NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—SUGGESTION COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES BE IMPROVED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 regarding a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the United States and, presumably, the joint Canada-U.S. NORAD command centre knew in early December that there was a nuclear-powered cell aboard a malfunctioning Soviet satellite, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has been unable to explain why the Minister of National Defence did not receive this information until last week, and this information was withheld from the Prime Minister in spite of the fact that he skied into NORAD headquarters for his supposedly more than comprehensive briefing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That this government take measures to improve communications between the Canadian command and the Prime Minister before another crisis occurs.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of this matter increases month to month, so I am going to try again.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House urges the government to introduce without delay an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to provide for the spouse's allowance to be replaced by an equivalent allowance to be paid to all persons between the ages of 60 and 65, including widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors as well as spouses, provided they are out of the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT'S PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I move a motion under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro). In view of the statement of the Commissioner of Official Languages that the bilingual bonus program of the government is a comedy of errors, is not one of the government's best moves and has been inevitably unsuccessful, and since it has caused ill-will, jealousy and a sense of discrimination in the public service, I move:

That the government be condemned for its shortsightedness in respect of this costly program and that it be terminated forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

REQUEST INITIATIVES BE TAKEN TO IMPROVE WEST COAST HANDLING FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S. O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, now that grain movements from west coast ports have reached crisis proportions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately announce new initiatives for the Prince Rupert elevator in order that it may quickly reach its potential of 50 million to 60 million bushels, thereby alleviating congestion at Vancouver and helping prairie farm income.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

HOME DELIVERY OF MAIL—ALLEGED CONTRADICTION BETWEEN MINISTER'S STATEMENT AND DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding a pressing and urgent matter. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General stated in this House on Monday that "there was no intention of doing anything which would have a negative impact on the letter carriers or, indeed, on home delivery," and in view of the report prepared for senior Post Office officials, including the alternate day delivery proposal, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the minister make a statement on motions explaining the apparent contradiction between his assurances in the House on home delivery of mail and the reports now being prepared within his department.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROTECTION OF CANADA'S NORTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada's resources were not sufficient to warn the Prime Minister of a potentially dangerous Soviet satellite landing in Canada's north, and that the warning came first from the President of the United States, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That this government take initiatives to safeguard Canada's north, and scrap plans to remove from Churchill, Manitoba, the only active winter warfare training unit in Canada capable of handling such an event; and furthermore, in order to ensure the protection of Canada's citizens and sovereignty, that this government retain and reinforce the existing 35-family armed forces base in Churchill, Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Schellenberger.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

REQUEST GOVERNMENT IMPROVE HANDLING FACILITIES ON WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, hoping to receive unanimous consent, with regard to the recurring problem of lack of co-ordination in the movement of grain through the west coast ports. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the ministers of agriculture and transport avail themselves at the earliest opportunity in the House to make statements on motions with regard to the chronic problem of the movement of grain through the west coast ports, those of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, offering a solution which would see the co-ordination of rail and port traffic and better utilization of the grain handling facilities on the west coast.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—LEGISLATION THAT CANADIAN STEEL BE USED FOR PIPE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Deputy Prime Minister's earlier assurance that Canadian steel producers would receive the overwhelming majority of contracts to supply steel for the Alcan pipeline, and in view of doubts cast on this assurance by other cabinet ministers and American officials, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House instruct the government to guarantee in its bill on the pipeline that Canadian steel will fill the majority of pipeline contracts.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

CRITICISM OF MINISTER'S ACTIONS VIS-À-VIS GATT NEGOTIATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that trade in agricultural products is not mentioned in Canada's original presentation at GATT, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Minister of Agriculture be severely reprimanded for being so callous toward trading relations in agricultural products.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF ADULT TRAINING COURSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As there is an everincreasing number of unemployed, and as there is good reason to hope that the situation is only temporary, for I am very optimistic seeing Canada will be needing more and more trained workers to fill the needs of its industrial development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to negotiate with the provincial governments, and more particularly with that of Quebec, that more people be allowed to benefit from the adult training programs, more specifically in the field of heavy equipment, with a view to soon being able to meet the needs more adequately in that field.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED WHO COLLECTED WELFARE AFTER EXPIRY OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I wonder if the minister can confirm to the House of Commons the accuracy of figures from the Unemployment Insurance Commission which indicate that in the month of December alone in excess of 42,000 Canadians who were on unemployment insurance had their benefits expire and went onto the welfare rolls of the provinces or municipalities, many of whom were not in a position to bear the financial burden of this failure in federal policy. Can the minister confirm that the expiry rate of people on unemployment insurance benefits was more than 42,000 in the month of December alone?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again we have the official opposition trotting out all of the figures from StatsCan and always emphasizing the negative, never the positive—

● (1417)

Mr. Cullen: —never the fact that some $117 million, for example, was spent in the Atlantic provinces to help with employment, never the fact that we introduced the job experience training program in co-operation with private enterprise. Never anything positive, always the negative.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, as the unemployed of Canada know, there is a great deal of negative to emphasize in the record of this government. I presume the minister's evasion can be taken as confirmation that, indeed, in one month alone 42,000 or more Canadians went off unemployment insurance and onto the welfare rolls of provinces and municipalities, which cannot afford that burden.

Is the minister monitoring that situation now? Given the fact that in the month of December, 37 per cent of those who were unemployed had been unemployed for longer than three months, can the minister tell us what will be the number of people who will be coming off unemployment insurance, because of the failure of this government, and becoming a charge on local municipalities and provinces which cannot afford that burden?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, here, again, the Leader of the Opposition does not, in fact, indicate that half of the cost of that particular operation is borne by the federal government. He also neglects to point out the facilities that are available in all of the regions for training, for the replacement of these individuals, and for mobility grants where they are necessary. It is not as though there is no help available. The fact is that many items are in place to cope with this particular need. The Leader of the Opposition, of course, chooses to ignore that.

FINANCE

FINANCIAL BURDEN ON PROVINCES BECAUSE OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister will soon recognize that the problems caused by the failure of the economic policy of this government simply will not go away because he ignores them. I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, in the absence of the Minister of Finance. Is the minister monitoring the situation to which I have referred, in order to determine the weight of the burden being imposed upon provincial governments, particularly those of the less wealthy provinces, and upon the municipalities, to see if there must be any changes in the financial arrangements relating to those governments because of the failure of this government to follow an economic policy which creates jobs for Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, a conference of finance ministers is currently looking into the economic situation and outlook. I am sure that if the finance ministers of some provinces are particularly concerned with this question, they will discuss it with their federal counterpart.

As far as the role of the government is concerned, as my colleague has indicated earlier, we pay 50 per cent of expenses related to assistance to the needy and the provinces and municipalities pay the rest. We will continue to provide these funds. Referring to my own experience as Minister of National Health and Welfare, I can say that the provinces have not made any representations or requests that the federal government should increase its contribution. I must also point out to the hon. member that each year under the equalization program the federal government pays several billion dollars to the provinces whose revenues are below the national average.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister demonstrates that the government can avoid answering questions in both official languages. I should now like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Given the fact that there was an increase of 40,000 in the number of unemployed last month, that more than 42,000 people who were on unemployment insurance went off that and on to the welfare rolls of provinces and municipalities, and the number of shut-downs by business, creating joblessness across the country, will the Prime Minister, putting the country's interests ahead of those of his party, now give us an undertaking that the government of Canada will immediately bring in a new budget designed to create jobs through a substantial tax cut that will stimulate consumption and demand in the country?

[Mr. Cullen.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at any time in the life of a nation, at any time in the life of an economic cycle—even when the economic cycle is on the upturn—there are unemployed. Their plight is of concern to this government. There are unemployed who are not eligible for unemployment insurance and who are on welfare. As both my colleagues have stated, the government pays 50 per cent of that program.

• (1422)

The question is: Is the government's present economic posture the proper one to create hope and growth for the future? On this aspect we have evidence from the very authors quoted by the opposition, the OECD, that the government's posture is, in fact, creating growth at a rate faster than any other nation except Japan and possibly, marginally, the United States. At the same time, on a per capita basis more people are coming onto the labour market in Canada than in any other nation. This is the situation which creates unemployment and it is one which causes us great concern. As I say, the question we have to ask ourselves is this: Should our short-term and medium-range economic posture be changed?

Some hon. Members: Order.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT INSTITUTE NEW PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would say, first, to the Prime Minister that what needs to be changed is the government.

We are approaching the stage at which practically half of the one million unemployed are not eligible for unemployment insurance, as illustrated by the fact that 37 per cent have been unemployed for three months or more. Since 35 per cent of these long-term unemployed are men aged 24 or over—which means they are breadwinners and heads of families—it is obvious that existing job-creation programs are not keeping up with the need. Given the scope of this problem in terms of the additional burden imposed upon the poorer provinces especially, and in terms of the human suffering behind every one of these statistics, I ask the minister what additional advice he is giving to his colleagues in government with respect to additional programs to alleviate this situation.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): This is not just a concern of mine during the question period, Mr. Speaker; it is one which concerns me on a daily basis. This is why we were able to get in excess of half a billion dollars from Treasury Board for direct job-creation programs. That is why I considered it appropriate that better use should be made of unemployment insurance funds, so we turned to developmental measures for training, work-sharing and job creation. That is why the Minister of Finance has introduced an employment tax credit program.

In excess of $700 million is being spent in this particular field. It might be argued that we should be spending even more, but I would point out that the money comes from people who are in fact working, people who say, "Do not overspend. Do not create more inflation which would be counterproductive and, in the final analysis, create more unemployment." The amount of money to be used and the direction to be taken are matters of judgment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: My concern and, I believe, the concern of most of us in this House, is for Canadians who are not working. I will put the question this way: Last year job creation lagged behind the growth in the labour force by 129,000. That is straightforward and surely the minister can understand it. It is obvious that government programs are not even keeping up with the growth in the labour force. In these circumstances, does the minister intend to sit back and depend on programs which have demonstrated their inability to keep up with the growth in the work force, or the growth in unemployment, or is he recommending to his cabinet colleagues new programs, for example, public works programs, so as to make an impact upon this problem now?

An hon. Member: Same question.

Mr. Cullen: It is because of the government's concern over this question that a whole series of new programs has been put in place. What the hon. member is doing is robbing the individuals concerned of any hope that things will get better. I believe the economic growth component of the Canada Works program is a positive step forward. I believe my meetings with the western ministers could be very productive. A whole series of measures is in place, designed to help people for whom my concern is just as great as that of the hon. member.

POST OFFICE

HOME MAIL DELIVERY—ALLEGED CONTRADICTION BETWEEN MINISTER'S STATEMENT AND DEPARTMENTAL PROPOSALS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. On Monday he said in the House that he had no intention of doing anything which would have a negative effect on home deliveries or on the letter carriers. Can the minister confirm that departmental officials at the most senior level, including the Deputy Postmaster General, are presently considering proposals which would restrict delivery of mail to existing and new homes and, if such proposals are being considered, how does he explain the contradiction with what he said on Monday?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): As the hon. gentleman knows—and I thank him for his question—there are a number of points that need clarification. As he knows, there has been a freeze, in terms of employment and man-years, by government institutions. The Post Office is a government institution and therefore we have been subjected to that freeze. This has meant that in new subdivisions there has been no extension of the letter carrier service.

The first part of the hon. member's question does not address itself specifically to that question but, rather, to the report that has received a great deal of publicity. That report dates back to August of last year. I reiterate that there is no intention at this time to restrict in any way the employment of letter carriers or, indeed, to cut back on the employment of letter carriers in accordance with programs that we have in place.

Mr. Orlikow: How does the minister equate what he has just said with one of the objectives of this advisory council, which states:

> The project team was asked to produce a mail delivery proposal which offered an alternative to both the current door-to-door delivery system and the alternate day delivery proposal.

It goes on to talk about the possible cutback of 3,000 letter carriers.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member understands that in an organization such as the Post Office, which is dynamic and which considers at all times various operations and various methods of providing service to the Canadian public, reports are formulated for the purpose of preparing ourselves for decision-making. That report was done for that purpose. Decisions were taken as of the middle of August last year. I reiterate the statement I made in Toronto last Saturday, that there is no intention of cutting back the letter carriers' service. I repeat what I said then, that no measure will be taken by the Post Office which would have a negative impact on the letter carriers or on any of the work force without full, prior consultation with the employees.

Mr. Orlikow: I ask the Postmaster General, since he has indicated there will be no cut in the service which exists at present, when, if ever, the tens of thousands of homes in the new urban areas of Canada which have not had door-to-door mail service because of the freeze can expect to get the same kind of service which other people in the cities of Canada now get?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, we would like to be able to offer door-to-door service in the near future to all the people who live in these new subdivisions. Unfortunately, as the hon. member knows very well, we have a deficit of more than $550 million for the current year and, furthermore, we have to deal with the freeze in government expenses, which makes it very difficult for us to beef up the staff in the Post Office.

Mr. Speaker, I ask all members to be a little bit more patient in this regard so that we might indeed boost our revenues, improve the economic situation of the Post Office and finally provide all the services to all those who are entitled to them and have a right to demand them.

INDUSTRY

HEAVY WATER—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER HAS HAD DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC COUNTERPART

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In light of the decision made by the cabinet members of the province of Quebec last November concerning a two and a half year moratorium on the nuclear industry program in Quebec, and given the fact that the government of Quebec categorically refuses to sign any contracts involving the heavy water industry, could the minister tell the House if he has met his Quebec counterpart recently to talk about this question?

● (1432)

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I received word this morning that the government of Quebec and Hydro Quebec had signed contracts with AECL with respect to a very substantial purchase of heavy water to be used in the province of Quebec. That word has just come through to me. I expect the closing of this very significant transaction will take place early next week.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, should the Quebec government not sign all the agreements, would the federal government, which owns Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, be in a position to carry out its threat to close the Gentilly heavy water plant if the Quebec government does not call off its nuclear moratorium?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the moratorium to which the hon. member refers. I imagine the government of Quebec will be publishing a white paper in due course as to its particular plans for electrical energy generation, including nuclear, in the years to come. It is quite clear the government of Quebec is interested in nuclear energy. As the hon. member may know, at the present time Gentilly I is under demonstration, Gentilly II is being built, Gentilly III has been committed, and sufficient heavy water has been committed for two further reactors with a 600 megawatt capacity.

[Mr. Blais.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—BRIEFING OF PRIME MINISTER ON SOVIET SATELLITE—INFORMATION PROVIDED DEFENCE MINISTER

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister visited NORAD headquarters, apparently he was not briefed about the particular dangers associated with the Cosmos satellite. I would like to know why. One might not want to burden a holidaying Prime Minister with the weight of too many technical details.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yes, I was briefed. Yesterday I told the House that I was briefed on the very large number of man-made objects which were satelliting around the earth. I believe they said they had approximately 4,000 in their sights and on their records which were being monitored all the time. As I said yesterday, some of them have gone out of control in the past and have re-entered the atmosphere. I was shown certain objects indicating what had been done with these re-entries when there had been recovery. I was told there were other satellites which would probably re-enter in the future, some would not re-enter for a very long time and some would probably re-enter the atmosphere within a shorter period of time.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): What goes up must come down.

Mr. Trudeau: Not necessarily, because if it is synchronized with the turning of the earth, it can stay up there forever.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister seems obsessed with passing on the garbage he received in NORAD. My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Seeing that the Prime Minister claims he was fully briefed about satellites, with one minor exception that he has not yet answered as to whether he knew that the Comos satellite had a nuclear package aboard, can the Minister of National Defence explain why the Prime Minister did not see fit to enlighten him after the profound and detailed briefing that he had? Yesterday the Minister of National Defence indicated that he found out about the nuclear package last Friday.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of nuclear garbage up there, and certainly a lot of it across the way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: Within the last hour I reviewed all the procedures of consultation and information which have been gone through. I am perfectly satisfied that the Prime Minister, myself and our staffs were kept fully informed at each stage of the operation when anything effectively could be done or it was in our best interests to know. Co-operation has been complete with the Americans.

Mr. Clark: Who decides our best interests?

Mr. Danson: The Americans have been open with us. At each stage we knew what was happening so that we could determine what was in our best interests and how to respond. We have responded, the Americans have co-operated, and everything that needs to be done is being done. We had all the information we needed except some technical information which was not forthcoming initially from the owners of the satellite. Progress is being made on the search. Some deposits have been found which indicate that there has been some re-entry in the Northwest Territories, and every action possible is being taken.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, it is extraordinarily difficult to receive an answer from the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. My question was simple: When did these two gentlemen find out that there was, in fact, a nuclear package aboard the Cosmos satellite? The Prime Minister claims he was fully briefed, but he has never said he knew that. The Minister of National Defence said he found out last Friday and claims he knew everything there was to know, despite the fact the Americans claim they had full knowledge of this problem on December 19. How can the minister say he was fully briefed, when the Americans knew about it on December 19 and he found out about it last Friday?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, our officials were notified on the nineteenth there was danger of destabilization in orbit and that the satellite might return to earth at an earlier period than originally predicted. The information was transferred to our headquarters when the possibility was that it would fall on North American territory on the nineteenth. The date was isolated on the twenty-third although the location was not. The Prime Minister and myself were advised on January 20 of this possibility—indeed, the likelihood that it might come down.

At that time there was no indicated likelihood that it would fall on Canadian soil. We were fully informed and fully on alert at that time. We have done everything necessary to proceed. We had all the information we needed in order to proceed. At the briefing at NORAD that information is readily given, but they cannot predict with accuracy what will happen two or three months in advance.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN—CONGESTION AND DELAYS AT VANCOUVER

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the continuing congestion and delays in the movement of grain out of the port of Vancouver where there have been as many as 40 ships waiting in the harbour. The situation is being aggravated by the enforcement of what have been referred to in the grain trade as unreasonable regulations of the federal Department of Labour. That has resulted in the closing of some terminals and the threat of further closure, all of which will have very grave implications on Canada's ability to meet its grain commitments, not to mention the impact of the Canadian grain economy.

Has the minister discussed this very serious problem with the Minister of Labour? Can he assure us that every possible effort is being made to ensure that these regulations have been complied with? One must bear in mind that the regulations are indeed important, but compliance with them and their enforcement must be carried out in a manner which will minimize disruption in further grain movements.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course the Minister of Labour is concerned and wants to be sure that appropriate measures are taken to ensure the safety of persons working in our terminal elevators. As a result, he has had to enforce the regulations. Obviously, he will look at the question of the balance between the safety which is required and the need to use the terminals effectively for the amount of grain going to the west coast. However, I should say that this particular temporary closure of a terminal is a very small part of the entire question of the amount of grain which can, or will, move through Vancouver during the course of this winter.

Indeed, there is a backlog of ships waiting. There were problems in December which delayed ships arriving. The good part of this is that part of the congestion will continue and the sales level of the Canadian Wheat Board and others is likely to reach record proportions. Already we are running 50 million bushels ahead of last year's volume. The movement of grain will continue very rapidly indeed. This means that, notwithstanding all the things we have done to improve grain handling on the west coast, when you try to put the absolute maximum through, particularly in winter time, you will obviously run into temporary periods of difficulty.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I trust the minister will meet with management and the enforcement agencies of the Department of Labour to ensure that this matter is closely monitored. Much of the problem in grain movement is the result of lack of proper co-ordination, and under utilization of the Prince Rupert port—it has been reported that the terminal at Prince Rupert port is bursting at the seams with grain—that hundreds of boxcars are to be unloaded, and that there are no ships available at the port.

Has the minister examined that situation? Can he explain the reason for this lack of co-ordination, and can he offer some hope to the prairie grain economy that we will see the end of these disruptions? For your information, Mr. Speaker, we are behind 22 million to 25 million bushels from our movement of grain last year.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, in my previous answer I reassured the Canadian farmer about the movement of grain. We are almost certain this year to set an all-time record in the export of wheat as well as the total export of grains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The reason for the temporary congestion at Prince Rupert is that arrivals of ships are notoriously unpredictable; there is no way to predict absolutely when a ship will arrive. Our problem in Prince Rupert is in part the fact that it is a small terminal. Therefore, the late arrival of even a single ship can make a tremendous difference to operating capabilities at Prince Rupert. As a result of that, the Minister of Agriculture and myself have been looking very zealously at the question of how we can improve and expand the capacity of Prince Rupert to handle grain. I am confident that before very long we will have a solution to that problem and expand the capacity there. The future for grain shipments through the west coast is, clearly, very good.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

PROTECTION OF LINGUISTIC RIGHTS OF MINORITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In light of the ruling by the Quebec Superior Court as to the constitutionality of some sections of Bill 101, and in light also of the impact of the Forest case in Manitoba, which puts into question English unilingualism in that province, does the Prime Minister intend to emphasize his representations to all provincial premiers in order to urge them to formally support the rights of language minorities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member will recall that in September I indeed asked all premiers not only to protect the rights of minorities in the education system but also to include this protection in the constitution by means of a constitutional amendment. This debate is still in progress. Several premiers have already forwarded their reply. However, I do not anticipate discussing this matter with them at next month's economic conference, but this certainly is our aim and we hope that the provinces will act accordingly.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO—SUGGESTED CLOSING OF RIVER SYSTEM DUE TO MERCURY POISONING OF FISH

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the ongoing problem of mercury pollution in the English-Wabigoon river basin in northwestern Ontario. In view of extensive testing done by Dr. Pritchard for the Department of National Health and Welfare, and his report of December 15, 1977, to government officials that his examination of a resident of Grassy Narrows showed more precisely than ever before symptoms of methyl mercury poisoning, is the minister, for the sake of the health and safety of the residents of the area, prepared to recommend to cabinet that the river system be closed to all fishing, as the native people have been demanding for several years?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will review that matter. My impression was that my predecessor had recommended that as a course of action, and there was disagreement on that course of action with the province of Ontario. However, I will review the matter and report back to the hon. member.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer and the testimony given by Mr. Carton, director of legal services of the Department of Fisheries, to the standing committee on June 16, 1977, that under the Fisheries Act the federal government could unilaterally close the English-Wabigoon river system without Ontario's approval, and since the Ontario government has stalled for years on cleaning up this mess, will the minister now do the decent and humane thing, close the river and begin remedial action before it is too late?

Mr. Faulkner: I will look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

FUNDY TIDAL POWER DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Now that the maritime premiers agree with the government on the important principle of a maritime energy corporation, will the minister advise the House whether the $5 million equity payment of the government will be spread over a ten-year term, or paid now; and is payment subject to a favourable report on Fundy tidal power development?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the three premiers and I reached agreement not only in principle but also on the next steps leading to the incorporation of a maritime energy corporation. We have reconfirmed the objectives and priorities of the corporation. We agreed on share participation and equity participation by the federal government and by the provinces, roughly a 50-50 dimension. We also agreed that it would be necessary, as the first step after incorporation, to set aside a sum of money—not a large sum of money—for working capital purposes. That is the figure to which the hon. member referred. I expect that $10 million is nothing more than a very small proportion of what will be needed over the years to undertake the massive projects which the people of the maritimes are going to need.

Mr. Howie: Is Ottawa committed to supporting Fundy tidal power development at the recommended sites, and to underwriting at least half the capital cost of these projects?

Mr. Gillespie: That is a matter for further discussion. It was agreed that if the report presently being prepared is favourable, and if the three premiers and the Government of Canada agree with it, phase two of the Fundy tidal development project would be the first one undertaken and funded by the proposed maritime energy corporation. Subject to those provisos, it is anticipated that the cost of phase two might be tens of millions of dollars. The exact proportion has yet to be determined by the parties.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CUBA'S SUPPORT OF COMMUNIST GROUPS IN OTHER COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. It has to do with a very serious situation which has caused a great deal of concern in the United States, namely, the degree to which Castro and Cuba are endeavouring to support communist groups in Africa and elsewhere to undermine existing governments. Yesterday I endeavoured to have the matter discussed in the House, but general disapprobation came from government benches: "no" was the answer. I should like to find out from the minister whether this government was in agreement with the Prime Minister when he sang the hallelujah chorus in Cuba, "Viva Castro".

Mr. Trudeau: That is not Spanish.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the reason the strong opinions of Americans have caused considerable discussion in Washington, asking why Canada does not take some stand in respect of a country to which the Prime Minister has given his support in such vocal and musical terms?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not the secretary of state for external affairs, and not yet the prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: I have heard from my colleagues in the United States. There is considerable interest in the friendly relationship between our countries and the example that was set by Canada of renewing bonds with a country which was dissociated from the mainstream of events. Perhaps that will better the state of mankind and bring strength to our resolve in the western world.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer is as evanescent as the minister's answers in connection with that stuff that is flying through the sky. Does the minister think Canada is making any contribution to peace by not standing against what Cuba is doing in sending troops to Ethiopia in a war against Somalia which it is anticipated will have effectively the same results as those attained in Angola?

Surely, with this wonderful relationship and the carrying into effect of the Prime Minister's admonition from Hamilton hill when he said, "Love one another", that is going too far if it permits a nation so close as Cuba is to the present government to carry on the way it is doing to endanger world peace.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I think we are going beyond my portfolio. If my memory serves me correctly, it was under the right hon. member's government that we maintained relations with Cuba. We are following in his footsteps. Not only that, but if I recall correctly, again, when President Kennedy wanted to take quick action in relation to Cuba, the right hon. gentleman delayed that decision. I find this question very difficult to answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I expected that answer as an example of the minister's wit. On a few occasions in the past I concluded that he was a wit, only to find that I was only half right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—DISCUSSIONS WITH STEEL INDUSTRY ON MANUFACTURE OF PIPE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who I am led to believe has had discussions with the steel industry with respect to pipe. We hear that the steel industry can be competitive. When the minister had these discussions with the steel industry, was there discussion with respect to American pressure? I mean by that the senators, unions and the steel industry in the United States who are apparently moving in a direction which would be to Canada's disadvantage. Was that type of thing discussed and, if so, what answer was given?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the steel industry, and more than likely will have a lot more. I have been assured by the Canadian steel industry that they can, will and are able to compete with the United States industry, and are looking forward to getting the contract for the Alcan pipeline.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, you will notice how the minister deliberately evaded my question. Let me ask him another. I do not know who is going to carry this bill, but in light of the fact that the estimates with respect to man-years, the estimates with respect to the amount of money involved, and the estimates with respect to the amount of steel in the pipe are all in question at this time, is it the intention of the minister, or whoever will introduce this bill at the time of first reading, to make a definitive statement regarding the benefits to Canada and Canadians from the pipeline?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I did that long ago.

Mr. Alexander: It is all out, John, and as usual you are wrong.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I think it should be obvious to all Canadians that the benefits Canada will receive from building this pipeline—the labour component, the steel component, the pipe-building component—will be a tremendous asset to Canadian industry. That should be obvious to everybody. I want to point out that in asking the question the hon. member clearly specified that these were estimates. They will be estimates until the pipe is laid in the ground.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF UNITED STATES APPLYING TAX WRITE-OFFS TO MANUFACTURE OF PIPE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister in his capacity as chief negotiator in the pipeline agreement. I do not have any doubt about the proposition that Canadian steel can be competitive with steel anywhere in the world. The concern is, given the fact there is such underutilization of the steel industry in the United States, is there any probability or possibility that special advantages will be given to that industry by the government of the United States through tax write-offs or something of that sort, so that it will have an undue advantage in competing for manufacture of the pipe?

I know that under GATT, arrangements are made whereby you cannot dump, and so on, but this is very slow in coming about. When discussions took place with the United States about bidding for the pipe, was it understood—explicitly or implicitly—that no changes would be made, in either country, in the tax structure allowances or subsidies provided to the industry, so that competition will be based on the situation as it exists right now?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, this very point was raised in the discussions. It was understood that both countries would act in good faith, that neither would cheat. There is a provision in the pipeline agreement itself by which one or the other country might raise any such question formally if it were alleged that unfair trade practices or exceptional steps had been taken in order to get business. That is clearly stated in the agreement. When the pipeline legislation comes before the House, I think it will be possible to explain further how we intend to deal with an eventuality of this kind which has already been provided for in the agreement.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the chief negotiator in the pipeline agreement. Have the reports from Washington about the pressures being exerted by senators and members of Congress from the various steel states been of sufficient magnitude for the Canadian government to raise with the United States government already—as they are apparently allowed to do—the possibility that undue pressure may be applied in this way? Is it too early to do that sort of thing?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should first of all congratulate the hon. member for his realization that it will be possible for Canadian business to participate effectively in this pipeline. He properly raises the question of what steps we can take if extraordinary or unfair practices develop. I think we can provide for that, and have provided for it. In answer to the question as to pressure, I would say that circumstances have not developed to the point where we would wish to raise this question formally with the government of the United States.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CARE OF THE ELDERLY—FINANCIAL AID FOR THOSE IN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns the increasing number of older people entering institutions. In view of the increase in cost due to inflation, particularly in the health care field and specifically affecting to the greatest degree those listed as charitable homes with only a few extended care beds and the rest of the beds mostly occupied by old age pensioners on supplement who have no resources—and leaving the balance of the cost to a charitable institution makes it very difficult for them—I ask what contribution is available through the Canada Assistance Plan to institutions which are now in financial difficulty?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, regarding home care for elderly citizens, home care and homemaker services are still covered and still cost-shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan. Under the block funding payments already in existence on the health side of my department, several institutions providing care to elderly citizens can benefit from whatever moneys the provincial governments decide to invest in these institutions. For instance, we presently give to Ontario over $1 billion under this block funding arrangement. Priorities are set now only by provincial governments.

Mr. Rynard: A supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister if the Canada Assistance Plan is available to people who are looked after in their own homes.

Miss Bégin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm that homemaker services and home care is still provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

TRADE

GATT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CANADA'S TARIFF PROPOSALS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that last Sunday he announced that the Canadian delegation to Geneva would table the Canadian list following the tabling of the United States list on Tuesday, is the minister prepared to table the list in the House today so that parliament can know what Canada is doing in the matter of trade and tariff negotiations?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I said we would be tabling a list in Geneva shortly after the United States tabled theirs on January 23. They have an offer list which can be withdrawn at any time. Therefore, it is not a final list and it would be wrong to refer to it in this House or anywhere else as being a final document. It is a negotiated beginning and not an end, and therefore it will be secret for some months yet.

● (1502)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the event that we read about it in the press next week, would the minister not agree that Canadian business and industry is entitled to know what is being offered in trade for other advantages, so that we do not go through the charade and nonsense of the Kennedy Round when half of Canadian industry had its bargaining rights traded away in secret?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, my department and I have been in constant consultation with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and with the advisory committee to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We are in constant consultation with Canadian industry generally.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Since our chief competitor is United States industry, why does not the minister in this administration, to which he now belatedly belongs, follow the example of the American negotiators and do it out in the open, so we know what he is doing? This is indicative of a few people in Geneva who have not consulted with the provinces or industry.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, let me correct the erroneous statement made by the hon. member. We and the team in Geneva have consulted extensively with the provinces. We are aware of the provinces' opinions, and to my knowledge the American list which was tabled on the twenty-third of this month has not been made public to the American businessman or anyone else other than those people who are part of the negotiating team at Geneva.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—CP AIR EXECUTIVE SERVICE BOOKING ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Speaker: Order. Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a question of privilege. The hon. Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) has indicated he would like to make a brief reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised a question of privilege concerning a letter sent by CP Air and suggesting the use of a telephone number from my department's Central Travel Office to make reservations on that airline.

Officers from my department have been acquainted with this letter and on January 24 they contacted and met with representatives of CP Air. The company expressed regret for this administrative error and stopped the distribution of the letter. Moreover, the company has promised to have this telephone number changed and a new explanatory letter will be sent to all persons concerned.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter was raised yesterday as a question of privilege. I indicated I had some reservation as to whether or not it was in fact a question of privilege. I can safely say now that it was not, and in any case the point has been properly answered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could direct a question to the government House leader concerning House business. Could he give us an outline of the business that he foresees, as far as he can look ahead, as we begin the second week of this part of the session? Would he also confirm that he is prepared to designate Thursday, February 2, as an allotted day?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to designate next Thursday as an allotted day.

Apart from the request for information on government business, I would like to confirm that we will be proceeding today with the employment tax credit legislation. This will be followed by Bill C-19 amending the Petroleum Administration Act, and by the bills dealing with the organization of Air Canada and the recapitalization of the CNR. We would follow this by completing the fishing and recreational harbours bill if there is time before we begin the discussion on the pipeline legislation, which I hope to introduce in the House at an early date and call for debate as soon as members have had an opportunity to study the terms of the bill.

Since Easter is very early this year, it may be useful if I give in general terms an outline of the business which is still ahead of us. We will have seven allotted days, probably one each week commencing with Thursday, February 2. In addition to the need to deal with these allotted days, the government will also propose legislation creating the post control monitoring agency, and bills and amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act with regard to the decontrol period. We will also bring forward amendments to the Farm Credit Act and the amendments to the Criminal Code, the Official Secrets Act and the Post Office Act. These bills will all warrant early consideration. That is a preview of the business I foresee for the early period before the Easter break.

As the hon. member knows, there are also bills in the committees of the House and bills standing on the order paper for second reading. There are bills that relate to the constitution and the holding of a national referendum which have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, which we will attempt to bring forward in this session.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that extensive list. However, I note that there is one glaring omission from that list in terms of the legislative program. That is the question of a budget, which has been mentioned for around the end of March, which I believe was the general phrase used. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell me today whether it is the intention of the government to bring down a budget prior to the anticipated Easter recess of the House? Naturally we think it should be brought in at a much earlier date. Would he deal with that, and could he deal with the suggestion that there be a special committee of this House, in the place of a standing committee, to deal with the pipeline legislation, which is another matter?

In addition, Sir, would he inform the House whether or not the hon. Minister of Finance will be here today to deal with the employment tax credit legislation himself? I realize the Minister is at a federal-provincial conference and some of his duties take him there. But is there any time during the next few days that he can devote to the House of Commons and be here for part of the debate since the minister has given so much importance to the passage of this bill? I might say to the hon. gentleman we do not intend to delay passage of the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you will note that the Deputy Prime Minister has been giving us a fairly long-range picture of the business of the session. However, may I ask him about two pieces of legislation he has not yet mentioned? As he knows, his colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, said yesterday that he expected to bring to the House some news about veterans of the First World War. He made that statement in the context of answers to various questions concerning veterans affairs. My question is: will there be legislation affecting veterans in this session? At the same time, may I ask if there will be any legislation in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, such as the social services act, or legislation respecting pensions?

• (1512)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like first to deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. It is not possible for me to announce a budget date, or indeed when and if there will be a budget. That is a matter for the Minister of Finance and I have not had an opportunity to discuss it with him. My answer is not intended to declare anything except my inability to answer the question, and no other implications or conclusions should be drawn from it.

I have concluded that it would be desirable to strike a special committee in order to study the pipeline legislation. I hope that we can make whatever arrangements are necessary before we give the bill second reading, call it for second reading, or even introduce it.

We are calling the employment tax credit bill today. The Minister of Finance is currently meeting with the finance ministers of the provinces, but I expect that he will be available in the House tomorrow afternoon to deal with the bill in committee stage, if it is at that stage. I understand it is impossible for him to be in the House today for second reading because of the meetings to which the hon. member has already referred.

Mr. Clark: And tonight?

Mr. MacEachen: Unfortunately, or fortunately, the meetings are still continuing with the finance ministers. It will not be possible for the Minister of Finance to disengage until late tonight, but he will be in the House just as soon as he can, either tonight or tomorrow.

I can tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the bills to which he refers are not on my list and it is not possible for me to indicate that they will get on the list at any point, but one never knows.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter that the government House leader alluded to, the question of the availability of the minister for the purpose of the employment tax credit bill. I want to emphasize to him, through you, Sir, that we are very anxious to have that bill proceed. As we have indicated, it has been too late in coming, and now that it is here it should not be delayed. However, we do wish to examine the minister. We think it is quite important because the government seems to attach so much importance to that program.

I wonder if the government House leader would consider extending the hours of the sitting tonight so that the minister could be here and we could go through committee of the whole proceedings after his meetings. He may not be able to give that answer right now. We would certainly be willing to stay to have that done because it is an important piece of legislation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly raise that with the minister. If the minister can be available, it might be a very good idea to try to give the bill full treatment today, second reading and the committee stage. If there are no objections from the other parties, I will take it for granted it is worth pursuing the notion of sitting beyond ten o'clock.

EXPENDITURES IN CONSTITUENCY OF NEW WESTMINSTER

Question No. 460—Mr. Leggatt:

In each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of New Westminster by the Department of Supply and Services and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as the Department of Supply and Services and the Canadian Commercial Corporation is concerned: the Department of Supply and Services maintains records by city and provincial boundaries and not by electoral districts. However, our records show the following contracting activity on behalf of government departments with vendors in the city of New Westminster, British Columbia:

CANADA PENSION PLAN OFFICE, BROCKVILLE, ONTARIO

Question No. 773—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware that there are a number of steps leading up to the Canada Pension Plan Office in Brockville, Ontario, which create a severe difficulty for the elderly and disabled and has the government looked into the situation and (a) if so, with what results (b) if not, for what reason?

2. Will the government consider moving the office to another location that will not require such a handicap for those who must use the facilities?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, the government is aware that there are 43 stair steps from the street level leading up the Canada Pension Plan office. This situation was taken into account in planning a current space reallocation project of various occupants of the building, scheduled to be completed February 1, 1978. (a) As a result of this project the Canada Pension Plan office will be located in the basement of the building. This will improve the situation by reducing the number of steps to 16. Furthermore, as part of our overall programme to provide case of access for handicapped persons to all government buildings, a project is under preparation to modify the secondary entrance of building, including the freight elevator, to make all floors accessible to persons using wheelchairs. This project is scheduled for completion in June, 1978. (b) Not applicable.

2. In view of the answer to part I, it is not considered necessary to further move the office within the building or to another building.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I placed questions on the order paper three days after this session began in October. These questions are very straighforward. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary can indicate when he intends to have those answers given to the House?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we have already replied to 414 of the more than 1,204 questions which have been asked. This being more than one third of the total questions asked up to this point in time of the session, I feel that it is an excellent average.

As to the hon. member's intervention, I shall inquire.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Hon. Bud Cullen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-23, to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the employment tax credit program, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister I would like to thank the opposition parties for their co-operation. As the House leader has indicated, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is attending the finance ministers' conference, something very productive.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise to deal with second reading of this bill to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the employment tax credit program.

We are all aware that Canada is faced with high unemployment. In my opinion, what we need is a program to foster employment in the private sector without running the risk of fuelling inflation. The national unemployment rate does not provide a clear picture of the many ways Canadians are affected by unemployment or have access to job opportunities. The reality of unemployment may differ according to living area, age and sex. Our programs, however, have been especially conceived to take these various factors into account. We have always been anxious to streamline our employment programs to meet the needs of the most seriously affected regions and groups. This orientation cannot be maintained with a comprehensive tax reduction program.

We devote considerable resources to the creation of employment. The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has a $485 million budget for its employment strategy. It includes the Canada Works Program, the Young Canada Works Program and other measures for the creation of employment. The recently announced federal intensive work program will receive an additional $150 million. Those programs provide a great number of additional jobs. However, they cannot offer what the unemployed are mostly seeking, to wit a permanent job in the private sector.

Canada is far from being the only country to experience such extensive unemployment. The necessity of a new concept for the creation of employment has led several governments to consider systems of employment credits. The question is to find a proper mechanism. Although the employment credit can take several forms according to the cases, the basic principles remain the same. An employment credit is a grant given to encourage employers to hire additional workers thus contributing to reduce unemployment. The aim of the program is, first, to create employment in the private sector rather than in the public sector, second, thus to provide greater advantages at the qualifying and training level so that the acquired experience is valuable, third, to create jobs in the areas and for the groups which are most in need and fourth, to create a maximum number of new jobs at the least cost for the state.

I think that those principles are incorporated in the bill referred to this House.

● (1522)

Briefly, this experimental program will have the following features:

The program will be administered by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, drawing on their extensive experience in the field of job creation. They will enter into agreements with employers who will certify that the jobs created by the program would not have existed without the incentive of the employment credit.

Reimbursement under the program will take the form of a taxable non-refundable employment credit differentiated in the same manner as the investment tax credit. Incremental employment in areas benefiting from the 10 per cent investment tax credit, that is, the Atlantic and Gaspé regions, will be eligible for a credit of $2.00 per hour. All other areas designated under the Regional Development Incentives Act will be eligible for a credit of $1.75 per hour, and undesignated areas, $1.50 per hour. This regional differentiation of the credit rate provides a higher level of incentive to areas of high unemployment and slow employment growth. This reflects the minister's deep concern with the problem of regional disparity.

Making the credit taxable means that the maximum benefit will accrue to small business. For example, a firm paying the top corporate rate of 46 per cent could get a maximum net benefit of up to $1,685 per job while a firm with a 25 per cent tax rate would net up to $2,340. Also, by making the credit taxable it was possible to make the amount of a taxable credit more generous than a credit which was not taxed. A non-taxable credit would have been approximately one-third lower and result in the same cost to the treasury. Finally, this provision will also prohibit serious abuse of the program.

Eligible employers will include taxable incorporated and unincorporated businesses. They will be issued a tax schedule allowing them to reduce taxes otherwise payable. Participating employers will be allowed to reduce their tax instalment payments by the amount of unused credits accrued to the due date of each payment. These credits could also be carried forward for up to five years.

Eligible employees will be those registered at Canada Manpower Centres or Employment Centres with the general principle that they must have been unemployed and looking for work for at least the eight weeks before referral to the program. One of the objectives of the program is to encourage the hiring of people who are becoming discouraged as a result of their inability to obtain employment, and thus to help them regain their self-confidence. At the same time we wish to ensure that other employment opportunities have been adequately examined prior to referral to this program.

Eligible employment must last at least three months, and at the present time subsidization will not exceed nine months. The three- to nine-month period was chosen so that employees will be offered a sufficient period of employment to benefit in terms of skill development and work experience. At the same time, the period of subsidy must be long enough to be attractive to employers and thus ensure their active support. We feel a nine month maximum represents the best balance between these concerns and program costs. At the same time, the legislation provides for the flexibility of extending the maximum to 12 months if it is warranted.

No limit will be placed on the number of participants but the program will be targetted at a net annual revenue cost of about $100 million. This, we feel, is capable of providing jobs for some 50,000 people per year.

The program will be introduced for a two-year period and will be effective no later than March 31, and hopefully on March 1 of this year.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention to the fact that the employment tax credit program represents a special, additional effort on the part of the federal government, over and above the many millions of dollars that are currently being spent on direct job creation. The program is a new and experimental approach to federal job creation. It will be closely monitored in order to determine its future as part of our employment policy. To be successful, the program requires an enthusiastic response from the private sector, an acknowledgment of the shared responsibility for providing jobs for those Canadians who have difficulty obtaining them.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the debate on the second reading of Bill C-23 I should like first of all to clarify the position of the official opposition with respect to this measure.

As most hon. members are well aware, we have for some time been pressing the government to bring in employment tax credit legislation, and I am very pleased that the minister has at last reached the point of bringing down the bill presently before us. Nevertheless, in the course of my remarks I shall draw attention to the differences between Bill C-23 and the employment tax credit program we had hoped to see for the benefit of Canadians and especially of those who are out of work.

I cannot refrain from commenting on what I regard as an unforgiveable lack of concern on the part of the government for the unemployment of this country. I really cannot understand why the government did not choose to give this bill priority yesterday. We in this party have indicated repeatedly during the question period that if it was the desire to bring in this bill we would give it passage in one day, subject, of course, to its being basically as represented. But this meant that we expected the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to be in his place to explain the measure and accept questions during the committee of the whole stage. For reasons not clear to me, the government chose instead to bring in its Anti-Inflation Board patch-up bill yesterday and to proceed with Bill C-23 today. And now we are told that the Minister of Finance is too tied up at a conference to present the bill in this House on second reading and spend an hour of his time answering questions during the committee stage. I do not think this is a very good effort on behalf of the unemployed.

I turn, now, to another point. Yesterday the Minister of Finance stated in answer to a question put by my leader that this bill, if passed, would result in the program being in place "by March 1". There was no equivocation. Today we find the parliamentary secretary, who has been given a brief, written presumably by the public service, saying it will hopefully be in place by March 1. This is just not good enough. If we must ride along with a part-time Minister of Finance, the time has come when somebody within the government has got to exercise compassion for the unemployed and see that progress is made with pressing legislation, putting it into place so as to relieve the tragic consequences of unemployment.

Hon. members will recall that as long ago as the budget of the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), on March 31, we stated in our response, that employment tax credits should be considered by the government and, hopefully, introduced. In October of last year before the start of the session, we again asked the government to bring in employment tax credits. On October 20 the Minister of Finance said he was setting aside $100 million for such a purpose. These delays illustrate the dither and lack of confidence which exist in government circles. Not until three months later do we find such a bill before us.

Even today when we commence second reading and, we hope, go into committee of the whole to review the bill, the Minister of Finance is not in his place in the House. I mention this because we all know he is attending the conference of ministers of finance, but he knew that yesterday. Why did he not ask that the House business be changed to give priority to this bill so that he could be with us when the bill is passed? It could have been done yesterday. The administration, to which the parliamentary secretary referred, would have been put in motion by now to ensure that the new law is functioning by March 1 at the latest.

Having said that, I would like to go back to the remarks we made on October 14 last year when we suggested the following to the Minister of Finance:

> We suggest to Mr. Chrétien that he institute a temporary employment tax credit for new workers hired by business. It has worked in the provinces, it has worked in other countries, it can work throughout Canada. The credit would be available to any business which increases its work force through hiring younger workers. In effect, the credit would be a subsidy of up to $1 an hour for the first 1,000 hours of employment, or about six months. For small businesses which may generate small taxable profits, it may be preferable to pay a direct subsidy at the same rate.

When we suggested that, we were suggesting a tax credit which would not be taxable itself. We suggested that it should be a clean tax credit for those who wished to apply for it, but only for $1. Secondly, we said the program should be oriented to the young workers in our country who are seeking jobs for the first time.

We are pleased that the government has introduced Bill C-23, but I would have to point out that the government has complicated it and muddled it. First of all, it suggests that the tax credit should be as much as $2 an hour, but then it wishes to tax back up to 46 per cent of it. In other words, for every $2 it is proposing to give to an employer on an employee's wage, 92 cents would be taxed back by the federal government. We suggest that that is a complication which the government could have avoided. It will be confusing for businessmen who wish to participate in the program in that they will not be clear what the total subsidy is worth to them until they have worked out their tax position.

Second, our suggestion was that the program should be oriented toward youth, the first time job seekers. We said that if the program is designed mainly to help first time job seekers, it will avoid the problem which, I know, concerns many members of parliament, that is, the dodge of laying off staff only to hire them on a subsidy basis at a subsequent date. We felt that orienting the program to first time job seekers would avoid the administrative nightmare of trying to prevent that dodge. But, above all, we felt that the high level of unemployment among our youth was something to which we should direct our attention especially, and we felt that the employment tax credit approach was a good way to start. We pointed out that the purpose of the employment tax credit is to relieve unemployment, first of all, but also, secondly, to give a subsidized wage to a person for, say, six months. The government is proposing nine months. During that time it is hoped that that person will become a productive employee of his company and will continue on in a permanent job.

I should like to summarize our suggestions, Mr. Speaker. We are saying that we are pleased the government has accepted our suggestion. We are disappointed it has gone to the complicated rule of proposing a larger subsidy only to tax back up to 46 per cent of it. We are disappointed that the government has not oriented the program to the first time job seekers or to the youth of our country, but perhaps our greatest disappointment is that the government, as stated in the legislation and in the press statement which was released at the same time, proposes to put such a heavy emphasis on the Canada Manpower Centres. As we all know, businessmen in this country are not pleased with the response they have been getting from Canada Manpower. They feel it is not a good agency through which to secure employees when they look for a further extension to their work force. For example, the Federation of Independent Canadian Businessmen carries out surveys, in one of which it was pointed out that 67 per cent, or about 15,000 people, mainly small business people, said they felt Canada Manpower employment services were poor.

We believe it is unfortunate, if the object of the program is to relieve unemployment, that there should be the impediment and the complication of having to hire the new employee, if one wishes to get the subsidy, through Canada Manpower. This is a rather tight red tape approach which the government is adopting.

I hope there is no doubt in anyone's mind in the House that we propose to support the legislation and we hope it will receive a speedy passage at second reading and in committee of the whole. But we also hope that the government will accept some of the suggestions we have put forth. We hope that the administrative nightmare which might occur will be minimized or eliminated, and we hope that the program will be oriented to our youth, who happen to make up one of the largest sectors among the unemployed of this country. Above all, we hope that the government will get on at last with clearing up whatever administrative difficulties it feels still exist in implementing this program, and that it will put it in place so that the Canadians who are tramping the streets in this cold, cold winter can once again get jobs on a more permanent basis.

I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that during the committee of the whole proceedings, which we hope to reach before the dinner adjournment, we think it is important that the minister provide time for us to question him and respond to our questions, because I know that members in my caucus, and presumably other members of the House, will have questions to put to him concerning the administration of this program and concerning the government's general concept of the program.

We are talking about big money here. The government has indicated it will cost about $140 million to encourage this type of employment and it hopes to tax back $40 million of that, resulting in a net outflow from the Treasury of $100 million. This is a lot of money, but the most important thing we must ensure is that this program works because, frankly, if the government brings in a program which, for reasons of an administrative nature or because of its concept, is not workable, we will not be doing a service to anyone. It is the unemployed about whom we should be concerned today, and that is why I hope the Minister of Finance will give us some time today when he can answer questions which members will be putting to him, as we are anxious to ensure that it is a program which not only makes sense in theory but which in practice will help relieve the unemployment situation in the country.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to agree with the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) when he suggests that this bill should have speedy passage. I disagree with his expression of surprise at the parliamentary secretary introducing this bill. This bill will have such a small impact on Canadian unemployment rates that I am surprised a backbencher did not introduce it. However, I might say the parliamentary secretary does an excellent job for his minister.

This bill is being introduced after the worst season is nearly over. It should have been introduced last spring. This band-aid solution is all that is being offered to the million unemployed. It is an incredible situation. The real problem is not the question of tax credits to small business, a principle which we can support on a temporary basis. The real problem is that the government has locked its financial position in because of the massive amounts of subsidies it has given to big business. Because its financial position is locked up, the government does not have the kind of flexibility necessary to move these concessions around to where they belong, which should be a massive tax cut at the consumer level. That would provide purchasing power, which would supply the small businessman with a need to hire additional people.

This bill asks small business to pull our irons out of the fire and to hire someone it does not need in order to remove him from the streets. In a minor way that will reduce our unemployment statistics, and to a limited extent it will reduce some of the money the government is putting into unemployment insurance by the removal of that person from the unemployment rolls. Unless the direction in which the economy is going is changed, there is no need for the small businessman to help out by hiring someone who is unnecessary to his business. There are not enough customers to buy the small businessman's product. The responsibility lies right at the government's door in that respect.

We will not attempt to impede passage of this band-aid legislation, but we have serious questions concerning it. As I read the legislation, it requires that a person being employed under this bill come from Manpower and should have been idle for eight weeks or more. The bill does not deal with the thousands of people who do not go to Manpower, who have given up on the idea that they will receive any help from Manpower, and who have given up on the idea that they will ever get a job. No employment will be created in that particular area.

This legislation is asking small business to do a favour for government. It is not a favour to small business. The hiring of an extra employee, who may or may not be necessary, does not help small business until consumer demand for his product has changed. Instead of the tax credit system, the same thing could be accomplished if the fellow who is coming to pick up his unemployment cheque is told to take a seat inside and is put on the employment list. That procedure would reduce the number of unemployed, but it would not be productive. It would have no impact in terms of the economy. It would take someone off one section of the rolls and put him on another. To some extent this bill does that, where the person hired is unnecessary to the operation. Small business will not take advantage of this bill unless the economy is changed and provides it with a need to hire more people. A small businessman might prefer to operate his business with five people rather than ten, because it is easier.

Another reservation we have, and perhaps we will propose an amendment in committee on this, is that under provincial minimum wage law where a part time employee is involved he is not covered under this legislation. I am surprised the government did not include a clause in the bill requiring the minimum wage to be paid by the employer in any event. Surely that must be accepted as a decent and reasonable standard. At least the federal minimum wage figure should be applied to the legislation so that employers do not take advantage of it by paying less than the minimum wage. As I read the legislation, they would be capable of doing that. I hope the minister gives serious consideration to seeing that provision incorporated in the bill.

In my view the red tape which is involved is unnecessary. An employment plan filed by the small businessman is required. Some bureaucrat will have to approve that employment plan before the businessman is able to take advantage of the tax credit system within the plan. I would rather trust the judgment of the small businessman than of some bureaucrat who says, "I do not like your plan. Therefore you cannot come under the program". The program does not need the red tape, nor does it need the plan system.

This piece of legislation does not zero in on the major unemployment groups, such as the young. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has pointed this out. It does not zero in on those who are not on unemployment insurance but are on welfare because they have been out of work so long. Those people desperately need to get back into the work system, and this bill does not help them.

I hope we do not become euphoric about this legislation and feel we have done something marvellous for small business. In fact we are asking small businesses to help by hiring people they may not require, in order to receive a tax advantage. A lot more can be done for small business than that. Surely parliament can sit down and assess the needs of small business.

By moving into this area so delicately, perhaps the government has started to understand that one third of all the jobs in Canada are jobs in the small business area. Those businesses are labour intensive and have the capacity to expand. The large business sector only uses 80 per cent of its capital capacity.

Our entire budgetary processes continue to reward the large business sector with accelerated depreciation and massive grants. For example, recently there was an announcement in Vancouver by the firm MacMillan-Bloedel indicating that it was shutting down its Vancouver plywood plant which would result in 700 people being put out of work. Over the past eight years this large firm has received $10,963,000 in concessions and grants. That is what the government has done for big business. They were provided with nearly $11 million in order to be competitive, and for assistance in research. If that money had been used to tool up that plywood plant and to make it efficient, 700 workers would not have to be laid off.

Why do we continue to give massive subsidies and tax concessions to big businesses which are now the weakest part of our economy? Small business is not the weakest part, but it has been ignored and ignored, and now we are paying the price. Workers at Inco are being laid off as well as workers at MacMillan Bloedel. MacMillan Bloedel lost about $50 million because of some very dumb executive decisions. MacMillan Bloedel did not tool up, did not become efficient, and did not use the government help which had been so generously given by the people of Canada, including the workers in its own plant whose taxes went to help in subsidizing the company, to making it efficient and to allowing it to purchase new equipment. Now the company wrings its hands and says it "cannot compete any more. That old mill has to be shut down". That is wrong and immoral.

We need some leadership from the government. The government should end those kinds of concessions to major companies. Concessions should be tied to jobs. If we are going to give massive subsidies to MacMillan Bloedel, let us see that there are job guarantees for Canadians.

In this bill there is a little concession for small business, and that little concession is tied to jobs. That should have been done with major corporations a long time ago. This government did not have the foresight to see what was happening. It was taken advantage of, just as it was taken advantage of in the negotiations regarding the Alcan pipeline.

Mrs. Holt: What did your buddies do in B.C. when they had a chance?

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) asks what my buddies did in B.C. when they had a chance. Ocean Falls, Can-cel and Kootenay Forest Products made enough money last year to balance the provincial budget for the people of British Columbia.

Mrs. Holt: The government went practically bankrupt.

Mr. Leggatt: In B.C. we have come back to the same proposition whereby we are allowing our economy to be dominated and controlled by major corporations which are laying off more workers than were ever laid off under the previous provincial regime. That is what is occurring in B.C.

We will support this legislation, although we want some minor changes, or at least some thought about some minor changes. It is very much a band-aid approach to a massive unemployment problem. If the government opposite cannot come up with more original ideas, it should just throw in the towel. This bill could have been brought in before the winter season. I suspect there will be more pie-in-the-sky announcements before the election, but if this bill is the response of this government to the over one million unemployed in Canada, the government deserves the response it will get from the Canadian people.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I do not want in any way to delay the passage of Bill C-23 but still I would like to make a few comments because I consider it to be my duty to express the needs of the south shore area which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. Speaker, as most government bills to curb rising prices and unemployment, this proposed employment tax credit program is a sort of hand-out to industry but I will not prolong my comments on this aspect of the bill because I will certainly have the opportunity in the near future to participate in a more comprehensive debate on this issue. There is no doubt that a program designed to create jobs can hardly and honestly be criticized. This is quite normal because that is what we want, namely to provide jobs for workers who are able to work for the betterment of this country. I understand that this is an innovative program. Furthermore, it meets a suggestion I made in my speech on second reading of Bill C-11. I said at that time:

> I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance: I think that rebates made on real investments in Canada might be much more indicated. Of course, these partial rebates could be calculated according to the number of jobs created.
> There would then be a reaction between capital and manpower resources.

I must say that this bill comes very close to the spirit of my suggestion. The idea to increase the credit in proportion to the regional rate of unemployment is only logical. On the other hand, it raises again the need to designate the south shore area as a special and under-privileged area.

Just recently I watched a television program featuring several Liberal members of the Quebec City area. It was interesting to hear those members' comments when describing the Quebec City area as an area which had not been advantaged in recent years, especially because the attention of governments had been directed mostly towards the Montreal area for the preparation of the Olympic games, and those Olympic games have left behind some problems, not only for the city of Montreal, not only for the province of Quebec, but also for Canada. They said that was why the Canadian government had again designated the Montreal area as a special zone to help local industries provide jobs for the numerous unemployed people living there. But also, Mr. Speaker, those hon. colleagues were emphasizing how important it was to have a federal cabinet minister in the Quebec City area to reassess the requests and claims of members in the cabinet and that representation of the Quebec City area in the Cabinet was absolutely necessary, extremely important, something I am not disputing.

I still believe that all areas of Canada must be fairly represented within the executive of the national government. But what surprised me is that after describing all the advantages that an area can have when it is represented by a minister of the federal cabinet, someone—I think it was the moderator—brought up the question of the transfer of certain maritime operations from the Quebec City area to the Montreal region. One of the members then said that this matter was vital, that there was no way to stop it, that it would mean a loss of employment in the Quebec City area in favour of the Montreal area, but that the move involved the operations of a private company and that it was impossible to interfere in the matter. I am happy to see my colleague, the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Lamontagne), who was recently appointed to the cabinet, for which I sincerely congratulate him. I know that he is an able man and that he held the important position of mayor in Quebec City, where he did a very good job, as I have already said, and I am sincerely pleased to repeat it in this House. Today, I would like to urge him to give his support to his colleagues who took part in this television program in favour of keeping the operations in the Quebec City area, whether in the maritime sector or the industrial development area, and I sincerely appeal to him as a member of Parliament and not as a member of a political party to use his influence so that the Quebec City area will not be disadvantaged in favour of Montreal because of exceptional circumstances following the Olympic Games. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the minister understands the point I want to make and that he will consider it his duty to outline accurately the economic needs of the Quebec City area so that it can be recognized that the south shore area has been disadvantaged in the past and needs to benefit from this legislation.

During the debate on Bill C-11, I even wrote to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and asked him to introduce an amendment having regard to the area affected by the bill and concerning tax credits for industries in the Atlantic provinces, extending from Gaspésie to Rivière-du-Loup, so that this area be included in the law providing grants for the transport of goods in the eastern area ending at the road going from Lévis to the American border. Unfortunately this amendment was not introduced, which is not to say that I gave up and changed my mind about the feasibility of this idea. Maybe some day the Minister of State, the hon. member for Langelier, might convince his cabinet colleagues of the soundness of this proposal and the necessity for the industries in this area to benefit from the same advantages.

At it happened, Mr. Speaker, on Monday when the House resumed I met the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) and spokesmen for an important industry established in the south shore area. Because of their vivacity, their vigour and their youth, these people, who believe in the future, have managed to conquer a market outside Canada and create quite a few jobs in a given community. They can give expansion to their industry and create about thirty new jobs, which is quite appreciable in a community which is home to hardly more than 2,000 or 3,000 people. Of course this calls for co-operation from government authorities and from DREE.

So I think that if we could provide this industry with the benefits of this legislative measure, Bill C-23, it would be of tremendous help for them to pursue their operations and corner new markets in the United States. Even if the province of Quebec is involved and there are misunderstandings between the two levels of government, my feeling is that we, as responsible members of parliament, must do our duty and try not to make things more difficult. We should show the people in our areas that there must be in this country a federal government, it must supervise across the country the economic well-being and development of our regions, in order that each and everyone can take advantage of the legislation and benefits that a united Canada can bring them, in whatever province.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have always been very optimistic in nature, and I am still more so today. I have a conviction that with legislation as that now before us, even if not perfect, there is a will to improve things for industries so they may create jobs to lessen the unemployment plague in our province and our country as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I remember when we discussed Bill C-11, my colleague the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) put forward an amendment to increase the exemption for workers, the $250 allowance proposed in the bill that workers could deduct from their revenues for income tax purposes. My colleague suggested the amount should be increased to $400.

I still think that such an amendment could have increased to that extent the workers' purchasing power. It should be remembered the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance suggested during these last months that the purchasing power of consumers must be raised, to increase the consumption of Canadian goods so our industries could operate on a more continuous basis and get rid of their inventories, so the products could reach households where they are needed, thereby increasing employment if possible and reaching for that common goal of ours, which is that every Canadian while earning a living can make a contribution not only to a higher gross national product but also to better competitiveness on the international markets, so that we can produce better quality products and allow our industries to better compete with imports.

Early this week, I received a report from a textile industry in my area informing me of the sad plight of those industries, particularly the one involved. I dealt with this last December and I emphasized that those factory owners are showing great courage in holding on while making little or no profit, in the hope that the central government, through stricter controls on imports, will enable these industries to get a greater share of the market and to maintain at least the same level of employment as in 1977.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to this measure provided for in Bill C-23, I would like to make again the same suggestion I made before in this House and which was even considered on an opposition day. At that time, I appreciated the position taken by all members of this House, from whatever party, because this motion was looked into carefully, objectively and sincerely by all members who participated in the debate on that opposition day, and I refer to the discount on the price of Canadian products that the Canadian government could implement through an act of parliament for certain products whose producers are in deeper trouble. This leads me to mention briefly the plight of hundreds of milk producers, especially industrial milk producers, whose quotas have expired since November, December or last January. If the milk policy schedule is not changed very soon, milk producers will have to consider limiting their production until April 1. Yet, these producers have heavy commitments toward their credit unions, their banks, and all those who grant them credit to purchase dairy feed or farm machinery.

Some will say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Bellechasse keeps raising this matter. Indeed, and I am not ashamed of doing so because I am well aware of this problem and I would not want to see within a year or two our country running short of milk producers because of the present lack of foresight of the government. I keep meeting many young producers whom I have advised to buy their father's or their neighbour's farm rather than letting it be sold to strangers who are going to let fertile land lie fallow. There is talk about land conservation today. This should not be the exclusive concern of the Quebec government. We should all help out in conserving the land because whatever changes in government happen, whatever form our institutions may take in Canada or in the provinces, we will always need farmers to produce our food.

So, if we are aware of all that, I think it is time, Mr. Speaker—and that is what I am suggesting—the government considered carefully the advisability of granting a rebate on dairy products, let say on whole milk first since surpluses are used as industrial milk, and we know all the wrangling it has brought about last year. Whole milk producers were pitted against industrial milk producers and it is a serious matter to sow discord between members of a same family. That is all right as far as neighbours are concerned, but when people live in the same house or live on the revenues from the same industry or product, it is quite serious.

So, if it were decided to grant a discount on a quart of milk —someone pointed out to me recently that now with the metric system, it costs 52 cents. Before, milk was sold by the quart and it also cost 52 cents. So, with the new system, the consumer gets less milk for the same price. That makes no sense at all! So, the lady bought a quart of milk in a glass container and then took a carton containing a litre and poured the milk into it. And there was really a difference of a teacup. And then, if you buy four litres of milk for your family, it means that you bought four teacups less than what you paid for.

Here again it is the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) to monitor the implementation of that change in the measurement of consumer goods that people must buy everyday.

So, Mr. Speaker, let us grant a subsidy as we did in 1972 under a minority government! The Canadian government, then in a minority, granted a 5 cent discount per quart of milk, and during the few months when that policy was implemented, $181 million were distributed throughout Canada to promote the consumption of milk and help Canadian consumers. The purchasing power of those who really need it was increased by $181 million. This was possible in 1972, Mr. Speaker, under a minority government that was listening to the demands of the people and was still able to administer our country. Foreign governments did not meddle in our affairs because we had a minority government. But we did not have a minority parliament. At that time, parliament was assuming its true responsibilities as an inspiring force and a legislator while the executive was assuming its true responsibilities by implementing the will of parliament.

I am not afraid of a minority government, as I know it has been beneficial to our country.

Recently I heard on the CBC TV network that there might be an election in 1978. It is a possibility, but it is also possible that the outcome of that election will be a minority government. If this is the will of the people, there is no problem. We are supposed to live in a democracy, a government by the people and for the people. When I was a child, I heard Mackenzie King make a speech in Quebec City. Mackenzie King was not very fluent in French. He could say yes, no and thank you, and also welcome, but anyhow I was at the meeting he held at the Armouries and he said something I shall remember all my life.

He said at the time: Never ask to live under a dictator, long live democracy—he knew it by heart and had practised for weeks. That was when he said: a government of the people, by the people and for the people. He concluded his speech by saying: That is what I want to give you.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I support Bill C-23, and my colleagues will probably do the same because we usually end up understanding each other. I hope that when the bill is referred to committee it will be amended as required and that the government will then implement them. I hope that the civil servants who will draft regulations after the bill has been passed will do so quickly in order that this legislation be in force as soon as possible. However, they should take care not to lose the real objective of Bill C-23.

I do not want to be unduly critical but sometimes, after we have considered a legislation and done our best to understand it, it happens that when people come to us for information and details we have to refer to the regulations made after enactment of the bill, but we find ourselves at a loss because they do not reflect what we did in parliament, far removed as they are from the legislator's thinking. I am not saying it is done on purpose but it does happen. And when the bill will be in force I do not want to have to say to businessmen who will want to benefit from the law that because of such or such regulation they cannot do this and they cannot do that. People think that we are not serious when, on the contrary, we should demonstrate to all Canadians we are really serious and responsible people who try to give their country the best administration so that our economy will operate at full capacity. After that effort has been made, Mr. Speaker, some people will still be without work because progress is here, because machines are taking the place of man, and because those machines do not ask for a salary the way workers do. After that, a program will have to be implemented which enables the federal government, the various departments, the provincial and municipal governments, to undertake a vast public works program designed to give the people the services they need.

That is where I agree with orthodox economists whom I have often had occasion to criticize in this House because I felt it was my duty to do so. Those conventional economists suggest as a means of making up for deficiency of private enterprise, of government bodies, as a means of giving employment so that everyone can have an income, as a means of increasing or giving purchasing power to those who do not have a steady job, those economists suggest public works programs to give everyone a chance to earn some purchasing power. The purchasing power will not only have contributed to produce consumer goods but to produce services which we could enjoy in this world and which could also benefit future generations. Now a public works program as a means of dealing with unemployment is an excellent policy provided that future generations are not burdened with the production of goods which are now needed.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion and as a third suggestion, I would like to remind the hon. members and members of the executive that such public works should be financed not through taxes but with credits created by the Bank of Canada and refunded in the same way as the credits created by chartered banks. The only difference is that the interest rate would be much lower because the Bank of Canada should not operate to make profits but to provide services. The only interests paid would serve to cover administrative costs.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if we did it this way we would contribute to decrease inflation. Some of our opponents have always tried to ridicule our ideas and suggestions—not you, I know you as being sincere and honest people. However, there are people outside this House whose mission is to ridicule everything we do here, be it on the side of the majority, or on the side of the official opposition or on the side of the opposition parties, the ones that are called the "small" parties. I do not mind being called a member of a "small" party because in the Gospel, Jesus Himself did say to let "small" people come to Him. He loved small people and I am sure He still does.

Mr. Speaker, this formula which I am proposing most respectfully and sincerely, think we should put it to the test. We have made so many experiences here and there which have failed, that I suggest we should at least try a formula in which I, and a number of financial experts today, sincerely believe. Why borrow from others what we ourselves can produce? Why go and draw water from our neighbour's well when our well is filled to capacity with perfectly good and pure water? Why borrow elsewhere? Why have the chartered banks borrow the funds we need to expand the public sector when we have our own bank which can operate and do the same job for a better price?

Mr. Speaker, let us examine this very carefully. I am sure that if the House analyses this situation and goes to the bottom of this, it will realize that the hon. member for Bellechasse has come up in his remarks with three useful suggestions which deserve to be put to the test and will certainly not bankrupt our country. There is no risk involved. In fact, the way things are going right now, we are very likely to end up in bankruptcy.

Therefore, to stay afloat while there is still some vigour left in us, parliament could certainly convince this government to introduce legislation which would be the extension of the one we are dealing with today and which would make it possible to achieve the results parliament has in mind, namely, to provide all Canadians with enough purchasing power to meet their needs.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help making a few remarks about this piece of legislation. First it should be well understood that when the government accepts recommendations from the opposition—that does not happen often—and yet they are always intelligent recommendations. But this time the government could not refuse to consider a legislation or a recommendation designed to create employment. We would rather have had the government do it a few months ago when the official critic of the opposition pointed it out in the House on behalf of our party. Nevertheless we will support this legislation which is before the House because it contains some elements of solution.

It is certainly not the ultimate solution but we realize that it deals with an urgent issue and we will obviously not hesitate to support this legislation. In addition, we will do our best to be short so that the government can implement it at the date set in and in the most efficient way. That does not prevent me from urging the government to pay close attention to the monitoring and implementation of this program. It is obvious that in any legislation providing for subsidies to certain classes of people, one will try by all possible means to obtain the most and, unfortunately, from time to time an attempt will also be made to justify a subsidy that is not always justifiable. In view of the circumstances, I feel it is our duty to ask the government to watch very closely the implementation of this act.

We have been advocating a similar program for a long time. May I repeat again that the government could have thought of it at least two years ago. For two years now we have lived through an intolerable situation and, in light of the steady increase in unemployment and in the cost of living, we knew full well that legislation would have to be brought in. Why wait so long? I will attempt to prove my point. It seems that, during those two years the government decided to maintain a million unemployed through various band-aids it introduced. It may be that the government thought that with such programs as the LIP, the Opportunities for Youth Program and the new Canada Works Program, the economic woes of the country would be solved. I hope no one thinks that. But as few other formulas have been found to generate employment, we, on this side of the House, as thousands of Canadians, have to think that the government has nothing rather to suggest than a few band-aid measures. Still, if I say that suggestion may be acceptable and even worthy of interest, I want to clear up one point. In the outline given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) and in the press release of the officials of the Department of Finance, mention is made of $100 million in federal revenue which would produce 50,000 new jobs in the first year. Those officials recognize and admit, very wisely indeed—because God knows how many errors have been made in forecasts these last few years—that only 25 per cent of the jobs created by this program will be permanent jobs. So I feel the Canadian people have a right to know, to be spared illusions: when we talk about 50,000 jobs, it sounds good and, naturally, outside the House people tend to think of them as 50,000 permanent jobs. Then, if we assume the figure is 25 per cent, which is dubious according to some officials, it means that this program worth $100 million will create next year 12,500 permanent jobs.

But this program may also create 37,500 jobs for periods ranging from three to nine months. It is similar to Canada Works, Mr. Speaker, with the advantage, I must admit, that these jobs will benefit more the Canadian production than others, more than unemployment insurance benefits anyway. It remains nonetheless that Canadians must know that we are not talking about 50,000 permanent jobs. According to some forecasts, as I have said before, it represents 12,500 jobs and if we divide them among the ten provinces, then my own province, for example, may see the creation of 1,000 to 1,200 permanent jobs when the number of unemployed almost reaches 300,000. So I must repeat that this legislation, although worth while, is not the ultimate solution and I hope the government understands that also.

I just said that we have not solved the problem. That much is evident. Is it then some kind of a band-aid legislation which, on the eve of a possible election, can help create an exciting electoral climate for Canadians. I think the question is worth asking. Why do I say that for the last two years we have been living in an intolerable situation? I think that Canadians must put the following question to the government: why are these measures submitted at the last minute? Talking about elections, one never knows if they will be held this spring, next fall or next year, but judging from the subsidies that are being granted on an almost day-to-day basis, and from the arrangements that are being worked out with the provinces, it is interesting to see that the government has managed to scrounge here and there money that it claimed was unavailable only a few months ago.

If we are talking about permanent jobs, Mr. Speaker, I think we should start talking about an industrial strategy. I remember that in reply to the Speech from the Throne the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), supported by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), talked of an industrial strategy where this government felt that it was time to have an industrial policy. After ten years I do think it is indeed time to have one, and in view of the economic situation we are now facing I think that, to have an industrial strategy, we must have a well organized research department with the necessary researchers and funds.

Why do we now have to use this band-aid? Precisely because in the absence of that adequate research department for the economic future of this country—and that is indeed the case—I must hold this government responsible for not having thought of allocating the necessary funds to have extensive research which could have foreseen the economic situation we are now facing. So we now find ourselves—and this should also be recognized—in a very obvious and intolerable economic slump which is forcing this government to introduce emergency measures.

I spoke of that band-aid just before an election, of this absence of adequate research only equalled by the absence of an unemployment policy for which this government was responsible and could not come up with—a lack of foresight which resulted in hundreds of industries going belly up. This lack of adequate research can be seen every day in different areas.

Let us talk about the impossibility of forecasting massive imports in the future. I could give examples—I think our friends opposite remember quite well the difficulties facing the textile industry. There were further recent lay-offs in the mining industry, in the footwear industry, in agriculture—the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) referred to it earlier. We recognize that this absence of adequate research which prevented this government from coming up with a necessary policy created tremendous difficulties for our Canadian industry.

So, Mr. Speaker, a government which scorns such an essential and indispensable tool as a well organized research department is guilty of gross incompetence and irresponsibility. I am sorry but I think the words are not too strong and I must say that this government after ten years, which must show the public such a gloomy economic record, is indeed a pitiful failure.

So the government is prepared to do something to redress the situation and is making today its last attempt with the meeting of the Minister of Finance and his provincial counterparts. Next February there will be the conference on economic affairs. But for how long have we, on this side of the House, been urging the government to meet these people, to share with the provinces, the citizens and the labour organizations and to ask them and more particularly the business community for solutions? I think they could give good advice to our present Minister of Finance, but nothing like that was done. Here again, 1978 will be a very special period. The government will try to hoodwink the Canadians by telling them that it is prepared to do something. But I think our responsibility is to ask the Canadians whether this government still deserves the confidence they have put in it since 1974 and during the last ten years.

Therefore, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, only a well planned industrial strategy will allow us to create jobs, and for this strategy to be properly established, additional funds must be earmarked for research departments. In the short term, we will have to be content with the corrective measures presented to us today, but then again the package appears a lot more attractive than it is in reality. I therefore repeat, it is urgent that we support this piece of legislation. I also wish to remind Canadians that the slump which we find ourselves in is due to a government that lacked the foresight and decency to equip itself with the tools necessary to establish its policy.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, leave the floor to some of my colleagues who have comments to make, and I hope that my observations will be taken into consideration by our friends on the other side.

[English]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this important matter because I think the government is on the right track although it is very limited in its approach, and for that reason, when the bill becomes legislation, it will not do nearly as good a job as would be possible with a broader approach which I intend to outline at present. My thoughts are as follows.

If we are to increase employment significantly in this country, we must find a way of obtaining orders which are at present being filled by producers in other countries due to their ability to turn out products which are as good as the ones we produce and to sell them in Canada at significantly lower prices.

There is a great deal of business which Canadian companies are unable to compete for because of low labour costs in the foreign countries where the products are made. If Canadian companies are to be able to compete for a good proportion of this business, and thereby obtain additional employment for Canadians, they must have an incentive which will enable them to reduce their labour cost on this potential new business to a level where they are within striking distance of these low foreign rates. Then by accepting a lower than normal margin of profit on this extra business in order to get started, they can compete for these orders and stand a good chance of obtaining a reasonable proportion of them. Now, what kind of incentive will do the job?

The government should say to all business—not just manufacturers and processors—that it will reward over-all increases in employment during the year by way of an employment incentive, which will be paid in direct proportion to the increases that are made. It is simply a matter of comparing the total number of man-years of employment by the company in the tax year under consideration with the last full year before the plan is put into operation, which will be the base year. The employment incentive would be paid in proportion to the increase in employment and the general wage level of the plant concerned, and the company will thus be able to calculate well in advance just what amounts of money it would receive for various increases in employment.

This will enable businessmen to calculate in advance how much their labour costs would be reduced on additional business which the employment incentive would make it possible for them to seek. All such business obtained in this way will be a net gain for Canadians.

As you know, a person receives two thirds of his former pay or salary when he is out of work and receiving UIC benefits. If one third of his former pay scale is made available to a potential employer who can then bid on previously unobtainable contracts, and in this way provide work for that unemployed person, then he or she would have the satisfaction of working instead of remaining in idleness; would be removed from the UIC rolls; would be making a positive contribution to the economy; and would begin paying income tax to the government.

To pay for this employment incentive, we would have available to us a considerable proportion of what the government pays out each year as its contribution to UIC benefits. This year it is estimated that the government's contribution will be at least $2 billion of the more than $4 billion which will be paid out as such benefits.

In the bill before us there are some changes in detail from what I have put forward on this occasion, but the government's proposal is the same in principle as the ideas which I put forward for its consideration. Therefore, I will be very pleased to support the bill when it comes to a vote.

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I do not plan to take very much time of the House on this bill but I do wish first to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) for their attempt to recognize again the regional disparities which exist in some areas of Canada. I also wish to congratulate them on trying to reduce unemployment through the incentive proposed in the bill before us.

For the benefit of members of the House and others I should like to say that one does not see too many arrangements which take the regional disparities in this country into consideration. However, under this bill, in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec a $2 tax credit per job is offered.

One must look at what is the objective of creating these jobs. The employer must find a new type of work and employ a person for three months in order to qualify for a tax credit for up to nine months of assistance, and the new employee must be employed full time. This should encourage small businesses in Nova Scotia, and in South Western Nova in particular, to consider this new method of reducing unemployment in the fields of fishing within the 200-mile limit, in farming, forestry and tourism.

There are some questions which I hope will be answered with regard to employment in the fishing area in cases where the catch is not available for the full 40 hours in a week or for the full three months. I hope that the minister will answer some questions I will put to him during the debate on this bill later on regarding the case of an employer who wishes to hire people in the fishing industry. Will he have to hire them for a steady three months' period to benefit, or will he be able to extend that period in case fish are not running for a period during that time? I wonder how the legislation should be interpreted in that respect. There are many areas in Nova Scotia and in other Atlantic provinces where people are unemployed for eight weeks and more and this tax credit will encourage small businesses in these areas to create new jobs for one or more people.

As I said, in South Western Nova in particular the fishing industry is expanding, and hopes for the future are great. The 200-mile limit has certainly contributed to this. The tax credit for the creation of jobs will provide an incentive to reduce unemployment. It parallels perhaps the investment tax credit which was granted in the past year to small businesses which amounts to 10 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and in the Gaspé. It is 7 per cent in other designated areas in Quebec, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, and 5 per cent in all other areas of Canada.

To return to the tax credit proposed in the bill before us, it will amount to $2 in the Atlantic area and in the Gaspé, to $1.75 in other designated areas in Quebec, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, and to $1.50 in all other areas. It is calculated after the total taxable income of the company benefiting has been reported for that year. It can credit up to nine months of the $2 per hour for the employed person. It covers up to a maximum of 40 hours each week for a period of nine months. The employer can use this tax credit over a period of five years, if he cannot use it up entirely in one taxation year.

Often opposition members indicate that the government has not been looking for a method to alleviate unemployment in the regions of high unemployment in Canada. In my constituency this year approximately $2.2 million is going toward Canada Works projects. It is creating employment in times of high unemployment.

It is nice for members opposite to boast about the employment situation in Alberta, but a lot of Albertans have not faced the tough times of the east. This income tax credit will help many Canadians, particularly many easterners. I have a lot of confidence in the future of the east. I see businesses starting or expanding from existing businesses, not only because of the 200-mile limit, but because of Canada's ability to find oil on the east coast in the future. If one looks at the North Sea and sees how many wells were dug in order to find oil there, one will realize that Canada has not done as much and has found gas.

I see advantages for the constituency of South Western Nova. In order to receive the $2 tax credit, a person must find full-time employment for three months. I question the three months in terms of the fishing industry. Perhaps fish do not realize they have to be around for three months at a time. This is something that may be answered later in the debate. The benefit to the small businessman will be up to nine months and, if he cannot use the entire tax credit, he can spread it over a period of five years.

I thank Your Honour for allowing me to talk about this further incentive by the federal government. It is designed to aid in reducing high unemployment in some of the areas of Canada. The job experience and training program under the Department of Employment and Immigration is very new. Chambers of commerce and boards of trade have already taken this problem in hand in order to find out whether companies could use additional unemployed youth between the ages of 18 and 24. They have attempted to find businesses which require this age group, at the same time as creating jobs for the future and taking advantage of the 50 per cent being paid by Manpower.

In conclusion, this two-year program regarding tax credit can only benefit Nova Scotia and my constituency. I congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. After consultation with members of all parties, we have agreed to suspend the private members' hour for this afternoon in order to continue with the discussion of Bill C-23 which is now referred to the committee of the whole.

I therefore propose that the House seek unanimous consent and issue an order on the last two lines of Standing Order 16 to suspend the private members' hour for today so as to allow us to continue the discussion of Bill C-23.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree?

Mr. Andre: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Allard: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do we have the unanimous consent to suspend the private members' hour and go into the committee of the whole to consider Bill C-23.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 54, I now leave the chair to enable the House to go into committee of the whole to consider the bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before going into committee of the whole it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis)—Public Service—Committee of review—Government position on public hearings; the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston)—External Affairs—Reason Canadian delegation in Indonesia to discuss possible Canadian participation in coal mining project; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth)—Northern Affairs—Government position on contracting out work to private operators.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

House in committee of the whole on Bill C-23, to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the employment tax credit program—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, it is obvious from the expedition with which this bill was greeted today that there is a disposition on the part of the House to pass this bill as quickly as possible.

Would it not have been better if the government had brought this bill on when we wanted it, that is, prior to the adjournment for Christmas? The earliest this bill can be implemented is March 1, 1978, which means whatever advantages are in this bill will be lost for now. We hope there will be advantages in terms of its ability to create jobs in the private sector. I believe the private sector is where the greatest potential for job creation exists. But the advantages will have been lost, in so far as the peak periods of unemployment are concerned, namely, the winter season.

If the government had agreed to bring on this bill prior to the adjournment for Christmas, which is what we requested, it would have been passed in all stages in one day. The possibility that we might get through this bill today exists, and hopefully we will. The fact that we are dealing with the bill as late as today itself represents a tragedy because we will lose the job creation advantage of the bill at a time when we need it most. To underline that fact, all we have to do is look at the December unemployment rate, and it is growing by leaps and bounds. The official unemployment rate for December stood at an all-time high of 8.5 per cent.

I suppose the government and the minister will draw some consolation from the fact that the rate of unemployment in December went up by only one tenth of 1 per cent over the previous month. There is a failure to recognize the fact that we are dealing here with human beings who are unemployed, and not just with statistics. While the government may draw some consolation from the fact that the rate December over November went up by only one tenth of one per cent, that official tabulation represents 40,000 people added to the number of jobless. That means that 40,000 more Canadians are without jobs.

If we examine the December figures one startling thing which stands out and which causes me a great deal of concern—and reference was made to this today in the question period—is the fact that a growing proportion of the unemployed have been unemployed for three months or more, which means that unemployment insurance benefits for these unfortunate Canadians are expiring at the rate of about 10,000 per week or about 2,000 Canadians every working day, according to December figures. For these people unemployment becomes a real tragedy because they no longer have the relative luxury of unemployment insurance cheques. These people have to make the decision to go to their local welfare officers and to submit themselves to the humiliation of means tests. In my view that holds the potential for great social unrest.

The official figures from Statistics Canada show that 37 per cent of those looking for work in December were unemployed for longer than three months. Of those unemployed for longer than three months 35 per cent represent working males 24 years of age and over, obviously heads of families. However, that is the official rate. In real terms the figures are even more startling because we have an army of unemployed numbering 1.271 million as opposed to the official figure of 840,000.

The real rate of unemployment in Newfoundland is 26.3 per cent, or 57,000 out of a work force of 217,000. In Prince Edward Island the real rate is 19.6 per cent, or 11,000 out of a work force of 56,000. In Nova Scotia the real rate is 16 per cent, or 57,000 out of a work force of 356,000. In New Brunswick the real rate is 20.9 per cent, or 62,000 out of a work force of 296,000. In Quebec the real rate is 14 per cent, or 408,000 out of a work force of 2.922 million. In Ontario the real rate is 9.4, per cent or 393,000 out of a work force of 4.193 million. In Manitoba the real rate is 8.2 per cent, or 39,000 out of a work force of 475,000. In Saskatchewan the real rate is 6.3 per cent, or 27,000 out of a work force of 432,000. These are the prairie provinces where employment is supposed to be at its highest. In Alberta the real rate is 7.1 per cent, or 66,000 out of a work force of 934,000. In British Columbia the real rate is 12.4 per cent, representing 151,000 out of a work force of 1.222 million. As I have said, the total number is 1.271 million unemployed Canadians, representing 11.4 per cent unemployment.

According to the latest figures available, a little more than half of these people are eligible for unemployment insurance. The rest of them have to fall back on provincial or municipal welfare rolls. That raises a larger problem—which I hope is being discussed today at the finance ministers' conference—of the additional burden this places on the poorer provinces, because most of the long-term unemployment in the country resides in the five eastern provinces, Quebec and the four Atlantic provinces, comprising considerably less than half the work force.

I believe 37 per cent of the work force in Canada resides in the five eastern provinces, yet almost 50 per cent of the total unemployed resides there. I hope that the finance ministers will address themselves to redressing this legitimate grievance of the poorer provinces. I hesitate to use the term "poorer provinces", but those provinces lack the capacity to meet this additional financial burden. I hope some way will be found, apart altogether from the Canada Assistance Plan under which the government boasts of the 50-cent dollar, whereby half of the welfare is paid by the Government of Canada. That represents 100 per cent for the provinces because they have to pay out 50 per cent, when heretofore they had to pay out nothing because unemployment insurance covered the situation. That is a problem of growing concern.

The whole matter of the consequences of long-term unemployment on the individual has not been fully addressed by this government. I know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is a compassionate man. I know he has a great deal of humanity and compassion, but I do not think he fully appreciates and understands what it means to be unemployed for a long period of time. I know what it means to the statisticians at Statistics Canada. It means that if you are unemployed for a long period of time and out of sheer frustration have given up looking for a job, you are no longer counted as being unemployed. You are not reported. In other words, you become one of the hidden unemployed, part of the indivisible army of unemployed, one of those for whom nobody holds any hope.

There are shortcomings in this bill which will be pointed out as we get into clause by clause examination. This bill is the only thing the government has come up with. We have asked for a new budget. There has been no response to that legitimate suggestion. Only a new budget can really address the comprehensive nature of this problem, the effect of long-term unemployment on the poorer provinces in terms of their capacity to meet additional welfare payments and the human consequences which flow from the effects of long-term unemployment. Only a new budget can prevent the social consequences which will result.

Youth unemployment is growing by leaps and bounds, and that is a real tragedy. Again, according to official Statistics Canada figures for the month of December, 15 per cent of the unemployed in the month of December was between the ages of 15 and 24. Many of them are university graduates or graduates from technical and vocational training schools. They have diplomas but no job opportunities. What does it do to a young Canadian who works hard to get his diploma when his country shows him absolutely nothing in the way of opportunity? I say that makes for cynicism of the worst kind.

When I addressed a graduating class of a technical college in my constituency last June I was struck by the large number of people there and asked the college president if such a turnout was the usual thing on a nice day. He replied that they rarely got a full complement out as in the normal course the students would be in the field, working at jobs in forestry, construction, or the technical area in which they had graduated. They were present that day because there were no jobs for them.

Unemployment in my part of the country is critical, Mr. Chairman. The best barometer of that is the construction industry where, of a total work force of 20,000 people, about 16,000 are unemployed.

There is a disposition on the part of the House to get this bill through so that it can be operative by March 1. I hope the government will not impose so many bureaucratic—I do not use the word in a derogatory sense—regulations as to make it difficult for people to take advantage of the bill. I think particularly of small businessmen who do not have the resources to deal with bureaucracy and paperwork.

The bill is being sponsored by the Minister of Finance, but its implication will be the responsibility of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I am glad to see he is here to pilot the bill through committee in the absence of the Minister of Finance who is quite legitimately away attending the conference of ministers of finance. I must say, however, that I think it would be an edifying experience for those provincial ministers of finance to watch these committee proceedings. They are going to have some input into the way the bill is implemented by providing advice to the government. Obviously the government cannot operate in a vacuum but will have to deal with the provinces, so I think those ten ministers of finance would be well served if they could observe committee stage of this bill from the galleries. I think they should understand what we are trying to do here.

All too often in this House when we put in place measures designed to cope with emergency situations, we make them so difficult that middle and small businessmen cannot take advantage of them. They are defeated before they start because of the numerous regulations and paperwork that must be coped with. I should like to ask the minister to address himself to this question as we proceed through committee stage.

The government is spending an impressive amount of money on make-work projects, various tax incentives, and manpower training programs—about $2 billion at the present time. The situation is not improving, however, although these programs have been in place for some time. The Canada Works Program has been in effect for a couple of years. The Young Canada Works Program has had very little impact on youth unemployment and, of course, the various government job training programs obviously can have but minimal impact. Why train people if there are no jobs at the end of the training period?

In my part of the country many people occupy places in vocational schools taking upgrading or training courses financed by the government, only to find at the end there are no jobs for them. Some look for ways to return to the vocational training schools to take other courses. When we consider that over $2 billion has been spent on programs to provide incentives through the Income Tax Act, job training programs, make-work programs, the Federal Labour Intensive Program and others, we wonder just how effective they are. Sometimes I suspect we make it too difficult for people to participate. That does not apply to the Canada Works Program, however, because that was put in place quickly, although because of the scope of the program the impact is minimal. I do not underrate the importance of the Canada Works Program or the Young Canada Works Program but in my province where 57,000 people are unemployed only 10 per cent will find jobs through the $20 million spent on this program.

It is important that we approach this problem as an emergency—one that is unprecedented since the great depression. Unless we do, many Canadians will be forced to the streets, to the welfare offices, and will have to give up on the system. I believe we allow that to happen to our peril. We must treat this situation for what it is. If we approach it as an emergency we will impose a minimum of regulations and bureaucracy in order to ensure that the program is in place, operative and, hopefully, effective, as quickly as possible.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I have a number of concerns about this bill. I realize that the job involved must be one that would not have been possible without the incentive of the tax credit, but I wonder what is the standard. Is it something that had existed in the past and had folded, or must it be something entirely new to the company?

Perhaps I can go on to my other concern. I realize that the company must not be receiving any other assistance in the form of a subsidy at the federal, provincial, or municipal level, but how does it affect companies presently receiving DREE assistance? Are they to be excluded from the program? The press release states that in order to receive the $2 tax credit which will be given for up to nine months, the person must be employed full time for three months. What is the interpretation of full time? In an area like South Western Nova where there is a volatile industry such as fishing, there may only be two months of herring fishing at the beginning of the season and a month some time later. Can that three months' full time employment be interrupted? I know that full time means the opposite of interruption, but in terms of the fishing industry how will full time employment be defined?

I commend the minister for this new measure. We all hope that most of the people who will be hired under this program will be rehired at the end of the subsidy. Perhaps I could get an answer for those two questions and then go on. I understand I have only ten minutes.

Mr. McGrath: You have 20 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for South Western Nova has the floor.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I read in the press release of the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the tax credit can be used to offset federal income tax liabilities for the taxation year in which the credit was earned. If not required the credit could be carried forward for up to five years against future federal income tax liabilities and it will count as taxable income. That will be of greatest benefit to small companies that pay lower corporate tax rates than major firms. Again, I think that is good. Is that the total taxable income of the company, or do you relate it to the income earned from that new employment?

It has been brought to my attention that perhaps there might be a difference there. I would think that it would have to be the total income tax owed by the company rather than just relating it to the job. Perhaps the minister could advise if this program could be combined with JET, job experience in training, or is that excluded because it is a federal program? I imagine that the JET program will be receiving a subsidy, so you would not have that.

To reiterate, I have asked for two answers. What is the meaning of full time employment in an area where there is fishing, and whether a company which is presently receiving assistance under DREE would be able to qualify for creation of employment. Do you relate that new employment to the existing DREE having received a subsidy, or are you allowed to go into that?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend my compliments to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance who has done a very commendable job, not only on this particular bill, but on other tax bills before us. It is to the credit of the parliamentary secretary that he takes such control. I do not feel that I am piloting this bill through, I feel that I am helping him because the aegis for this particular program does come from the Department of Finance with input from us.

I am not going to comment at this time at length; possibly at the third reading stage I will have something to say on some of the comments made by the hon. member for St. John's East. I thank him for his recognition and his comments about my being compassionate and concerned, because I am, but he seemed to indicate that I did not know what it meant to be unemployed. My father was unemployed. I know what the impact is on a family when that occurs, and I do have concern for that. This was at a time when there was no unemployment insurance and no welfare. Similarly, I have been in the same predicament myself of being laid off and being unemployed, and I do have some concern about the problems faced by individuals who are unemployed.

Mr. Stevens: You will have a new stint coming up after the next election.

Mr. Cullen: Frankly, I think we have more important things to talk about.

Mr. Stevens: Let's get on with it then.

Mr. Cullen: We have more important things to talk about right now when we are talking about this program and not the election.

Interestingly enough, all the provincial finance ministers have endorsed this particular piece of legislation. They have been over it. They have in fact had a full briefing, and have indicated their full support for this particular program. The opposition across the way have indicated to us their support and we do appreciate the fact that they are going to expedite passage of this bill.

Mr. Alexander: Even though it is full of holes.

Mr. Cullen: In answer to the hon. member for South Western Nova, if DREE assistance is given as an incentive to increase the capital cost there will be no impact whatsoever. This program in fact will be available.

In the event DREE assistance is given to help with jobs, then the full amount of the tax credit will be given under this particular program, but in so far as DREE is concerned they will be looking at the particular form to see what impact this would have on the kinds of incentives and the amounts of money that would be made available. So it will impact to some extent on DREE in that particular region, but not where the incentives are given to increase the capital cost aspect.

I believe the hon. member for South Western Nova asked whether a firm which cuts down on its employment could apply. I can best say that it is in looking at the employment base, that an employer can measure the increment to his work. In the case of seasonal work the employment base would be the level of employment during the equivalent period of one year earlier. If it is in the case of on-seasonal employment, then the base would be the average level of employment during the eight weeks preceding the application. In the case of employment in heavy capital goods or the construction industry where employment levels tend to fluctuate widely but not necessarily seasonally, the base would be the greater of that reflected by the approach taken in either one or the other of the examples given, so that whichever one works in the least interests of the employer, that is the one which would be made applicable.

With respect to the job experience training program, a credit will not be given to employment which already receives support under other federal, provincial or municipal job subsidy plans. Persons who have worked for the employer within the previous eight weeks will not be referred by the Canada Employment Centres, so that the JET program, being a federal program, would not be applicable.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to go over the point the minister explained respecting DREE. I would interpret his explanation as meaning that it would be up to the company which benefit would be best, either to apply for DREE assistance for job creation or to apply for a tax credit. I assume DREE officials will probably be explaining that in future.

With respect to the level of employment, instead of directing my question at two months out of four months possible employment, what about a week? For example, if a person can only obtain employment for two days, 24 hours in a week. You have a maximum of 40 hours, so I take it you would have a minimum of 24 hours or even 20 hours. The maximum is mentioned in the press release but there is no minimum.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Hamilton West on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I know I am a little late in arriving but we all have some significant interest in this bill. However, I am a little confused by this procedure. I notice the hon. member is directing her comments to clause 1 which I understood was used for debate purposes only. I am listening to my friend, the NDP House leader, who knows much more than I do of this procedure and I would not quarrel with him; he is the expert. When I am finished, he can stand up and give his opinion as to what the ruling should be.

We are now asking questions which could come up a little later. I am wondering if the procedure is correct. As long as I have been here, and I have not seen a change, when you call clause 1 it is for the purpose of debate only. Without any further ado, as they say, Mr. Chairman, will you kindly advise what the procedure is at this time.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Hamilton West has asked a question. When clause 1 is a short title, it is stood. If it is a long clause, there can be questions and answers. A member can make a speech for at least 20 minutes and then speak a second time. The number of times a member can speak is unlimited.

Miss Campbell: Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted, I was talking about the level of employment, and I referred to the period of 20 weeks. In the press release, a maximum of 40 weeks is mentioned. I have not had an opportunity to study the bill in depth clause by clause. I just wonder if the interpretation will be a qualifying period of 20 weeks, 25 weeks, or what minimum is necessary in order to qualify for this tax credit.

The minister has mentioned the different interpretations of employment for three months. Perhaps he can enlighten us as to what full employment means for a week's employment. He has answered my other question.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, the situation is that the credit is given for the number of hours actually worked. Let us take a situation about which the hon. member might be worried. An individual might work three months, or three weeks and not the fourth week, working only 24 days. The employer would get a tax credit for the number of hours worked. The minimum is not applicable there. The credit is given for the hours that are actually worked.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the minister's attention to page 8 of the bill before us. There are certain regulations that are contemplated. Will the minister indicate what in fact will be the definition of "eligible employer"?

Mr. Cullen: Either an incorporated or an unincorporated individual would qualify as an employer.

Mr. Stevens: Further to that, Mr. Chairman, are there any limitations on the type of work that the employer may be in? For example, are farmers included without any question?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, in the event that the farmer is in fact conducting a business as such, yes, he would be included as an employer. I understand that only temporary help agencies or personal service would not qualify for this particular tax credit.

Mr. Stevens: I take it that with those two exceptions the minister referred to, anybody who is carrying on a business will be treated as eligible employers. Presumably farmers, who are one of the most basic types of businessmen in the country, will be included. Will the minister then give us the intended definition for "eligible employment"?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, so there will be no misunderstanding, I will read this part of the response. "Eligible employment" is full time employment where the work week exceeds 35 hours, that will last for a minimum of three months and that pays an hourly wage at least as high as the credit. The maximum period of subsidization is nine months. Excluded is employment in personal services.

Mr. Stevens: Following on that definition, I wonder whether the minister could clarify one or two things. As I understand the definition, it is for a minimum three months' period. If your employee decided to leave for some reason at the end of the first month, would that be regarded as as ineligible employment?

Mr. Cullen: No, Mr. Chairman, The situation is we would anticipate employers would in fact be offering a job during that period of time, the three month period. If an individual works one or one and half months and leaves, or for that matter is laid off, the employment credit would be applicable, as far as the employer is concerned, for the period of time that the individual actually worked.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I noted the minister indicated that you can get your amount of credit provided the wage is at least two dollars or higher. Is that correct?

Mr. Cullen: There are the three figures, $1.50, $1.75 and $2, depending on the particular job. Given those three figures, the hon. member's suggestion is correct.

Mr. Stevens: I wonder if the minister can indicate what in fact is the lowest minimum wage in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Cullen: I am just having that figure checked out, if the hon. member would like to ask another question.

Mr. Stevens: Tied in with that, Mr. Chairman, can the minister give us some idea how many employers may be entitled to this type of credit who will not be bound by any minimum wage? To what extent might there be people who will be offered only $2, $2.25 or some relatively low wage, which would mean the government is paying the entire cost of the hourly wage?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I am hesitating on this because I think it is clear we would not have the statistics until we find out what kinds of operations are in place, what kinds of employers participate in this program. We would need that before we would have the kind of information the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Stevens: I am always anxious to help these ministers, Mr. Chairman. To be very specific, in most areas the farmer as a businessman is not bound to pay any minimum wage in so far as employees are concerned. Taking that as an example, am I correct in saying that a farmer, following the suggested definition, would be able to hire somebody for, say, $1.50 an hour, and be fully reimbursed by the credit that this program will provide?

Mr. Cullen: The first question of concern I would have is how many people would in fact come for $1.50 a hour. Second, the credit that the individual is given as the employer is limited to that figure. Then it is a net benefit because it is taxable.

Mr. Stevens: I was not looking for the rationalization; we can all put that in. I am asking a very simple question. Is it not conceivable that an employer could have an employee on his staff, there would be no net cost to him whatsoever in the sense that there may be some tax back, but that as far as the initial payment is concerned there would be no net cost to him for that employee?

Mr. Chrétien: I think I can safely say there is no such possibility.

Mr. Stevens: Well, Mr. Chairman, the part-time Minister of Finance—

Mr. Chrétien: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I think this is the third time since I entered this chamber that the hon. member has talked about a "part-time minister". I have spent all day with the other ministers of finance of the land doing a very important job. I finished at 5.30 and I came right into the House of Commons. It is incredible that members of the opposition, because I go once in a while to Quebec, as I did this week, and speak for Canada so as to keep Canadians together, should sneer in that way. I think such behaviour is completely irresponsible. I do not ask anything from anybody for my benefit but there is one thing nobody can say of me, and it is that I am lazy. I have worked for 15 years for Canada. In a sense, I am happy that the opposition is so irresponsible because the people of Canada who listen to snappy, cheap shots of that kind will never have enough confidence in that party to put them in power.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gilbert: Be a man! Apologize!

Mr. Stevens: I see we have only 16 or so minutes left before six o'clock so perhaps I might continue.

I should like to ask the minister what would be the definition of an eligible worker.

Mr. Cullen: An eligible worker is one who has been unemployed and registered at a manpower centre as having been actively seeking work for eight weeks or more. An employee must not be related to an employer or to senior management of a company.

Mr. Stevens: I take it, then, that the manpower office would be expected to maintain some kind of register of those who meet this definition. Will some running record be kept of those who are available under the definition?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman. That kind of record is in place now.

Mr. Stevens: The bill provides there will be a prescribed form of agreement, one which presumably the employer signs with the local manpower office as the other party.

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: Does the minister have a draft of this agreement for us to see?

Mr. Cullen: No, we have not, Mr. Chairman. If we did we would probably be criticized for moving ahead on the assumption that the legislation would be passed—we have been caught in that box before. But the agreement will be a simple one. We did not want to get into a lot of bureaucratic regulations. We wanted to keep it as simple as possible so that the employer could benefit without having to do a lot of paperwork.

Mr. Stevens: We note that the form of the agreement is still not available. I appreciate that the Minister of Finance will probably not be with us later this evening so perhaps I could put one or two more questions to him now. I understand that at a press conference he estimated that this program will cost the treasury about $140 million. But he anticipated that the tax-back might amount to $40 million, giving the net amount of $100 million to which he referred as being the total cost when he spoke on October 20. Could the minister confirm this for the record?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I can confirm that.

Mr. Stevens: Can the minister tell us what studies have been made of the second source of revenue to the treasury? We can understand an employer having to add to his income on the credit side, and presumably tax will be payable. On the other hand, tax will also be levied on many of the employees. Has any calculation been made of the net tax revenue expected from employees under this program?

Mr. Chrétien: We did not make such a calculation. I might say we did not anticipate that many of those who will benefit from this program will be in receipt of incomes at a taxable level anyway. One has to make at least $4 or $5 an hour to be in a tax bracket.

Mr. Stevens: The minister would agree, though, that there might be some tax-back.

Mr. Chrétien: There might be. In the case of an employee who was paid $10 a hour, we concede there would be. But we do not know, and we are inclined to think the effect on the cost of the program would be extremely marginal.

Mr. Stevens: In putting the program together, did the department produce any estimate of the average wage likely to be paid to employees who benefit from this program?

Mr. Chrétien: We did not try to make such a forecast.

Mr. Stevens: I draw the minister's attention, now, to clause 6 of the bill, which provides for an instalment basis for the taxation year and refers to an amount "determined in prescribed manner" upon the income tax base in that year. Can the minister tell us what is the "prescribed manner"?

Mr. Chrétien: I will give that answer to the hon. member later on. I am meeting with ministers of finance again tonight but the Minister of Employment and Immigration will give the hon. member an answer to that question.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you. One important point is this: when does the minister anticipate the program will be in operation? If there is any basic criticism of the program, it is that it has not been ready early enough to relieve some of our current unemployment. Yesterday, in reply to my leader, the Minister of Finance stated that the program will be in place by March 1. There was no equivocation. Today in a prepared statement the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance stated that, hopefully, it will be in place by March 1. Could both ministers confirm, assuming the bill receives a speedy passage, possibly today, that it will be definitely operational by March 1?

Mr. Chrétien: If everything goes according to plan, it will be in operation on March 1. That is our goal. We are pushing our officials to circulate all the documentation to the regional offices, and so on. We do not have much time. Of course, there are some rules and regulations which do not allow the government to make any financial outlays on programs such as this before they have been passed, but I am assured by the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the program will very likely be in operation on March 1. This is the goal and the objective of the government and we hope there will be no delays.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, assuming the program is operational by March 1, can the minister indicate when would be the earliest time that he could report back to the House on how the program is working, the number of people who are utilizing it and the amount of credit that is going out? In short, when will he be able to give us some type of summation following a monitoring?

Mr. Chrétien: I am informed by my officials that it would be impossible to make a report before the end of April. Of course, it will take some time before we gain sufficient experience to assess the value of the program. I am also informed that in the United States they have a program which is somewhat similar to ours, but even after it has operated for a year they still do not have sufficient data which would be useful. This is an experimental program and as soon as we have any information we will be delighted to pass it on.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member for York-Simcoe that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to go back to minimum wage questions which were asked previously. Can the minister advise why some provision was not placed in the bill so that a qualified employer would pay at least at the rate of the federal minimum wage? Why was it decided that this legislation may encourage people to pay less than the minimum wage if they hire someone on a part time basis? Could the minister provide a short explanation to the House as to why there is no minimum wage standard set down in this legislation since we have a minimum wage law?

Mr. Chrétien: The reason is that many occupations come under provincial jurisdiction and the minimum wage is set by provincial governments, so it would be considered to be an intervention in the provincial field by the federal government. Earlier in a question the hon. member for York-Simcoe said that in some areas of work there is no minimum wage. I was quite surprised to hear that, but apparently in some type of agricultural work no minimum wage is set. Hypothetically, someone might then receive more in credit than he has paid out. I was not aware of that possibility and I have instructed my officials to prevent that from happening.

Mr. Leggatt: Certainly the provincial minimum wage varies and the government could make the lowest provincial minimum wage apply, or the lowest federal minimum wage. I suggest that the principle is one that this government should not abandon.

My second question deals with the reduction in the unemployment insurance payments that will result. Have any studies been made in terms of estimates of the success of the program? The minister has given us ball park figures on how many potential jobs could be created under the program. Have calculations also been made as to the reductions that will result in respect of the government's obligation under the unemployment insurance program?

Mr. Chrétien: I think this is a valid question. There will be some savings in the unemployment insurance programs because we have designed the scheme in such a way as to ensure that people will benefit either under this tax credit program or under the unemployment insurance program or under welfare after the minimum eight weeks of unemployment. So in any case there will be savings for the federal government because we pay half the welfare cost and the full unemployment insurance cost. However, we have not made any calculations with regard to gains that would accrue for the government from this program in reduced unemployment insurance payments.

Mr. Leggatt: In cases where the approved employer has qualified employees under this legislation but operates his business at a loss and the loss continues year after year, is there a time when he will lose the tax credit available to him under this legislation since, if he does not earn a profit or file a tax return in which there is a tax payable, he will not have a tax credit available to him in the long run?

Mr. Chrétien: He can carry the tax credit forward for five years. We have to put a time limit on this because it would be extremely difficult to carry forward this tax credit for a period longer than that in terms of the bureaucracy. Also, it is most likely that a person who does not make a profit for five years will be out of business. We assume there are few guys in Canada who can carry losses for five years and still be in operation.

Mr. Leggatt: As I understand it, under the legislation an employer has the obligation to have his plan for employment approved. Is there a discretionary power on the part of the minister's officials in approving the plan? Let us say that the operator of a massage parlour wants to hire a few extra girls from all across the country. Will that be an approved small business which will qualify under this program?

Mr. Chrétien: First we must satisfy ourselves that the business is legal. The employer will have to certify that without the program he would not have increased his manpower strength. But in terms of how much strength is added to the body in a massage parlour, I do not know.

Mr. Leggatt: The last question which I wish to put concerns the use of the Manpower office as the funnelling agency for all the applicants. They must qualify as having been unemployed for eight weeks and be referred through a Manpower office. The difficulty with that provision is that there are a great many people who have fallen out of the manpower system because they have been out of work for such a long time. Can there be a provision in this bill permitting an employer to hire someone who does not come through manpower?

Mr. Chrétien: No. We have not included such a provision intentionally, because in previous programs we have come across cases where people were using programs to enter the labour force only to qualify for unemployment benefits, and we do not want that. In previous make work schemes of the government we found such abuses. We want to ensure that this program will benefit people who are in the labour force. For a person to be eligible to be in the labour force, he must be registered for more than eight weeks in a Manpower office as being eligible for work, even if he is not drawing unemployment insurance benefits.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at six o'clock clause 1 of Bill C-23, to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the employment tax credit program, was under consideration, and the hon. member for New Westminster had the floor. Noting that he is not here, I will recognize the hon. member for Simcoe North.

On clause 1.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if it might have been possible, when this bill was being drafted, to enlarge its scope. For instance, it follows, as I understand it, pretty well the lines of the DREE legislation, and takes us north into the riding of Simcoe North to the Parry Sound area before becoming effective on the higher scale of pay; in other words, those working in Simcoe county, where there is a large urban area and a great deal of manufacturing, as in the cities of Barrie and Orillia, and the town of Midland with 12,000 people, and Penetanguishene. Since the unemployment rate in that area is quite high, I am wondering why the minister could not include it so that we would have the opportunity of taking some of these people off the unemployment rolls. Industry has been hard hit in the area with the closing entirely of Motorola and with the strike at Decor Metals which supplies motor parts for cars principally, as well as seatbelts, windshield wipers and other safety devices.

One of the big plastic firms in the Midland area, which was basically sound, has cut some of its orders because of the slowdown in industry. As I have said, Motorola has entirely closed down its plant. RCA Victor recently lost its orders for government supplies, which means the loss of approximately 50 jobs. Penetang has a very high rate of unemployment, and Orillia, which is highly industrialized, has experienced the closing of one plant and many lay-offs. Barrie has a high rate of unemployment because of some industrial lay-offs.

My point is: the minister could have included that largely industrialized area of approximately 210,000 people in the DREE program in order for those people to be covered, and in an attempt to help other industries in the area as well. Why was this not possible? Is it still possible to do this?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, it is a well known fact, when the hon. member speaks in this House, that we all listen very carefully. Perhaps he does not speak as often as some members, but when he does, it is because he has something worth-while to say. I have noticed that in regard to the question period as well, but it is unfortunate that I am not in a position to say the same thing about his hon. colleagues.

It was the feeling that people right across the country will qualify for this particular program. It was drawn up in such a manner as to parallel the investment tax credit. That was felt to be appropriate. I appreciate the hon. member's concern about small areas in regard to the variable entrance requirement on unemployment insurance. I think the expansion from 16 to 54 regions is good. Certainly the hon. member's argument has merit. But given the fact that this is a two-year program and we expect it to be successful, I do not foresee our moving in the manner suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his compliment. If this program works out and is successful, as the hon. minister has indicated, would it not be advantageous to include an area like Simcoe county which has so much industry?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, because we are embarking on a new program, even though all ideas and suggestions may not be accepted now, I am sure they will be looked at. We do not have the time to look at them at this point, because we want to get this program operational. I assure the hon. member that suggestions will be looked at carefully over the next year or two years in an attempt to see if they can be implemented.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Chairman, I understand this program will commence around March 1. What provision has been made, or will be made, with respect to monitoring the program in order to determine the effectiveness of it? Approximately $100 million of taxpayers' money is being spent; therefore, it is important for the program to be monitored in order for Canadian taxpayers and parliament to know whether value is being received for the dollars spent. Will the minister advise whether he has a monitoring program? If so, would this monitoring program provide for a monthly report to parliament?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, of course we will be monitoring. From the standpoint of my own particular department, there will be a second monitoring when the individual business or employer makes application for his tax credit. Approximately a year is required in order to give it a full evaluation.

In answer to an earlier question, my colleague indicated that possibly by the end of April we will be in a position to give some preliminary information, after having experienced the kinds of people who are applying and which employers propose to take advantage of this particular program. By the end of the year we should know how effective the operation is. Of course we will monitor the program. I am sure both employees and employers will want to see that it works to their advantage.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Chairman, a year seems to be quite a lengthy period of time to determine whether a program is working or not. If the hiring is done through Manpower offices, certainly those offices will record the number of people who are being referred to jobs under the program. There are not that many Manpower offices. I understand the program will create work for approximately 50,000 people. Within 10 or 15 days after the end of each month, it seems to me the Manpower offices will be in a position to give tentative figures as to the number of people who have been referred by them to jobs. I appreciate employees have to work for a minimum of three months in a job before an employer can qualify for the particular subsidy, but in fairness parliament should be entitled on a monthly basis to the number of individual employees who have been referred to jobs under this program.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to correct one misapprehension the hon. member seems to have. It will not be necessary for the employee to work three months. We are anticipating that employers will recognize we want them to take advantage of this credit. We would expect the minimum time frame to be three months. However, if an individual works for two months and quits, the employer will still receive the employment tax credit. The employer will not be cut off because the individual did not work for three months. As a matter of fact, if an individual works only one month, perhaps it is because he has moved on to a better or more permanent job, or he may not be satisfied with the particular job he has. The employer will receive the credit for the time frame the employee has worked.

