evening, the minister indicated that he intended to make a call on that line of credit. Would he confirm that they gave formal notice to our chartered banks yesterday with respect to the credit, and would he also indicate to what extent they have told Canadian chartered banks they intend to call down the credit?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the documents are now being prepared so that we may submit our applications to the banks as soon as possible. This morning, I signed the documents, but I do not know when the Governor of the Bank of Canada will forward them to the Canadian banks.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: As the banks were formally notified yesterday of the actual documentation, would the minister inform the House what the documentation says with respect to the draw on the chartered banks' standing line of credit?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer this question.

[English]

TOTAL AMOUNT OF FOREIGN BORROWING

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. With regard to the new line of borrowing abroad by the government, can the minister take it upon himself to let Canadians know today what is the total amount of the borrowing abroad which the minister announced the other night?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer this question, as negotiations have not started yet.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: I am not talking about the negotiations; I am asking about the total amount, about which certainly there should be no secrecy. I cannot understand confidentiality on that particular matter. Would the minister care to indicate to the House whether the government of Canada, or the Bank of Canada, has any stand-by credit, or at least an understanding on funds with the Bank of England and, if so, to what extent may we look to that bank for assistance? If he will attempt to rely on some secrecy, let me tell him that certain aspects of this matter have already been publicly reported in Europe by the Reuters news agency.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, a special line of credit with the Bank of England is out of the question. Yesterday I clearly stated the government's position. As for the figures, I will not give them away at this time, and I think hon. members should recognize it is very difficult to speculate on the level of the Canadian dollar. Besides,— —yesterday, when I made my statement in the House, the Leader of the Opposition, in his speech in response, referred to the fact that I referred to rumours that were circulated about the so called big scandals. If he has read this morning's Gazette, he would know that in London yesterday, because of the false rumour being spread by the opposition, the dollar went down. This happened as a result of something unconnected with the level of the Canadian dollar. I can appreciate the fact that the Leader of the Opposition does not yet realize that he is Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1422)

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Finance has considered that perhaps one of the reasons we are experiencing the financial bleeding we are experiencing is the loss of credibility and confidence in the Minister of Finance in the international market. When matters are publicized abroad about figures and stand-by credits, the minister will not even let the people of Canada know these figures.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lawrence: Could the minister at least confirm the news that is presently found in many financial journals in the western world and in North America about the size of the loan he is attempting to get right now? Could he confirm that figure?

[Mr. Lawrence.]

Mr. Chrétien: No, Mr. Speaker, I will not, because that would be improper at this moment. I am doing this very delicate business in consultation with the governor of the Bank of Canada, and I will discharge my responsibility as I think best. I would like to point out to the hon. member that I hope he was sober last night when he made his foolish speech in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Another cheap shot.

Mr. Stevens: You weren't here.

Mr. Chrétien: You should look at the film.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member at three o'clock on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF MPs BY RCMP

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Following a series of articles culminating on August 12 with an article in the Globe and Mail which contained allegations about the RCMP keeping files on members of parliament, as well as allegations about surveillance of members of parliament and others, I wrote the then solicitor general on August 12—

Mr. Trudeau: I can't hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I understand that because of the noise the Prime Minister did not hear my question. I will repeat it. On August 12, I wrote the then solicitor general concerning a series of allegations which were made in articles which had been published during that week in the Globe and Mail pertaining to the surveillance of members of parliament and the keeping of files on members of parliament by the RCMP. I did not receive a letter from the then solicitor general for some time. I subsequently wrote to the Prime Minister. I received a letter from the then solicitor general two days later which concluded with the following quotation of the then commissioner of the RCMP pertaining to allegations about surveillance:

> I categorically deny that the RCMP has ever used electronic surveillance, including telephone taps or bugging devices in any form, anywhere, at any time against members of parliament, since the conviction of Fred Rose for espionage in 1947.

Following the submission of a petition by the hon. member for Central Nova yesterday which does contain information which, if it turns out to be true, is a serious contradiction of that assertion, has the Prime Minister checked with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerning the allegation made that he, in fact, had been the subject of electronic surveillance and that he, in fact, had been told about it later on?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, following a question along those lines yesterday, I did ask the Solicitor General to inquire into the matter. We agreed from the outset that such a serious allegation should be referred to the McDonald commission. I understand that Commissioner McDonald has indicated that he is seized of the matter.

● (1427)

As far as we are concerned, I wrote a letter to the Leader of the Opposition giving the same kind of assurance with regard to security matters as I believe was read by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I have checked today to make sure that the information supplied to me for the purpose of this letter was supplied by our security officials, and the answer is yes, so there is an apparent contradiction between the advice I received and the allegations contained in this affidavit. We are not in a position yet to indicate how this contradiction can be resolved. Of course, I have confidence in my advisers and in the RCMP, rather than in a third party who is making these allegations.

For greater security, however, the Solicitor General is having an inquiry made within the RCMP to ascertain if there is any substance to the allegations.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I can understand and accept part of the Prime Minister's answer when he says that the information was provided to him which formed the substance of his letter to the Leader of the Opposition, and the information that was provided to me, is being checked out: I fully accept that part of the answer.

My more specific question pertains to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It seems to me the answer to that question should not wait until we hear from the royal commission. Has the Prime Minister inquired of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to see whether, at the time he was solicitor general, he was informed by anyone that electronic surveillance had been undertaken against him under the auspices of the security service of the RCMP? If he had been told that surveillance had been carried out against him and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, as stated in the allegation, what did he do about it?

Mr. Trudeau: I understand some information did come to the previous solicitor general, Mr. Speaker, but I am not in a position to give exact dates. I want to assure the hon. member that I regard this matter very seriously. I also await the answer to this and other questions from the present Solicitor General, who told me just before the House met that he is pursuing the inquiry.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the assurance that the Prime Minister is having the matter investigated, I would, personally, be very happy to leave it at that if he would tell me that the pending investigation by the Solicitor General and whatever checking he is doing himself would be communicated to us early next week. Will this particular aspect—namely, the involvement of the former solicitor general, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—be reported to the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly ask the present Solicitor General to take that question into very serious consideration.

PENITENTIARIES

ARCHAMBAULT—REPLACEMENT OF MR. MARINEAU—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Solicitor General.

It was reported in the Journal de Montréal of February 21 last that Mr. Gérald Marineau who had succeeded Mr. Michel Roy as director of the Archambault Institute has been in turn succeeded by an administrative committee; the story also states, and I quote:

> Since his appointment as director of the Archambault Institute, he (Mr. Marineau) had been the object of many threatening phone calls from unknown individuals, presumably from the Inmates Liberation Army.

I want to ask the minister whether he could confirm or deny that the new change in that institution's direction is a direct answer to the threats against Mr. Marineau?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to tell the honourable member that I appreciate very much, as I am sure do all employees of the Canadian Penitentiary Service, the motion he moved today under Standing Order 43 to show support for those public servants, and I want to thank him for that on their behalf. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can indicate to him that the measure we have taken to establish a committee for the Archambault Institute was an administrative decision dictated by the circumstances we are facing.

REQUEST CAPITAL PUNISHMENT BE APPLIED IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

According to a public opinion poll made by a number of newspapers and involving 20,000 people, it would seem that 88.9 per cent of Canadians are for the reinstatement of capital punishment. This poll involved various classes of people as well as various types of crimes. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in order to protect honest people and particularly prison guards and police forces, and to restore confidence in our judicial system, the government intends to introduce a bill during this or the next session requiring the House to vote again on the issue of capital punishment, in response to the numerous letters we are getting from all parts of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government does not plan anything of that kind at the moment.

ESTIMATES

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. During his remarks yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board claimed that government spending had been pared to the absolute bone. However, budgetary estimates for the fiscal year 1978-79 are 13 per cent higher than budgetary estimates for fiscal 1977-78. Is the President of the Treasury Board telling the House and the country that 13 per cent is the minimum possible increase in government spending that could occur this year or could occur in the future?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my statement yesterday indicated that over-all spending for the full fiscal year 1978-79 would represent a 9.8 per cent increase at the ceiling I made public yesterday. I also indicated that the main estimates included several items which in the previous year would have been dealt with in supplementary estimates. One can think of additional funds for job creation which are in the main estimates for this year which I tabled yesterday, and which came along in supplementary form last year.

One can think of the established program finance payments to the provinces, in the order of about $550 million, which was put in the main estimates this year because we have an accurate projection on that. That is because this is the second year following the fiscal transfer arrangement. That is in the main estimates, whereas it had to be adjusted in the supplementary estimates last year. There are many items of that nature which mean that the expenditures have been moved forward to the main estimates and will not appear in the supplementary estimates. That is the simple explanation.

Mr. Andre: The figure the President of the Treasury Board has repeated can only be arrived at through judicial assumptions as to future supplementaries and amounts that will last. It results, as well, from a $1.5 billion decrease in non-budgetary estimates, a large part of which is a result of having certain Crown corporations borrow on their own, rather than having their borrowings included in the non-budgetary estimates as has been the case in previous years.

Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us what the over-all figure would be—even using the judicial assumptions he is using—if, in fact, there had not been the structural changes between last year and this year which, I am sure the minister will admit, distort the over-all picture and allow the production of a number like 9.8, when a considerably larger number is a more accurate description of what has happened?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not agree with the hon. member. The structural adjustments to which I referred yesterday applied to the fiscal year 1977-78 which I clearly set before the House on February 16, 1977, when I tabled the main estimates for that year. I also said yesterday, as was pointed out by the opposition critic following my speech of February 16, 1977, that the figure for 1977-78 probably would have been about 10 per cent except for that one-time change due, again, to the fiscal transfer arrangements negotiated the previous fall. As to the other allegations of the hon. member, he is dealing very much with a hypothetical situation, and I would not attempt to play in that game.

Mr. Andre: Is the President of the Treasury Board assuring the House that exactly the same items that were included in non-budgetary estimates last fiscal year were also included in non-budgetary estimates for the coming fiscal year, and there was no change in the items that will be counted from year to year?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, one would have to follow a very detailed path through all the things dropped from one year and added to another. On balance, yes, I think they are. The hon. member for York-Simcoe pointed out, as we pointed out in the fact sheets accompanying my tabling of the main estimates yesterday, that there is borrowing by the Export Development Corporation to the extent of $365 million. We drew the attention of hon. members and the public to the fact that it is in there. We do not consider that to fall into the category the hon. member is describing, because it has a very distinct and separate purpose as to why the Export Development Corporation is going to begin to seek funds on the private market: it is related to the strategy for the Export Development Corporation.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RESTRAINTS PRACTISED TO INHIBIT GROWTH

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board, seeing that we are flushing him out in terms of flim-flamming. The minister indicated that he will hold growth in the public service to six-tenths of 1 per cent, which I admit is admirable. At the same time, it has been brought to the attention of hon. members that several departments have been getting involved with temporary help and casual and term employment, which certainly has not frustrated the amount of growth in the public service: in fact, it is more.

What steps has the President of the Treasury Board taken to see that this matter has been brought to the attention of heads departments? Also, is any restraint being practised with regard to temporary help, casual and term, or are we still going to have a lot of flim-flam in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there is no flim-flam, a phrase the hon. member has fallen in love with in the last few days, obviously having picked it up from somebody else. I will be making public a complete examination of the question of temporary help, which I know has been of concern, somewhat fallaciously, to some members. I will make that release probably early next week, giving full details. I can assure the hon. member that it is under control and the representations or allegations about its misuse are, in fact, fallacious.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON POWDERED SKIM MILK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. It is a very important question. Given the fact that one million Canadians are unemployed, and 1½ million are drawing various social welfare benefits—in other words, drawing relief—and in light of a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the Food Conference that this country is facing a nutrition crisis, will the Prime Minister explain why at this time the government decided to remove the consumer subsidy on powdered skim milk, an important element in the diet of low income families? It will result in a 40 per cent to 50 per cent increase in the price of powdered skim milk in Canada.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representations. I will pass them on to the minister.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that this is not a representation; it is a well-known fact that the majority of people in this country find it difficult to understand why the government would take such an inhumane step at this time. Therefore, I ask the Minister of Finance to tell the House and the country why the government decided at this time to remove the consumer subsidy on powdered skim milk, amounting to some $18 million, which will probably result in a 50 per cent increase in the price of powdered skim milk, a very important part of the diet of low income families in Canada. This is a question, not a representation.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that question could be answered by the Minister of Agriculture or his parliamentary secretary.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY RESPECTING TEMPORARY AND TERM EMPLOYEES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the President of the Treasury Board a question with regard to the 0.6 per cent growth in the public service. His statements have been challenged repeatedly by public servants in a number of government departments, the Public Service Alliance and the Montreal area council of the Public Service Alliance which is preparing an in-depth study into the true value of these positions. Is the minister relying entirely on the word of the Public Service Commission that this temporary help and these term employees being made permanent is actually being restricted, or is he making any personal investigation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am relying on figures that I think are reliable. They come from various departments and from the Public Service Commission. I will be making that information available to hon. members and the public in pretty fair detail some time next week.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Alliance also stated that the contracting out which is widespread throughout the public service is another great government cover-up. They claim this contracting out is undermining the merit principle of hiring in the public service. Is the minister fully satisfied that all this contracting is necessary, or does he plan any investigation into the contracting out process which is costing hundreds of millions of dollars?

• (1442)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, contracting out is not amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. That is part of the information I will be making public next week, along with the head-on exposé of the fallacious allegations about temporary help.

URBAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST QUEBEC RESIDENTS BE ELIGIBLE FOR HOME-INSULATION GRANTS

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the province of Quebec has announced an energy conservation program granting a $500 subsidy for the insulation of single family dwellings, and that his own department has established a program last year granting $350 for the insulation of residential dwellings in Canada, could the minister tell the House if Quebec residents are eligible for this double subsidy?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is yes. Quebec residents are eligible for both programs. If I am sometimes critical of the initiatives or the lack of initiative by the province of Quebec, I am very happy to see that, in this case, it has finally understood the necessity of co-operating with the federal government in such an energy conservation program, and I congratulate it on this move.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GULL ISLAND PROJECT—JOBS RESULTING THEREFROM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact the Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated on Tuesday that the minister would be dealing with the problems of Newfoundland on the preparatory work for the lower Gull Island site, for which he mentioned a figure of $8,100 a job, could the minister indicate to the House what progress has been made to provide the 400 jobs which are so badly needed?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the joint statement made yesterday by the Newfoundland minister and myself, we have proposed to the province a program which it is now studying. We hope that in the coming days—in the coming weeks at most—the province of Newfoundland and Labrador will be in a position to make a decision on the proposal the federal government has made through my department.

[English]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would indicate the rationalization for the figure of $8,100 a job. Does the province of Newfoundland agree that this is the amount of money required, and has any consideration been given to raising that amount?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, we must remember that the federal government's proposal is an answer to a suggestion that had been made several months ago. So, at this moment, the proposal is being considered. Obviously, it does not cover all costs involved in the projects that are being analyzed at this moment, but the province is examining the possible ways to provide for the portion of the costs it should pour into the implementation of the first phase of the project.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE—RECOMMENDATIONS OF THOMPSON INQUIRY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment regarding the interim report of the west coast oil ports inquiry which Dr. Andrew Thompson submitted to the cabinet this morning. In view of the fact that in his letter of transmittal, Dr. Thompson suggested that the government had two alternatives—first, to reject the application for the pipeline from Kitimat to Edmonton, and second, to proceed with a further assessment of the environmental, social and navigational risks involved in this project—I ask the minister if he can assure the House that we will receive a reply from the government by March 31 as to which of these alternatives has been chosen.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly assure the hon. member that there will be a reply from the government or a reaction to Dr. Thompson's report before the date he indicates.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the National Energy Board has this application before them from the Kitimat pipeline company, and in view of the fact its area of jurisdiction is limited to the pipeline and does not cover port installations or navigational hazards, can we have assurance from the minister, or from any of his colleagues, that the matter of making the final decision for recommendation to the cabinet will not be left exclusively to the National Energy Board but will cover the other items which are beyond the jurisdiction of that body?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, it has always been made clear that when the National Energy Board does report—and I am not the experienced minister responsible—obviously cabinet has to agree or disagree with its recommendations.

THOMPSON INQUIRY—COMMISSIONER'S MANDATE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of State for the Environment. Could he give us some notion of the cabinet's view, in light of the commissioner's belief that it is his duty to carry on even under his existing terms of reference with environmental, social and navigational safety impact assessments? What provisions are being made to allow the commissioner to carry out what he considers to be his mandate.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the appropriate announcement will be made very shortly.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I hope that when this appropriate announcement is made, it is appropriate. I wonder whether the minister has, in fact, taken this matter into account and whether any thought has been given to the matter of negotiating a bilateral agreement with the United States covering such issues as hazards to fisheries, compensation, navigation, traffic control and pollution clean-up, construction and crewing standards in the Kitimat waters.

Mr. Marchand: I will take that representation into account, Mr. Speaker.

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF THOMPSON INQUIRY TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the inquiry which Dr. Thompson has undertaken. Neither his inquiry nor the terms of reference of the National Energy Board provide for study of the socioeconomic impact of the pipeline route from Kitimat to Edmonton. Is it the intention of the government, in light of the report tabled today and the press release which accompanied it, to initiate another study or extend the terms of reference of Dr. Thompson's inquiry to safeguard any negative impact on the pipeline route?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, everything will be clear as soon as the government makes an appropriate announcement, with respect to the Thompson inquiry, on the options that are given us. I want to assure the hon. member that I, as a British Columbia resident, am very much aware of the views of people living on the west coast and their views regarding tankers, and so on.

IMMIGRATION

PROCEDURES FOLLOWED RESPECTING ENTRY TO AND DEPORTATION FROM CANADA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Immigration with respect to Warren Hart. I would ask whether he has checked to see whether all regular procedures were followed with respect to his entry into Canada and deportation from Canada, and if anyone had contacted Mr. Hart officially on behalf of the government.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and in view of my interest in the matter, I will take note of the hon. member's question.

POST OFFICE

COMMITTEE STUDY OF LABOUR DISPUTES

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the work of the special subcommittee of justice and legal affairs on penitentiaries and violence, and the national credibility of that all-party, non-partisan committee's work to resolve management-union and inmate conflicts, in view of the fact that within the Post Office service similar conflicts between union, middle management and rank and file workers are a fundamental base for the disruptions of the national postal service, would the Prime Minister consider establishing a special committee using the same methods and style of the justice and legal affairs committee, even using, possibly, the same people to investigate and seek resolutions to the problems of the Post Office?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could hardly answer such a question without agreeing with the hon. member that the committee did first-rate work. The members serving on it, including the hon. member, were most responsible and did a very good job for this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1452)

Mr. Trudeau: I take this representation most earnestly. I undertake to discuss it with the House leader and with the Postmaster General.

TRADE

TEXTILES—PURCHASE AND SALE OF IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he tell the House whether he is aware that textile import quotas are being bought and sold in Canada, and to what degree these sales and purchases are going on?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the department is aware that businesses are changing hands. With them, to a certain extent, go some of the quotas. I should like to inform the hon. member that quotas were put in place to limit the importation of textiles into this country. For the benefit of the House, the quotas brought about an approximate 1 per cent reduction in textiles imported into Canada in 1977 over 1975. We accomplished what they set out to do.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of a company going out of business, does the government have any policy or attitude on the propriety of a market building up in textile quotas?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, if a company goes out of business and does not sell its business, one can assume there was no business left: that is the only assumption I can make.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED LEAKING OF INCOME TAX INFORMATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the House, please?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Beatty: It is very rowdy here today. My question is for the Minister of National Revenue, to whom I have given notice. It relates to an article by Mr. Victor Mackie which appeared in the Ottawa Journal. Mr. Mackie was reporting on an interview with the minister concerning the leaking of personal, confidential tax information about individuals to unauthorized people. With regard to the Toronto office and the leaking of information there, the minister is quoted in the article as saying:

We believe a person in that office gave out the information knowing it was being improperly released.

Is the minister aware of the identity of the individual in question? If so, why have charges not been laid?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the person in question and I do not know the person's name. I am aware that this has occurred. Also, I know the deputy minister made a report which was questioned at committee level. I believe the hon. member was present when this took place. In any case, what happened is part of the report of the committee. The reason no charge has yet been laid is that the RCMP does not have enough evidence to do so; otherwise, a charge would have been laid.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, the deputy minister did not deal expressly with this question when he appeared before the committee. I ask the minister whether the officials investigating this matter had a specific individual in mind. Is the minister aware of the name of that individual? Is the department investigating one particular individual? Do they think they know who it is?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Yes, Mr. Speaker, they know who it is, but I do not know who the person is. The RCMP know who the person is, but they will not divulge that information until they have sufficient evidence to lay appropriate charges.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHARGES LAID RESPECTING CRIMES COMMITTED BY PRISON INMATES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In light of the fact that we are now spending $2,575,000 on the Law Reform Commission and, in particular, they have recommended many prison reforms, in conjunction with a special committee, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a question in line with the question I asked as reported at page 2655 of Hansard. At that time I asked him about the murder of the warden at Archambault, Mr. Roy. Also, I asked him about the taking of hostages. Has anyone been charged in reference to that murder? What charges have been laid with reference to the hostage-taking incident at the British Columbia penitentiary?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with relation to the Archambault incident, investigation is on-going. In reply to the hon. member's question on the page which he cited, I will be pleased to look at that matter. In terms of the hostage-taking incident at the British Columbia penitentiary, that incident is the subject of a formal internal inquiry.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the estimates show $6 million for justice and legal affairs and that $2,575,000 is being spent on the Law Reform Commission, and nothing is implemented, I should like to ask the minister, who said that under the circumstances he did not have the answers at that time but he would get them almost immediately, whether he will give me an answer on what is being done in the penitentiary service of Canada to raise the morale of correctional officers and to protect inmates of the penitentiaries who are not charged with the kind of crimes which are causing trouble at the present time.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member had been here two Fridays ago, at the time we debated the report of the subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The matter was fully canvassed at that time and I indicated the progress that had been made.

Mr. Woolliams: But the minister has done nothing about it.

Mr. Blais: If the hon. member had been here more often in the past two or three weeks since my appointment, he would have heard me indicate quite readily that I will be discussing the progress of the recommendations of the subcommittee when we deal with the estimates in the very near future.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I offer my deepest sympathy to the Solicitor General because he is a disabled person: he must be blind. I have been here for months; I do not know where he has been. I am asking him to answer questions concerning his department. Will he now implement the recommendations of the subcommittee, and stop this tergiversation and procrastination that he is guilty of?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I may be blind, but I am not deaf.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PROGRESS REPORT ON HIGHWAY STRENGTHENING PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House whether he is still conducting negotiations with the governments of the four Atlantic provinces on his offer of a highway stengthening program? If so, what progress is being made? Will he state, also, the total amount of federal offer of assistance for this program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the federal offer was for a $100 million program. We are still discussing the matter with the provinces. Within the last few days I have written to the premiers asking them to give me a firm indication of their willingness to undertake cost-sharing on the highway construction which is envisaged in the program. I hope to receive affirmative replies from them in the very near future.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED CONNECTION BETWEEN WOMEN ON "THE PILL", CIGARETTE SMOKE AND HEART DISEASE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary. A little over a week ago, the federal Department of Health and Welfare announced, as a result of a study which had been done, that women aged 40 or over who are on the birth control pill were being subjected to the possibility of cardiovascular disease if they were unduly exposed to cigarette smoke, or nicotine in any room, whether it was in a public room, a committee room, a living-room, and so on. Now that this fear has spread across the country, I would like to know what follow-up the government has done to prevent this kind of situation.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It is my understanding that smoking adversely affects the heart of all people, not just those over the age of 40 who happen to be on the pill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson: I am talking about the females referred to by the hon. member, and not necessarily males. I understand a statement was made by the Department of National Health and Welfare on this matter. I will endeavour to follow up on it and find out what has taken place.

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT DRAW ON LINE OF CREDIT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My question is for the Minister of Finance, who developed the curious view that the change in the value of the dollar yesterday was the fault of the hon. member for Central Nova. Since the dollar fell again today, I presume he is going to blame that on the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway or perhaps on the performance of the Minister of National Revenue.

My question to the minister is as follows: Earlier today, when he was asked the extent of the draw upon the line of credit, he told the House of Commons—if I am quoting him correctly—that he was not in a position to comment. Can he tell us now whether that was because he does not know, or because as a matter of policy he declines to tell the House of Commons?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): It is because I do not think I can reveal it until the final undertaking has been agreed upon between the government and the banks.

Mr. Clark: As the minister will recognize, I am sure, one of the factors which has contributed substantially to the plunge in the value of the Canadian dollar—not only in relation to the American dollar but, for example, a plunge of nearly 38 per cent in relation to the Swiss franc, and dramatic drops in relation to other currencies—has been that the government has not been clear as to precisely what it is doing in relation to the Canadian dollar. Can the minister tell the House, with regard to this draw on the line of credit, the anticipated interest rates and the anticipated forms of repayment?

Mr. Chrétien: As I explained earlier in the House, we have agreed, with the banks, on a line of credit of $1.5 billion. The cost will be five-eighth's of 1 per cent above the agreed price in the interbank system in London.

Mr. Clark: I thank the minister for that answer. I want to turn to the very startling revelation made by the minister yesterday, to the effect that he is now engaged, at a time when he claims there is no crisis, in daily discussions with the governor of the Bank of Canada. In light of the fact that, by his own admission, these daily briefings or daily closetings between the governor and the minister took place in a period when there was no crisis, according to the minister, I should like to ask whether the briefings which occurred on Monday involved the minister being advised of the extensive and unusual interventions of the Bank of Canada which began that Monday afternoon?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I met the governor on Monday morning and we met again on Tuesday. On Wednesday, I was present at a lunch at which he was meeting the directors of the banks. That meeting was not held as a result of the situation of the dollar. I suppose I can accept an invitation from the governor, who is quite a gentleman. I just want to point out to the hon. member that he can read about the kind of irresponsible statements that sometimes are made from the other side. It appeared on the front page of this morning's Gazette: the story comes from Toronto and reports a rumour which was started in London, England.

Mr. Clark: I am quite concerned about the effect of rumours on the value of the Canadian dollar. Precisely because of the effect of rumours, I want—and the parliament of Canada wants—the government to come clean on exactly what it is doing, and to stop pretending there is no crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the minister, which is simple and quite important, is this: when he began this series of extraordinary meetings with the governor of the Bank of Canada on Monday morning, was he informed of the very unusual activity of the Bank of Canada which began on the afternoon of the day of the meetings between the minister and the governor? Did he know about the extensive activities of the bank to support the dollar? Yes or no?

Mr. Chrétien: I cannot reveal the conversation I had with the governor, but I would like to inform the hon. member that the meeting which I had on Monday morning was one that I have every week with the governor—in the morning, mostly on Mondays. On Tuesday morning we had a special meeting, but I have nothing else to report at this moment. I have said exactly what we were doing. I have explained that we decided, because of the balance of payments problem, that we would go to foreign markets to borrow money, and that in the interim we would draw on the arrangement we made some months ago—which was made public in the House—with a group of Canadian banks.

Mr. Gillies: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—NOTICE RESPECTING QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—ALLEGATION MINISTER MISLED HOUSE DELIBERATELY

Mr. Speaker: I have received a notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). The notice itself raises some procedural problems, some of which were raised when the hon. member rose during the question period today on a question of privilege because of a reference by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I presume, to remarks made last night by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

The notice that has been given to the Chair by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is as follows:

> Your Honour,
> Please accept this as notice that I intend to raise today at 3 p.m. a question of privilege respecting the manner in which the Minister of Finance deliberately misled the House on Monday and Tuesday of this week, as indicated in his speech to the House last evening, February 22.

Therefore, the first problem I have to deal with, which may relate to the question raised by the hon. member today in reference to the remark made by the Minister of Finance which referred back to the hon. member's speech last evening in which the same phrase "deliberately misled" was used, is that that phrase flies directly in the face of precedents that are clearly established, that it is unparliamentary language and cannot be used by a member in this House. The reference is at page 131 of Beauchesne, citation 155(3).

In addition, I have a body of numerous references which are set out in clear and concise language by several Speakers. One I can take at random is as follows:

> The hon. member for Cape Breton knows that he cannot say that another hon. member has lied to the House—that is elementary.

There are many rules which are being disregarded in the House, and just as many rules were being disregarded yesterday, but we must draw the line, and I cannot and would not want to allow an hon. member to say of another member that he has lied to the House. An hon. member cannot say of another hon. member that he has deliberately misled the House. He can say that the remarks made are perhaps incorrect, but he cannot say he has deliberately misled the House.

In light of the fact that the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham last night, referred to today by the Minister of Finance, and his notice today appear to fly in the face of precedents, and therefore are out of order, we have to begin by settling that procedural question first, and unless there is some argument which the hon. member can make now which would permit him to be excused from all those precedents and to use that language, when no other member has been permitted to use it in the past, I would have to find that his remarks last evening were out of order and that his notice today is out of order. Perhaps we should begin with that argument before we go on to anything else.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I appreciate your remarks, Sir, and certainly as a member of the House I would not want to get turfed out by your edict or anyone else's. But there is a difficulty here, Sir, and it may be compounded by at least one of your own rulings. It is simply this. There are those of us on this side of the House at least, and I suspect perhaps not just confined to this side of the House, who believe that some of the things that have been said in the House about actions, activities and inactivities in respect of the dollar crisis, have not been the full truth. There may have been evasions or there may not have been evasions—we do not know—but one way of attempting to find out is to check the very obvious contradictions that have appeared in the record and to find out if some of the very obvious contradictions can be borne out one way or the other.

There can be no argument that there have been contradictions. I am fully prepared now to give at least one very obvious contradiction, and I have a motion prepared to do just that, but to be able to get to the bottom of some of those contradictions this is not the forum in which to do it. We would have to have the matter referred to a committee. In a case such as this—and I am quite open about it; this was my motive completely—the only committee I feel this matter could be referred to on a matter such as this where there are obvious contradictions by a minister of the Crown is the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Because of those contradictions the only way we on this side of the House would now have of raising the matter would be that hopefully a question of privilege would be raised by the other side. I think it is pertinent that that motion respecting privilege has not been made by the other side.

The reason an allegation of intent had to be made was because of a ruling from the Chair. I refer to April 19 of last year. As reported at page 4766 of Hansard, Your Honour made a ruling regarding a question of privilege. Your Honour was denying that a question of privilege had been properly raised, and in so doing this is what Your Honour said:

> If it is to be pursued by way of a question of privilege, I wish to stress again that in order to qualify as a question of privilege the Chair would have to find that not only had there been actions by the minister to mislead hon. members—

That is the allegation I am making. I made it in this House during question period, and I had to repeat it again last night.

> —but that those actions were calculated and deliberate by the minister for that purpose.

Sir, what sort of corner have you backed us into?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: The ruling of the Chair is that no one, on this type of statement which misleads members, can claim that he has a question of privilege unless he also claims that there has been a deliberate intention to mislead. On the other hand, according to the precedents—and I know them well—the Chair says that it is absolutely out of order for anyone to claim that someone has deliberately mislead the House. With respect to those two matters I believe that my privileges as a member of this House were grossly abridged because I was misled in this House by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) last Monday. The subsequent action the minister announced just 28 hours later was completely contracdictory to what he said he was going to do.

I feel that I was misled. If I was misled, my privileges and rights as a member of this House were abridged. Your Honour has said that the only way we can get that before a committee, where we could call the Governor of the Bank of Canada and where we could call members of the chartered banks of this country, is to claim that there was a deliberate intent to mislead. That is the explanation for what happened last night.

If Your Honour rules that I have to withdraw those words, I will not attempt to withdraw them in the mealy-mouthed fashion we have heard others withdraw in the last month. I will unequivocally and absolutely withdraw those words. However, I must say that by virtue of Your Honour's own ruling and under these circumstances where there is no other opportunity, in my mind, for hon. members to get to the truth of these contradictory statements by the Minister of Finance, there was no other way I know of to get the matter before that committee. Your Honour may feel that I am unfairly blaming you.

Some hon. Members: You are.

Mr. Lawrence: However, I am sure Your Honour can appreciate the dilemma we are in. I have stated my motive. There is no question of what I did and how I did it, and I would certainly be willing to withdraw allegations of intent and deliberateness on the part of the minister if you so rule.

I still feel that no matter what type of technical language has to be used in this House, in my heart and in my mind—and I am not alone—I feel I have been misled. Knowing that, the only way we can get to the truth of the matter is to get the matter before a committee of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I gave the hon. member the floor today although I could have peremptorily ruled that his remarks were unparliamentary and that they had to be withdrawn. The reason I gave him the floor on this initial problem is, as one hon. member said just a moment ago, there is a danger that it is a Catch-22 situation.

The argument put forward with all our able advisers over the last couple of hours is that it has been ruled in the past to be unparliamentary to make this kind of allegation in this language, but what happens in other situations when someone wants to bring to parliament that kind of situation in respectful terms in order to bring it to the attention of the House? If that is the case, without settling the merits I would have to hear some arguments as to whether that matter becomes procedurally barred because, if it does, it does in fact have the appearance of a Catch-22 situation. That is why I wanted to address myself primarily to the procedural problem, first of all, of whether this matter can be put forward in the terms in which the hon. member has sought to do so. I think he has given a very clear explanation of his motivation.

I may still have to come to the same decision, but I wanted to indicate that I had gone over the same argument, in my mind, as the hon. member has done, and there may be other hon. members who want to contribute to this argument now. However, it is a very serious procedural matter about which I would not expect to hear from hon. members unless they had had an opportunity to address themselves to the precedents with a focus on this particular aspect of the problem.

I think I should also add that I have not said from the Chair that this is the only way the matter can be approached. I said that unless this is done it certainly would not begin to qualify as a question of privilege. However, there are other procedural ways of doing the same thing, and they would have to be considered. However, I certainly would want hon. members, particularly those who have an interest in procedure, to have an opportunity to examine the precedents and to give me some assistance on whether a matter can be raised in these terms in order to have it discussed in the House, without being unparliamentary. If it cannot, we must at least know that there is some other procedure whereby matters of this kind can be brought to the floor of the House. Perhaps other hon. members wish to contribute.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have read the words of the hon. member. Other things happened while he was speaking which are not written. They are on film.

The words of the hon. member have to be withdrawn. The rules are clear. I do not have to go into that. The hon. member said I lied. He used words such as "deliberately", "intentionally", "overtly" and "openly". I have not lied to the House. I reported the facts as they were on Monday and on Tuesday, and I have nothing to add.

The charges of the hon. member are not true. They are not parliamentary, and I insist he withdraw them entirely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1522)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the minister leaped over the issue that you left with us just a few moments ago to decide after the argument put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Quite frankly I think you put the cart in the proper place in relation to the horse in this matter. I would respectfully ask that you grant the opportunity that you mentioned in your earlier statements for the matter to proceed in an orderly way because of the very situation that you put so well when you used the words "Catch 22". I would ask, therefore, that the matter be reserved so that it can be argued completely and fully and the precedents settled.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have one comment to make. I have no quarrel with the necessity for research to be done or further consideration given to the general question of privilege. It seems to me, however, that it is quite unacceptable to suggest that the words uttered by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) should be allowed to sit for 24 hours or 48 hours, or for one instant—

An hon. Member: Let the committee decide.

Mr. MacEachen: —and those words not be withdrawn under the procedures of this House.

There is no precedent to my knowledge, and I would like one to be turned up, whereby an hon. member has been permitted to say that another member has lied or has deliberately misled the House and the matter has been allowed to rest pending research into the precedents. The precedents are absolutely clear. We all can mislead the House, and it often happens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: For example, I feel that in the debate on the northern pipeline which has gone on for eight days there have been many misleading statements. I believe that; that is debate. Contradictions occur in the statements of individuals and parties, and that is debate. But there is a line, and the line is when an hon. member says "You misled," and the line is passed when he says "You deliberately misled the House" or that you lied. That cannot be allowed to stand for an instant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the remarks just referred to by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) were made last evening by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), a point of order was raised which was quite properly taken by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery).

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has said today that if there was some defiance on this point, it would have to come to deliberation at this moment. I think I have exposed the procedural difficulty that is involved. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has already indicated that if in fact the precedents which I have said at the start are very clear, are to be followed, he will certainly withdraw, unequivocally, the remarks. Had he taken a different position today I think I probably would have had to make a determination, but in light of that I think no harm is done if I leave the matter until Monday until I can look into it further.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, we are really dealing with two separate matters. You have a notice before you in respect of another matter. I should honestly like to assist you and myself on this matter so I am quite willing right now to withdraw unequivocally those words indicating any deliberation or intent on the part of the Minister of Finance. There is no question there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Another matter has been brought to your attention, however. I do not mean what took place just a few moments ago or perhaps twenty minutes ago in the House. I refer to the notice that I gave you earlier. This, as well, touches on the procedural matter which was my initial motivation for even indicating what I had to do yesterday, both in the House when the minister was here—and he took no objection at that time—and later in the evening. I have a motion to make which I gave you notice of this morning. I think, sir, if you took this one under advisement, now that I have withdrawn anything that would touch the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I only interrupt the hon. member briefly. Part of the difficulty that I find myself in, and the reason I have given the House this opportunity, is because the notice the hon. member gave to me uses the word "deliberate." Before I can take into account the question of privilege, therefore, the hon. member would not only have to withdraw the remarks made last night but would have to withdraw the word "deliberate" in the notice before I can deal with it.

This is the reason I was putting the matter into discussion. If it was out of order last night and it appears to me clearly to be, it is equally out of order to use the word "deliberate" in the notice. If the notice is out of order, then I cannot take into account the hon. member's question of privilege. If he is going to withdraw the remarks he made last night now, instead of doing so on Monday, I would have to ask him to take the word "deliberate" out of the notice. I might then be able to come to the merits of the question of privilege which has another set of problems altogether.

Mr. Lawrence: Sir, by withdrawing the word "deliberate" in that particular case are we not all caught on the horns of a dilemma, according to your ruling of April, 1977? The only way we are going to get the question of deliberate misleading in this House settled is by including it in something or other.

Surely if the hon. minister is that intent and that upset, as he so obviously is, in respect of what was said last night, it could be left over until Monday or Tuesday while the motion, which perhaps is in more polite terms, is moved in this House. I have sent a copy to you and I have other copies for leaders in the House if they could be delivered. May I move—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants to commit himself to the form of some motion right now, that is up to him. At this stage the motion has no official status except to be an indication of what the hon. member would move if he had the permission of the House. My strong recommendation would be that it await a procedural analysis.

I think, for the benefit of the record, that the House is very well served if we consider that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has—as he has just said—taken up his previous offer and in fact withdrawn unequivocally the remarks he made last night. I see the assent of the hon. member. He made it unequivocal. That matter, having been withdrawn in unequivocal terms, is settled. It is disorder as it occurred last night. It has now been withdrawn and that matter has been resolved.

The question of the language is still in focus. I think it should be, because the notice given to the Chair on the question of privilege contains the word "deliberate." I think I have to address myself to that procedural problem which may be a road block in face of the earlier ruling. I think if I resolve the two, at the same time I ought to endeavour to indicate, if this course of action is not open, what course of action is open. I think that ought to be done after careful examination.

MR. LAWRENCE—REMARK BY MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I am sorry to rise again, sir, but it is on a completely separate question of privilege, the one that came up at the beginning of the question period today. I rise again more in sorrow than in anger.

I suppose at times everyone in this House under extreme pressure says things they do not really mean or do not really intend. There is a very clear imputation that, because I said what I said last night, I was not sober, i.e., I was drunk. There is a very clear imputation of that. There is no question about that at all. That was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the House just a few moments ago.

The reason I say I rise more in sorrow than anger is not so much for myself. I have been insulted in far better terms than that, in far better ways than that, by far better people. But when the chief financial officer of this country, under pressure, lashes out with a personal attack such as that, it does not bode good for this country or this administration. It is unparliamentary.

We have all lashed out at times. Obviously I have lashed out at times. However, I have never in my life attempted to lash out in a personal way such as that. If I have lashed out in terms uncomplimentary to anyone in public life or in private life, but especially in public life, it has been related to the public performance of the duties of that person.

I have called the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) incompetent. I have not called him drunk. I have not said to him that he has lacked sobriety in this House. I merely say to you today, Mr. Speaker, that I think that was uncalled for. I believe it to be uncomplimentary. Whether it is or is not, it does not call for a full apology. I merely say to you, sir, and through you to the Minister of Finance, that he is getting his dates and getting his parties mixed up. It is another group that was going to countenance and advocate drinking in the halls of this parliament, not this one.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had left the House before the hon. member made his speech. As reported at page 3173 of Hansard he stated "When you have a floating dollar, you have a floating dollar". At that time he made some slur about the way I speak English and a physical defect which the good Lord has put on me. I do speak out of the side of my mouth. However, I am not like the Tories who speak out of both sides of their mouths.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I was not here, but one of my colleagues told me his conduct at that moment was disgusting. That is unfair, because with the television cameras it can be seen by everyone. I hope he was not serious when he did that. That is why I referred to the word sober, that he was trying to make a joke of that. That is why I referred to that. I have lived with this problem for some years. I am not too preoccupied with it. The hon. member should not have acted in that fashion in the House of Commons. It is certainly not acceptable, in my judgment, and in the judgment of members who were in the House at that time. Some members from this side advised me that his conduct was unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no authority on procedural grounds that I am aware of at the moment for the Chair to make any further intervention in this matter.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the usual House question today in anticipation of the fact that we will likely be finishing the second reading of the pipeline debate today. As far as this party is concerned, that debate is completed. What is the intention of the government in terms of advancing other legislation and the order thereof? While the minister is on his feet, will he designate next Thursday, March 2, as an allotted day, in accordance with our understanding?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am quite agreeable to designating next Thursday as an allotted day. Following the completion of the pipeline debate, as I understand the order of business we will then deal with the Bank Act extension and CNR recapitalization bill. Following that it will be my intention to take the bill dealing with the office of comptroller general, then the bill dealing with amendments to the Post Office and the Narcotics Control Act. While on my feet I should advise hon. members that it is my intention at some point to put a motion on the order paper providing for an Easter break of the usual length, from the Wednesday preceding Good Friday until a week from Easter Monday.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion between others, certainly not between my friend and I, with respect to a piece of legislation that is not on the order paper, purportedly to be introduced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) dealing with World War I prisoners, escapees and evaders, somehow making it retroactive for those who will qualify. Has the minister had discussion with his colleague on this? If so, in order to bring that bill forward, because the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have been working on it for a long time, will he accept as an undertaking from this side, in order to speed up consideration, that we are prepared to have first reading and second reading debate with reference to the committee in one day, and with one speaker from each party?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the understanding he is presenting with respect to the bill that will appear, I expect, in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I have had discussion with the minister and it is his intention to bring forward the bill as early as possible. Maybe we can deal with it on Tuesday of next week, earlier if possible, but that is the date suggested to me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the minister knows, Mr. Speaker, there had been some discussions as to the possibility of dealing with that prisoner of war legislation this evening, but we understood it was put off until next week. In order to ensure that it is proceeded with early next week, could notice of that bill be filed today? While on my feet, I can confirm the arrangement that the official opposition House leader has mentioned, namely, that we are prepared to deal with that bill at second reading on the basis of one speaker per party.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member. Can he also confirm the other arrangement proposed by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that we will complete the second reading of the bill presently being debated this afternoon?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The universe will unfold as it should.

SPORTS

TABLING OF HOCKEY COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table, in both official languages, the report by the Committee on International Hockey. I would like to thank the members of all parties in the House who gave of their time and talent to the research and preparation of this non-partisan report.

PETITIONS

SECURITY, IMMIGRATION, AND PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the eighth report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and finds that it does not meet with requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

I might say, in addition to some difficulties with form, and there were more than one, there was one quite serious difficulty as to substance in that the document had appended to it a number of documents which do not form part of the petition. As well, there appeared to be an affidavit by an alien who is not a resident of Canada. There were several difficulties with the petition in a substantive way, but in any case it was not proper as to form, and the matter is therefore resolved by the report of the Clerk of Petitions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Translation]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 255, 258, 523, 700, 703, 901, 959, 980, 981 and 1,122.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

GOVERNMENT AID TO ALGERIA

Question No. 255—Mr. Epp:

1. In each year 1968 to 1976, was aid given by the government to the Government of Algeria and, if so, in what amount?

2. Has Algeria granted a safe haven to international hijackers and, if so, has the government placed any conditions on Algeria that no further aid will be forthcoming if Algeria does not end granting a safe haven to international hijackers and, if not, is the government contemplating such conditions?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. The Canadian Government has indicated its concern to the Government of Algeria and has underlined the Canadian position on air piracy. Canada has also expressed the hope that Algeria will become a cosignatory of the Hague and Montreal conventions on air piracy. Our representations were not accompanied by any threat of cutting financial aid to Algeria because Canada does not see this as a means of expressing disapproval. Concerning aid to development, Canada does not consider that it is in its interest to stop aid to Algeria because of the nature of Canada's aid programme which is designed to promote the economic and social development of the people concerned. In our view, it would not be right to use Canadian aid as a tool for rewarding or punishing a foreign country for its actions unless, of course, such actions have a detrimental effect on the aspirations of the peoples concerned for improved economic and social conditions.

In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. In each year 1968 to 1976 aid was given by the Government of Canada to the Government of Algeria as follows:

	($000) Loans	Grants	Food Aid	Total
1967-68	—	357.2	—	357.2
1968-69	—	296.3	3,000.0	3,296.3
1969-70	—	721.1	3,200.0	3,921.1
1970-71	130.4	1,021.7	2,900.0	4,052.1

FOREIGN AID IN CASH LOANS

Question No. 258—Mr. Whittaker:

1. Are any countries receiving aid in the form of cash loans from Canada and, if so, which ones?

2. Do any countries have outstanding debts owing to Canada and, if so (a) which countries and in what amount (b) which countries have had such debts converted to non-repayable grants since January 1, 1977?

3. (a) What was the total value of the foreign-aid debt cancellations in 1977 (b) what was the individual value, by country?

4. (a) Did Canada contribute to the fund set up by industrialized countries at the North-South Conference on International Economic Co-operation in Paris to ameliorate the condition of the developing countries and, if so, in what amount (b) was this contribution pledge presented to Parliament and, if so, in what manner?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the reply is as follows: 1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. (a) With reference to commercial loans made to countries pursuant to section 29 and 31 of the Export Development Act, these are detailed in the annual reports of the Export Development Corporation. In addition, the following countries have outstanding debts owed to Canada: Belgium, $2,300,000; United Kingdom, $909,300,000; France, $16,900,000; China, $49,400,000; Netherlands, $4,600,000; Greece, $6,400,000.

3. (a) Approximately $254 million, the actual value of which is $35 million. (b) A detailed breakdown of the loans by country is to be submitted to parliament in due course.

4. (a) At the Conference on International Economic Cooperation, Canada announced that it would contribute $51 million to the special action programme adopted by the conference to help meet the immediate needs of the poorer developing countries. Of this total, $35 million represents the actual value of the $254 million loan cancellation extended to least developed countries. The remaining $16 million will be split between two U.N. programmes, namely the UNDP (up to $3 million) and UNICEF (up to $2 million), and the International Development Association (IDA). (b) The proposed contribution will be submitted to parliament later in the session.

In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. See list below.

2. (a) See list below. (b) Nil.

3. (a) Nil. (b) Nil.

4. To be answered elsewhere.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this bill this afternoon I want to outline as clearly as I possibly can the reasons why my colleagues and myself cannot accept this legislation in its present form.

The New Democratic Party has an interest in this project. We were the first political party in Canada to talk about the Alcan pipeline as being the most desirable in principle, if and when we developed the means of facilitating our American neighbours and thereby transporting American gas from Alaska to their southern markets. And, coincidentally we could provide a facility to be used in the future for transporting Canadian energy reserves from our north to the south as well.

A year ago this month the New Democratic Party said that, of all the proposals under consideration, the Alcan proposal made the most sense. The Arctic Gas proposal and the El Paso proposal had very formidable arguments to be made against them. I will not repeat those arguments now. The Alcan route, if properly implemented, had some significant advantages. It would provide for the future possibility of bringing Canadian gas to Canadian markets and thus meet Canadian needs. It was, in comparison with the other alternatives, much more desirable in terms of coping with serious issues, including native rights and environmental concerns.

This particular proposal had major benefits for the United States, and I wish to stress that. Members of my party, as with all members of the House, believe it is a normal duty for a neighbour to facilitate another neighbour whenever possible. Therefore we were entirely sympathetic toward the development of the best means, from a Canadian point of view, to aid our American neighbours in getting gas to their markets.

Before I reach the substantive benefits for Canada in this Alcan proposal I want to make it clear that this route has, as its overwhelming purpose, benefits for the United States. We should not forget that. In deciding on the Alcan route we were of course making it possible for the Americans to bring their gas from the north to the south. More particularly, in comparison to the alternatives open to the Americans, the Alcan route is some $6 billion cheaper than the El Paso route would have been. In comparison with the Arctic gas route it is an even greater saving for the Americans. Therefore there is a major financial advantage of some $6 billion accruing to the Americans because of this proposal. By using the Alcan route the Americans will avoid a major environmental hazard of significant proportions which would have existed had they chosen the El Paso route, and which would have been inflicted upon the west coast of the United States. In choosing the Alcan route we head off that serious concern in terms of human decency and in terms of financial cost for our American neighbours.

This Alcan proposal meets with the central recommendation of the American department of defence. That department was strongly in favour of a continental route, and strongly in favour of ensuring that gas from Alaska was transported to the United States by means of a route which would have the minimum security risk in the event of a war. Obviously to send gas by tankers via the west coast, would leave their energy lines far more vulnerable to attack.

There are four important considerations to the Alcan proposal which we are debating today, and have been debating for some days, which meet American requirements. They obtain gas, it saves them $6 billion, removes an environmental risk, and it meets their military requirements; all very substantial indeed.

What are we going to get out of it as a country? About the only benefit of significance that will accrue to the people of Canada from the Alcan proposal is jobs, jobs that would accrue in the manufacturing of the pipe, in the manufacturing of steel, and jobs that would accrue on the construction site itself. In terms of these implications it is not simply Stelco, Welland, and Ipsco in Regina, it is also the other part of the steel industry in Hamilton, and in Sydney, Nova Scotia, and a component industry in Port Coquitlam in British Columbia which would benefit. In other words, if Canada received what my party believes it should receive as a minimum, that is, the guarantee of labour needed to produce the steel, the labour needed to construct the pipeline for all of the portion of the pipeline in Canada, then the benefits would have been substantial. It would also have a beneficial effect on most of the provinces right across the country, directly and indirectly.

When the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. MacEachen) reported last September 9, after negotiations with the United States, that the Government of Canada had agreed on the Alcan route, on behalf of my colleagues I said, and said with pleasure, that I agreed to the proposal that it would produce a substantial number of jobs, as it was described by the Deputy Prime Minister. He assured us at that time, and had statistics to prove it, that the minimum Canadians would get from this project would be 100,000 man-years in jobs. Well, that is a lot of jobs, particularly at a time when a million and half in real numbers are unemployed.

Almost within days of this announcement doubts began to be raised concerning the credibility of the minister's promises. I repeat the minister did not say that we might get, we could get, or if possible we should get 100,000 man-years; he said with great assurance and confidence on September 9 that Canadians would get 100,000 man-years in jobs.

● (1552)

On behalf of myself, my research staff talked with the commissioner in charge of this project in order to receive a breakdown of this estimate. The minister has refused either to deny or confirm the estimate. Perhaps sometime today the minister will let the House know about the accuracy of this contention. The commissioner in charge of the project indicated that the job estimate was based on Canada receiving 98 per cent, and not 90 per cent, of the orders for the steel necessary for the construction of the Canadian portion of the pipeline. Without that 98 per cent, we would not receive the 100,000 man-years in jobs promised by the minister. Shortly after we received that promise, we had some doubt because of the information given to us by the commissioner. We heard there would be no written guarantees in the legislation.

When the treaty came out and we saw the legislation, we realized there was no guarantee of jobs for Canadians. Actually we looked for that commitment, among other things. As other hon. members have pointed out during the course of this debate, the legislation has the treaty embodied in it. That makes sense. At least there is some logical consistency. The crucial portion of the treaty was clause 7, which is the sellout clause in terms of Canadian interest.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Mr. Broadbent: I hear the hon. member agreeing with what I am saying. I hope he keeps that in mind when he votes later today.

Clause 7 of the treaty should have provided Canadians with an exclusive right to the production of steel and the construction of the pipeline, but there is no such provision. In fact that clause is almost exactly the opposite. The provision in clause 7 indicates that if Canadians are fortunate enough, in terms of meeting international competition, they will have the legal right to compete in order to get jobs on the Canadian portion of the pipeline.

Because of the pipeline, the Americans will save $6 billion, lessen environmental risk to their west coast, and will have their defence needs met. The minister negotiated for Canadians to have the right to do work on the pipeline after world competition. I consider that clause to be a sellout clause. It was produced by a minister who sold out the interests of Canadian workers, when the treaty was negotiated. All negotiations involve a little give and take. Throughout our history, whenever Liberals do negotiating on behalf of Canadians, Canadians do the giving and Americans do the taking. This legislation is a beautiful example of that.

I am somewhat concerned about what has been indicated by the official opposition. The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) can argue with brilliant legalistic persuasion on both sides of any cause. He outdid himself in this debate. He devoted half of his time to attacking the New Democratic Party, which I found curious. My party was the first party which advocated this pipeline route. We have remained consistent by indicating that Canadians should receive the jobs to which they are entitled. Instead of zeroing in on the government, he spent the first half of his speech attacking my party. Having done that, then he proceeded to point out the faults in the bill. That is a perfect example of bad conscience. I will not bore the House or the hon. member by quoting his words. Hearing them once was bad enough. He went on at great length to indicate what a deplorable piece of legislation this was. He concluded his speech by saying that of course the Conservative party would vote for it.

Mr. Paproski: After it is amended.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, that was the position. I do not want to quote just the hon. member for the Yukon. I give credit to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who comes from a steel community. He was in on the issue early. He indicated what was involved as a possible benefit for Canada in terms of jobs. Like hon. members of the New Democratic Party, he stressed the positive possibilities. I wish he would take a consistent position, as hon. members of my party do. Then when the hon. member for Hamilton West saw the bill, he was horrified and had some rather uncomplimentary things to say about the government. He indicated that what was involved was "a sellout to the American consumer at the expense of Canadian steelworkers and jobs for Canadians."

Also he indicated that there should be guarantees in order to protect the interests of our steel industry and those who provide goods and services, which play a major part in this pipeline. He went on to say that there had to be such guarantees before this piece of legislation would be worthy of support. I am not frequently persuaded by the arguments of the hon. member for Hamilton West. We differ quite often, but in this instance I found his logic rather cogent and his argument sound. This legislation, without guarantees, is certainly unworthy of support.

I want to say to the hon. member for Hamilton West, the hon. member for the Yukon, and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), as well as to all other Conservative members who have opposed this bill, that their arguments are sound. I hope when my party votes against this bill that those hon. members will join with us in voting against a piece of legislation which is a sellout of Canadian interests.

I have some fresh details which I should like to add to the debate. The government has made the argument that the Canadian steel industry is efficient, modern, and competent. Indeed it is. In fact it is one of the few sectors in the manufacturing end of things which is of world quality. The Canadian steel industry deserves a lot of credit for having entrepreneurial initiative, and for knowing when to renew its capital equipment. That industry is a credit to the country. It shows us the modern industrial base that can be created in Canada.

However, the conclusion drawn from this by the government, simply because they are competitive and efficient, is that we should blindly assume that that industry will receive the orders. We should assume that it will follow, as night follows day, that jobs will inevitably occur in the communities I referred to earlier in my speech. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that does not necessarily follow at all, and I will give six interconnected reasons for Canadians right now being skeptical about the possibility of getting anywhere near the number of jobs the Deputy Prime Minister has said we will get.

● (1602)

First, I refer the Deputy Prime Minister to a study that was done by an interdepartmental committee in the United States, a study which the minister said the other day he had not read, when I mentioned it out in the question period. In that study the U.S. authorities claim that, in their view at least, 30 per cent of the business for the Canadian portion of the pipeline will go to the United States. That is considerably more than the minister has contended. That is not a study produced by the NDP or by some fly-by-night organization, but one produced by an interdepartmental committee of the United States.

Second—and I mentioned this to the minister a long time ago—the Bank of America in the United States has been running adds, not simply in the Wall Street Journal, which I know the minister reads with interest, but in many cases right across the United States. The assumption of the Bank of America is exactly the same as that of the interdepartmental committee, that they anticipate that at least 30 per cent of the business for the Canadian portion of the pipeline will go to the United States.

Third, if the minister is not persuaded by the Americans, as he usually is—they usually do an effective job on him and then they tell him what a tough negotiator he is, and when the Americans tell him what a good job he has done, then we can be sure we have lost completely—then I refer him to one of his own department's studies. DREE did a study for the government on this pipeline in which they said that unless there were assurances about jobs we would get nowhere near the number of jobs the minister has been promising. In fact the part of the estimates on which the minister has been relying for his job prognostications is what DREE called "the wish book", which the Deputy Prime Minister has inflicted upon Canada as being a guarantee for Canadian jobs.

This is what the study said:

Unless there are effective controls ensuring Canadian content, 67 per cent may be a more realistic projection.

That is 67 per cent only of the jobs, not anywhere near the 90 per cent to 98 per cent, depending on which figure the minister deems to be appropriate at the time, which he has been promising the people of Canada.

Some people might ask what is the difference between 67 per cent and what the minister has promised. It involves about $600 million worth of business less than the minister has been telling Canadians we will get. If you translate the $600 million into jobs, it could mean we will get thousands fewer jobs, according to the DREE study, than the minister has said we will get. So we are not talking about a handful of dollars or a mere scattering of jobs; we are talking about thousands of jobs and hundreds of millions of dollars about which the minister had been warned by a department of which he should know something.

Fourth, when we are talking about the competitive situation and how likely we are to get these jobs in Canada, we have to consider the state of the world's steel industry, the very people with whom we will be competing. As even the minister should probably know by now, demand has fallen off very considerably throughout the world in terms of steel, but simultaneously capacity in the steel producing countries has grown considerably.

Excess steel supplies have caused world prices to tumble all over, driving many producers into the red. For example, the five largest Japanese steel companies reported combined losses of over $300 million in the first six months of the fiscal year ending in September of last year. A similar situation exists with the British steel industry. The reality is that the steel industry in Japan, in Britain, in the United States, and in Italy, is in a state of slump. It is looking for new markets and it will be concentrating on the Alcan project as a major instrument of bailing itself out.

I should like to quote two of the principals involved in this whole issue, the heads of companies in Canada. The minister is fond of saying the steel industry is confident so why is the NDP not confident? I repeat that we are confident about the steel industry in Canada; we just have no confidence in the government.

Mr. John Allen, president of Stelco, said recently:

The realities of the current world steel environment are such that Canadian producers will have to fight as never before for future orders and overcome fierce competition from overseas manufacturers, most of whom operate in countries whose governments use their industrial infrastructures as an employment-providing or foreign-exchange-generating mechanism.

Not long ago I met Mr. Jim MacLennan, president of Ipsco, and discussed the situation with him. He made essentially the same point, and in fact went on the record on the night that the National Energy Board made its ruling on the size of the pipe. I heard him on the radio, and I am sure he was on television the same night, saying he has a great deal of concern about the Japanese, the Italians and other steel makers in the world, getting contracts. He spoke with confidence, as he should have, about his own company, because it has done a damn good job, just as Mr. John Allen, head of Stelco, spoke with confidence about his own company. But neither of these individuals underestimate the problems that will occur for Canada in getting those contracts, in a world community in which the steel industry is now operating way under capacity and is looking for new orders.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) dealt most specifically with the problem of competition. He dealt most specifically with the variety of means open to other companies in other countries to undercut the Canadian suppliers. A whole variety of methods can be used to undercut the competitive regulation which is supposed to be in the legislation. I appeal to the Deputy Prime Minister to consider this argument when he winds up the debate.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), speaking in the debate on Monday, February 20, replied to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I was astounded to read his speech and I am totally convinced the minister made a mistake when he read the notes that were prepared for him by his department, because in one paragraph he put forward an argument which he withdrew completely in the next. I refer the Deputy Prime Minister to page 3035 in Hansard. It is at this point that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is trying to deal with the fundamental argument which is now of concern to the leaders of the steel industry in Canada and to members of the NDP, that is, the problem of assessing what fair competition is in reaching a decision about which companies in which parts of the world are going to get contracts. This is what he said in terms of dealing with state subsidies, special tax concessions of the kind, for example, that DISC provides in the United States:

> Action under the Anti-dumping Act could be taken in cases where exports into Canada are financed under more favourable terms than are available to the foreign manufacturer for its domestic sales. Under regulation (11A) of the anti-dumping regulations, credit and other financing terms can be taken into account in determining the normal value, export price, and, hence, the margins of dumping under the meaning of the act.

● (1612)

That quote, if left alone, might persuade a number of people in this House. People might say that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has shown that we have regulations which will really protect the Canadian steel industry from unfair competition. However, the minister went on, and as sure as I stand here I am totally convinced the minister made a mistake. I think he was reading a note from one of his officials about the problem associated with this, because this is how the minister continued:

> It should be noted that neither (11A) of the anti-dumping regulations nor the imposition of countervailing duties for reasons of export financing subsidies, appear to have been tested as yet. Moreover, the anti-dumping option would really only come into play after the fact, which renders its use, other than as a threat mechanism, somewhat ineffective.

The Deputy Prime Minister looked concerned when I read that to him, and well he should, because in the words of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce there is a complete undermining of the government's argument that we are going to be protected. What the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said is that the very provisions of the Anti-dumping Act in section (11A) are going to be ineffective. He was saying that they have not as yet been tested and that with regard to the Alcan pipeline they would become operative only after the fact. Does this mean that after we buy the pipe and lay it—whether we buy it from Italy, Japan or some other country which might win in the bidding—only then can the government go back and say, "Too bad, fellows, you violated our anti-dumping legislation"?

I repeat what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

> Moreover, the anti-dumping option would really only come into play after the fact, which renders its use, other than as a threat mechanism, somewhat ineffective.

That was not said by a member of the opposition, it was said by a minister of the Crown, and to me it is the most damning argument which has been presented on the matter of competitiveness. I hope the Deputy Prime Minister will deal with that issue when he speaks.

With regard to being optimistic that Canadians will get the jobs in a competitive situation, the minister said that the Canadian steel industry is competitive. We think it is competitive, but who got the contracts for building the American pipeline in Alaska? Was it the Canadian steel industry or the American steel industry? Not at all. It was the Japanese steel industry. I do not know why the minister is so convinced that we will automatically get the contracts to produce the pipe when, for a similar project in Alaska, the Japanese, not the Canadians or the Americans, got the contracts. Surely that should give even the minister reason to pause and not be so acquiescent and optimistic about jobs.

Financial experts are now saying that Foothills will find it easier and cheaper to finance the project if more pipe, equipment and services are purchased offshore than originally planned. Lacking government financial backstopping which would have increased security and lowered debt costs, the consortium may be forced to minimize debt costs as much as possible to ensure debt and equity financing. One obvious way of achieving this would be to take advantage of less expensive foreign export financing which often accompanies foreign purchases.

If the consortium attempts to raise funds abroad, perhaps either in Japan or Europe, in the face of financing difficulties here in North America, it could well expect demands by foreign bankers and other foreign investors that the project use foreign funds to purchase foreign goods and services. In other words, if Foothills is going to get assistance in financing this massive project, which will cost anywhere from $10 billion to $14 billion, the source of those funds, whether continental Europe or Japan, could well insist that a good part of that money be used to purchase equipment in those countries. This is not a concern expressed only by the New Democratic Party.

I want to read to the minister from a confidential report prepared by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With direct reference to this problem of financing abroad, and therefore buying steel abroad, the report says the following:

> The Canadian content actually achieved could vary substantially from estimates because of competitive pricing conditions, tied and concessional financing, government monitoring, corporate attitudes, and other factors.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce seems quite concerned about tied and concessional financing arrangements which could be made by Foothills in and with other countries.

I have tried to put on the record some interconnected reasons why we are not all acquiescent or optimistic about the number of jobs which will come to Canada because of our strong competitive steel industry. There is every reason to believe that other companies in other parts of the world will get a substantial piece of the action.

An interdepartmental committee in the United States, DREE here in Canada, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and heads of companies in the steel industry here in Canada have all expressed the same concern. Only the Liberal Government of Canada, which was taken to the cleaners in negotiations, is saying that we are going to get 100,000 man-years in jobs. That is rubbish, and all experts in the field know it is rubbish.

The only way we can be guaranteed that we will get the jobs Canadians deserve is to make provision for that in this legislation. I want to repeat that I refer not just to jobs at Ipsco or Stelco. There would be a spin-off effect. If we were to get the contract, jobs would be created in Sydney, Nova Scotia; Sault Ste. Marie and in Port Coquitlam. Jobs would be spread right across the country. The only way we will get jobs in the numbers we ought to get them—because the Americans will get plenty as a result of the agreement—is to have embedded in this legislation guarantees that Canadian workers, wherever possible, will produce the steel for the Canadian part of this project.

I want to say in advance that I will be moving an amendment. If the amendment carries, we will be delighted to support this legislation. If it does not carry, we will regretfully have to vote against a project which could have been a project of monumental significance to the people of Canada.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That Bill C-25 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Special Committee on a Northern Pipeline with instruction that the said committee give consideration to the making of recommendations for the inclusion in the said bill of guarantees that all of the pipe for the pipeline the production of which is possible in Canada be produced in this country, in order to assure the attainment of the principal Canadian benefit from this pipeline, namely, jobs for Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that we take this amendment under advisement and continue with the debate.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I remind hon. members that if the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) speaks now, he closes the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not on an amendment.

● (1622)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order on the amendment. I do not think this amendment is acceptable on second reading. I think the amendment has not been put before the House. If I speak I clearly understand I am speaking on the main motion, so I would have to clarify the situation or continue the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is moved by Mr. Broadbent and seconded by Mr. Peters:

That Bill C-25 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Special Committee on a Northern Pipeline with instruction that the said committee give consideration to the making of recommendations for the inclusion in the said bill of guarantees that all of the pipe for the pipeline the production of which is possible in Canada be produced in this country, in order to assure the attainment of the principal Canadian benefit from this pipeline, namely, jobs for Canadians.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt said motion?

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am going to intervene very briefly to point out the irresponsibility of this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Hypocrite.

Mr. Nielsen: What the New Democratic Party is doing is attempting to kill this bill. If that amendment should pass it would effectively kill the project.

An hon. Member: They do not care.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Two-faced again.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not know whether two faces is unparliamentary or not.

Mr. Broadbent: I do not care.

Mr. Nielsen: That party has adopted three different positions. First, it was going to be a filibuster, then it was going to be all troops thrown into the fray, and now comes the impractical suggestion inherent in this motion of amending the legislation to ratify an international agreement with which we are stuck—a poor agreement for all that—and this is an out and out attempt to kill the bill.

There are timetables which must be met, Mr. Speaker. This project is vital to the national interest, but if this irresponsible amendment were accepted it would go down the tube as a good many other advantages went down the tube during negotiations.

I want to make it clear that while we are after the same kind of guarantees that those on my left are after; the difference is in the method. We know that it must be done by legislation and we know that if the government is reasonable with respect to suggested amendments, it can be done by a monitoring agency of this House. There is the difference. The same guarantees can be procured by either method. The method in this amendment is impractical and out of order. No such amendment can be made to the bill. That is the question that should be taken up by the Chair and the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) should support me on this. It is out of order because that bill cannot be amended to go beyond the provision with the United States that binds the two countries.

Having said those brief words I would urge the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) to withdraw his motion and vote on the main motion.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Nielsen: The Leader of the New Democratic Party and his colleagues tell me to sit down.

Mr. Broadbent: No, I did not.

Mr. Nielsen: We are going to vote for this bill. It is too much in the national interest to act any other way. With a reasonable approach and a monitoring agency, the guarantees will be achieved. It is impossible to achieve them in the manner suggested by the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am always sorry to see someone trapped in an untenable position. The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has spoken for a number of days and has directed a number of his party to speak in support of the idea that Canadians should be employed. Yet when he sees an opportunity to guarantee this employment through a small change in the legislation—a change that I am sure would be made by almost any other country concerned with a project that is a gift to a friendly neighbour of a transportation facility—he says they will vote against the amendment. When he has the opportunity to stand up and be counted, he does what he often does—turns the other cheek.

I believe this is an excellent amendment. If parliament rules that all the employment for manufacture of the pipe, the valves, digging the holes, laying the pipe, constructing the pumping stations and other facilities, should be Canadian, the only people in trouble will be those who sign the treaty and the amendments that will be made to it.

The treaty is not inviolable. It will be amended in any case. The United States have already made changes and they are going to demand more changes. I am sure we can also demand consideration.

A lot of things have not been said. I would be surprised if a great deal of money is not tied up in the development of the pipeline which may not be built for many years, or even not at all. The hon. member for the Yukon is aware of what is happening to the gas coming from Alaska today. He knows that much of it is being shipped to Japan. He knows that if we allow gas to be shipped to Japan by the United States, the consequences to our competitive position will be great. Japan will get cheap gas because it is not very far from Alaska and will not cost much to transport. The gas will then be used for the manufacture of steel. We are in the unhappy position of having to haul coal from Hamilton or other places, and so would not be competitive.

The hon. member is well aware that more gas is being developed in western Canada than we need today. There are applications galore before the National Energy Board to sell more gas. We are not concerned with a pipeline that is needed in a great rush. We will be able to demand time to develop the pipe, the valves, the pumping stations and all the necessary infrastructure if we make these things a condition of allowing the United States to transport fuel across our nation.

The hon. member for the Yukon knows that there was no opportunity in Alaska for training local people and that most of the labour was imported. He knows that other American states were not allowed to bid on the pipe. The pipe came from Japan. In fact it was manufactured years before the decision was made with regard to the pipeline. It sat there rusting. He knows that.

● (1632)

The hon. member cannot have it both ways. If he believes the Liberal party is the big business party, he should join them. However, he will find that both those parties are losing a lot of friends. When my leader gets so close enough to and knowledgeable about the corporations that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) begins calling them our "corporate chums," he may be closer than he thinks. We are talking about steel plants in Canada, workers who will work on the pipeline, and those who have not yet been trained to work on the pipeline. The hon. member knows that the facilities are not yet built. We have the capability and the know-how. All we need is time to develop the design and we will build the valves for the 56-inch pipeline. These valves are not available anywhere in the world. Given the opportunity, we can build them as good as or better than any country.

I may agree to a road being built across my farm and what the terms of the lease and so on will be. Obviously I will request that I not only have the right to use that road, but to be employed to maintain it and snowplough it. I will either demand that I provide that kind of labour, or get a tax reduction. That would be anticipated. With regard to the pipeline, the Americans can expect no less from us.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) made a very good speech. He rightly said there will be great advantages to our American partners. He also pointed out the advantage to Canadians and the fact that the alternative would be very bad. The alternative would be moving the gas and oil down the west coast, something very dangerous. The Americans will have a great saving as a result of that route being shortened. It is being made militarily safe. Canadians are providing them with the opportunity to transport over Canadian soil. Because we are good neighbours we are making certain concessions. In return, we will ask for concessions.

I do not place the entire blame on the Deputy Prime Minister because he is new at this game. I have negotiated with the Americans on occasion. They are the sharpest traders in the world. I have never been competent enough to negotiate satisfactorily with the international corporations. Therefore the workers for whom I was negotiating did not win. We were always taken because we could not read the fine print. We were honourable. We believed what we said. We always used simple English.

A Yankee trader does not believe in simple English. He reads all the fine print. In fact he wrote it. It is interesting to note that in the fine print there is always a reference to an act of God. However, that always refers to the corporation. I have never seen a case where an act of God worked in favour of the little guy. It always worked in favour of the other side. That was not because God was unfair. It was because of the small print.

The Deputy Prime Minister will find out that the small print is not like that used in External Affairs where everyone speaks in diplomatic language, not meaning what they say and not intending to say what they mean. What is written in the small print is what you get. What you see is not what you get. The Deputy Prime Minister agrees with us. He comes from a very backward part of the country, the same as I do.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Peters: I say that in terms of the employment and industry that are being developed in our areas. There is not much in his area or in mine. Foothills told the Deputy Prime Minister that we would get 90 per cent of the jobs. One horse, one rabbit makes 50/50. That is the kind of 90 per cent we will get.

Mr. Nystrom: They call it a "rorse".

Mr. Peters: Whatever "abortion" it will be, we will have to live with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: I will not be offended if the Deputy Prime Minister does not vote in favour of this amendment. I am sure he believes that when we open up the treaty we will get a better deal. However, he must realize that when dealing with the Yankee trader, you need somebody to read the fine print. We are not very good at that. We are not playing around with tariffs here. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is in the chamber. He will tell you that it is not like selling cattle on the open market. He knows that when dealing with the Yankee traders you have to read the fine print very carefully. This may not affect workers in the constituency of the Deputy Primer Minister or in Timiskaming.

Mr. Horner: There will be work in both those constituencies.

Mr. Peters: I hope to God that does not happen or I will be very upset. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said it will be worse in both constituencies.

Mr. Horner: I said there will be work in both those constituencies because of this pipeline.

Mr. Peters: I certainly support that. Coming from the man responsible for making it happen, I will hold him to it.

I am really surprised at the hon. member for Yukon. It is not he who will sit down with the Yankee trader and negotiate. There will be no alternative, no second chance. He will have to depend on the terms of this bill, the application of it to the treaty and the pipeline, the jobs, steel production and all the other facilities. I am sure his colleagues from Hamilton, Regina, Port Coquitlam, Montreal where the valves may be made, or Toronto where they will decide on the pressure units to be moved, will be shocked to find he has sold them down the river the same as the government did.

• (1642)

Mrs. Holt: I want jobs for the people.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) is speaking about jobs. We give her full credit for that. She says that she wants jobs. We not only want them, we want them guaranteed. It may be 20 years before this pipeline carries any gas if it is true they are compressing that gas and sending it to Japan and they are not flaming any off in Alaska. It may be quite awhile—

An hon. Member: How do you get it down the well?

Mr. Peters: Certainly they are pumping some of it down the well. It is a good way. Any time it goes back into the well it is worth more money. My friend, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, lives in an area that has developed more oil this year than the reserves held five years ago for the whole country.

Mr. Horner: Not so.

Mr. Peters: We have at least three applications to ship gas out that they are unable to handle. They have had great success in an area where the gas is estimated to be as plentiful as it was in the original Leduc field. If that is so, it will make the gas, reserves on the Arctic slope look like small potatoes. There is no great rush; it will take the Deputy Prime Minister several days or weeks to write in the guarantees in this bill. I am not familiar with the difficulties he will have with the treaty. I am not sure what the relationship between this bill and the treaty may be. But from my point of view I want as many jobs as possible guaranteed by the passage of this bill. Maybe the Conservatives do not. One or two of the Liberals say they want jobs. I count on them to stand up and vote for the guarantees in the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Yukon on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order which I staked out when the Chair read the motion, because of the doubts I had with respect to its acceptability.

Now that Mr. Speaker is in the chair, perhaps I can advance very briefly the arguments as to why—

An hon. Member: It has already been put.

Mr. Nielsen: The motion has not been put.

An hon. Member: He read it out.

Mr. Nielsen: The motion has not been put. The record will show that during my few remarks I staked out the position that I doubted the motion was in order and that I wanted a ruling to that effect from the Chair. Now that Mr. Speaker is in the chair I propose to put arguments with respect to my reasoning that it is out of order.

The motion, sir, in my submission goes beyond the scope of that which is allowable under the usual six months' hoist because it attaches conditions not provided for in the rule. It attaches conditions which impose instructions on the committee, and it attaches conditions that the committee must bring in a recommendation to amend the bill in the most impossible way. It goes beyond the scope of the bill itself. It is impossible to amend it in the fashion suggested in the motion because of the existence of the international agreement.

The original motion of the government had to be accompanied by a message from His Excellency and this amendment may very well affect that aspect since it is an intrusion upon a prerogative of His Excellency by reason of the fact that that motion standing on the order paper is confined to that purpose. For those reasons I submit the motion is out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to serve my right to argue the points the hon. member has made if you decide it is appropriate for this argument to be reopened. First of all I wish to make the point that when the amendment was put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) there was an objection from the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). We sat for a moment without anything being said and then the Acting Speaker, the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), rose and put the motion.

Mr. Nielsen: No, he did not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will have to resolve this initial point. As is no surprise I am sure to the hon. member, I have some misgivings about the procedural regularity of the motion and the points made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) are well taken.

However, it will have to be resolved whether the matter is open for argument at this time. Before resuming the chair I asked the hon. member, the Assistant Deputy Speaker, if he had in fact reserved on the matter and his impression clearly was that he had. That matter will have to be verified, but certainly that was his impression. Reference was made, I understood by the hon. member for Yukon in his participation right after that, that the matter had been reserved. Therefore I do not have as much difficulty with the procedural regularity of the motion as I do with the argument.