In an attempt to be as honest as possible, I referred to a year in answer to the hon. member. After talking with the Americans, members of my party, the Conservative party, the NDP and Social Credit parties, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs felt that was the shortest time it required in order to give an honest evaluation. As a result of monitoring, we will know the number of people applying; but we will be required to look very carefully at the implementation of the program in order to see just what impact it has. In fairness, a year is not out of line, given the fact that Americans have had some experience with this and that was the best advice they could give.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the implementation which is targeted for March 1, what is the plan regarding the promotion of the program? Small companies in remote parts of the country hardly can take advantage of this if they do not know about it. If the program is to be expeditiously implemented and working by March 1, it would required quite an ambitious promotional campaign, and if the program is to be successful as soon as possible, certainly an ambitious promotion campaign is warranted. Is there a promotional plan in existence? If so, what is the scope of it and when will it get underway?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, we anticipated an advertising campaign. Approximately 450,000 brochures will be distributed through the Department of National Revenue across the country. In addition to that, Canada Manpower centres will be making calls to businesses which will benefit from this particular program, particularly the small businesses, as well as having booklets, forms and the benefit of the advertising.

● (2022)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the types of firms which may qualify, we have heard some reference by the hon. member from Nova Scotia to companies, for example, which are receiving DREE grants. Would companies which have substantial provincial government involvement—not necessarily Crown corporations; I am thinking, for example, of the fishing industry—be ineligible for grants under this program?

Mr. Cullen: If in fact they are paying taxes, they are eligible. If they are making a profit, they qualify.

Mr. McGrath: I presume there would be co-operation and consultation with respect to maximizing the use of the program to promote industries which have employment potential. I am thinking of the fishing industry on the east coast where, by virtue of the implementation of the 200-mile limit, there is suddenly a tremendous unexploited potential. We are operating at about 50 per cent capacity, and there is room for tremendous expansion. If this program could be discussed between the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and the provincial fisheries ministers, I can see ways whereby the fishing industry could take tremendous advantage of it. This program could be a tremendous boost to the industry because the industry could take advantage of the unexploited stocks which are available as a result of the 200-mile limit.

Mr. Cullen: As I said, as we embark on this new program it seems to me that provincial and federal ministers and probably members of parliament, MLAs and MPPs will all endeavour to do what they can. However, as long as there is an increase in employment and as long as tax paying businesses are eligible, I would expect to see some leadership being taken in fields such as the one suggested by the hon. member. I do not see anything wrong with that.

Mr. McGrath: I wonder, then, if the minister would address himself to a matter with which I concerned myself in my opening remarks. Can he assure the committee that there will not be an overly burdensome bureaucracy put into place? Will this program be implemented by existing agencies of the government and the existing bureaucracy in the minister's department?

Mr. Cullen: If this program is to be successful at all it must have ease of operation, so we are endeavouring to do what we can to make it as simple as we can without imposing many regulations which would make it difficult. We do not want to hire additional people to fill out forms and to operate this program. We do not want to have a series of regulations which will impede what I think will be an excellent program.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Simcoe North I am not very happy to be told that this program will not be of as much benefit to the businessmen and the unemployed in my area—and I assume also in the minister's area—as it will be in some other parts of Canada. I think perhaps the department should re-examine that aspect. The Minister of Employment and Immigration need not be afraid that people will think he is looking after only his constituents; he can always say he is looking after the constituency of Huron-Middlesex, and his can slip in on the side.

There is another thing about this plan which disturbs me considerably, and that is that the department is going to run into the problem of deciding whether the new jobs which will be created under this plan would not in fact have been created without the plan. The other night the Minister of Finance was on television answering questions, and he said that the businessman would have to state on his honour—and the department would have to accept what the businessman says—whether any new jobs created would have been created regardless of whether this plan was in effect.

The department and the ministers like to refer to the U.S. plan. They say that this plan is patterned after the United States plan, but I note that under the U.S. plan there is no such provision. I think the Americans have the better plan because it is asking too much of the administrators of this plan to ask them to decide if an employer would have provided a new job whether the plan had been in effect or not. It is almost an impossible situation. I would like either the minister or the parliamentary secretary to have another look at this situation because they are asking for serious trouble.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member and I should be thankful that we live in areas of low unemployment where there is natural growth. Our areas do not need the assistance which is provided here to the same extent it is needed in areas of high unemployment.

With regard to monitoring and control we are going to rely on the word of employers. Our whole tax system is built on a trust mechanism, with occasional audits. In this case, when we do audits we will know how many employees particular firms or particular employers have. We will be able to check this out in that way.

This is a procedure we were asked to put in place by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. The hon. member for New Westminster suggested that rather than having too much bureaucracy, checking and auditing, this might be the better approach.

Mr. McKinley: I thank the minister for that explanation, but I still suggest that it will be impossible for the administrators of this program to be able to tell whether jobs would have been created without this plan. I think the minister is dreaming.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a few moments to make some brief comments about the possible impact of this bill, and then I would like to address perhaps just a single question to the minister about the manner in which the bill might work.

I would like to point out that in the southeast corner of Alberta, in my constituency of Medicine Hat and particularly in my home city of Medicine Hat and in Redcliff, where there is a population of about 40,000, for the first time in quite a number of years there is an increase in unemployment. I hasten to point out that I am not unmindful of the fact that we have enjoyed a very high level of employment for quite a number of years.

However, in the last quarter of 1977 and certainly in this early part of 1978 there has been a definite increase in unemployment in the Medicine Hat-Redcliff community. This is due partly to the termination of several years of heavy construction activity and also more recently to the shutdown of our meat packing plant the day before Christmas, which now appears to be a permanent shutdown. For the first time in quite a number of years we see a definite increase in the number of job hunters. They appear to be quite willing even to go out to work on farms and ranches, and that is quite a change.

I suggest to the minister that the best opportunity for employment in these circumstances at the moment is in rural areas. We are in the throes of a very severe winter, one which is exceedingly hard on range cattle. It seems that last year's severe drought all over southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan has given way to this severe winter and we have more snow now than the total fall of the last two winters. I hasten to say that I am not complaining about the severe winter. It seems we must have a lot of snow in order to get rain next spring. But it has created a demand for workers in rural areas.

Notwithstanding the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, about whether the program will apply to agriculture, I hope the minister can give an assurance that it will apply to the farmer who creates a new, permanent job, not one under a winter works type of deal. Will the program cover the farmer or rancher who wants to hire someone for a permanent job? I think this is the best way for it to work.

We are also a little concerned that the program may not come into operation until March. In that case would there be a possibility of retroactive application where jobs have been created as a result of severe winter conditions and where those jobs will continue?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I indicated earlier that as long as the job is incremental and the individual pays or is eligible to pay income tax, it will qualify under this program. We hope that the employee will establish to the satisfaction of the employer that he is worth keeping and that the employment will continue. We hope it will have that good "catch" factor and that we are creating not only temporary jobs. We think the increment will be maintained notwithstanding the fact that the employment tax credit will terminate at the end of a certain period.

There will not be any retroactivity in the program. We think that would be counterproductive.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, this program has been a long time in the making. The United States has had something similar and has not been very happy with it so there is some doubt about whether it is effective. Many felt that most of the jobs would have been created in any case. How does this program differ from the one in the United States?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, the first difference is that the United States system is automatic. If there is an increment over two per cent it is treated as automatically qualifying for the benefit. Second, no certification is required from the employer in the United States as will be required in Canada. Third, we will refer individuals to this program who have been out of work for eight weeks. Those are three specific instances of how it differs from the program in the United States.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance predicted that 50,000 jobs would be created. How was that figure arrived at? Was it based on the U.S. experience?

Mr. Cullen: I believe the Minister of Finance indicated that this was a calculation based on the dollars that are available and the rate of subsidy that will be paid.

Mr. Ritchie: May I ask the minister if this program will be open to unincorporated businesses, to farmers and others? Is there any limit on the number of employees that a single firm may apply for? Firms like the CPR or Bell Canada, for instance, might employ 2,000 or 3,000 new employees.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, as I have indicated, the program is open to incorporated businesses, unincorporated businesses, partnerships or sole proprietorships. There is no limit and nothing would make me happier than to have some corporations announce that they will participate and hire the number of people the hon. member mentions.

Mr. Ritchie: It seems that all an employer will have to do, Mr. Chairman, is sign an affidavit to the effect that the number of employees he takes on will be an increase in staff. I think employers may feel that, without a plan such as this, that would be a risk. Is there any way the department can check that it was not already the employer's intention to increase the staff? How can we be sure that the jobs have been created just because of this program?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is correct; it will be necessary for the employer to sign a certificate or participate in an agreement. We will conduct some sample audits and will be able to compare employment before and after. The claim will be filed under the Income Tax Act. The physical evidence of expansion of a business will be noted.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, many small business people who have gone through the red tape necessary to qualify for a grant are reluctant to go through the process a second time. Will the application of the rules be severe or lenient? Will there be a penalty if the department decides that a new job has not been created and that there was merely a roll-over?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to hear the hon. member's general comment that some people who have experienced difficulty collecting money from the government might be somewhat hesitant to go through the procedure again. I suggest with respect that once you have that experience, it has not been my conclusion that people are reluctant ever to seek out additional funds from the government, particularly when it is a good program.

In so far as being severe or lenient is concerned, we have indicated that we are endeavouring to remove as much of the bureaucratic aspect of it as possible. There is an element of trust but, by the same token, the individual will be filing a claim under the Income Tax Act to the effect that he is entitled to this particular benefit for the reasons given in the return. If that is incorrect he would pay that particular penalty.

I am advised that clause 7 of the bill provides that every person who makes a statement or representation that he knows to be false or misleading or who fails to disclose any information with the intent of misleading any other person is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, one final question. The Minister of Finance the other day in addressing business stated he was amazed that business was not taking up his tax breaks of $2 billion in the March and October budgets. Have the government canvassed business, that is at the local manpower levels, as to the possible acceptance of this? And have the government actually had the Manpower offices conduct a canvass beforehand in the small and larger business sectors as to their reaction to this type of program?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, probably one of the catalysts, if you will, of this particular program was Mr. Bullock, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, who came forward with a particular program comparable to this one. He indicated that they would definitely be very interested in participating and saw this program as a benefit to the small businessman. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce has also indicated that they are most interested in this program and would be encouraging members of their organization to participate. Having had some experience with the chamber in connection with the job experience training program, and knowing the kind of leadership that comes from the top in that organization where something can be done, I am satisfied that this particular program will be used by the business community, particularly the small businessmen and those members of the chamber.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, in answer to questions from the member for St. John's East the minister said that there would be a massive advertising campaign to inform people about this program. I am assuming he is referring to newspapers, radio and television. If so, could the minister tell me the amount of the budget which has been allotted to the program?

Mr. Cullen: My answer is yes, we will advertise in the newspapers, on radio, television, etc. I am advised it will be done in two phases. In the first stage there is a budget amount of $800,000. In the second phase approximately six months down the road an amount of $700,000 is budgeted for.

Mr. Friesen: By my quick addition, that is $1.5 million for advertising this program?

Mr. Lumley: Yes.

Mr. Friesen: Could I ask the minister which advertising firm was awarded the contract for this?

Mr. Cullen: I am advised that no contracts have been let. But, of course, they could not be until the bill is passed in any event. I would expect it to be one of our better Canadian agencies; they are all good.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, is the same firm that composed the advertising for the UIC being considered as one of the possible ones? Is it in the list somewhere?

Mr. Cullen: I would not want to say yes or no. I think all companies would be in a position to bid for these particular contracts. They are all government contracts, and the people who do our advertising do a first class job. There will be less criticism after people see our advertising than there is now, before people even read the ads.

Mr. Friesen: It would be interesting to know what the antecedent is to the possessive pronoun "our".

One final question. Will all companies in Canada be permitted to take advantage of this program? In other words, will the multinational corporations? Will there be any restrictions as to size or nationality of the companies that can take part in this program?

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Cullen: No. It is as broad as the hon. member has indicated, and as I have answered to his colleague the hon. member for York-Simcoe and others of his party. I have mentioned some earlier exceptions, personal service contracts and things of that nature. The impact is to be Canada wide and business wide.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, while listening to the answers given to my colleague concerning the opportunity for farmers to take advantage of this program, I had the impression we were talking about permanent jobs. If I understand this legislation, where some employment is assured for three months, one becomes eligible and from there on, taking as minimum criterion the three months required by the legislation which could be extended to nine months, could any producer hire an individual for at least three months if he is qualified after three months, because I imagine that the producers with that assistance will probably be in a position to hire one or several persons for various purposes. Will a minimum of three months make a producer eligible for a subsidy?

Mr. Cullen: We hope, Mr. Chairman, we hope that employment will last at least three months, but it is not necessary. A job could possibly last only one or two months. It is then possible to benefit under the legislation.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I hope that it is quite clear. A farmer could hire an individual for one, two or three months, but anyhow the farmer would be eligible under the program.

Mr. Cullen: Yes, that is right. However we hope that the farmer or other employers will keep the employees for three months or even more. However, even if it is for less than three months, it is still possible to take advantage of the program.

Mr. La Salle: It seems that even if employment does not last for three months, it will be still possible for the farmer to qualify under the program. I thought there was a minimum of three months to guarantee employment under the program. The minister says that even if employment does not last three months, the farmer could still take advantage of this legislation.

Mr. Cullen: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I think I have used all my French vocabulary and I would like to switch to English because it would be easier for me.

[English]

The three month criterion is included so that employees will be offered a sufficient period of employment to benefit in terms of skill, development, work experience and self-reinforcement. But if an individual is hired for three months or six months and he only works for one month, the employer—the farmer for example—will still qualify for the tax credit.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask another question. During the press conference which was given when this program was launched, officials estimated, according to the reports I have been able to read, that permanent employment under this program would be in the vicinity of 25 per cent. So I conclude from this that if 50,000 jobs are anticipated, it seems already that officials estimate very cautiously that they will maintain about 25 per cent, that is 12,500 permanent jobs which could be created under that program. The other jobs could last from three to nine months. Could the minister tell the House if he agrees with the predictions of his officials because I think it should be clear for all Canadians that we are not talking about 50,000 permanent jobs but hopefully 25 per cent of 50,000, that is 12,500 jobs.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, it must be stressed constantly that this is a new and innovative program. This is the best prediction that can be made, given the experience of looking at the American program where after a year they are still not in a position to tell how many of the jobs created will go on to become permanent jobs. As I indicated, it is my hope that at the end of the tax program period, employers will see the benefit of having an extra employee and will continue to employ him, notwithstanding the fact they will not receive the benefit.

With regard to the other aspect, it is not 50,000 for the period. It is 50,000 per annum. As this is a two-year program, we are looking at 100,000, not 50,000.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister on this move. It far exceeds some of the other programs that have been put in place by the government. It is anticipated that some good will come from this type of program. If the business or the farmer is in a tax loss position, will the tax incentive be taxed at a basic rate, or will it be added to his income and the business and farmer end up in a tax loss position even with this? Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that you add it to your income only in the year that you propose to take advantage of a particular program. It can be carried forward for a period of five years.

Mr. Towers: If bodies such as chambers of commerce qualify as a business in that they hire personnel to run tourist booths in the summer and other types of projects in which they may become involved, are they eligible for this type of program?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, the criteria require that the employer must pay taxes in order to qualify.

Mr. Towers: As a considerable amount of personnel will be involved in managing this program, will extra staff be hired in Manpower offices? Will private auditing firms do the auditing or will this be done by government auditors?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, we are endeavouring to avoid an expansion of personnel for the managers required. As far as we are able to determine, the auditing will be done by the personnel we have now in place. Again, we will want to look at that. I cannot say there will not be any increase. I cannot make that prediction at the present time. It is our hope that as a result of keeping this simple and not doing all the kinds of audits that have been suggested from time to time, we will not have to increase our personnel. We are trying to keep this simple and non-bureaucratic. We will, as we so often do, rely on the businessman to comply with the bill as it is intended to be used by him.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, the minister provided us a while ago with information which I feel is somewhat ambiguous about the conditions employers must meet to become eligible for the employment tax credit program. I submit to him for instance the case of a farmer who hires three or four people for the summer months and who is considered as a seasonal employer. Also a hotel keeper who hires some 30 people, say in the Gaspé region, during the tourist season is considered as a seasonal employer. The owner of a fish processing plant is also considered as a seasonal employer. It is a well known fact that these employers lay off their staff either in September, October or November and hire them again in May.

Mr. Chairman, based on the minister's last explanations, all these employers would be eligible for these tax credits, so that I am afraid the funds made available under this legislation would not be sufficient to meet the needs of all the employers who will apply for the $2 an hour tax credit on behalf of the staff they will rehire or the new staff they will hire in May or June for the summer months.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, it probably sounded ambiguous because I spoke in English, knowing that French is much more precise. I probably should use French, but my French is not as precise as it should be.

If an individual hires a lot of people in the summer, the previous summer will be the period used to do the comparison, not the fact that he had quite a few people and then laid them off. The comparison will take place for the season. The number of employees in one summer would be compared with the number of employees in the previous summer, not necessarily the previous eight weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago, our colleague from Joliette asked whether a farmer hiring two or three people for a three-month period could be entitled to any employment tax credits. But it must be clearly understood that if that same farmer had four employees in 1976 and if in 1978 he has only three or keeps his maximum of four employees during the season, that farmer or employer would not be entitled to employment tax credits for his four employees. He will perhaps get employment tax credits for the two or three extra people he will have hired as compared to his payroll for the previous years.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Under the bill a new employer, be he a farmer or anybody else, will not qualify unless there is an increase in the number of employees. This is not a tax credit for hiring people. It is a tax credit for hiring an additional number of people.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, in the January 24 communique issued by the Minister of Finance, we can read somewhere that any hired people will have to be referred to the employer by a Canada Manpower Centre, which will refer only people unemployed for more than eight weeks. Now here is what we find somewhere in another document on the highlights of the employment tax credit program:

Employers shall hire new employees referred by the Canada Manpower Centres.

We know from experiences we had in the past with various other programs that complications arose and that, in some cases, there were what may be described shady deals. But I hope the minister does not want employers to try by every means to take advantage of this legislation and to get tax credit, for example by laying off a worker who after nine or ten weeks, in compliance with the requirements of the legislation, will be referred to an employer, maybe the same one, who will then re-hire him after laying him off eight or ten weeks before.

Could the minister clarify this point for us in order to give us some real guarantees about the spirit of this legislation and the way it will be enforced to reach its true objectives.

● (2102)

[English]

Mr. Cullen: I might have expected that the hon. member would call attention to one of the dilemmas facing us. I suppose there is hardly a system conceived by parliamentarians which could not be abused in one way or another. It is for this reason that we shall be carrying out monitoring. We shall be checking the number of employees, we shall be requiring employers to sign certificates to the effect that there has been a legitimate increment. Employers will be filling up a tax form to certify entitlement under the act. There will be post-monitoring and there is provision in clause 7 for penalties. So we have introduced such safety measures as we can. I think, too, that some degree of trust should be placed in the business community.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, in another paragraph we read this, and I quote:

Employers will be required to sign an agreement certifying that their job-creation projects meet the criteria of the program. Agreements must be signed before March 31, 1980.

That is what I understood since, according to the news release of the Minister of Finance, the program gets under way on March 31, 1978, and lasts two years. Is there not a contradiction there, or is there any reason why agreements must be signed before March 31, 1980? Does it mean that date is the deadline? Could an employer start taking advantage of the program from March 31, 1978 on, even if he does not sign an agreement before March 31, 1980? I would appreciate the minister explaining this to us so that, in turn, we can give employers in our respective areas very specific information, and so enable them to benefit from the program and co-operate with the government under this act while contributing to the well-being of the unemployed.

[Mr. Cyr.]

[English]

Mr. Cullen: For a moment I thought the hon. member had caught me. It is a legitimate question and I thought I did not have an answer. In the first place, the Minister of Finance did clarify the situation by saying we were hoping to have this program in operation by March 1 instead of March 31. The press release was in error in that regard. Those who take part in the program must enter into the agreement within that time frame, March 1, 1978, to March 31, 1980. If they enter into it the day before March 31, 1980 the agreement will continue for nine months beyond that date.

[Translation]

Mr. Portelance: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister what would happen in the case of an industry which is expanding and this will create new jobs. Suppose the industry is already operating, and funds have been spent to hire some 15 or 20 new workers in a different area. What happens in that case? Is that industry also eligible for the reductions?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: It has to be an increment as compared with the situation eight weeks before the agreement was entered into, and must relate to personnel additional to those who would normally have been hired for the operation.

[Translation]

Mr. Portelance: Mr. Chairman, it is still something completely new, it did not exist before. On what will this additional grant be based since nothing like this has ever existed before?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: I am not sure I heard the hon. member's question correctly, but a new business does not qualify because it implies an expansion which would have taken place in the ordinary course of events.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I was sitting in other committees this afternoon and I apologize if the questions I wish to raise have been touched on by other speakers. When is it expected that the first funds will become available for this program? Will it be in April, as I have heard?

Mr. Cullen: I would remind the hon. member that this does not involve a payment out of funds. It is an employment tax credit. So an employer will receive the benefit at the time he files his income tax returns, or, in some cases, when he gets his tax rebate.

Mr. Clarke: Then perhaps the question might be better put this way: When is the commencement date of the program? When will the first jobs be created?

Mr. Cullen: We are looking to a date soon after March 1. We hope the program will be operational on that date. The answer is, as soon as agreements are entered into thereafter.

Mr. Clarke: It is obvious this program will have no effect on winter unemployment which is usually so severe. Is the Canada Works program for this winter in effect at the present time or has it been postponed because of this program?

Mr. Cullen: That program is in place and so is the job experience program. We hope to increase by twelvefold the number of people who will be able to participate in that program. What we are considering now is one more weapon in the total arsenal.

Mr. Clarke: I understand after talking to members of the ministerial advisory board in my riding that there has been a change in the Canada Works program. I know the Young Canada Works program is presently under consideration and that preliminary meetings will be held in February. Is the next Canada Works program to take place next winter?

Mr. Cullen: Because of the representations we have received from both sides of the House and from the business community as well as from those who have participated in the program we feel we should build an economic growth component into the program. That will account for about 30 per cent of the funding. We are telling individuals that they can apply until April 3, 1978 in connection with projects next winter. In the meantime, the second phase of the Canada Works Program is going on. The Young Canada Works program is going on together with the others we have in place. I shall not list them because we are not talking about them tonight.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure the minister knows I am not a fan of the Canada Works program as it appears to me the jobs created are not permanent jobs. But the question which arises in my mind is this: Why start another program to help the unemployed instead of expanding programs such as Canada Works? It is obvious that Canada Works, as it now stands, is not meeting the need. By starting a new program we are only setting up an additional element of bureaucracy. What is the rationale?

Mr. Cullen: This is an innovative approach which does not depend heavily on bureaucracy. It has been accepted and endorsed by the ministers of finance across the country meeting in Ottawa today. We believe we should not lose any opportunity at a time of high unemployment to use every tool at our disposal and this is one we hope will be very effective.

Mr. Clarke: I might come back to that topic but now I should like to know what safeguards there are in the program to guard against an employer laying off people and then rehiring them.

Mr. Cullen: I understand that the hon. member, as he said, has attended committee meetings and could not come here earlier, but I have answered that particular question put to me by two colleagues in his party on at least two occasions. I spelled out the control mechanism which we will have in place to guard against that eventuality and the reasons for it.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the minister for his answer and I will speak to my colleagues on that point.

It was my understanding that any new employment would be covered, but now I understand from what I have heard and read that the program applies only to jobs that would not have been created. So there is no reward for an employer who is hiring these very same people who are unemployed for eight weeks or longer unless he can prove that the jobs would not have existed except for this program. Is that correct?

Mr. Cullen: It is right on, Mr. Chairman. The idea is to have an increment. In the past year, between 200,000 and 300,000 additional jobs were created and would have been created this year whether or not this program were in place. What we want to do with this program is to have an increment; not to compensate people for hiring people whom they would have hired in any event, but to encourage them to hire one, two or three more people, depending on the size of the operation.

Mr. Scott: My question to the minister is in respect of students who cannot be classed as unemployed, who get out of community colleges, universities or other such institutions and are looking for jobs. How would they fit into the program? Will any consideration be given to them? They only get out of university at the end of May and it would be July before they could apply for a job, after being unemployed for eight weeks.

Mr. Cullen: It is the intention of this program to have an increment in employment. There is a whole series of other programs in place for students. As I have indicated, this is a new program which we hope will have an impact on another section of the work force. That does not mean that students could not apply, although those who have to go back to school cannot. There is the Canada Works program, the student job corps, and the Canada Manpower Centre program for students which not only employs people but also places students. There is a series of programs in place for students. This program is aimed at a different sector of the unemployed.

Mr. Scott: I had hoped this program could be oriented towards students as well. It might mean future careers for these young people. They could be serving an apprenticeship in a trade. If we do not offer them this opportunity we would be denying our younger workers the possibility of entering the labour market to pursue a career. A career would be the goal and this program would channel them into such a future career. The minister should take this into consideration and should open this program to students. This could be considered as an apprenticeship course which would be of value to these young people in the future.

Mr. Cullen: As I have indicated, an individual must be unemployed for eight weeks to qualify under the program. If the individual students to whom the hon. member is referring are not going back to school and want an apprenticeship course, it is available to them under the Canada Manpower industrial training program, the adult occupational training program as well as programs in different schools in various provinces.

A student who is not going back to school and who is unemployed for eight weeks can participate in this program. We hope that people who wish to take advantage of the employment tax credit program will see the benefit of retaining the particular employee after the employment tax credit period runs out. If it will have that beneficial spin-off effect, the program will be that much better.

Mr. Scott: I am not speaking of students who do not intend to go back to university but of students who do intend to go back to university, and God knows they have had a hard enough job finding work in spite of all the programs to which the minister has referred. We should probably try to encourage these chaps not only to go back to university but to find meaningful employment through the minister's program, and I am sure consideration should be given to some of these very deserving people.

Mr. Cullen: We know they are deserving and we have made other programs available to them. We do not think this program is appropriate for them, given the fact that students will be out for a shorter period of time and intend to go back to school.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The minister mentioned the requirement of unemployment for eight weeks. What about the vast throngs of people of whom we do not have any record who have ceased to draw unemployment insurance? Would they have to re-register in order to be eligible?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman, and be looking for a job.

Mr. Ritchie: The minister suggested to me that Mr. Bullock of small business is in favour of this program. My understanding is that this is certainly not what he had in mind but rather a much larger proposal based on an increase in wages over the year.

I should like to make a comment regarding the bureaucracy involved in the program. I think it is a significant deterrent to small business. First of all, an employer wishing to participate in the job creation program must approach a Canada Manpower Centre with a proposal. This proposal must be approved by the centre. Then the employer cannot go and hire any person whom he wants to hire, although that person may have been unemployed for eight weeks. He can only employ workers sent to him by the Manpower centre or else he will not get a tax credit. Also, he must sign an affidavit that he will create new jobs which he would not have had the financial ability to create without the program. Then, when he applies for the tax credit, assuming he has reached agreement with the Manpower centre, he must use a special tax schedule so they will know he is involved.

I do not see how this system can be said to require minimal red tape or how it is likely to produce jobs. Small businessmen especially who would stand to gain most from the tax credit may be reluctant to entangle themselves in all this bureaucracy and to risk the threat of a jail sentence or a fine if they are judged to have lied. In fact, the net value of the tax credit is not that attractive, particularly when one remembers that employers will presumably hire workers in a soft market and in a weak competitive position. Furthermore, this program is designed to reduce the hard core unemployed who, as group unemployment officers will tell you, will be unemployed from year to year. I think it is only fair to say that while the program may be of some value in improving the situation of this group of people, from the employer's point of view these people are not highly productive workers. That is the comment that I wish to make about the program.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member seems to forget we are dealing with the general taxpayers' money and that the system is comparatively simple. I think that this program could have been a lot more bureaucratic. It is a very simple procedure. The employer calls up, gets the form, fills it out, signs it and fills out his income tax form. It strikes me as a comparatively simple procedure.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister whether, before this program was introduced in the House, there were consultations with employers across Canada and, if so, were those employers enthusiastic about this program which could become an act affecting them?

Furthermore, it is said that this program will operate under a tax credit from which employers hiring personnel will be able to benefit. Will the employers who will wish to register under such a program have to prove in advance that they will in fact be paying taxes to the federal government to get credits? And since there are many businesses in rural areas where there are a lot of people without jobs, let us say a business signed an agreement with the Department of Employment and Immigration and anticipated paying taxes and because of unforeseeable circumstances or a difficult situation—higher costs, lower sales and profits—and at a given point that business which hired two, three, four or five persons is placed in that situation in preparing its tax return of not paying any taxes, what is going to happen to it? It cannot claim a tax credit. Can the minister tell the House whether such a situation was considered, and what will be the solution to this dilemma because this could very well happen, unless the minister has another explanation to give to the House or I did not grasp the scope of the bill?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have considered that. This is why there is a five-year carry forward, so that if an individual business, for example, as the hon. member has said, does not make a profit this year or in fact has made a loss, but makes a profit in the following year, this tax credit can be taken in that year. This can go on for the five-year time period.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell the House whether under this Bill C-23 there are different categories of businesses or whether it is open to all businesses which truly want to benefit under this program and see in this an opportunity to become a competitive business, particularly in a line of production facing competition from imports? I think that all serious businesses wishing to benefit from this program should be eligible but that is not clearly set out. So if all businesses meeting the criteria of the legislation are eligible I would like the minister to give us that assurance.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I assume the hon. member was in the committee when I was commenting on that, but, in point of fact, there is no discrimination between one business and another. It is open to all businesses. I mentioned some exceptions, for example a business engaged in personal service. As long as it is a business that pays tax or qualifies to pay tax then it will qualify under this program. New businesses that start up will not qualify because they would have started in business in any event.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could just follow up on the last answer by the minister. He has referred to personal service as being an exception. What does the government have in mind as being included in personal service? Would a data processing service be looked upon as a personal service, or would a hairdressing business be personal service? What is included in that phrase?

Mr. Cullen: It includes maids, chauffeurs and domestics, that kind of thing, not the kind of operation the hon. member indicated at the beginning, data processing or data service.

Mr. Stevens: If someone had a barber shop, would that be regarded as a personal service? Would such an individual not be able to hire somebody and get this investment tax credit as part of his barbering business?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, a barber shop, being a taxable enterprise, does in fact qualify under this program.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, earlier when the Minister of Finance was with us I asked him to define what was meant by "in prescribed manner" as it appears at page 6, clause 6 of the bill. Could we have that definition now?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, all corporations and those individuals who carry on business are required to make tax instalments. Corporate instalments are due monthly and individual instalments quarterly. Generally speaking, the instalments due are based on the lesser of: (a) an estimate of the current year's taxes; or (b) last year's taxes, referred to in the legislation as the instalment base. The instalment base has always been defined by regulation.

The effect of the amendments to the regulations will be to permit a taxpayer to reduce his instalments for the current year by the benefit he estimates he will derive from the employment tax credit program. Thus an employer can reduce his 1978 tax instalments by the benefit he estimates he will get from this program in his 1978 tax year. We believe this feature will provide immediate stimulus to the economy and improve the take-up rate under the program.

Mr. Stevens: As I understand the minister's answer, it is not exactly in line with his answer to my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Certainly the implication was that the credit would only be something you would benefit from next April; in other words, when you file your income tax return. As I understand it, the answer the minister has just put on the record is much better than that, in that you can claim a credit against instalments as they are due on a personal or corporate basis.

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is in fact the case. I was being precise in my answer, given the question the hon. member asked; but, as the hon. member has explained it, that is in fact the case and it is better than what was understood previously.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps I could take the minister ahead to clause 2 of the bill. Would he indicate what the significance of this amendment is in relation to the employment tax credit? Subsection 127(5), as I read the act, seems to be dealing with investment tax credits. It is not clear to me how this amendment is relevant to what we are proposing in setting up this employment tax credit.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, this is a relieving technical amendment to the definition of the capital cost of depreciable property. This definition now requires the capital cost of depreciable property to be reduced by the amount of certain grants, subsidies or tax credits which the taxpayer is entitled to receive from governments. Since the amount of the investment tax credit claim reduces cost, it also reduces the amount of depreciation that may be claimed. This amendment was necessary because of the relationship between the investment tax credit and the new employment tax credit. The taxpayer may claim any portion of either or both, as the circumstances require. It will insure that the capital cost of depreciable property will continue to be reduced only by the amount of investment tax credit actually claimed, not by the amount a taxpayer could have claimed.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I indicated earlier I would return to a comparison of this program with the Canada Works program. Under the Canada Works program jobs were created, and I understand this program will create jobs. The Canada Works program did not adequately fund all the jobs it wanted, because there was a need for jobs even after that program's money was used up. Why is it necessary to have a different kind of program, rather than just expanding the Canada Works program?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, they are two completely different programs. Canada Works is government sponsored and paid for by the government. This is an attempt to have private enterprises participating in job creation, given the incentive of the employment tax credit. It is not unusual to have more applications than funding under Canada Works. Normally it is approximately a three to one ratio in order to implement the excellent programs we want.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, since it is expected that jobs will be created because of the program, what expectation does the government have that the jobs will continue after the program ends?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I have commented at some length on the predictions made and the bases for them. If the hon. member reads the answers I have already given, I am sure he will be provided with an explanation of the figures used.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, one newsman has observed the program will produce more work for accountants. If jobs for accountants are created under this program, will those accountants be eligible for benefits as well?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, if an employer hires an accountant to do his books, and if the accountant indicates that he has to hire one more employee because of the employment tax credit, he would be well advised to get a new accountant.

Mr. Clarke: Before I became a professional politician I was a professional accountant. I was not referring to the employer who might have to hire one more bookkeeper. I am sure many accounting services in this country will have to hire extra men because of this program, and I cannot see why they should not be eligible for the program.

Mr. Cullen: If an accounting firm hires more people, no one will be happier than myself. The amount of work entailed is simply putting down the number of employees last year, the number who are working this year, and substracting one from the other to show there is an increment and that they are entitled to benefit. I am sure I would have been able to do that, even though I was a lawyer and not a professional accountant prior to being a member of parliament.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I put to the minister a question he has not answered. I realize my question may have been somewhat lengthy, so I would like to put it again in a shorter form.

Before Bill C-23 was introduced and the Minister of Finance made his statement on the program, could the minister tell the House whether discussions were held with firms that might participate? Were they enthusiastic about it, and can we entertain real hope that we are not losing our time in discussing the legislation and that when the final date comes, a number of jobs will be created because employers are enthusiastic?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Yes, we had extensive consultations with representatives of business. We met with the president and representatives of CFIB, as well as the chambers of commerce. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is now pointing out to me an article entitled: "Canadian Federation for Independent Business Demands the Job Tax Credit". We feel the benefits will be particularly felt in the small business community. Given that type of backing, I am sure we will have participation from the business community.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, there was a program, which I believe is still in force, under which employers could hire people to train them.

Can the minister indicate whether the program was successful, whether employers were as enthusiastic about it, and whether we can really be proud of the results? We know that it is a program somewhat similar in that both involve employer participation.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: It is difficult to compare enthusiastic receptions or rejections of a particular program. The people trained and employed because of industrial training programs were enthusiastic. We are being asked constantly for more money under those programs.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, during second reading I mentioned the fact that we were disappointed there was nothing in the minister's statement to favour first time job seekers, the unemployed youth. Can the minister indicate if any consideration was given to supplying a higher subsidy to somehow entice employers into hiring first time job seekers, as opposed to allowing them to be treated the same as any other person who is out of work?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, consideration was given to almost every idea which was put forward. Some were accepted, others rejected. Since the program was new and innovative, it was felt it should be kept as simple as possible. That would have provided one more complication, which we felt should not be built into the program at this particular time. We did not want to build too many issues into an innovative program. We wanted to get it working, realizing that the rough spots could be smoothed out later.

Mr. Stevens: Will the minister consider waiving the eight-week out of work provision for those who are first time job seekers? I can see how that provision is necessary in regard to people who want to fiddle the system by giving up jobs in order for an employer to become eligible for benefit. Why is it necessary to apply the eight-week period in the case of a youth who literally has no job? Why does he have to wait eight weeks without work before he can even qualify?

● (2142)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, one of the objectives of the program is to get people who have been in the work force and are discouraged because they cannot find employment back to work. That seems to be an appropriate thrust for this program.

Second, as the Minister of Finance indicated earlier this afternoon, it is not the intention of this program to entice into the work force people who had no intention of coming into it in any event. Those are two of the reasons we want to stick, for the time being at least, with the eight-week program, albeit it would have the impact the hon. member is suggesting on first time job seekers.

Mr. Stevens: Those people who have qualified to draw unemployment insurance are going to be eligible to get work, but a person who has never had enough employment to qualify for unemployment insurance will be in the odd situation of not being able to qualify for the employment tax credit. In other words, he has to be out of work for eight weeks. He cannot draw unemployment insurance, and I just do not know why there is that inconsistency.

Mr. Cullen: The situation is that that individual can in fact qualify, but he will have to have been registered and unemployed for a period of eight weeks. I think the first time job seeker particularly will probably want to do a bit of looking around. We do not propose to give this the same emphasis the hon. member is giving it at this time. We should be dealing primarily with discouraged workers and not with drawing into the labour force people who would not have wanted to enter it in the first instance. It is a matter of judgment at this time, and we think we have adopted the right approach.

Mr. Stevens: I will not press it now, but I hope the minister will keep an open mind in this matter because I think there is an inequity here in the sense that the approach seems to favour those who are already on unemployment insurance. Frankly, there has been wide speculation that the program is deliberately warped in order to take people out of the unemployment insurance scheme, knowing full well that some people, including young people who are unable to find jobs, are automatically disqualified because of this arbitrary eight-week looking for work period which is required.

I have a further question to put to the minister. It is stated in the press release that the program will be applicable for nine months' work. The bill sets it at 12 months. I wonder why the press release is more restrictive as to the time during which an employer can receive a credit, while the bill provides a 12 month period.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I think it is fair to say that in endeavouring to find the correct time frame in a new program it is a matter of judgment. I say without any real concern that, in my own view, it should have been a six-month time frame. I feel that that would have been more appropriate. More people could have benefitted from the program. I think that would have made the program twice as effective and provided a much better opportunity. There were others who thought 12 months would have been more effective and that people would be hired for that time and benefit more from the program. If the program works within a nine-month time frame, perhaps we should try it at six. If it does not, perhaps we should go to twelve. It is a judgment which was made with regard to a new program. We did not want to spend a lot of time debating whether it should be six, nine or twelve.

Mr. Stevens: My final question arises from an answer the minister gave earlier. I believe he said that one of the restrictions on employees would be that employees have no relationship with the employer. Would the minister clarify that? Is that in a family sense or in the sense of prior employment?

Mr. Cullen: Family, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: If a man has been working with company A and for some reason is laid off or quits and is out of work for eight weeks, in the ninth week could he be hired back by company A and could company A pick up the employment tax credit?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman, provided there was an increment. Obviously somebody else would have to be hired to fill the vacancy before the particular employee could be hired back. As long as there is an increment, the employer would qualify for a tax credit.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, would the minister state whether there will be a choice as to whom the employee might work for or whom the employer might hire? Are Manpower officials to have the sole jurisdiction in this matter?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, we will decide who will be referred, but the employer will decide who to hire.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Concerning the question put by the hon. member from the Progressive Conservative Party, Mr. Chairman, reference was made to relatives. Supposing I had a plant and employed people, would there not be a danger for instance that I fired one or two employees and rehired them eight weeks later, to take advantage of the legislation? I wonder if the question is understood. If I were an employer and wanted to get the income tax reduction, if I fired one or two employees and rehired them after eight weeks, would I be eligible for the income tax credit?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, as we indicated, there will be a monitoring. We will be doing sample audits from time to time, and if an individual employer laid off two people, he would first have to hire two people to get back to the level he was originally at before he could take advantage of the program by hiring two more. If he simply hires them back to fill a void, there is no increase in the number of employees and he therefore does not qualify.

[Translation]

Mr. Portelance: A final question, Mr. Chairman. In the construction industry, I do not know whether you already answered these questions, what will happen? It is well known things are rather quiet in the construction industry right now, but no later than next spring larger contracts will get under way. The contractor that used to hire maybe five or six people, let us say that this year he intends to do much more, assuming he hired some 15 people, would the differential in number of employees used entitle him to the income tax reduction?

[English]

Mr. Cullen: No, Mr. Chairman. I think I did answer when the hon. member was in the committee, but it would be a seasonal comparison. It would not be compared with the eight weeks or ten weeks but with the previous season. If an employer hired 15 last year and 15 this year, there would in fact be no increment.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I was about to move the amendment the hon. member for New Westminster proposed to move, but he has arrived, so he can move it himself.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That Bill C-23 be amended on page 7, in line 31, by changing the period after the word "employment" to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"provided that no employer is entitled to the deduction from tax in respect of any eligible worker who is paid at a rate below the minimum wage provided by law in the province or territory in which the employment takes place."

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair put the question on clause 7, and clause 7 carried. The Chair then put the question on the title, and that is where we are now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I insist that I was on my feet when you called clause 7. As my colleague came in I handed him the amendment.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, we were holding off because I knew the hon. member for New Westminster had an amendment. I would have to concede that as far as we are concerned the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was on his feet at the time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, in all fairness I think the hon. member was trying to get your attention to move the amendment when we were on clause 7.

[Mr. Cullen.]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, I will provide a brief explanation of the amendment. It simply provides that the prevailing provincial minimum wage must at least be paid by an employer seeking to take the benefits of this legislation. I therefore move:

That Bill C-23 be amended on page 7, in line 31, by changing the period after the word "employment" to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

provided that no employer is entitled to the deduction from tax in respect of any eligible worker who is paid at a rate below the minimum wage provided by law in the province or territory in which the employment takes place.

Mr. Cullen: I know what the hon. member is trying to do, Mr. Chairman, but I think the amendment is ineffective because the wages normally set in the various provinces are industrial wages. Without exception farmers are exempt from these provisions, so the effect of the amendment would be to make things the same as they are at the present. Farmers gave us some concern, but they would be excluded by provincial legislation in any event.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, there is also the question of the part-time employee. In some provinces if you employ someone on a temporary or part-time basis you are exempt from the minimum wage law. The purpose of the amendment is to see that the rate paid is at least the provincial minimum wage. Surely this House should support employers at least bringing their wage levels up to the minimum, otherwise no worker would be attracted to the program and perhaps not many employers would want to participate. The basic rate should be raised to the provincial minimum, which is generally $2.50 or $3.00 per hour around the country. This is a humane amendment. We do not want to be in the position of encouraging employers to pay unsatisfactory wage rates simply to comply with this program.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Amendment (Mr. Leggatt) negatived: yeas, 5; nays, 54.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Cullen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—COMMITTEE OF REVIEW—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on January 23 at page 2092 of Hansard I asked the following question of the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) concerning the special committee on the review of personnel management and the merit principle in the public service:

Will this committee hold public hearings? If so, when? Also, will MPs and others be given the opportunity to express their views?

I received an answer as follows:

HON. ALLAN J. MACEACHEN (DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF PRIVY COUNCIL): Mr. Speaker, I will have to verify the impression I have that it is not the intention to hold public hearings. I will make sure whether that is the correct situation.

I raise the matter tonight because I think it is extremely important that there be no misunderstanding concerning the procedures to be followed by this special committee of investigation. I hope we will have a further statement tonight.

To sketch the background a little, on February 4, 1977, the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council announced the appointment of this special committee. It was to consist of a representative of the employers, Mr. Bruce Brittain, who had held a position at the deputy minister level in the public service for some time; a representative of the employees, Mr. Davidge, a highly respected spokesman for the public service; and the chairman of the committee named in the first week of January this year, Mr. Guy D'Avignon.

The government did not exactly move with haste in this matter because a recommendation was made that such a committee of inquiry be appointed in the joint report of the committee of the Senate and House of Commons presented unanimously in January of 1976. That report recommended changes in the Public Service Staff Relations Act. But it pointed out very clearly that the changes that had to be made in the Public Service Staff Relations Act, while long overdue, would require consequential amendments to the Public Service Employment Act. The former chairman of the Public Service Commission, Mr. John Carson, had repeatedly requested that this inquiry take place. In a special audit conducted in 1973 and reported in the 1974 annual report of the Public Service Commission, something over 6,000 appointments were examined in detail. A substantial proportion of them, perhaps a third, indicated irregularities in the form of violations of the Public Service Employment Act and/or the regulations issued under that act.

Those of us who have been following events in the public service have been very much concerned with what has evolved over the period. We go back to the reports of the Glassco commission, that commission of investigation into government itself named by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was the prime minister of Canada. The Glassco commission brought forward a philosophy, a theory, a basic development of government policy, which said the organization had been too bureaucratic, that the comptroller general of the treasury had exerted too great a control. The Public Service Commission had exerted too strong a control on hiring. The Glassco commission said that the deputy ministers should be managers, that they should manage and have freedom and they should take responsibility for their own decisions. The Glassco commission also recommended certain safeguards be implemented. One half of the Glassco recommendations were implemented. The deputy ministers were given a great deal of discretion, but the other half, the checks on their operations, were not placed where they should be.

The Auditor General pointed out the consequences of this in his report of 1976, which was a bit of a blockbuster, and the government has moved to correct the bad administration which has crept in on the financial side. Very substantial improvements have taken place there. On the side of employment and personnel administration, I submit there have been equally serious defects that have crept into the operation of the public service and have not yet been corrected.

Those of us who have followed events are very much concerned, for example, about delegated authority, the procedure under which deputy ministers are making appointments. Sometimes the appointments they have made, for instance doubledecking, when candidates were required to go to language school, were clearly made without full examination of the requirements of the merit principle.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A lot of friendship in it too.

Mr. Francis: We are very much concerned about the situation of temporary help and what has developed in a number of areas here. We are concerned about the application of a computerized system of selection of applications for posts and the abuses that have crept in as a result of those who have learned how to beat the computer; how to put the right codes on their files; how to get the candidate that was wanted when a search was made in a computer, someone with say, ten years of experience in the northern territories for administrative posts, and by some strange coincidence only one candidate's name emerged when the file was examined. This kind of abuse of the procedures has become something of a legend in the public service today.

● (2207)

As a member representing an Ottawa constituency, I am pleased to see on the other side the representative of a neighbouring constituency, Grenville-Carleton, the House leader of the opposition. I am sure he concurs with me on this.

We are very much concerned as to how this committee is going to operate. Will it hold public hearings or will it not? If it is not going to hold public hearings, why will it not do so? If it is not going to hold public hearings, how is it going to get the necessary input of information from those who are not in the public service itself?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): As everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, last Monday the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) answered the question the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) had asked him concerning the special committee on the review of personnel management and the merit principle in the public service, when he said that he did not feel at the time that the special committee intended to hold public hearings, but that he would make sure whether that was the correct situation.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to convey to the hon. member and to the House the information I have obtained. I have learned that to provide a forum of free and open discussion, and obtain as much information as possible, the special committee did not intend to hold public hearings at the early stage of its work. It may, however, decide to do so later on. Moreover, the special committee would directly ask parliamentarians, representatives of civil service unions and other interested people to appear to make their views known. The public at large would be invited to do the same through advertising in the papers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REASON CANADIAN DELEGATION IN INDONESIA TO DISCUSS POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN COAL MINING PROJECT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, a week or so before the Christmas recess I raised the question of the propriety of this country sending a trade delegation to Indonesia, hoping to participate in the development of a billion dollar coal mining project. At the time the minister promised to make some inquiries and reply to me.

In the last two days prior to Christmas we had the debate on external affairs. Again I alluded to the trade relationship with Indonesia because what was going on simultaneously was a remarkable contrast to the minister's response to conditions in South Africa as he saw them in the withdrawing of Canadian representatives from that nation.

Since then I have received a reply from the minister. He assures me that the coal mining operation in Indonesia, if and when it comes on for local use, probably will not compete with Canadian mines. I find that a little strange to believe, particularly when he goes on with a qualifier. If that development proceeded, it would be remarkable if the government of Indonesia did not see to it that a great deal of that coal were exported. It could very possibly be in direct competition with Canada.

I do not at all see it beyond the scope of Japanese technology to raise lower grade coal to the point where it could serve good use. Of course, within this country we have a great deal of low grade thermal coal that we might profitably export in a few years' time. However, if a development like this proceeds, we would not be able to do that.

I represent an area of British Columbia with a history of coal mining. The initial industrial base in the province was based on Vancouver Island and in the southeast Kootenay riding that I represent. The coal mining industry virtually died. It saw extremely hard times. It made a remarkable comeback, particularly in the south Kootenay corner. At the moment the development of several promising prospects there is being delayed.

I would still raise the question whether it is in the best interests of Canada to so actively promote industry abroad that will be in direct competition with our Canadian industry when developed. I have a great suspicion that what we gain in the short range will be lost in the long range.

If we are going to be righteous about South Africa how can we actively and aggressively promote trade with Indonesia which has been the object of a report by Amnesty International highly critical of that country and placing it far beyond South Africa in terms of restrictions upon human rights and freedoms? The minister says that all the evidence available to him rules out any suspicion that Indonesia is making forced labour from political prisoner camps available for industrial or mining projects. From this I gather he has failed to read the report made on that country by Amnesty International. It is a lengthy document, one of pocketbook size, and nobody who reads it could reach such a conclusion. This report was produced by an organization which is held in high repute internationally, one whose censure of South Africa has been accepted by the government. I find it strange that an organization should be supported when it draws attention to a situation in one country, and totally ignored when it draws attention to a desperate situation in another, because it happens to suit our purpose, in this case to develop trade. It also happens that Indonesia is not the object of massive censure as is South Africa.

In the light of these considerations I can only conclude that this question has not been given the scrutiny and consideration it deserves either by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or, certainly, by the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a mission visited Indonesia recently led by an assistant deputy minister and comprised of officials from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and members of the engineering consulting community. Its object was to support a consortium of three highly recognized Canadian consulting firms in its bid to win an engineering services contract, financed by the World Bank, to co-ordinate what is known as the Sumatra project. This project, whose value is conservatively estimated at $1 million, includes the development of a coal mine, rail transportation, port facilities and two 375 megawatt thermal power plants. The government of Indonesia has decided that indigenous coal would be used for power generation wherever feasible and has requested financial and technical assistance from the World Bank in implementing the project.

Faced with stiff competition from countries such as the U.S.A., the U.K., Japan, Germany and France it would be presumptuous for Canada to believe that this project would not be implemented if we did not participate. We feel that if Canada is successful in winning the engineering contract it will enhance our opportunities to participate in the tremendous supply of capital equipment and related services needed. The expertise and capital equipment available from Canada in the rail, material handling, marine and thermal power sectors makes this truly a project worth pursuing. In addition, the number of jobs which could be created through export sales would be significant.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONTRACTING OUT WORK TO PRIVATE OPERATORS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, before the Christmas recess, on December 6, 1977, to be precise, I raised two questions with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner). They are related questions and they have to do with job opportunities, economic development and government policy in the Northwest Territories. I was asking about the government's plans to alleviate unemployment in the Northwest Territories and the government's position as to contracting out work to private operators in the Northwest Territories.

I was not completely satisfied with the minister's reply at that time. He mentioned he would look into these matters and report back. Since then the minister has had an opportunity to visit the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Indeed, I believe he has gone as far north as some parts of Alaska. So I hope that whoever is replying for the minister will have better answers than I received at the time I raised these questions.

With that in mind I should like to make a couple of brief remarks on economic development and job opportunities in the Northwest Territories. First, I believe the Northwest Territories are paying a large part of the bill for operating the Territories. I can think of a number of users of our resources up there, namely, oil companies, the mining industry and so on, that are exploiting the resources in the north. So I suggest that vast amounts of revenue go to government and pay for labour. There has been oil production at Norman Wells for some 35 or 40 years. There is the lead and zinc operation run by Cominco in Pine Point. There are two gold mines operating in Yellowknife, the Con and Giant Mines. There is silver coming from Echo Bay mines. There is the Tungsten mine on the Yukon-Northwest Territories border. There is a gas well and pipeline operating out of Pointed Mountain. There is the lead and zinc mine at Nanisivik on Baffin Island, and there are a number of other operations which pay taxes to the government. I refer to personal income tax, taxes and royalties on the fur industry, and business taxes.

So I have come to the conclusion that the Northwest Territories is paying its own way. I suggest this because of the sources of revenue which I just mentioned and the fact that there are only 43,000 people spread over that vast territory. Therefore, I think it is the responsibility of the government to put some investment into the north to provide more jobs and to provide for northern development in a way that people in that part of the country can accept.

I should like to make a couple of suggestions, if I may. First, however, I should like to congratulate the minister on his recent announcement that the government will be spending some $40 million to complete the Liard highway which will link Nelson, British Columbia with Liard and Fort Simpson.

I certainly hope the government will seriously consider adopting the policy which was announced some time ago by the previous minister of Indian affairs and northern development of giving people in the Northwest Territories preference for jobs. I hope the minister will consider this very seriously, not only with respect to the labour force but with respect to the contractors, the people who have equipment, so that they will put these people to work on the building of the highway from Nelson, B.C. to Liard and Fort Simpson in the Northwest Territories. This policy was in effect some years ago, not that far back in fact, in a project in which northern people had preference. There was on-the-job training and it was working very well. However, much more is needed and many ideas are required.

I believe the government must show some initiative. I have received ideas from my constituents which they have transmitted to me through letters and phone calls and during visits. They are very concerned that there is such high unemployment there. In December when I raised this question with the minister I mentioned that in the village where I come from there was at that time 72.2 per cent unemployment. That situation has not changed much.

I hope the government will move toward this idea of northern preference, looking at some other ideas such as the construction of an all-weather highway, gravel though it would be, from Fort McMurray, Alberta, to Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories. I met with the minister of highways for Alberta five or six weeks ago and he was very enthusiastic about such an idea. As a matter of fact, the government of Alberta has been considering this very seriously. I hope the federal government will get together with that province and pursue that idea as soon as possible.

It is also my hope that the government will consider seriously the construction of a bridge across the Mackenzie River at Fort Providence. This is another long-range program that could be initiated and spread over a number of years, thereby alleviating unemployment and would be a positive step in the area of economic development, especially for the western Arctic.

Other areas that require consideration are the tourist industry, the settlement of land claims, and a number of others. Another matter on which I place high priority—and I have mentioned this time and time again—is serious government consideration of the housing problems in the Northwest Territories. I hope it will alleviate the situation by—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the present levels of employment in the Northwest Territories and the expectation of rapid growth in the labour force in the coming years pose important challenges to both the government and the people of the north. In December officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the government of the Northwest Territories met with representatives from most communities of the Mackenzie valley to discuss ways of increasing employment in those communities. The ideas suggested for new employment by those communities are being followed up by officials.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) also intends to convene a conference on economic development in the Northwest Territories at which representatives of business, native associations and other interested organizations can exchange ideas on future directions for northern economic development for specific sectors.

While there is serious unemployment in the Northwest Territories, a great deal of employment has been created. For example, in the petroleum industry last year 802 northerners from 30 different settlements were employed. In the Mackenzie Delta alone, Beaufort Sea drilling resulted in employment for 194 northerners. In the mining industry it has been a priority of the government of the Northwest Territories to increase native employment through the use of rotation schemes which have been worked out with local communities. There have been significant increases in native employment at the Con Rycon, Terra and Echo Bay mines because of this initiative.

There will also be significant opportunities for employment in road construction this year. Work on two contracts on the northern part of the Dempster highway will be beginning again in the next few weeks. These will provide job opportunities for people from Fort McPherson.

The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) referred to the Liard highway. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced on January 20 that construction will begin immediately on the Liard highway between Fort Simpson and the British Columbia border. This project and the regional economic development initiatives which the road will make possible have the potential to create some hundreds of jobs.

Steps have also been taken to facilitate the private sector in its own employment-creating initiatives. For example, the government has improved the terms of the various loan funds operating in the Northwest Territories to assist business development. In addition, during the past year the Department of Regional Economic Expansion began offering its special ARDA program and a number of new small businesses have been created with special ARDA assistance. The government is also assisting two native associations in establishing development corporations in anticipation of future land claim settlements. Since there is much to be done to create new jobs, the government and the private sector have been active in exploring new opportunities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST SUBJECT OF RUNAWAY SATELLITES BE REFERRED TO UNITED NATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House urges the Canadian government to refer the subject of runaway satellites to the United Nations Security Council in order to strengthen systems for early detection and public warnings about radiation hazards, so that public safety can be improved and proper apportionments made in the fiscal responsibility for clean-up operations which, in the present case of the Russian Cosmos satellite, have resulted in heavy and unfair expenses to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMPENSATION FOR WORLD WAR I PRISONERS OF WAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made to the House the other day by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that he hopes soon to have some good news for veterans of World War I, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House urges the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce the necessary amendments to the Pension Act so that the compensation for prisoners of war provided therein will apply to the fewer than 200 Canadian veterans still living who were prisoners of war during World War I, as it does to those who were prisoners of war during World War II.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST AGRICULTURAL JOBS BE IMPROVED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that many farm workers are currently being victimized by the Department of National Revenue and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, that they are refused benefits by the officials of these government organizations on the grounds that their type of employment is not insurable, and that this state of affairs is particularly affecting our young people who will assume tomorrow the farming responsibilities in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House urge both the Minister of National Revenue and the minister in charge of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to take immediate action to eliminate the many obstacles which prevent the employment of farm workers from being insurable.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ONTARIO—DAMAGE CAUSED BY STORM—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, yesterday much of Ontario was lashed by the worst storm in 20 years, costing several lives and millions of dollars in property damage that will not be covered by insurance. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask consent to move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House notes with pride and gratitude the many acts of courage and dedicated service by Ontarians during the January 26 storm and requests the government to give serious consideration to extending special financial assistance to individuals, municipalities and businesses that have suffered losses because of the storm.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of any such motion for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

LEVEL OF INFLATION IN 1978

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is very simple. Will the Minister of Finance indicate what he anticipates to be the inflation level, average 1978 over average 1977? I ask this as a UPI story yesterday indicates that the minister has said it will be approximately 8 per cent.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the story is not correct. I said by year and we expect the inflation rate will be 6 per cent on average during the year. I explained that I could not make a precise prediction, but I can say it will be between 6 per cent and 7 per cent.

Mr. Stevens: On November 18 the Minister of Finance very definitively told the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs:

For the totality of the year 1978 it is going to be an average of 6 per cent.

That is a mark-up from his October 20 statement. Will the minister indicate why he is getting away from the 6 per cent ceiling target which he initially set on October 20, bearing in mind he has asked Canadian workers to accept a 6 per cent ceiling as far as their wage increases are concerned?

[Mr. Beatty.]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is because in the CPI of the last few months imported fruit and vegetable prices were higher than we predicted.

Mr. Stevens: As of last night, excluding the passage within one day of Bill C-23, the employment tax credit bill, the minister had absolutely no legislation before this House with regard to anything that might relieve the unemployment situation or the inflation situation. Have we seen the total package of government measures as far as financial relief is concerned, and unemployment, and are Canadians who are suffering from inflation on their own as far as the government is concerned?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, yesterday we discussed with the ministers of finance the short-term and medium-term policies for Canada.

Mr. Stevens: How about the immediate?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, we discussed the immediate. I was very pleased to see that the minister of finance for the province of Ontario, Mr. McKeough, was in complete agreement with our policy.

VALIDITY OF GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC FORECAST

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Last October the minister was quite definite in his forecast of a 6 per cent rate of inflation for 1978. He revised that in the House today to somewhere approaching 8 per cent.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Six to seven is not eight.

Mr. McGrath: I can further support my argument by telling the minister that inflation is now running at an annual rate of 9.5 per cent, according to the last CPI or, based on the last three months, at a quarterly rate of 11.5 per cent. Therefore, an 8 per cent rate of inflation is logical to accept. Is the government now going to change its economic forecast in order to preserve what little credibility it has left?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have made an economic statement on October 20 last and we have forecast that the economic growth would be in the vicinity of 5 per cent with an inflation rate of 6 per cent at the end of the year. We will not change our projections. My advisers, as well as most economic commentators, agree that 1978 will be better than 1977 and that only Japan could have a better economic performance than Canada.

• (1117)

[English]

Mr. McGrath: As we approach the end of the government's ineffective anti-inflation policy there is a special need for Canadians to be able to place confidence in economic forecasting. Would the government consider asking Statistics Canada to postpone its anticipated change in the base for calculating statistics from 1971 to 1974, so that there will be no statistical hanky-panky or shell game going on at the time an election is called.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not in charge of Statistics Canada. I know it has always behaved as a very responsible agency and that it is not submitted to government directives in its professional activities. So, if it plans to change anything, I was not made aware of it. But I have confidence in Statistics Canada because it has always been honest with the Canadian public.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister recommend to his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and to Statistics Canada that they devise a new method of measuring inflation, something akin to a poor persons' index, so we might have an opportunity during the post-control period to measure the full impact of inflation on the more than one million Canadians who are unemployed, on the working poor and on those living on fixed incomes?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have confidence in the professional integrity of Statistics Canada and I am surprised that the hon. member now asks the government to interfere with an agency which has such a good reputation.

MACMILLAN BLOEDEL, B.C.—PROPOSED SHUTDOWN OF MILL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. With his well known concern for the plight of the unemployed, would he tell the House what his response was today to the announcement by MacMillan Bloedel, the largest forestry company in British Columbia, that it intends to shut down the Vancouver plywood mill, with a loss of 700 to 1,000 jobs on the lower mainland? What steps has he or the government taken to intercede with the company? Can he now report to the House whether the shutdown will, in fact, take place?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Immediately I received the information from the corporation, officials of my department were on the site explaining the facilities which were available. The union and management have met with provincial government representatives, and the company has agreed to a stay of 30 days before a final decision is made. I believe something like six months' notice is required.

As I understand it, in the final analysis the company will be placing about 250 of the 700 workers affected in the White Pine mill and the mill at New Westminster. An additional shift will be put on to make this possible. The company believes that it can place within the corporation about another 150. If these numbers hold, given the six months time frame I think hon. members will see we can handle this problem very effectively.

Mr. Leggatt: Might I point out that this company has received from the government, in corporate tax concessions over the past eight years, in excess of $11 million. That money was provided for retooling and measures to make the company's operations efficient. The reason given by the company for the shutdown is that the mill is too old and cannot compete. In discussing this matter with company officials, has the minister brought to their attention the value of the grants, concessions and gifts they have received from the government without them being tied to jobs? Is it the minister's position that in future such grants, concessions and research money will be tied to the provision of continuous employment?

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member knows as well as I do the conditions which have existed in that industry. He knows the softness of the market in the United States and the difficulties the industry has had to face. I think it is appropriate for a government to make such grants in order to keep the majority of the work force in a particular company employed.

The fact that they are able to move into a third shift at the White Pine and New Westminster plants is an indication that they are not shutting down but are, in fact, expanding. If that is one of the reasons given—and it has not been given to me personally—we will, of course, remind them of these particular grants and ask them to what extent they have made any effort to make that particular plant operational and to keep it up to grade.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question as to whether government policy is that these research moneys and grants should be tied to continuing employment. I point out to the minister that since the last budget of this government this company alone has received an additional $1.5 million in special tax concessions because of the inventory provisions in the last budget. Next year it will receive $2 million for that specific item alone. Is it the minister's and the government's position that we should continue to give out this corporate welfare for which the workers at those plants are paying, without tying it to some guarantee that there will be continuing employment for the workers?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if we were not making these arrangements with corporations, the workers at those particular plants would probably be laid off in larger number. We are endeavouring to maintain employment at as high a level as we can. Where there is overproduction, we have to use the facilities we have in the Department of Employment and Immigration to see that workers are placed in other jobs where they can use their talents and skills.

MACMILLAN BLOEDEL, B.C.—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. With respect to the 30 days to which the minister referred a moment ago, has the minister heard directly from union leaders in the area, especially Mr. Jack Monroe, to the effect that it may be possible to conduct a study of the mill in question but that it could not possibly be done within 30 days, and that over several months such a study might give rise to suggestions for modification and rationalization of the plant, which would enable the bulk of the workers to continue their employment?

The union desperately needs more time before the closedown, in order to carry out this study. Does the minister know about this? Has he been in direct contact with the management of MacMillan Bloedel and asked them to seriously consider an extensive delay of the closedown so that such a study could be carried out?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in answer to one part of the question, Mr. Jack Monroe has not contacted me personally, nor do I think he has been in touch with our department to make that particular representation. I do feel, however, that there is a particular role for the union to play and we do not wish to usurp the responsibility of union leaders. The 30-day delay time is a time limit within which MacMillan Bloedel and the government will try to determine if it is possible to keep this operation going. But the notice is six months. The lay-offs will not take place until that length of time has passed. That will give the company and the union an opportunity to see if, in fact, these on-site jobs can be saved, rather than transferring workers to other regions.

Mr. Fraser: I thank the minister for that answer. Has the minister been in direct contact with the management of MacMillan Bloedel and, if not, would he be prepared to contact Jack Monroe of the IWA to discuss this matter with him and bring to the attention of MacMillan Bloedel the fact that the union believes there must be a further extension of time in order to resolve this problem?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Monroe's talents and abilities as a union leader have received high commendation. I am sure he is aware of the situation and feels that as leader of this particular union he can take that message directly to the company. It is a matter of mutual interest. I do not think Mr. Monroe needs my intervention, but if he does in this case I would be happy to meet with him and with management if that would help maintain jobs.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—SPEEDING UP IMPLEMENTATION OF PHASE THREE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As jobs are particularly hard to find at this time of the year, which makes life exceptionally difficult for the unemployed in search of work and who are denied insurance benefits because they do not seek employment—it is somehow like a mother sending her child to pick strawberries in the month of October: there is no way he will find any—can the minister tell the House whether phase three of the Canada Works program can be launched a few weeks earlier to allow the creation of a larger number of jobs and so give workers the possibility of really earning their living through work?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated that possibility to our staff when people are looking for a job. We have therefore decided to do so; I got in touch with every hon. member advising him of our intentions with regard to phase three of the Canada Works Program.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary.

As recently as this morning, it was reported on the air waves of a radio station that phase three of the Canada Works program would be delayed. I should like to ask the minister whether the program as announced, will be implemented and whether it will start at the time indicated by him. In addition, can the minister tell the House whether a decision has been made with regard to the amount of money to be spent on phase three and, if so, can he inform the House of it immediately?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I apologize, but I shall have to make my remarks in English because technical terms are involved.

[English]

We have decided that within the Canada Works program we will build an economic growth component of about 30 per cent to create more permanent and long-term jobs. This has come about as a result of representations from both sides of the House and from the business community. In addition to that, the President of the Treasury Board has announced the $150 million labour-intensive program, and just yesterday we passed the employment tax credit bill. There is approximately $700 million in place now for the direct job-creation aspect of the program, to say nothing of the approximately $1 billion for training programs which are in place. All these measures are directed toward assisting the unemployed in the hope of getting them back into the work force.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—INQUIRY AS TO FUNDING

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in respect of construction of the pipeline. It seems to me many of the promises this government put before the Canadian people are now being put into question. Is it the government's position, based on construction of a $10 billion pipeline, that no public money will be involved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that the United States general accounting office now indicates that the cost of this pipeline could be in the neighbourhood of $25 billion to $30 billion? Is it the government's position that notwithstanding what it costs, the government is not involving public funds in constructing the pipeline?

Mr. Trudeau: That is what I said, Mr. Speaker.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING ON PREVENTING FRAUD

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. As the minister has stated, we must do everything we can to deter and prevent fraud and cheating in respect of the UIC program. Is the minister relying entirely on his $1 million advertising compaign to stop abuses of the program, and does he believe advertising will stop criminals from embezzling UIC funds?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think advertising will stop criminals from doing anything. What we are trying to prevent is the idea on the part of individuals that it is a lark to cheat their fellow workers, and who in fact become criminals or acquire criminal records. The Auditor General indicated that we have to tighten up on administration, and we are in fact doing that. Any study of the statistics will indicate just how effective we have been in that area. It seems to us—and this is in keeping with what the Canadian Law Reform Commission indicated—we have an obligation to advertise and get the message across to those who pay the premiums that certain benefits are derived from the unemployment insurance program, but there are also certain obligations. The fact that we are moving in a more effective way and in a better administrative fashion is a reason, I think, for putting people on notice that to steal is to be a criminal, and this is what we want to prevent. It is not a lark to steal from your fellow workers.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the advertising campaign would indicate the government has failed in its responsibility to see that no one cheats under the scheme. Will the minister consider appointing a special investigation division, perhaps better known as a fraud squad, which the minister's officials and federal security officials say is badly needed because the UIC is extremely vulnerable to individual and organized fraud?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, a very careful examination of our record on the administrative side will indicate that the conclusions reached by the hon. member are incorrect. We have a most effective administrative authority in place, checking on this particular aspect. Because it is becoming effective, and because of the number of investigations under way and the number of prosecutions which have come about, it seemed appropriate to get the message across to people who are paying premiums so that they will not get caught in that particular net.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, as security advisers to the Prime Minister and RCMP officials have stated that only a small portion of internal and external UIC fraud is being uncovered, do they believe advertising is now the answer?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied they believe advertising is one of the answers. We had an overpayment of approximately $65 million. We were effective in getting back $60 million of that $65 million as a result of the enforcement and administrative procedures which we have in place. It is more important to prevent that kind of operation so that it does not cost the premium fund money to go after those who are cheating under the program. It is a very small percentage when one talks about $3 billion to $4 billion of payout and $65 million to $95 million of overpayment. We can save a lot of money if we can prevent cheating rather than having to collect afterwards.

ALTERNATIVES TO ADVERTISING PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding the advertising program. Something less than .3 per cent of the Canadian people are being aimed at by this advertising campaign. Why would the government want to waste $1 million by advertising to all Canadians when it would be a much less costly scheme to put inserts with cheques or have endorsements on the back of cheques? After all, the only people who can cheat are those receiving benefits.

Mr. McGrath: The old pork barrel is right there, Bud.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the opposition feels we are in an election year, because they are trotting out all the old phrases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Does the minister know what he is doing?

Mr. Cullen: Very definitely. There were 6,200 cases last year, involving approximately $60 million, so we are not only talking about a small percentage.

Mr. Stevens: Sixty million?

Mr. Cullen: The small percentage might be applicable to this year. If we can prevent that kind of thing, it is a good investment for the premium account.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, is the minister willing to name the advertising agency which will collect the $200,000 fee for placing these advertisements?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I cannot give the hon. member the information off the top of my head, but I will send him a letter. It is public information.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORTED REFUSAL OF ONTARIO TO GIVE OFFICIAL STATUS TO FRENCH LANGUAGE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

Since the Ontario premier in his letter to Mrs. Gisèle Richer, the general president of the Association canadienne française de l'Ontario, stated and I quote:

The Ontario government does not intend at the present time to take any step to make French an official language of the province.

Does the Secretary of State intend to meet his counterpart, the Ontario Minister of Education, to inquire in what circumstances and on what conditions his government would legislate on this official statute so often demanded or if on the contrary, we will have to resign ourselves for another 100 years to a dribs-like policy—

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Order. Does the hon. member have a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: —which seems to be that of Ontario I would say to the members opposite—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: Ask a question; don't make a speech.

[Translation]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have already expressed my deep regret following the refusal of the Ontario premier to accept that idea. I was quite disappointed. Such a request was made by the federal government in "A National Choice" and in letters sent by the Prime Minister to the premiers. We want them to accept at the provincial level the same policies on bilingualism as the federal government. From time to time I see the education minister and the Council of Ministers of Education. I will be taking this opportunity to speak to my counterpart, Mr. Wells from Ontario.

ELECTIONS

INQUIRY WHEN NEXT GENERAL ELECTION WILL BE HELD

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a statement made a moment ago by the minister of unemployment—I mean, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I was giving him the proper grading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that statement he said this House had the appearance of being in an election year. I ask the Prime Minister which of the three suggestions he made during his recent rather unsuccessful tour of western Ontario, when he dealt with the question of the time the election would take place, is correct? In one case the Prime Minister is reported to have said that it might be in June. In another case he is reported to have said that it could be in the fall of this year. In another case he indicated that it might be next year, and in another case he indicated that it might even be the year following, because much would depend on the question of Mr. Lévesque and his endeavour to find out the situation with respect to separatism.

In the last couple of days two ministers are reported as saying that it would be in June. Is the Prime Minister in a position now to clear up this matter? After all, the ambiguity of his own prophecies leads me to ask this question which I know he is very ready to answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the right hon. member is more concerned with his province and his riding than with the province of Quebec. If he is in some difficulty in his area, I will ask the Minister of Transport to give him a hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is typical of the kind of smart alec answers which the Prime Minister gives. I ask him for an answer. As far as Prince Albert is concerned, I wish he would come out there, because if he did my majority would be even greater.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to consider whether the question is a serious attempt to elicit information from the Prime Minister. In any event, I think it will not be very successful. I am prepared to hear one more question but I think the matter should not be pursued further.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when I ask a question I am looking for information. Apparently it has caused the Prime Minister consternation. In his travels through western Ontario he went all around the calendar, whereas two ministers have predicted the month of June. Is that right, or wrong? Does he not let them in on his secrets?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

RRAP—CHANGES IN REGULATIONS UNDER PROGRAM

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I have notified him of my intention to ask a question on this subject. It is my information that the residential rehabilitation assistance program and the accompanying regulations have been changed for 1978 so that repairs to basements and house sidings will no longer be included. Is this true? If so, does the minister think this is a good way to help low-income people who are trying to repair old houses?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my answer is that this issue is under study. Concerning the precise points mentioned by the hon. member, I cannot guarantee that they would not be applicable in the future. I think what we have to do is to make sure that the money involved in this program is used in the best possible way to be useful to those people with low income, which means that this point should remain included.

[English]

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the minister does not know, because program co-ordinators in some towns have already been given the regulations for 1978. The minister and I have had correspondence about my area which consist largely, in the mining area, of old mining stock that was built by the private coal companies in the past. The minister has been there. I have made a suggestion to him, to Devco and to his predecessor over the last 3½ years that, given the condition of housing there, the RRAP program is going to be a bad investment in the long run.

I should like to ask the minister today, in all seriousness, if he is prepared to accept my ten-year suggestion of special help for mining areas of Cape Breton, where a great deal of housing stock is 80 years old and was built without foundations, and so on? It would save the government of this country, and Nova Scotia, a lot of money in the future if it were done now.

Mr. Ouellet: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. In fact, we are trying to help this area of Canada through a different program than the one mentioned by the hon. member; that is, the emergency repair program which is more applicable to those parts of the country. We have tripled our allocation for that program and we have just given a special grant of $100,000 to the Citizen Services League of Glace Bay. This will be increased as the activities of the citizen group are carried out through the year.

BILL C-21—EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. It arises out of Bill C-21. First of all, I should like to congratulate the government for bringing in this bill which refers to the exchange of prisoners. Upon studying it, however, I find there is a big gap in its provisions. Are people in dungeons in Mexico, and that is what one can call them, who have not been charged—some have been there for months and their parents are being blackmailed and have to send money from Canada—to be forgotten and left out of the bill, because in the definitions that would seem to be the case?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member has taken an interest in this issue, as has my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would have to review the precise wording of the bill—and the committee will undoubtedly do that—to see to what extent a solution can be found.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We must remember that in Mexico one is guilty until he proves himself innocent. That is the reason they do not lay charges. I would ask the minister to discuss this matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the bill goes to committee. Debate on the bill could be very short indeed. If we are to forget people who have been in jail for months in Mexico without being charged and leave them to fend for themselves, this bill will not do the job I had hoped it would.

FISHERIES

CONSTRUCTION OF HARBOUR AT GROSSE-ÎLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my qestion is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, but since he is absent I will address it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fears expressed by the municipal authorities of Grosse-Île, Magdalen Island, and by the fishermen themselves about the possible effects on the lobster beds of the harbour facilities the province of Quebec plans to establish on this site, with the possible financial help of the federal government, could the right hon. Prime Minister tell this House whether the federal government has taken or intends to take some steps to protect the interest of these fishermen and to be sure that their views will be taken into account? If not, can he get some information about this?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the views of the fishermen of the Magdalen Islands will be taken into account and their best spokesman is certainly the hon. member himself. I can also assure him that all the instances he will present on this issue will be very carefully considered by the government and that we will do everything under our constitutional power to protect these fishermen against any negative effects these works may have on their activities.

FINANCE

ONTARIO—DAMAGE CAUSED BY STORM—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I am sure he is very much aware that Ontario has suffered extraordinary weather conditions this winter. Yesterday, much of Ontario suffered from the worst storm in 20 years, a storm which caused several deaths and millions of dollars of property damage, much of which will not be covered by insurance. The storm disrupted the lives of millions of Ontarians.

In view of the extraordinary circumstances caused by the storm, is the Prime Minister prepared to extend to the affected businesses, municipalities and individuals extraordinary financial assistance on behalf of the Government of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a well establish policy of assistance to provinces in defined circumstances. When, through natural causes such as this, they incur great distress the government is always anxious to come to their assistance. The first rule is for the province affected to apply to the federal government for assistance, and we then study the problem. As the hon. member knows, in a large number of cases the federal government has assisted the provinces in circumstances such as those described by the hon. member.

Mr. Beatty: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister is probably aware, President Carter of the United States has designated some states as disaster areas. Can the Prime Minister give this House some assurance that if Ontario makes a request to the federal government for extraordinary financial assistance, it will be given?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker, under the regulations made by the Department of Finance, if Ontario establishes the distress as being of such a nature that it cannot assist the area from its own economic means. I would remind the hon. member that just a few years ago in northern Ontario — I believe, in the Sudbury area — a natural disaster occurred which called for the assistance of the federal government, and we were very forthcoming.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and is related to some statements made a few days ago by the right hon. Prime Minister in southwestern Ontario. The Prime Minister has indicated over the last weekend that during the next parliament we might see some amendments regarding the universal scheme for family allowance payments. I would therefore ask if the Minister is now in agreement with the Prime Minister's statement that perhaps, in the future, some of the recipients might be faced with a reduction of family allowances?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): We do not cut those programs on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister is assuring me that he never mentioned that.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MEANS TEST FOR RECIPIENTS OF BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

I would like to know if, following his statement a few days ago, he has announced that the government may adopt a policy that would reinstate the means test for family allowances, or if it has found a formula that would abolish the universal allowances without reinstating, in the future, tests for those who are presently receiving family allowance payments.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already said, in reply to a question, that the government has no project under study to change the family allowance system. I referred to a bill presented in the early 1970s to change the family allowance system. I reminded my audience that this bill was defeated principally because of a vote by a Progressive Conservative member, but that, for the moment, we had no intention of coming back on this matter.

SMALL BUSINESS

PROGRAM TO ASSIST—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT—PERMITS FOR TEXTILE IMPORTS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State (Small Business). In announcing his program of assistance to small business, on several occasions he has mentioned a reduction in paper work, that is, a reduction in the regulatory process that has been imposed upon this important sector of our community.

Could he bring the House up to date on the progress made with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning the breakdown in the issuance of permits for quotas for textile imports? As I understand it, an audit is going on with respect to each quota, and the auditors are either away sick or away giving lectures. The mechanism is at a standstill, which is causing great anxiety to the importers and retailers involved in this aspect of our commercial life.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I will initiate inquiries on this specific matter. I am surprised to hear the situation has reached the grievous proportions which the hon. member cites. On the broader question, I am hopeful, optimistic and determined that in a very short time I will be coming forward with measures that will help combat this disease of paper burden and the type of problems occasioned by the bureaucracy at all levels of government. I know the hon. member will want to support us in that endeavour.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I certainly commend the statement of the minister for small business, but it seems the government is saying one thing and doing another. The other example I would like to bring to his attention—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, would he please put it.

Mr. Huntington: I ask the minister if he would also make representations to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning the plight of the retail shoe industry and the confusion which exists in that area. I know at least three or four retailers who are facing bankruptcy. Is he making representations—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

ROLE OF RECENTLY APPOINTED MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio, from Langelier. I congratulate him on leaping over many of his colleagues and getting into the cabinet. Some have been waiting long and patiently. I would like to ask him a question now he is a member of this cabinet which is approaching batallion size. What role has he been given by the Prime Minister? What special function is this minister going to perform in this very large cabinet?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Minister Without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer my hon. colleague that I think my role is the same as that of the hon. member of the opposition, that is, first, to help my colleagues to fulfil their mandate, second, to try to find solutions that might make the people of the Quebec City area happier and third, by using all the means and powers that have been given to me as a minister, to try to find solutions which will help keep Canada united.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I ask the minister, do his responsibilities involve ribbon cutting and the acceptance of applications for government jobs in the Quebec area?

Mr. Paproski: Opening gas stations and grocery stores.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FISHERIES—MERCURY POLLUTION IN NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of Indian affairs, I would like to direct my question to the minister of health and welfare. It concerns the mercury pollution problem in northwestern Ontario. The report which Dr. Pritchard made to the minister's department is the most conclusive evidence to date that Minamata disease has been confirmed in North America. A victim of this disease who came from the Grassy Narrows reserve was diagnosed and it showed a probability scale of zero to three, at level two. Will the minister recommend that the cabinet ban sports fishing in the English-Wabigoon River system, and begin remedial action on behalf of the natives in the area?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in a position to confirm the need for any such action.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I am shocked at the minister's lack of action, since this report has been with her officials for a number of months. In view of the requests of the former minister of Indian affairs that the Ontario government ban sports fishing in the English-Wabigoon river system, in view of Ontario's failure to do so, and in view of the legal opinion of the fisheries department that if the federal government felt that Ontario was dragging its feet, it could "arbitrarily, unilaterally . . . enact regulations, without consulting Ontario, that would close the English-Wabigoon", I would ask the minister, if she agrees with this report when she has read it, to recommend that the federal government take unilateral action to close this river system.

Miss Bégin: I am ready, Mr. Speaker, to consider the possibility and the results of taking unilateral action. Authority to close a river or lake for sports fishing has been delegated to the province of Ontario, which has systematically refused since 1971 to take any such action.

FINANCE

GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES TO MUNICIPALITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It concerns the discussions which the hon. gentleman and his colleague, the Minister of Finance, have had with Ottawa-Carleton regional and local municipal officials involving grants in lieu of taxes, as it affects the national capital area. Of course, it affects other areas of Canada as well. As a result of that meeting, certain legislation was promised which would be ready for June.

Based on that promise, could the minister let me know, in the absence of his colleague, the Minister of Finance, whether the legislation is in the course of preparation and whether it can be introduced at a reasonably early date, so that it can be discussed by the municipal officials involved, prior to the matter being first raised here in the House of Commons.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will be dealing with this question in the very near future.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, do I gather from the minister that it is, in fact, the intention of the government to introduce this legislation? Could he inform the House whether that legislation will be introduced today, or tell us when it will be introduced? Have there been discussions with any other municipalities in Canada, or any association representing those municipalities, because this question of the federal government paying its share to municipalities is quite important?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the Minister of Finance will be followed through in the very near future. I would prefer to have him deal with this question when he is in the House.

FOOD POLICY CONFERENCE—PROPOSALS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. With the help—and he really did not need much help—of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the food policy conference slated for late February has become a joke in the agricultural communities of Canada. My specific question is this: At the food policy conference, will the government be announcing specific proposals, or will we continue to have just vague, contradictory statements such as we have heard mentioned at the various meetings held across the country?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think many people would agree with the hon. member when he suggests the food strategy meetings we have been having, and the food strategy conference that is to take place in late February, are a joke. Some 60 different groups in Canada have already submitted briefs and have indicated how many people will be attending. The provinces sent their ministers, and it has been one of the most successful ministers' meetings we have held in many years, as far as I am concerned.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

STATEMENT OF MINISTER WITH REGARD TO TARIFFS AND IMPORTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not the opinion of the provincial ministers who attended the meeting at Winnipeg, and a good many people were involved.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I ask if he was serious in a statement which he made in Winnipeg, that he would be in favour of reducing import quotas, reducing tariffs on imports when prices rise, and that he would also favour placing controls on exports of agricultural products when domestic supplies are tight? Is this the kind of fuzzy thinking that we are going to have at this so-called food policy conference in February?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that food policy is something that embraces much more than agriculture. It includes fisheries, warehousing, processing, retailing and a number of other departments and interests. That is the reason many of the people in attendance were in addition to those connected with agriculture. On that particular point, we put to the provincial ministers some proposals for consideration, not that we had adopted them but as proposals for discussion and for feedback; and that was one of them.

RAILWAYS

FUNDS FOR URBAN TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In his absence, I will direct it to the acting minister. With the incorporation of the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act program into the new urban transportation assistance program, can the minister explain what method is being considered for transferring funds from the former program, which was set up under a specific act of parliament, to the new plan?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I take good note of the question.

[English]

Mr. Johnston: While the parliamentary secretary is considering that matter, will he also tell us whether the minister can assure the House that projects negotiated under the old Railway Relocation and Crossing Act will retain priority and will proceed under the same terms as if the program had not been incorporated in the urban transportation and assistance program.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, we will be happy to give the hon. member a complete answer as soon as possible.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CORBIN—INTERRUPTIONS BY HON. MEMBERS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It will not take more than a minute and I did not want to rise on a point of order during the oral question period because I know the standing orders too well. I would like to point out that as the member for Madawaska-Victoria, I am also allowed, I would even say that I am obliged to deal with all questions of national importance, and I will not tolerate being shouted down as I was today by members opposite who vainly tried to shut me up by raising spurious points of order. As a French Canadian, I have an obligation to work for all French Canadians, no matter where they live in this country. My family lives in Ontario with—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member and other hon. members will understand, it is for the Chair to decide whether a member is being unduly interfered with in the putting of a question. In my opinion the interference that was met by the hon. member today was certainly no greater than that which occurs on a great number of occasions when questions are being put in the House. The hon. member was able to put his question and get his answer like any other member. I do not think he has any cause for grievance.

NEW BRUNSWICK MULTIPLEX CORPORATION

Question No. 412—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the New Brunswick Multiplex Corporation and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Nil. Activities of New Brunswick Multiplex Corporation Limited as an incorporated body ceased on September 1, 1976 when its functions were taken over by the New Brunswick government.

2. (a) $369,246 (1975-76); (b) $124,674 (1976-77). All employees of the corporation were hired on contract; however, it is not possible to determine which of these were retired public servants.

DREE—APPLICATIONS FOR GRANTS—NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 508—Mr. Howie:

1. From November 1, 1976 to November 1, 1977, how many applications for DREE grants were received from New Brunswick and how many (a) were approved (b) were rejected (c) were withdrawn (d) are under consideration?

2. How many have been under consideration for more than three months?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. From November 1, 1976 to November 1, 1977, a total of 88 applications for DREE incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Act were received for projects in New Brunswick. Of this number, (a) 29 applications have resulted in incentives offers, of which 18 have been accepted by the companies concerned; (b) 6 were rejected; (c) 39 were withdrawn; (d) 14 are under consideration.

2. As of November 1, 1977, two of the applications had been under consideration for more than three months.

INDUSTRIAL PARK, NACKAWIC, N.B.—LOCATION OF INDUSTRIES

Question No. 509—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, has DREE made any effort to find or assist in the finding of industries willing to locate in the Industrial Park at Nackawic, New Brunswick and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: Please see the reply to question 1,063, House of Commons Debates, January 24, 1977, page 2290. One application for assistance was received on June 23, 1977 from an applicant willing to locate in Nackawic Industrial Park. The application was subsequently withdrawn on October 19, 1977.

ASSISTANCE FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Question No. 689—Mr. Howie:

In investigating applications submitted to DREE for assistance, does the Department make allowance for facilities to undertake research and development projects and, if so, since January, 1976, how many applications for assistance from the Atlantic region have included specifications for research and development facilities?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: The Regional Development Incentives Act enables the Department to offer incentive grants to eligible manufacturing and processing operations. Projects which are solely of a research and development nature are not eligible for RDIA incentive grants but may be eligible for a loan guarantee under RDIA. No applications for loan guarantees for research and development facilities have been received in the Atlantic Region since January 1976. Some applications for RDIA incentive grants provide for research and development facilities as an integral part of the manufacturing or processing operation. The Department does not compile statistics on applications involving an element of research and development.

DREE ASSISTANCE TO COULTER MANUFACTURING

Question No. 728—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AUTHORIZE IMPOSITION OF LEVY ON DOMESTIC PETROLEUM AND IMPORTS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think that the minister is on his way; but if he were late in coming to the House, I should seek permission to proceed with Bill C-7, and should the need arise, the minister would be in the House to introduce it.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we had a long discussion yesterday about what the order of business would be for today, and also there were private discussions. I regret to inform the Chair that no one came to me today to say that we would be doing anything but Bill C-19. The whole process breaks down if ministers or parliamentary secretaries are not ready. Is the government saying to us now that there is no one here who can handle Bill C-19? The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), the Conservative critic, is here. He has inconvenienced himself to come here. He is prepared to deal with that bill.

An hon. Member: Here comes the minister.

Mr. Speaker: After that brief interlude, perhaps we can resume discussion of the question which is already in the possession of the House, namely, that Bill C-19, an act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if I appear to be slightly out of breath—

Mr. Mazankowski: It is because you are out of shape.

Mr. Gillespie: I was downstairs at another meeting, when I received notice that Your Honour was ready to proceed with my bill. I apologize if I have caused any difficulty to the House by being a few minutes late and causing this delay.

This is a very important bill. I believe there has been some discussion between the government House leader and the House leader opposite with regard to the debate today. I am delighted that it may be possible to move expeditiously on the bill during the course of the day.

I am pleased to introduce for second reading today Bill C-19 which amends the Petroleum Administration Act.

The principal purpose of this bill is to enable the government to fulfil its commitment to provide international prices for the synthetic oil produced by Syncrude Canada Limited from Athabasca oil sands. It enables similar treatment to be extended to the production of other selected domestic petroleum sources at the discretion of the governor in council, a very important provision. By introducing this legislation, the government is taking a further significant step to ensure that Canada's net dependence on foreign oil is reduced by encouraging the development of our petroleum resources.

Canadians are beginning to recognize the severity of the problems presented by the rapid decline of our conventional petroleum reserves. The National Energy Board report on Canadian oil supply and requirements of February, 1977, projects the expected fall-off in conventional oil supply, and the corresponding need for oil from other sources. It indicates that by the early 1980's the total supply requirements of Ontario and the western provinces can no longer be met by indigenous crude oil. By 1990, the board foresees Canadian oil providing only about 42 per cent of our oil requirements as compared with about 82 per cent in 1977.

This potential growing dependence on foreign oil will not only place a heavy burden on our economy by increasing our balance of payments deficit but also endangers our oil supply security by increasing our reliance on sources which may be reduced or cut off by disruption of overseas production, as happened in 1973, by an embargo, or simply because of world demand beginning to outrun available supply.

It is imperative that we limit our dependence on foreign oil. It is therefore a cornerstone of national energy strategy that we restrict our net dependence on foreign oil by 1985 to no more than one third of our domestic demand or 800,000 barrels a day, whichever is lower. This means we have to take advantage of a number of opportunities available to us. We have to lessen oil consumption through conservation measures. We have to find substitute energy resources to replace oil, particularly foreign oil. We have to find new supplies. In particular we must recognize the potential of our heavy oils and of our tar sands out west. The government has already taken action to reach some of these targets. I believe it should be possible to produce close to a million barrels a day from the tar sands and heavy oil sands out west by 1990. I believe Canadian industry is gearing up to meet such a target by that date. I think the date is a realistic one. There are some who suggest it may be somewhat optimistic. Well, I think the problem we are facing requires us to reach for a target of that kind. The government has already made a commitment.

Steps which have already been taken by the government include the following:

1. A commitment to move Canadian oil prices toward international levels in order to encourage conservation and resource development.

2. The establishment of a comprehensive program of energy conservation which is already showing results in terms of reduced energy demand.

3. The creation of a financially attractive environment for oil and gas producers.

4. The conclusion of a deficiency agreement with the Interprovincial Pipeline Company which allowed the company to raise the funds to extend its system to Montreal. This gives Montreal refineries a secure supply of domestic crude oil into the 1980s.

Other measures which the government has taken include the formation of Petro-Canada to stimulate activity in petroleum exploration and development and our support for the Syncrude project by way of equity participation and the assurance of international prices for its output. The principal purpose of the legislation I am introducing for the second reading today concerns this latter step.

Consequent upon the withdrawal, in December, 1974, of Atlantic Richfield Limited as a participant in Syncrude, negotiations among the remaining participants, the federal government and the governments of Alberta and Ontario, culminated with the signing of the "Winnipeg Agreement" on February 3, 1975. As a result of this agreement the federal government acquired a 15 per cent equity interest in Syncrude, and the governments of Alberta and Ontario 10 per cent and 5 per cent respectively. In addition, the federal government undertook to assure to all participants the availability of international crude oil prices on the sale of synthetic crude from the Syncrude project.

Production is scheduled to commence this April, with daily volumes rising to 108,000 barrels a day by June, 1980, and then to 129,000 barrels a day. That is the rate of capacity on the basis of existing engineering. There is also the possibility that this production could be further expanded to a level of 200,000 barrels a day. Participants are currently considering the marketing alternatives of disposing of their shares of Syncrude output. To allow sufficient time to complete marketing arrangements before the first product becomes available it is necessary to put in place the mechanism to be employed to afford international prices to Syncrude output.

A number of mechanisms were considered. After discussion with the other Syncrude participants, including the provinces of Alberta and Ontario, it was decided that the objective could be best accomplished by permitting Syncrude output to be sold in Canada at international prices and then compensating refiners and other users as if the crude were imported. The calculation of the rate will be in line with the current methodology with respect to import compensation.

This approach will allow the international market to establish the value of Syncrude output relative to other crude oils. It will be comparatively easy to administer as it makes use of the existing compensation mechanism. The bill also authorizes the funding of this program by a levy on all crude oil refined in Canada and oil products imported to this country. This financial burden, equating to a maximum of approximately half a cent per gallon, will be placed on the consumer of petroleum products, who I believe should be prepared to pay the price to secure such development, both with respect to Syncrude and other petroleum energy projects.

I believe the mechanism I have just outlined for providing international prices is attractive, not only because it is consistent with our self-reliance objective, but also because it can be employed to encourage the future development of other energy projects.

Earlier I mentioned the need for Canadians to recognize the severity of the problems presented by the decline in our conventional petroleum reserves. We are fortunate, however, in having the option to develop the great potential of our vast non-conventional and frontier hydrocarbon resources. The oil sand and heavy oil deposits of Alberta and Saskatchewan, combined with our gas reserves in conventional and frontier areas, together give Canada a potential petroleum resource base which satisfy our country's energy needs well into the future.

I am encouraged to see that the Canadian oil industry is proceeding rapidly to develop these as yet largely untapped resources. Imperial Oil has recently announced a 140,000 B/D heavy oil project at Cold Lake. There are proposals to construct a 100,000 B/D heavy oil upgrading plant at Lloydminster. Shell is examining the possibility of a third oil sands plant with a 125,000 B/D capacity in the Fort McMurray area. And Great Canadian Oil Sands is considering an expansion of its existing facility.

As I have said, the total cost of these projects runs into billions of dollars. The development of these resources may now seem expensive, but they will, as the world's conventional crude oil reserves decline, be cheap at the price. Canadians must recognize this and be willing to pay the price to ensure not only that the problems of the present are solved but also that the promise of the future is fulfilled. Moreover, by creating thousands of jobs both in their construction and operational phases, these projects will help our economy to recover from the present recession.

The bill also authorizes two other minor changes to the Petroleum Administration Act. It provides for payments of special compensation to importers of petroleum in cases of undue financial hardship. This provision would be employed in situations where the regulations did not foresee special types of circumstances faced by importers.

The bill also changes the name of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board to the Petroleum Compensation Board, which more accurately reflects the current duties of the board. That is a technical change. The board was originally established under the Energy Supplies Emergency Act to prepare and implement plans to handle shortfalls of petroleum in times of emergency. This function of the board ceased on June 30, 1976. Its current and ongoing duties involve the administration of the oil import compensation program plus the administration of the program to provide international prices for the output of Syncrude Canada, which I have just outlined.

This legislation represents another important step toward implementation of established energy policies designed to assure Canadians of adequate and secure future supplies. As such, I commend it to the House for its prompt debate and passage.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that the minister's reports on our discussions with regard to this bill are accurate. We have no intention of delaying this bill. We support the basic principle behind the bill, but there are a few remarks I would like to make specifically about the bill as well as about the minister's remarks.

I think it is worth reminding the people of Canada that this is the third in a series of bills resulting from the attempts of the government to come to grips with the question of petroleum pricing in Canada. The first was the emergency energy supplies bill, the second was the Petroleum Administration Act, and now we have this amendment to the Petroleum Administration Act. I wait with bated breath for the fourth of these attempts to come to grips with a policy on petroleum pricing in Canada.

I am sure the House recalls the very unpleasant history of the evolution of these bills and of this problem which goes back to September 4, 1973, when, after publicly declaring he would never take such unilateral action, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) unilaterally put a price freeze on crude oil, causing friction to develop between the province of Alberta and the Government of Canada. This action ultimately involved other provinces as well and lead to a period of serious and debilitating friction between the federal government and the provincial governments which hurt the nation as a whole and caused severe economic hardship for individuals. It was very disrupting to the industry and resulted in some net economic loss to Canada. It is difficult to come up with a realistic price tag, but it would certainly be in the tens or hundreds of millions of dollars. That is the cost of an inopportune, politically motivated declaration by the Prime Minister during that minority parliament. I hope we will never have to go through that kind of exercise again because the economy and the Canadian fabric just could not tolerate it.

I would like to comment on some of the remarks of the minister about the so-called great things the government has been doing for Canada in terms of energy. At least that was the tone of the remarks of the minister, and I take exception to that. In his opening remarks the minister pointed out that, according to the National Energy Board, by 1990 Canadian domestic supplies will account for only 42 per cent of total Canadian consumption. If that projection turns out to be true, it will have devastating consequences for this nation.

The cost of importing the oil necessary to make up the 100 per cent we will need is enormous. It is a cost we cannot afford. It is in the order of $7 billion or $8 billion, based on today's prices. If we add that to the $12 billion trade deficit we suffer in terms of manufacturing, we encounter an incredible combined trade deficit of $20 billion. We think a 90-cent dollar is a depreciated dollar, but that is an extravagantly high priced dollar compared with the dollar we will have if we encounter trade deficits of that magnitude.

It is unacceptable and intolerable that the government should casually say that we are going to import more than half our oil by 1990. Instead, aggressive initiative should be taken by the government to ensure self-sufficiency and that we import zero per cent on a net basis. That is not an Utopian ideal; we are unique among western industrialized nations because we have the potential to do that. No other nation in the western industrialized world, with the possible exception of Great Britain because of petroleum in the North Sea, has the potential to be self-sufficient. Canada does, and that gives us a unique opportunity.

If this government were to dissipate that opportunity through inaction or inappropriate actions, that would cause great damage to future generations, and that should not be forgiven. We have that potential, and our party feels that self-sufficiency is an absolutely essential policy. It is a fundamental cornerstone of an energy policy for this country.

The minister articulated some steps he and his government are taking which are supposed to help ease our problem. The minister talked about trying to lower demand through conservation. There has been some progress, but not nearly enough. We feel that a reduction in demand to 2 per cent annual growth is possible. The minister talked about finding substitutes, but we have yet to see any concrete proposals in that regard. It is a high ideal, but until we see what the government has in mind, it is hard to comment.

The minister talked about finding new supplies, particularly tar sands and heavy oils, and he expressed the expectation of the government that by 1990 one million of barrels of oil per day would be produced from tar sands and heavy oils. Where did that figure come from? What is the basis for that figure?

The government has no policy with regard to tar sands and heavy oils. The government has stated that it will treat each project in an ad hoc fashion. How can developers allocate resources when they do not know what the rules are? Companies are faced daily with decisions on how to allocate their financial and human resources, and if they are considering tar sands and heavy oils and find a situation where the rules are not defined, they cannot calculate their returns. The government suggests they put together a plan or come up with a program, and it will talk about it, but who in his right mind is going to spend the $5 million, $10 million or $20 million which is necessary to put together this type of plan, only to come here on the odd chance that, after discussions with the minister and his officials, everything will turn out all right? That approach shows such a dismal ignorance about the operation that it is disturbing.

The minister apparently does not even know how many companies are interested in developing these heavy oils. He mentioned Imperial and heavy oils, that Shell is looking at another tar sands plant, and Great Canadian Oil Sands is expanding its plant. For the minister's edification I should inform him that Husky Oil and Pacific Petroleums are two other companies actively looking at heavy oils.

All these companies would very much like to have some definition of the rules so they can in fact get to work on the meaty part of their proposals. If they do not, there is not a hope in the world of achieving that goal of one million barrels a day by 1990, because the lead time in planning and putting together resources to build one of these plants is very substantial. In order to achieve the goal the minister talks about—he blandly throws out the figure of one million barrels per day by 1990—we will need one new plant every year starting next year, and there are not any that are anywhere near—

Mr. Gillespie: Way off.

Mr. Andre: Use your own figures. Syncrude is going to produce 100,000 barrels a day. If you multiply that by ten, because you said we were going to do this in roughly ten years, you are talking about one plant a year coming on-stream. When you add into that the lead times required then you realize it is time to get off one's behind and start defining some rules so these companies can begin to get to work.

We agree with the Syncrude development and the Syncrude agreement. We agree with the notion that Syncrude should be paid at world prices. We therefore understand the reasoning behind Bill C-19 to provide this subsidy to Syncrude, or to provide the government with the ability to designate Syncrude in the same category as an importer so it can get this subsidy and sell its product at the world price. We can understand that the money has to come from somewhere, but the minister neglected to state during his remarks that there is a tax to be put on all oil consumed in Canada of not more than $1 a barrel. The estimates are 15 cents to 20 cents but, nonetheless, the consumers should recognize they are going to have another half a cent a gallon of tax tacked on to their gasoline and heating oil.

There are some provisions in the bill which cause some concern in terms of the mentality of the draftsmen or proposers of it that I should like to bring to the attention of the House, and possibly at the committee stage we could get consideration of these matters.

In particular, proposed Section 65.13 states that the minister shall, at his discretion, exempt any petroleum or petroleum products from this extra tax. That put in a flexibility which I can understand is appreciated by the minister and his officials, but in my opinion it is contrary to the responsibilities inherent to operating in a democracy. That type of discretionary ability resting with the ministers and their officials is really contrary in general philosophy, and we wonder why that discretionary power is required. Is it perhaps necessary to make certain friends of the government such as Petro-Canada look good? Who is going to get the privilege of the exemption, and for what purpose? Is this exemption to give the minister another opportunity to treat his friends, associates or party colleagues, in appropriate ways?

Mr. Baldwin: How does it relate to party contributions?

Mr. Andre: That involves another possibility, but we do not see the necessity for this sort of discretionary power.

There is another discretionary power provided in clause 3 at page seven which says that the minister may decide to provide an extra subsidy to special hardship cases. Again I find this a very strange type of clause where, at the minister's discretion, there could be these sorts of handouts.

An hon. Member: For instance, Exxon.

Mr. Andre: Yes, Exxon may be a hardship case like that. Again, there is a temptation to make some of the friends of the government look good through the use of this clause.

The minister indicated in his comments that this bill is specifically designed to allow Syncrude to receive world prices for its production. In fact the bill does not talk about Syncrude specifically. The bill states that the governor in council can designate any production as those imported and, therefore, eligible for the import subsidy. Why go through this exercise? There is no other tar sand plant that is going to be completed for years in the future. We do not know of any heavy oil plants that are coming up. Why not look at those cases as they occur?

It strikes me as strange and inappropriate that we in the House of Commons are again being asked to give this open-ended authority to the government to deem any production it chooses as imports and, therefore, eligible for the subsidy. Is the government going to deem all the production from Petro-Can's producing wells, if it ever finds any oil, as imports in order to make that bottom line look good? How is this discretionary power going to be used? We should build into this clause some check back to the House so that, as producing facilities are added to the list to be deemed as importers, the House or a committee of this place will have an opportunity to examine and consider it before the fact rather than after the fact.

The other thing I should like to bring to the attention of the House, giving it notice, is my intention in committee to introduce a firm amendment to provide a termination date for this whole program. The Petroleum Administration Act was designed to administer over that period of time during which Canadian crude oil prices were less than world prices and it was necessary to collect export taxes, to pay the subsidy on imports, and so on.

It is government policy, which we support, to get out of the business of controlling oil prices eventually and let the market place dictate. At that point there is no further need for the Petroleum Compensation Board. The government took some pride in stating it took an awful lot of work to disband the Halifax Harbour Relief Commission which had been in existence for 60 years. Members opposite suggest it is extremely difficult to disband something once it has been created within this government. For this reason, why do we not build into this bill right now a provision to allow this thing to die gracefully and with dignity when its usefulness is finished, rather than carrying it on, in a way to which we have become habituated, almost in perpetuity?

It is my intention at the committee stage, and I hope to be able to convince government members of the advisability of this provision, to introduce a clause which will provide for the demise of the Petroleum Administration Act on June 30, 1983, unless a positive resolution of the House is introduced to extend that life for another five-year period. This would allow all the flexibility in the world, while providing for the dignified death of this organization once its usefulness is finished.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, today the Syncrude chickens which were hatched in 1975 are coming home to roost. Having been outbluffed and outwitted by two of the major oil companies into a give-away of public funds, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) finds it necessary to come now and tell the people of Canada that there is a bill which has to be met, there is a price which has to be paid for the deal which was concluded in 1975.

On January 24, 1975, Mr. Geoffrey Stevens in his column in the Toronto Globe and Mail stated, "This is one of the highest stakes poker games in Canadian history".

On February 4, 1975, when the then minister of energy, mines and resources made an announcement, I said, "This is the greatest sellout of our natural resources in the history of Canada". Every day which has passed since has reinforced those two opinions. It has been the "highest stakes poker game". There is no doubt who won the game. It has constituted the "greatest sellout of our natural resources in the history of Canada".

The time has come for the government to present the legislation by which we shall have to pay. This is not only for Syncrude, because the bill gives sweeping powers to cabinet by order in council to allow levies to be placed and taxes imposed on many forms of oil, as well as giving grants and concessions for different kinds of oil. Thus, we do not know from this legislation how big the bill is. We do know the government is asking parliament to give it the authority to pay the bill. We are being asked to sign a blank cheque. We do not know what the amount of that cheque is going to be.

We have to begin to recognize that when we talk about the oil sands of western Canada we are talking about one of the world's greatest reservoirs of oil. This legislation is asking us to pay for having it stolen from us.

In the 1973 booklet entitled "Energy Policy for Canada", reference is made to the geological survey of Canada which estimates that there are up to 700 billion barrels of oil in the tar sands of western Canada. If it could be extracted, that represents a larger accumulation of crude oil than there is in the Middle East. At the same time the estimates quoted are to the effect that 65 billion barrels of this oil can be recovered with the present known technology. It estimates that some 15 billion barrels can be recovered at a price of $5 a barrel wellhead, and 35 billion barrels at a price of $6 a barrel. The same report indicates that at a price of approximately $8 a barrel we have up to 40 billion barrels of crude oil which are economically recoverable from conventional reserves.

I ask the House to look at those figures. They were given in 1973, and this is only 1978. Approximately five years ago these were the optimistic statistics which were given to the people of Canada concerning the great unlimited reserves of oil that Canada has. Today the minister indicated that we are now a net importer of oil, that in the matter of a few years we will be able to meet less than half our oil requirements and that our bill for imported oil will be a staggering one.

Not only did the government paint this optimistic picture, the oil industry was equally euphoric about our oil supplies for the foreseeable future. The Imperial Oil Company's annual report for March, 1973, read as follows:

> In the current debate, the export of Canada's energy resources is being questioned: in effect we are being urged to bank our petroleum resources. Canada is not in any way deficient in energy resources. Our present energy reserves, using present technology, are sufficient for our requirements for several hundred years . . .

That statement was made less than five years ago. This misleading information was fed to the public assiduously for many years, deliberately to persuade a supine government to allow United States oil companies to ship 60 per cent of our oil production to the United States, despite the fact that geologists and academic authorities, who were familiar with the field, had been telling Canadians and committees of this House that within a matter of ten or 15 years Canada would have to import a very large proportion of its oil requirements. That day is already here, and we find that not only do we not have these large reservoirs of oil, which were allegedly available with the present technology, but we are now going to have to pay through the nose for companies to develop some of our oil sands.

In 1973 when the OPEC Nations acted in unison to force up oil prices, the oil industry in North America saw an opportunity to hold the public up to ransom, with the result that the wellhead price for oil has risen from approximately $3 per barrel to $12.75 per barrel, which is an increase of over 400 per cent. Certainly no one could attribute a 400 per cent increase in the price of a barrel of oil to inflation or to the cost of producing that barrel of oil.

Mr. Baldwin: It is the other way round—it has caused inflation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is right. As the hon. member says, the reverse is true. It is this horrendous increase in the price of oil which reflects itself in the cost of operating a car, a truck or a diesel engine. It reflects itself in the price of electric power and of home heating. It affects our whole economy, and particularly the farming and fishing industries are affected adversely.

The rapid rise in the price of oil from $3 a barrel to $12.75 has resulted in a situation where we paid in 1977 about $1.8 billion for imported oil, and it is estimated that by 1985 we will be paying $6 billion for imported oil. We are only beginning to realize what this will do to the cost of living for Canadians when we see what the future holds for us in terms of what we are going to pay for petroleum products. We will then realize how we have squandered the large accumulation of petroleum products which we had and which we gave away at fire sale prices. One then begins to realize that we have not had in Canada a national energy policy which was devised and designed to serve the interests of the Canadian people.

Let me just take a few moments to run over quickly the history of the oil sands development in this country. In October of 1962 Great Canadian Oil Sands, which is a subsidiary of Sun Oil of the U.S., was granted permission to build a small plant to extract oil from the tar sands. Later they enlarged the size and in 1974 the plant showed its first profit on oil, which they were selling for $6.50 a barrel. They have been making a profit ever since without any subsidy. They are a smaller plant without the modern technology which Syncrude has, and yet they have been able to do quite well on the domestic price. Yet we are being told that Syncrude cannot produce for the going price, which at present is $12.75, and needs a guarantee of the world price, no matter what the world price may be.

In February of 1972 the Syncrude consortium, which was made up of Imperial Oil, Atlantic Richfield, City Services Ltd., and Gulf Oil, secured approval from the Alberta government for the construction of a plant capable of producing 125,000 barrels a day. They estimated the cost to be $750 million. In September of 1973, syncrude and the Alberta government announced that it was going to cost $800 million to build this plant and that it would commence production in 1978, with the Alberta government agreeing to invest $500 million of the taxpayers' money to build a power plant, a pipeline and all the infrastructure. In December of 1974, Atlantic Richfield announced that it was withdrawing from the Syncrude consortium because the estimated cost of the project had risen to $1.6 billion from the original $750 million estimate.

On January 16, 1975, the remaining partners of the Syncrude consortium threatened to drop the whole project unless a partner could be found who would put up $1 billion to get the plan started on its way toward completion. The former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), and premier Lougheed of Alberta appealed to Syncrude for a 60 to 90 day extension to give the government time to canvass the situation to see what could be done. That reasonable request was refused, and so a hasty meeting was called in Winnipeg on February 3, 1975.

On February 4, the then minister of energy, mines and resources, the hon. member for Rosedale, announced that an agreement had been reached under which Syncrude would get the following concessions. First, they would get $600 million of equity, which was to be made up of $300 million put up by the federal government, $200 million by the government of Alberta, and $100 million from the government of Ontario, plus a $200 million loan from the government of Alberta which could later be converted, if it chose, into equity.

The second concession was a remarkable tax concession by which the company could go back to the terms of the 1973 budget, by which they received greater exemptions, were allowed to charge their royalties against their income tax payments, and were allowed lower rates of tax than were imposed in the 1974 budget. These tax concessions were worth to Syncrude, and are worth today, hundreds of millions of dollars which represent a loss to the Canadian treasury and which must be replaced by levying higher taxes on the other taxpayers of this country.

The third concession was that there would be no limit on the production of the Syncrude plant in the event that any pro rata plan were introduced by the government of Alberta, and the fourth concession was that Syncrude would be guaranteed the international price for any oil that it produced, irrespective of what the domestic price might be in Canada.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

AFTER RECESS

[English]

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned for lunch I was in the process of pointing out that, as a result of the agreement which was reached on February 3, 1975, between the Syncrude consortium and the governments of Canada, Alberta and Ontario, it was decided to proceed with the construction of the Syncrude plant for the extraction of oil from the sands of western Canada on the basis of four concessions. I was enumerating those concessions when we recessed.

The concessions were that the three governments concerned would put up $600 million, plus another $200 million loan from Alberta; that Syncrude would get special tax concessions which would take them back to the 1973 budget; that they would be guaranteed no limits on their production; and finally, that they would be guaranteed the international price for the oil they produced. I think it should be noted that when we say they will be guaranteed the international price we are really asking this parliament to give the government a blank cheque and to guarantee to this company amounts of money that we have no way of computing.

When the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works was discussing this matter with the former minister of energy, mines and resources, I produced a copy of one of the studies done for the government of Alberta by Foster Associates. The minister of that day took no exception to the fact that the study based the economic feasibility of the Syncrude project on the assumption that the price they would get would start at $15.50 per barrel and would go up to reach $35.00 per barrel eventually in the last year or two of the life of the plant.

I think this House and the people of Canada should be given some idea of what we are underwriting when we say we are going to guarantee this company will receive the international price. That price now is above the domestic price. The minister said today, and has said before, that he wants to see this country get to the international price. We had better know what we are talking about; we are talking about prices far in excess of anything we have ever dreamed of in this country.

The strange thing is, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Canada entered into this Syncrude agreement despite the fact that it had never at any time commissioned an economic feasibility study, it had not hired any experts or called in any consulting firm to do an assessment of the project.

It is true that the province of Alberta had commissioned four studies, but none of those was available on February 3 at the meeting in Winnipeg. On the night before and on the morning they were meeting, a rapid summary was hurried to them by telex giving them a fragmentary picture of what the reports were going to say. The other two reports did not reach them until after the agreement had been entered into.

I think that the governments of that time were stampeded into entering into an agreement which was not in the public interest and for which we are now being called upon to pay. This legislation asks that parliament approve the power to impose a levy or tax on all domestic oil and on all imported oil in order to create a fund sufficient to pay the difference between the domestic price and the international price.

I notice the minister now uses the term international price. His predecessor kept using the phrase internationally oriented price. We used to try to get him to define it. It is not defined yet, and it is not defined here. One of my objections to this legislation is that almost everything is left to the discretion of the government, and its boards, and it has no real definition of what we mean by international price or on what it will be based. There is no indication at all of the types of oil to which it will be applied. As a matter of fact, if I understood the minister correctly, he said this morning that the cabinet would have power by order in council to apply it to any type of oil it wished. I assume the government can apply it to oil extracted from the heavy oil deposits in Cold Lake and Lloydminster. It can apply it to any particular company which has some problem.

There are very wide discretionary powers of taxation. There are arbitrary powers which I doubt any parliament should give to a government. But most serious of all it means that these powers will enable the government to give the same concessions to other companies which may develop the oil sands. As a matter of fact I do not see how it can refuse. The minister's predecessor kept saying that no commitment was being made with respect to other companies that might go into the tar sands to extract oil. Will it be possible to do that?

I notice from press reports that Shell Oil is now negotiating with the government of Alberta with a view to building a plant there. I hope it does. This country certainly needs the oil, and we certainly cannot afford to import the amount of oil we are importing now with the effect it is having on our balance of trade and on the Canadian dollar. But how will this government justify saying to Shell Oil, "We are not going to give you any international price; we are giving it to Imperial Oil, we are giving it to Gulf Oil because we made a mistake on February 3, 1975, when we were stampeded into reaching an agreement"? Will it say "We are not going to give it to you"? You cannot do that. There will be other companies, Husky Oil and others which may decide to build plants in the oil sands area and surely they will be able to claim in all justice that they should have the same concessions, and those concessions are going to cost the people of this country tremendous sums of money.

I think what should be recognized is the concessions which were made on February 3, 1975. First of all they consisted of these very large sums of money, some $800 million, $600 million in equity and $200 million in loans. These companies will have had and will continue to receive hundreds of millions of dollars out of the public treasury as a result of the tremendous tax concessions which have to be paid for by the other taxpayers of Canada. Now on top of that we are going to tax the consumers of this country to give to Imperial Oil and Gulf Oil a special price for oil that is not enjoyed by other companies and is not enjoyed by the only other company that is producing oil in the tar sands, namely, Great Canadian Oil Sands, which has been producing all along, producing at the domestic price and with a much less sophisticated plant.

If ever a couple of oil companies have had preferred treatment, it is certainly Imperial Oil and Gulf Oil, under this agreement. I am saying to this House that these two companies and the oil industry as a whole just do not need this kind of handout. They have had the privilege given to them by this government of increasing the price of oil fourfold over the last five years. They have made hundreds of millions of dollars out of the Canadian people from their increased revenue.

Let me draw to the attention of the House for a moment the government's own monitoring survey for 1971-1976. I will have a chance to deal with it in more detail when we come to Bill C-12. To quote from page 5 of the monitoring survey, there is one sentence which I think ought to be emblazoned all across this country:

> Over the 1971-1976 period internal cash generation for the monitoring aggregate totalled $13.3 billion. Of this total, $6.7 billion or 50.4 per cent is represented by after tax profits.

I ask the members of this House: do you know of any other commercial operation or any other industry in Canada where its profits represent over 50 per cent of its total cash revenue? Do you know of any store, any businessman who, out of his total cash take, receives over 50 per cent in after tax profits?

President Carter said a short time ago that the oil industry in the United States was robbing the American people. Well, he ought to have a look at this statement and see how it is happening in this country. The oil industry in this country has made so much money out of the profits it has had from its domestic production that I claim that Imperial Oil and Gulf Oil do not need this extra money which is going to be provided by levying a tax on the Canadian people. It depends on what the world and domestic prices are, but if the difference between the two prices is three or four dollars per year then the Canadian consumer will have to pay $140 million to $150 million a year more than he is paying now.

Mr. Speaker, everyone knows we have already put a tax of ten cents a gallon on gasoline and home heating oil in this country. We are already taxing our people very heavily. In addition, we are going to tax them because a consortium in Canada is extracting oil from the tar sands and has managed to get a commitment from the Government of Canada, not just that it will get hundreds of millions of dollars of money which the public treasuries have poured into that consortium, not just that it will get these tremendous tax concessions, but that it is going to get a guarantee of a world price, something no other company in Canada has. It is going to get that no matter what happens. It is going to be paid for by the consumers of Canada who are already paying too much for both their motor fuel and heating fuel in light of what it costs.

If there were any assurance that these higher prices were going to be ploughed back in to ensure supplies for the future, it might make some sense. We will get to that when we come to Bill C-12. However, there is no such assurance. All we are asked in this legislation is to give the government authority to levy a tax on the consumers so that the government can take the money and turn it over to those poor, downtrodden, poverty sticken companies, Imperial Oil Company and the Gulf Oil Company of Canada.

I say that this is an iniquitous piece of legislation. Any government which has introduced it has lost all sense of shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has put his finger on one of the real problems of this legislation. Toward the conclusion of his remarks, he suggested in so many words that what we are being asked to do is buy a pig in a poke.

In his introductory remarks, the minister dealt with the particular situation of Syncrude. It might well be that a clear examination of all of the facts, and some indication as to the probability of what will happen in the future, might persuade this House that in the interest of doing something about the energy situation in Canada a certain type of arrangement should receive the support of the House.

I consider it most improper, and I think I would not be discharging my responsibility to my constituents and to the people of this country, to accept, without something more being done to bring home to us the actual facts, the statement of the minister that we should relate the general to the particular and that this situation with regard to Syncrude justifies the passing of this legislation.

As a Conservative I thoroughly believe that the private sector in general is the best weapon, best means and best vehicle to sustain progress in our society. However, that does not mean I am automatically opposed to intervention by the state when it can be established to be essential.

I can cast my mind back a great many years to the inception of programs with regard to the development of the tar sands. Under the premiership of a very distinguished gentleman, later a law partner of mine, the late John Brownlee, the government of Alberta established a program with regard to dealing with the tar sands. The then expenditure in today's terms would appear an extremely modest amount of money each year.

A very considerable amount of the basic research and study was done with regard to the tar sands in the McMurray area. At that time the government of Alberta saw fit, in collaboration with one or two companies, to continue its basic research. This in due course led to what progress has since been made in the McMurray district.

This legislation is something entirely different. It applies to what I like to call the great skin game of 1973. Because of the actions of the OPEC nations, the blindness, and possibly the collaboration of governments with some of the larger international companies, people on the North American continent and in Europe were frightened to death. They were persuaded to intervene in assistance, to engage in programs and to sponsor and enact legislation such as the Petroleum Administration Act and the energy allocation bill.

Several bills were passed at that time, having been introduced by the then minister, who has since left this House. At that time I participated very actively in the debate, both in committee and in the House. We attempted to move amendments. We said things then which have since been repeated by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). This shows that what the opposition stated at that time has now come true. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said, the chickens have come home to roost.

The legislation was conceived in panic, enacted in haste, and contained what at the time I characterized as an inordinate amount of authority given to the government. As a result of the power which the government took, against our opposition and contrary to the votes of the opposition, I never thought it would need to come back here. But now it comes back demanding an even greater degree of blanket authority on issues which may involve billions and billions of dollars.

The United States is in a very serious situation with regard to its balance of payments. President Carter has been attempting to secure enactment of a legislative package which will include, among other things, legislation dealing with the proposed pipeline coming down from Alaska, through the Yukon, into Canada. He has indicated that, if nothing is done, the United States may well have to contemplate a balance of payments deficit running into $100 billion or $125 billion in the not too distant future. I ask the House to consider what that might do to the question of inflation in the United States and, incidentally, to us, as well as the dangerous situation it would put those people in who directly rely on petroleum products for energy. We are heading down the same road.

I would like to feel that what the minister said might be correct, that a program such as he has intimated and such as has been referred to in the House might be essential in order to get this particular program going. However, we should be confronted with figures, particulars, an itemized statement, and some prognosis as to what will be involved. How will the people of the eastern provinces, who are faced with a staggering measure of inflation and unemployment, be involved, and how will they bear the burden of this particular program?

I know that if the production of petroleum were to cease the industrialized world would come to a crashing end because we have predicated our existence on the motor vehicle, on the internal combustion engine, and on the use of oil for fuel and heating.

I sometimes wonder whether in the excitement of these great projects which are pending we have not lost sight of their ultimate cost and the effect this figure is likely to have on the balance sheets being presented. We have been talking about a gas pipeline coming down from Alaska through the Yukon into southern Canada. The cost has been estimated at between $13 billion and $14 billion. I notice that the other day in Washington some fairly responsible members of Congress suggested that between $20 billion and $25 billion would be more realistic. Of course that might be alarmist information given for political purposes, but I would suggest that whatever figure the minister presently has in mind he will have to double or triple by the time the pipeline is finished. What effect is the final figure likely to have on the inflationary spiral?

I, for one, am not inclined to give the government the blank cheque it is seeking in legislation of the kind before us. I will make up my mind on the issue after hearing what the minister has to say during the committee stage. So far he has not been very informative. He is a good minister. He came into this Chamber just in time to inject a feeling of excitement about this bill and he read a very good brief which had been prepared by his officials—I do not know whether he had had a chance to read it before he delivered it. During the committee stage the missing information, part of which the minister may not have been able to soak up like a blotter, will be supplied by the officials who will be present to jog his elbow and put words and figures on his tongue—

Mr. Gillespie: I have just had a holiday.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister says he has just had a holiday. I have been on holiday too, in Yucatan, looking at the ruins, and now I have come back here to look at the ruins of the government. I might say that the ruins of Yucatan with their great stone faces were much more pleasant to gaze upon; at least they did not make the kind of speech the minister made today.

I once heard it said that genius could be defined as a capacity to take infinite pains. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should put that motto on his wall instead of the one which I imagine is there at the present time—"A Prime Minister can do no wrong". Ministers should be knowledgeable about the programs they bring before the House. They should know what they are doing, and why. There is more to this issue than the question of energy produced from oil derivatives under the present system.

Not long ago I was up in my constituency in the far north. I had a telephone call from a constituent, a farmer, who had conceived and developed a simple device for producing energy. He had a dozen cattle and he put the wastes from those cattle into a device which generated enough gas to provide electrical power for his furnace and for his lights. He has been in contact with both the provincial and the federal governments to work out a subsidy program through which the necessary equipment could be manufactured and sold to farmers at the price of $1,000 or so.

The beauty of this system is this: the end product is a valuable, highly enriched fertilizer which goes back into the field and is used to help grow feed for cattle. The cattle produce wastes, and the cycle begins again, so there is a kind of perpetual motion. By this little story I am trying to show that there are a great many sources of energy still to be developed, for example, thermal power, wind power, solar energy. I know the minister has gone through his repertoire of what the government is doing in this field, but personally I am not convinced by his statements. I do not think he knows what the department is doing, and I doubt whether the department knows either.

The minister is right in saying petroleum products are finite. There are limits. Maybe there are 180 billion barrels in the east, maybe more—we do not yet know what advances may be made in measures of recovery. Within 25 miles of my own town on the Peace River the Shell Company—and I give the company full credit for this—has been working steadily on a pilot project to develop methods of utilizing the tar sands some 1,000 feet down. It is estimated that between 25 billion and 30 billion barrels of oil are secreted in the tar sands of the area. The great virtue of this experiment is that the environmental hazards associated with the operations at Cold Lake and elsewhere are largely avoided. Therefore we may look forward to a process of recovery of a much larger percentage of tar sands energy in Western Canada than either the minister or the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands contemplates at this time. We know, however, that the time will come when these reserves will be exhausted.

We owe it not only to our constituents but to those who come after us to ensure that adequate steps are taken and that money is spent under proper supervision to bring about a comprehensive program which will permit us not only to be independent but to be generously supportive of other peoples in the world who are in need of energy. We are one of the better equipped countries in the world, because of our experience, knowledge and expertise, to offer assistance. I include my friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, who is very knowledgeable in this regard. He is a scientist, and in his speech he gave sure indication of his knowledge.

I just do not like the ad hocery which this bill puts before us. The minister says this bill is to deal with Syncrude. It could deal with any situation. I will read some of the parts which are obnoxious and repugnant to me. Proposed section 65.13 says the following:

> Where it is shown to the Governor in Council by the Board that it is in the public interest to do so—

Who decides what is in the public interest? Is it the board? This board has not shown the degree of knowledge and competence necessary to make an adjudication regarding public interest. It should be this House. It should be this parliament that should decide what is or is not in the public interest.

> —the Governor in Council may . . . exempt any petroleum or petroleum products from the charge imposed thereon . . .

If this parliament has any task at all, surely it is to tax and to relieve from taxation, and not to leave it to any board to do so. For too many years we have dribbled away our powers to the bureaucracy. The bureaucracy and the government are not composed of bad people. I think generally all governments are bad, but we should start on the basis that the men who conduct them are well intentioned but engage too much in deceit and are incompetent. I am not inclined to give this kind of power to people of that kind.

Surely it is the duty of this parliament to say to the minister that we will grant him this blanket legislation, but let him introduce into it a clause which says that any particular device, scheme or program with regard to any special area such as Syncrude shall be brought to the government by the board, and the government may indeed approve it by order in council, but subject to an affirmative resolution by this House. It is about time we started asserting not just our independence but also the necessity that we, as a parliament on behalf of the people of Canada, say to the government that programs of this kind which could involve over a ten-year period billions and billions of dollars will not be allowed to proceed without certain assurances.

We should not allow the minister to introduce them on his own, to deceive us, and to tell us about them only when they are all over. If the minister thinks he has a good program, let him bring it before parliament with facts, figures and detail, and if it is good we will give him our support. I believe that this parliament should reassert its independence from government. Hon. members opposite should assert their independence from the government and say that they have a right to be consulted about issues which affect us. I believe if that were done hon. members opposite could go back to their constituencies and be well received.

We are delinquent in our duty if we allow legislation of this kind to pass without making speeches such as the ones made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. There may not be profit in everything, but if we do not make those kinds of speeches, before ten years have passed I suggest that this House, this parliament and this country will be very sorry indeed for passing a bill of this kind.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the bill we have before us which deals with a special levy or tax on oil products in order that Syncrude may be compensated at world price levels for the oil production at its plant in the tar sands of Alberta is but one further instalment in a sad record of mismanagement of energy and tax policies on the part of this government.

In a sense this bill comes after the fact. In the original agreement with Syncrude the company was promised, no matter what, that it would get the world price for the oil produced from those tar sands. That price has not been guaranteed to any other Canadian energy producing company. Therefore this bill merely confirms something that was agreed to a number of years ago. We in the New Democratic Party objected to the Syncrude deal—or sellout, as we described it—and likewise we object to this bill for many of the same reasons.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

I think it is worth while to refresh the memories of hon. members on some of the pertinent details relating to the agreement which lead to the bill before us. In late 1974 there was a crisis energy shortage in this country and in the United States, and there was great panic among consumers and government that we might see a repetition of the lineups of automobiles at gasoline stations and that people might freeze in the dark. In that panic atmosphere the government was forced into making a deal that in reality sold out the Canadian consumer and future generations in terms of assuring that our energy supplies would be controlled by the people of Canada, who own the oil or natural gas that lies beneath the surface.

In June of 1974 when oil companies only were involved in the planned project to extract synthetic oil—oil of a very high quality which costs less to refine than conventional oil—the cost of the Syncrude project was projected to be about $960 million. Then we found that by December of 1974 it had escalated mysteriously to $1.6 billion. Five weeks later, after one of the original partners in that private consortium of international oil companies operating in Canada pulled out, the cost jumped to $2 billion. By the time the government bailed out those multinational oil companies in the project the cost was well over $2 billion. That in itself should have led any astute minister of energy to question.

What happened was that not only had the oil companies manoeuvred this government; they had done so at a tremendously inflated cost. In the negotiations at that time the government was given an ultimatum; "Either pour money into this enormously costly project, or it will collapse and Canadians will be facing more serious shortages of energy, and there will be panic in the streets."

Along with the governments of Alberta and Ontario the federal government bailed out the Syncrude project by putting up tremendous sums of public money. This money was paid to the private companies. This party has argued in the past that energy is owned by the people and therefore should be controlled by the people. That principle has been accepted in every province with regard to electricity. The wisdom of having electricity owned by the public is no longer debated. Yet we still allow one of our most precious and important energy resources, oil, to remain in the hands of private companies.

The oil industry in Canada in terms of refining is 99 per cent foreign-owned, so not only is it in private hands, it is in private foreign hands. As a result we have the very odd situation of the governments of Canada, Ontario and Alberta pouring money in to help out these private companies. If I were a negotiator or sound businessman putting hundreds of millions of dollars into a project, I would want to get something from it in return, either in terms of ownership and control, or benefits in terms of the products produced. One would assume that the Liberal government would operate on that logical premise. But we know from the past record of this government in energy policy that logic does not prevail. In this case it was a panic policy in a situation that helped the multinational oil companies.

Let us examine what happened. This project, involving more than $2 billion, was bailed out to the tune of some $600 million in investment money from the three governments; another $200 million in loans from the government of Alberta; another $600 million in assistance for the power plant and the pipeline from the public treasuries; and another $230 million in assistance for the building of roads and town services.

In addition to that kind of financial assistance in direct aid, the governments at both levels through their tax dollars gave the Syncrude partners tax concessions of immense dollar value; more tax concessions than private companies elsewhere in Canada were able to achieve. These included the writing off of provincial royalties, which has been denied every other company in computing taxes owed the federal government, depreciation allowances, and so on.

In return for all that capital investment and tax concession, how much ownership did we as the people of Canada obtain? I suggest it is not 50 per cent, not 60 per cent or 80 per cent, but a mere 30 per cent. We end up with 30 per cent control of the Syncrude project after putting up that kind of money.

When you total the grants and concessions and take into account the $1.4 billion of the more than $2 billion the private companies were supposed to have put in, you will find that we, as the taxpayers, are subsidizing even that amount. In reality we as taxpayers are putting up the majority of the money for the project but end up with only 30 per cent of the control. What a sellout! I do not see how the government can justify that kind of investment for that kind of control. It ends up with six directors on a board of 20, and 30 per cent ownership of a project in return for hundreds of millions in investment. The government was taken to the cleaners, and we as Canadians have, indeed, been taken to the cleaners along with it because we end up paying, in terms of our taxes, huge subsidies to Syncrude and, even more important, in terms of our consumer dollar we are subsidizing the Syncrude project.

What this means is that any refined oil product coming from Syncrude will now be subsidized to the extent of what the world price of oil will be. We are paying twice over for this project called Syncrude. Today the price of oil per barrel in Canada is $12.75. It is hard to believe that back in 1973 we were paying $3 a barrel for that oil. The world price which has been guaranteed to Syncrude is about $15 or $16, and the projections are that it will continue to increase. Therefore, because we have been able to cushion the world price for the Canadian consumer, holding it to $12.75, and the government will eventually bring it up to the world price now being received by every other oil company, we will allow Syncrude to get the world price. That is what this government has before us in this bill.

We as taxpayers have to make up the difference between $12.75 per barrel and the world price of $15 to $16. We are faced with an increase imposed in respect of other energy products we consume in order to pay Syncrude the equivalent of the world price.

We have already seen what has happened as a result of this tremendous escalation in the price of energy in the form of oil, from $3 a barrel five years ago to $12.75 at this time. It has been reflected in the cost of heating our homes, in the cost of public and private transportation, in the cost to the farmer for his machinery, which in turn is reflected in the higher cost of food, and in terms of unemployment. High energy costs have driven some of our industries into a non-competitive position. This has meant less sales and the layoff of many people.

We are paying many times over for this horrendous deal negotiated by the Liberal government. In return we are getting 30 per cent ownership and have to pay the world price for the oil produced by the Syncrude project. If ever there was an argument for full public ownership and control of the energy industries in this country, the Syncrude project is that argument.

We as the people of this country own the resources, but the policies of the Liberal and Conservative governments have been to pay the multinational oil companies large subsidies with our tax dollars and allow them to charge us the high world price for our domestic oil. What a ludicrous and ridiculous situation we have to face! It seems to me that the logic of seeing our oil industry as a public utility, as we do in respect of our electric industry, is very evident.

We now have this bill which will levy a tax or charge on conventional oil produced elsewhere in Canada in order to guarantee Syncrude the world price. What is that going to cost us as consumers? The bill does not spell this out, and that is another of the reasons we object to it. It gives carte blanche to the government to calculate what that charge will be. Several estimates report it to be $140 million a year in extra cost to Canadian consumers in the form of subsidies to the Syncrude project until we reach the world price for oil right across Canada. This is taking place at a time when inflation is on the rise and with unemployment at record high levels. To me this is a disastrous policy into which this government has locked itself.

We as consumers and workers have to put up with this immense folly perpetrated on the Canadian people by mismanagement. In addition, this means that we are going to be paying more for imported oil as the cost continually rises at the world level, and as we continue to import foreign oil instead of moving toward self-sufficiency, as we should have years ago. This is the result of the government allowing the control of pipe-lines to be in the hands of private industry. We have never moved toward an east-west pipeline in this country to isolate ourselves from the necessity of having to import oil from Venezuela and the Middle East. We will end up paying at least $1.8 billion a year for imported oil, as we do now, with the prospect of it going up to $6 billion by 1985. Already we have seen what this deficit in the balance of payments has done to the Canadian dollar. It has reduced its value to 90 cents. That will worsen, and indeed the consequences for our economy are very grim when one looks ahead. This legislation provides Syncrude with the world price, and one must worry about the projected world price a few years down the road.

Along with some of my colleagues in this House, I had the privilege of visiting the United States, specifically Washington and a number of other communities. We met with American officials to discuss its energy conservation program. In one of our meetings at the energy department in Washington with some of Mr. Schlesinger's officials, charts were pulled out which projected the world price, as well as what Americans were expecting to pay in 1985 for an imported barrel of crude oil. The figures were very sobering and were corroborated by other independent forecasters. It showed that by 1985 the world price, which is currently $15 a barrel, will be $25 a barrel in 1977 dollars and approximately $40 a barrel in 1985 dollars. This piece of legislation guarantees Syncrude the world price which has been projected for the years to come. Although Canadian oil will not cost that much to produce, we will end up paying Syncrude the world price because of this iniquitous legislation. The minister should resign in shame for this kind of betrayal.

The minister places great hope on the tar or oil sands as a great supplier of energy for Canada in the future. If one looks at the projected costs of such a development, one shudders because they amount to billions of dollars. I do not think the minister has looked at the oil sands situation from an energy point of view. The tendency is always to look at it from the dollar cost point of view. Has the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources conducted a study of the energy cost of extracting energy from the Alberta tar sands? Do we end up putting more energy into the tar sands in order to get energy back out and delivered to the consumer?

There was a study conducted by an American university on the whole question of the energy costs of the different developments which are occurring in the energy field. The oil shale situation was looked at by this group. I suppose that is not comparable to the oil sands, but it is an illustrative example and I hope the minister will provide a similar study at committee stage. The study group concluded that to obtain 1,000 BTUs of energy from oil shale, at least 1,238 BTUs of oil shale in the ground is required in the first place; another 359 BTUs of energy is required to build and to operate the extraction system, the great drag lines, etc.; and then another 483 BTUs of oil shale in the ground is required to supply the aforementioned BTU energy to build the system. In other words, an equivalent of 2,080 BTUs of oil shale is required to produce 1,000 BTUs for delivery to the consumer.

If that is placed on the energy equation scale, then is it worth while to invest so much money and time in that kind of extraction system or should we not spend our time and dollars on alternative energy sources such as solar, wind or enhancement of conservation? The government's record in that regard has been dismal, but in terms of alternative development we are behind most other countries in the world. From an energy point of view, as well as from a dollar point of view, perhaps we should go slowly into the future of oil sands development and look at alternative conventional sources of energy.

I reiterate our profound objections to the Syncrude project as well as the bill before us. It will continue to penalize Canadian consumers for the bad deal which was negotiated a few years ago. Indeed it gives the government and its anonymous officials a blank cheque and immense power in terms of defining the dollar levy consumers will end up paying to subsidize Syncrude. It gives wide and arbitrary power to cabinet. This cannot be allowed because the government has usurped the powers of this elected House. This will set a precedent for future oil sands development in terms of special deals, concessions, and prices for other oil companies involved in tar sands extraction, which no other energy company has in Canada. In its entirety this is a bad bill. The taxpayers will end up paying two times over for this very, very bad Syncrude deal foisted on the Canadian public a few years ago. I ask my colleagues to vote against it.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) advocating public ownership. I do not think we can say that public ownership has always been within the public good, or that it has always been the most profitable in terms of goods produced and services provided. I do not think we can say public ownership is all bad. Each case has to be examined on its merits.

The Syncrude project is a rather unique partnership between two provincial governments, the governments of Alberta and Ontario; the federal government, which came in at a later stage in order to fill a vacuum that had developed; and the private sector. In terms of the future of Canada, it is a project of some considerable value. It does not lie in the mouth of any member of this House to condemn it, because its work is important in terms of the development of Canadian energy resources.

I do not intend to give the government an inordinately large pat on the back for its incentives in energy. I would be surprised if the minister did not come before the House indicating that he and his department are the next best thing since sliced bread. Some people have said that rather than sliced bread I should have used the phrase "sliced baloney", but ministers do this kind of thing.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is right, however, that in terms of developing alternate sources of energy this government's record of talking on this subject in the House of Commons has been better than of taking any action. As time goes on our country will have to pay very dearly for the fact that thus far the development of alternate sources of energy has not proceeded too well.

What surprises me somewhat is the silence from the Liberal backbenchers on this bill which gives the government such extraordinary powers. I wonder how the Liberal backbenchers, who, I assume, are as concerned about the propriety of legislation as are any other members of the House, can sit by and allow a government to bring before the House a bill which may quite properly apply to the Syncrude project because of its particular nature, but which contains provisions allowing the government access to the public taxing power with respect to private organizations and, indeed, access to public funds.

The bill is broadly based and, I think, is the product of a lazy draftsman. It is much easier to draft bills which apply to everybody, bills which grant powers which the government might not need in particular circumstances but which would give the government a lot of regulatory power, than to design legislation for particular cases. It should go against the grain of any member of parliament to accept a bill which, by its very terms, denies us the right to examine the use of public money and the use of public levying power. We are very concerned about that.

The provisions set forth in Bill C-19 may be perfectly all right for Syncrude because of the nature of that company, but this might not apply to other cases, and I think parliament should be at least in a position to be consulted about it. At present that is not the case with respect to this bill. In effect, the government is being given a blank cheque with respect to those other oil companies. That could be an advantage to the oil companies but it can also be a great disadvantage to parliament and to the taxpayers. If we have any job here as members of parliament, it is to watch that kind of matter very closely.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that the job of parliament is basically a watchdog job; that the government creates legislation and comes to parliament to take part in the enactment of it, but that the first and foremost job of parliament is that of a watchdog. I am greatly surprised that some of the watchdogs on the other side are not equally concerned.

An hon. Member: They are pussy cats.

An hon. Member: They have lost their teeth.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That may be so but I am surprised that it is the case.

My predecessor in the role of House leader of the opposition asked the minister in an aside this afternoon whether he was in an amending mood. The minister said, quite properly of course, that he could not amend the bill on second reading. He is quite right that he cannot do that, but the question was not put to the minister lightly, nor was it with respect to amendments on second reading. The hon. member put his question with respect to amending the bill in committee.

I think it is proper that I lay out the matters that concern us with respect to this bill. We are very concerned about the clause with the notation in the margin "deemed importation" whereby, for the purposes of administering this statute, the product of the work of certain companies, the output from certain private organizations, can, by the stroke of a pen, be deemed to be importation and have the advantages set forth in the bill. We intend to address ourselves to that provision in committee.

The other aspect which concerns us regards the special subsidy for hardship cases. We are not suggesting that there will not be hardship cases, but we are concerned about giving the government a blank cheque in that regard. Frankly, we do not want this kind of power in the hands of the government forever. When there is a difficulty which must be faced by any industry in Canada, the statutes should not be so broad as to allow the government to step in at any time and expend public funds without first coming to parliament. That is why we are here. If we do not believe we have the right to review this kind of expenditure—and this could be a massive expenditure—then I assume we should not be here. We intend to bring forth amendments at the committee stage so that this power, which the government clutches to its breast in this piece of legislation, is not granted to it forever.

We are also concerned about the length of time that this measure will be in existence. The life of this legislation can go on forever and ever until the government decides it is time to come to parliament and repeal it. In the whole period of time that I have been here the only bill I have heard repealed in the House is one dealing with the Halifax disaster. Governments do not repeal bills because they do not wish to denude themselves of power. We hope to advance during the committee stage an amendment in the form of the bill which will permit the House to determine, by way of an affirmative resolution, whether within a reasonable period of time this bill and its powers should continue in existence.

The answer to that might be that we will be taking up all our time debating these affirmative resolutions in the House. I want to say to the minister that it is not our intention to do that. If the government were to agree to this limitation in time, I would be prepared to advance the proposition that the affirmative resolution be dealt with without debate, and that would end the matter there. I do not think it is appropriate that the government should garner this power to use public funds forever on such a broad scale without this parliament having an opportunity to step in at some stage and have the government come to the House to justify why it should continue to have such powers. It is a very simple matter, and on the terms and conditions I have mentioned I think ought not to offend the government if it cares about the operation of this parliament.

I rise only to lay out in this general way, the conditions that will apply. We do not regard the matter of second reading as of too great importance in this case. In fact, it is not our intention to stand in the way of the bill going to committee, but rather to help propel it to committee, where we hope the government will accept and see the reasoning behind our amendments. That, of course, is without prejudice to the position we may take after the committee has dealt with our proposals. If it deals with them in the way that I hope the minister will recommend, then the government may find us in an unusual position, with respect to what I have said, on third reading. I do not want the minister to think that because we hurry the bill to committee we will necessarily support it on third reading. We will look at the bill when it is reported from committee, we will consider the attitude of the government in committee and then make our decision on third reading.

I want the minister to know that we take exception to the may I say lazy draftsmanship of the bill or the easy route approach that has been taken. This is repugnant to the parliamentary process and it is time it came to an end.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I decided to participate after listening to the response of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to the speech of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). It seems to me that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton needs a lesson in the rudimentary principles of private enterprise and capitalism. For the moment he will have to take that lesson from a socialist.

It has always been my understanding of sound business principles and of private enterprise and capitalism that whoever puts up all the money owns all of the project, and whoever puts up the majority of the money owns the majority of the project. I could hardly believe my ears when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said that it was all right for this project we are dealing with to remain what he called a partnership; the public partners put up most of the money and the private partners have the majority ownership. I am sure his business friends would be horrified if he asked them to participate in that kind of deal. Perhaps I should find some investors and set up a plant to manufacture bologna slices and ask the hon. member to put up 70 per cent of the money and take only 30 percent of the ownership. I wonder if he would agree to that.

The Conservative party should be reminded that the Syncrude project is just another CPR; we are going to pay for it twice and still not own it. I read the debates of the 1880s in Hansard when the then Conservative government proposed putting up most of the money for the CPR. The Liberal opposition wanted to know why, if the government put up most of the money, they did not own it. When their leader was reminded that this would amount to public ownership he was horrified and, of course, when the Liberals took office they kept the deal going. The same thing is happening now. Twenty or thirty years from now our children and grandchildren will say the same things about Syncrude as have been said for almost 100 years about the CPR.

The government should blush when putting a proposition like this before us. And if the official opposition would only stick to the principles that I know they have, the bill would read differently. It would be bad enough if the government agreed to a limit on the world price to be received by Syncrude. Even if it were today's world price and nothing more, the company would still be laughing all the way to the bank and would end up owning the plant that we are paying for. That would be difficult enough to swallow but what they are offered is the world price on into the 1980s and 1990s. Mr. Speaker, how many times are the taxpayers to pay for a project they do not own? They do not even have a majority interest although they put up the majority of the money.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Many Liberal backbenchers have argued with me on occasion on the subject of sound business practices. I would be delighted to hear them object to this unsound business practice of a majority of public money going into an operation in which the public will have minority ownership. No self-respecting businessman would have anything to do with such a proposition.

How can a private enterprise government and a private enterprise official opposition who advocate sound business practices accept and perpetuate the nonsense offered in this bill? When I tell the Regina Chamber of Commerce about this they will be horrified. I do not understand how my colleagues in the official opposition and the Liberal backbenchers can hold still for this.

This is an economic tragedy, Mr. Speaker, and it will perpetrate social tragedy. It is a tragic example of "sell-out." It is a betrayal of new nationhood and sovereignty. I am a strong nationalist—not the old nineteenth century kind of nationalist—but by the gods of war, if we cannot control and run the development of our natural resources, particularly energy, I say we show weakness and cowardice. The government allowed itself to be held up to economic blackmail because of the threatened withdrawal or cancellation of the Syncrude project. There was a panic meeting in a motel room in Winnipeg when they gave away the store. What kind of Canadian nationalism is that? That is betrayal and leaves me ashamed and insulted. It is embarrassing for all of us but the minister and his colleagues. It would be nice to be a little mouse in the boardrooms of Imperial Oil, Gulf Oil and City Services and to be present during their cocktail hour to see them chuckle and rub their hands in glee at this marvellous return on investment they are receiving at the expense of the Canadian public as well as the concessions that they will receive through taxes and other benefits for years to come.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a real private enterprise deal for them, but it is not for us, and it is not for Canada. However, this government did not have the guts or the backbone to stand up and tell a few corporations: "Look, you either do the job or get the hell out of the way and we will do it ourselves." We can still tell them that, so that not only the government but the rest of us will be able to hold up our heads as Canadians with some measure of pride and say that we are developing and running our own resources for Canada first.

This kind of national betrayal which has occurred throughout the history of our country commenced with the CPR and now they are foisting on us another CPR. When I look at the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) I am reminded of the photograph of R. B. Bennett that Bob Edwards carried in the Calgary Eye Opener. Underneath the heading was "Another CPR Wreck". That is what we have in this legislation with the Syncrude project. I say to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and also to my hon. friend for Grenville-Carleton that you cannot stand up, support private enterprise, sound business practice and principles, and then support an operation whereby we, the public, put up the majority of the money and have a minority of the ownership and a minority of the say, if any say at all. Surely we should have some backbone to put a stop to those kinds of supine and weak-kneed activities by a government which should know better, and does know better. It should be made to act better. This is an opportunity for all of us to do something constructive on behalf of our fellow Canadians, rather than ignore the weakness of some cabinet ministers who are carrying out an effort that will cause all of us to rue the day and pay the bill many times over.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise only for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to indicate what may happen in a moment or two.

First of all, I should like to thank my hon. friend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for quoting those words he attributed to me concerning the fact that it is our role here to act as watchdogs. We find in this party that we have to be watchdogs with our eyes not only on the government of the day but on the members of the official opposition. They are just as ready to give away to private enterprise the people's heritage as are those who are on the government side right now. Watchdogs we are, looking both ways.

As my colleagues the hon. members for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) have indicated, we are opposed to this bill. I wish to say that in a moment or two, if the debate is over, we intend to ask for a recorded vote. In that connection I might point out that there was an agreement yesterday among the House leaders that if any votes were called for today they would be deferred until next week at a time or times to be settled by consultation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Accordingly the vote stands deferred until next week.

Petroleum Statistics

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR COLLECTION OF CERTAIN STATISTICS RELATING TO PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-12, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of certain petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased this afternoon to introduce for second reading a second bill, being a companion bill to the bill that has just finished its second reading debate and which will be voted upon next week.

Bill C-12, the petroleum corporations monitoring bill, concerns the vital matter of energy self-reliance. As I have indicated, it too is concerned with the increasing of Canadian supplies of hydrocarbon energy. As the title suggests, the purpose of the bill is the monitoring of the expenditures made by petroleum companies to search for and develop new energy supplies, which is a vital factor in our policy of achieving self-reliance.

From time to time members opposite, members from my side and the public generally are asking whether the oil companies are reinvesting their revenues so as to increase our own supplies of hydrocarbons and related energies in this country. If so, to what extent and how? The aim of this bill is to obtain the relevant data necessary to assure Canadian consumers, who must pay increasingly higher prices for petroleum products, that an appropriate proportion of the increased cash flow accruing to the Canadian petroleum industry is being reinvested in domestic energy related projects. This bill provides for a standard method of reporting of relevant capital expenditures and cash flow items by all petroleum companies in Canada which have gross revenues exceeding $10 million or total assets in Canada exceeding $5 million. It provides specific penalties for non-compliance or falsification of data.

Over the past three years there has been a great deal of discussion and debate about the energy crisis following the first round of crude price increases initiated by OPEC. In the winter of 1973-1974, for some countries, because of the embargo imposed by OPEC, the energy crisis was more than a crisis of price, it was a crisis of supply. It has been well documented that those countries, finding themselves in a position of near absolute dependence on this international cartel for petroleum supply, found themselves most vulnerable.

That supply crisis was underscored this past winter in the northeastern parts of the United States. Because of severe weather conditions and possible misjudgment by certain gas utilities, many cities in that region found it necessary to close schools and shut down industries in order that sufficient fuel could be allocated for the heating of private homes and hospitals particularly. The cost of this shortage in economic terms was enormous and served as a warning to both Americans and Canadians that any significant interruption in energy supply is potentially catastrophic. Many Canadians were made all too aware of that catastrophic event because they were thrown out of work. Many of the parts manufacturers in the United States for the automobile industry are located in Ohio. Those plants had to shut down for the reasons I have mentioned. Energy supplies were feeding Canadian manufacturing plants and assembly plants just as they were feeding American plants; therefore, Canadians suffered also. The energy crisis was brought home, albeit in a very discriminatory way, to Canadians as well.

The question of more secure supplies in the future and the need to reduce our independence on foreign imports, as I said earlier this afternoon, which is related to moving our prices up both for reasons of conservation and new supply, needs to be examined against those cash flows which are being generated by the higher prices. This nation too is dangerously vulnerable to any interruption of energy supply, particularly of oil supply, in the future.

Major steps have been taken in order to achieve this goal of self-reliance. There was discussion this morning that self-reliance was not a particular objective which the lead-off Tory spokesman would like. I remind him that self-reliance is a much larger concept than the narrow one he has chosen. He has chosen to pin his faith on a very narrow concept.

The hon. member talked about self-sufficiency. It sounds great. However, when you look closely you see it implies all sorts of things such as supplies at any cost regardless of where they come from. I suggest to him that self-reliance is far more sensible and a far more effective objective of Canadian energy policy because it has a flexibility built into it. It recognizes that if we can get supplies from other sources and get them at a lower price than we can develop them in Canada, then we should take advantage of that option. His particular articulation of self-sufficiency would clearly rule that out.

If you push the hon. member's theme on self-sufficiency to its logical conclusions, you could not take advantage of cheap electrical power from the United States during the winter season. It would deprive a large proportion of Canadians of the advantage of cheap electrical power during the winter season in the same way that it would deprive the American consumer of power from Canada during the summer season when they have their peak load. I suggest the hon. member re-examine this from the narrow view that he has with regard to the objectives of the energy policy in this country.

To return to the goal of energy self-reliance, it is to allow for domestic petroleum and natural gas prices. One aspect of our policy to achieve the goal of self-reliance is to gradually rise toward international levels, to promote conservation, and also to provide the necessary financial resources required to develop an adequate supply base. That clearly is based upon the present fiscal system which is aimed at making a large flow of internally generated funds available to oil companies so that they can be invested in the search for and development of domestic energy sources.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

In order to assure the accurate and useful measurements needed to assess the performance of this policy in stimulating increased exploration, a carefully designed cash flow monitoring program as stipulated in this bill is essential. The bill provides for a standard method of reporting for those petroleum companies to be surveyed on a semi-annual basis. A monitoring questionnaire, which reconciles our need for detailed information with our desire to minimize the administrative burden on the respondents, has been designed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in consultation with industry members. Much of the information required in this questionnaire is available from no other source.

While the information obtained will, as a rule, be treated strictly confidentially, it will be the prerogative of the minister to disclose any or all of the individual company data in the House of Commons or elsewhere if, in his opinion, such disclosure is in the national interest. The moral value of the minister's powers to expose companies which do not use their financial resources provided by the Canadian consumer in the search for new energy must not be overlooked. An exception will be made where such disclosure will, in the opinion of the minister, impair the competitive position of a company. The minister will give every opportunity for a company to make representations as to the effect any disclosure might have on its competitive position before the final decision on this subject is made by him.

Certain penalties for non-compliance are prescribed within the bill and there is provision for selected spot audits of company records to be made at the discretion of those administering the bill. Officials conducting the monitoring survey will not disclose individual company data to any person other than the minister. The bill is an integral part of what we believe will prove to be a far-sighted energy policy that results in maximum net benefit not only to present but future generations of Canadians.

The cash flows accruing to the industry as a result of the increasing prices will doubtless continue to come under attack by many energy critics. It is understandable that, as allowed semi-annual price increases become reflected in pump prices, the Canadian consumer will perhaps become more concerned that the additional sacrifice he is asked to make should be a positive contribution in securing energy supplies for our economy, and rightly so. We believe that the readjustment entailed by the rising prices is inevitable for our society, and while it is important to minimize the disruptive effect of large price increases, through a gradual phasing-in program, the problem of future shortages in domestic energy supplies should be faced now.

The United States of America recognizes the potential havoc which any interruption of crude imports would have and is presently developing strategic petroleum storage reservoirs which will be filled largely with imported oil.

The strategic reserves of Canada can be developed at home. I refer in large measure to the tar sands and the heavy oils. The vast deposits of crude oil locked up in the tar sands, the heavy oil deposits of our western provinces and the untapped potential resources of our frontier areas can supply this nation with the security of supply which Canadians in future years will require. However, that is going to require very substantial investment.

We believe that investment should be made by the private sector. We also believe that while the private sector has shown every inclination to re-invest those funds, it is essential in the public interest that parliament and the Canadian people have the legislative right to examine how those cash flows are being spent and whether they are being spent to the advantage of Canadians. It is the purpose of this bill to ensure that such surveillance can be carried out to the satisfaction of the Canadian public.

● (1552)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall naturally begin my remarks by straightening out the minister, if I can, as to the importance of terminology and as to the importance of understanding why self-sufficiency is an important policy objective. Based on the figures he gave this morning, by the year 1990, or perhaps earlier, we shall, given a continuation of the present policy, be facing a fuel bill with the Arab countries and Venezuela of $6.5 billion at today's prices. We shall have to generate this amount by means which are not obvious at this point in time because we are already running tremendous trade deficits in the manufacturing sector.

Since this $6.5 billion is being used to pay for consumer imports, the expenditure represents a direct loss to the Canadian economy, one which can be translated into lost jobs and so on. What will happen to the value of our dollar when the nation is subjected to a continued drain of that nature? It might well drop to 85 cents or to 80 cents. What will be the effect on the cost of living of the increased price of the goods we are obliged to import?

Canada has the geological potential to be self-sufficient, to be independent of the political intricacies of the Middle East oil trade. Since we are not obliged to pay out these large sums of money, every opportunity for self-sufficiency should be seized and pursued. The minister has suggested we would be opposed to importing cheap oil from secure sources. That is an absurd statement. But would the hon. gentleman like to tell us where we can find cheap oil from secure sources today?

Mr. Gillespie: Do you disagree with swap arrangements?

Mr. Andre: Not at all, if the minister is talking about trade back and forth.

Mr. Gillespie: That is self-reliance.

Mr. Andre: That is producing as much as we consume and it means a change in priorities. In my opinion the attitude of the government has not changed since 1973, when the first energy policy was produced. It still holds the view that the prime function of the oil and gas producers is to be a source of revenue for the federal treasury. An examination of policy statements, an examination of the motivation behind this bill, leave one with the impression that the role of government is considered to be that of taking as much of the pie as possible. Of course, to change the metaphor, they do not want to kill the goose altogether, but their attitude remains unchanged: it is to take as much of the pie as possible. A government which views the issue in this way is guilty of distorted perception, because the first priority is to achieve self-sufficiency—to produce as much as we consume. We are, of course, dealing here with the total package, not just with oil and gas.

This is not the type of bill we welcome with great enthusiasm but it is not one which invites very much opposition either, so we shall not hinder its passage. Nevertheless, there are aspects which cause concern. To begin with, I question the motives for bringing it forward in the first place since the information which the government now seeks to compel companies to provide is already being given voluntarily. This has been the case for five or six years. Why bring out the whip when, all this time, the carrot has proven to be effective? Why these compulsory tactics?

Then again, the clause which would permit the minister to disclose confidential information when he deemed it to be in the public interest is abhorrent on philosophical grounds. Is the next step to be the disclosure by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) of confidential information supplied by taxpayers on the ground that it would be in the public interest to do so? Corporations are not anonymous bodies despite the inclination to regard them as such. There are people involved—employers, workers, shareholders. If the minister were to use the blackmailing capability provided by the clause to which I have referred, it might be a comfort to him to think he was using it only against corporations, but he would be using it against people, the people who own and manage and work for these companies. As I say, the clause is abhorrent.

Another clause which I find abhorrent is that which would allow officials to burst in and seize records should the minister believe there was reason to do so. We know what happens when officials are armed with powers of this sort; I hardly need to explain why provisions of this kind should be opposed.

In our opinion, this bill is another candidate for a "sunset clause". We see no reason why this legislation should still be on the books 50, 60 or 100 years from now after we have used up all our petroleum and are relying on solar power or nuclear fission. We do not like the idea of some official sitting in a back room compiling forms and having them filled out simply because that is what the law says. Let us limit the life of the bill to five or six years; if the government thinks its operation should be extended it could be done at that time. I have no doubt parliament would agree to consider whether it should be extended or not.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that it is four o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the parliamentary secretary whether we shall be proceeding to finish this bill on Monday, and, if that is the case, what order of business we shall be following thereafter.

● (1602)

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we will follow the order of the bills indicated yesterday in the House by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), but I must specify that, barring unforeseen circumstances, we will resume study of the bill first thing on Monday.

PRIVATE MEMBERS PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will interrupt the proceedings for only a moment. There has been consultation on this matter.

A group of private members' bills were discharged and their subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The motion referring these bills was moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) prior to the Christmas recess. A bill was omitted from that grouping, and it is my purpose to attempt to have that bill included. If the House will give its unanimous consent, I wish to have Bill C-239, in the name of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), discharged and its subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) (for Mr. Whiteway) moved:

That Bill C-239 be withdrawn, the order discharged, and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered. I am advised that there is unanimous consent to stand orders Nos. 2, 4, 8, 9, 10, 13 and 16. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

SENIOR CITIZENS COMMISSION ACT

STUDY AND IDENTIFICATION OF NEEDS OF SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury) moved that Bill C-218, respecting senior citizens, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, senior citizens of Canada, working in far more difficult times than we have experienced, have created for us a better way of life than they themselves enjoyed. For many senior citizens living in their golden years the sands of time are running swiftly. The opportunity for us to recognize their contribution to our society is limited in time, and every day we wait this opportunity decreases dramatically. That is why I have introduced this bill.

I suggest that there is a need for a commission as a full-time job to identify the needs of senior citizens. These needs are very visible and large in number. I would like to mention a few of them.

The first problem that comes to mind is that of poverty. Many senior citizens grew up in the hungry thirties when pension plans were few and old age security was difficult to buy. Pension plans that were available did not envisage today's high prices and dramatic increases in the cost of living. Large numbers of our senior citizens are living below the poverty line, and the sole source of income for many of them is the old age pension and supplement. Their meagre incomes are ravaged by inflation. The cost of living, particularly food, clothing, shelter, energy and heat costs, have risen very rapidly, causing economic hardship and mental anguish. These costs increase faster than the increase in the old age pension and supplement. For workers who are being retired earlier than age 65 the present old age pension system offers no assistance, and these early retired workers suffer an unfair hardship.

How do we define poverty? There are four poverty lines defined by three independent organizations. They each provide unofficial measures which are useful in assessing poverty by income level. The Economic Council of Canada in its fifth report used the Statistics Canada approach to measuring poverty: a family is poor if it spends 70 per cent or more of its income on food, clothing and shelter. The Special Senate Committee on Poverty judged that this criterion was not satisfactory as a permanent yardstick of poverty.

In 1973 Statistics Canada revised its poverty line. It decided that family is poor if it spends 62 per cent or more of its income on basic essentials.

The Senate committee formula and that used by the Canadian Council on Social Development put poverty levels at 50 per cent of average Canadian family income with varying adjustments for inflation, taxes and gross national product.

There is no official poverty line; at best, any measure will be faulty. Last March Senator David Croll, Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, put on record the 1976 poverty line using the four bases.

In the year 2031 there will be 8 million elderly Canadians. Those people are alive now. Some 2 million Canadians today are old age pensioners. In eight years' time that figure will rise to 3 million. Some two thirds of them, according to a recent Global Television feature program, are living below the poverty line. In its July, 1976 paper on the changing age structure the Science Council notes at page 3 the following:

> The most glaring fact in regard to the distribution of income by age, and one which promises to be perpetuated in the future, is the relative poverty of the aged, compared with other age cohorts—
> In 1974, 26 per cent of old age pensioners received the full GIS and 32 per cent received a partial supplement. Thus over one half of Canada's elderly needed supplementary income to bring them at least to the poverty line.
> It is true that the apparent poverty of the aged is somewhat mitigated by the fact that many of the elderly own outright such assets as a home or car. However, these tend to be of older vintage and thus have a greater likelihood of incurring maintenance costs. In inflationary times, the burden of escalating repair costs and taxes can be nearly intolerable to a person on a small fixed income (i.e., pension).

The aged are our poorest population group, women being the worst off. Kevin Collins, senior economist for the Canadian Congress of Labour, says of his recent study for the Canadian Council on Social Development that, and I quote:

> If you look at all the different population groups, like young people, single parents, the elderly, it's the elderly who are the poorest. But among the elderly, it's the women who are the poorest of the poorest.

Mr. Collins said that in an interview published in the Globe and Mail on January 13, 1978 at page 12. Mr. Collins was the program director of income securities at the council. His year-long study on women and pensions was his last council project. Rather than recommending pension reforms that relate exclusively to women, the study calls for changes in the private and public pension plan systems and slams the federal government for its old age security and guaranteed income supplement benefits program. Mr. Collins said of this program:

> It guarantees a level of income for the elderly that is inadequate. It's below any realistic poverty line. In other words, it guarantees poverty.

One of the study's many recommendations calls for the combined income guarantee for the elderly to be substantially increased to meet 1977 poverty lines, which the Canadian Council on Social Development has estimated at $4,400 a year for a single person, and $7,300 for a couple.

Statistics Canada's booklet "Income Distribution by Size in Canada", published in October, 1977, reports that in 1976 31 per cent of single persons over 65 and of families headed by persons of that age, taken together, earned less than $4,000; half of them received less than $3,000 yearly. About 62 per cent of individuals aged 65 or more earned less than $4,000; 42 per cent earned less than $3,000.

If we agree that this is a legitimate problem of senior citizens, what do we do about it? I personally feel for one thing that the old age security pension should be increased to $200 per month immediately and that the guaranteed income supplement should be increased proportionately. I feel too that old age security should be made available to persons 60 years of age and over who are retired and that the supplement be paid to those who otherwise qualify at that age.

The cost of living index should be amended to fully reflect the increase in the cost of living to senior citizens. The basic requirements of senior citizens pretty well gobble up their slender incomes and it is these basic requirements, food, heat, light, shelter and clothing, that should be used as the criterion for indexing the old age pension and supplement. I am suggesting that the increase in these staple items should be averaged and form the multiplier for indexing the old age pension and supplement.

I feel too that the spouse's allowance should be continued for any spouse aged 60 and over who is widowed. The spouse of a public service pensioner gets one-half of the pension when the pensioner dies, but the fixed costs of living, including real property, tax, heat, light, repairs, telephone, all continue unabated. This is a cruel and merciless provision that should be rectified.

It is a blot on the conscience of this nation that our disabled war veterans did not receive the full increase in their pensions related to parity with the control group of five categories of public servants, instead of the increase being related to the much lower consumer price index. I sincerely hope this tragic error in judgment will be rectified.

The world of the senior citizen is sometimes much smaller and shrinks much faster in terms of friends and acquaintances that it does with younger people who are more active and make their way in the world.

Barbara Reynolds, in a paper entitled "Problems of Aging", produced by our own research library, May 3, 1974, reports that only about 5 per cent of those aged 65 or more need to live in institutions and that most elderly persons are reasonably healthy. Hence feebleness, sickness and other mental or physical handicaps are not the dominant obstacle to the good life for most elderly poor folk. Their critical need is for a chance to better themselves.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty commented that Canada has spent billions on income security and welfare programs to little purpose. They have "only made the lives of the poor a little less desperate". The committee's report continues:

> While the poor lack many things, their most fundamental lack is one of opportunity—of the liberty to exercise meaningful choice in our economy and our society. If they had that liberty, in ampler measure than today, they, or at any rate their children, would perform the greater part of the job of lifting themselves out of poverty.
> In short, we cannot expect major accomplishments unless we guarantee the necessary preconditions of sufficiency and opportunity.
> In each generation there are some poor people who are able to escape from poverty against all the odds and obstacles. But for most, it is simply impossible to control their economic destinies.
> It will continue to be impossible unless we find the means to increase their choice, to expand their liberty . . . and to convince them that they were not born to the "small loaf".

It seems to me, with high vacancy rates in our air carrier and land transportation systems, that senior citizens should be encouraged to do some travelling to visit friends, relatives and see our great country, and that when they travel in Canada they should enjoy a 50 per cent reduction in fares.

Another basic need of senior citizens is accommodation, but there surely can be no substitute for senior citizens remaining in their own homes as long as they wish and are physically able to do so. Competent but poor old folk often end up in nursing homes because they cannot pay for low-care or no-care housing. In 1976 in Ontario, according to provincial health minister Frank Miller, there were 35,000 persons in homes for the aged who should not have been there.

In earlier times they might well have been with younger members of their family, looking after grandchildren with a room of their own in the bigger homes of those days. But today the families are smaller, houses have shrunk and costs have climbed. The system tends to discard older persons.

Even elderly people living in their own houses are forced to sell because they cannot keep up the property taxes. They get a good price in inflated dollars for the family house but, in Ottawa, many have to pay more than $600 monthly for board and a shared room in an old folks' home subsidized by the province. It is a "no-win" situation especially for a childless person who has paid school taxes for decades and now is forced out by taxes.

It may be hard for older persons to keep a house; even harder to buy one if they need financing. Banks and trust companies generally do not issue mortgages on properties if the sum of the applicant's age and the term of the loan exceeds 80.

City planners and developers appear to favour destroying whatever has lost the glitter of newness. They raze the old to make way for sterile, costly apartments renting at prices beyond the reach of the elderly. Governments too seem mesmerized by the passion to plant huge office buildings in city cores, whether or not there is a valid demand for offices. Kicking out the poor and old on the pretext of upgrading an area is more fashionable than renewing accommodation so that the elderly may stay in districts they know and love among friends of a lifetime.

I suggest strongly one need that can be identified is the need to meet expenses and be financially able to continue living in one's own home on a slender retirement allowance. Personally I think this type of living should be encouraged and, if necessary, financial assistance should be given to senior citizens to enable them to do this. One goal of our nation should be to see that our senior citizens receive at least the average of the minimum wages established across the country.

For disabled senior citizens who require nursing home care, existing facilities are not sufficient to meet the demand. The financial technique presently used to build these facilities is to borrow money from CMHC, obtain federal grants where they are available and construct the facility. About 80 per cent of the cost of operating these facilities in New Brunswick is paid for by the provincial government through social assistance programs. In making these operating payments the provincial government in effect repays the CMHC mortgage to a great extent.

The federal government has not come to grips with this problem to the financial degree it should, and I would think the great need for facilities like this would attract the early attention of the commission that I propose be set up by this bill. I can indicate that in my own riding, areas such as Stanley, Millville, Nackawic, Oromocto and Fredericton come quickly to mind. There are many others as well. I would like to see greater use made along these lines of the Victoria Health Centre in Fredericton. Wherever possible senior citizens should be located in or near their own communities.

One project that appeared in the Canada Works program in my constituency and which I should like to share with the House is one involving a one-on-one service by volunteers for senior citizens. The volunteer under this program would be available to assist a senior citizen, who perhaps is unable to get out of his or her home, with such things as grocery shopping or shovelling out a front walk on a bad winter day. This type of service I find extremely useful and is appreciated by senior citizens.

Mr. A. Allentuck in "The Cost of Age", Toronto, Fitzhenry & Whitside, 1977, prescribes single-issue politics as a powerful weapon in the hands of the elderly of the future. "More for the elderly now" might be their motif. Their platform contains the following elements:

● (1622)

1. No compulsory retirement.

2. Private pensions openly managed and properly insured against mismanagement and fraud.

3. Public pensions, principally the Guaranteed Income Supplement, increased to levels adequate to support lives that are comfortable and secure.

4. Relief from real estate taxes.

5. Construction of more and better nursing homes.

6. Reduction of the cost of eyeglasses, hearing aids and other prosthetic devices either by subsidy or government intervention into the respective industries.

In the same book Mr. Allentuck suggests the following:

1. Patients shall be treated, dressed, clothed, housed and cared for in a manner befitting their stature as adults.

2. Patients may refuse medical treatments and medication to the extent permitted by law.

3. Patients shall not be compelled to participate in any experiments of any nature.

4. Patients shall be given explanations of their conditions, care and treatment, and such explanations shall be phrased in terms comprehensible to them.

5. Patients shall not be restricted to their beds or to their institutions unless their medical conditions so warrant.

6. If patients or their families make supplemental contributions to their institutions as entrance contract payments, such payments shall be refunded if they withdraw in protest against service rendered.

7. The patient's religious and cultural preferences shall be respected.

Mr. Reuben Baetz, when executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, had the following to say about the elderly:

Retired persons must themselves be engaged in the planning and implementation of programs, services, recreation, education, from which they are to derive benefit. Why can't the aged be more involved in the operation of homes for the aged? The revolution against paternalism is now well advanced on the university campus. The students are no longer ready to have handed down to them an education which the university fathers feel is best for them. They insist on being involved . . . . It is therefore high time that the aged assert clearly and forthrightly that they too want to be masters of their own destiny. They should make it perfectly clear that they too have human rights which must be protected and enhanced, and that these rights are more than a pension sufficient to keep body and soul together. They include the right to dignity and self-respect. In many cases, to protect these rights, they must have the opportunity to continue to make meaningful contributions to society. The decision as to when, how, and how long an individual should continue to participate in the mainstream of society must be made by that individual, and not by some computer clock which "rings down the curtain" at age 65.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill because I am so well aware of how terribly difficult it is for most senior citizens to live on what is provided for them now. It is difficult especially for them at a time when there is an increase in the cost of living on a year to year basis of 9.5 per cent. They despair when they see the cost of living increase to some 11.5 per cent, which is what happened during the last three months.

The basic amount of old age security is presently up to a little over $150 per month, and there is a $105 per month guaranteed income supplement for those who have nothing to live on. Therefore, $150 a month is paid to everyone 65 years of age or over, and $255 is paid to those who have the supplement. During these times of very high cost of living, the least one could hope for is an increase in the basic amount of old age security from $200 a month during this year, with a goal of $250 or $300 by 1980.

The guaranteed income supplement should be raised also this year to at least $130 a month, with a goal of $175 by 1982. This would be no great fiscal or financial burden on the nation, since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has indicated that the growth in real terms this year will be 5 per cent. These figures would be the minimum amount of rough justice the younger citizens of Canada owe to older people who are no longer in the labour force. Just as young union employees are often hesitant to vote for increases in the pension plan under the collective bargaining process and prefer immediate wages, we find creeping into our social thinking the notion that the nation is doing about as well as it can for those citizens who built this country during extremely trying times and suffered greatly during the depression and wars.

There are a great number of senior citizens, some of whom are veterans of World War I and others veterans of World War II. On June 28, 1973 royal assent was given to Bill C-202, which provided for an increase in the basic war disability pension to an amount equivalent to the composite of five public service categories. At that time it was felt that the Department of Veterans Affairs finally had arrived at an equitable basic rate of pension. A recent announcement by that department indicated an increase of 7.2 per cent. That fails to fulfil the spirit of the legislation passed in June of 1973, because the government did not repeal section 58.1 and 58.2 of the Pension Act. Bill C-202 increased the basic rate for veterans in an amount which was equal to the average wages of the composite group I have referred to. However, the provision remained in the Pension Act for increases in the years following the approval of Bill C-202 to be based only on the Consumer Price Index.

In comparing the basic rate of pension of a war disability pensioner, who is totally disabled, with the average wages for the composite group of five in the Public Service of Canada, there is a differential of approximately $600 to $700 on a yearly basis in favour of public servants. The government should take steps this year to close this differential, if it has any sense of gratitude for the veterans. Whether the government uses this during a political campaign or not is of little importance; the fairness and the spirit of the June 1973 legislation should be adhered to by the government.

A few weeks ago I was surprised to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) say, in reply to a question before the House, that the spouse's allowance providing for a payment to either a man or woman between the ages of 60 and 65 would apply only to a spouse who is married to, or living with, an older pensioner and would not be changed to include single people, whether widowed or unmarried. This is completely ridiculous when one considers that the total cost of including these categories would be approximately $4 million a year.

Recently in my constituency office a spinster, who was 62 years of age, said: "If I lived in a common law marriage with someone, I could get this allowance". People feel incensed about this kind of discrimination with regard to the present spouse's allowances. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), in answering the question, said that one of the reasons for her refusal to include these people would be national pressure to reduce to 60 the age at which old age security benefits are granted, and she said that the government could not afford that. This is a lame excuse for not including the above categories of people who are now being discriminated against.

Like Sweden, Canada should have a national study which would embrace the notion that people should be allowed to retire at various pension levels between the ages of 60 and 70, if not 75. Many senior citizens in Canada, including women who are heads of households, are suffering badly under our national and provincial assistance system. The low income groups in this country, such as, for example, the bottom 20 per cent of our income earners, receive only 4.4 per cent of our national pie, called the GNP, while the top 20 per cent skim some 40 per cent off that pie. That should concern us as parliamentarians and we should determine to really do something about it. I do not care if it is done in an election year or at another time. There is a great need for us as Canadians to provide a sufficient income for senior citizens who have done so much for this nation. Let us as parliamentarians accept the responsibility for bringing in needed reforms, not next year or the following year, but now, in 1978.

Mr. Wm. Andres (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-218 which was introduced by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie). Like him, I too have great concern about the needs of the senior citizens, but in reading Bill C-218, one wonders what the proposed senior citizens' commission could be expected to accomplish. The bill states that the commission is to study and identify the needs of senior citizens and make recommendations concerning these needs to the governor in council.

The establishment of a commission such as that proposed in the bill would more appropriately be a matter for action by the provinces. Indeed, some provincial governments have appointed bodies to identify the needs of older people, make recommendations on how these needs can be met, serve in an advisory capacity in the establishment of programs and services to meet the needs, identify gaps in information and services, promote research, and, in some cases, carry out research. Called by any one of several names, such as senior citizens commission, advisory council, or provincial senior citizens council, these bodies are appointed by government and responsible to a provincial minister of the Crown.

Several provinces have bodies operating under voluntary auspices either as independent councils on aging or as divisions of provincial social planning councils. In some urban centres, similar structures have been organized locally. In addition, some provinces have an office, bureau or division on aging, usually located in the department of social services. All these bodies are engaged in identifying the needs of older people and in establishing, in co-operation with other bodies, services for them.

Such developments are not surprising when the needs of older people are considered, namely, economic needs, physical and mental health, nutrition, living arrangements, transportation, leisure activities, education, employment, retirement and spiritual wellbeing. The federal government's responsibility in the economic sphere is fully recognized. Furthermore, federal financial participation with the provinces in the development of health and social services as well as the construction of housing and institutional care facilities has been in effect for many years. But the fact is that health and social services, housing, institutional care facilities, education and so on, are all under provincial jurisdiction.

There are those who argue that if older people were provided with enough money, they could look after their own needs. We have heard some of that rhetoric this afternoon. This is a fallacious argument. It assumes that the services needed are available, that they are accessible, and that whatever their cost old people could afford to pay for them regardless of the quantity required or the length of time the services are needed. The recognition of the lack of supportive services to help elderly persons to live independently in their own community, despite socioeconomic and physical problems, was the motive behind the federal government's initiative in introducing the social services act in Bill C-57 during the second session of the thirtieth parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What happened to it?

Mr. Andres: The announcement by the province of Quebec of its opposition to the cost sharing arrangements between the federal and provincial governments, and the lack of enthusiasm of a number of other provinces including Ontario, resulted in the bill's withdrawal. Admittedly, there was no guarantee under the proposed social services act that the provincial governments would include or extend services, but the federal government had opened the door for the development, with federal participation, of services as wide ranging as those of homemaker or home help, handyman or handywoman, preparation of meals, laundry, counselling services, day care for adults, special transportation, volunteer visiting and information and referral.

The problems of the aged and aging are as diverse as those which afflict all of society. We know, however, that the aged of the 1970s are very different from those of the 1950s and 1960s. Those of the 1980s will show even greater differences. It is estimated that about two-thirds of those aged 65 and over have no single identifying characteristic except age—they mingle largely unnoticed in the community. Indeed, the majority of older people can function in the community if society permits and encourages them through the provision of special services. Thus, an integral part of the planning process should be the provision of services and resources which would provide opportunities for senior citizens to participate in the community.

The New Horizons program of the Department of National Health and Welfare was established five years ago to help and encourage retired people to engage in activities of benefit to themselves and other members of their community. The result has been a dramatic increase in the number of community groups established by, and for, retired and elderly persons. Many of these groups have joined provincial and national senior citizens organizations, and these organizations have become extremely effective in speaking on behalf of their members. No one could be more thoroughly familiar than they are with the needs and aspirations of retired and elderly people.

On many occasions these organizations met with the former minister of national health and welfare, the present Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde), to discuss their concerns and to present their recommendations for improving the quality of life for retired Canadians. Many of their proposals have been incorporated in government programs for pensioners, and there is a continuing dialogue between the department and the spokesmen for senior citizens organizations. Ways of making this dialogue even more effective are being considered.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has recently granted funds to one New Horizons project group, composed of very knowledgeable seniors from across Canada, to undertake an independent look at the kinds of structure that might be most effective as a focus for the concerns about aging at the national level. Furthermore, they are presently considering with the provinces the merits of holding a national symposium to examine a range of issues related to this very important subject. So you see, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal is already being done, and I do not believe that the appointment of a senior citizens commission at this time would contribute anything to the measures which are already underway.

The paradox in respect of the older population is the tendency to view success as a problem. It is a particularly frustrating irony that progress in man's search for a longer life should produce the problems of aging. In fact, the very successes in economic, social, medical and industrial progress that now permit such a large number of people to reach old age have also produced the changes that make elderly people a generally dependent group and have robbed them of their most important and traditional functions, roles, and statuses.

Since World War II, scientific and technological advances, with increasing industrialization, have changed both the way people live and the way by which they earn their living. The impact of population growth, urbanization and industrialization on the lives of older people has been heightened by the fact that these changes are occurring rapidly. Coupled with these rapid changes has been a new phenomenon—retirement. For the first time in the history of the world, thousands of persons each year leave the labour force and enter retirement.

It is here that difficulties have arisen. The right of persons to spend their later adult years not tied to the demands and responsibilities of the working world has become accepted, but we have failed to take steps to provide people with systematic preparation for their retirement years. Preparation for adulthood, and particularly for work, is an institutionalized part of the system; preparation for the later adult years is left to the individual and as a result is haphazard and often incomplete. With the end of the work role, the value of the older person's contribution to the family, the church, the neighbourhood, and voluntary associations has been downgraded. Society has developed negative attitudes towards the aged and aging; older people now carry these attitudes, developed earlier in life, into their own retirement with the result that they have negative attitudes about themselves and their peers.

Each of us must develop positive attitudes toward our own aging and old age. It will be necessary to supplant the misconception that many incapacitating illnesses, either physical or mental, are inevitable and irreversible characteristics of the aged. Good health and a clear mind are as much the right of persons over 65 as they are of adolescents, or younger and middle-aged adults.

Overcoming the negative attitude society has concerning the aged and aging is the challenge we face. Like all age groups, older people have problems and we must continue in our efforts to solve them. But we must not allow our efforts to aid the helpless to become synonymous with the whole spectrum of aging. Stress on the negative side of aging has contributed to the stereotypes and myths which have grown around it. Most of us have in some way contributed to the false picture that has been created. Until we come to terms with our own aging and accept it, we will continue to endow the later years with all the misconceptions and untruths that society has built up, particularly over the past 30 to 40-some years—insidious and ultimately disastrous in terms of society's acceptance of its older citizens.

There are older people, many who are frail and not in the best of health, who are demonstrating that chronological age, in itself, is a meaningless measure. They continue to contribute to society, to their families, and to grow as individuals. When we see them, aging takes on a new dimension. Mr. Speaker, we all know such people; indeed some are in this House.

Changes in attitudes cannot be legislated. These will come about only through teaching in the homes, the schools, in the training of professionals who will be working in the community with the aged as well as other age groups. Each of us as individuals has a responsibility in this. Older people themselves have a responsibility. Increasingly they will have to demonstrate that they remain socially responsive and responsible, that they can and do continue to contribute to society, that there are new roles which they are able and willing to assume. We have to help them find these new roles; we have to provide the aged themselves with opportunities to do so.

Leadership is necessary to effect the kinds of developments required to allow older persons their rightful place in society and provide the services they need. Quality service, in the quantity needed, is essential. Effective leadership planning in aging requires real commitment for meeting the concerns and needs of older Canadians. Further, to enable a genuine exercise of leadership necessitates statutory authority, funds, energy and creativity, and status. Obviously it is only within the appropriate jurisdictions where the necessary statutory authority can be granted that authentic power lies.

Anyone familiar with the reports of the president's task force of older Americans of 1968 will know the problems there in respect to this whole matter. As we know, jurisdictional responsibilities are quite different in the United States from those in Canada. Besides some 20 agencies in the federal government in the U.S.A. with statutory responsibility for an extensive variety of programs and services for the aged and aging, there are dozens of additional federal operations that have considerable, if indirect, relevance. Co-ordination is therefore difficult to achieve, as is leadership planning. The result in 1968 was recommendations for new structures—thus adding to those already in place.

The 1970 task force explored the same range of issues as did the one of 1968. By the time of the 1971 White House conference on aging, leadership planning in aging was still more of a goal than a reality—a situation which continues to be of great concern. Various mechanisms, including some proposed mechanisms, have been given a variety of responsibilities for leadership planning in aging, but there have been difficulties in developing effective means to provide the appropriate authority to carry these out.

The president's council on aging serves as one example. Composed of very able members, its mandate limits what it can do in guiding federal efforts in aging. Its work has centred around such matters as determining that certain programs for the aged require more financial support, upon occasion developing a proposal for a demonstration project, and issuing an annual report. Although these reports provide evidence of the concern of the council about the problems of older people in the United States, and of the time and attention devoted to discussion of them, they unfortunately cannot be said to reflect a policy focus for the government's work in aging.

The U.S. federal government agency which receives the most attention from Canadians is the administration on aging. It has gone through many changes; from time to time efforts have been made to strengthen it. Its actual accomplishments have been limited because it has been difficult for it to assume a role of leadership. Its national visibility, prestige and power within government are limited. Its budget is relatively small in comparison with those of other activities of importance to the aging in the U.S.A. Preoccupation has centred around administering its grants-in-aid program to the states, its research and demonstration programs and the like. Staff resources devoted to government-wide activities and issues of over-all federal government policy on aging are not significantly emphasized.

I have a purpose, Mr. Speaker, in making these few brief comments about developments on aging in the U.S. federal government because these are so frequently referred to in Canada. That many departments of government in the U.S.A. have staff devoting time to aging, and that many commissions, task forces and the like are all operating on a continuing basis, is a fact. But recommendations for something else that will be effective are still being made. Some are acted upon, resulting in the emergence of another new structure; those already in place continue and the new creation establishes but another layer. To date we have avoided such proliferation in Canada.

I am not saying that some specific structure charged with responsibility in aging at the federal level should not be established. I am saying that before it is established we should define its role, its goals, and establish the appropriate authority, statutory or otherwise, under which it should operate. It should not duplicate the work on aging presently being done within several departments of government. Presumably it might serve to co-ordinate this work. Certainly it cannot assume, even by implication, the responsibilities which belong to other jurisdictions in Canada.

No one denies that there is much to be done. No one denies the challenge which faces us as such a large segment of our population continues to age. However, I do not believe that a senior citizens commission such as is proposed in Bill C-218 would resolve the tasks which are required to identify the needs of our senior citizens in this country.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate at the outset that I am pleased to support the proposal that has been made by my colleague from York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) which would create a commission. This commission would be unpaid and it would not cost the taxpayer a penny. It would make recommendations and study the problems of senior citizens and suggest to the government what should be done to come to grips with those problems.

An hon. Member: That would embarrass them.

Mr. Beatty: I am disappointed, Mr. Speaker, to learn that the government is in opposition to this proposal. It is a matter, as I have said, which would not cost the government a penny. The time has come to recognize that priority has to be given to the problems of senior citizens in Canada. They should not be forced to wait until election time, when the government will rediscover senior citizens and their problems. Action should be taken now.

In a very few minutes it will be evident whether this bill will go forward or whether the government will talk the legislation out and refuse to allow it to come to a vote. If the government has the courage and the desire to allow this bill to go ahead, two priority items should be dealt with by this commission. The first one is the question for spouse's allowance for widows.

Nothing during the time I have spent here has been more disgraceful or more disconcerting than the treatment accorded to widows in Canada between the ages of 60 and 65 who are heartlessly cut off by this government from their allowances. I am sure that every government member has received telephone calls, as I have, from widows between the ages of 60 and 65, as well as letters from them, respecting spouses' allowances, finding that upon the death of the senior pensioner those spouses allowances are cut off cold.

Most of these calls and letters come anonymously because the pensioners concerned are so ashamed. Their dignity and pride is attacked, and they are so frightened they will not identify themselves. The government has done nothing to alleviate this problem. The government should recognize that under the spouses' program in Ontario it is possible for the neediest in our society, the neediest pensioners, to receive over $500 a month. However, upon the death of a pensioner over 65 years of age whose spouse has yet to reach that age, that $500 is cut off cold. They just receive a letter from the government and they are told they are to fend for themselves. The widows are told to go out and get a job. This government just does not care.

On March 29 the then minister of health and welfare told the health committee of parliament that the savings made by the government in cutting off widows whose spouses have died amount to only $4 million a year. If the benefits were to be continued for these spouses the cost to the average Canadian would be 25 cents per year. What cruelty! The government is not even prepared to do that. Some 200 widows receive letters from the government informing them that their spouse's allowance will be cut off because they have had the misfortune to be married to someone who has died before reaching the age of 65.

I suspect the government will rediscover the spouses and the widows in Canada when election time comes. They will discover that they can find that $4 million. But action should be taken today. It should have been taken long ago to provide those benefits. These people are entitled to them. Surely those of us in society who are working and drawing incomes should recognize with appreciation the contribution that has been made by Canada's senior citizens through two world wars and a depression. We should not begrudge them what is necessary to grow old in dignity and without fear.

As was disclosed today this government can afford to spend $1 million in advertising for the UIC, on one program. Surely that money would be better directed in paying for the spouses' allowances for widows. There are numerous other examples of where this money could be found without asking that this government's extraordinary deficit be increased at all.

There is one other area I would like to touch on before closing and that is the question of the government's handling of the economy and the effect it has had on the weakest and poorest in our society. The cruellest tax imposed by any government is the tax of inflation. Take, for example, a couple who retired in December 1968, the year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power and who had life savings of $25,000. In December, 1977, that money would have been worth only $13,710. Literally thousands of senior citizens and pensioners have found their life savings stolen from them by the cruel tax of inflation, an inflation that this government has been unable to control.

Surely the time has come when the government must get serious about inflation. It must recognize that we cannot continue to have a year over year inflation increase of 9.5 per cent. We must recognize that inflation most cruelly attacks the weakest and the least able to look after themselves, such as people who will have their spouses' allowances cancelled if the senior pensioner dies. I think that all Canadians and certainly all members of this House should be made aware of the hardships—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Andres: Mr. Speaker, I was accused by the member of talking this bill out. I have given him an opportunity to speak. The member on the opposite side is talking the bill out.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, that is a spurious point of order and it is beneath the dignity of the House to put up with that. I ask that the question be put and support given to this bill.

Mr. John Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few seconds to rebut some of the foolishness which has been tossed towards the government. When hon. members realize all of the services that have been provided for senior citizens in past years, I am sure—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being five o'clock p.m. this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AIR TRANSPORT

RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S. ON CERTIFICATION OF AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of the importance of United States federal aviation authorities granting certification to the Challenger jet—our multimillion-dollar, government-owned and sponsored program—if it is to succeed in world markets, and in view of recent reports which I have heard in Washington and elsewhere of the resentment and concern of American aviation authorities and companies arising from the rather bizarre test project insisted upon by the Canadian Ministry of Transport, Walter McLeish, proprietor, which took place on September 28, 1977, in California involving a U.S. commercial aircraft, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Transport clarify on motions at an early date the basis of the present status of existing reciprocal agreements regarding certification of Canadian and American commercial aircraft.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—STATEMENT OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last night, on "The Nation's Business" television broadcast, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) seriously misled the Canadian public concerning the business of this House and the important role of the opposition in its deliberations. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House inform the government House leader—

This is something which he ought to have known in the first place, namely:

—that the bill establishing an employment tax incentive program was passed by this House on Thursday, and that members are waiting impatiently to deal with substantive economic matters rather than the list of insignificant housekeeping legislation the government has placed before us in an effort to hide their completely inadequate legislative program.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. Whereas the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) instructed his commissioner of the Yukon Territory, Art Pearson, not to assent to a bill to amend the inquiries ordinance of the Yukon territory which had passed all three stages in the legislative assembly of the Yukon and which would have enabled inquiries into the conduct of his commissioner, and whereas subsequent to the minister's action such an inquiry was established for the purpose of, inter alia, examining the conduct of his commissioner in instructing that a certain charge then pending in the Supreme Court of the Yukon territory be withdrawn, concerning which charge the judge of the Supreme Court had already stated that there appeared to be a prima facie case to be met, and whereas the said inquiry was established by the minister's commissioner who altered the terms of reference requested by the elected members of the assembly after first discussing such alterations with Commissioner Stratton appointed by Commissioner Pearson to head the inquiry, and the minister's commissioner having contemptuously—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: —described the inquiry now under way in the Yukon as "a crock of bullshit"—

S.O. 43

Mr. Speaker: Order. With all due respect, I think the hon. member is extending himself well into argument in the preamble. He should put the motion.

Mr. Nielsen: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government require the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to give immediate consideration to calling for the resignation of his said commissioner of the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EFFECT ON NORTHERN WILDLIFE OF RADIOACTIVE DEBRIS FROM SOVIET SATELLITE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the grave concern expressed by the Inuit of Baker Lake and the Keewatin region that radioactive debris from the Soviet satellite may represent a serious hazard to caribou herds and other wildlife and may contaminate the lakes and rivers, all of which are essential to the survival of the Inuit, I move, seconded by my hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Minister of National Defence or the responsible minister outline on motions today what is being done to determine the extent of the contamination and what contingency plans are in place to clean up the debris and minimize the risks.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require unanimous consent before such a motion can be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TOURISM

RECOMMENDATIONS OF INDUSTRY—LACK OF GOVERNMENT ACTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 with reference to the ailing condition of Canada's tourist industry which is expected to register a $2 billion deficit for 1977. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has failed to introduce his promised measures to encourage more Canadians to spend their holidays at home, and as the minister has failed to act in connection with the 13 problem areas in Canada identified by the tourism industry at the one-day session with the federal government's office of tourism, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

[Mr. Nielsen.]

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to appear before the appropriate standing committee to explain his lack of action in dealing with the 13 recommendations presented by the tourism industry, and to state what policies he proposes to overcome the record $2 billion deficit.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House before it can be presented. Is there unanimous consent?

QUEBEC—REQUEST GOVERNMENT NOT GIVE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO ABORTION CLINICS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the Quebec Social Affairs Minister, Dr. Denis Lazure, announced on November 23 last the opening of some twenty clinics across the province of Quebec where abortions will be performed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni):

That the government immediately stop giving financial assistance to those clinics.

REQUEST FOR EQUAL TREATMENT FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is too much to hope that some Liberal will not say no, but I shall try anyway—and I shall keep trying until we win. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House calls on the government, now that we are nearing the midway point in the United Nations Decade for Women, to expedite the introduction of legislation to establish equality for women, and that as a step toward this goal special emphasis be placed on pension equality, including full rights for women under the Canada Pension Plan, equal pension rights for all women between the ages of 60 and 65, regardless of marital status, increasing the pensions paid to widows under various government plans to at least 75 per cent, and the continuing payment of pensions granted to widows regardless of any subsequent change in marital status.

KEABLE INQUIRY—MINISTER'S AFFIDAVIT RESPECTING DOCUMENTS NOT PROVIDED TO INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Solicitor General. I very much regret that he is not here, but possibly the Minister of Justice has informed himself of the situation resulting from the serious accusations, or implications, of the article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. I ask the Minister of Justice whether on September 15, when the Solicitor General executed the affidavit referring to the 26 documents which he refused to turn over to the Keable inquiry, one or more of those documents referred to operation "Ham," which refers to the code name for the break-in to secure statistical data on the Parti Québécois.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Since reading that article I have not had an opportunity of discussing it with the Solicitor General, nor of reviewing all the documents. I think the House can appreciate that. I have had the opportunity to meet with and be briefed by senior officials of the Department of the Solicitor General and the security service, all of whom assure me that the Solicitor General did not know about Operation "Ham" before late October, 1977, and that his statement to the House on October 31 was correct.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the difficult position in which the Minister of Justice finds himself. I ask him if those officers indicated whether the words "operation Ham" were referred to in any of the 26 documents that formed the subject matter of the Solicitor General's affidavit of September 15.

Mr. Basford: Not specifically, Mr. Speaker, simply because I have not had an opportunity to review it that closely. They gave me the assurance—which I gave to the House—that there must be some mix-up in the story with regard to the documentation involved.

Mr. Jarvis: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the inability of the Minister of Justice to obtain exact details on this matter, would he undertake to determine whether any of the 26 documents which formed the subject matter of the September 15 affidavit referred to operation "Ham" specifically?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

WITHHOLDING OF INFORMATION BY SOLICITOR GENERAL—APPLICATION OF FEDERAL COURT ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he can provide the House and the country with some information which justifies the Solicitor General withholding information under the provisions of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. Can the learned gentleman say, for example, whether this is done on the basis of information known personally to the Solicitor General, based on reading the relevant files and material, based on reasonable information in the sense of permanent jurisprudence, or does he just sign these declarations under section 41(2) on the basis of some vague representations to do so?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker. Any minister signing a section 41 declaration does so after careful examination of the documents in front of him, and by exercising his judgment as to whether such action fits within the criteria of section 41.

Mr. MacKay: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Based on the undoubted concern that the Minister of Justice has for this very important matter which has occupied the attention of the country for some time, can he assure the House and the country that in fact that is what the Solicitor General has done in every case where he has withheld information, in view of the statement made by Mr. Julius Koteles, a well known Winnipeg lawyer, in connection with the Laycraft commission, that as far as he is concerned he sees no relevance at all in the material withheld under section 41(2) in this regard?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think the Solicitor General has already outlined to the House the manner and method by which he signed such declaration. It is done, obviously, on the advice of officials as to the nature of the material and its sensitivity, requiring a section 41 declaration.

Mr. MacKay: A final supplementary question. I gather the minister is saying that he cannot give the House the assurance that the Solicitor General personally read and acquainted himself with the material.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I can give the House the assurance that the Solicitor General pays very close attention to documents submitted to him under section 41. I am quite sure of that.

Oral Questions

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BREAK-IN AT PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS OFFICES—GOVERNMENT REFUSAL TO PROVIDE DOCUMENTS TO INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the Solicitor General. I checked with his office this morning and was told that he would be in for question period. He has obviously changed his mind. I will put my question to the Prime Minister. Since RCMP staff-sergeant François d'Entremont, of the Montreal detachment, asked RCMP headquarters, by telex on December 23, 1972, for confirmation that the break-in which took place on January 9, 1973, to obtain information about the Parti Québécois was legal, as the staff sergeant sent the request by telex to Ottawa to find out, before involving himself, whether he was about to do something legal or illegal, and since the reply he received authorized him to take what has turned out to be, transparently, an illegal act, could the Prime Minister tell the House why the government has refused the Keable inquiry access to the reply sent from Ottawa?

● (1422)

Surely, the reply was other than a straightforward "yes" or "no" and contained important information that I, for one, cannot believe would have any security implications.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has been detained on a personal matter, and I regret his absence from the House at this time. I will gladly take notice of that question and make sure he provides an answer.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIONS OF FORCE—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the notion of ministerial responsibility. In view of the fact that Superintendent Nowlan of the RCMP, the man who conducted the internal inquiry established last June into wrongdoings of the RCMP, was personally and deeply implicated in the illegal break-in to obtain information about the Parti Québécois in January, 1973, and since the Solicitor General indicated he was not told until late last fall about this activity, is it not the Prime Minister's view of ministerial responsibility that such a person should be sacked from his position if, in fact, he did not provide the Solicitor General with the information he requested last June?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this appears to me to be the type of argument the hon. member should make sure is familiar to the McDonald commission. I think this is a pleading of responsibility. We set up the McDonald royal commission precisely to look into the matter of responsibility of the RCMP and the government, and we are anxiously awaiting its report.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Prime Minister, as the head of the government, what I think is an important question on the principle of ministerial responsibility. Is it not his view that if a senior official of the Solicitor General's Department, or of any other department, is requested to conduct an inquiry and systematically misleads the minister in terms of the report he makes, that person should be dismissed or other, equally severe punitive action should be taken? Is that not at least what ministerial responsibility is all about?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is an allegation contained in that question that an RCMP officer systematically misled his minister.

Mr. Broadbent: I said, if that is the case.

Mr. Trudeau: The member is asking a hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker. I am telling him that the responsibility of the McDonald commission is to look into the facts to see if there was any systematic misleading.

Mr. Broadbent: Three years from now? The minister will be back tomorrow.

Mr. Trudeau: It is our opinion that there was no illegal or improper conduct on the part of RCMP officials. But we are trying to satisfy ourselves, through the royal commission, whether or not this is the fact; that is why we are waiting for its report.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER BEEF WILL BE MARKETED IN SAME FASHION AS OTHER FOOD PRODUCTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Further to the report of the commission of inquiry into the marketing of beef and veal in Canada, has the minister determined or is he in the process of determining what steps can be taken to implement the recommendations of the commission, and does he also intend to act upon the amendment to Bill C-76, allowing beef to be marketed on the same basis as the other foods covered by that act?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member that approximately 50 per cent to 60 per cent of the recommendations of the beef commission, and the Senate committee which studied the beef marketing system in Canada, have been or are in the process of being implemented. Also, some of the others are about to be put into place. The legislation suggested by both the Senate committee and the beef commission will be presented to the House in the near future. Work is being done on this legislation at the present time. With regard to the suggestion that we amend Bill C-76, there is no intention of doing that unless the beef producers ask for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the adoption of the legislation known as Bill C-76, did beef meat producer associations make any representation to the minister about their desire to have a marketing board for beef meat in Canada, as well as for quantities of imported beef from other countries?

● (1427)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, there have been some representations by some beef producers indicating that they want this kind of marketing system. I believe the vast majority would rather have—at least, it appears to me—the system we have at the present time, with some protection against imports, etc. They have protection against imports; they had it last year. They have it again this year under the import-export act. All beef producing countries which sell beef to Canada are under a permit or quota system at the present time.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

YUKON—REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the Stratton Inquiry now under way in the Yukon, established to inquire into the conduct of the minister's Commissioner of the Yukon, Art Pearson, among other things, in directing that a charge before the judge of the Supreme Court of the Yukon territory be withdrawn, has been referred to by the minister's commissioner in these terms, "I think the whole thing is a crock of bullshit", and notwithstanding Art Pearson's statement, which was not under oath, to attempt to escape the consequences of such a rash and contemptuous declaration, has the minister considered calling for the immediate resignation of his Commissioner of the Yukon?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not. I will await the outcome of the inquiry.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, since the minister must bear ultimate responsibility for the actions and statements of his departmental employees, in this case Commissioner Pearson, and since this entire affair is far more serious than the conduct of the hon. member for Westmount during the judges' affair a few months ago, when the hon. member for Westmount took the only honourable course open to him and tendered his resignation as a minister of the Crown, does the minister not feel obliged to his government, to his office and to the people of the Yukon to call for the immediate resignation of his Yukon commissioner?

Mr. Faulkner: No, Mr. Speaker. I feel an obligation to let the judicial process of the Yukon, now under way, complete itself. As the hon. member is a lawyer, I thought he would have respected that.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that his commissioner, in withdrawing the charges before the Supreme Court, did not follow that course. My supplementary question is: Since the Commissioner of the Yukon is appointed by the minister, holds office at the pleasure of the minister, reports and is responsible to the minister, does the minister not consider it to be a serious conflict for the Commissioner of the Yukon to establish an inquiry into his own conduct and set the terms of reference for that inquiry after restricting those terms of reference to what his commissioner wished from those requested by the elected members of the Yukon legislature?

Does the minister not believe he has any responsibility, in view of his Yukon commissioner's contempuous references to the inquiry set up by him, to intervene as I have suggested, particularly in light of the judges' affair of a few months ago?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had reservations about the setting up of the terms of reference for this inquiry, he could have raised them some time ago.

Mr. Nielsen: I did, in the House.

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Faulkner: I believe the inquiry is well established, and it is presided over by the very distinguished Mr. Justice Stratton. I am confident it will do the job it was originally established to do. I am prepared to wait for the findings of Mr. Justice Stratton.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INVOKING OF ANTI-DUMPING LEGISLATION RESPECTING STEEL BEAMS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. As the Minister of Finance is now aware of the serious disruption to the British Columbia construction industry and the threat to the jobs of 1,000 steelworkers in British Columbia caused by the decision of the anti-dumping tribunal on the Algoma Steel appeal, can he advise the House if steps will be taken to alleviate this serious example of regional discrimination by asking the governor in council to invoke section 7 of the Anti-Dumping Act exempting wide-flange steel beams from dumping duty when entered through the port of Vancouver?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, members of the British Columbia caucus have made representations to the minister in this regard. No decision has been taken as of this date.

Mr. Huntington: Again I direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister, or have his colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue, initiated studies to overcome the lengthy hearing process of anti-dumping tribunals? In other words, is he, or are his advisers, considering what are called fast-track procedures for some of these more important issues; and is the minister doing anything to improve the priority of regional considerations and protection for regional payrolls in the decision-making processes of anti-dumping tribunals?

● (1432)

Mr. Lumley: As the hon. member knows, there is a great deal of evidence to be put forward at any anti-dumping tribunal hearing. Although the minister is not happy with the processes of all the hearings, by and large he is doing everything he can to expedite matters in this regard.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, would you allow me to ask a question of the senior minister from British Columbia in order to obtain information on what he is doing to represent the interests of the west coast in this matter?

An hon. Member: He is doing nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIR TRANSPORT

PACKAGE TOURS FOR AIR CANADA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the urgent need to balance this country's huge tourist trade deficit of around $2 billion a year, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what the government is doing to make sure that the government's airline, Air Canada, makes available the same number and kind of package tours, which include hotels, car rentals, etc., to those who wish to visit places of interest within Canada as it makes available to those wishing to visit places of interest in other parts of the world?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course, many operators in the business of offering package tours require aircraft to operate under all-charter policies which are now available for domestic travel or for travel into Canada from other countries. I can tell the hon. member that this year Air Canada and Canadian Pacific are coming close to tripling the number of seats they are making available on charter, with competitive fares, during the peak months of the year. That is in addition to the very large number of charters which may be offered domestically under the revised charter policy approved recently by the cabinet.

[Mr. Lumley.]

Mr. Hees: Would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to tell the House how the number of package tours which will be made available this year by airlines in Canada compare with the number of package tours made available by Canadian airlines to those wishing to travel to other parts of the world, especially in view of the great need to overcome the tremendous tourist trade deficit of this country?

Mr. Lang: I will be glad to obtain that information as soon as it is available and make it available to the House, although I doubt it would constitute the substance of a statement on motions. In saying that the number of seats on a charter competitive basis has tripled, I can tell the hon. member that between CP Air and Air Canada together, during the main months of the summer 465,000 seats will be available. I should like to remind the hon. member, also, that the tremendous advantage of these seats is that they are available from almost every city in Canada to every other city, whereas much of the main charter business which may come will tend to be between the principal or larger cities only.

Mr. Hees: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not realize that the reason this country has a yearly $2 billion tourist trade deficit is that whatever we are doing is being done far better and far more extensively by airlines, hotels and other governments around the world, and there is need for Canada to get off its seat and get going?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, what I realize, and I hope the hon. member does, is that the question is far more complicated than simply pointing at one particular aspect such as airline travel. The facts show it is not that kind of travel which has changed dramatically: I am referring to Canadians travelling abroad. There is a significant drop, however, in the number of Americans coming to Canada and their length of stay here. One of the most important reasons for this is that some of our accommodation is more expensive than in the United States. That is due to a whole range of factors, including the level of the minimum wage set by the provinces, which is significantly higher in Canada than in the United States.

These are matters to which we must address ourselves earnestly and not, as the hon. member probably would, as simply a political matter of always being in favour of higher and higher minimum wages, as are his colleagues in provincial governments, but recognizing the serious impact of these factors on the whole economy.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED RAISE IN RETIREMENT AGE—CAPPING OF INDEXED PENSIONS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. In a report in the business section of Saturday's Globe and Mail, it was reported that at the federal-provincial finance ministers' meeting the minister proposed, first, raising the minimum retirement age of public service employees from 55 to 60 years of age and, second, the capping of indexed pensions for those in the public service. Did the minister make these proposals and, if so, had he previously consulted the staff associations representing public servants?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Those proposals were not made at the conference on Thursday and Friday.

An hon. Member: Where were they made?

GRAIN

QUOTAS ON TOUGH WHEAT—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the snow and rain conditions last fall in the prairies, the result of which is that we have a great deal of damp and tough wheat. I should like to know whether there are any points in the west where tough wheat is on quota, because in northern Saskatchewan last week in particular the situation was serious in that there is no quota on that type of wheat and there is no purchasing by the elevator companies.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board has opened certain quotas on tough and damp wheat. The Wheat Board has to do this very carefully, however, and many farmers are taking the trouble to dry the grain themselves. The Wheat Board made it clear that with the lower grades of wheat, particularly with 3-CU, it would be wise for farmers to consider drying the grain themselves, because delivery opportunities for such grain will not be as great as for higher grades.

Delivery opportunities may open up, but only in the last quarter of the crop year. Of course, this is because the Canadian Wheat Board made very successful efforts in selling the higher grades which they knew were available and could only now, after the harvest, begin to fit the program for selling 3-CU wheat into their other programs. That is the message which the Canadian Wheat Board gave the farmers, and I think this matter is best left in the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board so they can be sure to move the grain which is required for what may be a record year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am interested to know that there are some areas of the west in which tough wheat is being accepted. But that certainly does not apply to constituencies in Saskatchewan which are represented by other than Liberal members. I ask the minister whether he will do something about this situation. He suggests that farmers themselves should engage in drying operations. Will any assistance to that end be forthcoming from the government of Canada? Furthermore, will he look into this matter again, because it will be a very serious situation a couple of months hence when the break-up takes place in the spring: farmers who have damp or tough wheat will suffer terrible losses unless action is taken?

Mr. Lang: We considered, with the advisory committee of the Wheat Board, whether cash advances for drying grain were a desirable thing to invoke. We have put it into permanent legislation so it is there on a standby basis. It was thought the extent of the problem was not such that we should invoke it. Cash advances available for 3-CU come close to the total value of the grain, because they are based on two-thirds of the value of the grain so that farmers, generally speaking, receive adequate cash advances.

I think it is abhorrent for the right hon. gentleman to suggest that quotas might be issued by the Canadian Wheat Board on the basis of representations in parliament by any particular hon. members. I do not know if it reflects how things operated when he was prime minister, but I assure him that in no way and at no time would any political interference take place regarding quotas of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister's annoyance indicates that the truth hurts. I say to him that there was never any interference as there is today through him, and by him, all too often.

WIRETAPPING OF MORE THAN ONE TELEPHONE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It concerns the evidence given last week before the Laycraft inquiry about the use of wiretaps. The evidence was that the RCMP felt, when authorization was granted by a judge for wiretapping, they had the right not merely to wiretap the telephone identified in the authorization but also any telephone connected to it. I think that is called spin-off wiretapping. The evidence, also, was that that practice was widespread in western Canada. Can the minister advise whether there was any political authorization for this activity, or whether the RCMP were acting on legal advice in coming to the conclusion that they could use this spin-off wiretap technique following passage of the wiretap law in this House?

● (1442)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will determine those two things.

Mr. Leggatt: When the minister is looking into that question, will he also advise us how many of these spin-off wiretaps have taken place since we passed the law; and can he give us a commitment that this practice is not now being used in Canada?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, one of the amendments was designed to require more precise identification of which telephones were to be tapped, in affidavits requesting wiretaps. That amendment is, therefore, a response to the question the hon. member raises.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ANTICIPATED CHANGES IN MINISTRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he is contemplating or anticipating any immediate changes in the composition of his ministry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is always a possibility, and I believe the House is usually informed when it happens.

Mr. Clark: Can the Prime Minister indicate whether it is the intention of the present Solicitor General of Canada to make a statement on motions, or to raise a question of privilege at the end of this question period, which might relate in some way to the composition of the ministry?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question period ends in 16 minutes, and I think it is not too much to ask that the Leader of the Opposition wait for that.

Mr. Clark: Let me be more direct. Has the Prime Minister any reason to believe that he may be receiving, and that there may be communicated to the House of Commons today, an indication of the intention of the present Solicitor General of Canada to resign from his position?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is obviously basing his question on rumour. If the rumour is founded, he will know very, very soon. If it is not founded, I think it is a mistake to ask the question.

Mr. Clark: Does the Prime Minister have any information in his possession now, relative to the composition of his ministry, which will be released to the House of Commons at a later time? It is the business and the right of this House to know when the matter is raised.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, of course the House of Commons will know if the Solicitor General raises a question of privilege. If he has such a question, I suggest that he be allowed to speak for himself. I do not think it is too much to ask the House to wait for 15 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Leggatt.]

MISREPRESENTATION IN HOUSE BY HON. MEMBER—NEED FOR RESIGNATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister related to this matter and to the questions initiated by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot in light of recent revelations. Is it the policy of the government that a finding by a commission of inquiry into the RCMP that a member of the government, no matter how eminent, may knowingly have misrepresented facts in this House would be a ground for calling for the resignation of that minister, pursuant to the Profumo incident in the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is not only hypothetical but it is absolutely unfounded and, I suggest, malicious.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING FEATURE FILM INDUSTRY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. On October 27 of last year, in response to a question concerning the feature film industry, the Secretary of State replied that distribution was key to a resolution of the serious problem facing that industry. He indicated that he hoped to make an announcement of major government policy before the end of the year. Since that announcement has not yet been made, can the minister indicate the reason for the delay? Can he say that he will make such an announcement, that when it is made it will be made in the House, and that it will be more than just a continuation of the present voluntary agreements which are obviously hopelessly inadequate?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, policy decisions have been taken. There is a minor amount of redrafting to be done. I am waiting for an appropriate occasion to make an announcement of the policy which the government intends to implement. It will be much more extensive than a continuation of the voluntary agreements which the hon. member described.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I hope that assurance from the minister means he will be making a statement in this House and that he will make it shortly, because there is a good deal of uncertainty and fear in the industry. Since it appears that the key element in the minister's new policy may be a voluntary agreement with American distributors to reinvest a portion of their profits in film production here, is the minister assured that this will not undermine the creative and financial control by Canadians of their own film industry, similar to what happened in Great Britain or to what exists in our recording industry? In other words, will this measure promote film-making by Canadians, for Canadians, rather than just bringing about greater loss of autonomy and cultural identity in a very important industry in this country?

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REMOVAL OF HIGHLY PAID EMPLOYEES FROM BARGAINING UNITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board, since the hon. member for Ottawa West referred to Saturday's Globe and Mail. Is the government considering the removal of highly paid civil servants from bargaining units? Was this a position which was placed before the provincial finance ministers on Friday, or at any other time, in order to learn their views in this regard?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the conference among the finance ministers and, where they did not coincide, Treasury Board ministers on Friday morning was devoted to the subject of public service compensation. There were literally dozens of people in attendance. We discussed the general topics of compensation, comparability, ability to pay, and certain other matters. The specific question referred to by the hon. member was not discussed.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I understand, as well, that a question was raised about government spending, and that either at the conference or at some time in the past the federal government indicated it would restrict its spending to an increase of 3.6 per cent per year. As I understand it, the province of Ontario would rather see it restricted to 2 per cent and, if I am not mistaken, Manitoba and B.C. want it to be even less than that. Would the minister advise whether that type of discussion took place, and whether it is the position of the federal government that spending should be increased by no more than 3.5 per cent or 3.6 per cent per year?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, these percentages were discussed among several of the finance ministers, including our own Minister of Finance. This was related to certain aspects of expenditures and did not apply to the totality of budgetary or non-budgetary expenditures, capital or non-capital expenditures, and so forth. As I recall, papers were made available and were public. The hon. member could have the research group of his party pull them together and find the distinctions I am making, because the implications of his comments are not totally accurate.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I might as well carry this thing through to its conclusion. I understand there are now three positions with respect to indexed pensions. One is that the federal government is thinking about capping them. The Prime Minister is in favour of indexing. Even though the Tomenson-Alexander report has not yet been tabled, it indicates dissatisfaction with the form of indexing which exists. That report recommends that pension increases be made on an ad hoc basis.

Can the President of the Treasury Board indicate whether the government has reached a conclusion, particularly in light of what the Prime Minister has stated? Is the minister waiting for the other four or five reports from the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec, and the intergovernmental task force? Is he waiting for them before making up his mind with respect to the position toward which the government might lean?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, no decisions have been taken. The Tomenson-Alexander report is a very complex actuarial study. It is now available, but its translation and printing have not yet been completed. As soon as those requirements are satisfied, I intend to make it available to the House. Our position will require a great deal of analysis and thought. We have a commitment to consult with the bargaining agents and the advisory committee on public service pensions. I will be very interested in the hon. member's views as to what position should be taken, when he has access to the report.

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING FOREIGN TRAWLERS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

In his press release of January 24, the minister announced that the government might charter foreign vessels to catch deep water fish in North Atlantic zones. Because of an agreement between the Canadian government and the French government, plants in Gaspésie are periodically supplied by French trawlers and one captain said recently that it will be possible one day to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. My question is this: is the minister prepared to tell the House whether or not he will authorize foreign ships to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence even though their catches are delivered to Canadian fish plants?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, at the present time the Canadian fleet is quite capable of catching useful species in the gulf. Apart from the treaty governing our relations with France, I do not intend to allow any foreign vessels to penetrate in the gulf.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—NOTIFICATION TO U.S.S.R.

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. With respect to the Cosmos satellite, has the Canadian government notified the U.S.S.R. of the discovery on our soil of a space object, or its component parts, believed to be of a hazardous or deleterious nature, as we are required to do under article 5 of the international agreement on the return of objects launched into outer space?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all the object has to be correctly identified. There is contact among the Department of External Affairs, the Soviet embassy and our embassy in Moscow, as well as Soviet officials, so they are fully aware of the current situation. Also, I am sure they are reading the press as this matter evolves.

Mr. McKinnon: My supplementary question is for the same minister. Paragraph 5 of article 5 of the same treaty requires the launching authority, in this case the U.S.S.R., to pay expenses incurred in recovering and returning a space object. Has the government contacted the U.S.S.R. in this regard and, if so, what was the result?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the costs are not yet known. We are keeping a record of all the costs involved, which are rather significant I must say. The owners of the material, when identified, will certainly be well aware of the costs. They are fully aware of the treaty. The international régime will meet its responsibilities, as was indicated to the Department of External Affairs by the Soviet ambassador.

Mr. Paproski: Why didn't you tell us that last week?

Mr. McKinnon: My final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is to the same minister. If he casts his mind back prior to the launching of the satellite, the preamble to the treaty provides that the nation launching the satellite shall, upon request, furnish identifying data prior to the landing of an object it has launched. Did the government make such a request of the U.S.S.R. before the landing of the satellite? If so, what was the answer?

Mr. Danson: Not to the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—INFORMATION PROVIDED MINISTER

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, Admiral Falls, Chief of the Defence Staff, is quoted as saying that he knew Cosmos-954 carried a nuclear package and was likely to fall to earth, but did not inform the minister because "they say he is a busy man". Has the minister discussed this matter with Admiral Falls recently, and has any new system of priorities been established in the minister's office which will establish the confidence of competent senior Canadian defence officials in the adequacy of the minister of defence regarding such information?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all, perhaps I may complete my answer to the previous question. Of course, before the spacecraft, or vehicle, or any indication of landing took place, we did not know it was going to land in Canada, which made it difficult. There was communication between Mr. Brzezinski and Soviet authorities, because they were the ones involved in this problem. With respect to the second question, there is complete communication. With respect to items of priority, there is no question that I was advised, as soon as it was helpful for me to be advised, of the situation regarding the space object.

Mr. Paproski: Before, or after, it landed?

Mr. Danson: I have responsible officers who are properly carrying out their roles. It would be foolish to interfere with their day to day work. They call upon me, when it is necessary, as a matter of course.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, the time they called upon the minister indicates the confidence they had in his course of action. On Tuesday, the minister said there was a 98 per cent chance that the satellite would not reach the ground. On Wednesday, the minister told reporters there was a 90 per cent chance that they had found the satellite. He said they had found either a piece of satellite debris or the greatest uranium mine in the world. On Friday, Admiral Falls said it was neither.

Can the minister tell to the House whether he and the Chief of Defence Staff have totally separate sources of information, or does the minister simply prefer to spread his own pandemonium, without any source?

Mr. Danson: First of all, Mr. Speaker, my staff and senior officials have sufficient confidence in me to come at very short notice and receive wise, fast action and decisions. The Chief of Defence Staff and I are working in close concert. I think that is quite an inappropriate question. Any difference is only one in timing: the same information comes to both of us. It comes to me through the Chief of Defence Staff, and we are in constant communication. I was out of communication for a short period of time when I was on an aircraft at the time there was an exchange of information, but it was not conflicting information.

AIRPORTS

EDMONTON INTERNATIONAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns the Edmonton international airport. Has the minister reconsidered his decision to make only cosmetic improvements to the international airport, when in fact the government's own study shows that structural changes are urgent to meet the growing demand reflecting increasing passenger and commercial traffic?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have not been able to review the decision concerning major improvements to the Edmonton international airport which we have in the plans. Those improvements will be made as soon as we have financial provisions. We have, however, authorized very important changes, not merely cosmetic ones, to the airport which will improve it for the convenience of passengers. We have done that particularly with the Commonwealth Games in mind.

PARLIAMENT HILL

OCCUPATION OF EAST BLOCK AFTER RENOVATION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. As the renovations in the east block of the parliament buildings are progressing, I wonder if the minister could advise the House who is going to occupy those offices upon completion of the renovations? Specifically, will it be the senators.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the minister, that matter seems to fall under my area of responsibility.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE—TIMETABLE PROPOSED FOR CONSTRUCTION—CONSIDERATION BY NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. According to a CBC report, the minister made a statement on the west coast over the weekend indicating that the National Energy Board will probably complete its work on the Kitimat pipeline by September, but no action will be taken until the Thompson inquiry has completed its work. I would ask the minister if that is an accurate report. If it is not, will the minister give us some idea of the timetable which the four ministers responsible for this matter have in mind?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe my words were reported accurately. I did indicate that following the request of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the National Energy Board would address itself to the question of supply and requirements, and that the Kitimat proposal would not be looked at by the National Energy Board until such time as the NEB had looked at these initial questions. I have been away for a week travelling in British Columbia, so that some details may have escaped me.

With respect to the Thompson inquiry, the ministers have not yet had a discussion as to when or whether it will be continued. As the hon. member knows, it was recessed at Dr. Thompson's request. He is writing an interim report, and obviously we would want to see that report before going any further.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that it would seem virtually impossible for the National Energy Board to make an intelligent assessment of the proposed Kitimat pipeline until they receive the report of the Thompson inquiry, can the minister assure the House that no action will be taken and no decision reached by the National Energy Board until the Thompson inquiry has completed its work and reported its findings?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my colleague indicated that the future of the Thompson inquiry, the further work it may be called upon to do, and when we will receive its report, is still not known. It is important to emphasize that before the Energy Board considers the application for the Kitimat pipeline it should examine the question of how important it is to Canada, and how important it is to British Columbia, that there be an oil port of entry on the west coast. That is what they have been asked to do, and that is what they are going to turn their attention to before they examine the Kitimat pipeline application.

GRAIN

POSSIBILITY ELEVATOR AT MOOSE JAW ABLE TO SERVICE CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that studies regarding a new terminal elevator at Yorkton to service the port of Churchill, as recommended by the Hall commission, have concluded that such a terminal is not viable, and in view of the fact that the government elevator at Moose Jaw has the capacity and facilities to service the port of Churchill and is only some 150 miles farther removed than Yorkton, is the minister prepared to carry out a feasibility study to determine whether the facilities at Moose Jaw can be used to service the port of Churchill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we will certainly be looking at all the ways in which we will be able to improve the use of Churchill. The use of inland terminals is one of those ways. It does pose certain problems in terms of the gathering of grain in the district surrounding the terminal. We will have to weigh that as well. I do not quite accept the hon. member's use of words in saying that the study found the terminal in the Yorkton area not to be viable. It said there were some very high costs in connection with that terminal, but the viability of it in improving Churchill will depend upon an assessment of many other matters, including the relative rail costs and the relative advantages to the Canadian Wheat Board of being able to sell grain through Churchill. That work will also continue.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact the government elevator at Moose Jaw has a capacity of some five million bushels and presently has in storage 203,000 bushels, while the average over the year is 50,000, has the minister carried out any studies regarding the use of that elevator? In particular, has he discussed with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board the feasibility of using the drying facilities at the Moose Jaw terminal elevator to dry some of the grain that is damp in the northern part of the province, in order that there will be sales of such grain?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware the Minister of Agriculture has visited the Moose Jaw elevator. From time to time expenditures have been made on that elevator to keep it modern and up to date in order that it can do the job it may be required to do, as stated by the hon. member. We have looked at these matters to see how it can be used. We must also keep in mind that there is a private elevator system in the western provinces. This is a government elevator. If the hon. member is suggesting that we put it in direct competition with the private elevator system, he should suggest that and we will bring in an amendment to the bill immediately to allow just that. That is, if he wants that kind of operation of the elevator.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FOX—REASONS FOR RESIGNATION FROM MINISTRY

Hon. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that I resigned from the cabinet on Friday. I would like to tell the House of the events that led to my resignation.

A few years ago, before I entered the cabinet, I was involved in a brief liaison with a married woman who became pregnant. She subsequently applied for and secured the required permission for a therapeutic abortion. On her admission to hospital, I signed the name of her husband to an admitting document.

This fact has become known in the last few days. I discussed it with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and tendered my resignation, which he has accepted. I have today instructed my counsel to advise the attorney general of the province concerned so that he may be apprised of the matter.

These are the facts which the House should know. I take full responsibility for them. I would implore hon. members and the media to let these facts speak for themselves and not seek further details which would only cause harm to other individuals and families.

This incident in no way affected the work I undertook as Solicitor General, nor was it known to any official with whom I have worked.

I deeply regret the difficulty that my resignation may cause to the Prime Minister and to my colleagues in the cabinet. I consider it a great personal honour to have served during the past 16 months as a member of the cabinet and, through it, the people of Canada. I leave the office of Solicitor General of Canada under circumstances which I deeply regret but with the hope that the ministry and its agencies will have been well served during my tenure. Thank you.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Question No. 693—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1977 to date, did the Department of Public Works hire outside consultants and, if so, how many?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Consultants were hired for projects funded from the Department of Public Works appropriations and the Department of Public Works Working Capital Advance. From January 1, 1977, to November 16, 1977, the Department of Public Works hired 820 outside consultants primarily in the architectural and engineering field.

POULTRY PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE

Question No. 702—Mr. Howie:

Since April 1, 1977, what amount was paid to farmers in New Brunswick to assist with poultry production?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): In so far as Agriculture Canada and its agencies are concerned, the answer is: $156,895.00 (estimated).

WOMEN IN GOVERNMENT EARNING SALARIES OVER $20,000

Question No. 823—Mr. Howie:

On November 1, 1977, how many women in the government, excluding Crown corporations, were earning (a) $30,000 and over (b) $20,000 to $30,000 annually?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: (a) 17 women; (b) 392 women.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—NEW BUILDINGS

Question No. 834—Mr. Marshall:

1. What is the projected cost of the buildings in regard to the move of the Department of Veterans Affairs Headquarters to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

2. Have tenders been called on any aspect of the construction of such buildings?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. The projected cost of the building which will accommodate the Department of Veterans Affairs, headquarters, in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, will be $18,200,000.

2. No tenders have yet been called.

REGIONAL HEADQUARTERS FOR RCMP

Question No. 988—Mr. Howie:

Has the Department of Public Works completed plans for a regional RCMP headquarters at Fredericton, New Brunswick and, if so (a) what is the estimated cost of construction (b) on what date will construction begin (c) what is the estimated completion date?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): To date, Department of Public Works has not received a request from RCMP to commence design and construction for a headquarters building in Fredericton, New Brunswick.

DOMINION FIRE COMMISSIONER—PERSONS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 993—Mr. McKenzie:

Are there persons under contract to the Dominion Fire Commissioner and, if so, what (a) are their names (b) is the nature of their work?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works):

Order Paper Questions

(a) Names	(b) Nature of Work
D. S. Watts	Fire Training Consultant in the Pacific Region.
Claude Lamothe & Associates	Take-over of all sprinkler systems at MAPP projects, St-Laurent, Centre Ville.
Amyot, Bahl & Brown	To evaluate fire safety systems in high rise buildings.