It would seem to me there is only one way to settle that argument and that is to examine the transcript of the afternoon, when it is available, to decide whether there is any foundation for the argument of the question having been put. It is not now open to procedural argument. I would have to be persuaded of that, but surely we will need to have the evidence on hand. I do not think there is any way to solve it without looking at the transcript.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree we have to look at the evidence, namely, the blues of what was said. Of course there are tapes as well, so it is possible to look at what was said and we can hear what was said. An additional point I wish to make is that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) spoke to the amendment at some length after the motion was put. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) debated on his feet whether to speak to the amendment or to wait and speak to the main motion after the amendment was disposed of.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like arguing in advance of looking at or hearing the evidence either, but my memory is different. I will even confess that I was surprised at the ruling from the Chair. But we sat for 30 to 40 seconds without anything being said, and then the Assistant Deputy Speaker got up and said, "Moved by Mr. Broadbent and seconded by Mr. Peters," and called for the question. At that point the hon. member for the Yukon stood up and spoke to the amendment, followed by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). It seems to me the time for raising this whole question of the propriety of the amendment was over. It is unfortunate. Maybe there was some inadvertence about it, but this is what happened, and I do not think it is appropriate now to ask to go back at this stage of debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Any participation in the discussion would, of course, be without prejudice if the matter had been held under reserve. There is obviously only one consideration at this moment and that is whether the procedural regularity of the motion was held under reserve by the Chair. We have to determine that. The first way to assist in that discussion is to obtain a transcript of the record of the proceedings this afternoon. That will not be available for a short time. We cannot interfere with private members' hour which begins at five o'clock. It would appear that this discussion would have to take place later on this evening, I would presume at eight o'clock. That would be the appropriate time to raise it.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, one thing that the record will not show is that I was on my feet before the Assistant Deputy Speaker read the motion and at the outset I staked out the grounds of my point of order and asked the Chair to look at it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) did indeed stake out his brave ground, but the point surely on this matter is: did the Speaker at the time who was in the chair put the question or did he not? Did he name the mover and the seconder or not? The record is, I think, unequivocally clear on that. He moved the motion and expressed some reservations. He got up, he hesitated, and he moved the motion. It was so unequivocally accepted, I thought by all members. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) in informal conversation was talking about the debate arrangements to be made after that. The Deputy Prime Minister was assuming, and said to me informally, the motion had been put, and he was concerned about winding up the debate. He asked whether he should now speak on the amendment, or whether he should speak after the amendment was dealt with.

• (1652)

We were in the process of making informal arrangements to expedite procedures by agreeing that the Deputy Prime Minister should speak on the amendment. Also we agreed that we would not put up any further speakers. I cite that by way of evidence. It was a widespread assumption on the part of everyone, until the hon. member for the Yukon rose in a totally irrelevant manner to attempt to get himself out of a difficult situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Because of the very complex deliberations, I am sure we would be greatly assisted by examining the record of what really took place earlier this afternoon. Therefore the discussion on the procedural regularity of this motion will be held over until the House resumes its session this evening at eight o'clock. In that event, we will all have the benefit of examining the record. Then I can hear whatever arguments will be advanced at that time.

Is it the pleasure of the House to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Canadian culture—Federal assistance to cultural organizations; the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation—Reason for delay of final payment to fishermen; the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—Finance—Measures to prevent dumping of steel beams—Definition of "Fair world price".

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), and public bills.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Leggatt.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are faced with one little difficulty. The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) is not here. There have been some discussions about this bill. The understanding was that the hon. member who was sponsoring it did not wish to proceed with it today. I thought this was known by others. I see many affirmative nods on the government side of the House.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is not here, nor is the hon. member for Scarborough East. Our understandings were quite clear. Behind those understandings is the fact that there have been discussions between Bell Canada and those interested in this bill. It was the disposition of the sponsoring member that this bill was not to proceed today. Since it is only 4.55 p.m., I excuse him for not being here. Is there someone who can confirm this understanding?

There are two other bills under the heading of private bills, and the sponsors of those bills are here. Why can we not proceed with them?

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understood there was an agreement. I was told by the parliamentary secretary that agreement had been reached to call Bill S-5 and Bill S-6 at this time.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, as one of the sponsors, I should like to indicate that was my understanding as well. There was agreement that these two bills could be dealt with expeditiously today. I hope that understanding is clear on all sides of the House. There have been many discussions on the matter. Certainly that was my understanding of the agreement.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone approached my party for agreement.

Mr. Pinard: We spoke to hon. House leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Paproski: In any event, I never heard about it. We are willing to proceed on that basis, if the appropriate hon. members are present.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I did not personally speak with the Conservative House leader; but I was informed by the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul (Mr. Campbell) that an agreement had been reached.

Mr. Speaker: Before too many hon. members leave the Chamber, if there is any difficulty about the use of time now, perhaps we can settle the procedure problem at this point rather than waiting until eight o'clock. Perhaps it is worthwhile to wait a moment or two for the "blues".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Your Honour will discover that Bill S-5 and Bill S-6 will not take very long, perhaps a minute or two each. My suggestion is that we deal with those bills while waiting for the "blues".

Mr. Speaker: If the House is in agreement with the calling of Bill S-5 and Bill S-6, then we will proceed.

MARRIAGE LAW EXCEPTION—JAMES RICHARD BORDEN AND JUDY ANN BORDEN

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre) moved that Bill S-5, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of James Richard Borden and Judy Ann Borden, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill has been in the works for almost two years. It was dealt with in the other place, received third reading, and as a result has come to this place. As is stated in the title of the bill, it is an act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of James Richard Borden and Judy Ann Borden.

This matter has been gone into thoroughly by myself, as well as by many other hon. members. This legislation is required on the advice of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), which is outlined in his letter dated June 26, 1975. In part the letter reads:

> The only possibility for you to obtain authority to marry your niece under Canadian law would be for you to communicate with a private Member of Parliament in order to see whether the member would be willing to petition on your behalf for a private bill to provide an exception from the general law in force in Canada.

They proceeded to do that very thing. We are half way through the process. The couple have paid the costs incumbent upon them for private legislation. I hope the House rapidly accepts this bill on second reading so that it can be considered in more detail in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

MARRIAGE LAW EXCEPTION—EUGÈNE WADDELL AND MARGUERITE BENOIT

Mr. John Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul) moved that Bill S-6, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of François Eugène Arthur Waddell and Marie Anne Marguerite Benoit, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill seeks an exception from the general law regarding the degrees of affinity within which two people may marry. The petitioner, Eugène Waddell, wishes to marry his niece, Marguerite Benoit.

The preamble to the bill, which will be proven in committee, sets out the pertinent facts showing the necessity for bringing the bill before parliament.

Prior to the framing of the British North America Act in 1967, the civil code of the province of Quebec of 1866 was in effect, and it contains the provisions saying that a man may not marry his niece. The next year the British North America Act gave legislative jurisdiction to the Parliament of Canada in the field of marriage and, to the provinces, legislative jurisdiction in the field of solemnization of marriage. However, the degrees of consanguinity are part of the law of marriage rather than part of the law of solemnization of marriage, and therefore only the Parliament of Canada may properly legislate in this regard. The prohibition against marriage between uncle and niece contained in the code is therefore a matter of federal legislative jurisdiction. Because that prohibition was in the civil code of 1866, Section 129 of the British North America Act keeps it in force until it is "repealed, abolished or altered" by the Parliament of Canada.

Since the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction in respect of marriage and since, under Section 129 of the BNA Act, it has the power to "repeal or amend" the law that was in force in Quebec at the time of Confederation, I submit that it has the power to pass a private bill permitting the petitioners to marry each other, notwithstanding the prohibition that would otherwise make it impossible for them to marry.

I do not propose to go into any detail save to note that the petitioner, Eugène Waddell, is 84 years of age, and Miss Benoit is 66.

At this time I would like to express my appreciation on their behalf of the co-operation of the House leaders. I am sure all members would like to wish them much love and happiness in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There being no more private bills to be dealt with, and private bills being the first order of business today, is it the wish of the House that we proceed to notices of motions (paper), or private members' public bills?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand that His Honour is to return to the House to determine the ruling on the pipeline. If we can have a ruling, perhaps we could spend from now until six o'clock on that bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Speaker: The House will want to know that we are doing everything we can to expedite the production of the transcript of this afternoon so I can have some guidance from it. I understand the desire of the House to proceed with the matter forthwith because there might be some agreement that the matter be finalized. In the circumstances we may be able to produce the record very shortly, but it may take a few minutes. I would like some guidance from the House as to whether it would be useful to adjourn the House for a few minutes or say, until 5.30 p.m.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have been planning to speak in the debate and I would be ready to speak now. I could speak either on the assumption that I am dealing with the amendment or speak on second reading. If that is agreeable, I will proceed now.

Mr. Nielsen: That is agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker, and if the Chair should find that the circumstances are as I outlined them and that the motion is out of order, then it would be considered that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) will have closed the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Just to add another interesting procedural aspect to it, let me point out that it is indeed a fact that if we find out after the fact that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is speaking to the second reading motion, he closes the debate. If we find out after the fact that he is speaking to the amendment, I understand there might be a disposition to close the debate anyway. Perhaps while the President of Privy Council is addressing the House I can examine the transcript which has just been handed to me, and report to the House. Now that I have it, it should be possible to settle this very shortly.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a terrible precedent to allow a member's speech to be switched to another stage of the debate after the fact. I am prepared to let the minister speak on the amendment and, if it is found later that he was out of order, he could go ahead and make a speech on the motion. However, I would not agree to transferring his speech after he has made it to another stage of the debate. The amendment is before the House until Your Honour has made your decision on it. If the President of Privy Council wishes to speak, he should do so on the amendment, but I would not agree to having it transferred. That would be a terrible precedent.

Mr. Speaker: Now that I have the record in front of me, perhaps I might be of some assistance to hon. members. The record shows that, in concluding his remarks, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) moved the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). The text of the motion was then read. I will quote now from the text of the transcript as follows:

THE ACTING SPEAKER (MR. TURNER): Order, please. I suggest that we take this amendment under advisement and continue with the debate.

MR. MACEACHEN: Mr. Speaker—

THE ACTING SPEAKER (MR. TURNER): I remind hon. members that if the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) speaks now, he closes the debate.

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE): Not on an amendment.

MR. MACEACHEN: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order on the amendment. I do not think this amendment is acceptable on second reading. I think the amendment has not been put before the House. If I speak I clearly understand I am speaking on the main motion so I would have to clarify the situation or continue the debate.

Then the Acting Speaker put the motion. However, prior to putting the motion, he said to the House:

Order, please. I suggest that we take this amendment under advisement and continue with the debate.

It would seem to me that in these circumstances the proper interpretation of that is that the Acting Speaker at that time had indicated to the House there was a procedural reservation. He said then that we should continue with the debate and put the question, subject to taking it under advisement. I do not know what other interpretation could be put on it, which would mean that the matter was one of procedural regularity. Further, the first person to speak after that was the President of Privy Council who said:

Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order on the amendment. I do not think this amendment is acceptable on second reading . . .

The Acting Speaker having indicated that he wanted to take it under advisement, I do not know what other notice he could give to the House of his intention to do that. I think that the matter of the procedural regularity of this motion is open for discussion now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, what the transcript in front of you does not show is the space of time when nothing was happening.

● (1712)

It is perfectly true that the Acting Speaker said at one time that the matter should be reserved, but then after that certain things were said and certain things happened. We sat for a moment, and then the Acting Speaker got up and put the motion. My interpretation is that at that point he had decided there was going to be any discussion on the procedural matter, and he put the motion. Then he called on the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Neilsen) to speak, and then on the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). It seems to me that that earlier statement about taking it under advisement does not apply when, three or four minutes later, after we sat here, the Acting Speaker put the motion.

Mr. Speaker: We are in a situation in which the occupant of the chair has done two things, one consistent with taking the matter under advisement and one consistent with resolving that advisement very quickly and putting the question.

I have to make an interpretation now, after the fact, as to which one he intended to do, and I think I should take the interpretation that he made his intention clear by saying that the matter would have to be taken under advisement and that there was some procedural difficulty. Therefore I am resolving it in that way. The other choice is a less desirable one.

I think hon. members ought to be able, if they wish, to try to defend a motion which has a clear difficulty in it, in that it directs the committee to a certain line of discussion and endeavour, which certainly seems to offend two well known precedents which I am prepared to cite to the House if that is necessary. I would be glad to hear hon. members who want to defend the motion, but it has a clear procedural difficulty with respect to its instruction. In the circumstances, with the compression of time and if there is agreement that that is a procedural irregularity, I certainly think that it would be appropriate to enable the motion to be purged of the offending words so that it would stand on its own as a second reading amendment and to send the subject matter back to the committee so that it could proceed to a determination directly, if that is the case. In any event, if there is a defence of the motion, I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, do I not also have the right to hear any criticism of the motion?

Mr. Speaker: There has been an argument by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Neilsen) that the procedure is irregular on the ground that the motion issues an instruction to the committee, that the instruction is to introduce a new element into the bill which goes beyond the scope of the bill, and is therefore out of order. There was a third ground, but those are the two I recall.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in that connection I should like to point out that this amendment does not send the bill to the committee but, rather, sends its subject matter. Therefore the limitations that apply to amending a bill at second reading in my view do not apply. If on second reading we were trying to amend clauses of the bill, I know it could be argued from the authorities that the thing to do for that is to wait until we get the bill into committee. However, in this case we are sending the subject matter rather than the bill itself.

There is a rather long paragraph on page 185 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which is part of citation 226(2). The opening lines talk about the subject matter of a bill and so on, and then we get down to the last dozen lines:

> Accordingly, an instruction can be moved that authorizes the introduction of amendments into a Bill which extend its provisions to objects not contained therein, if those objects are relevant to the subject-matter thereof, or which would augment the legislative machinery whereby the Bill is to be put into force; whilst, on the other hand, no instruction is permissible which is irrelevant, foreign, or contradictory to the contents of the Bill, or that seeks the subversion thereof, by substituting another scheme for the mode of operation therein prescribed.

According to Dr. Beauchesne, that was taken from some edition of May at pages 398 and 399. There are other citations on other pages. I go back to page 183, citation 221(1).

> The object of a permissive instruction—

That is what this is, sir, not a mandatory instruction. It is a permissive instruction that the committee has power to consider such and such. Surely the power to consider such and such is not a mandatory instruction.

> The objective of a permissive instruction, which is the more ordinary form, is to confer on the Committee authority to do something which, without the instruction, they would have no power to do, for example, to divide a bill into two bills, to consolidate two bills into one, or to extend the scope of a bill. Instructions of this kind merely empower the Committee to take the course of action specified, leaving it to the discretion of the Committee whether or not they exercise the power.

What is proposed in the amendment is not that the bill be divided or anything like that, but that its scope be extended, and I have in mind the limitation that was in the citation I read earlier, that that extension cannot go beyond the objectives of the bill. I suggest that the whole question of this bill providing jobs for Canadians and providing for the production of pipe in Canada is not foreign to—it is part of—the bill. It is part of what was talked about in the treaty and so forth, so we are simply extending the provisions of the bill to provide that with respect to these matters, the making of the pipe and the providing of jobs, there shall be certain guarantees.

As I say, the requirement that we cannot be foreign to the bill, it seems to me, is met in this amendment. It deals with writing into the bill guarantees about things that are already implicit in it. And as for the suggestion that the instruction is mandatory, I do not see how that can be taken seriously at all because it is an instruction of a permissive nature, giving the committee the right to make recommendations for the inclusion in the said bill of certain guarantees. Surely that is leaving it to the committee, in the terms of citation 221, whether or not they exercise that power.

While it is a bit unusual as an amendment and perhaps a bit innovative in that we are sending the subject matter rather than the bill—and we frequently have had amendments sending subject matter—it seems to me to be in line with the other citations, namely, the right to ask the committee to consider recommending that certain clauses be put into the bill in the nature of guarantees.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I initially suggested that the amendment was out of order, and in view of the fact that you have ruled that the matter is still under reservation, I would like to indicate very briefly my view with respect to the regularity of the amendment.

The first point I want to make, in a sense bolsters the argument advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the effect that the question of Canadian content or the amount of Canadian content is within the bill because there is a clause which obligates the company to provide the agency and the minister with a procurement plan indicating, for example, Canadian content.

Having said that, it seems to me that the question of guarantees for Canadian content can be dealt with when the clauses of the bill are considered, and I understand that one of the rules developed by the Chair is that amendments to a second reading motion must not suggest amendments to clauses of a bill. To put it another way, an amendment at second reading must not anticipate amendments which can properly be put at the committee stage. I had anticipated that members of the New Democratic Party would come to the committee armed with amendments, dealing with Canadian content, to the appropriate clauses of the bill.

Second is the further precedent that a reasoned amendment to a second reading motion which would constitute an instruction to a committee is out of order. That case has been dealt with previously by the Chair. On November 6, 1976, in the House of Commons Journals at pages 482-3 the Chair held that an amendment moved was procedurally improper on the basis of citation 386(3) of Beauchesne which said that the House cannot both refuse to give second reading and refer some provisions of a bill to a committee. It has to make its choice. Here we are refusing second reading but at the same time saying we want to instruct the committee. It seems to me these are two considerations that would be helpful in determining the regularity of the amendments.

I make one last point, Mr. Speaker. Your memory was that the amendment goes beyond the motion on the order paper which was supported by a message from His Excellency.

Mr. Speaker: That was the third point that was earlier argued by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that is referred to in the precedents. I do not know if there is any intention to put forward a counter argument to the effect that the provisions, if accepted in the amendment, would raise the possibility of going beyond the financial prerogative of the Crown.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word about that which applies to most of the other arguments. I thought I had made it clear in my earlier submission that what this amendment would do is not to send the bill to the committee but simply to send the subject matter of the bill. Surely, if all the committee has is the subject matter, it could recommend back to the House the inclusion of other matters in the bill when the bill comes back again. Surely there is a difference between the things you cannot do to a bill and what you can do when what is before the committee is the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would be prepared to accede to that argument, as I am almost always prepared to accede to the arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), if it were not for the fact that Erskine May takes two or three pages in Chapter 21 to deal specifically with instructions related to motions on second reading of a bill. It goes into motions of instructions that would, for example, have the effect of widening the powers of the committee beyond the ways and means or money resolution which covers the bill, or if its proposals involve charge. There are several other precedents that indicate an instruction is out of order if it attempts to introduce into a bill a subject which should properly form the substance of a distinct measure.

Page 513 of Erskine May's nineteenth edition covers the points raised by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), that is to say, that since the clauses of a bill can be amended to accomplish what it is endeavoured to accomplish by the general amendment, that the amendment goes beyond the scope of a proper amendment at second reading stage and gets into amendments that can and properly should be secured by specific clause by clause amendments when the bill is in committee.

The first of such precedents cited at page 511 of Erskine May are worthy of mention, that is, if the instruction attempts to embody in a bill principles which are foreign or not cognate to the bill or are outside its scope and declared intention. I know the argument would be that if the bill were sent to the committee with that instruction, those precedents would apply. The argument is that since it is not the bill but the subject matter that is being referred, the instructions have become validated by virtue of that device.

With the greatest of respect I cannot accede to that argument. The hon. member knows that he can accomplish the same thing by stopping the amendment after the words which refer the subject matter to the committee. The amendment reads as follows:

That Bill C-25 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Special Committee on a Northern Pipeline—

The amendment could stop there and the hon. member would be able to do what he wants to do. If the amendment carries, then when the bill gets to committee he could persuade that committee to give consideration to the matter.

In view of the very clear precedent against the addition of instructions on motions at second reading stage, and since the instructions appear to run into a number of difficulties—giving the committee powers that it would not ordinarily possess to do things and to make changes to the bill which appear to be the proper subject of clause by clause amendments and might very well turn out to offend the financial provisions and be beyond the scope of the bill—all things considered, I have to resolve the benefit of the doubt against the procedural regularity of this amendment. I do say that under the circumstances, and particularly with the confusion about putting the question, if it is desired that the amendment be put now in proper language I would certainly think it appropriate to do so in the circumstances. I do not like to do that in every circumstance, but if the amendment were altered to put a period after "Northern Pipeline" I think that might be accepted.

Is the House ready for the question? Before the Deputy Prime Minister speaks, we might regularize our own procedures a little bit. I take it we have agreed we will continue with the consideration of government business, namely, the resumption of the debate on the second reading motion on this bill and by allowing the minister to address the question he would be concluding the debate.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to be clear where we are in the proceedings. I understood you to rule or to make the suggestion that my original amendment be changed to make it procedurally acceptable. Are you now accepting the amendment in modified form? If that is so, I will sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I was making an offer. It is not something I like to do in every case, but in these circumstances I think it only fair that if the hon. member wishes to modify his amendment and put a period after "Pipeline" the Chair would accept that amendment, put it, and it can be taken for debate. Is that agreed and understood?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will now read, moved by Mr. Broadbent, seconded by Mr. Peters:

That Bill C-25 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Special Committee on a Northern Pipeline.

The motion is now procedurally regular, is before the House and in the possession of the House. In speaking now the President of Privy Council is addressing himself to that motion.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by expressing the expectation that, even though we are debating the amendment moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the debate is coming to a conclusion and that it might be possible for us to deal with both the main motion and his amendment by a vote today or after conclusion of all the speeches that may be required.

In any event, if the debate is not concluded by my speech I will have another opportunity to speak on the main motion if necessary.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, one never knows what will happen around here, but my notion is that the minister's speech is the last one. Rather than having a vote or two votes that cut into the dinner hour, I wonder if we could have an understanding now that if there are no speeches after the minister speaks, the vote or votes will be taken tonight at 8 o'clock, 8:15, or whatever.

Mr. Nielsen: That is agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker. I hope there will be no further speakers after the minister. We are prepared to vote at any time he concludes his remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Knowing that the minister is effectively speaking on the amendment, and seeing the good will and agreement of the House, maybe we could make some order that would prevent a member who is not here now and a part of the agreement from indicating at 8 o'clock that he wants to add something to the debate. If we clarify the situation now we can establish the time of the vote, more or less, agreeing that the speech of the minister would conclude the debate on both the amendment and the main motion, and that any division to be taken would be postponed until such an hour.

• (1732)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understand there may be a disposition for the House to finish now and to have the vote at eight o'clock this evening or, if possible, before the dinner hour. I certainly hope that will be the case and we can get the matter cleared up.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, there is no agreement on that. We will take the vote on the amendment and take any other votes in their turn.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I make a simple suggestion, Mr. Speaker. If the minister finishes before six o'clock, he could call it six o'clock and take the floor again at eight o'clock. Things will probably then work out.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have sufficient guidance to know what to do in carrying out the instructions that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) failed to send to the committee but which he has succeeded in giving to me.

First, I want to express my appreciation to the House for its consideration of the bill at this stage. During the course of the debate, a number of questions were raised and several constructive comments were put forward. Of course, there were a number of criticisms of the bill and the circumstances surrounding it. While obviously there will be an opportunity to deal more fully with these suggestions and criticisms in the special committee, I want to respond to some of the more important matters raised in the debate.

I wish to refer to a statement made today in the debate and earlier by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) to the effect that the only significiant benefit to Canada in the Alcan pipeline project is jobs that may occur in the country. Of course, there is a benefit to Canada from jobs that we expect to be created. However, there are other benefits. It would be a great mistake for anyone, especially for anyone in the House of Commons, to believe that the only significiant benefit to Canada from this international enterprise is the creation of jobs, admitting the vital importance of that result.

I should begin by saying that this is an international project. It will be the result of an agreement that was negotiated between Canada and the United States. It was understood from the beginning that neither country could enter into the agreement unless it could register definite benefits for itself from the agreement.

In the negotiations we were seeking mutual benefits, benefits for the United States and benefits for Canada. I am not put off or disturbed in any way if members, especially those in the New Democratic Party, say in comparison that the El Paso route of Mr. Schlesinger was able to give a benefit of $8 billion to the United States as opposed to the Alcan route. Obviously there were strong pressures in the United States for that domestic route and not an international route. It had to be defended in the United States because that choice yielded benefits to the United States. Therefore, I do not regard that as a convincing argument against entering into this agreement. I refer to the argument that the United States gained benefits.

This agreement has provided benefits for the United States and is providing benefits for Canada. It is a plus for both Canada and the United States. I want to list as briefly as possible the main benefits that are accruing to Canada as a result of this agreement.

First, the agreement provides access to western Arctic supplies of gas on the only economic basis currently available to meet growing needs in this country. The capacity for the transmission of Canadian gas would be 1.2 billion cubic feet per day and even a flow of as little as 800 million cubic feet daily would be sufficient to supply up to 10 per cent of the forecast demand for several years. In contrast, the larger supplies in Alaska would only supply 5 per cent of United States needs.

Second, as a result of the cost-sharing formula with the United States with regard to the Dempster lateral, as provided for in the agreement, the cost of transporting Canadian gas could be up to 20 cents per mcf less than under the original National Energy Board proposal for a diversion of the main line in the Yukon to Dawson. That could represent a saving for the transport of existing Canadian reserves of $1 billion.

Third, it is estimated that between $4 billion and $5 billion will be spent in Canada in current dollar terms for the purchase of goods and services required for the construction of the 2,765 mile pipeline system from the Yukon to the southern U.S. border. These estimates do not include the lateral. This includes everything from design, engineering, projection supervision and transportation of supplies and equipment to pipes, valves, compressors, flanges and construction machinery. These outlays will provide a substantial boost to output and employment in this country, not only as a result of direct spending on the pipeline itself and all the machinery and equipment required to build and operate it, but also because of indirect demand for other goods and services that will be generated by pipeline spending.

Fourth, as stated previously on many occasions, nearly 100,000 man-years of employment would be created by the total project including the Delta lateral. Some 69,000 man-years would be generated directly by construction activities and 31,000 man-years indirectly as a result of expenditures of pipeline income. That was the estimate that was given when the agreement was announced. It was the estimate that we have been working on. Later I will deal with some of the interconnected reasons that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby put before the House.

Fifth, the construction of the pipeline system and the guaranteed access it assures to the Mackenzie Delta as a result of the Foothills commitment to provide a connecting lateral will provide substantial stimulus to continued exploration for new petroleum reserves in the western Arctic.

Sixth, the northern pipeline project will have a strongly positive impact on Canada's international balance of payments. That has hardly been mentioned in the debate. The first boost will come from the expected heavy inflow of capital to help finance construction in Canada, and once the gas begins to flow through the line to the south, Canada will be in receipt of substantial payments from the U.S. to cover transmission charges.

● (1742)

It is interesting that this particular aspect of the pipeline agreement was mentioned specifically at the federal-provincial conference of first ministers by Premier Allan Blakeney, whom the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby recommended to us as the only man at the first ministers' conference who could assist the current economic situation in Canada. He ruled out the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Manitoba but he selected the premier of Saskatchewan as the paragon of economic analysis. Obviously what he said would be acceptable to the hon. member. At pages 13 and 14 of his address concerning the Alcan project, he was talking about energy projects in general and I quote the premier:

> While it's not an energy project for Saskatchewan, the Alcan pipeline project is key. That project awaits a number of very important decisions.
> The pipeline could mean 18,000 man-years of construction work and 1,000 permanent jobs.

The premier of Saskatchewan is obviously referring to his province. Then he goes on to say that fees for Alaska gas flowing to the United States through the pipeline could earn Canada as much as $800 million a year by 1983. That is a very substantial benefit. Every year by 1983 American shippers or purchasers will pay Canada $800 million. Then he goes on to say:

> If the federal government makes sure that the pipe can be made in Canada, the steel plant in Regina could expand its capacity creating both construction work and nearly 500 permanent jobs.

You will notice that the premier of Saskatchewan said "if the federal government makes sure that the pipe can be made in Canada". We have assured that. The National Energy Board through its recommendation has assured the premier of Saskatchewan that the pipe can be made in Canada. I am sure that the premier of Saskatchewan, even though he is not a graduate of the London School of Economics, knows the difference between the words "can" and "will". He is a graduate of Dalhousie University. That is why I put high value on his selection of words. I will return to the premier of Saskatchewan's remarks later on because I find his speech rich in analysis which will, of course, be immediately accepted by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby who extolled his qualities yesterday in the debate.

I mentioned the support on the point of the balance of payments. The premier said that fees for Alaska gas flowing to the United States through the pipeline could earn Canada as much as $800 million a year by 1983. By the way, that figure is substantiated by the National Energy Board, and that is a powerful assistance to Canada.

Here I address myself to the hon. member for Yukon on the question of Yukon employment. Foothills have indicated that preference will be given to Yukon residents in hiring for construction of the line. It is estimated that some 200 permanent jobs will be opened up to residents of the Yukon to oversee operation of the pipeline in the territory and that many hundreds more will be created indirectly in the north as a result of the catalytic effect of the project in stimulating continued petroleum exploration and in helping to foster other industrial development.

I am disappointed that the chief spokesman for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, have confined their interest in the pipeline basically to that part of Ontario which is so interesting to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Not a word about the industrial possibilities and employment opportunities that will come in the Yukon as a result of the catalytic effect of the project.

Mr. Broadbent: "Catatonic".

Mr. MacEachen: Communities in the Yukon lying along the route of the line will also benefit through access to gas supplies at preferred rates.

I raised the question of property taxes—a subject matter which has been skilfully skirted by opposition spokesmen in the debate—under the agreement with the United States. I must say I was a bit irritated with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands for his speech and the way he denigrated Canadian spokesmen. He also showed disdain for the Americans. He vacillated. He said we fear them, we do not like them, the Canadians are no match for the Americans. He said there was a lack of confidence. As I listened to the debate I found the NDP had not really understood what happened in the negotiations, and they have not understood it yet. Just take the question of the Yukon property taxes. Under the agreement with the United States the company will be required to pay total property taxes of $35 million—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) seeks to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he would entertain one short question at this point.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will at the end of my comments. I would like to put these benefits on the record in one place so that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby will not go around saying the only significant benefit to Canada is from jobs we have not guaranteed.

Here is a very significant benefit to the Yukon under the agreement with the United States. The company will be required to pay property taxes of $35 million prior to completion of the line and $30 million annually thereafter, an amount which increases each year in line with the gross national product price deflator. Assuming 5 per cent inflation, net property tax payments of the company in the Yukon over the 25 year period will be more than $1 billion.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said we threw away a $200 million compensation fund. He said our chief negotiator threw away a $200 million card that he did not have to throw away. I admit I threw away that $200 million card, but I played a more than $1 billion card for the Yukon. This reminds me of what Mr. Lysyk and the National Energy Board recommended. What has been negotiated has yielded the Yukon more than three times the amount that would have been yielded to the Yukon under the National Energy Board proposal, three times more than what was suggested and recommended by the National Energy Board, and twice as much as was recommended by Dean Lysyk.

By this negotiation the property taxes we have achieved for the Yukon over the lifetime of the pipeline will amount to net tax revenues of more than $1 billion, which are much greater than any recommendation given to us by the National Energy Board and by Dean Lysyk.

● (1752)

In addition to the property taxes which will be paid to the Yukon, there is the very substantial revenue which will flow into the treasuries of the three western provinces as a result of the pipeline from such levies as property taxes and personal and corporate income taxes. Also the federal government will reap significant revenue from all these sources, other than property taxes.

If one compiles the benefits Canada will receive as a result of this agreement, one will see that the question of jobs is an important part but not the only part of the total benefits accruing to Canada.

I thank the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for the general support his party has given to this bill. I should like to answer a number of his criticisms. He indicated that the government has delayed the bringing in of this legislation. We brought the legislation in after having put the complex elements together. It was necessary to decide that before bringing in the legislation. It is true the United States Congress dealt quickly with the decision of the President. That was so because of pre-legislation which had been passed earlier under the Alaska natural gas transportation act. The United States Congress still has to deal with the President's energy package before gas contracts can be finalized. I am told these contracts are vital to the financing of the project.

The question of the price of gas in the United States has to be resolved. As yet the United States has not set up any administrative mechanism, nor any regulatory authority to deal with the pipeline. All of these things must be done. There is no basis for the complaint by the hon. member that the government is delaying the commencement of this project. The passage of this legislation is timely. If it can be dealt with in committee, then we will be in phase with the requirements as they have developed.

Also the hon. member for the Yukon dealt with the wide powers which were being given to the pipeline agency. These powers would be given directly and indirectly through the authority of the governor in council to amend regulations under other acts relating to the pipeline, or to transfer powers under legislation which bear on the project. I had that very much in mind when I was building the legislative framework.

During the debate which occurred last August, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicated that as a final condition for approval of the Foothills project his party insisted upon the creation of a single authority or independent regulatory agency. Also he indicated that the agency should be new and only last for the life of the project. That is what we are providing for. He continued by saying that the agency should have clear authority over all agencies and departments whose conflicts now complicate life in the north. He suggested that this agency must have a mandate to oversee and regulate technical and social problems connected with the pipeline. That is exactly what the government has attempted to do. We wanted to create a single authority which would be capable of overseeing and regulating the technical and social problems connected with the pipeline.

Mr. Paproski: That agency should have been located in Edmonton.

Mr. MacEachen: I should like to inform the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) that the office of the administrator will be located in the city of Calgary, along with the headquarters of the Foothills company.

Hon. members opposite have referred to the ability of parliament to oversee the operations of the pipeline agency.

Mr. Paproski: Monitor.

Mr. MacEachen: I have heard the word "monitor" being used, but I am not certain what it means. This agency will be subject to parliamentary control. Its annual reports will come before parliament. Its spending estimates will be before committee. Also it will be possible to examine this agency, to ask questions about it and to control it like any other department of the government.

Mr. Nielsen: Once a year.

Mr. MacEachen: I realize the hon. member for Yukon has other ideas on the subject of parliamentary control. Those ideas will be listened to and looked at in committee. The government does not intend to create an overblown agency. We intend to keep it as small as possible. It will be operated by seconding people from other government departments. We do not believe a large increase will be required in the number of government personnel.

Mr. Nielsen: Is the hon. minister going to deal with the appeals process?

Mr. MacEachen: I wanted to discuss other issues raised by the hon. member regarding provisions in the bill relating to the matter of recourse to the courts. I have considerable sympathy for the concerns expressed. We are prepared to consider that matter further when the bill is before the special committee. I want to underline the fact that some of those concerns appear to be based on a misunderstanding of the facts.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. MacEachen: When we rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the concerns which had been expressed with regard to the provisions in the bill relating to the matter of recourse to the courts. I referred to the comments that had been made by the hon. member for Yukon and other members of the House on this subject. If I interpret the hon. member correctly, he seemed to be suggesting that clause 16 of the bill, which empowers the governor in council to modify any regulations as they apply to the pipeline, combined with the second clause—he is reported in Hansard to have referred to clause 25(3), but I am sure his reference was intended to be clause 23(5), which restricts the Federal Court of Appeal to confirming a decision of the board or referring it back for reconsideration—could be employed to legislate native land claims to the Yukon out of existence.

Mr. Nielsen: To prevent injunctions.

Mr. MacEachen: I am certain that no such power exists in the bill, and I can assure the House that we have no such intention.

I will say that the hon. member for Yukon seemed to be somewhat ambivalent about his position on the provisions of the bill with respect to judicial reports. On the one hand he expressed concern that Indian groups may make every effort to prevent the project from proceeding, and he said he does not agree with that. On the other hand, he is concerned also about the denial of the fundamental right in British justice of guaranteeing a citizen free access to the courts.

In the course of his remarks the hon. member suggested that I had unintentionally misled the House in asserting that the restrictions on the judicial process proposed in the bill were similar to those provided by the United States with respect to the pipeline project. I believe that many of the restrictions are similar, but I did not mean, and I do not mean now, to suggest that they were identical. As the hon. member said, the court of appeal in the district of Columbia may quash, alter or confirm an order of the regulatory authority. He suggested that the courts in Canada had the power to confirm, quash, alter or refer back the decision of the semi-judicial tribunal.

He went on to contend, as I understood him, that clause 23 would be more acceptable if the appellate tribunal were empowered not only to confirm or refer back an order of the National Energy Board or the designated officer in the agency but also to alter it. I am informed by others more learned in the law than I that in fact it is not customary in Canadian practice to authorize the courts to vary the decision of an administrative agency of this nature. I suggest, therefore, that this is a matter which must be weighed more carefully in considering where to strike a balance which ensures the preservation of justice and equity for the individual without unnecessarily or unreasonably obstructing the progress of a project which promises so much benefit for the vast majority of the Canadian people.

Now I would like, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to turn to a number of questions involving the pipeline project as it affects the Yukon territory. It has been suggested that I made somewhat wild statements regarding preference for Yukon labour and procurement. The legislation requires the company to comply with undertakings it made before the National Energy Board which include a clear commitment to give preference to Yukon residents in hiring and procurement. In addition, Foothills also will be required to comply with detailed terms and conditions laid down under the authority of the legislation which will spell out the manner in which the company must comply with this undertaking.

In connection with the various undertakings by Foothills about which the hon. member for Yukon was inquiring, I might advise him that while many of these are summarized in the report of the National Energy Board, I understand that the board is presently in the process of documenting the undertakings made throughout the course of the hearings. I would expect that a complete list will be available by the time the bill is under consideration by the special committee.

Mr. Nielsen: That is next Monday.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It has also been contended that the representative from the territory on the proposed federal-provincial consultative council should be named by the territorial assembly which, it has been implied, would parallel the practice in the provinces under which their representatives might be named by the provincial legislatures. I am quite certain that in fact the provincial representatives will be named by the respective governments, and I can assure hon. members that it is our intention to designate the Yukon representative to the council on the advice of the executive committee of the territorial government.

There were a number of references made throughout the debate to various proposals that were put forward earlier with regard to providing additional funding for the benefit of the Yukon. This question was thoroughly covered by my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner). I think it might be worth reiterating the $200 million heritage fund recommended by the Lysyk inquiry, which the hon. member for Yukon described as up front money to meet the additional costs that the territory would face as a result of the project of providing additional services and facilities. The hon. member for Yukon argued that the provision we have made for the Yukon to borrow up to $200 million between 1978 and 1982 was back-end money.

I think it ought to be made clear that the heritage fund proposed by the Lysyk inquiry was not intended to provide up-front money to meet additional costs of services and facilities required by the pipeline but was for quite unrelated purposes. The provision permitting the Yukon to borrow up to $200 million would make funds available for this very purpose. I dealt earlier with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that when we agreed in the negotiations to forego the idea of a $200 million fund we threw away a valuable card. I have already indicated that that is nonsense.

Instead of gaining the $200 million so-called compensation fund for the Yukon we suggested in the negotiations the payment of a property tax to accrue to the treasury of the Yukon more than $1 billion over the lifetime of the pipeline. So I do not feel there is a need for going into that question more thoroughly.

I am satisfied that anyone who looks at the report of Lysyk and the funding recommendations of the National Energy Board for the Yukon, including the heritage fund, and at what has been negotiated, would agree that we have in all cases enriched the situation for the Yukon considerably above any proposals that were made by these inquiries.

The question of a further examination of the socio-economic impact of the project on the Yukon was dealt with in considerable detail by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As he made clear in response to unwarranted allegations of a number of members of the opposition, this second stage examination of the issues involved will provide a full opportunity for public consideration and discussion.

The second stage examination will be undertaken by the northern pipeline agency, and it will focus on the detailed terms and conditions which will be imposed on the company to maximize the benefits and minimize the adverse effects of the pipeline, which the Lysyk inquiry emphasized should be the principal objective of the exercise.

A number of speakers, notably the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) and the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes), raised the question of socio-economic considerations as they apply to northeastern British Columbia. I appreciate the concerns which hon. members have expressed. I am sure that they in turn understand that there are problems in connection with this issue involving the division of jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments. While the primary responsibility in this area rests with the British Columbia government, we recognize our responsibility for the welfare of native communities along the pipeline route. It is not yet clear how the provincial government intends to proceed, and we will want to obtain its views. For our part we would certainly be willing to consider having public hearings held in the region to examine the detailed terms and conditions that would apply to the project throughout northeastern British Columbia, as we plan to do in the Yukon.

Some interest has been expressed in discussions between Canada and British Columbia. I can tell hon. members that earlier this week I had a comprehensive survey, with the minister of energy and environment, the Hon. Jack Davis, on the interface between the federal government and the province of British Columbia with respect to the operation of the pipeline and the benefits that the province of B.C. will derive from this operation.

The hon. member for Yukon also raised a question as to who would be responsible for distribution of gas within communities in the territory. While that is a question which remains to be determined in consultation with the Yukon government, I understand that at least two companies have indicated an interest in resuming responsibility for that operation.

Mr. Nielsen: I hope it is not NCPC.

Mr. MacEachen: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Maine) underlined the importance of the provision we are making through an agreement with Foothills for the possible future electrification of its compressors in the southern Yukon in providing a potential base for future major expansion in electrical generating capacity in the territory. As he recognized, such a development could provide an opportunity for further expanding the industrial capacity of the Yukon and employment for the growing labour force of the Yukon.

I think there is very little I can add at this stage to the question of native land claims. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands complained that there was no provision in this legislation for the settlement of such claims. In my view it would be quite inappropriate for us to make such provision in this legislation.

The hon. member for Yukon thought we would be in for quite a shock if we considered that we were on the verge of settling claims in the Yukon. I can only repeat that the federal government is making and will make every effort to achieve a fair and just settlement just as quickly as possible. As hon. members will recall, the Lysyk inquiry concluded that it was quite possible to reach early agreement and considered that it was in the interests of Yukon Indians to do so in order to enable them to take full advantage of the benefits offered by the pipeline project.

Mr. Nielsen: That's right, but they don't believe that.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: The question of Canadian ownership—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), but his allotted time has expired. However, he may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for giving me additional time. I hope they will not regret their decision as I reach the conclusion of my remarks.

Let me turn to the question of Canadian ownership and equity participation in the pipeline. This subject was raised by a number of members of the official opposition and members of the New Democratic Party, and I have no doubt that hon. members will want to probe this issue more fully in the special committee.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) contended that there was nothing in the legislation that made any mention of conditions laid down with regard to the financing of the pipeline to make sure that Canadian content where it really counts—ownership—will be protected. I must advise the hon. member that on this point he is quite wrong. The majority Canadian ownership of the system in Canada is actually doubly protected under the legislation. The parent corporation, Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Limited, and the two sponsoring Canadian-owned companies which control it, Westcoast Transmission and Alberta Gas Trunk Line, cannot terminate, alter or amend their shareholders' agreement without the prior approval of the minister and the board.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not what he meant.

Mr. MacEachen: Further protection is provided under clause 12(a)(i) of schedule III of the bill, which requires the company to submit evidence to the minister and the National Energy Board prior to commencement of construction which establishes, in effect, that it is a Canadian controlled company as defined in the Foreign Investment Review Act.

• (2022)

An hon. Member: What about Canadians buying shares?

An hon. Member: What about Canadians generally?

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members have asked about Canadians generally and I want to say a word or two about that. Members have underlined the importance of ensuring that opportunity is provided for the widest possible acquisition of equity in the Foothills project by Canadians. Because Foothills will be funded on a project financing basis rather than by the more conventional means adopted by companies that are already going concerns, it will be essential for the sponsoring companies to put up all the required equity initially as a prerequisite to raising the necessary debt capital.

When the bill is before committee, members will have to ask themselves whether it would be feasible at that stage to insist that common shares be made generally available to the Canadian public and whether they would be an appropriate security for the average Canadian investor.

Mr. Nielsen: Only after completion.

Mr. MacEachen: The sponsoring companies have undertaken to make up to approximately 13 per cent of the total equity in the parent company available to the Canadian public. At a later date hon. members may wish to pursue in committee whether Foothills should be required to meet such a commitment once the project has been successfully completed and operations begun.

May I turn now to the arguments made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. He took great delight in portraying those of us who participated in the negotiations with the United States on the joint construction of this great undertaking as "innocents abroad." Despite the fact that we supposedly held all the cards, he suggested that Canadian negotiators were again outslickered by those shrewd Yankee traders.

Mr. Broadbent: They did not have to be very shrewd.

Mr. MacEachen: That refrain has been echoed mainly by members of the New Democratic Party who exhibit an innate sense of inferiority which they feel as a result of the long period spent in their particular part of the House of Commons. I feel no such sense of inferiority even though, as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) suggested this afternoon, I ought to feel it because I come from a "backward part" of Canada.

In this debate I have been waiting to find out where we have been outslickered. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands made some comments that I will deal with in a moment. I doubt there has ever been a negotiation undertaken with the United States or any other country that has not prompted some Canadians to proclaim that Canada got the worst of the bargain.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) had an unhappy complaint about all the instances in history when poor Canada had been outslickered by the United States. I find it rather interesting that some in the United States Congress seem to believe the same thing—but in the opposite way. They have been complaining that their negotiators ought to go back to Canada and improve the result obtained on the question of content, because it was obvious they had been outslickered by those shrewd Canadian negotiators.

I want to spend a moment or two with the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands in support of his allegation that we had been outslickered by those shrewd Yankee negotiators. His speech wavered between an expression of fear of the United States and an expression of disdain for the United States. He was not sure on which side he came down. As I understood his case, it rested on the contention that the United States desperately need the pipeline while Canada would not require gas from the Mackenzie Delta much before the mid-1990s, and might not need it at all until early next century. His analysis is now supported by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I do not know what he will say when I point out later that the paragon of economic analysis, the premier of Saskatchewan, disagreed with that view quite openly at the federal-provincial conference.

The hon. member said that Canada was put on the defensive by stressing the need to gain access to our Delta reserves, to which he would have attached a low priority. He would have attached a low priority to Canada's gaining access to our Delta reserves—I think that is important—and if not a low priority, no priority at all.

He went on to say that the Canadian bargaining position was strengthened because the United States desperately needed the gas and we do not. We had a further bargaining point because the United States would save $6 billion by transporting existing reserves by the overland route as opposed to the United States alternative, which apparently horrified their military authorities for security reasons.

Out of this fabricated "made in Canada" content policy the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands tried to build his argument. While he now tells us that the United States desperately needs access to Alaskan gas, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby told us on August 4 that there were reports put before President Carter which showed that the United States did not need the gas until the late 1980s. That is the argument he made in support of delaying the project. Now the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands says they desperately need the gas but that their military authorities were horrified at the prospect of an all-American route.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby repeated that unfounded allegation this afternoon. We know that the President of the United States received a report from his Department of Defence. The conclusion was that of the three transportation systems there was no overriding preference for one route over another when the analysis was based on military factors alone.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands referred to the saving of $6 billion to the United States by transporting this 22 trillion cubic feet of established Alaskan reserves via the overland route. I should inform him that the saving to Canada of transporting delta reserves of some five billion cubic feet through the joint system, as opposed to the all-Canadian alternative along the Mackenzie Valley, is estimated to be in the order of $2.5 billion. In relation to the size of our reserves there, the savings to Canada on this joint project are 60 per cent greater than is the case for the United States.

When you follow the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands down the dark alleys of his arguments you find that his arguments really fall apart. Of course, we on this side of the House differ fundamentally with the New Democratic Party on the question of the critical importance to Canada of gaining access on an economic basis to our reserves in the western Arctic. In this we share completely the view of the Conservative party as expressed by its leader in the debate last August, when he said that the primary goal is to deliver Canadian resources to Canadian markets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: My colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) very carefully explained why we consider it so vital to ensure access to our reserves in the Mackenzie Delta.

During the debate last August, the leader of the New Democratic Party was so concerned about the availability of gas reserves in Canada to meet future needs that he proposed, in effect, that we take the drastic step of abrogating our contracts to supply the United States after 1985 with any exports thereafter on a swap basis only. That was the course of action recommended by the leader of that party last August. This past week their chief spokesman said that we really do not need that gas.

I believe the New Democratic Party is prepared to put the future well-being of Canadians at stake in a numbers game based on widely varying estimates from private sources. We are not prepared to join the New Democratic Party in that particular gamble.

I wish to refer to the speech made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in which he underlined the importance to Canada of gaining access to Canadian gas in order to reduce our dependence on imported oil. In that connection, I wish to refer to what the premier of Saskatchewan said at the federal-provincial conference. I quote:

—I can't think of a better place for governments to start investing in our future than in energy. Jobs today—energy tomorrow.

In a few years, it's being predicted that Canada will have to import at least 600,000 barrels of oil a day. Even at current world prices, that's over $3 billion a year.

That's a $3 billion a year drain on our foreign currency reserves. That's $3 billion a year of inflationary pressure on our economy. That's nearly half the gross domestic product of the province of Saskatchewan. Three billion dollars a year and going up!

And yet there are people who say that governments should not build new energy projects now because they're afraid of inflation!

There are people who say that governments should not build new energy projects now because they do not understand the importance of access to these gas reserves to Canada in the pursuit of the goal of energy self-reliance and improving our balance of payments, particularly in financing the cost of the Quebec-Maritimes pipeline. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all the premiers suggested that an application ought to go before the National Energy Board as soon as possible to test the viability of that particular project.

I will not take very much time of the House to respond to the shop-worn argument of the NDP members with regard to the establishment of some kind of guarantees of high Canadian content. We did not insist on guarantees in our agreement with the United States for a number of reasons. First, they were not necessary. We are content today that Canadian industry is fully competitive, that it will be able to gain this business without legislated guarantees.

Next week the bill will be before the committee. Members of the New Democratic Party will be able to question the sponsors of the project. They will be able to ask them where they intend to buy their materials and whether they believe they can achieve the goal of nearly 90 per cent Canadian content. Up to the present time, Foothills have assured the National Energy Board, members of this party and me as minister that they intend to buy Canadian materials. They intend to buy Canadian steel and pipe, not Japanese pipe. Hon. members can ask the companies what they intend to do.

More than that, there is a provision in the bill by which the procurement plan listing the sources from which the company proposes to purchase its equipment, goods and materials must be submitted to the agency and the minister. If it is not satisfactory, it can be rejected by the agency and the minister. That is what is meant by effective control over Canadian content.

With regard to the suggestion that we have no ability to deal with unfair competition or dumping of foreign material, there is a provision in the bill which enables the minister to send back to the company any proposal or bid about which there is suspicion of unfair competition or dumping on the Canadian market.

In my opening speech, I argued that it is quite impossible for Canada to have these guarantees written into an international agreement without violating the provisions of our commitment under the General Agreement on Trade Tariffs. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands did not accept that argument. He is quite incorrect in suggesting that Canada and the United States are perfectly free under GATT to enter into an agreement which discriminates against other members by providing a guarantee of Canadian content. The non-discriminatory provisions of GATT do not apply to procurement by governments for their own purposes, but they certainly apply in the case of a pipeline project which is to be carried out by a private company for private purposes.

For many months we have heard suggestions from the New Democratic Party that the Americans were pressing for the adoption of a 48-inch high-pressure system from Whitehorse to Caroline in an effort to squeeze out potential Canadian suppliers. That charge was always quite untrue, but what is the response of the New Democratic Party now that we have indicated our intention to adopt a 56-inch pipe which no U.S. company is capable at present of producing? The argument advanced by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is that Canada had been outmanoeuvred by the United States, and the United States had garnered unto itself all of the pipe business. Lo and behold, when it was announced that the pipe selected was not even manufactured in the United States, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby suddenly changed the basis of his argument and said: "I have been talking to members of the steel industry and they tell me they are not really concerned about American competition, they are now concerned about Japanese competition." Of course, the implication of that argument is that the United States and Canada have so outmanoeuvred each other that they have handed over all the business to Japan.

● (2042)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How much Canadian content in the Alaska pipeline?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I really cannot refrain from quoting the immortal words of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on this particular point. He said on February 21, 1978, that: It is a total capitulation to American interests. The Canadian government has yielded to American pressure to allow more Japanese competition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: This will certainly go down on the record as one of the most absurd and most nonsensical statements ever made, even by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

I ask you to contrast that reaction from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby with other interest groups. You would think the president of Ipsco would have complained if he had been thrown off base. He said "We are delighted." The president of Stelco said "Tremendous." The vice-president of Foothills said "This is great." I am using general terms for their words. However, I will not use general terms for the statement issued by the office of the premier of Saskatchewan, Allan Blakeney. The premier of Saskatchewan said when we announced the decision that "This is a good decision for Canada." He did not say it was a total capitulation to American interests in order to get business for the Japanese."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I wish the former premier of Saskatchewan had updated himself on this question. On major points the premier of Saskatchewan has taken opposite positions from the New Democratic party in the House of Commons on the source of piping. He has not asked for guarantees. He asked at the federal-provincial conference if the pipe could be made in Canada, not if it will be made. All he wanted to do was compete, and he pointed out the benefits to his province of so doing.

On the question of energy projects he disagreed totally with the analysis of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands when he urged Canada to get on with new energy projects now. He underscored the importance of this particular project in improving our balance of payments situation and reducing our dependence upon foreign imported oil.

I regret to say that on the question of jobs for Canadians the members of the New Democratic Party have been creating a false issue where no issue exists. I once again remind them of the benefits to Canada that are contained in this agreement with the United States and in the legislation that is before the House. The New Democratic Party intend to vote against this legislation because they say there are no guarantees for Canadian jobs. If their will prevailed the legislation would be defeated and Canadian business would have no opportunity to compete. Canadian workers would also have no opportunity to compete, and indeed the plans for expansion in Hamilton and Regina would have to be delayed.

An hon. Member: You are ready for the Senate.

Mr. MacEachen: All I can say is that the Canadian people and the House of Commons will bear in mind the irresponsible approach to this bill by the members of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would like to suggest that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has already spoken in this debate, and unless he has a point of order, I will not recognize him.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the Deputy Prime Minister was granted a half hour extra time for his speech I wonder if he would reciprocate the courtesy by answering one question. The Deputy Prime Minister has indicated he would.

Following the Deputy Prime Minister's long, interesting and at times even factual discourse, I noted he did not deal with a matter I raised concerning a speech made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on February 20, and it is really very germane to his whole argument. He said on that date with reference to the problem of competition that we really did not have to worry because we had procedures under our Anti-dumping Act that would enable us to deal with the Japanese or the Italians or all these people who managed to build the Alaska pipeline in the face of intense Canadian competition. As reported at the top of page 3036 of Hansard he said:

It should be noted that neither (11A) of the anti-dumping regulations nor the imposition of countervailing duties for reasons of export financing subsidies appear to have been tested as yet. Moreover, the anti-dumping option would really only come into play after the fact, which renders its use, other than as a threat mechanism, somewhat ineffective.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said in fact the anti-dumping regulations, which the government is relying on so heavily to ensure fair competition, are ineffective. Would the Deputy Prime Minister comment on that?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby raises that point. I just do not have the clause before me at the moment, but within this bill there is provision under which the minister or the agency may, quite apart from the authority resting with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, send back or cause to be sent back for review any bid or any contract.

An hon. Member: Will it be done?

Mr. MacEachen: It is subject to the approval of the minister through the procurement plan. It will be sent back if there is any reason to believe there is any dumping, any subsidy or unfair competition. That is provided for within this bill. There is also, and I think this is important, the procurement plan. Before this is approved we will know where all this material is to come from and then we will have to say yes or no. That seems to me to be the kind of effective control the hon. member wants, and I believe when he gets to the committee he will agree with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier this afternoon I intervened and asked the Deputy Prime Minister whether he would entertain a question and he indicated at that time he would at the end of his speech. My question really is non-partisan and of a non-political nature.

An hon. Member: I am sure.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, it is. Just wait a minute. We and the Deputy Prime Minister have been talking about job creation in the Yukon. What I would like to hear from the Deputy Prime Minister is what measures, if any, are contained in this bill, or what measures will the government entertain in respect of the pre-training of natives—that is, native born Yukoners and non-native born, including Inuits, Indians, whites and so on—to ensure that these men and women will be able to compete with those from outside the Yukon for the jobs that will be available when this pipeline is being built.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the question of hiring of Yukoners and of their training, there is an undertaking by Foothills that it will give preference to northern workmen. That is one of the undertakings it has given, and that must be lived up to. One of the direct costs that may be associated with the pipeline is the cost of training which the company will have to bear. We expect that the Department of Employment and Immigration and Foothills will undertake whatever training is required so that the maximum advantage can be taken in respect of this project by the residents of the Yukon.

It is further my understanding that it will not be possible for people just to wander into the Yukon unless they get pre-clearance in the south. The hiring arrangements will be controlled in that way.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the Deputy Prime Minister is being so co-operative, in view of the continuing assurance we have from the minister about the competitivenes of Canadian industry, and the assurance from the industry itself that it is competitive, will the minister bring the House into his confidence by advising us what percentage of the Alaska oil pipeline was constructed by Canadian contractors, and what percentage of Canadian steel was used in that pipeline which was subject to the same open bidding he has suggested for the gas pipeline?

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not have those statistics. I am sure the hon. member has them. It may be that Canada did not get the business, and I do not know the reasons. I do know in respect of this line to be built in Canada that my confidence remains unshaken as to the ability of Canadian industry and Canadian workmen to bid. I should add that I was really quite heartened in that when we made the announcement of the 56-inch pipe the president of Stelco said: "We can get this business".

An hon. Member: He didn't say that.

Mr. MacEachen: The national director of the 185,000-member United Steelworkers Union, rather, when told of the board's ruling, said "That's good . . . I think it is a wise decision". The union leader said that the Canadian steel industry is quite competitive and Canadian mills may also be able to get some of the American section of the $10-billion pipeline to bring natural gas from Alaska to U.S. markets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: You cannot blame me for saying we can get the business when the national director of the steelworkers union says that, in his view we can get the Canadian business and part of the American line. I say, more power to him. I wish he were an active member of the NDP and would support this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I will recognize the hon. member for Yukon on a point of order, but let me suggest we are now getting into questions, and questions can be asked at the committee stage.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have one very brief question for the minister. Perhaps I might assist in regard to the question which was advanced by the hon. member for Brant by saying that AGTL has had a training program underway for the past six years, training northern native Yukoners to take over operational positions on the pipeline. The government has been slow and has nothing in place as yet.

The minister mentioned in his remarks that he made a better deal with the United States in connection with the tax revenues that will accrue as a result of the construction of the pipeline in the Yukon. Pipelines are normally taxed, somewhat higher than would be the case in the provinces. Because of this these tax revenues would be accrued anyway. The $200 million for the heritage fund, however, was something that Lysyk recommended, and something the NEB recommended should be in addition to these tax revenues. How does the minister explain the loss of that heritage fund of $200 million in face of the fact that the tax revenues are something to be expected in any event?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, it was not a question of "in any event". It was a question of negotiating this particular tax arrangement as a substitution for negotiating the $200 million suggested by the National Energy Board, or the $200 million suggested by Lysyk. This was a substitution, and the end benefits to the Yukon are much greater. The net dollar result is enormously better for the Yukon.

A question arises, of course, as to the purpose for which the fund was accruing. How will it be spent? There may be some difference of opinion as to whether or not we should put aside the $200 million of that more than $1 billion for the purpose suggested by Dean Lysyk. I think that is a legitimate argument to put forward. But there can be no argument which would support the suggestion that we lost $200 million. We gained more than a billion in negotiating.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is the following one. Mr. MacEachen, seconded by Mr. Goyer, moved:

That Bill C-25, an act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be now read a second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. Broadbent, seconded by Mr. Peters, moved in amendment thereto:

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"Bill C-25, an act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline".

The question is on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Broadbent) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on a northern gas pipeline.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been a suggestion that we might consider sending the document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters", and so on, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. If we can get agreement on that I would like to move that motion; I believe agreement is forthcoming.

[Mr. Speaker.]

● (2202)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is quite agreeable to us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree. Indeed, we believe that the whole Liberal platform should be sent to that committee.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has the consent of the House to move that motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts, subsequent to 1970", tabled on the 1st of February 1978, be referred to the Standing Commmittee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN CULTURE—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO CULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members will recall, as a result of meetings which took place on Tuesday of this week between the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) and representatives of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres, yesterday I attempted to find out from the Secretary of State what action he had taken, particularly because of the very strongly worded press release and comments put forward by members of that association as a result of their meetings with the Secretary of State indicating the very serious situation in which a number of professional theatre groups in this country find themselves because of funding policies emanating from that department.

Members will know that over the past 20 years we have seen a tremendous expansion of professional theatre activities in this country. It is difficult to believe now that back in 1957 there were only three professional theatre companies in Canada. In the last 20 years we have seen an expansion in the number of professional theatre groups to some 133.

As hon. members know, a good deal of the incentive and encouragement for this has come from governments represented by parties on both sides of this House through regular grants put forward basically through the Canada Council. However, in recent years we have seen a situation in which the government has virtually frozen its funding.

I think it is unfortunate that the Secretary of State, in answering questions yesterday, left the clear impression that there was no real freezing of the funds of these professional theatre groups. To allow that kind of misunderstanding to stand on the record does not do him credit and certainly does not clarify the very serious situation which exists in respect of professional theatre groups. As they themselves have said, in spite of ticket price increases on the part of more than two-thirds of their members, they have been faced with a situation in which some 55 per cent have had to lay off staff, 74 per cent have virtually had to reduce the number of actors employed, and 55 per cent have incurred a greatly increased deficit. As the representatives of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres remarked, their situation is intolerable.

The situation is well underlined in the tabling of estimates which took place yesterday. The over-all estimate of government expenditures is up by 9.3 or 9.8 per cent, depending on which figures are used. That is close in line with the average cost in the consumer price index, which is up 9.5 per cent. Even the estimates of the Secretary of State have shown a whopping increase. It runs into hundreds of millions of dollars, or approximately 25 per cent. If one looks specifically at the grants for arts and culture, one discovers the main estimates are down some 21.6 per cent. This indicates a very serious lack of commitment and concern on the part of the Secretary of State for professional theatre groups in this country.

Obviously thousands of people are now making their livelihood in professional theatre activities from coast to coast. At a time of rising unemployment and at a time when it is increasingly difficult to give people encouragement so that they can expect to have what is rightfully theirs—a job with a meaningful income—it is simply shocking that in this area of government responsibility there is no action and a declining commitment. Not only is there a freezing of the budget, there is a reducing of the federal budget in relation to this important segment of cultural activity in Canada.

Another thing which is of perhaps even greater concern is the impact that short-ranged and insufficient support lends to the importance of the cultural fabric of this country. Much has been written and many speeches have been given about the importance of maintaining national unity. The Secretary of State should know how important his role must be in maintaining the fabric of national unity.

A few weeks ago I was in Calgary. I was amazed to see the amount of professional theatre activity which has mushroomed in that city. I met a number of groups there, as well as a number of groups from across the country. I know the meaningful contribution these groups make toward national unity and identity. For the government to play fast and loose with cultural activity, which has increased over the last 20 years, is sheer irresponsibility.

I trust the parliamentary secretary who will be responding tonight will provide some measure of encouragement. In the three meetings which have occurred, and in the letter of the minister to the president of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres, which was sent approximately two months late, there was no encouragement whatsoever. That is simply not a sufficient answer, in light of the serious plight of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for his question. He will be pleased to know that today the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) received the first instalment on the 100,000 cards urging greater government support, as promised by the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres. The minister looks forward to a continued flood of mail and a continued expression of public interest in and support for our theatre in Canada.

In response to the question posed by the hon. member, I should like to quote from the minister's letter sent to Dr. Gregory Poggi, the chairman of the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres, Pact. The letter answers directly the concerns of Pact and those concerns expressed by the hon. member. It reads as follows:

> I need no convincing on the subject of more public support for our artistic and cultural life: all the performing arts, including theatre, together with our visual artists, writers, filmmakers and cultural institutions such as museums, galleries, libraries, deserve and need greater financial support from the public they serve. As Secretary of State I am acutely aware that Canada's cultural growth—particularly in the realm of the arts—has long depended on the federal government's support and that of its cultural agencies such as the Canada Council, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Canadian Film Development Corporation, National Film Board, and National Arts Centre. In recent years, support from other levels of government, from the private sector and from the public directly through audiences has broadened the financial base of the arts.

The letter goes on to state:

> The $13.6 million increase in federal cultural spending that I announced last September is concrete proof of the government's commitment to Canada's cultural and artistic growth. Not only do these new funds permit us to give more support through some programs whose value to Canadian arts and culture is well recognized. Perhaps more significantly, the funds are contributing in a variety of new areas hitherto unsupported.
> The 1977-78 increase in the Canada Council's budget . . . has meant that the council has had in many instances to keep grants at 1976-77 levels and to forgo this year making the first sustaining grants to newer companies. That in turn has forced many theatre and dance companies and orchestras to hold back on plans to more ambitious productions and schedules, or to seek more vigorously alternative sources of financing: private sector contributions, expanded subscription drives, for example. But I think it is unfair to say that because the government has, on the one hand, limited the over-all growth of an agency's budget and, on the other, provided new funds for specific areas of its total cultural program, it is taking from Peter to give to Paul.

I would like to emphasize further that the $13.6 million that the Secretary of State announced last September was new money for ongoing and new programs across the spectrum of federal cultural activities. Theatres do benefit! Here is the specific allocation in this area: The National Theatre School received $525,000 in capital grants in 1977-78 and 1978-79. The total over four years is $2.1 million. The Canada Council touring office, received $765,000 in 1977-78 and $1,065 million in 1978-79 for increased tours, workshops for impressarios and tour organizers.

The theatre, music and dance sections received $400,000 in both 1977-78 and 1978-79 for national cultural events involving participation of performing artists and arts companies, and for master classes enabling students to work with professionals. The National Arts Centre received $150,000 in 1977-78 and $1 million in 1978-79 to establish a theatre company, consisting of two small nuclear groups, one English and the other French, for creation and touring of theatrical productions.

I trust that the information from the minister's letter to the chairman of Pact, and this added information on the allocation of some of the $13.6 million, conveys to the hon. member for Egmont the commitment of the Secretary of State and that of the government to promoting professional theatre in Canada.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—REASON FOR DELAY OF FINAL PAYMENT TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, Manitoba produces 51 per cent of the fish that is handled by the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation located in Transcona, Manitoba. Due to the revelations that we have seen in the press in the last month and a half, I would say that the reputation of northern Manitoba fishermen is certainly in jeopardy.

At a meeting of the Northern Manitoba Commercial Fishermen's Association held on November 22 and 23, 1977, the chairman of the corporation, Mr. Peter Moss, said at that time that the fishermen would be receiving their final payment, which is due about the first part of December, in a couple of weeks. However, shortly after December 1, the chairman of the FFMC announced that no final payment would be made at that time. What has taken place since that time has certainly disheartened fishermen in Manitoba and, I am sure, has put what was once a very viable fishery into a precarious situation.

What had led to this situation is the fact that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has in its inventory some 14 million to 15 million pounds of fish which were purchased by the corporation. Of course, we read in the paper that much of this fish, due to freezer burn and to being stored for long periods of time, must now be dumped.

On November 22 and 23 at the meeting of the Northern Manitoba Fishermen's Association the chairman of the association, in reply to fishermen's questions, said he is getting sick and tired of people running down an efficient, well running corporation. "What are we fighting about", he asked. "We are trying to peddle your fish", he said. "We must work together closely". He suggested that they look at the beef producers and grain growers and count their blessings. Two short weeks after that the chairman said there was no final payment for the fishermen.

• (2217)

In 1969 the corporation was established, and its mandate was to market fish. Since that time the corporation has been getting into other aspects of the fishing business. I suggest that the corporation has spoiled the reputation of Canadian fishermen. The quality of fish has deteriorated. It will take a long time to re-establish fish markets.

Another point is that the ability of salesmen to sell fish harvested by fishermen has diminished. It has been suggested by the Northern Manitoba Fishermen's Association that these salesmen be put on commission instead of salary.

On the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press for February 18 we find an article entitled "Freshwatergate?" That pertains to some very serious allegations concerning the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. The agency has been accused of changing package dates as well as stamps.

Another article is entitled "Rabbi's OK was forged". That article accuses the corporation of changing dates on fish which had been stamped for gefilte fish and so forth.

There have been other allegations. It has been alleged that fillets have been shipped to a city dump for burning because they had been shipped to New York and some 30,000 to 40,000 pounds had been rejected by inspectors due to freezer burn. It has been alleged that trout has been kept in cold storage for far too long, and that freezer burn had to be trimmed off. It has been alleged that dates on packaging have been changed to make it appear as though the fish was fresh.

The fishermen of northern Manitoba who must try to harvest fish and get it to market in a fresh condition are losing everything they put into their operations. Technically the fish still belongs to the fishermen. They have not received their final payments, even though a partial payment has now been made. This is very discouraging for commercial fishermen.

I would like to see an immediate investigation conducted into the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. We have dealt with the chairman of the corporation many times in the committee. The chairman has been giving the committee a whitewash job. He has also been giving fishermen's associations whitewash jobs. He just cannot seem to understand that fishermen are concerned about putting a quality product on the market for human consumption. Fishermen do not want their products stored for long periods of time. There is an allegation that fish is being dumped under the direction of management. Fishermen are complaining about that and wondering why the price of their product cannot be reduced and sold rather than dumping the product. There has been an allegation that tons of fish have been left in the open and allowed to spoil. I ask that an investigation into the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation of Manitoba be started immediately.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has ten members. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) talks about irregularities and deviations from good corporate policy. I would remind the hon. member that four of those directors are active fishermen in the province of Manitoba. Although it is a Crown corporation the hon. member should realize when he makes remarks regarding the corporation in the province of Manitoba that he is not only hurting it but also the fishermen who play a very active role in the organization. I suppose I could say that the corporation has had a success which has led to some problems within the board.

● (2222)

The Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, as at April 30, 1977, completed the highest sales records and profits ever.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): And the fish are still in storage.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member and I hope he will allow me the same consideration.

Prices this past summer were increased and landings were up considerably for the summer fishing season. As a result this attracted fishermen who delivered greater volumes and substantially increased their earnings. Consequently, the corporation found itself at its borrowing ceiling and the board of directors made the decision to defer final payments until the cash flow improved.

On January 25, 1978, the corporation's board authorized the payment to the fishermen of 50 per cent of the final payment to be made February 24. The remainder will be paid as the cost flow situation continues to improve. In addition, the corporation is currently seeking inventory financing from the federal fisheries prices support board. This request is presently under consideration. This initiative will provide assistance until markets improve.

The Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation also provides financial assistance to fishermen to cover start-up costs when necessary. This program is well known to fishermen and is designed to assist them. Fishermen, therefore, have every reason to continue to fish this winter as they have in the past.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

SEAL HUNT—WARNING TO VIOLATORS OF PENALTIES FOR ILLEGAL ENTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. A petition from some 40,000 Newfoundland citizens presented to the House of Commons last year gave rise to a non-partisan amendment to the Fisheries Act which requires permission from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment to enter the area of the seal hunt and gives increased powers to fisheries officers to apprehend violators. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House orders that the minister of fisheries and the environment give warning to intended violators of the act of the penalties that they will face on illegal entry, such warning to be given such wide publicity that will prevent the needless hostility which could occur at this year's hunt.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE INCREASE IN PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as one who remembers not only the depression years, but also as one who remembers—for an even longer period of time—what the CPR has done to its employees, both working and retired, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), who also remembers:

That this House, noting that the Canadian Pacific Railway pays its president a salary of $330,000 a year, calls on the government to review and make public the massive extent to which this corporation receives public funds, and insists that the CPR increase immediately the level of pensions paid to its retired employees and their survivors, at least to the full extent recommended in the Noel Hall report of 1976.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING AGE OF ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering the unprecedented rate of unemployment now affecting the country and the fact that numerous workers are forced to retire before age 65 and consequently are not entitled to the old age pension, which creates unjustified difficulties for them, and considering that early retirement would greatly contribute to reducing unemployment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take the necessary measures so that those retiring at age 60 or more could benefit from the old age security pension as well as the guaranteed income supplement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POLICIES LIBERAL PARTY PUT FORWARD AT CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the reports of wholesale theft and fraudulent conversion, without colour of right, but attempting to appear to the right, of policies and principles of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada by pragmatic Liberal swingers at the weekend Liberal policy-swiping convention in Ottawa, and in view of the hanging given by liberal swingers to the leftist, state-ist and collectivist view of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as enunciated by him in rare but candid and frank New Year's confessions between electoral bouts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House direct the Minister of Justice to investigate and to charge the Liberal Party of Canada with theft of policies and principles of the PC party, though not with use of the same, and that the courts be informed that a plea for mercy be considered in view of the desperation as to electoral prospects that induced the said theft and fraudulent conversion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

RESOLUTIONS PUT FORWARD AT LIBERAL PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Liberal party resolutions approved this past weekend calling for an increase in government expenditures in many specific areas, while at the same time approving the tightening of the money supply, halting growth in the public service and limiting government spending, I move, seconded by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—that hon. relic from the depression days:

That this House agrees that this hallucinatory batch of resolutions supports the view of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that the Liberal party has gone to pot.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONTRIBUTION OF CANADIANS OF EUROPEAN DESCENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made in Hanna, Alberta, on February 24, 1978, and in view of the fact such statement described European Canadians as "thinkers" and not "builders" of this great country and that those Canadians of European descent, whether from the Ukraine, Italy, Poland, Germany, Scotland or England, have all contributed greatly to Canadian society, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Daudlin):

That this House condemn the artificial distinction made by the Leader of the Opposition as to North American and European Canadians, and that this House recognizes the great contribution of Canadians of European descent to our society and our nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, no one said "No" on this side. If anybody said "No", it was on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It was a motion condemning the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). If the hon. member wants me to ask for unanimous consent again, I will.

ENTRY INTO CANADA OF OFFSHORE WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that agricultural offshore labour is vital to the continuation of a healthy Canadian agricultural community, especially in horticultural pursuits, and in view of the fact that agricultural organizations have repeatedly asked the government to continue arrangements for offshore agricultural workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the government continue the program of allowing offshore agricultural workers into Canada at levels not less than those of previous years.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—REASON FOR DROP IN JANUARY EXPORTS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, perhaps I could direct my question to the second acting minister of industry, trade and commerce, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the government has represented for some time that our "crash dollar", which crashed down to 89 cents, would at least aid exports, will the minister indicate what happened in the month of January, when our exports dropped 16.9 per cent, a drop even greater than our imports—just the reverse of what was represented?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I happen to have the answer to that question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1417)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, because some of the comments on January commodity exports were misleading, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce very diligently sent me some notes so that I would be able to answer the concern of the hon. member. We have to look at a number of things. First, the trade balance. The commodity trade balance in January, 1978, was $306 million. This is a very high level indeed, since it would amount to an annual rate of $3.6 billion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Read on.

Mr. Trudeau: Second, we have to look at the record over the year. Canada obtained a merchandise trade surplus of—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Motions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I thought hon. members opposite wanted some information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is very simple; put it on motions.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not understand. If the House is concerned about this very high figure, perhaps—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question concerned a statistical matter for the month of January. Up to this moment, that is the question being answered. I will not let it go on too long, but the question is being addressed.

Mr. Trudeau: I was saying that Canada obtained a merchandise trade surplus of $2.9 billion in 1977, even with a deficit of $1.5 billion in crude petroleum. Therefore, Canada improved over the past two years by over $3.4 billion. Third, our export performance in the last two years—the volume of our exports—has risen by about 22 per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The answer may be too lengthy. The hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my further supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. When he said that he had the answers, presumably that means the second acting minister of industry, trade and commerce does not have the answers. The Prime Minister started to quote certain figures. I would be very pleased if he would give us the current account trade deficit estimate now for Canada, bearing in mind the January turndown in the figures. Would he indicate whether, in fact, we may expect the original estimate of approximately $4.5 billion in current account trade deficit this year, or may it be even higher?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, now the hon. member is concerned with the current account. His question was about trade performance. It is on this that I have figures from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I am sure the current account figures could be forwarded to me by the Minister of Finance, if the hon. member wants to know. The trade figures are extremely important. In the past two years, from 1975 to 1976, the value of exports of motor vehicles has increased by 52 per cent; automotive parts, by 69 per cent; chemicals by 70 per cent; industrial machinery, by 25 per cent; lumber, by 146 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Don't be such a phony.

Mr. Trudeau: Are you not happy that trade is going well?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LEVEL OF CURRENT ACCOUNT TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister. He must feel that the entire nation is filled with Canadians who are naive, when he attempts to give an answer like the one he just gave. My question was with respect to the current account trade deficit. The figures the Prime Minister referred to are the merchandise trade figures, and when an estimated $8 billion of current account deficit is subtracted, one ends up with a $4 billion to $5 billion current account trade deficit.

After explaining that to the Prime Minister, would he indicate whether the current estimate is $4 billion, or is it even higher with respect to the current account trade deficit, bearing in mind that as our dollar hovers, now, around 89 cents, it is the current account trade deficit which may push it even lower unless the government does something to regain not only domestic confidence but international confidence in Canada's economic future?

● (1422)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I imagine the hon. member is talking about the current account deficit, not about the trade deficit because, as he knows, there is no trade deficit. He is mixing the two terms. He has asked me a question—

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about the current account deficit.

Mr. Trudeau: The figures which alarm the hon. member—one can understand why he is alarmed—show that there was a slight fall in trade performance in January over December.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about the current account deficit.

Mr. Trudeau: That is something else, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about it.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course there is a current account deficit. We have said that in the House. We have explained that that is why we are calling on the stand-by credit. That is why we are trying to do something in the tourist area, where we have an enormous current account deficit.

Mr. Stevens: How much?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know how much tourist deficit there is, but certainly it is a substantial amount. That is why the first ministers and myself, just two weeks ago, undertook to act very seriously in this area.

Mr. Stevens: How much is there in the total current account?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Stevens: Answer my question.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member wants me to answer, Mr. Speaker, he should listen.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—CONCLUSIONS OF CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): I have a question for the Prime Minister, who seems to be full of electoral beans today. Does the Prime Minister realize that the Canadian dollar has been devalued by 26 per cent as against the Zambian kwacha?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Last year, I pointed out to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that devaluation of the dollar was not a permanent solution to our trade ills, but the minister rejected that and said that the devalued dollar, the "Chrétien dollar", the dollar with the backside gone out of it, is the answer to our trade ills.