[English]

Mr. Andres: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 45

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a very brief point of order with regard to question No. 45. This is a point of order I raised before. This question has not only been on the order paper since October 18 when this session began, but for a year before that. It asks how many public servants in the Public Service of Canada have been fingerprinted since January 1, 1972, an operation which the government, in answer to previous questions with regard to one department, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, has acknowledged is going on. I ask this question because it seems that those being fingerprinted are not just those in security positions such as in the Armed Forces and other security conscious positions, but people who are not in any way involved with security matters. Therefore it is a very serious question.

It is an invasion of the right of privacy of public servants of Canada that this is taking place. The government owes this House an accountability for having carried on and for still carrying on the business of fingerprinting public servants, many of whom have literally refused to go along with the procedure.

If the parliamentary secretary cannot supply the answer today as to when this can be answered, will he take it as notice and notify this House tomorrow when this question will be answered?

Mr. Andres: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take notice of this question. All these questions are serious. We will have the answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR COLLECTION OF CERTAIN STATISTICS RELATING TO PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

The House resumed, from Friday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-12, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of certain petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my very short remarks last Friday when this bill was initially called for second reading, I will not be taking up a great deal of the time of the House.

We have no serious quarrel with the intent of this bill. As I said when I last spoke on this subject, we question the reason for its introduction because it is our understanding that the information which the government is seeking to acquire through this legislation is in fact already available and is forthcoming on a voluntary basis. We wonder why the whip is being brought in while the carrot is working adequately.

It is our intention to allow the bill to go to committee though we have a number of reservations with regard to specifics, in particular the clause which would allow the minister at his discretion, should he deem it to be in the public interest, to release some of the confidential information gathered as a result of the application of this law, provided its release would not seriously hurt the competitive position of the company concerned. We find it unacceptable that discretionary power of this kind should be given to a minister; we wonder whether the next step will be to give the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) the power to release details of tax returns filed by individuals.

We question the structure of the clause. The phrases "if in the public interest" and "provided the position of the company is not adversely affected" are difficult to reconcile. Our view is that if disclosure is in the public interest, that should end the matter. The clause is poorly drafted and should not be there in its present form.

Another thing we object to is the "break and entry" clause which would allow officials, at the discretion of the minister, to seize files and documents of companies affected by the legislation. We find such "Gestapo" clauses totally unacceptable and out of keeping with the atmosphere which should prevail in our society.

One last point. I recall that during the debate leading up to the incorporation of Petro-Canada, one of the main reasons given by the government for establishing that corporation was that it needed a window on the industry. Spokesmen opposite argued that the government needed to know more about the industry and its affairs, and that the establishment of an operating company would make this possible. Well, Mr. Speaker, looking at the bill before us which would compel the industry to provide certain information to the government, one can only reach the conclusion that either Petro-Canada is providing no information at all or that the glass in that window is awfully dirty. If that observation is correct, then in the light of the arguments put forward when Petro-Canada was established, one can only assume the Liberal party will have no objection when we seek to remove the government's involvement in this oil corporation.

One last word. We intend to add a "sunset clause" to this legislation since the government has omitted to do so. We agree with the policy favoured by the cabinet, that of getting out of the business of pricing oil and gas eventually, and ceasing to involve ourselves in the day to day operations of the industry. In keeping with this philosophy we see no long term need for a bill such as this, so the clause we shall be proposing in committee is that the act should cease to be enforced after June, 1983, unless the government of the day wishes to take affirmative action at that time to sustain it for an additional five-year period. We do not think this is unreasonable. The government has all the flexibility in the world to extend the date if the situation requires it. On the other hand, under our proposal the economy would not be burdened in perpetuity with one more agency, one more level of bureaucracy costing the taxpayers money and imposing an added strain on the economy.

We shall be seeking from the minister in committee some estimate as to the cost of this program. Every time governments introduce measures like this affecting any aspect of Canadian business, a cost is associated. It is estimated that in Canada the cumulative cost of this sort of interference is a sum in the order of $5 billion to $6 billion. I believe it is time we started to cut back. It is time we began to limit this type of interference with the activities of Canadian business, especially small business which finds government bureaucracy and regulation a serious handicap to growth. We do not intend to vote against the bill on second reading, but we shall be putting forward in committee proposals for improvements and we trust the government will be amenable to these suggestions.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this measure, Bill C-12, is to make it mandatory upon the petroleum industry to provide the government with all the information necessary to ascertain whether the additional revenues they are receiving from rising prices are being reinvested in exploration and development in Canada.

After five years of rising oil and gas prices we do not need any further information in order to answer the question: are the oil and gas companies' profits being reinvested to find new sources of supply? On the basis of all the figures readily available it is clear that the answer is a resounding "No".

The facts are indisputable. The petroleum industry has not increased its expenditures on exploration and development in Canada at a rate commensurate with the tremendous revenues acquired from a 400 per cent increase in the price of oil. Ever since the OPEC nations faced the world with the prospect of steadily rising prices and the present government began to increase the price of oil and gas, we have been assured regularly and systematically by the oil companies that these increases were necessary to provide funds for the exploration and development of our resources.

When the government first proposed bringing the price up to $4 a barrel at the wellhead, we were assured in this House that the money would go into increased exploration and development in this country. When we expressed some skepticism the then minister of energy, mines and resources, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), promised in this House that the government would monitor the oil industry to ensure that the very large profits they received would be reinvested in exploration. For three years we have waited in vain for results of this promised monitoring, Mr. Speaker.

It was not until 1977, four years after the price increases began, that we got a monitoring survey which covers the period from 1971 to 1976, and which covers only some 82 per cent of Canada's crude oil production. The information from this first monitoring survey, done in 1977, is sketchy and inadequate. I should like to know why it has taken three years to get a monitoring survey and why it covers only 82 per cent of our oil production.

If the oil industry was not co-operating, why was legislation not introduced much sooner to make it mandatory on the oil companies to respond to the government questionnaire? It is very apparent that the oil industry did not co-operate quickly or willingly. It is also quite evident that the government has dealt with the oil industry with kid gloves.

I hope you will notice Mr. Speaker, how much different the story was in 1974 when the oil industry virtually went on strike and reduced its drilling program in order to force the government to agree to a further increase in oil and gas prices. The oil industry in Canada sent their drilling rigs to the United States and virtually brought drilling in western Canada to a standstill until the government caved in.

The position taken by the New Democratic Party has been clear and consistent ever since this crisis came upon us in 1973. We have said that, apart from increased production, transportation and refinery costs, we see no justification in these price increases unless the additional revenues generated are used to find new supplies of oil, gas, coal, or for research and development in renewable resources such as solar energy and tidal and geothermal power. We think this was a logical position to take five years ago, and we think it is a logical position to take today.

I should point out that the stand we have taken is not confined to this party. A former cabinet minister, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), said in this House on July 12, 1977, as reported at page 7613 of Hansard:

> If the purpose of the increase is to bring about increased production of our petroleum resources, why should the oil companies get any additional revenue, even one dollar, that is not used for exploration and development, to bring about such increased production?

To ensure that these greatly increased revenues were applied to exploration and development in Canada, the New Democratic Party proposed that all additional revenue from production of oil and gas, after making allowances for increased production of costs, should be placed in a national resources fund. This money, we contended, should then be used to finance exploration and development, both in non-renewable and renewable resources, by either private companies or Crown corporations which may be created from time to time by federal or provincial governments. If this proposal had been followed, several billion dollars would have been available for the development of our energy resources, rather than having this siphoned off by the oil industry while a subservient government stood idly by unable to get even a monitoring system set up until three years after the price increases had taken place.

An examination of the figures by the monitoring survey shows that the exploration and development program has fallen about $2.2 billion short of what would have been available had the proposal we made in 1973-74 been put into effect. I believe history will condemn this government for its failure to ensure that the billions of dollars extracted from the consumers of Canada were reinvested in the development of Canadian energy resources.

There is conclusive evidence that the increased oil revenues have not been used for the development and exploration of our resources to the extent that the increases which were granted have been made available. I refer, for instance, to the statement of Mr. Maurice Strong, chairman of Petro-Canada, as reported in the Globe and Mail of October 6, 1977. The article begins as follows:

> Maurice Strong, chairman of Petro-Canada, says the oil industry is not carrying out enough exploration with the 'tremendous amounts of money' built up through dramatic increases in the price of gasoline and home-heating oil.

The penultimate paragraph reads:

> 'Tremendous amounts of money are building up in the coffers of the oil companies,' Mr. Strong said. The money came from price increases justified by the industry on the basis it needed the cash to develop new supplies.

Referring to a criticism by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that Petro-Canada had spent $100 million on exploration, Mr. Strong said:

> —'but that's peanuts compared to what the private oil companies are spending of Canadian taxpayers' money'

He pointed out that after an oil company has spent $5 million in the north, 95 cents of every dollar are provided by the Government of Canada through the tax breaks devised to help oil companies.

I think few people realize the extent to which the taxpayers of this country finance oil and gas exploration. In the Arctic, if $20 million were spent on one well, the oil company would pay 12 per cent of the cost and the Canadian taxpayer 88 per cent. On page 36 of the pamphlet "An Energy Strategy for Canada" issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, we find that of an increase of $1 per barrel of oil, the industry will receive 25 cents even if it does no exploration at all. If it spends 50 cents per barrel on exploration, then its share of the increase goes up to 53 cents. If it spends 57 cents per barrel on exploration, the provincial government gets 44 cents, the federal government gets nothing, and the oil industry gets 56 cents. That is how generously they are treated. Few people in Canada realize the extent to which they are paying for any oil and gas exploration that takes place in Canada.

The significant thing to be noted is that even if the oil companies do not invest any of their additional revenues in exploration, they will still receive 25 cents out of every dollar increase in the price of a barrel of oil. This means that $1 billion in additional revenue will accrue to the industry and, since the government is now committed to a $1 per barrel increase every six months until the price reaches the world price, this will mean that the oil industry can increase its gross revenue by $2 billion a year without reinvesting any of its price rise in exploration and development. That seems to me to be an horrendous situation, and one of which I am sure the Canadian public is not fully aware.

It is an inexcusable deception to tell the people of Canada that this long series of price increases is being used for the purpose of finding new energy sources when our tax laws allow the companies to do nothing and at the same time pocket 25 per cent of the price increases.

The most damning indictment, however, of the oil industry's performance is the government's own monitoring survey which was issued in 1977 and covers the period from 1971 to 1976. We find that the cash generation in the industry from 1971 to 1976 rose from $1,300 million to $3,059 million, an increase of 135 per cent. In the same period of time net profits increased from $560 million to $1,536 million, an increase of nearly 170 per cent. However, total Canadian capital expenditures rose from $1,143 million to $2,338 million, an increase of only 104 per cent. At the same time, oil industry investments in foreign lands went up from $34.7 million to $231.8 million, which represents an increase of 568 per cent.

The report sums it up by saying that from 1971 to 1976 the companies reporting took in $13.3 billion, and that of this amount, $6.7 billion, over 50 per cent, is represented by federal tax profits.

I apologize to the House for using so many statistics, but when we are asking questions on this subject the minister keeps saying that members are being selective in quoting figures from the monitoring survey, that we have picked out items here and there. As a matter of fact I would be very glad if the minister would table the entire monitoring report as an appendix to Hansard so that everybody could read it. It is only a few pages long.

In order to clear up the matter once and for all regarding what is contained in the monitoring survey, I think it is necessary to put some more figures on the record.

Let me further examine the extent to which these tremendously swollen revenues have been devoted to exploration. The facts prove they were not re-invested into development to the extent the public had been led to believe they would be. To make a fair comparison, the survey compares the total Canadian capital investment in each year as a percentage of the industry's total cash receipts. Table I on page three makes the following comparison, and I will give you the year and the percentage of the total cash revenue which was spent on total Canadian capital investment: 1971, 87.9 per cent; 1972, 75 per cent; 1973, 66.9 per cent; 1974, 65.8 per cent; 1975, 71 per cent; and, 1976, 76.4 per cent.

I want the House to note that the percentage for total capital expenditure varied from 87.9 per cent to 76.4 per cent in 1976, but did not in any of the five years examined equal the proportion which was invested in 1971.

If we take only the money invested for exploration, the figures are even more revealing. They are: 1971, 30 per cent; 1972, 29.8 per cent; 1973, 25.7 per cent; 1974, 23.4 per cent; 1975, 21.8 per cent; and 1976, 24.6 per cent. Here again we see that exploration investment as a percentage of growth revenue at no time in that five year period equalled the 1971 level. As a matter of fact, the report itself sums the matter up very clearly on page 8, and I quote:

> Although the monitoring sample has enjoyed a substantial increase in over-all revenues (and profits) over the 1971-1976 interval, certain negative influences have resulted in domestic capital expenditures failing to maintain the same relative growth throughout the period.

Nothing could be more clear than that, Mr. Speaker. The survey has shown very clearly that the percentage of the gross aggregate income of the oil industry which has gone into exploration has not increased but, as a matter of fact, has declined, and this is something about which the government has done absolutely nothing until now.

I am sure it will not be lost on the Canadian public that while the amounts of money re-invested in Canada from greatly increased revenues and profits did not increase proportionately, the oil majors managed, in the period under review, to invest over $832 million in foreign exploration and development. This is money which was taken out of the pockets of the Canadian consumer on the pretext that it would be spent to find oil and gas in Canada, but instead found its way into foreign oil and gas ventures. During all this time the government, which imposed the price increases, has stood idly by while this money was siphoned out of the pockets of the Canadian consumer.

Let me close now by turning to the bill. What does this bill do? First of all, Bill C-12 does absolutely nothing to improve the situation. We may get more complete information as a result of making it mandatory for oil companies to report semi-annually, although that is doubtful unless the government is prepared to examine the books of these large oil companies and the books of their parent companies. I am not very optimistic that the monitoring system is going to give us all the information we need. Certainly the monitoring that has been done to date, which amounts to only a dozen or more pages, is sketchy and inadequate, and making this mandatory without the government asking for much more detailed information will not help the situation, with the exception that the part of the industry which so far has refused to answer questionnaires and supply the data will be compelled to comply.

The legislation the House is being asked to pass does not require the government to tell the oil industry what part of its swollen revenues should be devoted to exploration and development for our energy needs.

It is now five years since the government started a program of moving the price of Canadian oil and gas steadily toward the world level. During this period we were told regularly that the increased revenues to the companies, apart from their normal increased costs for transportation, refining and processing, would go into exploration and development. It has not happened. There is nothing in this legislation to make it happen.

I hope the minister will show us one clause in this bill which requires the oil and gas industry to spend a specific percentage of its aggregate income upon exploration in Canada. The minister does not even request that power. He is asking for what should have been requested in the first place four or five years ago, namely, that companies must fill in questionnaires providing the government with information as to how much of their aggregate incomes have gone into exploration and development. It was taken for granted that it would be done in the first place. When companies do not comply with the proposition that their increased revenues should result in increased expenditures for finding energy sources, whether renewable or non-renewable, then that requirement should be in the act. It is not there.

This legislation is typical Liberal legislation. It is designed to give the impression that the government is doing something when, as a matter of fact, the government is doing nothing. This is too serious a time for being polite about this question. The energy situation in the world is serious. The energy situation in Canada is serious.

Only a few years ago our nation was an exporter of oil, and is now a net importer of oil. In a matter of only a few years, Canada will be required to import half its oil requirements from outside the country and will pay five times as much per barrel as we received for the oil we shipped to the United States in the days when 60 per cent of Canadian oil went across the line. This is a serious situation.

This country must and can find new sources. There are supplies of conventional oil and gas, as well as great potential supplies of oil in the oil sands and in heavy oil, as technology for extracting the oil is developed. This will require great quantities of capital. The only reason given by the government for allowing oil companies to take billions of dollars out of the pockets of Canadian consumers was on the ground that the capital would be found. The fact is that it has not been spent on a proportionate basis, yet the companies have increased their expenditures for oil research outside Canada.

I see no reason why Canadian consumers should pay more for oil, gasoline and home heating fuel; why farmers should pay more for gasoline for their tractors or the fisherman for fuel for his fishing boat; or why utilities should pay more for their oil in order to generate electricity, when the government enables multinational organizations to take those profits and spend them in foreign ventures in the Middle East, the North Sea, Guatemala, and other parts of the world.

This piece of legislation is merely a sop. It is merely intended to inform the public that the government is on the job watching the oil companies, and to give the impression that some power will be given to the minister in order to carry out the government's commitment to see that increased prices result in increased exploration. There will be no results, because this legislation does not provide the government with the power to compel oil companies to set objectives and goals as to what percentage of their increased revenue will go into exploration and development.

I am glad the President of the United States apparently has become seized of the seriousness of this question. Last October during a press conference he indicated that the energy situation conjures up problems which are just as serious as war. Also he indicated that in many ways it is a moral equivalent of war. In his statement he said:

> As is the case in time of war, there is potential war profiteering in the impending energy crisis. This could develop within the passing months as the biggest rip-off in history.
> The grabbing for the financial rewards is what I deplore in the oil industry.

Whether the President of the United States is able to resolve the energy crisis there or not, we do not know. All of us wish him well. At least he has identified the problem, has put his finger on the culprit, and pointed out those who are to blame for the situation which faces the United States and will face that country in increasing measure.

I am disappointed the Canadian government failed to identify the problem and point out the culprit. Instead, it has brought in legislation which ignores the problem and will only serve the purpose of covering up the real problem so that people will think the government is in control of the oil industry when, as a matter of fact, it is the oil industry which increasingly controls the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-12 now before us to establish a control over oil companies to know how in the future those companies will be able or have to spend the money received from consumers through the sale of oil products is a bill which is undoubtedly important in the eyes of the government but which I think will have to be considered very carefully in the committee of the House of Commons with a view to bringing in certain amendments. I am under the impression after perusing this bill that perhaps it will not give the anticipated results.

Mr. Speaker, we are faced with increasingly important problems in the area of energy. Not so long ago the problem of energy was not in our discussions. It raised no questions, supplies seemed inexhaustible, and all of sudden we find out that there might be a shortage of energy. Last Friday, the minister reminded us in his speech that in the United States last year, as a result of a very severe winter and perhaps a miscalculation on the part of certain networks of distribution, schools and plants had to be closed in many U.S. cities, particularly in eastern cities where fuel had to be allocated for heating homes and hospitals. That allowed us to realize how dependent we are on oil energy in both the United States and Canada, and just a few minutes earlier the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) pointed out that not so long ago Canada was a net exporter of cheap oil, and we are now becoming an importer of high cost oil.

I think there is nothing good about this, and it is important to know what our energy supplies are in Canada, where there are chances of finding oil and natural gas supplies on the Canadian territory. I think surveys have been made, some are now under way and others will have to be made. I do not think that in a country as vast as Canada we have looked everywhere, we have surveyed everywhere to find sources of energy. There are still many areas to be explored to find oil supplies in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, controlling the expenditures made by oil corporations for the search for and development of new energy sources means knowing how the oil companies intend to spend the dollars they receive from Canadian consumers. We often see on television or in newspapers advertisements telling the Canadian consumer: Consume now and pay later. Travel now and pay later. For the past few years, in the case of the sale of petroleum products, the opposite has been done. The consumer has been told: Pay right now to enable the oil companies to accumulate profits in order to search for oil, and presumably to make it available to the consumers. The oil companies did not want to operate the way finance companies ask us to do, namely to commit ourselves financially to search for oil deposits and put them on the market. On the contrary, through the government, they have compelled the consumers to pay for those oil products in advance and at ever growing prices in order to be able to carry out petroleum exploration.

When I hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) telling this House that the aim of these half-yearly increases in oil product prices is to curb the consumption of such products among the population, I say this is a joke of monumental proportions, because the minister knows quite well that the Canadian consumer has definite needs. He has habits which he will not give up, and the minister knows quite well that the rate of oil product consumption will go on as before.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I contend that these petroleum price increases really aim at allowing oil companies to accumulate ever growing profits in order first to satisfy the shareholders of these companies and only then, as I mentioned earlier, to invest in exploration. Yet one often wonders whether this exploration is actually done where it should be and why the announcement of the results, is always made at times which are advantageous to these oil companies, for instance on the eve of petroleum product shortages.

I am convinced that, since the time explorations were started just about everywhere, oil companies already know places where oil deposits can be found. Yet they delay the public disclosure of the result of these explorations, at least at the government's level. So, Mr. Speaker, if this Bill C-12 aims at allowing the government to know those places where oil can be found, it ill be for the greater good of the government and the Canadian people.

For some years, explorations have been carried out in certain Arctic islands, namely King Christian and the Melville Islands. Explorations have also been carried out to determine the most economical or the shortest way to transport the natural gas found in these islands to the places where it will be used. Yet, according to information in my possession, it seems that these natural gas deposits found in these Arctic islands would be sent to the eastern United States or eastern Canada, mainly to the province of Quebec where a supply in natural gas is most needed.

Here is what La Frontière reported under date of November 15, 1972:

> Natural gas, an important element in industrialization, represents only 4 per cent of Quebec's energy, while in Ontario, it reaches 20 per cent. The overall percentage for Canada is 22 per cent.

Needless to say, therefore, it is most important that the province of Quebec should find a source of supplies in one of the finds of natural gas recently made in the Arctic islands. Still, according to the planned route which has just been published, it seems that the pipeline will run through the west, through Hudson Bay, across the Northwest Territories, part of northern Manitoba and Ontario, and then reach the existing pipeline; it seems this gas is intended only for the eastern United States, market, at a time, when Canada is in urgent need of natural gas for its own development.

I therefore ask the minister to have a close look at the natural gas needs of the province of Quebec, the route planned to take the Arctic gas to eastern Canada and the eastern states, to make sure that the industrialized part of Quebec is not overlooked in terms of those sources of gas in the Arctic islands, which, being Canadian sources should serve the Canadian people first. As for surpluses, we do not object to their being exported to our friends south of the border.

I insist on that last point with the minister: the situation warrants a very close look.

● (1602)

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two matters I would like to discuss with regard to this bill. It is a fairly innocuous bill, but it begs the question: does an industry have to invest in itself? Does this bill mean that because oil companies make money on oil and gas they should be required by law to invest in their own industry? If so, should they invest in solar energy, nuclear energy, or in the coal industry? A good many American companies are diversifying because it is not clear whether the government of that country will demand that they invest in uneconomic ways.

The food policy the government is talking about seems to imply that farmers should grow food which is cheap for the consumer but which also allows farmers an adequate return. Does this mean that a farmer who makes money raising pigs should invest in more equipment for pork production, or is he entitled, for example, to buy Canada Savings Bonds or take a well-earned holiday in the south?

It is felt by many people that funds from pension plans should be invested in such things as the housing industry where they would earn reduced rates of interest, although communities would benefit from this kind of investment. However, what is the responsibility of oil companies and other companies to their shareholders?

In the 1972 election campaign the matter of so-called corporate bums was raised, but corporations are made up of shareholders, management and workers. When management personnel receive increases in remuneration, those increases are quickly taxed by the Department of National Revenue. The same is true for workers. If a company expands its operations, presumably more workers and more management will be employed.

Are shareholders entitled to a return on their investment? Funds from private pension plans are invested in stocks, bonds and mortgages, and private pension plans bring in only about 3 per cent. If there is such a great amount of money being made in the oil industry, why are pension plans and registered retirement plans not investing in the oil industry? In many instances there is very little response by corporations to shareholders; that is perhaps because governments direct the management of corporations to expand operations in order to create more jobs.

People with private pension plans are finding that their plans are not keeping up with the cost of living, and some argue that government pension plans are better than any private pension plan in this country.

It was mentioned today that the President of the United States has berated American oil companies, implying that they are something akin to thieves. I think he is taking this stance to cover up the lack of an energy policy in the United States. The American energy policy is a mass of inconsistencies and contradictions. The vice president of the United States, Mr. Mondale, was here recently, and he spoke to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), but many problems were left unsolved. The price of gas flowing through the Alaska pipeline is not clear. In the United States there is argument about whether United States companies should be allowed to buy much needed gas supplies from Mexico and Algeria. The Carter administration does not like the Mexican price, $2.60 per thousand cubic feet. It also does not like the Algerian price, which is about $4.50. The Algerian source is considered to be insecure. The American administration is telling United States companies that they may not be allowed to buy it.

Furthermore, the American administration will not let artificially low domestic prices rise to more realistic international levels. If it did, that would boost domestic exploration and production in the United States, where gas supplies are low. The United States cannot have increased domestic supplies; nor can it increase imports. These contradictions in U.S. energy policy create difficulties for Canada. By roadblocking the Algerian LNG project the American administration is jeopardizing the success of the multimillion dollar processing plant which it is hoped to be built at Lorneville, New Brunswick, and which would give that part of Canada some investment clout.

If $4.50 for Algerian gas is too expensive for the United States administration—although apparently customers are willing to pay that much—what does that imply for Alaskan gas shipped via the proposed Alaska Highway pipeline? That gas may cost more than $5.

Regular prices for gas now being sold in the United States range from 50 cents to $1.50. The President of the United States has implied that he does not foresee the price going beyond $1.75. How can Alaska Highway pipeline investors raise money when it is unclear what the eventual price will be? Perhaps the minister can tell us whether Mr. Mondale told him how a $5 Alaskan gas price will be integrated into the American system if the price is to be kept below $1.75. There seems to me to be no feasible way that Alaskan gas at $5 can be integrated with lower priced American gas in the near future. Without some arrangement as to how Alaskan gas will be priced, there does not seem to be means whereby we can assess whether the pipeline is viable, at least within the next few years.

Energy was high on the list of topics and the minister has not stated as to whether the Alaskan pipeline will be built in full or how the Americans will get the price so that it can be built without government assistance. I believe last week the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) suggested that the price of the pipe line could reach $15 billion to $20 billion. I do not believe that was disputed. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the solution lies in the price of energy. It is a difficult one but it is to allow the domestic price to rise to world levels. Whether we like it or not the Arabs seem to have a corner on the world with respect to the supply of oil and gas, and only through a rise in price will we be able to diversify and obtain energy from other sources.

During the Christmas holidays I was very interested to note that in my riding practically everyone has a wood stove now. Previously they were using oil stoves or electric heat. There is no gas in that part of the country. Obviously because wood is plentiful they have solved their heating problems by using this commodity and it is very cheap for them, particularly if they are willing and have the incentive to cut it themselves.

It is also significant to me that Japan, Germany and Switzerland are paying world prices for oil, yet they are the hard currency countries of the world. Share prices in companies in those countries indicate what has happened. They are at an all time high. Last year in the United States share prices were off 20 per cent and Canada was off 33 per cent. In fact if holding down the price of oil is advantageous to a business economy, then the hard currency countries such as Japan and Germany which pay world prices for oil should be in trouble and we should not.

If there is any value in further statistics, perhaps the minister will inform us in committee. But it seems to me if we are looking to a demand that oil companies, along with other companies, are required to have a specific amount invested in their particular industry, we are courting trouble. After all that is how the Russian system operates. It is based on attempting to assess by government decree what each factory and what each industry should produce. The U.S.S.R. has not given its citizens as nearly as high a standard of living as that in the western world where there is much more flexibility.

I wait with considerable interest to hear an explanation concerning some aspects of this bill. I do believe that if this is the thin edge of the wedge to attempt to tell industry what it should do, it will not in the long run solve our problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words concerning the amendments adopted by the Senate and indicate our support for them.

A good number of amendments as printed in Votes and Proceedings are indeed simply editorial changes and renumbering of particular sections to improve their order. There are, however, several amendments of substance. A group of these deal with the manner of reporting and considering matters in parliament. They are very easy for members to agree to and support. One amendment makes clear that any direction given to the corporation would be by order and, therefore, automatically come within the purview of the statutory instruments committee.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

The Senate also noticed that a provision in the bill indicated that reports could be tabled and made available to committees of the House of Commons. They thought it appropriate that this should read parliament, and that also seems unexceptional.

The Senate also thought it desirable to be sure any orders made in connection with Air Canada would also be tabled in parliament. That now appears in the amendments.

The most important change in substance was the remaining amendment which was the repeal by the Senate of section 6(2) which had been incorporated in the original bill. This was the section which would enable us to make quite sure that any activities which might not at this moment be contemplated as part of appropriate airline business, or indeed related to it, be within the power of Air Canada to carry out, but with the control that governor in council would first have to approve it. There was some concern about the breadth of this in the Senate. However, I see no real difficulty in removing it and we are also recommending concurrence in this amendment.

It is true that sections of the bill incorporating Air Canada's powers as written are very broad and should allow for almost anything that might have been contemplated to have been undertaken by Air Canada in relation to airline activities. I see no great difficulty in saying that if doubt had to be resolved beyond that, we could be back in parliament dealing with it and specifically assuring Air Canada had the power. I should say that Air Canada is, of course, a very major corporation and the temptation might have been to give it power simply of a natural person and avoid even this problem of whether a section such as 6(2) should have been included. The concerns of parliament as to what may be included in its operation no doubt are of consideration in holding the limit on that.

Air Canada has been operating increasingly effectively, and a recent preliminary analysis of its position for the year 1977 confirms that. The corporation will make a significant profit on its 1977 operations compared with a loss in 1976. It is interesting too that the preliminary analysis shows that increases in costs were really of sufficient size that the increase in revenue to Air Canada from the various fare increases which did take place really only offset those increases in actual cost. Therefore, if nothing more had happened, Air Canada would have once again been in a loss position. Two things did happen which are a credit to the direction in which the corporation is going. One is an improvement in income from certain subsidiary activities such as computer operations in reservations which is being used by other companies. This would pretty well have offset the 1976 loss.

The profit would in fact be almost entirely attributed to the fact that in the course of 1977, with improved efficiency of schedules, route management and aircraft management, the number of passenger miles will have increased while the number of people actually involved and employed in carrying out the service will have decreased. This combination of savings on the one hand and improved revenue by better use of aircraft on the other produced the profit.

It is indeed a substantial profit, as we will see when the final report comes before us, but not one which is in any way out of proportion. It certainly will not be an end to the challenge for Air Canada, its employees and management because there is a very large investment here. The profit will not yet look like an adequate return on capital. That is something which may over time be solved.

I did want to take this opportunity in a preliminary way to congratulate the management and all the employees of Air Canada for this job which they have done and to wish them full success in their continuing development of better air service, increased convenience for passengers and at the same time good management and good operations which produce a better profit for the long term credit of the Canadian people, the owners of the airline.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) for outlining the thrust of amendments proposed in the other place and the report the government has rendered thereto.

When this bill or a version of it, Bill C-17 in the last session of the House, was first introduced, it was done with a considerable amount of urgency. Thus it is rather startling that we should still have it before us now. Just to recap, the bill was introduced in this House on October 28, 1976. It sat on the order paper until May, 1977, and was considered in this House and in committee during June and July. At that time we were told it was an absolute must to have the bill passed by summer. But in spite of the pressure and co-operation of the opposition to expedite passage, we find this bill still before us.

I wanted to point this out, particularly after watching the government House leader on "The Nation's Business" last night. He attempted to blame all the failures of the government on the opposition. He implied one of the reasons there is high unemployment is because there is a Conservative opposition. I do not know how many Canadians he expects to believe that. I just want to make the point that the fact that this bill is still before the House is certainly not our fault. It can be said that we exercised more than reasonable give and take. However, the fact it is before the House probably has some justification. I think the Senate has done a very commendable job in this instance.

My colleagues and I welcome the amendments proposed by the other place. We have no difficulty accepting the general thrust of the three substantive amendments, and certainly no problem with the others which are primarily consequential on those three.

The deletion of clause 6(2) certainly meets with our approval. The amendments to clause 17 having to do with the referral of the annual report is, as the minister pointed out, simply a change in wording, from House of Commons to parliament. The immediate tabling of any orders in council under the provisions of clauses 6 and 8 is an excellent amendment. We welcome these amendments and will certainly support them.

I continue to be perplexed by the attitude of the minister. There can be no doubt about our apprehension in committee with regard to clause 6(2). We expressed a great deal of reservation, taking exception to the wide powers that seem to be granted under the provisions of that particular clause. The minister stood firmly and said it was right with might.

We have now been treated to a new attitude of accommodation. I suppose it is because there may be an election in the air. This new attitude of accommodation can only be related to political considerations transcending everything else. The minister probably worries that he has not really achieved all that much since taking over the portfolio. I suppose he is also concerned about his new found colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), who seems to be breathing down his neck. He is not that once great western authority on all things ranging from marketing boards to air transportation to grain.

It is interesting to note that early in February the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, not the Minister of Transport, will be convening a meeting with the three western provincial ministers of transport. I find that very strange. They are going to be discussing some of the recommendations of the Hall report. I am not sure whether the Minister of Transport refuses to meet with his provincial counterparts or whether they refuse to meet with him. Nevertheless, it makes for very interesting contemplation. I suppose the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce finds this a rather interesting and enlightening experience in that he can do two things at the same time. He can improve his stature in western Canada and, at the same time, fight one of his old foes. These are indeed interesting developments.

Getting back to the thrust of the amendments, when dealing with this piece of legislation in committee, my colleagues and I tried to eliminate clause 6(2), albeit unsuccessfully. An amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), was defeated in the committee hearings. Quite frankly, we felt at that time that clause should have been eliminated. We still feel that way. It reads as follows:

> The Governor in Council may, by order, authorize the Corporation to engage in or carry on any activities not otherwise authorized by this Act.

It is clear that these powers are very broad. This was debated at length. It appeared then and it appears now that if Air Canada wish to engage in any activities other than outlined in clause 6(1)(a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), and (i) that this should be done by reference to parliament. In many respects this legislation contemplates a wholesale sell-out of the parliamentary process. The powers that are extended in clauses 6 and 8 are very broad.

When you consider the growing tendency to govern in this country by order in council, the fact that in 1976 something like 3,326 orders in council were passed and only 653 published in the Gazette, it clearly causes alarm and consternation to those of us who want to protect, preserve, and enhance the parliamentary process. In our view it is abuse of the order in council process, a circumvention of the parliamentary process.

It results in a lack of enforcement of regular accountability procedures by the Crown corporations.

Along with this there is an increasing tendency to rely upon commissions, study groups, task forces and royal commissions. This, too, tends to undermine the position of the elected representatives of the people and the idea of the primacy of parliament. It becomes a form of phony participatory democracy. By and large, Canadians are becoming increasingly disenchanted by their involvement with civil servants, regulatory bodies, commissions and so on. I believe they are demanding more direct contact with the representatives they elect to the House of Commons. I believe they want governments to govern.

The procedure presently used to consider and approve departmental estimates is another example of the circumvention of parliament especially when taken together with the government's refusal to strengthen the committee system—what has gone on more closely resembles a weakening process. We seem to be moving ever closer to government by decree.

It is interesting to note that while this legislation was under consideration in the other place, Mr. L. C. Des Bois, secretary to Air Canada, had this to say about clause 6(2) when he appeared as a witness—this is from the Senate committee hearings No. 2 page 19. He stated:

The wording and the concept of clause 6(2) was not suggested by Air Canada; it was proposed by the government itself in the original drafting as a means of avoiding having to go to parliament to clarify a point which was really something that could be administered in the context of the broad powers given to the corporation—

It was not the corporation but the government which sought this provision, even though, as the minister pointed out when he dealt with the matter, it was felt the department would not be called upon very often to exercise a prerogative under this provision.

The main drafter of the bill, Mr. Jim Lyon, who is now working with the Department of Finance, told one of the Senators that the concept of the bill was that the minister was administering the prerogatives of the shareholders. The members of the other place reminded him that, according to a government discussion paper on Crown corporations, it was parliament and not the minister which was empowered to administer the prerogatives of the shareholders of the Crown corporation.

It is interesting to note the following sentence in the document entitled "Crown Corporations, Their Direction, Control and Accountability":

It is commonly understood that Crown corporations, although largely independent of parliamentary scrutiny and control, are still in the final analysis instruments of parliament. Logic then dictates that parliament should exercise what might be called the shareholders prerogative with respect to Crown corporations on behalf of the Canadian public.

Clause 6(2) clearly runs counter to that recommendation. Subparagraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) state in explicit detail the powers and responsibilities of the corporation, and then there is a catch-all clause which states that it —may do such other things as are necessary or incidental to the carrying out of its activities.

After that there is, of course, a "grandfather" clause which provides that the governor in council may authorize the corporation to carry on or engage in any activities not otherwise authorized by the act. Clearly this establishes a very dangerous precedent and one which could be applied to other legislation. I certainly welcome the minister's change of heart in connection with that provision.

We applaud the sentiments expressed by Senator McElman that there is "a growing feeling in parliament that parliament should be more jealous of the powers that it extends by law to ministers to enable them to make regulations." I could not agree more. It would be well for us to bear statements like that in mind when considering other pieces of legislation and the granting of extraordinary powers to corporations such as Air Canada.

We welcome and support the other changes which have been made as a result of the Senate study of this bill. We are pleased with the support the Senate has given to our proposals having to do with the automatic reference of annual reports to the parliamentary committee. We apologize that we failed to insert the word "parliament" rather than "House of Commons". We certainly accept the amendment in good faith. The changes are welcome and I am sure that, as a result of them, the bill will serve the best interests of the airline and of the travelling public.

I should like to turn now to a few other matters which I have found somewhat disturbing, developments which have disappointed large segments of the Canadian population.

Members of this House, particularly those who serve on the transport committee, dealt with this legislation in good faith. There were some aspects of it we felt could be improved, and others about which we are still unhappy. Certain amendments have been accepted and I believe there was a general desire to give Air Canada the legislative framework it required in order that management might do its job more effectively. We made it clear we felt it was incumbent on management to accept its responsibilities to the public and to the House.

This debate comes at a time when the public is seriously questioning the structure and level of air fares in Canada. There is a feeling in many quarters that air passengers are being ripped off; there is also a consensus that in some cases fares bear no relationship to economic realities.

Many of us share the opinion expressed by the Minister of Transport about the management of Air Canada, that it is in the capable hands of a team of credible senior executive officers. We had hoped that this legislation would have been important in helping them carry out and even extend the mandate of one of the truly great national airlines.

Air Canada has come through some very rough periods in the last few years. Losses of $65 to $66 million were incurred over the past three years prior to 1977, so we are naturally happy that this has been reversed and hope the trend will continue. I think most of us consider that the recent profit came about as a result of Air Canada getting the message across to the public that fares in this country are competitive when the price of fuel, landing fees, weather, replacement of equipment and such things are taken into account. Air Canada started talking about a further increase in fares before the bill was introduced, however. Many of us feel this is a mistake and that there is still a lot of productivity to be gained first. I believe we should call upon Air Canada to reconsider its request for a domestic fare increase.

The operation has been streamlined, but I believe there is still room for improvement. Recently management has seen fit to extend free pass privileges to some 20,000 employees, which has since been aborted, but this gesture was not well received by the travelling public who were paying full fare. The resulting controversy was unfortunate and caused embarrassment all around. I do not argue with offering employees a bonus, but I argue with the manner in which it was handled. It may have been good for employer-employee relationships but it was not handled in the right way. The news broke as a result of some good investigative reporting by the Globe and Mail not an announcement by the airline. Surely if the airline had wanted to give a bonus for a job well done in 1977, it should have made a clear public statement and given the rationale behind the decision. The reaction of the Anti-Inflation Board and of Revenue Canada should have been explored. Also, given the fact that we have a tourist trade deficit of $2 billion, it seems to me that the passes should have been restricted to travel in Canada.

It has been the policy of Air Canada and other airlines for a long time to issue passes. I am informed that Air Canada's policy is very generous—perhaps overly generous. Perhaps it should be reviewed and the details made known to the shareholders, namely, the people of Canada. The gesture certainly focused attention on the question of free passes, and there has been considerable response in the media, particularly from people who use Air Canada.

The Ottawa Citizen carried a headline on January 21, 1978, "Free Tickets Standard Procedure on Airlines". The article reads in part as follows:

> Most free airline passes are issued in the interests of public affairs, business, inter-airline competition and generally to promote travel by air.
> That's not to mention, however, the politicians, newspaper representatives, business interests, tour operators and the myriad of air-line employees hitching a free ride.
>
> 'People in high places,' says Air Canada's regional officer Hugh Riopelle, 'are eligible for flight passes, depending on the reason—and business is one of them.'
> Mrs. Edward Dunlop, wife of the president of the Toronto Sun newspaper, for example, recently accompanied her husband to England on a pass called 'Pos F status' for guaranteed seating for free first-class return travel, worth $1,502, plus $8 tax.
> Public affairs officers, managers, salesmen and other top representatives of the 'people's airline' are given quotas of free tickets (either first-class or economy) and it's 'up to the discretion of various offices to dispense the passes as we see fit.'
> A free return ticket generally would apply to any destination serviced by the system.

It is interesting that even relatives of journalists are included amongst those who are issued free passes on our national airlines. That is rather strange as journalists are usually the first to point the finger. I will not say any more, Mr. Speaker, except that I think it is incumbent upon the airline to review its policy regarding passes and to make that policy known to the public.

The third point I want to raise is the airline's attitude toward domestic air charters. In my view the airline's position with respect to promoting discretionary air travel in this country has been selfish to say the least, and certainly is not forward looking. The record will clearly indicate that the airline has responded rather negatively instead of positively in terms of exploiting this vast new discretionary travel market. It has been proven throughout the world that there is a large potential here which involves marketing and getting on with the job.

This is clearly exemplified by the fact that the subscription of Canadian charter class fares which was made available last year was immediately sold out. There has been a substantial increase in the allocation of these seats for this year, and this is a clear indication of a tremendous market potential. Surely it is incumbent upon the airline to get on with the job of capturing that market.

One should be reminded that Air Canada was very reluctant to get involved in a very active way in the international charter market at the beginning. It seems to have adopted the same attitude in respect of the domestic charter market.

My colleague, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), will be talking about Air Canada's attitude in respect of cattle charters, and I would point out that it has been certainly less than positive in this area. The airline seems to lack the innovative requirement and drive to provide a service that is optimum at a reasonable cost. Air Canada does not seem to move unless it is cajoled into doing these things.

The service to Atlantic Canada, about which some of my colleagues from that area will be speaking, is another area the airline has not served, or in respect of which it has not fulfilled its mandate.

It is interesting to note that Air Canada is not alone in this regard. The Gazette of this morning carried an article under the headline "Men Who Fought Laker Find Business Booming". All major airlines fought Freddie Laker and his new concept of a sky train, but what he has done really is expand a market potential which would otherwise not have been there.

The attitude of the minister does not seem to be much improved. If I recall correctly, true to his autocratic form he attempted to prevent the CTC from going ahead with its hearings. We welcome his recent announcement expanding the ABCs relative to the decision handed down by the CTC. I am not sure whether the minister has given such a directive, but I would hope that he and the Air Transport Committee would seriously consider a reduction to 30 days from the 45 days proposed by the CTC.

Mr. Lang: That has been done.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister indicates he has done that, and I welcome that information because I think this is an excellent move. I think the ball now is clearly in the courts of the airlines of this country, and particularly in the court of Air Canada. The challenge is there for the company and I urge management to use some imagination and progressive marketing in exploiting this potential.

Our national airline must certainly be used as an instrument to promote national unity. I get the feeling from time to time that Air Canada is a bit spoiled. Because in fact it has had a captive market for far too long, it has become over-comfortable in its preferred position. It has a long way to go before reaching the status of a truly great airline. It cannot rest on its laurels and it cannot expect the continued good will of the Canadian public. The airline must improve and demonstrate that it intends to become, and will become, a great airline, fulfilling its mandate effectively and efficiently. It will then get the support it deserves.

This brings me to my fourth and final point, having to do with Air Canada's intended acquisition of Nordair. On the surface the announcement appears to reflect a continuation of the policy of a former chief executive officer of the airline, Mr. Pratte, as well as a former minister of transport. They indicated they felt we would be better off in this country with one airline. As a matter of fact I have a quotation from that former chief executive officer. It is a Canadian Press article under the headline "Travel Would Be Better With One Airline".

I believe competition keeps airlines keen, imaginative, and innovative, and I hope it will continue. The proposed acquisition of Nordair by Air Canada runs counter to stated government policy. I am not pleased with Air Canada's proposed plans to acquire Nordair. Air Canada is a national airline, a trunk airline, and not a regional carrier. Therefore its operations are not necessarily compatible with the operations of a regional carrier. It should concentrate primarily on being a truly great national airline.

Furthermore, I am not convinced that monopolization is the answer even in respect of the airline industry. The position the government has taken with regard to this acquisition is not clear. I am not sure that the minister was even informed of the intended offer to purchase. It is quite obvious that Nordair, one of the more successful regional carriers, was being harassed to death by Air Canada, and finally succumbed and offered to sell.

In this connection I should like to quote from a letter written to me back in February, 1975, by a vice president of Nordair. He stated in conclusion:

> Since the regional carrier policy and its application depends to some extent upon the delineation between the role of the mainline carriers including Air Canada and the regional carriers, it is disturbing to think that the country's largest airline has paid so little attention to this problem and is seemingly not interested in what Canada's policy is with regard to the remaining commercial carriers. Needless to say, this is bad news to the regional carriers who have been relying on the regional carrier policy as their planning base for growth and expansion.

That clearly outlines the kind of interference and harassment with which the regional carriers have been afflicted.

The government has stated regional air policy, but it really has not fostered the implementation of that policy. Having regard to what has been allowed to happen over the last few years, I think a re-examination of that policy is necessary. Is it the government's intention to rationalize, and what is the future of regional air carriers in this country? Are we to end up with one mainline carrier and one regional carrier? I do not know what the government plans. In view of the kind of rationalization that appears to be taking place, it is certainly incumbent upon the minister to look once again at regional air policy. He should perhaps delineate some guidelines and patterns for growth in order that this important segment of air transportation can continue to grow, flourish, and meet the challenges of the respective regions.

I see that my time is almost expired and we are approaching the hour for private members' business. Let me simply say that we on this side hope the legislative mechanism which is to be approved in the next little while will provide the kind of framework in which Air Canada can do the job it was intended to do, thereby fulfilling its mandate.

At the same time I want to place on record my very deep concern about this airline infringing upon the regional carriers. Before there is a conclusion of this proposed transaction currently in process between Air Canada and Nordair, I hope the minister will give this House and the country the benefit on his thinking regarding the future of regional carriers, as well as the future of third-level carriers, and give some clear outline of national airline policy in this country.

Mr. Alexander: And that includes Nordair for Hamilton.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Request that basic rate of war disability pension be reconsidered; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Public Service—Allegation departments circumventing growth guidelines; the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) —Agriculture—Food policy conference—Proposals of government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

It is my understanding that an agreement has been reached to proceed directly to motion No. 17 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis).

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, motion No. 4 stands in my name. It is substantially similar to one adopted by the House on December 13, 1977. That motion gave the joint committee 90 days to bring in a report. Forty-eight days have now elapsed, and it is my hope the committee can be named soon in order for it to proceed with its work. With the understanding there will be a naming of that committee this week, I would defer for the present to the agreements which have been worked out with the spokesmen of the various parties.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Of course the Chair can play no part in resolving the request of the hon. member. I cannot give that guarantee. All I can do is ask for unanimous consent to proceed with motion No. 17.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, in respect to the matter raised by the hon. member, it was discussed with me just prior to this time. Arrangements will be made for instructions to be given to our whip to negotiate the members of that committee. Hopefully that will be done tomorrow or the next day in order to put the committee in place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All being well, is there unanimous consent to suspend the consideration of motions Nos. 2, 4, 5, 11, 12, 15, and to proceed directly to motion No. 17?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, while I do not object to unanimous consent, I should like to point out to the Chair that when the majority party needs unanimous consent from all parties to amend an order of the House the representatives of every party should in common decency be consulted. Mr. Speaker, I am the House Leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada and I have always showed understanding and co-operation with all other leaders. I was very surprised when I heard you say just now, Mr. Speaker, that there was unanimous consent, since we had heard nothing about this. I do not know if anyone doubts the existence of my party but I certainly am here as the member for Bellechasse.

I have very often been told that I do not need a microphone to be heard, that my voice is strong enough to reach every corner of the House. I wish to continue to be co-operative and understanding and to facilitate the business of the House. I also wish that when there are consultations, when the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the government House leader, wants to have serious talks with his counterparts, he would call us to his office. I understand that sometimes there have to be hasty consultations on the floor. I understand all that. After ten years in parliament there are certain things you know. You also learn not to let others pull a fast one on you, hoping that you will run for cover like a rabbit.

Mr. Isabelle: Babbitt.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): My colleague, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle), is trying to be funny. I said rabbit intentionally, Mr. Speaker, as I have seen a TV program in which the rabbit was always nosing around, always getting into trouble and always the loser. I do not want to be a rabbit and a loser.

I am willing to go along today with the proposals that have been made, but from now on I want everyone to be aware of our existence and when consultations to get unanimous consent to change the rules are held we should be consulted. I think we will be bright enough to understand that the request is justified and will agree to it. Then, agreement having been reached by the parties in this House, Mr. Speaker will not have to lie. He will be telling the truth.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I understand the hon. member's position, and perhaps I might say just a word. No one spoke to me specifically about what was to be done today. What has been happening in the past few weeks is that a list of the private members' business for the ensuing week has been passed around, and we all see it. When I have received that list, I take it for granted that if I do not object to it, in effect I have agreed to it. I suppose it was taken for granted, since there was no objection by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), that his party agreed as well. Even so, I think his point is well taken. It might be a good idea for the government members who make these arrangements not just to send the sheet around and assume that is the end of it, but actually they should speak to representatives of each of the parties.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, the list referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is posted on the bulletin boards in the lobbies. A close check of that list will indicate that there is an entirely different matter listed for this afternoon. That arrangement was made very late on Friday afternoon. Thus, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) has been asked to fill in at the very last minute, in fact approximately four parliamentary hours before this took place. I appreciate the consternation of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), but the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton is quite prepared to fill in during the time remaining.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not present in the Chamber for all of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). In light of the comments made by Your Honour in respect to this question which has been raised on a number of previous occasions, it is my understanding that unanimous consent implied an arrangement among the individuals who were in fact vying for time in private members' hour, as opposed to unanimous agreement among parties. That may not be an accurate understanding of this, but the comments that have been made in the House certainly give rise to a need for some discussion on how we might deal with this in an orderly manner and in a manner which is agreeable to the House leaders of all parties.

I think that the matter should be taken up at a later date to ensure that this kind of difficulty does not ensue and that there is a general understanding by the House leaders of all parties of the procedures to be followed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The last point made by the minister is quite correct. I think in the ruling given recently the Chair did request a representative of the government to consult with the interested members on the various motions. We are not actually looking at government orders. This is the private members' hour and we are addressing ourselves to motions put forward by private members. Since members are not always available for that kind of consultation, perhaps there is an alternative way of protecting the right of members and that is to approach House leaders, thus ensuring that when a member involved is not available, at least the House leader of his party is contacted and consulted.

[Translation]

To my mind, the point the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) brought up goes beyond the scope of deliberations during the private members' hour. When there is general consultation of the House, occasionally the representative of his party or he himself are not consulted as they should be. During the period assigned to the study of private members' bills, of course we discuss bills introduced by hon. members as private members. When I brought down my decision in this regard shortly before Christmas, I recommended that the government be asked to continue to co-ordinate the business to be dealt with during the private members' period, but to do so in consultation with each hon. member individually. It may be that the suggestion of the hon. member and the criticism of the minister will take us one step further. Those consultations should perhaps include as well the representatives of the parties, to ensure that all hon. members in the House, specially the party leaders in the House, are kept informed of the debates to be held or changes in debates which can come up every day, including the debates held during the private members' period.

Having said that, I shall now submit the following motion to the House—

[Mr. Cafik.]

[English]

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

SUGGESTION TO ESTABLISH STANDING JOINT PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the National Capital Commission is not sufficiently accountable to those who live in the national capital region or the people of Canada, and exercises its powers in an arbitrary manner without adequate consultation with other levels of government and that, as a just step, there should be a permanent standing joint committee on the national capital region.

She said: Mr. Speaker, sometimes it is said that it is the last straw that breaks the camel's back, and I am certain that the government is wondering at the rash of editorials over the weekend and at the press coverage of the appointment of the new chairman of the National Capital Commission, the former hon. member for Westmount. I think it is the straw that breaks the camel's back, because one of the things the people who live and work in this city and who pay taxes have felt is that the NCC has become a political football to this government and has not taken in the cares and concerns of those who live and work in this whole region.

It was Harold L. Ickes who said "I am against government by crony". Public office is a public trust, not a political prize. The recent appointments to the chairmanship of the National Capital Commission suggest that the job qualifications for that position have more to do with partisan public relations and assembly of land than the long range development of the national capital region. It seems that candidates for this position have to be former politicians who are closely linked with the present government.

The future of this city and important relations involving many levels of government across provincial jurisdictions need strong and enlightened leadership. The federal government, however, has completely ignored any but the most partisan considerations in the appointment of the NCC chairman. The ability of the former member for Westmount and of Mr. Juneau are not the issue. At a time when the NCC is at the centre of serious problems in this region, its whole operation must be an example of justice and accountability, both in fact and in appearance.

The NCC has now become what is really a national capital corporation in which the "capital" is represented in the dollars and cents of land management and powerplays redirect millions of dollars worth of buildings without the consultation of local elected people, and not in the creation of a meaningful symbol for our country.

The National Capital Act passed in 1958 states that the purpose of the NCC is to prepare plans and to assist in the development of the national capital region "in accordance with its national significance". Is there national significance in the fact that no elected official of any of the regional or local municipalities of the national capital region sits on the NCC?

In April of 1977 Mr. Pierre Juneau said:

—it is the duty of the NCC to nurture and expand the spirit of co-operation and good will which characterizes its relationship with the community of which it is an inseparable part.

But in its 1975-76 annual report, the NCC maintained that municipal responsibilities "cannot be construed as representing the national interest". It is tragic. How is this statement expected, again in the words of Mr. Juneau, to "expand the spirit of co-operation and good will"?

For most of its history the NCC and its predecessors concerned themselves with the beautification of the capital area. During the 1950s the commission began to assume the job of over-all planning. As the owner of upwards of 40 per cent of the land in the national capital region, the NCC has exerted a strong influence here and has been able to build whatever it wanted on its land without even getting a building permit.

Local groups and politicians have faced a deaf ear when they tried to become involved in their own planning and decision making in their city. There are many examples. The situation at Carlsbad Springs is just one of them, and it is a corner of my wonderful constituency of Ottawa-Carleton.

In 1974 farmers at Carlsbad Springs who wished to discuss expropriation plans involving their lands were told to report their complaints to a tape recorder since no authorized person was available to answer questions. It is no wonder that people at Carlsbad Springs were prompted to say:

We are just not happy with the NCC's behaviour. Poor communications with area residents was the standard pattern and often we would learn of events through press reports.

Mr. Juneau made a solemn commitment to me that he would meet with the residents of Carlsbad Springs, and now he is gone. There have been six chairmen in ten years, and five general managers. The heavy hand of this kind of bureaucratic decision breaks the spirit of people who live in that area. Sometimes I really wish that I could have taken Mr. Juneau up and made him listen to those wonderful farmers who love that land out there, who produce excellent market gardens, but who only live on year to year leases, men who really care about their land ant that it be productive, but yet have no sense of future from the commission.

The recent relocation of federal public servants to Hull is a failure as a planning effort. We have created some of the worst work ghettos. I do not say that certain public servants should not have gone. We should have evened out development on both sides, but producing those cement work ghettos to me is like planning out of a dark age. I have repeatedly received complaints from public servants, not because they had to move to Hull, but because they have to work in giant cold buildings with no souls. If that is the kind of planning which goes on in the Department of Public Works and in the National Capital Commission, we need some fresh air.

Local municipal officials in both Ottawa-Carleton and in the Outaouais region have been justifiably critical of the lack of consultation and information which accompanied the relocation. For many residents of western Quebec the federal relocation to Hull is better described as interference. There is a sense that federal buildings such as Place du Portage are destroying the French culture and language by destroying existing neighbourhoods. I have a feeling we could have done much better.

While all of that was going on, no one thought through the planning process of what should take place here in this city. There were no plans regarding Rideau Centre: it was all talk. There is an incredible number of empty parking spots two blocks away from this beautiful building. There was no planning whatsoever.

The Auditor General has criticized the NCC for a financial arrangement it made with the Department of Public Works involving $22 million for the purchase of land in the central core of Ottawa. Rather than follow the directions of the orders in council authorizing the purchase of these properties, the NCC made an arrangement which avoided the need to seek parliamentary authority for such moves. Planning by the NCC has often been marked, not by the spirit of co-operation about which Mr. Juneau spoke, but by an inclination to move unilaterally. The regional and provicial governments have been moved to call for a reduction of NCC powers in a number of areas. They have called for a reduction of NCC power to expropriate land, for an end to federal intervention in the planning field, and for a realignment of NCC powers to make them more narrow.

It has been suggested that the NCC remove itself from planning altogether and merely be responsible for such things as cultural development in the national capital region. The NCC plan for the national capital region, called "Tomorrow's Capital", favours centralized growth in one area, but the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton plan favours decentralization to a number of areas. Such sharp differences between non-elected officials and elected bodies from the provinces suggest the adoption of a requirement that NCC plans agree with local and regional plans before they become official.

Under the BNA Act the provinces are responsible for municipal affairs, including planning. This planning is often delegated to regional and local officials, yet the federal government, through the NCC, seems to believe that it is the only one which has the constitutional power to plan for the development of the "national interest" in this region. What we need is a definition of what is the national interest. The lack of a proper forum for discussion of the national interest has contributed to intergovernmental tensions.

The legal mandate of the NCC to develop the national capital has become instead a mandate for secret decisions. Rather than sensing the mood of Ottawa and Hull in a spirit of open government, the NCC has operated as a remote, self-sustaining wing of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) office. Sometimes public servants and residents of the city of Ottawa say they have canals and bike paths. We remember the famous time in history when it was said: "Let's give them bread and circuses". That was to divert attention from the fact that in this town we pay higher taxes and a commercial industrial rate about 20 per cent higher than in any other area of Ontario. This is due to the fact that the federal government does not pay its share.

In 1972 journalist Patrick Watson, writing in Maclean's, described the "Cool Trippers" who exist in many government offices. Cool trippers survive and keep the great machine going, not by correcting problems, but by being consummate experts in tolerating the intolerable. Problems are not solved; solutions are not found. Long-term development has given way to maintenance of the status quo through an agency which lacks accountability, access, and openness.

Prior to Christmas there was a breath of hope that this committee would be formed and that we would be well on our way, but half the time of the committee has now gone by and we have not even decided who should be on this committee. That is the kind of thing which makes people feel that the matter of the future of the region has been shoved to one side.

At present it is unclear just what type of consultation takes place. We need a formal, consultative and co-ordinating mechanism to ensure that planning in the national capital region is thorough and based on dialogue, not arbitrary and hidden directives. That is why I believe that the federal government might well consider its commitment to consultation and accountability through a standing committee on the national capital region with representatives from all levels of government. I believe it is here in this parliament that there should be input with regard to the public interest and to the future of the national capital region.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I support this motion. I commend the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) for introducing it to this House. I cannot agree with all the remarks she has made in the course of this debate, but I am in substantial agreement with the general thrust of her complaint about the National Capital Commission.

Contrary to the opinion of the hon. lady who just spoke, I believe that the new chairman of the National Capital Commission will make a great contribution in that position. He brings to it a very great background of experience. He is sensitive, he is a bilingual person, and he knows as much as any member of this House or anyone outside it the problems of this region and the special character of the national capital. At this stage of his career it is a challenge for him to prove that he can make this further contribution and leave his mark. I believe he is so motivated, and I look forward to a good chairmanship and a good regime under the former member for Westmount.

That is not to say that I am not without reservations about what is going on. I cannot help but express my concern about the fact that a motion adopted on December 13 in this House to strike a joint committee of this place and the other place to deal with matters of the National Capital Commission has not been followed through. It is now 48 days since the motion was passed, and the committee was given instructions to bring its report in within 90 days. This is manifestly impossible. The time will have to be extended, and there is very important work to be done.

There are many things one could say about the National Capital Commission. The very concept of running a national capital through a Crown corporation is something which has always puzzled me. The National Capital Commission is not elected, as the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton said. There is not a single elected person on the commission. The commission talks about its mandate. I have attended public meetings at which planners for the commission talked about their mandate, as if nobody else in the room had a mandate and as if elected people had no mandate at all.

According to those planners, only this Crown corporation, the existence of which is at the decree of the executive, has a mandate to do great things. It is my hope that members of this temporary joint committee—the motion before us would create a permanent one—would go to Washington for a short visit. We can learn a great deal from Washington's experience. There is a body in Washington called the National Capital Planning Commission. That body is not permitted to have title to one acre of land. That body is restricted to an advisory and planning capacity, and that came out of the bitter experience of what happened in Washington when an authoritative federal agency tried to deal with a heavy hand and misused ownership of land in an attempt to impose its view.

No clearer example of misuse of the power of land ownership can be seen than in the present National Capital Commission. Members of the NCC and spokesmen for them appeared before the joint committee over a year ago and argued that they had a vision as to how the national capital should be planned. There was a day when they alone had the technical expertise to do planning, but the growth of planning capacity in the regional municipality on the Quebec side, Communauté Régionale de l'Outaouais, and in the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton on this side has brought an entirely new element into the picture. The planning resources at local disposal are substantially in excess of the planning resources at the disposal of the National Capital Commission.

When the National Capital Commission publishes a document, such as "Invitation to Dialogue", which it published in 1975, it said it would create a community of 100,000 in Carlsbad and 100,000 on the other side of the river near Aylmer, and link them with a transportation corridor, a corridor going from a place where no one existed to another place where no one existed, at a time when we have negative growth forecast in the national capital region itself and the government is implementing a policy of decentralization. The National Capital Commission have given the figure of 25,000 jobs—that is their figure—to be moved out of the national capital region as part of the decentralization process. They mentioned that figure in their 1975 annual report. I am happy to note that that figure has been substantially revised downwards in the order of 15,000 jobs, of which only 5,000 are permanent.

Nevertheless it was inconceivable to me what monstrously bad planning advice the NCC offered. Then it said to the regional municipalities: "If you don't conform to our vision of how things are going to be, you can't cross our land". They own large blocks of land in this region, and they threatened in an arbitrary, tryannical, irresponsible fashion to thwart the plans of the regional municipalities, plans which were arrived at after extensive public hearings in a democratic way, because they did not conform to the ideals of those heaven-sent planners hired by the Crown corporation called the National Capital Commission.

If we can learn anything from the Washington experience it is that we cannot create a body with excessive powers which are essentially based on land ownership. And based on its current concept of its mandate it should not be permitted, although theoretically responsible to an elected body, indirectly to the cabinet through its Crown corporation status, to act in the way that the Auditor General criticized when they subverted the will of parliament in the exchange of properties they had no business acquiring, in the way in which they kept their books, and in the way they let contracts without tenders.

There is a house cleaning job to be done in that commission. I want to say, to the credit of the former chairman, who I think was a conscientious and good chairman, that he became aware of the magnitude of the problem and he kept a low profile. He quietly worked at improving relations and brought a personal integrity to his job, and I want to pay tribute to him for that on this occasion.

The task of re-examining the powers and functions of the National Capital Commission is an imperative task. Those of us who are residents of the area say to the members of this place and the other place who will serve on that committee: "Please take an interest and do a job." We want this capital to be a place that is a showpiece, a pride, a symbol of Canadian nationhood. We want it to be a place where the two official languages and the various cultures that have made this country will all feel at home; a place where there is a part of them in this national symbol. But we want it also to be a democratic capital with its two systems of property and civil law, one on the Quebec side and one on the Ontario side; a capital with its two systems of education, and the multiplicity that is involved in the most complicated national capital that any nation in the modern world has attempted to create. The task, Mr. Speaker, is a very great task. I hope that the committee will be struck and that the terms of reference will be before it shortly. I hope too that hon. members will proceed and a report will follow which will be of great assistance to the government and the new chairman for setting the policy for the years ahead.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, even though the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) may have some matters on which they do not agree, they are in agreement on what is being asked for, both in this motion and in the motion in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, although that one is not before us today. In both cases they are seeking some democratization of the operations of the National Capital Commission. That is a position, Mr. Speaker, that I think should be fully supported by this House.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Ottawa West say a few things which make it clear that he realizes, even though he is an Ottawa resident, that there is a sense in which this area belongs to Canada. It is the nation's capital. It is appropriate that the people of Canada through their parliament and their government should have something to say about what goes on in the planning of this general area. As I say, no one quarrels with that. But from that position the National Capital Commission seems to have evolved in a way which, as both previous speakers have pointed out, includes no elected members and operates on its own self-created mandate. I believe that point has been made today by the two members from Ottawa who have already spoken and who deserve our full support. I hope they will stick with it, and that other members from the Ottawa area as well as some of us who have spent quite a few years in the Ottawa area will also continue to do so.

Having said that, I have no desire to prevent others from speaking or to contribute to the talking out of this motion; I would like to see it carried. I realize there is a problem of whether we want a special committee or a standing committee, that some negotiations may have to take place, but I hope the opinion of the House this afternoon will be clearly in favour, as I say, of the democratization of the running of the National Capital Commission.

While I am on my feet, may I say that I know there is hardly anybody in the House who does not know what is on my mind, but I want to say again that I greatly deplore the lack of planning that has resulted in this cluster of high rise structures in one part of this city. I have often spoken about this from the point of view of one who lives a few miles away and can still see the Peace Tower from my bedroom window out on Commanche Drive. Woe betide the developer who happens to put a highrise building between me and the Peace Tower!

I have spoken about this from the viewpoint of those who are on the ground. There are areas in many parts of the city where one used to be able to see the Peace Tower when driving around, but now in most areas it is blocked out. A couple of times lately, when flying in and out of the city I have had a particularly good view of the place. Usually my flights in and out of the city are over Parkwood Hills and Kanata and on we go; we come in on that same runway time and time again. But a couple of times lately on clear days the plane has circled around to the east and we have been able to see the whole of the city at once. It hits me between the eyes when I look down and see those clusters of highrise buildings all in one place. They should at least have been spread out. Some are in the suburbs but most are right in the centre of the city, and unfortunately, it is creating a core which is an eyesore and which does not make any sense. Indeed, from the air one can hardly see the Peace Tower, because of all the other high structures. I think it is contrary to the whole idea expressed by the hon. member for Ottawa West that this is the nation's capital. This being the nation's capital, I think this building and its Peace Tower have a symbolism which is very important, and I am sorry that that symbolism and that view have to a large extent been blotted out. You cannot ask anyone to tear down these tall buildings, but I hope there will be some better planning of this city in the years that lie ahead.

Towards that end, I support the whole idea that the planning of this area should be done in a democratic way. Therefore, I commend the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton for the motion she has brought before the House this afternoon.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in this debate on motion No. 17 presented by the member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). It does seem that this motion is excellent but it is twofold. The first part is a critic addressed to the National Capital Commission and concerns its actions since its inception. That is the negative part of it. The other part is rather constructive. It states that a permanent joint committee should be constituted.

First of all, let me say that I do not favour the creation of a permanent joint committee but rather that of a permanent committee of the House of Commons which, when parliament is in session, would study the complaints and concerns of the various groups and municipalities in the national capital region. I think there is something like it in Washington which is called the District of Columbia committee made out of representatives from the Congress who, every year, study the problems facing the District of Columbia, be it concerning estimates or other matters. In my opinion this is an excellent idea.

What we should recall is that we must always take into account the history of the National Capital Commission and the national capital region itself. I have heard the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) criticize the skyline which is now hiding the magnificent view of parliament but it all boils down to say that if we had listened to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we would have today some kind of a federal district and this would never have happened.

If we have high-rise buildings hiding Parliament Hill from just about everywhere—and the same kind of planning, the same type of design took place on the Quebec side—it is precisely because there have been quarrels among politicians while the National Capital Commission or the Federal District Commission as it was called then, opposed the construction of these high-rise buildings. However, the Federal District Commission had no jurisdiction over the Ottawa city council nor dit it have any such authority over the municipalities in the national capital region. And if we study the act which governs the National Capital Commission, we realize that it is not vested with any power.

If we now have problems with the National Capital Commission, it is because, like my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) has already said, there have been many changes and extraordinary evolution in the national capital area. Before there were no regional communities on either side of the river. There were simply municipalities which could not afford urban planners. In fact, urban planners were rare at that time and municipal authorities used to borrow the services of National Capital Commission urban planners to develop rural municipalities and cities within the national capital area.

But this has changed. Nowadays nearly all cities hire urban planners. They have consultants. Urban planners are like economists: Half will say that such and such a project is good for a certain area and the other half will say that it is unpractical. It is somewhat like writers who can write very good novels but whose stories would seem ridiculous if they were applied to reality. They are nice stories, but they could not happen in practice. It is the people who have spoiled the structures of the National Capital Commission, and it did have weaknesses in the past. In my opinion, it no longer has.

It has had certain inherent human weaknesses because its destiny is controlled by human beings and its mandate comes from the government. I hear the opposition critics say: Oh, those are political appointments. Whether it be the Liberal or the Progressive Conservative government, I am sure that the Conservative government made certain appointments around 1958; I am not sure, but I have the impression that it did. But in the present case, the case of Mr. Drury, who has been appointed chairman of the commission, I am sure he will do an excellent job. When he takes over his office, I am sure that his first request will not be for a map of the region to see where he is, and this, at least, is something. He has been living in the area for 30 years. He served as Minister of Public Works, and we know what the NCC owes him during that term, since at the time the Commission came under Public Works.

So we had several chairmen, and since then evolution followed its normal course. We did not use to hear about the NCC. In the Ottawa-Hull area, people used to phone their members of parliament to ask when the NCC would be expropriating them, and that was going on on both sides. Everybody was waiting to be expropriated. There were not that many expropriations, but let us say that everybody waited for the NCC before selling their house and property which often were not worth anything. And I think that the NCC has changed. At that time, we did not use to hear about it because, as I said earlier, the professional services of the NCC were used on both sides, so we did not use to hear about it, and it was a good thing at the time. But today this has degenerated into conflicts of interest between experts, and I think that experts are not worth anything. They are good once in a while when a war breaks out in order to know whether the cannon is going to fire left or right, because a cannon that fires to the left when it is aimed at right is no good. That is all right. And, besides, they are ideologists, people who try to put down on paper things that do not make sense.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Big payrolls.

Mr. Isabelle: You are right. We had NCC chairmen who were exceptional, and we can name them. Mr. Fullerton is one of them, for example. Mr. Fullerton prepared an explosive report that upset some people. He actually told how things really were in the national capital area which is overgoverned and overtaxed. So, Mr. Fullerton made a report and, naturally, it caused confusion among the mayors and the elected representatives within the national capital area. Then there was that poor Mr. Gallant who was an excellent chairman, but he had to pick up the pieces because people were not talking to one another on either side.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): He became gallant.

Mr. Isabelle: He became gallant. With time he turned out to be a good diplomat, he patched things up and became an excellent mediator. And then Mr. Juneau "arrived" while the National Capital Commission was going through an adjustment process with all the changes that had occurred in the region. At first Mr. Juneau was not accepted by representatives of different municipal bodies from either side but in the end everybody deplored his departure. But everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as someone leaves, he is offered congratulations and all sorts of good things, even from his opponents. But he had gained the confidence of the public.

Now we have a new chairman and I am sure he will render exceptional services to the population and more particularly to the national capital region. He will do so because the leaders of this region should understand that if we are part of the national capital region, we should depoliticize our problems. I believe we should try a formula to reflect in the national capital area the best of Canada's beauty and greatness. It must be the nation's focus and soul. Certainly this cannot be done amidst dissension or it cannot be built on bickering, or great walls of China. It can only be done in a spirit of co-operation.

Mr. Speaker, speaking of co-operation the thing that struck me most in Washington were the various frameworks ruling the District of Columbia. But before discussing that I must say it would be a great thing if all members of the National Capital commission were elected. Unfortunately there can be no agreement at the municipal government level, nor at the regional community level, so how can there be agreement when they are part of two different entities? Each time provincial governments come here, people from the area catch cold or pneumonia, and the impact is on the NCC. Every time Toronto says to do something Ottawa complies, and every time Quebec says something, Hull follows. How then can there be co-operation? This is a total mess!

If on the other hand we had elected people, people representing Canada as a whole, because in this way is the National Capital Commission formed, if we had a chairman nominated not on account of political allegiance, not because the government is Liberal, but chosen among senators, judges, Progressive Conservatives because of his qualifications, as was done in the past without any outcry.

So let me come back to my experience in the District of Columbia. It might be a good thing if elective representatives in the area pressed reeves to group themselves into in a council of governments as was done in the District of Columbia. This is an assembly comprised of representatives of all groups within the District of Columbia. Those elective representatives meet in general assembly to elect a ten-man executive. Members of that executive group neither govern nor control, because they have no power other than persuasion. Whenever there are differences among governments on a given project, those members go back and forth between governments to convince them it is in the region's greater interest. It is something in the nature of a guiding light or a life buoy.

In my view, the various municipal councils in the area should meet along those lines, they should create an executive to do some lobbying with the various levels of government, for the good administration of the national capital area. For example, we have the convention centre. The battle is on. Will Hull have it, will Ottawa have it, who knows? Everybody is lobbying. It should not be that way. If economic development is what we want for this region, we should decide and say: this time you will have it, next time it will be our turn, all in order to spur the economy and create economic benefits for the entire region.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we should not let this become a political sounding board, and I think the National Capital Commission has played a vital role in that matter. Of course, the committee will make recommendations, and I am sure that in view of the developments of the last 15 years, the government will not lend a deaf ear, and will do what it has to do to keep in step and give the national capital the best of all possible governments. I am not sure that if we had gone along with the idea of a federal district we would not know all the problems we find ourselves enmeshed in today. Regardless of political allegiances, we should all work in the same direction, in order to create an image, a crystallisation of all the aspirations described by politicians and prime ministers on the topic of a capital of a country, a nation, Ottawa. That is why I think we failed for not doing it, and that is why we find ourselves a bit short-handed today, trying to patch up that which was excellent in the beginning, but which was unfortunately left to stagnate for the past 50 years.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few comments I wanted to make on this motion, and as I said at the outset, this is a two part motion, one being critical, negative and political, the other being constructive, except that I would not want to see the Senate sit on this committee, but rather a committee of the House which would review the funds, complaints, and studies, and which would hear the citizens at least once a year.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): It is with considerable pride that I take part in the debate on the motion before us this afternoon. This is my first opportunity to speak as parliamentary secretary on the subject of the National Capital Commission. I want to begin by congratulating all the previous speakers. They spoke eloquently and well. I suspect one of the reasons they spoke so well was their pride in what we often refer to as the nation's capital.

We have heard some criticism of the fact that there will be no elected federal members of the commission, but it should be borne in mind that this is the national capital and that there is adequate representation on the commission of the provinces and of the territories.

With respect to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) may I say that, though the hon. lady made some good points, I regret she should have taken a political approach by slamming the recent appointment of the former member for Westmount (Mr. Drury). I think we should give credit where it is due to a man who has distinguished himself throughout the years, serving his country with distinction both in time of war and subsequently in government. I would have thought hon. members would have done him the courtesy of at least allowing him to get his feet under the desk before beginning to criticize him. We did not criticize the hon. lady in advance when she was appointed opposition critic in this field. We thought we would wait and see what her approach would be. However, with respect to intergovernmental coordination the National Capital Commission is firmly committed to the fullest possible co-ordination and co-operation with other levels of government. This has been one of Mr. Pierre Juneau's highest priorities and my former colleague, Mr. Drury, has stated that he, too, will concentrate his efforts in this area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the parliamentary secretary. It is six o'clock and I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang for the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to ask the government House leader or the government whip or whoever is responsible to consider arranging the cancellation of the meeting tonight of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Since this House is also debating a bill on transportation, a number of members are involved in both forums. Could the government House leader or someone tell us whether the committee meeting will be cancelled?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I expect that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will be in the House shortly and will attempt to work out some accommodation to meet the point raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the hour is late for that kind of arrangement. I had discussions prior to six o'clock with various members and have been on the telephone for the last two hours but could not reach the people I wanted. That was not their fault. I wanted to speak on this bill tonight and refer to the amendments now before the House. I particularly wanted to comment on the remarks of my good friend the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), who spoke of total approval of the bill, which scares me a little. I also wanted to refer to what the minister said about relieving Air Canada of its special obligations. In fact, I wanted to comment on what this whole issue of competition in public transportation involves in Canada.

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications is meeting tonight to consider the Aeronautics Act. We arranged for two witnesses to appear last week and again tonight, both of whom I understand are from Ottawa. I and other members of the House are involved in that matter as members of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Since we cannot be in both places at once, and since the arrangement for the committee to meet was certainly prior to the calling of this bill for debate, I feel my place and the place of other hon. members is at the meeting of the standing committee. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will forgo the remarks I should like to make on this bill and I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That this debate be now adjourned.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might rise on a point of order before the hon. member puts his motion. I know he is ready to put the motion, but if he would accept some accommodation perhaps we might have an opportunity to solve this problem. He has brought the matter forward in just the last few minutes, so perhaps he would give us a little time in which this problem might be resolved, rather than moving the adjournment of the debate which, at the moment, we would have to oppose.

Mr. Benjamin: In reply to the point raised by the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform him that I was in discussion with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) prior to five o'clock, and I was informed shortly thereafter that the committee meeting would not be cancelled. Since I have work to do both in that committee and here in respect of this bill I am at a loss as to what should be done next. I tried to phone both the chairman of the committee and the parliamentary secretary and succeeded in reaching the parliamentary secretary a few minutes before six. I informed him how I felt about this matter and suggested that I was left with no alternative, unless I was advised before this time that the committee meeting had been cancelled. If it has not been cancelled then I would ask that my motion be put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not debatable.

Mr. Alexander: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MacEachen: This is on the point of order.

Mr. Lapointe: On the motion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I recognize the parliamentary secretary on the point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to correct the facts somewhat for my hon. colleagues who will have to vote on this motion. You will easily understand, Mr. Speaker, that it was not easy to anticipate early today how long the debate would last on Bill C-12 introduced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). Thus, it was also difficult to anticipate how much time the hon. members would take to debate the motion relating to the legislation amended by the Senate, that is the Air Canada legislation.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, surely it is clear that this motion is not debatable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary is on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but he said he was on a point of order and he is not. He is debating a motion that is not debatable.

Mr. Alexander: Put the motion.

An hon. Member: He is trying to get some information.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the parliamentary secretary indicate the nature of his point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, I am merely trying to clarify the situation so that hon. members can vote advisedly on the motion of the hon. member. Mr. Speaker, I believe that later in the day an attempt was made to cancel the meeting planned for the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications this evening. The witnesses from Toronto and Montreal were already in Ottawa and we were unable to reach them between 5.30 and 6.30.

[English]

An hon. Member: He is just stalling.

Mr. Alexander: This is debate and he is out of order.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if you are going to allow the parliamentary secretary—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would like to listen to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is not speaking to a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benjamin: He is not on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): We have one point of order before the House at the present time and I am prepared to listen to the minister's parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Benjamin: For how long?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, I was explaining that we tried in every possible way to reach the witnesses who are to appear this evening before the committee on transport and communications. Still, neither the committee chairman nor myself were able to do so and that is why we could not cancel the committee meeting this evening. I believe the hon. member who was supposed to speak when the sitting resumed tonight on the bill dealing with Air Canada could easily have done so in the 20 or 30 minutes allowed him; he could then have come to join us in committee and continued with the business at hand.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I readily accept the upbraiding of the parliamentary secretary to the effect that we should have been here at 7.55 p.m. to express our views on Bill C-3. One cannot be everywhere at the same time. Before six o'clock, I told the parliamentary secretary that I had some comments to make on this bill. Mr. Speaker, if I am denied the right to speak for procedural reasons, I shall abide by your decision, but if I am still allowed to speak, I shall avail myself of that right, not to indulge in negative but rather in objective criticism. Mr. Speaker, with your permission, if I am allowed to speak, I shall do so, but if you rule that I am not entitled to speak, I shall keep silent. The decision is yours.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), that this debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUEST THAT BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, January 25, as recorded in Hansard at page 2232, I put this question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald):

In view of the increasing concern on the part of veterans across Canada over the refusal of the government to restore the basic rate of the war disability pension to the average take-home pay of the five categories of public servants designated in 1973, has the minister resubmitted this matter to the cabinet, asking for a reversal of the negative decision which he announced a couple of months ago?

The reply of the Minister of Veterans Affairs was in these words:

No, Mr. Speaker, I have not resubmitted this question, but I would like to remind the House that on January 1 there was an increase of 7.2 per cent in disability pensions across this country. As I stated previously, when the government sees things in a different light, I will bring this matter back to it.

In my supplementary question I pointed out that the 7.2 per cent increase which came into effect this month because of legislation that is on the statute books was something entirely different from the restoration of the basic rate to the formula agreed upon in 1973. It was this that I asked the minister to take back again to cabinet.

In my supplementary I also referred to the problem which still exists in that when a veteran dies having been on a pension of less than 48 per cent there is no automatic pension for his widow. I also pointed out that there is still no compensation available to veterans who were prisoners of war in the first world war. I underline the urgency of these two matters which I brought forward in my supplementary but tonight I shall speak mainly on the question of the basic rate.

I might say that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has expressed to me his regret that he could not be here tonight to give his personal reply to the question I am raising, and I assume the parliamentary secretary will be making the reply. I want to say to the parliamentary secretary that seldom will he be called upon to deal with a more important issue of principle than the one involved in this question. It is not just the standard request for more money.

There is a lot of history behind this. Before I was elected to this chamber, in fact shortly after the first world war, disability pensions were set up on the basis of 100 per cent disability being related to a certain level of pay in the civil service, as it was then called. But over the decades this standard got worn down so that by the time of the second world war the principle had been lost and disability pensions under the Pension Act were set arbitrarily. During the second world war we tried to get back to an acceptable formula and we kept trying in the years which followed. Finally, in 1973, after a tripartite committee and the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs had studied the question and made recommendations, the government agreed to set the 100 per cent disability rate at the level of the average take-home pay of five designated categories within the public service.

There was also the recommendation that this practice should be continued in perpetuity. The government did not accept this latter point of view but undertook to deal with that question later. It said: For the time being we will accept these figures for 1973 and increase pensions in succeeding years by the percentage by which the cost of living increases. That is what has happened since. The result is that a very wide gap has developed between the average pay of the federal public service in the five categories chosen and the amount of the 100 per cent disability pension.

What veterans are asking is good faith on the part of the government. They are asking that the principle fought for at the end of World War I and again at the end of World War II and finally won in 1973 be sustained. I plead with the parliamentary secretary not to say that the 7.2 per cent cost of living increase fills the bill. It does not. Veterans know what that does. It still leaves them behind the standard of living which can be attained by those who are able to work because they have not suffered war disability.

This is not just one more request by members of the opposition for more money to be spent here or there. We are asking for recognition of a principle which was sacred at the end of World War I, agreed upon at the end of World War II, and confirmed in 1973, a principle which is now being lost by the refusal of the government to restore the pension to the figure set by the 1973 formula.

My plea to the minister the other day was that he should take this matter back to cabinet despite the fact that he announced a few months ago that the answer was no. I hope the parliamentary secretary is in a position to assure us tonight that his minister recognizes the seriousness of this issue and that he will take the matter back to cabinet and seek a reversal of that negative decision during the present session of parliament.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, lest there be any question that the minister or myself believes that this is a very serious matter, I think it should be stated here categorically that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has, since he has taken this post, always had the best interests of the veterans at heart.

As the hon. member knows, this question has been brought up repeatedly in this House. I am going to reiterate what has already been said about the 7.2 per cent increase which came about on January 1. However, one thing that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did not mention was that the basic rate for an unmarried 100 per cent pensioner is now $596.70 per month. In the case of a married 100 per cent pensioner, the figure is $745.88 per month; and if he and his wife have two dependent children, his pension has been increased to $880.15 per month.

In so far as the pro rata pension to widows of pensioned veterans is concerned, there is nothing new to add since a statement was last made on this subject.

The suggestion has been made that a widow should receive a pro rata pension if her husband had been in receipt of a disability pension of 47 per cent or less. This is because she would be fully pensionable as a widow if his pension had been 48 per cent or more at the time of death. What is sometimes missed is that the widow will be pensioned if her husband's death occurred during wartime or was attributable to his service, regardless of the degree of the assessment of his disability.

The question which arises is whether, if death was not in any way attributable to military service, a widow's pension should be paid because of the service connection. We know and the hon. member knows—I say this in all sincerity—that the benefits provided to the disabled serviceman or woman, or to their surviving dependents, are far greater than those provided by most other countries. I am not aware of any of our major wartime allies who pay automatic survivor benefits to widows approaching the 48 per cent basis which we in Canada use.

With regard to providing pensions for first world war prisoners of war, the minister has stated and I repeat tonight, that this is under very active consideration and that a decision will be made shortly.

I have served with the hon. member for a number of years on the Standing Committee of Veterans Affairs. I would ask him if he would take those things which have been done into consideration. We hope that those things yet to be accomplished will come about very quickly.

PUBLIC SERVICE—ALLEGATION DEPARTMENT CIRCUMVENTING GROWTH GUIDELINES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, tonight I am calling for the subject of contracting out in the civil service and the hiring through private employment agencies to be referred to a standing committee. I also ask that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) be asked to appear before that committee to explain government policy in regard to these hiring practices which completely contradict his statement of February 16, 1977, that public service growth would be restricted to 0.6 per cent.

Growth is growth and this method of hiring through the backdoor requires an explanation from the government. The Public Service Alliance has launched an all-out campaign against these two practices and it is quite obvious that there is a complete breakdown in communication and consultation between the government and the alliance. It has almost reached the stage of open warfare.

To add to the complete confusion, private employment agencies claim there is a threat to their future. The minister should not only explain to the committee why all this extra growth is needed but why the government is not using the services of Canada Manpower when extra help is needed, especially when there are one million unemployed Canadians.

I should like to read into the record some of the concerns of the Public Service Alliance which are expressed in their publication, the Argus Journal. It is no wonder we have no morale in the public service. The alliance should also be allowed to appear before the committee to present its side of the story.

In one of the latest publications the alliance has printed a questionnaire for distribution to the membership. It is entitled "The Great Government Cover-up". The alliance urges its members to answer the questionnaire as fully as possible.

The concern is shown in another article headed "Contracting out: the Great Government Cover-Up", which states in part:

> Contracting out is expensive: the government claims it is keeping down annual increases in the size of the public service while at the same time expanding work done for the government by private firms.

● (2232)

> There is little or no control over the quality of or accountability for work done by private contractors.

[Mr. Parent.]

> Contracting out leaves politicians open to the temptation to give contracts to "friends" who might be supporters in past or future election campaigns.
> There is even danger that some sections of government departments might disappear because of the increasing trend to contracting out.
> Some firms that hold government contracts exploit their employees.

Another article states under the heading "Members' jobs are on the line as contracting out increases":

> The loss of government jobs is a crucial issue but there is more to it than that. The PSAC has opposed contracting out for more reasons than job security.
> First, it is dishonest. The government says it is limiting the growth of the public service; in fact it is using contracting out to cover up an expansion of service growth. While limiting public service spending, the government is increasing costly professional and special contractual services.

Another article is headed "New guidelines no solution" and states in part:

> The government has drawn up new guidelines on the use by departments of temporary help in the administrative support category in the National Capital Region. But PSAC President Andy Stewart points out that the guidelines don't go far enough to eliminate the profit being raked off by middlemen. In Ottawa-Hull alone, he estimates, there are now more than 2,000 people in government offices who are supplied by personnel agencies.

The article goes on to state:

> However, Brother Stewart says the only acceptable solution would be to do away entirely with temporary help employees.
> "As an alternative, the Public Services Commission should establish a pool of qualified public service employees to draw on for temporary help. In this way the total payment for services would accrue to the employees themselves."

These alternatives should be fully discussed by a parliamentary committee.

I would also like to refer to a letter to the editor of the Winnipeg Tribune written by a MOT safety inspector. He states in part:

> My colleagues and I service, maintain and certify all the complex communications, navigational aids, radar and electronics control equipment . . . To attempt to contract out to inexperienced, untrained, incapable maintenance personnel, the absolute requirement of high quality and availability of electronic services to everyone who flies in Canadian air space is a flagrant disregard for the SAFETY of anyone who flies.
> To falsely claim to be saving the taxpayer money while at the same time heedlessly compromising your SAFETY and mine represents at the very least, a conscious criminal act.

In light of these serious charges and this continuing battle between the government and the civil service, I am sure the parliamentary secretary will say there is no alternative but to bring this whole subject matter out in the open by having it fully discussed before a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is recognized that the use of temporary help company employees has been increasing over the last few years. Consequently the Treasury Board has recently approved and issued a policy statement and guidelines on the appropriate use of such services in the administrative support category in the national capital region. Under the guidelines, agency employees are to be used only where an unexpected vacancy or workload increase occurs without sufficient notice to carry out normal staffing action. Arrangements for temporary help will be limited to eight weeks' duration. In order to provide a measure of control over the qualifications of personnel supplied through the agencies, and over rates paid, DSS will become the sole contracting authority for such services on April 1 of this year.

In order to provide a measure of control, the Department of Supply and Services will be the only government department with authority in these matters. In addition, departments are also being asked to maintain adequate records on the utilization of such services and to ensure that personnel provided meet the qualification standards specified in the contracts. At the end of one year these operations under the new system will be evaluated by the Treasury Board secretariat. It will evaluate the effectiveness of this policy and guidelines by utilizing departmental records and data supplied by the Department of Supply and Services. Changes have been made, and further attempts are being made to control this.

Further, it will be ensured that where possible public servants are replaced by other public servants through such actions as redeployment of existing resources, and use of transfers, acting appointments or specified period appointments, as appropriate, in accordance with the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act. Where there is temporary administrative work to be done for which no man-year or salary provisions were made, as far as possible such work will be done by existing departmental or program resources through the rearrangement of priorities and temporary reassignment of tasks to personnel. Where it is not feasible, temporary help company employees may be engaged. However, to avoid any duplication or any potential conflict with the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act appointment criteria, they should not be engaged for periods in excess of eight weeks.

The Department of Supply and Services will become the sole contracting authority for temporary help services in the administrative support category as of April 1, 1978. Commencing April 1, 1978, departments and agencies will be asked to obtain temporary help services directly from those companies with which the Department of Supply and Services has entered standing offer agreements.

There is no doubt that the government shares the concern of the hon. member. Attempts are being made to make arrangements so that the best and most efficient use can be made of the public service in Canada.

AGRICULTURE—FOOD POLICY CONFERENCE—PROPOSALS OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming very apparent that the government's food policy has become the joke of the agricultural industry. At the present time everyone is skeptical of three ministers: the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner).

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been the most conspicuous to date in putting his foot in his mouth. It appears that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs wants a cheap food policy. Last week during a press conference in Winnipeg he said that he was looking at a possible ceiling on food prices, reduction of import duties and other controls on domestic prices, export embargoes, selective consumer subsidies, possible two-price systems to set different prices for domestic and export consumption, stiffer supervision of food processors and distributors, a study of some of their most basic activities and their information system, and he would attempt to explain food price changes to consumers. That statement is enough to send everyone running for cover.

Amid all the speeches and meetings, what is really happening? Do we really need a national food policy when the proportion of personal incomes spent on food is probably the lowest in the world; when domestic production of many food items is at a permanent cost disadvantage; when domestic production of some important commodities is already declining; and when massive imports are worsening the balance of payments problems, which is a major threat to the national economy?

Obviously the answer must be no, we do not require a national food policy. In 1976 Canadians spent an average of 13.6 per cent of their disposable incomes on food eaten at home, compared to 14.8 per cent in 1971 and 19.5 per cent between 1951 and 1955. I believe that a food policy put forward by Trudeau Liberals means a cheap food policy.

The farmers will once again be caught in a government controlled vice with bureaucrats and government planners trying to squeeze every last cent out of the producer. A cheap food policy, if allowed to develop in the manner talked about by the minister's colleagues, would, in my opinion, virtually destroy the horticultural industry in Canada as well as major sectors of the beef and pork industries.

This program, the propaganda associated with it and also the February conference, are all being brought forward as political gimmicks designed for the 1978 election. The government is trying to please everyone, and of course that is impossible. To consumers it appears that a positive move is being made toward a food policy; but the unsuspecting producer will be made to feel that his interests are being looked after. Both these observations are incorrect. The government has no policy on anything except to re-elect itself. It will destroy and divide to do just that, and apparently that is what is coming out of the national food policy.

By agreeing to a national food policy, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has directed Canadian farmers to an uncertain and unknown future. I believe that we have a minister who is forced to go along with his cabinet colleagues, partly to save face because there is no coherent agricultural policy in this country, and partly from political expediency because the government anticipates an election, possibly this spring. Policies for agriculture and food should not be devised in this haphazard manner.

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to answer and supplement a reply given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on January 27, 1978 to a question by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta).

Perhaps the hon. member is not aware of the purpose of the Food Strategy Conference. It is not to dictate a food policy but to improve the procedures of communication, consultation and understanding for those who have a vital interest in the agricultural food system, either as consumers, producers, manufacturers, retailers or restaurateurs as well as dealers in the agriculture and food area.

We also want their opinions and recommendations for the implementation, the improvement as well as the continuity of a Canadian food strategy.

The government will spell out everything that has been accomplished and the directions we have already taken for a Canadian food strategy but I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we did not decide to call this conference to dictate government ideas but to exchange and receive the opinions of producers, consumers and people in the agricultural food industry in general.

The proposed consultations we undertook were aimed at a food strategy reached in three steps: the meetings between a committee of federal ministers and nine national organizations last December, the federal-provincial conference held in Winnipeg on January 16 and now the National Food Strategy Conference to be held on February 22 and 23, 1978. That conference will have the participation of over 150 organizations, and if I may be more specific, has already generated a lot of enthusiasm and support from various agricultural food organizations.

The food strategy is an aggressive concept to help improve the food policy now in effect in Canada.

The food system is important and complex and has very large significance for the economic life in this country. We are aggressively seeking as a department the assistance and active support of all Canadians with an interest in the food business.

REQUEST IMMEDIATE STEPS BE TAKEN TO PREVENT LOSS OF JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since the federal-provincial conference of industry, trade and commerce ministers held yesterday determined that 30,000 of the 80,000 jobs lost in Canada during the past 13 months were in Quebec; since most of those 30,000 jobs are in the footwear, textile, furniture, clothing and paper industries which are important industries in the Quebec and Canadian economies; since the federal tariff policy on imports and the lack of satisfactory safeguards are to a great extent responsible for that disastrous situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) to convene the authorities of those industrial sectors and immediately set them up with a very special strategy to put an end to so many shutdowns and job losses.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

SUGGESTION FLOOR PRICE OF DOMESTIC MILLING WHEAT BE RAISED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the 30-cent increase in the floor price for domestic wheat announced last week is much less than half of the deficit between the old price and farmers' cost of production, and since farm incomes on the prairies are expected to remain below 1973-74 levels, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House instruct the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to immediately raise the floor price for domestic milling wheat to a level that pays farmers their full cost of production.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the unanimous consent of the House is required before such a motion can come before it for discussion. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST MEASURES BE TAKEN TO HAVE DAIRY YEAR CORRESPOND TO CALENDAR YEAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since 25 per cent of milk producers will not have any revenues until the end of the dairy year because their quotas have expired and since milk producers must now pay all year long $1.35 for every hundredweight of industrial milk for the storage of powdered milk, which is a very substantial sum when we consider the financial hardship that these people are experiencing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to call immediately for a meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture to take an in-depth look at the dairy policy in Canada, a policy that proved disastrous for milk producers in general, so that steps can be taken as soon as possible in order that the dairy year correspond to the calendar year, a step which would have the effect of allowing milk producers to better manage their production volume.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of this motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AIR TRANSPORT

REASONS GOVERNMENT HAS PURSUED CONSTANT PERFORMANCE MONITORING IN AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the importance of Canadian airlines to this nation's economy, and the manipulative and interventionist tendencies sometimes exhibited by some officials in the Ministry of Transport without meaningful consultations with the industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Minister of Transport advise the House of the reasons which have motivated his ministry, and in particular Mr. Walter McLeish, to actively pursue the sensitive matter of the institution of a system of electronic or constant performance monitoring in Canadian aircraft, with apparently little or no consultation with CALPA, and whether or not such an Orwellian system presently exists in any other country?

RADON RADIATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SAFEGUARD THOSE AFFECTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the findings of a survey carried out by the Department of National Health and Welfare indicating that over 6,000 households in Canada registered ascertainable levels of radon radiation in population centres as widespread as Calgary, Thunder Bay, Sudbury, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Fredericton and St. John's, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That this government notify immediately those persons affected and the affected provincial governments and municipalities so that appropriate action can be taken without delay to safeguard the health of those endangered by this radiation.

REQUEST FOR INVOKING OF ANTI-DUMPING LEGISLATION RESPECTING STEEL BEAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the intense regional antagonism that is developing over the anti-dumping tribunal decision to uphold the Algoma appeal for the imposition of a 30 per cent dumping duty on wide-flange steel beams entered through the port of Vancouver, and in view of the fact that Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railway and Algoma Central Railways have announced a further increase of 5 per cent on steel rail freight rates from Ontario commencing April 1, 1978, at the expense of western Canada, thus exhibiting an indifference and a failure to adjust the system to allow regional resource-based industries to exist, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the government of Canada invoke section 7 of the Anti-dumping Act exempting wide-flange steel beams 25 inches and less from the act when imported through the port of Vancouver.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF HOUSE COMMITTEE TO STUDY ACTIVITIES OF FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the necessity of removing all illegal and unfair practices which have been introduced into the administration of justice; considering the explicit recognition of irregular, illicit and shameful acts committed by the RCMP; considering the spiteful allegation of irresponsibility made by the Solicitor General against those who have unveiled some abominable acts of the RCMP while he himself, again on January 9 last, did reveal another as unbelievable an operation by that police force as that of having issued a communique in the name of the FLQ in 1971; considering that all those facts revealed bit by bit seem to cover acts and circumstances much more serious; and considering that the refusal of the Solicitor General to co-operate with the Keable Commission reflects the bad faith of the federal government, because the McDonald Commission seems rather to act as the attorney of the minister and the RCMP and hence does not obtain public support, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That a special committee of the House representing all political parties be authorized to set up an objective, non-partisan and exhaustive inquiry into the actions of the RCMP, and of those who have authority over it, concerning

APPOINTMENT OF NEW SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can he tell the House of Commons when he will be naming a new solicitor general?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope to make that appointment later this week. In the meantime, of the proponents, the Minister of Justice will continue to act as acting solicitor general.

CIRCUMSTANCES SURROUNDING RESIGNATION OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister tell the House when he first became aware of the circumstances involving—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: You have no class, Joe.

Mr. Clark: —a possible breach of the law which led to the resignation of the solicitor general?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I first learned of it on Wednesday, January 18, some nine days before the minister resigned. The facts were made known to me in a letter sent to me through my principal secretary by a private citizen.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question refers to the standards of the government generally. Could the Prime Minister tell us, in this particular circumstance where an event which apparently occurred before the appointment to cabinet of the member involved and which, when it became known, led to the resignation of that member from cabinet, how the standards and the screening of the Prime Minister failed to make him aware of this circumstance prior to the appointment of this member of parliament to a very sensitive position in cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, before making an order in council appointment of any sensitive nature, I always ask for a screening from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I ask them if they have any files or allegations which might cause me to ask the proposed appointee any questions and discuss with him why I should or should not appoint him. This procedure was followed in the case of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, as with other ministers. There was absolutely no reason why I should not proceed with the appointment of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes. When I appointed him, he did not raise these facts with me. As I learned later, he considered these facts to be private, personal matters and did not feel that the implications were such that he should not join the cabinet.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister advise the House whether he is considering changing either the standards which he applies, or the screening procedures which are followed in circumstances of this kind?

Mrs. Holt: Look behind you, Joe.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. When I appoint a person to cabinet or, indeed, to other high offices, I have a screening procedure to make sure there is no illegality in the past. Usually, I discuss with the person the role of the office I am going to give him and ascertain that he is going to conduct himself honourably.

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER UNDERTAKE RESPONSIBILITIES OF SOLICITOR GENERAL—APPLICATION OF FEDERAL COURT ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman a question about what I believe—and I believe many would agree with me—is an unprecedented situation in the administration of justice in this country. With three former solicitors general now not available for questioning in accordance with parliamentary rules, with three judicial inquiries going on respecting the business of the department, and with important legislation pending which is also affecting the portfolio, will the Prime Minister fill this ministerial and parliamentary vacuum by devoting his personal attention to some of these matters, and will he perhaps elaborate later on motions what he plans to do to make certain that the administration of justice in this country does not fail the confidence of the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have appointed a royal commission of inquiry to look into allegations of possible improprieties or illegalities committed by representatives of the Canadian government in the administration of justice. We expect this commission of inquiry to search into every relevant aspect of the question. I believe that this is the proper procedure to ensure that the examination of these facts and allegations is not in the hands of the government but, rather, is in the hands of a royal commission of inquiry.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister that he cannot, in all conscience, delegate all the responsibilities implicit in this House to a royal commission, however eminent. I should like to ask him, by way of a final supplementary question, whether, as a man of the law, he is not concerned about the provisions of section 41(2) which have played such an important role in the deliberations of royal commissions looking into some of these aspects. This section, as the Prime Minister knows, sanctions executive privilege without judicial review. I am wondering if the Prime Minister recognizes this fact and is prepared to take steps to change it, particularly in view of the less than positive assurances yesterday of the Minister of Justice that some of the material withheld under the section, without benefit of judicial review, may not necessarily have been in the personal purview and knowledge of the minister who withheld the material.

Mr. Trudeau: Without at all agreeing with the interpretation given by the hon. member of the words of the Minister of Justice, I would say that the practice incorporated in the law is in keeping with traditional parliamentary practices. In our system, the executive is responsible for making executive decisions regarding the secrecy that is needed for the protection and security of the state. This, of the proponents, can be questioned: it is the opposition's role to ask questions, if they wish.

An hon. Member: Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: For greater certainty, we have referred this whole matter to the royal commission to see if they can suggest any ways of improving the present practices. I, for one, believe they are completely in keeping with the traditions of parliament.

KEABLE INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT REFUSAL TO PROVIDE CABLE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister, in the Solicitor General's absence, why the government denied the Keable inquiry access to the telex which RCMP Superintendent Nowlan sent from Ottawa to Montreal authorizing the illegal break-in which took place on January 9, 1973, to obtain information about the Parti Québécois. Yesterday the Prime Minister said he would ensure that the Solicitor General answered the question. We now know that is impossible. But I would like to follow up the spirit of the question and ask the Minister of Justice if he could inform the House why the Keable inquiry is denied access to this cable, which should have said simply "Yes" or "No" and, as we now have on the record, said "Yes". Will he now tell us why we cannot have access to that cable?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): It is, of the proponents, an assumption that that is all the telegram said. I apologize to the leader of the NDP, but I have not had a chance to examine that particular question. I shall do so.

BREAK-IN AT PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS OFFICES—RESPONSIBILITY OF FORCE TO REPORT TO SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It relates to a matter which I raised yesterday in the House. I asked the Prime Minister about Superintendent Nowlan's failure to inform the then solicitor general last June of the activity of the RCMP in obtaining information about the Parti Québécois. In his answer in the House yesterday, the Prime Minister said, and I quote, "that there was no illegal or improper conduct on the part of RCMP officials". That is the opinion of the Prime Minister.

● (1427)

I would like the Prime Minister to think about that answer in the following context. Since the question pertains to Superintendent Nowlan's authorization of an illegal break-in a few years ago, on one hand, and on the other his responsibility to conduct an internal inquiry requested by the then solicitor general—he did not report last June to the solicitor general about his own activity and that of the RCMP—I ask the Prime Minister concretely whether he does not think there was a clear dereliction of responsibility on the part of Superintendent Nowlan to report to the then solicitor general about this action.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer would depend on two questions which I hope will be determined by the McDonald commission. The first question is whether the taking of tapes from an office by the RCMP, provincial and municipal police forces, was an illegal act, and the second is whether it was thought to be an illegal act. If it was thought by the forces involved to be illegal, was it deliberately hidden from their superiors? This is what the McDonald commission is looking into.

Mr. Broadbent: We will not have the findings of that commission for two, or possibly three years. In the opinion of almost everyone concerned, the activity was clearly illegal and, if not that, at least improper. Since the internal inquiry which was set up by the minister last June was to look not only into illegal activities but also improper activities, does the Prime Minister not think he is being a little other than ingenuous when he says we have to wait until the royal commission makes a report at some time in the distant future, to get an answer?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party himself indicates that he has doubt as to the illegality.

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Mr. Trudeau: First he says that the act was clearly illegal, and then he says that if it was not illegal, it was at least improper. There is, obviously, doubt in the hon. member's mind.

Mr. Broadbent: It was one or the other.

Mr. Trudeau: It was one or the other, in the opinion of the leader of the New Democratic Party. But if he himself has doubts as to illegality, I can assure him that it is possible the police also had doubts. They were conducting an inquiry. They had not, in their view, committed an illegal act; that is why it was not reported. When it was discovered by the minister and by the investigators later, they said it was something which should be looked into. That is why we referred the matter to the McDonald commission. The leader of the New Democratic Party says the McDonald commission may not report for two or three years. Indeed, we hope it will report long before that; but if it is seen that it will take a long time to report, we will insist on being given interim reports.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY INDUSTRY—REQUEST PRODUCERS BE ALLOWED INCREASED QUOTAS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, my question is directed to his parliamentary secretary.

As several dairy producers are now experiencing acute quota problems, and as most of them are being denied additional quotas, can the hon. member tell the House whether or not his government has thought or is thinking of soon revising the dairy policy with a view to improving the situation which has become almost unbearable for most Quebec dairy producers?

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the new dairy policy, I must say to the hon. member that it is now being studied by the management committee made up of provincial representatives and chaired by the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission. The cabinet will therefore have to reach a decision in the very near future with regard to extending that dairy policy.

POWDERED MILK STOCKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY REGARDING DISPOSAL

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his generous reply. I should like to ask him in addition whether the committee has considered the problem of the storage of powdered milk which, in fact, is a big problem for the farmer as well as the government, because we all know the farmer has to pay $1.35 per hundredweight for storage. I was about to ask the hon. member whether they have considered the fact that powdered milk could be used advantageously by the producers provided, however, the price were the same as that for exports. This would have the double advantage of reducing the stocks of powdered milk and, as a consequence, of reducing storage costs.

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would still like to point out to the hon. member that, at the present time, there is no powdered milk in storage: all of it has been sold for the year 1977-78. On the other hand, I agree fully with his suggestions and they may become part of a new and good dairy policy for 1978-79.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear those words coming from the mouth of the hon. member but why wait to remove the quotas on milk when we are obliged to import milk from New Brunswick? The Rimouski Co-operative imported over two million pounds of milk from New Brunswick to meet the needs of its industries, while we have had to close down one of our cheese factories at Amqui for lack of milk. So, let the quotas be removed immediately!

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the dairy policy applies to all of Canada and that New Brunswick is part of Canada.

KEABLE INQUIRY—MINISTER'S AFFIDAVIT RESPECTING DOCUMENTS NOT PROVIDED TO INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Solicitor General. It arises from his answer to my question yesterday wherein he undertook to determine if any of the documents which formed the subject matter of the September 15 affidavit sworn to by the then solicitor general referred to operation "Ham", the code name for the Parti Québécois break-in.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member repeat the question?

Mr. Jarvis: The question relates to the answer given to me yesterday by the Acting Solicitor General wherein he undertook to determine if any of the approximately 26 documents which formed the subject matter of the September 15, 1977, affidavit sworn to by the then solicitor general related to operation "Ham", the code name for the break-in to obtain confidential records of the Parti Québécois.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am told that they were not. They were in code numbers that would not be recognized.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE—CANADA-U.S. NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING PROTOCOL

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. I am sure the minister is aware that one of the bills before the United States congress is the Jackson-Dingell bill which authorizes the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with Canada to seek a protocol to the U.S.-Canada pipeline transit treaty to include Kitimat, and that the President must report to congress by the end of July, 1978. Was this matter discussed with the Vice-President of the United States when he was here earlier this month?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this was not the subject of discussion at the meeting I attended, although it may have been with other colleagues on this side of the House.

Mr. Friesen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In December, the United States vice president said in Seattle that when he was senator for the state of Minnesota he approved of Kitimat as a major oil port site in Canada. When he was here, was he given any encouragement by cabinet that this question was under active consideration?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON PENITENTIARIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPLEMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Acting Solicitor General. I wish to assure him that members of this party do not intend to ask questions with respect to the ongoing hostage-taking incidents in the Dorchester and British Columbia penitentiaries, since this might endanger the lives and safety of those involved. Would he take this opportunity to inform the House of the progress being made on implementation of the unanimous recommendations of the subcommittee on penitentiaries.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Solicitor General has asked me to answer questions relating to the Canadian penitentiaries service. I should like to assure the hon. member that the recommendations of the parliamentary subcommittee on penitentiaries are being implemented at a considerable rate of speed. The building program is part of the work being undertaken currently by the penitentiary service in order to allay some of the problems to which the hon. member may be referring.

KEABLE INQUIRY—MINISTER'S AFFIDAVIT RESPECTING DOCUMENTS NOT PROVIDED TO INQUIRY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the answer given by the Acting Solicitor General a few moments ago regarding inclusion in the documents referred to in the affidavit of the former solicitor general relating to the break-in by the security service to obtain confidential records of the Parti Québécois. As I understood the minister's answer, he said these were referred to in those documents by code number, and not necessarily by reference, in English terminology or language terminology, to the break-in.

Bearing in mind that the affidavit sworn by the former solicitor general said he had personal knowledge of the facts deposed to in the affidavit and had examined those documents, could the Acting Solicitor General inform this House whether the former solicitor general had knowledge of the break-in operation as referred to in those documents?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was assured an hour and fifteen minutes ago that the former solicitor general did not have that knowledge.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Perhaps it is a question of knowledge or a question of understanding what someone is swearing to in a document. Can the Acting Solicitor General tell this House, as he is reporting to us now on this matter, whether his former colleague was swearing something in an affidavit which he actually had no knowledge of, even though he was swearing he did have knowledge of it?

Mr. Basford: No, that is not what I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence: I wonder if the Acting Solicitor General can explain the very apparent contradiction in what he is now saying.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there is no contradiction between my answer yesterday and my answer today. There is no contradiction in what the former solicitor general has said, that he was not informed, prior to making a statement in the House, of the other illegal activities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO UNITED NATIONS OF ISSUE OF RUNAWAY SATELLITES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the House what instructions have been sent to the Canadian delegation at the United Nations to raise the issue of runaway satellites before the committee on outer space in order to amend the present international treaty so that nuclear reactors will be banned in satellites which orbit the earth and pose a serious radiation hazard in the event of an accident which brings the satellite down in a heavily populated community?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government is consulting with other governments presently as to the implications for future conduct as a result of this incident.

Mr. Roche: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With respect to financial liability for the Cosmos clean-up, can the minister confirm that the present treaty does not make it clear, legally, that the Soviet Union must bear financial responsibility for the extensive clean-up operation in Canada; and, if so, what steps is the government taking to have the Soviet Union pay the bill for this operation and to amend the treaty to clarify financial responsibility?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the assumption is that questions of compensation and liability have already been dealt with in convention or treaty. I believe that further concentrations are necessary in order to define more precisely how application can be made to the present incident.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RADIO-MUTUEL LABOUR DISPUTE—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING BILL C-8

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

The Radio-Mutuel dispute has now lasted for more than a year and the report by the mediator, appointed by the government last fall, has recently been made public. This report seems to point clearly to some anti-union allergy on the part of management. Could the minister tell the House whether in the shortest delay he intends to amend Bill C-8, a legislation which would allow the government to step rapidly in that dispute?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at various options, including legislation, as a means of resolving the dispute.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

LEGISLATION TO LEGALIZE OPENING OF MAIL BY POLICE FORCES—PURPOSE OF McDONALD INQUIRY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Acting Solicitor General. It concerns the Prime Minister's recent announcement that we can expect legislation in the House shortly to legalize mail opening by the RCMP or other police forces in Canada. Given the fact that the McDonald inquiry has a specific mandate, and in fact at the present time is looking into operation "Cathedral", can the Minister of Justice advise the House why it is necessary to prejudge the McDonald inquiry and bring legislation before this House before recommendations have been made with regard to this matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, because we have been advised by police and national security authorities that such legislation is necessary, it is the intention of the government to introduce short-term, interim legislation that will be dependent upon recommendations of the McDonald inquiry.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I can understand the police advising that the legislation is necessary, after illegal mail openings during the past 40 years. The facts with regard to operation "Cathedral" are certainly known to the minister. I refer to the fact that illegal activity has taken place. Can the minister explain to the House why no charges have been laid? Why does the legal process not take its normal the proponents with regard to RCMP officers in the way it has to take its normal the proponents for the rest of the people?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, for the very simple reason that any facts or reports I have seen do not contain the precise type of information that is required in the laying of charges against specific officers or constables. That is one of the precise purposes of the hearings of the McDonald inquiry, to put before them facts with sufficient precision so that if charges can be laid, they will be laid.

Mr. Leggatt: Perhaps at this point the Minister of Justice can advise the House if the legislation that is being prepared will require judicial warrant for mail opening. Will it refer to specific pieces of mail, or are we going back to the system whereby the RCMP make their own judgments as to whose mail is to be opened? Is there to be a judicial review of this matter?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CIDA GRANTS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. At the present time, there are reported to be several thousand Cuban military advisers and Russian military advisers in Ethiopia. In light of the fact that CIDA have indicated they are prepared to provide some $7.9 million for water supplies, will it be the minister's position to recommend to CIDA that Canada does not at this time provide such money but, rather, we should let the communist nations provide the funding, in view of the fact that money can be better utilized here in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we have faced a similar issue in other countries. We had not taken the view that programs of international economic development should be terminated or interrupted because of the political activities of the government of the day. To my current knowledge, that is still the policy of the government of Canada.

Mr. Brisco: In light of the fact that the political activities of this government have yet to provide any assistance for an urgent water supply for the city of Castlegar, which would ensure several hundred jobs almost immediately, is the minister prepared to recommend to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that some $3 million of Federal money be provided to the community of Castlegar to assist them in their water development and industry?

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question seems to be in the nature of a representation.

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING FOREIGN TRAWLERS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Yesterday, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Gaspé, the minister indicated that the government would not permit foreign trawlers to operate in the Gulf of St. Lawrence notwithstanding the fact that they may be catching fish for Canadian plants. Does this prohibition apply to all zones on the Atlantic coast of Canada? What impact would this have on any proposed takeover of Canadian plants by foreign-based, multinational companies?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this does not apply to other fishing zones. Obviously, there may be cases in which we will want to authorize some landings by vessels from foreign countries when there is a shortage of supply. I would not want to get into the business of foreign takeovers, which I believe was the latter part of the hon. member's question. At the moment, as the hon. member knows, the FIRA process is taking its normal the proponents; the proponents will be appearing before it. I have, however, expressed my view that there are obstacles beyond the narrow definitions of FIRA as to what are "advantages" to Canada.

GRAIN

DATE AND AMOUNT OF 1977 PAYMENTS UNDER STABILIZATION PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. When will the 1977 payments under the grain stabilization plan be made to western farmers? Also, can the minister give an indication of the amount of such payments?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not yet possible to be precise about the amount. Indeed, the final amount may not be known for some time. However, the likelihood is that an analysis of the figures will allow us to look at the question of whether an interim payment should be made. We will be discussing that matter in the very near future.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, the minister has touched on my supplementary question. Because of the fact that farm incomes have been dropping, and representations have been made to the minister for an interim payment, can the minister assure the House that an interim payment will be made? If not, what difficulty does he see in making an interim payment well before the spring, so that farmers will have some ready cash and be able to plant in the spring of 1978?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his support. The notion of an interim payment was first put by me to the advisory committee for the reasons to which the hon. member so ably referred.

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC SELECTION CRITERIA—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON AREA DESIGNATION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister is quoted as saying in an interview that if a prospective immigrant to Quebec failed to meet the federal criteria, but was admitted under the Quebec selection criteria, he could move to another part of Canada "at some later date". This raises the whole question of whether interprovincial mobility has been clarified. In view of the fact that the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration rejected area designation when it discussed the immigration bill, I ask the minister whether this is a reinstatement of area designation. Also, how much time would have to elapse before an immigrant could move to another part of Canada?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, recognizing that there is an opportunity and, in fact, a responsibility for the provinces to participate in the immigration field, it seemed appropriate that we should discuss with each of the provinces—there are, in fact, discussions going on with four or five provinces at the present time—some method of co-determination of the landing of immigrants. I have indicated, and I will stick with this statement, that there will be no loss of the mobility aspect as a result of agreements entered into. The agreements that we enter into must be consistent with the British North America Act and with immigration policy. Therefore, it is not a renunciation of the regional aspect. I think the hon. member will be satisfied with the co-determination aspects of the agreements we are proposing to enter into.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. It is similar to a question I asked the minister earlier this session. In view of the undertakings the minister gave us previously, that the regulations would be before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration in order to determine whether they were in keeping with the spirit of the Immigration Act, and in view of the agreement regarding which the minister indicated he is trying to obtain co-determination from the provinces, can we have the minister's commitment that the agreement and the regulations will be brought before the standing committee so that the committee and, in fact, all Canadians can know exactly what we are agreeing to?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, we are in the process of negotiating with the provinces. It seems inappropriate to bring before this House or anyone else terms and conditions that have not as yet been agreed upon. Until that has been done, we really do not have anything to report to the House.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO EXPLORATIONS LAST YEAR

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It is not a secret for anyone that there has been an increase in oil prices and therefore, I imagine, new profits for corporations. But as regards the anticipated benefits for Canada, that is more prospection and exploration, did these activities really take place during the last 12 months?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of increases in the budget for energy research and development. I would be very pleased to provide the hon. member with a list of them. High priority has been given to conservation and renewable energy sources, but very substantial funds are being allocated for petroleum-related energy projects, in conjunction with the province of Alberta in particular but also with the province of Saskatchewan in connection with tertiary recovery.

GEORGES BANK—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT OF DISCUSSIONS ON OWNERSHIP

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the importance to the people of Atlantic Canada of the fisheries resources, along possibly with hydrocarbon resources, of Georges Bank, is the minister in a position to give the House a report on the progress of the discussions concerning the ownership of this bank presently being carried out by Canada and the United States?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The question of boundaries with the United States is of great importance to at least four regions of the country, including two in the Pacific region. The negotiations have not been successful to date, but the two special negotiators have agreed that in light of the substantial progress they have made, they will continue to work during February. They recognize that some difficulties persist. They are now reporting to their respective governments, the positions will be reassessed, and it is hoped they will resume negotiations in the second half of February.

Mr. Crouse: One brief supplementary. Since the area in question falls within the 200-mile economic zone of the United States as well as within the 200-mile economic zone of Canada, has the minister given any thought to proposing to the negotiators that we consider banning all foreign fishing activity from that area and allocating all the resources in the so-called grey area on a 50-50 basis to the two countries most concerned?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I would have to check the statistics, but it is my information that off the eastern coast of the United States and Canada there is little foreign fishing for species for which we have ready markets. The hon. member's suggestion is an interesting one and I will discuss it with the officials.

LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is of deep interest and extreme concern to my constituents, and I direct it to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It arises from the various visits made by the hon. gentleman to the new riding of Leeds-Grenville. I presume they are an indication of his extreme interest in the welfare of the people in that area. Is the minister aware that the unemployment rate there has risen in about a year from below the national average to twice the national average? What plans does the minister have to deal with this situation? Is he prepared to order Canada Manpower to set up special facilities to assist the many hundreds who have been laid off as a result of slumping industry?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): It is true that I have made several trips to the new riding at the request of the local Liberal organization and of the people in the community. The hon. member should know that he has an obligation to draw to the attention of the people in his riding the many and varied services which are available from my department. The comment keeps coming back: the riding has been good for Cossitt, but has Cossitt been good for the riding?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The difficulty we get into is evident when we focus upon the problems of a particular constituency during the question period. I do not want to restrict hon. members unduly, but one can easily see that when the question period is used in that way, it invites the kind of political commentary which I have discouraged during this stage of our proceedings. We should not let this practice go too far. I shall allow one supplementary.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

Mr. Cossitt: My supplementary is simply this: Several of the hon. gentleman's special assistants have been working with people in the riding. Are they making a constructive survey of the unemployment situation, or are they in reality engaged at the taxpayers' expense in desperately trying to find a Liberal candidate for the next election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INCREASED IMPORT LEVY ON OFFSHORE STEEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Has he addressed himself to the serious issue of the Algoma Steel appeal and the increased import levy on offshore steel from 10 per cent to 30 per cent? To what extent and in what manner has the hon. gentleman addressed himself to this problem? Have there been discussions with his cabinet colleagues, particularly the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): This matter is under review at the moment by the cabinet and officials of my department.

Mr. Oberle: Since this issue is causing serious tension in western Canada, can the minister advise us of the date we can expect a decision to be made on this very serious matter?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I agree with the hon. member that this is a very serious matter. It is one which is of great concern to my department and to the cabinet. As soon as we can finalize the question, the hon. member will hear about it.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—CONSTRUCTION OF THIRD RUNWAY—ACCESS TO ARTHUR LAING BRIDGE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that the Richmond council in British Columbia has withdrawn its support for the construction of a third runway at the Vancouver international airport? Further, has he been informed that the council is in favour of a Richmond access route to the Arthur Laing bridge, regarding it now as having higher priority than the construction of a third runway?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the council of a change in its position. As to access to the bridge, this is a question which has been under discussion for some time. I have always expressed willingness to co-operate with the approved and appropriate local solution. The dilemma to which Vancouver has always drawn attention is that if additional traffic comes off the bridge, it is doubtful whether there is enough street capacity to handle it. This, I understand, is the local conclusion, or it was when I last saw the mayor. I am, of the proponents, receptive to a change in position on the part of Vancouver too, if there is to be one.

TRADE

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES REGARDING CONTRACTUAL LINK

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): I am tempted to ask the Prime Minister whether he is feeling as pessimistic as his rose looks today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: More seriously, are any new initiatives being taken with regard to the contractual link with the European Economic Community, of which we heard so much a year or two ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and in a direct sense. The Chancellor of Germany has just announced there will be an economic summit in July to which Canada will be invited. It will be preceded by a meeting of the members of the Community with which we have developed this extraordinarily successful contractual link.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENSIONS

REQUESTED AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PENSIONS AT AGE 60 DESPITE MARITAL STATUS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Now that she has been the head of her very important department long enough to know that a great many Canadian women between 60 and 65 feel very unhappy and upset over the fact that there is no pension for them unless they have the status of being married to and living with someone who is 65 or over, is the minister giving consideration to the necessary amendments to the Old Age Security Act so that persons between the ages of 60 and 65, particularly women, who are in need will get a pension without regard to their marital status?

● (1502)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I answered the same question very recently put to me by other members of this House. We are reviewing the situation, and I have nothing new to add today. As soon as I am ready to give a further explanation, I will do so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, while the minister and her department are reviewing that aspect of the question, will they also review other ways in which women are discriminated against, such as their being excluded, if they are housewives, from Canada Pension Plan benefits, as well as various pension plans under which the survival portion for a widow is only half what it is when the widower survives?

LETTERS OF CREDENCE FOR MEMBERS OF DIPLOMATIC CORPS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the Prime Minister's reply to a question posed to him by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. As reported on January 23 at page 2088 of Hansard, the Prime Minister indicated that the appointment and the signature of letters of credence for Canadians serving in the diplomatic service abroad were henceforth to be signed by the Governor General, on the strength of letters patent issued in 1947. If my calculations are correct, the Prime Minister is the fifth prime minister since those letters patent were issued. I am wondering how it came about that he suddenly found the secret that the other four did not find in the letters patent which permitted those letters of credence to be signed in Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There is no secret at all, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman reads the letters patent, as I suspect he has, he will see that at that time the letters patent vested in the Governor General all and every power exercisable by the Queen with regard to Canada. Certainly, this includes the signing of letters of credence for ambassadors.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am taking into account the preamble, or the salutation of those letters of credence, which reads as follows:

George the Sixth, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King—

Mr. Crosbie: Including Newfoundland.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Would the Prime Minister like to correct the words attributed to him in the second column on that page, because there he talks about a transference from the Queen of England to the Governor General in Canada. Surely he meant the Queen of Canada to her representative the Governor General in Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there was some noise which blotted out the question, but as far as I understood it, the question was whether Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II is Queen of Canada. The answer is yes.

Nova Scotia

PRIVILEGE

MR. MUNRO (ESQUIMALT-SAANICH)—TRANSFER OF MONARCH'S AUTHORITY

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The words standing in the second column on page 2088 of Hansard for January 23, attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), referred to the transfer of authority from the Queen of England. It was not. As I read my constitutional history, it was the Queen of Canada who made the transfer. I am wondering if the Prime Minister wishes to correct this in Hansard so that future historians and future readers of Hansard will understand the constitutional position of this country?

Mr. Speaker: It may be a useful suggestion for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but it certainly does not constitute a question of privilege.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORT RESPECTING HANDICAPPED PERSONS

Mr. Speaker: Tabling of documents.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question of tabling of documents, I have let a certain matter lie until now. On November 30 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) undertook to look into the question of tabling in this House the report of the Public Service Commission with respect to handicapped persons. It is now the end of January and that matter has not been proceeded with thus far. Perhaps there is a reason for it and the minister could explain it. I will be very glad to hear his explanation. It is a very important report and it needs elucidation. Would the minister be prepared to undertake to table it immediately?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have no particular excuse. I forgot about it for this past week or so. I will certainly undertake to table it as soon as possible within the next few days.

INCOME TAX ACT—FAMILY FARM

Question No. 118—Mr. Herbert:

Has the government permitted or considered permitting the deferral of the collection of taxes payable upon the death of one member of a family farm?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): In accordance with the government's policy of encouraging a strong and viable agricultural sector, the Income Tax Act was amended in 1973 and 1975 in order to permit farmland, buildings and machinery to be transferred tax-free to a farmer's wife or children on his death. This is generally referred to as a "rollover" privilege. In order to qualify for the rollover, certain conditions must be satisfied. For example, the property must have been used by the farmer or his family in a farming business. In addition, the taxpayer's wife, children or grandchildren who receive this property on his death must be resident in Canada. The purpose of these special rules is to allow farmland, buildings and machinery to be passed indefinitely between generations without any tax being paid at the time of the transfer. Taxpayers having specific questions about these rules should contact the Minister of National Revenue who is responsible for the administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

GRANTS TO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE IN QUEBEC

Question No. 153—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the "Chambre de Commerce de la province de Québec" located at 500 St-François Xavier, Montreal, receive a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, if so (a) in what amount (b) on what date?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: no.

GRANT TO DEMUTH INC.—ST-PIE-DE-BAGOT, QUEBEC

Question No. 154—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did Demuth Inc. located in St-Pie-de-Bagot, Quebec, receive a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, if so (a) in what amount (b) on what date?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act, an incentive offer of $145,520 was made to Demuth Inc. on January 14, 1976, and subsequently accepted by the company. Payments against the incentive offer are made according to section C of the procedures described in the monthly incentives report to parliament.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: nil.

GRANT TO WIREFIL INC.—ST-LÉONARD, QUEBEC

Question No. 155—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did Wirefil Inc. located at 8585 Langelier, St-Léonard, Quebec, receive a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, if so (a) in what amount (b) on what date?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act, an incentive offer of $39,834 was made to Wirefil Inc. on August 9, 1973, and subsequently accepted by the company. Payments against the incentive offer are made according to section C of the procedures described in the monthly incentives report to parliament.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: (a) $28 under the Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises (CASE) Program. (b) Fiscal year 1974/75.

GRANT TO PHIL-REY INC.—DRUMMONDVILLE, QUEBEC

Question No. 156—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did Phil-Rey Inc. located at 1800 St-Charles Blvd, Drummondville, Quebec receive a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, if so (a) in what amount (b) on what date?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act, an incentive offer of $44,425 was made to Phil-Rey Inc. on March 23, 1977, modified on May 11, 1977, and subsequently accepted by the company. Payments against the incentive offer are made according to section C of the procedures described in the monthly incentives report to parliament.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: nil.

GRANT TO CARI-RELL COMPANY—MONTREAL, QUEBEC

Question No. 157—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the Cari-Rell Company located at 175 St-Cyr, Montreal, Quebec receive a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, if so (a) in what amount (b) on what date?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: no.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—INTERIOR LANDSCAPING

Question No. 750—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, what amount was spent on interior landscaping by the Department of Supply and Services and on what projects?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): $13,271—rental of art works from Canada Council Art Bank.

TAKE-OVER BID FOR CULINAR INC. OF STE-MARIE-DE-BEAUCE, QUEBEC

Question No. 765—Mr. Herbert:

1. Was the government consulted by the Canadian Development Corporation concerning its intention to make a take-over bid for Culinar Inc. of Ste-Marie-de-Beauce, Quebec?

2. On what basis was the offer of $28.5 million established?

3. Is the book value of the Company approximately $13 million?

4. What approximate percentage of the share holding of Culinar Inc. is presently Canadian owned?

5. Is the government giving consideration to the formation of a corporation that would have as an objective the acquisition of foreign controlled companies?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. No. The Canada Development Corporation is intended to operate with a considerable degree of independence. Individual transactions have not been brought to the government for scrutiny and advice.

2, 3 and 4. Not known (see above).

5. No.

NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 780—Mr. Laprise:

1. (a) What was the National Debt in 1968 (b) what is it at the present time?

2. What is its annual interest rate?

3. What measure, if any, has the government taken to pay it back?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. (a) Canada's National Debt in 1968 was $32,924,000,000.* (b) The National Debt at the present time is $67,075,000,000.

2. The average interest rate on the government's unmatured debt was 7.53 per cent at March 31, 1977.

3. When economic, fiscal and financial conditions are favourable, the government attempts to reduce this debt.

---

* The amount for 1968 has not been adjusted to reflect the new presentation of assets and liabilities introduced in 1976-77. In the new presentation, the Provincial government securities in the Canada Pension Plan Account have been netted out as well as some other minor items.

DOMICILIARY CARE FOR NEW BRUNSWICK VETERANS

Question No. 967—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, were studies made by the Department of Veterans Affairs concerning the need of disabled veterans in New Brunswick for domiciliary care?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The department has been assessing the needs of veterans for priority beds in New Brunswick, having regard to the various levels of care required, and the geographical distribution of veterans in the province. Departmental officials have been in contact with the provincial health authorities, and further discussions have been arranged for early February, 1978.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 45

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from a point of order that I raised yesterday and the reply given thereto by the acting parliamentary secretary, who was at that time announcing the questions to be answered.

In regard to question No. 45 dealing with the fingerprinting to a very great extent of public servants, I asked why this question had not been answered. It has been on the order paper since October 18 and it was on the order paper through the whole of the last session of parliament. It has been outstanding for a year or more. Yesterday, as reported at page 2351 of Hansard I asked him specifically if the government would tell the House when we could expect an answer, or whether the question would be answered today. He replied as follows:

● (1512)

Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take notice of this question . . . We will have the answer for the hon. member.

Therefore I presume the parliamentary secretary has the answer or the date on which it will be answered, as the case may be. I would appreciate if he could provide me with an answer to that question.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I already had the opportunity to tell the hon. member that he has been asking a great many questions and that the government had dutifully endeavoured to answer most of his questions. Other members are waiting so that we can do the necessary research to give them complete and appropriate answers, and question No. 45 referred to by the hon. member concerns all departments of the government. Therefore that question requires a considerable amount of work and research. I wonder why the hon. member is unduly losing patience. I would simply ask him to be patient and not to carry his indignation too far, bearing in mind the efforts undertaken by this side of the House to give flawless service to the greatest number of members possible. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do want to assure the hon. member that his question is being studied, that we are doing complete research, and I urge him to have the decency not to display his impatience any further.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: After a year and a half you call it impatience.

MR. McKINNON—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 147

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a similar point of order. On October 19 I put question No. 147 on the order paper. As yet it has not been answered It was a carry-over from question No. 2,538 of the previous session. It involves the cost for the trip of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) to Europe.

In answer to question No. 2,538 of the previous session, I was told to refer to question No. 2,881 which listed the price of each plane used. The Falcon jet came to several hundred dollars an hour. Calculated on a 24-hour basis for the time the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport had the plane, it came to a total of $378,504. This is quite a bit to pay to satisfy the ego of any minister. When will I receive an answer to my question requesting the real cost of the Falcon flight, which left Canada on April 20 and returned when the minister finished using the plane? The question can be answered easily, since the Department of National Defence keeps very careful record of the cost of these flights. I would like an answer in the near future.

MR. JONES—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 145

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary if it is at all possible for him to expedite the answers to the questions under question No. 145? We have requested those answers several times but have not received them as yet.

Mr. Speaker: Earlier the hon. parliamentary secretary indicated if it was agreed that question No. 979 could be transformed into an order for return, the return would be tabled forthwith. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be read the second time and amendments made by the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks concerning Bill C-3 which was adopted by the House of November 7, 1977, but I do not want to monopolize too much of the time of the House, for the bell has been using up a good part of our time over the past two weeks. If we want to expedite these affairs, we shall have to limit the length of our interventions. I, for one, am quite willing to do so, while making my views known on this bill.

We all recall that the other place studied this bill after it was passed by the House, as I said, and recommended some amendments which, to me, seem valid and which lead me to believe that they will complete it. Such are the aims of Bill C-3. Air Canada is a Crown corporation. As such, all Canadians are shareholders, and directors are appointed to manage the corporation on behalf of all Canadians. Canadians therefore have the right to demand that its directors do their utmost to properly manage this Crown corporation, and to strive for budgetary balance, as do all private companies. That is why we must occasionally come back on this subject here in the House to remind the directors what parliament and Canadians expect of them. They must absolutely manage the corporation without counting too much on government intervention and on parliament's allocating votes to the corporation to restore budgetary balance when it is in the red. I hold this to be a principle of sound management.

The recommendations of the Auditor General of Canada in other areas should also apply to the Crown corporation, Air Canada. Mr. Speaker, it happens sometimes while travelling throughout the country on Air Canada planes that as parliamentarians we ask ourselves some questions as we see their operations. Although we cannot properly query the officials at work, just the same we ask ourselves the following question: Why such and such a thing is done in such and such a way? When we get the reports of the corporation, several questions still remain unanswered. On the other hand, there are some competitive private companies. It is a good thing to have some competition even in that area where private companies do their utmost to provide excellent services to attract customers.

So, for its part, Air Canada must also do what it can to try and attract the greatest number of people to travel on its flights so they will be as full as possible and profitable. But it so happens sometimes, Mr. Speaker, and I do want to draw the attention of the minister on this—although he may be out, perhaps temporarily, I would like to tell him that I noticed on several occasions, and I remember the time when the late Réal Caouette used to sit in this House and make rather frequent remarks about the fact that all across Canada the staff on Air Canada planes did not provide adequate bilingual services. I think that with aircraft flying all over this country, if bilingualism is to be promoted in this country Air Canada should have at least bilingual staff on its aircraft. Nothing aggravates me more than when I address an Air Canada employee in French and that employee does not seem to understand me and tells me, I am sorry.

I understand that they should be sorry about it but the fact still remains that I do not get an answer. That is disappointing on an airline such as Air Canada when there would be a great opportunity of setting a good example all across this country and showing that Canada is bilingual and that at least public services are provided in both official languages. We can do that if we really want to. The same thing goes for an English-speaking Canadian. Imagine an English-speaking Canadian in Quebec city talking to an Air Canada official at the Ancienne-Lorette airport, the Quebec city airport, and there is no one to answer him in English. He too is going to be aggravated. He is going to wonder: But what is going on in Canada? How come I cannot get service in my language?

That is why I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), who is responsible in this area, to use with his officials all the means he can to try and improve this service in the area of language communication so all Canadians will be proud when they travel on Air Canada planes, if they cannot get it on the ground, to have at least bilingualism in the air. We are going to fight for that, Mr. Speaker. We are going to fight further because it is a right, and because it is part of our constitution. Let us at least live up to the good parts in our Canadian constitution. Some are mere nonsense, but that is something relevant, it is acceptable, it is something we should live up to and be proud of. That would be the best way to ensure understanding between French- and English-speaking Canadians. Looking at each other we look reasonable. But when we try to talk to each other, we do not speak the same language and that is where the problem starts. To help solve the problem we have government services that can very well promote bilingualism, and Air Canada should be an expert in that field.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, on a somewhat more optimistic and very patriotic tone, I must say that when I stand in a foreign airport I am very proud to see our Air Canada aircraft arriving, those giant airplanes with a beautiful flag on their wings. Yes, I feel proud that our planes measure up with those of any other country. They are very well built and very comfortable, and they lack only one thing, bilingualism!

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is not forgetting this: we demand bilingualism in air services, and we will go on demanding it as long as a favourable answer is not forthcoming. To conclude, I accept the amendments to Bill C-3 and also the bill itself of the proponents. If there is a vote, I shall make a point of supporting it.

● (1522)

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to say a few words on this piece of legislation, Bill C-3, respecting Air Canada, because ever since I came to this place I have been interested in the operations of our national air line.

I think it is fair to say that during the past two or three years there has been an improvement in the operations of Air Canada, and I think this piece of legislation is a good one and will facilitate the operations of the company. However, I think that to put matters in a historical perspective it would be useful to go back a little bit, as my friend, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), did yesterday, and to point out some of the delays and some of the incredible lack of inititative by the government in not bringing this legislation forward years ago. I say that advisedly in view of the unfortunate remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) who sought to give the completely inaccurate impression in the program "The Nation's Business" that it was the opposition parties which were holding up the legislative progress of this parliament rather than the government's poor planning and lack of purpose and direction.

I think it is rather amazing to consider that it is now practically six years since the then minister of transport, now Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), recognized in this Chamber the urgent need for legislation to revamp and restructure Air Canada. On March 14, 1972 he said:

> —I propose to bring before the House in the next session three important pieces of legislation on which work is proceeding at the present time. The first of these is a bill designed to reconstitute Air Canada as a separate Crown corporation, thus divorcing it, as it were, from CNR—

Here we are six years later and, as the saying goes, definitely "it ain't performance". It is almost equally noteworthy that almost three years after the date of the judicial inquiry into certain aspects of Air Canada—an inquiry, as most hon. members realize, for which our party was responsible—we still have not completed, and we are here today trying to complete, the legislative process to embody some of the changes and improvements recommended by Mr. Justice Estey in that report.

Part of the problem has been the reluctance to accept some of the logic and reason that has been put forward from many sources until the government was practically coerced into doing so. Even the noteworthy section which the minister and his colleagues have finally agreed to eliminate, section 6(2), has been eliminated only after the other place—and I think they deserve credit for this—reinforced this party's determination to take away this carte blanche which the government sought to have which, in my view, would seriously undermine the integrity of this legislation.

I think it would be useful to go back a little way since there have been developments so far as our national air line is concerned which indicate that there is a possibility that Nordair will be acquired, and to point out that just as the progress has been tortuously slow in respect of this particular piece of needed legislation, the policy with respect to regionals has been, if anything, even slower.

In October, 1966, J. W. Pickersgill, who was then minister of transport, issued a statement of principles outlining the role the regional air lines would be committed to play. They were to provide regular route operations into the north, and to operate local and regional routes to complement the main carriers. Where appropriate, routes operated by the mainline companies would be transferred to the regionals.

There were other developments which were proposed by the government at that time. The Air Transport Board, now the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, would be responsible for deciding which routes would be suitable for regional air line operations; it would also administer the policy relating to the transfer of these routes.

The regional carriers accepted this policy and began to develop their operations within its framework. They had long recognized the need to increase traffic and improve the stability of their operations, but had been hesitant to do so without firm recognition and direction from government. Under the new policy, they were prepared to move on their own initiative to develop their scheduled service, seek out new routes, and use their own resources, imagination, and business acumen to make them profitable. That has not happened very quickly.

In 1969 the government announced a refinement of the policy, dividing the country into regions and letting the regionals know exactly where they could move. Pacific Western was given British Columbia and western Alberta; Transair the prairie provinces and northwestern Ontario, and so on. Nordair and other regionals were given certain route structures.

The policy allowed for route transfers, modest competition with the mainline carriers, and co-operation between the two.

The Air Transport Committee has taken no action of any consequence, so far as I know, to determine which routes operated by the mainline carriers are eligible for transfer. No guidelines have yet been developed for new types of services that could be established by regional carriers, services such as airbus or specialized cargo services, with few if any exceptions.

Co-operation between the mainline carriers on route transfers to regional carriers has not been consistent. The eight years or so that have passed since some of these policies were announced have been noteworthy because of the mushrooming of the so-called third-level carriers. These carriers are smaller than regional carriers, which are also looking upward and outward. I suggest that these reasons make it necessary and a matter of some urgency to re-examine some of the objectives envisioned by the policy and to ensure their early realization.

Surely Canada now needs, in the context of the legislation we are dealing with today, a clear policy statement on transcontinental, regional, third-level, helicopter and charter operations, if our air transportation system is to continue to grow in an orderly way.

Our national carrier recently has been doing much better financially, but in order to keep matters in perpective we must realize that profitability alone can never be the sole criterion for a national air carrier, otherwise there will be very justifiable concerns raised by the disadvantaged parts of the country which rightly expect our national air carrier to help facilitate regional development.

Before we get too puffed up about the profits Air Canada is expected to show, I think we should remember that some of its competitors in North America, particularly in the United States, face tougher competition. Some competitors have roughly comparable route structures but are doing much better. They are doing so with fewer employees and lesser load factors. The annual report of Delta Airlines, which I have before me, indicates that for the year 1977 Delta's profit before taxes was $155 million, and it appears that its net profit will be over $90 million. I have heard a figure of possibly $20 million for Air Canada, which is certainly much better than its performance in recent years, but when that is compared with the performance of Delta we realize that, while it is reasonable, it is not something Air Canada can necessarily point to with any overweening pride.

It seems to me that there are some legitimate questions to raise about the situation in which Nordair is in the process of being acquired by Air Canada. My colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville, discussed this situation yesterday, and I want to touch upon some of the things he said.

It is pretty obvious that Air Canada has not been particularly imaginative or innovative in getting into the charter business or in developing new route structures. I well remember the abortive experience this company had when it tried to acquire Wardair and the rather naive way the corporate expertise of Air Canada stacked up against the much more practical and knowledgeable expertise shown by this particular private charter carrier. In the present particular case Nordair is a pretty healthy and well respected regional carrier, and I would have thought that if Air Canada was going to pick up a regional carrier, it would have been the better policy to take one with some financial difficulty. That would have rationalized the system somewhat and would have had the virtue of rescuing a carrier which perhaps needed help. However, what do we see with respect to Nordair? It is probably one of the healthiest—at least recently—regional carriers.

It is interesting that the proposed price of $11.50 for each Nordair share is $4.50 more than the price the stock was trading at when the exchange closed late in December of last year, a matter of a very few weeks ago. It is also interesting, although far be it from me to knock private enterprise, that some of the main shareholders of Nordair are going to make some very substantial profits. It appears that this may be done at the expense, indirectly at least, of the taxpayers of Canada, who are the ultimate owners of Air Canada. Mr. Tooley appears to be headed for a profit of $1 million in a very short time, based on the market fluctuations of the stock. Mr. Marx, one of the principal shareholders who lives in New York, picked up 17,000 shares at $2.58 per share last June. Now he is going to get $11.50, a nice little profit indeed.

Apart from that there is concern in the industry about the effect this may have on the relationship of other regional carriers. According to the Montreal Star the president of Pacific Western Airlines, Mr. Eyton, is concerned. According to an article in the Montreal Star of January 10 of this year, Air Canada's purchase of the Montreal-based Nordair Limited may interfere with his company's plans.

Mr. Eyton was quoted as follows:

> I would not like to see a regional carrier like PWA running alongside a major carrier like Air Canada. With the acquisition of Nordair any route opportunities, in terms of what Air Canada might have been willing to turn over to regional carriers, is lost.

From an historical perspective it is interesting how things turn out, because if Air Canada had directed its attention to its own corporate business as much as to opposing some of the regional carriers like, ironically enough, the one it now seeks to acquire, we would all be better off. In the not so recent past our national airline opposed Nordair in its application for routes, and I am thinking particularly of the Montreal-Ottawa-Sudbury-Thunder Bay route. Now we find that this company is gobbling up, or acquiring at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, what it opposed and what it was not able to develop by itself a very short time ago.

I want to say at this time again that in making these remarks I am not taking an anti-Air Canada bias. I very much hope that our national air carrier does well. I personally have high regard for the chief executive officer, and I am particularly impressed with the morale and efficiency of many of the employees. As the hon. member for Vegreville said yesterday, it is a shame that the proposed reward by way of a bonus involving passes to employees was handled in a rather peremptory and perhaps not very efficient way, which probably has the net effect of embarrassing the employees and blunting an initiative which might have been very appropriate had it been handled in a slightly different way after some consultations and some variations, instead of having the announcement made and then having to vary the original proposal.

Another thing I think we have to look at is the fact that, as far as I am concerned, Air Canada is not fulfilling its mandate in the eastern part of the country in the sense of serving as a real aid to developing that part of the country and providing it with important links. Surely there must be something Air Canada and the government can do to facilitate the utilization of the route from Halifax to Bangor.

In 1973 Canada and the United States signed a bilateral agreement which included a route, effective as of January 1, 1974, between Montreal, Bangor, Portland and Halifax. This route has never been implemented because, according to Air Canada, there was no money in it. The route was designated to be of use only in summer peak service periods. I understand that Air Canada is now saying that that was the time in 1974 when the airline industry was in an upheaval crisis due to fuel shortages. I also understand, although it has not been officially confirmed, that Air Canada would consider the possibility of subcontracting or negotiating this route with some other air carrier.

However, be that as it may, it seems obvious that Bangor is making great strides as a commercial and warehousing centre in the northeastern part of the United States. It is obvious to anyone who knows the maritime provinces that Halifax is becoming more and more a commercial centre for that region of the country.

The Halifax International Airport was recently upgraded. I should like to see the Ottawa International Airport given the same kind of facilities that Halifax now has. At the present time when one boards an aircraft at Ottawa airport it is like going on a tour of the sunken gardens or a sideshow orientation where you go through long winding tunnels and canvass flaps of various hues. I guess improvements will come in time.

The Halifax-Bangor route ought to be developed. I am no expert on air transportation but I imagine any route that requires promotion and pioneering will lose money for a while. I also imagine that, if Air Canada does not do something constructive soon, residents of this area will be justified in asking their elected representatives to consider allowing an airline like Delta to operate there—one that is already making at least four times the profit of Air Canada and under tougher competition.

I think it should be made clear to the chief executive officers of the airline and to the government that if they do not do something about filling this designated route with a Canadian air carrier that can provide needed transportation and trade links with Bangor, an American carrier should be permitted and even encouraged to come in and do the job. This has to be considered.

In summing up my views about this legislation I must say the thing that must be kept in mind is that it would appear that this bill seems to have achieved the objective of giving Air Canada enough corporate freedom and initiative to do its job without interference from officials in the Department of Transport who have a penchant for fouling up everything they attempt and antagonising people at the same time, at least at the highest levels. It also seems to have had the effect of giving the board of directors a clear mandate. The primary objective, of the proponents, was to free this billion dollar corporation of the entanglements that our other national carrier, the CNR, has experienced.

Members of this House will be watching very closely to see the beneficial effects of this legislation and will expect the minister and his cabinet colleagues to ensure that the improved framework for operating the airline is used properly.

I urge the government to cease the practice which has been so painfully evident in the past of scheduling—or not scheduling—committee proceedings so that Air Canada can be reviewed regularly by interested elected representatives. It is not the fault of our national air carrier that their appearances before the transportation committee have been few and far between; it is rather due to the ineptitude and bungling of the government. As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, the government has attempted to place the responsibility for this on the shoulders of the opposition parties. The government House leader will be sorry, I am sure, for the representation that he put over the networks of this country as it is so self-serving and so false.

The legislation could be summed up in the words of an old proverb—better late than never. I trust it will serve our national air carrier well and justify the work and concern that so many members of this House from all parties have put into its composition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Chair would like to point out to all hon. members that we have been very lenient with members who have spoken on Bill C-3 dealing with amendments made by the other place. I would therefore suggest that all future speakers stay strictly on the flight path and speak only on those technical amendments made by the other place.

I should like to refer hon. members to May's eighteenth edition, page 534, where the following passage appears:

The debate on this motion must be confined to the amendment under consideration, and may not extend to other amendments or to the general merits of the bill.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I presume it was purely accidental that you made your ruling at this particular time. After listening to some of the other speeches I do not see how I could possibly be out of order.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) must be interested that we are now having another kick at the cat because of the sober second thought given this bill in the other place. Some of my colleagues disagree with the word "sober" but that word appears in the legislation which created the other place. The amendments have eliminated the right of the government to make decisions. Instead of being covered by order in council, they are now to be covered by order of the governor in council.

One of the major changes that Air Canada has made recently is that the president is no longer a political appointee but rather is someone who has risen from the ranks. This would appear to be a good measure judging by the fact that in 1975 the airline lost over $13 million while in the first quarter of 1977 it showed a profit. We appreciate the good job done by the president, Mr. Claude Taylor, and all previous speakers have referred to this.

A former minister of transport, Senator Marchand, when speaking on this bill, referred to the great size of this country and the difference in services necessary for different parts of it and to the fact that heavily populated areas require a different transportation facility than that necessary for remote areas. Of the proponents that was recognized when the country was founded and when assistance was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway to provide facilities in remote areas.

Air travel in this country started with a large number of very small airlines, one man-one plane operations, and eventually we established what we hoped would be the flag-fleet of the air service of Canada to carry our flag all over the world. Members who have travelled abroad have been very proud to see an Air Canada plane sitting at an airport in Europe, Asia, Africa, or any other part of the world. This equals the pride which the people of France have in Air France, and the British have in their airlines serving all parts of the world. I am sure this is true of every country. It is also interesting to note the pride of small African countries in their airlines. When travelling from central Africa to England, they take great pride in flying the banner of East African Airlines. This pride is worth something.

Over the years Canada has been well served by Air Canada. However, Air Canada has had a great deal of problems. We have never had a transportation facility which takes into consideration the fact that if it is going to operate all across this country, providing service on uneconomic routes to the by-ways of the nation, it must use income derived from the heavily populated routes to provide such service.

It has been pointed out that we have not been able to compete. Neither have the railways. They have not been able to compete in the United States. A few moments ago, an hon. member referred to Delta Airlines. In the United States there are eight or ten airlines. They have a population of 220 million on which to draw. In Canada there are seven main carriers, five regionals and two major airlines, Air Canada and CP. We have a population of only 22 million. I believe we have done very well.

It is interesting to note the way the American airlines have changed their accounting system. For example, in one year Eastern Airlines lost $45 million. The next year they had a book transfer of $44 million. Therefore they are now able to show a profit. They may not be able to do that over a ten-year period. Eventually they will have to relate to the new book values they have placed on their investment. That will have to be taken into consideration.

Despite bad management of Air Canada and the fact the government treated it as having a responsibility without offsetting it with any asset, Air Canada has done fairly well. In 1975 Air Canada had a loss of $13 million. It reached the point where morale was rock bottom.

I recall members of this House asking for a financial statement. The situation was so bad at that time the government could not decide whether to honour the previous government's commitment to an auditing firm to audit the books of Air Canada or whether to appoint their own auditors. For a number of years there were no auditors because the government could not resolve that problem. They operated under immense hardship. The morale of Air Canada suffered badly. Mr. Claude Taylor has been able to make great changes. Therefore, we must give him the support that is necessary. This will involve a number of things.

The Minister of Transport stated, and I am paraphrasing, that his purpose is to get Air Canada into a position where it is making money and is a financial success. If that is achieved, the minister thinks we should then get rid of those sections that are successful. In my opinion, Air Canada would be fragmented to the point where it would be in the same position as the CN passenger service.

Not long ago I attended one of railway hearings. I am sure Your Honour has been at many of them. The CNR was asking for subsidization of passenger service on a specific line. That was the only question before the hearing, whether they should be allowed to drop passenger service on that line which ran between North Bay and Toronto. I attended as a member of parliament. I completely supported their application to drop that passenger service. I was opposed to a subsidy being paid to them when they were not in effect operating a service. Service was so bad that no one would use it. People use the Ontario Northland Railway, a totally Ontario-owned railway which operates in this province. That railway is not entitled to apply for a subsidy. CN asked for a subsidy or, in the alternative, to drop the service.

I had hoped that CN would sell its line to Ontario Northland so that passenger service between northern Ontario and Toronto could become more efficient. I am sure it could be operated without a loss. There would be no need for a subsidy. But of the proponents, it was decided that CN must continue, and because it had to continue, they were to be subsidized.

From reading the bill and the changes recommended by the other place, my understanding is that Air Canada will be permitted to implement a regional basis of reporting. Recently, Transair was told to take the western Canadian routes from Winnipeg to Regina, Winnipeg to Edmonton and Winnipeg to Calgary. These routes are now operating at a loss. In return for that, they were given the route from Winnipeg to Toronto through Thunder Bay and Sault Ste. Marie. As a result of transfers like this, airlines will be fragmented to the point that it will be impossible to travel anywhere in Canada without travelling on two or three different carriers. If this operates like a railroad, and I have every reason to believe it does, we will find that the initiating line, which will likely be between the major operating centres, will get the lion's share of the revenues. Very little will be left for the carriers that operate on a regional basis.

Your Honour is very fortunate to be in the position where you can fly from here to your constituency on one airline, the government airline. If I fly to my constituency, I must travel on two airlines. And even if I take the alternative to the Air Canada route, I must travel on two airlines as well.

If the profitable runs are sold, I suggest that it will be necessary to make two or three changes when travelling in this country. This means giving up the idea of a national airline with equal opportunity to people living in various parts of the country. This is a fundamental right to which Canadians are entitled.

Air Canada is being told to fly into Yellowknife. For years I travelled on a route which lost money. It went from Montreal to Ottawa, Ottawa to Val-d'Or, Val-d'Or to Rouyn, Rouyn to Earlton, on to Toronto and then back to Montreal. The mileage on that one flight would cover half the distance of travelling to Europe. There were many stops on that run. The passenger service was not sufficient to cover the cost of operation of that run. However, it filled a great need for the people of northern Quebec and northeastern Ontario.

I am sure that every member who lives outside of the five or six major centres is aware of what Air Canada did for the citizens of this country, even though it was not economically advantageous. However, they felt they had a right to some service.

[Mr. Peters.]

I would be remiss if I did not refer to something which has been mentioned many times by other members in relation to the American airlines. Along with other airlines Air Canada made the mistake especially in the late sixties, of getting the wrong type of aircraft for many of the routes it was serving. It was almost commonplace to see routes served by aircraft which were never more than half filled. It seems to me this is why the regional carriers are successful—they have been willing to buy aircraft which meet the needs of these runs.

● (1602)

I am flying almost regularly now, in 1978, in a DC-3 which was virtually obsolete in the middle forties, a plane which has not been modified or changed in any substantial way since the forties. It was flying in the thirties and it is still flying. I consider the Douglas DC-3 to be one of the safest planes we have. It is true it lacks some of the advantages of modern planes but it can carry passengers more economically on a cents-per-mile basis than most modern aircraft, and it meets the needs of routes where only a light passenger load can be expected.

It is unfortunate that Air Canada did not see fit to acquire a certain number of smaller aircraft so that it could move passengers along such routes in a more economical way. I have no doubt the management of the corporation will be giving close consideration to this aspect. I trust no decision will be made to buy Twin Otters for no better reason than to keep the investments of the Ontario government or of the federal government safe. It seems to me we should be buying aircraft on a totally different basis.

Many airlines in the United States operated with Viscount aircraft, probably the most expensive passenger aircraft ever developed. They were so expensive that two or three of the U.S. airlines using them went bankrupt. It took a very rich organization, Air Canada, to operate the Viscount during its last years of service. The correct choice of aircraft is a matter of great importance, it seems to me.

With perhaps one exception, the bill has come back to us from the Senate with very little alteration. Apart from clause 8, most of the amendments merely involve renumbering clauses. I have a copy of a note sent along with the amendments and signed by James Lyon, acting general counsel for the Department of Finance. I imagine that some of the amendments were made at the instigation of the Department of Finance since they involve technical matters which might have been overlooked in the original drafting.

One new subclause added by the Senate was to the effect that an order of the governor in council made under clause 6 or clause 8 must be tabled in parliament and published in the Canada Gazette. This is an amendment with which I am sure all members agree. I presume that all orders in council make their way in time into the Canada Gazette, but I would point out that the Canada Gazette is no longer a publication which is read by the average Canadian, though it might interest lawyers and members of legislatures across the country, as well as a handful of other persons who follow these matters closely.

I am sure most hon. members have read this publication from time to time and found very little in it which was exciting or illuminating; after reading it for a while and failing to understand what was in it, most of us have desisted from that exercise. If, on the other hand, an order in council is tabled in the House of Commons, interest is immediately attracted. I see my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is fidgeting in his place. He probably wants to make the point that people are not likely to pay close attention to orders which are tabled in the House, either—of the proponents, that does not apply to me! I see that Senator Grosart and Senator Forsey read them, and if somebody reads them it is likely that orders in council which provoke disagreement will be brought to the attention of the House.

Many of the changes which are made by order in council are carried out because some departmental official finds them to be to his advantage. So a change is made in the form, the direction, or, sometimes, even in the content of legislation. I am sure members of parliament want to know about these things so I believe it is safe to say everyone will support the provision for the tabling of these particular orders in council in the House. After all, the changes might be extensive.

At some point in time, possibly after further study, the government may wish to break off a particular section of the corporation's activities without harming the remaining operations. Those sections which become profitable will be sold and it might be possible to make such changes on the basis of clause 6 of the bill which sets out the powers and activities of the corporation, allowing it to buy, sell, lease, hire, dispose of, maintain, operate and so on. The corporation is by no means restricted to the operation of aircraft. It can provide hotels, surface vehicles and other facilities for servicing and housing. Any single one of these operations, if it became viable, might be broken off. One of the first the minister might consider would be Econo-Travel, the travel service which has been operating for years with mixed success.

It may be Air Canada will want to build hotels as other airlines have done in countries such as in the Caribbean. They may want to build them in France. In travelling to France, Canadians are at a very great disadvantage. In travelling to Paris, particularly if you fly Air France, you can stay at a very reduced rate at hotels owned by Air France. However, if you fly by Air Canada you cannot get that same kind of an arrangement.

We are attempting, I presume, to do the same kind of business which we have done over the years unsuccessfully with CN. It may be by order in council that we may be able to commence building facilities of various kinds, ancillary services, and when they become viable enterprises and stand on their own two feet they will be sold. It may be they will be sold, under the direction of an order in council, and the disposition may be able to be made under clause 6 of this bill.

The Senate, Mr. Speaker, were also concerned about a number of other amendments, all very consequential on the passing of the initial one, with one exception that stands on its own. The Senate intend by many of these amendments, and there are quite a number of them, just to change the numbering of the clauses. While it is necessary, I think it might have been possible if this House passed the first one we would have known ourselves of the necessity to change the numbering, or there would have been two numbers for the same clause. We do end up with a lot of amendments which we may want to go through at another stage. However, I think at this stage we should be more interested in whether we want to pass the major amendments in this bill. They will in effect change the method used in these acquisitions, disposals and operations of all the ancillary services which I am not sure properly belong to an airline, but which we have created as part of our Canadian airline.

I believe this bill gives the government more power, and in my opinion the airlines should be worried about this as well. Mr. Taylor is a very outspoken gentleman and, I am sure, far-seeing. He will undoubtedly see the disadvantage of the cabinet deciding whether or not Transair should have the right to make the $12 million exchange from the Toronto-Thunder Bay-Winnipeg run to runs including Winnipeg, Regina—the local prairie runs. If the cabinet makes these decisions, Mr. Taylor, I presume, will not be with us very long and we will return to a much more unsatisfactory management. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, these changes can be made in that manner, and we are very concerned.

I personally do not think that there is anything wrong with the initial purpose of Air Canada in providing reasonable transportation to all Canadians, no matter where they live, where it is at all feasible, and where the cost is not exorbitant and prohibitive. In the main, Air Canada has been willing to do this. We have certainly attached to them a terrific handicap. Certainly the Conservatives should be blamed for this handicap because they allowed Canadian Pacific, as an alternate airline, to pick up the cream of the runs, and not to do anything for Canada, not to do anything for the unity of this nation. Canadian Pacific Airlines do not travel to any place which does not pay them to go there. They do not operate anything that it does not pay them to operate. They are a truly private enterprise operation, and I have no quarrel with that. If I were a shareholder of Canadian Pacific Airlines I would be very pleased with the way the airline is managed. But, Mr. Speaker, if I were president of Air Canada I would have grave objection to the kind of competition that I meet, which does not aid in the role that I have of providing all Canadians with access to air travel.

I do not object to competition, but competition should be fair. Competition which the Conservatives speak of is one horse, one rabbit. That may be 50-50, but it is not a very fair 50-50. I believe it should be fair. If we ask the same of our regional carriers, if we ask the same of our two national carriers, that is competition fair and square, and may the best company win.

If Air Canada under those terms could not survive and Canadian Pacific did, then Canadian Pacific would be the flag carrier of our nation. In my opinion that is competition. But what we have today is not competition and I disagree violently with the idea of frittering away little parts because they become profitable, and that appears to be what is going to happen.

One of these amendments questions how this can be done. It questions what the government is doing, and the way the government reports it to parliament. I suggest there are still those in Canada proud of the national airline. Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, many of those people who are proud of Air Canada are proud of it for the simple reason that it is Air Canada. They are proud of its record. They are proud of it because it flies from community to community and carries our flag to other countries around the world. It is not because Canadian people travel via Air Canada. When we provide air travel, we provide it for a very limited number of people in this country. There are people who travel on an air carrier almost every day of their work week, but most people save up all year, take one trip to go on a holiday somewhere, which is usually outside of the country, and that is the only occasion when they fly.

The average Canadian does not travel by air. It is too expensive, and his time is not that valuable. He can afford to drive, to ride a bus or take the train. Therefore we always have to keep in mind that we are providing this type of service, which is very necessary for the economy of the nation. It is very necessary transportation for the business of the communities and it is very important for those who have to get from one point to another over a great distance in a short period of time. We are certainly not suggesting it is not important. We should keep in mind it is important, but that it applies to a very small percentage of our population.

In closing, looking at any record of Air Canada and comparing it with American records, Air Canada does not fare too badly. It is interesting to note the traffic growth in the United States. For instance the revenue per passenger mile for airlines increased 9.9 per cent and freight ton miles increased 6.5 per cent. The industry was more productive by increasing its load factor from 53.7 per cent to 55.4 per cent. However, this falls far short of Air Canada's 61 per cent load factor. Traffic growth in Canada was much slower because of the size of our population and the distance between major cities. Between 1975 and 1976 Air Canada increased its revenue passenger miles by 6 per cent, while Canadian Pacific, that great free enterprise, decreased its revenue passenger miles by 1 per cent. Thus, Air Canada is not doing so bad, and it is serving the Canadian public.

● (1622)

The government should make up its mind on what is going to be done with regional carriers and Canadian Pacific. Is Canadian Pacific to the Liberal party what it was to the Conservative party? Is it their little darling? Does it have to be protected? Does it have to be given all kinds of advantages? The former minister of transport, Mr. Marchand, indicated that it is the over-all transportation facility for Canadians.

[Mr. Peters.]

Will the government look at it in the same way? If Canadian Pacific is to have this great advantage, then we should know about it. It should be put into a position which is not competitive, because it is not competitive compared to Air Canada.

Something should be done about regional carriers. They should be allowed free access to the market, wherever it may be, within their regions. They should be allowed to compete on the national runs, as Canadian Pacific does. The routes should be formalized. We should take the bull by the horns in terms of travel in Canada, which has been mentioned by other hon. members.

When one can travel to the Caribbean and Mexico and pay less than $400 for a hotel room for a week, and in some cases for two weeks, and when it costs $400 for a person to fly from Ottawa to Vancouver, then surely there is something wrong with the suggestion that a service is being provided to Canadians. If those arrangements are available outside Canada, surely they can be arranged inside Canada.

I do not think the government believes in national unity. It believes in keeping Quebec in the Liberal party. It would be nice for the people of the maritimes to be able to travel to Vancouver for less than $500, and vice versa. Canadians should be given a break when travelling across this country. I have been on planes travelling across Canada which have been slightly over half full. Surely a break could be given to people in order for them to see Canada, especially if they cannot travel otherwise, even if it requires staying in hotels over night on a standby basis to allow normal revenue passengers to take their flights. If we do not intend to do that, then we are only paying lip service to national unity.

My friends across Canada who work in factories, mines, and forests receive only two weeks for their holidays. In order for them to drive to British Columbia and back, they require ten days. Thus, they are left with four days to visit the provinces which they pass through. The only way they can see Canada, which would provide them with a better understanding of the problems facing the country, would be a lesser air fare. The Senate amendments may make it possible for the government to do this, but I have seen little indication on the part of the government that it wants to serve such a role. Rather, it seems the government wants to serve the conservative role, which seems to be a competitive enterprise system for CP Air and very little for the national flight carrier, Air Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the amendments we are studying today include among them an amendment to clause 6.(1)(g) of the bill, which would give Air Canada the authority to "acquire and hold shares or debt obligations of any other body corporate carrying on activities similar or incidental to those of the corporation and sell or otherwise deal with such shares or debt obligations."

Another amendment we are considering is with respect to clause 6.(2) of the bill which reads as follows:

The governor in council may, by order, authorize the corporation to engage in or carry on any activities not otherwise authorized by this act.

There could be concern about the authority to be given directly to the corporation to acquire control of other airline operations, particularly when one takes a preliminary look at the intended takeover by Air Canada of Nordair. Also one can wonder about the implications of the authority which the original bill intended to give to the governor in council. If the amendment from the other place is not accepted, it should be clarified whether this authority would prevail over the regulatory authority of the Canadian Transport Commission.

I am raising this matter at this time in connection with the proposed acquisition of majority control of Nordair by Air Canada. Because of my concerns about this, I have asked the Canadian Transport Commission to make certain, in considering whether to approve the Air Canada takeover of Nordair, that this takeover will not result in any lessening of the service now being provided to Windsor, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal and other communities on the present Nordair route by either Nordair or Air Canada. Also I have asked the director of the combines branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to use the authority given him by amendments to the Combines Act, which have been in force since 1976, to consider and make representations to the Canadian Transport Commission about the implications for competition in Canada if permission was granted for Air Canada to take over Nordair.

Air Canada and Nordair are the only airlines providing scheduled service to Windsor, Ontario. Nordair is the only airline directly providing scheduled service to Hamilton, Ontario, although I understand Air Canada advertises its service to Malton airport as serving "Toronto-Hamilton". I am sure the people of Hamilton would agree that such service is not the same as serving Hamilton directly via Mount Hope airport as Nordair does.

The existence of the scheduled service by Nordair to Windsor, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal, and so on, during the past few years has provided useful competition to Air Canada. It has provided needed additional flights at convenient times to these communities which were not available until Nordair began its scheduled service to them. Also Nordair has been offering special fares for weekends, for senior citizens and young people, which I understand are less costly than equivalent fares offered by Air Canada. It would not be in the best interests of the communities presently served by Nordair if the takeover by Air Canada brings about any decrease in the services presently offered to them by either or both Nordair and Air Canada.

At about the time of the announcement of the offer of Air Canada to acquire the majority control of Nordair press reports suggested that Air Canada was interested in buying Nordair because of the successful business it has built up in charter flights to foreign destinations. The primary objective of Air Canada should be to improve its service offered within Canada and to make it less costly than at present. Air Canada should strive to change the present situation where it is often cheaper for Canadians to fly outside Canada, even on Canadian airlines, than it is to fly to points within Canada. It would not be in the public interest if Air Canada attempted to increase its charter business to foreign points by used Nordair planes which are presently serving scheduled routes within Canada.

The press reports at the time of the announcement of the intended takeover of Nordair by Air Canada did not indicate in any way that such a step would be necessary in order to keep Nordair operating since it has been reported to have been financially successful in recent years. That is why, as I have said, I have raised this matter with the Canadian Transport Commission and also with the director of the combines branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As a result, I have been informed very recently by Robert J. Bertrand, director of the combines branch, that he is presently examining the proposed acquisition in light of the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and those of the National Transportation Act. He went on to inform me that his examination is to determine the extent to which competition will be lessened in the provision of air transportation in Canada, and the effect such a transaction will have on competition in other allied service industries.

I hope that the director of the combines branch will soon complete his preliminary examination and confirm that he will use the authority he now has to raise before the Transport Commission the implications for competition in the air line and related industries if the proposed takeover of Nordair by Air Canada is allowed to go through. I am pleased to have his confirmation that, as a result of my bringing the matter to his attention, he has begun reviewing this transaction for that purpose.

A basis for concern about the effects on competition of the takeover if it were allowed to go through is provided by what is said in a letter which Gerry O'Rourke, assistant manager of Arrow Travel Agency Ltd., sent to Mrs. P. Delbridge of the Consumers' Association of Canada. I refer particularly to the following statement, assuming it contains correct information, in the second paragraph of Mrs. O'Rourke's letter, which reads:

Nordair was also contacted for a price which, at the moment, they have to decline quoting until Air Canada either cannot fulfil your request or for some other reason are unable to accept your booking. Once Air Canada has refused, then Nordair will be pleased to give a price.

Mrs. O'Rourke's letter is dated January 18. It is my understanding that the acquisition of a controlling interest in Nordair by Air Canada subject to CTC approval was announced some nine days earlier.

It might be that the Nordair position referred to in Mrs. O'Rourke's letter is consistent with existing regulations, but if this is so, these regulations would seem to be anticompetitive in their impact, and this is a matter which should be considered by the Transport Commission and which should be raised before it by the director of the combines branch.

As a result of my expressing my concerns in a preliminary way to the president of the Canadian Transport Commission about the proposed takeover the president, the Hon. E. J. Benson, replied to me that he has forwarded a copy of my letter to the chairman of the Air Transport Committee. He went on to say, in effect, that he assumed I wanted to oppose the acquisition and my letter dated January 9 could therefore be accepted as a letter of opposition as contemplated by section 27 of the act, if this were my wish and intention. I want to inform the House that as a result, I wrote formally to the president of the CTC saying that I wanted to confirm that my letter to him of January 9 should constitute a formal objection to the proposed acquisition. Also in my letter, I requested that the proposed acquisition be the subject of public hearings by the Air Transport Committee of the CTC.

It is interesting to note that it is not obligatory for this type of transaction to be the subject of public hearings, as I think should be the case, but I hope that the Air Transport Committee will accede to my request and that the matter of the approval of the takeover will be the subject of public hearings so that community bodies in Hamilton, Windsor and elsewhere will have a chance to state their views, but I know that they have concerns similar to mine which they have already expressed in local communities.

It is my intention as well to pursue these concerns, but I wanted to raise this matter at this time to indicate how the broad authority which it is intended this bill should give to Air Canada, and which in some ways it already has, could possibly be exercised in a way which is contrary to the best interests of the communities served by both Air Canada and Nordair, a consequence which could have anti-competitive effects. This should be very important to Canada at this time when we want to stimulate competition in all industries in order to bring about the pressures of competition for the well-being of all Canadians.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, early last October when this Air Canada reorganization bill was before us in the House I made a few brief remarks—I believe it was last November 1—about some very specific aspects of the bill. They dealt with only three items, two of them dealing with the Air Canada freight policy for livestock and a third one dealing with Air Canada's policy of buying off-shore beef, principally from Australia and New Zealand, for their passenger service meals, when we in Canada, through our own Canadian cattle industry, can supply the best beef in the world.

The first two aspects on which I touched were the air freight policy of Air Canada with respect to freighting live cattle and the insistence of Air Canada on the first right of refusal on all bids for air freighting of cattle out of Canada. I do not propose to repeat my earlier remarks on these specific issues, but I know of some new developments since that earlier debate which I would like to touch upon. They do not relate to the same aspects and I want to suggest that this information has come to me principally as a result of being in close co-operation with the only two truly Canadian forwarders of livestock, and particularly cattle, in Canada. One of them is World Wide Forwarders based in Farnham, Quebec. They have been the leading forwarders not only in Canada but in North America for a number of years. The other one is a new organization known as Alberta-Canada All Breeds Association, which has recently become active and which operates out of Calgary.

Last December 20, just before we recessed, as a result, I am sure, of my earlier remarks and which were quite specific about Air Canada's air freight policy for livestock, I was supplied with a brief directive from Air Canada with limited information. I want to quote from that information. It is in the form of a very brief message and it is dated December 20. It reads:

> Air Canada has a fleet of six DC-8 freighters, all of which may be used for cattle charters. On the average, the air line operates some 50 such charters each year and works with CIDA in the export of Canadian livestock.
> For more than two years the air line has used the more efficient and humane loading equipment which permits cattle to be "walked" on to the aircraft.
>
> A number of continuing improvements have been effected over the years as a result of regular meeting with owner and forwarder representative associations.

● (1642)

> Air Canada's pricing structure for these charters is competitive with other operators.

A postscript at the bottom of that information sheet says the following:

> PWA has not been in the cattle charter business for some time due to a reported heavy loss in this market. Also, the normal advance application to the CTC for operation of a cattle charter is 30 days.

That reference to Pacific Western's experience in hauling live cattle with specially equipped aircraft, which that company had at one time, relates to some of my earlier remarks. It is true that that particular service is no longer operating, because evidently PWA chose to get into passenger service with that particular aircraft. That was PWA's decision, but in the short interval PWA was operating that service PWA demonstrated how to load live cattle on to an aircraft and move them very efficiently. PWA developed the best possible system, and that system is still used by some carriers. It is truly a walk-on system whereby the cattle walk off a cattle liner, up the appropriate chute and right into the aircraft where there are appropriate cross pens in which to contain them.

I want to make some remarks about the message I received. I am sure the information statement was prepared in answer to those earlier remarks of mine. As a result of information I received from World Wide Forwarders operating out of Quebec, it is my understanding that representatives of Air Canada say they are using a walk-on system at Mirabel, but I have gone to some trouble to learn that the situation is simply that they still use a crate system, at least for lighter cattle. I have not been able to find out what they do for heavier cattle, but they insist on a crating system whereby the cattle are loaded into temporary, flimsy crates. They are lifted by forklift high enough to be pushed into the fuselage of the aircraft on a dolly system. After they are inside, they are released, and they walk into the various compartments. That is what Air Canada calls a walk-on system, which is a less than adequate explanation.

As I explained, a true walk-on system is much more efficient. By having the cattle walk off a cattle liner, through an appropriate chute and up into the aircraft it is possible to load a large aircraft in perhaps no more than an hour, or an hour and ten minutes at the most. One can appreciate the extra cost involved in holding up a large aircraft which sometimes requires up to five or six hours to load using the much less efficient system of using crates and forklifts. I was informed that the only time Air Canada used a true walk-on system was when there were snowplowing problems at Mirabel. Arrangements were made to load an aircraft at Dorval. The other system was used, and the operation was much more efficient.

I would like to comment on the statement that Air Canada's pricing structure for these charters is competitive with other operations. I suggest most sincerely that Air Canada is not competitive, especially with regard to large cattle. The experience of the Alberta-Canada All Breeds Association operating out of the Calgary airport is that the bids for proposed contracts for flights out of the Calgary airport by Air Canada were one third higher than those coming from United States carriers for the same job.

These bids were based on Air Canada's using a standard DC-8 with a capacity of 65,000 pounds. I want to report that Air Canada did move about 11 loads with this type of equipment during the month of December out of the Toronto airport. These were mostly lighter weight dairy cattle that were going to the Mediterranean. The reason Air Canada is not competitive with foreign carriers is that while Air Canada's cost per pound may be competitive with other carriers, its cost per head is far from competitive. I suppose the principal reason is that Air Canada's competitors are using larger aircraft which are able to take bigger pay loads. The cost per head can be reduced significantly by using that approach.

However, much more important than being competitive, Air Canada continues to insist on its right of first refusal on all proposed contracts for airlifting of Canadian cattle out of Canadian airports. The only comment which I think is appropriate is that surely this is a dog-in-the-manger attitude which does not help two air forwarders, or more for that matter, who may wish to organize in Canada and to get into what appears to be the very good business of exporting Canada's excellent breeding cattle to a world-wide market.

I suggest that there are some very direct consequences of this right of first refusal upon which Air Canada insists. This information again comes from these two forwarders. World Wide Forwarders is one of the largest and most progressive forwarders in North America, and perhaps in the world. As a result of this policy World Wide has had to acquire its own aircraft. It cannot use its own aircraft out of Canadian airports for the reasons I have cited, so World Wide trucks Canadian cattle it acquires for offshore customers to the United States and then uses its own aircraft and quite a number of other foreign aircraft to complete the job and to forward to customers abroad.

The Alberta-Canada All Breeds Association which operates out of Calgary is presently trucking its cattle from various locations in Alberta, and perhaps from other parts of Western Canada, to Montana. Most of the shipments go to Great Falls, Montana, where they are loaded onto foreign carriers. This group has a contract for about one airload per week for a full year, and possibly considerably more at the completion of that undertaking. All of these types of contracts for airlifting cattle are for foreign customers, and all of them are across at least one ocean. The only practical way to move the cattle is by aircraft.

Both Canadian forwarders are mindful of some of Air Canada's special problems which have developed as a result of limited experience. One of them is a problem regarding ventilation of aircraft when flying livestock. Just shortly before Christmas about half a load—several hundred cattle—died as a result of poor ventilation on one of the trips about which I have been speaking. I suggest that that was the result of lack of experience. It is a poor way to build confidence and to attract Canadian customers. Air Canada has limited experience and not much desire to get into the air freighting of livestock.

Both these truly Canadian forwarders are knowledgeable about the worldwide popularity of and demand for our dairy and beef cattle, and are trying to fit that into their business of forwarding breeding cattle to customers all over the world. This country has built a good reputation for both breeding and dairy cattle over the years, in part because of the high standards imposed by the health of animals branch. Both these forwarders would like to see an air freight carrier—a Boeing 707 or similar wide-bodied aircraft—make weekly shipments of live cattle to Europe, North Africa and the Middle East. They have enough firm orders for several years, but in order to ship once a week out of Calgary, Edmonton and more often from Montreal, they would have to insist on a more efficient walk-on system than Air Canada uses at the present time. If Air Canada is not prepared to supply such a facility then I suggest that foreign carriers be allowed to offer it at Canadian airports.

I am sure the president of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, is well aware of these representations as he has received correspondence from both these forwarders and from other Canadian cattle organizations about the situation. His letters, which appear in the flight magazine En Route, indicate his interest in matters relating to the airline. He must be aware of the potential for Canada's balance of trade position through air freighting cattle, since every animal transported goes to an export market. This is a relatively new market which is waiting, even begging, for good Canadian cattle.

In the past few years our cattle industry has been depressed, but this new concept has helped attract foreign customers. The market is there, the price is right, and Air Canada has an obligation to help move the cattle. I suggest that a realistic air freight policy could enhance our total balance of payments picture considerably.

I have no problem with the Senate amendments to this bill for the reorganization of Air Canada, Mr. Speaker. I think we will have a better organized and better administered national airline as a result of them. I wish to commend the Senate for becoming involved and bringing something of this nature to this House for ratification, and I fully support the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add to the comments of my colleagues on the bill respecting the reorganization of Air Canada. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) brought up an excellent point. Farm income in western Canada has decreased rapidly over the last three years. Many farmers and ranchers have spent years acquiring expertise in the breeding of cattle, hogs, and other livestock, and it seems unfair that we cannot provide the kind of aircraft necessary for this livestock to be exported. This is a business which would help increase prairie farm income.

It is ironic that, as we debate the Senate amendments to the bill to reorganize Air Canada, the government has just approved a new budget for the airlines. The press release I have here indicates that Air Canada's 1978 capital budget for the purchase of new aircraft will be in the neighbourhood of $68.5 million. The capitalization of the airline is not very high and that is why we are now considering amendments to the act—to enable Air Canada to be free of the hold of the CNR and go forward as a Crown corporation. The financial reorganization bill before us reduces Air Canada's debt to equity ratio from the current 95 to 5 to 60 to 40, which is a more traditional situation for North American air carriers. The equity will increase from the current $5 million now held by CNR to $340 million, all held by the Crown corporation, Air Canada.

Some of the amendments proposed and argued by hon. members in the other place were debated very effectively on this side of the House before the bill went to the other place. In particular I should like to refer to the deletion of clause 6(2) which reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may, by order, authorize the Corporation to engage in or carry on any activities not otherwise authorized by this Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Health—Alleged danger to infants from chemicals carried by nursing mothers—Request for study; the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin)—Official Languages—Reported refusal of Ontario to give official status to French language; the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—External Affairs—Prime Minister's knowledge that Soviet satellite contained nuclear package.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

Order No. 2; the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 4; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 8; the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 9; the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1702)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To save Your Honour reading 15 or 20 orders, I believe there is an understanding that we proceed to No. 29.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that all orders prior to No. 29 shall stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved that Bill C-229, to protect the Canadian environment by instituting mandatory impact assessment procedures prior to the construction of installations potentially damaging to the environment, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in an age of supposed rational enlightenment, it is unfortunate that our society still seems able to respond only to crisis demand situations. Yet how many in this room today can remember having heard the word pollution more than 15 years ago, let alone having been actively involved in the alarm that was raised in our society at that time?

I recall being elected to the British Columbia legislature in 1966 without the issue ever being raised in the campaign, let alone on the floor of the House by either the government or the opposition in the ensuing year. However, by 1968-69 the small vocal group of seemingly radical doomsday soothsayers had grown into a large public outcry, leading to public and political pressure and the subsequent beginnings of the legislative process.

By the early seventies a considerable and credible body of scientific and professional environmentalists emerged and gained credibility as well as bureaucratic positioning within governments. Within a decade, society had moved from the more negative expressionism of pollution and severe attack on the great villains, government and industry, and evolved into the more moderate expressions of the word environment and broadening the general perspective, to recognizing that all human activity encroaches on the natural environment, to a recognition of the limits of growth, and to a condemnation of the developed world by the developing nations for its gluttonous consumption, and finally to the concept of a conservation ethic and awareness that big is bad and that we need a reassessment of our entire value system and life style.

Often a recurring trend in film art provides us with a mirror of our current cultural or ethical values. I saw a movie a short time ago that reflected and simplified one such current value. The movie was called "Oh God". The story centred around a young man working in a grocery store who claimed to have heard and seen God, who had asked him to bring the message of the hour to man from God, the basic message being God gave us the world for us to live in and He provided all that we need; all we had to do was make it work. The choice is ours individually and if we so choose it will work well for us, but if we choose to destroy His creations the inevitable doomsday would be upon us. A movie such as this in both form and substance would have been laughed at and mocked out of existence less than a decade ago among the symbols of "Easy Rider" and "Clockwork Orange".

Today, whether it is "Rocky" or "Star Wars" or "Oh God", people are reaching out to the message of that movie because a new generation has been born, educated, and has accepted a new or renewed ethic of conservation. The ethic of pessimism, wanton desecration, and fantasy has passed and a new generation has emerged speaking, believing, and feeling the need to balance and harmonize productivity and consumption with conservation and replenishment.

This House and this government, as well as the next House and the next government, may well not recognize that before us is in fact an extension of those new or renewed basic values or ethics. Before the next decade has passed this and other legislation based upon these ethics or values will be in place. Consequently any delaying tactics to prevent its passage or broaden its discussion will only be temporary because this piece of legislation in its principles is in tune with its time, it is right morally, and ethically right according to the values of the next generation, if not this generation.

This current generation of legislators has responded to the call of a few radicals and visionaries in an effort to pacify rather than to create from an inner environmental value and conviction, and for this reason, under the pressure of energy demands, unemployment and inflation, the environmental cause may be unfortunately forced to rest a while, but be assured this force will come again with a new inner conviction.

I urge Canadians listening today to give this legislation a chance. Listen to this legislation. Open it for further discussion in order that these basic principles will be recognized by legislators tomorrow as they are being recognized by the legislators today.

We have in the last decade advanced rapidly and progressively. Through this period of rapid growth of environmental technology standards and legislation, while some programs have applied technology successfully, it is time to assess our future direction in restoring and maintaining a harmonious environment.

On the negative side, environmental concerns have been paralleled by decreasing productivity and deterioration of the work ethic. Energy and inflation crises have successfully challenged environmental priorities. The individual has no status in law to come into court and challenge a project unless it is going to damage his own person or his own property. Most legislation created by governments tends to be after-the-fact legislation, and at the federal level the Fisheries Act still remains the only effective veto relative to developmental projects.

On the more positive side, environmental concerns are firmly entrenched in both the public and the private sector, and while legislation remains largely toothless, it does enunciate wordy principles and has resulted in a firmly entrenched professional bureaucracy.

How many times does one hear citizens declaring that it is useless to protest or to take action because the government or other institutions will not listen; an indication of apathy? Toffler's book "Future Shock" supports the theory that the individual whose role in society has become increasingly insignificant, whose sphere of personal action has been reduced, perceives most of social reality as being beyond personal control.

Decentralization of organization must take place. There must emerge a form of redistribution of power to individuals and communities. Today most things are done through organizations, but human beings are in these organizations. They can, and they must insist that organizations are meant to serve men, not men to serve organizations.

To ensure that there is active public participation, one is in need of two elements. There must exist a legal basis for participation and there must be mechanisms for public involvement. If one studies the various pieces of federal environmental legislation in Canada, such as the federal government's Clean Air Act, and Water Act, one realizes that citizens are not guaranteed the right to participate in public and private decisions concerning resource development and management. The Canadian legal system does not guarantee or even promise those rights.

● (1712)

The convening of public hearings, such as the Berger Commission, is a discretionary power given to an official, not a requirement. Only the federal government's Northern Inland Waters Act manifests any commitment to participation by the public in making of environmental management decisions.

Section 26 of the Canada Water Act (1970) states that the minister may establish advisory committees if he considers them desirable. He may appoint to these committees such persons as he desires, and he is under no obligation to be in any way influenced by the advice given to him by the committees. The Clean Air Act does not contemplate any compulsory citizen participation in the making of any environmental quality decisions. There is a provision in the National Energy Board Act for the holding of public hearings, but the statute does not define what procedure is to be followed. The Board may determine its own procedure.

After the release of the Environment Canada report on ecological consequences of the James Bay hydro dam system, the federal government publicized a new administrative program called EARP. The Minister of the Environment, at his discretion, could call for an environmental impact assessment prior to the construction of a federal project. This policy mechanism is a false front. The government can talk about its commitment to the protection of the environment. However, it never has to put that commitment to work.

If a political party holds a majority, a minister is not bound to act on regulations which do not have the clout of statute. As usual, it is the individual without political or economic power who loses. My bill would bring the decision-making process out of the smoke-filled back rooms and into the open. The individual citizen's rights would be guaranteed.

The ineffectiveness of the existing regulations is compounded by what governments have chosen to leave out. They ask only for a narrowly defined environmental study, whereas in my bill the environment includes the human population. Another problem of definition exists because the term "projects" is used in the regulations. Undertakings other than projects, such as policies or legislative proposals, are therefore not included, and when a policy proposal has achieved the "project" stage it means the cabinet has already given the green light, so the assessment procedure becomes an exercise or a detailing of consequences. Not only that, it is a gross waste of public money and constitutes an added cost which should never be incurred. Environmental assessments which are not carried out before decisions are made are, in effect, valueless, nothing but sand in the gears.

[Mr. Wenman.]

Of graver concern is the complete lack of an opportunity for the public to contribute to the decision-making process. The minister may sit in his office, read the proponent's report, approve it, and the next minute the concrete starts to flow.

There is a substantial discretionary power in the hands of the proponent of a project. A federal agency or department, or a private company operating on a federal grant, has the discretion itself to decide that its proposal will have practically no environmental impact. If the proponent makes that decision, and if it sticks, he can go ahead without being subject to the impact assessment procedures. Again, if he can satisfy the screening committee that the environmental impact will only be minor, he can also go ahead without assessment. And even if the assessment procedure applies, it is the proponent, not the department, not an outside agency, which prepares the initial assessment. The environmental assessment panel sets down guidelines, but the proponent himself determines how those guidelines apply to the initial assessment.

The "front program" which the government has supposedly adopted and which will supposedly assure that no program will go ahead in the absence of an environmental assessment, has now proven to be ineffective. The fact is that such projects do go ahead without assessment. This is made possible because of the discretionary powers left with ministers. Each year more than 1,000 projects are screened for potential adverse environmental effects. Time has shown that on the average only five per year are deemed to have significant environmental effects, qualifying them for an initial study.

The powers of the assessment panel are limited. For one thing, it has the capacity only to review impact assessments prepared by the proponent. Then, if it does find fault, it has only the power to advise, and it can be ignored or overruled by the minister or by the cabinet.

In the case of multi-phase projects, it appears to be the practice of the Department of the Environment to conduct environmental impact assessments one stage at a time. In practice this means that if the first phase of a multi-phase project can be cleared environmentally the whole thing will go ahead, because a proponent will argue that so much has been invested in the development of the first stage that the investment commitment should outweigh any adverse environmental factors which appear later on. That seems to be the approach the Department of the Environment is taking to projects at both Wreck Cove in Nova Scotia, and in northwestern British Columbia, in the minister's own riding.

Bill C-229 would ensure that undertakings in which the federal government has any type of interest are planned with due consideration for the environment. My bill has several key provisions which fill gaps in existing federal environmental legislation and administrative processes. They are as follows:

1. Any undertaking by the Government of Canada, or under its legislative authority or funded by it in any manner, must submit an impact assessment to the Minister of the Environment. This is not spelled out clearly in existing legislation.

2. All persons should have access to the impact assessment. At the present time information is withheld, or can be withheld; the public is not allowed access to scientific information connected with impact assessment.

3. A public hearing at which any person may participate must be held before the minister makes a decision. At the present time there is no provision that any such hearing must take place. Decisions can be made and projects completed in the absence of any public participation or any public hearing.

4. Funds provided by the proponent should be made available at the minister's discretion to responsible participants acting in the public interest. This would assist in ensuring full, intelligent, and competent discussion. As things are, many people are in a position to see that something is being done which is wrong. They feel it is wrong, but they lack the confidence or the information which would enable them to prove their case. Information should be provided by the government or by the proponents of the plan to be used by those who contend that the project should not proceed and need this information to prove their point.

I am concerned that environmental legislation is presently being used only as "sand-in-the-gears" whose result is to slow projects down or to make them more expensive. Very often responsibility for taking environmental decisions is passed from one minister to another, and in the end nobody makes a decision. As I say, it is merely sand in the gears. That is not the case with my bill; the minister could make such a provision. Provision is also made for class actions. Any person could appeal the minister's decision in court.

The concept behind environmental impact assessment is rooted in the moral obligation to accept the interdependence of the earth's ecosystem, and act accordingly. Man must junk his faith in his own dominance to the trash can of narrowly conceived ideas. Everything and anything can only take so much kicking around. The vulnerability of man stems from his pressure upon and manipulation of the environment. Technology will not be able to fabricate substitutes which yield the same satisfaction for natural habitat resources which man has exploited to the point of non-productibility or irreversibility.

If we examine our material progress to date, the inescapable fact is that the largest part has come from the conversion of our natural resources into—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Wenman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What then could be more logical than a legislative mechanism which helps to safeguard the rights of individuals who derive some form of wealth from the services of our natural resources?

In the recently introduced nuclear control bill provision is made for public hearings—a reaction to public protestations of nuclear facilities being put up in their backyard without public debate. Not very much is spelled out in the legislation as to how public hearings are to be conducted, but at least there is provision for them. At least there is some minor sign that the government remains open, although largely ignorant of the real requirements of an environmental impact assessment.

There is some minimal amount of radiation associated with a uranium mine, nuclear reactor, or a coal-fired electrical generation plant. Apparently the number of premature deaths caused by the entire coal fuel cycle is much higher than that considered as possible for a uranium fuel cycle.

If the federal government decides to help develop coal generated electricity, are those people potentially affected by, say, coal ash, to be treated in a different manner than those potential victims of the uranium fuel cycle's radiation? I think not. Both groups should have the opportunity to participate in a public hearing, a right my legislation would give them.

Public hearings are not perfect policy-making devices, and we all know that because we have attended or participated in them many times as politicians. What results from a public hearing is a variety of different, often self-interested views, some facts about and perhaps some novel untested solutions to a problem. But public hearings do perform several useful functions; gathering information, increasing public participation and acceptability of decisions, and assisting decision-makers, the minister and his civil servants, to choose from different alternatives that may be put forward.

Why is the government so afraid of information? Why is it so afraid of facts? If that is all this legislation does, it could produce information to improve a decision and to make sure a decision is morally right.

Legislation of the sort I have proposed requires comprehensive freedom of information laws. Without access to government research documents, the public's hands are tied. An excellent example is the attempt, which I brought up recently in the national resources standing committee, of citizens trying to prepare good briefs respecting the nuclear waste issue without access to many government documents which are now classified confidential. These 30 environmental groups from across Canada were notified only two weeks ahead that they could appear and present a brief before the committee. They are told that they cannot have the information that is available to the committee, the same scientific government information—"make your brief but get your own material." Why, if this is public information, is it not available to all the people making objections? It seems almost ridiculous to believe that government in this day and age would withhold such information.

I do not want this legislation to be used to stall worthy projects solely because some minuscule faction deems it unworthy. In Bill C-229 I have tried to ensure that an efficient and fair examination be given to all federal government undertakings which have been deemed to affect the environment in some manner. I am more than willing to listen to any group or individual who has ideas on how to speed up the process while still attaining the legislation's objectives.

Bill C-229 would not bloat the bureaucracy, because the civil servants who administer the existing environmental assessment review would instead carry out the provisions of my bill. Several provinces, Australia, many United States states, and the U.S. federal government have legislation that requires government departments within their jurisdiction to go through some sort of environmental assessment review process. I have taken the best from their legislation, discarded the worst, and added some of my own ideas. I believe strongly that if not the bill then the subject matter should be passed on to the committee stage.

I have dozens of letters of support for my bill. Many groups, ranging from oil companies to environmental organizations, want to appear before the standing committee to discuss environmental impact assessments. They want to appear because this subject is timely. Has this government its ear to hear? The government would have a chance to defend its new EARP program and to find out if it is lacking, where it might act and where it might change. I think it would be an objective kind of committee, that it would be open to new ideas, to the flow of new information. The government has nothing to fear, it has only to gain and to learn.

If at least the subject matter of Bill C-229 were sent to committee, we could get going on this issue now and not before it is too late.

Courage is often associated with standing firm against opposition. Such courage is as important today as ever. But perhaps more important today is the courage to move, to innovate, to make decisions. In the emerging society of today, the decisions are becoming much more complex. Decisions call for inventiveness as well as firmness. Only by combining sensitivity to human needs with rigorous understanding of social processes can we make sound decisions. Decisions of the future must be worked out by men and women at their jobs in a world of specialized functions.

The major decisions of our time concern far-ranging issues of the use of power, the relation of men to machines, the relation of men to environment, the establishing of freedom in an increasingly organized world. These decisions must be made by men such as ourselves, gathered here today, men who exercise power and live day in and day out in the midst of their responsibilities.

We need criticism and help from those who see issues from varied perspectives. We need the advice of scientists. But, most important of all we need the wisdom and the participation of people as well as the insight of specialists. All people share the risks of our decisions and all people have a right to participate in the shaping of those decisions.

[Mr. Wenman.]

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, protection of the Canadian environment is an issue that concerns all Canadians, and I welcome the hon. member's proposal as another expression of that concern. As you know, the government has already taken positive steps to meet this issue through the formation of the Department of the Environment, and the establishment of an environmental assessment and review process through a cabinet decision in December, 1973.

The process covers activities and projects initiated by federal departments and agencies and those involving federal funds or property. Federal departments must examine their planned proposals and refer those with potentially significant environmental effects to the environmental assessment panel in the Department of the Environment for review. The panel sets guidelines for the preparation of an environmental impact statement by the project proponent, and releases this statement for public evaluation. After reviewing the environmental impact statement and obtaining the views of the public through hearings, the panel recommends appropriate action to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) based on the environmental consequences involved. The decision to implement the panel's recommendations is made by the Minister of the Environment and his colleagues whose departments are initiating or sponsoring the proposals.

There are now 21 such projects under review, and these include the gas pipeline from the Arctic to southern Canada proposed by Polar Gas, the extension to the Vancouver International Airport by the Department of Transport, and the development of uranium refineries in Saskatchewan and Ontario by Eldorado Nuclear Limited. We can all appreciate the complexities involved in projects of this size and nature, as well as the length of time required to produce a meaningful environmental assessment.

Our present assessment process is a very flexible instrument which can be adjusted easily to accommodated required changes. Based on present experience with the assessment process, changes are being considered now which will broaden the capabilities of the environmental assessment panel to review projects that are referred by federal departments and agencies. We plan to keep the assessment process under continuing review to determine further adjustments or changes which may be needed to make it as effective as possible.

Unfortunately, Bill C-229 does not improve the government's ability to assess the environmental consequences of projects for which it is responsible. The bill proposes to give federal courts an appellate decision-making power on the merits of a proposed action. In this connection, I should like to refer to the following provisions which relate to environmental assessment decisions made by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). Clause 19 of the bill reads as follows:

> Any person may, within 10 days of the minister's decision, apply to the Federal Court for a review of that decision.

Clause 20 of the bill reads as follows:

The Federal Court shall determine the matter de novo, and may examine the environmental impact assessment, the review, any submission made to the minister and such further material as is necessary in the opinion of the court to reach a decision.

Clause 22. (1) reads as follows:

The Federal Court shall determine the matters in question within a reasonable period of time after final day of the hearing.

Traditionally our courts have intervened to set aside administrative decision where the procedure required by law has not been followed or where an administrative decision is shown, on the basis of the evidence adduced, to be plainly arbitrary or capricious. But it has never been the practice of our courts, nor do our judges have special competence, to substitute their value judgments for those of others. To require our courts to undertake such a responsibility would be inconsistent with our system of democratic government and would be an inappropriate use of the judiciary.

The author of Bill C-229 does not appear to have considered carefully how a federal environmental impact assessment act will fit with existing statutory responsibilities such as, for example, the responsibilities of certain regulatory bodies to take account of environmental concerns. Is it intended to repeal the statutory responsibility of the Yukon and Northwest Territories water boards which were established under the Northern Inland Waters Act? Those boards were established to provide, pursuant to section 9 of the act, the following:

—the conservation, development and utilization of the water resources of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories in a manner that will provide the optimum benefit therefrom for all Canadians and for the residents of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories in particular.

Is it intended to remove from the National Energy Board its perceived statutory responsibility under section 44 of the National Energy Board Act to take account of environmental concerns in deciding whether to issue a certificate of public convenience and necessity for the construction of interprovincial pipelines, which is a perceived statutory responsibility that has caused the board to require applicants for such certificate to undertake environmental impact assessments?

These examples illustrate the need to consider carefully how the requirements of a federal environmental impact assessment act should dovetail with existing statutory responsibilities, both federal and provincial, which require regulatory bodies to satisfy themselves regarding environmental matters. I am sure all hon. members would agree that needless duplication of time and money should be avoided.

Many of the provisions of Bill C-229 have been borrowed from existing legislation, such as the United States national environmental policy act and the environmental assessment act, 1975, of Ontario. These provisions were tossed into the pot, as it were, without due consideration having been given to the purpose and scheme of the acts from which they were borrowed. The decision-making power Bill C-299 would propose to give the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has been evidently borrowed from the environmental assessment act, 1975, of Ontario. However, it should be noted that the word "undertaking" in the Ontario act is much narrower in scope than the scope given to the word in Bill C-229. The Ontario act defines "undertaking" as an "enterprise or activity." At present it applies only to enterprises, activities or projects by or on behalf of the government of Ontario, and by public bodies or municipalities. The proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor required by section 3(b) of the act, making the act applicable to any major commercial or business enterprise or activity designated by the regulations—for example, projects by the private sector—has not yet been made. For that matter, neither have the regulations.

The definition proposed in section 2(d) of Bill C-229 for environmental impact assessment is taken, with the substitution of the word "undertaking" for the word "action", from section 102(2)C of the United States national environmental policy act. However, this definition is preceded in the NEPA document by the following statement:

The Congress authorizes and directs that, to the fullest extent possible—

(2) all agencies of the federal government shall—

(c) include in every recommendation or report on proposals for legislation and other major federal actions significantly affecting the quality of the human environment a detailed statement by the responsible official—

As will be apparent when considered in context, the five point enumeration in NEPA is not intended to define what an environmental impact assessment statement should contain. The contents of any environmental impact statement ought to be based on what is being assessed and not on some abstract definition of what should be contained in the statement in which the assessment is written up. The United States council of environmental quality, CEQ, which was established by NEPA, has published extensive guidelines designed to assist federal agencies in preparing environmental impact statements. The latest was issued in 1975.

In conclusion, Bill C-229 will not produce an effective and efficient environmental assessment procedure. It does not improve in any way the government's existing capability in this area which is provided by the environmental assessment and review process.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I see that the opposition is very anxious about this bill and that it would like the House to proceed immediately to a vote. As chairman of the committee on fisheries and forestry, which has jurisdiction over environmental matters, I am surprised to see how anxious the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) is for this bill to be put to a vote when—perhaps I should not say so here—sometimes we need several sittings of the committee to pass certain bills.

Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate my colleague for Fraser Valley West because, as I have just said, he is a member of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and is greatly concerned with the environment. It could perhaps be said that, as all members of the committee are aware, he shows a certain obstinacy about this problem which greatly concerns him, as it concerns of course every member of the House and every Canadian. The environment in which we are all condemned to live on this earth—as I see the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), I would even say in this valley of sorrows—the protection of this environment is a daily concern for all Canadians and especially the federal government, and Bill C-229 submitted for our consideration by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West expresses once again this concern, not only of the representatives of the people, but also of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, as you and all members of the House who insist on being kept well informed are aware, the present government has made positive efforts to meet the concerns of Canadians expressed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West in Bill C-229, first by creating the Department of Environment, and they by establishing in December 1973 an environmental assessment and review process. I believe that the French word "environnemental" is rather modern and that it was not accepted before 1960. This word was not used at that time, but it is now accepted by the Académie canadienne-française and the Académie française.

From the very beginning, Environment Canada has endeavoured to measure the level of pollution caused by the federal government. It also assesses the projects in which it participates financially in one way or another so that these projects will comply with the guidelines aimed at eliminating or restricting contamination of the environment.

In 1972, the cabinet approved a recommendation from a ministerial committee to the effect that the environmental impact of any new project of the federal government should be scrutinized. It is precisely in light of that policy of the Canadian government that Friday last week I asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question concerning an issue of considerable interest for us in Magdalen Islands, that is the possible effects of the development of salt deposits discovered there.

In fact, if the present government of the province of Quebec does not delay the project, the salt mine discovered in Magdalen Islands should become productive by the end of 1978. Being ever optimistic I would say to my friend the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) that to haul that salt away we shall necessarily have to build harbour facilities as those deposits are located on an island. The project of the provincial government involving the financial participation of the federal government implies the building of a deep water wharf on a site which fishermen and municipal authorities consider detrimental to fish and particularly lobster stocks.

As we know, lobster fishing is the main source of income for Magdalen Islands fishermen and residents. We should be very careful and study seriously the concerns expressed by fishermen. Since the federal government will contribute financially to the project it wonders if in view of that policy and that process it should not initiate an environmental study in this area. I am told that, according to provincial experts, there is no risk for lobster stocks but fishermen who are sceptical by nature do not readily believe this assertion of the so-called experts from the provincial environment department.

Pollution is not our only source of environmental concern, Mr. Speaker, although more importance seems to be given to air and water pollution. It is not the only sphere of federal action in this matter. There are a number of other factors which must be taken into consideration. Among other things, the damaging effect of physical obstacles on the water community and the migratory paths of various wildlife, as well as the irresponsible development of non renewable resources, including land.

Thus on December 20, 1973 a cabinet decision instituted the environmental assessment and review process so that, first, the environmental factor would be taken into consideration at the planning stage of new federal projects, programs or activities, all the while respecting provincial jurisdictions, and second, so as to submit all potentially hazardous projects to an environmental assessment prior to irrevocable commitments or decisions. Third, to take into account the results of such an assessment in the planning, decision making and implementation process.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, despite the importance of Bill C-229 introduced by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), that the steps taken so far by the government of Canada meet the concerns he expresses in his bill. Earlier he criticized the Clean Air Act and other statutes, saying they are not mandatory. But I am surprised to see that a Progressive Conservative like the hon. member for Fraser Valley West in particular should always want to impose some restriction such as that on the freedom of the people in Canada. I do not criticize his position on the protection of our environment but the way he wants to stop everything by mandatory and coercive measures, if I may put it that way. And that is characteristic of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, as I said earlier. He will not let go. I indicated at the beginning of my remarks what his attitude was in this area at the meetings of the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, which also includes environment. As my colleague the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Anderson) pointed out earlier in his enthusiasm to support the cause he has always felt strongly about, I believe this bill derives from certain pieces of legislation already in existence in Ontario and to the south but he arranged them to suit his purpose and I believe that is why we have here a provision that could run counter to certain customs in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that today everybody is concerned with the quality of life, and Canadian society, as all societies facing this problem, is wondering what decisions should be made. I think that survival is also included in quality of life, and I believe that people must have the means to survive and earn their living. For some fifteen years pollution and all those things resembling pollution have rightly been the subject of considerable concern. We keep hearing today about the environmental impact which might ensue from given projects scheduled for certain areas in need of regional or industrial development.

What are governments doing about that problem? They are going to do what they have done till today and what the hon. member for Fraser Valley West suggests, but at what expense? At the expense of not only money but time and many speeches. During that time there are projects, for example in a non-polluted area such as ours—I am talking about the Gaspé area and a good part of the province of Quebec not located in the surroundings of Canada's metropolis—there are projects that could have been born in a very short delay but which are being postponed because of unnecessary complications imposed by certain statutes because of the effects on the environment.

Which is more important: to see to it that our citizens are fed or to set aside development projects which could help them feed themselves while bringing them the ideal quality of life environmentalists hope for? I can understand that the problem is a difficult one to solve for the governments, I understand its importance and I do not want to criticize those who—

Mr. Wenman: Refer it to the committee.

Mr. Béchard: I did not say a word when the hon. member for Fraser Valley West spoke, but I would like him to understand that I do not oppose what steps are taken to preserve the quality of life and increase it, if possible. But I do wonder about all that is being done at the present time, to obstruct, in some instances, projects that would allow a whole area to survive. Because of the problems and dangers the industry in question could lead to in 15, 20, 25 or 50 years hence, projects are dropped.

It may be that we have not done enough, that we did not utter that word "environment" early enough, that we did not concern ourselves with it. Neither our former governments nor the people have worried long enough about our environment. But one must also realize that Canada has not always been an industrialized country as it is today. Perhaps we did go through the transition between the society in which we lived before and the industrialized society we have today and which we have known now for a good many years without caring too much for the consequences and the impact that modern developments would have on the environment and the quality of our life.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I could perhaps elaborate even further but I want to pay tribute not only to the member but first of all to the present Canadian government and to the precedent it has set by the work it has accomplished in that direction. One will understand that it is very costly for an industrial to transform his plant overnight so that it may cease polluting or that it may lessen its pollution of the environment. In common language, we say that one must use his better judgment in certain cases, but I think that it is what the present government has done and in the case of Bill C-229, which is praiseworthy as far as the principles are concerned, I would not go so far as saying that it is premature, but I think it is superfluous given the safeguards and present legislation that already exist. I would like to see the member for Fraser Valley West discuss this bill if it were presented by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). I would like to see if this bill would be passed within the hour as the hon. member wished it would be when I rose to take the floor and comment on this bill. I imagine we would be debating it as long as we debated the Clean Air Act and I think he realized that when the committee studied that bill. Again, Mr. Speaker, I commend the initiative taken by the hon. member who is very active in this field within the committee and at the same time I wish to praise the government which is initiating measures that will ensure us a better quality of life as advocated in Bill C-229.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The time allotted for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be read the second time and amendments made by the Senate be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At five o'clock the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) had the floor.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, when private members' hour began I was discussing the deletion of clause 6(2) of the bill which reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may, by order, authorize the Corporation to engage in or carry on any activities not otherwise authorized by this Act.

The deletion of this clause is a welcome move as it granted undue power to the governor in council to enlarge the scope or completely change the nature of the activities carried on by Air Canada without coming back to parliament for authority. This is a dangerous precedent and if the clause were enacted it could weaken parliamentary power. In addition, Senator Grosart pointed out in the deliberations in the other place that this clause contravenes the government's basic guidelines for crown corporations. The Privy Council office document entitled "Crown Corporations, Direction, Control, Accountability—Government of Canada Proposals 1977", states:

> It is commonly understood that crown corporations, although largely independent of parliamentary scrutiny and controls, are still in the final analysis instruments of parliament. Logic then dictates that parliament should exercise what might be called the shareholder's prerogative with respect to crown corporations on behalf of the Canadian public.

The message contained in this policy statement is clearly that as long as a corporation is a Crown corporation, its authority for action rests with parliament. By removing the necessity of dealing with parliament, this clause may well provide Air Canada with a certain amount of added flexibility. However, as long as Air Canada remains a Crown corporation, its flexibility must of necessity be restricted.

The controversy over this one clause highlights the conflict of ideas concerning what should be the limits and bounds of a Crown corporation. Passage of Bill C-3, in its present form, could serve to cloud further the distinction between Crown corporations and private corporations. One of the major provisions of Bill C-3 grants to Air Canada the power to embark on auxiliary projects, other than air transportation, such as the management of hotels and travel agencies and perhaps even extending to trucking. In April of 1974, I rose in the House to speak on a similar bill dealing with financial arrangements for the CNR and argued that the CNR had no mandate to become embroiled in the hotel and real estate businesses.

I would like to restate my thinking in a nutshell. A crown corporation should not become involved in areas where private enterprise has the willingness and the wherewithal to provide the service or the product. In the Canadian context, private firms have almost invariably provided a better service and done a better job of running business than government.

Given the exemplary record of CNR with regard to hotel management, allowing Air Canada to get into this business gives me room for great concern. The original mandate of Air Canada as a Crown corporation was to provide safe and efficient air service both within and outside this country. The business of Air Canada was seen to be the air business. It is my strong belief that the original mandate of this corporation should be strictly adhered to.

During the debate this past fall on Bill C-3, many members from the Edmonton area raised the question of the difficulties which lie with the Edmonton international airport. By virtue of clause 6(1)(b) and (c), the government will allow the airlines to build facilities to help in their operations. My contention is that the government should allow the airlines more freedom in discussing what type of terminals they will generally have to service the public. If they were given that opportunity, I think you would see much less in the way of grandiose structures such as Mirabel and Calgary and perhaps a great deal more efficient structures wherein the landing fees, and so on, would not be so expensive for the airlines.

I wish to mention two areas of concern to me and perhaps suggest to the minister how he can follow this up. The first is the problem of preclearance at Edmonton International Airport. Calgary and Edmonton were both to get preclearance at about the same time. The problem is that the facilities at Edmonton International Airport are incapable of handling this at this time. Budgetary restraints mean that more money cannot be provided at the present time.

I suggest to the minister that in order to provide these facilities in time for the Commonwealth Games this summer he attempt to negotiate with the United States air carriers to see if they will provide preclearance personnel to Edmonton on the basis of cheap, temporary facilities being set up now with the promise that, as soon as budgetary restraints allow the building of permanent facilities, these will be put in place. I feel they may look at that type of suggestion, particularly if we say it will be within one or two years of the time of the promise.

The other problem is customs clearance after arrival at the airport. I want briefly to state what happened to one of my constituents. I will not get too deeply into this because my colleagues from Edmonton have already stated this problem bluntly and seriously. I quote from a letter that I recently received:

> My wife and I recently had the unfortunate experience of having to clear Canadian customs at the Edmonton international airport. I say unfortunate because there were approximately 440 other people on our flight also trying to clear. We were all forced up one escalator into a room that was overflowing with people and only the quick action of a fellow passenger, in turning off the escalator, averted what could have been a serious accident with people unable to get off the moving stairs because of the full room.

Ministry of Transport officials in Edmonton state that this facility for customs preclearance was designed for a Vanguard capable of carrying about 90 passengers. Today arriving at that terminal are 747s carrying over 400 people. It can be seen that even with the $400,000 allowed to expand this facility temporarily, the problem still exists. There is a great need for something to be done very quickly to alleviate this problem.

One amendment to clause 6(2) restricts the ability of Air Canada to go beyond subclauses (a), (b), (c) and (d) so far as what they can do in the way of expansion without coming to government. Herein lies the problem of Air Canada's intended purchase of Nordair. Before such a purchase can be made and because of amendments to the act, they should come before a parliamentary committee in order that it can deal with the reasons why Air Canada would like to get into the regional air carrier business.

Throughout the history of regional air carriers in Canada there has been a problem. From their earliest beginnings as bush pilot operations, these airlines have typified for many the spirit of adventure that has made our country what it is today. Nordair has been no exception. In 1968, 21 years after the beginnings of Nordair, it was the first airline to land a jet aircraft in the Northwest Territories.

The policy statement of regional airlines set forth by the Minister of Transport in 1966 outlined the role which regional airlines would be permitted to play in the near future. The regionals were to provide regular route operations into the north and operate local and regional routes to complement the main carriers. It was a distinct policy which was somewhat refined in 1969 by the designation of definite geographic areas in each region.

Air Canada's intended purchase of Nordair is a concern for me. It means the elimination of a small but very efficient regional air carrier, a competitor, and the intrusion of a strictly mainline air carrier into the regional business.

Nordair has provided excellent service to the public of eastern Ontario and northwestern Quebec. It has fulfilled a quite separate function from that being fulfilled by Air Canada. My worry is that the Air Canada takeover may weaken the traditional commitment of Nordair to its travelling public. It may lead to an unfortunate abandonment of low profit routes.

I have put forward a number of my concerns about the Air Canada bill. I do not intend to outline those concerns that have already been covered by my colleagues. I just want to make one last comment regarding the profitability of Air Canada.

It concerns me somewhat that the management of Air Canada would provide air passes to their employees on other than a standby basis. If we want to reward our employees for productivity, that is a good thing to do. Obviously the productivity of Air Canada has increased in the last year. Their profits show that. However, providing employees with passes would average about $300 per person; if they are provided also to wives or husbands or relatives, the number could go as high as 40,000. That would almost eat up the total profit this airline accumulated in the past year.

Something else that bothers me is there is no stipulation that the pass must be used in Canada. The deficit in the tourist industry in this country in 1971 was $202 million. It is calculated to be $1.3 billion today. We must take a careful look at the decisions made by the Corporation.

We are glad to see in the bill a clause providing that Air Canada's report must be brought before the transport committee each year. After all, we do represent the shareholders, and Crown corporations are still responsible to the parliament of Canada. May I add that I am pleased that the other place saw fit to make these amendments; we in this party thought they were very necessary at the time we were discussing second reading.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a few brief comments to make on Bill C-3. I note the measure authorizes Air Canada to engage in a wider range of activities having to do, for example, with hotels and travel agencies. I commend our caucus critic, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), on the important role he played in the discussion of this legislation. At the committee level he proposed many amendments, and a good many of the amendments put forward by my party were accepted. The bill has been returned to the House from the Senate because one amendment which we proposed was not accepted by the House of Commons.

Among the positive proposals made by the Conservative party in the committee was that the annual report of Air Canada be referred to a standing committee on an annual basis. In this connection it is noteworthy that the corporation's annual report has not been before a committee since November, 1973. Also, we would have enshrined in legislation a provision that Air Canada should have due regard to sound business principles and, in particular, to the contemplation of profit. Mr. Pratte, the former chairman of Air Canada, always complained that he did not really know what the purpose of the corporation was.

We on this side are glad the Senate saw fit to eliminate clause 6(2) from the legislation and that the minister has seen fit to support this recommendation. I will put the pertinent part of the clause on record. It stated that the governor-in-council "may by order authorize the corporation to engage in or carry on activities not otherwise authorized by this act." It is obvious that undue powers would have been given to the cabinet or to the governor in council. We in this party have always believed in parliamentary control.

While this legislation was before the Senate it is interesting to note that the secretary of Air Canada had this to say about clause 6(2):

> The wording and the concept was not suggested by Air Canada; it was proposed by the government itself in the original drafting as a means of avoiding having to go back to parliament to clarify a point which was really something which could be handled administratively in the context of the broad powers given to the corporation.

This was something which the government itself wished to see included in the bill so that it would not be obliged to come back to parliament to enlarge the responsibilities of Air Canada. It exemplifies an attitude which the administration has so often taken. Ministers opposite prefer passing orders-in-council to the parliamentary process. In many ways the actions they have taken amount to a sell-out of the parliamentary process, and clause 6(2) is a fine example.

Going back to the year 1972 we find that something like 3,326 orders in council were passed, only 653 of which were published in the Canada Gazette. This is cause for alarm and consternation among those of us who want to preserve and enhance the parliamentary process. It amounts to an abuse of the order in council procedure inasmuch as it is a circumvention of the parliamentary process.

We see evidence of this approach in other areas. There is a committee going around the country dealing with the subject of national unity. We in this party said it ought to be a parliamentary committee so that concerned individuals throughout Canada could speak directly to their elected representatives and feel they were participating in our democratic process. That is why I am so encouraged that the Senate should have seen fit to return this bill with clause 6(2) eliminated from it. Among other things, it shows the value of the Senate, whose members have a very useful role to play in our democratic process. I commend them for amending the bill in this way.

I wish now to underline some of the points made by my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) when he was dealing with some of the facilities available at Edmonton international airport, specifically the customs service and preclearance services. We have been allocated $500,000 to construct these temporary facilities. At one time we were given a commitment that some $22 million would be spent on upgrading. This is the year of the Commonwealth Games. As was pointed out by my hon. friend, it is essential there should be facilities at Edmonton airport to accommodate the visitors which are expected.

I should like to reinforce the proposal made by my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) give an undertaking to United States firms that we shall have the necessary facilities at the airport, and in a year or two, permanent facilities for customs and preclearance, so the services needed for the Commonwealth Games will be there at least on a temporary basis this year.

To come back to Bill C-3, we in this party generally support the legislation. We feel it will serve our national air carrier well, enabling Air Canada, in turn, to serve the general public better.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF CERTAIN HARBOURS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-2 respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, after consultation with members on the opposite side I request unanimous consent of the House to move an amendment to Bill C-2.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I just wish to confirm that consultations have been held on this side concerning the remarks made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), and we give consent to the moving of an amendment at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I am advised that in order to pass this amendment we need the unanimous consent of the House. Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Elzinga.]

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That Bill C-2, an Act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, be amended by adding immediately after line 22 at page 13 the following new clause:

Repeal

"29. (1) The Belleville Harbour Commissioners Act, chapter 34 of the Statutes of Canada, 1952, is repealed.

Repeal

(2) The Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act, chapter 55 of the Statutes of Canada, 1912, is repealed.

Administration, property, rights and actions

(3) On the coming into force of this section,

(a) the harbour of Belleville described in the Act repealed by subsection (1) and the harbour of Winnipeg and St. Boniface described in the Act repealed by subsection (2) shall be under the control and administration of the Minister for all the purposes of this Act;

(b) all real and personal property owned by a Corporation established by an Act repealed by subsection (1) or (2) shall be deemed to be owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada and shall be under the control and administration of the Minister for all the purposes of this Act;

(c) all rights, obligations and liabilities of a Corporation established by an Act repealed by subsection (1) or (2) shall become rights, obligations and liabilities of Her Majesty in right of Canada; and

and by renumbering clause 29 as clause 30.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the House passes this report stage amendment to Bill C-2 I wonder if there is someone over there who has not yet spoken and who might be in a position to answer a question or two about it.

If my reading of the material in front of us is correct, what is now proposed to be written into Bill C-2 was already proposed to be a part of Bill C-6. Bill C-6 was a piece of legislation regarding Canadian ports. Under that bill the operation of certain harbours such as the Belleville harbour and the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour was to come under the direction of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). It seems now, with Bill C-6 not having been passed that the switching of the control of these two harbours is being made to Bill C-2, which puts them under the authority of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). What I should like to know is whether I am understanding the situation correctly.

Even more important than that I should like to know if there have been consultations with the authorities in Belleville and in the Winnipeg area with regard to this change. Are the present harbour commissioners in Belleville and the present harbour commissioners in Winnipeg and St. Boniface, even though it is now all one city, satisfied with this change? I suppose a prior question would be in these terms: Are they satisfied with losing their local control? Obviously that has been decided; the government is going to make the change. Now we have a sort of change on change. Bill C-6 takes control of those harbours away from the local bodies and gives it to the Minister of Transport. Now we are calling them recreational harbours instead of commercial harbours and giving the control of these harbours to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

I am not standing here making an argument one way or the other, but I do think with this kind of a change being made there ought to be some explanation of it. I hope somebody over there is in a position to give us that explanation.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm that, in order to expedite the measure and assure that these two facilities or ports are dealt with in the best way for the developing of the fishing and recreational aspects of these harbours, which are the predominant ones, they are now included in this bill by this amendment. The intention all along under Bill C-6 had been to take them out from under commission operation. It was certainly not to put them under the new commissions that are proposed to be formed for basically major commercial ports throughout Canada. There is general satisfaction that these ports should be dealt with as recreational and fishing ports and not as major commercial enterprises.

If Bill C-6 had passed before Bill C-2, we would have arranged for a transfer of the responsibility of these two ports from the Minister of Transport to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. This bill therefore does it all in one through this amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, has there been consultation with the city councils of Belleville and Winnipeg? If so, what is the word from those bodies?

Mr. Lang: I referred to general satisfaction. There have been discussions and consultations particularly between the people developing the ports legislation, the task force and other officials, and my understanding is there is general satisfaction with this change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Anderson) agreed to.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment) moved that Bill C-2, an Act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

● (2042)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce for third reading Bill C-2, the fishing and recreational harbours act. This act will provide the necessary legislative authority to develop and administer commercial fishing and recreational harbours in Canada in order to meet the changing requirements of the fisheries and the growing needs of sports fishing and recreational boating. We have about 2,300 of these small harbours located across the country, with some comprising several wharves, breakwaters, and other structures, totalling some 4,000 facilities.

[Translation]

We often forget that one of the essential factors of successful fisheries is precisely the development of harbour, and harbour facilities well situated in relation to fishing areas and providing standards required by fishermen as far as facilities and services are concerned. The provisions of Bill C-2 on development provide various measures which will meet those requirements as far as possible. The government will thus be in a position to continue to build, maintain and operate fishing harbours giving priority to such activities in the allotment of budget funds.

[English]

During debate on second reading of the bill some members were critical of the amount of money being spent on the development and maintenance of our small craft harbours. I should like to put on the record a few facts and figures which I believe speak for themselves.

In the six years prior to the transfer of responsibility for this program to the Department of Fisheries, expenditures on fishing and recreational harbours varied from a low of about $8 million a year to a little over $13 million. This is in sharp contrast to expenditure levels in recent years. They have more than quadrupled in some years; for example, in 1973-74 expenditures amounted to about $22.3 million; in 1974-75 to about $30.6 million; in 1975-76 to about $28.8 million; in 1976-77 to about $42.7 million; and in 1977-78 we expect the amount to reach some $47 million.

In 1976-77, and again this year, we have made extensive use of funds provided by the federal labour-intensive program and the Canada Works program to undertake improvements and repairs to our fishing harbours. Our small craft harbours administration has provided on-site assistance and materials required by communities, whilst utilizing local labour. This melding of small craft harbour resources with the federal labour-intensive and Canada manpower programs has resulted in the provision of additional funds for harbour development in the amount of nearly $32 million over the two years which would not have been otherwise available.

In terms of job creation, these special programs have meant some 7,500 more man-months in 1976-77, and we anticipate about 15,000 more man-months this year. The economic and social impact of these programs is very considerable as they are undertaken in communities with a high level of unemployment and have a multiplier effect in stimulating economic activity at the local level.

I have mentioned the substantial increase in levels of program expenditures in recent years, and I would now like to highlight a few of the more important considerations concerning the distribution of these funds.

It must be remembered that in 1973 the department inherited over 2,000 harbours and wharves, very large numbers of which were in dire need of repairs as a result of neglect in the past. Because of this, our programs have focused on making good this backlog of repairs and providing for only the most urgent of harbour expansions. It is only now that we are in a position to change the main thrust of our programs from repairs to that of improving, expanding and up-dating our harbours, and providing the better services needed by fishermen such as lighting, haulouts and proper work areas.

In 1973 we initiated a series of major studies to evaluate the existing fishing and recreational harbours owned by the federal government and to suggest a rationale for their development in the future. These studies were completed in 1975 and provide the basis for our ongoing plans, ensuring a planned and orderly undertaking of harbour improvements which are in step with the needs of the fishery across the country. The programming of projects each year takes into account not only the local needs of the fishermen but also the broader requirements and priorities of the commercial fishery throughout a region.

Our projects, whilst based on the needs of a community, are integrated within a national program in which major projects are usually phased over two or more years. This causes peaks in some regional allotments for the years covering major construction as they shift from region to region. For example, expenditures in Quebec peaked during 1975-76 and 1976-77 due to the special St. Lawrence fishing harbour development program, and have now been reduced to more modest levels. Meanwhile, expenditures in British Columbia will be increased this year and in the next few years as a result of construction of the new fishing harbour at Steveston, which is a very major undertaking. And so it goes in other regions.

Members of the House who have been following Bill C-2 through committee are aware of the misunderstandings that have arisen over provisions in the legislation which would allow introduction of a system of annual charges to commercial fishermen. This, naturally, has caused concern on the part of members on both sides of the House as to possible additional burdens being imposed on already hard-pressed fishermen.

This misconception, of course, is that the existing system is not imposing hardship. It is, because fishermen are not being treated equally at our harbours; at one they are required to pay a fee, and at others they are not. Inadequate administration and management of our harbours has resulted in that inequity, and others, that must be resolved.

However, let me assure the House that no decision has been made in respect of the details of a new fee structure. Fishermen are not going to wake up with the passage of this legislation to find they have to pay the federal government "X" number of dollars.

I believe we should continue with our present system, with all its shortcomings, for the present, without making any changes until the health of the fishery improves and subsidies in that area are reduced. What we intend to do now is discuss with fishermen and their organizations how we can achieve a modest and equitable fee structure that would allow both better management of facilities and better on-site services for Canada's commercial fishermen. Certainly I cannot emphasize this enough. Any fee structure arrived at through that consultative process will be of a modest nature and will be phased in gradually in relation to the recovery of the stocks and the over-all health of the fishery.

The nucleus of the proposal we will bring to the fishermen is how we can best devise a fee system which will not only recognize market demand and relate to the level and quality of services provided, but will recognize regional differences. Obviously that means we are not going to be illogical enough, particularly in the case of east coast fishermen, to subsidize on the one hand and take it back through an unreasonable fee structure on the other.

I am confident that through discussion and consultation, and by approaching the issue with the best interests of the fishermen in mind, a system can be devised which will make history of existing inequities and provide only benefits to the fishermen in the future.

I want to say very simply that the purpose of this act is not to increase general revenues of the Receiver General of Canada, but rather is an attempt to put in place an administrative framework which in fact services the fishermen. The fishing and recreational harbours act will provide the legislative authority to undertake this type of work, and will also place emphasis on joint planning and co-operation with the provinces. I will, therefore, be introducing some new programs which will be responsive to provincial and municipal governments for the joint development of launching ramps and marinas where they are required to meet the needs of communities.

The bulk of pleasure boating activity is concentrated in Ontario and British Columbia and it has caused acute congestion within the harbours in these regions. I would, therefore, expect to see our expenditures continue to be directed primarily, but by no means entirely, to these areas of the country.

I should like to say in conclusion that this bill, the fishing and recreational harbours act, is important to ensure the proper continuing development of fishing and recreational harbours in the country. It will allow the minister to introduce new programs and administrative arrangements which are responsive to the changing needs of our commercial fishermen and recreational boaters. I thank hon. members on both sides of the House for their co-operation, as well as their valuable comments and suggestions made during the review of this bill.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-2, an act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada. This bill was introduced first in the last session. At that time it was known as Bill C-7.