The Conference Board of Canada put out a report last week. I ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees with the conclusions in the report of the Conference Board that devaluation of the dollar is no permanent solution to our trade ills, and that growing deficits in manufactured goods, future large shortfalls in the oil and gas trade, deficits in service payments, including tourism, and the impact of negotiations with GATT, will have an adverse impact on our economic future.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not only do we agree, but I said that very thing in my speech in the House last October when I indicated that devaluation of the Canadian dollar might be a temporary solution, provided we accepted the judgment of the world markets that this meant we have to work harder to perform better, and thus be more competitive. It is good that the hon. member understands this; it might lead him to the conclusion that he would be unwise to speculate on Zambian currency as against Canadian currency. But if he wants to do it, it is his own dough and he can do it.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not intend to do the cha-cha with the kwacha with the Prime Minister. I am glad the Prime Minister understands these matters, but it is too bad he does not act on them. I ask the Prime Minister this question. Statistics Canada, in their advance estimates for 1978, show that the total of capital expenditures this year in all sectors of the Canadian economy will increase by only 4.8 per cent above 1977 figures. The figures for 1977 were 7 per cent higher than those for 1976, that is, less than the inflation rate; new construction will have a 4.8 per cent gain over 1977—and 1977 was a desperate year— and this increase is below the 8.1 per cent advance in 1977. The same with capital expenditures—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

● (1427)

Mr. Crosbie: This is not the Liberal convention. We have Mr. Speaker here to keep order. These forecasts paint a very grim economic picture for this year. Has the Prime Minister any response to these very disturbing forecasts by Statistics Canada? These are not Liberal party statistics.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in order to interpret those figures, I would have to know if the percentages the hon. member gave are in real terms or in money terms. If they are in real terms, that is good, and I thank the hon. member for bringing them to the House.

Mr. Crosbie: They were in money terms.

JOB-CREATING PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION TO INTRODUCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to help the Prime Minister in interpreting this question. The figures given refer to a forecast by Statistics Canada in real terms and indicate a net decline in investment for 1978 of about 3 per cent. Considering that the government's own document produced for the first ministers' conference said that an average of at least a 7.3 per cent increase was required in 1978 to produce the 300,000 new jobs which are necessary, can the Prime Minister indicate whether the government intends to bring any new job-creating programs before parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this forecast: I will gladly look at it. If it is only just out, I suppose it was available in some form to the government two weeks ago when we spoke to the first ministers. Therefore, I think the actions and policies we have brought forward are meant to deal with this precise situation.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, by his answer the Prime Minister has compounded the problem. If the figures were available to the government two weeks ago at the time of the first ministers' conference, why did the Minister of Finance forecast that we would have an increase in investment of 7.3 per cent? In real terms, Statistics Canada says there will be a net decline in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent. The government has indicated that we need a minimum of 300,000 new jobs a year to bring unemployment down to 5 per cent by the beginning of 1982. With this level of investment we will clearly not do that. Manufacturing is operating at only 80 per cent capacity. The private sector did not respond to give-away programs last year, for obvious reasons: businessmen are not stupid; they are not going to expand operations if there is 20 per cent unused capacity.

Considering this very real and serious situation, will the government now allow tax cuts for consumers in order to stimulate demand for manufacturing? Will the government bring forward public investment programs for a shipping fleet on the east coast and for urban transit programs for our cities to produce jobs?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is repeating the same lesson he has been giving us for the past month. The Minister of Finance and I have indicated to him that he is making the mistake of looking at this question in static terms. We had a first ministers' conference precisely because the situation was serious. All the first ministers, as well as myself, felt it very urgent to adjust our policies and to create a measure of confidence in falling price levels, in increased productivity and in a more competitive Canadian economic position. That is why we had that conference and that is why we are more optimistic than the hon. member, who prefers to look at past figures and present figures as though there has been no policy change.

Mr. Broadbent: It is clear that the Prime Minister and his party are not at the radical centre of Canadian politics; they are at the dead centre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I am using Statistics Canada figures, which show that the private sector will not obtain the investment that is absolutely essential if we are to create jobs. Is the Prime Minister saying he would rather spend $4 billion—which is what we will spend on unemployment insurance next year in pay-outs to people for doing nothing—than invest so that people will have the opportunity to work?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, that is not what I am saying. I am saying that this government is bringing forward policies and legislation which will create investment and jobs.

Mr. Broadbent: Where are they?

Mr. Trudeau: They are before the House.

Mr. Stevens: There is nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: The pipeline legislation, for instance, is before the House. The NDP persists in feeling that we will not create jobs, but I can assure the hon. member that that is not the feeling of the country.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST MUNICIPALITIES BE ASSISTED TO MEET COMMITMENTS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister. He seems to forget that suggestions were made by members of the opposition and that the government is not quite willing when special rates are requested to transport ore from west to east so as to carry on our activities in Northwestern Quebec. However, the Minister of Finance stated during the weekend that the depreciation of the Canadian dollar was helpful for our exports, but he forgot to say that as a result of that same depreciation some twenty Quebec municipalities are unable to repay their loans made in Switzerland and abroad. Could the Prime Minister then tell us what he intends to do to help those municipalities meet their commitments abroad?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit leader is versed enough in monetary matters to know that when a currency depreciates in relation to another, it is due to the fact that this country is importing rather than exporting goods and services of all kinds. The reaction of the monetary system is to devaluate the currency of the country which is importing too much and is not exporting enough. This makes it possible to export at more competitive prices. In such a way, the economy can improve. This is why the Minister of Finance indicated that a devaluated dollar is warning the Canadian economy that it should be more competitive. This is the lesson which should be learned by the government and the opposition parties.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The purpose of the first question I directed to the Prime Minister was to find out what he meant to do for the municipalities which, because of the current dollar devaluation, are faced with the huge problem of not being able to reimburse the money they have borrowed in Switzerland and other countries. Therefore, I should like to know what, if anything, the Prime Minister can do to help these municipalities meet their commitments.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the municipality, corporation or individual seeking a loan on a foreign market is aware that such a loan will be exposed to exchange fluctuation of both the Canadian dollar and the foreign currencies. This situation, which has been in effect since 1970, remains unchanged. For a few years, the Canadian dollar was worth more than its American counterpart; now it is worth less. The borrowers on foreign exchange markets are aware of this. They are also aware that, if the Canadian dollar drops in value, things will be more difficult, and that if it increases in value, they will be easier. Both situations have occurred over the past six or seven years, and borrowers are as a rule serious people who can assume their responsibilities.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I should like to put one last supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As the municipalities are adult enough to know exactly where the problem lies, and as today they are up against the problem of reimbursing their debts which they cannot afford to do, I ask the Prime Minister what he intends to do and if he will finally accept to help those municipalities finance themselves here in Canada, instead of being forced to borrow money abroad, by granting them interest free loans or privileged rate loans from the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, two things are important: first, and the hon. member knows it full well, the municipalities do not fall within federal jurisdiction. When they borrow, municipalities do so under provincial laws or authorization. We have no control over those loans whether it be where they are made, the interest rates that apply, the amounts or the terms. We have no control whatsoever in those fields. If a problem exists, the municipalities can go to the provincial government.

As for the Bank of Canada lending without interest, I explained not so long ago, barely a month ago, to the hon. member, that when the government of Canada borrows from the citizens, it pays them interest: When the leader of the Social Credit Party buys savings bonds, he receives interest from the government: in other words, the government itself pays interest. So, clearly, when individuals or municipalities borrow, they must pay interest.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON POWDERED SKIM MILK

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture: it is prompted by a statement made last week to the Food Conference by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the effect that the country is facing a nutrition crisis. Given that fact, and the importance of powdered skim milk in the diet of low income and fixed income people in Canada, declining farm incomes and rising food prices, would the minister explain to the House and to the country why he decided at this time to remove the consumer subsidy from skim milk powder?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it was based on the use of skim milk powder and whether the subsidy was doing the things we wanted it to do. Statistics Canada has taken a survey of over 3,000 families which shows that this subsidized product was not being used by the poor people it was intended for; the biggest percentage was used by middle income people or those who could afford the other type of product.

Instead of consumption of this product increasing because of its low price, it continued to go down. This amazed us, because so many told us that the right thing to do was to make sure this product was available to people on low income. It should also be noted that government programs such as indexing and transfer payments provide more income for low income families. It is estimated that indexing of family allowances, old age security pensions, guaranteed income supplements and other—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A supplementary question; the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister is going to talk his way out of this one, as it defies explanation. I ask the minister who I know has a human heart beneath that gruff exterior if he would explain to the House what measures the government intends to take to ensure that the subsidy on powdered skim milk, an important dietary element to most Canadians—including those on middle or low incomes—is replaced, given the fact that it will mean an approximately 40 per cent increase in the price of powdered skim milk in this country for people who can least afford it.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not have thought that what I was saying about indexing pensions, transfer of payments, etc., was important; But they are for the poor people too. In 1977, transfers to low income people amounted to $589 million—not the $13 million with which we were subsidizing skim milk powder, but there was an equivalent of $589 million more to benefit the poor peole of our country so they could make their own purchases in their own manner.

We are trying to develop a program, with the Department of National Health and Welfare and others, to make the product available to people in the far northern regions of our country who cannot receive liquid milk. I was most disappointed that the program was not more successful in getting nutrition to the people who need it most, because this came out of my departments' budget and I thought it was the right thing to do. It turned out that the people using this product were those who could afford fluid milk, so the program has cost the government more money than it should because we were making powder and butter. When you sell fluid milk, you do not have those extra costs which are such a tremendous burden to the dairy industry and to the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. McGrath: A final supplementary question. Would the minister explain to the House the economic results of his actions? Why will Canadians now pay more for powdered skim milk than consumers in Japan, for the same Canadian product?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, whatever Japan does with the product is up to them, but I would doubt we would be paying more than Japan because in actual economic jargon what Japan is doing is buying it at world market prices. Whether they buy the surplus product from us or from the European Community, in most instances they are putting it on their domestic market at a higher price than we are putting it on our domestic market.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is significant that consumption of this highly nutritional product was 43 million pounds two years ago, and it appears we will be lucky if it is over 26 million pounds this year. All these people who spread doom and gloom about the buying power of our people should check the statistics. They would find that only 10 per cent of our people live below the poverty line. That is a drop from 20 per cent in just a few short years.

FISHERIES

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—INQUIRY RESPECTING INVESTIGATION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment: it has to do with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and, in particular, two affidavits which I sent earlier today to the minister. In light of the statements made in those two affidavits, would the minister now indicate to the House whether he will immediately put in place an investigation into the marketing practices and financial arrangements of that corporation?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, not only have I received a letter from the hon. member indicating that he would ask these questions, but I have also seen the clippings from the Winnipeg Free Press, in which he has obviously orchestrated some kind of campaign announcing that affidavits might or might not come. By the way, these affidavits have nothing to do with marketing. If what is contained in the affidavits is perceived by the hon. member as being correct, and if he is interested in these matters being investigated, the least he should do is to give them to the attorney general of Manitoba.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. I am not in a position to editorialize on these affidavits; they are statements made by persons who were employed there at one time. Does the minister intend to act within his jurisdiction and responsibility and direct an inquiry into these marketing procedures? Pertaining to statements in the affidavits as to certain actions by top executives of the corporation, does he intend to use his responsibility to institute a full investigation?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that he does not want to editorialize. I certainly hope he does not want to smear individuals. The fact is that the Auditor General is the auditor of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and he has in the past given the corporation a clean bill of health from an accounting point of view. Obviously, if these allegations have substance, they should be checked or challenged. I am not a lawyer, but if they have substance I assume they should be the subject of some action by the attorney general of Manitoba.

If they are not substantiated, I would hope that the hon. member would at least stop smear and innuendo against persons who are employed and who could very well be employed in something else but who were working day and night trying to improve the conditions of the freshwater fish marketing industry.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the same minister. In view of the fact that the minister responsible in the province of Manitoba has asked the federal minister for such an investigation, is it the intention of the federal minister, who has the power to initiate an investigation, to do so at the request of the provincial minister? Is that your intention, sir or is it not?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the minister from Manitoba has a view of the marketing corporation which is a view not shared by the board of the marketing corporation, four of whom are fishermen and the others are representatives from various provinces involved in the corporation. This is an honest difference of opinion and it has to be met by the board. It is, in fact, being met by the board. Surely the hon. member is not asking me to go behind the back of other provincial ministers and to call inquiries and audits on the basis of allegations and affidavits regarding which he has not had the courage to at least name the sponsors.

Oral Questions

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ANNOUNCED LAY-OFFS AT IRON ORE COMPANY OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it has to do with announced lay-offs at the Iron Ore Company of Canada plant in Labrador City, because of down-time, some time early in the summer. I ask the minister, in view of the effect this will have not only on the economy of the area but on the economy of the province which is hard hit already, what steps he can take within his deparment to help avert these proposed lay-offs. In particular, would he consider setting up a joint consultative committee of union and management to investigate thoroughly the reasons for the lay-offs and to attempt to find alternatives?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would probably be incorrect for me to say that we can take action that might avert these particular lay-offs. I can say that our manpower consultative service people are meeting with the company today, and it would be my hope that they would see fit to set up a manpower consultative committee in the interests of assessing what can be done for the individuals who are laid off, or who face lay-off.

TRADE

PURCHASE AND SALE OF IMPORT QUOTAS FOR TEXTILES AND SHOES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise this House whether he is aware of a domestic market building up in the sale and purchase of textile quotas, brought about because of the quotas that were imposed approximately a year ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that situation, but I will ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to take note of that matter and look into it.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Could he could also tell the House whether he is aware of a similar situation building up with respect to quotas granted for the imports of shoes? I am referring specifically to textiles and shoes of styles and prices which cannot be attained in Canada and for which there would not be any infringement on the domestic market in so far as Canadian producers are concerned.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for drawing this question to my attention.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

FINANCE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever may be subbing for the Minister of Finance. Is it the first acting minister of finance, the second acting minister, or the parliamentary secretary? With regard to bringing in for first reading the amendments to the Bank Act, statements were made almost a month ago that these were expected in the middle of March. Is the government prepared to say when this legislation is to be brought forward for first reading?

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not changed his position from the answer he gave the hon. member in the committee meeting a month ago.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My supplementary question is this. At that time the government announced that the amendments to the Bank Act would be introduced in the middle of March. That was a month ago. Is the date still the same? The bill was sent to the Department of Justice for technical drafting. Is anyone from the Department of Justice prepared to answer, Mr. Speaker, as to how long this technical drafting is to take, or is it simply that this document is to be kept away from the House until after Easter, in anticipation of a possible election call?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, the minister hopes, and it is still his priority, that amendments to the Bank Act will be introduced during the month of March.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN REFINANCING SAWMILL IN N.W.T

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns the Slave River sawmill at Fort Resolution, Northwest Territories, and the recent submission to the minister's department for refinancing under the emergency response program. Can the minister report any progress on this matter to the House?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a result of that representation we looked at the matter favourably. However, because of the sum of money involved we require approval of the Treasury Board. I am not certain at this point whether that request was heard on Thursday. I will check it out and reply to the hon. member today.

Mr. Firth: My supplementary question is this. I ask the President of the Treasury Board when we may expect an answer on the submission regarding the sawmill operation at Fort Resolution, Northwest Territories, since he may be familiar with this application.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the submission. I will inquire from the department concerned.

NATIONAL SECURITY

WARREN HART—REMUNERATION FOR SECURITY WORK UNDERTAKEN FOR GOVERNMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Has he been able to satisfy himself whether Mr. Warren Hart has received money for the work he was doing in Canada related to security matters? Also, can he indicate whether the names of certain RCMP members mentioned by Warren Hart appear in immigration and other files and whether there is evidence, according to some of the material which was indicated to the minister previously, that aliens were taken across the border, in particular one Ferdinando Melito?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to indicate to the hon. member and to the House that, indeed, Mr. Hart has been in the employ of the RCMP. The other aspect of the hon. gentleman's question is one to which, of course, I shall be directing my attention.

● (1452)

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the minister's answer. I should now like to ask a question related to the same general subject, that is, the activities of an undercover police informer. Has the hon. gentleman been apprised of an investigation regarding a Mr. C. Wagner about whose position a representative of CTV contacted Inspector Rod Stammler, resulting in an investigation which is apparently shaping up to the point at which CTV is reportedly threatened with charges, along with Mr. Jim Reed who investigated some of these matters?

Mr. Blais: The hon. member spoke to me about this matter before I came into the House. I have no additional information to provide at this time.

WARREN HART—RELEVANCE OF IMMIGRATION FILE TO DEPORTATION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): A supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Has the minister been fully briefed on Mr. Warren Hart's immigration file, and can he tell us whether the stated grounds for his deportation correlate with the background in that file?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have reviewed that file. I am satisfied that the deportation order with respect to Mr. Hart in 1971, the refusal of his application for student status in 1972, and the refusal of his application for immigrant status in 1976, were legal and that regular procedures were followed. I am also satisfied that immigration officials did not knowingly grant the entry of Mr. Hart to Canada in violation of the Immigration Act. However, we have received a request from the McDonald commission to forward a file and I have written today to Mr. Justice McDonald. Perhaps I should quote from that letter:

> It appears, however, that on several occasions after his deportation immigration officers became aware of his presence in Canada but, contrary to the provisions of the Immigration Act, did not take prompt action to apprehend and deport him because they were aware of the RCMP interest in him.

I felt this matter should be brought to the attention of the commission, so I have done that in addition to sending our headquarters' file.

Mr. Epp: Would the minister table that letter, since he has quoted from it at some length? In light of the minister's answer and the dates he gave, would he indicate the terms under which Mr. Hart was admitted to Canada on December 1, 1975?

Mr. Cullen: The information I have is that Mr. Hart, being an American citizen, came here as a visitor in the same way as any other American might do. It came to our attention that he had overstayed the period allowed for such visits, and a deportation order was made on that basis. As far as tabling the letter is concerned, I have a copy of it and I am quite prepared to accede to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Speaker: In response to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Provencher, it being in keeping with precedence, the minister is now at leave to table the letter.

CANADIAN CULTURE

IMPORTATION OF U.S. EDITIONS OF CANADIAN BOOKS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Last fall, as he may recall, I raised the problem caused by the loss of thousands of dollars to Canadian authors and publishers through the importation of American editions of Canadian books. At that time, both the minister and the parliamentary secretary assured me that the problem could be overcome by means of schedule C of the Customs and Excise Act.

Is the minister aware that copies of a popular Canadian book entitled "Book of Eve", by Constance Beresford-Howe, published by MacMillan of Canada, have been on sale in Montreal and Toronto despite its being listed a year and a half ago under schedule C, and that in response to complaints by the author and the publisher, legal counsel for both Revenue Canada and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have stated they will not take action because, they claim, schedule C does not specifically encompass books? May I ask what action the minister is taking to rectify this situation, or what action he is recommending to his cabinet colleagues?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I thank the hon. member for drawing this matter to my attention. I will look into it with the utmost dispatch.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not here today, but since neither his department nor the Department of National Revenue has been able to act in this instance, I wonder whether some commitment might not be made through the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary either to introduce appropriate amendments to the Copyright Act or to undertake a test case, as was earlier suggested by Canadian authors, with respect to this serious situation.

Mr. Alan G. Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As the hon. member may be aware, it is proposed that amendments to the Copyright Act will be coming forward at some time in the future, and I will certainly bring his representations to the attention of the minister.

FISHERIES

ALLEGATION SEALS SKINNED ALIVE—GOVERNMENT REACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that one, Brian Davies, was able to persuade one Newfoundlander to bring discredit to his province by indicating at press conferences in London and Paris that a goodly number of seals were being skinned while alive, I wonder if the minister has investigated that charge, and what action does he intend to take in the matter?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): We obviously have no evidence of this situation having arisen. I might say that if Mr. Brian Davies wants to skin an animal of the shape and size of seal while it is alive, it is quite a challenge to anybody's skill. We have no evidence of that whatsoever.

Mr. Marshall: I am sure the minister accepted that my question was a serious one. In view of the fact that the motion I placed before the House today was not accepted, and in view of the hostility which could occur at the seal hunt this year because of the bad publicity, I wonder if the minister would indicate, by wider publicity of the amendments to the Fisheries Act which were accepted by the government last year, that this will be given the widest publicity and people will be warned of the violation and penalties that could be inflicted on violators? Would he do that, because there are only a few days left before the seal hunt starts?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I assure the hon. member that I did take his question very seriously. I read the text of the motion he sought to present, and had I been in my place at the time I would have said yes. The fact is that we have, by an order in council which will be published in a special Gazette, issued the regulations under which access to the seal hunt will be permitted. It will be under permit as parliament approved last year, and the regulations will be fully publicized. I hope there will be no confrontation. We have no interest in stopping legitimate observers from appeariang on the ice floes, including those who do not share our views about the seal hunt. What we want to avoid is interference with a legitimate activity of Newfoundland and Magdalen Island fishermen.

AGRICULTURE

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY ON POWDERED SKIM MILK

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the price of skim milk powder. Skim milk powder will now cost about 40 per cent more in Canada as a result of the removal of the subsidy, a price which is about five times the world price. I know that the Consumers' Association of Canada were not consulted, and I know the dairy farmers were not consulted. Could the minister tell us whether, before taking the action he did, he consulted the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and did that minister agree?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Skim milk powder will still be much cheaper in Canada than fluid milk: the honourable member knows this. What he is trying to get across is that it is above and beyond the purchasing power of the vast majority of Canadians, which is not true; they will still be able to buy it. It is not the intention of the government to produce a surplus and just throw it on the world market and try and recoup what it can. We are curtailing our production for our domestic needs in order to meet our food aid programs across the world and aid needy people who cannot afford the high domestic price for it, as we have always done.

As I said earlier, in just one year we have put $589 million more into low income programs. When the hon. member suggests people cannot afford to buy skim milk powder, I do not know what he is talking about, and I do not think he does, either.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, last week in this city a conference on food took place and one of the themes of that conference was the desirability of consulting all those in the food industry. My question was whether or not the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was consulted. The dairy farmers were not consulted; neither was the Consumers' Association.

Mr. Whelan: All my cabinet colleagues were perfectly aware of the programs which we were initiating, because of the consultation process under which we operate when putting forward our estimates. Of course, when we are putting forward our estimates, we do not have the leeway to make it possible to consult on every little item. I might add that a survey was taken recently to determine how the subsidy was being used in this country and who was benefiting most from it. To our amazement, we found it was not the poor people who were benefiting and consuming the most, but middle income and richer people who can well afford to pay the present price for the good milk we are producing in this country.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING GUARANTEED INCOME

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of National Health and Welfare is absent, may I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister?

Considering that since the 1974 election about ten federal-provincial conferences have been held on the subject of welfare, and in particular on the minimum guaranteed income and that, if I remember right, during the last federal election there was an undertaking that legislation establishing the minimum guaranteed income would be introduced, my question is the following: I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to carry out his undertaking and when he intends to introduce that bill.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there were several federal-provincial conferences of ministers responsible for health and welfare. I know that the then minister, the hon. member for Outremont, in his meetings with the provinces, made quite a lot of progress, towards a formula which would enable us to go in the direction mentioned by the hon. member. However, I shall refer the question to the present Minister of National Health and Welfare to have a report which is more up to date and I shall draw her attention to the hon. member's question. Perhaps he might ask his question again tomorrow.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HANDICAPPED PEOPLE ENTERING SERVICE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In November, 1977, and again in January, 1978, I asked the minister whether he would be tabling in this House the report of the Public Service Commission with regard to the problems of handicapped people entering and working with the public service. I know he has had some difficulty. Can the minister advise what the difficulty is, why it has not been reported and was not tabled in this House today, and when does he expect it to be tabled, because it is important in this continuing dialogue that must go on in the community with regard to the problems of handicapped people? It contains important recommendations. When will we see it?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be very frank with the hon. member. I regret that it has not been tabled. I expect to table it within the next week or ten days. One of the problems has been that I was somewhat preoccupied with other responsibilities during that period. The hon. member has rightly reminded me of the report and its importance—an attitude I fully share. What I am attempting to do now is look very carefully at possible responses so that we will not, in fact, come out with a suggestion of further studies which, of course, the hon. member agrees we should not do, or the recommendations of the report that we should not.

I do not want to raise false or unfulfillable expectations. I want to be quite responsible, as the hon. member would want me to be, at the time I table it in order to be able to give some kind of response of the government which will lay before us all possible answers to this pervasive problem.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, did I hear the minister correctly, that he will be tabling the report? Certainly, that is the way this dialogue should begin, with the expectations and the reasons for action examined. Did I hear him correctly, that he intends to table it? If I did, when?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I said that I intend to table it. I am hopeful of being able to develop a response as to the recommendations at almost the same time, so that expectations emanating from the report will not be beyond our ability to fulfil in terms of expenditures at this time. However, that will be within the next week or ten days.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CULLEN—ANSWER GIVEN TO HON. MEMBER FOR PROVENCHER

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In a question to me by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) I believe he mentioned the month of December for the deportation order. I want my answer to be as full and complete as possible. The situation is that Mr. Hart came into the country in the spring of 1971 to act as an informant for the RCMP. We were not aware of this fact until December, when the deportation order was made. I wanted to give full information to the hon. member.

MR. ALEXANDER—PROCEEDINGS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to draw to Your Honour's attention the fact of the flagrant abuse of the question period by two ministers in particular, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), was particularly noticeable today. On several occasions I have heard Your Honour indicate to both sides of the House that questions should be sharp and short. I submit that this is what occurred this afternoon.

I noticed on several occasions that Your Honour attempted to admonish not only the Prime Minister but the Minister of Agriculture who were flagrantly—I do not want to use the word deliberately—abusing the question period by making statements which should come on motions. It is not up me to tell the Speaker how this House should be conducted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: However, it is my duty to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to other members of the House that this type of action cannot continue, because we will have a breakdown. You, sir, have indicated this on several occasions in the past month and a half.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The Prime Minister is again being a smart alec. He had a little three-day convention and he had Trudeaumania within the Chateau Laurier—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: —but he has despair, discontentment and disillusionment around the country. I will now close my argument, hoping that when the donkeys quit braying, you will have an opportunity to give some input to my point of order, particularly with regard to chastising and admonishing the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and other ministers who are flagrantly abusing the question period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), my recollection is that today I extended about equal leniency to both sides of the House. I invite the hon. member to examine the transcript to see that. However, I will be glad to accept his invitation to come down a little tougher tomorrow on both sides. But it will be on both sides, not just one.

MR. PAPROSKI—MOTION OF HON. MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER EAST

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding, I said to the motion by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) that this motion is not true and it should be debated.

IMMIGRATION

TEXT OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table, in both official languages, the immigration agreement entered into between Canada and the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the document just tabled by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). Is it going to be the practice of the minister to table from time to time these important documents with respect to immigration agreements between the federal government and the provinces without any opportunity for the standing committee to examine the regulations that will come into effect shortly? I find this to be a strange abuse of governmental responsibility.

When we discussed Bill C-24 it was my very clear understanding that the standing committee would have an opportunity to review those regulations before they went into effect. We are now in the situation of having the minister table the agreements with the provinces, with no chance to review even the regulations that are going to come into force which will affect those agreements and the over-all functioning of Bill C-24.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, rather than being discourteous to hon. members, when I was before the committee I provided them with rather extensive notes on the regulations to be passed pursuant to the Immigration Act. In addition, some two months ago, early in January in any event, I sent around to each member of parliament the regulations that would be passed, and pointed out the necessity of tabling them in the Gazette. I have not had one representation from any member of the House since January 3 with regard to the content of these particular regulations.

I thought I was being courteous to the House by indicating to it that notwithstanding whether I do or do not have a requirement, I made this information on the agreements available to members of the House so that they would have all of the information possible pursuant to the provisions of the act.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know that the minister would not want to misrepresent the position of my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), our spokesman on immigration. On two separate occasions since those regulations have been presented by the minister, my colleague asked that they be referred to the standing committee. The minister refused twice to have that happen. Therefore the situation is not as stated by the minister. There has indeed been a very clear request by the official spokesman of our party to have these reviewed by the standing committee. We have had no such opportunity. I find it strange the minister has refused it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is engaging in argument. It has nothing to do with privilege.

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to Loto Canada Inc. and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): 1. As of October 20, 1977, there was one person under contract to Loto Canada Inc. He was a retired public servant.

2. (a) Not applicable. (b) During the fiscal year 1976-77, $183,490.93 was paid to persons under contract. This took place during Loto Canada's start-up phase so that a very large majority of these individuals are no longer associated with the corporation. None of these, to our knowledge, was a retired public servant.

KATIMAVIK—ENROLMENTS, PROJECTS AND PARTICULARS CONCERNING NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,091—Mr. Marshall:

1. How many young Canadians have applied to enroll under DND Programme KATIMAVIK?

2. How many were (a) accepted (b) rejected?

6. How many applications were received from the Province of Newfoundland and how many were (a) accepted (b) rejected, and for what reason?

7. What is the allocation of funding under KATIMAVIK, by province?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. KATIMAVIK is not a DND programme. However, the programme does offer a military option under the aegis of the Department of National Defence. The statistics in regard to the total programme as well as the military option are as follows: Number of applicants, 3,375; number invited for interview, 2,996; number reported for interview, 1,596; number enrolled, 1,137; number who selected military option, 112; number enrolled under the military option, 79.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—EXPENDITURES IN NICKEL BELT CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,130—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of Labour and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Although the Department of Labour is active within the Constituency of Nickel Belt, accounting procedures are such that a specific reply would entail a lengthy and costly examination of accounts, the cost of which in manpower and time would be prohibitive.

SNOWBLOWING EQUIPMENT FOR STEPHENVILLE AND/OR DEER LAKE, NEWFOUNDLAND AIRPORTS

Question No. 1,157—Mr. Marshall:

Were requests made to the Department of Transport for new snowblowing equipment for Stephenville and/or Deer Lake, Newfoundland Airports and, if so, was such equipment provided under the $2.5 million procurement programme to replace snowblowing machines, as per Department of Transport News Release No. 283/77 dated December 20, 1977 and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The requirement to provide snowblowing equipment at Stephenville and/or Deer Lake, Newfoundland Airports, as for other Transport Canada Airports, is reviewed periodically. The result of the current review showed that the snowblowers held at these two sites are adequate to meet the workload commitment for the next four years. Snowblowing equipment is not included therefore for these two airports in the $2.5 million procurement program announced in the Transport Canada News Release No. 283/77 dated December 20, 1977.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FLIP IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,158—Mr. Marshall:

1. What are the particular projects being carried out under FLIP as a result of the allocation of $633,000 to the Province of Newfoundland under the Department of National Defence?

2. What is the breakdown, by districts, in the Province?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The projects are in the administrative support and general labour categories and will basically provide the following work: (a) clerical, and general office work; (b) brush clearing, snow removal, kitchen help, grass cutting, cleaning assistance and driving.

2. CFS St. John's, $153,000; CFS Gander, $377,000; CFB Goose Bay, $103,000. Total, $633,000.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COST OF COMMERCIAL AIR TRANSPORTATION IN 1977

Question No. 1,167—Mr. McKinnon:

What was the total cost to the Department of National Defence for commercial air transportation in 1977 for (a) military personnel (b) civilian personnel (c) material?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): (a) and (b) This information is not readily available since military and civilian travel expenditures are controlled on a decentralized basis, at units, stations, bases and headquarters. To provide this information would require a review of thousands of claims all over Canada and overseas. For this the department does not have the necessary resources. (c) Commercial air transportation costs of material is not recorded as a separate item from other commercial transportation modes, i.e. railways, therefore only an estimate based on percentage use can be made. The estimate for 1977 is approximately $700,000. However, commercial air transportation is only used when DND resources are not available.

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

Question No. 1,229—Mr. Howie:

1. How many persons are on the New Brunswick Provincial Liaison Committee of the Task Force on National Unity?

2. Do they receive remuneration or travel expenses and, if so, in each case, in what amount?

3. (a) In what manner was the liaison committee in New Brunswick selected (b) what are the members names and in which municipality does each reside?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. The New Brunswick Provincial Committee of the Task Force on Canadian Unity is composed of 15 appointed members.

2. The committee members are volunteer and receive no remuneration for their services.

3. (a) To select members of the New Brunswick Liaison Committee, the Task Force on Canadian Unity contacted directors of different organizations and citizen's groups, such as the Federation of Labour, numerous Chambers of Commerce, educational groups, etc. From the suggestions given by directors of the groups consulted, fifteen interested New Brunswick residents were selected in order to achieve optimum representation.

AMENDMENT TO BANK ACT

Question No. 1,246—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is it the government's intention to introduce an amendment to the Bank Act obligating chartered banks to release funds to a client at a branch other than that at which the funds are held in the account of the client?

2. Is it the government's intention to change the procedure by which a chartered bank can release funds frozen at the death of a client?

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): A number of changes to the Bank Act were proposed in the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation, released in August 1976. Numerous suggestions were received through submissions from interested parties, responding to the White Paper proposals or to perceived shortcomings in the banking system. The government has considered these suggestions, along with a large number of relatively detailed changes that were not discussed in the White Paper. All of the proposed amendments, including any changes to the White Paper proposals will be made public at the time the bill to revise the Bank Act is introduced in Parliament.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND SENATORS WHO ARE SHAREHOLDERS IN CPR

Question No. 1,287—Mr. Jones:

1. How many M.P.'s and Senators are shareholders in the CPR Company or its subsidiaries?

2. What are the names of these persons and the amount of their shares and what are the details?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, citation 171 (dd).

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, about a month ago I directed some questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the hope that I would receive a reply from the minister or someone speaking on behalf of the government. I did not really expect a reiteration by the parliamentary secretary of the same vague information given to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. That information was to the effect that the information might be forthcoming around March 15. The minister said it was really out of his hands in that the bill had been sent to the Department of Justice for the drafting of a technical amendment.

I have before me a copy of Issue No. 7 of the evidence of proceedings before that committee, where at page 6 it is indicated that the decision had been taken after the receipt of briefs, and that this was a very complex piece of legislation.

There may be some areas where it is complex, but of all the legislation I have seen and am familiar with, it seems to me the Bank Act is one of the clearest we have on the statute books, at least in its basic terms, and it has been in existence for a long time. I do not agree that this thing is very complex.

Of course we are not able to know what the government proposes to do as a result of its white paper and the representations it has received, but the minister has said that there is a technical amendment that has to be made, and that the bill has been sent to the Department of Justice.

It would be very interesting to hear from a representative of the Department of Justice what that department is doing about the revisions to the Bank Act. I did ask for such information, but the parliamentary secretary to the minister merely reiterated what had been said.

Why is the department hanging on to this bill? I would suggest in a straightforward way that the bill is being deliberately buried by the Department of Justice. Why would that be so? First of all, I think the government must be concerned about some of the recommendations it has received, it has seen, or will be seeing in the Bryce report on corporate concentration, and that report has been aborning a long time. It seems to me it has been in the hands of the government for some time. It is supposedly in the process of translation, but the government knows what it contains, and that may have caused the government to want to change the Bank Act.

We are reaching a very sensitive season. As of yesterday we have been told we can expect an election date at any time. If anything is to be proposed by the government in respect of the Bank Act which might upset a part of the Canadian community, then obviously the best thing for the government to do is leave those revisions buried in the drafting section of the Department of Justice until it is too late for them to affect this House or the opinion of the public.

The extension date to March 31 of next year must be taken in conjunction with the government's proposals in its white paper dated August, 1976. Those in themselves are modest enough and there is no fundamental revision to the Bank Act, or not to the extent I would like. I think what all this amounts to is a sort of tinkering based upon what has happened in the last ten years. There should be much more than that.

I am not going to repeat what I said during the second reading debate. The Bank Act in so far as it deals with the chartered banks is not too bad. However, with the growth of the near-banks, and they are even more permanent than they were ten years ago when changes were last made,—I am referring to the trust companies, some of which were founded in the 1960's and have grown into substantial institutions—we need some changes. These near-banks are not as big as the big five chartered banks, but they are substantial institutions and are engaged in the business of banking. No one will deny that they are engaged in the business of banking.

Some of the provinces are overly touchy about these near-banks. They do not want trust companies operating under incorporation by and within the provinces to be touched by the authority of the Minister of Finance or the Inspector General of Banks. However, the constitution speaks about banking, and these companies are engaged in the business of banking. The only thing they do not have is the formula under which they can increase the volume of deposits on the basis of a percentage of their reserves and cash. The same thing applies to les caisses populaires and credit unions. They are engaged in the business of banking, and I will discuss them a bit further later on.

These near-banks, in whatever form, want the advantages of the clearing system, but they are not prepared to commit their reserves, as do other chartered banks, small or large. There are credit unions in existence today which are larger and stronger than some of the new banks that have been incorporated in the last two or three years. They have been operating for a good length of time. There is no question about the fact that they are no longer in the infant stage. They have grown to full-blown adulthood. I am not objecting to that in any way. They have been well run, but they are in the business of banking. Therefore it seems to me anyone engaged in the business of banking should come under the Bank Act. There should be a Bank Act not just dealing with commercial banks but with the chartered banks as well.

I expressed the opinion that there should be a short debate on this bill. My colleagues have convinced me otherwise. The stated purpose was in order to receive some views about changes to come in banking at this time. That is not totally relevant to the bill, but in the tradition of the House if something can be brought in under the title of a bill, then debate will take place regardless of the rules of relevance. Be that as it may, the official opposition voted against this bill on second reading in order to express disapproval of the government's failure to come forward with amendments to the Bank Act. This bill is another illustration of the careless, slapdash attitude the government has toward economic problems. It is tied up with so many other things that do not assist in putting this country together, and do not work toward developing Canada's economic strength. Further development of our economic strength is necessary in order to afford people the frills they desire in an affluent society.

I should like to refer to government proposals made in regard to the Canadian payment system. This must be brought out in the open. This is the first time we have had a chance to debate these matters before the House. What is the Canadian payment system? The present system is run by the Canadian Bankers' Association. It is established under federal law, and its by-laws are subject to the approval of the Treasury Board. The system is highly automated, but it is on the verge of becoming outdated for two reasons. I should like to refer to the white paper which reads as follows:

> The first reason is that inequities have developed in the system as the near banks, operating under legislation different from that under which the banks operate, have become important in the business of accepting orders for the transfer of deposits.

Anyone working in the clearing system of any bank can indicate what the volume of transfer deposits means. The credit unions and caisses populaires are not geared to handle as yet their responsibilities in the clearance system. Any good banker who has worked in the main clearing system can indicate that.

The white paper continues:

> While the banks have made provision for the clearing of the cheques on these institutions, thereby aiding them to gain their present status in the payment system, the near banks have no voice in the operation of the clearing system.

I think they should have a voice in the operation of the clearing system. They have been strong participants in the transfer of deposits.

It continues:

> Neither do they have access to lending facilities of the central bank as do the chartered banks. On the other hand, the near banks have no obligation to maintain non-earning reserves against their deposit liabilities as do the banks.
>
> The second reason why the present system is becoming outdated is that the making of payments is starting to evolve from a system based almost exclusively on paper transactions toward an electronic system in which paper transactions will have a less prominent role. The Government of Canada has already recognized that the near banks should be represented in the technical work that must precede the introduction of such a new system and they are represented in the committee now at work designing some of the specifications which will be required. These institutions have asked for and welcomed the opportunity to participate . . .
> In the evolution of the payments system of today into the payments system of tomorrow, the economic interests of Canada will be served best by a national clearing system in which all of the institutions directly involved may participate and share the requisite rights and obligations in an equitable manner . . .

I think everyone in the House would agree with that. In principle, all the near banks would agree with this. Then arises the question of how to achieve this status and what it would cost. What would be the responsibilities? I am afraid there is a difference of opinion in that regard. It has been expressed to me in letters from some of the credit union federation since I last spoke on this bill. I respect some of the opinions expressed. In others the language was somewhat intemperate and was not becoming of those who signed the letters. When the Bank Act comes up for revision, those self-same people will be heard, as I will be too. We will have an opportunity to discuss and then decide what should happen.

There will be many colleagues on the committee interested in banking who will express views with which there may be some divergence. This dialogue should have taken place a long time ago. There is no reason why the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), should have refused to let the white paper go to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. In the fall of 1976 the other House availed itself of the opportunity by adopting the simple expedient of referring the contents of the white paper to its banking committee. They conducted some good hearings and heard views from people from whom we should have heard. Because there was a conflict of stupidities in regard to the length of debate that could take place on second reading, this was not done here. I am sure there would have been extensive participation from both sides of the House on second reading, because the Bank Act only comes before the House every ten years. There are strong views held in favour of varying conditions which apply across the country. The conditions in Alberta should not necessarily apply in the Atlantic provinces, nor in the province of Quebec where there is a greater influence in the credit unions and les caisses populaires, nor in any other province where there is not the same balance.

One of the big difficulties in the economic administration of this country is that the Bank Act lays down conditions for the operations of chartered banks. They should be the same from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia; from the 49th parallel and those places south of it, right up to the north pole. It seems to me that in a while we can legislate for the operations of the chartered banks across the country on a uniform basis, yet there should be provisions in the Bank Act to give flexibility for the better operation of those institutions best suited for the development of the regions.

If rural Quebec prefers to have caisses populaires and credit unions, or if in the rural portions of Newfoundland co-operative credit unions are the best vehicle for the handling of business on a personal and commercial basis, then so be it, but they should all come under the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in so far as monetary policy is concerned, and their responsibility should be to the central system. That is the way the constitution foresees it in giving to the federal authority absolute jurisdiction over banking and money. Yet we see the side operations, which now represent a high portion of the total of the financial operations in the country, being beyond the direct control of the Minister of Finance and of the central bank. I do not think we are in a position as a country to deal in what I think is such a slipshod and loosely organized way as that.

I want to see our banking system, as I explained on second reading, much more responsive to the needs not only of today but of the next 25 to 40 years. As I said then, we operate the Bank Act on a Model T Ford mentality. Everything is based on how the old Model T used to go.

The Porter Commission in the 1950's and 1960's made a number of valid proposals. I do not think it went far enough because I do not think it looked at the whole of the banking system, but the conditions in Canada at that time were different from what they are now and the Porter Commission should be viewed in the context of the conditions that applied at that time and the experience of today. Today we are in quite a different world. Our population has increased, our business affairs have increased, the sophistication of our financial system has created new demands, but, frankly, our financial institutions have not been flexible enough to respond to this.

You can talk to businessmen in the United States and to many of our own businessmen who will tell you of their difficulty in obtaining easier financing so that it does not become a case of hawking one's gold teeth every time one requires financing, or borrowing your own money. A much greater degree of confident risk taking must exist. The small businessman today in this country is strapped by the conditions. I am not blaming the commercial banks. They have to change their philosophy as well, but we must also make available other systems to fit our requirements.

We need a money market in Canada. At present one has to go abroad. The framework and the circumstances most required for the development of that money market do not exist and cannot be created overnight. If the minister of finance at that time, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), and the then inspector general of the banks had seen fit to allow merchant banks in Canada on a proper framework, we would not have had the kind of funny financing that goes on now. There is some merchant banking that takes place in Canada, but mostly by agencies of foreign houses.

The white paper speaks about the operations of foreign banks. Well, there is competition and our chartered banks welcome it, but there must be competition on a fair basis. I say, as I did on second reading, that in most of our major cities we have suitcase bankers. They come from the world over and they provide a remarkably large volume of funds required to meet conditions here in Canada. There is one difficulty, however. These people operate without supervision and entirely outside of any control so far as ethics or safeguards are concerned. They take money out of the country. It is proposed here that there should be some form of control, but this condition has become epidemic and it will go further by March 31, 1979. Of course, that is only a problematical date, I forecast, because it all depends on when the next federal election takes place.

If the bill comes in on March 15, it is a question of whether the present House leader will consider allocating time to a lengthy debate on second reading of the bill. The estimates are before the House now, and the House committees will be considering estimates, not legislation, and also there has to be a run-up period for public hearings. When will those public hearings take place? Would it be in May or June? What about an election or, if the election is deferred until the fall, when will those public hearings take place? The committee will make its report, and on that basis what will the government do? Will it just turn a deaf ear to many of the recommendations that the committee may make and insist, if God forbid it should be the same administration, that its original proposals should stand without any major amendments?

Then, when is the legislation to be passed? More important, we must give time to the various financial institutions to adjust their operations so that they can be in a position to carry on when the new legislation becomes effective. They cannot adjust casually to the requirements which may be made of them because, insofar as chartered banks are concerned, the Bank Act is their charter. If they cannot be in a position to operate legally under the Bank Act, they will be in contravention of it. That is not a profound statement, but the Bank Act is their charter, and it sets out the conditions under which they operate. I find it appalling that the government has adopted such a casual approach to the fundamental cornerstone of the operations of the Canadian economic system. This cornerstone is viewed as an easy canter or a lazy waltz toward the objectives. I do not think that is good enough.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Let us go back to what the government proposed with regard to the Canadian Payments Association. There would have to be a companion act, incidentally, because the Bank Act in its present form deals only with chartered banks. There would have to be a Canadian Payments Association Act because near-banks cannot operate under an act which is limited and forms the charter of chartered banks only.

To give effect to the payments system of tomorrow it is proposed that a Canadian Payments Association be established by companion legislation to the Bank Act. All institutions in Canada accepting deposits transferable by order will be required to join the association. That means trust companies, caisses populaires and credit unions. All members of the association will have certain rights and obligations. They will have the right to offer checking facilities to their customers. They do that now. They will have the right to have checks and perhaps certain other items cleared through the national clearing system. However, they do that now in a limited way in that this is handled in an account within one of the chartered banks which itself is a member of the clearing system. Near-banks are not.

Members will be expected to co-operate in the effective running of the system and to share its operating costs. I think that is quite right. If you are a member and you have a say about operations, you should be prepared to pay some of the costs. I do not think anybody really objects to that.

To assure all members that their associates are maintaining a sound financial condition, all members will be required to belong to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, to be insured by the Quebec Deposit Insurance Board, or, in the case of credit union centrals and caisses populaires federations, to be members of the Canadian Co-operative Credit Society. I do not think that condition represents any obstacle. As a matter of fact I think everyone operating complies with these requirements, but here comes, shall we say, the nut on which some are cracking their teeth: members will also be required to maintain minimum reserve against specified liabilities in the form of Bank of Canada notes, in non-interest bearing deposits at the Bank of Canada or, in some cases, with other members of the association. Finally, members will be obliged to meet other requirements of the Canadian Payments Association Act in areas such as reporting information.

Provincially incorporated institutions will in all other respects continue to be controlled by their provincial acts of incorporation and subject to provincial jurisdiction. The filing of financial returns, annual reports, lists of shareholders, or whatever the credit unions require of their member societies, will have to be done according to the regulations laid down within the various provincial statutes, but as far as the business of banking is concerned it is my view—which is not necessarily shared by all—that all such institutions should have common privileges and common responsibilities.

The white paper goes further to say that in order to give flexibility to the system and, indeed, to permit it to function as much like the present system as the members desire, it is proposed to permit any bank or non-bank member of the association to be either a clearing member or a non-clearing member. A clearing member will keep its reserve account with the Bank of Canada and participate in the clearings at the regional settlement points. A non-clearing member will elect to clear through a clearing member and may keep its reserve account with that member, in which case the clearing member will have to match the non-clearing member's reserve account by an equivalent amount in its account at the central bank.

It is anticipated that many members of the association will elect to clear through other members. I think so; they do that now. There already have been some difficulties in some of the smaller institutions and among near banks. It is felt that the assignment of some reserves to a known interest earning status will cause them some difficulties. I do not know. Unless I can be persuaded otherwise, it seems to me that if they want to belong to the club they have to pay their dues. I am not looking for a great controlling hand.

My purpose in looking at the revisions to the Bank Act is to help create a Bank Act and a system which will give us greater flexibility in the kinds of institutions we can have here in Canada. They should, however, be responsible through the banking system to the Minister of Finance, who is responsible by law for the monetary policy of this country. Canada should be furnished many of the features of banking systems abroad. All of us know very well that those systems function very successfully. We have not been able to incorporate those features into our requirements because the single act we have that governs banking, governs chartered banks only.

There is another feature that I want to discuss briefly, Mr. Speaker. There has been mention of an electronics payments system which is an offshoot of the payments system. It will be much like a credit card but will be a payments card. The possibilities are just beginning to become evident, but I believe that within ten years of the effective date of whatever legislation we have permitting the payments card, individuals will be doing a fantastic amount of their business that way. It is open to electronic connections and the desire of the banks, whether near or fully chartered banks, to eliminate the cost of the float. The cost of floating credit instruments constitutes a high proportion of the total cost in our systems today. Banks may be able to eliminate some of these costs and thus reduce charges for the services offered to customers, and perhaps even enlarge their clientele.

I will not touch on the subject of reserve requirements because that is too complicated to discuss at the moment, but I should like to refer to the difficulties of entering the banking industry. At the present time banks may be incorporated only be a private act going through this House and the other place. The passage of a private banking bill is a calvary. I do not know how many gethsemanes the organizers of a new chartered bank have to pass through before a bill passes. The record is shocking. The system for private members' bills is such that one or two members can hold up a chartered bank bill beyond reason, just through caprice or ignorance. This is unfair to the organizers of a bank.

I agree with the proposal that chartered banks may be incorporated by letters patent, subject to stringent conditions, through the Department of the Secretary of State or the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. One thing in the white paper that I do not agree with emanated from the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, and that is the proposal to allow provincial governments to participate in the founding of chartered banks to the extent of owning up to 25 per cent of the issued shares, this to be reduced to a maximum of 10 per cent over ten years.

I am very pleased that the White Paper dropped the much more dangerous provision that was bandied about in Bill C-2 three or four years ago which would have allowed provincial governments to buy into existing chartered banks. This would have resulted in chaos and conflicts of interest. It would have given the provinces that owned shares in major banks an unjustified leverage in granting credit for the development of industry in certain provinces. It was a totally repulsive feature which I was glad to see abandoned.

I do not like to see provincial governments in the business of banking. It is all right for them to operate savings associations, but not chartered banks. The province of Alberta operates treasury branches which are a form of near-banks. I would like to see them disposed of to someone who is prepared to organize a regional bank which would respond to the needs of people as do the treasury branches.

I should like to close on a note of caution, Mr. Speaker. We have mentioned the activities of foreign banks. I am sure they recognize that they should operate within a framework which people understand and which at the same time is fair to them. At the present time arbitrary action can be taken which would be unfair to them. Not only would this framework permit a measure of control over them but it would also give them protection. It should be remembered that overly stringent or repressive action by the Canadian government toward foreign banks would be reciprocated in many countries. Our major chartered banks have established a world-wide network of operating branches in foreign capitals which enable Canadians to do business with their own institutions and thereby facilitate Canadian business. This should not be endangered.

This bill is a reflection of the slip-shod performance of the government, Mr. Speaker. I cannot accept the reasons given by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) that the delay occurred in the Department of Justice. But I certainly think that March 31 next is a sort of trigger clause or non-sitting clause. If it is required at that time it will give us a margin of safety with the chartered banks.

There are factors, however, which might cause us to come back again because there will be insufficient time to deal with the Bank Act. In outlining my remarks I have indicated what those circumstances might be. It might be just a case of calling the election at the wrong time. I hope, therefore, that members of this House had an opportunity themselves to examine the white paper. I think we should have a limited debate even of this nature given somewhat beyond Bill C-16. We thank the Chair for its indulgence, and I am sure that hon. members on the government side would want to respond in the same way so that we can discuss some of the requirements we think should exist in the Bank Act.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Bank Act by law is revised every ten years. We are now being asked to postpone that major revision. It is not because the opposition is opposing or blocking the revision of the Bank Act; it is because the government is not ready. This is an indication of how serious the economic situation is in this country and how the government has mismanaged its affairs.

This is a time when we have the highest number of unemployed Canada has seen since the great depression of the 1930's. By official statistics we have 991,000 unemployed. We know there are probably another 500,000 unemployed who are not counted in the official statistics. These are people who have given up looking for work because there are simply no jobs. These people live in areas such as Newfoundland, Cape Breton Island and eastern Quebec and the majority of them are women and youth. There are almost 20 people available for every job that exists. This is an indication of the serious situation in which this country finds itself.

Banks in every country have tremendous power. Banks play a major role in the decisions which will direct the economy over the next few months or years. And yet despite the banks' decisions to invest money in certain areas and in industry, and despite the importance those decisions have on the people of Canada, the government is not ready with its proposals to revise the Bank Act under which all the chartered banks and institutions such as the credit unions and trust companies operate. This is, to say the least, a disgraceful indication of the difficulties which this country faces.

This debate should be one of the most important debates in parliament. The chartered banks are at the centre of our whole financial system. We are disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that the government has taken this approach in postponing consideration and amendment of the Bank Act.

When the present Bank Act was tabled over 10 years it was labelled by the then finance minister as a "blueprint for competition". But over the next decade the banks grew faster then ever before in our history. They have consolidated their position at the centre of our financial system. In our view, their level of profits over the last decade has been much higher than public interest would have dictated. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, in light of the anti-inflation program which this country has supposedly lived with since October, 1975, together with the 6 per cent restriction which the government has imposed on any increase of wages and salaries in the coming year, that the increase in assets and profits of the five largest banks is a disgrace. This is a situation the people of Canada ought not to put up with.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

The five largest chartered banks which control 90 per cent of the assets have already an inordinate degree of power. Yet the new Bank Act which the government is considering and which I assume will be the basis for the bill when we get it some time next year, would increase substantially the powers the banks already have. They would be able to expand into new areas where they have previously been forbidden and thus be able to expand profits and power.

One only needs to look at the information which the banks make public to see the tremendous powers that they hold. I want to take a few moments to illustrate some of these powers. I do this because of the tremendous financial assets of the banks and because of the interlocking directorate between senior officers of the five largest banks and the other major industrial and financial corporations of this country. These facts I procured from the Directory of Directors published by the Financial Post.

Mr. W. Earle McLaughlin is the chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada, and I will mention just a few of the directorships which he holds. First of all is Sun Life, and those Canadians particularly from Quebec know all about Sun Life. Mr. McLaughlin is a director of Adele Investments; Algoma Steel; Allied Chemical; Canadian Pacific Railway; General Motors—this is the whole General Motors corporation not just the Canadian segment—Genstar; Metropolitan Life; Power Corporation; Ralston Purina, the food corporation; and Standard Brands.

Another of the Royal Bank's directors is Ian Sinclair who is the president of the CPR. According to a report in the Globe and Mail for February 22, Mr. Sinclair was forced under provisions of United States law by regulations enacted by its Securities and Exchange Commission, to make public the salary he earns. This is a salary well over $300,000 a year. At the same time Canadians are being told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that they are living beyond their means. This is at a time when Canadians are being told by the Prime Minister that they should tighten their belts and so on; it is at a time when the CPR pays some of its retired employees pensions of substantially less than $100 a month. Anyway, Mr. Sinclair, who is a director of the Royal Bank and of the CPR, is also a director of CP Investments, of CP Air, of Cominco, of Pan Canadian Petroleum, of the Canadian Investment Fund, of Great Lakes Paper, of MacMillan Bloedel, of Seagrams, of Simpsons Limited, and of TransCanada Pipelines.

● (1612)

Look at the Canadian Imperial Bank. Its chairman, Russell Harrison, is a director of Brascan Limited, of British American Assurance, of Canada Life, of Kinross Mortgage, of TransCanada Pipelines and of the Royal Insurance Company. One of its directors, John A. McDougold, is head of the Argus Corporation, of Dominion Stores, of Standard Broadcasting, of Hollinger Mines, of General Bakeries, of Massey-Ferguson, of Domtar Limited, and of the Iron Ore Company of Canada. If I were to take the time to list all the corporations of which Mr. McDougold is a director it would take up the whole of the 40 minutes available to me.

Now I turn to the third largest bank, the Bank of Montreal. Its chairman, Fred McNeil, is a director of Canadian Canners, Dominion Life, MICC Investments, the Mortgage Insurance Company, Seagrams Limited, and International Resources Finance Bank. Another director, A. Searle Leach, is a director of Federal Industries, of Great West Life, of Bathurst Paper, of Carling-O'Keefe Limited, and of Dominion Tanners.

I could go on and on, but I think the few examples I have given illustrate the kind of control which the senior officers of Canadian banks exercise not only over the banking system but over the largest corporations of this country. At a time when ordinary citizens are being told by the federal government that they ought to restrict demands for increases in wages and salaries to 6 per cent, although the cost of living is increasing by 9 per cent, we find that the assets and profits of the banks have been increasing month by month and year by year at well beyond that rate.

I call attention to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 22, 1978, in the section headed "Report on Business." Consider the situation. Our largest bank, the Royal Bank, held assets amounting to $35,670 million as of December, 1977. This figure increased in one year by 18.8 per cent. On the same date the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce held assets of $32,781 million. In that case there was an increase of 19.6 per cent in one year. The assets of the Bank of Montreal, at $25.9 million, increased by 21.8 per cent in one year, and those of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, at $19.46 million, increased by 18.5 per cent.

Looking at the extent to which assets have risen one also finds that funds invested in NHA mortgages increased by 35 per cent, money on loan increased by 16.5 per cent, the value of securities held went up by 62 per cent, and holdings of Canadian treasury bonds increased in value by 17.3 per cent. Finally, funds out on day call and short loans rose by 32.5 per cent. Not only do the banks possess tremendous assets but the size of those assets is increasing rapidly. Total bank assets in December, 1977, according to the Globe and Mail, amounted to over $150 billion. So the banks play a decisive role in all the economic activities of Canadian corporations and Canadian citizens.

We in this party feel very strongly that the chartered banks, or at least the five largest, already have an inordinate degree of power and that the Bank Act amendments which the government proposes to bring forward, and which it is now postponing, would have increased the powers of the banks still further, allowing them into new areas previously forbidden to them, and offering them many new possibilities for expanding profits and power. At the same time the near-banks such as the credit unions, the caisses populaires, and the trust companies would have found the bill imposing new restrictions upon their activities. We believe that the bank bill, when it is brought forward, should do the reverse—that it should encourage competition by giving more power to the credit unions, the caisses populaires, and the trust companies.

The proposals which the government included in its draft bank act were supposed to promote competition. It is our feeling that the result would have been just the opposite, that there would have been even more concentration than there is at the present time. The plain fact is that promoting competition between institutions of grossly unequal size simply allows the dominant institutions to take over the smaller ones. The record proves that this is what happens. If the Minister of Finance is really serious about increasing competition in the financial system, we would like him to take up the suggestion made at the finance ministers' meeting last month, that is, to set up a monitoring system to track the distribution of market power in the financial world and, if there is evidence of concentration, to take action to correct it.

We challenge the minister to look closely at the level of profits the banks have made over the past decade and to tell the Canadian people if he believes this is in the best public interest. If, as we think, the banks have made too much money in recent years, the government should be proposing measures to control profits and interest rates. Yet there is nothing in the Bank Act as it was drafted which addresses itself to this issue.

We believe the Minister of Finance should ask himself whether the big banks have been responsive in the last ten years to the real economic needs of this country. According to a narrow definition, one might say that economic efficiency is maximized when market forces concentrate investment in shopping centres and office space in big cities at the expense of investment in low cost housing, small business, and development in the more isolated regions. There is all kinds of evidence that banks have been leaders in the concentration of the business community in this country in the high growth areas of southern Ontario and British Columbia to the detriment of slow growth areas in eastern Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and Manitoba. Governments at all levels should be taking a more active role in deciding investment priorities. That is what governments do in such countries as Norway, Sweden, and West Germany.

The federal government has not done that kind of investment planning in co-operation with the banks. That is one reason why this country has economic difficulties and unemployment. Disparities between the high growth and low growth regions of Canada have been increasing rather than decreasing, which has been the supposed objective of the federal government for the past ten years.

When it brought forward the Bank Act, we were disappointed that it limited participation of provincial governments in regional banks. It seemed to penalize co-operative institutions such as credit unions and caises populaires. By and large, these institutions grew up to serve local and regional needs with which the big banks could not be bothered. They are an essential part of our financial system, particularly for those who are increasingly turning to the credit unions and caisses populaires for whatever their business requirements may be with regard to financial institutions.

The criticisms I have made are the same that were made when the white paper on the Bank Act was brought forward. I want to put on record some of the views of governments, credit unions and trust companies. To a large extent they are the same criticisms that we make of the government's proposed bill which has been postponed. Should the same government be in office when the Bank Act is brought forward, it will be in much the same form as when it was first tabled by the government.

When the white paper on the Bank Act was brought forward, the government of Manitoba made certain comments. I quote in part from their comments:

My government has serious concerns with the over-all tenor of the proposals. They are apparently designed to promote competition among financial institutions and make the provision of financial services more efficient.

They said they approve of those goals but feel that, and I quote:

—the very structure of the financial sector in Canada is such that the changes proposed are more likely to produce the reverse effect—more concentration and less "efficiency" in the broadest sense.

The plain fact is that promoting competition between institutions of grossly unequal size simply allows the dominating institutions to take over business from the small institutions.

The chartered banks have demonstrated clearly that they act as 'oligopolists'; if competition among banks were real or effective they would be vying with each other for higher deposit rates and lower lending rates, and this would be reflected in lower profits.

I was told today by someone very knowledgeable that one cannot get from the Canadian banks the prices they offer for different types of loans. This is kept secret. In fact there is no competition among the major banks despite the need for competition, and we should have a new competition act which would deal with that kind of situation.

The government of Manitoba further stated:

I would ask that the federal government demonstrate the sincerity of its concern with competition in banking by setting up a monitoring system to track the competitive situation in the financial sector—and take action should there be evidence of lack of competition.

Talking about the kind of investment controls which I indicated countries in western Europe have, the government of Manitoba said, and I quote:

The federal government has the power to stipulate requirements on the banks' assets and thus influence the composition of investment. Market forces concentrate investment on large low risk projects, and shortchange housing, especially low income housing, and small business and industry in remote regions. Certain proportions of the banks' investments should be earmarked for housing and small industry.

The province of Saskatchewan stated:

The banks have not been responsive to regional needs. The credit unions and co-operatives have grown up to fill this gap. The continuing existence of a strong credit union system is our insurance that the banks will not revert to their old ways of dealing with the people of Saskatchewan . . .

The banks are already earning excess profits because of their market power; allowing them to move into leasing and factoring will increase this power, which is already too strong.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

I do not have time today to go into detail, but in the Financial Post in January of this year there was a story headlined "Banks Increase Share of Expanding Leasing and Factoring Services." It will be seen that the province of Saskatchewan was not wrong when it warned of this. I quote from this article:

Despite further delays in the Bank Act revision, Canadian banks are going ahead and beefing up their participation in leasing and factoring (basically managing accounts receivable).

Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and Banque Provinciale du Canada have recently established new wholly-owned leasing subsidiaries. And Provinciale has brought a 100 per cent interest in an existing factoring company while Commerce is negotiating with a U.S. bank to take over its Candian factoring operation. Earlier, Royal Bank of Canada bought a 100 per cent interest in an established leasing company and increased its holding in another to 100 per cent from 50 per cent.

One therefore sees the direction in which the banks are moving without any countervailing action on the part of the federal government.

The province of Saskatchewan said that it is concerned that the white paper relies too heavily on the notion that increased competition within the banking sector will have a beneficial impact. The paper fails to realize that the real source of competition for the banks will increasingly come from the trust companies and credit unions. They feel in particular that no impediments such as a reserve requirement should block the road for the credit unions, that direct regulatory controls are necessary to restrain excess profits in the banking industry.

The National Association of Canadian Credit Unions made representations. They pointed out that while they had no objection to reserve requirements based on the needs of a clearing system, they saw no need for non-interest bearing reserves with the central bank. They said the only purpose of that proposal would be a centralized monitoring control which the Bank of Canada had always maintained could be achieved through control over the banks. They said that credit unions are already subject to a variety of legislative requirements under the provincial statutes and the federal Co-operative Credit Associations Act. They said that to stack such requirements on top of existing legislative requirements specific to Credit Unions without providing access to the compensating advantages enjoyed by chartered banks would be quite inequitable.

An even lengthier brief was presented by the Federation de Quebec Caisses Populaires. I could go on, but it is pretty obvious that what the government proposes in respect of revisions to the Bank Act will not do the job required. It will not bring about more competition and will not serve the needs of the people of Canada. We believe the Bank Act should accomplish these things, and this should have been assured in the proposed bill that has been postponed. There should have been provisions included to beef up disclosure and conflict of interest rules that apply to banks so everyone will know who it is that runs the big banks, what they earn, and what are their business interests.

Indicative of the kind of secrecy we have in this country is the fact that the information about the salary of the president of the CPR which I put on record today came to us, not as a result of laws we have in Canada, and not as a result of regulations put into effect by Canadian governments, but rather as a result of information which the U.S. government requires. The Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States requires every corporation to make public, when its shares are being traded on U.S. stock markets, that kind of information. Without that kind of regulation in the United States we would not know what the president of the CPR makes, anymore than we know the salary of the presidents of the Bank of Montreal, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Canada or the Royal Bank. We would not know what their roles are. We think that kind of regulation is needed in the Bank Act which we will finally be discussing.

When the Bank Act is brought forward we believe it should strengthen the role of co-operative credit institutions in our society. Our analysis, and the analysis of the credit unions and caisses populaires of the proposed bill, are that in fact if it had been passed as it was it would reduce this role and make the credit unions and the caisses populaires even less able to meet the needs of the Canadian people than they are at the present time. When the legislation is finally brought forward we believe it should make the big banks more responsive to regional needs, the need for housing, and the need for small business investment.

We are happy that several new banks have been created in recent years, and that the credit unions of western Canada helped to establish the Northland Bank. However, the assets of the new banks and their powers are relatively insignificant when compared with those of the five major banks. We believe more competition is required, and that the way to get that competition is by strengthening the credit unions, caisses populaires, and the trust companies.

The Bank Act should make the financial system as a whole more responsive to government investment priorities. One cannot come from a relatively slow growth area like Manitoba, as I do, without realizing that for generations, if not for the entire 100 years of Canada's life, the banks have not given the kind of consideration to the needs of slow growth areas that they ought to have given. The Government of Canada should take a leaf from the books of the governments of most of the democratic countries of the western world. Those governments, by law or by custom, voluntarily or by a twisting of the arms of bank officials, require the investment policies of their banks to be directed toward meeting the needs of the people. It is our belief the Government of Canada should have and should exercise the same kind of power and influence in respect of the investment policies of Canadian banks.

I am not going to deal with this at any length today, but we are less than enthused by the involvement of Canadian banks in large scale investments in countries such as Chile and South Africa. Our concerns are not just those of the members of this party, but are concerns that have been voiced by the largest churches in this country as well as by credit unions, co-operatives, and other organizations. We are amazed and horrified by the increasing involvement of Canadian banks, with assets entrusted to them by the ordinary Canadian citizen, with regimes such as the repressive regime in Chile and the racist regime of South Africa.

Mr. Benjamin: Anything to make a buck.

Mr. Orlikow: As my colleague, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) says, "Anything to make a buck". That is precisely the attitude of the major Canadian banks. We hope that when the government finally gets around to bringing forth its proposed bank act for discussion and enactment, which will amend the present powers, rights, duties and responsibilities of Canadian banks, it will take into consideration the proposals, suggestions, and criticisms of some of the provincial governments, credit unions, trust companies and co-operatives of the proposals in the postponed measures. When we get the new Bank Act we hope it will require our banks, more than has been the case, to meet the needs of the ordinary citizens of this country.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the government first presented its highlights in the white paper on Canadian banking legislation back in August, 1976, and here we are, two and a half years later, still talking about it. We are no further ahead, and the government is asking for an additional extension of the Bank Act to 1979. We are prepared to grant that extension, but first the government should table the bill. It should give us the proposed bank act.

Our financial institutions, caisses populaires, credit unions, opposition parties, and others have been patiently waiting for the new Bank Act to be tabled. With the economic crisis we have in this country, together with record unemployment, record debt and record borrowing—and we are now borrowing abroad to pay the interest on the money we have borrowed—the last thing we need is another delay in the Bank Act or in respect of anything to do with economic issues in Canada.

This request for an extension to the Bank Act was first suggested by the government on January 23 of this year when the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) stated:

> Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that in March of this year the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), introduced a bill to amend Sections 6 of the Bank Act and Quebec Savings Banks Act to permit the banks incorporated under those acts to continue to carry on business until March 31, 1978, nine months beyond the date specified. The short bill before us today will further extend the banks' powers to do business until March 31, 1979.

The parliamentary secretary went on to say:

> The reasons given in March for the delay in the decennial revision were the following. First, the extent of consultations encouraged by the white paper. Second, the extent and complexity of the task of converting the principles of the white paper into legislation and particularly, where appropriate, making the Bank Act consistent with the principles and provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act and, third, the extent of the pressure of other priorities on the small group of legislative drafters in the Department of Justice.

● (1642)

The government has had ample time in order to do this. It is aware of the fact that the Bank Act has to be revised every ten years. Certainly this should have been prepared by now.

The document entitled "Highlights of the White Paper on Canadian Banking Legislation", dated August, 1976, reads as follows:

The federal government's white paper on banking issued today proposes significant legislative changes designed to encourage more competition in Canada's financial system.

Let us move toward revising the Bank Act in order to have this competition.

The document continues:

The white paper proposes to establish a new national framework for Canada's chequing system. It would permit foreign bank subsidiaries to operate within Canadian banking legislation, as a new dimension in competition.

Steps outlined in the white paper will help facilitate the establishment of new Canadian domestic banks. A number of changes are also proposed in the powers of the chartered banks, in order to promote stronger competition within a framework of Canadian regulatory control and predominantly Canadian ownership.

The white paper follows an extended period of study by federal authorities, during which financial institutions and other groups made representations to the government.

This was 2½ years ago. Yet we are still faced with delays and stalling tactics.

It continues:

The paper provides a further opportunity for public discussion before conclusion of the current decennial review of the Bank Act and other banking legislation.

Well, discussions have taken place. The banks and the credit unions did their homework and presented briefs approximately two years ago. The government is causing the delays. Everyone is co-operating with the government. It is time for the government to reciprocate by taking a look at the Bank Act.

The document continues:

The review is occasioned by the fact that the Bank Act confers powers on Canada's ten chartered banks for a ten-year period only.

The ten years are up.

It continues:

The last review was concluded in 1967; parliament will be required to act before the next scheduled expiry of these powers on June 30, 1977.

At this point we are well into 1978. The government has identified all the problems. It has made excellent suggestions in its white paper. It has run into very little opposition.

In the same document under the heading "A Canadian Payments Association", it reads as follows:

ED$(»: 2089;-1 2810;-1

The white paper points to growing inequities and fragmentation within the payments function, which lies at the heart of our financial system. This function is exercised principally by the chequing system, under which deposits are transferred by cheque or similar orders to settle financial obligations. Near banks, which include trust and mortgage loan companies, caisses populaires and credit unions largely outside federal regulation, play an important role in effecting payments. But they have only indirect access to the clearing system for cheques, and do not enjoy a full voice or full rights in its operations, with the result that they are not fully subject to all its obligations.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

The white paper proposes to bring all institutions offering chequing facilities into a new Canadian Payments Association to replace the present clearing system operated by the chartered banks. Members will share the same rights and obligations. They will obtain credit facilities from the Bank of Canada and will be required to maintain minimum reserves with the central bank.

Most of the credit unions are quite prepared to do this, but they want a copy of the Bank Act in order to read the fine print and details. This is causing them concern in their operations.

The document continues:

The reserve requirements: on Canadian dollar notice deposits, and term deposits with an original term to maturity of one year or less, or longer if encashable (includes most reservable deposits of near banks)—2 per cent on the first $500 million; 4 per cent on the remainder. On Canadian dollar demand deposits (mainly banks)—12 per cent as at present. On foreign currency deposits used domestically—4 per cent.

There are quite a few foreign banks operating illegally in Canada today.

Under the section headed "Foreign Banks", the document reads as follows:

Canadian law does not permit foreign banks to operate as banks in Canada, but they have established many affiliated corporations here as active lenders to business and as borrowers in the money market. Many of their operations are not subject to regulation. They enjoy some special advantages and have captured a significant share of commercial lending activities, including some areas where direct participation by Canadian banks is prohibited under the Bank Act.

Foreign banks can bring additional competition and innovation to bear in Canadian banking. With their world-wide connections, they can help develop Canadian resources, industries and trade. However, there should be a legislative basis for regulating their operations in Canada to ensure equitable and effective competition and that Canada's banking system remains predominantly in Canadian hands.

We do not know whether this will happen or not. Everyone is patiently awaiting consideration of the Bank Act, which has been delayed again and again.

The document continues:

The paper therefore proposes to allow foreign bank subsidiaries to operate in Canada as banks, incorporated with full powers under the Bank Act. However, government policy will be to limit their growth and size individually and their combined operations to 15 per cent of commercial lending in Canada, these limits being subject to review. They will be permitted a maximum of five branches; a minimum of one half of their directors will have to be Canadian citizens.

We do not know how foreign banks operate today. Perhaps those banks would like to know whether they are operating legally.

It continues:

Limits on the size of any foreign bank subsidiary will be removed if it opts to "Canadianize" by selling shareholdings in excess of 10 per cent to Canadians.

Canada will expect reciprocal recognition for its banks in the jurisdiction of the parent bank. The government does not propose to permit the establishment in Canada of branches or agencies of foreign banks. Foreign bank representative offices will be registered.

Non-bank subsidiaries of foreign banks in Canada will be required to file reports on their activities. Unless specifically authorized, such affiliates will be denied the right to borrow in the Canadian market with the guarantee of their foreign parents.

I should like to refer briefly to the representations made by the Co-operative Credit Society of Manitoba, Limited. As I pointed out on January 23, 1978, the credit unions and caisses populaires across Canada have memberships totalling 7½ million, and there are 4,000 such institutions. Is the government afraid to face the credit unions? Is it afraid to sit down in committee and discuss the Bank Act? Is it afraid to deal with these 4,000 institutions? Is this one of the reasons for the stalling with respect to the bringing in of this bill? I am suspicious of this.

In a document entitled "A Summary of Concerns Respecting Proposed Federal Legislation", the Co-operative Credit Society of Manitoba indicated the following:

Bank Act Proposals—As we understand it, the government's basic purpose here is to integrate the payments system and to encourage fair competition among the financial institutions—as becomes a democratic society—maintaining Canadian control of our own banking system and avoiding undue concentration of power and influence in this field.

We agree all qualified institutions should have access to the Canadian payments system through membership in the proposed Canadian Payments Association. However, the manner in which present arrangements are to be effected is of some concern since the system must be applied nationally and yet not clash with the jurisdiction of the province whose legislation has traditionally dictated the Manitoba Credit Union regulations. This positive approach is specifically mentioned in the white paper. We feel impelled to emphasize its importance here for reasons set out in the credit unions' response to the proposed banking legislation which you have before you.

● (1652)

Especially of concern to our members is the matter of proposed credit union inclusion in reserving with the Bank of Canada. We feel, and feel quite strongly, that proposals in the white paper in this regard are based upon the long since antiquated idea that the chartered banks are the only financial institutions of significance in Canada. Also we feel that based upon this outmoded idea, the proposals regarding reserves with the Bank of Canada by all other financial institutions, which is based upon traditional chartered bank operations is unrealistic.

I should like to read also from the 1976 Annual Report of the Co-operative Credit Society of Manitoba and Subsidiaries. This gives you an idea of how long they have been preparing for changes in the Bank Act. It is unbelievable that the government, with the staff it now has, could not have been prepared last year. The Co-operative Credit Society of Manitoba in its brief states the following under the heading "Bank Act Revision":

Nature of the Canadian financial systems' development will hinge greatly upon final provisions of the Bank Act, which currently is undergoing its decennial revision. Manitoba credit unions' concerns are embodied in the National Association of Canadian Credit Unions' (NACCU) briefs to the federal government, prior to and following release of the government's white paper.

Our position is that the credit union system be included in the Canadian payments and electronic funds transfer systems, that the credit union system have direct access to the negotiable orders clearing system, and that credit unions be excluded from the proposed requirements of direct reserving with the Bank of Canada.

Credit unions maintain that the holding of reserves for monetary policy purposes and the maintenance of a settlement account for payment purposes are two entirely separate issues and should be considered separately.

These are some of the issues which we should be discussing in committee. In the meantime the government's constant delaying leaves the committee hanging in mid air.

In the white paper there is a reference to residential mortgages. With reference to that matter the white paper states:

The Bank Act now places arbitrary limits on bank holdings of residential mortgages. The limits have so far constrained only new banks, but in future they could also curb mortgage lending by larger banks. The limits will be removed in recognition of the need for residential mortgage funds.

Because of the problems we have today with high mortgage rates and difficulties which Canadians have in obtaining mortgages and finding proper housing, it is imperative that we get on with amendments to the Bank Act and that we do everything possible to help Canadians receive residential mortgage loans.

Another important aspect pointed out in the white paper is in regard to investments in Canadian corporations. It states:

The white paper outlines a limited number of exceptions to the principle that the business of a bank should be provided directly through its own corporate structure.

The exceptions arise in such areas as residential mortgage lending, certain mortgage-based funds, venture capital and joint venture activities.

In Canada today there is practically no venture capital available and very few joint venture activities. This is one of the reasons why we have such record high unemployment. Our secondary industries are not expanding because they cannot obtain venture capital. Two and a half years ago the government pointed out the need for venture capital for secondary industries. However, it has been stalling on this issue. It is unbelievable, in light of the financial problems we are having in this country. Businesses are closing down or are pulling out of the country; there is record unemployment; our secondary industries cannot expand because they need venture capital, and yet the government is stalling. It is absolutely ridiculous.

Back in 1975 the Canadian Federation of Independent Business presented a document on changes to the Bank Act. Two or three years ago everyone was doing their job to prepare for this, but not the government. It is not prepared to do anything other than engage in another stalling tactic. It causes as much confusion as it possibly can in this country. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business pointed out a number of policy issues about which they are concerned, such as the portion of bank loans made to independent business; support for new venture formation—they were talking about venture capital and how important it is in this country, and that was back in 1975—the role of guaranteed loan programs; the role of banks in fostering Canadian ownership—that is very important in Canada—the impact of bank credit cards; the broadening of bank services to compete with customers; competition in banking; the role of banks in furthering the process of concentration of power; and the role of banks in regional disparities.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) commented on the huge profits that banks are making. That is something we should discuss with the banking officials when they come to the committee. I will have no hesitation in discussing this with them.

I should like to read an excellent article which was recently written on this subject headed "Credit Unions Can Now Give Banks a Run For Your Money". It reads:

Why would anybody want to deal at a bank when it appears they can get a much better deal at most credit unions and many trust companies?

I know of no banks which offer, as at least one credit union does, the following services: no charge for personalized cheques; no service charge for processing cheques; no charge for monthly mailing of statement and cancelled cheques; no charge for telephone transfer of funds from your savings account; no charge for postage-paid mail deposit envelopes; no monthly charges of any sort and no minimum balances required.

Here is what a reader stated, Mr. Speaker, about his experience with credit unions.

Banks are too expensive for the ordinary man. It's all free at many credit unions and several trust companies. Even loans are better. To pay my dentist bill, one year, I borrowed several hundred dollars at the credit union. The only added charge was for 12 per cent interest, and it worked out to small potatoes as I only borrowed for one month.

The article goes on to say:

Credit unions have come a long way. Here's a typical list of the types of services you can find at all but the smallest credit unions: various savings instruments, personal loans, first and second mortgages, collection of agreements for sale, life and general (fire, theft) insurance, Canada Savings Bonds (in season), registered retirement and home ownership savings plans (RRSPs and RHOSPs), wills and estate planning, reveal arrangements and safety deposit boxes.

They offer excellent service. We should be discussing why the banks have these tremendous charges for their chequing and other services and why credit unions can do it at no charge.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ALLOWANCES TO HOUSEWIVES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of having Parliament adopt a measure authorizing payment of an allowance to housewives who remain at home to take care of their family instead of joining the labour market, the purpose being to ensure a global income corresponding to the family's needs by providing an additional family income to that earned by the father.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I am honoured to sponsor aims at inviting the House to consider the important and noble role played by housewives in Canadian society and at inviting the federal government to introduce before Parliament legislation which would authorize the payment of an allowance to housewives who remain at home to take care of their family instead of joining the labour market, the purpose being to ensure a global income corresponding to the family's needs by providing an additional family income to that earned by the father.

In our society, Mr. Speaker, the family institution is at the very basis of the two founding people of our country. In our opinion, the family consists of the father, the mother and the children. I have always believed and still do today that the family is a divine institution for if it were an invention of men, it would have disappeared I think a long time ago. In the past, and maybe not so long ago, the majority of our population was made up of farmers' families. Each family would produce all sorts of goods to provide for its own needs. In that manner, each member of the family be it large or small, accomplished some kind of job to ensure satisfaction of the needs of his close relatives. Craftsmanship played an important role instead of importing, things were handicrafted at home. Progress and industrialization have completely transformed our customs and we now have to pay the price of it.

Before the Second World War of 1939-45, the number of housewives on the job market was very small. One can actually say that women really started working outside their home around 1940, when Canada needed manpower for its ammunition plants. I can remember then that hundreds of women would go to the Quebec City Palais Station to board special trains taking them to the ammunition plants located at Valcartier where people worked day and night shifts. During the war, and in the ensuing years, as male workers were not available in sufficient numbers of the jobs market, the woman was increasingly attracted to it first on a temporary basis and then on a permanent basis.

Many families have contracted financial obligations to acquire a family home, which is quite legitimate. Then the mother tells the father: I am going to work to help you pay our home, and then I will stop working to look after my family. Unfortunately, that was not always the way it turned out. New needs were created. She had to keep on working in order to earn the income required to meet those new needs. Very often we hear mothers say: Oh, if I had a small additional income, I would much prefer to stay home. And just as I was coming to Parliament in the minibus, there was a mother saying: If I could, I would stay home to look after my children, but I have to work to help my husband earn enough to meet our commitments.

We are living in an age of speed which led to a consumer society. Everything or nearly everything is mass produced at the plant and delivered in homes in small packages, which is likely to further strain the family budget, and then the father's income is no longer enough. So the mother has to look for a job to help make both ends meet. And now this situation does not only exist in large cities but also in the country. I represent a riding which is made up mostly of country people; they are rural families and the same problem now exists for country people. By nature the mother is a housewife, and on the whole, she would much prefer to perform that role.

Generally speaking, that is what we hear: mothers would like to have good meals ready for their husband and children, the house to be clean when the father and children come back from work and everbody sits around the table. That is really a family meal and a way of meeting one another to talk things over instead of everyone being always on the run the home being simply a place to sleep that everyone leaves in a hurry. Unfortunately, that is the situation in too many homes.

Mr. Speaker, I believe for my part that the mother greatly deserves our recognition. We all have a mother, and everyone of us believes that his is the best in the world. That is normal. We must absolutely take measures to recognize that also in fact.

All things considered, it is she who gives our country its greatest wealth, that is human investment, it is she who takes care of our children. She must ensure that our children get a good education and a good instruction to be able to carry on a trade or a profession later on in life. As a matter of fact, I must say, Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing to find that sometimes these efforts are not successful. I know all members receive letters from young girls who, after graduating as nurses, secretaries, accounting clerk or anything else, are looking for jobs. Finding none, they stay at home and it is the mother, on top all her work at home, who has to go to work in a factory or an office to make ends meet.

It is topsy-turvydom. I think it is our duty to straighten things out. Nowadays, mothers are participating in meetings on children's education. They are more willing, at least in my province, to accept the school comissionner job. They sit in on parents' meetings while the father, busy elsewhere, has no more time to devote to his children's education. It is the mother's burden.

If she has an outside job, she is constantly rushed and cannot succeed either in playing her role as she would like and as her maternal feelings make her want to play it. The motion that I have suggested and that we are now discussing aims at recognizing that the mother who works at home is entitled to an income. I would not want this to be called a salary because a mother does not work for a salary; a mother with children does not think about that. On the other hand, she has needs which must be fulfilled. This is not done as in the past, as I explained at the beginning of my comments.

The married woman who has a job in a plant or an office is entitled to wages. Everyone recognizes this. At the end of the week, if she has worked 40 hours for example, society recognizes her right to a monetary reward. This is completely logical. This income is added to the salary of the husband. When there are five people in a family, they share the incomes of the father and the mother. This is a supplement. Everyone benefits from it. However, the mother who stays at home should also be entitled to a reward, whether she is married to a manual worker or a farmer, and God knows that farmers' wives work hard and have long days of work, not only in the house, but also in the barn, to help manage the dairy, to make sure everything is clean. I believe that those mothers are entitled to recognition and to an income.

I said earlier, and I want to repeat it, that it is essential and important for society to recognize in practice that we shall necessarily have to find a means to reward those who stay at home, through a sense of duty, necessity or choice. What happens in the case of a small wage earner, for instance? At the end of the week, the father comes home with his pay cheque, and if he has three children, this means that he must support five people including the mother. Unlike the family where the mother has an outside job, this family has only one income. Income has to be divided into five, and once more the mother will have to go without a number of small things she would like to have, such as short holidays she would like to take once in a while, because she cannot afford them. So she has to live on one income.

On the other hand, I approve the principle of equal pay for equal work. Obviously an employer should not be paid $100 more by his boss because he has three or five children. Equal pay for equal work. But then, we should hasten to say in Canada, because we can afford it and the Lord gave us enough resources to do so, "To each according to his needs." We should find a way to add to income to meet that need. One way to reach that goal of family income would be to pay the mother as such a special allowance. That same allowance could also be paid to the widowed mother and the mother faced with some other hardship. We know, in this day and age, that there is no need to list such other hardships, because they are too numerous to be listed. They are covered by the words "other hardships".

Hon. members opposite may say the government is already paying mothers family allowances. Concerning this, I would point out that in the case of families with incomes below $13,000, family allowances should not be taxable, as we have said a number of times, and I am convinced government members themselves feel as I do. Of course some may say that the government needs revenues to meet the cost of social programs.

I think that capital should be taxed more. Let us consider the balance sheets of chartered banks which are making more and more profits as well as multinationals which manage to build up colossal reserves on which they are not taxed. We should consider this and we should surely find the revenues needed to compensate tax exemption at least on family allowances. I suggest to the government that families pay fewer taxes so that they have a chance to make a decent living and that our mothers have a little more opportunity to enjoy life and take some rest. They get tired and wear themselves out with work. We must give them a chance to stay beautiful. Women are beautiful. Mothers are beautiful. As legislators we must make all possible efforts to keep them even more beautiful. And to do this, we must alleviate some of their difficulties.

I invite the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to present a legislation recognizing that Canadian mothers deserve our gratitude and that this Parliament is dedicated to save the family structure which is crucial for our society. I think that if that legislation is passed, it could be considered as the first step towards an annual guaranteed income system.

Last night, during the CBC news report, I watched the summary of resolutions presented to the Liberal party convention during the weekend. I noticed that some were for it and some against. The former finance minister was not absolutely convinced that the annual guaranteed income was a possibility in Canada. The present Minister of National Health and Welfare has advocated the view that she already expressed in this House, that it was time to initiate an annual guaranteed income system. This is why I said earlier that I am convinced that even on the government side there is no consensus on all those points. It does not mean that we should relinguish this system. It means that we must work further and that all studies made at the federal-provincial conference level about the necessity to establish an annual guaranteed income system should be continued.

Today, in reply to a question from an opposition member the Prime Minister said that Canadians had to be more productive to become competitive on the international market. I entirely agree with him. There is one solution to encourage a greater input in the gross national product. It is to give youth the opportunity to contribute all their energy, their efficacity and their knowledge. At the same time, Canadian mothers would be given a chance to fulfill their responsibilities as mothers and wives, if we give them the security to which they are entitled.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for bringing forth a motion filled with the things we are all concerned about, that is, having sufficient income on which to live. He mentioned that the family is the basic unit. I certainly agree with that and I hope we will continue to feel that the basic unit is the family unit. I understand the hon. member has a large family. Maybe that is why he is so concerned about this kind of motion—he could use two salaries instead of one! I think he is pointing to the same kind of situation for many people in this country who find that one paycheck at the end of the week is not enough and that you actually need two in order to have a decent standard of living.

The motion put forward by the hon. member for Bellechasse regarding the payment of an allowance for housewives who remain at home to take care of the family instead of joining the labour market, touches the issue of income distribution and the status of women, matters which are of great concern to this government as I believe they have been of long standing concern to many others.

The motion essentially asks the government to consider in its over-all, ongoing study of income distribution and income maintenance, the specific role which allowances to housewives who remain at home to take care of their families, could play in the package of income distribution measures which constitutes the government's income policy at present and in the future.

● (1722)

I would like to respond to the hon. member's motion by reviewing some of the issues that are implied. Current studies by the Department of National Health and Welfare already have given considerable attention to many of these points; they are not new to me. I can do justice to the issues at hand by sharing some of my thinking on the subject with hon. members.

At the outset I would like to make particular mention of the fact that to focus on the needs of low income earners and single parent families as two specific target populations for the continuing evolution of our income maintenance policy is an idea I wholeheartedly support. In my opinion, the motion before us is related to this idea, and I hope to be able to show that to you today. The needs of children, the needs of parents and the responsibilities of parents in meeting children's needs will be receiving considerable attention by the minister and by the Department of National Health and Welfare within the next few months.

First, I would like to point out that the use of the term "housewife" in the motion raises an important issue of definition. It seems to me necessary to take into account that there are the single parent families which in most cases, whether they remain at home or enter the labour market, receive a level of income below their needs. The majority of this population are women who remain at home and receive transfer payments. If they enter the labour market they are unable to earn sufficient income to live, to meet employment expenses, and to cover the necessary child care costs. These women do a considerable amount of work in the home. They make do without many conveniences; they nurture dependent children, but they cannot or do not want to be classified as "housewives"—maybe nurturers of children would be the appropriate term.

Many needy families are one parent families. The term "housewife" is not always relevant to them. To target a program to "housewives" would surely invite considerable and justified criticism from those who are charged with the responsibility of taking care of a family but are not "wives"—be they single women, single men or married men. I would imagine that a motion which replaced the word "housewives" by the words "parents with dependent children" would be better received by this House.

Second, I would like to clarify to this House that the main concern of what may loosely be called "family support" is, in my mind, the care and well-being of children. This is not to say that childless families never merit support; but rather that incremental redistribution of income which this government is considering is targeted to groups with identified special needs. The responsibility to ensure adequate care for children creates one of those special needs we have identified. Conversely, other special needs of certain childless families are addressed by other policies and programs.

The case can be made that the responsibility for children creates particular needs in families. It is much harder to build a case to the effect that housework in and by itself creates special needs. After all everyone is in one way or another engaged in housework. Therefore housework does not have a proper place in the discussion regarding income distribution between families. Admittedly, housework has a role in the discussion of the distribution of income within the boundaries of the family. This is another subject and I do not believe the motion we are addressing today touches upon that subject.

At present there is a virtually infinite range of alternatives for people to organize the distribution of tasks within the home from total specialization to total sharing including alteration of roles and so forth. It would be senseless and very unwelcome from the point of view of the population to interfere with those choices.

Third, and assuming that we are in fact discussing the special needs of parents during their child rearing years, it seems useful to distinguish between material support for the child rearing function and recognition of the social importance of that function. Both subjects are of great concern to me. Unfortunately the first is a more straightforward problem than the second. Let me begin by saying a few words on the issue of recognition, and I will return later to the issue of material support.

Many proponents of payment for parents at home have advanced the argument that the role of child rearing does not meet with proper recognition in our society, and that it is one of the responsibilities of the state to ensure that proper recognition is awarded. I say that this is one of the more problematic of the two concerns because it is neither clear that government intervention can prescribe the gain or loss of prestige of any individual or profession, nor is it clear that a monetary compensation would achieve any such desired goals. These two things are also interrelated. Prestige has traditionally been the result of a combination of qualities, among which money always had a role. The role of money, in recent years, has become more and more central in our society to the definition of prestige or recognition, to the point that some argue that only payment for services rendered is adequate recognition. Although this position has some merit in a society so heavily market oriented as is ours it remains unconvincing to many who argue that certain roles in society, among which child rearing is prominent, are privileged in that they contain intrinsic and otherwise non-monetary rewards.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Like being a member of parliament.

Mr. Robinson: That may be so.

In this regard our society seems to have come to some collective decisions without careful examination of alternatives. It is not clear to many observers that engulfing every person in the monetary and market scheme of things is a worth-while social objective. There are many different opinions and nuances voiced on this issue at this point in time, and to pretend to be able to find a solution to the problem of recognition through a monetary compensation scheme is premature. Nevertheless, let me repeat with emphasis that the issue of proper recognition of the child rearing function in our society is at the centre of this government's concern with the status of women. That is a subject on which I welcome further discussion.

The increasing sense of financial insecurity of parents who choose to remain outside the labour market due to marital breakdown, discontinuity of employment, loss of labour force skills and other related phenomena, is a mounting concern of this government. Recent and proposed changes in divorce laws and pension regulations address some of these issues. But then again this subject, as vitally important as it is, is not the issue raised by the motion under discussion.

Regarding the target population and the principal objective of the proposed policy study, namely, material support for parents with dependent children, I will address a fourth issue. This is the issue, as stated in the motion before us, of ensuring the adequacy of global income of families in relation to needs.

As you are all well aware, early in 1973 the government initiated a review aimed toward this objective: ensuring the adequacy of family income to meeting needs. At that time the Minister of National Health and Welfare tabled in this House the working paper on social security in Canada and launched the joint federal-provincial social security review. Since that review began there have been several major initiatives which have contributed very substantially to the attainment of the type of income security system envisaged by the hon. member for Bellechasse.

It will not be necessary to remind the House in detail of the many provisions that have come into being during the last few years through the sponsorship in the Ministry of National Health and Welfare and through the actions of this House. Among them I will cite only the tripling of family allowances, the tying of their purchasing power to the cost of living; the increases in old age security and in the guaranteed income supplement payments as well as their tying in to the consumer price index; the increase in Canada Pension Plan benefits and their protection against inflation as well as the increases which we have seen across the country in social assistance scheduled. Last but not least is the steep rise in income tax exemptions that has taken place.

Beyond these provisions, as I have already suggested, further income distribution proposals should be addressed to specific target populations in need. It is not sufficient to demonstrate that a segment of those affected are still in need in order to argue for augmenting universal income provisions. The taxpayer will not easily agree to give up more money for such unspecific purposes.

Therefore, the purpose of the motion must be understood to refer to the investigation and consideration of the needs of parents with dependent children which are not presently met by the broader income support systems. Clearly, only a portion of those with children will be found with valid claims for greater financial assistance; and that portion is by definition to be found largely among low income families. The motion, therefore, suggests that an investigation is necessary to determine in which income groups we still find parents with dependent children whose financial needs are not fully met for whatever reasons.

This is the type of issue which my department investigates on a continuing basis, and in so far as the issue raised by the motion is understood in these terms, I find myself in full agreement with it. Creating an atmosphere of financial security for every Canadian does not mean that we can be complacent and pretend that all problems are being solved. There are emerging needs and heightened perceptions of needs in a rapidly changing society which force us to be watchful and responsive at all times. In fact, as I have already stated in this House, the Department of National Health and Welfare is currently studying the means for instituting tax credits to benefit low-income earners and one-parent families, which are examples of how we seek to respond to changing needs in society. These studies, I might add, are also targeted in large measure to provide support to parents with dependent children.

Having said all that, I can now address a fifth issue, namely that this proposal does indeed refer to the provision of family allowances and income tax exemptions for dependent spouses and children. These are the two basic mechanisms available for the support of the child-rearing responsibilities of parents. With regard to family allowances, the first substantial step towards ensuring that family income matches family responsibilities was taken in 1974 by increasing the allowances to an average of $20 per month, by tying their purchasing power to the cost of living, and by maximizing the benefits to lower and middle income groups through the taxation of the allowance. In addition, provision was made for provincial legislatures to vary the level of federal family allowances, subject to national norms, in order to better integrate them with provincial social security systems. Two provinces, Quebec and Alberta, have taken advantage of these provisions.

With regard to personal income tax exemptions, I need only say that the basic deductions for the tax-filer, spouse, and two children under 16 today is $5,120 as opposed to $2,600 for the same family six years ago.

I would contend, Mr. Speaker, that the motion put forth by the hon. member for Bellechasse, although commendable in its intent, when examined closely comes down to a request for consideration of measures for the support of parents with dependent children in low-income situations, and that it is therefore misdirected in failing to take into account the existence of two very important provisions designed to accomplish precisely the objective which he advances. On the basis of these thoughts, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this motion.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely grateful to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for bringing forward this motion; it is an important contribution to the list of subjects considered by this House during the private members' hour. As the previous speaker recognized, this is a matter which has been causing increasing concern not only to people in government but to many in the private sector as well. I do not think we should lose sight of the fact that one important if not crucial aspect of this subject involves recognition of the value of labour, of work done by those who work in the home.

We should not assume, simply because of the appearance of this motion before us, that there has been widespread acceptance of the idea that a definite value should be attached to the contribution made by homeworkers. While traditionally the major part of home-making activities has been carried out by women, increasing numbers of men are choosing to spend a certain amount of their time in the home carrying on home-making activities as part of a changing lifestyle. It is important, I believe, to recognize this trend.

I am sure most hon. members can confirm this either from personal experience or from the experience of friends. I can think of friends of my own who from time to time have varied the sequence of participation in domestic tasks. It happens from time to time that one or other partner decides to leave the public labour force and work in the private labour sector of the home. Thus it is not totally the case that work in the home is reserved for women. There should be a flexibility attached to modern arrangements in societies such as ours.

Of course, changes of this kind do not come quickly or easily. Indeed, presentation of this motion does, of itself, create a danger—that in responding to the motion as it is phrased we might be moving toward a solution which would create more difficulties than the present problem. By this, we might be in real danger of reinforcing the whole notion of a female ghetto as represented by work in the home.

I say this because implicit in the motion before us is the idea that, basically, women should remain in the home. To concur with the proposition put forward in this motion would, I suggest, simply strengthen that particular conception. The thrust of the proposal is that women would be in a position to remain at home without suffering economic loss, a consideration of particular importance today when, unfortunately, a second income is necessary if many families are to survive. Such families find themselves in a situation where one wage-earner simply cannot supply the household needs. So especially at the lower end of the income scale we find women being forced out of the home not by choice but through economic necessity.

I can well imagine that the hon. member who proposed this motion has done so with the needs of such families in mind. However, adoption of the motion might lead to substantial difficulty. I would refer to a recent report of the Canadian Council on Social Development entitled "Women's Pensions", specifically to pages 124 to 126, which analyze the whole question of pay for housework. The report outlines the various arrangements which could be made to improve the economic position of those who work in the home but recognizes that specific solutions would almost ensure further dependency, locking women particularly into a housework role from which it would be very difficult to escape. Summing up the options available, the report states:

> Finally, the pay for housework proposal does nothing to solve the sexual division of labour inside and outside the home. Indeed, it may simply serve to legitimize it.

That one sentence contains the nub of the difficulty presented by the hon. member's motion. Further, summing up the report on page 235, there are one or two further comments which go to the heart of the housework for pay question. I quote from paragraph two of page 235:

> The recognition of so-called housework must be enhanced through fundamental reforms such as family law reform as well as through largely symbolic but important changes such as the inclusion of such work in the measurement of gross national product.

The author of this report, Mr. Kevin Collins, has done outstanding work with the Canadian Council on Social Development and has now gone on to work with the Canadian Labour Congress. Here he has stressed the need to recognize the importance of the work which is done in the home. For far too long, those who have worked in the home, for the most part women, have been regarded as providing a service of a kind which in other fields was provided by slave labour. If this motion does nothing else this afternoon, it emphasizes once and for all that those who work in the home are adding every bit as much to the total welfare of society and the totality of the gross national product as those who are employed in the well-known and strong professions of society.

I say again that we owe great credit to the hon. member for Bellechasse for bringing forward this motion. However, as I said, the danger is that we will reinforce the notion of a ghetto. It would lock women in particular into a no-choice situation. They would be forced to remain in the home, even though that may not be their basic desire.

As some members will recall, only a few days ago in this House I raised some questions with the minister responsible for the status of women. Knowing his great interest in this question, I am sorry he is not here to participate this afternoon. I raised with him the report that had been distributed through my office by a group of concerned female public servants. They indicated there were considerable problems within employment in the public service of this country. I want to quote a couple of sentences from the report to show how difficult it is to break down the notion of these ghettos, whether they exist in the home or in the public service of this country. In the opening part of this report they state:

> The attached is from a group of concerned women who are witnessing every day signs of increasing discrimination against women workers. Press reports have indicated that there is growing opposition to women workers. Few have reported on the fallacy of the argument that women are a cause of the high unemployment rate.

If women are the cause of increasing unemployment in our society, by all means let there be a regular allowance so that they can get out of the work force outside the home and stay in the home. However, if we were to take that very retrograde step, it would be a terrible disservice to the women of this country. The report goes on to note that we have already established in public service employment in this country a very great ghetto. I want to read a brief section from the report under the heading "Job Ghettos". I quote:

> One million women work in the clerical group and half of them are stenographers, typists or receptionists.

This is in Canada generally.

> In services, almost two thirds of the women work as cooks, waitresses or hairdressers. Of the half million professional women, more than 60 per cent are school teachers or nurses. In the federal public service, the percentage of administrative support jobs filled by women has increased steadily over the past five years (from 68.2 per cent in 1972 to 78.8 per cent in 1976), thus creating the biggest job ghetto in the public service.

When hon. members relate that to the figures of those women who are employed at the very senior levels of administration in the public service, they will realize what women in public service employment are up against.

According to a listing of departments from the Public Service Commission 1976 annual report, there were only 38 females in the senior executive capacity, known as SX, compared to 1,221 males. National Revenue with a total of 23,736 employees, of which 39.4 per cent were women. There were 55 employees in the SX category, but not a single woman. The Department of Supply and Services had 10,217 employees, 46.8 per cent of whom were women. Of 62 in the SX category, there was not a single woman.

In the Public Service Commission, which is charged with the redressing of the balance in terms of employment of women at senior levels, there were 4,042 employees; 55 per cent were women, there were 27 in the SX category, of which only one was a woman. Obviously she must have been regarded as a token woman in the SX category.

In the Department of Secretary of State where almost two thirds of the employees are women, there was not one in the SX category. CIDA, which deals with the development of countries around the world, with a thousand employees, roughly half of them women, with 31 people at the SX level, does not have one single woman at that level. That is the kind of situation women face today in the public service.

What concerns me about the motion today is that we might restrict the opportunity for women to have their rightful role at every level of employment, not just in certain ghettos outside the home as is presently the case at a clerical administrative level, but throughout the public service and employment in this country.

I will not carry on this debate any longer, Mr. Speaker. It has been a useful contribution to a particularly important question, and I hope other members will have an opportunity to contribute to it as well.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson) and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) have indicated, it is possible, on the one hand, to praise the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for bringing in this motion and then to turn around and find all sorts of flaws in it. I suppose I could find a flaw in it myself. However, I am more concerned, to give my support to the intent of the motion, which is a good one for us to be considering this afternoon.

Time is going on and I shall not be part of the talking out process. I have learned in private members' hour how to say what is on my mind very quickly.

I feel that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare missed one of the main points in this whole proposal. I recognize that in the motion there is a reference to the ensuring of a global income. However, it seems to me that the main reason for making payments of some sort to housewives and mothers is not just as an addition to income, but as a means of recognizing the contribution these people make.

During the first part of his speech the parliamentary secretary showed no indication of that. When he got along into his speech, he talked about recognition. What did he say? Wives and mothers should enjoy the prestige that they have, that that should be sufficient recognition. That is where I threw in my reference about being members of parliament. There is a lot of prestige attached to our position as members of parliament, but we are not a group of people who are prepared to do it for no pay, just recognition. I submit that the time has come when we should recognize the work being done by housewives and mothers in the same way as we recognize all others.

I recognize the argument that the hon. member for Egmont made about job ghettos. However, I think he carried it a little bit far. I would like to see an equal chance for women whether they go out into the labour market or stay at home. As the hon. member pointed out, there are plenty of ghettos. However, I believe he is overplaying that word as far as life in the home is concerned. I contend that, there should be equal opportunity.

I promised myself to keep this contribution brief. However, I want to say a word about my concern with regard to equality for women which also extends to the time when they should be on pension. It is a shame we have not found some way of providing women in the home with the equivalent of the Canada Pension Plan. This might be one way of doing it. If we can put them on some sort of allowance or salary for the work they do in the home and count that as a contribution to the Canada Pension Plan, we might be able to do something about it. We shall have more to say about this matter on another occasion.

My main concern this afternoon is not to point out the flaws in the hon. member's motion but to commend him for bringing it forward and to encourage him to keep at it.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to enter this debate this afternoon, but I cannot sit here and listen to this kind of tokenism, perpetuation of role locking a woman into the role of homemaker—a place in life she may not choose. If you want to pay your wife, pay her yourself; the country should not have to pay the cost. I do not think there are many women in Canada who would welcome this, as opposed to having essential help to what I would call the "displaced homemaker". These are women who have carried out this job as wife and mother for 10 or 15 years and raised their children with little imaginative support in the home. Their husbands were out enjoying themselves. I have worked all my life in that world and I know the men have had a much better and easier time of it. They have their coffee breaks and other privileges. They had freedoms, often, to act in a way I did not admire such as being disloyal to the women at home working.

• (1752)

We must give some consideration to those women who have been homemakers. There should also be equality in the home. We now have a number of househusbands, as they call them, who stay at home and look after the children. They must have equality with their wives who are out working. They are entitled to equal respect and equal opportunity.

This debate reminds me of what might have happened even before there were women in this House. This whole matter dates back to even before the 1920's. I have been in the work force now for about 35 years. I remember when men tried to prevent me from being in the outside work world. They told me, and are still trying to tell me, that my place is in the home. They suggest I have no right to be in the work force because, God forbid, I may be taking a job away from some man. There is nothing in our society that says men are superior, more competent and more able than that other 50 per cent of the population. It may very well be that our society, our governments, our institutions, our working force and, perhaps, the entire world would be better off if we recognized the fact that there is another 50 per cent of the population, the women—those members of society who not only make good mothers and homemakers, but also good lawyers, good accountants, good engineers—

An hon. Member: Good members of parliament.

Mrs. Holt: I thank the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) who says "good members of parliament". I would like to see 50 per cent equity in this House. We are always talking about giving proportional representation by race. Perhaps it is time we also said we should have proportional representation by sex—in the House of Commons and in the work force.

I know there are many women who will not accept this motion by the hon. member for Bellechasse and I do not blame them. Many of the young women today are studying law, medicine, etc., even while they are raising their children. This is much more difficult for them because there are still some men who do not think they have to ease the workload for women, even those at school or working. If there is work to be done in the home it should be paid for by whoever is earning the living, be it the man or the woman.

There must never again be another Murdock case in Canada. In that case a woman who had worked her whole life to help in the building of an estate lost it all because she happened to be a member of the female sex. In courtrooms women are strangers in a foreign land and are taken to the cleaners.

If a woman wants to stay at home she should have that right and be paid for the work she does there by the one who uses her services—if this partnership requires pay. I think the greatest occupation ever for a woman or a man is the raising of a family successfully. There are none I respect more than those who have done so. There are none in this world we can respect more than those who have brought children into the world and fashioned them into good human beings. The children of today will be the leaders of tomorrow. There is nothing that says the woman alone must raise the family.

The greatest failures among children are the results of the very thing the hon. member is suggesting in his motion, that the men can abdicate their responsibilities and let the government take over in the raising of their children while the women stay at home alone. As the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) says, this would legitimize the servant status for women.

I had a cartoon slipped to me early this afternoon and it is amazing how appropriate it is to this debate. It comes from Grainews, published by the farm information services of the United Grain Growers Limited, P.O. Box 6600, Winnipeg. Hon. members can send for this cartoon if it pleases them to adopt a chauvinist line. It is a picture of two farmers beside an old cow. Beside them is an elderly woman walking away with a milk pail. Underneath it states: "I don't care how good she used to be! Look at those teats! She's a broken down old bag and I'd get rid of her!". That attitude is what it is all about. I say we must all strive here to get women equal rights and equal respect.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what happened to the homemakers of the generation just before mine? They finished their job of raising the children but were not prepared to go out and earn a living outside the home. Some ended up in mental hospitals; some managed to rebuild their lives; and some managed to learn to use their leisure properly. Many turned to alcohol. Those were the tragedies of once good wives and homemakers—rejected and lonely.

In my generation a few women have broken out and are free. Many of my friends have gone back to school in their middle years and are trying to find a way to catch up. During the 20 years they were destined to be in the home alone, without much help, they were left behind in the work world by men. In many cases the man and woman would enter law, for example, at the same time, but the woman would have to stop because it was her duty to stay at home with the children and keep house. While the woman stayed home, locked into this thing called "woman's duty," the man moved on to become a judge, the head of a bank, the head of a business, a head plumber, or a head horticulturalist. As a result, when the women were free to enter the work force they could only go into jobs such as waitresses and secretaries.

Let me stop here to say that the most important and strongest group of women in our society is that group made up of our secretaries. I have discovered—and perhaps this is why women have been kept out of the board rooms for so long—that the male executives do not want women to find out the truth of how they do their jobs. The jobs really are done by the secretaries. In the law profession for example, it is very interesting to note that the secretary does most of the work—the factumes, the reports and the statements of claim. She does all that work and may make $8,000 a year.

I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he argues—

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must take exception to some of the remarks of the hon. member. Being a lawyer myself I cannot agree that all of the things she has said are in fact accurate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Let me suggest to the hon. parliamentary secretary that that is not a point of order but rather a point of debate.

Mrs. Holt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They must defend their own injustices to women. I am not saying the parliamentary secretary is in this position, but many lawyers pay $8,000 a year to these women and charge $20,000 to $50,000 for the cases those women have prepared for them.

I say that young women now know they must prepare for their lives in their middle years. They will have to attain their degrees and nurture their talents in order to prepare their lives for the future. If both men and women share in the lives of their children, I am sure we will have happier children.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour for consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue with my remarks in regard to how credit unions offer many additional services free of charge compared to banks. Turning to the article which I was referring to earlier, it reads as follows:

> Banks certainly offer many of the same services, and quite a few others as well—although there's usually a charge.
> But the credit unions offer many of the everyday services free, and the rates they pay for savings are often slightly higher than those paid by the banks.
>
> To obtain the revenue for this, the credit unions sometimes charge slightly higher loan and mortgage rates—but then they often allow you to make extra payments ahead of time without penalty, which can be worth quite a bit.

[Mrs. Holt.]

The article went on to quote the comments of one member of a credit union who indicated the following:

> We own a 12-site apartment and our cash flow is about $30,000 a year. Our account's monthly balance ranges from $1,200 to $2,000. Our bank didn't pay interest on the daily balance, so we switched to a credit union which does. And our credit union cheques work out to a cost of ten cents each versus the bank's 21.7 cents.

These are things we can question the bank representatives about when they come to committee in order to find out why the same services cannot be offered.

Earlier in my remarks I referred to the government's white paper on revisions to the Bank Act. It pointed out that some type of legislation would be brought in to deal with venture capital. Just last month I spoke on that subject in another debate. I indicated how important it was for our secondary industries to obtain venture capital. Venture capital cannot be obtained because of conditions in the country today. Apparently the government has some kind of program in regard to venture capital which will be presented.

Last week the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) stated that the opposition was making him look good. When we experience delays like this and the stalling tactics which have occurred, neither the minister nor the government looks good. With the economic conditions in the country today, the government looks terrible when it delays something as important as the Bank Act. Also it is a disgrace that the minister is delaying the development of the new Bank Act. Independent businessmen of Canada have pointed out the kind of changes required in the legislation in order for small business and secondary industry to obtain venture capital. This is important today with our record high unemployment, which is costing $8 billion a year. It is time for something to be done to expand our secondary industry and to assist our small businesses, instead of just bringing in ridiculous pieces of legislation calling for delays in bringing in the Bank Act.

● (2012)

Earlier this year I read from a document from a financial group in Winnipeg named Peter Henry Jerch and Associates. They are a firm specializing in corporate finance and acquisitions. They have a significant roster of clients needing capital and are aware of many of the situations where the injection of equity venture capital can produce very beneficial results to them and to the economy at large. In fact, the need is so broad that nearly half of all companies that apply to banks for credit should have additional venture capital to make them more successful and more viable.

Instead of allowing this tremendous outflow of capital to the United States and large numbers of businesses to move to the United States because of the political climate here and the uncertainty caused by delays in producing the Bank Act, which should have been tabled here at least a year ago, the government points out the need for all these things in the white paper but is doing nothing. It is just bringing in ridiculous pieces of legislation asking for more delays.

This investment counselling firm also pointed out:

> ... if such venture capital investments could be offset in full against other income, and besides the tremendous impact on the short and long term economy, there would be no negative effect on government tax revenues. To test this assertion, Peter Henry Jerch and Associates conducted a detailed survey of 40 smaller Canadian owned companies located in Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and B.C. The survey delved into nearly every aspect of a company and included a review of financial statements and books, a review of management ability to carry out a proposed strategy, and a study of product viability and historical projected market acceptance. Detailed summary tables were drawn up based on the results of this in depth review.

They go on to give statistical information on how they could expand and the number of jobs they would create if they could receive additional venture capital which they cannot obtain in this country and which, as the minister pointed out in his white paper, is one of the top requirements in this country. But apparently we will have to wait until unemployment goes up, more businesses leave and more investment capital leaves the country. Then the government might get around to bringing in revisions of the Bank Act. This is a ridiculous situation although, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, we could go along with a further extension of the Bank Act if the legislation is tabled now and businesses, credit unions and banks across Canada have this document to study so they can prepare themselves.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the delay for which the minister asks. I hope he will read the remarks that were made today by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), by myself and by others who will speak later. I hope they will be forceful also in demanding that this irresponsible minister table the Bank Act immediately, instead of making ridiculous statements in the House that he looks good.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about Bill C-16 which is before us, the purpose of which is to extend the Bank Act for another year. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) and the hon. member who spoke prior to him, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), both expressed my views clearly on why we are debating this bill when, as they have said, we should be debating the new Bank Act. I know that the minister, the people in his department and most of the people in the private sector to whom I spoke look upon the revised Bank Act as the basis for any economic recovery which will occur in Canada. We have all read the white paper on banking and the proposed changes to the Bank Act. We know that the legislation is ready and has been for some time.

Mr. Chrétien: This is not true, it is not ready.

Mr. Kempling: Perhaps we have been misinformed, but we were informed in January that the Bank Act is ready and that we might possibly be debating it—

Mr. Chrétien: With the permission of the hon. member I would like to tell him that if the bill were ready, I would be tabling it. The bill is being drafted at this time by the Department of Justice. I am as frustrated as the hon. member that the bill is not ready. We had a long debate after the white paper was brought forward, we had more representations and some changes had to be made. Since the bill is not ready, I am not tabling it. It has not come back to me in its draft form.

Mr. Whiteway: That is the problem. The bill is not ready.

Mr. Chrétien: I said that in the committee about two weeks ago. I know that when the hon. member said the bill was ready, he was probably using information he had, and I wanted to correct his wrong impression.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am sure the minister wanted to rise on a point of clarification, but this does not justify a point of order.

Mr. Whiteway: That is the problem, it is not ready.

Mr. Paproski: Nothing is ready over there.

Mr. Kempling: I thank the minister and I accept his explanation that the bill is not yet ready. What I was referring to was information that we had in January to the effect that the bill was ready, had been drafted and approved; and, I might go on to say, we were even told that it followed the white paper very closely with few changes. I am referring to the white paper which was presented in August of 1976. We were told that that is the sort of bill we would be seeing. So I was not just spreading an idle rumour; I was speaking on the basis of pretty good information.

However, now that we are talking about the bill not being here, let me point out that the bill was being considered in 1973, 1974 and 1975. Here we are in 1978, five years after the bill was first considered, being asked to extend the existing legislation for another year to give the government a chance to bring in revised legislation. It is particularly important because people in the private sector are being pressured by the government to stimulate employment, to expand their plant facilities, to help pick up the slack in unemployment, to help export more products, and to offset our balance of payments deficit. The reason for not doing this, aside from the general economic condition, is the severe difficulties they have in obtaining adequate financing through our banking system.

In the last ten years, the ability to accumulate wealth has dried up. Normally, one could go into the stock and raise capital in order to spawn a new industry or enlarge an existing one, but that facility is not available today. The result is that we have to rely on what was traditionally a short-term money market for long-term investments. When we have difficulty getting those commitments out of some of our banks because of restrictions in the existing Bank Act, that is one of the major reasons for the absence of an upsurge in economic activity in Canada.

We need a variety of financial institutions in Canada. After reading the white paper on proposed changes to the Bank Act and on proposals regarding the credit union movement I was concerned. I suggest to the minister that possibly we need two levels of financing. Perhaps we need the level of our ten chartered banks and another piece of legislation to deal with credit unions, merchant banks, discount houses and those kinds of financial institutions. I am not convinced that we should bring credit unions totally under the control of the Bank Act.

If we look into the matter carefully, I think we will find that the bulk of assistance being given to small business today in Canada is given by credit unions. A tremendous amount of assistance is being given to small business by credit unions, I believe more than by chartered banks. I would be upset if we tried to cast a net and draw credit unions totally into the same orbit in which we find chartered banks.

One of the things we need most is confidence in the dollar. We also need confidence that Canada will continue on some rational footing for the next period of time. We need confidence in the integrity of Canadian enterprise. I do not think that confidence will come through programs and incentives from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, where there is much bureaucracy but as a result of a realistic revision of the Bank Act, a close look at the functions being performed by trust companies and credit unions and an examination of the merchant banking system which we find to be very successful in Europe.

In my own career in business I had an opportunity to use merchant banks. Many years ago we had a tight money policy. At least that is what bankers in Canada told us. I had some difficulty acquiring some funds, so I got in touch with a merchant banking firm in London, England. After telex messages passed back and forth between London and my office, in a matter of 24 hours a line of credit was arranged which could not be arranged with one of our chartered Canadian banks. Merchant banks have a place in our banking system.

One gentleman in the business community whose opinion I particularly respect told me at the weekend that sooner or later Katz' Law is going to come into effect in Ottawa. According to Katz' Law, when you have completely screwed up the economy sooner or later you are going to do the things you should have done in the first place. Had the government pursued a revision of the Bank Act in 1974 and 1975, we would have been better served than we were by the imposition of controls. As I have said, the cornerstone of the economic recovery program is a revived and revised Bank Act.

One of the difficulties which was experienced by many businesses in 1975 and 1976 when our interest rates were running high was that they had to make arrangements principally in the United States and Europe to finance inventories. They entered into arrangements with European and American suppliers to finance inventories at rates of interest ranging from 5.5 per cent to 7.5 per cent, which was considerably lower than rates in Canada. As a result of a slowdown of activity in 1977 many of those business firms are now carrying notes from European and American financial institutions on their books. With the present devalued dollar they are into a serious profit position.

The stabilization of the dollar, a reconstituting of the Bank Act and a revision of the Bank Act are vital to everything we do in business, and I am amazed that when we came back here in the fall the government did not announce that it would proceed full speed ahead with a new Bank Act and endeavour to have it in place by the spring of 1978. I want to stress the need to revise the present act. Businesses face tremendous difficulties with various sections of the existing act. I have raised the matter of section 88 before. That is the section of the act which deals with collateral. Under section 88, if you are in a manufacturing operation, banks will accept as collateral raw material and work in progress. However, once that work in progress is completed and is part of inventory it no longer falls under section 88. Where material rolls off the line and is delivered, that is fine; section 88 works well in that situation. But where there is a slowdown and where there is an accumulation of inventory, the business involved rapidly runs out of money, especially if that inventory is stored for a long period of time.

I have heard various members of the New Democratic Party urge that certain industries should be stockpiling or building up inventories to keep employment going during the present economic slowdown. The very real difficulty is the financing of that inventory. Most trading companies and most manufacturing companies have a great deal of difficulty financing finished inventories. Consequently, they tend to keep a minimum of finished inventories on their shelves. We really need some new instruments and some changes in the act in order to accommodate this situation. Banks need a new instrument to deal with small and medium-sized businesses, and I hope the minister will consider what I have said about two levels of financial institutions.

Once again I say that credit unions, trust companies and merchant bank operations could be governed by another type of legislation. Perhaps there could be a financing instrument to deal with the requirements of small and medium sized businesses. Under the existing act the small businessman really has very little leverage through the medium of a debt instrument which he can use to finance his business.

We are concerned, of course, with the forecast in the white paper about the role of the chartered banks in the areas of leasing, computer services and the extension of consumer credit. If the banks enter these areas to any great extent it could be to the detriment of the small and medium sized business sector. I think that would be a tragedy, Mr. Speaker.

We face difficult times. Unemployment stands at 8.3 per cent, inflation at 9 per cent, the Canadian dollar is under 90 cents U.S. and is unstable, while private capital spending is below 3.5 per cent. Everyone is calling for increased activity in the private sector and it seems to me that introduction of the Bank Act would do more to stimulate this than any other action. Programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, GATT incentive programs, controls or no controls, labour relations, competition legislation—none of these things will have as much effect on the private sector as a revised Bank Act.

The minister has said that the legislation is presently being drafted by the Department of Justice and that he has not seen the draft. Of course, I take his word for that. He has also said that he wants to bring the bill to the House as soon as possible. That is rather strange when you consider how long it has been around. The Bank Act is due for revision every ten years and we know work was being done on it in 1973, yet after five years we are being asked to extend the present act.

I would urge the minister to bring the bill to the House as soon as possible. We did not have an opportunity to debate the white paper and it was never referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. It is true that the Senate studied it and the chartered banks and some other institutions had an opportunity to consider it, but the House did not. When the revised Bank Act is ready we are anxious that the House have an opportunity to debate it, to hear witnesses and, if necessary, to offer amendments to make it legislation the business community can work with for the next ten years.

That is about all I have to say on Bill C-16 at this time. Some of my colleagues will be speaking and I presume we will proceed with the bill when the other speakers have completed their remarks.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there are three main points that should be made when considering Bill C-16 and I do not think they can be made too often. First is the irresponsibility of the government; second is the uncertainty in the business community; and third is the uncertainty of future activities of the banks themselves.

Some of my colleagues have spoken of the performance of the government leading up to this bill and some of the things they have said are worth repeating briefly. The Bank Act expired on June 30, 1977. It is not as if the government did not know this was going to happen; one might say the government had ten years' notice that the act would expire. This act is not like any other; it does not just expire and become part of history. If it is allowed to wind down and expire, the banks are forced to wind down all operations on the day of expiration and then have no authority by which to operate.

If the ten years' notice were not enough for the government, they were reminded of their responsibility to introduce new legislation in 1977 when the first extension bill which extended the Bank Act until March 31, 1978 was introduced. After that came the white paper. The government might say it has so many things to do it could not possibly get the legislation passed by March 31, so now we are asked to extend the act until March 31, 1979.

There is a catch in this bill, Mr. Speaker. It is not only a bill to extend the operation of the Bank Act until April 1, 1979; in fact, it could go on for quite a few months more. That is not evident from the bill. The extension could be for several months or ten months. What the bill says is that it will extend the act beyond the end of March, 1979 until the sixtieth sitting day of parliament next thereafter. Parliament rarely sits more than 20 days in any month so that would give three months if parliament were in proper session. But let us suppose the government called an election next March, although, heaven forbid, there need not be an election until the fall of 1979. If an election were called in March, 1979 there would be a two-month election campaign during April and May. The House traditionally does not sit until a couple of months after an election so that would take us through June and July, nor does it usually sit in August, September or October. This would mean a possible extension not to March 31, 1979, but for seven or more months after that.

With that background I think we must ask why there has been a delay and why the government did not have the legislation ready. It has known for ten or eleven years when the review was due. If we look at the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) at the time the bill was introduced in the House in January of this year, it might be interesting to note that the Minister did not see fit to present the bill. It was presented by his colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and was introduced by way of opening remarks by the parliamentary secretary. One would have thought that the minister would find it important enough to be here since it was the first day of the resumption of parliament after the Christmas recess. In any event, at page 2118 of Hansard the parliamentary secretary said:

First, the extent of consultations encouraged by the white paper. Second, the extent and complexity of the task of converting the principles of white paper into legislation and particularly, where appropriate, making the Bank Act consistent with the principles and provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act and, third, the extent of the pressure of other priorities on the small group of legislative drafters in the Department of Justice.

If I could comment for a moment on the last reason. We had an example where a mysterious bill materialized from the offices of the legislative drafters in the Department of Justice, which bore the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). It was strange that the Minister of Finance denied any connection with this particular bill. When I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) last week what minion in his department had authorized the drafting of this bill, he was unable to recall the name of the author, what authority had been given for its drafting or for its release across this country.

What about these first and second reasons, which may be more important? The first was the extent of consultations encouraged by the white paper. The government called for submissions in response to the white paper from the business community. They received them and they were considered. They were distributed to all of the members of the finance committee. I have stacks of them in my office. But did the government ever call that committee to consider them in detail? No, Mr. Speaker, there have been no meetings by the standing committee to consider those submissions. The government itself undoubtedly had lots of time to examine those submissions. Goodness knows why they did not pay any attention to them. Maybe they did. Maybe that is why they withdrew the legislation.

The second reason given by the parliamentary secretary is the extent and complexity of the task of converting the principles of the white paper into legislation. I am sure the banking community would like to know where they stand regarding the submissions which they made at the request of the government. The request was made for some input respecting the new rules that will be affecting banks in the near future. The legislation is nearing completion and the bill will soon be ready for introduction. At least, that is what we were told today when the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) asked what was likely to be happening with the legislation. There have been ample opportunities for the government to have it ready. The words of the minister today merely repeated the statement which the parliamentary secretary made in his speech over a month ago. One would wonder if there is any faith in the system as exhibited by the government.

Again at page 2118 of Hansard, referring to the earlier amendment, the parliamentary secretary said:

That wording provides flexibility and acts as a safeguard in the event that parliament is not sitting at the end of March, 1979—

I believe I covered that when I said there was a possibility that this bill might not to passed until late in the fall of next year.

That is enough about the performance of the government. We should now turn to the performance of the banks to see what kind of consideration they deserve. The banks are often painted as ogres or worse by some members of this House. Management of Canadian banks is responsible in the performance of its duties. Everybody is not happy with the performance of the banks, just as everybody is not happy with the performance of politicians. There are split responsibilities. The management of Canada's banks has responsibility to its depositors. They must safeguard the millions of dollars belonging to Canadians on deposit in the banks. They are also responsible to the countless thousands of Canadians who own equity in the banks.

I do not have the number of shareholders at hand and I do not know whether that information has been given in this debate. However, I do remember when the International Nickel Company was the subject of debate in this House that the number of shareholders in Canada in that company was 55,000. If I had to guess, Mr. Speaker, I would say that there were several hundred thousand Canadians who had direct ownership of shares in Canadian banks. If we take the institutional investment in the banks and consider the beneficial ownership in the banks' equity stock by Canadians—and in this respect I am referring to pension funds, estates and trusts—I suggest there are probably millions of Canadians who have some direct or indirect interest in the operation of Canadian banks.

The executives themselves are not a particularly wealthy group. Some people are impressed by the high salaries of these professional managers in Canada. There was an example given just recently of an industrialist managing a large company earning something over $300,000. Salaries of $200,000 are not at all rare in Canada today. I do not know what salaries the banks pay their top men, and this information may not be published. But that is not the point. These men are professional managers whose responsibility it is to serve their customers. At the same time they must protect their depositors and ensure that their shareholders, who are their ultimate bosses, receive a proper return on the capital which they have invested in those banks.

A lot is said about the banks and their huge profits. It is not necessary to go into the dollar figures here, but the percentage increases, which is the kind of information my friends to my left, and particularly the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), seem to indulge in, I have brought with me tonight. Profits of all Canadians banks, not counting the ones which lost money, in 1977 increased between 10 per cent and 13 per cent over 1976 profits.

Everything that is published in the financial world these days is published in numbers of actual dollars, not in so-called real dollars, which is the dollar discounted for inflation. If the government can allow the inflation rate to run at 9 or 10 per cent every year, an interest rate running between 10 and 13 per cent can hardly be said to be unreasonable. After all, the banks deal in dollar units; they do not get the kind of security against inflation which is held by people investing in real estate or in equities which increase in real value so as to offer protection against inflation. The banks have to reflect the result of inflation in the increase in their investments in terms of numbers of dollars. This is not to the discredit of the banks. If there is any blame to be apportioned for that kind of increase, it has to fall upon the government.

What kind of services are the banks performing and what kind of services do we want them to perform? It is true that the banks, because of the type of deposits they were in the habit of taking, were not for a long time involved in the mortgage market. Then, for a time, there was a non-legislative barrier against their being engaged in mortgage transactions—I refer to the interest ceiling placed on banks only. But since then we have seen an increasing involvement of banks in the mortgage field. Indeed, two years ago the banks were the holders of 21 per cent of all institutionally supplied mortgages. So more than one of every five dollars in the mortgage market had been put up by the banks, representing a sizeable proportion of mortgage funding in the housing field at any time. I suppose one might wonder whether this involvement by the banks increased the total amount of money available for mortgages or whether it merely allowed some of the other lenders to run off into other areas. I do not know.

Another important use of the funds of banks is in the small loans field. This is an area which is often overlooked. People sometimes think that the banks are being unfair in charging what they term a high interest rate on loans to individuals; rates of between 12 and 14 per cent are talked about and are realized by the banks. What is often ignored is the risk encountered by the banks and the rates charged by others in the field who are not in the same competitive position. I am referring to some of those lenders who are subject to attack by supporters of the government when the borrowers and depositors legislation was introduced here and then allowed to die on the order paper.

It was interesting to note that when the legislation was introduced the then minister—I think he was the seventh in a row of nine or ten—spoke of an illegal rate of interest and stated that the highest rate of interest the government would consider would be something like six times the prime. In any event, it worked out to something like 50 per cent per annum before a rate would be illegal. And here we have the banks lending with a very small margin, because they pay interest, of course, on the amounts they lend out. They try to pay a rate of interest as high as possible to their depositors, and lend money to other Canadians who need it for individual purposes at 2 per cent or so over the rate. Indeed, sometimes the margin is no more than one and a half per cent. In any event, a real service to the community is being done in this field.

There is another and lesser known area, that of factoring. Many businessmen know how useful the banks are in factoring accounts receivable, say, in direct payments. What do we expect the banks to do in the future? Here is a real opportunity for the government and for the opposition to change the direction of banking in Canada. If the government would only come forward and let us know what plans it has, we could have something to say about the issue and so could the banking community.

With reference to other fields in which the banks might become involved I can only say I see certain dangers. For example, the banks want to become more involved in leasing. I see danger in this. I know there are many ordinary Canadian businesses which lease equipment and so on. If we consider the matter closely we see that leasing, after all, is only another way of borrowing money and that the one operation can be directly related to the other. If the banks were to step into the leasing field they would be competing with those who already lease equipment. When a lessor wanted to increase his line of credit with a bank the tendency, inescapably, would be for the bank to say: We are sorry, we have come to the end of the line of credit we are authorized to extend to you. The door would then be open for that bank, or any other bank, to jump in without restriction and offer to take the contract as a condition of providing the equipment. That is one possibility. There are undoubtedly others which would arise in connection with the expansion of banking activities. Thus it is important that the government get its legislation into the hands of the committee where it can be studied very carefully.

Finally, it is urgent that the bill before us be passed so that the banks will have this element of uncertainty removed from their operations and they will not be wondering whether they will still be in business after the end of next month. The best thing I can think of now as a member of the opposition is to urge the government to produce its revised act as they have promised to do very soon, but which we have not yet seen—

Mr. Stevens: Shame!

Mr. Clarke: My hon. friend says "Shame" and that is a fitting note on which to end. Let the government cease to follow these shameful delaying tactics which are imposing such uncertainty upon the banking and business community.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): As a country boy from Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to hon. members from both sides speak on this measure. I want to take only a few minutes in which to remind the House that all this bill does is extend the provisions of the present Bank Act for another year while the government, like governments before it, agonizes about what should be done with our banking legislation.

In the history of this country, transportation and transcontinental railways were used as instruments of national policy. It seems to me this should be even more the case when it comes to banks and banking: they should be used as a tool of national policy. They should be used as a tool in terms of social policy, the direction of their investment, the kind of profits they make, how they treat their employees and their ethics or conscience in their dealings with Canadians, with their employees, and where they deal in other parts of the world. If anything has been lacking in financial institutions over many decades, it is some kind of conscience in terms of social policy, the ethics of who they deal with and how they deal with them.

One can go back 2,100 years. I do not want to infringe upon the territory of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but the parable of the money changers being driven from the temple is even more applicable today. It may have happened 2,100 years ago, but they have snuck in the back door and are here again!

The banks of our country whose depositors, borrowers and shareholders are Canadians are very large and efficient operators in the world banking industry. They are Canadian owned and operated for and by Canadians. When they deal outside of our boundaries, similar to the way investors did with the Hitlers, Mussolinis and Stalins of this world, one has to ask whether that is the kind of conscionable financial institutions we want in this country.

Mr. Clarke: Yes.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) says yes.

Mr. Clarke: To protect the depositors.

Mr. Benjamin: To protect those depositors who invest money in military dictatorships in Chile and to protect the dividends of those shareholders. Canadian money is provided to bolster a racist regime in South Africa and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra thinks that is great. One of the reasons Jesus drove the money changers out of the temple was, I believe, because of the exploiting of people. That is a nineteenth century, or even older, philosophy or creed which says it is okay to do anything to make a buck.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How about loans to the left?

Mr. Benjamin: When it is a totalitarian dictatorship, right, left, upside or downside, it is not okay. If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra or the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) want to invest their money in shoring up a loan for the state bank in Moscow or the military regime in Chile, that is their business. However, I do not know that any board of directors of a bank has a right to do that on behalf of their hundreds of thousands of depositors, customers and, in particular, shareholders without asking them. They never consult with them.

Mr. Clarke: Every year.

Mr. Benjamin: Every year they throw a party. If a shareholder tries to protest at an annual meeting about the kind of investment that is being made, he gets absolutely nowhere. Every time church groups and shareholders attend annual meetings of banks and protest policies regarding investments or the social conscience of that institution, they get absolutely no place. It is a myth that these private enterprise outfits are very democratic and that shareholders have the final say. I have never yet seen it work with any of these outfits.

Mr. Kaplan: They can always sell their shares.

Mr. Benjamin: The $90,000 candidate from Toronto says they can always sell their shares.

An hon. Member: He can always sell his soul.

Mr. Benjamin: Maybe, if he has one. It is easy for him to make that kind of recommendation. If he were an investment counsellor, he would abhor what the banks are doing. However, he would advise his clients to invest in banks because there are good bucks in it. Anything to make a buck.

The Royal Bank has participated in a $55 million loan to finance a steel project in Chile. The Bank of Montreal has confirmed it is part of an international group that will provide $125 million in economic aid to the Chilean junta. It is not bad enough that they do that, but they gave $25,000 to both the Conservative and Liberal parties a year ago. I suspect they do that every year. I doubt whether they consulted with their shareholders on that. They sure did not consult with their shareholders about backing up a $125 million project in Chile. They can find that kind of money, but when it is suggested that maybe there should be a few cents less in dividends for their shareholders and a few million for their profits so that this money can be used for the development and growth of our nation, they are quick to say it is not good business or good enterprise.

I know some free enterprising individuals who maximize their participation in our society and country. We might argue about politics, but they make a contribution to their community, province and country in a variety of ways. They treat their employees well, participate in good pension plans and do not invest in what can be called the "anything for a buck" type of operation. However, our banks and other financial institutions do. That is something that gets our so-called free enterprise system in trouble. Their social conscience, how they deal with people and treat their shareholders is what gets them into trouble.

Mr. Clarke: We are not in trouble.

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, like Marie Antoinette, says "We are not in trouble".

Mr. Clarke: Pierre gets in trouble.

Mr. Benjamin: It does not matter whether it is Pierre Elliott Trudeau or R. B. Bennett. Not that there is that much difference between them—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One is dead.

Mr. Benjamin: One is dead and the other soon will be politically.

Those who spread propaganda about the great ethics, morality and standards of the free enterprise system have dirty hands. I know some of these people personally. They are fine upstanding citizens. However, how they can look at themselves in the mirror in the morning without throwing up, I will never be able to understand. Not that everybody is totally pure.

Mr. Stevens: You have a lot of cuts on your face.

Mr. Benjamin: The banks advertise on television telling us how great they are for us, but the entire history of the banking fraternity in Canada is bad, and that bad history goes back as far as confederation.

We need only two financial systems in this country, a publicly owned chartered banking system and the credit union or caisse populaire system. Let me tell the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that about 30 years ago, when I first tried to get a loan from a bank for a $2,700 item, with $2,000 cash on hand, the bank manager, who was a very nice fellow to curl up with and to have a cup of coffee with, asked me if I owned any land, to which I said no. He asked did I own a house, to which I replied no, and whether I had any cash. So I said all I had was the $2,000, a good name and my job. He said he was sorry he could not lend me the $700. That was one of our great chartered banks. I had a wife, three kids and bills all over town like most every other Canadian in those days, but he could not trust me as a customer.

That is when I got wise, smartened up and went to my credit union. When I went to the credit union I paid my $5 for a membership in the union and had my $700 by noon. Let me tell you that I have never gone anywhere else but to the credit union since, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: You still owe them.

Mr. Benjamin: I have owed them several times, and sometimes they carried me longer than my own mother did.

An hon Member: And she carried you too long.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You were a long-term baby.

Mr. Benjamin: I have been a member, on the board of directors and a member of the supervisory committees of a credit union for about 30 years. I have seen at first hand how money can work for people instead of people just working for money. I have seen what can be done for individuals in a community who desperately need the help of a financial friend. I have seen what money can do for an entire community when these private enterprise banks would not touch the project with a ten-foot pole, even though it meant a local skating rink or a curling club. As a result the people got together and did it themselves.

At a time when we need hundreds of millions more investments in low-income housing, senior citizens' homes or, even a real risk item, a day care centre which might go belly-up a year or two later—in other words, when it comes to the things in respect of which money can really work for the people—where do we find these banks? They all have great commercials on television, and they do everything to try to drag you in off the street to make you a loan, even for something for which you neither have the money nor the need. But when society really needs the money, or when a community, a small group or an individual needs financing, that is when whatever amount of social conscience they might attempt to display through their television ads totally disappears.

Let me tell my hon. friend from Vancouver that perhaps I should give him an honorary citizenship in Saskatchewan, or make him an honorary wheat farmer so that he can find out what the CCF did in respect of the co-operative movement in Saskatchewan. In fact, even his own party gave at least lip service to that movement in the dirty thirties, and the labour party bailed out the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the farmers' co-operative. There is a great deal of history of government activity in my province, a government which has said to hell with the banks and has done things itself.

At a time when we need so much investment in homes, hospitals, day care centres, senior citizens' housing and other socially desirable projects, these outfits are telling us how great they are about shoring up outfits in South Africa and Chile. It seems to me that condemns these institutions out of their own mouths and from their own actions. I do not see these banks rushing to help other Third World nations whose short-term prospects are not very good. They may be terribly poor nations with an annual per capita income of $50 or $100. They may be located in the middle of the desert, or because of some other geographical or natural circumstance they are in that category; but I do not see our banks volunteering to make investments, particularly if the chance of their making a buck is not very good. I do not see them volunteering to risk some part of their worth and wealth for these people. I have had many people in the banking fraternity tell me they are willing to invest their money, but that it must be in a very good thing. Any damned fool can be a banker with that kind of a deal.

I think that governments must have some direction in this regard. This is a horrible thought to my friends to the right and to many across the way, but other countries to the right, the left and the centre have done this with their financial institutions and banks decades ago. They have moved in and directed them in terms of where some if not all of their investments are to go.

These governments have given the banking institutions two choices in respect of how much of their investment will be made in low-income housing, day care centres and other worth-while social projects which may or may not make a buck. They have directed them as to how much investment must go into those projects. They are given one of two choices; it is "compulsory" or they "must" do it.

Let us consider the whole matter of using our chartered banks as a tool of national policy. It seems to me this is even more important than the manner in which our national transcontinental railways are set up. In that case we are looking at investment in projects of national interest and national worth. When you require funding for some great national project the banking community, which obviously will not do it on its own, must be directed as to how much of their investment portfolios will go into the national project.

Let me say a word or two about the people who work in the banks—the tellers, the clerks and accountants. They are all capable, competent people. If they were not the banks would not be making nearly as much money as they do. For decades and decades they have attempted to obtain better working conditions—better hours, holidays with pay and rates of pay—but they have been looked upon as Scrooge looked upon Bob Cratchett. The needs and the wellbeing of the people who work for the banks come almost last in the banks' consideration. In fact, when one looks at the 30, 40 and 50-storey highrises the banks have been putting up in several cities in Canada, and the competition among our bankers to see which bank can put up the highest building, one can only conclude that their employees should be given the same kind of break employees in other industries are getting. When that is suggested to the bankers the answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

One might also talk about experts at union busting and at preventing employees from voluntarily organizing themselves into associations. Here is where the banks expend great effort. They can put up 50-storey towers, but they cannot do something about the pensions of their own employees. The banks carry on these chambers of commerce contests as to which one will be the most swinging. They carry on contests as to which one will have the best television advertisements. They advertise to buy off people with their own money. They cannot lead the way as they should do. They are the most financially capable of any employer in Canada. They should lead the way in dealing with and treating their employees, but they rate among the lowest. I know of restaurant owners who pay their waiters, waitresses and dish washers better than some banks pay their junior employees.

I hope the government in power a year from now will bring in some real changes in the Bank Act. We will provide these institutions with another year of life under the present law, but surely the next government should bring in amendments to the Bank Act which will provide for genuine public participation and be of meaning to the people of this nation. These amendments should provide some direction in the handling of financial institutions, individual citizens, groups of citizens, regions and small businesses.

Recently I heard a colleague indicate that the New Democratic Party did not object to more competition in the banking field. If there was some real competition, I suppose I could agree. It seems to me that competition is not necessary among churches, because their parishioners believe in the same God. I wonder why competition among banks would be necessary when their god is the same—mammon. We need competition among the banks like we need a hole in the head. Banks do not compete. Their competition is so marginal and dispersed that one bank will provide a one-quarter of 1 per cent better deal on one thing while the bank across the street will give you a like deal on something else. There is no genuine competition. If there was genuine competition in the banking institutions, it would hurt the people who need to use those services. I hope this parliament and the next one will direct their minds toward some fundamental changes with respect to how our banking institutions are required to operate and in fact operate.

The left and the right wing political parties of Norway have laid down some real rules for their banks. These banks operate in the best interests of people and money comes second. Canadian banks should serve people and not money. If and when a profit is made, it should be secondary. Much more can be done in this nation. Hundreds of thousands of people who require monetary assistance could be treated much better. If that was accomplished, Canada could be more proud of its banking system. I hope all hon. members will think about what has been said with respect to the kind of financial institutions Canada requires and how they should serve people.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of participating in this debate, but having listened to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), I cannot refrain from rising in an attempt to counter some of the ridiculous accusations he has made against banking and business. It is obvious the hon. member does not believe in business; he thinks that business is one of these evil necessities we would be better without. I do not rise to defend the banks. I rise to defend something the hon. member was prepared to attack and to take away from Canadian society, that is freedom. Freedom is something which is important in Canadian society.

The hon. member argued that Canadian banks should not be free to lend their shareholders' and depositors' money where they think it is in the best interest of their institutions to do so.

Mr. Benjamin: They lend it whether the shareholders like it or not. Does the hon. member call that freedom?

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Kaplan: I will come to that. The hon. member's point was that the banks should not have this freedom. He was able to refer to a list of countries which, in his view, are evil countries. I do not argue with that. In fact, I agree with him. Canada is one of the freest countries in the world. In most other countries human rights are not respected, even though they should be. These countries should be condemned. We should take concerted action with other countries, as we do, in an attempt to influence those countries along the lines of greater recognition of freedom and greater rights for the individual.

How does the hon. member want to solve that problem? The hon. member wants to take away the freedom of Canadians and Canadian institutions. He indicates that those institutions should not have the right to trade with the Soviet Union, parts of Africa, Latin America and Pakistan. Perhaps a list of 80 or 90 countries where people are far less free than Canadians could be drawn up. I do not mean to belittle the hon. member's point. Many people are less free than Canadians. Many countries that are run by autocratic dictators are unworthy. The hon. member wants to take away freedom. If the New Democratic Party wants the right to lend money to Chile to be taken away from Canadian institutions—

Mr. Benjamin: I did not say that.

Mr. Kaplan: That is what the hon. members said. If that right is to be taken away, what about the right of travel? Why should the hon. member be prepared to permit Canadians to travel to those same countries? If the logic of the New Democratic Party is to take away the right to lend, invest and trade, should not the right to travel be taken away? That would be logical. Travel supports these countries. If the logic is followed, what about the right of Canadians to make telephone calls to those countries? Should that right be taken away? Why should Canadians be allowed to make telephone calls to those terrible countries? I agree they are terrible countries. If the position of the New Democratic Party is to take away the freedom of Canadians to trade, invest and do business with these countries, should not the freedom to travel and make telephone calls also be taken away? What about the freedom to send letters? Why should Canadians be allowed the freedom of writing letters to those totalitarian countries? In the policies advocated by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), the NDP wants to take this country down the very dangerous path of reducing freedom of choice.

• (2132)

Now, let us come back to banks.

An hon. Member: Yes, let us do that.

Mr. Kaplan: I do not doubt that shareholders turn up at meetings at these banks to advocate that the banks should stop trading or doing business with certain countries. This is a free country and they are perfectly free to go to these meetings and to take these positions. What I would argue about with the hon. member is that if the majority of them took the view that he says some do, then they would not be lending to these countries because banks are controlled by the majority of their shareholders, not by the minority. If the majority wanted the bank to stop trading, lending or investing in a certain way, the bank would have to stop doing it. So I disagree with the hon. member in his assertion that the banks are disobeying their shareholders. If a shareholder, depositor or a lender is dissatisfied with a policy of a bank, they have an easy recourse. They can sell their shares, transfer their deposits, and they have lots of places to go in this free country. If they do not like having shares in a bank, they can make a deposit in a credit union, as the hon. member indicated, and a credit union will have the advantage of having to pay far less income taxes and corporate taxes than do banks. In this country they have the perfect right to do that.

I should like to say in conclusion that I agree with the hon. member's condemnation of many countries. I think that the Canadian government and the Canadian people should express their views and do what they can to advance human freedoms in the world. But to recommend that our policy for achieving that should be to take away the freedom of our own people in this country is something that I am astonished to hear the NDP advocate, and something that I certainly hope this House will reject wholeheartedly.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity, when a banking problem is being discussed, to suggest ways of improving the present system. Bill C-16 explains that the passage of this legislation may be delayed and that other drawbacks could occur to delay it further. Therefore, no specific date is given. But since this matter is under discussion, I have here statements made by politicians which inspire me and lead me to discuss the difficulties resulting from our famous banking system.

I listened carefully to some of my colleagues who referred to the various problems that arise from the implementation of the regulations following from the legislation which allow the banks to control just about everything because of the power they have. But I want to point out at the very beginning that I am not referring to the staff of those banking organizations. They are very honest and dedicated people who have been selected after investigation and they are actually performing their duties. What I want to point out in particular is the power held by the banking system which needs to be straightened out.

I realize that we live in a rich country, a tremendously rich country as many of our politicians like to put it, and I realize also that a high percentage of the population lives in poverty, that we accumulate debts which we cannot repay, because I have been here for over 15 years now and I do not hear anymore our friends opposite responsible for the administration of this country say how they are going to manage to repay the debt. The only thing they can do is to try to explain how they are going to manage to pay the interest. Can you imagine a man managing his industry or whatever he has in that fashion? His whole enterprise would collapse.

We live in a system in which the banking organization forces our politicians who think they are smart to manage the country day in and day out grappling with ever increasing debts. Moreover, they do not seem to understand that money should be a man-made service. According to what some of them say, one would believe that money has been created by an outer-space force. Yet, when one takes a close look at the system, one can clearly see that money is created by people. God does not send angels every six months to create money. People create money. So how come the men who are supposed to hold the sovereign power of governing the country are controlled by a small number of people who are the only creators of money? That is the inefficient banking system we have and which is in dire need of a few basic changes. Otherwise we will never be able to pull ourselves out of the economic chaos in which we are struggling now.

I know that most people wish they could find a solution to the problem of unemployment which makes hundreds and even thousands of Canadians suffer. I know that many sincere politicians on both sides of the House would like to find a solution to this problem. But why are they unable to find it? Why is it that their efforts to fight unemployment only make inflation grow worse? They are also fighting hard against inflation. Therefore why not take a moment to consider the source of all these problems, which is our famous monetary system.

Earlier when I arrived in the House my colleague gave me a copy of a speech delivered by a man who is not just anybody. I am talking of Father Georges-Henri Lévesque, the founder of the Social Sciences Faculty of the Université Laval, who spoke not so long ago, as he did in 1936 and 1937. Many of his writings were published in the press, but some people managed to reduce his influence and to send him away as a measure of protection for the present system. But he is back and he understands very well the nature of this system.

I should like to quote a few excerpts from this lecture; on the subject of money, he said:

> That general commodity is not only economic in nature. Money is a servant with a great many capabilities. Its contribution has hardly started when it has made it possible for us to clear the land for cultivation, operate a plant, and eat our daily bread. It must also and especially help develop the higher values in this world.
>
> Money therefore must be put to use for charity. What favour from Heaven it is to be entrusted with some of the wealth which permits us to be generous . . .
> . . . to help the poor and the needy . . .
> . . . and contribute to our neighbours' happiness! What a privilege it is for one to cause the succurred poor to send prayers of thanks to Heaven through this great servant which money is.

Later on, he stated:

> Is money not the magic instrument capable of mobilizing all beings in creation, of representing all things while expressing their value . . .

At this time, we know the value of money can be played with, the dollar floats and we see it lose value. It fluctuates from one day to the next in Canada and in the United States.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): It will drown if it continues floating like that!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): My colleague tells me that in these days of floating about, the dollar will drown if it continues to float like that. So, to resume my quotation from Father Lévesque's text:

Is money not the magic instrument capable of mobilizing all beings in creation, of representing all things while expressing their value . . . even where men are concerned (is it not said that so-and-so is worth a million?) In fact, money is not a means, it is the perfect means. So, the infinity of its possibilities confers upon it, falsely, the traits and prestige of a god.

Further on, it is very interesting because in that talk we find many explanations of our famous present monetary system.

Speaking of money he says this:

That general commodity, what is it in fact, where does it come from?

Talking about money.

I remember reading an article in the August 16, 1939 edition of the Action Catholique which was entitled: A mystery to clear up. Where does money come from? This article was written by Louis-Philippe Roy who, after mentioning that we had been short of money for a long time—let us not forget that we were in 1939, at the time of the declaration of war—all of a sudden there was plenty of everything, there was a flow of money for all the needs, war needs, of course.

He concluded his article by saying:

If, according to Pius XI, economic conditions are such that the salvation work is absolutely jeopardized by the money makers, it is high time we investigated in that direction.

I return to the speech I mentioned earlier:

What is it in fact? Where does it come from? It is not a direct creation of God who does not waste his time coining money. God does not need money. He has in his hands all the magnificence of creation: all the treasures buried in the ground or scattered in the infinity of space, the beauty of spring flowers and the brilliance of fall colours . . . One may even say that with regard to His creation, God does not need anything since He is everything. We must have things because our being is finite. To have is the human condition. To Be is the attribute of God. In his celestial grammar, the Creator only conjugates with the auxiliary verb to be: "I am that I am". Hence, money is a human invention.

That is what I was saying at the beginning.

It is produced by us. And in doing so, we are wonderfully right, even in the eyes of God. For God has put the material world at our disposal, leaving it to us to develop and to increase the natural wealth that He distributed here and there. He also endowed our minds and our bodies with various talents and different aptitudes enabling us to help each other.

But in order to achieve this, we must take the required means. I was saying at the very beginning, when I had other quotations in hand, particularly the one referring to a former prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

● (2142)

Once a nation loses control over its currency and its credit, it does not matter much who in that nation makes laws. Once in control, money lenders will ruin any country.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

This is somebody that you know well. Several of you have probably sat with him in this House. I also have here statements from American administrators, like Jefferson for instance who said and I quote:

Money, that is the mean through which modern nations will recover their dues. This institution (the Bank of the United States) is one of the deadliest enemies threatening the principles and the form of our Constitution. I believe that no government can feel safe when it is subservient to an independent authority or toward any authority other than that of the nation.

I could give you hundreds of quotations such as these, which demonstrate that the power held by the banking system must absolutely be changed. Otherwise we are directing ourselves toward . . . Well, the population is asking itself toward what. How many times has this question been asked to us during our travels in our ridings. People ask us: Where is that system leading us to? I confess that it is difficult to give an answer because we cannot foresee, at least seriously the presence of active politicians exercizing decisive powers of control and who seem likely to bring back order to that financial chaos. It must be undertood that this is a serious matter. One must first grasp the difference between what is real and what is financial. These are two different things. Yet one has to admit it.

When one speaks about wheat, butter, cheese, eggs, shoes or anything likely to help us in our daily life, we are talking about real things. But when one talks about dollars, pounds, francs, you are talking about symbols. You do not eat symbols. In our present system, symbols are nevertheless necessary to obtain food. These symbols cannot by themselves feed, clothe, house or cure individuals. They are only symbols made to evaluate things and also in our organized world to give to those who offer to trade them certain rights to things they want.

The most important of the two and this is at this stage that one must come to think about it, is obviously the real one for these are the things which are the most important. Without the real thing, the symbol would not mean anything. If there were not goods, if there were no men at work, no women at work, if it were not for the fact that the whole population of a country who wishes to produce something, what would then be the use of money? What is essential is the material good. The symbol is of secondary importance. It is therefore necessary that we adopt a policy to adjust the value of that symbol. This must be corrected to enable the goods to meet the needs that are to be fulfilled. There lies the answer. Why not look for it in that area. It is useless to discuss or replace the Minister of Finance. Even when we do have good ones, they do not change the system. They try to struggle in a defective system. Reality rather than the financial aspect is what counts. A starving man in the desert with a wad of bills in his hand will die. A loaf of bread would be more appreciated. And in a city, a man with a wad of bills does not starve because he exchanges his dollars for food. Reality depends on the productive capacity of the country: natural resources, land, climate, manpower, machinery, production procedures, division of labour, social order, etc. This productive capacity of the country, real or anticipated, is the basis of the confidence held by its residents or its new citizens. Before it was even realized, that potential capacity of our country inspired enough confidence in people from France for them to leave their country for the shores of the St. Lawrence. Today Canada's production system while it has not yet reached it's full capacity is not of concern to anyone at all—there is not a Canadian who fears that in 10 or 50 years from now his country will no longer be able to produce wheat, meat, wood and manufactured goods.

The confidence in Canada's production system is total. If the financial system were the true image of the production system it would inspire exactly as much confidence as the production system. That is not the case; if no one fears for Canada's production many Canadians fear for the financial means of obtaining the product. That is what you see; nobody can deny it. We do see constant progress made in the production system but also continuous disorders in the financial system. The signs are not at all in precise and constant relation with things. There are so many advanced machines today to make calculations of all kinds and computers costing millions of dollars that can apparently at even excessive speed put out results from a problem they are fed based on the operator's programming, and we, as politicians, as administrators, could not find means of making adequate calculations and fairly distribute the wealth of this country based on the sign values. We would not have this difficulty of always being faced with the uncertainty of the variation of our dollar as the wealth, the real wealth, is in things and not in the bucks. No matter how many bucks you have, if the things are not there, people can starve to death. The main thing is food, clothing, conditions, everthing one can find to have these decent living conditions. And there is no lack of that in Canada! What we lack is an adjustment in figures. Did you ever see such nonsense? It is really beyond understanding. And as I was saying earlier, if it came from a divine power, we would comply with it but that is not the case. All that is controlled by men, a handful of men who control the exchange, products, at will; they supply the money needed to organize their system so as to continue to make money, to build up profits. It is written all over the place. Banking organizations, we know what they are from charter bank annual reports. That does not mean I am critical of reasonable profits, however there is no reason why the system that controls everything should also be controlling our very lives, deciding whether we are going to eat two or three meals a day through the amount of money they put into circulation, with their power to create and delete money at will. Dollars there is no dearth of in wartime, when the producing system is geared to making things that in no way correspond to the people's needs. But when the producing system is no longer capable of supplying everything required from it, dollars to cover orders disappear. This we have experienced on many occasions.