Unfortunately the Liberal government chose to treat this as an unimportant piece of legislation, so unimportant in fact that it chose to let it die on the order paper. Yet during that period of time the government passed legislation relating to the Canada Lands Surveys Act, diplomatic and consular privileges, an income tax agreement with Germany and some 12 name changes to constituencies.

I am not saying these pieces of legislation were not important, but I am questioning their relative importance vis-à-vis fisheries. Surely the government's handling of Bill C-7 demonstrates its lack of concern for the Canadian fishing industry, an industry where the gross annual cash receipts to our primary producers now total approximately $400 million, with an annual market value of approximately $1 billion. Our annual commercial fish landings of close to one million tons are approximately one-tenth of those of the leading producer of food from water, namely, Japan. It is between 1 per cent and 2 per cent of the world's production. Obviously Canada has a long way to go. There is a lot of opportunity if we get out the nets and get to work.

Because of the fate of Bill C-7, my colleagues and I, in a spirit of co-operation, allowed the government to send Bill C-2 directly to committee at the beginning of this session. Unfortunately this spirit of co-operation at the beginning of the new session ended in committee where the Liberal majority refused to accept sound amendments aimed at improving this bill. In particular, the Liberal majority supported those sections of the bill which will increase licence fees, which will not ensure consultation with interested parties, and which will give the minister the right arbitrarily to lease harbours to any one person. Bill C-2 updates past legislation and regulations pertaining to small craft harbours.

Legislative authority for the administration of these harbours has been provided by the government's Harbours and Piers Act, its accompanying government wharves regulations and various orders in council. The Harbours and Piers Act was originally drafted in 1895 and revised in 1937. Obviously years ago fisheries were not considered that important, because when we look at 1895 and 1937, we find a lot of bridge has gone over the water in Halifax, for example in the time elapsed. As a result, it has not focused on the present day administration needs of the fishermen and recreational boaters. As well, it does not include provisions for the development of these harbours. New legislation has been needed for some time. At last we have Bill C-2 which will gather, consolidate, and update the scattered elements under one new act.

In addition, when the program and administrative responsibilities for the small craft harbours were transferred to the Department of Fisheries and the Environment in June 1973 from the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport, it was done so by an order in council. This method of transfer has not been as effective for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) as legislative enactment. For example, one Department of Transport official on the west coast refused to acknowledge the transfer and he did not send his files to the Department of Fisheries and the Environment until late last year, some three years after the time of transfer. Perhaps the minister takes exception to that, but that is my information.

Nevertheless, in spite of these good intentions, Bill C-2 raises some questions and problems. The budget of the small craft harbours branch, which will administer Bill C-2, was only $35 million in fiscal year 1976-77. Most of that money was used for the repair and modernization of the federal government's fishing and recreational harbours and wharves on the east and west coasts. This is a pitifully small amount of money when one considers that the small craft harbours branch has responsibility over some 2,300 facilities.

I have been informed that the government would like to abandon or destroy about half of these facilities. Consequently, it would appear that the Liberal government's master plan is not to increase expenditures to meet the number of facilities, but to decrease the number of facilities to meet the expenditures, regardless of whether they are serving the needs of communities. I made this point last December and indicated that, if my analysis was incorrect, then the minister should table the future plans of the small craft harbours branch so that they could be discussed in committee. I am still waiting. The longer I wait, the more credible is my original analysis.

At the same time, the number of fishery wharves has been decreasing. These wharves are essential to the very livelihood of many maritime Canadians. This government has become more involved in the financing and construction of recreational harbours. This drift toward recreation at the expense of fishing raises a valid question as to whether the Department of Fisheries and the Environment is fulfilling its mandate. Its mandate is to promote and undertake programs designed to improve the management and sustained economic utilization of the marine and aquatic renewable resources of the nation, compatible with a concern for the quality of the environment. I hope the minister will reconsider his priorities, because after all there is a Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo), a minister who could be made responsible for the development of recreational facilities.

Nonetheless, since Bill C-2 is partly concerned with financing recreational harbours, one still might question one aspect of the government's marina assistance program which was established to encourage the construction of new marinas by local municipalities and by private developers. The federal government pays for the construction of the breakwater and for dredging, while the municipality and/or developer pays the other costs plus upkeep. Federal government participation is limited to 50 per cent of the total cost of the marina. However, despite paying up to 50 per cent of the cost, it receives no future compensation for its contribution. Why should private developers line their pockets with taxpayers' money? I hope the government ensures that the marina is opened and available to all boaters at reasonable cost.

Unfortunately the figures referred to by the minister this evening are not the same as those contained in his news release of December 15, 1977, which announced spending under FLIP. I am sure my constituents wonder what is going on when they hear the many different alphabetical acronyms which are being used, such as FLIP, LIP and zippety-do-dahs. On December 15 the minister announced that $18,386,000 would be spent over the next nine months for fisheries management and small craft harbours projects. Frankly, this is something we have been advocating for considerable time. We have been saying it is not necessary to spend millions of dollars to find out what is needed in Atlantic Canada because we have many wharves, skidways and harbour facilities that require improvement. We welcome additional money. But I say to the minister that it still only brings the total for harbours in Canada to date to something a little more than $50 million—$35 million in the estimates and the $18 million.

When I look at the money spent on Mirabel, something in the nature of $600 million to $800 million, the total amount spent on harbours would cover perhaps a couple of runways. It still falls far short of the amount we hand out to run the Post Office, the deficit of which this year will be something like $475 million. We seem to think nothing of funding the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the tune of something like $468 million this year, or over $9 million a week. When we look, as I said a moment ago, at an industry that is worth $400 million to Canadians, to the primary sector alone, and $1 billion in total, I submit it is time that the industry received greater consideration from this government. Since the number of fisheries wharves has also been decreasing, we would like to see a little more action, especially in some parts of Nova Scotia.

So much for the good news. The major faults of this bill so far as I can determine—and we gave the bill very careful study in committee—lie in the areas of leasing, consultation and licence fees. Clauses 5 and 8 of the bill read as follows:

5. (1) The minister may undertake projects for the acquisition, development, construction, improvement or repair of any scheduled harbour or any fishing or recreational harbour to which this act applies.

8. The minister may, subject to the regulations,

(a) lease any scheduled harbour or any part thereof to any person;

(b) grant a licence to any person for the use of any scheduled harbour or any part thereof; and

(c) enter into an agreement with the government of any province or agency thereof for the occupancy and use of any scheduled harbour or any part thereof.

I said in committee that these powers are too wide for the minister. They are too wide for any minister. We cannot understand how any minister can believe that he has the right to lease a harbour to any one person. We do not believe that fishermen should needlessly be subjected to the whims of a private individual or corporation who may wish to lease the harbour. In committee we introduced an amendment which would have required that any leasing be done to provincial or municipal government. However, the Liberal majority voted this down.

We also fear that the bill does not provide for sufficient consultation between the minister and the affected parties. According to the small craft harbours branch, Bill C-2 is wide enough to sail the Queen Mary through. It is wide enough for the minister to go it alone where he can work, if he so wishes, in concert with the provinces and municipalities. The trouble with this minister is that he does not often choose to work with the provinces.

I can see problems with clause 5 of this bill which allows the minister to build recreational harbours wherever he chooses without regard for provincial or municipal desires. I should like to ask the minister what has happened to the view that the provinces should be consulted on matters affecting their interests. I say to the minister most sincerely that his lack of consultation with the provincial ministers over fisheries matters has been a major criticism of him. The Halifax Chronicle Herald has contained nothing but criticism of him for months, as expressed by the provincial minister of Newfoundland and by the supporter of his own party in the province of Nova Scotia, the provincial minister of fisheries in our province.

This lack of consultation was especially evident last session at committee hearings on Bill C-38, to amend the Fisheries Act. Province after province came forward from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, and each and every brief presented before that committee contained a condemnation of this minister for lack of consultation with them on the bill's provision for fighting pollution. Stonewalling tactics do not work. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that confrontation will never replace consultation, and that we do not need to wonder why there is dissatisfaction and discontent at present throughout the land.

Unfortunately it would appear that the minister has learned very little from his experience with Bill C-38, because in committee his colleagues refused to support our amendment which would have required him at least to consult with the affected provinces and municipalities before constructing a small craft harbour. I had hoped the minister would have learned from the past that he can no longer treat the provinces and municipalities as mere pawns which exist to obey and carry out the programs and policies of this minister and his staff; but it would seem from the Liberal attitude which was displayed in the committee that this government will try to continue to ride roughshod over the provinces' and municipalities' rights and desires.

Our major disappointment at the committee hearings centred around the minister's attitude toward licence fees for the use of small craft harbour facilities. The bill allows the minister to set whatever fee he wants without having to go to parliament for approval. The minister admitted that a licence fee would be imposed for the use of government small craft harbour facilities, but he was unwilling to tell us what that fee would be. Rather than that, he stated, we should pass the bill immediately so that he could set up a fee structure.

This is like closing the barn door after the horse has escaped. If we were to pass this bill unaltered, I submit we would be derelict in our duties because the minister could then establish a fee structure and remain unresponsive to any criticisms or suggestions for its improvement. I have learned that a plan is now being discussed which would require a fisherman to purchase a licence based upon the length of his vessel, possibly $1 per foot, although this was not clarified this evening by the minister in his remarks. He simply stated that fishermen should not worry that they would wake up and find they would have to pay X number of dollars after we pass this bill.

I say to the minister that fishermen wake up many nights wondering in some cases where their next dollar is coming from, whether the weather will be fine the next day, whether they can go to sea, whether there will be any lobsters there for them to catch. Now he has given them another worry: will it be $1 or $2? How many dollars per foot will he charge them? Will the minister deign to tell them this evening? He says that this fee will only cover the use of the government's small craft harbour facilities. There will still be other fees to pay, such as a licence fee for lobster fishermen or for ground fishermen, or a licence fee for tying up the boat. The fishermen with whom I have spoken recently say: "We are getting to be like the office of Sun Life, filled with all kinds of papers delivered to us from bureaucratic Ottawa. We will soon have to get an accountant just to keep track of our licences".

What I said last December still holds true. In my view this proposal for a licence fee is simply another unfair tax on Canadians using public facilities in Atlantic Canada, while people in more prosperous parts of this nation are provided more public facilities free of charge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Ask your colleagues from western Canada.

Mr. Crouse: My colleagues from western Canada are quite capable of speaking for themselves. I am speaking for the fishermen in Atlantic Canada, and primarily for people in my province of Nova Scotia. I would like to think that after 21 years here in June I have a fairly good idea of what they like and dislike about some of these fisheries policies.

I contend that what is being proposed in this legislation—and I regret that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is not here because I do not like to speak about ministers in their absence—is nothing more than the concept put forward by the Minister of Transport, the user-pay concept, and I submit that it is not acceptable in Atlantic Canada. A $50 fee for a 50-foot boat may not sound like much to the minister or to an Ottawa bureaucrat, but to an Atlantic fisherman $50 can sometimes be a very princely sum not too easily come by, especially in these times of high unemployment.

In my view it is senseless for the government to talk about added licence fees and added financial burdens during these times of high unemployment. On a national basis in December unemployment was running at 8.5 per cent, up from 7.5 per cent the year before. The figures were even worse in Atlantic Canada. There the average stood at 13.3 per cent or 107,000 unemployed persons, up from 10.8 per cent or 90,000 the year before. In effect, one worker in eight is without employment in Atlantic Canada.

On a provincial basis unemployment in December stood at 17.5 per cent, or 31,000 people, in Newfoundland; in Prince Edward Island it stood at 11.4 per cent, or 5,000 people; in Nova Scotia it stood at 10.2 per cent, or 33,000 people; and in New Brunswick it stood at 14.3 per cent, or 38,000 people. Worse still, these figures are expected to increase. By 1979 another 12,000 people are projected to be unemployed in Atlantic Canada, and most of them will be residents of Newfoundland where unemployment is projected to increase by a full 3 per cent over the next two years. These are only bare statistics. In terms of human sorrow and mental anguish the story is much worse. Yet this government insists upon licence fees, causing the people of Atlantic Canada who can least afford it to bear an even heavier share of the burden of the mismanagement of the economy of Canada by this Liberal government. That is most unfair.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Goodale: You are laughing over there.

Mr. Crouse: An hon. member opposite says we are laughing. Well, he can sit over there and laugh at the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. He can laugh at the hardships they face and the work they have to do to make a living in a very harsh environment. He can laugh if he wishes. But it is no laughing matter in Atlantic Canada, and if the hon. member wants to see how funny it is, he can come down to Atlantic Canada some time.

The minister has argued that fishermen already face licence fees because there are already wharfage charges on the books. However, as there are only approximately 200 wharfingers throughout Canada to collect those charges, most fishermen have grown accustomed to using government wharves and small craft harbour facilities free of charge. The minister plans to revamp the wharfinger system so that all major small craft harbours will be under the administration of wharfingers. As I understand it, some 1,466 facilities have no wharfingers, and the number hired has no relation to the number of small craft harbours in a province. Newfoundland, for example, has only eight. In Nova Scotia I understand that there are about 40, while Quebec has only five.

In committee my colleagues and I simply requested the minister, bearing in mind the high unemployment levels and the low income levels of Atlantic Canada, to defer any introduction of a licence fee for at least five years. After five years, in our opinion the Atlantic fishery should hopefully be on its way to recovery. It should be on its way to recovery because of the phase-out of foreign fishing within the 200-mile economic zone. In this phase-out decreased fishing should enable fish stocks to rebuild automatically. As Progressive Conservatives this seemed to us to be a reasonable compromise. However, the minister and all the Liberal members on that committee voted down that compromise. They will have to answer to the people of Atlantic Canada for so doing. They refused that reasonable request.

As a result of the minister's refusal to take a compromising position over licence fees, we on this side are forced to vote against this bill. We are very much aware of the economic suffering which many of our fishermen have been going through. For example, five years ago approximately 7 per cent of Canada's commercial fishermen earned less than $7,500, which is the generally accepted poverty line figure. I do not believe that this figure has changed drastically, especially with reduced catch quotas. Therefore, I feel that Canadian fishermen should not be subjected at this time to additional erosions of their already small incomes.

Speaking as one who has lived a lifetime on the ocean, I am well aware that a watertight, seaworthy ship can travel over thousands of miles of ocean without facing any serious difficulty. However, when a little water enters the ship the crew is in difficulty, and when a lot of water enters the ship the crew is in danger of foundering and sinking with that ship. The present Liberal government can be compared somewhat to a ship in the ocean. As long as it made laws for Canadians which could serve as a guide for their day-to-day social, cultural and business activities, the ship of state could safely sail over the economic ocean of Canada. However, this government, unfortunately, has not been satisfied at all with doing the job it was elected to do. It not only wanted to sail over Canada's economic ocean; it started leaking economic water into the Canadian ship of state. Just as a ship sinks when it takes in too much of the element over which it is sailing, so too is the Canadian ship of state sinking, because this government today is taking in too much of the economic ocean of Canada.

For safety's sake, the water of the ocean must be kept out of a ship; and for the safe and sound development of the Canadian economy this government must stick to the job of manning the ship of state while allowing the economic oceans of Canada to rise, fall and move as the currents of individual ambition and initiative strive to develop and improve conditions individually and collectively. We on this side do not want to see Canada's ship of state founder and sink, but this is what is happening as this government seeks to make laws and to set up too strong a control over the economy through the setting up of government controlled companies which ultimately destroy the freedoms of individual Canadians and limits their right to make meaningful decisions.

This is what we see happening today with this bill. This bill seeks to tax Canadian fishermen further. It seeks to limit their freedom of choice as it applies to docking their ships, and it ultimately will give more political power over the lives of individual Canadians to the government. The appointment of some 1,400 wharfingers alone would be pork barrelling of the worst kind. It would give power to the minister unlike anything we have seen. This is not restraint. This is not restriction of bureaucracy. This is an expansion of it.

In conclusion, if we are to break out from under the present heavy burden of excessive taxation, mounting inflation and rising unemployment, we can do so only by giving free rein to individual ambition and initiative. We must encourage the individual Canadian to do better, and this cannot be accomplished by further restricting his individual freedoms and increasing his tax burdens.

In the recent joint provincial fisheries development proposal there was no reference whatsoever to Bill C-2. The proposal did, however, deal with the resource fleet development, markets and foreign arrangements, something which the minister has chosen, in discussing this bill, to ignore completely. As a result of the minister's attitude an entire generation of young Canadian fishermen may well be lost unless licenses and boats are made available. In parts of Atlantic Canada many young people who want to go fishing are forced to turn elsewhere for employment. Many have skipper's licenses but no boats, and fishermen can no longer afford to build boats on their own. Because it is imperative that we build up the inshore fleet, the federal government should make funds available for fishermen who wish to borrow.

Canadian shipyard costs are much higher than in Europe. The fishermen have to sell their catches in European as well as American markets on a competitive basis. It is up to this government to arrange the equalizer between our own costs and European costs so that our fleet can be built up for the benefit of Canadian shipyards and the industry.

The most recent statement the minister made to me did nothing to indicate that some of the problems to which I refer will be resolved or even studied, so at this time we therefore feel it necessary to vote against this bill on third reading.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is not long since this bill was first before us that it is not surprising there was some uncertainty this evening about whether we would be debating it or Bill C-17. Until the last minute it was not clear whether we would be going ahead with Bill C-3, Bill C-2 or Bill C-17. This is a further example of the disorder in which this government finds itself. It was only at the last minute they decided to move Bill C-2.

Bill C-2 was originally presented as Bill C-7, but that was long ago. It was thoroughly examined in committee both as Bill C-7 and as Bill C-2 and the government eventually responded to recommendations from this side to modify some of the plans laid out in the bill. Nonetheless, the terms were left in the bill to enable the government to go back and do something they said they were going to withdraw for the time being. I refer, of course, to the levying of fees for the use of the facilities.

Fishing on the west coast is in complete disarray at the moment, despite the fact that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) is Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Fishermen are in revolt against the regulations that have been brought forward, against the uncertainty of plans for licensing, against the thought that they will be charged the financial schedule that was being proposed. Although we heard during the committee proceedings that they had been consulted before the fee schedule was brought forward, this has since turned out to be misleading. There was no consultation until these regulations were brought down in committee. Then we found a series of regulations drawn up without regard to the fact that fees for licensing on the west coast ranged up to about $2,000 and fees for the use of harbours on the west coast were to be double the fees on the east coast.

This is unacceptable in a country where equalization is supposed to be one of the features of our society. There ought to be some means of maintaining unity in this country. Why exacerbate matters by surcharging the west coast on fees, thereby aggravating the disunifying factors that are already there. These are some of the reasons why I must vote against the bill.

Clause 9(f) of the bill reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may make regulations . . .

(f) prescribing charges for the use of any scheduled harbour;

An earlier clause designates scheduled harbours. When the bill is passed the minister will have power to prescribe the fees. We have the word of the minister in committee. I take his word as he is an honourable man, but supposing he should not be the minister one day. We hear there are other more exalted roles for him to play.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I am going to B.C.!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The minister expresses an interest in going to B.C. I think he would have trouble there. With the suggestions he has made about overcharging the fishermen in B.C. I do not think they would accept him too readily.

We have an undertaking by a minister in committee, however, that he will not for the moment prescribe charges for the use of any scheduled harbour. Under the provisions of clause 9 the minister may do certain things through the governor in council. About fifteen different things will be proposed by his officials, be approved by the minister and then go to the governor in council. If another minister takes over he may, of course, scrap the undertaking given by this minister and introduce the fees that were withdrawn.

I was absolutely staggered by the schedule of fees presented to us in committee by officials of the department. I think it was that as much as anything that caused me to have serious doubts about the bill and which brought me to the conclusion that I shall have to vote against it.

I mentioned the disarray of the fishing industry on the west coast. A former minister of the environment in this government devised a scheme of restricting licenses, presumably with a view to the management of the stock of the fisheries. He introduced two different kinds of fishing licenses and this scheme has continued. For reasons best known to the fishermen and the minister, this system just has not worked. Today, in an open meeting, I asked whether the Davis plan for managing the catch had resulted in increased stock on the west coast. The answer from knowledgeable scientific people was that it had not. Now I understand that the minister had decided the plan will not work and has appointed a Mr. Sol Sinclair to investigate the AB licensing system to determine whether it should be modified in order to produce an increase in stock or whether some other system would be preferable. Meanwhile, the fishermen do not know where the licensing system is going to lead. As I say, they are in disarray.

Another aspect of this bill has me worried. In clauses 10, 8 and 5, there are possibilities for patronage. In fact, possibilities for patronage abound in this bill. Clause 10 states:

—the Minister may designate as an enforcement officer any person who is, in the opinion of the Minister, qualified to be so designated—

There is no indication of what the qualifications ought to be. If the minister intended that a fisheries officer, RCMP officer or coast guard officer should be designated as an enforcement officer under the meaning of this act, why did he not clearly state that? The qualifications of an enforcement officer ought to be somewhere. There is a definition, but no qualification. This is very dangerous.

After the next election, there will be a lot of defeated candidates. Some of them will be designated if this minister is still the minister, which I doubt.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): He will be.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): If he is here, he will have to change sides. He will no longer be fisheries minister. Some of these people opposite might have it in mind to designate defeated candidate enforcement officers. That option, of course, will be foreclosed with the next election. There is no doubt in my mind about that. The same option is open to the minister under clause 8, which states:

The minister may—

(a) lease any scheduled harbour . . . to any person;

A scheduled harbour may have a great commercial potential. The danger here is that a long lease may be signed before the next election. The minister may feel that it is about time someone was looked after, and in order to ensure his vote at the next election he will lease one of the harbours that he has scheduled to that individual. That is another opportunity for patronage. Bill C-2 ought to be called the patronage bill.

Clause 5(1)—and this, Mr. Speaker, you will find hard to believe—states:

The Minister may undertake projects for the acquisition, development, construction, improvement or repair of any scheduled harbour or any fishing or recreational harbour to which this Act applies.

The minister better make use of that before the election if he intends to compensate those who have given good service to the party. Clause 5(3) provides a beautiful opportunity. You would not believe this one. I quote:

The Minister may . . . enter into an agreement with any person to provide for

(a) the undertaking jointly with the person of any project that the Minister is authorized to undertake under subsection (1);

Would you believe that? It is open to pork barrelling of the worst possible kind. We are being asked to approve the possibility of government, whichever government, authorizing pork barrelling. That is something that is normally done under the counter without legislative backup, but here we are being asked to make it legal. This I will not do.

In his introduction the minister talked about fees. I have already mentioned them in my few remarks. He stated that for the time being there are not going to be any fees. He said they are going to study the question again. I do not have the text of the minister's comments in front of me, but he left the impression that this is all being done out of his good nature. Someone happened to mention to him that there was some inconsistency in the fees being proposed. Out of his good nature, and he is a good natured guy, he said he would withdraw the fee schedule.

It was not withdrawn because of his consultations with the fishermen. It was because of all the harping we did in committee. We stated that they were impossible fee schedules and we were not going to have them. Thereupon they were withdrawn for the time being. However, as I already stated, the provision is still in the bill for him to impose that fee schedule whenever he wishes.

The other problem on the west coast is the enhancement program. It is such a complicated matter that I am not sure I will be able to deal with it in all aspects. It has gone a little foul in two regards. One suggestion is that the enhancement program is going to be contracted out. I have heard, and this distresses me, that some fisheries officials have decided there is more to be gained outside the public service by taking a contract to do the enhancement program than there is inside using fisheries officers. I do not like that suggestion.

The enhancement program requires the most careful, scientific care of trained people. The minister would not contract out to me, even if I were on his side of the House, because I am not scientifically trained.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Oh yes, I would.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Although we are good friends, I do not think he would go quite that far. I know I am not trained to carry out the program. If it goes to contracting out, how is the minister to determine whether those he contracts to carry out the program are qualified to do so? This provision is very dangerous. The minister is about to say he would only hire those already in his service who decide to retire. That is a very bad principle. It is one of the aspects that is causing a great deal of concern on the west coast.

The other matter of concern is the cost of the enhancement program. It was to be included in the fees. If this minister has anything to do with it—and he will not be the minister for all time—it will be included in the fees when that schedule comes forward. That is how the salmon enhancement program should work. Instead of user-pay, or "user-pray," I think that "prey on the user" is the correct way of defining the program. The western fishermen will have none of that.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

I have gone into some of the regulations. Under this bill there are two sets of regulations. We have reached a point in this parliament at which we are considering bills whose purpose is to provide a framework within which regulations may be set. That is the way the government operates. They will not come clean and say what regulations they intend to establish. Clause 9 and clause 25 each implies different sets of regulations. Clause 9 gives the governor in council authority to make regulations governing 15 different matters, including fees, schedules, safety and so on. Fair enough. But the officials surely know what ought to be contained in these regulations. Why not append them to the bill? We criticized the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) when we were dealing with another bill and eventually we got the regulations appended to the measure. That is the way it should work.

● (2142)

There is no question that regulations are required and that they cannot all be written into an act. But they could be attached as a schedule. The schedule could be brought forward for consideration during the life of an act and altered at that time. Blanket authority should not be given to officials to draw up regulations which are not known to the House in advance.

Clause 25 contemplates that the governor-in-council may by regulation designate any offence under the act. Here we are dealing with the fixing of fines by another set of regulations. Surely it should be possible to append the regulations to a bill so that we and the fishermen directly concerned may know exactly where we stand. The matter is even more important to the fishermen than it is to us; we are trying to defend their interests in our comments tonight.

My hon. friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) mentioned the wharfingers and the possibility of patronage. I shall not develop that aspect, but is the minister planning to designate some of the wharfingers as enforcement officers? Maybe. Maybe not. I am sorry there is no clearer definition of what is meant by "enforcement officer". The term could apply to wharfingers; they have certain powers under the act which are stronger than one might be prepared to accept at first glance.

My final comments relate to the 200-mile limit which is another source of great confusion on both coasts because of the uncertainty and the secrecy surrounding the negotiations between ourselves and the United States with regard to the definition of our boundaries at the four places where our two zones meet. There has been no report on these negotiations. We know that a competent diplomat has been assigned to the task backed by a good staff, but we are expected to take so much on trust when the government has given us no reason for extending that trust. It worries me that we should be expected to extend trust to a government which has shown itself incapable of governing this country. On the contrary, it is seemingly determined to break the country up. Still, we are asked to trust the government to conclude satisfactory agreements with our neighbour to the south on the boundary between the two zones. We do not even know what possibilities are being explored by the negotiators.

In this connection, I note that my former colleague, Marcel Cadieux, is the principal negotiator. I have great trust in the man. But why should he not have behind him the authority of parliament to get what is required by Canada in these negotiations? Why has there not been a briefing, even a confidential briefing, given to selected members of parliament? They would not go blabbing. Members of the Press Gallery would try to get information. Bless them, let them try. But in matters of this importance there could not be any possibility of leakage.

A further cause of uncertainty is that no provision whatever has been made for the surface patrol of a tremendously large area which was taken under our umbrella on January 1, 1977. I do not know whether the minister, when he was out in Victoria, saw those ships, boats, or whatever they are, which are intended to be our patrol vessels. For their size and number they do a fair job but they cannot be expected to carry Canadian jurisdiction to the extent of 200 miles or even, on the west coast, to the 50-mile margin which is the end of the fishing limit out there to all intents and purposes. This still leaves a lot of sea to be covered.

The three vessels out there, the Runner, the Racer and the Rider, are just not capable of the task assigned to them, and there is still nothing in the works, as far as I can make out, unless something is being negotiated with Denmark on a charter basis. And that would be a great shame when we have within this country the competence, the technology, to produce our own fisheries patrol vessels. They ought to be on the stocks. Is any thought at all being given to that? I see the minister nods but I have not seen any tenders for design being let, or anything like that. I believe he is keeping that in his head because he does not want me to know that vessels intended for us on the west coast are not being built on the west coast. Vessels which are for use on the Pacific coast should be designed and built on the Pacific coast whether they are for naval or for fisheries use.

An hon. Member: And at Saint John for the east coast.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And at Saint John for the east coast; we shall split it for the Arctic.

It is on these grounds—the uncertainty due to what the regulations will contain, the uncertainty as to what the level of the fees will be, the uncertainty into which the west coast fishermen have been locked because of the licensing system and the patronage potential contained in the bill—that we find it impossible to support this bill.

In addition there is the salmonoid program, which had been the enhancement program to which I subscribed. I do not like the way it is going. Last but not least, there is the failure of this bill to define exactly what is intended by an enforcement officer. For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I do feel that it will be impossible for my colleagues and I to support this bill.

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this bill, particularly after listening to my colleague from the west coast. I had heard the party opposite described as the party of gloom and doom, but nowhere is that more evident than in debate of this bill tonight. It seems to me that this is one area, not the only area in the country, where there is room for hope, yet all we have heard are the negative aspects of this particular industry.

My colleague from the west coast has told me that the west coast fisheries are in disarray. There is disillusionment, discouragement and despair in that region. I do not know what the mood is there because I cannot speak for the west coast, but I can tell you that in my part of the east coast, in the Atlantic area, there is optimism, there is buoyancy and there is a spirit among the fishermen which has never been experienced before. All of this is due to the policies of the government and this minister. That is a fact. If you would like to go and talk to the fishermen, Mr. Speaker, they will tell you the same things I am telling you now. I have heard the comment that all of this is as a result of the policies of this minister. This minister is known not necessarily as the minister of fisheries but as the minister of fishermen. There is a great difference, and there is adequate evidence why that should be so.

I heard arguments earlier this evening concerning the amount of money put in to small craft harbours compared with what was spent on Mirabel airport, what was spent on the CBC and whatever. Some years ago when the Koreans hit the U.S. market with cheap hake, something like $140 million was gained by this minister from the government of Canada to support a failing Atlantic fishery, which was failing through no fault of its own but through the fault of the state of the marketplace at that time. So when hon. members fault the minister for obtaining insufficient money for the fishery, there is evidence there to contradict that. When they fault him for not bringing in policies that are in the interests of the fishermen, here is a minister who put money into the fishermen's pocket. The subsidies up to two years ago went to the companies. Now two and a half cents a pound on top quality groundfish is going into the pockets of the fishermen for the first time. This is the minister not of fisheries but of fishermen.

I want to make some comments concerning this bill. I think they have to be put in the context of the 200-mile limit. I was mystified because I heard that the 200-mile limit was not necessarily going over as a good thing. In my area it is the greatest thing since sliced bread. The 200-mile limit is a fantastic thing for this country. It is the greatest reason for hope that we have, and that is certainly true in my province. As a result of the 200-mile limit, quotas over-all have been decreased so that we are now rebuilding stocks, but Canadian quotas have increased. What is more important is the fact that the quota to inshore fishermen has increased, which comes off the top of the over-all quota before it is divided up. This is the point I want to zero in on. This bill is going to be good for the inshore fishery, which in my area is still the backbone of the fishery.

I want to refer to a statement made by the minister of external affairs, I believe last week. I would like to quote parts of it in a press release that accompanied his statement.

The guiding principle for future development of Newfoundland's fisheries should be that the inshore fishery comes first.

I cannot read all of what he said, but here are some other statements:

It is not a matter of having one or the other . . . It is . . . very much a question of balance, and in considering what that balance should be, there is now, near unanimous agreement on a fundamental first principle for fisheries development: the inshore fishery comes first.

First of all, if the inshore fishery is to be the backbone of the Newfoundland fishery—I do agree with that statement, and I believe it to be true certainly along the northeast coast—then we have a need for good shore facilities. This bill gives the minister management over those shore facilities and a structure for seeing those shore facilities are developed. In the long run that will benefit the fishermen. He makes provision, contrary to what we have heard, for consultation, for community involvement in the planning facilities. I do not know about other areas, but we have not had that in my area before. The opening is there for putting further staff in place. I can only speak again for the area I represent. It is a good thing as long as it does not become a rigid tier of bureaucracy. This is something we have to guard against.

If the minister is going to put in place this management regime and if he is going to recruit additional staff, I would urge the minister to have advisory groups set up among the fishermen in the same way that he does in setting his licensing policies. I believe that consultation has to be there. He has shown in the past that he is prepared to do it and I urge him to do it in the future.

As for the matter of charges to be levied, the minister has dealt with that in his own speech and there is no need for me to elaborate. Whatever the minister may do he has shown up to now that he is the minister of fishermen and that his policies have been in the interests, not only of the industry as a whole, but of the fishermen themselves. They know that whatever he may do he will act in their best interests, and he will not raise licence fees unnecessarily until such time as they are making an adequate income.

That adequate income is coming. This year I would say on the northeast coast of Newfoundland the increase in the amount of fish caught and the amount of money earned is something like 40 per cent over last year. The salaries are improving, not to the point where we would like to see them, but they are getting better. People are going back to the fishery who have not been in it for a long time. But I still do not think that we should be imposing two charges on fishermen, and this is something the minister will have to monitor.

There is something else I would like to mention, but we are running out of time. Better shore facilities go hand in hand with some measures that the Department of Fisheries have already taken regarding quality control. The wharves and breakwaters have to be in place. We have to build more of them, and we have built more of them. But regarding shore facilities, we had to have measures such as the program we have put into effect on the northeast coast of Newfoundland.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is rising on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, from the point of view of the business of the House I would like to receive some confirmation from somebody on the other side of the House as to what we will be dealing with tomorrow when the House commences at two o'clock for business. I realize we are going to have a vote, but after we have gone through the niceties of the vote, what will be the government business?

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the leader of the House announced last Thursday, unless there is a change in the program, we shall probably continue the study of Bill C-2 now before the House and then Bill C-17.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the parliamentary secretary. Will he please convey to the government House leader our anger, quite frankly, at failing to follow through this evening with the program which was announced a few days ago with respect to government business. I wonder whether he would ask the hon. gentleman to explain at some time why, without warning, he changed the order of government business. It is particularly important that he do so if there is to be any credence given to the matter of co-operation between parties in this House. If the government House leader is interested in proceeding apace with the business important to him, I think he should not forget the importance of the word "consultation."

● (2202)

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the continual practice of the leader of the House has been to respect the opinion of the opposition as concerns the legislative program. However, I believe that we must be flexible and understanding enough to recognize that there can be last minute changes. According to what I have been told, what has happened today is as follows, if I may have the attention of hon. members. During the question period, the parliamentary secretary to the minister concerned talked with the House leader of the opposition and also with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I see a member waving at me: we shall be able to have a talk after the late show this evening. At that time, Mr. Speaker, it was clearly stated that after studying Bill C-3, we would proceed this afternoon to the report stage of Bill C-2 and there was even some discussion with the House leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about the amendment which received unanimous consent this evening. I do not know if at that time it was understood that there would be a change in our program, but I want to say one thing: Last Thursday, when the government House leader announced the legislative program, he said that we would proceed this week to the study of Bills C-3, C-17 and C-2. Of course, if we consider what I have just said literally, normally Bill C-2 should have come after Bill C-17. But as I said in the beginning, I believe that sometimes, because of the circumstances, we must show some flexibility and understanding, and we do not usually seek to disregard the agreements or the programs discussed with opposition leaders.

A while ago, before rising on a point of order, the opposition leader talked to me and I suggested that he raise this question at the next private meeting of party leaders, which will probably be held Thursday as usual. At that time we might review the facts and perhaps make the necessary adjustments. In view of his point of order, I would ask to the opposition leader to demonstrate some flexibility. I am convinced that after the discussion with the parliamentary secretary following the question period today, if there had seen major objections to the consideration of Bill C-2 tonight he would have raised them and we would not have studied that bill. But as there were discussions on the amendment it seems that on this side of the House we took for granted that we could proceed with Bill C-2 before considering Bill C-17. If the opposition leader resents this I am sorry but I think that this kind of issue should be discussed during a private meeting between House leaders and not as a point of order. I do not think it contributes to the harmony of House business.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not blaming the parliamentary secretary, and I want him to understand that, but I am suggesting that if there were representations made they were not made to me. I think it is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think at this stage I might hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to extend this argument, but I should like to be sure that there is one point about tomorrow that is clear. A few moments ago for the first time it was said publicly, though we reached agreement sometime ago, that the vote on Bill C-19 would be taken tomorrow at or shortly after three o'clock. In view of the fact that on two occasions during the last few days the bell has rung for two hours, I hope it is understood, by ordering tonight this vote to take place at three o'clock tomorrow, that it will be a 15-minute bell.

● (2207)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. For the purpose of clarification and in an attempt to end this discussion, this is a matter of who is right and who is wrong, who said this and who said that. Presently both hon. members are debating what the order of business should have been, even though the order of business has been established. I see no reason to entertain more points of order or more discussion concerning House business in view of the fact that it has been established.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing the matter which concerns Your Honour. Is it not a House order that there is to be a vote tomorrow at three o'clock? If that is the case, then the rule will make it a 15-minute bell.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, it was not public knowledge, so I do not see how there would be any public knowledge of it. I understand there will be a vote following the question period tomorrow, but when the hon. member indicates that it will be at three o'clock sharp, I am not sure. I have not seen the order. Perhaps the hon. member has seen the order indicating the time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, let's not quibble. Make it a 15-minute bell.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the vote to be taken tomorrow, I assume there will be an order made on unanimous consent. From my party's point of view, we are prepared to consent to a 15-minute bell. It will be very refreshing after experiencing two-hour bells on two occasions because of the absence of government members.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to participate in a debate at this time in the kind of fashion which has occurred. I think hon. members should be honourable, and the truth of the matter is: if a vote is called without an order and it is not a 15-minute bell, in many cases it is because there are members at meetings in this city who require 40 or 50 minutes to get to the chamber. That will occur time and time again if there is no notification in advance of a 15-minute bell. My understanding is that all House leaders have agreed to something. They are the ones who should tell us about this. Tonight we have heard that no other agreements should be made, because one House leader has indicated that he was not consulted. I respect him fully for that. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said something about it not being public knowledge, and then he is asking me to guarantee bells. I will guarantee bells when it is public knowledge.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I gather there is no understanding. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was seeking a guarantee from the government benches that there would be a limited bell. From what I gather, there is none. Therefore, I cannot see why we should continue to entertain—

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, that is not what I said. I am trying to point out very clearly that the two House leaders who are present are talking about discussions which they have had privately. I cannot confirm those discussions because I was not there. I understood there was to be a vote after question period. Since I have knowledge of that, one would presume it would be a 15-minute bell and that the whips would honourably, as they always do, settle this. If hon. members are going to begin to instruct whips from one side of the House to the other, then we will not know who is in charge of bells. In my case I presumed it would be a 15-minute bell.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In an attempt to end this discussion, perhaps I could ask for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent that there be a 15-minute bell?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Then, I think the question posed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been answered.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I think it should be indicated that the vote will occur following orders of the day and not the question period. I say that simply for clarification.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—ALLEGED DANGER TO INFANTS FROM CHEMICALS CARRIED BY NURSING MOTHERS—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on December 14, 1977 I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) a question in the House concerning the alleged danger to infants from breast feeding, particularly by mothers whose milk contains high levels of DDT and PCBs, or polychlorinate biphenyls. The PCBs are industrial chemicals which pollute water and air, and eventually our food, and are found in higher levels than they should be in mothers' milk.

I am concerned about this and would like to know whether there is any correlation between the increase in levels of DDT and the weight of the patient. We know that DDT is stored in the fatty tissues of animals and fish. Suppose that one woman weighs a couple of hundred pounds and another one weighs 125 pounds, and suppose both women give birth. Does the mother who is obese carry more DDT and biphenyls in her body, and consequently in her breast milk with which she feeds her baby, than the thinner mother?

The second question I would like to put concerns lower levels of these substances found in cows' milk. I should like to know from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson), who has been interested in this kind of work for some time, what tests have been carried out on cows, whether on dairy cows or first calvers, and for what period of time. Could he also tell me whether any beef cows were tested, because there is a great difference between those two animals so far as storage of fat is concerned. I would like to know also whether we have a central laboratory where those tests can be carried out.

Statistics indicate that only about one in four mothers nurse their babies for various lengths of time. This is less than in the past and less than in undeveloped countries where babies are nursed for months.

I also have the following question and I wonder whether the department is prepared to do some research on it. Suppose a mother weighing 140 pounds goes on nursing her baby and then loses weight. Will the amount of DDT and biphenyls in her body accumulate or decrease? If it accumulates, it would be paramount for pediatricians to keep the weight of mothers at the same level so that they would not be storing DDT and biphenyls in their body fat. Does the government have facilities at present in any province in Canada for testing milk, and are there facilities for testing drugs which may have been ingested by mothers?

One case which comes to my mind involved a woman who underwent a bone graft in her back. She had a degenerating spine. Unfortunately, she developed the morphine habit because of all the pain she experienced. She overcame the habit. She later had a baby, and I often wonder about this because there was some problem with that baby. I wonder if tests have been done.

Dr. Morrison mentioned that there were 350 investigations now underway, and I wonder what those investigations cover. Do they cover drugs and chemicals? We know that phenylephrine are found in sprays, cold tablets and so forth and that if a person uses hypertension pills, or pills for high blood pressure, he may get into serious trouble. I wonder how much we know about these things, if our testing is accurate and how many places we have where those substances can be accurately tested so that we can be sure of the results.

DDT can be found in large fish and in beef. However, if fatty parts are trimmed off, the amount of DDT will naturally be cut down. Freshwater fish are loaded with contamination, and we must keep these things in mind.

Cattle drink water from streams and creeks where DDT, insecticides and other chemicals are found. They wash into the water. The cattle drink that water, and yet the tests show a lower concentration in cows' milk than that found in mother's milk. Mothers should surely be protected more than animals. Do we have laboratory facilities for tests? In view of the fact that only one in four mothers nurse, would it not be wise to test them all and if necessary resort to cows' milk?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) has raised a number of questions, and I am quite sure we will read the record at a later date and respond to them. In the meantime, I would like to respond to the specific question the hon. member raised on December 14, 1977.

At that time the hon. member asked the minister whether her department was doing anything to provide any information to expectant or nursing mothers about diets which are low in pesticides and other chemical contaminants. In responding to this question the following points can be made. The information from several years of monitoring indicates that the amounts of pesticide in the total diet are much lower than those which have been set as the maximum safe level by the World Health Organization. For example, the amount of DDT in the total diet in 1974 was found to be only 0.5 per cent of the acceptable daily intake as set out by the World Health Organization.

Pesticides and other organic contaminants tend to accumulate in fatty foods. The Department of National Health and Welfare advocates the adoption by the public of a prudent diet which emphasizes consumption of increased amounts of fruits, vegetables and whole grain cereals and decreased amounts of sugar and fat. We encourage also the substitution of low fat milk and other similar modified products for conventional high fat items. Such a diet would be expected to contain reduced levels of fat soluble pesticides and other chemical contaminants.

Women of child-bearing age living in the Great Lakes system, including the St. Lawrence River valley, are advised to exercise caution in the consumption of locally caught game fish such as coho and chinook salmon, eels and catfish. Only an occasional meal of locally caught fish of these species should be consumed by women of child-bearing age from the geographical areas mentioned. The forementioned Canadian guideline of two parts per million PCBs—polychloro biphenyls—for fish is the strictest in the world to our knowledge, and is carefully monitored by the fisheries and marine services branch of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment. Canadians can therefore be assured that commercial fish does not contain unsafe levels of PCBs.

An insert providing informative warning information for women of child-bearing age is being prepared for inclusion with the March 1978 family allowance cheques. This information will provide general dietary advice and specific information about reducing dietary fat intake.

I should like to point out to the hon. member that, as he asked a number of questions subsequent to the one on December 14, I will undertake on behalf of the minister to see that a letter is sent to him setting out what the department is doing on the matters he has raised which are very important.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, last January 27 I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) to get information from the Ontario Minister of Education about the conditions required to make French an official language in that province. I must recall that Ontario Premier William Davis wrote recently, and I quote:

> The Ontario government does not intend at the present time to take any step to make French an official language of the province.

That rather startling announcement contains two notions that seem conflicting at first glance. It represents a categorical and absolute refusal. One remains temporarily shocked and stunned by its apparent finality. However, the Ontario premier did not close the door completely. He said: Not at the present time.

Such a statement makes us believe that the government of Ontario might change its mind if the situation evolved and that it would indeed agree to change its position if certain approaches were made. What would be those circumstances, those conditions, those prerequisites? I would like to say in passing that apparently some members have blamed me for my intervention in the House last Friday, perhaps because I was dealing with an issue concerning the province of Ontario. However, my intervention was valid and honest. I do not consider that I have narrow responsibilities as a member. I do not think I should deal only with problems concerning my riding in New Brunswick or other Atlantic provinces. I have the right and the privilege and even the duty and the intention of intervening to a greater degree in all questions pertaining to the fate of French Canadians everywhere across my country and of doing so beyond artificial barriers represented by jurisdictions. I challenge all other provinces to do as much for the two official language groups as has been done in the province of New Brunswick since the sixties under the government of Louis Robichaud and to a certain degree under the present administration.

In my opinion, the two linguistic communities of New Brunswick deserve greater credit for their achievements even if there is still a lot of progress to be made in such sectors as language, schools, services, than for instance Quebeckers who so far have gone through a smooth evolution under the umbrella of constitutional guarantees.

When Premier Davis states that he has no intention of taking any step to make French an official language and adds in the same breath specifying that such is his intention "at the present time", I feel as indignant and outraged as the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) himself felt. Yet I still hope and seriously believe that the Ontario government is willing to make some concessions. This is why I am asking the Secretary of State to look into it, to negotiate, to improve the dialogue. Is it Bill 101 in Quebec that Mr. Davis finds shocking? Is it the proposal made by Mr. René Lévesque at the St. Andrews conference that is bothering him? Let him speak out frankly, let his education minister reveal the abcess so it may be lanced right now, but for goodness's sake let us not put in the balance the cultural life and language of Franco-Ontarians. Let them grant French official status in Ontario. It would be like pouring oil on a tormented sea, but above all it would amount to a demonstration of equity and justice.

The lame excuse that Ontario does not now have the resources to provide the required services which would automatically be needed once French gained official status is an easy way out.

That point was made recently by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Young) when answering a question put by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). He referred to the serious administrative impact of support personnel, not to mention the fact that in some provinces a start would have to be made from scratch. He was referring of course to the judicial area, our Canadian courts.

Time and good will can in my view overcome such obstacles. The province of New Brunswick has still less resources than Ontario, however, it did not wait for everything to be in place and perfectly developed to act. At this point in our history, in these times of emergency, Ontario has a unique opportunity! I am convinced the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) will spare neither time nor effort to offer his most sincere co-operation, with the rather significant federal resources, to encourage that province to take the next logical step. This would be a gesture so significant it would raise new hopes for the future of our country among those most depressed by the current situation.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned in my answer of January 27 to the question put by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), I was very disappointed by the position taken by Ontario's premier concerning the official language policy and the recognition of the French language as an official language in Ontario.

As I said, I was very disappointed because I had hoped the Ontario government would accept the request we put forward in "A National Understanding" for implementation at the provincial level of the bilingualism principles proposed by the federal government.

Unfortunately, I was taken aghast by Ontario's refusal, and I shared the feelings of the hon. member.

As very aptly indicated by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), it seems to me that the Ontario premier left the door open to a change of attitude on the subject of the recognition of the French language as a second official language in Ontario.

I shall be meeting with the Ontario Minister of Education next spring, at the meeting of the Council of Ministers of Education. My colleague from Madawaska-Victoria may rest assured that the issue will be raised with him, and I shall do my best to convince the Ontario government to review their position on the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE THAT SOVIET SATELLITE CONTAINED NUCLEAR PACKAGE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the events of the past week made us look again at the provisions we have made for space exploration and the use of outer space. In questioning the minister involved last week, it became apparent there are major gaps in the system of international treaties governing outer space. Three aspects or the recent events seem to be of particular importance in highlighting these gaps.

First, the Soviet Union co-operated with us and earlier with the United States only after they were requested to do so. Second, the Soviet Union acted on a bilateral basis in this affair, apparently making no contacts with international organizations. Thus, only those countries which the United States or the Soviet Union chose to inform had advance warning of the danger. The satellite fell over an area which is not only sparsely populated, but in a country which eventually knew that a dangerous satellite was in trouble and which therefore had made some slight preparation.

Finally, in the search which is being conducted, the entire cost is up to now being borne by Canada and the United States, unless U.S.S.R. asks for the return of the debris under the provisions of article 5 of Treaty 1975 No. 6, the agreement on the return of objects launched into outer space. This section can and has been misinterpreted, I believe, in that article 5 states that expenses incurred in fulfilling obligations to recover and return the space object or its component parts under paragraphs 2 and 3 shall be borne by the launching authority. However, paragraphs 2 and 3, the operative parts, contain the words "contingent upon the requisition by the launching authority". So if the U.S.S.R. does not ask for the debris back it will not be liable for the cost of recovering the same. I presume it must have done so because yesterday the minister said the Soviet Union would meet its responsibilities.

These circumstances are the consequence of some basic shortcomings in the treaties which deal with problems which could arise from mankind's use of space. The agreements all fail to take into account two important facts. First, while banning "any objects carrying nuclear weapons", the treaty-makers did not prohibit the inclusion of dangerous amounts of fissionable material in satellites. The treaty-makers seem not to have realized that a situation could arise in which an unarmed satellite would, upon re-entry, pose a threat to a wide area, that is, a threat apart from the immediate physical damage caused by impact.

In the second place they do not take into account the rapid advances in satellite tracking technology and thus ignore the opportunities presented by the fact that there are often significant lengths of time in which to prepare ourselves before a satellite re-enters the atmosphere. Neither do the accords take cognizance of the coming of the space shuttle orbiters. These should be in operation in two years' time and within five years they should be of great help in relieving us from the dangers we were facing last week.

The remedy for these shortcomings lies, I believe, in simple amendments to the treaties themselves. First, the convention on the registration of objects launched into outer space should be amended so that, in addition to the basic orbital parameters, the launching states would be required to notify the Secretary General of the UN of the inclusion of any fissionable material in a satellite. Perhaps in order to avoid difficulties and red tape in connection with safe scientific experiments there should be some minimum amount provided for, such as 100 grams, below which no notification would be required. An exemption of this sort could no doubt be arranged after discussion with the technical experts.

The second change which should be made is an addition requiring the launching state to notify the Secretary General of the United Nations whether any satellite re-entering the atmosphere contains any material, fissionable, chemical or biological, which could present a safety threat if it reached earth. Notification to this effect should be made as soon as it is ascertained that the satellite is likely to re-enter the atmosphere. The Secretary General in turn would notify any state over which the satellite was passing.

Third, once a satellite has been classified by this method as potentially dangerous, states with satellite tracking capability—presumably the United States and the U.S.S.R.—would be required to keep the Secretary General informed of the expected time and location of re-entry. Once a location could be predicted, the Secretary General and the heads of the states affected are to be informed.

Finally, reasonable costs of searching for and containing the contamination, even if the search is only to confirm that the satellite was entirely consumed during re-entry, should be treated as damages under the existing convention of international liability for damage caused by space objects. This would make it possible to recover such costs. In addition, article XXI of Treaty No. 1 would permit the affected state to seek assistance from the launching state in this search and containment operation.

Taken together, these suggestions would, if implemented, give us a safer world, one in which the risks to the population at large inherent in space exploration and use would be reduced. The government should learn from its experience of the ad hoc and frequently inefficient train of communication evident in the past week's crisis and press vigorously for the changes I have outlined.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I express my appreciation to the hon. member for drawing the attention of the House of Commons and of Canadians generally to this important subject.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated to the hon. member, in response to his question concerning the briefings at NORAD during his visit there in late December, that he was advised that NORAD headquarters were monitoring all the satellites and other man-made objects in space and that the headquarters were aware of the situation. He also stated that they went into some detail at his briefings which he did not think it was appropriate for him to disclose.

The hon. member must know from the responses to various questions given by the Prime Minister and the Ministry of National Defence that Canada and the United States have had complete and harmonious co-operation on all aspects dealing with the Cosmos satellite. Before January 20, 1978 when the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) were briefed on the probability of the Cosmos landing on earth and a possibility that it may be in Canada, there was no requirement for a detailed disposition of the Cosmos as it was not apparent that its disorientation would affect North America. In fact, it was considered that it may land in the south Atlantic or sometime later in the year, probably in the month of April 1978.

The Minister of National Defence and the Chief of the Defence Staff have openly and frankly reported on all aspects of this event and continue to do so the minute new information is available. They will continue to do so until the matter has been finalized. At this time, the Canadian and American armed forces and Department of Energy, Mines and Resources' officials and other agencies and officials concerned with the operation continue to operate in close co-operation with the forces' information officials in Edmonton and are providing details of the operation to the news media as soon as communications permit.

The Canadian forces' officials were informed of the disorientation of the Cosmos as early as September 1977. Details of its progress were reported as its disposition changed. At each stage, higher levels of authority were advised, culminating with the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister several days prior to the final plunge. As the Minister of National Defence has stated several times, he is satisfied that he received timely information on the Cosmos through proper channels following recognized procedures.

I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that he has made other representations as well which will be taken into consideration by the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Therefore this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.38 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING EXECUTIVE ASSISTANTS' CONTACTS WITH CONSTITUENCIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter pertaining to the work being done by certain special and executive assistants to members of the cabinet. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister advise the House whether it is government policy to permit special and executive assistants to cabinet ministers to visit or contact various constituencies on matters that are not government business, and specifically that the Prime Minister immediately instruct all members of the cabinet to cease permitting their staffs during government working time and at taxpayers' expense from indulging in attempts to prop up the obviously lost cause of Trudeau-type Liberalism.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be discussed only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

CHEQUES RETURNED TO PRODUCERS—ACTION BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. In view of the fact that many grain producers who sold to feed mills, unaware that they were not designated to collect the 2 per cent deduction, are having their cheques returned by the Western Grain Stabilization Board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board immediately consider taking action to resolve this problem.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—SIZE OF PIPE TO BE MANUFACTURED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the necessity that Canadian steel manufacturers produce the steel for the Canadian portion of the Alcan pipeline, and in view of recent statements by Foothills Pipe Lines Limited indicating that a decision is required soon regarding the size of pipe to be used, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to announce that the steel pipe to be used in the construction of the Alcan pipeline be of a size which can be produced both in eastern and western Canada and that the government announce its intention to guarantee that orders for the Canadian portion of the pipeline will be filled in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REPAIR OF FOREIGN FISHING VESSELS IN CANADIAN SHIPYARDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the tremendous need for employment opportunities in the Atlantic provinces, in view of the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) was reported by Canadian Press on October 21 last as having stated that he is considering favourably a new policy to permit foreign nations to repair their fishing vessels in Canadian shipyards and stated a week ago that he would permit such fishing vessels to have major repairs done in Canadian shipyards, and in view of the fact that Canadian control over fishing in the 200-mile economic zone now makes the former restrictions unnecessary, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

S.O. 43

That this House direct the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment to implement a new policy permitting foreign fishing vessels to be repaired in Canadian shipyards commencing today, and that foreign fishing vessels be allowed to transfer catches and exchange crews at Canadian ports as part of the said new policy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST DOMESTIC FARES BE COMPETITIVE WITH OVERSEAS FARES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning a matter which is of great importance, especially at this time of the year.

Given the fact that Air Canada domestic fares are higher than those on overseas flights, which amounts to inviting Canadians to travel outside the country during their vacations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the House urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the management of Air Canada to take a close look at domestic and international travel with a view to authorizing competitive domestic and overseas fares so as to encourage Canadians to travel more within Canada, a policy which is likely to foster Canadian harmony.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS BE BUILT IN CANADIAN SHIPYARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the consent of the House to move a motion of critical urgency to literally thousands of laid-off Canadian shipyard workers and their colleagues who will during the next three to five months find themselves out of work. Given the critical situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

[Mr. Crosbie.]

That this House directs the Government of Canada to take immediate steps to ensure that during periods of slack activity in our Canadian shipyards, all Canadian government-owned ships will in fact be designed and built in Canadian yards, and further directs the Minister of Transport to recall from Europe those officials of his department who are there seeking a ferry replacement for the CN Marine ferry Carson.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—DANGER FROM RADIATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the grave concern being expressed by people in the Yellowknife-Hay River area in respect of media coverage of the radiation hazards caused by the crash of the Soviet satellite, which they feel will have an adverse effect on the tourist industry, and in view of the fact that the site of the crash is in an isolated area and danger from radiation will be restricted to the site and will not affect the areas ordinarily visited by tourists, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That the Minister of National Defence issue a statement assuring the public that the danger from radiation is limited to the isolated site and, further, that in the event the wreckage of the satellite is not returned to the Soviet Union and is not hazardous, it be placed in the museum at Yellowknife as an additional tourist attraction.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR REMISSION ORDER ON TRIBUNAL'S DECISION RESPECTING DUMPING OF STEEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: Since British Columbia, by reasons of history, geography and the nature of its steel consumers, is not part of the domestic market for Algoma wide-flange steel, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall):

That the President of the Treasury Board seek and obtain a remission order pursuant to section 7 of the Financial Administration Act 1970, RSC chapter F-10, from the governor in council regarding an anti-dumping tribunal's decision with respect to the dumping of steel.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of the said motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATION OF NATIVE PEOPLES IN DISCUSSIONS ON CONSTITUTION OF N.W.T.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that the two largest native organizations of the Northwest Territories, namely, the Indian Brotherhood of the N.W.T. and the Inuit Tapirisat, have refused to participate in the inquiry, headed by C. M. Drury, on constitutional development in the Northwest Territories, and that without the involvement of these groups the inquiry will be rendered irrelevant, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls upon the government to suspend the lame-duck Drury inquiry until some accommodation can be reached with the Indian Brotherhood and ITC so that native peoples in the north are represented in any ongoing discussions regarding the constitutional evolution of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—S.O. 43 MOTION BY MR. ANDERSON

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank you very much for recognizing me at this particular point, as it does have to do with the proceedings which have just taken place. There is a considerable body of opinion in the House, and we bow to your judgment, sir, that there was not a "No" in respect of the motion by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). I wonder whether we might be permitted, since it is not unprecedented, to have that motion called again, perhaps to test the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There was no mistaking the distinct "No" I heard in respect of the motion.

KEABLE INQUIRY—MINISTER'S AFFIDAVIT RESPECTING DOCUMENTS NOT PROVIDED TO INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Solicitor General. Yesterday, I asked the minister specific questions about the state of knowledge of the previous solicitor general when he signed an affidavit on September 15 and, indeed, a subsequent affidavit on October 12, relating to the 26 documents which the solicitor general refused to turn over to the Keable inquiry. The Acting Solicitor General said his predecessor would not have known that one or more of those documents referred to operation "Ham", that is, the PQ break-in, because they were coded numerically.

Would the Acting Solicitor General explain to the House why the department, the security service or whoever it was, would use code numbers, when this operation had already been given a code name, namely, operation "Ham"?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity, which I appreciate the House giving me, of reviewing the annex to the affidavit to which the hon. member refers. There are three references to documents with references to file numbers. They were considered, along with the other 23 documents, by the then solicitor general against a set of criteria drawn up by him, his advisers and counsel—including counsel from my department—as to the basis upon which they should be excluded. Those three references had file references which later turned out to be references to the "Ham" file. I have reviewed the three documents which are excluded, and none of those documents, while they have a file reference, include the word "Ham".

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated yesterday in his answers that there was no contradiction. In his answer on Monday, he said:

Any minister signing a section 41 declaration does so after careful examination of the documents in front of him—

Therefore, the very unfortunate question has to be: On October 28 or October 31, did the then solicitor general mislead the House; or on September 15 or October 12, did the then solicitor general sign a false affidavit?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the answer to both those questions is an emphatic "No". The documents which were given to the Keable inquiry under that affidavit, and the documents that were withheld, were carefully reviewed by the then solicitor general, over some 70 hours of work with his advisers, as to which would be submitted to the inquiry and which would not. None of those documents refer to "Ham". Those 26 documents were excluded, on the basis of section 41(2), against a set of criteria including such things as the protection of human sources, technical sources, information from other security services and the revealing of other targets or operations of the RCMP.

At that time, the then solicitor general, in reviewing those documents, was reviewing documents relative to the Bricole file or the Bricole matter, the break-in at the APLQ, and was excluding documents which did not relate to that incident.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, because this discussion is not clarifying anything, my final supplementary question is: Were there documents listed among the 26 which referred to activities other than those to which the affidavit referred, because the matters deposed to and the documents referred to in the affidavit related to specific events, being the subject matter of the inquiry of Mr. Justice Keable, specifically? Were these other three documents related to other activities, specifically, the Parti Québécois break-in? How on earth could the minister fail to inform himself of that very situation, having, as his successor has said, met the standard of conduct required by a minister in signing a section 41 affidavit, which was outlined to the House by the Acting Solicitor General yesterday?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, they were documents which did not relate to the APLQ break-in, they related to other files of the RCMP which did not relate to the APLQ, and therefore were excluded from the affidavit relating to the APLQ. I think some of the confusion—and I indicated the other day that there is confusion—may well arise from the fact that there is in the annex, the list of excluded documents, a reference to a telex which does not use the word "Ham". There is, however, another telex of the same date, from the same officer which does refer to operation "Ham". That is not the telegram referred to in the annex, nor is it the document excluded by the former solicitor general.

Mr. Jarvis: Will the Acting Solicitor General assure the House that the affidavit sworn to by the then solicitor general on October 12, 1977, which includes the list of documents, No. 24 of which is a telex from d'Entremont, does not relate to operation "Ham", that is, the PQ break-in?

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NEWFOUNDLAND—SHUTDOWN OF FLUORSPAR MINE—IMPORT TARIFF TO PROTECT JOBS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Alcan company is shutting down its fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland—a criminal act which will throw 400 people in the community out of work—and in view of the fact that Alcan is doing this because they feel they can make more profit from the fluorspar mine owned by Noranda in Mexico, and in view of the fact that Alcan is brutalizing the community in this way, immediately following a year in which that company's profits increased by 500 per cent over the previous year, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House why he refuses to protect the jobs of Canadians and the community of St. Lawrence by imposing temporary import tariffs on fluorspar?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): The representations of the hon. member in this matter will be considered.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that about a month ago the government took the position that it would not impose an import tariff on fluorspar, and in view of the fact that the precedent for imposing an import tariff to protect Canadian industry and jobs was established in the shoe industry, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House why he is so tardy as to put off the decision, once again, on which depends the fate of the community and the jobs of 400 workers? Can he tell the House right now, without equivocating and without fiddling and faddling, if he is prepared, now, to impose an import tariff on fluorspar?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question would be no, without further consideration.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that it is fairly obvious that the House has frequently in the past voted, considered and debated legislation to put workers back to work, and in view of the fact that the government is putting off the decision and has in the past denied the right to impose a tariff on imported fluorspar, can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House if he intends to bring legislation before the House which will put capital back to work so that no one will be laid off in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland?

Mr. MacEachen: I will give the same answer to the third question on the same point.

AIR TRANSPORT

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN DOMESTIC AND OVERSEAS RATES—CRITERIA USED TO ESTABLISH RATES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

I have been told that over similar distances domestic rates differ from rates on overseas flights originating in Canada.

Could the minister tell the House whether those allegations are correct and, if so, what criteria are considered in establishing passenger rates inside or outside the country?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to make a sweeping statement about a comparison of rates of all kinds within the country and abroad. However, it may be that the hon. member's question is directly related to a recent report of a higher rate between points in eastern Canada and Vancouver, compared with a lower rate if one is travelling to Los Angeles. That report, as an Air Canada vice president made clear in a letter to the same newspaper, was quite wrong. As usual, a charter economy or excursion fare was being compared with a regular fare inside Canada.

● (1427)

In fact, a real comparison of rates shows that the lowest rates generally available are charter competitive fares, which both CP Air and Air Canada offer. As that vice president reported, on the particular routes being used as the examples when comparing those two fares, the fare for the inside Canada route was actually lower than the one to the foreign destination.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, would the minister give serious attention to this matter, which is of great interest for all Canadians, so that people who wish to take a few days' vacation be better informed, and see if it might be possible to give a special advantage to Canadians who want to visit Canada rather than foreign countries?

Could the minister inform the House about this study? Would he be prepared to make that recommendation or to give the results of this study in the House of Commons within the next few days?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I have just indicated, very often the inside-Canada fares are indeed as low or lower than similar ones for foreign destinations. What I think may be required is the correcting of the false impression which is often left when comparing an excursion fare with a regular fare, which is obviously not a fair comparison. I think I should encourage the airlines to give greater publicity to their charter competitive fares so that there is as much attention given to them for travel inside Canada as the promoters of various tours abroad give to the rates available there. I believe greater information is what is required. I think the fare structure may, in fact, be reasonably balanced at the present time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—INFORMATION PROVIDED MINISTER ON MILITARY MATTERS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday, General Hill, the Commander in Chief of NORAD, stated that he had briefed the Prime Minister on the nuclear package in the faltering Cosmos satellite. It seems that the Prime Minister either forgot to pass the news on to the Minister of National Defence, or possibly did not understand what the briefing officers were telling him. In any case, the Minister of National Defence was left in the dark by both the Prime Minister and his own Chief of Defence staff. Has the minister discussed with the Prime Minister the advantages of keeping the minister informed about military matters? In turn, the minister might enlighten the Prime Minister regarding the role of NORAD.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no discrepancy and there never has been a discrepancy. The information which has come to either the Prime Minister or myself has been known by both of us. There is a discrepancy in the statement made last night by General Hill. There is, obviously, a misunderstanding, because that statement is not borne out by officers who are at the location. Unfortunately, General Hill is on his way back to Colorado Springs. I am sure he and the Prime Minister will be pleased to answer questions about this matter. I will have word from General Hill later this afternoon when the Prime Minister returns to the House. I am sure that the information he was given is correct.

DISINTEGRATION OF SOVIET SATELLITE OVER CANADIAN SOIL—USEFULNESS OF U.S.S.R. SCIENTISTS BEING ON SITE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question would have been directed to the Prime Minister, but unfortunately he is absent so I will ask about another aspect of this problem. One of the senior Canadian officers engaged in the search for and retrieval of the debris has suggested that it would be helpful to have Russian scientists there now. Has the government considered this course of action and, if so, what steps have been taken?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): I understand that the Prime Minister is speaking with representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress at the present time. Many people at the site are making many statements. There has been no request for Russian assistance from any of our people. The Soviets have offered to assist, but there has not been a need for it. It is very simple for hon. members opposite to pick up the latest edition of a newspaper or to listen to the latest newscasts, but I have to deal with a situation which covers some 20,000 square miles, with hundreds of people involved, in a very hostile environment with temperatures of 70 degrees below zero with the wind chill factor. We have a large operation going on there. What any individual might say might be helpful and, if not, the information is coming through from individuals in charge of the search.

NORAD—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADA'S ROLE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): In view of the efficient and clear statement of General Hill of the United States, which indicated that the Prime Minister apparently did not understand the significance of the falling satellite, nor did he understand the significance of Canada's participation in the joint command aspect of NORAD, in view of the Prime Minister's confusion will the Minister of National Defence consider making a statement on motions to clarify the government's confusion and incompetence, in order that Canadians may be reassured regarding the security of the nation and the excellence and competence of our Canadian defence officials in NORAD?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am really amazed by hon. members who believe that every foreign officer is making an accurate statement, and when it comes to our Canadian forces they seem to question them all the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: I think the hon. member is as far back on the backbenches as he can be, but it is still too bad he is that close.

Mr. Wenman: Unfortunately, the minister did not hear the question, Mr. Speaker. I said that I wanted him to make such a statement on motions, in order that the people of Canada might understand that members on this side of the House share an understanding as to the excellence of our forces. We are not concerned about their excellence; we are concerned about the incompetence of the government. Will the minister make such a statement on motions?

POST OFFICE

McDONALD INQUIRY—MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF MAIL OPENING BY RCMP

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It relates to the possible misleading of the House, or misinformation given by an official of the Post Office to the minister. Mr. Paul Boisvert, director of security and investigations for the Post Office, has told the McDonald commission that he learned of the "Cathedral" mail openings by the RCMP some time in October. On November 9, in the House, the minister denied that he knew anything about illegal mail openings. In fact, in response to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition he said:

Mr. Speaker, following the investigation I have conducted with my own security investigation personnel, I stand by my statement.

Will the minister say whether he misled the House at that time, or whether he had been misinformed by his official who heads the security and investigations division?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the question I was asked was whether I was aware of any complicity on the part of postal officials tampering with the mail. I have not seen the transcript of Mr. Boisvert's evidence, but as I understand it, the evidence before the McDonald inquiry was to the effect that he had been made aware in mid-October of the RCMP tampering with the mail. There is no indication that at that time he had been made aware of any official or employee of the Post Office being involved.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. We are moving from misleading, to incompetence in the operation of the department. The Postmaster General well knows that the questioning on that particular day related to stories revealed in the press of RCMP interception of mail. Will the minister indicate to the House whether he will take action with respect to that official in his department, or whether he will bear full responsibility for misleading this House on a very important matter as far as the country is concerned?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on that day I answered the question put to me by the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Postmaster General at least give this House the assurance that he will not, under any circumstances, allow his name to stand for the position of solicitor general?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE STUDY OPERATIONS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the increasing disgust of more and more Canadians with the inadequacy of our postal service, as evidenced by the fact that in one constituency office yesterday we received eight to ten phone calls, independently, from people indicating their dismay with the situation, would the Postmaster General agree that the inquiries he has instituted to date in which Post Office officials investigate themselves, are a failure and would he be willing to reconsider having a parliamentary committee investigate the whole Post Office mess?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FIGHT CARDIOVASCULAR DISEASE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of recently published statistics that cardiovascular disease is still the number one cause of mortality and morbidity in Canada, and that the month of February is dedicated by the medical world as "heart month", I should like to ask the minister what new steps she has taken to help Canadians fight cardiovascular disease.

Mr. Clark: That's a toughie.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I personally launched the campaign for "heart month" on Monday in Montreal. I do not recall the amount of the campaign for the whole of Canada, but I shall give the figure to the House as soon as I have it. One million dollars is the goal for the province of Quebec. I encourage hon. members to contribute their share in accordance with what they believe. I should like to mention the excellent work done by Dr. Fraser Mustard's committee in this respect. We are giving support to the research side. Last year we gave $6.2 million—

Some hon. Members: Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSTPONING CONSTRUCTION OF POWER DEVELOPMENT ON POPLAR RIVER, SASK.—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will address my question to the government House leader, the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government made any response to the formal note submitted to it by the International Joint Commission with regard to postponing or imposing a moratorium on the construction of the power development on the Poplar River in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not made any formal reply to the request of the International Joint Commission that further work on the project be suspended until information has been assembled which is required for the water quality studies of the commission. We are aware that the government of Saskatchewan has indicated it will attempt to provide the required information as soon as possible.

FISHERIES

REPAIR OF FOREIGN VESSELS IN CANADIAN SHIPYARDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, as he may leave us soon. As the minister knows, I have been urging him for a year to announce a policy that will give Canadians ship repair yards the ability to service foreign fishing vessels. The minister had said he would permit major repairs. Will he also permit vessels under repair to have crew changes and catch changes, so that east coast shipyards will be able to repair the foreign fishing vessels which we now control within our 200-mile economic zone?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if I were to consider going where the hon. member suggests, I might discuss it with him on the way since he knows the way from the provincial to the federal field. I would tell him that some Liberals in his own riding asked me if I was intersted in running in Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker, the matter of port access is before us. As the hon. member knows, we are engaged in bilateral negotiations with two major components of our foreign fisheries relations. I have always said that port access should be exchanged for other economic developments. I am willing to look at ad hoc cases which come before me, and authorize negotiations under the Fisheries Protection Act. I am very sympathetic in the case of the port in which the hon. member is interested.

Mr. Crosbie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman would be a fish out of water if he went to Newfoundland. There are thousands of shipyard workers in Nova Scotia, and hundreds in Newfoundland who can be kept employed or whose employment could expand if this change came into effect. I ask the minister when there will be a definite announcement on whether this policy is going to change, in order to permit our shipyards to negotiate with the foreign companies involved and obtain this additional work. Newfoundland should be a service station in the North Atlantic for these fleets, but it is stopped at the moment. When can we have a definite, final policy?

• (1442)

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have not prevented discussions between one major company and one country from taking place. I am sure that if they agree to conditions and prices, it will be authorized. The hon. member—and I say this because he is a former minister of fisheries with whom I had very good relations—recognizes that access to ports at a time when we do not have jurisdiction beyond 200 miles, and other conditions which we want to attach to protect the fisheries, can become a bargaining point in our bilateral agreements. For that reason I am not willing to rush into port access except on an ad hoc basis where our vital interest is protected.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

REPLACEMENT FOR S.S. "CARSON"—LOCATION OF SHIPYARD UNDERTAKING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I must say I appreciate that last observation made by the Minister of Fisheries. I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister indicate whether, in fact, officials of his department are now outside Canada seeking to place an order for replacement of the CN ferry Carson which sank off the Labrador coast late last year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no firm position has been taken at this point in time for a replacement for the Carson. Officials of my department and of CN Marine are always alert in an effort to find out which vessels may be available for additional service in the ferry systems in the eastern part of the country. I have no doubt they are interested at all times to know at what prices they might be able to acquire vessels of various configurations. That, of course, goes alongside the question that we are looking at for the future, that is, replacement of a vessel three or four years from now. Obviously, we would look much harder at the question of constructing such a vessel in Canada.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises from the fact, as I understand it, that the ministry has not canvassed Canadian shipyard capacity which, as everyone knows, is greatly reduced. I wonder if the minister, in association with his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, could give an undertaking that there will be a revamped and revised policy by the government toward shipbuilding in Canada. In addition, could the minister, on behalf of the government, undertake to give the assurance that during periods of undue slackness and underutilization of our Canadian shipyards, particularly in light of the thousands of jobs that have been lost in recent months and will be lost over the next two or three months, Canadian government requirements will be for Canadian designed and Canadian built ships?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that the hon. member continued with his supplementary question, because I had already said that if we were looking at the construction of a vessel which would be available several years hence, we would very clearly be interested in the question of Canadian construction, with the jobs that would go with it and the use of idle shipyards. I hope that the hon. gentleman will recognize that if what we are after is a vessel for the coming season, there is no possibility of constructing such a vessel in that time period, and we may therefore, very reasonably, go outside the country to charter a vessel not built in Canada, as a temporary measure to meet the real needs of people wanting to travel between the Atlantic provinces.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR MANUFACTURE OF PIPE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Foothills Pipe Lines cannot call for tenders and steel plants in Canada cannot make plans for production for the proposed Alcan pipeline until they know the result of negotiations between the technical committees of the United States and Canada, can the minister tell the House the state of those negotiations respecting specifications for pipe? Can he assure the House that the negotiators for Canada will not allow themselves to be outmanoeuvred regarding specifications which rule out most, if not all, of the Canadian steel industry? Also, can he tell the House when we will have those specifications?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, joint technical discussions have taken place between officials on our side, namely, the National Energy Board, and officials of the United States. The United States has undertaken further studies on its own, as I understand it. Nevertheless, it is the intention of the National Energy Board to make a decision on pipe size, I would say within two weeks. Of course, the pipe size is a matter within the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board because it does have responsibility for assuring safety standards and reliability within Canadian territory.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion? In view of the fact that the agreement on the pipeline was reached months ago, and in view of the announcements by the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister regarding Canadian content, Canadian construction and Canadian pipe, will the minister—even though I might be worried—accept the statements and the commitments of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister at face value and proceed at once with the contribution by his department toward the $80 million expansion for the Interprovincial Steel Company plants in Regina and Edmonton, so they may proceed to produce a major portion of the pipe for that line?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, this proposal was brought before our Department some time ago and we are considering it in conjunction with that company and the provincial authorities. It will probably take a few weeks before we will be able to bring together all the facts and elements that will help up make up our minds as take a decision about the way this project can be worked out.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR EARLY INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has been promising the House the pipeline legislation for months. It is a matter which went through the United States Congress last year. Obviously, it is going to be a complicated and lengthy bill, with great economic problems and others which must be discussed by hon. members. In order that we may acquaint ourselves with the provisions of this bill, rather than being confronted with a rushed, last-minute debate, will the minister indicate that he will bring the bill before the House before the end of this week, or at the latest on Monday, with ten days or two weeks set aside for members to study it before second reading debate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that I propose to give notice of the bill today. We will give it first reading at the end of the week, or early next week, and we will commence the debate just as soon as hon. members have had an opportunity to study the bill. I doubt whether the length of time requested by the hon. member is required in order to examine the qualities of this bill.

THE CANADIAN MINT

METRIC-SIZED COINS—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INTRODUCTION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services who is responsible for the Mint. Will the Minister say whether a decision has been made not to introduce the new metric one-cent coins because of the fact that any change in coin sizes costs hundreds of millions of dollars, especially to coin machine operators, vending machine operators, etc? Will the minister say whether the Mint now has secret designs which will result in the introduction of metric-sized coins in denominations of 20 cents, 40 cents and 80 cents to replace existing coinage?

Mr. Woolliams: Bring back the five-cent coffee, too.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the Mint has no secret designs and, as a matter of fact, the Mint was thinking of issuing a new one-cent coin. But since it costs us two cents to make a one-cent coin and since our designs were so well known that people involved in the private market and in the public sector were opposed to the issuance of this new coin, we have cancelled this project.

It is true that we are considering a new proposal which we and the people involved intend to assess with a view to lowering our operating costs.

● (1452)

[English]

Mr. Bawden: Would the minister tell us whether the new one-cent coins were minted and, if so, at what cost? Would he also tell us why these changes in size were made? If it was to reduce the cost, would the hon. gentleman explain why the Mint did not simply change the alloys going into the coins but left them the same size, since this would have eliminated horrendous problems for the Toronto subway authority, for instance, and towns which have installed parking meters.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is partly right: it is a matter of size, but also of weight. When the alloy used for the one-cent coin is changed, private enterprise as well as public services, such as the Toronto and Montreal transport commissions, run into trouble. We want to change the one-cent coin precisely because it costs us $6 million more than it brings in.

We are looking at new proposals and the pilot project cost $5,000. To my mind that is not prohibitive considering the fact that we are trying to save $6 million.

INCLUSION OF B.C. IN DECISION OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL RESPECTING STEEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question was to have been directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister. It has to do with all the pressure being brought to bear in this House for protection for industry in central Canada—for example, the shoe industry, textiles and, now, the newest inequity, steel—at a cost to the economic health of the outer reaches of Canada. I have in mind British Columbia. In view of the fact that British Columbia has never been a market for Algoma wide-flange steel, would the hon. gentleman tell us why British Columbia was included in the decision of the anti-dumping tribunal to increase the cost of imported steel to the construction industry of British Columbia?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): I can assure the hon. member that, as a person from the outer reaches of Canada, I am seriously concerned about the problem she has raised. I want to tell her that the matter is presently before the government for consideration, and we are expecting and awaiting further information on this question from the government of British Columbia.

ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL ENGAGED IN SEARCH FOR REMAINS OF SOVIET SATELLITE

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I may say I am appalled by the emphasis the minister is placing on the harsh environment of northern Canada, as if it were the first time anyone in this government realized that this was a cold climate and there are thousands of people living and working in such an environment every day. I should like to ask whether armed forces personnel now at Churchill, Manitoba, and involved in winter warfare training were engaged in searching for the remains of the satellite which came down in Canadian territory.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. Most of the personnel engaged in the search came from Edmonton and Yellowknife; none has been drawn from Churchill. If they are required, they can be made available.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Is active consideration being given to the removal of the remaining 35 armed forces families presently in Churchill to other locations for winter warfare training?

Mr. Danson: I think it is an overstatement to say active consideration is being given to that question. A review of all our bases is a regular practice intended to increase the efficiency of the forces. It is possible that Churchill is under consideration, as it has been before, but I have no change immediately planned for the future.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF DECISION OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister and is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who has taken up a subject first raised by my hon. friend from Capilano. Given that there is real concern on both sides of the House about this decision by the anti-dumping tribunal, would the Acting Prime Minister, in the interest of making parliament effective in dealing with regional concerns, agree to make an immediate reference of the decision of the anti-dumping tribunal on December 29, 1977, to the appropriate committee of the House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): We hope to be able to reach a decision on this question shortly. It may be that in the circumstances reference to a standing committee would delay a decision on the matter, one which is urgently required.

Mr. Clark: It should be understood that our concern is that this decision did not adequately represent regional realities. There is very real concern that the same lack of attention will be displayed by the government. One way to ensure that the legitimate regional interests of British Columbia are expressed would be by affording an opportunity before a standing committee of the House of Commons for British Columbia members to make their case directly. Why does the Acting Prime Minister deny that right to a standing committee of the House?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition need not be afraid that the regional interests of British Columbia are not being vigorously pressed forward by Liberal members and by ministers from British Columbia. If that is his concern, I can assure him that it is groundless.

INVESTIGATION INTO CONDUCT OF MEMBER—ACTION TAKEN BY RCMP

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Would the hon. gentleman confirm to the House that a Liberal member of parliament has been charged by the RCMP for influence-peddling?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that because I am not responsible, nor do I have official information on the subject.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not get the minister's answer precisely, but since a press report is now out to the effect that the member has been charged, I assume the Deputy Prime Minister will check this soon and have some kind of report made to the House, whether the charge was that of influence-peddling and whether departments other than the House of Commons, for example, were involved.

Mr. MacEachen: In order to make the situation absolutely clear so that there might be no question of misunderstanding later, I should like to say that the investigation into the conduct of the hon. member mentioned by the leader of the New Democratic Party was launched under the authority of the Speaker. It is my view that any further information on the subject ought to be sought from that source, because this is a matter of parliamentary conduct. I have received some information on the subject—I want to make that clear—but I believe it might be better if the channel to which I have referred were followed in this case.

INCREASE IN SHUTDOWN OF PLANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is absent, I shall direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Further to the federal-provincial conference of trade and commerce ministers this week, it was shown that Canada has lost 84,000 jobs in the last thirteen months, 30,000 being in the province of Quebec. In view of these facts, can the minister tell us whether his government intends to take immediate action to put an end to this current massive closure of industries?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first I must set the facts straight. As for the number mentioned, I believe there was a printing error in the newspaper. I think the number mentioned was rather 34,000 jobs lost during that period in the manufacturing sector, including roughly 30,000 in certain industrial sectors of Quebec. As for the purport of the hon. member's question, certain measures have of course been adopted, for example certain quotas have been applied to imports in two programs, also some support has been given to certain industries. As the hon. member knows, our department has already started a program to help certain industrial sectors in the province of Quebec, particularly in Montreal.

Mr. La Salle: I would like to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I realize the efforts the government is now making to correct the situation. Since these propositions will probably have medium and long-term effects, is the minister prepared to urge his government to call together all the industrial sectors in order to have this government and these heads of industry develop a very special strategy designed to stop at last those shutdowns we see from day to day? I want to know if the minister would be prepared to recommend such a meeting with the government to develop a special strategy in this regard.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that our measures also have short-term effects. Some of them are already felt by industry and recognized as having been beneficial to them. Moreover, I would like to add that such meetings as suggested by the hon. member have already taken place and are still taking place fairly regularly because we do have a consultation process with the heads of the industries mentioned by the hon. member. Those consultations will surely go on so that the measures we have to apply get maximum results and that industries can comply with the measures we have developed for them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INVESTIGATION INTO CONDUCT OF MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: In reference to the matter just raised a moment ago, I think it is appropriate for me to inform the House before carrying on with any other business that the investigation which I undertook to request on behalf of the House into allegations which appeared some time ago in at least one national newspaper concerning one member of the House has been ongoing. During the course of it, there were developments reported to me which I in turn conveyed in a regular way to the House leaders. Yesterday I was advised, and I in turn advised the House leaders of all parties, that in fact a charge as a result of that investigation had been laid against the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Rooney).

PRIVILEGE

MR. JARVIS—POSSIBLE CONFUSION ARISING FROM QUESTION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At the commencement of the question period, the last question that I put to the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Basford) may have resulted in a little bit of confusion. What I had intended to ask—I have not seen the blues but what I believe I did ask—was whether a certain telex from Sergeant d'Entremont to Superintendent Nowlan related to operation "Ham". I referred specifically to the telex in the list of documents forming a schedule to the then solicitor general's affidavit of October 12. I referred specifically to item 24 on that list.

What my question may have indicated to the Acting Solicitor General was whether the subject matter of that telex was completely or at least in part relating to operation "Ham". What I intended to ask was did it relate in any way to operation "Ham"?

In that there now appears to have been two telex messages between the two officers, the Acting Solicitor General, in the interests of clearing up what is an increasingly confusing issue, may consider tabling these two telex. I suggest that particularly because, if one believes the press reports, the solicitor before the Keable commission for the RCMP is quoted as saying that his clients have no objection whatsoever to making those two documents public.

That final judgment has to rest, of course, with the Solicitor General. However, there did appear as a result of my questions, and the Acting Solicitor General's answer to my last question in particular, some confusion which he and I discused very briefly.

I raise this by way of a question of privilege first, so that the Acting Solicitor General may clear up any uncertainty that exists in his mind and, second, that he might consider advising the House whether he deems it advisable in the very serious circumstances to table these two telex.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's rising. After the exchange of questions, I went to him to see whether there was any confusion in his mind. My earlier answer indicated that in the annex to the Solicitor General's telegram there were three documents that had been excluded under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act on the basis that they referred to other matters. I indicated in my answer there were three of them that had a file number in them that subsequently proved to be the operation "Ham" file number. That answer would include his last question.

Just so that we are precisely clear, the telex that the hon. member refers to, telex B526 listed in the annex, has within it the file number of the "Ham" file. It does not have the word "Ham" in it and does not deal with the subject matter of "Ham" or the PQ break-in.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION—EMPLOYEES OBTAINED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 276—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Canadian Commercial Corporation obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Canadian Commercial Corporation in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. (a) (i) (ii) (iii) (iv) (vi) (vii) (viii) (ix) (x) Nil. (v) 1975: 8; 1976: 15. (b) Not applicable.

2. Main estimates.

3. (a)(i) $7.27. (ii) $7.50. (b) Not known. (c)(i) $10,630. (ii) $18,739.

CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION—EMPLOYEES OBTAINED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 300—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. (a) (i) (ii) (iii) (iv) (vi) (vii) (viii) (ix) (x) Not applicable. (v) 6. (b) Not applicable.

2. Main estimates.

3. (a)(i) Not applicable. (ii) $5.41. (b) Not known. (c)(i) Not applicable. (ii) $5,000.

CARPET—EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION OFFICE—BROCKVILLE, ONTARIO

Question No. 417—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was or has carpet been purchased by the government for the new Employment and Immigration office on King Street East, Brockville, Ontario and, if so (a) from whom (b) on what date (c) at what price per square yard (d) what was the total cost?

2. Were tenders called to permit local suppliers to bid on such requirements and (a) if so (i) on what date (ii) in each case, what is the name of the tenderer and the amount (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. No. (a), (b), (c) and (d) Not applicable.

2. (a)(i) and (ii) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable.

BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION OVER SAINT JOHN RIVER, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 982—Mr. Howie:

Has DREE (a) agreed (b) been asked to financially support the cost of construction of a bridge over the Saint John River at Fredericton, New Brunswick and, if so, will it assist financially in this project?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: (a) No. (b) No.

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION FROM FREDERICTON TO SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Question No. 983—Mr. Howie:

Has DREE (a) agreed (b) been asked to financially support the cost of construction of a highway from Fredericton to Saint John, New Brunswick?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: (a) No. (b) No.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCTION OF "KINGS AND DESPERATE MEN"

Question No. 1,024—Mr. Epp:

Is the Canada Council, the National Film Board or the Canadian Film Development Board in any way contributing financially to the film being produced in Montreal entitled "Kings and Desperate Men" and, if so, in what amount and for what specifically?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council, the National Film Board and the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: No.

Mr. Andres: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AUTHORIZE IMPOSITION OF LEVY ON DOMESTIC PETROLEUM AND IMPORTS

The House resumed, from Friday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources), that Bill C-19, to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Order made yesterday, January 31, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works of Bill C-19, an act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

I think there was some discussion last evening that the House would try to move to the taking of the division in 15 minutes time. Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lalonde, for Mr. Gillespie) which was agreed to on the following division:

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF CERTAIN HARBOURS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, January 31, 1978, consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent) that Bill C-2, respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my understanding that at the conclusion of the debate last evening, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) had the floor. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity in committee and through the debates in the House to take a good look at the bill before the House. It is such a short bill which contains so little that one could easily overlook its true significance. The significance of the bill is that the minister will have authority to increase to a large extent the fee structure for fishermen on the east and west coasts. We in this party are not opposed to rationalization of the small harbours system and we are not opposed to ending the idea that a fisherman can tie up at one wharf for nothing but at another wharf he has to pay the wharfinger.

I know that the minister is attempting through this legislation to solve this kind of inequity, but there are some real reasons for which we feel as a matter of principle we cannot support the bill. One of the fundamental principles which we in this party support is that one should not take the public's property and turn it over to the private sector and leave those in the fishing industry unprotected. Under section 8 this bill contains the clear provision that the minister may, subject to the regulations, lease any scheduled harbour or any part thereof to any person. First of all, I see nothing in this bill which would protect fishermen against moorage fees, which may amount to whatever the traffic can bear as far as the private lessee of that marina is concerned, or nothing to prevent the lessee deciding he does not want fishermen on his docks but just wants big yachts, because obviously he can make more money from yachts. I see the minister shaking his head and I hope he will correct us.

I do not see anything in the bill which guarantees that if the minister decides, under the powers of this legislation, to transfer a public small harbour to the private sector, fishermen will be protected in terms of the regulated fee under the act. I cannot imagine any private entrepreneur taking it on that basis without some flexibility in terms of the kinds of fees that a private entrepreneur would take.

What is really passing strange in this bill appears when one reads the record of evidence in committee and the statements made by the minister in the House about the whole question of the fee structure. On November 15, as recorded at page 2:5 of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, Mr. Reid, who looks after the small harbours division in the minister's department, said the following:

Some fishermen pay and others are not paying, depending on whether or not there is a government wharfinger to collect the charges. In fact, we have a number of outstanding court cases in which fishermen ought to have paid charges, and they have not, and their neighbours a few villages away have paid. This has caused us considerable concern.

I agree with him that this should cause concern. He goes on to say:

The amount of money that we are anticipating collecting in the first year, should we introduce this new scheme of charging everyone, would be extremely modest and, in fact, would only equal what we are collecting today.

That was an assurance in committee that the total amount of fees taken from commercial fishermen will not be any higher.

Let us go into the rest of the evidence. We come now to the minister's statement on January 31, 1978 made in the House when he said the following about the fees to be charged to fishermen. It is to be found at page 2414 of Hansard of that day. He said:

However, let me assure the House that no decision has been made in respect of the details of a new fee structure. Fishermen are not going to wake up with the passage of this legislation to find they have to pay the federal government "X" number of dollars.

He did not specify the number of dollars. Then he went on to say:

I believe we should continue with our present system, with all its shortcomings, for the present, without making any charges until the health of the fishery improves and subsidies in that area are reduced. What we intend to do now is discuss with fishermen and their organizations how we can achieve a modest and equitable fee structure that would allow both better management of facilities and better on-site services for Canada's commercial fishermen. Certainly I cannot emphasize this enough.

Let us look at the evidence given by the man who actually runs the system, namely, Mr. Reid. This is what he testified in front of the committee on November 24, just before the bill came out of committee:

The level of charge will be modest and reflect regional differences; in fact, we have proposed that it should range from a low of $1 per foot per year in the Atlantic regions and Quebec to $2 per foot per year in the Pacific.

● (1542)

That evidence indicates a 63 per cent increase in the present moorage charges in the province of British Columbia, which is the evidence I have, and the minister can re-examine that. It indicates a tremendous discrimination between one coast and the other. I am not suggesting that there should not be some discrimination in favour of those who are least able to pay, but the myth that the commercial fishermen of British Columbia are wealthy entrepreneurs just does not bear close examination. In fact, there is a great number of fishermen in British Columbia for whom the moorage fees are key to their operation and to whether they can make a satisfactory living. We are talking of up to $2,000 a year for licence fees in B.C. When you keep adding all these drips and dabs in B.C., where does that leave us? That kind of discrimination is completely unsatisfactory and unnecessary, and if we pass this bill we give a blank cheque to the minister to impose whatever fee he wants with regard to commercial fisheries.

I do not think this minister has done a bad job. I do not want to carp and criticize everything, but if I was a commercial fisherman, I would not buy a pig in a poke. If I was a commercial fisherman, I would want a commitment, before the minister was given the powers contained in this bill, as to what his charges will be and how many wharfingers will be hired in the province of B.C. Are these wharfingers to be local Liberals who happen to be unemployed? That question always comes up. One of the minister's principal problems might be to find Liberals to handle these jobs. Things are getting pretty rough. We do not know how many wharfingers the minister intends to add to the rolls. Some wharfingers in British Columbia work eight hours and then nip down to pick up fees at the docks. Those people are called wharfingers, but if that is the kind of wharfinger we are going to add to the ones we already have, the government can forget about it. We do not need part-time wharfingers and moonlighters. If we are going to have wharfingers, fishermen want people who will properly manage docks so they will get something for their money.

Another myth abroad is that fishermen are mooring for nothing all over the place, and they are not. It depends, but at the docks where they are allegedly mooring for nothing a fisherman would not want to tie up his boat because it might be cut adrift the next day, boats might have to get over sand bars to get to the docks, no dredging is done, the docks are rotting right into the ocean, and there is no breakwater at all.

I do not object to the idea that we should spend more money on small harbours. The minister has not spent enough money on small harbours. We can be putting public money into those harbours, but I do not see why commercial fishermen have to bear the burden. I do not see why we should take one section of the economy and let it carry the can for something this government has allowed to decline over the last 20 or 30 years.

Another reason this bill should not be approved is that there has been a remarkable lack of consultation with those involved. I know the minister has been out to the coast. I know he has had meetings with the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union. However, as I recall, the minister did not have those meetings prior to this bill going through committee. The fishermen's union was not invited to make representations to the committee with regard to this bill. That particular union, which is the most seriously affected, submitted a very lengthy and detailed brief on this subject to the minister, and my information is that that brief has not been responded to in any detailed way. The minister did spend some two and a half hours, but he did not spend two and a half hours with the representatives of that union on the question of moorage fees. He spent his time on salmon enhancement problems, with boundary problems and with U.S.-Canada treaty problems—

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): And Bill C-2.

Mr. Leggatt: —but how much time was spent on Bill C-2? Very little out of that two and a half hour meeting. Perhaps that is consultation in the way this government operates, but it is not meaningful consultation. Surely those who are most seriously affected by the fees should have the principal input in terms of how the program is going to work and which docks are going to become staffed docks at which there will be charges.

It is perhaps typical of this government that it moves first and asks questions of the groups most affected later, but it is wrong. Having this bill in his hand will improve the minister's bargaining position with regard to fees charged to fishermen on the west coast, but I am not particularly interested in strengthening the minister's hand. The people who need help are the fishermen, not the minister. Therefore, what we should be doing is denying the minister this bill and letting him go back to the coast to meet with Pacific trawlers, the UFAWU, the native brotherhood and all the fishing groups to develop a consensus for a bill which the people affected can accept.

That is not what the minister has done. He is going to give them a bill. If they do not like it, he will listen to them for ten minutes, but they are going to get it anyway. The minister is going to ram it down the throats of British Columbia fishermen, and this being so I suggest that there will be a real problem. Some fishermen may not obey the law, and I would regret that, but the kind of approach one takes to legislation has to be considered with care. It is important to get a consensus of the commercial fishing industry of B.C. That consensus is important if there is to be no problem collecting moorage charges.

With regard to clause 8, the question of the minister's capacity to transfer public property to the private sector, I am concerned about the minister's lack of capacity to guarantee fishermen that the rates set by regulation will be maintained by the private sector and the failure to guarantee that services to vessels will be properly maintained. That is a fundamental flaw. The number of mooring stations for commercial fishermen will be reduced because the private sector wants to handle big yachts from Seattle and get the people with the bucks to pay more and more moorage fees. This is a beautiful opportunity for the minister to abandon his reponsibility to commercial fishermen on the coast.

There are many problems in the fishing industry. The minister has not resolved the uncertainty of the A and B licensing system, and in my discussions with fishermen I learned that that is causing very real concern on the coast. The minister has not made an announcement with regard to the phase-out. I think he is putting the cart before the horse again. Fishermen want to know where they are going with regard to their licensing system.

The small harbours matter is something which could have been left alone. Fishermen would like to know whether Canada will have any clout with regard to setting boundaries. Indications are that we have given up on the Dixon entrance and on the boundary in the riding of the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) which was set by international treaty. Indications are that we are bungling on the salmon negotiations. We are not standing up. The minister cannot expect to earn the confidence of the fishing industry when Canada is rolled over by the Americans on these negotiations. The minister's department says it is doing a great job. It tells fishermen to forget about those negotiations and that it will increase moorage fees this year. The department says it is going to put the matter of small harbours on a sound foundation. How can fishermen have confidence in this kind of legislation when nothing has been done about other matters?

With regard to the transfer of public property to private enterprise, if the minister would limit that provision to municipal or provincial authority and limit the capacity of that authority to set moorage rates beyond those set by regulation under the legislation, then I think he would have the support of fishermen. Unless I have misread the bill, control of power to regulate fees under the terms of the lease arrangement would be lost. From a practical point of view the bill would be useless because no private marina would be interested in obtaining a public small harbour unless it had flexibility in regard to fees. Those people are in business to make a profit and are not going to hold on to the property under lease if they are losing money.

There are a lot of areas in this country other than commercial fishermen that can be taxed. If more money is needed for small harbours it is available from many areas that have been undertaxed in the past, such as the western empire which derives as much benefit from the fishing industry as any other class in Canada. Tax concessions are granted at the top level and that is where additional money could be obtained.

If we increase the number of wharfingers there is no guarantee that they will be full time wharfingers, no guarantee of their training, of what kind of people will be hired to do the job or whether the last canvasser of the Liberal party just walks down to the end of the dock and takes his position in the little hut. Most of all, there is a lack of consultation with the groups affected.

All these things lead me to the firm conclusion that this bill is premature, Mr. Speaker, and that the government should withdraw it. The minister should take another trip to the west coast and instead of just spending two and a half hours talking on the subject of moorage payments he should spend a day with the fishermen, go up to Skeena for a day or out to the Island for a day, and then come back to this bill. I cannot accept the evidence given in committee to the effect that fishermen are crying for this legislation because that just is not true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, when I heard the minister's remarks at the opening of the debate I thought that I would not speak. I have a fair degree of confidence in him and respect for his ability, sincerity and integrity relative to other cabinet ministers in this government. Of course, that qualifies my commendation somewhat. I felt that the minister had addressed the problems that I raised in committee but upon reading Hansard today I found a number of qualifications that led me to believe he was perhaps using a delaying tactic. Perhaps he hoped I could be convinced to keep quiet and that the fees could be slipped into place and the bill passed. That is what my concern centres upon.

I am well aware, as are west coast fishermen, that the governor in council sets the fees under this bill and that the proclamation in the Gazette is not to be made just yet. My concern is that there should be some indication of the nature of the fees prior to passage of the bill. I expressed that concern in committee and as a result the minister presented samples of the fees that were anticipated and defended them. He stated clearly that he wants a different fee schedule for each region. The figures shown to the committee indicated that west coast fishermen will pay twice as much as their east coast counterparts. I can tell the minister that they do not like that.

The minister admits that for years inequity has been perpetrated by the Liberal government, that the administration has been inadequate and management of our harbours poor. This is the minister's own condemnation of previous ministers and this government's efforts in the fisheries industry. We are glad the government took note of our demand for change and brought this type of bill forward. We are pleased to hear they are concerned about inadequate administration and management and the history of inequalities which they claim will disappear.

The minister speaks of erasing inequalities and then goes on to say he will recognize regional differences. I should like him to recognize regional differences in the sense that the problems of the fisheries of British Columbia are not necessarily the same as those on the east coast but must be treated differently. That does not mean they should be treated differently on the basis of fee schedules or ability to pay but, rather, that the fee structure should be based on the cost of services provided. The sample presented by the minister indicated that this factor will not be taken into account.

We already have equalization in our federal system. The income tax system is supposed to redistribute income in an equitable manner. There is also the system of equilization payments between provinces which is supposed to equalize the level of services between regions. These two federal concerns at least have some clear cut direction in theory if not in practice. Then we have a whole host of federal policy initiatives with scattered effects which dot each department.

The sum total of all these initiatives to develop equalization is actually a terrible mess and the proposed fee schedule is just one more feature. We have tariffs, transportation rates, DREE programs, the Canada Works program and so on. I am concerned that this should not be just another method of redistributing income. There are other provisions and other bills to this effect. If we want to redistribute income we should use the existing programs of income tax and equalization and not carry the burden forward. We should recognize that some fishermen in British Columbia are competent and successful but that not all fishermen in British Columbia can be classed in the same way. There are poor fishermen in British Columbia just as there are in the Atlantic provinces. In fact, to be a poor fisherman in British Columbia is more a severe plight than to be a poor fisherman in the Atlantic region because the costs are so much higher, the competition is so much keener and tougher, in that province.

Let me make this point very strongly. I want the minister to stand up and tell us that the fee schedule will not be based on ability to pay but will be charged equally to all fishermen in British Columbia; that instead it will be a fee that relates to the cost of service and the quality of service that is provided to those fishermen.

The new berthing charges do not grasp the user-pay concept, as well they should not. Motorists do not pay for the total cost of highways directly, nor do airline patrons have to shell out for the whole cost of airports. Fishermen should not be the exception to the rule and should not be expected to pay for the full cost of servicing their industry. The berthing charges will be directed to the salaries of harbour managers. There is little reason why these people would be paid twice as much in British Columbia on the west coast as they are on the east coast, so why should the charges as indicated in the fee schedule be twice as much in British Columbia? If a fee must be charged it must be a consistent fee between the regions. The differences should be recognized in the nature of the fisheries, but not in the nature of the fee schedule.

The minister has made much of his willingness to meet with the fishermen on their own turf. He has visited the area and he has directed his officials to become acquainted with the fishermen. I appreciate the initiatives of the minister. I know these reports are true. I have received a very good response from officials in his department. They are endeavouring to be open and are prepared to bring information forward. I commend him for that. But yet while we see this openness, it just has not quite worked as far as consultation goes.

I have made assumptions and I took it for granted that when this bill came to committee the fishermen would in fact be invited to give testimony. In committee I questioned this very carefully. I asked if this fee schedule had been accepted by the fishermen in British Columbia and if they had been consulted. It is on record in Hansard. I was assured by the witnesses testifying, by the minister and I believe by one of the Liberal backbenchers, that in fact such consultation had taken place. I could not believe that the British Columbia fishermen would agree to pay a fee schedule twice as much as the east coast fishermen. But I was given that assurance.

I took those assurances and the minutes and I sent them to British Columbia to the fishermen's union. What do you know? The fishermen wrote back. Referring to C-2, Jack Nichol, president of the United Fishermen's and Allied Workers' Union, in a December 5 letter to the minister, stated:

> At no time was our union contacted or consulted on this matter.

The union was referring to the matter of fees. So that consultation had not in fact taken place. The promise that the minister gives me today is now somewhat in doubt. Once the minister, someone in his department, or one of his officials have misled us about this consultation, we become doubtful and sceptical. And, Mr. Speaker, you can hardly blame us for that in this instance.

While I have a reasonable amount of faith in him as the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, I am rather concerned that he might in fact leave this chamber. If that were to be so, I would be very concerned about giving these broad powers to another minister who might not exercise them with the discretion that this minister appears willing to exercise.

With respect to this fee schedule, we may have to look at it again. It should be put in an amended form before we pass it. It should be considered further and perhaps even a section taken out of the bill for more study. Maybe a commitment could be made to us that the fee schedule will be attached by amendment to the bill in the next session of the House—something along this line to assure that the fishermen and all those who are directly affected can appear and make their points known to us prior to the passing of this bill. Rather than giving full discretion to the minister, perhaps there should be some limitation imposed.

I am concerned that this after-the-fact consultation is a feature, not only of this particular minister, but of government departments. In all forms of environmental legislation we constantly have the attitude: "Yes, we are concerned, but let us build the plant now and see about it later". The one exception has been the Fisheries Act. Again, I am a little concerned about this act because it is masquerading a little bit. I wish that the minister would put a little more emphasis on the fact that this is a major environmental bill, that the powers the minister has taken unto himself are in fact the only veto powers to any development available in any bill before this House respecting before-the-fact legislation.

This bill has great environmental potential. It also has a great capacity for abuse. To give an example, if I were to touch my toe in the water, I could be considered a pollutant and the development would stop. That is not a confession relative to the cleanliness of my feet!

I suggest to the minister that he consider interfacing this bill with another bill relating to the environmental impact assessment or assure us whether or not it is an environmental bill. Will it in fact be used in that capacity in lieu of other legislation? These are questions which remain unanswered and are of concern to the fishermen on the west coast.

I am pleased to see that my representations which I have made continually since I have been here as a member of the House of Commons regarding recreational boating promotion have resulted from the fact that British Columbia has a tremendous coastline but has virtually no facilities for small boats. Small boats are constantly being forced to travel to the United States in order to gain berthing in Bellingham and Blaine. There is a great demand and need for recreational boating and for harbours in British Columbia. I am pleased to see that the minister has recognized this need after much pushing from myself and others. An hon. member seems to question when I have done this. If the hon. member will look at the first speech which I gave in the House of Commons, he will find it there. If he would review the committee meetings for the fisheries department he will find it there too. In addition to that, if the minister would like to consult my constituents who have worked with the minister to assist in bringing information forward, he will find it again, and again.

I have one small doubt here concerning the improvement, expansion and the updating of wharves. With respect to the wharf at Ruskin, where the local council and the local fishermen need the wharf, I received notice two months ago that they are tearing it down. This matter does not seem to jell when we are talking of maintaining, rebuilding and expanding. At the same time I am trying to tell the people of the area that the Minister is saying the wharf must be torn down. This is just an example of policy which needs to be referred to the minister's department to check. Are they operating under the auspices of this bill or are they still operating on the theory of efficiency with a lot of cutting back over the past few years?

With those points in mind I would like to say that I approve of the principle of this bill, the consolidation of it and the fact that the minister will be able to make decisions and actually do something concrete under the provisions thereof. Those are the positive aspects and the reason why the bill should pass.

But there are weaknesses. There is great concern for Canadian unity in this country and the recognition of the differences of the regions. But for goodness sake we must not play one coast against the other coast. Equity must be found, and I am sure it will be found if there is further and better consultation on the fee structure and the other items which are concerning our fishermen.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me state that because I am concerned with both the commercial fishermen and those people who use private boats—pleasure boats—in federal harbours and harbour commissions I support this measure strongly.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to members speaking on this bill on both sides of the House. Recalling the deliberations on second reading and in the committee, it is beyond my imagination how the hon. members opposite could have concluded there are so many things wrong with this legislation. It is obvious that too little attention has been paid to the comprehensive information provided at all stages along the way. Important aspects appear to have been largely ignored.

For example, the matter of leasing harbours is mentioned in the bill and this was, I recall, explained as covering companies, municipalities, and various groups. Such a definition was, I believe, provided by the Department of Justice. This type of clause is required so that we are not bound by this legislation as we were by the old Government Harbours and Piers Act under which it was possible to lease facilities only to municipalities, provinces, or shipping companies. Very recently, for example, a fishermen's union local wished to lease a facility on the west coast in a community in my constituency—Sointula. This association was considered to be an excellent tenant, but under the provisions of the Government Harbours and Piers Act—an outdated piece of legislation—the government was unable to enter into an agreement with it for management of the facility.

I wish the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) were here because he brought this point up and used it to illustrate why he is against this particular section of the legislation. But, Mr. Speaker, when a group of fishermen, on their own initiative, wish to take over the management of a small wharf or pier in an isolated area, we are prevented under the present legislation from allowing them to do so. Under the new legislation we shall be able to allow people such as those in a union local to take over a pier and run it to their best advantage, and I am very surprised that the hon. member for New Westminster did not apprise himself of that situation. Knowing his concern with respect to unions, I would have expected him to support a bill which would increase the government's authority to make decisions for the benefit of fishermen's co-operatives. I mention this point in passing because it was also referred to by the official opposition critic. Again, I would point out that this bill would give the minister greater flexibility because, if I am correct, the legislation under which we are presently operating originated in 1938.

As I said earlier, the government is unable to enter into what we consider good arrangements at the present time. It also has to be said that leasing applies to more than the wharves. It applies to upland properties on which producers may wish to locate, to fishermen who require gear and storage facilities, fish buyers, etc. Under the present legislation we are not able to enter into an agreement with fishermen to provide these services. In the absence of this authority to enter into reasonable term leases, processors and others will not invest money in buildings and plants at harbours.

I see that the hon. member for New Westminster is back in his place. I hope he reads Hansard to see that I have pointed out that in Sointula—I am sure he knows where that is—a fishermen's co-operative could not lease a wharf because under the terms of the old legislation we cannot lease to individuals. I wish he would check and make sure that I am correct because we are attempting, in the bill before us, to provide more flexibility in order to deal with groups such as native groups and fishermen's co-operatives. This measure would enable us to turn over the management of these facilities to such group's. At the present time we are not able to do this.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Anderson: I would be more than pleased to entertain a question at the close of my remarks.

To move on to the criticisms concerning the abandonment and destruction of facilities, let me remind hon. members opposite that the department has not abandoned any usable and useful small craft harbour facilities. I would say that some facilities have been abandoned as no longer being used. These are few in number and account for less than one per cent of the facilities.

In total, facilities have increased. However, it is obvious it makes no economic sense to spend money on facilities which are no longer required while leaving harbours used by fishermen to go begging. The government's approach is a rational one—to improve facilities where required and to abandon those no longer serving any useful purpose. As a result of consultation with municipalities and members of this House, facilities which are borderline have often been improved over the last few years through the Canada Works and similar government programs, using local labour, thereby providing a double spin-off in terms of employment and usable facilities for which departmental priorities would not normally dictate the expenditure of funds.

On the recreational side, although limited funds are expended these do contribute to the public's access to the water, as well as providing economic benefit in terms of employment. I should make it clear that federal funds allocated to community marina developments contain guarantees that such facilities are always open and available to the public. This program recognizes the importance of recreational boating and the rapidly expanding demand for public berthing. Of course, the government is not in a position to develop and operate totally recreational facilities. Our position is one of assistance in areas of greatest need.

Turning to the matter of consultation with the provinces, I can assure hon. members opposite that consultation did take place with regard to this bill on many occasions. As recently as the summer of 1977, the provinces were again asked for their views. Apparently some members have forgotten the committee discussions covering this point. We are not surprised by criticism emanating from certain newspapers in different parts of Canada, but surely members of the committee were apprised of the situation and correspondence was produced during the committee hearings.

I wish to comment on the matter of fees. I notice that the hon. member who spoke immediately before me is no longer here. There is good reason for the fact that in the bill itself no schedule of fees is set down. During the committee hearings the former director of small craft harbours explained that no fee system can be "cast in concrete", and the fact that no fee schedule is attached to the legislation allows the minister to discuss fees with British Columbia, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia before they are imposed. Consultation can take place as to the fees which should properly be charged.

I believe that everyone on the standing committee was aware there is no fee schedule included in Bill C-2. Certainly the minister has indicated on numerous occasions that the fee schedule will not be the subject of capricious decision by either himself or his officials. Rather, it will be the result of a process of deliberation, a process of meeting with those concerned in order to make sure a fair determination is reached in setting it up.

It is not as though there is no fee system already in effect. We have fee systems on both the east and west coasts. Certain members who have spoken in this debate indicated to the House, I am sure not deliberately, that there is some new concept, that the government of Canada, under the present Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), has suddenly backed away from the system of charging fees to those who use commercial fishing facilities. This is far from the truth, Mr. Speaker. We have had a system in place on the west coast for a number of years. The problem is that fishermen dependent on the wharves and harbours they use are being discriminated against. Fishermen may pay a fee in one port but not in another. Fishermen get together and discuss what is going on in the industry. It would be no surprise if one fishermen asked: "What the devil is going on? I am being charged fees when you are not."

Surely the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) will agree that if you use a facility, there should be some charge to the user. I think the hon. member will also agree that the fee should be determined after consultation with those who are going to use the facility. The bill does not include a fee schedule.

The hon. member can say the minister is going to bring in a fee that will be totally unreasonable for fishermen in the province of British Columbia. I suspect from the past performance of this minister that the opposite is the case. Fishermen on both the east and west coasts of Canada have come to trust this minister because what he says he usually does.

The minister recently returned from a week's visit to British Columbia. I think his consultation is an indication that he is willing to listen to the UFAWU, the trawlers, processors, native groups and others in British Columbia. That is the process that will have to go on regarding fees and the establishment of berthage charges is concerned.

As I have said, I am pleased to support this legislation. It is rational. It has been on the books for two or three years awaiting third reading. I am surprised that some opponents of the legislation have suggested that we are rushing into it. If a span of two or three years is rushing into a situation, I would hate to see what would happen if we actually passed legislation within a month. It is funny, but people in Canada say one of two things. If they are in favour of a piece of legislation, they say we should get it through and quit dragging our feet. If we rush to deal with it, we are accused of ramrodding it through.

If a piece of legislation has been before this House for two or three years, I do not accept the statement that those in the fishing industry have not had an opportunity to make their views known. I suggest that anyone interested in this legislation has had ample opportunity to come before this House and make any representations that they wish.

The hon. member who spoke before me said that invitations were not sent out. Surely it is not the role of parliament to send out invitations asking every Canadian if he wishes to appear before a standing committee. Most fishing industry representatives keep a very close watch on what is happening in the House of Commons with regard to legislation that affects their industry. I suspect the reason why there was not a great deal of representation to the committee was that, by and large, the industry was in favour of it. I do not think the fact that one or two groups have expressed the desire to halt the legislation at this point will find total agreement across Canada, from one coast to the other.

[Mr. Anderson.]

For this reason, I am very pleased to support this legislation and congratulate the minister for having brought it before the House.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to use this occasion to bring to the attention of the minister some problems peculiar to the fishermen of Glace Bay in my constituency. I want to deal with the concept of management and control that was introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). This was referred to in another way by the last speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). The second concept I want to speak on in relation to this bill and the problem in my area is the question of consultation.