That game is anti-social and barbaric. It hurts consumers in the context of unused production. We remember periods where there was talk of overproduction, while families without actually dying of hunger pretty near did, lacking the essentials in of everything across the land. We now have the same thing again. We should not be talking of Canadian prosperity but of the percentage of the people who enjoy that prosperity when thousands of people have incomes below the poverty level. The reason they do not enjoy prosperity is the lack of symbols which dollars are. That game is anti-social and barbaric, it hurts consumers and creates fictitious problems not only for the individual but for groups and even governments. The government is wrestling with its debt and is unable to repay. If we think seriously about that, there is no way this will not lead us into trouble. The government is trying to juggle with figures, it is not trying to go to the root of the problem. They would identify its cause if they tried, as it is rather easy. Today there are courses on monetary reform. I already quoted in this House the book written by a famous economist about the issuing of money. It proved that those who still believe that banks do not create money supply are wrong.

As there have been so many inquiries that proved it, we can say without exaggeration that 90 per cent of the problems are financial problems. And if we look at what happens everywhere in our families, our households, how many quarrels are caused by a lack of money? When federal and provincial ministers meet to conclude an agreement, it is always on a financial matter. Federal-provincial conferences are endless and what is the subject of discussion? Who has the right to tax? It is always on a money matter.

I remember very well that during a federal-provincial conference in 1941, a Social Credit premier of Alberta made some suggestions. They listened to him. They listened to him very quietly and the conference chairman who was the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King even thanked him. He was the last one to have the floor but it did not bother the Alberta premier who explained his views about the situation. He made practical suggestions and said: We meet here to find the means to improve the situation and conditions in Upper Canada. If we really wanted, we should try to change something in the present system. Unfortunately, they did not follow his suggestions and since then they debate the same matter from one conference to another and it is sometimes a cause of differences. Now we are talking about national unity. We try to reunite—

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Some of them slam the doors!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Indeed. All sorts of things happen but if you consider the problem, they always meet about taxation rights. Who will best be served by knowing how much money Canadian taxpayers have? If reality consists in products and if the financier simply has to make symbols, the symbol acquires importance because of the rule under which you have to present the symbol to have the product that you do not manufacture yourself. Bread feeds you, but when you do not make your own bread, you can only get some by giving money. Money is important since it is a prerequisite to having bread. This is extremely important in today's world because to survive everyone needs products made by others. Therefore the dollar sign is truly a permit to live. If you have this permit, you can get what you want from the production system. If you do not have this permit, the dollar, you will get nothing and the production system will slow down instead of serving you.

Control of money and credit therefore is the same as the control of peoples' life. It is not a coincidence that one of the highest doctrinal authorities in the world said in the encyclic that manipulators of money and credit hold economic life in their hands, so much so that no one can breathe without their consent. The encyclic has been praised many times. The words of the Pope of the time have been lauded, but his advice has never been followed. We have never tried. We have never made sufficient investigations on the issuing of money and there still are problems that cannot be solved. This is unfortunate. Even though the majority of members of parliament are sincere when they say they would like to find answers, I can tell them that I am convinced that I am right and that those who will live in the years after me will find that out. If the present financial system is not modified, we will continue to be constantly in debt and we will always have the same problems. A change, a radical change is needed in that area, as well as earnest people. Yet there are people who can understand that the money system must be adjusted to the needs of man since money must be a servant not a master.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being ten o'clock, in accordance with Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been moved and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is that the House do now adjourn.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—TEXTILES—PURCHASE AND SALE OF IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on February 9 in this House, as recorded in Hansard at page 2696, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) certain questions respecting the difficulties faced by Canadian importers of footwear, especially those who are importing products that cannot be obtained in Canada. This is because either the fashion or the price cannot be obtained here and there is not much possibility that Canadian manufacturers can realistically make any attempt to supply that market. I cited an article from the Vancouver paper the Province dated January 30, 1978 under the heading "B.C. shoe industry gets the boot". I quoted at that time some parts of the article but there are other parts I was unable to quote during the question period and which deserve to be put on the record. I quote:

● (2202)

Another segment of the industry hard hit will be the stores specializing in imports. As it looks now, they'll lose one-third of their business with no respite.

"They'll have to ask Ottawa whether the government thinks they should be allowed to exist," said veteran Vancouver shoe retailer Ernie Freedman. Meanwhile, he, like all retailers, must juggle with the confusion created by the fact orders for spring merchandise, placed last fall before quotas were imposed, may have eaten up the quota of the entire year.

Now, faced with buying for fall, the stores find their imports limited and availability of domestic supplies uncertain.

The fact of the matter is that the majority of people in the retail shoe business are not objecting to some import quotas if the result of those quotas is to protect Canadian industry. The growing suspicion is that the quotas are affecting those products which the Canadian manufacturers cannot supply. The result of this is higher prices. The allegation is that the Canadian manufacturers are increasing their prices on general footwear.

On February 23 I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a question on a related subject, that of textiles. I asked the minister if he could tell this House whether there was a market building up for the sale and purchase of quotas in textiles. Today I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the same question, and I also extended it to the problem of shoe quotas. I ask the question over and over again because I am receiving representations that this is exactly what is going on. Since the small operator cannot obtain the quotas he or she need, it is seems to me a travesty that other quotas which obviously are in excess of what is needed are being sold for profit within the domestic Canadian market. I refer specifically to an advertisement which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on February 4, 1978 for jeans. It says:

Jean or Pant Quota
Willing to purchase available quotas for spring and fall 1978.
Any quantity up to 100,000 pairs. Apply in confidence to—

Then it gives a box number. It is time that the government came clean with the House of Commons and with importers as to its motives, especially with respect to textiles or footwear which cannot be obtained in Canada and which the Canadian manufacturer cannot produce.

I have received innumerable complaints. I have received pleas from importers who, without some redress, are going to go broke. I have consistently received complaints that the machinery set up by the government is not competent to deal with the applications and is being handled in such a way that it is not attuned to market problems, especially in British Columbia.

I see my time is up and I will conclude on that note.

• (2207)

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has been very busy. He has two questions tonight, one dealing with imported shoes and the other with import quotas.

Let me deal with imported shoes first. In response to this allegation I wish to state that the figure of 11 million pairs is inaccurate. The correct figure is 7.5 million pairs. In 1976 imports amounted to 40 million pairs of leather and vinyl footwear, an increase of 46 per cent over 1975. Government action has limited such imports to 32.5 million pairs, a cutback of 7.5 million pairs or a reduction of less than 19 per cent. While 1977 data are not available, it appears that imports will reach the 1976 level. This cutback of 7.5 million pairs represents 16 per cent of the 1976 Canadian production of 45.8 million pairs. Therefore, the replacement of 7.5 million pairs of imports would require not the alleged 50 per cent increase in domestic output but 16 per cent, which I am confident the Canadian industry is capable of producing.

To turn now to the textile question, under the Export and Import Permits Act, transfer of an import permit is prohibited as well as the transfer of quota allocated as a condition to the issuance of such a permit. In several instances the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been asked to authorize the transfer of quota from one company to another as a result of the business changing hands or of a change in the structure of a particular business. All such requests for transfer of quota have been refused by officials in the department.

The department has also been apprised of several instances where possibilities of buying or selling import quotas were offered in newspapers. All cases brought to the attention of the departmental officials have been investigated. To date the results of two of these investigations have been received. It has been established that certain people were using the words "Quota for sale" or "Quota wanted" when they were in fact referring to goods already imported under the authority of an import permit issued under the Export and Import Permits Act after a valid quota had been obtained. The reason for using the word "quota" is simply that those goods had been imported as a result of allocation of quota. So far, none of the investigations have established that quota were in fact being bought and sold in Canada.

Perhaps I could make one last point with respect to imported shoes. Imports of 32.5 million pairs of leather and vinyl footwear permitted by the cabinet decision are considerably higher than imports in any year except 1976 and 1977. If to this we add approximately 15 million pairs of rubber, canvas and other types of footwear exempted from the quota, plus the capabilities of the Canadian footwear manufacturing industry, I am confident that retailers and consumers will have a very wide selection in terms of price, fashion, quality and function.

Adjournment Debate

TOURISM—PROBLEMS IDENTIFIED AT INDUSTRY CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SOLVE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, Canada registered a record fourth quarter tourism deficit of $340 million compared with a shortfall a year earlier of $293 million, Statistics Canada has reported. The tourism deficit for 1977 was also a record, totalling $1.66 billion compared with a 1976 gap of $1.19 billion.

Canadian visits to the United States are on the increase. Statistics Canada has reported that Canadians made 37.9 million visits to the U.S. during 1977, an increase of 5.5 per cent over the total for 1976. The number of trips to Canada by U.S. residents fell by 1.4 per cent from the 1976 total to 31.8 million in 1977. Similarly, the number of trips to Canada by foreign visitors from all other countries, at 1.4 million, was down 9.7 per cent from 1976. From these figures hon. members can see the dangerous trend which is developing in Canada with regard to tourism.

The statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade an Commerce (Mr. Horner) with respect to alleviating the current $2 billion tourism deficit amounts only to window dressing. Tonight I am calling for the implementation of the following measures immediately.

I propose a reduction in sales taxes on promotional literature to the United States, and income tax reduction for Canadians who travel within Canada, reduced federal sales taxes, and, most important, that federal and provincial governments agree on a promotional package instead of each presenting a different picture of Canada as is the current concept. This does not mean that the provinces should abandon the practice of advertising individually but rather should adopt a more national promotional picture.

The federal government is spending $1.5 million to promote Canadian vacation packages at rock bottom prices. This great promotion is to start next month. However, many are not new, and many do not offer particularly low prices. An Ottawa travel agent says it is a lot of window dressing for a project which is basically unchanged. Also, much of what they are offering travel agents sold independently last summer. The packaging makes it easier to sell the product, an agent said, but that is all that is different. The price is not really different. The massive promotional approach to Canadian tourism is. One can see this is a lot of window dressing and not concrete proposals.

The Canadian tourism industry and the Canadian government office of tourism held a conference recently. The highlight was 13 problem areas facing the tourism industry in Canada. Referring to marketing, they stated, I quote:

> Canada's visibility in the U.S. market was about 75 per cent this year because of frozen marketing budgets. Canada's visibility will be reduced to 60 per cent next year if CGOT marketing budgets do not increase . . . It was suggested that more work should be done in the "V.F.R." (visiting friends and relatives) category. It is not known what motivates these people to come nor has it been fully determined exactly how many dollars were spent in areas other than accommodation.

There was a new report entitled "International Tourism Development Forecasts to 1985" produced by the Economist Intelligence Unit Limited in London, England. It shed some new light in this area. They stated:

> The image of Canada in the U.S. is that Canadians are anti-American. Another problem in Canada is poor attitude of people who service the general public.

The document further states:

> Lengthy discussions centered around the unfavourable image of Canada as a friendly tourist destination. This image problem is seen on two levels: first, some Americans view Canada (the government not the people) as being anti-American due to certain of its policies; second, some tourists feel friendly toward Canada as a country and even toward individual Canadians; however, having experienced unpleasant situations in previous travels, they have spread the word that Canada is not a friendly vacation spot.

Not only is this government driving out investment but it is scaring off tourists. No wonder we are heading for a $2 billion deficit. A recent editorial pointed out that the tourist program is mainly fanfare. I quote from that article:

> With considerable fanfare, federal Industry Minister Jack Horner and his provincial counterparts have unveiled a national plan to promote tourism in Canada. Some specific deals are included for the benefit of consumers, but the main emphasis seems to be upon another massive publicity campaign by the government on behalf of domestic tourism.

Massive publicity campaigns alone are not the answer. The document prepared by the tourism industry and the government department also points out that transportation constraints are one of the main problems in Canada. It points out, and I quote:

> There was great concern regarding travel costs caused by restrictive regulations governing various forms of transportation. The airline representatives strongly opposed the M.O.T. policy of "user pays"; the high cost of renting counter space at airport terminals is a contributor to higher costs, ultimately passed on to the air traveller. Fuel costs and labour costs were also cited as significant contributors to the high fares that must be set.

They claim that most of the tourists arriving in Canada from the United States on packaged tours come by motor coach. Regulations covering the use of coaches in Canada are deterring tour operators from sending their clientele to Canada. What is the government going to do about these transportation policies?

● (2217)

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suppose if there were an award or trophy for someone who is the champion at spreading negative trends of gloom and doom, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) would probably be right up there as a contender for that award.

Let me state the government's position. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the government have been concerned for some time with certain negative trends in Canada's tourism industry. Tourism is very important to Canada, as attested by the $9.2 billion in tourism related receipts in 1976, about 5 per cent of our gross national product, by the $7.3 billion expenditure of Canadians travelling in Canada and the $1.93 billion expenditure by visitors from the United States and other countries abroad. Over 800,000 jobs are involved, directly and indirectly, widely dispersed across Canada.

The problem is reflected by recent changes in the international balance of payments on travel account. Over the last three years alone, 1973 through 1976, the negative balance on travel account has quadrupled, reaching $1.2 billion, and is now responsible for 20.5 per cent of the shortfall of $5.8 billion for all service transactions. In 1977 so far the negative trend continues.

The factors largely contributing to the increasing negative tourism balance are, first, a decline in the numbers of United States visitors, about 6 per cent in 1976 and somewhat less in 1977; and, second, big increases in Canadians travelling outside of Canada, up from 8 per cent to 10 per cent in 1976.

Because tourism is such big business for Canada and so important to the thousands of businesses across Canada servicing it, the minister, and before him the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), have been looking into the causes of these trends and seeking ways of reversing them.

Some of the actions taken are these. Over a year ago, in co-operation with the Travel Industry Association of Canada, the Canadian government office of tourism convened a workshop on "price competitiveness" problems. The CGOT has been working even more intensively in co-operative travel promotion with provinces and the industry. The minister discussed these problems with provincial ministers responsible for tourism in November, 1976, and September just past, in Yellowknife. In March this past year the Minister of Finance called together some 13 leaders of the industry to discuss the situation, and since has been gratified to receive from them very detailed recommendations which provide very helpful information which is being considered. Also, the minister has taken account of resolutions passed by TIAC at their annual conference in Edmonton last May.

The minister has directed that the most intense co-operative effort be carried on with the provinces and industry to find answers to these problems. One result expected is that, overall, 1978 Canadian tourism promotion programs will have much increased impact. As well, several special study projects are in process, the results of which the minister expects to be considering over the next two months and should lead to further actions to support this important industry.

Mr. McKenzie: Too little, too late.

HOUSING—RRAP—CHANGES IN REGULATIONS UNDER PROGRAM

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on January 27 I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) some questions on the changing regulations for the residential rehabilitation assistance program for 1978. I was especially concerned about rumours that repairs to basements of old houses of low-income people were not going to be included in the residential rehabilitation assistance program of the federal government in 1978. The minister in answering me said that the issue is under study, but that "this point should remain included". I took it for granted that he was talking about the question of basements and house siding in the federal rehabilitation program.

Through correspondence with the minister and his predecessor I had suggested that a ten-year program of rehabilitation of miners' homes be carried out in the whole of the mining areas of Cape Breton which are now occupied by pensioned senior citizens, widows and others on low income. I pointed out that a great deal of this housing, formerly built by the private companies who controlled the coal fields in Cape Breton, was 70 or 80 years old. The miners in the past and the present occupants have done their best to keep these homes as neat and tidy as possible inside, but because of the age of these homes the sills, poor roofs and lack of foundations are beginning to take a toll.

With the introduction of the residential rehabilitation assistance program a few years ago some desperately needed help was given. The trouble is that the national legislation provided that the municipalities in urban areas had to set up neighbourhood improvement projects before RRAP money would be expended by the federal government. I suggest that in the case of mining towns such as those in Cape Breton this was putting the cart before the horse, that really what was needed was a more substantial ongoing housing repair program to be followed later on by neighbourhood improvements such as recreational fields and other amenities. In most of the mining areas sewer and water were already normal services for years.

Glace Bay is a town with a population of approximately 23,000 people. Last year it received RRAP funding of $453,000. The number of applicants looking for housing repairs was 755 without any advertising of this program. It must be kept in mind that this is just in the NIP areas which were designated by the town council and co-ordinator. The number of applicants approved was 99. The average loan was $4,564 with $3,500 forgiveable. The average income of successful applicants was $4,000.

New Waterford is a town in my constituency of approximately 10,000 people. It received an allocation of $437,000, again without advertising. There were 631 applicants. Of these applicants, 70 were approved. Their average income was $5,320.

Aside from the criticism noted above, my major criticism of this program was that at this rate of repairing the homes we were going to run into a situation where many of them could never be rehabilitated because the structures would be so far gone with respect to deterioration. The result would be a clamour for more public housing. The government of Nova Scotia had already placed a moratorium on family public housing in the province.

I attempted to get the Cape Breton Development Corporation and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation involved in setting up a special rehabilitation agency so as to get more homes in these areas repaired more quickly, efficiently and effectively. I estimated that it would cost from approximately $7,500 to $8,000 to do the job on one side of the duplexes, which are the typical type of housing we are talking about. In his answer to me, the minister indicated that another federal government program called the emergency repair program might be more applicable to our part of the country. He noted that the federal government had just given a special grant of $100,000 to the citizens service league of Glace Bay for emergency repairs. Also he indicated that more would follow.

I was happy about this, but I was not satisfied that the minister had grasped the difference between emergency repair programs, which had been used by the province of Nova Scotia within the last year, and full rehabilitation of these old homes, which would be a long term investment by governments to make these homes livable well into the future. I was attempting to press the point that we really needed a small or medium sized rehabilitation industry or agency to go beyond the work of the emergency repair programs, as well as to offset the slowness and other disadvantages in the NIP-RRAP programs as applied in present and former mining areas of Cape Breton.

Lask week I was notified by CMHC to attend a meeting at the Holiday Inn in Sydney. It began at ten o'clock on February 21 and lasted until 5.30 p.m. It continued the next day from nine to twelve o'clock. The main speaker at that meeting was a Mrs. Pat Gish, the director of the Eastern Kentucky Housing Development Corporation of Kentucky, U.S.A. During that day and a half, delegates went into the mining areas and saw the situation at first hand for themselves. Present at the meeting were five representatives of CMHC, two representatives of the Nova Scotia Housing Commission, one representative of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, myself, and a few other invited people from the area who were working in the housing field.

The conclusion of the meeting was that there was a general need for a special rehabilitation industry or agency to do the required job. CMHC and the Cape Breton Development Corporation could well have a special role in setting up the agency so as to ensure the cash flow status of small contractors in the area. Also they could play a part in setting up additional administrative training programs, possibly in conjunction with Canada Manpower and industrial training programs. The objective was to set up a housing rehabilitation industry with a view to fixing up most of these homes in a substantial way over a 10 or 12 year period, thus providing a small but important industry in an area of high unemployment.

CMHC delegates said they would be meeting internally on the matter and would be getting together with Devco with a view to trying to bring this new agency into reality. The two representatives of the Nova Scotia Housing Commission said that the commission was prepared to do anything it could to help expedite the setting up of such a program. I expect that such a housing rehabilitation industry will become a reality in Cape Breton this year.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), because of his interest in the subject and his experience in that area, would want to point out publicly the most positive thrust that has been made evident, especially in the Cape Breton area, in terms of assistance in housing programs. I would enjoin the hon. member to give credit where credit is due in terms of the amount of money and effort expended in that area by the federal government.

I have been advised by officials of CMHC that, under the residential rehabilitation assistance program, repairs to the basic components, basements and house sidings are not excluded. The changed regulations to which the hon. member refers are the standards for the rehabilitation of residential buildings. These standards were modified in 1977 and, following consultation with numerous municipalities across Canada, became effective after January 1, 1978.

These two repair items remain within these standards. Specifically, a section concerning structural repairs entitled "Foundations" reads as follows:

Foundations shall be restored to ensure that they reasonably support the loads imposed.

I emphasize "shall" because not only is this item included, but any repairs to foundations which may be required are mandatory. The following standard, however, has made extensive upgrading ineligible:

A mud sill foundation may be replaced by a pier or perimeter type foundation. No further upgrading of the foundation is eligible, for example—changing a crawl space foundation to a conventional full basement.

The rationale for this restriction, which is one of the most significant changes from the previous standards, is that urban RRAP is a rehabilitation program, not a modernization program. Where a basement did not exist previously, one cannot be provided under this program.

With respect to house siding, I wish to quote as follows from a section in the standards concerning exterior walls and roofs:

All exterior walls and roofs shall have an acceptable cladding or covering to prevent the entry of moisture into the structure and provide reasonable durability. Exterior cladding shall not be replaced except where restoration or repair is not justifiable in terms of cost. All exterior material subject to deterioration in its unprotected state should be painted or otherwise suitably treated.

Again, emphasis is placed on the mandatory nature of repairs which may be required to the house siding. The guideline within the standard, however, warns against the replacement of siding solely for aesthetic reasons or for ease of maintenance.

I wish to repeat what the minister said at that time, namely that we have to ensure that the money involved in this program is used in the best possible way to improve the living conditions of low income people, which is why the two points mentioned by the hon. member concerning basements and house siding are not only applicable but emphasized when rehabilitating housing.

With reference to the emergency repair program, I have been advised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that a grant was provided to the citizens services league of Glace Bay in the amount of $148,213 covering the period July 5, 1977 to December 31, 1978. The grant was increased from $48,213 to $148,213, but it should be noted that the period covered is 18 months rather than the usual six months.

If further funds are required by the CSL, a special submission will have to be prepared and forwarded for consideration. It should be pointed out, however, that the emergency repair program RNH budget for 1978 is currently fully allocated to other applicants.

With the introduction of residential rehabilitation in rural areas in 1974, the emergency repair program is gradually being phased out. The total budget was $3 million in 1975, $2 million in each of 1977 and 1978, and it is anticipated that it will be $1 million in 1979.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR ADEQUATE PROTECTION OF SALMON FISHERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Declining salmon stocks have necessitated government intervention of special restrictions on both commercial and recreational salmon fisheries this year. Since government management program restrictions dictate drastic effects on salmon fishing but do not provide for increased surveillance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House orders that the number of river guardians be increased, commensurate with the number required to give adequate protection, and that the minister make a statement on motions outlining the government's plans to prevent uncontrolled poaching, which is the real reason for the decline in stocks.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

CONDEMNATION OF STABILIZATION PAYMENT TO COW-CALF PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on Friday last announced a miserly stabilization payment of $10.27 for cow-calf producers. Since calf producers are losing as much as $100 for every calf they raise, and many of them are facing bankruptcy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House condemns the payment as inadequate and directs the Minister of Agriculture to bring forward revisions to the Agricultural Stabilization Act to provide for payments to cover the full cost of production.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DEATH OF RCMP OFFICER IN MEXICO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart), under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a matter of urgent and national importance:

That this House requests the Secretary of State for External Affairs to inquire as to the death of an RCMP officer from Swan River, Manitoba, while on vacation in Mexico, and to report to the House as to the circumstances surrounding this tragic episode.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST ACTIVITIES OF FORCE IN FLQ CRISIS BE PUBLICIZED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Since the circumstances surrounding the events during the October 1970 crisis remain mysterious; since in a statement on January 9 last the Solicitor General indicated that in 1971 the RCMP had issued on behalf of the FLQ a release inciting violence; since that police force usually operates by infiltrating criminal groups; and since justice demands that the truth be known concerning that mysterious matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the Solicitor General report to the House on the activities of the RCMP in the FLQ terrorist groups between 1960 and 1970.

BELGRADE REVIEW CONFERENCE—FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ ON QUESTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Belgrade Review Conference is now drawing to a conclusion with little progress having been made on the question of human rights, and that a final communiqué which makes no reference to the increasing violations of human rights would be a mockery of the terms of the Helsinki Final Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this House urges the government of Canada to maintain a strict refusal to endorse any final communiqué which makes no reference to human rights.

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT SPENDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In a document entitled "A Legacy of Spending", compiled by Edward Murphy of CJOR radio, Vancouver, on mismanagement and waste within the federal government over the past ten years, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is quoted as saying in 1969: "We would be on the way to financial disaster—"

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member would get to the urgency of the matter immediately, it would be appreciated.

Mr. McKenzie: In 1969, the Prime Minister said: "We would be on the way to financial disaster—"

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Matte.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require that the matter be of urgent and pressing necessity and that an hon. member be given only the opportunity to develop its urgent and pressing necessity. If the hon. member would confine himself to that, it would be appreciated.

Mr. McKenzie: Then I will move my motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That this House direct the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Vancouver East to appear before the public accounts committee to explain the 230 per cent increase in government spending since the Prime Minister's statement on restraint in 1969.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

This will have powerful implications for agricultural research and has already had its effect on morale in the research department of the Department of Agriculture. EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED CANDU AGENCY SCANDAL—GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if the government of Canada has given any reply to the government of Argentina with respect to the very sharply implied criticism by Argentina that the Canadian government was dragging its feet on any meaningful government investigation of the Candu agency scandal, as evidenced by the note handed to our government on November 17 last by Argentina.

Why were the contents of that note hidden from the public accounts committee of this House while the matter was still being investigated by that committee? Why did it take from November 17, 1977, to February 21, 1978, before the minister even had the good grace and manners to produce that note for the public accounts committee?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as usual, in starting to ask a perfectly legitimate question the hon. member has to throw in some rather stupid curves which tend to distort the whole issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: There was no hold-up as far as I was concerned. I think the record will show that we have responded to every request for information made by the hon. member. In this particular case, when we received the note I had to get clearance from the Argentinians to make it available. In addition, there was a period during which, as the hon. member knows, I was out of the country. There was no particular delay or anything unusual. I reject totally and completely the quite uncalled for charge which has been made.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the minister's reply with regard to whether a reply had been given to Argentina. Has there been any formal communication between the Canadian government and the government of Italy on this matter? Why, when the key man in the whole Argentinian Candu scandal is an employee of an Italian corporation of which the Italian government is a major shareholder, has there been no pressure put on the Italian government for co-operation and assistance from Canada's so-called partner in this whole matter?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the word "pressure" is an appropriate one, but we have made representations to the Italian government on a number of occasions. I believe the hon. member, or the committee, has had copies of those representations. I think the hon. member also knows that the government of Italy—I am recalling this from memory, but I am reasonably certain I am correct—has indicated that it cannot go beyond what it has already done.

The hon. member is shaking his head. I ask him to give me an opportunity to check the record to be sure. Certainly, verbally, I have been told that there is nothing that can be done. On the other hand, I say to the hon. member—or perhaps, more appropriately, I should say this to the chairman of the public accounts committee—that if the committee has any formula it can devise which would make it capable of being put to the Italian government in a way other than we have already done, I am certainly prepared to do it. Indeed, I will transmit any message the committee wishes to prepare.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, because this matter is before the House and is now a parliamentary matter rather than a committee matter, certainly the government owes it to the people of the country and to this House to take the initiative and exercise some leadership instead of dragging its feet all down the line. Swiss legal authorities and even Swiss government officials have informed me that there are a number of ways of proceeding if the Canadian government wants to get at the truth of this matter. The Canadian government could be making other attempts either through Swiss courts, the Canadian courts or the Swiss government, rather than making a single, feeble and half-hearted attempt to break the Swiss numbered bank account secrecy.

Canadian taxpayers' moneys were deposited in Swiss numbered bank accounts. What other attempts has the minister, his departmental officials or the Canadian government taken to find out who received that Canadian money through those Swiss accounts, besides the single, feeble and unsuccessful attempt which has been made?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, let me first deal with the preamble to the hon. member's question. When the hon. member gets into his debating and argumentative style, quite frankly it is hard to pick the substance out of the tremendous amount of verbiage with which he surrounds the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1422)

Mr. Jamieson: In so far as his first comment is concerned about the government not having dealt with this matter other than through the committee, surely it has been said repeatedly in this House that it was a matter for the committee. I undertook to do whatever the committee asked. The committee never argued with that proposition. Yesterday the report of the standing committee was issued and the hon. member did not even let 24 hours go by before asking what the government was going to do on another course.

I repeat to him that we have made all the representations that as far as we are concerned we have been asked to make—if the hon. member would let me finish—and in so far as we have been able to determine, we have gone through all the channels and made all the representations that we either have been asked to make or which appeared to be open to us to make. I repeat, if the hon. member has been advised by the Swiss of some method through which this information can be obtained, we are as anxious to have it as he is. I think it would have been sensible for him to specify what those methods are. I gave him an assurance that if they are open to us, we will pursue them immediately.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS—RCMP INVESTIGATION INTO POSSIBLE ILLEGALITIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Would the minister report to the House and the people of Canada on the investigations undertaken by the RCMP with respect to nuclear sales and the possibility of breaches of Canadian law? I ask this question because the investigation has apparently been going on since the early part of 1977. Has the Solicitor General apprised himself of the situation, and what can he report to us today?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. gentleman that an investigation has been conducted by the RCMP. It is ongoing and is by no means complete, as we have encountered the difficulties described by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, namely, lack of co-operation from the areas within which the amounts are alleged to have been deposited.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that it has been reported that Dr. Marvulli, a federal state prosecutor in Genoa, Italy, has raised questions about the fairness of the investigation being carried on by the RCMP which leaves much to be desired? If he is not aware of this, would he follow this allegation through the usual channels in order to determine what type of investigation has been carried on? Would he find out how the RCMP is conducting the investigation and whether inquiries overseas, particularly in Italy, leave something to be desired?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would be very surprised indeed if there were any unfairness in the investigation being conducted by the RCMP. As the hon. member knows, offshore the RCMP is rather limited in its operations, because we are not engaged in offensive investigations or intelligence-gathering. In this particular instance, we have to rely in large measure on the co-operation of foreign agencies.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I mentioned the name of Dr. Marvulli. Would the minister keep that name in mind? Also, would he approach his departmental officials and, in particular, the RCMP to determine whether there is any truth in the allegation about the fairness of the investigation which apparently, according to reports, leaves something to be desired?

Mr. Blais: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would encourage the hon. gentleman to give particulars of the information he is advancing, which he will recognize is of a very general nature indeed.

ENERGY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF OIL—EFFECT ON COST OF LIVING

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister because it concerns over-all government policy rather than that of a single department. I refer to the fact that as a result of the government allowing the price of oil to be raised on January 1, the price of gasoline for cars and trucks, the price of home heating fuel and the price of natural gas will go up tomorrow. It is estimated this will increase the cost of living index by a full percentage point, and it is already more than 50 per cent higher than the 6 per cent increase forecast by the Minister of Finance.

● (1427)

I ask the Prime Minister, therefore, if he is sufficiently interested in keeping down the cost of living and relieving the hardship which its increase will involve, to rescind the increase in the price of oil and leave the price where it was.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are interested in keeping the cost of living down, particularly in energy areas. The hon. gentleman certainly remembers that right after the OPEC decision in the fall of 1973, this government acted, and has continued to act, to ensure that the price of energy—of gas and oil—in Canada would be below the world market price. We have all said at some point that if we wanted investment to continue, as well as exploration, we would have to trend toward world prices. But for four years we have been below world prices, and we will continue for another short period of time to be below the price in world markets.

Therefore, the effect on the cost of living of the OPEC nations' decision has not yet been fully borne by the Canadian consumer. This seems to be an element that the hon. gentleman always forgets when he talks about the actions of the federal government. The action taken by the federal government has not been to increase the price of petroleum; it has been to keep it below world prices.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this: In view of the fact that a very large part of the petroleum products we consume is produced in this country and not bought from OPEC countries, we have the opportunity to keep prices at a much lower level than they have been kept. I ask the Prime Minister if he is aware of the fact that the research which has been done by federal and provincial officers has indicated that this increase alone will place between 30,000 and 35,000 jobs in jeopardy. Also, in view of the fact that circumstances have changed since the government embarked upon a policy of allowing the price to rise toward the world level, is this not the time, in order to cope with inflation and unemployment, to confine this increase to the point it had reached prior to January 1?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course, some of the petroleum we consume in Canada is produced in Canada. But the hon. gentleman knows that we have to import a sizable and growing quantity of petroleum. This is paid for at world prices. It is because the government has been bringing in external petroleum and has been subsidizing the consumer that Canadians have been able to purchase energy at lower than world prices. This is something the hon. gentleman understands perfectly.

An hon. Member: All oil?

Mr. Trudeau: Well "all oil" is pretty well all, Mr. Speaker. But the policy is well known to the Canadian people. They know they have benefited for four years from lower prices than world prices, in spite of the fact that we have had to import increasing quantities of oil from overseas. They have been subsidized to the tune of a few billion dollars by now, and Canadian consumers and producers have benefited from that action of the federal government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. The fact is that the government has not subsidized the consumer, but the consumer has subsidized it by paying a ten cents a gallon gasoline tax, and the export levy on oil sold outside Canada has enabled us to level out the price in Canada. Also, the fact is that the Canadian consumer now is being charged four times as much for oil as he was being charged five years ago, and the main beneficiaries have been the oil companies. The government's own report shows that over 50 per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, would he put it forthwith, please?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Over 50 per cent of the oil companies' cash flow is represented by after-tax profits. I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of that, he will at least insist that any increase in the price of oil be put into some type of fund to pay for exploration, rather than going into pockets of the oil industry which has resulted in the biggest rip-off in the history of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that may be an argument, but it is based on erroneous facts. The first thing is that the export tax is not sufficient to pay the subsidy for the five eastern provinces who rely on imported oil. That is why we have had to charge all consumers the extra ten cents a gallon. It is in order to make up for the deficiency in the export tax. Second, the hon. member is quite wrong when he says the money coming from the windfall benefits resulting from the actions of the OPEC nations has gone just to the oil corporations. It has gone in part, through increased taxes, to the federal government: but it has gone in large part to the Conservative treasury of Alberta and the socialist treasury of Saskatchewan. The hon. member knows that.

ESTIMATES

DATE OF REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of Privy Council. Has the minister initiated any conferences with House leaders concerning the allocation of the estimates tabled last Wednesday, so that House committees can start work? The rules provide that the estimates shall stand referred to the various committees, without debate, upon allocation after consultation among the House leaders. Has the minister held those conversations, and can he tell us when the estimates will be referred to the committees, because at the moment they are standing still doing nothing—like this government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the motion to refer the estimates will be made tomorrow.

ENERGY

CONTROL OVER AECL IN INTERNATIONAL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the public accounts committee report, tabled yesterday, on the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited matter states that the chairman, Ross Campbell, failed in his renegotiation of the Eisenberg agency agreement in that he failed to obain an accounting of legitimate costs, and that he committed AECL to an exclusive agency agreement with Eisenberg for a second sale to Korea at an undetermined fee, what steps has the government taken to discipline Mr. Campbell or to ensure that he is kept under proper control in dealings where he might make costly or inappropriate arrangements on account of the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the preamble to the hon. member's question. I think Ross Campbell has done a first-rate job for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. He moved in at a very difficult time to clean up a very difficult situation. In the renegotiation of the contract which the public accounts committee has examined there was some suggestion that a significant fee would be payable in the event that a second reactor was sold to Korea. That was implicit in the hon.

member's question. There is no finder's fee involved at all: Mr. Campbell made that very clear to the committee.

He also made it very clear to the committee in his testimony that fees for the service part of that contract would very likely not be payable. One particular invoice was submitted to him in April, 1976, well before the committee started to examine this question. He rejected that invoice, and no further invoices have been submitted to AECL. I think Mr. Campbell has done a first-rate job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to paragraphs 5 and 71 of the report tabled yesterday. I realize it has only been 24 hours and perhaps the minister has not had a chance to study those words. I believe my paraphrasing to be accurate. I ask the minister to look at those paragraphs. Is it the opinion of the minister and the government that Mr. Campbell was the most able negotiator to be found to renegotiate this contract? What was the purpose of the government in sending only one man?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to renegotiation of the agency arrangement with regard to Korea, the answer is to be found in the decision of the board of directors of the corporation at that time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER HAS STUDIED RECORD OF FLQ CRISIS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General.

In view of the fact that on January 9 his predecessor stated that in 1971 the RCMP had issued a communiqué in the name of the FLQ, and also that in 1970, during the all too famous October crisis, similar releases had been issued which, as was established in court, did not come from the FLQ, would the minister tell the House whether he has had the opportunity, now that he is settled in his department, to look fully into the record of the 1970 October crisis and whether he is aware of this fact, in order to inform the House to what extent the special anti-terrorist RCMP committee had infiltrated into the FLQ?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had time to look fully into the record of the 1970 October crisis, as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, the minister answers my question as if he had never read the questions I have been putting in this House for a long, long time now. To my mind, it is time the truth were known in that regard. I therefore ask the Solicitor General, as a supplementary, whether he agrees that it is part of the RCMP's normal functions to infiltrate groups of criminals—

An hon. Member: Terrorists!

Mr. Matte: —of terrorists, yes, to stimulate their activities: does he at least agree with that principle?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly, two weeks ago the hon. member expressed his opinion on this matter, and I believe that, in his speech, he recognized that we agree it was our responsibility to infiltrate terrorist, subversive groups, which fall within the definition of section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act.

MINISTERS INVOLVED IN FINANCIAL ASPECTS OF SALE OF CANDU REACTORS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Was the president of the Export Development Corporation telling the truth when he told the public accounts committee on November 29 at least four or five senior cabinet ministers were involved in financing decisions concerning both the Korean and Argentinian Candu reactor sales?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is raising a question which was properly raised before the committee. I am not familiar with the particular testimony to which the hon. member is referring. I will be pleased to read the report to determine whether there are allegations of that kind in it, and provide the hon. member with an answer at a later date.

Mr. Huntington: I would advise the minister that the testimony I am speaking of was given on November 29 after the committee had finished the hearings concerning AECL. We were advised then that four or five ministers were involved in these decisions. Does the minister, as part of the cabinet committee on these matters, accept responsibility for the terms and conditions of these reactor deals with Korea and Argentina, both of which deals were subjected to strong criticism in the report tabled yesterday?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to the Export Development Corporation in his first question. I agreed to take that matter under advisement and provide an answer at a later date. As to the question of the Argentinian renegotiation, as the hon. member knows, that was the reason Mr. Campbell was brought back from Japan, where he was serving as ambassador, to renegotiate the fiscal terms of the contract. The successful result of those negotiations was a saving in the order of $80 million. That is the report I have been given. I have to say that Mr. Campbell did a first-rate job in renegotiation of the Argentinian contract as well.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—TOTAL GOVERNMENT BORROWING TO IMPROVE EXCHANGE RATE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the minister continues to seed uncertainty in the marketplace with his inadequate statements and lack of decisive action on many financial matters, will he, in view of the still falling 89-cent Canadian dollar, clarify for the House and the Canadian public his statement of last evening—made outside this House—that it was the intention of the administration to take down $200 million of their $1.5 billion line of credit, but that it was only one sequence in a group of borrowings planned by the administration? What do they plan to borrow in total, and for how long?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, after careful consideration, I made a statement yesterday. We decided to borrow $200 million yesterday. The stand-by credit is there. The governor of the Bank of Canada will be borrowing more when it is judged necessary.

Mr. Stevens: As business confidence continues to fall day by day, as shown by the Bank of Montreal's recent poll, due largely to the administration's inept handling of so many economic matters, will the minister at least clarify his borrowing intentions with regard to our balance of payments deficit? He indicated one week ago that he plans to borrow foreign funds to help cover the balance of payments deficit. What is the magnitude of that borrowing? To what degree will he cover that deficit, which is now estimated to be almost $6 billion?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there is another flow of capital coming into Canada outside of the planned borrowing by the federal government. We are in negotiation at this time. When agreement is reached, I will make it public.

● (1442)

Mr. Stevens: Another question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the extreme uncertainty which prevails in the country today, would the minister agree to make a statement on motions concerning the present position of our foreign exchange, or would he make a suitable reference to the appropriate committee so there could be clarification of the government's handling of our foreign exchange at the present time?

Mr. Chrétien: In two days the Bank of Canada will be publishing its monthly report on the figures.

Mr. Stevens: We know that.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR CLOSING OF RIVER SYSTEMS CONTAMINATED BY MERCURY

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of reports that the Minister of National Health and Welfare intends to recommend the closing of the English-Wabigoon River system unilateral action on the part of the federal government because of mercury contamination, would the hon. gentleman give serious consideration to following an entirely consistent policy which would involve the closing of all river systems in Canada where mercury levels in fish life exceed the tolerable limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): I am informed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was incompletely reported. In fact, it is to the provincial department of fisheries that she will address her request for closure. This is perfectly normal, since the Ontario fishery is a provincial responsibility. To this extent, I am in the hands of the minister responsible for fisheries in Ontario since the federal government does not have the policing capacity to put such a ban into effect.

JUSTIFICATION OF MONEYS PAID UNDER EISENBERG CONTRACT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since renegotiation of the Eisenberg contract was specifically discussed and agreed to by him, would he now assure the House that the expenditure of a considerable amount of public funds with respect to that contract is fully justified, or whether any further investigation has been carried out to determine whether fair and reasonable use is being made of funds supplied to this agent?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. member will appreciate that the report of the public accounts committee dealing with this matter was tabled only yesterday and I have not yet had an opportunity to familiarize myself with all its recommendations. However, my first impression is that action on most of the recommendations, if not all of them, is substantially advanced.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I would have thought that for some months now the minister would have been actively pursuing the question whether or not there had been massive abuse of public funds with respect to this agency. Is he telling us that no action has been taken by his own department?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member did not listen to the answer I gave to his last question. I made it clear that as I read through the recommendations in the committee report made yesterday, I was very pleased to note that nearly all those recommendations, if not all of them, had been met either in whole or in part by the agency during the last 12 months.

MIRABEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ELIMINATE DEFICIT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As Mirabel airport has cost Canadian taxpayers $115 million in deficits in the past two years, and since the department has no idea how long such enormous deficits will continue, would the hon. gentleman take the first opportunity to tell the House on motions what the government plans to do to eliminate these deficits and put this enormous white elephant on a paying basis?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The first thing I should like to say to the hon. member is this: it should be clear, if this matter is to be put into perspective, that any large figure for the deficit is only usable because we have taken the policy decision to include interest on the investment as part of the ongoing recurrent cost shown in relation to an airport. Hon. members should, at least, not use the initial cost of an airport and then use it again in terms of the ongoing interest costs: it should be one or the other. Mirabel will turn out to be, as it is given a chance to develop, one of the great investments in aviation in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: It is true that no airline likes to operate out of two airports in a particular city, but in Montreal—just as in the case of Toronto—there was very significant resistance to expanding sites in whose neighbourhood a lot of people wanted to live. It was, therefore, necessary to go to a new location and build a large airport which would progressively prove itself. At the present time, there is a vigorous committee at work to show the value of Mirabel, its potential, and to draw commercial development there. This, notwithstanding the existence of the present provincial government of Quebec, will continue to be our intention both in the near term and in the long run.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister not aware that construction of the second terminal building which had been planned for Dorval airport would easily have handled all overseas traffic for many years to come, with far greater convenience to the travelling public who by the tens and hundreds of thousands are not using Mirabel because it is too darned inconvenient?

Mr. Lang: There is no doubt that if one ignores certain costs, the easiest solution in both the Montreal area and the Toronto area would have been the expansion of Dorval and the expansion of Malton. But we do not like to ignore costs and, just as in the case of Malton, we refused to ignore the cost—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —which the hon. member just rides over, of inconvenience and, indeed, real damage to people in the neighbourhood of an airport if we increase unduly the amount of traffic into the airport once people have made their homes in the area. We will not do it in Malton, either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Since the figures in my possession were given me, as a former minister, by senior officials in the hon. gentleman's own department, I would ask the Minister of Transport to go back to his department and study those figures to see just how wrong he is and what a wrong decision the government made when it decided not to build a second terminal building at Dorval and, instead, built the white elephant at Mirabel—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: —when a wiser decision could have given the Canadian travelling public the service they deserve, at no cost to the taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, by its very nature, is argumentative.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION PROVIDING PUBLICATION OF SALARIES OF CORPORATION EXECUTIVES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I address this question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises from the revelations regarding the extremely high remuneration received by executives of Canadian corporations, particularly the $330,000 a year salary of the president of the CPR. Since all the information we have comes to us as a result of disclosure requirements in United States legislation, would the minister consider bringing in amendments to the Canada Corporations Act which would require Canadian corporations to make public the salaries and other remuneration of their senior officials?

● (1452)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take that representation under consideration.

FINANCE

SALARY INCREASES IN EXCESS OF AIB GUIDELINES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister discuss with the Anti-Inflation Board its decision to permit an increase of $3,650 in the salary of the president of the CPR, who is already receiving $330,000 per year, when the supposed maximum annual increase permitted by the AIB guidelines in $2,400, and at a time when workers with incomes of less than $10,000 a year are being restricted to increases of 4 per cent to 6 per cent a year?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of that question and shall inquire into the matter from representatives of the Anti-Inflation Board.

CANADIAN CULTURE

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR PERFORMING ARTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members: the warm response reminds me of the line from Macbeth about my predecessor, Macdonwald, of whom it was said: "Nothing in his life became him like the leaving it".

I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State. Is he in a position to meet with the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres for the purpose of discussing further financing for the performing arts?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question, largely because it gives me a chance to salute the completion of the distinguished parliamentary career of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: I have met with the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres to discuss its problems. I hope to meet with them again in the not too distant future. Perhaps I should say to the hon. member's Doppelgänger, the hon. member for Egmont, who cited the other day an apparent drop in the funding for the arts on the part of the Secretary of State, that there is an error in the estimates. In fact, rather than decreasing, as was suggested by the hon. member, they have been increased. I will provide him with the details.

Mr. Paproski: When did you change that?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

WARREN HART—REQUESTED RETURN TO CANADA TO GIVE EVIDENCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. Will the minister advise the House whether Mr. Warren Hart entered and left Canada with the knowledge and consent of the RCMP or the Department of Employment and Immigration, or both, subsequent to the deportation order of December 9, 1971? Such order resulted from an inquiry under the provisions of the Immigration Act held December 9, 1971, before special inquiry officer W. O. Darling. Is the minister prepared to consult with his cabinet colleagues to facilitate the re-entry of Mr. Hart into this country so that he can testify before the appropriate bodies?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the deportation order was, indeed, effected and Mr. Hart left the country with the concurrence of the RCMP. I would have to check with my colleague to ascertain whether there was involvement on the part of immigration authorities at that time. With reference to facilitating the re-entry of Mr. Hart into Canada, that is a matter which would have to be disposed of by the minister, and undoubtedly a request made by the McDonald commission.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, is the minister really saying that the tapings to which he referred outside the House yesterday were accidental? Also, is he able to tell the House whether the commissioner of the RCMP knew, approved and was consulted concerning the recruitment and taking into this country of Mr. Warren Hart?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the entry of Mr. Hart into this country, it was done in accordance with the measures which are followed in such occurrences as between the RCMP and other associations of like nature in other countries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I will not comment further. In terms of my statement yesterday, I do not recall using the word "accidental". What I meant was "incidental".

INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES CONDUCTED IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. It relates to the evidence given by the commissioner and other officials before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs last November, relating to our use of agents provocateurs, undercover agents and intelligence activities in foreign countries. Has the Solicitor General considered this very important evidence? Is he prepared to stand by it? If not, will he give an undertaking to the House that he will clarify and/or, if necessary, reject that very important evidence which was given before the standing committee last November?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any evidence indicating that we have used agents provocateurs outside—

An hon. Member: The hon. minister is not aware?

Mr. Blais: I am not aware of any such evidence. If the hon. member indicates that evidence has been presented before a committee of the House, I will look at it and comment further at a later time.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer the Solicitor General to page 2:26 and the following pages of the minutes of the standing committee of November 24. My supplementary question is: In view of the fact that we will be studying the estimates, including the Solicitor General's, in a very short time—which does not provide me with time to put the necessary questions on the order paper—will he undertake to provide details of the cost of travel and the air fares of Mr. Warren Hart and the Canadian employees who accompanied him, in order that that may be a subject matter before the standing committee when the estimates of the Solicitor General's department are studied?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I will give the hon. member's representations serious consideration.

FISHERIES

REQUEST BAN ON SWORDFISHING REVOKED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. According to reports, the provincial minister of fisheries for Nova Scotia told the provincial legislature that he has been informed by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the ban on swordfishing on the coast of Atlantic Canada will be lifted soon: I think he indicated that it would be this spring.

In view of the importance and the value of this fishery in the past, and the time required to rebuild the fleet, would the minister indicate when we can anticipate an announcement in the House on the lifting of the swordfishing ban? In light of the large number of swordfish presently sold by the American fleet in the United States, can he indicate if he has made representations to his counterpart to lift the ban on the sale of swordfish in the United States, or any other country, which would be helpful in re-establishing this industry?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the exact words used by the minister for Nova Scotia but I have seen the press clipping. The reality is that we have been trying for some time to find a way to solve the problem of utilization of swordfish because of the mercury content difficulty. As the hon. member knows very well, only 10 per cent of the swordfish taken has traditionally been sold in the Canadian market. It is doubtful that the economics would justify reopening the fishery just for the Canadian market. To this end, we are contacting and working with the Americans involved in the Food and Drug Administration. In fact, a meeting is scheduled for the next week or ten days. It is a decision that has to be taken by them. We are attempting to influence that decision, but they may not come our way.

REQUEST FOR ADEQUATE PROTECTION OF SALMON FISHERY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. It deals with another species and the ban and restriction in the close-down of the salmon season. Can the minister indicate whether reconsideration has been given to the fierce restrictions on the closing of the salmon rivers? What are his intentions with regard to increasing the number of river guardians to try to prevent an increase in poaching which is taking place in all Canadian salmon rivers?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows very well, the conservation measures which are taken are determined by biologists because we need escapement for spawning.

● (1502)

As for the poaching problem, the hon. member was on the committee when the penalties were considerably increased by this parliament. He knows that magistrates have been showing much more severity in their judgments when there is a conviction. He also knows that upon conviction we seize and forfeit equipment, vehicles, nets, etc., which were used in the violation.

As for the number of people employed in guarding the streams and rivers, the hon. member knows that we are always limited by the number of man-years allocated to our department and, of course, by the pressures on our department to manage the 200-mile limit properly and, therefore, the use of resources in that area.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—NOTICE RESPECTING QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—ALLEGATION MINISTER MISLED HOUSE DELIBERATELY

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There remains outstanding from last Thursday the question raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) giving notice to the Chair of a desire to raise a question of privilege, related to the action of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) which, according to the notice, was deliberately misleading the House.

This gave rise to a discussion as to whether or not that language can be used in parliament, and it led to the explanation by the hon. member at that time that his use of the language on the previous evening was not designed to offend parliamentary practices but rather had been calculated to put the matter on the record in order to test the rulings that have surrounded that particular language, and the rulings which surround the desire of a member who may wish to call into scrutiny the conduct of another member in the House.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, in answer to my reference to the precedents, clearly and unequivocally withdrew that remark from Thursday night's record, and I left intentionally the word "deliberately" in his notice of a question of privilege in order to bring the matter further into scrutiny to see if I could be of some assistance to members in the apparent dilemma, and I am happy to say the dilemma is more apparent than real.

There has been, quite naturally, confusion in matters of this sort. Since under the precedents it is clearly unparliamentary to accuse a member of deliberately misleading the House, obviously an action of deliberately misleading the House would have to be looked upon as being a most serious action indeed. If a member is suspected of that kind of action, the dilemma becomes: how does a member call that conduct into scrutiny without using the words "deliberately misleading the House", since in fact the use of the language is in itself unparliamentary and therefore prohibited. It appears on the surface of it to give rise to a rather frustrating situation.

I have taken the time to examine some of the precedents, which I would like to give hon. members now. I think these precedents may be of assistance to hon. members in their further examination of this matter which, I hope, will leave open a possible course, if it is the desire of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham or of any other member, now or at any other time, to pursue it.

My first reference is to the nineteenth edition of Erskine May at pages 367 and 428. At page 367, under the heading "Rules Governing Subject-Matter of Motions", it is stated that certain matters cannot be debated save upon a substantive motion which admits of a distinct vote of the House. Among these is the conduct of members of either House of Parliament. I am summarizing that slightly, but the reference is there.

At page 428 of May's nineteenth edition, under the heading "Reflections on the Sovereign, etc.", it is stated that unless the discussion is based upon a substantive motion, drawn in proper terms, reflections must not be cast in debate upon the conduct of the sovereign, etc, and among those enumerated are members of either House of Parliament.

There are two other rather important precedents to which I would like to refer for the benefit of hon. members. I have them here and would be glad to have them copied and distributed to any members who might be interested in the discussion. One of them refers to a case in our own Journals which is reported on March 11, 1890, when Sir Richard J. Cartwright moved a motion of criticism of another member of the House which contained in it, first of all, an allegation of directly misleading the House and, finally, concluded by saying that the conduct of a certain member in the premises was and had been discreditable, corrupt and scandalous. That matter was debated by the House as a substantive motion, and after debate the decision was taken that the matter would be referred to a committee for further examination.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In addition, there is a very useful precedent from the British House which occurred on June 15, 1965. At page 242 of the Official Report and the following page there are some very informative comments by the Chair relative to a comment that was made in the debate about a member being involved in racist propaganda. On being called to order by the Chair and, after discussion in which it was indicated that the withdrawal of those remarks was necessary in those circumstances, the clear indication was given by the Chair that if it was the intention to proceed to criticize the conduct of the member, it would have to be done by a substantive motion drawn in proper terms.

This does raise a very slight question as to whether or not in a substantive motion, since it is the very intention of the motion, language can be used which appears otherwise to be prohibited. My preliminary decision is that since the motion directs itself to that kind of criticism, obviously that language would have to be embodied in a motion and certainly would have to be permitted during the course of the debate, because I cannot see how the House could address itself to a substantive motion making that kind of allegation and complaint unless it was prepared to deal with it in specific terms. That question seems to remain partly open, but in any case that is my preliminary opinion.

The last area of guidance which the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham sought related to my own ruling of April 19, 1977, in which I indicated that, in order to found a question of privilege, the allegation would have to be not simply that the House had been misled, but had been deliberately misled. Whether or not in fact that necessarily constitutes a question of privilege, what I was endeavouring to say on that occasion was that certainly an allegation that the House had been misled without deliberateness does not constitute privilege on the face of it. If the action was deliberate and was then the subject of a substantive motion as required by the precedents, it might be argued by the mover of that substantive motion that rather than having the substantive motion dealt with in its regular place under private members' notices of motions, for example, it ought to enjoy the precedence accorded to privileged motions. Under certain circumstances that argument might prevail. In other words, once the matter is properly embodied in a substantive motion, it can be argued that it touches the privileges of members of the House. Whether that argument would prevail would depend on the original circumstances. What I was attempting to put forth in that ruling of April 19 was precisely that.

Certainly an allegation that the House has been misled unintentionally does not raise a question of privilege. Whether it would do so when the allegation in a proper substantive motion is that it was done deliberately, would be subject to argument, and I think possibly would accord to such a substantive motion. Certainly that has been the practice in the past where such a substantive motion has been put forward; obviously the House has been readily motivated to deal with it as a matter of privilege and give it the priority that privileged motions do enjoy. Therefore I think it was quite proper on April 19 to indicate that it may possibly be privilege if the allegation is of deliberately misleading and contained in a proper substantive motion. That was what I was endeavouring to put forward at that time.

I would think, therefore, that the action would be to strike out the hon. member's notice of privilege because it contained the word "deliberately", on the basis of clear precedents. It is entirely without prejudice to the hon. member to raise the matter again in a substantive motion after he has had the opportunity to consult these precedents. Whether or not that course is open, in the light of the interventions that have already taken place by the Minister of Finance in the proceedings to this date, in which the Minister of Finance indicated that he did not mislead the House on those occasions, would have to depend on other precedents in which, when matters of this sort or similar to this have been raised a minister or a member has risen in his place in the House and said that the House was not misled, or, if it was misled, it was certainly not done intentionally. Under the practices of this House his word has always been accepted, and the matter has always been finalized. Since the minister has already said that, whether the matter ought to go further is something only further reflection can determine. However, I did want to give to the House and the hon. members involved the benefit of my examination of these precedents.

● (1512)

The matter remains open for further action which might be recommended, but it would have to be done in accordance with those precedents rather than in the manner which has been attempted up to the present time.

POINTS OF ORDER

MRS. HOLT—SALARIES OF LEGAL SECRETARIES

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday I spoke on a motion relating to housewives' allowances, and I feel compelled now to correct an error in Hansard at page 3265. I referred yesterday to legal secretarial salaries and compared them with the income per case of their lawyer bosses. I used an old salary rate of $8,000 a year. It should have been $11,000 to $14,000 for what lawyers describe as a "good secretary". The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) challenged me in the debate. I would like the record to show that I know he is very generous in recognizing his secretary's remarkable management talent.

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—CHANGES IN ESTIMATES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Just as a preliminary to my point of order, I gather from what Your Honour said with respect to the previous matter raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) that the matter is open to argument and that Your Honour put precedents before the House so that we can examine them and perhaps speak later. I gather that is the case.

My point of order relates to something which arose during the question period with regard to the fact that, according to the announcement of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), estimates will be referred to the appropriate committees tomorrow. During the course of the question period the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), in, I suppose, his last question in this House, raised with the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) who, I suppose gave his penultimate answer in this House, the fact that there is some mistake in the estimates and that the estimates of the Secretary of State would be increased. I think the words used were "raised substantially".

That raises a point of order with respect to the reference tomorrow, and that has to do with whether any other ministers have approached the President of Treasury Board to advise him whether there will be revisions, either upward or downward, in their respective departmental estimates. Prior to any reference being made—preferably today, and certainly tomorrow—there should be a statement made or, on the reference, something substantive should go to the committees so that the committees and this House can be aware of what the situation might be. I raise this as a point of order because I think it deals with propositions with respect to the reference of the estimates tomorrow. Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board can deal with this.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly undertake to examine that situation. This is the first indication I have had that perhaps there was a printing error. However, I will check into this and try to give the hon. member a reassurance at the appropriate time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—PROCEDURE ON S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege. Today as never before the House of Commons is under close scrutiny in all parts of Canada. Over and over again in the last few months Canadians have shown a deeper interest in the democratic system and in the preservation of parliamentary government.

Not having the knowledge which comes from years of experience in the House of Commons that on occasion we do say things we ought not to, some Canadians have pointed out that they find it difficult to understand some of the raucous behaviour that takes place. We understand it; they do not. Indeed, in two schools to which I have spoken, students in grades 11 and 12 have asked, "Is it actually parliamentary? After all, if we acted that way, we would not be in school very long." I mention that as a preliminary to the matter I wish to raise.

Like all hon. members, I am one who has a deep and abiding affection for this institution. I think it was some 12 years ago that I suggested that something should be done to preserve the right of private members to bring before the House matters which they regard as being important, nationally or provincially. Following that, over a period of time the procedure under Standing Order 43 was developed. In itself it is good. It enables hon. members, particularly private members, to bring before the House matters of importance to them and the country. Without Standing Order 43 they would be denied that opportunity.

However, my hope that Standing Order 43 would prove to be something worthy of the institution has been degraded to the point where, when a motion under Standing Order 43 is raised, one solitary member can say "no"; "nyet", as if this were the Duma. When that happens, nothing further can be done. I am not going to identify anyone because I do not want to give him notoriety. However, today I had my eyes on him. I just happened to be looking in the direction of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and some distance behind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no identification in that, unless the hon. member wishes to be identified. In almost every case one person says no. We might as well have a gramophone record here. That would be more in keeping with the technological development of this House.

The point I make is this: Standing Order 43 has been fractured in consequence of the fact that one member can simply deny the opportunity for the discussion of important matters. Are we going to have the House of Commons denatured in this way? Is it not about time we made a rule that a group of members may say no by simply rising? Perhaps the number should be increased to ten. In that way Standing Order 43 could provide a better opportunity for private members. After all, that is one of the purposes of the House of Commons.

I know that during your term of office Your Honour has done everything to uphold the rights of private members. If Standing Order 43 is not changed, it will simply be a caricature of what it should be, and I suggest that before this session is over, and before Your Honour completes his present term of office, an opportunity ought to be made available to discuss this question so that parliament will become effective and so that the voice of one, even with all the attributes of a gramophone, will not be effective in stultifying this institution.

● (1522)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before giving the floor to the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) I want to comment briefly on the two points raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that I am sure are very much on the minds of members of the House. The first relates to decorum. I think all members have had inquiries from the public who have now had an opportunity to examine the proceedings of the House to determine which of our parliamentary traditions are essential to the expedition of the nation's business in this chamber, and which are not. I think this is an important matter of introspection for all hon. members.

The second point relates to the question of some of our procedures, those specifically singled out for attention being applications pursuant to Standing Order 43 for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with matters of urgent and pressing necessity. There are, of course, arguments on both sides about whether regular business should be set aside for motions advanced in that way. It is not for the Chair to go into them at this time.

I think we must all observe, however, that often the rules under which we operate are there for a specific purpose and sometimes are being stretched in order to accomplish a purpose not envisaged in our procedures but which is nevertheless an important part of the life of the individual member of parliament. I think particularly of the opportunity to address the House in a brief and specific way on grievances which may not be of national importance but which may be of great importance to the individual member. It is only with the utmost difficulty that time can be found in the schedule of parliament, which is already overcrowded, to provide for that. As a result, questions are often used in that way, and applications pursuant to Standing Order 43 are often used in that way. These are not satisfactory replacements for a grievance procedure of some sort which would not only give the opportunity to put the matter before the House but to get some sort of response in the circumstances on whether anything could or should be done. In my opinion we lack that procedure and often find ourselves in circumstances where we use other rules to accomplish the same purpose, but not in a very satisfactory way.

If the question of the satisfactory nature of applications pursuant to Standing Order 43 is to be examined, the more general question to be considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization is whether it is going to be altered substantially to deal only with matters in which some other form of the withholding of consent might be done. I would hope that the committee would try to find some other method by which legitimate attempts to raise matters of serious concern might be provided for the individual member of the House.

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

The House resumed, from February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, last evening, before the House adjourned, I explained during the debate on Bill C-16 the damage caused on our planet by this financial system which dominates virtually the whole world, and I made suggestions on possible changes. I also cited in this context the view of some authorities on the subject who also deplored the disastrous effects of a system which does not meet the present needs. So I would like to continue by suggesting first that whe should necessarily put some order into this disorder which is so harmful to mankind as a whole.

An end must be put to that dictatorship by making financial credit truly represent the real credit in our country. In other words, by making money account exactly for the production capacity of the country, money would be produced with the same dynamism as production itself; as real credit belongs to the community, financial credit would also belong to it. Society itself would attend to dividing the credit of the money that entitles to goods. Money would then be no more of a problem than production itself. It is made by men, who are also citizens, as I said last night, and not by angels: money is produced by men. Money would go to everyone since production is meant to meet needs and everyone has needs. Society would see to it that the flow of production is maintained by giving adequate reward for work, as is done today through the intermediary of employers who pay their workers a salary, and by the reasonable profit margin the masters of production would continue to take through their prices. Society would distribute among its members whatever would be left of the financial credit representing production.

The technique, to that end, has been described repeatedly in the House of Commons by the Social Credit members, and outside in the works of authorities in the matter, such as Major Douglas and several others, in newspaper articles by people who have really studied the matter, by citizens concerned about finding a solution instead of power-hungry politicians. In any event, ignorance of the solution to money problems cannot be accepted as an excuse. Our legislators know or should know that the money supply can be increased or decreased at will, at very little cost; still, too many people still believe it would be unhealthy to get the system to work.

Last night, I had occasion to quote a few excerpts from a speech given by Father Georges-Henri Lévesque, a Dominican. He is well versed in the field of making money and especially in that of the ravages it that famous system has caused on our planet, if you will. Let me quote another excerpts from that speech. I quote:

> Finally, money must serve freedom. Money, which can be a bad master, the tyrant of the greedy man, the inhuman despot of a soulless society, can also become a marvellous instrument of liberation. But, one must have the means to be free. The hungry are not free before the hand that proffers bread. At least a minimum of property is required to guarantee personal freedom. The freedom and dignity of those who fear neither necessity, nor unemployment, nor disease nor old age. The freedom and dignity of all social classes become more prosperous. The hoped for freedom and dignity of all peoples, finally!... thinking more specifically of developing countries.

● (1532)

> Their liberation will not come only through their own efforts, no matter how valiant they are. It will come as much if not more from a new distribution and apportionment of the common wealth more in harmony with its prime purpose which is to serve mankind.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

> More than any other in world history, our western society has created great amounts of riches which take the form of money or of things provided by money. In spite of the tremendous waste which now changes the outcome of its work into death and pollution, never before did it have such capacity for producing and accumulating. The power of money is ever expanding as man increases his control over the universe. It is up to us, to each of us, to see to it that this tremendous power makes money a better or, unfortunately, a worse instrument for mankind. Conversely, if we make money our master, it can only be a bad one.
> The reason for this is first and foremost that men should not be commanded or dominated by money. When it gets such power it turns into a tyrant because, as I said before, it should only be considered as a tool, a medium we have produced. But sometimes we rush to submit to it, to estrange ourselves, to become its servants. Initially, with great joy and excitement, but progressively with a frenzy we do not want to end. We make it, against its purpose, a usurpator, a tyrant, a despot, an idol, a god. Yet, it is from us, and from nowhere else, that money takes its power. Little by little we let it take over us, like an interesting vice. Of course we complain of this weighty yoke, but with a secret perversity not devoid of pleasure.
> Basically a bad master, money can become an even worse master because it is naturally hard. Even though some forms of it may have the flexibility of paper, they do not make it more human. Little by little overcoming our spirit and our heart, it dries them up, and conveys to them its own hardness. One need only think of Scrooge.

As I was saying in the earlier, this only gives us an idea of the ravages caused on this planet and in this country by a defective system that must be changed. We have reasons, many reasons. That is why I sometimes wonder how come some men, scientists, competent people, people who have taken all sorts of courses, who have had a university education and have acquired all kinds of knowledge in many fields, or so they think, do not search for the cause of most of our problems. At a time of upheaval in many fields: education, management-labour relations, debt, proliferation of taxes, permissions, restrictions, it is imperative we find a flexible way to allow the abundant goods that exist to satisfy the needs that are there.

Obviously, this adaptation of goods to needs would require a fundamental change in the goods distribution system. That is normal. That is why we should not stay with the old methods that have given us the well known results of inflation, deflation, increasing pollution, heavier taxes, a rising unpaid and unpayable national debt under our present system.

All those facts are so obvious nobody can dispute them. Why should we keep looking for invisible solutions in a confused system? Thousands of cases of affliction of all sorts lead us to the logical conclusion that the main cause of current economic and social disorders lies in a bad distrubition of wealth. Each thing must be put back in its right place and be given its true value. First, it must be recognized that men, women and children are human beings. In order to lead a decent life, they need wholesome food, warm clothing, proper care and adequate shelter.

In His wisdom, the Creator provided on earth everything necessary for mankind to ensure the survival of each and every one of its members. And it is undeniably proven that man's creative genius, inspired by a host of components in nature, did succeed in perfecting the productive mechanism to unsurpassed levels. At times, even our knowledgeable theoreticians, or those who pretend to be, have tried to explain to us that we were struggling with an overproduction crisis. Let us remember the years 1929 to 1939 in particular. The facts have clearly demonstrated that it was rather a crisis of under-consumption.

One will recall that the politicians of the day did not find any other solution than to destroy the production at a time when the population went hungry. Instead of instituting a price adjustment mechanism through a compensated discount to the producers and allowing the consumers to use the many goods which existed then, the choice was made to destroy real riches and goods to maintain the prices represented by figures. Why did they give such importance to figures and left aside what is important. After all, it is with goods and things that people live. It is not with figures. Figures are supposed to play a prevailing role provided they be adjusted. One can then enjoy the ownership of existing goods but to do so, their prices must be adjusted first.

The same system still applies in 1978. The population does not feed itself on par with the amount of food that, good God helping, our farmers manage to produce. Canadians do not get their housing depending on the quantity of lumber, stones or cement available or any other building materials that Canada produces in quantity. The population does not satisfy its clothing needs according to the variety of clothing produced in our manufactures or imported which is displayed in the stores or stacked on the shelves of our shops. The same thing applies for medical care, transportation, comfort under its most various aspects. Under the present system, our fellow citizens get food, housing, clothing or medical care according to the amount of money which each one of them has in his wallet. This is what Socreds call a stupid system.

The idea is not to change everything or set up a national printing office as some simplistic minds would have us say. The institutions are already here, it is just a question of adjusting the values, a matter of accounting through which a financial device will be established to reflect the real riches by taking into account the dignity of the human person, the value of the goods which can be produced in sufficient quantity to provide food, housing and clothing to the population. It is quite surprising as I mentioned previously, to see that such a great number of researchers in many fields, particularly in the economic field, have not yet succeeded in developing a device for the distribution of a large production that only awaits to be ordered to satisfy latent needs. Surely it is not on the scarcity of adequate means of transportation that this situation must be blamed.

We have now reached the point where it is possible to spend millions of dollars to travel to the moon for the mere purpose of finding out what is going on on earth's satellite, while on earth itself thousands of human beings are suffering through lack of proper food, lodging, clothing and care. It is high time for the politicians who are now at the helm to find alternative solutions to the plans which have been followed up to now and which have only succeeded in favouring the strong at the expense of the weak. We do not claim that the Social Credit philosophy is a panacea, but it should very likely eliminate a great many of the causes of our current ills. In an article dealing with employment and income distribution which was published on January 17, 1976, Mr. Francis Blanchard—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I thank my colleagues for their generosity and their willingness to continue to hear my version of the present system.

An hon. Member: To listen to the truth.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): My colleague says, to listen to the truth. So I was referring to an article by Mr. Francis Blanchard, Director General of the International Labour Organization and Chairman of the Institute for Social Sciences. He said, and I quote:

> Employment and income distribution are the most urgent and serious problems now facing developed as well as developing countries.

In that article inspired by a lecture he gave early this year before the New Delhi National Labour Institute the ILO director general examines various aspects of those problems, the efforts that have been made to date and what still remains to be done to solve them, and he talks about a new fight against extreme poverty and unemployment, pointing out that it is obvious today that the massive post-war economic expansion did not significantly improve material living conditions for a vast multitude of individuals. The absolute number of people in situations of extreme poverty continued to increase; the huge disparities in incomes and income opportunities remained and even widened in many countries during that period. Those unexpected results from three decades of development efforts compel us to reconsider the strategies and policies decided upon in the past and to rethink entirely the problem itself. It is unfortunate to see that people in general do not stop long enough to think in terms of heritage and heirs. Yet science and industry are the intellectual heritage of nations, the illustrated Webster of the 20th century.

Science as applied to agriculture, industry, trade, communications, has made enormous progress particularly in the past century and a half, and more particularly in the past forty years. Man had long since learned to use simple machines to heighten the strength of his muscles and that of animals—he also used a few inanimate forces like wind and water. But since he has learned to use fossil solar energy in the form of coal or oil, since he has been distributing through simple metal wires the power of falling masses of water across hundreds of miles, since chemistry went from the laboratory to industry, the progress made cannot be measured, the problem of production has been solved. Realizing what is happening in the area of production and consumption and particularly the means of distribution used, we sometime wonder whether the leaders of our society are blind or stubborn. They do not seem to have yet understood that we should be heirs rather than born losers.

He still believes that a man must be poor and find it very difficult to earn his living. We speak about the legacy gathered by generations, of the land conquered through the toil and ingenuity of mankind; they will reply that we are born under a blanket of debts. Wealth is overflowing, but a false, stupid, deceitful and fanciful system turns heirs into debtors. According to their argument, Champlain and the brave settlers established the faith, farming and civilization in Canadian forests; their successors three centuries afterwards have improved agriculture, have built cities, modernized industry and all that series of workers would have toiled on the Canadian soil to leave to their issue a legacy of debts, misery and hardships. But this is really absurd! This is why I insist we should refrain from studying the terrible cause of all our troubles. Again I say it is the financial system, the money made by man which has been badly distributed and that is the matter which should be investigated.

For several years now our politicians no longer refer to the payment of our national debt, as I pointed out last night, they can hardly manage to pay the interests which reach several billions each year. We should not forget that it is only the interests on the public debt. We are surprised by the rising cost of living. We do not stop to think that higher interest payments are one of the main causes of the cost of goods and the soaring cost of living. And all this is due to that financial system which should be altered. Most provincial and municipal governments have to pay interests on their debts and they hardly manage to meet them. From our woods, our lands, our manufactures, we can hear someone making the following parody: You will pay your debts and your taxes by the sweat of your brow.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on Bill C-16 which extends the date on which the Bank Act expires from March 31, 1978, to April 1, 1979. I am very much in favour of this bill passing. I am in no hurry to see a new Bank Act. If what I hear is correct, the new Bank Act will not be very favourable to ordinary Canadian citizens. Therefore we need more time to talk about what should be in the new Bank Act to help the ordinary people of this country. It is on that issue I want to spend the next few minutes.

I believe that under the new Bank Act the government will allow into this country what one might call suitcase banks. The government would like to see a lot more banks come into Canada. They would obviously be foreign-owned banks, most of which would be based in the United States. I contend there are enough banks in this country. We do not need to bring in more. If more banks do come into Canada, I can visualize a lot of problems.

If we have an open door policy with regard to banks, the banks that will locate here will primarily be branches of the huge banks in the United States or large multinationals around the world. There will be a lot more competition with the Canadian chartered banks for the big accounts such as Inco, CP Rail, Imperial Oil and the like. Increased competition will mean lower profits for the Canadian banks than would otherwise be the case from the source.

We now have legislation in this country whereby our banks are Canadian. That is an important part of legislation passed in this House many years ago.

If foreign owned banks come into this country, their prime target will be to get the accounts of the large companies in Canada. They will not be interested in servicing the ordinary person who lives in Selkirk, Manitoba; Yorkton, Saskatchewan; Montreal, or anywhere else in this country. The Canadian banks will have to compete with these new banks for the business of these large companies. In order to be more competitive they will have to make less profit. They will make their profit by charging higher interest rates on consumer loans and charging higher fees and service charges to the ordinary citizen banking his money or making a loan. The service charges being paid by the ordinary person in this country will increase after the new Bank Act comes into force.

● (1552)

If what we hear is true, the government is going to open the door to allow more banks, the suitcase bankers, the foreign bankers, into our country. I think that would be a very big mistake. One of the prime prerequisites of our banking system in Canada should be to have that banking system act as an instrument of national policy. I think it should act as an instrument of national policy in the same way as a transportation system must act as an instrument of national policy. The government must maintain control over that system. It is one of the things which must remain within the authority and under the jurisdiction of the federal government. If we were to decentralize the banking system the difficulty of maintaining good economic planning would be more difficult.

The main point I am making, Mr. Speaker, is that banks must be an instrument of national policy and they must be used as such. If we are to allow huge multinational banks into our country from offshore it will be more difficult to use banks as vehicles of national policy and economic planning. It would mean that the banking industry would be more fragmented and more difficult to direct by the Government of Canada on behalf of all the people.

We need to retain our control for all kinds of reasons. First, we are a country which is undergoing many economic difficulties; one need not talk at great length about our economic problems today in Canada. We know there are many difficulties, and if we are to solve them we need strong intervention by the government and strong intervention on the side of public planning. I know there are many hon. members, not all of them in the Conservative party, who are starting to look the other way. I know that during the Liberal convention held in Ottawa last weekend many of the delegates were talking about less government involvement and less government intervention in the economy. They felt that was the way to make the economy go well. But I suggest it is not.

If we are going to leave that to the private sector which, in the main, consists of the large multinational corporations, they will not do much for the ordinary citizen in our country. Their main goal is obviously to maximize their profits and to make their shareholders happy regardless of where their shareholders may live. There is absolutely nothing wrong with that if that is the type of system under which you wish to live. But I suggest to the House that in a country like our own that is just not going to work. Most of our economy is foreign owned and foreign controlled, of a resource-based economy in Canada where our resources are dug out of the ground here and are shipped over to the United States or somewhere else to be refined or manufactured—where, of course, the jobs are—and the profits will be drained out to those areas and we shall not have the benefit of any development of secondary industry based in Canada.

Perhaps even worse than that, though, we shall not see development of our country occur in an equal and uniform way. An hon. member from the maritimes asked a little earlier what was wrong with that. I tell him that that is why his region of the country, which is really being hit hardest, does not get some of the development. It is because the multinationals and the big corporations in this country have too much control.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Nystrom: When I have finished I hope the hon. member will get up and speak. It would be interesting to see him take the opportunity to debate that point with us. If we had more government intervention and more planning in our economy, the maritime provinces, the eastern part of Quebec, the prairies and the north would be a lot better off.

I maintain it is not profitable to put plants in places like the maritime provinces if one is guided strictly by the profit motive. This is because they are a long way from the large markets and because we have a government which believes that we must have a user-pay transportation system. That, too, is part of free enterprise—you have to pay for what you use. If you hold that type of philosophical belief you are not going to develop equally those parts of our country which for numerous reasons are disadvantaged, through no fault of the people who live there. If you employ government intervention in the economy, for example in the area of transportation, where freight rates are equalized, so that no discrimination would exist against the maritimes and the north, then you would have a much better chance of making this country a sensible and well planned place in which to live.

Perhaps the best way of describing our country would be to use the analogy which my father used to use when I was quite young, in describing how our country is run. He saw this country as a huge cow pasture and in the pasture was a cow facing west eating the resources of the prairie. Those resources were processed within the cow and the cow was milked over Toronto. That was where all the cream went. The tail end of the cow was over the Atlantic provinces and part of Quebec. You know what was happening at that end of the cow. Anyway, that analogy is not far from the truth. That is the type of system you have if free enterprise takes over this country. You get profits any way you can without any regard to what it will do to people in the outlying areas. I would like to see some of the more capitalistic members, like the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley), get up and refute this in as intelligent a way as I put it forward. Let us look at our country. We have never had any socialist government running things in the hundred and some odd years we have been in existence. Still we have these high inequities existing here. Look at the unemployment rate in the maritimes. Consider the average standard of living in places like Newfoundland. That cannot be as a result of the socialist system; it is the result of the systems we have always had in this country. What I am suggesting is that it is time we had an alternative to what has been happening; we need stronger intervention by the public in the economy in order that we would more equitably distribute our resources among the many parts of our country. Transportation is one of the very important tools to be used to this end and, of course, another which comes to mind is the use of the financial institutions and the banks.

We must do more to direct capital, to direct investment in Canada. Other countries in the world do so and the results are very good. In fact Canada is one of the very few countries in the world which does not have investment controls and the direction of capital. Just look at some of the social democratic countries such as Japan, France, and even Italy. Japan and France plan their economy in a much more interventionist sense than we do. They have in power governments equivalent to our own Liberal government, and equivalent to what a Conservative government would be like. Of course on the other side of the question I can think of many democratic socialist countries like Sweden, Norway, West Germany and so on which have for years intervened in the economy in order that all people under their economies are much better off and are much more equally served. One of the advantages we have in this country is that we now control the banks in Canada. Let us not allow that to slip away from us.

[Translation]

And before I rose, Mr. Speaker, we heard an hon. member from the Social Credit Party of Canada who referred to many problems we have in our economy and which I too recognize. We in Canada are now facing an inflation crisis and an unemployment crisis. We are also facing a crisis on the matter of national unity, and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of our country has been in power for the last ten years. And before he got to power there was no Parti Québécois, which is the main factor in the national unity crisis. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that one of the reasons there is no national unity in this country lies in the whole economic problem. I have already mentioned unemployment and inflation. What we need in this country is a system of equality, equality between all regions of Canada, equality between all individuals, and the instrument for that equality is the Bank of Canada and the transportation system.

[English]

That is why it is so important, when we are debating issues such as that before us today, that we talk about the philosophy of how we wish to see our country developed, the philosophy of how we want our institutions to play their role. It seems to me that our financial institutions are among the main tools one needs in planning a country. I have referred also to transportation, to food, and to agriculture as among just a few very important elements which must be taken into consideration in this direction. Another which comes to mind is energy, and the gas and oil industry.

Another consideration to which we must turn attention when considering this subject is what we should be doing with our banks. I have already mentioned controlling investment, controlling profits, and these things should be within the public hand; they should be controlled more closely by the public of Canada. When the new Bank Act is brought in, one should consider the fact that Canada will have more foreign banks. That will hurt ordinary Canadians.

Hon. members should give some thought to the establishment of a Canadian Crown bank which would be publicly owned. Some of the more traditional free enterprise hon. members, excluding the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), will perhaps become nervous when contemplating this. They should be reminded, if Canada is faced with a situation where there are more foreign owned banks receiving the large Canadian company accounts, that the banks already in existence will have to increase their charges. In order to compensate for that, the possibility of a Crown bank should be considered. It could be established very quickly by channelling federal government accounts to that bank. Many of these accounts are gravy accounts. They are fat and juicy. Banks make a lot of money on those accounts.

When dealing with federal government accounts, one is handling public money. I can see no reason why those accounts cannot be taken away from the private banks and channelled into a Crown bank in order for its business to be commenced. In this area I am thinking of various pension plans, the Canada Pension Plan, CMHC, farm programs, the Farm Credit Corporation and so on. The government is involved federally with an immense amount of money. Why not channel that money to a publicly owned bank? A Crown bank could be the vanguard in planning our economic system. It is public money. Why cannot it be used in the best manner to plan on behalf of Canadians?

Mr. Whittaker: What about lower interest rates?

Mr. Nystrom: This would be a great way to lower the interest rates. I am glad the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) mentioned this. If all the government accounts are in a Crown bank, probably the interest rates for the ordinary Canadian will be lowered, as well as the service charges. If Canadian banks are to compete with multinationals and foreigners for the accounts of big companies, it will be necessary to lower their interest rates and service charges. A profit will have to be made somewhere. That profit will be made by charging the hopeless, small Canadians who have no way to fight back because they are facing an oligopoly. If a Crown bank were in existence, then those people would have a choice. They could do their banking in a Crown banking system. Hon. members of the Conservative party should not consider that idea as being too radical. It was that party which brought in many of the Crown corporations which are now in existence, such as the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are not banks.

Mr. Nystrom: No, they are not banks. In the days when the CNR was brought into existence many Conservative members felt it was an outrageous scandal. Also many members of that party felt the establishment of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was an outrageous scandal as well.

Mr. Whiteway: Right!

Mr. Nystrom: I hear an hon. member saying, "right". I hope that is said in front of Conservative party constituents. In the riding of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), the CBC is very popular and well liked indeed. For many years in the House, when a transportation policy was being discussed, members of the Conservative party chastised the New Democratic Party for talking about public ownership of parts of the transportation system such as the railways. It was not too many years later that Peter Lougheed of Alberta decided to nationalize one of the airline companies, PWA. That province has a Conservative government. I have not heard too many members of the Conservative party rising to chastise Peter Lougheed for nationalizing that airline.

That is what my party would like to see happen in the Canadian banking system. The establishment of a Crown bank should be considered. If that were done it would be only a matter of a few years before that bank would be one of the largest in the country, and only a matter of a few more years before it would become the largest. I suggest it would provide a valuable tool to the government with which to plan the economy so that there is a much more balanced economic system for everyone.

I realize this suggestion goes against the grain of the majority of hon. members. That is why I am a member of the New Democractic Party. Most members like to see the operations of corporations go unimpeded. They like to see the elephants having all the liberation they want when they dance among the chickens in the chicken house. That is the philosophy of the other parties. That type of system would not help the ordinary Canadian. Ordinary Canadians require a system where the government would have a tool to plan our economic needs.

Mr. Jones: Some tool!

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member for Moncton seems to be content with defending the government today. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is listening very seriously.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The size of the party of the hon. member for Moncton has doubled today.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes. Perhaps he will join the Liberal party. I see the Minister of Finance taking out the Liberal party membership book. Perhaps he would be pleased to welcome the hon. member.

The record of governments in the past has not been effective in terms of reducing inequities in Canada. Some Liberal members are disappointed at how the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has failed to narrow the gaps between the haves and the have-nots over the past eight or ten years. One reason for that is that the old free enterprise system has been relied on because it was considered to be the system which would heal the country. The government, like a giant Santa Claus, has been willing to hand out carrots, bananas, and Christmas gifts to companies to solve problems. But once the gifts run out, there is no reason for the companies to expand or to remain, if the system is not changed. Banks should be used as one means for changing the system under which we operate in Canada.

When we talk about the Bank Act we must consider the credit unions and the co-operatives. I come from a province where the credit union movement is very strong and popular. In the province of Saskatchewan, perhaps nine times out of ten the credit unions have done more for the ordinary citizens and the small communities than the banks.

[Translation]

And I think the same is true in the province of Quebec with the caisses populaires.

[English]

I think too, when we talk about banks, we must make sure the legislation pertaining to credit unions remains as it is so that they can operate in the way they have been set up and are supposed to operate. Historically credit unions have played a valuable role in the development of Canada by assisting ordinary people and the communities in which they are located.

These are a few things which are important to mention when Bill C-16 is being considered. This bill will extend the old Bank Act for one more year in order to give the government, and the people of Canada, another year to think about what they want in the new Bank Act which is to come before us. I do not want this bill to be held up, but when hon. members rise I hope they talk about the general direction in which they want to see our country go, and the general role banks and financial institutions can play in the development of Canada to make it a better place in which to live.

We must think about how we can make Canada a much better country for each and every one, regardless of economic background, colour of skin, or in what part of the country they live. Canada should not be made a better country only for those who have money, who happen to have inherited wealth or who have been given, by the grace of God, more luck or intelligence than others in order to benefit from the free enterprise system as we know it. It is wrong when people like the president of the CPR, Mr. Sinclair, earn approximately $330,000 a year, plus the other benefits which he receives. I think it is wrong when some people in our country make so much money and when at the same time there are so many Canadians living in absolute poverty.

• (1612)

Mr. Chrétien: What about baseball players?

Mr. Nystrom: I agree completely with the Minister of Finance. Some of the salaries paid to baseball and hockey players are outrageously high. I think the former premier of Manitoba had a much more decent philosophy when he suggested that management should be paid no more than two and a half or three times the salary of the workers who work in the plant. That is the direction we must take in this country. We would create a much more decent society if we had other priorities than simply making a hell of a lot of money. This is what is wrong in this country—the worship of the almighty buck. When you believe in that, you start trampling on people and warping your priorities.

Mr. Jones: Yes, take away people's initiative.

Mr. Nystrom: I am glad the former mayor of Moncton mentioned initiative because one sure way to kill initiative in people is to keep them in poverty, keep them down in the gutter, with no money to buy such essentials as food and shelter. If you want people with initiative, make sure they have the basics in life. Once you have those basics in life, you have a lot more initiative than when you have to live on welfare or on unemployment insurance. That is one way of killing initiative in our country. You certainly have more initiative among people for whom you provide medicare, public auto insurance, decent old age pensions, family allowances, etc. That is how you give people initiative. If they have the basic necessities of life, they have an opportunity to be more creative and to be more happy with life, and therefore are liable to do a lot more in this country than if you keep them in the type of system we have.

Members of the Conservative party are very good at criticizing any government involvement in the economy. They say that any intervention in the economy promotes a massive bureaucracy. This is absolute balderdash. All you have to do is to take a look at the federal-provincial conference which was held here two weeks ago. Which provincial government has the smallest number of public servants on a per capita basis? It is the province of Saskatchewan with its NDP government. In Saskatchewan for the last 27 years of the last 31 or 32 there has been a social democratic government.

Which province has the most public servants on a per capita basis? It is the province of Alberta, and Peter Lougheed, the premier of that province admitted that at the federal-provincial conference. And yet we hear members of the Conservative party here saying that any intervention in the economy will result in a massive bureaucracy. I maintain that precisely the opposite is true. Alberta has many more bureaucrats per capita than any other province.

Mr. Kempling: What about Manitoba?

Mr. Nystrom: Alberta has many more bureaucrats than Manitoba on a per capita basis. You will find that in any province run by Conservatives there are more bureaucrats. You can even compare the salaries of the bureaucrats. In places such as Saskatchewan and Manitoba the salaries of the public servants are much lower than in Alberta, or indeed in the other beautiful province of the Conservative party, namely, Ontario. This is what we should keep in mind when we talk about intervention. When we talk about intervention we talk about a planning tool on behalf of all the people.

It does not require a very big bureaucracy to direct this country. In many cases it takes fewer people working in the public sector than if they were working in the private sector. That is an argument that has been proven time and time again in the little province from which I come, where socialism has been in practice for 27 of the last 31 or 32 years. I think we should use that province as a model. And we can look to many other countries of the world as well. The Conservative party should look at these facts when they argue, instead of using old rhetoric which comes not just from the depression days but from the 18th century, when debating a bill which will be so important to the future of the country, namely the Bank Act, which will help us determine what kind of economy we want for the years that lie ahead.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise in my place to speak on Bill C-16 and primarily to reprimand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) but, as has happened so often in recent years, it is difficult to tell where the enemy is, whether the socialists are in front of us or to the left of us.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) chastised the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and wondered whether the hon. member for Moncton was going to join the Liberal party. He also referred to the Minister of Finance taking out his membership. I can remember the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville supporting the Liberal government right down the line for 20 months and climbing into bed with them without the benefit of a marriage licence or a party membership. If the hon. member wants to talk about flirtations with the Liberal government, he has only to look at his own record, which is a record of support and one which I find less and less clear because I think it is becoming crystal clear to most Canadians that the Trudeau government is as socialist as those who live under the name of socialists.

Mr. Nystrom: Be serious.

Mr. Whiteway: That is an odd admonition coming from the hon. member who, I thought, had just spoken tongue in cheek for some 30 minutes. In any event, I would like members of the House to realize what is the situation here today. It is February 28, 1978, eighteen minutes past four o'clock in the afternoon, and today we have nearly double digit inflation in Canada, we have double digit unemployment, and we have estimates, which will be referred to the committees, showing a deficit of $11 billion. On February 28, 1978, we have an 89-cent dollar. Perhaps it is even less than that at 19 minutes past four o'clock, but that is what it was at noon today. We have record government spending, which has doubled in five years.

Our exports dropped last month, despite the assurances of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a couple of months ago that the effect of the devaluation of the dollar would show in increased exports. In fact the reverse occurred in January. Neither the Minister of Finance, who is present now in the House, nor the Prime Minister, has explained that as yet. There is a record outflow of capital from this country to the U.S. I can go on, but let this suffice as a brief background to what is the situation on the twenty-eighth day of February, 1978. With this background, the Minister of Finance has presented to the House, not a new Bank Act, but a bill which asks parliament and Canadians to give another year's extension to the existing Bank Act.

The Liberal party has been talking about revisions of the Bank Act for half as many years as I am old. It has produced white papers on this subject and it has mentioned it in throne speeches. Just five years ago Liberals were on the brink of bringing in a new Bank Act. Yet here we are on February 28, 1978, and there is no new Bank Act. As a matter of fact last night in the House the Minister of Finance, in referring to the Bank Act—which we thought must be a massive document because it took so long to draft it—said the following, as reported at page 3267 of Hansard:

> With the permission of the hon. member I would like to tell him that if the bill were ready, I would be tabling it. The bill is being drafted at this time by the Department of Justice.

It is not even drafted. The minister demonstrated he is a concerned Canadian when he said:

> I am as frustrated as the hon. member that the bill is not ready.

• (1622)

The difference between the frustration of the Minister of Finance and that of hon. members on this side of the House is that the minister has the power to act. He is the head of the Department of Finance, and he is a minister in a government which has a duty to act. Granted, hon. members on this side of the House are frustrated, but we are not the government. If the minister cannot direct his department to get the bill drafted, he should move aside because we in the opposition will take the reins of government and get the job done.

The minister should not come before us with the feeble excuse that the government has been the government for only ten years and that we should not expect so much. For five years we almost had a new Bank Act. The minister seemed sincere and was almost believable when he said it was being drafted and that the bill was not quite complete. The minister told us that if it was drafted, he would table it immediately. He said he was just as frustrated as other hon. members.

I do not want to mislead the minister. On previous occasions I have pointed out that under the parliamentary system it is the right and responsibility of the government to govern absolutely. It is the job of the government to set fiscal and monetary policies. Regardless of the mess the government has made, I believe it is its responsibility and duty to set foreign policy, and to bring in legislation which gives direction to the country economically and in every other way. Those are the responsibilities of the government, but it is the responsibility of the opposition to criticize, to point out to the government where it has failed and to try to point it in the right direction. If hon. members on this side have attempted to do anything it has been to point the government in the right direction. My friend and an able parliamentarian, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, might want to push the government in the wrong direction, but I admire him for at least trying to offer some alternative to the government, however wrong and misguided it might be.

Hon. members on this side of the House are going to do our jobs. We will not simply accept the word of the Minister of Finance when he comes to this House year after year and says the bill is being drafted and that his department is working night and day. The minister is not saying the act is not drafted; he is saying that the government's act is not together. The minister does not know what he wants to do, or, if he does, he does not have the fortitude to put it in the form of legislation.

I cannot believe for a minute that the reason the legislation is not on the table is that the government is running out of time. The reason is that, characteristically, the government is confused. I see the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres) shaking his head as if to say no. He says the government is not confused. A government with a clear purpose would come to this House on a matter of critical importance to small businessmen and say that it knows exactly where it wants to take the country, but that is not the case here. If government policy was clear, we would have legislation. Perhaps the hon. member for Lincoln will stand in his place later today and tell us that ten years of Trudeau Liberal administration is not enough time.

Mr. Andres: You have never had it so good.

Mr. Whiteway: The hon. member says we have never had it so good. Let us ask one million unemployed Canadians how good things are. Let us ask those in the secondary manufacturing industry, and small businessmen who are crying for venture capital and for a new Bank Act, how good things are. These people need tools which would allow them to get on with business. Let us ask Canadians faced with an 89 cent dollar how good things are. Let us ask housewives faced with 11 per cent inflation of food prices how good things are. There are 850,000 Canadian families which do not own their own homes.

Mr. Andres: Ask the farmers.

Mr. Whiteway: Perhaps the hon. member will stand in his place and tell us how great things are in Canada. We on this side of the House have a vision for this country. We want to put Canadians back to work. I hear hon. members opposite mumbling and grumbling that ours is the party of gloom and doom.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Right on.

Mr. Whiteway: The hon. member opposite says "right on" when one million Canadians are unemployed, when we have record inflation, when we have a devalued 89-cent dollar, when we have confusion in fiscal and monetary policies and when we have record spending and record deficits. If that is gloom and doom, then I am a prophet of gloom and doom. We talk about it, but the government opposite made it.

On the eve of a federal election we will point out to Canadians what they already know. If the results of the administration of this government are gloom and doom, so be it, but we on this side can do one thing hon. members opposite cannot do. We can offer Canadians a different course of action. We can offer not only different personnel, not only a new Prime Minister and not only a new Minister of Finance and new frontbenchers, but also a new direction, new hope, and new policies which will allow Canadians to see a star and to reach up and grasp it. We will offer Canadians job opportunities in order to get the country going again. What is the Liberal solution on February 28? It is, "We are sorry, but we have not had time in ten years to produce a new Bank Act". The government says the Department of Justice is not finished drafting it, but that just does not wash.

This Minister of Finance is being absolutely irresponsible. I have to chuckle at the hon. member for Lincoln. In spite of the critical conditions we have in Canada there are some members of this Trudeau government who can still joke and make light of the fact that one million are unemployed, that we have record deficits, record spending, waste and all the other things for which this government stands. The hon. member can laugh and joke about that. That is the arrogance that typifies this government, but it does not become it.

Mr. Murta: It is coldhearted.

Mr. Whiteway: Just before sitting down I want to make it clear that I am not an apologist for the banks of this country. I have no vested interest in the banking system. I hold no stocks of any kind, preferred, common or otherwise. I hold no debentures or bonds. I realize that there are deficiencies in our banking system. I can understand the frustration of a small businessman who tries to get the capital that is required to run his business.

There are hundreds of thousands of independent small businessmen. They are the backbone of this country. With their own initiative, backbone and hard work, and with the labour of their own hands and minds they want to get on with building this country. They want to provide employment for themselves and for others. A new Bank Act is critical, yet we do not have one. It is business as usual for this government. The business of this government is record spending, record unemployment, and the other things about which I have spoken.

The Minister of Finance is a man of integrity and honour, in spite of the fact that he displays incompetence in some of the things he does. If he wants to be serious and do something effective he could expedite the legislation and put Bill C-16 aside for a week or two. We on this side are willing to wait, or even come back early after the Easter recess. I would personally be prepared to sit through an all night session if we could get the new Bank Act, which is so important, especially to small businessmen.

● (1632)

There would be three major advantages to having a new Bank Act, Mr. Speaker. First, there would be more competition and efficiency in the financial market place. Second, the regulations and inspection of financial institutions would become more standardized. A problem with banks and near banks is the question of standardization and regulation which for near-banks comes under provincial jurisdiction. The third advantage would be greater efficiency. At the moment near-banks are not required to hold primary and secondary reserves with the Bank of Canada, but the new Bank Act would address itself to that problem.

In opposition to those three major advantages is the argument that the power of the provinces is somehow taken away. At the moment the provinces have constitutional jurisdiction over the near banks and these would now be put under federal jurisdiction. That is a powerful argument.

We cannot discuss the pros and cons of the new Bank Act, however, because we do not have it before us. Bill C-16 which is before us does not deal with the serious questions regarding the whole structure of the banking system of Canada and I would be out of order to go into this at any length. What is before us is a bill that says "business as usual".

In effect the government is saying, "The bill is not even drafted and we do not know when it will be ready but, until it is, we would like another one-year extension." I would ask the Minister of Finance to set aside Bill C-16 for at least three weeks, or until he can get the new legislation in place. This would be a service to all of Canada.

[Mr. Murta.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let Bill C-16 pass without saying a few words, but I do not intend to take too much of the time of the House. This is a very simple bill of two pages. All it asks is to extend the existing Bank Act for another year. This would be the second extension. The minister tells us that the act cannot be presented to the House because it has not been drafted. I wonder what the real reasons are for this foot dragging. The government has been aware for ten years that the act would have to be revised but now it is asking for an extra two years.

The Bank Act is not complex. It is one of the clearest statutes on the books, and it is very important to Canadians.

When the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) spoke he proposed that we start a government bank, another Crown corporation. This causes me to wonder if this is why the government is dragging its feet, as I believe it to be far more socialist than his party. After he spoke I saw him go over and sit very comfortably on the government benches, so again I wonder if this is one of the reasons for the foot dragging. Does the government want to get the election over, bring in such a proposal, and then have more control over the people? The hon. member said the government would take off with the plums and put them into this bank, but I doubt that there are really many plums because of the system of banking in this country.

Is the government dragging its feet because it is afraid to show the people before an election what could happen to them? Does it want to get the election over and then bring in a Bank Act which includes such things as a government bank? This would mean more bureaucracy and more controls over the people such as has happened in the last ten years. Or is it that just before an election the government is afraid to deal with the question of near-banks and credit unions? We know that the government's attitude toward economics is not very satisfactory. It has not done anything for Canada, especially in the last ten years. We do not have a money market in Canada.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville spoke of what a socialist government could do but he did not mention the socialist government that British Columbia had for four long years. There was a surplus when it took over, but it soon had to borrow money outside Canada. Of course everyone else has to do that as well because there is not a money market in Canada. That government did not do anything for British Columbia except leave a deficit. It used and abused the money. The hon. member glibly spoke of what they could and would do, but we have the experience of British Columbia to warn us.

There is no venture capital in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and that is a pity because this country needs venture capital. There should be venture capital and profit for risk takers. We have high interest rates in Canada. In the speech given by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville he mentioned that if there were more banks in Canada interest rates would go up. If we take a look at the countries which have more banks than Canada, their interest rates are lower than here. It is one thing to talk about more banks but another thing to see how they operate.

● (1642)

We have a government which is adopting a casual approach to the Canadian economic system. We have a large outflow of capital funds leaving Canada. Our dollar is dropping drastically. It is now lower than 90 cents even though the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is trying his best to borrow funds abroad in order to prop up the dollar. Unfortunately there is no money market here in Canada, and we are not sure that the minister will be able to alleviate the situation by borrowing abroad. Our balance of trade is poor. It is billions of dollars in deficit. For many years the government has had high deficits. We are not sure what the amount is at the moment since the Minister of Finance is not presenting a budget. However, we do know that we have very high government spending. During the last ten years in which the present Bank Act has been in existence, government spending has risen from $10 billion to $50 billion. That demonstrates what has happened to the money market. We should have a new Bank Act brought forward in the face of the government's spending and the sums of money it is generating itself.

We should not be debating a bill to hoist the new Bank Act for another year. This legislation should be brought forward. It is necessary.

If the government is not proposing to bring forward the amendments to the Bank Act because it is afraid to present it before an election, that is shameful. An important item such as this should not be put off just so the government can go to the people, have an election, and then come back and do something which it says that it is not going to do.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this bill with reference to another hoist of the Bank Act. First of all I must compliment the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on his forceful address. I felt the arguments and points he presented were legitimate.

Voltaire once remarked that if you wanted to talk to him, that is, Voltaire, about God, you should first define your terms. And so with the banks. I do not want to give members the impression that the banks and God are synonymous. If we hope to discuss banks and banking with clarity we should define our terms. It is curious that there is no real definition of a bank in the Bank Act. In the interpretation section, 2(1), "bank" means a bank to which this act applies. Section 4 reads, "This act applies to each bank named in schedule "A" and does not apply to any other bank". We are not much wiser. Except that a bank is a bank. Obviously, however, it is implied that there are banks other than those listed in schedule "A".

The other day I received a letter from the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan). He said to me:

Thank you for your letter of 25 January 1978, concerning Sun Systems Limited.

It is true that the Government of Canada, in responding to the energy crisis, did not immediately embrace the ideas of exploiting renewable energy resources, particularly solar, with the same urgency as the United States or some other countries. Our solar program began in 1976, about two years after the United States.

We still lack the large program of government procurement and subsidies or incentives for private solar installations that will be needed to provide a sufficient market to foster the Canadian solar industry at this pioneering stage.

What has that to do with the Bank Act? In reading those two paragraphs in this letter I was immediately struck with the similarity of the circumstance in that particular ministry with the similarity of the position taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and his inexcusable delay in bringing forward the Bank Act. I do not think there is a subject of federal and national concern to which we can turn today without finding that the government is about two years out of step with everybody else. Of course if you were to ask the government they would say everybody else is out of step with them.

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Brisco: One of the hon. members from the Liberal side has agreed with me. That is a further demonstration of Liberal government thinking, two years behind everybody else and out of step with the nation.

Recently the Inspector General of Banks wrote to someone with whom I am acquainted in terms of bank involvement. I quote from that letter:

The Office is established by the Bank Act, an Act of the Parliament of Canada, and the powers and responsibilities of the Inspector General are set out in that legislation.

He goes on to quote Section 68(2) of the act, and this is a quote from the act provided by the Inspector General of Banks. That is an onerous title. It imparts to me and to the casual observer or those affected that here is someone who is in a position to make major decisions in terms of bank operations. It reads as follows:

The Inspector or any other person appointed or employed under section 64 or any person to whom any powers are delegated under sub-section 65(4) shall not disclose to any other person, except the Minister, the Deputy Minister of Finance or the Governor of the Bank of Canada, or a representative of the latter if authorized by him in writing, any information regarding the business or affairs of a bank.

If there ever was a need for a revision of the Bank Act that clause in itself clearly indicates the urgency of revision. Just how protectionist can one get? That smacks of the same kind of government secrecy Canadians have experienced since the Liberals came to power. The Inspector General goes on to say:

As you will now understand, this Office is prevented by law from revealing to you any information that might come into our hands regarding the business or affairs of a bank.

● (1652)

Section 65(1) of the Act states in effect that the responsibility of the Inspector General is to inquire into the affairs of a bank annually "for the purposes of satisfying himself that the provisions of this Act having reference to the safety of the creditors and shareholders of the bank are being duly observed and that the bank is in a sound financial condition . . ." This section has always been interpreted as a responsibility in relation to the solvency of a bank. The broad powers of inspection given to this office are for the above purposes.

Obviously there is no provision for the Inspector General of Banks to inquire into any hanky panky by any of the banks.

The Office has virtually no power to direct a bank to behave in a particular way in its relations with a client.

It does not matter how small or how large the client, there is no provision whatsoever for the Inspector General of Banks to intrude into the affairs of that bank. I expect it would probably lead to chaos within the banking system if one of us or the man on the street could put his oar into the banking system without just cause. However, if we are going to appoint someone and provide him with the title of Inspector General of Banks, we should give him some teeth with which to act.

The Inspector General went on to say:

Nonetheless, where a dissatisfied client of a bank writes to this office or his complaint is brought to the attention of this office, the complaint is often referred to a senior officer of the bank involved to ensure that it receives a fair hearing in the bank.

Isn't that just sweet! If a particular bank has done a gross disservice to a client, the matter is reported to the Inspector General of Banks. The Inspector General writes to the manager of that bank, states that there is a problem and tells him to look after it. There is no slap on the wrist, no investigation. The bank is supposed to examine itself and make sure it did right by its client.

We see in the press today evidence and indications that some banks have cheated the public and have acted in an irresponsible fashion. It is grossly unfair to tar the banking system with a broad brush, but Canadians know that there are those within the banking system, indeed within any system, who are unscrupulous in the manner in which they do business with the public.

The Inspector General went on to say:

More difficult problems involving large clients in contractual obligations are normally settled in direct negotiations between the client and the bank or finally in the courts.

That brings me to the next point. I draw the attention of this House to the conduct of one bank. I do this with some discomfort because I am one of their satisfied customers. I refer to the Bank of Montreal and the manner in which that bank in British Columbia treated a constituent of mine, Merlin Thompson, who attempted to establish an industry within my constituency, Arvee Cedar Mills Limited. That matter is before the courts. The manner in which the Bank of Montreal treated that individual is indeed scandalous. After this has dragged through the courts for the next couple of years I hope the record will show that the Bank of Montreal does not act in this fashion in all of its branches.

Clearly my experience has been favourable, but just as clearly we should watch the bank for the next little while because this sad, nasty story of the actions of the Bank of Montreal will clearly be told. That is not the only case. Recently in this House the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) a question with regard to the conduct of a bank in Vancouver with reference to the manner in which it treated one of his constituents in violation of the law.

[Mr. Brisco.]

Not too long ago the British Columbia provincial minister of consumer and corporate affairs publicly stated over television that his department is very concerned about the attitude of banks. While there is growing public concern over the manner in which banks are doing business, this government is dragging its feet as usual. It does not matter whether it is a depressed Canadian dollar, massive unemployment or gross inflation, this government fails to respond. It is two years behind in taking action.

We have seen the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wrestle inflation to the ground. His biceps really do not amount to much. He is not fit for wrestling or for a lot of other things, particularly serving as Prime Minister of this country.

Not too long ago there was another disastrous bill before the committee, the borrowers and depositors protection act. It was brought in on the advice of the officials and with the blessings of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). If ever a bill contained excess verbiage and ill-defined rhetoric, that was a classic. It died at the committee stage. The minister was clearly incompetent to move it any further.

In that bill there was provision for those who have had their cause advanced in this House today, those on low income and those with no income save and except welfare or the popular route of unemployment insurance. Because of the difficulty in borrowing from a bank, these people go to the loan sharks. We had representations from senior members of the Montreal police force about this problem.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF LAND WHERE RAILWAY LINE ABANDONED

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary) moved that Bill C-222, to amend the Railway Act (ownership of land where railway line abandoned), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is self-explanatory. It is to provide that railway rights of way revert to the Crown when they are no longer used by railway companies.

There are five major reasons for the introduction of this bill:

1. The selling of these rights of way would effectively close transportation corridors which might well be needed in future years.

2. The Government of Canada has made monumental concessions to the railways in this country. Land and tax benefits were given freely to the railways in return for cross-Canada transportation service and now, when these lines are abandoned, the property should revert to the government as partial payment for those early concessions.

3. Today, through a CPR subsidiary company, Marathon Realty, large sums of money are being made from roughly one million acres of land originally granted by the Canadian government to the CPR and still held by the company.

4. The original mandate of the CPR was to provide transportation on an ongoing basis to all parts of Canada. That mandate is no longer being followed.

5. Through abandonment, the railway companies are making large financial gains selling property in urban areas at the expense of the Canadian people.

I was very happy when my motion on this topic was discussed in the House and given support in principle. Indeed, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) said he would support the basic principle of the motion; he went even further by undertaking to support the bill when it came before the House. He stated he would support the measure in order to bring it to committee where its ramifications could be closely studied. He also indicated that the government's position was one of support in principle for the bill.

In two instances the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) supported the idea. With reference to a specific incident of abandonment authorized by the Canadian Transport Commission, he said:

> The Government of Canada would then, after consultation with the provinces, offer the land to the provincial Crown involved for ultimate disposition to a local municipality, or we would offer it for sale as soon as possible to adjacent farm land owners.

Responding to a brief by the three prairie provinces' transport ministers, he said:

> Where any land is in fact abandoned, the roadbed property should revert automatically to the federal Crown.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) also made her views known in strong support of my motion on the reversion of rights. Indeed the hon member suggested that the CPR is no longer a railway but "a front for exploitation of other interests in this country." She said:

> The railway is simply there to further CP's moneymaking, and, I will go so far as to say, greed . . . I know the reputation of the railway, specifically the Canadian Pacific, which has taken so much of what should be the property of Canadians.

Hon. members may agree that that is strong language to direct against a major Canadian company.

I should also like to call the attention of the House to a news clipping from the Vancouver Province dated December 2, 1977. The clipping states that Canada's two major railways have made a secret pact with Ottawa to turn over all abandoned prairie railways to the federal government. According to this article, an agreement supposedly released by Alberta transport minister Hugh Horner shows CN and CP rail as having agreed to turn over to Ottawa all railway rights of way abandoned on or after August 5. Under the terms of the agreement the federal government would not pay for land but the railways would be paying mines and mineral rights. Urban rights of way and adjacent rail lands were excluded from the agreement. The only part of the agreement I question is this: why was it kept secret?

There has been speculation that the federal transport ministry has been waiving it under provincial noses to support the contention that railbeds belong to the federal government. I should also like to point out that Mr. Justice Hall, in the Hall Commission Report on grain handling and railways in western Canada, came to a similar conclusion as far as rail abandonment is concerned, except that he suggested rights of way should revert to the provincial governments. I refer to pages 104 and 105 of that report which read as follows:

Upon abandonment, the roadbed, that part of the property abandoned, represented by land vested in the provincial Crown for disposition as may be mutually agreed to between the relevant province and municipal authority, the CNR or CPR, whatever the case may be, have entitlement to recover and remove with one exception such of the improvements to the property, rail, ties, other track materials, ballast etc. as may in their judgment be warranted. Culverts, the removal of which might alter established drainage patterns or have adverse effects, would constitute the sole item of improvements to be left in place by the prairie grain authority. We anticipate some objection that the property disposition formula we have outlined involves an element of expropriation of railway property without compensation to the railway company. This cannot be a valid objection. Under sections 106 and 259 of the Railway Act, the railways have a legal obligation to maintain service on all lines until approval for abandonment is given. In the case of grain-related branch lines the railways ask to be relieved of this obligation taking the position, with which we do not agree, that they are operating these uneconomic lines at a great loss even when given the branch line subsidies to which we have referred.

In our view, the railways cannot have it both ways. They cannot secure relief from their financial burdens, as we propose, and yet retain an undiluted title to the property in toto. This is particularly the case when, as we also propose, many elements in the property ultimately to be abandoned are likely in the interim to be enhanced by some degree of rehabilitation involving new investment of funds.

We therefore deem it eminently just and equitable that in return for permanent relief from legal obligation to continue a losing operation and having to restore the abandoned right of way to its former condition, the privilege of being allowed to abandon should be made conditional upon giving up ownership of the land in the right of way. A substantial portion of this land is quite valueless in any event. There should be no crying over the return of rights of way to the Crown.

I first became interested in the subject of railway abondonment some two years ago when the CPR made an application to the Transport Commission to abandon a large portion of what is known as the Kettle Valley Railway in my riding. This railway had long served as a second rail corridor across British Columbia—its use has been abandoned for some years, now. Rail traffic in British Columbia from east to west has been concentrated on what is known as the main line and both the CPR and the CNR use a similar route for much of the traffic.

If one looks at a map of British Columbia and studies the very limited corridor which is being used today for rail traffic, he will quickly see how vulnerable it is in many respects. This may be tolerable as long as the road links which exist today continue to exist. However, road use in years to come will be dependent on the same type of energy source as is used today, namely oil. On the other hand, railways can revert to the use of coal or electric energy generated from sources other than fossil fuel.

I became increasingly interested in rail line abandonment when I realized that at some time in the future, maybe not in my lifetime but certainly in the lifetime of my children and grandchildren, we might very well be obliged to return to rail transportation. I believe the corridors which have been used for railways will be necessary for future transportation in Canada. I have come to believe this even more strongly having looked at what could happen in such a city as Penticton, B.C., if the railways were allowed to abandon their responsibilities and sell off the real estate in these corridors.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

● (1712)

It is for these reasons I asked questions of the Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, Mr. Edgar Benson. The CTC, under Mr. Benson, decides whether rail lines should be abandoned. I asked what would happen to the rights of way when abandonment was allowed, during a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. His answer was as follows:

As I understand the situation, once we rule that a branch line or spur line can be abandoned, we have no control over the land per se. But the railway may deal with it as it may see fit. Sometimes when the railway makes application for abandonment, someone will have indicated to them that they would like to use the land for a specific use and the railway will undertake to make land available for that specific use.

In addition I asked why the Canadian Transport Commission could not make it a condition that the land revert to the Crown on abandonment. Mr. Benson's answer was as follows:

You would have to put that into the Railway Act so we would have the authority to do it.

Also I questioned the Minister of Transport on this and received similar answers.

The railways of today are no longer only interested in transportation. For instance, the CPR is not merely a railway company but a huge conglomerate controlling a number of enterprises ranging from mining to air travel and from logging to oil. Also, the company has investments in almost all major industries. One has only to look at their television ads to see this.

In 1897 the CPR and the new Liberal government signed the most important deal since its original contract, giving CPR access to one of Canada's richest mineral areas, southeastern British Columbia in exchange for a reduction of freight rates. By 1970 it was estimated that CPR owned or controlled at least $1 billion in assets in B.C., making it by far the largest corporation in the province. The second largest, MacMillan-Bloedel, is being slowly bought up by CPR. The brokerage house report on CP will often tout its controlling interest in Cominco as one of the main reasons for the attractiveness of the company as an investment. It is much more important in this regard than the railway.

The government's transportation policy, as it can be exercised by this commission, should stress the transportation aspect and the historical commitment itinerant with the early grants and concessions that helped place CPR in a position from which it could expand and consolidate its position in a number of areas. It had an economic stability; others did not. This enabled it to buy up other railways and to acquire land charters that went with them. To capitalize now on the situation by selling rights of way in urban centres such as Penticton at premium prices is irresponsible. It closes the corridors which might be needed for coal shipping in approximately 15 years, or for transportating products from mining interests in the area to the coast. The line should be retained and maintained, even in disuse. The right of way could be used as a transportation corridor in the future. Under this condition, without the real estate revenues accrued from dividing and selling rights of way of the abandoned lines, the prospects of abandonment would appear much less attractive to Canadian Pacific Railway.

Railways, especially the CPR, have a commitment to maintain rail lines even if they are losing money. This argument is based on the fact that the CPR was heavily subsidized, received generous concessions and inducements for constructing the transcontinental line. Because of the almost limitless aid from the government, the CPR was a moderate success from the start. The total value of the government aid is almost impossible to estimate. There was $25 million in cash. Large portions of the railway were actually built by the government and then turned over to the company at a cost of $37.8 million. Also there were close to 25 million acres of arable land. The CPR received other concessions, especially in the area of railroad equipment and competition. Equipment was allowed into the country duty-free. The government assured the company a virtual monopoly until 1888.

Another serious consideration is the re-acquisition of rights of way once property is sold in transportation corridors. The cost of alternative transportation may be prohibitive. In the long run the cost of re-acquiring rail rights of way will make this more economic mode of transportation unjustifiably and needlessly expensive. The natural and obvious alternative is not to court these developments. Furthermore, the cost of re-acquiring rights of way in British Columbia, especially central and southern B.C., are higher than other regions in Canada.

The current routes used by rail lines are often the only viable passage. To circumvent urban areas in search of cheaper land in the future may be impossible. The only alternative would be to expropriate these lands currently being sold and developed as prime real estate property by Marathon Realty. Then they can be restored to transportation corridors at exorbitant cost to the taxpayer.

The hon. member for Scarborough East raised some concerns about the ramifications of the motion. He said:

> Here are some of the considerations that I think cannot be met in this House in the broad scope he has given the motion. Supposing all of those properties revert to the Crown, what would be the burdens on the federal government in maintaining the properties in the meantime? Would it, in fact, wish to sell it off? Would any sales be consistent with long term planning in a municipality, or even a requirement that there be a federal-provincial agreement on long term transportation corridor needs? We do not know and cannot know unless we have much more information.

What the hon. member for Scarborough East said is true. Is there a better way to answer these questions than by taking them to committee? Also, the hon. member asked what city properties are worth in downtown Toronto if put into non-rail uses, and whether some of the properties now developed with multimillion dollar complexes would also revert to the Crown. He said that we should know the details of the amounts of money involved, and whether the railways would still have the opportunity to reinvest in railway networks. The only way to come to grips with these questions and the implications of the bill is to take it to committee. I agree with the hon. member when he suggested that the implications of the bill are serious, that detailed discussion and planning are needed to make this a cohesive piece of legislation. The only way to solve these questions is to take the bill to committee stage. In order to do that, I require the support of the House.

Once in committee, witnesses can be called to answer questions thoughtfully brought forward by the hon. member for Scarborough East. Witnesses can be called from the provincial and federal governments, as well as from the CPR and CNR. This will considerably speed up the process of gaining information. Also amendments could be proposed and dealt with in committee.

The Hall Report, which was compiled at the request of the Minister of Transport, is in agreement with my proposal. The Minister of Transport has shown his support of the proposal in principle, yet stories are circulating about secret agreements between the provinces and the federal government. These problems should be brought into the open. These secret meetings and agreements, which will affect transportation, should be disposed of. Transportation is the very lifeblood of this country. It is our responsibility to keep transportation corridors open. It is the responsibility of the government to prepare the future for our children and grandchildren. Perhaps I will never see the end of fossil fuels in my lifetime, but probably my children will. The importance of these transportation corridors will be evident then. We must get ready for the future. I appeal to the House to pass this bill. It will correct the unfair situation caused by attitudes taken by the railways on the abandonment of branch lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, given my prairie background I am understandably pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this particular debate regarding rail roadbeds this afternoon. On the prairies we perennially have no end of rail issues to discuss, debate and argue about. The sad thing is that until recently the issues we have argued about have been founded primarily upon bad news about the prairie rail system: the news of rising costs and declining service, the news of antiquated rolling stock and deteriorating rail lines, the news of possible abandonments, and nagging, lingering uncertainty concerning our rail system.

● (1722)

Fortunately, in the past couple of years, the news has begun to turn around, particularly with the work of the Snavely and Hall Commissions which have touched upon the issue we are discussing today of roadbed ownership, among a great many other things.

It seems to me that to understand fully the rail situation on the prairies today and to be able to assess the motion now before us it is essential to put the Snavely and Hall Commissions into perspective, that is, it is important to see how that bad news scenario I just mentioned has turned around to a more positive situation.

To begin with, during the past decade or so, quite apart from the Snavely and Hall work, there have been several significant modifications in our prairie grain handling and transportation systems which have been positive and helpful and which deserve to be recognized in a discussion of this kind. I think, for example, of the construction of more modern elevator facilities and the efforts at consolidation of some elevator facilities on the prairies. There have been agreements between the railways to eliminate what used to be wasteful grain back-hauls in the movement of grain from prairie regions to export positions.

We have seen the development of a new quota system and the block shipping system; the appointment of port co-ordinators for grain operations at Thunder Bay and Vancouver; a special grain boxcar repair program which saved railway rolling stock for the movement of grain; probably most dramatically, the purchase of 8,000 grain hopper cars at a cost to the federal treasury of something in the order of $255 million; the useful Mants report on grain car allocation procedures; and a special Canadian Wheat Board trucking program to help move tough and damp grain and to ease pressure during times of peak volumes in the rail system.

Also, we have seen recently the Wheat Board's incentive program to encourage construction of new terminal capacity on the west coast; continuing efforts to utilize the port of Prince Rupert better for grain movement; an ongoing federal upgrading program to the tune of $12.5 million for the port of Churchill, including the installation this year of hopper car unloading facilities; and compulsory railway cost disclosure legislation to open the books of the railway companies for the first time.

That and other developments have brought us most recently to the work of the Snavely Commission, a commission initiated at the same time and in conjunction with the Hall Commission, to do the job of analyzing and assessing the real costs of trnasporting grain by rail.

The work of the Snavely Commission is generally regarded as being very thorough, practical and reliable. It has been well received and widely respected across the prairies, and indeed there has been no serious challenge to the basic analysis offered by the Snavely Commission. All of those developments, including the Snavely report and others, have formed the context within which the Hall Commission did its fundamental work to help shape the prairie rail network which we will require for the future.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened with patience to the hon. member and, quite frankly, I fail to see what the Hall or Snavely Commission reports have to do with the private member's bill before us. He is talking about the movement of grain, not rail abandonment.

Mr. Goodale: If the hon. member had been in the room and had listened to the hon. member who moved the motion, he would have heard extensive references to the Hall report in the very speech in which the motion was introduced. Indeed, the whole question of the status of roadbeds on the prairies is derived from the work of the Hall report which was fundamental to the grain handling and transportation systems in western Canada. It is most unfortunate that the representative of the Conservative party fails to recognize that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: As I have said many times, there is probably no document of more significance to our future in western Canada in relation to our transportation system than the report of the Hall Commission. It represents the collective judgment and wisdom of five prominent, well respected westerners, who were appointed by the government of Canada in 1975 to undertake a serious investigation of the prairie rail network. The commission took two full years to do its job, and in the process established a solid reputation across the prairies for fairness and thorough, conscientious work.

The report provides us with a good foundation upon which to build as we tackle what has become the very urgent job of revitalizing our grain handling and transportation systems. Reaction to it from most quarters—from farmers, farm organizations, western commodity groups, municipalities, grain companies and co-ops, provincial governments, opposition spokesmen in the House of Commons, and so on—has been generally positive.

As soon as the Hall report was published on May 16, 1977, westerners generally began to demand swift and positive responses to it. The government of Canada agreed, and we have moved quickly to implement the thrust of the Hall proposals. Probably no other report of a federal commission of inquiry has received such prompt, decisive attention as the Hall report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is stretching our credibility too far.

Mr. Goodale: The hon. gentleman across the way wants to see a demonstration of that decisive action and I am quite prepared to give it to him at this moment. As I said, the report was first tabled in the House of Commons on May 16, 1977, and published across western Canada on that same date. Ten days later, on May 26, its central recommendation was passed into law by the federal cabinet when an order in council was adopted transferring more than 1,800 miles of prairie branch lines to the permanent basic rail network, bringing that network to well over 14,000 miles altogether. It is important to note that that is a full three quarters of all the trackage existing on the prairies in 1975 when the Commission began its work.

Furthermore, on that same day, on May 26, another federal order in council extended the existing freeze protection against abandonment for another 2,300 miles of rail line which Hall suggested should be assigned to the jurisdiction of the new body to be created called the Prairie Rail Authority, or PRA as it has come to be known. Significantly, toward the end of last year, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) announced his intention to present legislation to the House on the PRA concept during 1978.

On May 27, just 11 days after the Hall report was first tabled, the federal government announced its intention to establish an interim Prairie Rail Action Committee to go to work immediately upon three urgent tasks: first, to recommend additional, immediate transfers of lines from the suggested PRA category to the permanent network in order to facilitate the building plans of grain companies and so forth; second, the PRAC was to offer advice on rail line upgrading priorities; and third, the committee was asked to thrash out the full details of how the PRA concept would operate.

In June, a prominent Saskatchewan transportation expert, Professor Fred Anderson of the University of Regina, was named chairman of the Prairie Rail Action Committee. In July, three prairie farmers were appointed to serve on that committee, namely, Bill Cooper from West Bend, Saskatchewan, Jack Gorr from Three Hills, Alberta, and Lorne Parker from Ste. Agathe, Manitoba. The committee has been hard at work since they took their positions last summer, and in fact their first recommendations are at hand.

In June and July of last year, as a result of the work of the Hall Commission on the configuration of the rail network on the prairies, a special engineering team was assigned to conduct the necessary on-the-ground examination of the new rail links between lines which Hall had recommended as logical in terms of rationalizing the rail system across the prairies. The report from that engineering team was essentially positive. It is now in hand and being studied by the prairie rail action committee.

Also last summer the federal government called for the submission of specific proposals from consulting firms in connection with the new grain collection and cleaning facilities in east central Saskatchewan which Hall had suggested as one way to bolster the future use of the port of Churchill. That analysis was completed early in the fall and has been under review not only by the government but also by various elements of the grains industry of western Canada to make an assessment of its value as an instructive piece of work so far as possible use of that kind of facility in east-central Saskatchewan is concerned in relation to the port of Churchill.

● (1732)

Also dealing with the question of Churchill, last May the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) instructed the CNR to review its decision to stop its upgrading work on the rail line to Churchill. The minister indicated to the railway that its reasons for stopping that work were inadequate and that it ought to reconsider that particular decision. Further, and most recently, the federal government announced a multi-million dollar western rail rehabilitation program. This as well flows from the work of the Hall commission and from the kind of discussion we are having today in relation to rail roadbeds. The government announced a rail rehabilitation program with an initial federal commitment of funds of $100 million. The work on that program has already begun. It is a massive amount of work, but it is urgently required from a prairie point of view. The $100 million represents the maximum amount of work that can be physically accomplished by the spring of 1979. It is moving forward at a great pace and is part of the scenario which has turned around the bad news with respect to rail lines which used to exist on the prairies. When we see those rail lines being rebuilt and restored, we see evidence that the news is now on the positive side.

Finally, I would like to refer to some demands which were made by the government of Canada upon the railways immediately after the Hall commission report was published. The federal government demanded three undertakings from the CNR and the CPR: first, that they provide complete concrete and ironclad rebuilding and upgrading commitments in western Canada in return for any future cash payments from the federal treasury; second, that they agree to exchange between themselves the specific rail lines which the Hall Commission recommended as logical ownership changes; third, that they surrender to the federal Crown any rail roadbeds which may be abandoned so that the government of Canada could dispose of them to municipalities or to adjacent farmland owners. Those last words bear specifically upon the matter which we have before us this afternoon.

The fundamental difference between the hon. member's bill and the position of the government is essentially that we do not want to be the permanent owners of the roadbed rights of way. On the contrary—and I think this stands in distinct contrast to the apparent positions being taken by provincial governments in western Canada—we at the federal level see our role merely as that of a facilitator to ensure that the ownership of these lands is transferred as quickly and as expeditiously as possible to the appropriate final owners, namely, in most cases the adjacent municipalities and the adjacent farmland owners.

To expedite the transfer of title to the ultimate owners the Minister of Transport signed an agreement early last fall with the CNR and the CPR which will transfer to the federal government all roadbed property identified for abandonment in the prairie provinces. As the minister stated openly before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications and elsewhere in public as well, this agreement was reached specifically to ensure that the land is in fact transferred to the logical recipients just as quickly as possible. There is no intention on the part of the federal government to retain the land for the Crown. In order to facilitate the process of ownership transfer, and recognizing the need of municipalities for compensation, the minister has proposed that each prairie province have a roadbed steering committee to help determine the disposition of abandoned rights of way in each particular province.

Preparatory meetings have already been held with prairie farm and municipal groups, one of the most important being held in the city of Saskatoon on November 30 where some 30 or 40 western farm and municipal organizations were represented. It was a very positive meeting indeed. Rural and urban municipal organizations and, significantly, the Western Agricultural Conference, which represents most farm groups in western Canada, have given active and enthusiastic support to the initiative outlined by the federal government through the Minister of Transport. Municipal associations have now been formally invited to participate in this consultative process, and the prairie governments have also been invited to lend their support to the plan. As I said, the reaction from farm and municipal organizations to the plan of attack outlined by the Minister of Transport as to how best to deal with the roadbeds which may eventually be abandoned across the prairies has been extremely positive. They see it as a method of legitimately recognizing their interests and concerns with respect to the future ownership of those roadbed rights of way.

The bill proposed by the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary has merit in principle as far as it goes, and the government of Canada can stand generally in agreement with the intent of the bill, namely that the ownership of abandoned railway rights of way revert, at least initially or temporarily, to the federal Crown, not in terms of final ownership but, as I said earlier, only in terms of facilitating the transfer to the appropriate final owner. However, while this bill has appeared on the order paper, events across the prairies have indeed superseded the proposed item we have before us because the government has acted expeditiously and in a more effective and complete fashion than that envisaged in the general legislative approach we now have before us. The reversion of roadbeds to the federal Crown must not be an end in itself but merely a means to an end. Its objective must be to smooth the transfer of title to the logical ultimate owners in as equitable a manner as possible, and as I have said before, in most cases the most logical ultimate owners should be adjacent municipalities or adjacent farmland owners.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour this afternoon to rise in support of Bill C-222 and the work the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) has done in this vital issue. As a member representing the prairie region, I want to commend the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary for the clear vision he has not only of the problems of the region he represents but also of the prairies. What he has presented to the House is much in keeping with what we see as needed in the prairie region.

I find it interesting that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) spent his time primarily on the Hall report. He finally got to the recommendations Mr. Justice Hall made with regard to rail line abandonment. I felt he took the position of the federal government, which I suppose is fine, but he spent actually very little time on rail line abandonment. He finally did get to it. I want to touch on the matter of jurisdiction a little later on.

The hon. member for Assiniboia spoke about the alacrity with which the government has moved forward on the Hall commission recommendations. It is true that the government moved ahead on rail line abandonment, at least at the discussion stage, but we must keep in mind the fact that Mr. Justice Hall made some 96 recommendations and that the government has accepted only four or five of them. With regard to action on the others which farm groups and related organizations on the prairies have been asking for, the federal government has been doing more studies. The federal government is creating organizations within the provinces, which is fine, but they are not moving with anything near the speed the hon. member for Assiniboia tried to impress upon us.

Just yesterday, February 27, about 15 members of the Conservative caucus who are primarily from the prairie region had a meeting with Mr. Justice Hall. The meeting was co-chaired by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). That was the first time members of parliament have gone directly to the gentleman to discuss his report on behalf of their constituents. Liberals still have not done that, but I suppose they would have to find someone from the prairie region to go to such a meeting. I know they have a problem in that regard.

Mr. Dupras: We will fix that after the next election.

Mr. Brisco: There won't be any Liberals from the prairie provinces after the next election.

Mr. Epp: After what I heard from the lone Liberal MLA from Manitoba at the recent Liberal convention, I do not think we have to worry any further about Liberals from the prairies. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think we will have to put them on the list of endangered species.

● (1742)

Two years ago the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary set this bill down on the order paper, well before the Hall commission report was tabled. When the hon. member for Assiniboia says that events have preceded this bill, we should remember that the government could have accepted it two years ago and could have had at that time the very recommendations that Mr. Justice Hall made later.

I want to go into some of the practical realities now to show how this question is vital to rural municipalities and how the federal government is again not fulfilling its obligations but is in fact encroaching further on provincial rights. When a rail line is abandoned, the land still belongs to the railroads. The secretary of the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission wrote to me saying that the Canadian Transport Commission does not consider it has jurisdiction to order a railway company to take any specific steps when disposing of abandoned right-of-way property. That letter was received in my office on February 21.

In the five and a half years that I have been in this House, Mr. Speaker, I have appeared at hearings of the Canadian Transport Commission in my riding on two occasions in reference to a specific rail line which the CNR had applied to abandon. On the first application they wanted to abandon the line from Emerson to South Junction. They modified that application to abandon the line only from South Junction to Ridgeville. That left approximately nine miles on the line. Despite the objections of rural municipalities, local government district officials and the recommendation that, if the CTC gave approval of abandonment, the land should revert to local government districts and rural municipalities, the CTC finally gave permission to abandon that rail line.

No sooner had that happened than the CNR made application to abandon another three and a half miles of line. That would remove another elevator from the line and there would be only one left. You can mark my words, Mr. Speaker; as soon as they get permission to abandon the three and a half miles they will apply to abandon the remaining six. That is the way they operate. Since 1969 there has been no train on the line through South Junction, Sundown, Vita, Gardenton and Ridgeville.

We knew the rail line abandonment would come but we wanted certain conditions. We made strong representations that we should know exactly what would happen to the land. This is what happened. Permission has been given to lift the rail. Tenders are now out for lifting the rail, the ties and the clamps. Rural officials have told me, the Canadian Transport Commission and the CNR that they feel the right-of-way should revert to local government districts or rural municipalities—that is, the local government district of Stuartburn or the rural municipality of Franklin. I see the hon. member for Assiniboia nodding his head, I take it in assent. I am glad we agree so far.

These rights-of-way that divided the small communities create problems and increase expenses for such things as roads. Some of these communities are now service centres for the highway system. The division in these towns has increased the cost of water and sewers. Planning is difficult for them because they do not know whether they will get the land. These problems are all valid, and I think everyone raised on the prairies understands them. Here is where the difficulty comes in, however: The federal government wants to take these rights-of-way and transfer them to the ultimate owner, namely local government districts, rural municipalities and private farmers; but the point is that the federal government, under the constitution, has no jurisdiction over the municipalities. The municipalities, the local government districts, the towns and villages fall within section 93, provincial rights. The three prairie provinces want the land and say they will give it to the local government districts, the rural municipalities and local farmers, but in some areas the rights-of-way parallel the roads. If the rail lines are abandoned some of those road systems will have to be upgraded, so surely the rights-of-way could be used for that purpose.

Mr. Goodale: That is possible under our plan.

Mr. Epp: Of course it is possible, but the federal government wants to bypass the prairie provinces and go directly to the municipalities over which they have no authority. I would ask the federal government to approach the three prairie provinces. Basically they are in agreement, but they want jurisdiction because they have a responsibility to local government districts, rural municipalities and regarding land titles.

If the federal government is honest in its approach, and I believe it is, then it should make an agreement with the provinces that the ultimate owners can get the land. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary had this clear insight two years ago, well before the government all of a sudden decided it might be able to exploit the issue politically. I commend the hon. member and I support this bill wholeheartedly.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) has moved an interesting bill. I am reminded of an argument he made previously on a resolution which I had an opportunity to read before this debate began. Last November he made essentially the same argument. There is nothing wrong with that because it is a good argument, and it is a good argument today although I think he might have updated it in light of what has happened since.

Bill C-222 will certainly have my support. My only point is that the bill is superfluous and unnecessary as the government has made an agreement with both major railroads that would implement the thrust of the bill. To a large extent, therefore, we are going over previously plowed ground.

Mr. Whittaker: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A member who spoke previously said that the minister had done certain things, and now the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley is saying the same thing. I should like to know when and where the minister made this announcement. The last I heard of it was when I asked a question in committee and the minister said the government could not do anything without changing the act.

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may or may not have been at the committee in November when this question of ownership of rural rail beds was discussed very thoroughly by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the transport critic of the hon. member's party. There was nothing secret as my hon. friend would have us believe. He quoted earlier some press release he had found about a secret deal between the railroads and the minister. It was a well understood and well known move, although it may have taken my Tory friends some time to learn what happened and to realize the speed with which the minister was moving on a number of the recommendations in the Hall report.

• (1752)

I am pleased to know that my hon. friend from Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has had a meeting with Chief Justice Hall and perhaps other members of that commission. Members on this side have met with various members of the Hall commission and held private discussions during the time the hearings were being held and following their conclusion. It is pleasing to note that the Tories are joining other groups of people and agencies across the prairies in finding out what was recommended in the Hall report as well as learning some of the background to the recommendations.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We are supporting the Hall commission recommendations.

Mr. McIsaac: I was interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) who just took his seat.

He made some good points. He mentioned the Hall report was not being implemented soon enough. The Conservative criticism of the Hall report is careful not to spell out either their concerns or their endorsements. They are also careful not to mention the positive steps, actions and announcements which have taken place and which were outlined so capably by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) earlier this afternoon. They did not enjoy the comments of the hon. member for Assiniboia. My friend took 20 minutes in this debate; he could have taken a good deal longer to elaborate if time had permitted. It did require more time to outline all of the moves which have taken place and which have been enacted by this government in response to the Hall commission report.

The bill proposes that the rights-of-way of railroad beds of abandoned lines should revert to the federal Crown. With respect to Saskatchewan, the branch lines in that province are probably in a different situation from some of the lines my friend from the Okanagan valley might have in his province. It might make a good deal of sense to retain some lines in that part of British Columbia in the name of the federal Crown for perhaps years. But I doubt, Mr. Speaker, if that is the case in many situations in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta or Manitoba. Most of these lines have been dealt with through the full abandonment process of the Canadian Transport Commission. Mostly these are branch lines and lines which have not been used to any great degree, and they are not likely to be used again in future, at least in terms of rail corridors. British Columbia in that respect could be different and on that point I am certainly not able to argue with my hon. friend.

In the majority of instances it will be the farmer or the cattleman who has had those tracks crossing his land over the years. He will be the logical person to own or have control over that particular land. It seems to me that it is appropriate to give that land to the federal Crown so they can move expeditiously to put that land into the hands of the farmer or the ranch owner through the municipality.

I do not think there is any group of people or body of elected officials in the prairie provinces, and I am sure it is true across the country, who are more capable and qualified to make the decision, Mr. Speaker, as to who should receive that right-of-way land. The Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, which is made up of almost 2,000 members of every political stripe and party, has endorsed this government wholeheartedly and opposes strenuously the recommendation of Mr. Justice Hall that rights-of-way first of all go to the provincial Crown.

Part of that opposition might be explained by the difficulties they have encountered with the present minister of transportation in the present government of Saskatchewan. The minister has been imposing various weight restrictions and other limitations on roads in the province. Perhaps it is their mistrust of that minister that brings about this particular approach. Surprisingly enough, the municipal people in Alberta and Manitoba have also endorsed the action of the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in seeking that agreement which is now signed and public. There is nothing secret about it. The rights-of-way when these lines are finally abandoned will revert to the federal Crown, for disposition as the municipalities see fit. The municipalities are losing considerable tax revenue from the loss of this land. It is worth pointing out that the return from the sale of this land will go to the municipalities, not the railroads or the federal Crown.

All hon. members opposite I am sure would endorse that particular aspect of this policy, which is meeting with the approval not only of municipal officials across the prairies but all farm groups in every province. Recently at a meeting in the province of Quebec the Canadian Federation of Agriculture endorsed the federal minister's proposals with respect to ownership of the rights-of-way of such land.

We have yet to see any tracks abandoned since the Hall report has been presented. I am aware of the fear, concern and apprehension that for many years has been shown particularly by members of the New Democratic party in some provinces. This issue that they have been worrying about for so long covering something like 14,000 miles of rail line in western Canada has now largely been cleared up and clarified right through the year 2000. There will be a period of indecision as to whether another 2,000 miles of line will be retained, rebuilt or abandoned after some four or five years.

I am pleased to endorse this bill. I point out that it is purely superfluous because of the action of the government and the Minister of Transport. This bill is not required in my riding—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. The time allotted to the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, earlier today when discussing the proposal to give the revision of the Bank Act a one year hoist, I indicated that I had very serious reservations about the wisdom of that proposal. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) and others have spoken most effectively. They presented very persuasive arguments why this should not be, not the least of which is the footdragging of the government which has in effect had ten years of notice of the revision of the Bank Act. It may well be, as I indicated earlier, that events will catch up with the Bank Act revision.

I indicated earlier there is presently before the courts in Vancouver a situation involving a chartered bank and Arvee Cedar Mills Ltd. I suppose it is quite common in this day and age, indeed in any day, to have banks involved in cases of law with clients. However, when the situation gets to the point that the Inspector General of Banks feels it necessary to have a solicitor from his department sit in to observe the circumstances of this case, the degree of seriousness escalates at once.

As I mentioned earlier, the Inspector General of Banks does not have the capacity to act in a very specific way in terms of any punitive—Mr. Speaker, I am having great difficulty hearing myself, let alone the rest of the members. I wonder if we could have a little order in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) has the floor and I suggest we all listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: It would be helpful if the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) would simmer down.

Mrs. Holt: What was that again?

Mr. Brisco: There is very little teeth in the Bank Act to allow the Inspector General to participate in a real and punitive sense with regard to the activities of a bank, whether they be legal or illegal. However, in the case I mentioned earlier today, it is significant that the Inspector General of Banks has seen fit to send a solicitor to Vancouver to observe this particular case.

● (2012)

It is further significant that the federal Department of Justice should have assigned two of its solicitors to be present and to look into the background to this case. Even greater significance can be attached to the fact that the same Mr. Raugust of the Vancouver Sun is shortly going to publish a feature story running, as I understand it, through several editions, dealing with this very case and the abuse of the individual by a chartered bank. It is more than passing strange that this particular case, which involves a cedar mill which went into receivership and was subsequently sold for the paltry sum of about $85,000, should now be back in receivership in the hands of the same receiver, a Mr. Sigurdson of Vancouver, who incidentally handles about 70 per cent of the receivership cases in Vancouver.

An hon. Member: And a Liberal!

Mr. Brisco: And a Liberal. It is passing strange he should have this kind of corner on the market. Certainly he has had that corner on the market in Kootenay West in terms of Arvee Cedar, Quadra Manufacturing, Carefree Enterprises, and what other companies I know not. I find it strange indeed that this gentleman should have his oar in to such a degree that when a pressman from the Vancouver Sun approached him and asked "What is your interest in this case?", he should have replied, "I had better talk to my lawyer."

If there was ever a shadow of concern that perhaps he was skirting the bounds of legality, that kind of statement would certainly have made the Vancouver Sun reporter suspicious. And, indeed, he was. He said: "You know, that is the strangest statement I have ever heard in response to a simple question". Here is a man who is busy putting all kinds of companies in Vancouver into receivership for the chartered banks. I think it should also be noted that the solicitor who represents the Vancouver Sun, a man of no mean repute and ability, is also the solicitor who is representing Arvee Cedar Mills in its case against the Bank of Montreal.

It should also be noted that lawyers in smaller communities, who are often overlooked but who have a great deal to contribute and whose skills are often equal to, if not greater than, those of lawyers in the larger cities, have also taken part in this case in one way or another. I refer to a man who, as I understand it, is a good Liberal. I am not sure there are many good Liberals around, but at any rate, he is a Liberal, a man by the name of Warren Ferguson from Nelson, a very competent solicitor in any event. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that when this bad smell emanating from Vancouver involving the chartered banks—the Canadian Bank of Commerce and Nelsal, and the Bank of Montreal and Arvee Cedar—comes before the public there will be a great deal of pressure on ministers of this do-little government to get off their collective backsides and bring in the Bank Act for revision.

I wonder whether Sir Josiah Stamp ever visualized that the Bank Act would get this kind of treatment or that some banks would treat the act in the manner they have since he introduced the original legislation in 1931. Sir Josiah Stamp, as hon. members may remember, was chairman of the royal commission in 1931 which recommended that Canada set up a central bank, following which the Bank of Canada was incorporated and has since then advanced all our legal tender.

Mr. Woolliams: R. B. Bennett did that. R. B. Bennett was there.

Mr. Brisco: I could go on at some length about the necessity of reviewing the Bank Act at this time. After all, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) has done nothing with his borrowers and depositors protection legislation. That was a total disaster. There is no way in which the underprivileged individual, the low income earner, can approach any chartered bank and expect the kind of treatment which you, sir, or I might expect to receive. Let us draw a credit line at that point, however, and say it is my understanding, as a result of serving on the committee and listening to witnesses, that at least the Bank of Montreal has made an effort in that context right in the heart of loan-sharking territory. This is commendable. The bank was able to demonstrate that, although a person might have only low or negligible income, he or she could be trusted with a bank loan, which as a rule amounts to $100 or $150. Such an amount might seem an insignificant sum to many people, but to those at the near edge of things it is a princely sum indeed since it means the difference between having food for the family and having no food to put on the table.

I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will take the time to read a submission which was forwarded to the former minister of finance in August, 1976 by a Mr. Alton Dahlstrom of British Columbia which dealt with the white paper on Canadian banking legislation. It is an excellent submission and I take this opportunity of recommending it to the present minister and to other members on the government side realizing, however, that in all likelihood they will ignore it since in this instance the author is a Conservative barrister and solicitor rather than a Liberal.

I hope that before parliament adjourns I will have the opportunity to deal with the Bank Act itself instead of addressing myself to this ridiculous proposal for a one year hoist. If, indeed, there is a one-year hoist and the Bank Act revision does not come back for a year, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we in the Conservative party will deal with it properly as a government.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting day in the House, listening to the debate on Bill C-16. Sitting at this end of the House I am very concerned, too, that the group of independents has increased 100 per cent as a result of a form of excommunication by a certain party in this chamber.

As for the bill before us, it is not my intention to speak about it for very long because there is really nothing to speak about. It is a nonentity. It is not a new act; the government merely asks for an extension of the same old thing for a further year, a continuation of the same act by the same old government, too tired and too worried to get the bureaucracy down to some good hard work for a change. The government has clearly shown by its attitude to this legislation that it is not prepared to tell the bureaucracy what to do. Instead, it prefers to wait for the bureaucracy to tell it what to do, a good example of the essence of socialism. The government has shown that it is not a promoter of free enterprise. In fact, it is not a promoter at all. I think some politician once said you can fool some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time. But you cannot fool the silent majority in this country for too long.

• (2022)

Mr. Woolliams: I will help you if you don't know who that was. It was Abraham Lincoln who said that.

[Mr. Brisco.]

Mr. Jones: Yes, and I will quote him later on. He is a good man to quote, and it is too bad hon. members of this House do not use and follow his quotations more often.

I cannot say I really oppose what the government has in mind, if it has anything in mind at all. It has not brought in a bill with a policy; it has just asked for an extension. It seems to me the government has shown a bit of lackadaisicalness either in the Department of Finance or the Department of Justice. Surely to goodness it must have drafted a bill now that it could bring before this House. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) wanted a hoist for a year he should have had the common courtesy to present a white paper, a green paper, even a red paper or maybe a yellow paper, to show us what is the policy of the government in relation to banks and banking. This is what the people of Canada are concerned about; certainly it is the concern of customers of the banks. It should be the concern of this parliament.

Everyone is talking about the eve of a federal election, and some say it will be within a few months. That is no excuse for failing to tell us what government policy is in relation to banks and banking. This is a very important subject, particularly at a time when our economy is in such bad shape. We should know where we are going in so far as banking is concerned.

We really have nothing to debate here. Do we agree that we let this revision go for a year, or do we not agree? Should we let the government have its way and give the act a 12 months' hoist? It does not take 12 months to draft a bill in relation to banks and banking policy. It does not take 12 months for a good lawyer to draft a bill.

Mr. Woolliams: He doesn't know them like I do.

Mr. Jones: I do not know whether I can support the bill until the Minister of Finance brings the policy before us. It is a sad day for democracy here to be witness to such unreasonableness on the part of a minister who introduces a bill which really says nothing except that he wants 12 months to do something he should have done ten years ago. We should have the final bill.

Reference was made by the NDP member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) to the poor conditions in the maritimes. He sure wanted to run down the free enterprise system. Let me point out that, like a lot of members of this House, I am not a socialist, and, like a lot of people in Canada, I do not believe in socialism. I am in favour of the free enterprise system. I am sure a lot of the problems of this nation could be solved through the free enterprise system. I am proud that a lot of people in my own constituency built their businesses and their lives on the free enterprise system. There is nothing wrong with making a profit so long as you are prepared to work for that profit, free of government interference, particularly dead weight government interference.

The hon. member mentioned the poor conditions in the maritimes, but let me assure him that those conditions are not the result of the free enterprise system. I can assure him that if he reads the history of the maritime provinces he will see that we were not always poor. What has made us poor are things like socialism. It has wormed its miserable way into our area. In fact, we have lost many things through socialist provincial and federal governments.

An hon. Member: Is that the Conservatives or the Liberals?

Mr. Jones: Both of them, and they call it equal opportunity down there. If the rest of Canada would come to its senses and get off this socialist bandwagon, with proper leadership we in the maritimes could fare pretty darn well.

We hear a lot said about pipelines and the St. Lawrence Seaway, part of which we in the maritimes paid for. It had a great impact on maritime seaports. I am sure we are going to help pay in the longrun for subsidization of the pipeline and other things across this country. These things are called for by socialist or semi-socialist regimes, provincial and federal. This is what hurts poor areas like the maritime provinces more than anything else. The rich get richer and the maritimes get poorer because of the socialist system. We do not want or need handouts. What we need are workouts in the maritime provinces. We need a free enterprise system to give us a little boost. That is all we need in the maritime provinces and with that we would be a "have" province before long. But we cannot do this with socialism.

I suppose to some of you the phrases "handouts" and "workouts" are new, but these represent the issues in this country today. There is a necessity for a return to the free enterprise system, particularly in this time of our failing economy. There is a necessity for a return to the principle of good hard work in business and in government.

My reference to handouts and workouts no doubt puts many of those on the government side of the House in a state of wonderment, not only about the meaning of those phrases but also about the seriousness of them. I do not want them to be deceived by the apparent light humour of those phrases. They are serious and meaningful, especially as I intend to use them tonight.

As hon. members are all well aware, over the last number of years our country in its entirety from coast to coast has been placed in a state of advanced socialism. We must admit that. This has been partly due to a failing economic order on the part of the government. But that is only half the reason. That is right; before our very eyes we have seen this country become a welfare state. Although this plan of welfare may fare well in the short-term, it certainly cannot be the rule for the long-term. If these programs of free government care continue, the federal Department of National Health and Welfare—or should I say "wealth and hellfare", because that is the department responsible for the majority of government grants and donations—will soon put this country so far in the red that we will never be able to see the light of day.

I am trying to tell it as it is. Some members may not know how it is. They should see what some of the books say about it. There is no escaping the fact that man must produce goods in order to enjoy them. Despite the availability of government free lunches and the patchwork quilt of welfare benefits offered by all layers of government, there is no disputing the fact that the law of supply and demand cannot be repealed. You cannot extend that for a year. We will remain in this mess of today unless something is done immediately to doctor the situation. The establishment of a Crown bank, as has been suggested, offers no solution. I am sure such a bank would be in a deficit or bankrupt position overnight, and again the free enterprise system would begin to go down further.

It may seem absurd to some hon. members to turn to the past to find an appropriate remedy, but these basic truths and fundamental principles to which we must return in Canada were spoken of many years ago by a famous American politician, known to all of us. I refer to Abraham Lincoln. I have referred to these truths before and I should like to repeat them tonight. I hope hon. members will listen because they are very apropos this debate. He said:

> You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money. You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than you earn. You cannot build character and courage by taking away a man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves.

It has been said on more than one occasion that Canada is the most overgoverned country on earth. In almost the same breath, the sentiment is expressed: thank God we do not get all the government we pay for. I realize these are contradictions, but they indicate our essential dilemma. When municipal, provincial and federal levels are combined—and included therein are the marketing boards and regulatory agencies—there is no doubt that Canada is being overgoverned.

One cannot really blame the government for all their inefficiencies because their programs are conjured up partially to win elections. But it is time for Canadian businessmen to call a halt to some of the welfare situations. Governments cannot create wealth. They can provide only the climate where it can be generated and disbursed. We must find ways of allocating powers between governments. Also we must find ways of lessening their deadweight interference in the economy. Already we have gone too far. It is time for this nation to rebuild the barricades.

My own constituency has received assistance, and it will receive more assistance from DREE and the Federal Business Development Bank. During the last 11 months assistance was received from the Federal Business Development Bank by 39 small businesses. That is what is needed in the maritime provinces. This bank is capable of doing this. It provides incentive to industry, which is what Canada needs. The private businesses in the maritime provinces require a little push. That push can go a long way. With a little hard work, nothing is impossible.

The word I use is "work". Work will be the key to the success of parliament and the nation. We can no longer expect lunches to be free. The government is starting to admit that it cannot continue giving handouts. Even the government pot is running dry. In fact, it has gone dry. We require workouts.

Not only do we require work on the part of individuals and industry, we require work on the part of everyone, including elected representatives at all levels. If all elected officials, regardless of their petty political wrangling, worked in a united front, we could fight the common problem on our doorstep. Work and action will accomplish the things which have to be done, not the words which are spoken day after day. We require action by responsible politicians. Some hon. members may have an opinion different from mine. To them I say, "The steam that blows the whistle will never turn the wheel".

Canadians must return to the principles I mentioned earlier. We must return to the free enterprise system. There is nothing wrong with it. Also we must return to hard work. This is the basis upon which this nation was built. This is the basis upon which this nation will continue. I am referring to simple hard work. Perhaps that is unknown to many bureaucrats. It will be necessary to teach them to work hard. If they had been taught that, we would have been considering the Bank Act today rather than just an extension of it. Handouts are not the solution. We require incentives to industry. If industry receives those incentives, it will do the job.

What we are considering tonight indicates that the government does not have the policies we require, nor are the government bureaucrats prepared to work hard.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was very surprised to learn tonight that the maritimes have become socialistic. I am sure Mr. Hatfield, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Moores and Mr. Regan will be surprised. If the maritimes have become socialistic, it is the best kept secret in Canada. If that is so, perhaps it would be better if it remained a secret, rather than the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) informing the people of the maritimes about it. Presumably it has happened without their knowing.

If we were to move a 12 month hoist on this bill, we would accomplish what the government is able to accomplish in any event, which is the postponement of the decision on the decennial review of the Bank Act. That review is already nine years late. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated, he will be here long enough to see it missed for the entire ten year period.

I do not believe the maritimes has become socialistic. Perhaps there are too many free enterprisers in that part of the country. There seems to be an acceptance of the subsidies given by the government. The Bank Act is being postponed because the government and the banks are not sure what they will do in the next two or three years to solve some of the problems in regard to the Bank Act. One problem is the government's relationship to the banking industry. Another problem is the roles which are played by members in the caisses populaires and credit unions of the country. Changes have been suggested with respect to the relationship which exist among the government, the caisses populaires and credit unions. It is difficult to decide what political advantage will be gained by including credit unions in the Bank Act, or allowing them to operate in the way they have in the past. It will be necessary for the government to consider this suggestion for another two or three years, because it would be unwise if a wrong decision was arrived at prior to the forthcoming election.

I am concerned about what is happening to our Canadian dollar at the present time and its relationship to world currencies. The money markets of the world have been destroyed by asking countries to make deposits to the International Monetary Fund, and then giving them drawing rights against the IMF for the third world countries. The initial idea was that if the countries which were in a fairly sound financial position were to allow money to be lent to the developing countries, those countries would develop and then would become consumers while the countries which had lent the money would be able to do business and get their money back.