Very recently the question of a slipway and repair shed for Glace Bay harbour was finally solved. Agreement has been reached with the small craft harbours branch, which got Treasury Board to move on this federal labour intensive project and received their money from them.

When the order was put in for the material required for the slipway, they ordered treated lumber. Untreated lumber was received and it cannot be used, and the fishermen are rather worked up about this. They were kept waiting many months for the slipway; Treasury Board was very slow in giving approval. Now that Treasury Board has finally approved the FLIP money, the material to build the slipway must be sent back because it is untreated.

The fishermen are very concerned about the question of management and control. They have already brought this to the attention of the small craft harbour officials. I understood the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to say that through this bill there is the possibility of putting controls on piers, harbours and so on, under such groups as fishermen's associations, co-operatives—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It does not say that.

Mr. Hogan: That is a question I am asking. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni seemed to suggest that. What we in Glace Bay want is control of that skidway under the fishermen's association, something similar to what the co-op has in Cheticamp. It is true they have a marine railway.

The question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster regarding the public versus the private sector is relevant to the situation in Glace Bay. We were told by an official of the small craft harbours branch that because there is a privately owned marine railway in Sydney, the fishermen from Glace Bay must use that. I can swear to you, Mr. Minister, that one fisherman in Glace Bay paid $8,500 to use that private marine railway in Sydney.

Given the income situation of inshore fishermen on the whole of the east coast, particularly in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, this is inequitable. The only way to correct it is to allow the fishermen to manage that slipway and repair shed once it is completed. There will have to be a fee structure for use, and agreement from those who do not belong to the fishermen's association.

On my last journey back to my constituency some two weeks ago, I met with the fishermen. They informed me that the money being used to build that slipway and repair shed would be wasted unless they could control and manage it; otherwise, it would end up in a shambles. I am inclined to agree with them. I would ask the minister if he would consider this and get an expression in writing to this fishermen's association through the head of the small craft and harbours branch. Of course, the rules and regulations would have to be drawn up by the fishermen's association and by members of the Department of Fisheries. There will be some things that the department with the local area management will want to straighten out, but there is no problem there. However, the direct management of that slipway and repair shed must be put in the hands of the local fishermen's association; otherwise, having listened to the fishermen and being inclined to agree with them, the department might just as well not build it at all.

This has little to do with management and moorage fees, because in my particular part of the world this question has not been brought to my attention as being a major problem. One thing that is very clear when you come into this House at first is the significant differences between west coast and east coast fishing.

I take exception to what was said by one member speaking for the Conservative side today. He expressed the opinion, as I understood him, and I hope I am not misinterpreting him, that west coast fishermen, or a lot of them, are much worse off than Atlantic fishermen. If that is true, and we would have to look up the income figures to check it, then God help those fishermen on the west coast because they must be in one hell of a desperate situation. The inshore fishermen in the Atlantic region, and the minister knows about this, by and large are among the most poor of the working poor in Canada. If it were not for unemployment insurance and other things they receive they would be in even worse shape.

I say these things knowing, as those of us who are in any way connected with fisheries know, that this minister has done his best in the short period of time he has been in office to make up for the failures of this government vis-à-vis the inshore fishermen which have taken place for at least 15 years. That minister will admit, in all humility, that there is still a very, very long way to go.

Let me come back to the principle of management remaining with the fisheries associations. This association in the Glace Bay area must be given control, otherwise the minister might as well cut out the spending now because it will be waste of money to build that slipway and repair shed. We will have to enter into a consideration of such things as rules and regulations, and I as a member of parliament will listen, as I am sure will Mr. Bagnell who is in charge of the area; but we agree that the final approval of these rules and regulations will have to be made by the fisheries department, whether it is through the small craft and harbours branch or somebody else designated by the minister.

As far as consultation is concerned, I know the minister recently spent a week in British Columbia consulting the people there, but that is a very large area. He also spent a considerable amount of time in the Atlantic region in those areas more heavily dependent upon the fishing industry than is my region. As most members know, even if they go to sleep when I get to my feet, most of my riding is made up of miners, with about 25 per cent of the work force employed by the Sydney steel plant in my riding and a smaller percentage of fishermen and loggers. Although it is a small percentage, it is a very important segment.

Let us compare Cape Breton on the east coast with the metropolitan area of Halifax in respect of what has happened with the inshore fisheries. It seems obvious that the people in the department, particularly in the small craft harbours branch, were convinced that fisheries should be written off in the area as far as potential is concerned. I have talked about this matter with Devco as well, particularly regarding inshore fishing. It is one thing to let inshore fishing gradually die out in an area within a 50 or 60 miles radius from Halifax because Halifax has mushroomed in growth. There is also a special problem there now regarding ship repairing by Hawker Siddeley. But that is another concern. I suggest that anything Hawker Siddeley has touched in the maritime provinces has ultimately turned to lead anyway. That company has continually been propped up through subsidies, and so on. The government has given them substantial subsidies in Cape Breton, yet the company walked off and left us high and dry. The government then had to take up what cudgels there were left, along with the social problems and so on. I do not think it did a good job in that regard, although I appreciate the enormous effort it has recently made in respect of the coal industry. However, most of the time the government is darn reluctant to accept the notion that you have to make some kind of plans, especially in regions where there are only one or two other industries. Planning before hand is replaced by reactive planning.

Let me return to this notion of comparing the area around Sydney with that of metropolitan Halifax. Sydney is essentially the large population area of Cape Breton. I am speaking of the region close to Sydney, Glace Bay, Donkin and other such areas where the fishing industry has died or is dying. Because in addition to the seasonally unemployed in fishing there is average unemployment of 20 per cent to 25 per cent in the other sectors. Because of the growth in the metropolitan Halifax area and what has been done there for Halifax and Dartmouth through DREE and other programs, you can disregard the people who have been involved in inshore fishing for a long period of time. However, to do that in eastern Nova Scotia would create absolute catastrophe, because all you are doing is perpetuating a bad situation, and some government or combination of governments will eventually have to spend a lot of money on welfare and other schemes. The fact is there is no metropolitan growth area there.

It is terribly important to the fishermen in the area to have management and control of such things as slipways in their areas, although they have been considered as not having as much potential in the inshore fisheries as perhaps in other areas of Nova Scotia. Obviously they have pretty nearly been dependent exclusively on the fishing industry, and when they are offered such things by the government in the way of help to the fishing industry they feel such assistance should be put under their control and management, although they agree that regulations and rules must be established and approved of by the Department of Fisheries. I see Mr. Hall up in the gallery there and I am sure he will bring this to the attention of members of the small craft harbours branch.

In addition to the management and consultation questions—and I am repeating myself now and probably rambling a bit—the minister has been down into my area for the purpose of consultation. He came down at the request of the Sydney industrial board of trade. The unfortunate thing is that while the sponsors were well-intentioned, they do not know the fishermen very well. The department was also well intentioned, but the result was that the minister received only a small representation from the fishing areas.

These fishermen want the minister to come back to that area. They have a lot of questions to ask him. Inshore fishermen have a great deal of respect for this minister as compared to the minister whose place he took. This minister has taken an unequivocal stand in respect of inshore fishermen as opposed to offshore fishing which we know is also important. They want him back to explain the philosophy he expounded in Yarmouth. They want him to explain how this philosophy is to be turned into policy in respect of inshore fishing. They are convinced now that the minister is for them, but they also know there is a strong group in the Nova Scotia government area that wants to place most of the emphasis and spend most of the money on offshore fisheries, with very little emphasis being placed on the inshore fisheries.

● (1642)

Mr. Alphonse Bergeron, who is the son of a fisherman in my area, lives at 3 Park Street, Sydney, Nova Scotia. He reminded me that the "Fishing News International" of October 1977 reported that according to Dr. Dan Reid, who is the minister of fisheries for Nova Scotia, his department wanted $135 million to be spent on nine freezer trawlers; $600 million to be spent on 125 new trawlers; and $140 million to be spent to replace old scallop draggers. In other words, $875 million would be spent in Nova Scotia alone. There was no mention of inshore fishermen in that article at all. Although Dr. Reid is a very likeable man, he is being dictated to because of the power of the Nickerson interests in the economy of Nova Scotia and its government, which power results from the recent purchase of the controlling shares of National Sea Products and even though many of us feel this will end up in a monopolization of the industry.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Continually I have requested of the past minister of consumer and corporate affairs, as well as of the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), that Mr. Nickerson and Mr. Morrow appear before a committee dealing with the anti-combines legislation. Because of the philosophy which has been expressed already by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), I am sure he will make sure this monopoly will not take place. There are many questions which need to be asked in that regard. The fishermen have many questions they want answered, some of which will concern lobster licensing and how the general policy will be protective of inshore fishermen. I am sure it is possible for the minister to meet with 100 to 150 fishermen in the eastern Nova Scotia area whom we could attract in order to discuss these and other problems which they face. I appeal to Mr. Hall, who is in the gallery, and I hope the minister will take note of what I am saying.

In conclusion, let me repeat that the Glace Bay development and the approved projects which will be built there will be of no use unless the fishermen's association has management and control of that slipway and that shed.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make with respect to the bill before the House. I welcome the opportunity it affords those of us who come from provinces and constituencies where the fishing industry is an important factor. It provides us with an opportunity to have some input into the fisheries policy in an attempt to improve legislation. Of course, that is the raison d'être behind this kind of parliamentary debate.

Notwithstanding the fact that this bill has been around for some considerable time, I must say I read the minister's speech which he presented in the House last night very carefully and could find nothing in it to reassure me there would be no additional financial burden imposed upon Canadian fishermen at this time. As reported at page 2414 of Hansard, the minister said the following:

> However, let me assure the House that no decision has been made in respect of the details of a new fee structure. Fishermen are not going to wake up with the passage of this legislation to find they have to pay the federal government "X" number of dollars.

As the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) said so eloquently, we may wake up to find that the hon. member opposite is no longer with us and has gone on to what he considers to be greener pastures. Consequently, that assurance is no longer valid. As long as the minister is in his post, he can be held to his word. With the transpiration of events, there is every indication he will accept the siren call from New Brunswick and leave us for the Liberal leadership of that province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I wish him godspeed and every happiness. I cannot wish him success because I know he cannot achieve that, even if I wish it. I believe the minister is leaving, which makes it incumbent upon us to do what we can to get him to change his mind on this bill. That is why the hon. member for South Shore indicated that our party cannot support this bill at this time.

The bill provides us with an excellent opportunity to speak on fisheries and fishery policy generally. I regret very much the minister did not seize this opportunity in his speech last night, because a lot of fish have been caught and a lot of water has flowed in the northwest Atlantic and Pacific since the introduction of this bill. Many important changes are taking place in this industry, the oldest of Canada's industries. They are welcome changes brought about as a result of the unilateral declaration and imposition of the 200-mile economic zone, which was preceded by various bilateral agreements with a number of countries that have enjoyed ancient, traditional fishing rights in some of the areas now covered by that zone.

It has been indicated that it will take anywhere from five years to ten years to build up the stocks in order to repair the damage which was done as a result of the uncontrolled foreign exploitation that took place in our fishing grounds. It will be necessary to take advantage of that period of time in order to put in place policies which will have long term effects and which will provide Canadians with a certain degree of confidence that has heretofore been missing in this industry. It should be the kind of confidence men and women can build their futures upon and be reasonably assured of a good living. The Atlantic Canada fishing industry has a potential of providing our people with a good way of living and with a good income. Certainly this holds true in the case of Newfoundland, which is currently experiencing economic difficulties that are prevalent across the country. When there is an economic crisis in Canada, it becomes all that much more severe in Atlantic Canada which already faces the highest unemployment rate in our country.

A number of our people who no longer have any confidence in fly-by-night industrial ventures—and rightly so when you look at the record of some of these ventures—are now beginning to look to the fishing industry because they believe that there is a future in the fishery. They know that with our management of the stock we can now control the industry to the point where we can maximize the exploitation of it for the benefit of our own people, which has not been the case heretofore.

In the past, it is true to say, the fishing industry has been a Cinderella of the Canadian government. We have had a number of ministers who preceded the hon. gentleman who now has the responsibility of the fisheries portfolio, earnest, sincere, dedicated people, whose influence on their colleagues in cabinet, unfortunately for the fishing industry, has been minimal. Consequently, matters relating to the fisheries were always given a very low priority. But now I hope that is changing, and I suspect a symptom of that change in attitude by the House is the attention that has been paid to this bill.

In normal times a bill of this nature brought before the House would only receive perfunctory attention. It would be passed through all phases of the parliamentary process quite quickly. But not so today because we all sense there is something happening. In fact, we know there is something happening. We know there are big things in store, and therefore this debate provides us with the first opportunity we have to discuss matters relating to the fishery.

As far as the industry in Newfoundland is concerned, I have stated—and I firmly believe, and the government of Newfoundland believes—that the fishing industry has the potential to provide our people with a good livelihood, to provide excellent job and business opportunities for our people, if we go about it the right way. But regrettably, all is not as it should be. What I call a jurisdictional debate has developed between the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) and his counterpart in the government of Newfoundland, to the detriment of the industry. I want to be as objective as I can. The gentleman who holds the responsibility for the fisheries portfolio in Newfoundland is a former member of the House and I believe—and I feel in all fairness that the minister opposite will agree with me—that he is certainly one of the best fisheries ministers that Newfoundland has ever had, if not the best. He has brought to the portfolio a dedication and a concern that has all too often been missing in the past.

Out of that concern and dedication, in consultation with his counterpart in the province of Nova Scotia—because essentially when we speak of the groundfish industry in the Atlantic provinces we are primarily talking about Newfoundland and Nova Scotia—he has put together a fisheries development program. The minister complained that he has not even seen the program, that the program had never been presented to him. I find that hard to believe because I suspect, indeed I know, that the minister's officials had a great deal of input in the preparation of that program. Civil servants in the provincial and federal jurisdictions in this field of activity have worked and continue to work very closely together, and rightly so. The minister knew what was in the program, but he seemed to want to go his own separate way.

What we on this side of the House would like to see implemented is the philosophy expounded by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), who issued a major statement on fisheries on January 26 in the form of a press release and an excellent paper, with most of which I find myself in total agreement. He said:

> It is important, even essential, that fishermen, the fish trade, governments and Newfoundlanders generally, work together co-operatively to make the most of this new chance because, the odds are, that if we fail this time, that chance won't come again.

I say Amen to that statement. I believe that the situation is improving. I believe that there is emerging from the dispute to which I have referred a new climate of co-operation. I give a lot of the credit for this to the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who represents one of the important fishing constituencies in this country. He initiated, with the support of his colleague the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), a symposium on the fisheries at Marystown, and from that I think has emerged a new spirit of co-operation.

I believe there will now be very close co-operation by the two levels of government, certainly in so far as the fisheries development is concerned in the province of Newfoundland, because there are problems that have to be tackled. One of them is the whole question of the utilization of the resource. At present it is underutilized. Both our present plant capacity and our trawler capacity are underutilized, and that is a situation which we must turn around.

Then there is the question—I am sure this is a question which is very dear to the minister's heart, and I do not say that sarcastically because I know it is and I applaud him for it—of inshore fisheries. Up to the extension of our jurisdiction, the inshore fishery had a very limited future because the fish were not coming in. They were not coming in because they were being caught by foreigners. It is as simple as that. Now we have a chance to control that situation, and an opportunity to develop a viable inshore industry so that a man can engage in the fishing industry with very little investment in terms of facilities, and so on, if he utilizes smaller boats and if he has some kind of assurance that there will be proper holding facilities for his catch until the plants are able to absorb it. In that lies the greatest opportunity for expansion, and not only for expansion but for the preservation of what the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo and the president of the Newfoundland Fish Food and Allied Workers' Union has called Newfoundland's social structure. It is an opportunity for the preservation of a way of life that has existed in our province for over 400 years, the very reason for the existence of Newfoundland in the first place.

I hope that we can provide these fishermen with incentives and not put road blocks in their way. I consider this bill to be a potential road block. It is another part of the user-pay concept of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). We are liable to wake up tomorrow and find the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has become the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in the province of New Brunswick, and lo and behold there it is!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Don't hold your breath!

Mr. McGrath: I believe we should be, at this critical stage in our fisheries development, providing incentives to our people to involve themselves in the inshore fishery. Here I want to refer—and I regret very much having to bring this partisan note in here—to the minister's pork barrel philosophy in approaching the whole business of allocation of funds to small craft harbours. I can cite my constituency as living proof that this pork barrel approach to the allocation of funds for wharves, breakwaters and marine facilities still exists and in fact is thriving under the administration of the present minister. Notwithstanding its urban nature, my constituency, as the minister knows, is a very important fish producing constituency. There are a number of small harbours adjacent to the city of St. John's which are the headquarters for a number of inshore and mid-shore fishermen. Yet try as we may, we are unable to get the government to give any priority to repairs and construction of new facilities in the constituency of St. John's East. I suspect the same probably holds true in the riding of St. John's West.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Just let me give an example by way of illustration. Between Christmas and New Year's we had an unusual storm. Even the oldtimers could not remember anything to come close to it in terms of ferocity and severity. We suspect there was some kind of subterranean upheaval. It almost caused a tidal wave. It was devastating and did a tremendous amount of damage in the southeast part of Newfoundland.

I met with fishermen from several important fishing communities in my constituency where damage had been extensive, and together with the fishermen's union, the mayor, provincial officials and officials from the minister's department we came to the conclusion that there was a serious problem. In order to ensure that it would be addressed expeditiously and urgently we sent a telex to the minister outlining the extent of the damage, requesting immediate attention to it and calling upon the minister to get on with the business of providing additional facilities. In this case we wanted breakwaters to ensure that this kind of storm damage would never recur; in other words, to ensure that we would not be spending good money after bad.

I must say that the minister's response was sympathetic. I talked to his officials, and I received a letter from the minister concerning the villages of Torbay and Flat Rock. It is here that we get into the pork barrel philosophy of the minister. As a courtesy to me as a member of parliament surely the minister could have given me the opportunity of telling these people that the damage would be repaired and that the Department of Public Works had been instructed to investigate the possibility of putting in breakwaters. But no, letters arrived three days after the minister's announcement appeared in the St. John's press. That is a discourtesy.

We have come to expect that because the minister exemplifies and epitomizes the pork barrel approach, and I say that is regrettable. The industry is too important and too critical for us to resurrect that ancient and outmoded approach to the building of marine works and the repairing of existing facilities. The fishermen in my constituency have just as much right to expect favourable consideration as the fishermen in a constituency represented by a Liberal, and that has not always been the case.

Let us examine the votes for small craft harbours. In 1973-74 the total was $2.9 million for the province of Newfoundland. Last night the minister referred to the 2,000 harbours and wharves which are under his jurisdiction, many of them in dire need of repair when he took them over in 1973. Most of these harbours, wharves and breakwaters are in the province of Newfoundland because of the extent of our coastline, and yet in 1973-74 the total vote was $2.9 million for Newfoundland.

The figure improved in 1974-75. It went up to $6.8 million. In 1975-76 the figure went down to $4.3 million. When we were going through a period of austerity in government spending, as pointed out by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), small craft harbours were the first to come under the knife. That is a matter of considerable regret because the small craft harbours division of the department had been underfunded for a considerable time anyway.

There was some improvement in 1976-77. The figure jumped up to $11.5 million. A very substantial portion of that, almost three quarters of it, was funds provided under the Canada Works program. That may seem logical and sensible on the surface, but in my view it represents something totally reprehensible. The minister used the Canada Works program as a means of getting cheap labour because he knew that under the program you are allowed to pay only the prevailing provincial minimum wage plus $15 which, in the case of Newfoundland, amounted to $115 per week.

An example of the problems that caused could be found at one harbour in my constituency in the town of Holyrood where there was substantial development going on, largely funded by Canada Works and with a great deal of input by the provincial government. The minister decided, and rightly so, that here was a suitable client to receive money under the marina policy of the department. It was decided that under the marina policy this project would be supported. The project was the building of a basin for a very impressive yacht club, the only one in that part of the province. It was decided to support the financing of the construction of a breakwater. So the breakwater was constructed under the marina policy. There was a contract for the hiring of workers at $6 an hour, while their neighbours employed by Canada Works who were doing the same job were getting $2.50 an hour. How totally unfair! These people could not understand what was going on, and I had to explain to them that under the regulations imposed under this program the government could pay them only the minimum wage, plus $15.

This other project came under another policy, and the contractor had to pay prevailing rates. Quite naturally, those people did not know what I was talking about, and I do not blame them, because it did not make any sense. I know of wharves throughout my constituency and throughout Newfoundland which are utilizing the cheap labour concept of Canada Works to do badly needed and long overdue repairs. That is a totally reprehensible approach to what is essentially an urgent problem. It is also the wrong way to utilize the Canada Works program, which was never intended to be utilized in that way.

I had to go along with it, and I have gone along with it. We all have because we have had no choice. If there is a wharf in a constituency which is badly in need of repairs and which the department has refused to repair because of budgetary considerations, I have to suggest an application for a grant under the Canada Works program be made, and the small craft harbours division of the Department of Fisheries supports the project and provides materials. On the surface that seems like a good idea. Canada Works supplies $100,000 for labour at $2.50 an hour where normally the labour would cost twice that amount. The Department of Fisheries supplies the materials, which might amount to another $20,000 or $30,000. Naturally, advantage has to be taken of this. There is no choice. It is Hobson's choice. However, I submit that this is misusing the intent of the Canada Works program, and it represents what I consider to be the frustration of the minister's officials in recognizing the need which is there but in not having the wherewithal to do anything about it. The minister does not seem to have the necessary clout with Treasury Board to get the funds to put these projects in place.

There is also the policy, which I hope will be changed, of the "chicken and egg" concept. The department will turn down a request for extension of a wharf because, on the basis of their survey, not enough fish are being landed or there is no commercial fishing activity that would justify the expenditure. How can there be when the facility is not there in the first place? Which comes first—increased fish landings or improved facilities to accommodate such landings? I hope the "chicken and egg" concept will change within the scope of the new opportunities we now have. We have a unique and golden opportunity to develop this industry as a viable and renewable one which will provide permanent jobs for as far ahead as man can see. The demand for protein will continue and will grow as the population of the world increases.

The change of attitude has to start with the minister. I know that is difficult for him, representing as he does the town of Shediac. We know the hanky-panky that went on between Shediac and Moncton. It will be difficult for the minister to change but change he must. Knowing the rules of the game as I do and having been around politics for so long, if the minister were to tell me he will spend $100,000 in my constituency, I would not make a big deal of it. People know there is a Liberal government in Ottawa, so if the minister extended that courtesy to me I would notify, as is my responsibility as their representative, the chairman of the fishermen's committee, the local of the fishermen's union, the mayor of the community concerned and the provincial member. Apparently that courtesy is not to be extended, however.

This industry is very important in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker. I have been to Iceland and I saw how they were able to develop their industry. I can appreciate the parallel between that country and Newfoundland. The fishing industry provides them with a standard of living higher than ours—probably fourth or fifth in the world and with practically zero unemployment.

That brings me to my next comment, Mr. Speaker, the question of changes necessary to the Fisheries Act because of the 200-mile limit. The time is long past for the minister to give serious consideration to changing the Fisheries Act in order to allow foreign trawlers and draggers the right to change their crews and to have minor repairs done in Canada. The reason for the prohibition is no longer relevant. The prohibition made a great deal of sense prior to the 200-mile limit because then we had to do whatever we could to discourage foreigners from raping those resources.

Now we have a degree of control within 200 miles. This is another advantage which we can maximize by allowing foreigners to change crews and have minor repairs done here. This would mean a great deal to the ports of St. John's, Sydney, Halifax and Saint John, New Brunswick. It would mean millions of dollars in new business and new jobs. It would mean utilizing the port of St. John's which is uniquely suited to be the service station of the North Atlantic.

The government must be sympathetic and provide proper haulout facilities. By that I mean providing a synchro-lift for the port of St. John's. We have a drydock there that is capable of expansion if we had a synchro-lift that would enable us to haul ships out of the water in order to repair their bottoms. The minister is nodding his head, Mr. Speaker. I know from what he said in the House today that active consideration is being given to this proposition. It is something that is long overdue.

Now I come to the area of foreign involvement and the question of joint ventures, Mr. Speaker. There is also the question of foreign draggers being licensed to land fish in Canada and the potential of transshipment in bond for foreigners. This has great possibilities for us. The question was taboo a short time ago but the situation has changed. There are now possibilities of working out some means of transshipment, whilst retaining control, which would provide jobs. At the moment we control the resource to a large extent. In the area outside the 200-mile limit we can exercise control through the ICNAF treaty if we go about it the right way and use the tremendous bargaining power we have as a lever. This matter was touched on by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). We could reach agreement, I am sure, for some degree of control beyond the 200-mile limit.

Of course, the 200-mile limit is just as artificial as the 12-mile limit or the three-mile limit. Had the anchovies of Peru swum for 400 miles then we would probably have a 400-mile limit. It was only because the precedent had been set by Peru to control the anchovy stock by extending their jurisdiction to 200 miles that we were able to get approval, notwithstanding the failure of the Law of the Sea Conference. We might get agreement to control beyond the 200-mile limit if we use the position of strength that we have as a bargaining lever.

We should be looking at the potential which exists not only for our ports but for our underutilized plant capacity in the Atlantic provinces, especially Newfoundland. That does not mean that we have to sell out to foreign companies. I share the minister's concern about the proposed takeover of the Ocean Harvester's plant by the subsidiary of Unilever, Nordzee. Here I find myself on the horns of a dilemma. I see immediate jobs on the one hand and a loss of potential on the other.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. Anderson) is rising on a point of order or to ask a question.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member regarding the Law of the Sea Conference, the 200-mile limit and various other matters but I question whether he is dealing with the bill before us, Bill C-2.

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for treating that spurious point of order with the silent contempt it deserved. I was saying that we are facing a dilemma in Newfoundland over the potential foreign takeover which is now quite properly the subject of review by the Foreign Investment Review Agency. On the one hand we see the immediate possibility of jobs for a depressed area where jobs are crucial, and on the other we see an opportunity for a company that had been there before, had pulled up stakes and left us high and dry, to come back and use a trawler capacity—which they are now unable to use—because of our extended jurisdiction. I think that sums up the position this company is in, as well as other west European companies. So we can get deals without selling out. But I say this to the minister, and through him to FIRA, that if in their determination this takeover is not to be permitted, they have to satisfy themselves that there is somebody else who is there who is going to move in and utilize this plant, because that plant's capacity is 50 per cent underutilized at the present time.

Northern stocks are crucial to the future of the inshore fishery on the northeast and southeast coast of Newfoundland. We have already bartered away unilaterally—and I say unilaterally without reference to the government of Newfoundland—hundreds of thousands of pounds of fish through bilateral agreements. I look at the figures for 1977—178,000 metric tons of codfish with a landed value of $59 million or an export value of $118,320,000. That represents jobs that may have been lost to us by allowing foreigners to fish for these quotas. Before we make any more deals with anybody there should be first of all consultation with the province that is to be directly affected. These are our resources and they are just as important to us in Newfoundland as the oil reserves of the tar sands in Alberta are to the Albertans. It is just as much our resource. It has a tremendous impact on our economic future.

I do not think the minister, notwithstanding the constitution or any right he may feel he has constitutionally in this respect, has the right, given the concept of co-operative federalism, to barter away our future in this way without reference to us. I could go down the list of all the other species; redfish or ocean perch, 55,000 metric tons bartered away in 1977 representing $9 million or an export value of $20 million. And so it goes.

The minister laughs. The minister knows what is happening. What has been happening is that I suspect that these quotas have been used as barter in making deals with other countries for other commodities.

Some hon. Members: Totally irresponsible.

Mr. McGrath: I believe it is happening, and in fact I know it is happening. It is happening in the case of wheat. They are bartering away our quotas for other commodity deals without reference to the province of Newfoundland or the province of Nova Scotia. I would say that is totally irresponsible. Is it any wonder that the minister has problems getting along with his counterparts in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. He can continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not very knowledgeable about the rules of the House. The hon. member has given a rambling speech full of damaging statistics in terms of the truth. Unless he is willing to put them into context, I will have to challenge him to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister knows that he has already contributed to the debate in moving his motion and he has no right of reply. There is no way, within the debate, that he can participate himself unless he receives consent to make an intervention.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to provide the minister with the statistical information I have put on the record. It was supplied to me by the Newfoundland government and I believe it to be accurate.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure you at the outset and all hon. members of the House that I will speak for as little time as I can in completing my remarks. I will not be nearly as lengthy or verbose as the previous speaker and I will try to deal with the subject matter.

I am dismayed and surprised that the debate on this bill is still carrying on at this stage in this House. This bill has been before us in one form or another for some two years now. We have all had adequate knowledge of it, we have all had a chance to debate it, and we have all had a chance to make recommendations and improve it. And now, two years later, the Conservative and the New Democratic opposition are blocking and delaying a bill which is thoroughly needed and for which the minister ought to be commended.

I am amazed that there is not a charge being led from the middle of the Conservative opposition congratulating the minister and supporting his bill. During most of this debate I do not seem to recall having seen those good Conservative members from the province of Ontario, who knew and know right now how important the need is in this country to build more harbours and recreational facilities for small boating in Canada. It is strange too that those members from Ontario in the New Democratic Party are not here leading a motion in support of this debate.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Why?

Mr. Young: I will answer the hon. member. His own leader, the representative from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), should be here supporting the minister because over the next 13 years in the area of Oshawa and Toronto there will be a need not to quadruple but to quintuple the number of berths for small boats in the Toronto area. The member for Oshawa-Whitby should be here commending the minister and getting on with the bill.

It is about time, Mr. Speaker, that some of those members who think they know what they are doing learn of the needs of sports fishermen, commercial fishermen and recreational boaters from the province of Ontario. I know that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) is here and if he really believes in his cause—and I know he agrees with me because we sat in committee together—he is going to get up and lead that charge from the Conservative ranks, support the minister and say: "Let us get on with this bill and get the job done."

I hope that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and some of the other members of the NDP might come into this House, because people are waiting to build marinas in Sault Ste. Marie and in northern Ontario. But where are they? They should be here supporting the bill.

We have had enough delay of this bill; we have been debating it for two years. This is a bill to promote federal-provincial planning and development of harbour facilities on a shared cost basis, to stimulate construction and local operation of water access facilities through shared cost programs, and to support marina developments by the private sector. These members of the opposition are blocking and delaying just the kind of program that we need to cure some of the harbour deficiencies in the province of Ontario and throughout Canada.

I confess to having been a thorn in the minister's side for the last couple of years. I have bugged him and I have cajoled him and I have said: "Let us go and spend more money". I am not totally happy with the amount that is being spent, but I am not going to block the best bill that he has brought forward to get the job done. Neither should the opposition members be doing that. That is shameful.

We have here a bill, Mr. Speaker, to establish and improve the administrative system for the management of our harbours and facilities, to appoint harbour managers, and to make it possible to better administer, organize and run our harbours, to create better safety provisions, and to help commercial fishermen, sports fishermen and the recreational boater—the little fellow whom the NDP say they normally support, the little fellow who just goes boating on the weekend.

An hon. Member: You are worrying about them?

Mr. Young: Yes, I am worrying about them.

An hon. Member: The bill shows it.

Mr. Young: Let me answer the hon. member right now. I do not want to be nasty but I am going to suggest that his tongue is kind of flapping like a hatch in a line squall right now. If he wants me to tell him a little bit about boating and some of the needs of recreational boaters in the province of Ontario, I can well do so. I would just like to point out to the hon. member, if he will hold that flapping tongue for a moment, that I have written articles concerning boating in national publications in this country. I have been published across the country.

• (1732)

If the hon. member would like me to teach him a little about boating, I would be glad to do so—and I know he comes from British Columbia. I would be glad to explain to him that we are going to need at least 20,000 berths in the Ontario area for recreational purposes in the next few years alone. I would be glad to explain to him that we have a $450 million sports fishing industry in Ontario and that people cannot get out to fish and use their boats, commercial or pleasure, because we do not have enough ramps and marinas.

An hon. member who spoke just a while ago said there had been pork-barrelling. Well, I have not seen any of it. I have been after the minister for three years to get a marina built in my riding so that "little people" like myself would not have to walk 200 or 300 feet into the lake to reach a boat tied up to a rock or to a mooring. People have to walk into the lake now and they do so from the moment the ice breaks up in the springtime to the day it forms in late fall.

While we are not entirely happy with what has been done, we commend the minister for at least starting on the job and increasing his budget by six or seven times in the last five years. All of us are waiting to get with this job. There are people in this province who want docks and wharves. Members of the Conservative party, members of the New Democratic Party and members of the Liberal party as well are waiting for docks and marinas to go in. Let us get on with the job. There should not be any more delay; there has already been too much. I see the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) is about to put the needle to some of his colleagues and say: "Quit messing around, let us do some of the things that are needed; let us support the minister, let us not block his way when he seeks to improve the bill; if we can do part of the work this year, that is great; next year let us do more."

I wax somewhat eloquent when I get into this subject; it is one I have been close to for a number of years. I have tried to work very hard to further the education of some of my fellow members so that they could understand the plight of the small craft boating people and industry in this country. Hon. members talk about inequities in the small boating industry. If there is anyone who can claim to be the victim of inequity he would be the Minister of State (Small Business), (Mr. Abbott). Hon. members talk about fees. A full 40 per cent of all wharfage charges in this country come from people in the riding of the Minister of State (Small Business), subsidizing a lot of boating in the rest of the country. We in Ontario are not crying the blues. We are willing to pay our way. As a matter of fact we are doing a great deal to subsidize some of the work being done in other parts of the country. But our economy in Ontario is based on recreation and the provision of manufactured goods.

Mr. Johnston: And heavy industry.

Mr. Young: And heavy industry, yes. We depend on people who create jobs through the building of small boats that some of you people on the coast sail on the ocean waters.

Mr. Johnston: You haven't got a monopoly.

Mr. Young: We build some of the best boats in this country right in my riding as well as right next to it. We have gained worldwide recognition for building some of the finest sailing boats.

Mr. Johnston: Do you think we don't?

Mr. Young: Yes, you do. I am not disputing that. You were challenging me.

Part of the economy of Ontario which goes to support those who are less fortunate in this country comes from recreational boating and the sports fishing industry. We have to do something to keep that industry growing and improving. We need a bill such as the one before us. We need the development of recreational, small boat harbours in this country. We should stop stonewalling and putting roadblocks in the way of the minister. Let us get on with the debate. Let us get it over with and let us get on with this part of the job. If there is more to do, we can come back and do the rest of it later.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the concerns advanced by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) who waxed eloquently for a few minutes. It was obvious to me that we were hearing an expression of serious concern from Ontario but very little concern for the east coast. In fact, I failed to hear any reference to the east coast or to the west coast. That same concern was voiced in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry when the bill was before it; we heard a ten-minute eulogy and then a five-minute speech regarding the need for marinas in Niagara Falls. Yet, in terms of taxable dollars, the hon. member for Niagara Falls knows full well that his constituency gets more than its fair share.

To use the excuse that this bill has been before the House for debate for two years is spurious, and the hon. member should know better than to say so. It has not been before the House for two years. Last night the government thought that once again it might just be able to catch the opposition off guard so it tried to sneak it in. They did so. But the government has never yet caught the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) off guard, and they have never yet caught the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) off guard. Nor will they.

Mr. Young: Bunkum!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Niagara Falls has anything to add which makes any sense, I am prepared to let him stand and speak again; otherwise it would be helpful if he would keep his mouth shut. I did not interject while he was attempting to make his point, even though he failed to succeed. I say again, if the hon. member wishes to interject—

Mr. Young: The opportunity has been offered. I did refer to both coasts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is not for the hon. member for Kootenay West to decide who is to have the floor. The hon. member can speak in due time. If the hon. member for Kootenay West yields to someone else, he also loses his turn.

Mr. Brisco: I thank you for your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I certainly would not want to lose my opportunity to speak.

It should also be drawn to the attention of the hon. member for Niagara Falls, that in his desire to increase the marina facilities in Niagara Falls—it is a genuine concern and he is truly representing the concern of his riding in that context—he failed to mention that under the scheme of things he proposed, which certainly involves no small expenditure, there has to be some involvement in spending by the provincial government and the municipal authorities as well. Surely, the taxpayers of Canada should not be obliged to carry the can for the marinas which the hon. member for Niagara Falls wants in his riding without some cost-sharing—cost-sharing by the boat owners themselves.

Mr. Young: That is exactly what the legislation does.

Mr. Brisco: I am thoroughly familiar with the legislation. I have sat on the committee with the hon. member for Niagara Falls and I have studied the bill from cover to cover. He clearly fails to understand that, in his representations to the minister a few moments ago, he totally neglected, in his desire to extend the marina facilities in his constituency, to indicate that there should be provincial and municipal involvement.

● (1742)

Let us get to the other inequities. If members opposite feel there are inequities, how do members on the opposition side feel about it? The member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) talked of obstructionism and delay. This bill was introduced last night. Is it obstructionism that we would seek to debate the bill for one or two days? If in the view of that member bills should be brought in and passed without debate, we have lost the true intent of parliament.

I recall other inequities with regard to the boating industry that were brought in by this government. I recall the spurious argument being introduced that, as an energy saving device, the government was going to tax certain boat motors over and above a certain size, beginning at a certain date, provided those motors were purchased from that date forward. There was no mention of the motors that were popping around the bays prior to that date. Those motors were exempt. There must have been some special designation that implied they did not consume the gasoline that the more recent motors consumed. What a ridiculous type of excuse that this government made on the basis of a very shallow argument.

Again to satisfy the hon. member for Niagara Falls, I am sure there are members here who agree that there is much within the content of Bill C-2 that is favourable. It is unusual to hear members on both sides of the House make statements which are clearly in favour of the minister. That rarely happens. It is a reflection of the manner in which the minister has handled his post that members from both sides of the House recognize his energies. That is not to say that improvements cannot be made. It is not to say that the minister, engrained in the Liberal tradition of confrontation with the provinces and the Liberal tradition of pork barrelling, is not a victim of those failures.

I recall after first being elected being in the small community of Procter, where there was a federal government wharf that was in a disastrous state of repair. One of the first things drawn to my attention after the election was the fact that two ladies who walked out on to this wharf in Kootenay Lake stepped on a plank and nearly ended up in the water underneath the wharf because the plank was rotten.

I was asked what I was going to do about this, and I wrote a letter to the Department of Transport. After a very substantial delay I received a response to the effect that the matter belonged more appropriately with the Department of Public Works, so I wrote a letter to the minister. Because the delay was so long, I had the opportunity to slip into a standing committee meeting involving that particular minister. I described the circumstances and asked what he was going to do about the Procter wharf.

Some weeks later I received a letter indicating that this was more appropriately the responsibility of the Department of Transport. I then wrote back to the Department of Transport, pointing out the difference of opinion and suggesting they were playing games with me and my constituents. I finally discovered the responsibility for the wharf had been taken over by small craft harbours branch of the Department of the Environment. That was in 1974.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And 1975.

Mr. Brisco: In 1974, 1975, 1976, ad nauseam. Two days ago, Canada Works and small craft harbours got together and began construction of a new wharf.

In the interim the people of Procter were trying to use this facility. One afternoon, when the people were at work, along came a tugboat, the wharf was sawed in half with a power saw and half of it towed up Kootenay Lake. Who knows the cost of that? It was used as a breakwater at Johnsons Landing. The next day when the people went down to the wharf, half of it was missing, small craft harbours people did not know about it. Public Works did, but they are no longer involved. How ridiculous!

An hon. Member: Who owned the chain saw?

Mr. Brisco: I think it was a government subsidy.

I hope this bill will provide some cohesive policy in terms of the maintenance of facilities. Looking at the wharf and ramp facilities put in by the federal government in my constituency, it seems to have been the policy to allow these facilities to deteriorate to the point where they must be declared abandoned structures, dangerous to the public and marked "Please keep off". It would be less costly to the taxpayer to provide proper maintenance. They are all in fresh water. They are not subject to the dry rot and other erosions that occur in salt water, yet they have been allowed to deteriorate and degenerate.

There are no launching facilities on magnificent Kootenay Lake from the city of Nelson right through to the top end of the lake. Kaslo, which has its own little harbour and marina, has a private facility. The people of Kaslo and Kootenay West have been urging that the wharf be upgraded so that they can use it. The answer is: (a) the wharf has deteriorated to the stage where it is dangerous for public use; (b) too costly to repair; (c) too costly to replace; and (d) to remove the structure and put in place an earth filled structure is too costly.

We are faced with a struggle with the British Columbia government for a release of other land in that harbour to try and put in a facility for boat launching for public use on the west side of Kootenay Lake from Nelson to the head end of the lake.

Robson has the same problem. Fortunately there is a good wharf there which has been improved and is being maintained in a state of repair by the Department of the Environment. Unfortunately, there is a breakdown in communications and a failure of the two governments to get their act together. The wharf provides access to Arrow Lake below the Keenleyside dam, that structure put in under the Columbia River treaty. It is not cleared of snow in the winter. It would take a department of highways truck about ten minutes to clear that wharf. However, they do not do that. As a result, no one can use it.

The same situation applies in the town of Nakusp, where the wharf has been allowed to deteriorate. When it gets into a shabby state because of the terrific rise and fall of Arrow Lake, due to the Columbia River and B.C. Hydro, the village is expected to handle the movement of that wharf facility when the water is low, to allow the dockage points to be moved out, and to have them brought in when the water is high. Finally, it looks as though B.C. Hydro is back in the act. Quite possibly with the efforts of the community of Nakusp and surrounding communities B.C. Hydro will now move and put in appropriate wharf facilities. Whether or not small craft harbours or Canada Works will join them remains to be seen. There is, however, an application that will shortly go before the minister, and that application is from the city of Nelson.

As I have already remarked, there are no boat launching facilities on Kootenay Lake for public use from Nelson to the north end of the lake, a distance of some 75 or 80 miles. There are two or three private marinas that are well maintained, but the city of Nelson has a very old marina, very old, indeed. In its efforts to improve its foreshore Nelson now proposes to develop a marina on the foreshore site at the city of Nelson. That project will probably cost in the area of $230,000. Already the city has either approached or very shortly will approach the provincial authorities for assistance. On its behalf it would be my intention to approach small craft harbours and Canada Works. Hopefully we can see that project go ahead for the betterment of a community which exists on a lake but has no adequate or proper wharf facilities.

It should also be mentioned in the context of British Columbia, and certainly in the context of Kootenay West, that the co-operation I have received from officials of small craft harbours based in Vancouver has been very good. I should like to say I enjoy the sense of rapport which seems to have developed between myself and Mr. Warren Parkinson. His co-operation has on more than one occasion been of some benefit to the people of Kootenay West.

At the present time the provision of wharf, ramp or marina facilities is important to the boating public on that major body of water, Kootenay Lake. This is also important on the Arrow lakes, but there is less traffic there. Kootenay Lake enjoys a great deal of traffic both Canadian and American.

I might point out that recently the RCMP moved in in respect of these American boats tied up at certain marinas in my riding. These boats apparently had come through customs without proper declaration as to why they were remaining in Canada. They have been subsequently seized.

It might have been of some benefit to Canada-U.S. relations if these people had been formally informed or notified prior to seizure, giving them the opportunity of either declaring they had major repairs to be done on their boats or getting the boats out of the country. These people are now faced with a Canadian assessment and double taxation before they can take their boats back to the United States. This will amount to a great deal of money, and I suggest it makes about as much sense as the $8-tax this government recently put on American citizens flying into Canada or travelling on flights originating in Canada. That has to be the chippiest piece of legislation I have seen for a long time, but par for the course for this government.

I have remarked about the boating facilities on Kootenay Lake. I would like to be able to favourably remark on the fishing facilities as well. Unfortunately we are faced with another section of the Columbia River treaty; that final portion called the Kootenay River diversion. There is some question as to what impact that diversion will have on the Kootenay Lake fishery.

The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) has provided experts in their fields, such as limnologists, to go into the Kootenay Lake area and carry out a careful study and analysis of the water quality of that lake. I wrote to the minister and asked him to provide me with a preliminary report on the water quality studies done by officials of his department—these experts whose qualifications I do not question. The Kootenay River diversion project is boiling and coming to a head. Public concern is really very serious. What did the minister say to me in his reply? One of the most entertaining statements by the minister, which reflects Liberal thinking, was that he was not in a position to provide me with these figures, statistics and information at this time but would be pleased to do so in 1979.

The minister questions whether it was him who said that. Indeed, it was. The minister presupposes that he is going to be the minister of this department in 1979, and he also presupposes, which is even worse, that he will even be a minister in 1979. I suggest that is very much open to question and doubt.

This demonstrates the point that has been expressed by members of the opposition, that while the minister may be very sincere in what he says about the regulations and his dealings with the fishermen on the east and west coasts regarding the sort of fees that will be levied by the wharfingers, what guarantee do we have that the minister will be in place when those fees are established?

The minister is already in difficulty in respect of another piece of legislation. He declared that we had nothing to fear because he was in control. I refer to Bill C-38 which is far from settled. The minister knows that the province of British Columbia has not yet approved Bill C-38 or accepted its context. The minister knows that officials from various hydro projects across Canada where fisheries are involved have been to Ottawa expressing to his officials their concern over certain provisions of that bill which in effect could shut them down overnight. I suggest Ontario would have the biggest brown-out in its history.

The minister knows that the forest industry is far from satisfied. He knows also that the mining industry is far from satisfied and that there are other provinces in addition to British Columbia which have not yet accepted the legislation contained in Bill C-38.

I will grant the minister one victory. Let me compliment him on the stand he took with reference to the McGregor diversion. Clearly the province of British Columbia or, more appropriately, British Columbia Hydro, was fearful of the parasites in the water endemic to the Fraser moving into Arctic waterways, and there was no way to stop it. That was a major concern. The other major concern, spoken or unspoken, was that the federal government had expressed its very serious reservations about the McGregor diversion through the minister. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORAD—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON BRIEFING OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in view of the diametrically opposed views of the Prime Minister and General Hill, the Chief of Staff of NORAD, as to the role of NORAD in relation to satellite activity, and in view of the often repeated statements of the Prime Minister that he had been briefed fully as to NORAD activities during his visit to Colorado Springs over the Christmas recess, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions as to the briefing received by him at NORAD, other than a viewing of the movie "Star Wars" at the Bijou in Aspen.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BELL CANADA—INCREASE IN RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding an urgent and pressing matter. In view of the fact that Bell Canada since the beginning of 1970 has requested from the federal government six increases worth $477 million in annual income to the company, and has received approval for 87 per cent, or a total of $416 million, and considering that Bell Canada now wants to increase the basic residential telephone rate by 20 per cent, from $8.15 a month to $9.80 a month, and the basic business telephone rate by 28 per cent, from $24.85 a month to $31.80 a month, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House of Commons unanimously send the following communication to Bell Canada officials: "We're mad as hell and we're not going to take this any more".

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE STUDY PROVISIONS OF FEDERAL COURT ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a clear case of pressing and urgent necessity caused by what appear to be abuses in the use of phony and specious affidavits made under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act in order to conceal facts embarrassing to the government and, in particular, not to be compelled to disclose its early knowledge of the extraordinary activities of the security branch, the exposure of which would have lost New Democratic Party support in the 1972-1973 and 1974 minority parliament. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House urges that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be empowered, under appropriate terms of reference, to examine the manner in which this law has been used and to propose suitable changes in the public interest.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

McDONALD INQUIRY—REQUEST FOR EARLY REPORT ON MAIL OPENING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Therefore, I move:

That there being widespread concern in this nation because the McDonald commission, which was set up in July, did not commence sitting until early winter and has made little progress since, this House feels that it should end its lagging rate of progress, which gives us all an idea of the meaning of eternity, and make its final report within two months. Furthermore, as the House will be asked to legalize the opening of mail by police officers, it should have before it an early interim report from the commission as to whether or not such a step should be followed before the House deals with the bill. Furthermore, there being three members of this House all former solicitors general, the Hon. Warren Allmand, P.C., the Hon. J. P. Goyer, P.C., and the Hon. Francis Fox, P.C., who are now immune from being questioned in this House as they no longer occupy the portfolio, as such they should be forthwith summoned before the said commission, as they must be most anxious to have the facts known and so that the truth will not be hedged-in and the secrecy imposed on them by parliamentary rules can be lifted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY RESPECTING COIN DISTRIBUTING FIRM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that Fred Samuels Ltd., 614 St. James Street West in Montreal, a brokerage firm chosen by the Post Office Department to distribute and sell Olympic coins, is bankrupt or is on the verge of bankruptcy; considering that 300 or 400 persons who paid some $250,000 have yet to receive any of the coins they ordered, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That this House discuss the means to be taken to investigate this situation and instruct the government to proceed so that those who dealt with that firm are reimbursed as they should be for the Olympic coins which they ordered or paid for.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ESTIMATES FOR RIDEAU HALL—SWEARING IN OF NEW MINISTERS, ETC.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In the ten years since this government first came to power there has been a constant stream of cabinet appointments, resignations and retirements—the whirling dervish syndrome. In view of the wear and tear this causes to the furniture and fixtures of Rideau Hall, the time that must be taken by various government assistants to arrange the swearing in of new ministers, and the degree of difficulty caused in co-ordinating these frequent ceremonies with the busy travel schedule of the Prime Minister, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche):

That this government consider including in the main estimates sufficient moneys to pay for a revolving door at Rideau Hall; and, furthermore, that the Prime Minister instruct one of his many assistants to include each week in his personal schedule a standing appointment to the Governor General to be used solely for swearing in of new or reconstituted ministers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

OIL PORTS INQUIRY TO DEFER DECISION UNTIL NEB DECISION ON KITIMAT PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity having to do with the west coast ports inquiry. In view of the fact that a Kitimat consortium has been revived and has recently reactivated its submission to the National Energy Board for the carriage of Alaska, and possibly offshore crude from Kitimat, B.C., to Alberta, for forwarding to U.S. markets in the east, and in view of the fact that the west coast oil ports inquiry suspended its hearings almost two months ago, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House requests the government to cause the west coast oil ports inquiry to resume its hearings and instruct the National Energy Board to defer its pronouncement on the Kitimat submission until those hearings have been completed and the report of the inquiry tabled in the House and referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—INCREASE IN RATES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I was going to direct a question to the Minister of Communications, who I understood would be in the House, but in her absence I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister and ask him whether he, speaking for the government, the Minister of Communications or any other minister, is aware of Bell's application before it was filed before the CRTC yesterday.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer for the Minister of Communications on this question.

Mr. Nowlan: Obviously, there are difficulties, Mr. Speaker, but I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister the following question. In view of the application, which is obviously one of the most historic, involving the greatest rate application before any regulatory body in Canadian history, does he intend, as today's spokesman for the government, to discuss this matter with the Minister of Communications, considering especially the potential inflationary implications of this large rate application increase, so that there can be some semblance of restraint not only in government programs but also among major companies outside the government umbrella? Is it intended that action will be taken, and will the Deputy Prime Minister instruct the Minister of Communications to use some of her powers under the communications bill?

● (1417)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications is unavoidably absent today. Obviously, the matter will be discussed with her. But the application which goes before the regulatory agency for a hearing—it is a request for a hearing—does not come before the government. It is not, therefore, a matter which can be dealt with by the government at the present time.

BELL CANADA—EFFECT OF RATE INCREASE ON USERS OF SERVICE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate affairs, who has statutory responsibility for protecting consumer interests in areas of federal jurisdiction. Did the minister have discussions with Bell Canada prior to the announcement of its application for what appears to be an excessive rate increase, given the impact this would have on Canadian consumers, especially low income earners and pensioners during this current wave of inflation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I had no discussions with Bell Canada before it filed its application, and I was not aware of it. However, we are extremely concerned and the department will be looking into the matter.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to intervene, and is it now his intention to restore the grant to the Consumers' Association of Canada which his department cut by 50 per cent, which seriously undermined the association's role respecting consumer advocacy? Would the minister restore that grant to its original $186,000, or will a special grant be provided so the association can prepare an adequate presentation to the CRTC on behalf of Canadian consumers in Quebec, Ontario, Labrador and the Yukon who will be adversely affected by this rate increase?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, we have already given an additional grant to the Consumers' Association of Canada for its regulated industries program, and we have arranged long-term funding so that the association can look forward to a number of years in this type of activity. In addition, we will be looking at the possibility of making the views of the department known on the subject.

Mr. McGrath: In pursuit of his consumer-interest responsibilities, will the minister intervene with the CRTC, through his cabinet colleague, the Minister of Communications, to ensure that hearings are held in places such as Sherbrooke, Quebec, St. Catharines, Ontario, Goose Bay, Labrador, and Whitehorse, Yukon, in order to ensure that the consumers affected in those areas will have a chance to appear before the commission at hearings which are important to them?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take that question into consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

OUTLOOK FOR YOUNG PERSONS LOOKING FOR JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This morning the minister was quoted on the CBC as saying yesterday: "We've got to stop momma and poppa saying every kid has got to be a doctor or an engineer or a lawyer. We've got to have them look at some of the trades, the blue-collar trades". In this incredible statement, was the minister telling parents of young Canadians that they should stop aspiring to be trained professionals, but instead should be content with blue-collar training, in which category unemployment is actually much higher?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. I indicated that there is a role for education in maintaining employment, be it at the secondary or the post-secondary school level. I indicated that it seemed to me unconscionable that, rather than training individuals for the better blue-collar jobs in their factories, corporations are content to rely on immigration and the very effective apprenticeship programs abroad. I thought that was the kind of thing we should require departments of education and corporations to change. I used as one example an individual who would have been the best motor mechanic in Canada, but ended up as Canada's worst lawyer. I think we have to undertake a little more vocational guidance.

● (1422)

Mr. Broadbent: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister says we have to do more in Canada regarding vocational training. Is he aware that the federal government has spent $2 billion on manpower retraining programs during the past seven years? If so, is he now telling Canadians they have received the wrong kind of training, or is he saying they have received the right kind of training but no jobs are available for them? In either case, would he admit that his government has been a colossal failure in this respect?

Mr. Cullen: I will answer the last part of the question first and say "absolutely not", Mr. Speaker. I have indicated that in the field of education, which is a jurisdiction jealously guarded by the provinces—as well it should be—we have a role to play as far as creating employment for those seeking it who do not have adequate training. That is why we have made money available under the Adult Occupational Training Act, Canada Manpower industrial training programs and apprenticeship programs to see that people get the kind of training they need for the kind of jobs that are available in Canada. I think it is reprehensible that 600 jobs at a world-scale plant in Canada—very well paid jobs—went to Americans, when Canadians could have done those jobs had they had adequate training.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister is missing the point. If the federal government is putting up all the financing, or a good part of it, and is involved in a major consultative role with the provinces in determining the nature of the training programs, the minister has no excuse for not taking action that would have trained Canadians to fill the 600 jobs he speaks of. The clear implication of his speech, as reported this morning, was to tell young Canadians that they should not aspire to go to university, but should be content with blue-collar jobs. Is the minister aware that unemployment in the blue-collar sector is much higher and, specifically, is he aware of a statement made from his department last month that in December 4,300 Canadians in blue-collar jobs were laid off?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is again drawing a wrong conclusion from sketchy facts, but that is the sort of thing I have become accustomed to in his criticism. I did indicate that it was not necessary for every young person in Canada to go to university in order to get a job which gave him a splendid quality of life and an opportunity to participate in the economy. I cited the example of 600 people working at a world-scale plant who were all Americans and were drawing great salaries that should have gone to Canadians. That is why, for example, I am reorienting the adult occupational training program, in order to ensure that funds in that particular region are directed to providing the kind of training necessary for the jobs that will be available in the future.

PUBLIC WORKS

DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF POST OFFICE IN ROUYN, QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

In answer to a letter from the former hon. member for Témiscamingue, the Minister of Public Works replied on May 11, 1972 that the government intended to build a post office at Rouyn and that an amount of $200,000 had been earmarked for the project in 1972-73, that another amount of $300,000 had been provided for it in 1973-74, and finally, an amount of $250,000 in 1974-75. On July 13, 1973, the architects were asked to start—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Témiscamingue has a question to put, he should do so now.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it seems important to me to indicate to the minister what his department does.

In 1973, it was indicated that the architects had obtained the contract. On September 7, 1977 we were advised that the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question to put, he must put it immediately.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The other hon. member took five minutes to put his question, and yet, he was allowed to do so.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —we were advised, Mr. Speaker, that construction of the building would start in the spring. I would therefore ask the Minister of Public Works, since we received a letter today advising us that construction will not begin before 1979, whether he can say what those $750,000 were used for which were approved between 1972 and 1975, and when construction will really start?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will have to verify the previous estimates and find out where these funds were allocated. I would also be happy to check on the current situation and advise the hon. member.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the minister undertake to do whatever is necessary to accelerate the decision-making process since the programs are ready? Since it had been decided that construction would start in early 1978, would the minister be prepared to reconsider the statement made by his representative, Mr. Havor, and change this decision so that construction could get under way without undue delay?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EVIDENCE PRESENTED TO INQUIRY INTO RCMP ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT REACTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question and my congratulations are to our new Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: We have had the opportunity of sending similar congratulations to five different cabinet ministers in the last couple of years. I know the minister's new officials and advisers have already brought to his attention the testimony yesterday of ex-Commissioner Higgitt before a judicial inquiry in Montreal. Of course, Mr. Higgitt's testimony is completely incompatible with the words spoken in this House by a former minister, the present Minister of Supply and Services. My question to the minister is simply this: Has he had the opportunity of finding out who is telling the truth in this matter? Is it Commissioner Higgitt, or the Minister of Supply and Services?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the hon. gentleman for his congratulations. I would also like to thank all hon. members on this side of the House who met with approval that particular sentiment of congratulation. I hope as well, Mr. Speaker, that it is a sentiment which will have a long-standing effect. With reference to the question posed, undoubtedly the hon. member recognizes the complexity of all the issues with which I have to make myself familiar, and I would hope he would grant me at least this day in which to familiarize myself with the background of the question he has posed, in order that I may give him a more complete answer tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Where is the letter-opener?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, there will, obviously, be further difficulty in getting to the truth of the matter in this House. My supplementary question is to the Acting Prime Minister. Because of the implications of contradictory testimony respecting the actions of past and present cabinet ministers, I wonder if the government has given, or will now give, immediate consideration to urging those who have control over at least one of these judicial inquiries to see if it is possible for people in the political realm to immediately appear before one or other of those judicial inquiries or royal commissions so there is no further stigma or implication respecting the integrity of those of us who are in the political field in respect of the very obvious contradictions that are now coming to the fore. When can we have a cabinet minister appear before one or other of these royal commissions?

● (1432)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, without accepting fully the allegations that the hon. member has made about contradictions—

Mr. Broadbent: Are you partly accepting them?

Mr. MacEachen: —or even partly accepting them, I would tell him that the former solicitor general has already expressed his willingness to appear before the commission at any time he is called. It seems to me it is now up to the commission to call the witnesses in the order in which it alone determines, and to determine also the credibility of the evidence that is brought before the commission. It is certainly not the job of the government or the House of Commons to take over and replace the work of the commission.

Mr. Lawrence: For two nights running, on the national media there has been an undenied report that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had the information respecting the circumstances that caused the resignation of the former solicitor general prior to that information reaching the hands of the Prime Minister of Canada. Can the Acting Prime Minister confirm or deny that report? If he is not in that position, can he undertake to report to the House at a very early date as to whether that information was in the hands of our national police force before it was in the hands of our Prime Minister?

Mr. MacEachen: As I recollect, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did indicate the source of the information which he had received. There is no evidence whatsoever, that I have, to indicate that the RCMP had information prior to that information being received by the Prime Minister. That is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. Lawrence: That was not my question.

INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO PROVIDE FOR REOPENING OF DUPUIS ET FRÈRES PLANTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has certainly heard with regret, as I and thousands of Montrealers have, of the closing of Dupuis et Frères last weekend, which will throw 700 employees out on to the street. Since a group of businessmen have decided to take over this firm, has the Minister of Finance been consulted on that matter? If not, does he intend to offer every possible financial assistance to this group of businessmen, considering the mechanisms now in place, to help reopen this firm in the east of Montreal?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive any representation whatever from anyone on that matter and I cannot say anything about it because I have not had any request of any kind.

Mr. La Salle: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I suppose all hon. members on the government side take a special interest in this firm. Would the minister attach the same importance to this case as he did for other businesses which expressed their intention of leaving Montreal and, if so, would he tell the House whether, if it turns out that this group of businessmen take over, the reopening would be considered as a creation of new jobs? In that case, would this firm get the advantages of the subsidy program for the creation of new jobs which has been recently announced?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we did not receive any request of that kind. There are federal agencies such as the Federal Business Development Bank and other institutions which deal with private interests and this group of businessmen can apply to such organizations. As for the tax credit program that has just been set up, I do not think, in view of the circumstances, these jobs can be considered as new jobs in that business.

Mr. La Salle: The minister did not catch the point of my question. I was talking of the 700 people laid off—

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to questions asked earlier about the application of Bell Canada for a rate increase. Given the implications this application has for higher inflation, given that the decision will be made by a federally-appointed agency on which there are no provincial representatives—even though this is in an area in which there is a great deal of provincial responsibility—and given that the federal government is continually importuning the provinces to assist it in trying to impose these restraints on inflation, will the minister advise whether the implications of this highly inflationary move have been discussed with the provincial governments?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this application has been made to the appropriate board. It is not for me to make any comment at this time. There was no such discussion with the provincial finance ministers when I met them last week.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Seeing that the pending application of Bell Canada for this increase, in terms of dollars, is probably the most profound and most historic to come before any regulatory body, particularly in terms of inflation, will the minister undertake to add this as an agenda item to the upcoming federal-provincial conference?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this is an application that has been made before a federal agency which has to deliver decisions. On numerous occasions the applications filed by that company have not been accepted or at least have been reduced by the agency, and it would not be appropriate for the government to intervene at this point.

[English]

BELL CANADA—APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Communications. I will ask only one question because I do not want to trespass too far. I do not think the Minister of Communications heard the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister, but I think she heard the answer of the Minister of Finance.

As hon. members know, there is a regulatory body, and the usual course of action in a rate application is to go through a regulatory process. If the minister did not have prior communication with Bell Canada officials with regard to their pending rate application, in view of the size of this application—coming after five others in the past six years—does she not feel she has a responsibility above the mechanics of the regulatory process to discuss the implications of this question, because after the rate hearing in May or June, depending on the political climate, this matter bounces back to cabinet for retroactive review. This government has a very bad history of retroactive review of some of the deliberations of the CRTC. Let us do something now, rather than go through all the regulatory process and then perhaps have the cabinet do something.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, any application which comes before the regulatory body is carefully scrutinized. There were more than 800 interrogatories with respect to the last application. It took 27 days to completely review the matter. I am sure hon. members know that any demand for a rate increase is based on providing new service to different communities, and the amount of money which Bell can ask for in that increase is related to the principle of rate of return. It is for the CRTC to make these decisions: it has the proper mechanism to examine them. The hon. member is correct, once that decision is taken by the CRTC, there is a right of appeal.

FINANCE

CORPORATE TAX CONCESSIONS—EFFECT ON JOB-CREATION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's assurance that corporate tax concessions of $1.2 billion would stimulate expansion and job-creation, and since these concessions are worth $3 million to Northern Telecom which laid off 1,000 employees last year and has just announced further lay-offs of 280 workers in Montreal, will the minister now admit these tax concessions are not having the effect he promised, and will he cancel them for companies such as Northern Telecom?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we do not plan to change the law in this regard. All companies that are making investments obtain income tax credit rights, and this point has no relation to the problem raised by the hon. member, because the benefits earned by Northern Telecom last year have nothing to do with those it will earn in 1978.

● (1442)

[English]

Mr. Symes: I find the minister's answer incredible, in light of the fact that over the past 18 months 2,000 people have been laid off at Northern Telecom—and this is a continuing process. Since I am unable to get a satisfactory answer from the Minister of Finance, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Communications. It arises from the fact that Bell Canada is a major purchaser from Northern Telecom. If Bell lived up to its commitment to improve rural service, there would be more employment at Northern Telecom due to increased purchases of equipment. Will the minister urge the cabinet to instruct the CRTC to obtain assurances that Bell will accelerate its rural improvement program before considering the company's most recent request for a 20 per cent increase in rates?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): The hon. member will have noted, I am sure, that the legislation which I brought before the House a couple of days ago does allow for the inclusion of social objectives when considering the development of Bell. This means that in future the CRTC will have the authority to encourage Bell to extend service to certain rural communities and to give better service in rural communities. However, the hon. member will understand that you only get what you can get for your money. Of course, the service in certain rural communities could be improved, and this is precisely what most of the applications are about. In fact, they say, "We are extending the service, but we need so much money in order to do so. We need an increase in rates." Whether that is fair or not is for the CRTC to decide.

INDUSTRY

BALANCE OF PAYMENTS DEFICIT IN AUTOMOBILE PARTS TRADE

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Having regard to the widening balance of payments deficit in the automobile parts trade, one which amounted to $1.05 billion in 1977, can the hon. gentleman tell us what his department is doing to redress the current imbalance?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We have had the automobile industry and the imbalance in the parts trade under intensive study. We have talked to the three large automobile manufacturers. I think one new plant has already been announced for Windsor, and very shortly a couple of additional parts manufacturing plants will be built in Canada.

TOURISM

TAX CONCESSIONS TO ATTRACT VISITORS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The hon. gentleman has taken credit for provincial tourist agency and chamber of commerce tourism promotion, and now he talks about a package deal. Bearing in mind that about two million people go through the gates of Banff and Jasper national parks, what package deal would be available to tourists who come from the United States, the majority of them by car? Will they be able to get price reductions at hotels and restaurants? Will there be any reduction of the gasoline tax, to attract tourists and bring about a better balance of trade with the United States?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): At the tourist ministers meeting on Tuesday there was a general agreement that present costs impede our country when it comes to the successful balancing of tourist accounts. The provinces and the federal government impose taxes on gasoline. The purpose of the tax imposed by the federal government was pointed out. We are addressing ourselves to that question and to the question of wages. I was particularly pleased to announce, at the time, a whole host of package tours to make it easier for Canadians to travel all over the country and to get to know one another better.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, that was a pretty colourful rancher's speech. I should like to ask the minister this question: Since he appears to have taken an affirmative approach to the multimillion dollar project at Lake Louise which was vetoed some years ago, is he likely to be in a position to make a judgment in this regard, or has he just horned in on the responsibility of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I have always been an enthusiastic booster of Canadian tourism, and I believe we need additional capacity to handle the needs of tourists coming to this country. Banff and Lake Louise play a major part in attracting tourists to Canada, and as a minister from Alberta I think I should take an interest in developments there.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR EXCLUSION FROM TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises from a recent statement by the Canadian Textile Institute that "most Canadian textile plants would be wiped out by 1985 if tariffs were cut along the lines of the Swiss formula which has become the basis for negotiations at Geneva." Does the government intend to accede to the urgent request of the Canadian textile industry that Canadian textiles be excluded from the tariff negotiations presently going on at Geneva?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In Geneva at the present time countries are putting forward their offer lists. Nothing is firm yet, and nothing will be firm for some time. With regard to the 40 per cent tariff offer, the so-called Swiss formula, I should like to point out that it is a hypothesis: there may be a greater reduction on some commodities and not on others. It is a weighted average, one which we may or may not arrive at when the negotiations are complete.

Mr. Hees: In view of that vague and unsatisfactory answer, is it not the case that the hon. gentleman was correctly described by Patrick Watson in a television interview last night as a minister who can only say, "I think"; "I am not sure", and "I can't say"?

AGRICULTURE

DELEGATES TO NATIONAL FOOD POLICY CONFERENCE

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the National Food Policy Conference to be held in Ottawa next month. Has the delegate list, or membership list, been finalized and, if so, when will it be made available?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I believe the list is still open, but if the hon. member has in mind any persons he thinks should be there, we would be glad to send them invitations to attend, at least as observers. Agricultural producers in Canada will represent about 15 per cent of the delegates; they will be the largest single unit there. As far as I know, virtually every agricultural organization in Canada has been invited to be present, and I feel that agriculture will be well represented.

Mr. Wise: Can the minister give me an assurance that all sectors of the food chain will be adequately represented?

Mr. Whelan: I think I can. Other ministers who are interested in this meeting on food strategy are making sure that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs do not forget anyone who is connected with the food chain. I believe the list is a public one; anybody who wishes to do so can find out who has been invited. If there has been an oversight, we are certainly prepared to add to the list.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Is it correct that the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has been asked to send only one delegate to the conference? Is the minister aware, also, that the president of the federation, Mr. Peter Hannam, has described the conference as a farce?

Mr. Whelan: I used to be associated with that organization. That is where I got my political training.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: To be a successful farm leader, one has to be a pretty good politician. It may be correct that the Ontario federation will have one delegate, but let us not forget that this organization is affiliated with practically every commodity group in Ontario, as well as with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which will send several delegates.

TRANSPORT

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRAIRIE RAIL AUTHORITY

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. When will the prairie rail authority be intact? When is it the minister's intention to announce that program?

● (1452)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the course of meetings in Saskatchewan this fall or during the winter, it would be our intention to introduce legislation which would be required to bring about a prairie rail authority in accordance with the wishes of most of the farm and prairie organizations, not with railway management but essentially for some of the other functions which the Hall commission recommended. It was my intention to see that legislation in place in 1978. There is a good deal more work to be done on it with prairie organizations and with others in producing the legislation. Therefore, I cannot tell the hon. member whether it will happen while he is in this House or after he has been defeated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, will the minister assure the House at this time that no action will be taken until there is full and complete concert with all the provincial ministers of transport and the prairie premiers? Also, will he give the assurance that action is not taking place which is not in concert with the prairie ministers of transport and provincial premiers in that regard?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be wise to say that we would not act in this House without the full concurrence and approval of any group of premiers or transport ministers of the provinces. Of course we intend to have the fullest discussion. But, as in the case of the ownership of the roadbeds in relation to abandoned railways, I think it is much better if we have the full agreement, support and consent of the farm groups, farm organizations and the farmers themselves in connection with what is happening here. Generally speaking, I would say we have that support. It will be on that support that we will proceed.

FERRY SERVICE IN SOUTH WESTERN NOVA

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As the minister has been made fully aware of the concerns of the people of South Western Nova concerning improved ferry services, is he now prepared to tell the House what steps he is prepared to take to improve the service between Yarmouth and New England?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy indeed to tell the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, opposition members may sound somewhat skeptical, but I am delighted by the manner in which the hon. member has pressed this matter. We now have a firm decision in favour of the acquiring of a ferry to provide a year-round truck service between Yarmouth and New England. The charter will be signed within approximately a week. The ferry will be brought to Canada and probably will be ready by about mid-March.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PAYMENTS FOR PREGNANT MARES' URINE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Recently he announced a $1 million payment, or the equivalent of $1 per gallon, for pregnant mares' urine for laboratory production. Since Ayerst Laboratories are ceasing the purchase of this urine at the end of April, was that payment the final payment, or is all production of PMU to cease in Canada as of that date?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, that is a payment to assist farmers who are being forced out of that business, a production entity which they have been in for many years. There will still be a production entity for that company where they have new laboratories, I believe, in the province of Manitoba.

HEALTH

PRODUCTION OF CONJUGATED ESTROGEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Were both the Frosst Laboratories and the Ayerst Laboratories under the direction of the minister's department to cease production of conjugated estrogen because of the possible link with cancer, or are these laboratories ceasing production because they are aware of the possibility themselves, without instructions from the minister's department? Can the minister assure the public that this hormone is relatively safe and there is no connection between its use and cancer?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire and report to the hon. member as soon as possible.

GRAIN—POOL ACCOUNT DEFICITS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. As the chief commissioner of the Wheat Board has indicated, there will almost certainly be deficits in the pool accounts for this crop year. Can the minister tell the House if these deficits are indicated now to be large and may apply to all four grain pools?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is too early to say anything definite about such things as size and the exact number of pools which will be involved. The selling period, which is in issue, extends as far as into the end of September, 1978. Therefore, it would not be very wise to speculate very extensively. I agree, though, with the chief commissioner's statement in regard to the main pool at least.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, will surpluses from one pool be transferred to deficient pools, or will the federal treasury be called upon to absorb any losses in the pools?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, under the law the federal treasury is required to absorb any losses in the pools.

DEVELOPMENT OF LITHIUM BATTERIES—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It follows a question which I asked him on December 6, 1977. It concerns lithium batteries, or ELTs. Could the minister, who promised me an answer before the end of January, tell me now whether there has been any progress in the development of safe lithium batteries or ELTs? Is there any attempt by the department to subsidize the reinstallation of effective ELTs in private aircraft?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate any financial involvement by the department. I can tell the hon. member there has been some success in developing batteries which will operate. They should be available very soon, so that those who want to may reinstall ELTs in the aircraft. It is not anticipated that we are yet in a position to return to a compulsory installation of the ELTs because the number of batteries and the extensiveness of their availability has not yet been assured.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DUTY-FREE OUTLETS FOR PERSONS CROSSING CANADA-U.S. BORDER

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue before he goes to the other place, thus allowing consummation of the deal between the Manitoba New Democratic Party and the federal Liberal party. In view of the fact that 80 per cent of all visitors to Canada arrive by car, and therefore must pass through highway ports of entry, and in view of the fact that duty-free stores are being built in the United States along the United States-Canada border, can the minister indicate whether the government will follow the advice of the Canadian Automobile Association in its 1977 submission to the government and approve regulations permitting land border, duty-free shops for Canadian and United States motorists crossing into the United States?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that I am not doing any wishful thinking.

Mr. Clark: Take out the adjective.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In regard to the question, this matter is under review and study by the officials of my department. Representations have been made by many members of this House, particularly on this side. Rest assured, we will let the hon. member know as soon as we come out with a certain policy pertaining to this matter or in an area which will be most effective for the time being.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—JOBS FOR CANADIANS IN CONSTRUCTION OF PIPE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a couple of questions to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of his remarks last evening on television, which were to the effect of guaranteeing jobs in the construction of the pipeline, may I ask if he can assure the House that guarantees will be provided for those in the construction industry, and why can the same kind of guarantees not be given for steelworkers so that plants in Welland, Regina and Sault Ste. Marie can be manufacturing pipe for the pipeline?

• (1502)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have said several times in the House that the steel industry in Canada is very competitive with the United States—in the last number of years at a rate of 6.4 per cent in relation to 1.9 per cent. In my conversations with people in the steel industry, I have found they are not worried at all, they believe they can compete on bids with the United States in the long run. The American consumer will have to pay for this; therefore, it has to be built on competitive principles.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, can the minister assure the House that in his discussions with the Americans in technical committees specifications will not be agreed upon by the Canadian government which eliminate most, if not all, of the Canadian steel industry, in spite of our capacity to produce low pressure large diameter pipe? Can he assure the House that we will not be outmanoeuvred by the Americans on the specifications for the pipe, and Canadian plants will be able to bid on it successfully?

Mr. Horner: The specifications of the pipe will be laid down by the National Energy Board. I am told that the National Energy Board hopes to have a decision on that matter about the middle of February. The factors involved will always put safety of the pipeline over its economics. I want to stress that point because to me it is very important.

FOOD POLICY CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture relative to the national food policy conference. Will the minister explain the logic behind a situation where, with a national conference designed to develop a food strategy for the country, only 15 per cent of the participants will be the people who actually grow the food?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): All in all, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are doing too badly when we represent only about 6 per cent of the population.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: This is a total concept. "All Canadians" involved in this matter means everyone who has anything to do with food, including the consumer; that is, everybody in Canada.

Mr. Clark: Given the minister's marginal influence in cabinet—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: How do you know that?

Mr. Clark: —can he tell us if his colleagues are going to let him go to the conference?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: —I would only refer the Leader of the Opposition to a statement made by E. P. Taylor when he spoke about offtrack betting. He said, "I had too much power in the cabinet. I threw too much weight and I was considered the heavyweight." I do not think there is much more I can say. My concern is that there be proper representation at that meeting of people who are really concerned about developing and improving the food policy with any new strategy possible. We would even consider anything the Leader of the Official Opposition might suggest.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—ALLEGED CURTAILMENT OF LIBERTY OF SPEECH FOR SOCIAL CREDIT PARTY MEMBERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Pursuant to our standing orders, Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. Since the beginning of the 3rd session of the 30th legislature, members of the Social Credit Party of Canada have been very rarely recognized by the Chair for more than one question during any single oral question period. On the other hand, hon. members of the party of the majority, contrary to practice, have now been granted the privilege of directing questions to the ministry, which was not customary in the parliaments which had adopted the British procedure. This new way of doing things has deprived our party of the right to ask more than one question. On January 25, 1978, the Chair asked for shorter questions and replies, something with which I fully agree. Unfortunately, these recommendations seem difficult to apply. I appreciate, however, the difficult position of the Chair in this respect. Since January 25, the preamble to some questions and to some ministerial replies has been somewhat lengthy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must draw the attention of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) to the fact that, this afternoon, the oral question period started by questions from an hon. member of the official opposition, followed by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and finally by the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada (Mr. Caouette).

First, the question asked by the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada was too long. Second, it dealt with a matter dating back to 1972 which continued in 1973, 1974 and 1975. It was therefore a very acceptable matter as a question on the order paper, which could also have been dealt with by writing to a minister, but as the hon. member is leader of a party in the House, I allowed him the question. The second question was a representation, and I also allowed it. As for the number of members by party now in the House, I gave the floor for some questions from the Social Credit Party of Canada and from the New Democratic Party. If the hon. member is seeking to establish proportions as to the number of members who are present, I am indeed under the impression that today and on all other days of sitting of the House I have been fair to the Social Credit Party of Canada. As for the matter of privilege, it could be unfair to other parties, because of the proportion of members in the House today and on other days. That is something I calculate very carefully every day, and I am convinced that this arrangement is quite fair to the Social Credit Party of Canada, and all other parties in the House. However, if the hon. member is looking for an opportunity to discuss this in private, it can be done, but today is an opposition day. I therefore believe that the hon. member should briefly conclude his remarks.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I accept your very judicious remarks, but I was about to conclude my question of privilege anyway. I did not have the opportunity to put it completely, but I will do so now with your permission.

Here is my conclusion, Mr. Speaker. Today the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) wanted to ask a very important question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan). The current Minister of Public Works was not in this portfolio on the dates referred to by the hon. member for Témiscamingue and so, in order to make it easier for the minister to give him a satisfactory answer, the hon. member simply had to provide the minister with some references. It is my view that the hon. member for Témiscamingue was totally justified in giving the Minister of Public Works the opportunity to know about the facts that have preceded the event which was the object of the hon. member's question in order to make it possible for the minister to give an answer which would have been really satisfactory not only to the hon. member, but to the minister as well. So, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to criticize or question your decisions. Your responsibility is much greater than mine and it obliges you to make very quick decisions, which sometimes makes them questionable. In any event, you are the authority in this House and I submit to it.

With your permission, Your Honour, and at the request of my colleague from Témiscamingue, I ask that his question be discussed at ten o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

February 2, 1978

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 2nd day of February, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant
EDMOND JOLY DE LOTBINIÈRE
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is most unusual that Her Majesty's representative should appear on an allotted day. I hope that the government House leader will convey to Government House, or perhaps to others who arrange this, the fact that we are somewhat disturbed that it should be proceeded with on this day. There may be an explanation, but I think it is something which—

Mr. Clark: Violates tradition.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —violates tradition, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) says, but it also is something which could perhaps be avoided in the future. I raise this matter and leave it with the government House leader.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House leader can tell me the sequence of forthcoming government business. I am particularly interested in whether it will be acceptable to designate next Friday, February 10, as an allotted day, as indicated in the schedule. When is the government House leader intending to establish the special pipeline committee? When does he intend to introduce the pipeline legislation?

Finally, has he consulted the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) with respect to the regulations the minister promised sometime ago would be given to the committee to be studied? Would the minister deal with all those matters while he is on his feet?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the last question first, I have not consulted the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). The date suggested for the next allotted day, February 10, is quite acceptable to us, and I accordingly designate that day as an allotted day. Tomorrow I would like to call the motion establishing the special committee. I hope it will be passed without debate. Then I hope we will continue with bills dealing with fishing and recreational harbours, CNR recapitalization, and the extension of the Bank Act. I have given notice of the northern pipeline bill. I expect it will be given first reading tomorrow, and I hope we will deal with it at second reading at a mutually agreeable time next week.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question with respect to the business of the House which is a repetition of a question I put to the minister earlier. As a matter of fact, since the start of the session I have been asking him if he would give us a list of the legislation the government plans for this session. He has not yet done so. I impress upon him the point that when one looks at the order paper one has to agree that it is pretty thin. I think Parkinson's Law is having its effect around here. If we knew there were major pieces of legislation to be put before us before Easter, or before this session ends, whether by prorogation or dissolution, it would be helpful to us.

May I also ask if there is any firm word yet about the date for the presentation of a budget? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) once said it would be in March. Then on another occasion he said it might not be until April.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I know no firm date for the presentation of a budget. I disagree with the hon. member as to the thinness of the order paper. There are a number of substantial items there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Like the national anthem?

Mr. MacEachen: Like ports policy, like the bills we are dealing with at the moment, the bill dealing with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, the Financial Administration Act, and so on down the list. However, perhaps the hon. member can be induced to accelerate the business of the House. On the understanding that I add one bill perhaps the hon. member will guarantee that we will move at a double rate of progress.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Give us something important and it will move a lot faster than all this unimportant stuff.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the statement of the minister that the pipeline bill will be read the first time tomorrow and that debate will probably start next week, I wonder if he has taken into consideration the fact that much of the discussion on that bill will be dependent on a decision having been made with reference to the specifications for the pipe. It seems to me that the debate at second reading ought to be delayed, or that the government should have the National Energy Board speed up a decision with reference to that matter because otherwise we will be discussing a situation about which we do not have knowledge of a germane factor.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the relevancy of the hon. member's point. It has been very much on my mind that we should at least have a firm date from the National Energy Board regarding the timing of the decision. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) stated today, it is expected that that will come by mid-February. I agree that a decision of a certain kind would undoubtedly create a good deal of consternation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The minister is almost inviting the House and the committee to delay that legislation until we get that information. Surely that is not the best way to hasten the passage of legislation through the House and the committee.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. I think the question raised by the hon. member is quite germane to the over-all project. However, there are a number of stages. There is second reading, there will be very detailed study in the committee, and it seems to me that these stages could easily proceed in the absence of the decision to which the hon. member refers.

Some hon. Members: Come on!

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) should at least recognize that since parliament has resumed its sittings after the Christmas and New Year recess, work has progressed in a rather efficient way. Several bills have been adopted rather rapidly, and I might even say that the government has been in one instance caught by surprise when debate on a certain bill had ended, and that the bell has stolen two hours of our time that could have been spent on something else.

I would like to ask the President of Privy Council if he has provided for the number of the so-called opposition days up until the Easter recess, and also if he could tell us when those opposition days would be held; this would make it easier for us to co-operate with the government for the adoption of other bills the government regards as having priority, for as far as we are concerned, I have always said and I repeat that we are always ready to make it easier for the government to get its bills adopted first, while other private members' bills or motions should come in second. I am, for my part, prepared to accept that provided we know the government's proposed timetable until the Easter recess.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do have a list of suggested dates for the remaining opposition days. I do not have it with me, but I will be glad to circulate the suggested dates as a planning aid for all of us. It will probably be followed, but occasionally dates have to be changed for one reason or another.

● (1522)

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understood the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) correctly. It had certainly been my understanding, prior to the previous session, that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) had indicated that the regulations in the Immigration Act were of such importance that they would be reviewed by the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. I think it is important that this be borne in mind, and I would ask the minister whether that is still the intention of the government.

I think the Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated in the House today that it was the intention of the government to have the statutory regulations reviewed, but I think he put in a condition about this matter going through with some degree of promptness. I may say that our party has discussed the regulations and the act in great detail, and would certainly not be disposed to ignore a proper study of the regulations, but to make the discussion of them reasonably brief, and certainly not act in a delaying manner. We are anxious to see the bill passed. I think the date set was April 1.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his assurance that if this matter is to be reviewed it will be done quickly. I shall discuss the matter with the Minister of Employment and Immigration and attempt to get back to the hon. member quickly on what can be done.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 742, 816, 912 and 938.

[Text]

VISIT OF PRESIDENT CARTER TO CANADA

Question No. 742—Mr. Howie:

Are any plans underway to invite U.S. President Carter to visit Canada?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): During his visit to Washington in February, the Prime Minister personally invited President Carter to visit Canada. The President accepted in principle but the dates for such a visit have not been set.

1977 GREY CUP

Question No. 816—Mr. Howie:

What amount was spent by the Ministry of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport on the 1977 Grey Cup pre-game and half-time shows?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): In so far as the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport is concerned: $60,000.

DREE ASSISTANCE TO THE BRICKLIN CAR DEVELOPMENT, SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Question No. 912—Mr. Howie:

Did DREE grant, loan or guarantee any loans in respect of the Bricklin car development at Saint John, New Brunswick and, if so, in what amount?

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: The Department of Regional Economic Expansion guaranteed 90 per cent ($2,700,000) of a loan of $3,000,000 made to Bricklin Canada Ltd. by the Bank of Montreal. The offer of loan guarantee was made April 1, 1974 and was accepted by the company April 25, 1974.

RELOCATION OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 938—Mr. Epp:

1. What procedure does the government follow when choosing and hiring moving companies to relocate employees?

2. (a) What amount was spent last year in relocating government employees (b) how many relocations took place (c) how many inter-provincial and inter-territorial moves took place?

3. (a) How many moves took place from one respective province or territory to another (b) what were the provinces or territories and the numbers involved?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The Central Removal Service of the Department of Supply and Services arranges moves with carriers on behalf of all civilian government departments and agencies. Carriers are approved for source listing by an inter-departmental committee, following examination of their capability to meet government conditions for moving household goods. The selection of the approved carriers for individual moves is on a rotational basis by dollar value using an equalization system.

2. (a) $12,883,661 on removals; (b) 10,360 removals; (c) 4,830 interprovincial, 32 inter-territorial.

3. (a) (See 2 c);

(b).

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 148 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

TRAVEL COSTS—MARINE AND FERRY BRANCH OF DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Question No. 148—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. What travel costs were incurred by personnel of the Marine and Ferry Branch of the Department of Transport for each fiscal year since 1970-71 on visits (a) to Europe (b) to the Far East (c) in Canada and, in each case, what countries or provinces were visited?

2. (a) Which members of the Branch were involved in each visit (b) how much did each claim for each trip?

3. For the same years, what expenses were incurred, and by what foreign firms, that were asked by the Department to visit Canada?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The questions listed by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 148 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ROLE OF GOVERNMENT IN SOCIETY AND ECONOMY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That in the opinion of this House it is essential to the economic well-being and good government of Canada that action be taken to reduce the scope and rationalize the role of government activity in Canadian society by reducing the share of the national wealth currently consumed by government, and to this end that a special committee be struck before February 28, 1978 to consider:

(1) the enactment of "Sunset Laws" to provide for the termination of programs or agencies which have outlived their usefulness;

(2) methods to limit the growing and undemocratic use of regulations;

(3) the criteria by which the government would divest itself of those Crown corporations which play no useful role in the public sector;

(4) the adaptation of new flexible budget planning techniques to discourage unnecessary growth in departmental budgets.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think when all of us came back to parliament at the start of this year, we hoped that the government would take the problems of the country seriously and introduce some measures that go to the heart of some of the basic problems the country faces. The government, unfortunately, refuses to do that, so we accept the responsibility.

In this first allotted day of 1978 we intend to propose a number of means to deal with the cost and size and effectiveness of government. We have framed our motion in the most non-partisan way possible, not to require government members to embrace specific proposals, but only to ask that they accept their responsibilities as parliamentarians, and have a select committee of this House established to consider specific means by which we can reduce waste and improve efficiency in the Government of Canada.

I do not intend to detain or bore this House of Commons with the details of waste that have become all too well known in this country, but I think there are two items worth recalling. One is an excerpt from the report of the Auditor General of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1976, in which he said:

Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

That was the judgment of the Auditor General of Canada.

The other matter worth recalling is the really quite amazing and symbolic event that occurred before Christmas when, in the standing committee, the deputy secretary of the Treasury Board and his officials had to admit to members of parliament that they did not know the total number of Crown corporations in which the Government of Canada had an ownership position. First they said there were 366. Then they found seven more. By last month the list had grown to 387. We do not know what it is today, but quite literally this demonstrates that the government itself does not know what it is doing.

The statistics of government growth over the last decade are shocking. In 1968 when this government was elected, government at all levels in Canada consumed 34 per cent of Canada's gross national product. After ten years of this wasteful and uncontrollable government, that figure is up to 41 per cent of Canada's gross national product. According to the estimates for 1968, the year this government came to office, the federal budget was $10.9 billion. The estimates for this year are for a federal budget at $41.1 billion. That means that the dollar spending of the Government of Canada has increased almost fourfold in the ten years of the Trudeau government. We can argue about the causes of that excessive increase and the cost and waste of government, but let us not occupy ourselves in talking about politics. We in this House of Commons have to deal with the consequences of that record. Those consequences are acute and various and simply can no longer be ignored by this House of Commons and the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One consequence is that investment money, which this nation needs, is leaving this country, or else it is failing to come here because mobile investors, who have a whole world to turn to, are putting their money in places where government costs less, interferes less, or is more certain. I shall not detain the House with a long list of quotations from independent experts who have made this point. I see an hon. member from Toronto indicating disagreement, which is rather strange. He should be concerned about the capacity of construction workers in the city of Toronto to find jobs. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) does not care about those construction workers, but if he did he would be worried about the tremendous amount of investment money that is leaving that city to go to countries where investors trust the government more than they do here.

Some time ago one of the chief economists of the Bank of Canada gave the following warning:

● (1532)

—we have to get our house in order and make it more attractive for private capital or else Canada will become a sleeping backwater.

I also refer to a study that came out just the other day from the Florida legislature which shows that Canadians are the largest foreign investors in the state of Florida. That is happening in part because people who have money to invest do not trust this government and they are concerned about the waste of this government and the size of spending here.

The consequence of that, Sir, is that it very seriously limits our ability to grow, and causes our failure to grow. I emphasize this point, our failure to grow, which puts at risk our ability to stay together as a people.

[Translation]

Another consequence is that the performance of our economy is dangerously low. Closing plants have large stocks—one million unemployed prove this—and the government tells us that it is not stimulating the economy because our deficit is already too high. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we cannot spend money on things we need because we have already spent too much on things we do not need. We cannot do what we should for the unemployed for instance, because we have already spent too much for Petro-Can, for consultants and for opposing the other levels of government.

[English]

There is another consequence, Sir, that goes well beyond the economic, and that is the effect upon the enterprise and the attitude of the Canadian people. That is much harder to quantify, but it is essential for us to face. We have to ask ourselves, as parliamentarians who are responsible for the future of this country, how many small Canadian businessmen have given up because of the weight of frivolous regulations? And what is the cost to local communities when those small businesses are replaced by companies or by managers who are strangers in the neighbourhood?

What is the social cost of having government move into areas where volunteers have worked, as this government did in the last decade? This government moved in on voluntary activities, ranging from youth hostel associations all the way through to amateur sport.

Like other members of parliament in the early days of the Local Initiatives Program I established a constituency advisory group in my constituency. Mr. Speaker, in response from one of the people I had asked to serve on that group I received a very interesting, and true story. It related to a community unknown to most members of this House, a little swelling in the road in western Alberta called Niton Junction. The people in Niton Junction wanted a community hall and they got together and applied for a LIP grant, and they failed. The man who served on the constituency advisory group from that area wrote to me afterwards and he said, "You know, 10 years ago the people of Niton Junction, if they wanted a community hall, would get together and build a community hall. Now they get together and apply for a LIP grant, and they are turned down." That means they have, failed on two counts. First of all they are left without the community hall they need, secondly they have worked together on something that failed and their sense of working together and co-operating together has become soured.

I think we must have much more attention paid to the social consequences of this kind of extensive government intervention into areas where volunteers previously made local communities work and strive for something they wanted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have to ask ourselves, Sir, what is the cost to our sense of national community—our sense of working together as partners? There is a new and growing hostility between the public sector and the private sector. What Sir, is the cost to Canada of the continuing competition for power between different levels of government?

Another one of those immeasurable costs, and one which should be of particular concern to all of us in this House, is the damage which has been done to the credibility of our political system. For a decade Canadians have been told by their politicians that more and bigger government would solve their problems, whatever their problems were. Governments have become larger, and they have become more expensive, but the problems remain, and more and more Canadians have come to question, not simply the wisdom of the so-called solution, but they have come to question the integrity and the credibility of those in this institution and elsewhere who have been proposing those solutions.

We have come through a decade, Sir, in which people have put too much faith in government, which meant that they were putting too little faith in individual citizens or in private or voluntary groups. The response to virtually every problem was to create government programs. Those programs then grew beyond control. Examples abound; the growth of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, from its original purpose as a co-ordinator into a little empire of its owe that competes with the people it was supposed to co-ordinate; Petro-Can which was established to make the government itself a competitor in the oil industry, and which has been used to bend and twist and distort regulations to give an unfair advantage to the creature of the government.

Indeed, the very principle of decentralization has been—and I use the word deliberately-perverted into a program of patronage for ministers. I understand the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) is entertaining invitations from New Brunswick to go back and lead the Liberal party in that province. The understanding which I have is that he has agreed to accept that position on the condition that they will move the capital of that province to Shediac, New Brunswick.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: In Canada that tendency of putting too much faith in government has been aggravated by this particular government to concentrate power in their own hands. Some people sometime impute sinster motives to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his close colleagues in this regard. Frankly, I see nothing in this pattern more sinister that arrogance. They really do believe that they can run everything better than anyone else despite abundant evidence to the contrary.

Their pattern, the clear pattern of these ten years, has been to centralize power. Economic power is gathered to Canada by investment review agencies, by competition boards, by literally more Crown corporations that the government can count, and the growth, literally by volumes, of regulations.

[Translation]

Constitutional powers have been centralized in Ottawa through the creation of federal departments which are supposed to deal with matters of provincial jurisdiction, such as urban affairs, through financial blackmail, in the case of health insurance for instance, and through interference in traditional provincial jurisdictions such as natural resources, communications and culture. The Minister of State for Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) is still trying to take away the powers of managing organizations in the area of sports and to concentrate government control. This trend toward centralization of power is one of the main causes of our problems in Canada and contributes to the increase in costs that we can no longer afford.

[English]

Years ago, Sir, if we look back on the history of political development, it required an act of imagination to recognize that government did too little, and the consequences of governments doing too little were poverty, injustice, and social turmoil. So government became active doing things that needed to be done, doing things that would not have been done without government intervention. We have an honourable history of that kind of intervention in Canada, and I am personally proud to lead a party which had the imagination to create the CBC, the Canadian Wheat Board, the Agricultural and Rural Development Act, and other necessary agencies.

However, I trust that the hon. member for Davenport, who has no concern for his constituents who are looking for work in the construction industry, will take the opportunity, now that he has been excluded again from the cabinet, to take part in this debate rather than sitting and shouting from his seat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Just as it once required, in this country and elsewhere, an act of imagination to recognize that government did too little, so is a new act of imagination required today to break conventional thinkings and recognize that government can try to do too much. Now, as then, the standard is not the size of government of even the cost of government; the standard has to be the effectiveness of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Government of Canada today, while it is unquestionably costly and unquestionably big, is just not effective in doing the jobs that Canadians expect it to do.

● (1542)

What we need is a fundamental change in our approach to the role and accountability of government. We will be kidding ourselves and the country if we pretend that another so-called "restraint program" will do. Every President of the Treasury Board during the past decade has risen at least once in this House to announce a new era of austerity in the government. And yet the size and cost of government grow and grow without effective control.

The problem runs much deeper than any tinkering with the federal books. The system itself is out of control, and what we must change are the attitudes upon which the government operates. For example, we must end the prevailing view that advancement in the public service depends on growth and spending. We must reverse a system where it is considered some kind of a disgrace for public servants to allow funds to lapse at the end of the fiscal year. The public service must know that advancement and recognition can come from saving money and ending unnecessary programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That new direction, that new spirit, has to come from the political level. Public servants did not create the present atmosphere; they are only working within the rules of the game laid down by their political masters. Indeed, it is a matter of encouragement to me that nowhere does concern about the present system run higher than among public servants themselves, who see the waste first hand and have to carry the can for political decisions that they did not make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The government is bringing in a Comptroller General, bringing him in reluctantly, and in a way that invites the question as to whether this will be an office with real powers, or just paper powers. But even if the Comptroller General has the means and the will to be effective, that appointment is simply spitting in the wind unless it is backed up by a fundamental change in attitude, not just about control of government, but about the size and effectiveness of government.

This parliament cannot wash its hands of its responsibilities simply by appointing a new official who will not even report to us. We are here to control government. That is one of the basic things that parliament is about.

We will betray our responsibility to the people of Canada unless we have the courage and the determination to act ourselves to make government less expensive and more effective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want, today, to spell out some of the ways we can do that, and my colleagues will elaborate on these proposals later in this debate. First, we need to introduce the idea of the "sunset law" into Canadian practice.

In the natural world, the sun rises and the sun sets. If you come, as I do, from the foothills of Alberta, you know that the setting of the sun is often more dramatic and inspiring than its rising. But governments violate nature. Virtually every month the sun rises on new government activities or agencies—governments get into things far more easily than they get out of them—and we need a system that will allow the sun to set on government activities after their day is done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Why should FIRA go on forever? Why should the Halifax Disaster Relief Agency have endured so long after the disaster? Why should other agencies escape the kind of life and death scrutiny which would allow MP's to discuss not just their funding but their future?

We will be describing a mechanism which will require certain Crown agencies and activities to come back to parliament at regular intervals and justify their need to continue to exist. If they can justify that need, they will carry on, perhaps in amended form. If they cannot, they will end, and that money will be available for the individuals and governments to do things that do need to be done. That is the kind of decision that parliament is supposed to make.

Because of a perversion of the rules that take power away from parliament, we can only ask questions, not stop programs. Canadians send us here for more than that, and we owe it to our country to let the people's representatives stop the waste of the people's money.

In another field we must stop the practice of government creating more and more regulations, which parliament cannot control, and with which private Canadians cannot cope.

[Translation]

The government is now compiling all existing regulations. These regulations cover 12,000 computer print-out sheets, and when they are printed and bound, they make up 15 volumes of 800 pages each, which is much more that the Revised Statutes of Canada. A few years ago, a survey by the Financial Post concluded that, in Canada, businessmen spend 35 per cent of their time conforming to government regulations. In the United States, it is estimated that government regulations cost the American economy from $50 to $60 billion a year. If we suppose that there are on the average as many regulations in Canada, which is a reasonable assumption, Mr. Speaker, the cost for the Canadian economy is at least $5 or $6 billion a year.

[English]

We need to review the need for nearly 400 federal Crown corporations, and review that calmly, sanely and without ideology. The idea of the Crown corporation is an essential and valuable part of Canadian life and history. We have needed Crown corporations in the past. We need some of them now. I think it is safe to predict we may well need to create new Crown corporations in the future. But the fact that some Crown corporations are necessary does not mean that all are, and the fact that a specific Crown corporation was necessary at one point in time does not mean that Crown corporation is necessary forever.

To my mind, the simple standard is that government intervention should come as a last resort, when other ways will not work, and not as a first resort, as it was with Petro-Can, where the motive is only to get the government into something where it should not be.

It is absurb to have more Crown corporations than you can count. It is often wasteful to spend public money on things where private money is available. It is possible, as other jurisdictions have shown, to divest of unnecessary Crown corporations in ways that will let more Canadian citizens develop an equity interest in our country.

Finally, we need new, more flexible budget planning techniques to discourage unnecessary growth in the budgets of government departments.

There is no question that we can control government spending, no question that we can reduce waste, improve effectiveness, and put government in a position again where it is capable of taking the initiatives that government must take. It is absurd, in a country like Canada with more than one million people out of work, that the government cannot take the economic initiatives that are necessary because it has wasted so much money in the past that it has a deficit that strangles its ability to act. That is unforgiveable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is nothing revolutionary about what has been proposed today. Sunset Laws are in effect in several states in the United States. That country already has underway a major review of the impact of regulations. The state of Israel has put at least 90 of its state-owned agencies up for sale. Tomorrow is the final day for the submission of tenders to the Progressive Conservative government of Manitoba for the purchase of Cybershare Limited, a data processing company purchased by the former government of that province. These things can be done if there is a government prepared to do them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: They must be done because Canadians are not going to accept leadership from a government or from a parliament that is unable to control its own excesses. That is not just a question of investment, important as investment is, and unlikely as it is that investment will come to a country that continues to build deficits and refuses to eliminate waste. The deeper question concerns the confidence ordinary Canadians have in a government which they see is costing more and more and doing less and less that makes sense to them.

Our union is under assault from several sources. One of them is the idea of separatism. Another is the reality of cynicism. People do not believe governments. People do not take parliament seriously. That we have brought upon ourselves.

In the months and years to come we must demonstrate to the people of Canada that our institutions can work, that our governments can serve real needs, that there is leadership here that is tough enough to recognize and reform our own weaknesses before prescribing for others.

Today, I have brought before the House of Commons a resolution which will allow us as a parliament to do the work that parliament was created to do, to get control of government and to make government effective again in Canada. The operative part of this motion is the request that we immediately establish a select committee to cut away at waste in government. I earnestly hope that other parties in this House will follow our example and agree to this proposal in the interest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1552)

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) closed his speech by asking all members in other parties to support his motion. He did so having argued that there are innumerable Crown corporations which ought to be eliminated, and having given us just two illustrations of what he had in mind. I suggest he did not give more examples because he has not done the work which is called for, and cannot prove the case he has tried to make. The proposal put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, if put into effect, would mean a return to the depressed economy of the thirties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: The motion states:

> That in the opinion of this House it is essential to the economic well-being and good government of Canada that action be taken to reduce the scope and rationalize the role of government activity in Canadian society by reducing the share of the national wealth currently consumed by government . . .

The Leader of the Offical Opposition wants the people of Canada to forget the depression years of the thirties when the private sector of our society collapsed and when governments were completely immobilized. It was not until the Second World War, when we realized we had to produce the necessities of war, that we put people back to work. The earlier depression was the result of government inaction, especially at a time when the private sector was not functioning.

Of course all Canadians want government to operate as efficiently as possible. Of course we want the Government of Canada to be accountable to people and to justify its programs. Of course we want to get rid of Crown corporations and agencies which no longer serve a useful purpose. But on the basis of the examples given by the Leader of the Opposition we certainly cannot support his proposal.

Canadians who have studied the level of government activity and believe governments should reduce the scope of their involvement and the share of the national wealth they consume, know that in order to achieve anything substantial it would be necessary not just to cut back on Crown corporations and agencies but to cut back on programs presently provided for the people. If one thing was obvious in the speech we have just heard it was that the hon. gentleman did not deal with programs which would have to be eliminated if there were a real intention to achieve the end proposed, that is, a significant reduction in the size of government spending and government's share of the national income.

I challenge speakers from the Conservative party who will follow to tell us which programs they would eliminate or restrict. Do they wish to cut back on health insurance or health care? Do they want to cut back on hospital insurance? Do they want to cut back the program of old age pensions? Do they want to eliminate or reduce family allowances or Canada Pensions? These are among the most expensive programs which the government, alone or in conjunction with the provinces, provides. If the Conservative party is serious about cutting back government expenditures, it is programs of this kind it will have to consider.

We have heard a great deal about Crown corporations. I join with the Leader of the Opposition in expressing amazement at the figure he produced—he told us we have some 340 of them. But Crown corporations have not been created by socialist governments—we have never had a socialist government in Canada.

An hon. Member: What is that over there?

Mr. Orlikow: Crown corporations were created in the past by Conservative and Liberal governments to meet needs which were not being met by the private sector. Consider the CNR. The rail lines were laid down by private investors with the help of huge grants of land and money from governments both federal and provincial. The companies' bonds were guaranteed by the Government of Canada. When the private companies went bankrupt the government created the CNR. Again, the Wheat Board was created by a Conservative government, as was ARDA. Are these the kinds of Crown corporations the Conservative party proposes we should get rid of? If they are, the case must be explained in much more detail.

The only two Crown corporations to which the Leader of the Opposition referred in the examples he gave were FIRA and Petro-Can. We can easily understand why the Conservative party opposes the operation of Petro-Can. That party is quite happy to leave the oil industry in the hands of the U.S. multinational corporations which control about 97 per cent of it. We do not believe the multinational oil corporations have been working in the interest of the Canadian people. We are aware of the fantastic increases in company profits. We have been fed stories which change from month to month and from year to year about the extent of the reserves available in Canada.

It is interesting that the Leader of the Opposition should talk about cutting back on government expenditure at the same time as Conservative provinces are calling on the federal government to increase its activities in various fields such as the provision of employment, the provision of forestry services, and the funding of health care services. This would imply the expenditure by the federal government of more money and the employment of more staff to monitor that expenditure.

● (1602)

Conservative provincial governments are among the highest employers of public servants. According to Statistics Canada, in September, 1977, the province of Newfoundland, which has a Conservative government, had 23 provincial public servants per thousand population; the province of New Brunswick, which has a Conservative government, had 37.1 provincial public servants per thousand population; the province of Alberta, which has a Conservative government, had 26.2 provincial public servants per thousand population; and the province of Manitoba, which had a New Democratic government until recently, had only 14.9 provincial public servants per thousand population.

The Conservative party is saying, "Do as we say and not as our fellow Conservatives do." The New Democratic Party wants better government, and not bigger government.

When one looks at the federal public service, it is interesting to note the increase in the number of federal public servants. There has been an approximate 3 per cent to 4 per cent increase per year. At the same time as this increase is taking place, the increase in the number of senior public servants has been tremendous.

I should like to refer to the SX employee category, which is an executive classification for federal government employees. From 1968 to 1975 there was an increase in it from 381 to 1,260, an increase of over 20 per cent a year. Next, I should like to deal with professional employees, which is the category below the executive class. This category includes economists, lawyers, engineers and other specialists in senior federal government positions. During the period from 1974 to 1976, when supposedly the government had accepted the fact that a slowdown was necessary, their numbers increased from 5,938 to 7,521, which is an increase of almost 27 per cent, or over 13 per cent a year.

Did this tremendous increase in the senior level of federal public servants provide a better government? Did it provide a better service for the ordinary citizen? On the basis of my observations, I have to indicate that it did not. This is not the time to discuss why that took place, but it was a mistake of major proportion which is costing Canadians tens of millions of dollars.

At the same time as those tremendous increases at the top have occurred, there has been a steady, continuous increase in the hiring of temporary employees for relatively unskilled jobs. I am referring to secretarial help, filing clerks and so on. Also at the same time there was an explosion in the number of contracts which have been let for studies by various departments into present and future governmental policies, and examination of administration or internal operations.

The amount of money allocated for contracts has increased continuously. I should like to compare 1973 with 1974. During those two years in the Department of Agriculture there was a 131 per cent increase in the amount of money allocated for contracts; in the Department of Fisheries and the Environment there was a 104 per cent increase; and in the Department of National Health and Welfare there was a 179 per cent increase. Those examples indicate that the increases amounted to over 100 per cent in those years.

Also I have figures for term, casual and other temporary employees for the years 1971 to 1975. It is not a complete list, because it is difficult to get one. Over those four years there has been an increase of 133 per cent.

Government has permitted senior level bureaucrats to grow at an unprecedented and unwarranted rate. We have been told that has stopped, which is the case every year, and usually we find the government has found a way around the so-called freeze, and is spending more money and hiring more people. My party is suspicious of what has happened.

I should like to return to the motion we are debating today. The principles of the motion cannot be accepted. The concept that the percentage of the gross national product, which is now devoted to providing services by the three levels of government, can be sharply cut back cannot be accepted, particularly at a time when the private sector is not operating at full capacity. It would be a disaster for the three levels of government to cut back sharply. That would not be productive. In fact, it would simply increase the percentage of unemployed Canadians, which is much greater than it ought to be at the present time. Because that is the situation, the New Democratic Party cannot support the motion proposed by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition. We propose to vote against it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised when I read the motion introduced by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark).

At last the Progressive Conservatives realize that the government administration has complicated matters but as the spokesman for the New Democratic Party stated a while ago, they have yet to see that when they were in power they operated exactly as the Liberals do right now.

Generally speaking, the motion advocates setting up a committee to consider the possibility of putting an end to government intervention in certain areas, a curb on the excessive use of regulations under legislation introduced in the House and the removal of some government agencies to improve the planning of the budget. On the whole, those are wise suggestions. However one must realize that the government administration is inefficient.

Not long ago we were discussing the problem in the Post Office and the increase in the cost of postal services in Canada. Recently the Prime Minister said that Canadians might very well have to get used to not having their mail delivered at home. In other areas, in growing municipalities, they say they can no longer afford home delivery of mail. We have come to the point where we can see multiple mail boxes installed on the street corners downtown. The Post Office gives half the services it used to give three or four years ago and we have to pay three times as much as we used to. Things have gone down to the point where it is impossible to know when a letter will be received. The service stinks and that is due to a large extent to the increase in the number of public servants, to the increase in the handling process. That is what makes the costs double or triple. And then we are told that we are going to keep on paying without getting our money's worth in service and even that the services we were used to will be cut down.

The Post Office is just one area. For instance they mentioned Air Canada, the so-called unity crisis, the east-west confrontation, and we realize that this government agency cannot provide adequate service to the Canadian public. I have just returned from a trip to western Canada and Quebec. When I fly to Vancouver I pay as much as I would to go and bask in the sun down south or in the Caribbeans, where a company systematically refuses to give Canada any publicity, exaggerates costs and provides to its customers a deplorable service which is not in line with the price of the ticket. Bureaucracy is on the rise again.

Remedies exist. I could mention the fact that we had to fight to obtain at least two official languages spoken on board Air Canada planes. I could even fly from Vancouver to Edmonton where people were served in two languages, either English or German, but not French. That is the approach taken by Air Canada, a corporation which is unable to provide the service we are paying for, which ought to be able, with the assistance of the government, to provide a service superior to that of any other airline, but which just simply cannot. I was dealing this afternoon with a matter which again demonstrates the ineffectiveness of the government, and on two occasions the Chair had to urge me to put my question, for there are cases which date back to 1970-72 when agreements were signed by the government.

The matter I raised this afternoon during the question period was related to the post office in Rouyn where it had been agreed in 1972 to start the construction of a new federal building in the riding of Témiscamingue, and indeed funds of $200,000, $250,000 and $300,000 had been allocated for three consecutive years; but after those funds have been spent, we hear in 1978 that they are not going ahead with that building, that it has to be delayed for a year supposedly, as they say in the letter, because of adjustments in the department's budget, there will be no funds available for that project before fiscal year 1979-80. What a weird administration! Hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent on the preparation of a project and when the time comes to see it through the whole thing flops and you have to start from scratch again. That is the very type of administration we now have.

I was talking about Air Canada and the fact that it costs $100 to fly to Florida whereas for the same distance within Canada you have to pay $200 or $300.

In public works, for example in the case of the CBC, another governmental agency, the same thing has happened. Fabulous amounts of money have been spent and the public does not even know what is going on in Canada where, day after day, we ask questions in the House, we deliver speeches and the CBC systematically refuses to report what happens in the House. They are playing a political game. They systematically refuse to present the point of view of a fourth party in the House of Commons. And we pay for administrations like those! As for paying, as for raising the subventions to those corporations, no problem! Bills and budgets are submitted to us every year, and every year we have to raise the budgets of those corporations while at the same time downgrading the services they give us.

I was talking about regulations a moment ago. The government is adding too many regulations to the laws after they are passed. We had this situation in unemployment insurance where it was agreed that people over 65, for example, could draw unemployment insurance benefits and where, under the law, some bureaucrats decide by themselves to enact a regulation cancelling the law and they put this regulation into force. We see that constantly in most of the acts in which, through the play of regulations, the government tries to circumvent the law, tries to fiddle with it, and even after three cases were won before the courts for those people of 65, the government comes again with another bill to justify regulations previously passed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Present government measures will require fortunes to be spent and will not solve the problem. Today we know that we have an unemployment problem across the country. The only solution the government has found so far was to introduce band-aid programs, investing money in an attempt, was it said, to reduce unemployment. Year after year it became obvious that unemployment was still growing and in many cases, instead of reducing unemployment, the government was increasing it. That is the case with the Canada Works Program, for instance, where in a riding like mine, the rate of unemployment has reached 21.8 per cent, where only 57.6 per cent of the people work; and we ask the minister to invest money, not to spend it to give short term jobs of eight, ten or 12 weeks, but to invest money to build plants, to create companies that could finance themselves later on, to launch and help small businesses.

Instead they prefer to give $1,658,000 for Canada Works projects as they did in my riding. That in fact enables us to create 314 jobs for a certain period of time, but after, what do you get? Nothing at all! The government did not try to help those who are now filling applications for employment. Small businesses have been providing permanent employment for several decades but with the proliferation of taxation forms nowadays they must spend 30 to 35 per cent of their revenues and their time only to fill those forms which increase their production costs. So they have to reduce their staff to make ends meet and operate efficiently. The government does not help those small businesses. In big businesses it is the same situation.

A few days ago I made a suggestion to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) about mining in northwestern Quebec where Noranda Mines might be in serious trouble next year, if not this year, because of an unsufficient supply of ore. Mining production in northern Ontario has been reduced and we know that in many cases, because of transportation costs, it is cheaper to process western copper in Japan than in Canada not because of production costs as such but because it is more expensive to ship copper to the east of the country than to Japan. Recently I urged the department to set special rates to promote employment for Canadians and I asked for special freight rates for the transportation of western ore to eastern Canada where our processing costs are competitive with those of any other country but where the problem is one of transportation cost.

I received a letter from the minister telling me that my proposition was good but that they were not about to make special concessions in the transportation field. In the meantime, imports are allowed in across the country, the doors are wide open, jobs are destroyed. We had that problem in the shoe industry. Every day we get letters from producers who would be quite ready to increase production if only the government would leave them alone, if it ceased overtaxing them, if it reduced the ever growing pile of forms to be supplied.