There is an interesting article in Myers' Finance and Energy publication. I know some hon. members are not the least bit impressed by some of the advice given by Richardson, Myers' or some of the other agencies on what to buy, what to sell and where to put their money, but the February issue of their commentary indicates that there are $400 billion Eurodollars floating around the world. They indicate, in a long and involved way, that the U.S. Treasury does not owe money for these Eurodollars. Many U.S. dollars, have been processed by the IMF and have reached Europe not as a debt but as a currency for which the U.S. takes no responsibility. The United States has made its sale, they have been paid for it in U.S. dollars and these dollars will not be picked up by the U.S. Treasury. The commentary goes on to say:

> The U.S. Treasury does not owe any of those dollars and has no responsibility to make good. Only when the U.S. dollar was backed by gold was it in the position where it had to be made good. If an Arab potentate buys $10 million of U.S. Treasury notes, the U.S. does owe and must pay those dollars. If, however, the potentate puts $10 billion in Citibank and certificates of deposit, the U.S. has no obligation to pay those dollars. Citibank does, but the country doesn't.

It goes on to say that in their opinion there is probably $1 trillion floating around, only $800 billion of which the U.S. Treasury has the responsibility to repurchase, and that the great danger the world faces today is not inflation but deflation.

This commentary points out:

> The very great danger rests in the contraction which is taking place all around the world. Japan at present is leading with bankruptcy. So far these are mild and they have not caused more than a few large failures, which have been absorbed. But if the illiquid debtors around the world run into a bad climate generally, many of them will have to defer payment, some of them will have to default payment. A certain amount of this can be handled. But if at the same time the depositors get scared of what is happening and begin to withdraw their funds, the banks will be left defenseless because, as previously stated, they simply do not have the money. It is in the hands of the illiquid debtors.

It goes on to say—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Table it.

Mr. Peters: It has been sent it to all members. The hon. member has not read it.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Peters: It goes on to talk about depletion at home. World farm prices are in bad shape in the United States. The European countries and Japan are politically bound to protect their farmers. This protection has the effect of reducing—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

An hon. Member: Table it.

Mr. Peters: I would be pleased to table it but the rules of the House do not permit it. I am sorry that so many hon. members do not know the rules of the House. I will continue to read it. Hon. members will be very interested to hear that if they were smart enough to read this and understand it, they could profit from it. Yes, even hon. members from the maritimes might be interested, members from that "social paradise" in Canada, the maritimes. As Myers' states:

Literally hundreds of thousands of pounds have been bought on credit—

This is certainly true of Canada.

—with the expectiation that the world would continue to go ahead in the 70's as it did in the 60's. But if this expectation proves to be wrong, these farmers will not be able to pay. Already they are crying for a debt moratorium, but who is to finance the moratorium?

The banks have lent them the money. But the money belongs to someone else who deposits in the bank. When that someone else demands his money, the banks will have to pay him, and so the farmers will have to pay the banks. If they do not, either the banks or the farmer will go bankrupt. If either of them go bankrupt first, then the original depositor will not be able to get his deposits out of the bank—and he will go bankrupt.

It's really not hard to accept this case for world deflation. To me, it's a much stronger one than the projections of inflation by most newsletters and the prognosticators. It could start at any time. It could start with default by foreign countries. It could start in Europe. It could start by withdrawals of large amounts of Arab money; and Japan—or even at home.

I know hon. members do not pay much attention to this, but let me read them the advice this gentleman gave. He went on to advise people who want to buy something that they buy gold. This commentary was published on February 10.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What does he advise us to buy?

Mr. Peters: Gold, that yellow stuff found in the ground which has been fairly stable in value in unstable times. Myers states:

Gold therefore stands on solid base around $170 to $175 as it moves toward its first important barrier, $185. But this barrier could quickly crumble in face of unpredictable events. Also, Carter's total deficit, disclosed and undisclosed, for 1978 and 1979 will be close to $160 billion. Worldwide awareness of this is reason for dollar's recent weakness and will push gold easily above $200, perhaps $250 this year in its march to unexpected new highs later on.

On February 10 the price of gold in Canada was $172 an ounce, but because of the instability of the government and banking institutions in Canada the price of gold last Friday, before the end of the month, stood at $203 an ounce. This means, for my friend from New Brunswick—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are three of them over there.

Mr. Peters: All my friends from New Brunswick, those four socialists from New Brunswick. If they had bought futures for a May delivery, it would not have cost them any money, if they had just learned to read and understand the system. If they wanted to buy futures—400 ounces is the minimum they could buy—they would have to make a deposit, but on $65,000 worth of gold it would not be a very large deposit. They would then be able to sell that gold at $203, thus making somewhat over $25 an ounce in round figures. That $25 an ounce for 400 ounces would mean slightly over $10,000 in profit. Even a socialist maritimer would not object to that kind of profit. Anyone who is smart enough to tell you how you can make $10,000 in two weeks on a small deposit should be worth listening to.

● (2052)

Our currency is in trouble. I raise this matter because the government is now going to the banks to borrow money. The government will borrow $2 billion. It has asked the United States or other foreign markets to supply us with another $2 billion. That is $4 billion. We probably still have $5 billion in foreign currency. If we start to put that out, thinking we will hold our Canadian dollar when we have a government which cannot even bring forward a new Bank Act, and when there are no plans for a new Bank Act or for the future, and if we think we can spend $100 million a day to raise the value of our dollar one quarter of a cent—and it will probably slip back at the end of the day—we will see how bankrupt this government is.

If the government were to put up the total amount, it might be able to hedge our dollar against the American dollar; but let us not forget that the American dollar is in very serious difficulty. The American dollar is not even worth 60 cents against the yen. Perhaps it is worth 65 cents against the French franc and about 68 cents against the Swiss franc, or vice versa. The American dollar is in a very serious position, and now we are going to put up whatever reserves we have to bolster our dollar when everyone knows that economically speaking this country has no government, no policy and no plan for a long-range solution to our economic problems.

There are advantages associated with our devalued dollar. If its value goes down to 60 cents American, I will be unhappy because my national pride will be hurt. However, we would sell tremendous amounts of lumber from northern Ontario because we would have a 40 per cent advantage over the United States. The Americans would shut down their mills and buy our lumber.

Mr. Lumley: Go back to the Bank Act.

Mr. Peters: My friend says I should go back to the Bank Act. This man speaks for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who cannot bring in a bill which is already nine years overdue.

We are not talking about the 1980s for the revision of the Bank Act. We are talking about the 1970s. This minister who cannot bring in a new Bank Act is going to give us some advice on currency and on the relationship between the banking industry and our economic problems. If he is, he should get cracking with some of the people at the Bank of Canada and other stupid financial institutions to whom he listens. He should be considering what would be to the best advantage of Canada.

I would not want to see the dollar go down to 60 cents American, but at 80 cents there would be a 20 per cent advantage. That would mean that even members of parliament would be cautious about going out of the country because it would cost too much. People would be making up our $4 billion tourism deficit here. They would be staying at home.

We would not be buying television sets from Japan, we would be making them. Perhaps those socialists from the maritimes should consider that. We have spent a lot of money on maritime socialists. We gave them a nationalized industry, Clairtone. We put DREE money into that.

Mr. Jones: And Bricklin.

Mr. Peters: We can talk about Bricklin too, it makes no difference. As long as the dollar stays at a 20 per cent advantage, investors would invest in Canada and there would be production in Canada. I suppose even rubber boots would be produced in Canada. We went out of that business years ago because we could not compete. With a 20 per cent advantage we could compete, and Clairtone could operate a television business, unless all its assets have been disposed of.

I have always said that a Canadian car should be produced. That could be done if we had a 20 per cent advantage. People would invest in Canada if they could get that kind of premium on their money. They would get high interest on that kind of high-risk money. They would not do too badly. We would see lots of money coming into this country. The banks would have to consider stopping money coming into the country. If they did not, we would be flooded with capital. In my opinion that would be detrimental because many branch plants would operate here and profits would be taken out of this country. There would be high profits because of high risks.

It seems to me that we should not just be revising the Bank Act. We should be looking at where we are going. I am sure the hon. member from Miramichi in the maritimes has gone to meetings in his area at which some dumb bunnies have asked him about the national debt.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, while I enjoy the hon. member's explanation of the financial situation in this country, which he obviously does not understand, I want to point out that I come from the riding of Northumberland-Miramichi and that there are no dumb bunnies in my riding.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, people must ask questions about the national debt in the hon. member's riding because they do in mine and in other parts of the country. When we have discussed the Bank Act in the 20 years I have been here we have never discussed the national debt, yet there are people in this country who believe that the national debt is something they owe, that perhaps we should turn our attention to it, that for this reason we should not have huge deficits to carry the financing of the nation but that perhaps we should be reducing them.

There may be some merit in discussing these matters, and they might be discussed even in the socialist maritimes. I am not above admitting I am no expert on this subject.

Mr. Woolliams: You could have fooled me.

Mr. Peters: I know a considerable amount about gold, but I do not know so much about the way the Liberal party finances the economy of the nation. I do know that we should have a serious discussion about it. I was very shocked a week or so ago, as I am sure the country was, that when the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) asked the Minister of Finance what he was going to do about the falling dollar, the minister flippantly said he was not going to do anything about it, that the dollar was fine and that everything was rosy.

Mr. Stevens: We were all shocked.

Mr. Peters: Then later the minister said we would spend an unlimited amount of money to bolster our dollar. I think it is time the minister discussed the intentions of the government. How is the government going to finance our dollar?

Our dollar is obviously not floating now. It is being bolstered by American currency. I suggest that we should know how much of that $5 billion reserve fund is going to be spent. We should know how much of the $2 billion which has been borrowed from Canadian banks and how much of the line of credit which has been arranged with foreign agencies will be spent. We should know that because I am sure that $200 million is not going to help. That is obvious because a number of years ago the government under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) tried it and spent a lot of money trying to maintain the Canadian dollar without pegging it.

● (2102)

Mr. Woolliams: Not as much as this government.

Mr. Peters: I am sure it was not as much as this government is going to spend because the international money market today is very pernickety. It is not sound in any country. The United States is trying to get Germany to peg the German mark and the Japanese the yen, but both countries are resisting because they do not want to price themselves out of world markets. I think we will be throwing a lot of money away, trying to keep reasonable limits on a dirty float of the Canadian dollar against United States currency.

The newspapers are full of declared bankruptcies, Mr. Speaker. They appear every day in the Montreal Gazette and in the Toronto newspapers, so Japan and other countries with which we do business are not the only ones with this trouble. If there is devaluation of our dollar I am sure my friends in the Social Credit party, who know quite a bit about international finance, would say it would be greatly to our advantage to retain the deposits which we now hold in foreign currency. It would be a good thing to have that in a time of need when it will be required if we are to carry on trade.

I am sure the Minister of Finance and the government are getting much advice on how to stabilize our dollar and whether we should continue to back our currency with the International Monetary Fund. They could ask the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) to advise them on the latest developments of the tri-lateral commission of which he is one of the chairmen. The object of this tri-lateral commission, set up by David Rockefeller, is to replace the International Monetary Fund, which they believe is going bankrupt. I think they would be interested in having a former minister of finance discuss Canada's role in that new agency.

Hon. members opposite laugh. They do not believe they should have any control over the banking institutions of this country. In the last four or five years some hon. members in this House have suggested that we should have more banks, and they will remember that I disagreed. Banks in this country do not operate in a free enterprise system. Sometimes they compete with trust companies, but they own the trust companies so it does not matter whether the trust company or the bank makes a loan because the bank will lend the money to the trust company anyway. There is very little competition in banking in this country. That goes for the International Development Bank as well, which I have not found to be a paragon of generosity when dealing with people who want to borrow money.

I am prepared to agree that banks should be nationalized and brought more under government control than at present, although most of them would maintain that they are well controlled now. That is partly true. There is no point, however, in allowing banks to build office towers like that one on Sparks Street. If I were in charge of that banking institution and had money stored there I would have the mirrors on the inside so that everything would be rosy, and then instead of there being one pile of money there would seem to be three piles!

The Bank Act should be changed and the whole banking structure of the country should be changed, Mr. Speaker, because there is no banking competition. If you want to borrow money and are turned down by one bank you will likely be turned down by another; and if you are turned down by two banks the Industrial Development Bank will not let you borrow money.

I do not propose that we should return to backing our currency with gold, but we should back it with something. There seems to be little reference to the gross national product as a means of backing money which is outstanding. We do not seem to be making an effort to reduce the national debt. We are living on a credit card just as individuals are being encouraged to do.

It is all very well for a bank to send me a letter outlining all the ways I can borrow money on my Chargex card and complaining that I have not used the card in the last three months. I suppose it is all right to use the credit card as long as there is money in the bank. But unless there is, I would be operating at a deficit. That may be necessary for me when I make a major purchase but it may not be an advantageous way for a nation to do business.

Someone who spoke earlier mentioned restrictions, and I should not be surprised to see some of them contained in a new budget, Mr. Speaker. We are borrowing money against the U.S. dollar in order to peg our dollar, but we have not done anything about the financial drain that is taking place in many areas. Some of this we can do something about and some we cannot, such as importing fruit and vegetables in winter. It may not be advisable for our tourists to spend $4 billion outside the country each year so controls may have to be put on travelling. I am sure some hon. members are not old enough to remember when that happened before, but it was since World Was II and travelers could only take about $200 out of the country. Such restrictions may have to be imposed again to help our balance of trade. That is the deciding factor in how other nations see us. How other nations see us is by their evaluation of our currency, and our dollar will reach that level of their support.

Again I tell those socialists in the maritimes to read Myers' report. He told us to buy gold. He told us not to buy certificates in South Africa because of the political climate there. His suggestion is to buy gold and nothing else. If the maritime socialists take his advice, they may find in that paradise that the sun may shine on them too.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the shifting of the financial centre of Canada to a most westerly position has occurred in Canada in spite of rather than because of the initiatives of this centralist government. It the government intended to pay more than lip service to the concept of regionalism that is being espoused across this land, they could have demonstrated it in this Bank Act. They could have demonstrated it in minor ways by making changes in the basic structure of the board of directors of the Bank of Canada. Perhaps they could have considered the reintroduction of bill C-7 which was brought forward in 1974.

The Bank of Canada is controlled by a governor, a senior deputy governor, two deputy governors and 12 directors appointed by the federal government for three year terms. The Bank of Canada is the most centralized of all the regulatory agencies in that it has no mechanism for regional accommodation at all. The Bank of Canada's macro-economic models are strictly national in scope and make no estimate of the bank's policy as it relates to the regions. Provincial officials have complained long and loud about the inadequate consultation between provincial governments and Bank of Canada officials.

If our government intends to review the banking legislation, it is not sufficient to receive briefs from and examine the chartered banks and near banks. The Bank of Canada's policies determine significantly the behaviour of all banking institutions. If regional aspirations are to be given the consideration they deserve, some day there should be direct appointments by provincial governments to the board of directors of the Bank of Canada.

If the Bank of Canada considers it cannot find 12 directors outside of central Canada who have the financial capacity to represent or express regional aspirations, or if they consider the rest of Canada is incompetent financially, or if they fear the provincial governments and do not want direct provincial government input or appointment, perhaps they could in their own representation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the hon. member correctly, he said that there were no members from British Columbia or western Canada serving on the board of the Bank of Canada. I think he should check the list of directors of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Wenman: I was suggesting to the House that there is no regional representation; that members chosen for directorship have in the past been and continue to be not regional in their recognition. I am suggesting a specific proposal, that the government recognize the provinces by allowing them to make some appointments to the board. If the government is afraid of the provinces and does not wish each province to recommend one appointment, then perhaps the government could choose five representatives. Or perhaps a system could be found which would, within the appointments of the federal government, recognize the regionality of Canada. This is not the situation currently and it should be.

Another matter which the government might have considered in its Bank Act revision legislation is permitting chartered banks to use provincial treasury bills as part of their secondary reserve requirements. There are several advantages to the proposal. It would lift what could be considered a monopolistic federal tax on chartered banks. The federal government's discriminatory action against the provinces in the secondary reserve requirements is typical of its lip service in recognizing regional rights and aspirations rather than do so on a realistic basis.

In 1974 after the infusion of a few more Conservative MP's from western Canada we thought the government had heard western Canada when it acceded to British Columbia's request for more regional autonomy by introducing a bill which would allow a 25 per cent equity position by a provincial government in regional chartered banks. That was three finance ministers ago.

Why did the government not accept this proposal? Was this window dressing tokenism? Or was it because the legislation that is currently being planned by the government was in fact the new socialist controlled system that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) muses about so loudly so often? Perhaps the hon. member who has just spoken was revealing some inside information and the government is going to restrict Canadian travel by restricting the amount of money we can take out of this country. Is that socialist policy government policy? I hope not. I hope they will make that matter clear before the next election.

Why did the government not bring forward the former bill C-7? Is it a stall to get the government past another election? Is it because the government does not want to accept the proposals presented to it or does not know what to do? Regardless of the excuse, it is inadequate. Instead it should be part of a substantial major economic package which would improve the sagging economy of this nation. The country cannot wait 12, 18 or 24 months for a new Bank Act or a new economic thrust. The country is tired of the election paralysis which has fallen over this parliament and Canada. It is time that the government did something concrete or called an election so we can get on with governing this nation.

This bill is one of the government's excuses for inaction. It is a further stall tactic. It means that on election day Canadians will choose a new government to bring in a new economic package which will include a new Bank Act and the provisions which are wanted and needed by Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, the white paper on the Canadian banking legislation published at the end of August 1976 would have the banks more competitive with credit unions, and other banking institutions. The members of the Social Credit Party of Canada believe that chartered banks at present are in a better position than other financial institutions in the country since they have the privilege to create money with a mere stroke of the pen.

A while ago I heard the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) say that he thought that the banks were sufficiently powerful, but chartered banks do not have control. They are self-controlled and they even control the members of this House as well as the government. They rule the roost. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-16 since it gives Canadians the opportunity to get acquainted with the operation of our monetary system. I have before me some statements on banking assets from 1967 to 1975. From October 30, 1967 to October 31, 1970 those assets increased by $6 billion; from 1971 to 1972, by $8 billion; and from 1973 to 1975, a record increase of $16 billion. I said "record", but I think they will beat that record this year. In June, I forecast that the chartered banks would make a net profit of $25 billion, but I foresee now that those will reach $26 billion this year.

Mr. Speaker, before the Bank Act was revised in 1957, the increases in bank assets varied between $2 and $3 billion a year. With regard to interest rates on loans to their clients, there was a 7 per cent ceiling from 1934 to 1944 and 6 per cent from 1944 to 1967. When the ceiling was removed in 1967, rates remained subject to a very complicated increase which depended more on the general trends in financial markets than on the public will or that of the government. Before 1967, when the Bank Act was revised, bank shares were set at a $10 par value. After 1967, that par value was lowered to $2, but worthy of note is the fact that those same $2 bring in from 50 to 80 per cent in dividends annually. Today, it is easy to see that despite their par value of $2, bank shares fluctuate between $14 and $45. On that par value of $2, banks pay a dividend that varies between 25 cents and 40 cents, about four times a year, that is from $1 to $1.60 a year on a par value of $2 depending on the market, profits and other appreciations of market values.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, all that is very complex for the non-initiated to the monetary, economic and political systems in Canada and the United States. But, before going any further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to go back somewhat to better situate us in the banking context. During the worst of the 1930-39 depression many economists, Canadian, American and even from around the world met in Canada to study the phenomenon of the economic depression, the worldwide stagnation and the lethargy of business.

It is as a reaction to the increasing misery in a great many countries of the world that the Bank of Canada came up with all these regulations governing chartered banks, the printing of money, interest rates, etc. For 22 years, specifically from 1934 to 1956, the Bank of Canada maintained a basic interest rate of 2 per cent which made it possible for it to survive through the difficult years of the depression, World War II, the post-war boom, and part of the inflation which accompanied this boom.

As I was saying a moment ago, the chartered banks were limited to a ceiling of 7 per cent on loans from 1934 to 1944. At the time of the decennial review, this rate was reduced to 6 per cent for the period from 1944 to 1967, when it was decided to lift the ceiling on interest rates, without saying that this was a way to fight inflation. We realize today that the result has been quite the opposite As a matter of fact, this may be the most inflationary period ever, together with record unemployment. In 1967, we celebrated the centennial of Confederation. On that occasion, Canadians paused to consider the road already covered. Well, they came to realize that over the past 100 years, our chartered banks had accumulated total assets of some $100 billion. You will note that from 1967 to 1973, those same banks have reached assets of $75 billion. In hardly seven years, they have more than doubled the assets they had reached after their 100 first years.

Thus it can be suggested that a good part of that extraordinary increase was due to the removal of the ceiling on interest rates which grew from 6 and 7 per cent up to 13.5 and 14 per cent those last few days. Today, when we consider the national product, we find that it amounts to $190 billion and yet the federal government managed to show deficits. Indeed, as recently as last week, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announced in the House of Commons that the estimated deficit would be roughly $8 billion. For this year, it is expected that it will go as high as $11 billion. Meanwhile, those who have the privilege to create credit, generally known as banks, were reporting net assets of $26 billion. Is that not cause for one to wonder? I think so.

If I may, I would like to quote from an article entitled "The Issues as I See Them," published in MacLean's of September 15, 1935. At that time, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King said the following, and I quote from the article which was translated from English into French:

> The Liberal Party thinks that credit is a public matter which does not concern bankers alone but which also affects directly the average citizen. The party is in favour of the immediate creation of a national central bank duly incorporated which would be responsible for rediscount and which would ensure the issuing of money according to public needs. A central bank is necessary on the one hand to determine the monetary reserve according to the national, social and industrial needs of the Canadian people, and on the other hand to deal with matters of international trade and exchange.
> As a national central bank has been created by the present government since the disclosure of the Liberal policy on this subject, I think it is necessary to stress here that the Bank of Canada as it now is is a far cry from the institution viewed by the Liberal Party. As have stated several of our prominent economists, the Bank of Canada follows a fascist model. It is in fact a private company which has the power to control the volume of money in the country. I must repeat what I have already told Parliament when protesting over the fact that government was relinquishing to a private institution the control of the country and the nation's money. Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and democracy is idle and futile. One of the Liberal Party's main objective will be to return to the nation what it lost, and to establish a duly constituted national central bank.

Mr. Speaker, 44 years later, we are hanging from the cliff. The unemployment rate is at a record high. Our dollar is not worth what it used to, and is continuing to decline. Inflation is hitting us on all sides, and so on, and so forth.

I would like to quote from a newspaper article by Louis-Philippe Roy that appeared on August 17, 1939:

> Here is an unsolved mystery: Where does money come from? Years go by and the depression continues. It was supposed to last three, five years at the most, but it has been with us for 10 years and real prosperity is nowhere in sight yet. Why does depression last so long? Why so much unrelenting unemployment? Why such famine in the midst of plenty? The present depression has a feature that is unique in history: millions of human beings live in misery while in many countries wealth is destroyed: milk is sent down the drain, coffee is burned, farmers are paid to reduce production. And in this country of ours, there is no lack of wealth, nor transportation to distribute it. We have an industrial work force that is rusting at idle and transport corridors often devoid of traffic.
> If Providence has been generous to us, if goods are everywhere, if the soil waits but for man's work to yield its riches, the cause of this depression certainly is not the poverty of our Canadian land.
>
> Is it that production is not well run? No. Manufacturers, just as farmers could produce more if their products were to move.
> Ask mothers why there is nothing on their tables. Ask fathers why they are getting hungry. Ask children why they are getting skinny. Ask merchants why their business is not thriving. Ask professionals why they do so much work on credit. Everyone's answer will be: because there is no money!
>
> No money! This is what people in government say to those asking for help, industrialists to those asking for work, consumers to businessmen asking for orders, businessmen to wholesalers. The same answer everyone gives everyone else!

No money? Billions and billions are spent on means of destruction. To prepare for the great kill there is all the money needed. War industries are working at capacity.

So there is money!

Would it be that its role is to prepare man's destruction? However it would seem that money was invented to provide for trade in produce and manufactured products, and also the sale of services.

If the world is suffering, it is not because for the most part trade is paralyzed? Then money is not fulfilling its normal function?

Who is to blame?

Certainly not the Lord. Neither is Nature, because money can exist independently from seasons and weather; it is immune to draught and grasshoppers. Its manufacture is limited to the availability of gold, they say, a big joke.

● (2132)

During the 1914-18 war there was little gold available and a great deal of money. The United States have piles of gold and yet 13 million unemployed cannot earn money. Never has Canada witnessed such a production of gold these years and look at the results. Must the government be blamed for it? I believe so because government, Mr. Speaker, seems to be powerless or paralyzed in the face of unemployment, inflation and all those who tell it what to do. Yet let us not forget that our governments are as poor as the individual; municipal governments, provincial governments, the federal government have only the money we pay them in taxes. They are the ones who borrow from banks, yes. The public administration which gives banks the power to make money has to ask the bank and pay large interests to obtain credit to administer the country and give the unemployed something to eat. Money, currency, credit, is that the same thing? To what principle are they subject in the manufacture of money, the issuance of currency, the distribution of credit? What do they demand in return and why? So many questions without answers in our school books. Yet the problem seems crucial at this time. Why that mystery about the origin of money? Is it not high time to put an end to that mystery? It is high time to scrutinize this problem of money which seems to be one of the causes of the present economic slump because it is true that current conditions of social economic life are such that a very considerable number of men are finding it most difficult to earn their bread.

So, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to try and help the population lift the veil of mystery over the origin of money. How does book money start? It starts, of course, when a credit is registered in a bank book without reducing anything elsewhere. Book money does not start when I deposit $10 at myh bank or my caisse populaire. It does not start because that account is opened by a reduction in my pocket money. It is a simple conversion of pocket money into book money. Book money does not start either when the car dealer sees his account increase by $2,000 after he sells a car. That increase of $2,000 in his account is the result of a decrease of $2,000 in mine. But book money is accumulated when a sum is deposited in an account without reducing another's account or emptying another's pockets.

Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker, using, of course, a fictitious name. Mr. Jones, a manufacturer, wants to extend his factory. He does not have the money to pay for materials, labour and equipment. With $100,000, he could carry out his plans; later, with an increased production and sales, he could easily pay back the money. He then goes to his banker who agress to lend him the money, against the security given by Mr. Jones. How is the loan worked out? The banker gives to Mr. Jones what is called a discount cheque worth $100,000. M. Jones goes to the cashier. As he is not interested in carrying such a sum, he simply deposits th cheque which is credited by the cashier to his account. All Mr. Jones has to do now is to make out cheques whenever he needs to pay for materials, labour or equipment.

[Mr. Allard.]

When Mr. Toupin leaves the bank, he has a credit account of $100,000. No other account was debited, not one cent or one dollar has left one pocket or one drawer. Everyone has exactly the same amount on their account or on the books as before, but Mr. Toupin has $100,000 more. There are $100,000 more in the country in the account of Mr. Toupin. This is not an account from savings, from money that already existed and that was saved, this is a borrowing account from new money born from the decision of the banker, from a simple pen stroke and an entry in a credit account. This is where and how money comes into being: in a bank through a loan in the form of credit, but also in the form of a debt to be repaid with interest.

About one tenth of the cheques made by Mr. Toupin to pay his bills will be cashed in at the bank against coins or paper money; the other nine tenths will simply be deposited and will simply transfer the amount from the new credit of Mr. Toupin to the credit of other people. This is the result of present trade practices and the banker is well aware of it. He can easily loan against security ten times as much money as he has in reserve; he is the only one who can do this, no private moneylender has this magic wand. And the banker is authorized by his charter to do this. The Canadian legislation even allows him to loan up to 20 times the amount of his reserve. This is the money-making system established by the banks and legalized by our government.

I would add that the government itself when it needs more money than it can immediately levy through taxes also goes to the banks. It borrows in exactly the same manner as Mr. Toupin, but it gives as security the future taxes that it will collect from Canadian citizens. The government also promises to repay with interest and becomes a debtor of the bank to which it has delegated an absolute power, that of creating the currency of the country. The banker makes money, but we should note that he does not do so for himself, he does it for the borrower. Moreover, the banker is not giving this money away, he loans it, and this money is not put into circulation forever. The borrower must repay it within a certain time.

In the case of Mr. Toupin, what will happen of course is this: The banker will first withdraw from the account of Mr. Toupin the amount of the interest; if the loan is for one year at 7 per cent, the interest is $7,000. The banker will subtract $7,000 from the credit of Mr. Toupin and transfer it to the credit of the bank in the interest account. So, Mr. Toupin will have only $93,000 to his credit. When he starts paying his bills or his employees, using a cheque, progressively Mr. Toupin will circulate those $93,000, but he must consider he has to pay his loan back within a year. Therefore Mr. Toupin is going to sell his products and make enough profit to earn $100,000 within a year to pay back the bank in one shot or every month according to the terms of the contract. Mr. Toupin invested $93,000 and extracted $100,000 from the public; that is the way he will generate that money.

As Mr. Toupin repays the bank, it will credit the discount which was charged when the $100,000 were generated. And when the $100,000 will be entirely paid back, the discount account will balance and that will be the end. Figure money, bookkeeping money will die at the same place where it was born. No new money will be created and put in circulation and in the same way, by creating the same debt, the consumer must pay that debt through the purchases he makes. As far as government is concerned, it is exactly the same thing except the taxpayer rather than the consumer has to foot the bill. However, until now the government does not pay back money but it defers maturity by issuing new bonds sometimes with a lower interest rate. That is why the national debt of all industrialized countries will never be settled but will increase instead as they have to borrow again for new projects. And that is why taxpayers must pay hundreds of millions every year to service national debts. As we can see, money is made by people with a stroke of the pen. Money is not eternal; it is destroyed by the same people who made it according to the terms of the birth certificate.

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on entering the debate on Bill C-16, which represents the second extension this government has asked this parliament to endorse in respect of the existing Bank Act in Canada, it is wise that we first take some cognizance of how the banking industry now stands in Canada, and how the near-banks, including the credit unions, trust companies, loan companies and finance companies, stand in relation to our chartered banks. Before we go further in considering whether this extension should be granted, I think it would be wise if we got a better perspective of why, on the last day of February, we are considering another extension to the Bank Act, which should have been extended as of June 30 last year.

I would suggest we have in this legislation before us tonight a very vivid example of the ineptness of this government over the past few years. There may be things that sneak up on this government or that surprise the government, and would perhaps surprise any government, but surely the one thing that any government in power in Canada could have anticipated was the revision of our Bank Act in 1977. It was a 10-year Bank Act, and on June 30 everybody knew that, unless it was further extended for another ten years, or extended as the government chose to do on March 31 of this year, the business of banks in this country would literally disintegrate. There would be no banks. Their constitution, which is the Bank Act, would no longer be in existence. Although the government was well aware of that fact, it chose not to take the necessary action to see to it that we did have a 10-year review of our banking situation and then a proper Bank Act introduced and passed in this House by the first deadline.

Having said that, I suggest we in this country missed a tremendous opportunity, an opportunity that may well have relieved some of the anxiety we now feel in respect of our crippled dollar. I suggest this because one of the things we have done well in this country is banking. We have healthy and strong banks which, unlike some of our industries, are able to be competitive with the largest banks in the world. I suggest there is a matter of reciprocity involved. We have been active in our banks. Our banks have been very successful in the United Kingdom, the United States and in other countries. They have brought back huge profits to this country as a result of their activities. As a matter of fact, at the present time our Canadian chartered banks have approximately $100 billion in domestic assets and $50 billion in foreign assets. In short, one-third of our total banking industry today is active around the world, doing what I would suggest we in Canada must try to get more industries doing; that is, making the world their oyster. In truth we are a tremendous international banking country, and that is a credit to us in Canada.

There is a certain feeling of reciprocity involved. If you choose to do business in another country—and I refer to banking activity—it is only natural that that country will expect to do some business in your country in return. There are many banks that are anxious to do business in Canada. They feel they can contribute in the sense of making Montreal, Vancouver or Toronto significant financial centres if given the right to participate in these markets.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about Winnipeg?

Mr. Stevens: This is known to the government and it has been known for years. In fact, the interest shown by these banks is such that it is estimated that in Canada there may be as many as 60 foreign banks carrying out some type of operation already, in the sense that they have agencies or representative offices here or, as some classify it, suitcase type operations. Some 60 foreign banks are active in Canada in the sense that they are waiting to get the nod to become active participants in our banking community if the Bank Act so permits.

Let me be more specific. In Toronto it is estimated there may be over 40 foreign banks presently maintaining offices, certainly as lookouts, listening posts or as training stations, as some describe them, but, in any case, indirectly carrying on active banking business. In the Commerce Court in Toronto there are 26 foreign banks which maintain offices of a banking nature. According to the Bank Act, it is an offence to use the title "bank" unless the bank is one of the scheduled banks to the act. I invite any hon. member to go through Commerce Court and see the number of banks which probably display their signs in that complex. Presumably there has been absolutely no criticism from Ottawa.

Let there be no doubt: I am saying that this is doubly wrong. If the Bank Act indicates that the title "bank" should not be used with respect to financial activities unless the bank is a chartered bank under that act, that is the law and it should be enforced. The government is wrong to allow this encroachment to take place with virtually no regulation.

On the other hand, it is totally wrong for the government not to realize this interest on the part of foreign banks. They give them lip service and encouragement through the white paper, which has been referred to in this debate, but they then let these banks sit in limbo. I know of at least 40 banks which opened offices over 2½ years ago in anticipation of this Bank Act being passed and putting them in a position of carrying on active banking activities. I am referring to banks such as the Deutsche Bank which has assets of $44 billion. It has an office in Toronto. It is awaiting an opportunity to do business. Perhaps it is indirectly doing some business at the present time. There is also the Dai-Ichi Kangyo Bank of Japan. It has $43 billion in assets. Also it is waiting to do business. There is the Banco do Brasil which has $39 billion in assets and is waiting. Also the Crédit Lyonnais, the Fuji Bank, the Société Générale, the Dresdner Bank, the Mitsubishi Bank, the Sanwa Bank, the Barclays Bank, the Bank of Tokyo and the Industrial Bank of Japan are waiting to do business. In the sense of maintaining offices, they are actively waiting to get into our banking system. They feel Canada can be made into an international banking community, yet they have not received the satisfaction of a proper regulation in the sense of having a Bank Act passed in Canada which will permit them to legalize their activities.

The reason I referred to that list is that it is interesting to note that every one of those banks has larger assets than our largest bank, the Royal Bank of Canada. The 50 largest banks listed in the Fortune list of the largest banks outside of the United States have total assets amounting to $1,287 billion. When one considers the potential which exists for Canada if those banks are encouraged to become participants in the Canadian banking community, and adds to that the participants from the United States, it is just great.

Mr. Gillespie: What about the Western Bank?

Mr. Paproski: The hon. minister should stop making noises.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has the floor.

Mr. Stevens: I have not heard the hon. minister speak so loudly in the House for weeks.

Mr. Gillespie: Perhaps you have not been in the House.

Mr. Stevens: I wish the hon. minister would listen to what I am saying.

Mr. Gillespie: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Stevens.]

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for York-Simcoe has the floor for the purpose of making a speech. I suggest hon. members listen.

Mr. Gillespie: How are the deposits in the Western Bank now?

Mr. Stevens: I would have thought the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) would be tracking down a few of the payoffs which have occurred in the Crown corporations that he is responsible for.

Mr. Paproski: That shameful minister!

Mr. Gillespie: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps the hon. member should do that, instead of talking about something he does not have one tittle of knowledge about.

There is an opportunity in Canada, if the Bank Act is revised to permit international banking activities in Canada under proper regulation. That opportunity should not be missed. It is most unfortunate the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) and the Hon. John Turner have systematically postponed the revision to the Bank Act. I will go through the sequence of how they did that tomorrow. It is unfortunate that on the eve of the first extension to the Bank Act there is a request for a further one-year extension from the end of March. That is the first point I should like to make.

Mr. Gillespie: What is your second point?

Mr. Paproski: I think the hon. minister should listen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for York-Simcoe has the floor.

Mr. Stevens: I have patience for the minister. Obviously the stress and strain of his office on his weak mind is showing tonight.

International banks are interested in doing business in Canada. If we get on with revising the Bank Act properly, they can be regulated. I could be an asset to Canada. We must not forget that Canadian banks have been active in foreign countries of the world, and that is what this banking reciprocity is all about. One of the objectives in the revision of the Bank Act will be to ensure that the competitive position which has been built up by our banks around the world is maintained. Since Canadian banks are allowed to do business in some foreign countries, those countries should have some right to do business in Canada, thus maintaining our competitive position.

May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—PROTECTION OF LINGUISTIC RIGHTS OF MINORITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, following the ruling by the Quebec Superior Court as to the constitutionality of some sections of Bill 101 concerning the language used in legislation and the administration of justice, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he intended to make further representations to all provincial premiers urging them to formally support the linguistic rights of minorities. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I refer to the linguistic rights of the French minorities outside the province of Quebec and the English minority in Quebec.

In fact, all governments should make every effort to guarantee to all Canadians, wherever they live in Canada, the right to be served in the official language of their choice in the fields of justice, legislation, administration and education.

In his reply, the Prime Minister told me that in September, he had asked all premiers not only to protect the rights of minorities in the education system, but also to include this protection in the Constitution by means of a constitutional amendment. Since my question did not refer only to linguistic rights in education, I take this opportunity to clearly state my views on this issue of great current interest, namely the basic human rights in a new Canada based on respect and tolerance and built on equality, justice and understanding. The only way for the federal government and the provinces to ensure that basic justice will be to agree on an amendment formula safeguarding linguistic rights.

Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed with the compromise that came out of the premiers' conference held in Montreal last week. After having asserted the right of every child of the English or French minority to be educated in his language, they managed to restrict this right under a second principle which leaves it to the discretion of the provinces to grant that right or not.

I would like to quote these two principles from Le Devoir of February 24, 1978. The first one says:

> All children belonging to the French-speaking or English-speaking minority in every province have the right to be educated in their language in elementary and secondary schools where the number of students warrants the establishment of such schools.

The second principle is as follows:

> It is agreed, in view of the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial governments over education and of the important cultural and demographic differences, that each province is free to decide how the provisions preceding paragraph shall be applied.

The provinces, Mr. Speaker, have surrendered before the challenge of language equality in the educational field across Canada. I think they have rejected the only valuable guarantee, the constitutional amendment formula ensuring for ever these rights in the field of education.

After the St. Andrews conference which was held last year and where the bargaining between the provinces embarrassed them, the Montreal conference has now put them to sleep for ever. The agreements of reciprocity proposed by Mr. Lévesque were in fact quite embarrassing after 110 years of inequality in the field of educational rights in all the other provinces of Canada.

Last week we heard the provincial premiers say that for some time yet things will remain more or less like they are now. I said for some time, Mr. Speaker, for I feel that very shortly those premiers will have to make up their mind about the Canadian reality. They will have to understand that the English-speaking minority in Quebec and the French-speaking minority outside Quebec must not be treated like pawns in interprovincial bargainings, but that most Canadians are ever more anxious to see that every Canadian citizen be given the consitutional right to receive his education in the official language of his choice.

The federal government has given its support and will certainly continue to support all great efforts in the field of education in all provinces. I am glad to see that the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) is here tonight. I know he has undertaken negotiations to reach agreements with regard to the continuation of programs carried on by his ministry to support the education of official language minority groups and the teaching of the second language. I also know the great needs of groups and the need for additional funds for education. On the other hand, I am convinced that the provinces should be publicly answerable for the way they spend those funds.

In view of the two statements that I have read, Mr. Speaker, from the Montreal conference, I think it is urgent for the government to review entirely its financial contribution to the program relating to the minority language in every provincial jurisdiction. The federal government has no other choice. It must fill the abyss of iniquity the premiers have left open. I also feel it is imperative to change the rules of the game so that from now on the federal government can obtain tangible results for every single dollar invested for the teaching of minority school rights.

● (2207)

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has indeed raised an important issue and I think he is right in emphasizing the importance of the issue of educational rights. Just like him, I was rather disappointed by the statements made by the premiers last week, because, Mr. Speaker, as he himself indicated, the premiers declaration can be interpreted as an acceptance of the principle of education in the two official languages without any commitment to its implementation. This second principle can be interpreted—and I believe that is the Quebec premier's interpretation—as a supporting bill 101 in the province of Quebec, which, I am sure, is not all in keeping with the views of the premiers of the other provinces.

So just like the hon. member, I am somewhat puzzled by the interpretation which should be given to that statement, and I think like him, that it demonstrates the importance of writing the linguistic rights to education in the official languages into the Constitution, which happen to be the aim of this government. Last September, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) raised that issue with the premiers and I myself did likewise last November, in discussions I had with the ministers of education. I again raised it also in connection with the charter of linguistic rights of minorities. Just before Christmas, we stressed the importance given at the federal level to the idea that the provinces will agree to exceptions to these very important rights.

As the hon. member already pointed out, there are federal agreements with the provinces for the financial support of second language education and also, what is very important, the education of the minority groups. Since I became Secretary of State, I have been concerned with the implementation of these agreements, because the objectives as well as the criteria are not clearly specified, which makes for an inadequate assessment and accountability of these programs.

I believe that the hon. member has often emphasized, and other members as well, the importance of earmarking during the negotiations the funds to be transferred to the provinces under a formula designed to meet the objectives established in the programs. That is why in the course of my negotiations with the provinces, I hope that we will succeed in specifying certain points especially with regard to the minority language. The hon. member has described a formula, a program, a means to ensure that the moneys used to attain these objectives will actually be used for that purpose. It is not only a mere transfer in principle, a theory calling for the funds to be used for the implementation of just about any objective. The fundamental objectives of these programs means that some kind of support of the minority language education must really be achieved.

These are the negotiations under way. I hope to meet again with the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada in the near future. We will have to negotiate in the hope of reaching before March 1979 a new agreement to last for a period of five years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. minister that his allotted time has expired.

POWER—NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN POWER PROJECTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on February 21 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) a question about the Gull Island project. On February 13 to 15 the first ministers of Canada had their great conference. The conference of the "Great Poohbahs" was held in Ottawa. The first ministers' caper was performed before the Canadian public on television. At that conference two specific things in the energy field were promised to the people of Canada. One was that the Gull Island project in Labrador would go ahead; the other was a project in Saskatchewan. The communiqué from the conference was a laugh: it listed another 12 projects that were to be considered for action soon.

That announcement aroused expectations that at last the federal government was moving on a project that had been put before them first in March, 1974. When we got a chance to look at the release issued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the premier of Newfoundland, we found that the Gull Island project was not going into full gear immediately but that a corporation was to be set up by the province and the federal government. Further studies were to be done to see whether that or any other project of Labrador, hydro might be economically and technically justifiable.

What nonsense, Mr. Speaker! These studies were done three years ago and the proposal has been before the federal government for two years and five months. The great action to come out of this conference was "further studies". One of the main features of the conference was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources performing the greatest bubble act since the south sea bubble of the eighteenth century. Rumours swept the country that he was going to create one million jobs in energy projects. He went on television with his list of some 40 projects to create a million jobs which would put the one million unemployed to work immediately.

One of those projects was the Kitimat oil port and pipeline which was kiboshed several days ago. That shows the transparent dishonesty of that exercise. Another was the Gull Island hydro development and transmission line. The gullible are no longer going to gulp Gillespie. They did not believe this, and it was a lucky thing they did not because there was not an ounce of truth in the whole performance. The Gull Island project is not going ahead, nor are the other 40 projects that were listed. Indeed, some were already started. It was a shocking, transparent attempt to convince people that the government were doing something in the areas of employment and energy, when actually they were not.

The Gull Island project was first proposed to the government in March, 1974. It was a $2.3 billion project to develop 1800 megawatts of hydro power resources on the Lower Churchill River, with a transmission line to the Strait of Belle Isle and a tunnel under the straits to Newfoundland. Newfoundland has no further sources of major hydro power on the island and is now at the mercy of oil-fired, steam-generated electricity which is very expensive. This project would save importing oil to Newfoundland to be converted to power. It is in the national interest as well as in the provincial interest.

There would be a surplus of power from that development which Newfoundland could not use for ten or fifteen years, which potentially could be sold to Quebec or some other purchaser if Quebec would allow it to be transmitted across the province to customers in the maritimes. The federal government's offer of assistance was much too small. They offered to lend one half of the cost of the transmission line to the project and would allow interest to be capitalized during construction and some other things that would total $343 million out of this $2.3 billion project.

In addition to the paucity of assistance offered by the federal government, the government of Quebec would not agree to buy the surplus power from Newfoundland at a reasonable price, nor allow Newfoundland to transmit it across their territory to other customers. They said, "Sell to us at the price we say, or do not sell at all." And this great Canadian government did nothing about it. They did not offer to use their powers under the BNA Act, section 92(10), to declare a transmission line across Quebec to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. If they had, Quebec could no longer blackmail Newfoundland and prevent the Gull Island project. But the government said that they would not interfere.

But now, with an election coming, on February 15, during a television program, they pretended the Gull Island program is now going ahead. When we look beneath the surface we find nothing but weasel words about further studies, that the federal government is taking equity in a company, and so on. This was the most dishonest television program ever seen in the history of television. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should have been given an enema award instead of an Emmy award.

On February 20 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), in an interview he gave to the Evening Telegram, stated it was a question of how much money can be generated out of the power in Labrador in order to develop power on the island in a less expensive way if possible. In other words, what the minister is suggesting is perhaps they will not divert to Newfoundland any hydro energy generated in Labrador. We will not do that if Labrador power can be sold outside Labrador, and then use the profits to subsidize power on the island of Newfoundland. That is the suggestion made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

He went on to say that there is now a re-examination under way of whether or not there has to be a tunnel at all to carry the power from Labrador under the Strait of Belle Isle to Newfoundland. He went on to say he does not think financing will be a problem. Once it is determined where the markets are, where the power is going, "then the financing will flow", he said. What is going to flow from now until the election is over is the Secretary of State for External Affairs: he will flow. The financing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is always a treat for us on this side to listen to the empty polemics of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He has developed a well earned reputation as perhaps one of the noisiest, one of the most boisterous and at times one of the more innovative speakers in this House. He is not a man who has developed a reputation for accuracy, but that is not something that disturbs him. He is interested in projecting a sense of aggressiveness. Indeed, whenever it comes to the question of advancing energy projects, we on this side of the House think that he is far more interested in projecting his own advance, not advancing energy projects in his own province. That has been clear from the beginning.

I remember when he was a minister in the government of Newfoundland, a government which he is now criticizing and which he left because he felt he could advance himself more propitiously in the federal House. I remember that he and his government at that time could not make up their minds whether they wanted to go ahead with the Gull Island project. They had not been successful in getting the province of Quebec to agree to terms they had put forward. When we talked to them about the Gull Island project, an important national asset which we wanted to see advanced, they said "We are not quite ready because we cannot make up our minds whether to go ahead with this now or wait until there has been a settlement in the courts with Quebec".

It is interesting that the premier of Newfoundland has now reached agreement with us on the establishment of a corporation. Now that the premier has lost the counsel, advice and temerity, but not the noise, of the hon. member, he has said yes, he would like to form a corporation with us; he would like the federal government as equity partners. The federal government has said it would like to go ahead on that basis and that a corporation would be the logical first step in moving this massive project forward. The federal government has said that the corporation should be the agent for marketing that power, for assessing the financing of that project and working out plans for constructing and managing it. The hon. member is mostly noise, but those of us on this side of the House have become used to it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—CANADIAN RAILROAD WORKERS EMPLOYED BY UNITED STATES RAILROADS—ENTITLEMENT TO BENEFITS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on February 13 I asked a question of the minister responsible for unemployment insurance regarding the circumstances of Canadian railroad workers employed by United States railroads who work in Canada. The minister at that time was unable to respond to my question. I certainly accept the fact that every minister cannot have every answer at the tip of his tongue. However, he then provided me with a follow-up letter which gives me cause for further concern.

It should be noted at the outset that this matter was brought to my attention by a railroad worker in my constituency and only affects seven railroad workers within Kootenay West. They work for the Burlington Northern Railway. These are Canadians working in Canada but subject to U.S. benefits only. If you examine the system across Canada as I have, Mr. Speaker you find there are some 12 U.S. railroads operating in Canada employing some 1,000 Canadian workers.

In responding to the concern that I have regarding the fact that these employees receive U.S. unemployment insurance benefits and not Canadian benefits, and that there are some serious questions that have to be asked about their pension benefits, the minister stated, to quote from his letter:

> The United States Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act predates Canadian unemployment insurance legislation. It was designed specifically to take into account the peculiarities of employment by U.S. railroads. For example, benefits may be paid to workers while legally on strike. Also, the R.R. U.I. Act paid benefits in the event of sickness before sickness benefit was allowed under Canadian U.I.

I accept that Mr. Speaker, but that is in the past. In fact, it is some time in the past and fails to deal with the present. It is the present that I and the railroad workers are concerned about. It is all very well to refer back to 1971 and some Canada-U.S. agreement, but this is 1978, some seven years later, with some very substantial changes in our social system, unemployment insurance benefits and pension plan.

The minister went on to say that the benefit rate under railroad unemployment insurance is 60 per cent of wages up to a maximum of $125 per week, and that this is less than the present maximum of $160 per week under Canadian unemployment insurance benefits. I heartily agree.

He then draws in a red herring dealing with the period of time American workers are covered for sickness benefits compared to Canadian workers. Our period of 16 weeks is realistic. The United States seems to believe that 26 weeks is realistic. That is beside the point. The fact remains that the benefits are totally different in the United States. They receive 60 per cent of wages up to a maximum of $125 per week, whereas we receive $160 per week under Canadian unemployment insurance benefits. The minister went on to say:

> To bring the railway workers now covered by U.S. R.R. U.I. into the Canadian U.I. program could adversely affect those workers. Where, for example, they work partly in the U.S.A. and partly in Canada, only their earnings from employment in Canada could be taken into account in determining the benefit rate. This could have a a depressing effect on the benefit rate.

That is another red herring. I am sure the minister has absolutely no knowledge of how many railroad workers work for American companies in Canada. I am sure he has absolutely no knowledge of how many work on both sides of the U.S. border. I can say there are very few. Therefore, that particular argument carries no weight whatsoever. Finally, the minister says:

● (2227)

> Finally, it might be pointed out that for the above mentioned reasons the United States R.R. U.I. Act was specifically excepted from the U.S.-Canada reciprocal agreement on unemployment insurance.

That was in 1971 and bears no relationship to the situation today.

I should like to make a quick comparison of the pay benefits. Under the CN system the termination benefits are as follows. Up to one year, the contribution is refunded. From zero to 15 years the contribution is refunded with interest. The CP system provides that from zero to five years the contribution is refunded, and from five to 15 years, it is refunded with interest.

In the United States, if an employee has put in ten years he can obtain those benefits; but in the case of a Canadian worker employed for less than ten years those benefits go back to the estate of the railroad worker. Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of railway workers in Canada today who have no idea the pension benefits will accrue to their estates. In effect, they are being denied those benefits.

I object to the present system and I intend to do everything I can to bring about a change through a private member's bill so that Canadian workers receive the Canadian benefits due to them, rather than the lesser U.S. benefits.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of making a reply this evening on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). It appears to me the minister has already conveyed to the hon. member a great deal of the information which is on hand.

First, it is important that I put the issue into its proper perspective. The United States railroad unemployment insurance act covers only those employees who work for U.S. railroads. It was created as a U.S. federal act, as opposed to individual state unemployment insurance legislation, in order to ensure that employees working for railroads in the U.S. had adequate coverage even though they work in several states or Canada throughout the course of a year.

Canada has a reciprocal agreement with 50 of the states and several U.S. territories in order to ensure satisfactory administration of payment of unemployment insurance benefits from respective programs and to guard against duplication of coverage. This reciprocal agreement explicitly excludes those covered under the U.S. railroad unemployment insurance act for that reason. Also, Mr. Speaker, the R.R. U.I. act paid benefits in the event of sickness before sickness benefit was allowed under the Canadian Unemployment Insurance Act. The benefit rate under R.R. U.I. is 60 per cent of wages up to a maximum of $125 per week, but these payments are not taxable under U.S. law. This may be slightly less than the present maximum of the taxable $160 per week under Canadian Unemployment Insurance, depending on the income tax position of the recipient. However, benefit duration both for sickness and shortage of work is 26 weeks, with the possibility of a further 26 weeks of extended benefit under U.S. law. It is noteworthy that Canadian unemployment insurance benefit for sickness is limited to 15 weeks. I think that is an important point.

To bring railway workers now covered by U.S. R.R. U.I. into the Canadian program could adversely affect those workers. Where, for example, they work partly in the U.S.A. and partly in Canada, only their earnings from employment in Canada could be taken into account in determining the benefit rate and duration. This could have a depressing effect on the benefit rate and might in some cases result in individuals failing to qualify for benefits under either U.S. railroad or Canadian law.

For the foregoing reasons, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we should undertake to change the existing reciprocal arrangements. The potential good that might result for a few individuals would be far outweighed by the harm that would be caused to the majority who work for U.S. railroads in Canada.

Finally, I can assure the hon. member that I will be glad to see that his additional points are drawn to the attention of the minister. Coming from a border constituency, as I do, I have a large number of railway workers in my riding who work on Canadian engines and trains travelling in the United States as well as a great many who work for United States railroads coming into Canada. I am quite prepared, as I say, to draw his additional comments to the minister's attention.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTEST AGAINST SOVIET TREATMENT OF CERTAIN NATIONALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the over 30 years that the peoples of Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania have been victims of Soviet imperialism. In view of the fact, despite the rhetoric of detente, that hundreds of thousands of individuals are today the victims of Soviet political concentration camps, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House condemns Soviet aggression and, further, that this House supports the legitimate aspirations of the Latvian, Estonian and Lithuanian peoples for the freedoms which ought to be the birthright of every human being.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER REFRAIN FROM MAKING STATEMENTS ON SEPARATISM, ETC.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the Prime Minister's recent declarations that the opening of mail caused the apprehension of a terrorist, and his further assurances in respect of the bugging of offices of members of parliament during his term of office are, to put it charitably, now open to question, and keeping in mind that on various occasions he has assured the country that separatism is dead, unemployment licked and inflation wrestled to the ground, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Prime Minister refrain from any further predictions or assurances and continues the only role at which he seems to have any success—as chief Liberal "snollygoster".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding a specific and important matter. The Minister of Finance, in Montreal in a speech to the Canadian Club, stated: "The fundamental news at this time, of course, is that Canada's economic recovery is gaining momentum". He also said: "Economic growth in the fourth quarter of 1977 was at or above the long-term potential rate for the economy". Finally, he said: "The outlook for investment is improving". The Statistics Canada report issued on Friday, and the one yesterday, contradict everything the minister said. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

In view of the fact that the minister's department received this information from Statistics Canada well before he gave his speech in Montreal, that this House of Commons condemns the Minister of Finance for his deliberately misleading and erroneous statements on the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRADE

REQUESTED INCREASE IN TARIFFS ON TEXTILES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of utmost importance and urgency.

Since the textile industry in Canada is in a very delicate situation due to lack of strict controls over imports, and since this forces companies to cut down considerably on production, which leads to many workers being laid off, especially in the province of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the House recommend that the import tariffs be increased in order at least to save what is left of this important industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

CIRCULATION OF ALLEGED LIBELLOUS DOCUMENT DURING LIBERAL CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns a document which was circulated by the Liberal party at its recent convention, misrepresenting the achievements of the Minister of Transport, among others. For example, this document describes the minister as a "road" scholar—that is spelled r-o-a-d—when it is well known that his special field is really government jet transport. Also, the document depicts the minister's brother-in-law as smiling, when he stated in the Canadian Magazine that he had not smiled for seven years. Goodness knows, he had no reason to. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the minister make a statement on motions as to whether he will follow his past practice of personal and legal action to prevent the publication of this apparently libellous tract in the province of Saskatchewan against Liberal candidates in that province who have either worked for or are related to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT PRACTICES WHICH BREACH PRIVACY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cossitt: —with regard to statements made by the attorney general of Ontario indicating that the RCMP obtained illegally confidential psychiatric information on individuals from the Ontario Health Insurance Plan, and that the RCMP were acting under direct orders of the federal government, made by certain federal departments. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

That the House condemns this serious invasion of privacy for which the ultimate blame rests with the government, and not the RCMP who were acting under deplorable government orders; that the Prime Minister order the Solicitor General to immediately release the names of the government departments and any cabinet ministers involved and what steps are being taken to prevent any recurrence of such incidents; and, finally, whether or not any provinces other than Ontario have been involved by the government in this despicable, disgraceful and disreputable political conduct.

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL OF SPRUCE BUDWORM SPRAYING PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a ten year-old child from outside Saint John, New Brunswick, was flown to Halifax on Sunday for treatment of a confirmed case of Reye's syndrome, a disease linked to the spruce budworm spraying program, in view of the fact that this is the thirteenth confirmed case of the disease since 1968, which has resulted in at least five deaths, and in view of the fact that the Minister of State for the Environment (Mr. Marchand) has not used the powers of this department to control provincial agencies which are continuing to spray, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the minister make an unequivocal withdrawal of his department's indirect support for aerial spraying as started on December 13, 1977, and restated yesterday in an ATV interview.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUESTED DISMISSAL OF MINISTER FOR TELLING RACIST JOKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the sensitive nature of the task of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) involving understanding of the regions of Canada and awareness of the feelings of people in all areas of Canada, and in view of the insensitive and racially motivated "Newfie" joke told by the minister for the supposed amusement of the readers of the Maclean's magazine of February 6, properly entitled, "Marc Lalonde: Wrong Man, Wrong Place, Wrong Time", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House regrets the insensitive and insulting racial joke of the minister, advises the minister that he is next to go, and calls on the Prime Minister for dismissal of the minister and for disavowal of the gauche, ignorant and arrogant remarks of the minister who hopefully will be known as "Marc Lashort" as a result of his brief tenure as federal-provincial relations minister.

LAKE ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT SHORELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that record high levels of water in the Great Lakes have been extremely destructive this year and have already been the cause of much damage to public property and the cause of much hardship to private property owners surrounding Lake Ontario and the Bay of Quinte, the fact that these levels are being maintained at such a high level by artificial means in order that an extra kilowatt or two might be squeezed out, and in order to keep Lake Ontario as deep as possible for shipping, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees):

That the Minister of State for the Environment be directed to act immediately through the St. Lawrence Seaway authority to develop a plan for shoreline protection and beach erosion control along Lake Ontario and report on such plan to this House as soon as possible.

REQUESTED STUDY OF GRAIN HANDLING PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to raise an urgent matter. In view of the fact that the export of grain is so important to counteract Canada's balance of trade deficit, as well as being vital to the economy of western Canada, in view of the fact that 20 vessels are now waiting to be loaded at the port of Vancouver, resulting in mounting demurrage charges, and in view of the fact that apparently a Canadian Wheat Board delegation had to go to Japan to improve relations with that country because of uncertainty of delivery and loading ability, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the entire matter of sales and loading of grain be immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF EASTER SEAL TIMMIES

Mr. Speaker: Before beginning the oral question period, I know all hon. members would want to join me in recalling the fact that as we roll around each year to Eastertime, we think immediately of the Easter Seal campaign and of the symbol of the Easter Seal, Timmy, who has been representative of that campaign in such a successful way in the past.

• (1417)

This year, we are happy that present in our gallery are the Easter Seal symbols, in the plural. I say that with emphasis, because this year the Easter Seal Timmy is not one, but two—twins from Hamilton, Ontario—Peter and Paul Settle. I am sure they will carry on the very successful tradition of the Easter Seal symbol for a very successful compaign in 1978.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INSTITUTION OF EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The minister will recall that after he was finally able to introduce into the House of Commons his employment tax credit legislation, he said to me on January 25 that the program "will be in place by March 1". Today is March 1. I would like to ask the minister when Canadians who want to take advantage of that program will be able to do so.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the program is not ready as yet. I understand that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is working on it. We hope it will be introduced in the next few weeks.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance could not get this matter into the House when he should have brought it in: he delayed it two or three months. He gave us a clear undertaking that the program would be in place by March 1. Canadians who are looking for this program to help create jobs in this country have a right to know when it will be in effect. Will the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Employment and Immigration tell us whether the administrative arrangements are in place, and give us a date we can count on for the implementation of that program?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said that the program will be in place this month. The administration of it will be under my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I will inquire and report to the House as soon as I have spoken to him.

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question relating to delays on the part of the Minister of Finance. Yesterday's figures indicate that domestic growth in Canada is at a rate dramatically lower than the minister predicted. That is, in part, due to uncertainty about the Bank Act. Nearly four years ago my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, first raised the question as to when the government would begin the review of the Bank Act. When will the House of Commons see the new Bank Act?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the House will consider the bill dealing with the revision of the Bank Act as soon as the government is through drafting it. The bill is still at the Department of Justice and has not yet been approved by the government.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Mr. Clark: Just as with the employment tax credit, this minister cannot get Bank Act legislation through the bureaucracy. Canadians who want to know what is going to be the shape of economic policy have a right to see the legislation as quickly as possible. I do not want the excuse from the minister that the legislation is tied up in some of the departments. It is his responsibility, not that of the Minister of Justice. Can the minister give us a firm undertaking that the new Bank Act will be presented to the House of Commons before we rise for the Easter recess?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I hope so, but I cannot guarantee that, because the bill is not yet ready.

FORECASTS OF ECONOMIC RECOVERY—APPARENT DISCREPANCIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who seems to be entangled with the bureaucracy. The minister assured the nation, in Montreal on Monday, that the long-term potential for the country is still good. To use his words: "We are going into the new year from a strong basis of real growth". On Tuesday, the minister's comments were refuted by Statistics Canada figures which indicated that domestic demand in this country was actually negative in the final quarter. Would the minister indicate how he could be so wrong within a day of the actual figures being published, or are we to believe that he is simply dealing in rhetoric and hoping that people will not compare his rhetoric to the facts?

• (1422)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I stated yesterday, I am somewhat disappointed by the economic growth of Canada for the third quarter. However the economic growth for the second half of 1977 in terms of real growth was 4.3 per cent which is a fairly reasonable performance. Perhaps it was not as good as I would have hoped, Mr. Speaker, but I state the facts as they are, and Canada's economic performance for 1977, as compiled by Statistics Canada, ranked third, after Japan and the U.S., which puts us ahead of all other industrialized western countries.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance admits that he is disappointed with the figures released yesterday. In view of the disappointing year of 1977, which augurs poorly for 1978, would the minister at least reconsider his position of not giving the Canadian taxpayer a break through new legislation in the form of tax credits, bearing in mind that on average this month the Canadian taxpayer will start paying $50 per month more than he paid in February or January?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers of Canada received a tax break of $100 in the last two months. That was a very stimulative policy and cost the treasury more than $700 million. I am amazed that the hon. member, who is always complaining that we are running too large a deficit, now suggests we should run an even larger deficit.

INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In a speech made in Montreal two days ago, he said that the outlook for investment was improving and, with reference to the last quarter of 1977, that we were beginning this year "from a strong base of real growth." Figures released by Statistics Canada yesterday and on Friday not only put a different emphasis on this matter but flatly contradict what the minister said in his speech.

Considering that his department have had the correct figures from Statistics Canada for at least a week, as the Prime Minister indicated in the House, why is the minister deliberately misinforming the people of Canada about the real situation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not misled anybody. I checked the text of that speech carefully with my officials. I think the performance of the Canadian economy in the second half of 1977 was very strong compared with that of most other nations. I do not think a base of 4.3 per cent real growth is a weak base.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Figures produced by Statistics Canada show the net decline in investment in the last quarter running at an annual rate of 10.8 per cent. How can the minister possibly say that we are starting from a strong base of real growth when there is this decline in investment? When is the minister going to start speaking frankly, because the people of Canada want to hear the truth? When will he stop misleading the people and bring in programs to clear up the situation?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said there is some strength that I have seen in the economy. For example, in the last quarter there was a strong increase in the surplus of exports from the Canadian economy, but the demand at home was too weak. Through the measures we introduced last fall, we have given private citizens more than $2 billion in stimulus for 1978, including the $100 they received in January and February. In December, we passed measures, which came before the House last spring, to stimulate the corporate sector. All those elements led me to say—and I still believe it—that we will have a real growth of 5 per cent in 1978.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the minister did not answer the question I asked, but in his answer he acknowledged that domestic demand was not as great as he had hoped. In other words, the mini-budget of last fall and the budget of last spring failed. Domestic demand is not there to stimulate the manufacturing sector, which is operating at only 80 per cent capacity. Can the minister assure the House now that he will take corrective action before Easter, and announce tax cuts, instead of saving such matters for an election campaign after Easter?

● (1427)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the most fundamental problem we face is that people must have confidence in the economy. The doom and gloom approach—

Mr. Stevens: How can we, with you?

Mr. Chrétien: The approach the opposition has is not helpful. On top of that, the tax cut which I proposed came into effect January 1, 1978, and the hon. member refers to statistics that are previous to that date.

TRADE

TEXTILES—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT RECEIVED INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING TARIFFS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the textile industry in Canada, and especially in the province of Quebec, is going through extremely rough times for lack of control over imports, could the minister tell the House if he has received from the Canadian Textile Institute representations urging Canada to object to lower tariffs in order to adequately protect the Canadian textile industry?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that the Quebec caucus is keeping me up to date on events in the textile industry. In answer to the hon. member's question, I would like to inform him and the House that textile imports for 1977 were 1 per cent less than those in 1975. It is encouraging to note that in the recent report of Statistics Canada to the nation, investments were up considerably in the textile industry as at the beginning of this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for informing us that the Quebec Liberal caucus is looking into this matter. But if that is the case, the last part of his answer is not quite factual. If the caucus is looking into the matter, it is because something is wrong. I would like to ask the minister seriously if he intends to recommend that Canada agree to lower its tariffs according to the Swiss formula, which would have a disastrous effect on our industry? Can he assure our industries that there will be no tariff reduction?

[English]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the House that the multilateral trade negotiations respecting the Swiss formula of a 40 per cent cut represents merely a weighted average. In some instances one might grant a higher percentage, and in others a lower percentage. If one looks at the manufacturing sector paper which my department put out, one can see the four or five specific industries in which imports have made the greatest inroad into our domestic production. Textiles is one of those industries. It would be logical to assume that our negotiators would argue strongly for a much lower reduction than the Swiss weighted average formula of 40 per cent.

Mr. Stevens: Where does the logic come in?

Mr. Horner: With regard to the textile industry, investment, which is not large, in Canada is up something like 23.6 per cent this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Considering the importance of the matter and the fact that there is a Textile and Clothing Board which is specifically there to advise regularly the minister about the conditions, has the board asked the government not to reduce tariffs on imports, especially on textiles?

[English]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the Textile and Clothing Board has kept me informed of their wishes and of the progress in the industry. I would inform the hon. member that I intend to table a report on motions this afternoon with regard to textiles and handbags.

ENERGY

AECL ENFORCEMENT OF EISENBERG CONTRACT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it arises out of the disturbing remarks yesterday of the chairman of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I am sure the minister is well aware of them. Since the chairman of AECL states that he does not know whether Mr. Shaul Eisenberg will perform his agent's services—which is a different opinion from the one he expressed before the public accounts committee last November 17, when he said, "I fully expect the services to be rendered over the six or seven-year period"—and since the minister gave his personal authorization to the renegotiation of this contract by Mr. Campbell, what steps has the minister taken to ensure contract compliance? Also, has he asked Mr. Campbell for an explanation as to why AECL, in particular, would not attempt to enforce such a contract?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the chairman made it quite clear that AECL is going to insist upon enforcement of the contract because it is not satisfied with invoices that were submitted to it nearly two years ago with regard to post-contract services. The corporation rejected, and did not pay, that invoice; nor has it received any other invoice. I can only assume that the agent has received the message that he will have to provide much better accountability for these invoices in future.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of the contradiction between the minister's statements today and Mr. Campbell's statement yesterday, is Mr. Campbell going to introduce another statement today contradicting his statement of yesterday but agreeing with the statement of November 17? Will the minister indicate why he approved the kind of open-ended financial commitment that was made in the renegotiated contract—a financial commitment that has cost the taxpayers of this country well over $15 million already? Can he offer any assurance that services are being performed by Mr. Eisenberg, in light of the fact that the one document that has been submitted was rejected by AECL? What can he give by way of assurance that any aspect of service is being performed by Mr. Eisenberg in spite of the further payment of $2 million that has been made?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the chairman made it clear yesterday that he is seeking an undertaking from the agent on that point.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is obvious that the minister is in no position to answer. It is incredible that the situation has been allowed to drag on for so long. In addition to the more than $15 million that has already been paid to Mr. Eisenberg—for which, according to the Auditor General, and now the public accounts committee, no satisfactory accounting has been made—is the minister still going to permit a further payment of more than $3 million as agreed to by himself and Mr. Campbell without any adequate means of ensuring contract compliance? Are we going to see further expenditure of public funds simply frittered away on this very bad agreement made by the minister and Mr. Campbell?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is flogging an issue here in which he took no interest before. He was not a member of the committee. He has suddenly surfaced as a person who is interested in a subject which engaged the attention of many other members during this period. I suspect that if he had looked at the issues, I would not have to remind him once again that no payment has been made on the post-services contract. I do not know how many times I will have to repeat that for his benefit. If he likes, I will repeat it once more: the post-services contract could be as much as $5 million. No payment was made; the invoice was rejected.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REASON FOR DELEGATION'S VISIT TO JAPAN

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. What issue or situation made it necessary for a Canadian Wheat Board delegation to travel to Japan to smooth out difficulties?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the trip by the Canadian Wheat Board commissioners was not simply to smooth out difficulties; it was part of the ongoing, very close relationship between the Wheat Board and the buyers of grain in Japan, where we once again have sold a very large quantity of wheat and barley for this year.

Mr. Towers: With modern technical facilities at its disposal, the Canadian Wheat Board can locate every boxcar of grain in western Canada. Why does the board not know the date of arrival of grain vessels and the type of grain to be loaded, so that west coast grain exports are not held up as much as they are at the present time, with 20 boats waiting there?

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect, I cannot see the connection between the previous question and this one as a supplementary.

NATIONAL REVENUE

IMPORTATION OF MAGAZINES ENCOURAGING USE OF NARCOTICS—JUSTIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue: it arises out of magazines sent to me by the Calgary police force. The three magazines are entitled High Times, Rush and Head. They deal with such matters as paraphernalia and equipment for the smoking of marijuana, growing it, importing it, using it, and they also encourage the use of LSD and hard drugs.

How can the minister justify these and other magazines coming from New York and other places in the United States, in light of the regulations which govern Customs with reference to the importation of these kinds of periodicals which counsel crime and are against the Criminal Code of Canada? Under the Narcotic Control Act, if young persons are caught importing marijuana, they can receive a sentence of seven years imprisonment.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, many items come into this country, such as narcotics, which customs officers do not even see. The hon. member knows that. Municipal and provincial governments have the right to license those who sell magazines—municipal governments in particular. They can control this by the simple fact that if these people do not do what the municipalities want them to do, they can take away their licence. They can do away with sex shops and newsstands, if they wish.

I do not understand why the hon. member insists on putting the entire blame on Revenue Canada, or the government of Canada, when this situation can be controlled at the local level. Many magazines are not allowed into Canada, specifically those the hon. member has mentioned. I will be interested in continuing discussion on this matter with the hon. member. I will follow up this question and give an answer with regard to the magazines the hon. member has mentioned.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INVESTIGATION INTO LEGALITY OF IMPORTATION OF MAGAZINES ENCOURAGING USE OF NARCOTICS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to follow up this matter by asking the Minister of Justice a question. The Minister of National Revenue talked about the right of municipalities to issue licences to those selling these magazines. I am speaking of breaking the law by counselling crime. I am at a loss to understand his answer. Will the Minister of Justice, as the chief law officer of Canada, recommend to the provincial attorneys general that this matter be investigated? By permitting these magazines to be picked up by young people, the law is being broken. The Minister of Justice could walk into any police court in Canada on any day of the week, and he would find 25 or 30 people charged with offences such as those encouraged in these periodicals. In addition to recommending to the provincial attorneys general that these periodicals be investigated, will the minister recommend that charges be laid against the distributors, if he cannot get hold of the creators of this type of crime?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not know which magazines the hon. member has in his possession. If he will give them to me, I will be happy to consider them. I know that some magazines which seem to promote the use of pot have been the subject of investigation by the attorneys general. Whether these three magazines fall within that category, I do not know. If the hon. member will give them to me, I will be happy to refer them to the attorneys general.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT LIMIT MONOPOLY OF BELL CANADA THROUGH RATE REDUCTION

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Its recent application before the CRTC for a 20 per cent increase suggests that the Bell Canada monopoly of the Canadian telecommunications and telephone system is stifling fair competition and driving up prices. Will the government consider limiting these monopolistic prices, and will it act to declare telephone and transmission lines as public utilities and mediums serviced and operated by a private operation?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, these are considered public utilities. This is the reason they operate under the very severe regulations of the CRTC. The application presently before the CRTC will, I believe, be heard in the course of the next month. As I understand it, there will be five weeks of public hearings on the merits of the application. I have full confidence that the CRTC is fully equipped to deal with such a request.

TRADE

NEGOTIATION OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT TO BENEFIT PRODUCERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has nothing to do with freight rates, railroads or those other matters which ordinarily come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport and which, apparently, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has now taken over as his own—at any rate as far as the prairie provinces are concerned. Of the utmost importance and concern to those provinces is the International Wheat Agreement.

In view of the comparatively low prices for products such as wheat, the tremendous interest rate and the fantastic price which has to be paid for implements, agriculture is in a serious position. Is it a fact, as stated in certain specialized sections of the American press, that practically every impediment—if not every impediment—or roadblock in the way of the International Wheat Agreement has been swept aside by reason of the United States agreeing generally to the need for one, and also to the price? Would the minister say whether he is optimistic that on the basis of the present situation the farm population and, indeed, the nation as a whole, may look forward to an early completion of the discussions in Geneva and to an International Wheat Agreement which will bring some hope to our farmers?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the right hon. gentleman for that question. As he knows, I am deeply concerned about the price of grain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: My department is watching closely the talks which are going on at this moment in Geneva. An attempt is being made there to set up what might be called a reserve or buffer stock which could be drawn upon when the trigger price is activated. What that price will be, and the amount going into the reserve stock, are matters still under negotiation. The United States appears to be working very hard on this occasion to set up a new agreement. We are certainly co-operating with them, but we intend to watch carefully both the price and the amount going into this buffer stock, as well as the amount of stock withdrawn from it, since these questions are of vital importance to western Canada.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR CLOSING OF RIVER SYSTEMS CONTAMINATED BY MERCURY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Yesterday, as reported at page 3290 of Hansard, the minister stated that his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, had been misquoted when she said she would ask him to close the English-Wabigoon River system on account of mercury contamination there. I now have a transcript of the hon. lady's interview, which was recorded on tape. Asked whether the closure of the river system was a dead issue, she stated:

> It is not, and I am ready to write again to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, who has the final authority to close the river system to sport fishing—

In view of that statement, will the minister now make a commitment to recognize the request of his cabinet colleague and close this polluted river system?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): I thank the hon. member for raising this question. I was hoping that while I was on my feet for another purpose, I might be able to correct the record. We checked with the minister's office—the minister herself was out of town—and were informed she had intended to say "the provincial minister". However, this was not the case; it was to me she intended to direct the request. I hereby correct the record and apologize to the hon. member and to the House for having made the statement I did.

As to the substance of the issue, it is obvious that the province of Ontario administers the inland water fishery. This was the situation for many years before I became minister. We proclaim, by order in council, the changes in the regulations which are requested. If we were to close the river system, we would have no way of enforcing such closure. We do not carry out conservation work; we only do inspection work. So the only effective way in which that system could be closed would be by the provincial authorities, who would then assign protection officiers to the area. I might add that there is no commercial fishing going on, and the inspection branch of my department has prohibited the sale of fish taken from the rivers concerned.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the minister can stand with a clear conscience and try once again to pass the buck on an issue which has been with us for eight years, especially since the health and safety of a great many people is involved. The hon. gentleman's officials admitted in committee that the federal government has power to close the river to sports fishing, unilaterally. If that action had been taken, I believe we would have been able to devise a policing mechanism. In my opinion, the minister has done nothing more than set up another straw man. Let him close the river—which he has power to do—as has been requested by the native people for eight years, and then we shall see if we can get the closure policed effectively by the federal government.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I recognize at once that the Fisheries Act takes precedence over provincial regulations.

Mr. Symes: Then do it.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): If the hon. member wants the federal government to aassume jurisdiction over inland waters, that is the way to proceed. But it would be a total fraud to pretend to close a fishery if we cannot enforce the closure. Some of the hon. member's friends sit in the Ontario legislature. I suggest they might be the ones to approach on this matter, because that is where the responsibility lies.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SEIZURE OF CONFIDENTIAL FILES BY RCMP—DEPARTMENTS INVOLVED

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General, who I am sure is aware that the Ontario legislature has been informed that confidential medical files of a psychiatric nature were obtained in at least two cases, and that these files were secured at the direction of two federal departments. Would the minister tell us which departments these were, and under whose authorization, in each case, the action was taken?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): I am aware of the statement which was made in the legislature. That statement was based upon information which was received from the RCMP pursuant to a letter issued by the Acting Commanding Officer of the RCMP of the Ontario region. I may tell the hon. member that no directions were given on the part of any department of government to obtain the information in the way in which it was obtained.

Mr. Jarvis: Then am I to assume that the particular officer was lying or misleading the attorney general of Ontario; or, in the alternative, if it was not by reason of a direct command by a federal department, was the securing of those two psychiatric files carried out with the knowledge of two federal departments? If that is the case, I again ask: Which federal departments?

Mr. Blais: The information was obtained as a result of the activities conducted by the RCMP security service in obtaining security clearance of federal civil servants. In obtaining such clearance, information is sought on matters relating to mental stability. That, indeed, was the direction which was given to the RCMP when obtaining clearance: the aspect of mental stability would be taken into consideration.

Mr. Jarvis: Would the Solicitor General tell us whether at least one or, likely, two federal departments knew that confidential psychiatric information was being obtained so that they might benefit in terms of assessing the potential of staff for promotion? Who knew about it, which department, and under whose authorization was this? Surely the Solicitor General cannot avoid answering that question if he has any integrity at all.

● (1452)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am not attempting to avoid the question. The question is quite clear and the reply is quite clear. There was no specific direction from any government department.

Mr. Jarvis: Did they know about it?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, at this time I have no indication that there was any knowledge in the department that information was obtained from OHIP files. I am simply addressing myself to the question that was initially asked relating to the statement in the legislature, that is, the statement which referred to express directions from two federal departments. I say there was no direction from any federal department.

PUBLIC WORKS

PRACTICE FOLLOWED IN CALL FOR TENDERS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question should be directed to the President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible for government finances. It concerns a practice being followed by the Department of Public Works. When the Department of Public Works puts out a call for tenders for the construction of federal buildings in certain areas of Canada, there is attached to that call a stipulation in respect of the minimum hourly wage that must be paid by persons replying to the call for tender. In cases that I am aware of, the minimum wage stipulated is much above what is being paid in the area. I believe the information is supposed to come from the Department of Labour.

I ask the minister if he would have the department discontinue this practice, or make sure that the information obtained from the Department of Labour is much more accurate, so it does not disrupt wage patterns in certain areas and, more importantly, does not provide the fiscal irresponsibility that a program such as this smells of.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can give me specific instances, I will certainly look into them. I am not aware of the situation he describes.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SUGGESTED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RESPECTING LANGUAGE RIGHTS IN TEACHING

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. As the premiers gathered in Montreal last week have recognized the principle of free access for everyone to French and English education according to their mother tongue, when the number of children justifies it, which the Minister of State responsible for federal-provincial relations described as significant progress, and as the provinces have reasserted at the same time the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial governments in the field of education, would the Prime Minister tell us if, in the circumstances, he still intends to propose a constitutional amendment concerning linguistic rights in the education field?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I agree with the Minister of State responsible for federal-provincial relations that some progress has been made at the premiers' meeting last week. But I would point out that this progress simply corresponds to what the federal government obtained at the 1968 and 1969 conferences where indeed we discussed those problems with the provinces and received from them the acknowledgement of the right of French-and English-speaking minorities to be educated in their own language where it is justified. I am encouraged by the fact that the provinces are still proceeding in the right direction. I only regret that we have not yet succeeded in confirming this progress in a constitutional document. It is good to recognize, as we did in 1968 and 1969, the right of minorities to be educated in their language, but this would be a reality had we proceeded as suggested then and now by the federal government. This progress would be included in the constitution and courts would ensure its becoming a reality. This is why our suggestion is still valid and I hope that the premiers and hon. members will understand that such a constitutional amendment would not remove this matter from provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

I would say to the Prime Minister that I understand quite well and that is perhaps why I ask the question. The Prime Minister has just said that he still intends to introduce this amendment. Given the circumstances, would he assure the House that such a constitutional amendment on educational linguistic rights will not be presented without securing prior agreement from the provinces?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this House must recognize the protection of minorities as one of its roles. In any case, that is the position of the government under my leadership. Already in 1968—and I have documents to prove it—we had secured agreement in principle. And during the last ten years, we have been asking the provinces to come together on that point so that this agreement in principle, which is very important for Francophone minorities in provinces other than Quebec—and now for the Anglophone minority of the province of Quebec—we have been asking, as I said, that is this agreement in principle go one step further. Of course, we will keep on asking the provinces to come to an agreement on that matter but I do not think the hon. member would prevent us from making such a proposal to those governments.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT PROPOSES AMENDMENTS

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Notwithstanding the attitude of the Quebec government which seems to have lost interest in the evolution of the constitutional debate, could the Prime Minister tell hon. members whether the government is prepared to take concrete action to make it clear that we are not for the status quo and that we are ready to consider the constitutional changes requested by Canadians and more particularly by Quebecers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this supplementary question is very pertinent to the previous one. As I have been saying again and again since 1968 and 1969 and at the Victoria conference, then again in my letters to the premiers in 1975 and 1976, and again in my other letters to them last September and October, we have been constantly proposing constitutional changes, particularly changes designed to protect public liberties and of course linguistic rights. Therefore I do not think any sincere person can describe this situation as a status quo. We did make a series of proposals. To answer the question of the hon. member, I would say yes, we have announced them in the Speech from the Throne and we intend to bring before the House before the end of this session other proposals related to constitutional changes, because indeed it seems clear that we cannot expect them from the government of Quebec which has only vague formulas and does not give any clear definition of its sovereignty-association option.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

RUNWAY AT VANCOUVER AIRPORT—REQUEST GOVERNMENT CANCEL PLANS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Environment). Could he tell the House exactly what is going on with respect to the study of the proposed new runway for the Vancouver airport, bearing in mind that he had no difficulty whatsoever in interfering with all the usual procedures when cancelling the Kitimat proposal? Will he assure the House that he will now step in, in like manner, and cancel this new runway, which has already been studied to death and in respect of which all the evidence is that it is not necessary and is not needed?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, an environmental assessment panel has been appointed to work on this matter and is reviewing the situation. It will be presenting a final report to me some time this fall. By that time I will be in a position to make a recommendation to my colleague, the Minister of Transport, on what should be done.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State tell the House the facts that he or other members of the cabinet suddenly acquired last week, which made it possible to cancel the Kitimat proposal, which were not available to him months ago before millions of dollars in taxpayers' money had been spent on a study which was interrupted by the government?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, certainly the government had a number of facts on hand relating—

An hon. Member: Which facts?

Mr. Marchand: —to the whole question of petroleum and energy supplies for Canada. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has been doing a great job in addressing this question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Can we have the facts?

Mr. Marchand: I will send the hon. member a copy of the information, if he would like that. We waited until we received the interim report from Dr. Thompson. That helped a great deal in making up our minds finally in relation to the west coast oil ports.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL PRESIDENT AMIN BE BANNED FROM ENTERING CANADA FOR COMMONWEALTH GAMES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week Uganda announced that it would accept the invitation to attend the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton and would be sending a contingent of 75 people, whom we welcome. On May 26, 1977, in answer to a question I posed in the House, the minister said he would investigate my suggestion that President Idi Amin be banned from entering Canada during the Commonwealth Games.

In light of the latest Amnesty International Report for 1977, which specifies that President Amin is responsible for numerous killings during a reign of terror in that country, will the minister now make it perfectly clear that President Amin will be banned from entering Canada during the Commonwealth Games?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is another talent President Amin has, which the hon. member should be aware of, and that is maximizing the proposing of hypothetical questions as to whether he is going to visit some place or whether he is not. I can see we are now off on a whole new round of speculation: Is he going to come, or is he not? In those circumstances I do not think I ought to comment, other than what I said last May, on what President Amin may do or what attitude we would take toward him. I have said repeatedly that it serves no useful purpose. If President Amin announces categorically that he is going to come, we will deal with it at that time. I do not see any point in changing the observations I made last May.

INDUSTRY

CLOSING OF MINE IN STEWART, B.C.—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: it concerns the town of Stewart, British Columbia. I realize the hon. Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport has that community in her riding. That community will be experiencing the shutdown of the Granduc mine on June 30, 1978. That will almost eliminate it as a viable community in the area. What proposals has the government made with regard to bringing back that community and giving the residents some assurance that there will be work, there will be employment, and there will not be just bankruptcy and unemployment following June 30?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department is watching the copper situation very closely. The United States is announcing today, or announced yesterday, an inquiry on copper coming into that country. That will affect the copper producing countries which are in competition with Canada and came on the market excessively in the last six months, such as Zaire, Chile, and so on. Because of our long-term sales to the United States, we are negotiating with them so that we will be able to continue exporting to that country, which has been our pattern. With that in mind, the hon. Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport has kept me informed of the situation in respect of the town of Stewart.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Because of the hon. Minister's ability to lobby to me, I am sure my department will do the best it can to assist the employment situation in Granduc and will help the industry to diversify as much as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I have two notices of privilege, but I have also notice from the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) of a point of order, which might usefully be taken first. Also I have notice that three ministers will be tabling documents that perhaps the House will be interested in. I wonder if I might be permitted to call those matters in that order.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have learned from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that he has the information with regard to the employment tax credit program which was passed in the House. Previously he undertook that it would be starting by March 1. If he has information in order to answer the questions of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), we would appreciate hearing from him now.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House. I have checked with the Department of Employment and Immigration. The program will start next week on March 8.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. ROBERTS—CORRECTION OF OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have two separate corrections or clarifications to make to Hansard for February 28. The first one relates to the adjournment debate as reported at page 3330 when I was replying to the question of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). The English Hansard reads as follows:

> Just before Christmas, we stressed the importance given at the federal level to the idea that the provinces will agree to exceptions to these very important rights.

It should read, "to accepting these very important rights". Since it is a complete transformation of the sense, I should like that correction to be made.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Hansard reported accurately what the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) said yesterday.

Mr. Roberts: But I was speaking in French.

Mr. Paproski: I heard the translation.

Mr. Roberts: The French version of Hansard reads as follows:

[Translation]

> . . . que les provinces accepteront les exceptions à ces droits très importants.
> [Mr. Horner.]

[English]

My only explanation would be that perhaps I was groping for words in French and repeated twice the word "accepteront", which was reported as "exceptions".

MR. ROBERTS—CLARIFICATION OF CHANGES IN ESTIMATES

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the second matter refers to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) yesterday. Earlier the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) argued that there had been a decrease in funding on the part of the government for arts and culture within the Department of the Secretary of State. Since that was not the case, and since I understood how he arrived at that conclusion, I was seeking to explain the true situation to him.

In my remarks I used the word "error", which I think was wrongly used. Shortly after the blue book went to press, there was a change agreed to by Treasury Board which had the effect of making an increase, in the grants portion to be undertaken under the Festival Canada program, to $1,450,-000. In effect, it was not an error at the time the Blue Book went to press. The blue book did not accurately indicate decisions which were subsequently taken. It would be the intention of the government to make the modification on supplementary estimates. I wanted to be sure the hon. member for Egmont did not misunderstand the government's intention. The use of the word "error" was probably an inaccurate description of what in fact took place.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond for a moment to the comments made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). He leaves the standing committee in a bit of difficulty when it meets, if some of the material being furnished to it by way of reference today will not be complete, in the sense of analysing this with previous expenditures, until we have supplementary estimates, which are many months away. Prior to any consideration by committee, I hope the minister will be able to make available to all hon. members a full explanation so that proper and due consideration can be given to items in the estimates.

Also while I am on my feet, originally I meant to raise a question of privilege concerning the comments of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). I realize he did not want to cast any aspersions on the motivation or interest of any hon. member, but he referred to the fact that I had been seized suddenly with this problem of agents' fees. Possibly the minister neglected to check the record and refer to the many occasions on which I, as well as many other hon. members, had raised this issue over some months.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I permit the hon. member the floor on a question of privilege on those grounds, presumably I will have to let several ministers have the floor every time an hon. member, in putting a question, says something which might cast any aspersions on ministers. Perhaps that is a subject of disagreement or a subject of argument, but it does not reach in any way the proportions of a question of privilege.

MR. ANDRE—ASSURANCE OF ACCURATE ESTIMATES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is related to the remarks of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). When clarifying his comments yesterday, he indicated, as a result of approvals or certain procedures within the Treasury Board not having been completed before the blue book went to press, that in fact the blue book of main estimates will not accurately assess the appropriations for that particular department. That explanation does not cover the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) yesterday, when he expressed concern about the fact that shortly the Blue Book estimates will be referred to appropriate committees. We have been told that the appropriations or estimates of at least one department are inaccurate.

My point of order is: what assurance can the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) give us that we in fact will be looking at the legitimate estimates of planned expenditures in the government, and not something which may or may not be wrong or inappropriate for one or more departments?

● (1512)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the very simple answer is to recognize that at the time of the printing and tabling of the main estimates, the basic expenditure plan of the government was contained therein; but we know there is provision in our procedure for subsequent adjustments to programs, additions, deletions, changes and transfers between votes, a whole series of adjustments necessary for an institution the size of the government. Consequently, the provision for supplementary estimates is there. Of course, there will be some adjustments further down the road.

The figures referred to by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) reflected the decision of the government on a policy basis, at the time the main estimates were sent to print, in advance of tabling, for the obvious reason that a strictly mechanical or administrative time frame is required. So there will be a subsequent adjustment to many programs, and I think that is what the Secretary of State implied.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when this matter was raised, the hon. gentleman said he would look into it. We have now discovered there is quite a substantial change with respect to one aspect. I was satisfied with that answer yesterday, and I took it that before the reference was made to the standing committees some attempt would be made to clear up in advance the total amount of the estimates with which those standing committees will have to deal.

The following questions are legitimate questions to the minister following upon his undertaking: Has that study been made? To what extent are the estimates, with which we will be dealing today and which we will be sending to the committees, changed? Is the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) in a position to table the document today—to which we would be delighted to consent—and make a statement—which we would like to hear—in order to indicate, after the experience he has just described and before the matter finally goes to committee and leaves the House, what the true state of the estimates might be. I think it is rather important that, in considering the estimates in the committee, we start off from the correct base, not from something that is fluid in terms of the reference from the House to the committee. There is enough criticism of the whole procedure in dealing with the estimates without starting off from a base which is not reliable, and I think the President of Treasury Board would agree with that. Is he prepared to clarify this situation today?

Mr. Andras: There are no known errors in the main estimates as printed and tabled on February 22. Obviously, as I have indicated and as every member of the House knows, between the time of dealing with the main estimates as they were laid before the House of Commons on February 22 and the end of the fiscal year 1978-79, which concludes on March 31, 1979, about 13 months from now, there will be some supplementary estimates. That is the only issue involved here. The blue book is as accurate as human competence can guarantee it and I know of no errors or omissions in it as tabled the other day.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, that is the assurance I wanted.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad this point of order was brought out because I wondered if the Department of National Defence was alone in having these inaccurate estimates before the House. I have a written answer from the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) which was provided several months ago telling me that the additional cost for long range patrol aircraft would come to some $71 million. The estimates reflect not a dime of that $71 million, and yet he knew about it several months ago. The Krauss-Maffei contract for tanks is another such matter. Our dollar has been devalued in relationship to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Two occasions have presented themselves, one in particular when the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) tabled the estimates on which there was a round of questioning with regard to general matters. In addition, detailed questioning about the estimates of each individual department will take place when the estimates are before the committees. The only reason for accepting the point of order at this time is that it was known today that the minister would move the motion of reference to the standing committees.

Yesterday the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) said there was an error in one portion of those estimates, and I felt that before the motions were put today that error should be cleared up. To the extent it can be done, the error has been cleared up; but I would not want any hon. member to presume that this would allow points of order to be raised to question the minister today on the details of every department. That will be done when the estimates of each department are before the committees.

Before questions of privilege are raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), there are three ministers who wish to table documents. I wonder if the House might consent to allowing them to do so now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF MEMBERS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I consider to be a very serious matter of privilege. A week ago in this House it was brought to our attention that two of the members of this House had been the objects of electronic surveillance. Subsequent to that disclosure the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) confirmed in the House that the person responsible for this surveillance had been in the employ of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The person responsible for the surveillance also admitted on national television that he had conducted a bugging operation against me at one point in my riding.

This would clearly indicate to me a breach of privilege if for no other reason than the fact that this calls into question the privacy of communication between a member of parliament and his constituents, and as such clearly inhibits the ability of a member of parliament to perform his duties.

I would also like to refer your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the statement of Mr. Speaker on October 17, 1973, when he said in this House that an incident of electronic surveillance against the caucus of the New Democratic Party was, and I quote: "A prima facie case of breach of privilege".

I might add that even more weight must be given to this question of privilege because since that time we have had the assurance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that no member of parliament had been the subject of electronic surveillance by our federal police force since the case of Fred Rose.

Mr. Speaker, it is your role to protect the rights and privileges of members of parliament, and it is to you I turn for redress on this matter. I must ask you in that role to obtain any tapes or other objects resulting from electronic surveillance against myself from whatever level or organization under the Solicitor General which is presently holding that material. I must also ask you in your role as Mr. Speaker to discover why that electronic surveillance operation was undertaken, why I was never informed that the operation had taken place, and why the tapes have not been turned over to me.

Since it has now been seven days since this information became public and I have received neither an apology nor an explanation, I must now, Mr. Speaker, ask you to step into this affair. Notwithstanding the action which I have asked Your Honour to take in this matter, I reserve my right to move a motion of privilege at some future time.

● (1522)

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) I wonder if Your Honour and the hon. member, who has already indicated he is asking that his motion be reserved in any event, might agree to give the Solicitor General the opportunity to address himself to this question in the next day or two or, at least, the next time he is in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I have no hesitation in agreeing to allow some time for the response of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to the question put forward today. In any case, I would need some time to assess it in terms of my own responsibilities with regard to the request made. Therefore I am quite happy to see the matter reserved for a day or two until I have had some indication whether the information asked for by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) today is forthcoming.

In the interim I see no difficulty at all in reserving to the hon. member the right to carry on the question of privilege of which he gave the Chair notice a week ago, which is the reason I took it as a priority item today in terms of notices of questions of privilege which have been filed with me.

MR. BROADBENT—ALLEGED MISSTATEMENTS OF FACT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise, as I indicated to you in a letter this morning, on a separate question of privilege. In a speech delivered in Montreal on Monday night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chretien) devoted his time to making some assertions about the nature of the Canadian economy. Arising from those assertions it seems to me that there is a very serious question of privilege, at least on a prima facie basis, which concerns all members of this House.

I would like to quote three portions of the minister's speech. First, he said that Canada's economic recovery is gaining momentum. Second, at page three of the text of his speech the minister said that "unlike the situation 12 months ago, we are going into the new year from a strong base of real growth". Third, the minister said that the outlook for investment is improving.

I am very concerned about these statements because they were not rhetorical in nature. They were not the kind of statement that politicians of whatever party make from time to time in exaggerated claims about the nature of their virtues or about the nature of the vices of their opponents. They were statements of purported fact, and they were made just two nights ago by the Minister of Finance, the man who holds the most responsible financial position in Canada.

The concern I have about those allegations of fact is that they are not only slightly contradicted in emphasis by other evidence, but they are flatly contradicted by reports which have been produced by another government agency, Statistics Canada. One report appeared on Friday of last week, and another just appeared yesterday. I will not go into both those reports at length. I could do so, and in chapter after chapter and verse after verse they would flatly contradict the alleged factual assertions made by the minister. I will refer to just two such factual contradictions. Yesterday's Statistics Canada report showed that business investment in the last quarter of 1977 declined at an annual rate of 10.8—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Regardless of the merits of the statistics in the argument the hon. member is about to put forward, surely he will agree that in principle what he is doing is entering into argumentation with regard to the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chretien). If I were to extend to the hon. member the right to raise this disagreement by way of a question of privilege, I would have to extend to every hon. member every day, under the guise of privilege, the opportunity to take issue, no matter how serious and fundamental, with statements made by ministers or by other members of the House both inside and outside the House. No matter how fundamental that disagreement may be and no matter how well documented or how persuasive the argument may turn out to be, it still remains argument; and I cannot recognize argument as privilege, for to do so would invite the same thing from every member every day.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I fully respect what you have said, but I wonder if you will permit me perhaps another 60 seconds to try to make a case of privilege because I do not think this is just a matter of argument.

As Your Honour knows, this House has a rule that no minister or member ought deliberately to misinform other members in the House, and if there is any breach of that rule, a bona fide question of privilege can be raised.

The concern I have is that yesterday in the question period the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that the government was aware of the information contained in the Statistics Canada report, but during the same period of awareness the Minister of Finance was uttering something which was not just a matter of emphasis but a factual contention which was a flat contradiction of what Statistics Canada was saying was going on in the economy.

If Your Honour rules in my favour, my prima facie question of privilege would be that we as members of this House cannot continue to do our jobs properly if we are provided systematically with contradictory information from the Minister of Finance and from other government agencies. This is an extremely serious issue, particularly at this time when the problems in the Canadian economy are very real indeed. Perhaps above all else at this time, if we are going to come to grips with the very serious problems facing us, we need honesty.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is exaggerating somewhat. Statistics Canada published its figures on Tuesday. I did not see them before they were published, so the hon. member cannot accuse me of having seen them. He cannot accuse department heads because the speech I made in Montreal was about policy which I, in concert with my bureaucrats, had developed. There was absolutely nothing misleading in that.

I said that for the fourth quarter of the year I expected to see 4 per cent to 5 per cent real growth. I have said that many times. However, I did not at that time have the facts which were published by Statistics Canada. I had some indication that the figure was to be between 4 per cent and 5 per cent. Unfortunately the figure turned out to be 3.2 per cent, which made the average 4.3 per cent for the last half of the year.

In the present economic circumstances one could claim that 4.3 per cent is weak. I can disagree with the hon. member and say that it is rather strong. Only Japan and the United States outperformed Canada in that part of the year.

We can argue, but I want to assure the hon. member that when I made that speech, I based it on the facts which were available to me and my ministry at that time. When I was the minister responsible for Statistics Canada, statistics would come to me as minister of industry, trade and commerce the night before they were published. At no time did I make those statistics available to other ministers, even at times relative to inflation and unemployment. I kept them to myself, and they were not distributed to other departments. Statistics Canada is completely independent from the government. It publishes its own statistics. We can argue whether growth of 4.3 per cent for the last half of last year is strong enough, but I think it is a good base. I do not think there is any basis for arguing that I deliberately misled the House or the public. I think there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: We are clearly, in the most classic terms, in the field of argumentation or dispute as to facts. The matter is not in any way related to privilege and therefore cannot go any further.

MR. STEVENS—ALLEGED MISREPRESENTATION BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege arises from the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in defence of what I felt was a proper representation on the part of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). The minister has misled the House again. The Montreal speech to which reference was made did not refer to the last half of 1977. I refer specifically to the following wording:

> Economic growth in both the third and fourth quarters of 1977 was at or above the long-term potential rate for the economy.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): That is the last half of 1977.

Mr. Stevens: The important thing is that the minister referred specifically to the third and fourth quarters. The third quarter did show the growth to which the minister is referring. That is the 5.2 per cent growth which is above the 5 per cent real growth target which is looked upon as our potential. The fourth quarter figures are very clear. They show .8 per cent, which is 3.2 per cent on an annualized basis. This is below the potential.

● (1532)

The fact is that the minister misled both his audience in Montreal and members of the House by saying he was referring to the second half. He was not referring to the second half. He created the impression that the third quarter was above its potential level and that the fourth quarter was above its potential level as far as real growth is concerned. From an economic standpoint there is a very important distinction between what he said today and what he said in Montreal. If the fourth quarter is—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) is right back where we were before, which is a direct confrontation on an interpretation to be placed on remarks of the minister made outside the House.

Mr. Stevens: No, here.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. On a procedural basis the extent to which this dispute exists is not any concern of the Chair. It remains a dispute and not in any way a procedural problem.

STATISTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO SECURE RELEASE OF CERTAIN CENSUS RETURNS

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-422, to amend the Statistics Act (release of pre-1900 census returns).

He said: Mr. Speaker, in response to the concerns of Mrs. Jacqueline Norris, past chairman of the Wellington-Waterloo branch of the Ontario Genealogical Society and other members of similar Canadian genealogical organizations, I wish to introduce a bill entitled an act to amend the Statistics Act, calling for the release of individual returns to a census taken prior to January 1, 1900.

While section 16 of the Canada Statistics Act is addressed to secrecy and prohibits the divulging of census return information, no section of the act is addressed to a mechanism for the eventual release of this census data. There appears to be no overriding reason to prevent public access to this pre-1900 census information.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COST OF DRILLING OFFSHORE WELLS

Question No. 1,100—Mr. Howie:

To the knowledge of the government, what is the average cost for carrying out one-test drilling from a drilling platform in search for off-shore oil?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: The cost of a single offshore well depends on a number of variables such as the depth and geographical location of the well, the associated weather conditions, and the depth of the water, as well as such economic factors as the world-wide demand for offshore drilling rigs. In Canada, offshore wells have been drilled at locations in the Beaufort Sea, which has long periods of ice cover; on the Labrador Shelf, which has deep water and the threats of icebergs; and on the Scotian Shelf, Grand Banks and West Coast offshore all of which have less severe summer conditions but which have severe winter storms. Well costs, therefore, vary significantly. However, taking the above factors into account, the following values are representative of the total cost drilling a single 10,000 foot well in the following offshore regions: Beaufort Sea, $35—50 million; Labrador Sea, $9 million; Grand Banks, West Coast Offshore, Scotian Shelf $4 million. By way of comparison, a single 10,000 foot well in Alberta costs $3/4—$1 million. It should be added that a significant portion of the cost for a single well program is the cost of mobilizing and demobilizing the necessary equipment. This cost, which normally amounts to $1 to $1½ million, is included in the above figures.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. EPP—CORRECTION OF OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relative to the manner in which questions are being answered. I do not intend to take much of the time of the House but I must take a minute to explain the situation.

In question No. 1,394 the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) asked about the disposition and ownership of Thunderbird Lodge located on Wrong Lake in Manitoba. The question was, "Who is the owner of the lodge?", and the answer was given on October 17, 1977, at page 8218 of Hansard where the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), then parliamentary secretary to the President of Privy Council, named Mr. D. W. Gallagher as a director of Thunderbird Lodge.

When Mr. D. W. Gallagher of Winnipeg, Manitoba, was apprised of the answer that appeared in Hansard he wrote to the hon. member for Assiniboia. With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I should like to set the record straight because this gentleman does not have any way in which he can correct the record. Mr. Gallagher wrote to the hon. member for Assiniboia as follows.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. It is some time since the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) was the parliamentary secretary responsible in this area. This point would have to have some immediacy that is not readily apparent to the Chair.

Mr. Epp: I appreciate you intervention, Mr. Speaker, and I expected it. It has just recently been brought to my attention by Mr. Gallagher that the correction he made in letter form to the parliamentary secretary has never received a response nor has the Hansard record been corrected. It is on that basis that I am trying to correct Hansard with your indulgence.

I will read part of the letter which Mr. Gallagher wrote, as follows:

1. I am not a director of Thunderbird Lodge, and have never been a director.

2. I have attended no meetings of the board of directors of Thunderbird Lodge.

3. I have no involvement in Thunderbird Lodge, nor have I had.

● (1542)

That letter was sent on October 31 of last year and to date Mr. Gallagher has not received a clarification nor has the government seen fit to rise in this House and correct the record. I have now done so.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I never did get that letter from Mr. Gallagher, but I shall check with my predecessor and find out what happened exactly.

MR. McKINLEY—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary responsible for answering questions on the order paper that I have had on the order paper questions Nos. 560 to 673 inclusive since November 14. I was advised by way of an answer to a question that all this information has been fed on to computers within the Department of Public Works, but I see no reason whatsoever for this delay, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANK ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND OPERATION TO APRIL 1, 1979

The House resumed, from Tuesday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-16, to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening when I commenced my remarks with respect to Bill C-16 I was pointing out that, if the situation was handled properly, Canada had an attractive opportunity in allowing regulated controlled foreign bank participation in our market place. In Toronto, for example, there are some 40 foreign banks which have already opened offices and which are carrying on a banking operation to the extent that the law now permits. I understand that throughout the country there may be a total of 60 banking concerns carrying on business in Canada which have their head offices in foreign countries. In the Commerce Court there are 26 banks which have an office of some description in that complex. This goes to illustrate the potential that exists. We should, therefore, get on with passing the necessary banking legislation to allow these concerns to become participants in the Canadian banking and financial markets.

As I mentioned yesterday, we have a reciprocal agreement. Our Canadian banks, much to their credit, have been active in many countries around the world for some time. The Bank of Nova Scotia is active in such countries as Argentina, Australia, the Bahamas, Barbados, Belgium, Bermuda, Brazil, the Cayman Islands, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, England, France, Grenada, Haiti, Hong Kong, Indonesia, Ireland, Jamaica, Japan, Malaysia, Lebanon, Mexico, The Netherlands, Norway, Panama, the Philippines, St. Lucia, Puerto Rico, Singapore, Trinidad and Tobago, United States, the Virgin Islands and West Germany. I could continue. The Royal Bank of Canada is likewise very active in many countries around the world.

In today's money market, the international market is the name of the game. Banks create activity amongst themselves. Unfortunately we have remained sheltered from this international type of banking. There is a tremendous opportunity for cities such as Montreal, Vancouver, Toronto and Winnipeg—as was suggested last night—to become international banking centres. The potential is there. There are foreign banks active now in the Canadian market to the extent the law will permit. I am referring to very large banks. For example, the Deutsche Bank, which aside from the Bank of America in the United States is the largest bank in the world, has an office in Toronto. Incidentally, there is no particular mystery to the operation of these banks. They are all listed in the yellow pages of the Montreal and Toronto phone books.

In considering what should be done respecting Bill C-16, we should remember that we will be postponing yet again the revisions to our Bank Act. This in turn will mean those foreign banks which could contribute something to Canada, under proper regulation, will be denied for perhaps another year active participation in the Canadian market.

Some of those banks I have referred to have been renting and staffing their offices for two and a half to three years. At some point we must accept the fact that their host countries may respond. If we do not find their banking concerns suitable for doing business in Canada, our banking concerns may possibly have their doors shut. That, Mr. Speaker, would be tragic.

As I mentioned yesterday, the assets of Canadian banks amount to $150 billion. These banks are quite capable of joining this international banking community, which is a positive element we have. It is said that we should facilitate the development of sectors within the Canadian economy where there is an advantage, and one of those advantages is in the banking community. We are good bankers. We understand finance. In many ways we could become the Switzerland of North America if we would accept that challenge and lead instead of follow.

What we are witnessing with respect to the revisions of the Bank Act is discouraging. Everybody realized the Bank Act had to be changed by June 30, 1977. That was the tenth anniversary of the last revision.

As my leader pointed out today, on March 5, 1974 the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) asked the government for the first time what did the government propose doing with respect to the review of the Bank Act. Almost four years later we are still hearing from a third minister of finance that the legislation is being drafted. That is shameful. Why is it still being drafted? We are told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that there has been agreement in principle. The policy has been established, but unfortunately although it has been sent over to the Department of Justice the draftsmen cannot get on with their job. If that is true, it is a tremendous reflection on the workings of this cabinet. It is counterproductive to have the Department of Justice frustrating the will of the Minister of Finance if he is sincere in saying that he would like to table this legislation as soon as possible. Our concern should be the effect that this will have on the whole banking community in Canada. It preserves uncertainty, something which should not be preserved. Indeed, it denies Canada that opportunity of thrusting the country more forcefully into the international banking community to which I have referred.

We have heard many discussions concerning the monetary situation and the crisis our dollar is in at the present time. We know too that the government is trying to raise foreign funds to offset some of the drain of reserves which will be reflected tomorrow. I understand that the drain of our reserves in February is something over half a billion dollars. It could be higher. I understand as well, and this is a published figure, that we had a drain of our reserves of $200 million in January.

My suggestion which would alleviate the drain on our reserves would be to allow our banking community to become more internationalized in the way I have outlined. Let this nation become the Switzerland of North America. I can assure the House the real growth figures we have been talking about as our potential would be reality as opposed to the sad display which we witnessed today. The Minister of Finance had to stand up and admit that while he was in Montreal he referred to fourth quarter real growth of something over an annualized 5 per cent. He then had to eat his words when the published figures showed it was a little over 3 per cent. That occurred yesterday, and that is my first point.

● (1552)

The second point I would like to make when considering this extension with regard to the time limitation of the Bank Act is this. Think of the uncertain questions that this is leaving. For example, the white paper suggested that the credit unions should be pulled within our banking system. They suggested that the time had come when reserves which are normally expected from banking operations as far as the Bank of Canada is concerned should also be expected from credit unions. We know that the credit unions are very much opposed to this type of approach. They would like to be left alone. They feel that some type of federal regulation is not welcome, bearing in mind they are largely provincially regulated and governed at the present time.

This is where we get an unfortunate clash between the politics of government and economic reality. On one hand we are told that the government intends to include these credit unions in the new banking legislation. In fact, most will be surprised if the credit unions are not squarely included within the draft bill whenever it is produced. That may clearly be the attitude of the Department of Finance, but the political decision that has been made at the highest level, the level of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is that the government does not want this Bank Act to be shown because they do not want to live with the political consequences. In short, they do not want to have the draft legislation before this nation pending an election.

[Mr. Stevens.]

One minister of the cabinet was very candid with a banking friend of mine. He said the government would not show the draft Bank Act legislation because they did not want to take on the caisses populaire of Quebec. They know that what they intend to do with the caisses populaire will be unpopular. It means votes as far as they are concerned. Frankly, they are not going to run that risk. That is what we are living with here. We have sheer political expediency on the part of this government, in spite of the fact the economic realities cry out for more decisive decisions to be made by this cabinet.

Certain members of the government are a little startled at that blunt language. The fact is it is the truth. The economic condition of this country is being put on the back burner as this government gets ready for an election which they anticipate will be some time in May or June. Let there be no fudging of this question. As far as the cabinet level is concerned, this bill was conveniently sent over to the justice department and conveniently left there to give the government an excuse for not showing their colours with regard to the types of things to which I am referring.

Again I wish to touch on this whole question as to why we urgently need a change as far as our approach to the Bank Act revision is concerned. In short, since 1967 there has been a tremendous transition in our banking industry in Canada. I will put a few facts on the record. For example, the banks' share of deposits has actually declined by almost 3 per cent since the last Bank Act revision in 1967. That is relative to all deposit-taking institutions. Credit unions have shown the largest increase, climbing from 9.9 per cent to 12 per cent of the 1975 total.

Generally speaking, as we know, Canadians are considered among the world's highest savers. Total savings on a national accounts basis as a percentage of personal disposable income ranged between a low of 5.5 per cent in 1970 to a high of 10.2 per cent in 1975. A portion of these savings ultimately end up as personal savings deposits in one of the various deposit-taking institutions. In short, there has been a redistribution as far as deposits are concerned as to who owns the savings of this nation.

Let me put it another way. Since the last revision to the Bank Act, the chartered banks' share of this pot has gone down 3 per cent while that of the credit unions has gone up 2½ per cent as far as the over-all share is concerned. We are talking big figures. Total personal savings held by all of these deposit-taking institutions have increased by more than 300 per cent since 1967, to over $75 billion in 1976. Personal savings deposits in the 22 million deposit accounts in the chartered banks accounted for over $30 billion of this total, or about 40 per cent, compared to more than $10 billion in 1967.

The reason I put some of these figures on the record is because sometimes we do not acknowledge the tremendous explosion we have had in our banking system. When the Porter commission last sat and reviewed the financial community in Canada, total assets, certainly domestic bank assets, were approximately $13 billion. Domestic bank assets at the time of our last revision were approximately $25 billion. Today they are over $100 billion. That is the type of explosion that calls out for a relatively early review of our banking system and, above all, a new Bank Act to give confidence and certainty to the system which is needed in a highly industrialized nation such as Canada.

I referred to the credit union position. I referred to the fact that the government is timorous with regard to showing its hands with respect to the credit union. They obviously feel that the politically expedient thing to do is to bury this whole question and hopefully get through the next election on the understanding that perhaps they will do something subsequent to that election if, heaven forbid, they do get re-elected.

Let me refer to the Economic Council of Canada study and the fact that a committee of another part of this parliament reviewed the white paper that was tabled by this government in August 1976. After all those reviews and all the briefs that have been sent in, the government owes it to the Canadian public to show exactly what is their position with regard to the whole banking community in Canada.

As far as credit unions are concerned, I do not think a good case has been made as to why credit unions have to be put smack bang right into the banking system, as has been suggested. Let me refer to the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada. For example, they mention that credit unions should be controlled to some degree. They make various other recommendations. My point is that one of the reasons for this unsatisfactory real growth is that the business community feels an overwhelming sense of insecurity. There is a lack of confidence. The government's indecision, its stalling on this Bank Act for political reasons, is contributing to this lack of confidence.

Most members realize that our housing industry is not prospering to the degree we would like. Who in this country feels that our mortgage interest rate structure is acceptable? Surely it is points like that which should be covered within a Bank Act revision in the hope that we can free up more mortgage money and hopefully lower interest rates for those who would like to buy properties in Canada or refinance their existing homes.

As far as that is concerned, let me put a few more figures on the record to show what could be done by a suitable revision to the Bank Act. In 1967 the banks had very little power to go into the mortgage field, but as a result of the removal of the main deterrent to bank mortgage lending in that year we find that the banks have entered that field to a greater extent than most of us would have expected. Incidentally, their gain has been largely at the expense of the life insurance companies. We find that the respective share of the banks and of the life insurance companies has been reversed as far as mortgage holdings are concerned, while that of trust companies has remained relatively stable at about 50 per cent of the market.

Let me put these figures on the record. While the total mortgage market has grown 375 per cent, from $1.7 billion to $8.3 billion, in the past 11 years, bank mortgage lending has grown by 1240 per cent. In short, the activities of the banks in the mortgage field have grown four times as fast as mortgages have grown in Canada generally. This is the indication of the effect that a change in banking legislation can bring about. With suitable changes in this long overdue legislation I suggest we could once again bring about an effect of that kind, not only with regard to foreign international banking but also with regard to our domestic market, which at the present time is "frozen" as far as credit and mortgages are concerned.

Let me touch again on one very important question, the question of the extent to which our banks should be committed to enter new fields of activity. To what extent, for example, should they be able to get into the computer field or into the leasing field? These are issues which ought to be clarified. At the present time there are institutions which might be desirous of developing data processing facilities to a greater extent, but which feel that if the banks are to be given carte blanche to enter the field their efforts would be clobbered and their investment ill-advised. Again, there are examples of leasing firms which are very nervous about expanding because they feel that if the banks were given power to compete with them they would not be able to match the competition. These are uncertainties which can and must be clarified by the tabling of an amended Bank Act.

When I talk about details, perhaps it would be helpful if I were specific. There is sometimes a tendency in this House for members to gloss over the facts. The first suggestion of an amendment to the Bank Act was made on September 6, 1973. At that time, Mr. Turner, then minister of finance, stated that he hoped to introduce legislation in 1974. The hon. member who was the leader of the NDP at that time asked whether it could not be done earlier, say some time in 1973. Is it not almost ludicrous, Mr. Speaker? There was a suggestion being made that an amended bill should be introduced some time in 1973 instead of waiting until 1974. And here we are, now, in 1978, and we are told by the Minister of Finance that legislation is still being drafted over at the justice department.

In the Speech from the Throne on February 27, 1974, amendments to the Bank Act were promised. I notice that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), speaking on the Address in Reply—I am sorry he is not in the House today—stated:

> I am most pleased that this session will see amendments to the Bank Act. The Canadian banking system is substantially non-competitive and is run from Bay Street. This statement will bring vehement denials from our chartered banks but almost 100 per cent agreement from the banks' customers.

It is four years later and I have yet to hear the hon. member for Vaudreuil standing up and addressing the obvious question to the Minister of Finance: Where is the Bank Act amendment about which I spoke so favourably in 1974?

Again, on March 5, 1974, my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) put this question to the then minister of finance:

> Will the minister please make a statement shortly on what is being done with regard to a review of the Bank Act? The Bank Act has to come up for renewal . . . and a lot of hard work has to be done.

To the best of my knowledge, my hon. friend never did get an answer. At about the same time, or a little later, I asked whether the time had not come to review the banking industry again, whether there should not be another Porter commission inquiring into banking, the assets of which had grown from $20 billion to $80 billion. I point out that today our banks collectively have $150 billion in assets compared with the $20 billion at the time of the last review of the Bank Act by a commission. Surely it is unforgiveable that the Minister of Finance should still be telling us today that he cannot produce a bill even before the Easter break because it is lingering somewhere in the Department of Justice.

On June 19, 1975, the then minister of finance told the House:

> One would hope we will have a draft bill ready by the middle of next year, allowing for hearings on that bill before the final bill is presented to parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I must point out that the time allotted to the hon. member has expired. He may, however, continue unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I shall not take undue advantage of my extended time. The minister of finance of that time went on to say it would be good parliamentary practice to have an extensive hearing with respect to the Bank Act, which he had promised would be introduced early in 1976. By December 2, 1975, we find the then minister of finance saying:

> We shall be placing before the House before next summer legislation amending the Bank Act as a result of the decennial revision.

On December 3, in reply to a question by myself, the minister seemed to waffle a little. He stated:

> If I may elaborate further on my statement of yesterday, I indicated that we intend to give first reading to the bill next year without proceeding further with it so that there will be full opportunity for the community to study the bill and comment on it.

He then went on to say:

> We shall not proceed with it in the present session.

At least, though, there was an undertaking to give the bill first reading so as to allow discussion to take place.

On May 17, 1976, we find the following statement in the budget of the then minister of finance:

> Finally, to refer to another important part of the financial system, the government's proposals on the decennial revision of the Bank Act will be brought to the House later in the year. This will afford us an occasion for broad consideration of the task of financing the Canadian economy.

● (1612)

We did not see it. What we did see during the recess in August, 1976, was a white paper on banking. It was finally tabled later in that year.

Again we find that on October 14, 1976, my House leader put a question to the present House leader of the government.

The President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) stated at that time:

> Having regard to the reference to the white paper on banking, I have not had an opportunity of discussing that with the Minister of Finance or my colleagues. When I do so, which I hope will be soon, I will communicate the results to the House.

That was the answer in reply to my colleague's question as to whether we were going to have a reference of the white paper to the appropriate committee to allow some discussion of the important matters the then minister of finance had referred to. On February 15, 1977, the then minister of finance broke the news to us when he said:

> —it appears that it will not now be possible to have a fully drafted Bank Act in time for full consideration by parliament before the present Bank Act expires on June 30 next . . .
> It would therefore be the intention to introduce a short bill to extend the life of the current Bank Act for a further six months so that parliament may have adequate time to deal with the matter.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this extension was not for six months but for 12 months. Partly as a result of the draftsmanship of my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton West the original wording was changed. The bill we now have before us states that, "subject to this act, the bank may carry on the business of banking until 31st day of March, 1978, and no longer". In short we have the amendment to the 1977 Bank Act which simply gave another nine months of extended time within which the government would bring something before this House.

There is something that is perhaps being overlooked, Mr. Speaker. Because of that legislation the government today has its back to the wall. If the government does not get the extension it is asking for in Bill C-16, it cannot call the election it presumably wishes. It cannot call the election for the very simple reason that the banks would disintegrate on March 31. Surely no responsible government would ever call an election, dissolving parliament, with the realization that on March 31 the Bank Act would no longer exist; the banks would have no constitution and literally could not carry on further.

The extending legislation to which I have referred is very clear. It states that the banks may carry on until the 31st day of March, 1978—but no longer. There is no provision to cover the event of parliament not being in session. There is no provision whatsoever other than the termination of the banks.

I mention this because it clearly demonstrates the precarious way this government is running the economy of this country. The government is asking us today, on March 1, to pass legislation which, if not passed, would result in the banks disintegrating on March 31. Certainly it is unbelievable when you think of the consequences to the Canadian public if the government ever dared call an election. With the dissolution of parliament there could be no revision of the Bank Act passed. That would mean there would be no Bank Act on April 1 of this year, with the result that we would have no banks. That is an indication of the precarious way this Minister of Finance is directing the finances of this country.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker. On December 13, for example, when this question was raised, the present Minister of Finance stated:

> I will be introducing additional legislation as early as possible when we come back in January so that the committee will be able to start the very difficult work of reviewing the Bank Act again.

That was in December of last year. We were promised by this minister that legislation would be brought before us in January so we could commence as early as possible a review of whatever provisions the government proposed. On that same day I spoke of the need to have an early tabling of the banking legislation to allow us to look at it. At the committee the matter was pressed again, and on January 31 the minister stated:

> I do not know exactly when the drafting will be completed.

That was the drafting of the Bank Act bill. He went on to state:

> It is not something that is under my control. I can guess, but a guess is a guess—mid-March or something like that. I hope earlier but there is nothing that I can do.

That was on January 31. Here we are today when, in response to a question by my leader, the Minister of Finance said it was still out of his control, and he could not even promise that the bill would be tabled by March 22 when we hope to recess for Easter. That is no way to run a country, no way to run a Department of Finance, and certainly no way to play fair with the financial institutions of this country.

If the Bank Act revision has such a low priority with the emperor of this country, the Prime Minister—and I do not fault the Minister of Finance for this—it is time the Canadian public was made aware of that fact. It is time the Canadian public was made aware of the type of political expediency that comes first with the emperor, the Prime Minister, as opposed to the hard economic needs of this nation, such as a properly constituted banking community under a revised Bank Act.

On February 27 we had another comment concerning when the bill might be brought in. In short, every comment by the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary has underlined the fact that, quite frankly, they do not have control of the situation. Charged with the responsibility of running a credible financial situation in Canada, the minister presumably is being overruled by that politically expedient Prime Minister.

I make this reference because unfortunately credit in Canada means so very much compared to what it means in other countries. Our consumer credit in relation to personal incomes may now be the highest in the world. Quite frankly, I would suggest that is a dubious honour. That was an honour that used to be held by United States citizens. In 1960, Canadian consumer credit as a proportion of our disposable income was 15.5 per cent—

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think there is a rule involved here. We gave permission to the hon. member a few minutes ago to complete his remarks. It is now 15 minutes later and he is just finishing the first phrase. That is a bit long. I do not know if he will conclude in the next minute or two, but I think it would then be fair to give the floor to someone else.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I must remind the minister that once the House gives a member unanimous consent there is not much we can do about it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to point out that once we give the hon. member unanimous consent he has unlimited time.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated when the House was good enough to give me extended time, I will not be unduly long. My only comment to the Minister of Finance regarding the extra time I am taking this afternoon is that the equivalent amount was perhaps used up by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) last night when he interrupted me so frequently during my initial remarks.

My conclusion is simply that we are not talking in terms of just commercial complications or commercial impact. Consumer credit in this country is extremely high. It is an extremely important thing for the citizens of this country. Perhaps it is a dubious honour, but there is probably more consumer credit held by the average Canadian than the citizens of any other country in the world.

In 1960, Canadian consumer credit as a proportion of our disposable income was 15.5 per cent compared to 16 per cent in the U.S. In 1974 this ratio had soared in Canada to 23.1 per cent compared to 19.4 per cent in the United States. On average, every member of our employed labour force owed more than $2,250 of consumer debt in 1974. That figure has naturally gone up since that time.

Apparently Canadian attitudes with regard to credit have modified since the fifties. It has become more acceptable to separate the pleasure of acquisition from the pain of payment by the use of credit. Our chartered banks have been the leaders in servicing the public in its desire for credit. Approximately 20 years ago the banks held only 15.2 per cent of the personal loans in the country. Currently they hold over 55 per cent of all consumer credit, which in itself has expanded tenfold, from $2.9 billion to almost $30 billion today.

We must look at deposits, mortgages, consumer credit, foreign bank participation and the complication respecting credit unions. Clearly, there are very serious matters which should be dealt with promptly by this government. I urge the government to bring in the Bank Act without further delay. If in fact the government has frustration with the Department of Justice, it is time for it to be dramatized to the Canadian public. That will be the intention of my party in the days ahead.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with Bill C-16 before it passes third reading. I should like to make remarks concerning farm improvement loans, small businessmen's loans and fisheries improvement loans.

Mr. Lumley: Those areas have nothing to do with the Bank Act.

Mr. McKinley: These loans are received from banks. We are dealing with the Bank Act at the present time.

During the past number of years, most banks do not want to admit that this legislation exists. This legislation has been on the books for many years. It was amended last session in order to make the limits of loans higher and to make the definition of the small businessman higher. Amending this legislation did not do anything to make it more usable by farmers, small businessmen or fishermen.

At the time of the amendments to these acts last year, we were informed that negotiations would take place with the banks to establish an equitable interest rate for the granting of these loans. Apparently this has never been done. Farmers, fishermen and small businessmen have been turned down regularly when requesting loans under these acts.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not wish to speak incorrectly. I realize he is very interested in this area. Negotiations such as he described took place. Regulations were passed to amend the interest rate to a point above prime. The Canadian Bankers' Association has expressed warm support. It will work hard to improve the utilization of this act. Only $80 million was lent last year, but we expect much more to be lent in the months ahead. The same situation will apply in respect to farmers. I just wanted to inform the hon. member of those facts.

Mr. McKinley: I thank the hon. Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) for his intervention. I am pleased to know that some action has been taken. Perhaps it was as a result of the question I posed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) some time ago in order to get him moving on this situation. Until I posed that question, nothing had been done.

I would like to see more done in this direction. Since this legislation is on the books, it must be adhered to by the banks. If it is not adhered to, the legislation might as well be done away with. At this stage in our history it is more important for these loans to be granted by the banks, because farm incomes are down approximately 30 to 40 per cent for the last two years. Approximately three years ago the banks were not too interested in these particular loans because farmers were making enough money and small businessmen were doing fairly well. At that time the banks did not require government backing in order to grant these loans. They suggested that a demand loan would be granted based on collateral.

It is time for the government to provide a policy to the banks which can be followed in order to provide loans that are government backed, up to the percentage called for in the act. I am referring to loans to farmers, fishermen and small businessmen. I realize these people in my area are having difficulty being granted these loans.

[Mr. McKinley.]'

As expressed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), I am also very disappointed that the original Bank Act is being extended to the early part of 1979 instead of our debating the Bank Act as revised by the government. That would provide us with a chance to go over the act and discover the improvements it requires, as well as taking action in that regard.

The main reason the government does not want to bring in the Bank Act now is because it would contain unpopular provisions regarding the credit unions and the caisses populaires, particularly in Quebec. That is not the manner in which a responsible government should act. The Bank Act should be brought in as quickly as possible in order for hon. members to see what it is, think about it, make necessary changes and make sure arrangements are made to ensure that farmers, fishermen and small businessmen are able to obtain loans under this act.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address myself to this particular bill. Before the matter is brought to a vote, I should like to make a few comments.

I am as anxious as all hon. members to have this matter come to a vote, primarily because it is another opportunity to bring to the attention of Canadians the very serious shortcomings of the government of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) with respect to economic policy and the economic leadership which is greatly needed at this time. During the period of time that the minister has been in his portfolio, he has faced some of the most crucial economic times in the history of Canada. Certainly they are most crucial from the point of view of the economy of our country since the last great depression.

Approximately four years ago the matter concerning changes to the Bank Act was brought to the attention of the government by such hon. members as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). At that time it was pointed out that it was absolutely essential for the government to take steps to commence discussion, consideration and the establishment of proposals, so that by the time the act expired there would be in place provisions to go forward for another ten years. Therefore, it is not a question of whether the government was given adequate notice, nor whether the government had sufficient time to bring forward proposals. In fact, this is the second extension the government is requesting in order to carry on with the provisions of this bill. This is another indication of the lack of ideas on the part of the government regarding Canada's economy and the future we face.

The Bank Act is a very important and crucial instrument in the over-all economic planning of our country. If the chartered banks do not have any idea as to the direction in which our country is going in this particular area, nor as to the policies of the government, then how can they play their full role in the development of a stable, progressive and expansive economy?

● (1632)

I think the fact is that the minister, at the time he held the portfolio, had not really come to grips with the job. Because if he had, he would have wasted no time in ensuring, if he were going to ask for a second extension, that he had specific proposals and a specific date to lay before parliament for the introduction of the proposed Bank Act containing, as it should, the changes which this government plans to bring in. I am the last one to suggest that this action might have any bearing on the electoral prospects this year, but it seems to me that this matter transcends mere electoral prospects and that it is a duty which this government owes to the country. The minister should stand in his place at the conclusion of this debate, as he is entitled to do, and make a firm statement with respect to the timing of the introduction of the proposed legislation, so that Canadians involved in banking or in areas related to banking will be able to prepare themselves for this legislation and be given assistance and counsel in areas where they may be affected.

I simply wanted to make this brief intervention now because this legislation concerns people right across the country. People feel that the government has no sense of direction; it seems to be floundering, as has been demonstrated by the lack of confidence in our dollar in the international monetary market. It seems to be manifested in the way in which our economy is managed. The prospects seem to be very bleak. I do not say this out of a sense of pride or any glee. I say it with sorrow, because a country like Canada, which has so much to offer and so much potential, deserves leadership which this government is neither able nor capable of providing.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this third reading debate of this minor bill which has so little in it, merely a 12 months' hoist to the Bank Act which should have been presented to the House a long time ago.

In view of the fact that Canadians have always taken an interest in the banking system and that it was decided that it was in the best interests of the country to have a ten year review of the Bank Act, it is with a good deal of reservation that Canadians are looking at this bill and at the failure of the government to introduce a new Bank Act. Until this is done, the financial community is hamstrung and the economic well-being of this country is hampered. Not only are the very large banks uncertain but so are small credit unions which have considerable reservations with respect to this legislation.

I know from the letters I have been receiving that small credit unions, their managers and supporters, are following this debate with interest. A suspicion has arisen amongst credit union people that somehow the legislation is being stalled at the insistence of senior bank officers in order to hamper the growth of our credit unions and caisses populaires. Perhaps these suspicions are not altogether well founded. Certainly these institutions have greatly contributed to the economic life of this country over the years, particularly in rural communities. They view this delay with considerable alarm. They wonder if the government is deliberately stalling the revision of the Bank Act because they have legislation in store for credit unions which would not meet with acceptance from them. Certainly the public has a right to know before the election is called, and the government should not foist on them legislation with which they cannot live. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) should come clean with the House of Commons and with the public and give us an outline of the new Bank Act which, he says, is being drafted and which he cannot get back from the Department of Justice.

There is no doubt that we should have a new Bank Act and everyone knows that changes to it are needed, but what they will be it is difficult to know. Will they be so unpleasant that the voters will not like them? Of course, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that the government is a party of the radical centre. Just what does that mean? How radical is it? He said also, "We are a party of the radical middle". I have never heard of any people in the middle of the political spectrum being called radicals. Indeed, they do not do very much, and that is what this bill is all about. I think this short bill is merely a prescription to go on doing nothing.

Surely now is the time when the new Bank Act is necessary to give us a vision of the way ahead. The government even put out a glossy pamphlet a few months ago called, "The Way Ahead"; but in view of the delay of the Bank Act perhaps it should be called "The Way Behind".

It is a long time since the economy of this country has been more uncertain and there has been such a pessimistic outlook. In yesterday's issue of the Globe and Mail there was a survey by the Bank of Montreal which had polled 2,261 businesses which showed a generally uniform gloomy outlook. They thought there would be a continuing rise in consumer prices. It is interesting to note that some 60 per cent of the surveyed respondents felt that the devaluation of the Canadian dollar hurt their competitive position, while only 40 per cent believed that it had improved it. This shows mixed feelings about the devaluation of the dollar among those who should know best. Most thought that there would be no change in capital spending, and a large majority suggested that the federal government should cut back on spending. Certainly the necessity for the federal government to borrow $200 million in our circumstances demonstrates the underlying weakness of our position in the world economy.

The Minister of Finance even suggested that he would go to the New York market in order to raise the foreign borrowing to support the dollar which he had announced last week. Certainly it is difficult to agree with the minister that the dollar is floating, at least cleanly, when we have committed such a large amount of our reserves to the so-called orderly flow. The other day the Minister of Finance said in Montreal that the recovery is gaining momentum. He said that in the third and fourth quarters of last year the long term growth rate has increased, but according to Statistics Canada, our activity was off markedly in the fourth quarter.

It is stated in the Toronto Star today that in 1977 the growth rate dropped to 2.6 per cent. Certainly this compares unfavourably with the increase of 4.9 per cent in 1976 and 1.1 per cent in 1975.

The government has just brought down its spending estimates. The President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) was elated at the fact that over-all government expenditures were restricted to an increase of some 9.8 per cent. In fact, he forgot to say that even if they could be restricted to that extent, the taxation rates are not keeping up with the inflation rates, so that we can expect greater and greater deficits. With the deficit of some $9 billion this year, and upward of $10 billion or $12 billion forecast for next year, surely it cannot be said that this government is running a tight financial ship.

● (1642)

There has been a great deal of mismanagement in this government over the past ten years. In a speech to a mining association a senior tax consultant suggested that the Canadian mining industry faces two decades of low returns because of federal and provincial changes in tax laws some years ago. The federal government has not moved to improve the situation. Our financial institutions are in a state of flux. For instance, Sun Life decided, for various reasons, that it should move out of the province of Quebec. I cannot say I agree or disagree with the motives of Sun Life, but I believe it has the right to move to a location which suits its method of doing business. After all, it would be difficult to comply with the regulations the government of Quebec feels are necessary and still do business with the rest of the country.

According to a story in today's Montreal Star, American banking institutions and brokers have threatened to flood the market with millions of dollars in Quebec bonds if the Quebec government does not tone down its nationalist initiatives. This might be one of the reasons Mr. Levesque did not introduce nationalist measures in his inaugural address to the National Assembly.

Westerners are interested in the Bank Act. Canadian banking institutions tend to be concentrated in Montreal and Toronto. The workings of these banking institutions have caused a decrease in activity in western Canada. One individual involved with architectural work told me he had to go to Toronto every two weeks to get money to carry out building plans. In assessing new banking rules and new legislation it is important to take into account that whatever may be the future of this country, whether it be a so-called sovereignty-association, a confederation, or whatever, the regions will have to shoulder more of the burden of carrying out their own functions. We in western Canada are anxious that there be more banking facilities in the west and that the people who live in the west have more control over them.

The minister has been lax in not bringing forward revisions to the Bank Act. I suspect he is hoping to hold that off until after the next election. However, that would mean we would have to go a few more months without knowing the financial guidelines for the next few years.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point or order, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with respect to the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. This is a bill which has the support of all parties in the House. Would the acting government House leader be prepared to undertake to go ahead with this bill on Friday, the next government day? We would undertake in turn to deal with the measure in all three stages. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others have been pressing for this bill for a long time and we are prepared to give it three readings—

Some hon. Members: Now!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Members on the government benches say "Now!". I presume the minister is ready to proceed. In that case we too are ready to proceed.

Mr. Cafik: I am not sure I have completely understood the hon. member. Am I correct in understanding that between now and six o'clock members will be prepared to pass this bill in all its stages? If so, I am prepared to call the bill now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Provided there could be some voluntary division of the time available so that a few words might be said by spokesmen for each of the parties, we would be prepared to do it now.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, that proposal sounds very sensible to me. We sometimes waste time but, in this instance we want to save time. As for our party, we agree with proceeding the way the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested, provided of course the time is well divided.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House seems disposed to let the measure go through all stages between now and six o'clock provided there is some division of the time available to allow a representative of each party to make some contribution. If the bill is ready, perhaps it could be called as the next order of government business. Of course, the bill was introduced for first reading earlier this day so it would require unanimous consent at each stage before going further. In particular, it would require unanimous consent to change the motion so as to refer the bill to the committee of the whole House.

Is there unanimous consent to proceed with the bill at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion, then, will be presented accordingly by unanimous consent.

COMPENSATION FOR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND SCOPE OF BENEFITS

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-27, to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, be read the second time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today on a bill designed to improve the lot of members of the armed forces who were prisoners of war during the first world war and others who were later evaders in enemy or enemy occupied territory. The House will agree that Canada owes a debt of gratitude to the men and women who answered the call of their country and served so gallantly for the preservation of our freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Canada's legislation for pension benefits and other services for our veteran population ranks among the best in the world.

It gives me a great deal of personal satisfaction to speak on a bill to amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. The bill will affect compensation paid to about 200 veterans who were prisoners of war during the first world war and about 100 "evaders"—persons who were in enemy or enemy-occupied territory and evaded capture. These evaders were, in general, members of the RCAF who were shot down during the second world war and avoided capture after reaching the ground. Also affected by the bill are a number of veterans who had become prisoners of war and who escaped from their captors.

This measure, the provisions of which are retroactive to April 1, 1976, will amend the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act to provide compensation for former prisoners of war of the first world war and evaders and escapees under the same basic terms and conditions as for second world war prisoners of war of another power. Under the present legislation, Mr. Speaker, only the time actually spent as a prisoner of war may be counted toward computation of POW compensation. Some prisoners escaped and were recaptured, as I said before; others managed to evade capture and eventually reached allied lines or were able to return to the United Kingdom.

● (1732)

It is estimated, however, that there may be as many as 75 cases where an escapee's rate of compensation would be increased if the time between escape and recapture, or escape and eventual reporting to his own or allied force, could be counted as prisoner of war time. There are now about 200 surviving members of the armed forces who evaded capture by the enemy, and it is estimated half of this number evaded the enemy for three months or more.

Members will recall that in 1971 the Pension Act was amended to provide special benefits to the equivalent of a minimum 50 per cent pension to former prisoners of war of the Japanese because of the long-term after effects they suffered as a result of their imprisonment.

Four years later the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act was passed. This act provides benefits on a sliding scale to former prisoners of war of other powers during the second world war and other later conflicts. It also upgraded the benefits for those who were POWs of the Japanese.

There can be no doubt that conditions in German prisoner of war camps 60 years ago were very primitive indeed—conditions and experiences that do not relate to any other civilized kind of incarceration. This group of about 200 first world war prisoners of war, whose average age is about 82, probably suffered from malnutrition and deprivation to an extent at least equivalent to their second world war counterparts.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the measures proposed in this bill will be welcomed by every member of the House as further evidence of Canada's awareness of the special contribution made by our veterans to our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to pay special tribute to all those who have been involved in the studies which led to this bill: the veterans' organizations, the members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, other members of this House and officials of the Canadian Pension Commission.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, today, as a result of the introduction of these amendments to the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, we are taking another small step in achieving the recognition due and commitment to another small segment of our veterans population. In this case we are recognizing, albeit it some 60 years late, the effects of incarceration on first world war prisoners, as well as escapees and evaders during the second world war, because of the suffering and dangers to which they were exposed. As a result of avoiding capture they experienced effects in some cases equal to the danger to their lives, which they offered Canada at the call of our government, a call to their patriotism as the youth of our country.

While I feel it is my duty, and I do so without reservation, to commend the minister for listening to the plea of veterans organizations, the veterans themselves who were caught in this situation, and most members of the House of Commons who made a plea to bring in this bill which will overcome another part of the faith that we want to restore in the veterans of Canada as to what Canada's commitment is to them. I hope that even with the introduction of this bill, which will correct another glaring inequity in the veterans charter, hon. members will remember we should not feel too smug about what we have accomplished, if indeed it is an accomplishment. Perhaps it should be better described as giving ourselves relief from guilt complex; it is a relief to our conscience because we waited so long to recognize that incarceration in POW camps in the first world war also had serious effects on the lives of those who served and denied them the advantage of opportunity back in that great country of Canada at the same level as those who returned unharmed.

I welcome the fact, too, that those within the department of the minister have had the compassion to make the effective date of compensation retroactive to the original date of bill C-292, April 1976, which is only fair and decent. In some cases this will amount to some financial relief to those veterans who, on a small pension, are faced with the effects of a strangling inflation which is so difficult to cope with these days.

In the case of veterans who fall in the 10 per cent to 20 per cent category, this amendment should mean that they will receive, because of the retroactivity, between $1,300 and $2,600. Perhaps this will take away some of the sting of bitterness which they feel towards politicians as a whole, and as they wonder why all of a sudden we can find the insignificant sum of some $200,000 to $350,000 to provide a bit of extra comfort for the few who are left, probably by this time numbering below 200.

The first world war veteran is of the average age of some 83 years. According to statistics I gathered, in 1976 there were some 12,404 first world war veterans receiving disability pension. In 1977 this dropped by 1,500 because many of them passed away. This means we are losing some 15 per cent of our first world war veterans each year.

Based on these figures it is natural to assume that the known 200 prisoners of war probably number now somewhere around 150. It is tragic that the 50 or so who have passed away could not have been afforded a little bit of the financial comfort they might have enjoyed had it not been for our procrastination.

One of the small advantages that will result from this bill is that it will bring some of the first world war widows up to the 48 per cent category which will provide them with a widow's pension. Even though there will be few, this is one small advantage of this bill.

This brings up another point and gives us the opportunity of referring to the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, a recommendation that was accepted unanimously as a result of the Hermann Report which brought about the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. Let me quote that recommendation:

> That because the difference in widows benefits for those whose husbands were pensioned above and below 48 per cent is too extreme, the widows of those pensioned below 48 per cent should be awarded a pension that is the same percentage of the widows pension as the assessment of her deceased husband's disability, including any additional compensation awarded as a result of this study.

This means that compensation of 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 20 per cent, depending on the period of incarceration, would be added to the amount of pension payable under the Pension Act on account of pensionable disability, to a maximum total of 100 per cent; and that escapees and evaders should also be considered, which they now are.

We really could have commended the minister and his government to a far greater extent, at a time when they could use a little praise, if they had accepted the very important and vital recommendation to amend the Pension Act to award widows' pensions to those who at present cannot qualify because of the fact that their veteran husbands died when in receipt of a disability pension of less than 48 per cent. It is stated in the recommendation, and I think it is worthwhile putting on the record:

> Your Committee also recommends to the House that consideration be given to amending the Pension Act to provide that a widow's pension be awarded on a sliding scale as follows:
> When at the time of death of the prisoner he was, or would have been, in receipt of a pension assessed at 47 per cent or less, that pension be paid to the widow in double proportion to the assessed degree of the pensioner's disability as it relates to the basic pension granted to widows.

I had hoped that the minister, who agrees with this recommendation, would include this in the bill. At the present time a full widow's pension is paid when the pensioner's death was attributable to, or was incurred during, wartime military service, or, in the case of peacetime forces, if it arose out of, or was directly connected with, service, or when the pensioner's disability was assessed at 48 per cent or more at the time of death. Because 100 per cent of the widow's pension is payable when the disability pension was paid at a 50 per cent rate, the effect of this would be that a double proportion would be payable if the disability was assessed at a lesser rate. For example, if the veteran who died was receiving 40 per cent, his widow would receive double that, or 80 per cent. The minister agreed with this. It is unfortunate that he could not convince cabinet.

The inequity with regard to the widows of veterans who died receiving less than 48 per cent condemns anything which is right in society. Either those responsible are not aware of this absolute discrimination, or they do not care. It is a condemnation of any agency commissioned by parliament, whether it is responsible for studying equality or the status of women, human rights and civil liberties, or any other government agency responsible for the welfare of Canadians.

How in the name of all that is humane and decent can the following be rationalized? A married disability pensioner is entitled to $372.93, at the rate of 48 per cent. Upon his death his widow is deemed to need and receives $447.53. If that veteran was receiving $37.28 less, or 1 per cent less, she is deemed to need $335.65. When he dies, and unless his death is attributable to war service, his widow receives nothing. Thus, she is relegated to the mercy of the welfare system in the province where she lives.

This is particularly unfair in the case of World War I veterans. In a great number of cases, their widows spent most of their years caring for their husbands. It is just not right. Also it is difficult to reconcile this when compared to the fact that the wife of a veteran recipient of war veterans allowance is protected after her husband's death. She receives the married rate of $502 per month for a year, and then reverts to the single rate of $300 per month.

I hope the minister can convince cabinet that something must be done. World War I veterans are now 83 years of age, and World War II veterans range between the ages of 60 and 63. After the bill is passed, World War I veterans who were prisoners of war will have to apply. The facts should be pointed out to them in a note, in order for them to take advantage of anything which exists under the act.

In 1973 it was agreed that the basic rate of pension would be equated to the five lowest categories in the public service. We agreed that it should be done on a wage indexing basis, yet it was done on a cost of living indexing basis. That caused veterans to fall behind. This creates concern among veterans and I hope the minister will give it serious consideration.

At the present time a veteran who is receiving a 90 per cent disability pension and is also entitled to the 20 per cent rate increase would lose 10 per cent because his rate would exceed 100 per cent. Something should be included in the act to allow him to receive the full benefit of the 20 per cent.

There are many items which should be dealt with when the estimates appear before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I hope the suggestions I have outlined will be taken into consideration. My party appreciates the compassion of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, as well as his department. The department is continuing to study the cases of veterans and their war service. Even though we perhaps feel embarrassed, have a good Pension Act and a good veterans' charter, we should not rest. Agreement was reached to put this bill through all stages today. That is indicative of how the House of Commons feels toward the veterans of our country.

Veterans made this country great. That is a fact which seems to be forgotten too often. We must remember the dedication, the service and the sacrifice made by the youth of 1914-17, 1939-45, and at the time of the Korean War. I hope this bill will be put through, and that World War I veterans, escapees and evaders will receive the benefits they are entitled to as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I very warmly welcome the introduction of Bill C-27. We have indicated our approval by pointing out that we are prepared for the bill to be put through all remaining stages this afternoon. If perchance we have not reached that point by six o'clock, I hope Your Honour will not see the clock until all necessary deliberations with respect to this bill have been completed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As has been pointed out on quite a few occasions, the number of prisoners of war veterans of World War I who are still with us is not very great. Probably they amount to about 200. That means they are scattered all over Canada.

The day after it reached the media that this legislation would be brought in, one of these veterans, who was a prisoner of war in World War I, came to Parliament Hill. He saw me in the rotunda. I believe he went to see the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), as well as the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). This gentleman happens to be just at the average age which has been mentioned, 82. When I looked at him, I realized he looked as young as I do. He said that of course the extra dollars would be useful to him, and that he was glad to know the money would be forthcoming. But what meant the most to him was the recognition which was being accorded, even though it was more than 60 years after the time he was a prisoner of war in German prison camps during World War I.

I have received two letters from other parts of the country since it became clear that this legislation would be put through. In both cases the same message appeared: they are glad to get the money, but what really helps is the recognition which is now being accorded. Therefore, we are happy to give our support to this bill and to see to it that it is passed this afternoon.

I hope I can be forgiven for saying that this bill should not have been necessary at all. These provisions should have been contained in Bill C-92 which was brought before the House in March and April of 1976. As the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe pointed out, the recommendations of the Hermann Commission and the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs referred to all Canadian veterans who had been prisoners of war, and not just those who had been prisoners of war during World War II. But when the government brought in the bill, it was narrowed.

● (1752)

Also, the escapers and the evaders were mentioned in the Hermann report and also in the report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, so they should have been dealt with then. It is unfortunate that some who might have gained by this legislation had they been included in the original bill have passed on, but at any rate it is good we are doing it now.

Like the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, I welcome the fact that the same effective date which was in bill C-92 of 1976 is being retained in this legislation, which means that a World War I veteran who was a prisoner of war, whenever he applies, can pick up the compensation that is coming to him retroactive to April 1, 1976.

We are glad that all of the other provisions apply. Some of those provisions could be improved for the whole group, and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe mentioned one or two of them. There is also the question of whether the rates might be increased, and there are questions that can be raised about some categories still not included.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) the other day had a motion in which he expressed the hope that some of those from allied forces who were prisoners of war in World War I or World War II and who are now in Canada might have been included. There is also the case of a group of priests who were the victims of enemy action in the Atlantic during World War II and found themselves spending the rest of the war in a POW camp in Europe and who ministered greatly and effectively to the enlisted personnel who were in that camp. There are those of the prisoners of war associations in this country who feel that they should be considered as well. Unfortunately, they are not covered in this bill, but there is a motion on the order paper for the reference of the annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs to our committee, so that when we do get that reference before us, we can discuss those matters as well.

So far as this legislation is concerned, even though it is two years late we welcome it and we are very happy to put it through all stages this afternoon.

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe pointed out that there are certain facts that should be made known to those who will apply for this compensation. Let it be remembered that if there are such veterans who are receiving the war veterans allowance because their other benefits do not bring them up to the ceiling set in that act, the way that act reads, what they get as prisoners of war compensation will come off their war veterans allowance. This means that though they may feel it is better to have something that is recognition rather than a form of welfare, we should be taking another look at the means test provisions in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The other two things I want to say have been said very effectively by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, but he and I, as well as others, feel that we cannot fail to emphasize these points every time there is an opportunity to do so. The question of the widow in the case where the veteran's pension was less than 48 per cent is not foreign to the whole subject matter that is before us because it was dealt with in the Hermann report and it was part of the recommendation that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs made to the House. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has read portions of that recommendation.

I still feel, as do many people in this country, that it is unthinkable that a woman who was married to a veteran on a 48 per cent pension can get the full widow's pension if her husband dies, but another woman married to a veteran on a 47 per cent pension gets nothing after the veteran dies. Surely the idea of at least a pro rata pension, which is what our recommendation called for, must be considered. We shall deal with this issue when we get to committee on the annual report of the department and we shall deal with it when we have the estimates before the committee, for this issue simply cannot be forgotten. As I say, that is part of the whole matter that was raised in the Hermann report.

The other issue raised by my friend from Newfoundland is still with us very strongly, namely, that the understanding of 1973 has, in our view, not been carried forward in that the basic rate of the war disability pension has not been retained at the level of the average take home pay of the five categories in the public service which were designated that year. This too we can deal with when we are in committee on the various items that have been referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

I can say to you, sir, and to the minister and the government, that these issues cannot be side-tracked. There are still other matters that relate to veterans. Once we have dealt with World War I prisoners of war, there are two other main issues, the ones we are talking about this afternoon, namely the position of the widow whose veteran husband's pension was below 48 per cent, and the basic rate of the war disability pension itself. There is no doubt in my friend's mind or mine where the minister's heart is with respect to this. We are satisfied that he is with us and we sympathize with him because of the trouble he has with his tight-fisted colleagues in the cabinet. I hope he looks upon our keeping at him on these issues as being a case of supporting him in what must be done for the veterans of this country.

So, Mr. Speaker, there are these items of unfinished business. We shall keep at them. But so far as Bill C-27 is concerned, we welcome it and we are prepared to see it passed through all stages this afternoon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) is it agreed that, because of the disposition of the House to proceed through all stages of the bill this afternoon, I do not see the clock until we have adopted the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for this bill designed to improve the lot of members of the Armed Forces who were prisoners of war during the first world war and others who were later evaders in enemy or enemy occupied territory.

Of course, this bill will affect only about 300 people, which is not very many. However, Mr. Speaker, I hasten to add that we members of the Social Credit Party of Canada warmly welcome the provisions of this bill. There is no doubt that ex-prisoners of war deserve gratitude and respect from people all over the country. In light of the gradual erosion of the real value of the benefits now paid by the federal government to this category of citizens, the passing of this measure will undoubtedly help them. Mr. Speaker, we cannot ignore the needs of veterans who just like us have to face increases in the cost of living and all kinds of expenses. I sincerely think that it is our duty to ensure that this bill which has just been introduced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs is passed this afternoon as quickly as possible.

I am all the more aware that it has become urgent to welcome the representations made by these ex-prisoners of war that they have been very badly treated and that they were victims of atrocities. As stated by the minister in his speech, these few hundreds of prisoners of war of the first world war who are 82 on the average have probably suffered from malnutrition and deprivation as much as if not more than those of the second world war. In fact, do the effects of such imprisonment not stay with you for the rest of your life? These prisoners of war, who for the most part were volunteers, had to leave their home to fight. They accepted to run all sorts of risks and even to die if necessary to defend their country. In any case, the minister proved this afternoon that the government has considered their problem and that they are entitled to be heard and even to get what they have been seeking for a long time.

Before closing, I would like to urge the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to reconsider his decision of October 26 last, namely that the federal government would not recommend to Parliament that the basic rate of disability pensions be increased for all veterans unable to work.

In June 1973, the House passed a bill which aimed at amending the legislation concerning veterans' pensions. Under this bill, the federal government promised that disability pensions for veterans would achieve parity with the wages earned by a group of non-specialized workers within the public service of Canada. As you certainly know, Mr. Speaker, a 7.2 per cent increase was granted on January 1 in view of the consumer price index increase. In spite of this, the basic rate is still $240 less than the average yearly wages of the non-specialized employee group of the public service of Canada after deduction of all income tax.

In my humble opinion, it would be an exaggeration to suggest that the present Canadian legislation for veterans is the best in the world if we consider that in the United States, the compensation rate for 100 percent disability was $707 a month, or $8,484 a year, on January 1, 1977, which virtually means that an American veteran with 100 per cent disability received $1,805 more a year than a Canadian veteran. This shows that the American legislation gives a basic compensation guarantee of 25 per cent more than the disability pension granted to Canadian veterans.

Mr. Speaker, all I want is for those people to live happy lives. I have asked the minister to consider also the category of veterans of the second world war who must also pay more for what they buy in view of current inflation.

I hope in closing that the Minister of Veterans Affairs will examine this matter and introduce a bill as soon as possible to help the veterans, like he has done this afternoon.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this is a good day upon which to put this bill through. I believe it is St. David's day. I have no hesitation whatsoever in supporting this bill which has been introduced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). We see today that when good men of goodwill want to work together, they can work together for the good of those who are in need. An example which all of us can follow is being set. I commend the minister and hon. members in all parties who are co-operating in getting this bill through all stages. I trust that the minister will receive the necessary support from the cabinet for even further amendments to veterans legislation in the very near future.

That is all I have to say. I have not had equal time, just sufficient time.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make a few remarks about these amendments to the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. I congratulate and commend the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) for bringing in these amendments which provide benefits for veterans and escapees of World War I as well as those of World War II. I thank all hon. members for their support of my motion in this House on February 10 asking the minister to consider in the future that this bill apply to all Canadian citizens who were prisoners of war or escapees in World War I and World War II.

I think today when human rights acts are being proclaimed we should do everything we can to extend fair and equal treatment to all Canadian citizens. If possible, I urge the minister in the very near future to bring in additional amendments to include all Canadian citizens who were prisoners of war or escapees in World War I and World War II.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being after six o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6.08 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