Everyday we get some. I received one not later than today. Washing machine manufacturers were facing in 1966 a 37.6 per cent competition from imports, and produced 31,203 units. In 1976, the last year for which data are available, 43,293 were made in Canada, while imports accounted for 78.6 per cent of sales. The government on the one hand reduces our production, it reduces producer efficiency through government intervention, and on the other it allows massive imports. With such an approach, understandably unemployment has reached astronomical levels, as in my area for instance. We have reached 21.8 per cent, and this is no joke.

And it is still less funny that 57.6 per cent of the people only are at work. So, 57.6 deducted from 100 per cent leaves 42.4 per cent of the people not working, not producing for the country. Of that number, 21 per cent get unemployment insurance benefits, but where are the others? Yet the government does not find a way to invest or help existing corporations reduce their costs. Instead we have social measures, band-aids. That is the attitude of this government now.

What are the solutions? First, to help those small businesses, lower interest rates on the money they borrow. They are no longer able to operate with their own money, they have to borrow to finance production, inventories, sales, sales advertising. Our governments are doing exactly the same thing by going into debt, they pay interest on it and fuel inflation. The further we move ahead, the more they spend, the more taxes you pay, the fewer services you get in return. We have been calling for a reduction in interest rates on loans to an acceptable level of 5 or 6 per cent as it was in 1967 before this Liberal government blew the lid off interest rates and sent inflation on its way up. We also ask that governments be financed by interest free loans from the Bank of Canada. Those are solutions that would reduce administrative costs, production costs for businesses and enable us to start over again, put production and the economy back on a positive track and enable us at the same time to create jobs that are now being destroyed by the attitude of this government of applying a band-aid on a wooden leg.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few remarks I wanted to make, and I sincerely think that the creation of a committee to study those solutions would certainly not be the best way of solving this problem. But I think that if we really want to take major steps the population as a whole must make government understand that it is time for it to stop its interventions in all areas. As I often noticed in my tours, people are telling us: We are prepared to work, we are prepared to produce but ask government to stop scratching our backs and continuously taking away what we can produce. I think the government will understand through this motion that time has long since come for it to get off the backs of industrialists and businessmen, to allow them to live because they are the ones who can create productive jobs, not government, as it is now.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, when some of my colleagues read the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), they were somewhat critical of its content. When I was given the motion to read last night, I looked forward to this debate. I thought it could be potentially constructive. Some of the wording in the motion is current and topical, and the House should address itself to it. Having said that, I must say now, after listening to three speeches, particularly that of the Leader of the Opposition, that we have not advanced the theory or the practicality of the intent of this motion very far. We have heard some motherhood—or perhaps fatherhood—statements, but a very distinct lack of specific recommendations.

The Leader of the Opposition started off by hitting the high plane. He caught my ear and my fancy by saying that he would not be partisan, but then he proceeded to be very personal and very partisan. That was a slight disappointment.

In any event, the motion proposes that another parliamentary committee be struck to examine an area which is fundamental to parliament. It proposes another committee to do the job of the Public Accounts Committee. I think the Public Accounts Committee is doing very well and with increasing competence, and generally speaking—with some relapses from time to time—in a fairly non-partisan and constructive fashion. The motion denigrates the whole process of examination of estimates, which is made up of procedures which were endorsed and approved by this parliament.

Mr. Clark: Railroaded through.

Mr. Andras: The Leader of the Opposition criticized very selectively. He made reference to the 1976 report of the Auditor General, which nobody on this side of the House would parade before anybody with great joy. Admittedly, it was certainly a blast at the government in terms of financial control. However, that was very selective because the hon. member did not even make passing reference to the 1977 report of the Auditor General. If the hon. member had done that, he would have been a great deal more credible. Some opposition members in different parties have been straightforward enough to admit that the 1977 report pointed out that there was a vast improvement. As a matter of fact I heard one of them say—in the House, and it is recorded in Hansard—that it was one of the best he had seen in the many years he had been in parliament. It would have given the Leader of the Opposition a little more credibility if he had at least nodded toward the evidence the Auditor General offered of the beginnings of improvement and the good start which has been made. However, that is the way it goes.

The Leader of the Opposition made reference to the office of Comptroller General. I want to assure the hon. member that we will be debating this in more detail in the not too distant future. The appointment to this office is taken very seriously. The delay in finding and appointing a comptroller general is an indication of our agreement with the other half of the Auditor General's recommendation that, equally as important as the creation of the office, is the obtaining of the services of a fairly competent person whose competence is recognized. Our search for the right person is almost complete and I am hopeful that we can attract a very competent person from the outside.

● (1632)

The House might like to know that one of the interesting problems, which I shall not dwell upon, is that when you seek a competent person with the necessary credentials and experience in the outside world, then you are searching for someone with experience and earnings considerably above the very top level of salary offered in the federal public service. I say that in light of the often quoted criticisms of the level of pay offered public servants in this country. Six candidates were considered to have the qualifications, but we were faced with salary ranges $30,000 to $75,000 above the maximum range of top level senior public servants.

Mr. Paproski: Is that what Juneau is making now?

Mr. Andras: It has nothing to do with Juneau. That is utterly ridiculous. Mr. Speaker, there is no senior deputy minister in the federal government who is at the top range of the allowable maximum for senior deputy ministers.

Mr. Paproski: Did you say $60,000 or $65,000?

Mr. Andras: I was using those figures when I was referring to the competition we face in attracting qualified people. I simply say that, before we talk about those salaries being completely out of line, we must recognize what the competition is paying. However, I do not want to be diverted.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the growth of government spending in this country. Since I am on public record as suggesting it is time we looked at a general curtailment of the spending of governments, I am not going to attack that general theme. This is where I would also probably differ with the comments of the hon. member of Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). As is sometimes the case, I find myself in the middle, but I hope my position is based on more facts than he has offered.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke about growth. I shall use a slightly different time period because the statistics in my mind relate to probably a ten-year period and may not coincide, except for the final year. The growth over ten or eleven years went from about 30 per cent of GNP to about 41 per cent at the end of 1976. Those final figures have been shaded slightly downward because of the adjustment of GNP figures. That is simply a statistical change, but nevertheless the trend is there. In examining where that growth took place I should like to place the following comments on the record.

At the beginning of that ten-year period the federal percentage of GNP was in fact 15 per cent, and this has grown to a little over 16 per cent, at the same time as the provincial and municipal share to make up that 30 to 41 per cent has grown from 16 per cent to 25 per cent.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned his fears about constitutional attacks. In this context I want to place on the record an interesting fact that I have observed. In terms of taxing and spending, this country is the most decentralized in the world, other than Switzerland. The proportion of revenue raised by taxation—federal, provincial and municipal—and the spending in the same ratio compared to any country except Switzerland, indicates that more is raised and more is spent by other levels of government than at the federal level. I grant that the total of all spending may be too high, but it would probably be more constructive to look more closely where the growth in spending occurs. We have recognized this fact and tried to do something about it in the last few years. There is no doubt that during the minority government period of 1972 to 1974—which I have described as being a very responsive and expensive one—we saw year on year increases that were unsustainable for any length of time.

In 1975 we articulated a policy to constrain the growth of federal government spending, all budgetary, non-budgetary, capital, non-capital spending and during the full fiscal year, to not more than the growth in the gross national product, that is, real and inflationary. We have met those commitments ever since.

In 1975 or 1976, the first full year in which this would have been effective, we indicated we were aiming for a spending ceiling of $42,150 billion, which would have represented a 13 per cent increase over the previous year. We cut that shortly thereafter and came in $1 billion under our reduced and publicly stated objective, and held it to around 10 per cent. With any luck in the six or seven weeks that remain of the present fiscal year to March 31, I am quite confident that we can bring in the final expenditures for this fiscal year at or below the committed public total of $44,450 billion. That will represent about an 8 per cent increase over the previous year, which adjustment from the 7 per cent as we had announced is purely because we came in $1 billion under the previous year. I think 8 per cent is not a bad performance, and when inflation is discounted it really represents no real growth.

The Leader of the Opposition spread gloom and doom saying that investment is leaving the country because of mismanagement by this government and so on. He had the temerity to quote a Royal Bank of Canada economist. That gives me the opportunity to quote that person's boss—the Chairman of the Board of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. Earle McLaughlin. I do not think that by any stretch of the imagination he could be called a closet liberal or even a person lacking in realism. Mr. McLaughlin said:

> . . . the most calamitous thing for business and Canada would be to be swept away by the waves of pessimism often displayed by too many.

Although he acknowledged that over the past two or three years Canadian economic performance has not matched that of the United States, he chided the business community for its short memories of Canadian successes. He was talking about the past seven years and he said that selection of years was "a purely arbitrary medium term yardstick", because he said almost any other similar reference period would do. He also said that Canadians have outperformed the United States by almost any economic yardstick you might propose. That is the boss of the economist that the Leader of the Opposition quoted in absolutely different terms.

Mr. McLaughlin said also that in that period real personal incomes in Canada had increased 38 per cent, even taking into account the weakening Canadian dollar, compared with a U.S. increase of 17 per cent.

He said that the Canadian material standard of living had increased more than in the United States and, despite our unemployment, we had been creating jobs, new jobs, 50 per cent faster than the U.S.

He commented on another vital indicator when he said the total investment in Canada, investment spending in Canada, rose by 168 per cent compared to a growth of only 107 per cent in the United States and, he added, the past 12 or 24 months notwithstanding. He said that Canadian corporate after tax profits grew by 186 per cent, 7 per cent more than the United States.

He had more to say, but I will not bore the House with the rest of it. I just wanted to indicate to the Leader of the Opposition and members of the House that there are differences of opinion. I think the most important thing I can comment upon is Mr. McLaughlin's statement that it would be calamitous for business and Canada to be swept away by the waves of pessimism that are inherent in some of the comments we hear.

● (1642)

To return to the more specific subclauses of the motion before us, I quote:

(1) the enactment of "Sunset Laws" to provide for the termination of programs or agencies which have outlived their usefulness;

I do not find too much argument with the selective application of "sunset laws" of a very special type and for very special situations. Indeed I think this government has done that on occasion, and I can think of certain programs. I remember that when I had the responsibility for housing and urban affairs we had the sewage treatment loan program which had an expiry date, which is a "sunset law" application. We have the Neighbourhood Improvement Program right now, and I think we have to take a close look at this one. It is due to expire at the end of March. There is the anti-inflation program which is operating under the date of a "sunset law" and requires a review by parliament if it is to be continued.

If that is the kind of application, and one could think of others, that the opposition is suggesting be wisely used over a period of time, I can agree with that. If the hon. Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we go the route that is being touted in the new American fad that all departments and agencies be placed under "sunset laws", then there are certain theoretical advantages to the review or evaluation that that triggers. But let us face the practical fact of life that this parliament could not, nor could the American Congress, deal with the legislative burden that kind of a blanket across-the-board "sunset law" application would require.

Mr. Clark: You could do it one at a time.

Mr. Andras: If the hon. Leader of the Opposition is talking about a selective, periodic review, zero based budgeting and that kind of thing, I do not think he made it clear, nor is it clear in the motion that may be different.

Mr. Clark: "Sunset laws" applied one at a time.

Mr. Andras: That is exactly what I said, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Clark: No, Sir.

Mr. Andras: —when I said I had some sympathy with it on a selective basis and on a very carefully planned basis.

An hon. Member: Let us have a committee look into it.

Mr. Andras: Before you have a committee deal with that particular subject, there is another committee that perhaps should meet and look into the total revision of the rules and procedures of this House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Right on.

Mr. Andras: Because the legislative procedures under which we are operating now are about 19th century, and we would have to bring this House into the 20th century in order to provide for many improvements of that nature. That is where you would have to begin, because the theoretical suggestions of these kinds of improvements would absolutely bog down if you did not have that accomplished.

Mr. Clark: Talk to Allan MacEachen.

Mr. Andras: While I listened with great interest for the specific nature of the dramatic chops that the opposition was going to make with respect to Crown corporations, I only heard FIRA and Petro-Can mentioned. I thought Petro-Can would come up; it is one of their favourite flogging horses. FIRA, that is another matter.

There is a suggestion of the development of criteria. I have not heard a suggestion of what the criteria would be for the elimination of Crown corporations. Again, I am simply saying that in my disappointment at not hearing specific suggestions here, just the grand generalizations, this does not mean that we do not have a great deal of sympathy or that we are not looking very closely at the idea of what we can effectively get rid of and put into the private sector. I will look forward to constructive suggestions respecting that aspect.

Because of the pressure of time. Mr. Speaker, I would like now to come more to the final subclause in the motion, the adaptation of budget planning techniques, etc. I think this is an area to which, on a non-partisan basis, that we, at some time, have to address ourselves in this House. But let us please understand what we are really getting at here. As the President of the Treasury Board I doubt that there are many people more conscious of the rigidity and lack of flexibility that our present expenditure process involves.

Under any acceptable ceiling of expenditure I can tell you that you start off with about 57 per cent of your budget precommitted in about 11 or 12 statutory programs. Let us not argue about the quality of those programs, I am simply telling you the facts. Much of this is in a book which was published about a year ago explaining how your tax dollar is spent, and I commend it to you for reading. This is a mutual problem for all of us if we are going to be serious about whether it is bigger government or better government, or whatever the clichés might end up saying.

Some 57 per cent of our expenditures are committed at the beginning. They are basically the social programs, of which most of us in this House are proud, even if a lot of us think they are probably things which have to be looked at, for example adjustments. An extra 10 or 12 per cent, I cannot recall the exact figure, is also precommitted in the nature of contractual obligations to the provinces, such as manpower training contracts etc. You could argue about their value, but they are commitments. There are longer term commitments, established program financing, and a dozen other things, with the result that 23 per cent of the budget of expenditures of the federal government today are transfer payments to the provinces. The federal government collects the revenue in the main, obviously through taxation, and then transfers this to the provinces. Equalization payments and many others of that nature, establish program financing, for instance. Again, I am not arguing with the merits of the particular programs. I am talking about the totality and buildup of this situation.

Certainly the federal government, and to a degree parliamentarians on all sides of this House receive criticism of the federal government expenditures. But the fact is that the 23 per cent right off the top, which we just pass through to the provinces, which they spend, and which we have collected for them. That is not recognized generally, Mr. Speaker.

In recent years I have often wondered if it is not at least better for the Canadian people to have a much clearer picture of that distribution of transfers. Of course another sizeable portion of our expenditures is transfers to persons. So when you add transfers to persons and transfers to provinces, you have absorbed approximately 50 per cent of the federal government's expenditures. What is left is what we call operations of government. I will show you the figures at any time, or I can elaborate on them in more detail in committee. They have not really grown that much.

An interesting fact I observed in analysing certain facts the other day is that we are all conscious of the growth of the size of the public service. Indeed, during the last two or three years we have been taking very definite measures to restrain and control that. The first year, and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Winnipeg North.

Mr. Andras: North, thank you. He talked about this exponential growth particularly in the senior management category. He did quote some figures that were close to being accurate anyway. He mentioned that for some years the totality of our man year growth was around 3 or 4 percent. But starting in 1976 we committed ourselves to constrain it to 1½ per cent, and we came in at just above one per cent. Last year, and I can assure you, and I will be tabling estimates later this month, for next year we will be continuing that restraint to about one half of one per cent growth. We will be taking quite drastic measures with the senior management complement.

The contract bit is a myth which the opposition members have been running through the rhetorical mill for four or five years, some of them knowing very well how fallacious it is, and I will be very glad to deal with that when I table the estimates later this month.

Flexible budgeting—who can argue? The priorities of any party in government will have to change from time to time. If you have the rigidity of precommitment to the degree which I have tried to describe to you, 57 per cent on established programs, indexed in the main, and another long term sizeable portion of any expenditure ceiling committed to contractual obligations, then I agree we need more flexibility. It means we need to have the guts in all parts of this House to look at some of those established programs. There is no other way to get flexibility than by looking at those kinds of decisions. I have not heard from the opposition the selective programs which they would be prepared to cut.

It is a strange pattern to listen to all this talk from the Leader of the Opposition about over-expenditures, waste, where we should cut back and all the rest. As reported at page 2251 of Hansard, he took exactly the opposite line. The implication of what he said to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) was that because there had been a brutal tightening up of unemployment insurance benefits, we should in turn send that money to the municipalities for welfare. In that narrow context, I cannot see his argument. The end point was that unemployment insurance benefits should not be cut back or welfare payments should be increased. Either one of those would involve more expenditure.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the minister is not deliberately distorting either the language or the purport of what I said. I do not have the question in front of me as he does. He will recall that the questions to his colleague had to do with discussions that that colleague might enter into with the provinces and municipalities which were being victimized by the failure of this government to generate jobs, in part because this government over the past ten years of which the minister has been speaking entrapped itself into such heavy expenditures that it does not have the fiscal flexibility to do those things which ought to be done. I am sure he will want the record set straight.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, before this becomes a debate on what the Leader of the Opposition may have intended or an interpretation of what he said, I will leave it to him to examine it. It is page 2251 of Hansard. I say, with all sincerity, that clearly the intent comes to me that he was implying that you should not tighten up unemployment insurance or you should give the money to municipalities in terms of welfare. Let me get away from the partisan comment on it.

I am illustrating the difficulty of talking about general control, adjustment, more flexibility, and changing of priorities. That can mean only one thing. You have to cut back in some areas. It certainly is not as easy as members opposite try to make out. You do not follow the totally impractical suggestion of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) of firing 60,000 public servants in one fell swoop.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He did not say that.

Mr. Andras: He was quoted as saying it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He did not say it.

Mr. Andras: We often suffer from that kind of thing.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You should not do it in the House.

Mr. Andras: To be accused of that by the opposition is most interesting indeed.

I regret that I probably will not be able to hear every comment of every member speaking in this debate. I assure hon. members that the general theme and thrust of it is very close to my portfolio and responsibility, and is of great interest to me. I will read Hansard for any comments by members that I may miss as a result of a few minutes' absence from the House.

So far, I am a little bit disappointed in the lack of specific suggestions by the Leader of the Opposition, the New Democratic Party and, indeed, the Social Credit party. Perhaps I should have a little patience. Maybe in the course of debate there will be something we can get our teeth into.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, before the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) resumes his seat, I wonder if he would accept a question.

Mr. Andras: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crouse: When the President of the Treasury Board referred to the speech made by W. Earle McLaughlin, chairman and chief executive officer of the Royal Bank of Canada, it was fortuitous that I was reading the same speech. The title of the speech is "There is a Bright Side". The minister quoted from page 1. I flip over to page 2, and there I read as follows:

> Now I must admit that 1978 is not shaping up as the greatest year in economic terms. We will be fortunate to achieve real growth of more than 3½ or 4 per cent. However, inflation—that corrosive cancer on the market system—will continue at an unacceptable level. That is simply intolerable. Nothing will destroy investment, growth prospects, or rising living standards faster than continuing inflation.

Does the President of the Treasury Board agree with those remarks by Mr. McLaughlin?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree that inflation is insidious and has to be fought.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Like the government.

Mr. Andras: By every government, and all institutions in the private sectors, unions and so on. I have no disagreement fundamentally, but those two or three comments really do not indicate what the Leader of the Opposition was saying about gloom and doom, that investment is leaving the country and everything has gone to hell. That does not relate to the more optimistic observation of the Chairman of the Royal Bank.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, there are only one or two observations that can be made with regard to the intervention of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). One thing was obvious to anyone here this afternoon, or to anyone who has been following the activities of this government in recent years. The minister spend 20 minutes, more or less, making his comments, but like his tired and weary colleagues, he failed to say anything concrete.

The minister's intervention was tired, almost apologetic. It is not acceptable to the people of this country. The sooner they wake up and realize that, the better they will be.

Following the return of those on this great cross country tour to promote policy sessions of the government and the Liberal party, I hope the President of the Treasury Board will heed the advice of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) and the president of his party, the distinguished Senator from Nova Scotia. They have suggested that one current theme is that this government is too big, that it must be reduced in size.

With regard to my colleagues to the left, their interest and concern in the subject matter of the motion are such that they did not even bother to deal with it this afternoon.

I intend to follow very closely on the suggestion put forward by my leader with regard to "sunset laws". One particular aspect of it requires our wholehearted concern.

It has been indicated that this government has grown at an alarming rate in recent years. Governments, agencies and departments grow. They do not have a natural life. They do not come to an end. We have no mechanism or capacity to determine whether their programs continue to be justified, or whether they should be amended to bring them more into line with the purposes and requirements of the present time. In fact most of them seem to acquire a life of their own. They grow on themselves.

● (1702)

My leader has suggested a unique and promising approach, an approach by way of "sunset laws" which is currently being used in the United States—the Congress is actively considering it along with about 24 of the states. The concept involves the setting of fixed dates for the termination of programs in order to bring about a full-scale review and oblige a decision to be made one way or another. If the agencies and programs concerned are serving the purpose for which they were created, their operations could be extended by a positive resolution. If they were deemed to be no longer useful or necessary they could be modified or allowed to lapse.

"Sunset legislation" is only one method by which legislatures can assess the effectiveness of their past endeavours and eliminate programs which are ineffective or unnecessary, while undertaking new initiatives suited to the times and circumstances. It is only one way of revising priorities and allocating scarce dollars and human resources in a manner more consistent with the need.

There appear to be three measures central to the concept. First, there is provision for a mandatory review. Legislation would contain a termination provision under which the House would be obliged to reconsider and reorganize programs, in default of which they would terminate. This places the onus on supporters of programs to justify their continued existence rather than requiring opponents of programs to put forward reasons for their discontinuance.

The second approach is through a budgetary process. The legislation tends to focus on the funding of a program or agency rather than on the act establishing it. The "sunset" provision terminates the funding authority, leaving the laws and regulations unaffected. Thus a program can be re-established or continued without the need to create new legislation.

The third principle involves broadbased evaluation. The mandatory evaluation of a program or agency should take place, we suggest, in the broadest possible context, that is, in context with all other programs or agencies of a similar function. This would ensure that overlapping programs or duplication of services are identified and eliminated. It should be pointed out that the termination clause inherent in any "sunset" legislation is only the mechanism which obliges a review or re-evaluation process to take place. In no way does it imply that agencies or programs listed should be terminated; only that they will be terminated if the statutory review does not take place.

The major ingredients which would make for effective legislation include time-limited budgetary authority, classification of programs and agencies, a program review schedule, definition of review process and responsibilities, evaluation criteria, and a termination process. These elements should be clearly defined within the legislation to ensure that the legislating body understands its responsibilities.

It is not my custom to refer to the specific details of proposals we are putting forward, but on this occasion I believe I should go into somewhat greater detail than usual with respect to the positive steps which we believe could be taken by the government, and which would be taken by us when we form the government, to curtail and bring into line some of the programs and agencies which have been in operation for years and years without review. With this in mind, I turn to a draft bill which I have before me. It will not be necessary for me to read the preamble because my leader has placed its purpose clearly on record. As a short title, the legislation may be cited as the "Canada Sunset Act, 1978." I shall not read the definition clause because it follows the usual pattern. Thereafter, the act would read:

Part II

Termination

New Federal Bodies

3. (1) Subject to Section 5 of this Act, every Federal Body established after this Act comes into force shall terminate eight years after such Federal Body is established.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection one, the Governor in Council may, by regulation subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons, designate a termination date to occur before eight years after such Federal Body is established.

Existing Federal Bodies

4. (1) Subject to Section 5, every Federal Body enumerated in Schedule I of this Act shall terminate on October 31, 1980.

(2) Subject to Section 5, every Federal Body enumerated in Schedule II of this Act shall terminate on October 31, 1982.

(3) Subject to Section 5, every Federal Body enumerated in Schedule III of this Act shall terminate on October 31 1984.

(4) Subject to Section 5, every Federal Body enumerated in Schedule IV of this act shall terminate on October 31, 1986.

(5) Where a Federal Body that exists at the time this Act comes into force is not referred to in any of the Schedules of this Act, subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons, the Governor in Council may, by regulation, provide for a termination date for such Federal Body.

(6) For the purposes of Subsections (1) and (5), subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons, the Governor in Council may, by regulation, change the termination date of a Federal Body.

(7) Notwithstanding anything in this Section, every Federal Body that exists at the time this Act comes into force is deemed to terminate not later than eight years after this Act comes into force.

Continuance of Federal Bodies

5. (1) A Federal Body shall not terminate pursuant to this Act where the House of Commons, after considering a committee's report upon such a Federal Body, resolves that it is in the best interests of the public to continue such Federal Body.

(2) For the purposes of this Section, a motion to continue a Federal Body under review shall be debated for no longer than five hours at the end of which time such motion shall be decided forthwith without debate or amendment. Where a Federal Body terminates, the House of Commons may resolve after considering committee report to re-establish such body.

Re-examination

6. Subject to Section 5, where the House of Commons has resolved to continue a Federal Body, that Body shall terminate eight years after that resolution.

Review Process

Purpose of Committee Report

7. A committee shall assess the public need for the continuation of a Federal Body under review, and shall table its report thereon in the House of Commons before the termination date of that Federal Body has been reached.

Committee's report

8. When a committee reviews a Federal Body it shall:

(a) Examine the reasons why the Federal Body under review was established and identify that Body's objectives and mandate:

(b) Assess the degree to which the Federal Body has

(i) achieved its objectives and fulfilled its mandate;

(ii) established or been subject to policies, such as but not limited to regulations and standards that are consistent with its objectives and mandate; and

(iii) promote public participation in its decision-making process;

(c) assess any alternative methods of achieving the objectives and fulfilling the mandate of the Federal Body that may be more effective or more economical;

● (1712)

(d) analyse the impact of

(i) terminating the Federal Body;

(ii) continuing the Federal Body at its current level of activity;

(iii) reducing the Federal Body's level of activity;

(iv) increasing the Federal body's level of activity; and

(e) provide a statement including the number of and classifications of beneficiaries served by the Federal Body.

I am quoting from the draft bill in order to indicate the process of review which is necessary, and to reassure hon. members opposite, as well as the minister, that we have given some thought to this. In fact we are concerned enough to bring the matter before the House this afternoon. Again I should like to quote from the draft bill we hope to introduce very soon. It continues:

9. The Auditor General of Canada shall make such examinations of a Federal Body that would enable him to fulfil his duties as provided for in the Auditor General Act, and shall submit his report to the Speaker of the House of Commons within a reasonable time before the Federal Body's termination date and the Speaker of the House of Commons shall lay each such report before the House of Commons forthwith after receipt thereof by him or, if that House is not then sitting, on the first day next thereafter that the House of Commons is sitting.

10. In reviewing a Federal Body a committee may
(a) consider the Auditor General's report referred to in Section 9;
(b) receive and consider written representations from the public;
(c) conduct public hearings; or
(d) receive reports and recommendations from officials of the Federal Body under review.

Part IV

Effect of Termination

11. Where a Federal Body is terminated pursuant to this Act no payment shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the purpose of operating such a body, and the Governor General shall not sign a warrant prepared on the order of the Governor in Council pursuant to Section 21 of the Financial Administration Act.
12. When a Federal Body terminates pursuant to this Act it shall be afforded a reasonable period of time to conclude its operations and to wind up its affairs.
13. (1) The termination of a Federal Body pursuant to this Act shall not in any way abrogate, abridge or diminish the right of a person to any legal remedy to which he may be entitled.
(2) This Act is binding on Her Majesty in the right of Canada.

Commencement

14. This Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

The course which I have followed today is somewhat unusual. Since coming to the Chamber, I cannot remember an occasion where a private member, backbencher or opposition member, read the contents of a proposed bill which his party hoped to put forward in a very positive and real fashion so that it would be considered before the House.

The review process must take place in the House of Commons, rather than in an existing or yet to be established agency. The main purpose is to force parliament to re-examine its past decision-making and reaffirm its priorities. This is the job of politicians, not public servants. It has been suggested that the review process take place within standing committees, and that the decision to extend the life of an agency be made by a positive resolution of the House.

There may be some confusion as to exactly what "sunset" legislation is all about. The fact that 20 or 40 government agencies may be scheduled for termination over the next eight years in no way implies that these agencies will be terminated or that they are not useful. It is only the mechanism to ensure that the goals and activities of these agencies are in fact re-evaluated by politicians in light of the needs, ambitions, hopes and priorities of Canadians. Pressure groups need to be made aware that "sunset" legislation probably will help them in their function and will in fact act in their best interests, as it will give them an opportunity on a regular basis to review and update the departments and agencies they support.

Government complexity and unaccountability has become an increasingly critical problem. Basic questions about the relationship between people and their government need to be asked, and "sunset" legislation provides a practical step which could result in one promising answer. I commend it to hon. members in the hope, at the end of the debate later this evening, the government might see fit to support this matter as a practical measure, or at least refer it to the appropriate standing committee in order for it to receive the type of in-House examination such a proposal demands. As well, I commend it to individual groups outside of parliament, and I commend it to the House.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I congratulate my leader for the foresight and concern he displayed in proposing this motion not only to the House but, more important, to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the speeches made by the hon. members who have preceded me. The motion put forward by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is far-reaching. I will confine my remarks to the section which deals with Crown corporations.

The Crown corporations which are in existence were established to satisfy needs in our society, things which are highly desirable but would not be undertaken by the private sector at all or to the extent required by Canadians. I expect it would be difficult to interest someone in the private sector in acquiring some of these corporations which, because of special requirements, such as the provision of broadcasting services in isolated areas by the CBC, require financing by the government. Likewise, the Canadian public may not be prepared to see the profitable ones turned over to the private sector, especially if this affected the level or universality of service provided.

Surely the opposition is not suggesting that we should be discontinuing such Crown corporations as the Export Development Corporation, which is a vital component in the development of our economy; the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which was referred to by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and which is in the business of providing accommodation to our lower income population, the aged and others; or the Farm Credit Corporation, which is assisting our agricultural community to produce the necessary food and other items so vital to our well-being.

Surely the proper perspective on Crown corporations would be to continue to create, modify, or dispose of them in relation to the needs of the Canadian people. They are not and have not been created for their own sake, nor should they be altered or eliminated capriciously. An example of sound reasoning for the creation of corporations was the acquisition of several aircraft companies, notably Canadair and de Havilland, for the purpose of rationalizing the Canadian aircraft industry. I am sure the opposition would not quarrel with this type of action which was required for the economy and to protect the Canadian aircraft industry. It is still the intention that these revert to the private sector once they have been completely rationalized.

● (1722)

The government is always reviewing these operations, and in this connection may I point out that during the past few years it has reviewed the need for corporations, their direction and control, as well as their accountability. When completed, this will result in the updating of the Financial Administration Act to provide a much clearer mandate.

The establishment of a committee, as proposed, would either duplicate the work already done or set aside the well established roles of committees already in place. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts—which is, by the way, ably chaired by a member of the official opposition, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—has just completed five meetings in a row on management and control practices of Crown corporations, following a study on Crown corporations entitled, "Direction, Control and Accountability", made public by the government last summer, which was under the direction of the Privy Council. The Auditor General brought people from his own staff to these meetings and also people from private firms who had been involved in the study that he had carried out, independently of this government's own study.

The deliberations of the Public Accounts Committee are to be found in the committee's reports, issues Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14, beginning on December 8 last. I would commend them to any member interested in the ongoing study by government and committees of this House of the affairs of Canada's Crown corporations.

I believe it became obvious at these hearings—and I took part in them—that the government shares the concern of the Auditor General and other members of this House that there must be controls on Crown corporations with regard to the direction they are taking. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board announced, on December 16 last, guidelines for Crown corporations. I would like to cite some passages from this document. I believe they are worth repeating.

[Translation]

It is expressly forbidden for crown corporations to render or accept any bribe or other improper benefit or apply improper influence in the conduct of their business. The guidelines released by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) also imposed on Crown corporations certain obligations when retaining sales and procurement agents.

They must adopt an established selection process to ensure that the agent's qualifications for the work are clearly established and evaluated; negotiate formally written agency agreements including specific undertakings by the agents to act in accordance with the laws of the place where the transaction occurs; establish a procedure for approval of agency agreements; ensure that remuneration under the agreements is based on justifiable and sound business practice, and that payments are strictly in accordance with the formal written agreement; disclose in their annual reports the names of their agents, as well as the aggregate of all remuneration paid to such agents, and any approved administrative exception for the policy and the reasons therefor.

Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board also wanted to emphasize that rigorous ethical standards and dedication to propriety can sometimes be expensive. What I am really saying today, the minister said on December 16, is that, while we Canadians need and want to expand our foreign trade, we are not prepared to sell our goods and services on any terms or under any conditions. Principles, just as commodities, can be expensive. We Canadians must be fully aware of the price we must pay to live by our principles, to be the kind of people we want to be and to maintain the kind of society we want to have.

It is clear enough, Mr. Speaker, that the government is aware that Crown corporations must be made accountable for their actions to the government and parliament. The guidelines released by the President of the Treasury Board and the new steps that were announced to ensure that all officials within those corporations are well aware that the new measures that were announced are going to be of great help in giving the people of Canada confidence that Crown corporations not only represent the government of Canada well but also properly carry out the terms of reference they were given by this Parliament.

[English]

I feel confident that these guidelines, coupled with the findings of the government study and the Public Accounts Committee's work with the Auditor General and representatives of the Treasury Board and Privy Council, will result in the changes in accountability that the Canadian people and parliament expect, require, and deserve.

The Privy Council study mentions in its introduction on page 7 the following concerns:

> To what extent should crown corporations be used as instruments of public policy when the pursuit of policy objectives may detract from the financial performance of such corporations? How can increased responsiveness to public policy be reconciled with the arm's-length relationship which the theory of public enterprise requires government, ministers and parliament to maintain with crown corporations?

There has always been concern in this country when crown corporations are set up. Right from the beginning, it was quite apparent that parliament wanted to make sure that there would be no political finagling in the day-to-day operations of Crown corporations. This is a concern which must be reconciled with the concern that the taxpayers' money be well spent and that there be adequate controls on the administrators of these Crown corporations so that they are in effect responsible to parliament, on behalf of the Canadian people.

The arm's length relationship is very important in the minds of many, and indeed will require a great deal of thought and review before changes are made so that there is a consistency and clarity in the relationship between the corporation, the ministry, and parliament. There is no doubt that the present government has shown great interest and concern in the wide field of public spending and accountability. The Auditor General's office has been strengthened both by the new legislation and by the increase in budget that allows him a greater freedom, and also very important, more personnel to enable him to carry out his work on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has stated in committee that he is completely satisfied with the co-operation he has received from this government and the various departments. It is also worth mentioning that the Lambert Commission is another proof of this government's ongoing concern with this subject. I am certain that this Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability will bring forth many proposals of interest and importance in its report.

No, Mr. Speaker, this motion cannot be supported. It is too vague and does not take into account the changes and proposals already put into motion by this responsible government.

● (1732)

I hope hon. members who missed the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) will read them in Hansard. He pointed out that over 50 per cent of the budget of this government is made up of moneys which are transferred either to people directly or to provincial governments. In other words, the day the minister lays down the estimates 50 per cent of the funds are already committed to ongoing programs. I am sure no one in this parliament would want the government to renege on agreements which have been duly signed and officially made part of the agreement between the federal government and the provinces.

I and many others are looking forward to the time when the government appoints a person who is willing and able to accept the position of comptroller general. That office will provide safeguards for the taxpayers of Canada. The person must be a highly placed and capable individual whose integrity deserves respect. If he is a person like the present Auditor General, the secretary deputies of the Treasury Board or others who are in this work now, I am sure we will indeed be assured that money paid into public coffers is properly spent.

I am sure that this government will continue its work and will see that it is done with honesty, integrity and with a view to making sure that Canadian taxpayers get all that is due them in return for their hard earned tax dollars.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add to the comments already made. I am sorry that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is not here; I understand that he has some urgent matters to attend to. I want to reflect for a moment on his remarks today. Many of us on this side appreciate the difficulty he has in trying to get a handle on government expenditures. At one time in my business career I had the task of changing the loss position of certain companies into a profit position. I can appreciate that department heads as well as employees do not have all the solutions. If they had, certain departments and companies would not be in the position they are now. A tough line really has to be taken. Surgery is required. I think the current view of those charged with these responsibilities in other jurisdictions is that 1 per cent or 2 per cent per year is really not effective control at all.

I want to address myself specifically to deregulation. If I tend to be a little partisan in my remarks, I apologize. I think, however, that that is very normal in the atmosphere in which we work. We are partisan. I mean no offence to any individual. I will speak in generalities in this regard. There is a great deal of interest in the concept of deregulation of government statutes. The interest in Canada arises for several reasons. One is the style of government we have had for the past decade. We have a neighbour to the south which speaks the same language as about 80 per cent of the people of Canada, and in many instances we tend to have a knee-jerk reaction to much of its legislation. We know that the United States is well down the road to the deregulation of some of its statutes.

A further reason for interest in deregulation is the fact that we have had one-party rule in this country for 40 of the past 52 years, and many of the programs and much of the process of legislation have become entrenched and accepted as if written in stone, never to be challenged. Rather than the government's responding to the requirements of the economy and of the people of Canada, we find the people of Canada reacting to programs put in place by a bureaucracy which we feel is out of touch with reality.

I want to examine each of these points and put some examples beside them. However, let me say at the outset that we have in the public service of Canada many thousands of dedicated public servants who know this country is in desperate straits. They know it, and they are concerned. When I make reference to bureaucratic bungling and game-playing, I am not referring to the thousands of dedicated public servants who truly want to serve Canada, who are concerned about our national plight and who want to see the country put back on course.

When I refer to the style and structure of the present government I refer to the way the rules of this House and the committee system of this House have been perverted to serve the ends of the Liberal party. I say with the deepest respect that we are not really performing the function we were elected to perform when we are in this House. We have an appointed Senate which is stacked politically. It is in fact a rubber stamp for the government.

The House of Commons is stripped of its power to control government spending because of rule changes put in place by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1967 and 1968. Indeed, the House of Commons is so sterile that in one of his emotional fits the Prime Minister was moved to say, 50 yards from Parliament Hill, that members of this House are nobodies. We all remember that remark. This loose structure carries through to the committees of the House where, with the exception, perhaps, of the public accounts committee, by and large a charade is played with the legislation placed before them.

Most substantive legislation brought before this House has a structure which pushes it beyond the reach of parliament forever once it has passed all stages. The structure can be recognized by the following observations. A typical bill states that the governor in council shall make regulations as required, that regulations will be attached thereto upon proclamation and that regulations may be changed by the governor in council from time to time as required. Once that process is completed the governor in council moves in with staff requirements. Senior appointments are made, salaries and expenses are set and tenure of office is determined—all by the governor in council.

I feel that that process has become a way of life for this government. There is a proliferation of boards, commissions and tribunals, staffed mainly by political hacks rewarded for past political favours. The power of the boards, commissions and tribunals originates with the governor in council. It flows from the cabinet and back to the cabinet. The existence of a board is at the pleasure of the governor in council. Its funding and appointments are at the pleasure of the governor in council.

There must be a relationship between the number of consultants employed by the government and lack of experience on boards and commissions. It seems that if you have a problem or a tough decision or if you are in conflict with career public servants over a matter you are considering, the solution is to put the matter out to a consultant for study.

The citizens of Canada through their elected representatives have lost control of the spending of this government, as the Auditor General said in several of his reports; citizens increasingly find themselves controlled by the government. In its drive to legislate a controlled society and remove the uncertainty from life this government has fettered the average Canadian with rules, regulations and compulsory programs to such a degree that his individual freedom has been substantially reduced and is under perpetual threat. An example of the heavy hand of regulations is the current undertaking to compile existing regulations. In raw form these regulations cover over 12,000 sheets of computer printout, and when printed they will consist of 15 volumes of 800 pages each. In other words, these regulations are considerably more weighty than the consolidated Statutes of Canada. I think it is a fair comment that the existing regulations are estimated to cost the people of Canada about $6 billion annually.

I believe the fact that we have spent 40 of the last 52 years under one political party has led to entrenchment of a level of bureaucratic regulation that is moving us away from the rule of law and deeper into administrative law.

Through the process I have described where parliament passes legislation that has regulations attached to it by the bureaucracy through the governor in council upon proclamation, we place in operation regulations that have the force of statutes designed by nameless, faceless bureaucrats who are not elected and who answer only to the governor in council. They are not responsible to the people or to parliament through this imperfect process we knowingly deal with every day. We knowingly pass unconstitutional law and attach to that law equally unconstitutional regulations. It is only when some citizen has sufficient financial resources to hire legal counsel to challenge such law that we change the regulations.

But aside from the legislative approach to regulations, I am concerned about the human side. I am concerned when business people tell me that because of the heavy hand of regulations they are not going to expand their factory. Many people have made representations to me and expressed fear of reprisals from bureaucrats in the Departments of Finance, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Consumer and Corporate Affairs and National Revenue if they rock the boat or make too much noise about certain regulations that are rumoured to go in place or are in place. They fear an appearance before a board or commission. A corporation which appeared before one of our standing committees last year told us that each appearance before a particular board of this government cost them $1 million. They claimed that the fastest growing department of their business was the legal department and that government regulations cost the corporation $21 million per year.

I have also noticed the timid approach some national associations take to proposed legislation. The views they express privately differ vastly, in many instances, from those expressed in a brief. Why is this? When you question them closely they seem to fear the heavy hand of government which may change taxation or tariffs or put in place some new reporting procedure that will cause difficulties and be an added burden for their members, so they modify their remarks.

The process of deregulation is as complicated as the process of putting regulations in place in the first instance. It must be an ongoing function and the Parliament of Canada must be involved.

As a start, let me suggest that, starting now, all legislation put to this parliament should have the regulations attached at the time the bill is given first reading. The regulations should be debated with the bill. At committee the regulations should be dealt with along with the legislation itself. When we pass the legislation, we pass the regulations at the same time.

There should be established immediately a committee of the House of Commons similar to the public accounts committee to look into and recommend changes in regulations already in place. I know that a great deal of work has been done in this area but I think if we had a committee of that type we would begin to grapple with the regulations we have now. This committee should have a staff of legal, economic and accounting advisers. The committee should report on the economic impact of regulations on our society and on the economy and recommend changes. It should be a permanent committee that reports to the House of Commons and the government should be required to act on the recommendations put before the House within a specified number of days.

I want to deal now, Mr. Speaker, with some examples of regulations that I have encountered. All western governments recognize that governments have grown too large and that in many instances regulations are inhibiting economic activity. In my business experience, both with companies I have been involved with personally and those that I have endeavoured to assist, I have run up against regulations that are just deplorable. It is a difficult thing for a businessman struggling with our economy to have an employee of Statistics Canada, for example, telephone him and demand that a certain form be completed or a fine of $250 per day will be levied if this is not done forthwith.

Many years ago in my own business we had to decide whether to deal with government forms or do business and try to make a profit. I devised a very simple system, Mr. Speaker. All the government forms that came in were sorted into two piles, one for Statistics Canada and the other for the tax department. Recognizing that if I did not pay my taxes I would have some difficulties, I had my accountant look after the tax forms. For the other forms, however, I bought a large rubber stamp which said "not applicable". I bought a red stamp pad and stamped all the Statistics Canada forms "not applicable", put them in the envelopes and sent them back. I received a form letter from Statistics Canada referring to form No. such and such which was "not applicable" according to the words written in the relevant part. There was a squiggly signature which looked like something out of the Arabic alphabet. The next time a form came in we just stamped it "not applicable" and sent it back. A strange thing happened Mr. Speaker—government forms were cut by 40 per cent. That allowed me to earn a profit that year and to pay some taxes.

Another example I should like to give is the income tax form. I can remember when that form was about the size of a No. 10 envelope and was very simple. Today it is in four or five colours and comes with a manual. The television carries cartoons telling us how easy the form is to fill in, seminars are held on the subject and there is a proliferation of companies in the income tax business which make a profit out of filling out a government form. Surely that is an indication that the growth of regulations and forms is out of control. I am sure that if we asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) if the tax form could be simplified he would reply that the government are studying it. Every minister studies it, Mr. Speaker. This is a serious matter and we must deal with it.

I am also concerned about definitions. The language of regulations is weird and wonderful. For instance, the auto pact carries a definition of a motor vehicle. It is described as a vehicle having an engine, wheels, tires and so on that can travel on the highway. Then the body that fits on to a motor vehicle is described and "for the purposes of the act" that body, which has no motor or wheels, is a "motor vehicle". This language is twisted around for the purposes of the act and oranges and apples and grapes become bananas. This is the sort of thing we have to deal with in regulations. I have travelled this country from coast to coast on business and regulations that are applied in Vancouver have a different interpretation in Montreal.

As we look into this process, we find this is one of the great things inhibiting the economy of Canada at this time, and we will have to deal with it sooner or later. I believe there is no better way to deal with this matter than for the parliament of this country to do so through a committee or through a standing committee structure, along the lines of the public accounts committee. We have the competence to deal with it, and I certainly know we have the interest to deal with it because of the serious plight our economy is in and the high level of unemployment that we face at this time.

I would mention one other thing, Mr. Speaker. When you run a business you gather up a lot of letters, forms and records. If you ask someone in the federal government how long you should keep your business records and which business records you should keep, you cannot get an answer. I sometimes wonder whether somebody in the government, maybe some member, has some shares or stock in a company which manufactures filing cabinets. There is hardly a business in operation which is not overloaded with filing cabinets full of dead records. We have spawned a whole industry microfilming these records just to try to comply with government regulations.

The customs forms that we use for importing goods into Canada state "Subject to review". Every customs entry is subject to review. Look at the difficulty that creates from a businessman's point of view when he is required to certify the profit that he has made and he knows that perhaps $1 million of it is subject to review. There is no limitation to it. There is no statute of limitations. As we go through this whole process of regulating, which I hope we will review in the near future, I hope that we will follow this suggestion that we have made and look very carefully into these things. We should involve the members of parliament in this process so that they can respond to their constituents who come to them with very real problems concerning government regulations and the interpretation of those regulations. We should try to get rid of some of the tyranny that is placed on the business community by some of the bureaucrats that we must deal with.

I can say no more at this time other than to ask the President of the Treasury Board to consider again the remarks made by my colleagues and those that will follow. We are very sincere in the motion that we have put forward and we do want to see things turned about in this country. We do not like to see the economy travelling in the direction it is. We do not take any pleasure in the negative attitude that we see in some parts of Canada.

Indeed, in my own business I was so struck by the negative attitude of my own directors that I caused them to approve an addition to my little factory because I came to the conclusion that there was no better time to build than right now when construction prices could be had at such a reasonable level.

We are genuinely concerned about where this country is going, to the extent that we put our motion forward and we ask you to consider it seriously.

[Mr. Kempling.]

ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

● (1802)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C-23, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to establish the Employment Tax Credit Program—Chapter No. 4.

Bill C-3, An Act respecting the reorganization of Air Canada—Chapter No. 5.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.07 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ROLE OF GOVERNMENT IN SOCIETY AND ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark:

That in the opinion of this House it is essential to the economic well-being and good government of Canada that action be taken to reduce the scope and rationalize the role of government activity in Canadian society by reducing the share of the national wealth currently consumed by government, and to this end that a special committee be struck before February 28, 1978 to consider:

(1) the enactment of "sunset laws" to provide for the termination of programs or agencies which have outlived their usefulness;

(2) methods to limit the growing and undemocratic use of regulations;

(3) the criteria by which the government would divest itself of those crown corporations which play no useful role in the public sector;

(4) the adaptation of new flexible budget planning techniques to discourage unnecessary growth in departmental budgets.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are debating this evening has four main thrusts. It has reference to the need to reduce the scope of government activity in Canadian society and to rationalize its role by reducing the share of the national wealth currently consumed by government. It refers to "sunset laws" to terminate programs and agencies which have outlived their usefulness. It refers to ways of eliminating the growing and undemocratic use of regulations and, presumably, other statutory instruments. Finally, it refers to Crown corporations and ways of getting rid of those which are of no further use and whose activities might better be carried on by the private sector and to more flexible budget planning.

No one can object to any of these objectives. But the motion would create a special committee to study all these matters and the question in my mind is whether a reference to a committee would really be the most effective way of achieving these objectives.

This afternoon the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) dealt with the general issue of government expenditures. He pointed out that provincial and municipal governments have increased their expenditures at an even greater rate than the federal government has; the sector we are considering, the federal government, now spends a diminishing portion of the national income from year to year. Nevertheless, all of us, regardless of the party to which we belong, are concerned about the objective advanced here, because it is basic.

There is a great deal of current mythology implicit in the motion. Hon. members advocate "sunset laws" to get rid of agencies or programs which have outlived their usefulness. Mr. Speaker, there is not a day of the week on which I do not interview people in my office whose services are redundant because the programs upon which they were working have been terminated. A determined effort is currently under way to review all government expenditures and bring about a measure of economy in the public interest.

When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power—it does not seem so long ago—they named a body to look into government organization, the Glassco Commission, whose terms of reference followed generally along the lines of the motion before us. The commission made a series of recommendations. The sum total of their philosophy was this: government was too big, too bureaucratic, too cumbersome; expenditures were controlled by Treasury Board with too heavy a hand under a Comptroller of the Treasury and all applications for employment were carefully funneled through the bureaucratic institution called the Public Service Commission. The Glassco commission said: let the deputy ministers manage things; let them be responsible; get rid of the heavy-handed apparatus of control and in this way we shall achieve efficiency.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we know what happened. The Glassco recommendations were accepted in many instances and the result was not an improvement in government efficiency. Indeed, the upshot was the situation which the Auditor General called to our attention in his 1976 report. When the office of comptroller general was abolished the mechanisms designed to check government expenditure were removed; the financial control officers and the financial control manuals were not in place. Now the wheel has turned again. Under pressure from the Auditor General the government is restoring the office of comptroller general. The terms of reference have been changed and his functions are somewhat different, but from where I sit as a layman it all has a familiar ring. After all these years we are coming back closer to the machinery with which we started.

On the employment side the deputy ministers were given authority to do their own hiring. They did their own spending and their own hiring. We are presently conducting an investigation to ascertain the effect. How many violations of the Public Service Employment Act were revealed in the audit by the Public Service Commission of some 6,000 appointments in 1974? Something like one-third of them were in violation of the act. I am not citing these examples to suggest that the process of constantly seeking new ways of doing things is without purpose. It does have a purpose. What I am suggesting is that there is no need to create another special committee to study these things because, in my opinion, it would not make a significant contribution. Turning to the second paragraph of the motion, it reads as follows:

methods to limit the growing and undemocratic use of regulations;

I do not like the use of regulations where it should be possible to legislate, but I do not know how we can escape it. The House cannot deal with the legislative priorities which are placed before it now. The measures the government places before the House in any particular session do not receive orderly and prompt consideration in the management of House business because of the archaic rules under which we operate. The more the presentation of legislation is thwarted, the more there will be pressure to do things by regulation and under statutory instruments which might perhaps be better done in other ways.

There is a joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments of the House and the Senate. It has done some very good work. The members of that committee have acted in a non-partisan fashion trying to come to grips with this problem of what is happening in the multiplication of these instruments. Do hon. members opposite want to create another omnibus special committee to look at these and duplicate the work of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments? Is that a solution to the problem? Hon. members should become involved in that committee, participate in its affairs, and allow that committee to come to grips with the problem. It is a very real problem; I do not wish to minimize it.

Turning to the third paragraph, it reads as follows:

the criteria by which the government would divest itself of those Crown corporations which play no useful role in the public sector;

Mr. Friesen: Just like the NCC.

Mr. Francis: I suggest that is a simplistic view of the problem. As a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I participated, along with many other hon. members, in the review of two Crown corporations which gave us cause for concern: Polysar and Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd. If I may be so bold as to say, the problem is not that they should never have been Crown corporations. The problem is caused by evolution, growth, change in function and responsibility of these Crown corporations, without the corresponding surveillance that they should have received. Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd. began its life as a research organization created by order in council in wartime. It was very necessary. For many years its function continued in that capacity. It expanded into the use of radioactive isotopes and radioactive cobalt for the treatment of cancer. It developed a health division.

Then this Crown corporation came into an entirely new age: the development of atomic energy and nuclear reactors. This transformed a small research-oriented Crown corporation into a multibillion dollar, multinational corporation almost overnight. It was in the business of selling atomic reactors abroad at a price of $400 million each and up.

A technology was developed in Canada of which we were justly proud. It was one of the outstanding achievements of Canadian science and engineering. I am referring to our heavy-water cooled, natural uranium without enrichment CANDU reactor. As part of the development of that reactor, the responsible Crown corporation had to envisage a program. The acceptance by Ontario Hydro and domestic consumers was readily obtained in the beginning. In order to produce reactors of the necessary size and scale, there had to be a regular production schedule established. There were gaps in that schedule for the marketing of those reactors. The corporation undertook a program of aggressive sales abroad. Because of its insufficient resources, marketing skills, management skills, experience in sales and contract negotiations, the corporation was not equipped for the task it was called upon to do. Competitors abroad were very well equipped. In the United States Westinghouse knew the business backwards and forwards. When AECL was reaching a point of going into sales in some parts of the world, there was a question of what was necessary to gain acceptance of the product. There was a strong suspicion, in the case of one or two sales, that irregular payments may have been made to influence the governments of the purchasing countries.

Having broken through by the use of agents and the payment of large commissions, which were not substantiated by accurate documentation, the Crown corporation did something which was absolutely unforgiveable according to our scales: it lost a lot of money in its Argentine sale. The process of growth and development of a Crown corporation attracted public attention when it lost money. That is when the matter became serious, and that is when it brought headlines.

The problem of Crown corporations is not whether we should have them or not. That is what the third item of the motion suggests: "... Crown corporations which play no useful role in the public sector." If a committee restricted itself to these terms of reference for a long period of time, it would come up with exactly nothing in the way of findings. One could find a reason for every Crown corporation. If a person restricted himself to these terms of reference, he would miss the real problems which the Crown corporations had to face as a result of a change in their nature, function, status and the scale of which they were doing business.

In his 1976 report the Auditor General made some very blunt points, and the government has reacted. A very interesting document was prepared by the Privy Council and made public last year. It indicated the policy the government is considering and what it is going to do in order to tighten up this whole field. That is long overdue, Mr. Speaker.

What are hon. members opposite going to achieve by creating a special committee which will look at Crown corporations, among other things? The Auditor General, the special Lambert Royal commission and the Standing Committee on Public Accounts are doing that. The hon. members who participated in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts would agree that it was generally a non-partisan committee whose members, regardless of political party, were anxious to do the right thing in terms of coming to grips with the areas where it was necessary to bring about a greater economy in the use of public resources.

● (2022)

It was a bit of a joke in that committee that we never knew how many Crown corporations there were. The number kept expanding. When the representative of the Treasury Board came in, the first question asked of him day after day was: "Have you found any more Crown corporations since the last time?" Well, there is now a comprehensive list. It is a good joke, but the problem lay in the fact that many Crown corporations had incorporated subsidiaries and the incorporated subsidiaries may or may not have been active. In many cases they were dormant, and were added to the list, and properly so. The most significant and active Crown corporations, I am happy to report, were discovered some time ago and were documented.

The process of review, I submit, has to be done by this parliament through its committees. We will have an occasion to do so when the Financial Administration Act is revised, which the government intends doing in the very near future. The revision of that act will establish a framework for re-examining government policy with regard to Crown corporations. It is a far greater problem than deciding whether or not we should have a Crown corporation. The problem is to make sure the proper resources are at the disposal of the Crown corporation; that there is a periodic review in response to some instrument of the democratic government of Canada; that guidelines are issued and followed concerning the ethics which will guide that public corporation in its expenditure of what are, after all, public funds; and last but not least, to make sure that at every point the basic question is asked: Are we getting value for our money? Are we getting good use of our resources? Are we in effect doing those things which government should be doing? We must admit quite frankly that from time to time the function may well change and that we should get out of the business. When that time comes, it should be possible to make a rational decision.

Mr. Speaker, the last of the arms of this multiple resolution—it has at least these four sides to it—is the adaptation of new flexible budget planning techniques to discourage unnecessary growth in departmental budgets. We are also trying to do this. Treasury Board is doing this, searching from day to day. This is the task for all of us who participate in parliament. The current approach, of course, is to set limits on the manpower side. Within the entire public service of Canada, six tenths of one per cent is the total permitted increase of manpower within the current budget year.

Hon. members on the other side are smiling about this, but there is reason to believe that these limits will be observed. If there is any reason to show they are not being observed, it is our task to find out and demonstrate it, not just make a general allegation. I know as an Ottawa member that it is very hard for any young graduate to get a job in the public service today because job opportunities are not there. The restrictions on hiring are there. The restrictions on the budget are there. I know the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) will agree with me because he must be getting as many letters as I am. Positions are being declared redundant. Fathers and mothers come in to me and say that there are just no job opportunities for their children in the public service because of the restrictions that are now in place, the decentralization moves now in effect, and also the adoption of new flexible budget planning techniques to discourage unnecessary growth. The old-fashioned way to limit growth is to say: There is the line; this is the sum that must not be exceeded. This is the established number you can have for personnel; you cannot exceed it.

Within the national capital region today, growth is negative. The growth taking place in the public service is largely outside the national capital region.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless he may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): I have to open my remarks by saying how surprised I am at the negative and unconstructive posture of the speakers opposite. I find this especially surprising in view of the report in yesterday's Ottawa Journal in which the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), the chairman of the forthcoming Liberal policy convention and the president of the Liberal party, the senator from Nova Scotia, were reported as saying that, as they returned from their tour across Canada, having talked to the Liberal rank and file, they found that the predominant concern of the Liberal rank and file was the growth and size of government and the necessity to bring this under control.

The motion put forward by my leader today outlines four very responsible initiatives which we believe, if implemented, would accomplish the goal which obviously concerns not just us in the House but, in fact, the rank and file of the Liberal party.

The negative posture taken by spokesmen on the other side is a little hard to understand and reconcile. It shows a lack of sensitivity and concern among the rank and file of their own party. The NDP, on the other hand, have reaffirmed what has been a notion of mine for many years, namely that they are without doubt the most reactionary party in the House of Commons and on the national scene.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Their position is very clear. It is that everything is fine. We should not touch anything. Everything that happened before was absolutely perfect. We should not entertain any radical ideas that are going to affect the status quo.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Your smile is showing on television!

Mr. Andre: The Canadian economy simply cannot sustain the burden of this size of government and still provide jobs and the material well being that Canadians desire and have the right to expect. The fact of the matter is that every responsible economist or economic institution, in putting forward a prescription for the long term economic wellbeing of Canada, has as part of that prescription a reduction in the percentage of national wealth consumed by government. That is one of the reasons that we feel this subject matter is worthy of careful consideration in this House.

The second reason is that our democratic system just cannot cope with the complexity of modern government. I refer members opposite to a speech given by my former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), to the University of Acadia last year as part of the lecture series in which he very skilfully put forth the thesis that in fact, with our complex government of today, the cabinet cannot even control its activities, let alone the House of Commons. So we have a choice. The choice is between parliamentary democracy and more government. If we want to maintain parliamentary democracy in the system that we now have, the system that Canadians want and I am sure Canadians want to maintain parliamentary democracy—then we have no alternative but to look at ways in which we can reduce the scope and nature of government activity.

The third reason is that individual freedom and all-encompassing government are simply of opposite polarity. There is no question that governments have a vital responsibility to protect the individual from some of the nearer potentialities of life; but when governments attempt to remove all uncertainty from life, then individuality—individual freedom—must suffer.

We think a better balance can be drawn. We are not suggesting great cuts in government spending, such as great reductions in spending on social benefits. Indeed, we are not even proposing today any cuts. What we are proposing is to put in place procedures and techniques which will result in selective, refined, proper reductions in the roles and activities of the government, thereby saving the government money, reducing the size of government and, over the long haul, resulting in a more efficient, more effective and more appropriate Government of Canada.

Indeed, in the weeks and months ahead we will undoubtedly be proposing more spending in certain areas, but we recognize that the taxpayers of Canada just cannot be burdened further with additional taxes for these new proposals, which we think are important, and we feel that the place to look for those funds is within current government spending activities. We are absolutely convinced that there is ample room to generate these funds through employment of the techniques we are talking about.

I wonder how many members of the House saw the cartoon in yesterday's Ottawa Journal. It depicted a number of bird watchers with binoculars. They were on a bird counting expedition. The leader of the expedition explained to one of the participants that the reason they were engaging in this seemingly meaningless task was to pre-empt the government from doing it at a cost of million and millions of dollars.

There is more than a modicum of truth in that because three years ago I encountered an old colleague from university days who, working for the Department of the Secretary of State, was in Calgary as part of a national tour. He was visiting all the major centres in Canada, and the purpose of his visit to Calgary, as to all the other major centres in Canada, was to count playgrounds. He had been given the task of touring the country and counting all playgrounds. Over the last decade, started by the Pearson administration and carried on enthusiastically by the Trudeau administration, the federal government has involved itself in a great number of new areas of responsibility which, considered individually, probably were relatively minor and perhaps not significant, but when looked at in totality, the picture is one of a government involved in almost every aspect of human life.

As I indicated earlier, we do not think wholesale across-the-board slashes are the responsible way to approach this problem, but we do believe there are many activities in which the government is currently involved but should not be involved. There are other activities which could be performed better and which could and should be put into the private sector. One of the popular vehicles which has been used by the government to involve itself more and more in the private sector has been that of the Crown corporation.

As was indicated earlier, the government does not even know how many Crown corporations there are. Last May the number was perhaps 366. There were a few others discovered. As of January of this year the number had risen to 387, 21 in seven months or about three a month. Since that report came out a couple of weeks ago, the number now is probably up to 388. How can any rational human being tell me or anyone else that these Crown corporations are performing some vital role in fulfilling public policy when it is not known how many there are? Not knowing how many there are, the government cannot be managing them properly. Therefore, it comes as no surprise that in his 1976 report the Auditor General stated, and I quote:

In the majority of crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control is weak and ineffective. Moreover, co-ordination and guidance by central government agencies of financial management and control practices in these Crown corporations are virtually non-existent.

This afternoon the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) said we did not look at the 1977 Auditor General's report. Well, I did, and with regard to the control of financial management of Crown corporations the report said: "Progress has not been spectacular". Either through dereliction or through its inability to cope, the government has failed to exercise proper financial control over those Crown corporations which are wholly-owned and are, by and large, direct operating arms of the government.

I do not have time in this speech to get into detail, but I refer the President of Treasury Board and the House to the reports of the Auditor General for 1976 and 1977 and to the proceedings of the public accounts committee dealing with those reports. The government does not know how many Crown corporations there are, and those it knows about it is not managing properly. The response of the government to this criticism of its management of Crown corporations was to commission a Privy Council study which led to a white paper published last year dealing with the direction, control and accountability of Crown corporations.

However, it is worth reminding the President of Treasury Board that prior to his being in that portfolio, in 1973 and 1974, a fairly thorough review of the Financial Administration Act was undertaken to see if it should be revised in order to be more functional and to cater more closely to Crown corporation peculiarities and requirements. The conclusion was that no such revision was either necessary or particularly desirable unless or until the role of and expectations for Crown corporations were first reviewed, revised and updated, with clarification and refinement of all associated mandates.

Those observations are equally valid today. To attempt to improve the direction, control and accountability of Crown corporations, which this Privy Council study very unsuccessfully tried to do, is simply premature. There must be a reassessment. Until the government is prepared to go back to square one and confirm or revise basic corporations' mandates in light of existing and expected national needs, tempered by political objectives, nothing of consequence can be anticipated from trivial adjustments to the Financial Administration Act, which in themselves lack direction or purpose.

The proposal of my party is to establish a select committee of this House to look at mechanisms for reviewing Crown corporations. However, we would not leave it at that. We have some specific suggestions which should be looked at by this committee. We think a review process should be undertaken, including a strategic audit of existing Crown corporations, which would have the following guidelines: What is each Crown corporation contributing to our national welfare or policy goals; what is it costing us; is the Crown corporation vehicle the most appropriate one with which to continue; what mandate particulars will be appropriate for each ongoing Crown corporation to guide its board and management?

The result of such a review would undoubtedly lead to fewer Crown corporations and more clear and more essential mandates. Once it is known which Crown corporations remain after that review, it would be practical, possible and desirable to introduce a program for improved direction, control and accountability of Crown corporations. Only then can we really succeed, and I refer hon. members to proceedings of the public accounts committee to show the difficulty of trying to do that before there is a rationalization in this regard.

In November of 1975 the Progressive Conservative party undertook an extensive analysis or special audit of just 11 Crown corporations. The conclusions of that limited study—limited in terms of the number of corporations but fairly in depth with regard to them—was that seven, or more than half, of the 11 Crown corporations had in fact lost any sense of public purpose; five could be disbanded without any damage or loss to the public interest; two should probably be privatized and the remaining four needed changes in their mandates.

There was a request for specifics. I am prepared to give specifics. The five which could and should be dismantled without any loss or damage to the public interest are Canadian Arsenals Limited, Canadian Defence Construction (1951) Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation Limited, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship Lines and Canadian Patent Development Limited. Each of those corporations do perform minor functions which could be brought back in. The two which should be privatized are Northern Transportation Limited and Eldorado Nuclear.

There are a number of Crown corporations which operate as day to day operating arms of the government. These are the so-called schedule C, or agency, corporations. They are a misuse and abuse of the Crown corporation concept, with its arm's length feature. Many of these require public funds. They require appropriations from parliament for their functioning, and as such an arm's length relationship is absolutely inappropriate because normal economics and balances simply do not apply. Again, I refer the minister to the discussions with regard to the Canadian Dairy Commission in the public accounts committee. To apply the term "Crown corporation" to these agencies is a misnomer. These agencies should be brought back under the control of government where the normal checks and balances of ministerial responsibility could apply.

● (2042)

If it is necessary to have a corporate framework in order to deal with clients, so that separate bank accounts can be maintained, cheques written, funds received and so on, then I would suggest a new type of corporation. It could be called something like a "federal government corporation"—FGC—which would give the necessary flexibility without the implications of arm's length that goes with a Crown corporation. There should not be any arm's length relationship with a corporation that requires annual appropriations from the people of Canada in order that it may function. It is, in fact, a part of government and should not be considered arm's length. I am prepared to discuss with the minister those agency corporations on the schedule C list that could most appropriately be treated in this way.

Mr. Clark: That would be ideally suited for a committee.

Mr. Andre: That is right, Mr. Speaker. It would be an ideal matter for a select committee of this House to look at, and that is one of the reasons why I think an affirmative vote on our motion would be most appropriate. There are a significant number of Crown corporations which operate in the commercial sphere and compete against other privately owned corporations. These corporations are by and large beyond any control or influence either from parliament or from the government.

For example, Air Canada and Canadian National Railways operate in the transportation field. I submit that it is unnecessary that the federal government own these corporations. The government can influence any company in any industry just by its size. Moreover, it has the direct ability to regulate those companies through the Canadian Transport Commission. It almost creates continuous conflict of interest situations.

A number of Crown corporations fit into this category and I submit to the House that the following very simple test should be applied: if they were privately owned today, would there be compelling public reasons to nationalize them? If the answer is in the negative, then they should become candidates for privatization. Some Crown corporations which fall into this category are Petro-Canada, obviously; Eldorado Nuclear Limited, obviously; Northern Transportation Company, obviously; Air Canada; Canadian National Railways; the Canadian Development Corporation and its many subsidiaries, and so on.

I will go further for the benefit of the House and the minister, Mr. Speaker and suggest ways in which that privatization could occur. In some cases it might be appropriate to sell the corporations as whole entities to private purchasers. Where the corporation is less than successful, as is the case with Northern Transportation Company Limited, the more appropriate thing might be to break it up and sell the assets. With annual losses of $50 million this company is not a great investment. There are other private suppliers of the service available so no one would be deprived of an essential service.

A more interesting procedure for privatization is the method used by the government of Alberta in the mid-1950's. That government decided it was necessary to create a monopoly in the province to gather gas from producing gas fields and effect delivery to border points for sale to other companies so that there would not be a lot of separate gas lines running all over the province. This sounded like a candidate for a Crown corporation, and had the government been Liberal or NDP, that is what would have happened. It was a Social Credit government, however, and it chose instead to create a private corporation and offer shares to people of Alberta above the age of majority; the offer was something like 20 shares at $10.00 each and more could be subscribed if the first issue was not all taken up.

Mr. Andras: Were there any guarantees?

Mr. Andre: No guarantees. The company was Alberta Gas Trunk Line Limited. Instead of a sleepy Crown corporation gathering up a little gas, this is now one of the most dynamic, active, contributing corporations in Canada today. What a tragedy it would have been if the traditional, lack-lustre, reactionary method of creating Crown corporations had been used in that case. This is a corporation that took on the multinationals and won.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Alan G. Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate for a few minutes in debate on this opposition motion which asks members of parliament to establish yet another special committee of this House. The apparent purpose of that committee would be to look into the economic well-being of the country and to see if we can somehow or other arrive at a better form of budgeting and running our government than we seem to have at present.

Before we undertake the establishment of any special committee, Mr. Speaker, I think all of us should look at the numerous standing committees of the House that exist and the mechanics that are available to us for examining estimates that come before those committees, and focus on matters of serious concern in relation to government expenditures in each department or agency. Should we brush all that aside for this new idea of a special committee to try to come to grips with some of the horrendous problems associated with the apportionment of some $45 billion, which is basically the level of government expenditure we are talking about? I do not know of many committee meetings where the full complement of members present—and I speak of members from this side as well as members of the opposition show their real concern at those committees. Before we even consider establishing another special committee I think we should look at ourselves very closely and ask if we are doing all we can to make the system work. That is my first point, Mr. Speaker.

It is suggested that this special committee could in some way or other make proposals to rationalize the role of government activity in Canadian society by "reducing the share of the national wealth currently consumed by government". As federal members we must realize that close to half the 44 per cent of the gross national product which is devoted to government in this country today is actually spent at provincial and municipal levels. Try as we may, as a federal government there is no way we can control expenditures at the municipal or provincial level. I suppose the argument could be advanced that if we have a special committee then perhaps the ten provinces will also have special committees, thus following our leadership. That is wishful thinking, Mr. Speaker.

Having put that in context I should like now to speak to one of the proposals put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). He proposes that the special committee should consider the enactment of what has come to be known in the United States as "sunset laws" to provide for the termination of programs or agencies which have outlived their usefulness.

It is very difficult to argue against the concept of cancelling programs which have outlived their usefulness. Rather let us consider what would be the best way to resolve that problem. Is it more objective to do it by establishing a special committee of the House of Commons which can bring forth proposals? Or is it more efficient to examine the workings of government and to ensure that through mechanisms such as Treasury Board management concepts are put in place appointing the deputy minister and his assistants to fulfil that function each year when they propose the budget for the following year. They will then look at a program, realize it has been carried out for 10 years, and then contemplate whether it is needed for another 10 years or five years. They will then likely come to the same conclusion as those made by a major corporation in the private sector, namely that it is not.

I believe this is already happening directly as a result of the kind of leadership that is being shown by the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and his immediate predecessor, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), when he was in that post. They insisted each year that, before departments brought their budgets to Treasury Board for approval and ultimate passage into the legislative process, they scrutinized and removed from their budgets whatever redundant programs there were.

I endorse the comment made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the current very able vice-chairman of the public accounts committee, that perhaps that is not being done adequately. In fact, we know that it is not being done adequately.

I might say from my experience in the private sector, one of the concerns of chief executive officers in many large corporations is that this process is still not being carried out adequately in those corporations. We all have to improve. I believe the establishment of the position of comptroller general within the government service is going to be a step in the right direction. It will be one of his responsibilties to ensure that financial control procedures are indeed in place within departments and agencies of government which will require an annual examination and an explanation from them of how they have spent their money and how they propose to spend future moneys, just as we might anticipate would occur in a major organization in the private sector.

This concept of "sunset laws" which is running into difficulties in the legislative process in the United States and is far from being enacted at this time, is really an attempt to accomplish by the legislative process what first must be done at the management level.

Directors of a corporation, Mr. Speaker, cannot be expected to perform the day by day and week by week chores of a corporation, which includes the checking of detailed budget planning for five years or so. They must insist that professional people in their organization take on that responsibility and produce budgets and programs for their scrutiny.

Many members of parliament on both sides of this House must wonder at times how carefully this process has been followed before we are presented with the blue book in committee and are expected to ask logical and sensible questions on figures which are put before us. I suggest that this is the type of procedure that the President of Treasury Board is trying to implement. The appointment of a comptroller general will indeed assist members of parliament and give us an increasing assurance that, when we are considering programs for the coming year and the amount of money to be allocated to them, we can be confident the figures are accurate.

If we can achieve this—and I presume that this is what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has in mind with a special committee—it will be much more meaningful than 20 members of this House using valuable time which could be used for other important legislation. This job should be done by the capable executives who are hired to do it. From my point of view it is not our job; I think it is their job. It is our task to ensure that the job is being done adequately.

I suggest this is the problem that the United States government has encountered in its senate with the Muskie bill. If this is added to other legislative work, it is going to require far more time than the senate committees and subcommittees can spare. The same situation will arise in this House, although we have a somewhat different system. This is why this idea is bogging down in the United States, even though it originally had the support of 55 sponsors in the senate. It was part of President Carter's program and, was one item he mentioned in his initial fireside chat. The theory sounds great. Under the "sunset law" legislation it would be possible to halt all programs found to be redundant, which would mean that no money for them would be required the following year. Mr. Speaker, that is an over-simplified way of explaining it. You do not simply shut down the post office if you have a problem with the post office.

Mr. Fraser: Try starting the post office up.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps you look at other alternatives, but you certainly do not shut down the post office. You do not stop AECL from producing nuclear reactors because there have been some problems in that corporation in relation to their international dealings. You do not close down an organization such as Polysar because they became involved in what the report from the public accounts committee termed some wrongdoings in their international negotiations. Instead you must try to correct what is wrong and go on from there.

I suggest we should be supporting and occasionally pushing the government to implement additional procedures in order that the allocations of budgets are very closely scrutinized. After all, it is the electorate who are footing the bill for these things. There is a great deal of room for improvement. However, changes cannot happen overnight. The budget of this country and the budgets of our provinces, governed by various political parties, have grown tremendously over the past 10 years. All levels of government have made greater inroads into society than was the case 15 years ago. All of this is costing more money. It is therefore essential that financial controls and procedures which protect the taxpayer in a meaningful way are implemented. I do not think a special committee of parliament is a solution. I do not believe the establishment of "sunset laws" is a solution either.

We must ensure that when a deputy minister places a budget before his minister requiring so many millions of dollars to run the department for the coming year, that minister knows the budget has received the utmost scrutiny. I personally hope that the comptroller general, as one of his functions, will be making absolutely sure of that point. This is not in the realm of the Auditor General's duties. He looks at expenditures after they have been made. This job, then, is parallel to that of a chief executive officer in the private sector, who must insist upon double checking all figures in order to keep his corporation healthy and competitive.

The concept of instituting better control over government expenditures cannot be argued with. We must be realistic. First, we must understand that the federal government consumes only roughly 50 per cent of the gross national product of this country. As the President of the Treasury Board mentioned this afternoon, only about 50 per cent of those expenditures, or 25 per cent of the gross national product, is really controllable. The other 50 per cent is taken up by ongoing programs to which a "sunset law" could not apply. For instance, the government cannot arbitrarily cease to make payments to the provinces. There are other kinds of statutory payments, such as interest and so on, which are impossible to control.

The way we control the other half of our budget is through the kinds of personnel and dollar controls that are being instituted by this government more and more through effective measures advocated by Treasury Board. It is our job as members of parliament to continue to push for those. That is our idea of the way in which we can ultimately get a much better grip on the public purse.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat mystified by a couple of things that occurred in the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) and the last speaker, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin), regarding their view of what this motion means. Either they have read the motion and not understood it, particularly the last speaker, or if they do understand it, they do not want to admit its validity. It concerns me that two parliamentarians have taken the view that parliament as such has no place in the boardrooms of the public service.

Mr. Martin: I did not say that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member says he did not say that. He said he thought it would be best if the control of government expenditures was left to Treasury Board. There is nothing in the motion put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) which says that Treasury Board ought not to have the kind of control about which the hon. member spoke. We say the facts speak for themselves.

Over the course of time the federal government has been a contributor to the eating up of the gross national product. The question in the minds of many members is whether Treasury Board control by itself has proved to be adequate. It is time parliament began examining the accounts from the point of view of the percentage of the gross national product being eaten up by government. When we consider the situation, there is only one group of people in Canada ultimately accountable to the people, and that is the members in this chamber who also occupy the committees.

There is nothing sacrosanct about the standing committees of the House of Commons. Of course, there ought to be a study with regard to their relevancy, and I intend to say something about that later from the point of view of control.

Let us not fool ourselves. Let us not try to get the public to believe that the present system of control has been satisfactory. Perhaps it is time that we got into the business of examining the expenditures of government and the operations of agencies of government to see whether the people of Canada are obtaining the best value for their tax dollar. That is the purpose of this motion.

I commend the Leader of the Opposition on the speech he made and the new approach he has taken. It is perhaps an indication that the old rules which have been tested on the old boys are not sufficient today for the control of government. For the sake of being able to supply the social necessities to the public of Canada, we must look at new ways of controlling the cost of government.

The speech by the Leader of the Opposition indicated a new approach. It is unique because he said that parliament has a part to play in it. What disturbed me about the approach taken by the first NDP member who spoke was not only that they were prepared to have the old ways prevail, but that they are going to vote against this concept because it is new. It is a crass kind of conservatism that shakes me. Perhaps it is an indication of where that party stands in the scheme of things. More than that, it probably indicates the trauma from which they have yet to recover resulting from the election of the government of Sterling Lyon in Manitoba and what that government has done.

The government of Manitoba has established a force to look into the expenditures of government. They have involved the public service in a participatory way. My friends in that government tell me that the response they have had from the public service has been tremendous. There may be possibilities that that kind of approach can be operated with the involvement of the parliament of Canada. The government ought not to take the view that parliament has no place in deciding the fate of crown corporations and agencies. Parliament should have a place in deciding whether programs have become useless or whether their objectives should be changed.

I was interested in the approach to this whole matter by the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). He agreed with us.

Mr. Andras: In a very limited way.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I look forward to him and his colleagues supporting this motion because it is needed. The minister tried to tell us that the government is interested in the process of a comptroller general. Well, they had to be dragged kicking and screaming to it. I do not know whether the President of Treasury Board has noted it, but in the long list of priorities of this government for this session. Bill C-10 of last session which created the office, of Comptroller General does not appear. While the minister may give lip service to the idea, I would rather see the bill on the government's list of priorities.

The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) spoke about crown corporations. He said it will be difficult to decide whether to eliminate this Crown corporation, retain that one or change an objective. He is absolutely right. That is very important from the point of view of the operation of the government in a credible way. It is important from the point of view of the expenditure of public money. That kind of decision ought not to be made by a royal commission, commission of inquiry or task force. This country is overflowing with those.

As we see with the McDonald commission, once it is established, the people's representatives, the Parliament of Canada, and I guess even the Government of Canada, have no conrol over its function, speed or approach. It may become an excuse for government inaction. We have had enough of that.

This place, which is accountable in some way, given the expertise and advice that is available, is equipped to decide priorities and which programs should go ahead. After all, the people sent us here for that purpose. They sent all of us, no matter on which side we sit, to superintend and act as watchdogs over government expenditures.

The hon. member for Pontiac quite properly asked which agencies would be dealt with. There are some that are obvious, and the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) set them forth. Also he set forth criteria for dealing with cases which may not be so obvious. Crown corporations are not accountable in any real sense. There is even difficulty in having their annual reports before committees. I believe such criteria should be in place. The government has stolen a number of suggestions in the past and I think they would do well to steal this one, too. Decisions should be made in public.

If parliament really was able to exercise any control over the establishment or operation of programs, would it have consented to embark upon the relocation program and have carried it out at the same time as the government was decentralizing? I do not think the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) would have been so silly as to consent to running those two programs in parallel. Parliament would have rebelled. The hon. member for Ottawa West has spoken out against the decentralization program. But he supports a government which has operated this program, one based upon the crassets political motives, one which involves ministers of the Crown in the shabbiest patronage. Those are the kinds of decisions which, as he and I know, were made behind closed doors in the absence of studies and foisted—not by parliament, because parliament was never consulted—on the people of Canada.

Of course, a case can be made for decentralization, but certainly not for the way in which it was carried out in this instance. The hon. member for Ottawa West knows this. He has talked to people who have been affected by this policy; he has talked to administrators whose programs have been mucked up and whose lines of communication have been stretched beyond recognition. Can you imagine this parliament, Mr. Speaker, tolerating the way in which the status of women program has been handled, if it truly had a voice in it? I cannot imagine it being tolerated by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) if that were the case, or by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). It has been a sham. But there is no channel through which the program can be effectively examined by parliament and all members know it.

A proposal for an ombudsman is before us; a white paper has been prepared by senior public servants. No input has been made by parliament, yet the people we represent are much affected by these proposals and legislation will be drawn up on the basis of the white paper. I think parliament is the place where these programs should be examined. Take the bilingual bonus program which is discriminatory, wasteful and wrong in principle. I do not think any parliament would have started that nonsense, let alone persisted in it as the government has done after making the decision behind closed doors.

What has been the effect of that program upon public servants? They have become demoralized. They feel put upon and discriminated against. The merit principle has been destroyed. Talk about regulations! Three thousand public servants, it turns out, have been placed improperly, recruited without any competition. If anything ought to be supervised by parliament it is this program.

There are some of us—and I am one—who think this place is not perfect. The government wants its legislation passed quickly and members of parliament want to be able to look at some of these programs. We have never been able to resolve these divergent points of view. But the committee proposed by the Leader of the Opposition would give us for the first time a parliamentary opportunity to consider these matters, as opposed to their being considered by a royal commission of inquiry. After all, they are of importance to each one of us as well as to the people we represent.

Parliament has to take one further step. There is not a member who can honestly say that our system of standing committees is adequate to the task of examining the estimates. That is why two years ago I made a proposal to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization on behalf of the Conservative party aimed at establishing an ongoing committee in which the programs and ongoing policies of government, as provided for in the estimates, could be examined. We could then take specific programs out of the estimates and consider them in depth, not against the guillotine at the end of the fiscal period but in depth. We could call public servants as well as ministers before us and assess which programs were relevant, the direction they were taking and whether there might not be a better way in which their purpose could be achieved.

If we pass our most important problems to bureaucrats and task forces we are simply going to drift along. For example, there is no one in the country who believes that the road show of Pepin and Robarts will save confederation. It is a bureaucracy. A nation, I have always thought, is a matter of spirit. No one believes there is likely to be any fundamental change in the way government carries out its business unless parliament gets to the root of it. As things are, there is no way in which we can help the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) with his costly programs. We cannot help him unless parliament has an opportunity to examine these programs.

I do not speak in a partisan way when I suggest the reason a lot of these programs have gone off the rails is because we have reached the point in Canada at which the only body examining the operations of government is the Treasury Board; it is not an independent body, it is the government examining itself. It is time things changed, and the appointment of a select committee as we suggest is one of the ways in which this process can begin. We all know a general election is coming soon and that we are unlikely to see any procedural reform in those circumstances. But we should not lose sight of the part parliament can play in changing our approach, in changing our way of governing, in making government accountable, in—

An hon. Member: Filibustering.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member over there no doubt suggests that the way this House operates is by the government proposing and the opposition filibustering. What both he and I must consider is the relevancy of this institution to the needs and problems of the country. The unfortunate thing is that too much is done behind closed doors in Canada and not enough is done on the floor of the House of Commons with respect to matters which affect the Canadian people.

● (2122)

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief to allow my colleague from the NDP to take part in the debate. When I read the motion introduced today by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), I was particularly surprised—although the motion deals with four different matters—by the second paragraph. And for the benefit of the discussion, I take the liberty of reading again that second paragraph. I quote:

> . . . that a special committee be struck before February 28, 1978 to consider:
> . . . .
> (2) methods to limit the growing and undemocratic use of regulations;

Mr. Speaker, I was amazed at the word undemocratic because it shows the lack of ethics in the opposition. Mr. Speaker, the opposition should know, especially their leader, that regulations in Canada are not an undemocratic exercise. This exercise originates from the power which is given by the House and by legislation to the executive so that it can set up the details of its implementation.

Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to talk about an excessive number of regulations and that is debatable, I agree. But when they say that regulations are undemocratic, I do not quite see the point. I do not intend to enter into an academic argument to show that regulations are part of our institutions to the same extent as laws or other areas of concern of the institutional activity in Canada, but still I wanted to stress some principles. One cannot include in a motion which otherwise has some merit a word such as undemocratic about a government function which has endured through time. Mr. Speaker, regulations are the privilege of the executive, but again they stem only from the powers which are conferred by legislation passed by the House in the first place.

And I remind the opposition that this power can be used only if the House has first of all conferred its powers; as long as it has not done so, this power cannot be used.

Mr. Speaker, my second point concerning regulations consists in the analysis of its function. Is the opposition saying that the legislative power in Canada, that is this House, and accessorily the Senate, should deal itself with all the regulations? This would mean that all members of this House would have to be experts in all endeavours of daily life, and we all know that this is impossible. I would like to give a few examples of cases where I believe that it would not be a good thing for the House itself to discuss the details of regulations.

Let us take for instance the Fisheries Act. Is the opposition suggesting that each year the House of Commons should discuss quotas, the general control of fisheries, catches and permits? Mr. Speaker, we would talk about fisheries for the whole year. The Fisheries Act provides a structure within which the executive is responsible for issuing regulations for its application. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is normal and that no one would question the validity of this function.

Here is another example, Mr. Speaker: the radioactive products and materials legislation. Is the opposition implying that the House should study all the cases of materials or products giving out dangerous radiation and that the House should study every one of the products which will eventually be prohibited? We are not experts in nuclear energy; we are not experts or scientists in radioactive materials. This is another example, Mr. Speaker, of a situation where the experts, through regulations, can do a much better job than we can within the context of legislation which provides general guidelines.

Mr. Speaker, here is one last example: the navigation legislation which makes the government responsible for regulating navigation safety, shipbuilding specifications and ship equipment. Mr. Speaker, is the opposition trying to make us believe that it is anxious to study every detail concerning navigation? Mr. Speaker, how can we—264 members in this House—go into every detail of the navigation legislation?

Mr. Speaker, those are mere examples demonstrating that regulation authority is justified and is not undemocratic. On the contrary it is part of our institutions. Now, if we are told that the executive makes an overly generous or laxist use of that authority, we might discuss that; there are arguments for and against. But I shall remind the House that there is a principle as concerns authority, the principle that any gap tends to be filled. And why is this gap often filled through regulation? Because the House is often inadequate, inefficient and operates with such archaic rules that we cannot be really efficient and really professional in our capacity.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members really believe that the legislative has progressively relinquished its powers and if they are serious when they denounce it in such a motion—because a no confidence motion is a very serious matter—I urge them to get together in committee or otherwise to redefine this House as a modern institution with up-to-date rules so that it can really play its legislative function and spell out for the government the limits within which it must act. And that, Mr. Speaker, is the real issue. It is not saying: You have undemocratic regulations. It is not true. They are democratic since they emanate from a decision of this House but it is rather a matter of properly defining the framework within which they must operate.

But besides that, Mr. Speaker, and I will be finished in a few moments, I would like to remind the House that the exercise of the right to regulate operates within very specific criteria. It will be remembered that in 1971 the House passed the Statutory Instruments Act which defines in very specific terms the framework within which the process of regulation must operate, the criteria a regulation must meet to be legal and the obligation for any regulation to be in accordance with the Human Rights Act.

Mr. Speaker, a section of the Treasury Board studies all regulations on a daily basis to ensure that none of them violate the provisions of the Human Rights Act. I must say that it is more than our courts were willing to do since they did not accept the power they were being given to exercise some discretion in the interpretation of our laws under the Human Rights Act. And without going further into this, Mr. Speaker, the government deserves to be commended for setting up this review mechanism within the Privy Council. And that is not all, Mr. Speaker. For some time already in certain statutes—and I am referring in particular to new legislation such as the regulations relating to the Motor Vehicles Act, for example, or the Clean Air Act, or the Anti-Pollution Act—all those recently enacted statutes contain a mechanism providing for the publication of the regulations to allow the public to make its views known to the government on the effects such regulations might have.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, last December the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced that from now on a new system involving the socio-economic analysis and impact of any regulation would be implemented under which any regulation involving expenditures or a major social or economic impact would be reviewed. The results of that examination would then be published in the Canada Gazette giving interested organizations a period of 60 days in which to make their opinions known to the agency involved, to make representations and thus ensure more enlightened regulations.

Mr. Speaker, I am not here to stick up for the regulations put out by the government. I am merely attempting to define the framework within which clause 2 of the motion of the official opposition must be considered. Once again, the big question, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said so well, the question is not so much to complain about the number of regulations promulgated by the government, as that of ensuring that they respect the spirit of the law which confers upon the executive the authority to issue them and of working towards the future, as the President of the Treasury Board said this afternoon, by reforming the standing orders of the House and making the legislative body more efficient, more critical and more pertinent, thus better circumscribing the authority and the scope of the executive. That is the big question, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, the motion of the opposition does not touch upon that aspect of the situation which really is of prime importance for both our institutions and our country.

● (2132)

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this has been a very interesting debate. A good many sensible things have been said, and they have been said from both sides of the House. I like, in particular, the appeal that has been made by some of the members of the official opposition for means whereby we can scrutinize more carefully the expenditures of government and have an opportunity to review programs. I also like the same sentiment as we have heard it from the other side of the House by members of the government, who have suggested that when things are not right the course to follow is not to throw out a program but to see what can be done to correct it. So, sir, I think it has been a useful day that we have spent on this motion.

In a few moments, however, we shall be called upon to cast a vote. We are not being asked to vote on the sensible things that may have been said from either side of the House; we are being asked to vote on a specific motion. The motion is a lengthy one. No matter what one picks out, somebody is likely to say, "Didn't you notice line so and so?"

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the essence of this motion is found in the words, "... that action be taken to reduce the scope ... of government activity in Canadian society ..." My hon. friends to the right are trying to say that this is a motion of new ideas. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has been congratulated for putting forward something that is new. There is nothing in the whole motion that is new; no forward steps are proposed. Everything in this motion calls for cutting back, cutting out, or discontinuing something that government is doing. It is all summed up in those words that I have already underlined, " . . . that action be taken to reduce the scope . . . of government activity in Canadian society . . ."

Mr. Clark: How reactionary, Stanley!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a moment, my young friend—

An hon. Member: Whipper snapper.

Mr. Clark: CCF philosophy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Like quite a few members of this House, but not all of them, I remember the days when the scope of government in Canadian society was a lot less than it is today. I remember those days well.

Mr. Paproski: One hundred years ago.

An hon. Member: Show some respect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, years ago. I experienced what we had in those days in terms of poverty, lack of health care, insecurity. I could tell the story of it in my own family. I could tell countless stories of what it was like to live in that kind of society by recounting what happened to families in the churches in which I had the privilege of being the minister. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go back to those days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not want a society—

Mr. Clark: That is known as a red herring.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Never mind that language, I am talking about reality. I am talking about the perspective of history. I know what it was like when there was less government concern. I know that today things are better for the people of this country in terms of health, housing, security, minimum wage and other labour laws, farm marketing, culture, highways and travel, and all the rest of it. It has all come about because the Canadian people have taken action in these areas through the medium of government activity. To turn all of that back is unthinkable.

I have to say, as I stand here tonight, that I have no confidence in the government across the way.

Mr. Nowlan: You hypocrite!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But, Mr. Speaker, I would be denying everything that I have fought for throughout my life if I supported the philosophy that is contained in this motion—

An hon. Member: Read the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —which says take the government out of Canadian society, spend less money, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Show some respect.

An hon. Member: Socialist misrepresentation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Seldom have I been honoured by as much heckling as I am getting now. It tells me just one thing. It tells me that what I am saying is true. It tells me I have got to the heart of this motion. It tells me that the Tories do not like to be told that what they want is as reactionary and old fashioned as it could be.

• (2142)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member is happy with the attention he is receiving, but the Chair has very much difficulty in hearing what he is saying.

Mr. Kempling: He isn't saying anything anyway.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with the emphasis put on the point which has been made from time to time today that governments should not be allowed to get out of hand, that we should do something about waste, that we should be concerned about a government which has all kinds of money for a lot of nonsensical projects and does not have money for veterans, pensioners and so on. But as for the fundamental philosophy of whether we are going to go back to the greed, the caprice and the cruelty of a free market economy or whether the people are going to act through their government to create the kind of society they want, I take my stand for the latter.

I said something about having a recollection of what it was like in the days before there was the scope of government activity which exists today, and I reassert my contention that we solved many of those problems because government got into the battle. Difficult as those problems some of us faced when we were late teenagers or in our twenties were, and difficult as it seemed in the 1930's to counter that situation, far greater problems face us today, such as the whole problem of what we are going to do about energy, the whole problem of a world with finite resources and the whole problem of what we are going to do about an industrial strategy. If these things are left to a political philosophy which says that governments should stay out of the picture, those problems will not be solved at all. We need a much more sensible, vigorous and aggressive government than we have today; but to suggest that we do not need government at all or that the government should cut back is a grossly irresponsible position to take, and as far as this motion is concerned, we cannot support it.

I welcome the sensible things which have been said, but I cannot understand why this House is being asked to vote for such a reactionary motion which does nothing but turn the clock back. Why do the Tories want to become the next government if they do not want to govern and if they do not want to give some leadership?

Again I say I welcome the heckling and interruptions. It means that at least I have not been putting hon. members to sleep.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to have this opportunity to say that we have no confidence in the government opposite, but we are not going to vote for a motion which would turn the clock back.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, one member I have enjoyed knowing and from whom I have learned much over the years is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: This man has served this country well in his capacity as a member of parliament. Much social advance has come about under his urging, but in my opinion tonight he distorts and wishes to destroy all the gains which have been made in this country by supporting the degree of waste and abuse of power which is going on under the government opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(9), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the proceeding now before the House.

The question is upon the motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Clark) which was negatived on the following division.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO RECOMMENDATIONS OF IJC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the growing urgency surrounding the Garrison diversion project and its effect upon Manitoba's lakes and rivers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to send a diplomatic note immediately to the U.S. government stating Canada's firm commitment to the recommendations of the IJC that guarantee no environmental harm to Canada, and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs refer both the International Joint Commission report on Garrison and the "Andrus plan" to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO IMPROVE RAILWAYS' PENSION PLANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency; therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House regrets the failure of the government to take any action to require the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway to improve their pension plans as recommended by Dr. Noel Hall in his report on Canadian railway pension plans and, further, noting that the pension issue is a major element in the breakdown of labour-management railway contract negotiations, this House calls on the government to insist on immediate increases in the pensions of retired railway workers and the inclusion of an indexing provision in all railway pension plans.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTHORIZATION FOR OPENING OF MAIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That any legislation brought forward by this government in reference to granting authority to police officers to open mail require that authorization be sought and granted by a judge of the superior court of a province and that such authorization only be granted if an affidavit by the applicant states that such police officers have reasonable grounds to believe the security of the nation is threatened or a serious crime is involved.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST THAT EX-MINISTER BE AUTHORIZED TO ANSWER QUESTIONS ON RCMP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce an important motion of pressing necessity.

Since the Prime Minister has decided to accept the resignation of the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) as minister of his cabinet; since that minister was directly related in the House to the case of RCMP illegal activities; since that resignation could be interpreted as a means to prevent the minister from answering questions about the part played by the government in that shameful affair involving the RCMP; and since the members of this House are entitled to question the ministers of Her Majesty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That the House demand that the former solicitor general be authorized to answer specific questions concerning his department, especially as regards the so-called RCMP affair.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS CARRY OUT MORE RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that only one nation in the industrial world, Denmark, contributes less money than Canada for research in the field of agriculture, and since the present support for agricultural research in Canada is miserably low when compared with that for private business and industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House urges the government of Canada to reverse its destructive intention to curtail the use of public institutions for research in agricultural production and contract such research to private research institutions which in the case of plant and animal breeding is non-existent.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR IMPROVED SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the CBC has sufficient resources to finance such programming frivolity as conducting a national telephone survey on the dreams of Canadians, including wasting the time of members of parliament with such nonsense, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House unanimously condemns such irresponsible squandering of public funds by the CBC and directs the corporation to provide forthwith realistic production facilities in the province of New Brunswick and access to AM and FM radio programming in both official languages to all the people of New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) said "No".

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REMARKS ABOUT MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is recorded in Hansard for November 26, 1974, as forecasting, and I quote, "I shall see Otto Lang tarred and feathered and driven out of Saskatchewan", and "I will pay for the oil and I will pluck the chickens", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the minister advise the House whether he is still prepared to pay for the oil and pluck the chickens needed for the tarring and feathering of his colleague, or whether he no longer desires such a sticky future for the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS BY BELL CANADA AND NORTHERN TELECOM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, regarding an urgent and pressing matter. In view of the fact that Northern Telecom, a subsidiary of Bell Canada, laid off over 1,000 workers in the last year and that new lay-offs of an additional 400 workers in Montreal and Brantford are being announced, and in view of the statement by Telecom's chairman, Mr. Robert Scrivener, that Northern Telecom would hire more workers if Bell is allowed to increase its residential telephone rate by 20 per cent and its business rate by 28 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House unanimously condemns the economic blackmail by Bell Canada and Northern Telecom and urges the government to stop immediately the millions of dollars in tax concessions provided to Northern Telecom to create jobs in Canada instead of laying off workers and using Canadian taxpayers' moneys to expand in the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RECURRING LAY-OFFS—EFFECT ON ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I could interrupt his conversation with his Quebec lieutenant, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hees: Good old bilingual Jack.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, someone across the aisle now confirms that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is the Quebec adviser to the Government of Canada, and I am prepared to accept that advice. My question to the Minister of Finance flows from the most recent publication of statistics by this government which indicate the failures of the policies of the government.

Today, reports from the Department of Employment and Immigration indicate that in the month of January in excess of 7,000 Canadians were laid off at plants across this country. That continues the very dangerous pattern that was evident in October, November and December and indicates, also, that the government must do something quickly to stop this pattern of lay-offs which is adding to unemployment in the country. My question to the minister is simple: What immediate action does the government intend to take to halt this dangerous pattern of lay-offs across the country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I prefer to have some advice from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on national issues, on a Friday morning, rather than the kind of advice that the Leader of the Opposition was trying to get in Quebec City last Friday. I think we are very much aware that we have some difficult economic problems in this land, and we are working very hard to try to improve the situation.

Last Friday I spoke with my colleagues, the ministers of finance of the provinces, about the general situation. There will be an economic summit with the premiers and other ministers in the next couple of weeks. They are trying to do whatever is possible to improve the situation. We stated our economic policies in October, and this month some tax cuts come into the economy. We cut income tax by $100, for January and February, for seven million taxpayers. On January 1 we—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member said we do not have economic policies, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to report to him that many ministers of finance—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Clark: If I may summarize that answer, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said that his plan is to continue to talk while plants close down across the country. He referred to his meeting with provincial ministers of finance. If press reports are correct, at that meeting he repeated his projection that there would be a rate of growth of at least 5 per cent, and perhaps 5.5 per cent, this year. I do not know of one, and I defy the minister to name any serious economist in the country who accepts that rate of growth.

What worries this House of Commons is that if the minister is wrong in this, as he has been in everything else, we are going to have deeper problems with unemployment and the economy of this country. Will the minister table in this House the projections and inform .tion from his department on which that forecast of growth rate was based?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we discussed those policies with officials of the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. We were not the only ones who predicted that Canadian growth in 1978 will be second only to Japanese growth, of all countries in the world, and will be better than all other OECD countries. We said on October 20 that the growth pattern for 1978 would be 5 per cent, and we do not have to change that figure. The Leader of the Opposition is asking if we have some company. I was quite pleased to learn that the Conference Boards of Canada and the United States predicted that the Canadian economy in 1978 would be better than any country other than Japan.

● (1122)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister is supposed to be dealing with figures. He has given a hard figure of at least 5 per cent, perhaps 5.5 per cent. Who else predicts that rate of growth for Canada? The answer is that nobody else of standing predicts that rate of growth. I am asking the Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was about to call to order the Leader of the Opposition, who had put a question and then began to answer it. I think that is extending the privileges of the question period.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question. My reasonable request is to the Minister of Finance. Canadians who are presently unemployed, and the number is growing each month, are the ones who are interested in being assured that the economic policy of this government will create new jobs, my question is: Will the minister make available to the House of Commons the information on which he bases his projection, so we can be sure the minister correctly understands that information, that he is correctly presenting the views of his officials, and so that all Canadians, including this parliament, will have some reason for confidence—something more than the word of this minister that we can count upon for that kind of rate of real growth in the country? Will he make that information available to the House of Commons?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I made an economic statement on October 20, 1977, in which I explained why we believe the growth will be 5 per cent. There is no information at present which will force me to change that projection. I stand by what I said. Before I made those projections, I had long discussions with the very able advisers of the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada, and to date they have not asked me to change my position.

Mr. Clark: Will the Minister of Finance agree, right now, to resign if he is wrong in that projection?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can understand that the hon. member would like me to be out of politics. I would like to be out of politics, but when I see that we could be replaced by a party which will be led by him, I have reason to stay around.

GOVERNMENT ADVICE TO JOBLESS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the soon-to-be unemployed Minister of Employment and Immigration. I ask him this question: Given the fact that according to the latest figures of Statistics Canada, there are 26 job seekers for every job opening in this country, and apart from the frivolous and irresponsible advice he gave to the group he calls the mommas and poppas of the country not to send their kids to university, as well as a million dollars worth of offensive advice he has given to unemployment insurance recipients, what advice does he have for the one million Canadians for whom there are no job openings?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with that preamble we have seen an unusual phenomenon: the hon. member's mind stopped working and his mouth kept functioning.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the unemployed.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to constantly misquote what in fact was said by myself, I suppose that is appropriate enough, if that is the kind of hyperbole that he wants to use. Let me suggest to him that in addition to being the official crepe-hangers over there, some consideration should be given to the fact that in villages and small communities such as Pembroke an industrial park has been opened, and Shell are talking about embarking upon a $200 million expansion.

The hon. member has said there is no hope for the people who are unemployed. I say that is just not the case. Shell management have indicated they are expanding; they are moving into a Syncrude project. When we hear all the blues being cried about not being able to lease buildings in Ottawa, we should remember that Metropolitan Life, with its large building, says they are having no difficulty. There are all kinds of opportunities and optimism alive in the country.

LEADERSHIP FROM DEPARTMENT TO IMPROVE EMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If we are to go by the irrational statements of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, his mind is certainly not working. My question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is this: Given the fact that in the month of January there were more than 7,000 plant lay-offs, affecting every region of the country, mainly because of lack of orders, what direction or leadership can we expect from the minister and his department with respect to the plants which are being forced to close down and lay-off Canadians because of lack of orders?

• (1127)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that at any given time in a normal year, 25 per cent of the labour force change jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I hear members saying "Oh, oh!" Some move up the ladder, some move laterally, and some move to new locations. I would also like to state that my department, through the enterprise development program, is assisting industry every day. In fact, in the month of January we probably substantiated 7,000 more jobs.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

McDONALD INQUIRY—EVIDENCE THAT PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE INSPIRED RCMP BREAK-IN

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I congratulate him on his appointment and on assuming this new responsibility. I wish him luck: he will probably need a lot. The evidence given before the McDonald inquiry yesterday was that the break-in at the offices containing PQ files was inspired, not by the RCMP security service but by information given from the Privy Council Office to the RCMP to the effect that the PQ was being funded from a foreign source.

Can the minister confirm that it was the PCO which gave the information to the RCMP before that activity against the PQ? Also, can he advise what evidence the PCO had, that the RCMP did not have, which inspired the RCMP to move on the PQ?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind words. With regard to the question he has raised, I would point out to him that the McDonald commission is dealing with the issues that he has identified. It will be my policy to leave the McDonald commission to make its own conclusions on the evidence that is adduced. I will not be commenting on a day by day basis on evidence that may be adduced before that commission on a prior occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the question of political responsibility is the one that is being asked. The Solicitor General knows that. This is a blank refusal to deal with the responsibility of this government. I hope the Canadian public understand what is happening when the Solicitor General gives that kind of answer. My supplementary question is this: Also before that inquiry, evidence was given that, in fact, when the Japanese Red Army terrorist was arrested, the illegal mail openings that took place were unnecessary. The evidence was, with hindsight, they would not have needed it. The apprehension was done after a legal wiretap and had nothing whatsoever to do with the mail opening in that particular case. We had evidence by the previous solicitor general in this House, and statements by the Prime Minister, that as a direct result of that mail opening the apprehension had taken place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder how long the hon. member really feels he is entitled to make a preamble. If he has a supplementary question, I suggest he should put it.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, you have to be careful asking questions of a new minister: I want to make sure he is fully advised. Can the Solicitor General now advise the House what information was put before the previous Solicitor General with regard to mail openings? What information was put before the Prime Minister with regard to mail openings? Was the information that the mail openings were responsible for the arrest? Was this House misled?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the initial remark of the hon. member, I want to assure him that I take my ministerial responsibility very seriously indeed. That ministerial responsibility is dated as of February 1 of this year. What happened prior to that time and prior to the nomination of the previous solicitor general is a matter presently under study by the McDonald commission. The allegation the hon. member has brought to our attention is, again, a matter that was brought forward in evidence before the McDonald commission. I suggest to the hon. member that he not only rely on his interpretation of a reporter's interpretation of the evidence, but that he read the transcript. I point out to him that the transcript of Sergeant Pollock's evidence comprises 30 pages of yesterday's proceedings. I suggest he familiarize himself with those proceedings before making any sort of allegations in this House, if he is to discharge his responsibilities as a private member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Solicitor General to clarify his last answer. Is it his position that he will not be informing himself of anything that has occurred previously in his department, in order to advise this House concerning the political responsibility of the government? Is that precisely what the minister is telling the opposition today?

Mr. Blais: Of course not, Mr. Speaker.

● (1132)

McDONALD INQUIRY—REQUEST SOLICITOR GENERAL RECONSIDER EARLIER ANSWER

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. If we agree that we are not to rely merely on press reports of what is happening in a couple of judicial inquiries in respect of our search and our responsibility in this House to get this information, obviously this is an added burden and responsibility on us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Obviously, it is our responsibility to ask the minister these questions so that we can receive the truth in this House. Will the Solicitor General reconsider the rather inflexible attitude which he has just displayed, so that we can ask him these questions in the House about this important matter and not have to rely on what is happening in a judicial inquiry?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

KEABLE INQUIRY—INQUIRY WHETHER NEW SOLICITOR GENERAL WILL FOLLOW POLICY OF HIS PREDECESSOR

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Solicitor General.

Can the new Solicitor General tell us whether he intends to follow the same policy as his predecessor with regard to the stand to be taken on the summons and requests of the Keable inquiry?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. In fact, I had hoped that the hon. member would realize that I should analyse each summons before making a specific decision on what I am being asked. Generally speaking, I do intend to follow the policy of my predecessor with regard to such requests as I feel exceed the mandate of the Keable inquiry.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, can the minister say whether he will accept to clear up completely the reasons which led the RCMP to act illegally under the circumstances that have already been revealed, and will he also accept to throw light on the responsibility of the RCMP agents provocateurs in the infamous October 1970 crisis?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I should like to reflect at greater length on the question of the hon. member. Naturally, I am not familiar enough with the matter to give him a complete answer, but, generally speaking, I believe that most of the topics he has brought to our attention are now being examined by the McDonald Commission. I am totally confident that the latter will be able to assume its full responsibilities under its terms of reference.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SIGNATURE OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR ON QUEBEC BILL 101

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In connection with the signature which was applied a couple of days ago to Bill 101 by the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, after a delay of approximately five months, at which time he affixed his signature to the French version of Bill 101, was the Government of Canada consulted by the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec as to the course that should be followed? Was there any discussion between the government of Canada and the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec in connection with this matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I made a quick check on that point this morning. To my knowledge the answer is no, there has been no such consultation or discussion between the government and the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. That is the result of a quick check. If further investigation reveals that I am incorrect, I will tell the House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec constitutionally occupies a dual position as a representative of the Crown and is reponsible to the Government of Canada which appointed him, does the Acting Prime Minister not think the Government of Canada, under the law which provides for bilingualism in every part of Canada, should have made it clear to the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec that the course he was following was one which was satisfying Mr. Lévesque but was a denial of the entire consitutional basis of this country?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would not undertake to accept that view. The Lieutenant Governor of Quebec is an experienced person with long service in that particular post. I am sure he acted with full knowledge of the consequences of his actions and his constitutional position. To my knowledge, we have not had any contact or discussion with him as to how he ought to proceed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am always impressed by the hon. minister when he answers a question and when he speaks in the House. I ask him this simple question: Does he not think the Government of Canada owed a duty to the whole of Canada to take a view different from that expressed by Premier Lévesque and apparently accepted by Mr. Lapointe in correspondence, was what took place proper and appropriate? Surely the Government of Canada should have followed the course other governments had followed in the past when lieutenant governors act contrary to what is expected in a national sense, namely, the government steps in. Is this another example of the Government of Canada having a sham fight with Premier Lévesque?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker; the fight is quite real.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BILINGUALISM

ALLEGED LACK OF PUBLIC POLICY FOR PROGRAM

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It concerns the recent resignation of the minister's bilingualism co-ordinator in Ontario, Mr. Richard Fitzgerald, who charged at the time of his quitting that the lack of public policy in dealing with ethnic groups is resulting in a waste of funds and an unfair allocation of money: in fact, he suggested that this money is being used to re-elect Liberals, to the detriment of the minority it is supposed to serve.

When the minister's undersecretary appeared before the standing committee last November 30, in response to a question posed by me he said:

> The way I have operated is to seek my minister's approval for priorities and then decide to discriminate in favour of the issue.

Can the minister give an uncategorical assurance that he or his office at no time during the drafting or implementation of funding programs under his department for minority groups or citizen participation gave an implied or direct indication to his officials that the impact of such funding upon the Liberal party's fortunes should be a consideration in its allocation?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member that assurance. I met with the public servant in question after he tendered his resignation to explore with him the reasons for it, and indeed we discussed policy matters. But at no time in our conversation did he raise the kind of matter which was referred to in the press and to which the hon. member has now referred.

When I read those press reports, obviously I was disturbed by their import. I instructed my officials to get in touch with him to find out if there was specific evidence to support such allegations, if indeed he made such allegations. I know my officials have been in touch with him; I believe they wrote to him the day before yesterday. I am awaiting any specific information which would help me to track down such cases, if indeed there are any. I can assure the hon. member there has never been any instruction, implied or otherwise, on my part that grants or awards should be given on the basis he suggested.

● (1142)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that the minister indicated at the meeting early in December that he would supply to members of the committee a clear indication of the nature of the projects that have been funded, and a further elaboration on the criteria—something that has not yet been received by the committee members—and because during the month of December, when the minister announced his policy for aid to Francophones, there was a noticeable lack of either prior consultation or, in effect, acceptance by the umbrella organization, the Federation of Francophones of Quebec, could the minister indicate if his department is still bypassing this organization in the allocation of grants, and whether any steps are being taken to effect meaningful, ongoing consultation and co-ordination in this important program?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I think three questions are contained in the hon. member's question. I will try to answer each one of them. Of course, decisions about grants are made within the framework of the government; they are not made by the organizations which consult with the government. Second, there has been a continuing effort to seek consultation in this area, particularly over the summer months when we were preparing the proposals which I announced before Christmas. There has been a constant effort to obtain the co-operation of La Fédération Francophone hors Québec in the elaboration of these programs, and for reasons which they have expressed, with which I am unhappy, they decided not to take part in the process of consultation.

Third, I should indicate that in terms of the elaboration of the criteria to which the hon. member referred, criteria have been established for a considerable period of time for the official languages minority group program. What I have suggested is that it might be useful to develop those criteria further, to elaborate on them and to find additional criteria for the funding of groups. So there are criteria already available. It has been my hope that through the process of consultation we might be able to improve on those criteria to further assist the groups.

COMMUNICATIONS

LONGLAC, ONT.—REPORTED SEIZURE OF TRANSMITTING EQUIPMENT

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Communications. I ask the minister whether she is aware of the fact that last night, in Longlac, Ontario, officials of her department, aided by the RCMP, seized the transmitting equipment of the Northern Access network. This was done on the eve of French language television being put on the air for the first time in Longlac, something which the CBC has promised for many years but never delivered. Will the minister instruct her officials to stop this practice of harassment against these citizens living in an isolated region of Canada, and can she tell the House what action is proposed to help Northern Access to become technically certified and then licensed?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of these actions which took place last night, but I expect the only grounds on which such seizure of equipment could take place would be that the equipment of the persons or firm in question was not up to the standard required by the department. However, I will inquire immediately into this situation to see what really happened and for what reasons.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAYS—BREAKDOWN OF NEGOTIATIONS IN LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that negotiations between the railway brotherhoods and railway management broke down yesterday after a period of negotiation, and in view of the fact that the unions have asked the minister to appoint a commissioner in this matter, can he tell the House whether he will do so, what the duties of Mr. Kelly are, and what his status is in his movement from here to Montreal? Also, can the minister tell the House whether he has held discussions with the railroads and the unions on this matter?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, Mr. Kelly is highly experienced, especially in railway negotiations, so no doubt he has been in discussion with both management and labour. On the railways, his function is, of course, to go to Montreal to try to achieve a settlement by bringing the parties together. I sincerely hope he can accomplish it.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the fact that the issues which caused the breakdown in the negotiations are confined to the totally inadequate response of the companies on fringe benefits, nothing for those who are on pension and, what is most serious, the whole matter of the railways' attempt to contract out—which has to do with job security—will the minister be making representations through other ministers or the government as a whole to the railway management? Also, since I appreciate that he must maintain some element of neutrality and impartiality, will he ask the Minister of Transport, rather than my chicken-plucking friend from St. John's West, to call upon the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway management to make improvements in benefits for their pensioners and to cease and desist from attempts to contract out work, particularly with respect to maintenance of way, and if they will negotiate—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, no doubt the hon. member's message is getting through, but so far as I am concerned I would not maintain the position of neutrality which the hon. member advises me to maintain.

B.C.—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that there has been a long and unpleasant strike in British Columbia, involving the management and employees of British Columbia Tel, and in view of the fact that rumours are circulating that the strike has either been settled or is on the verge of settlement, can the minister report to the House on the situation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is a happy occasion for me because I am advised that there is every expectation that a settlement of that bitter dispute will be reached. There are still things to be worked out in the work agreement area. I will be in the hon. member's city tomorrow, and I will be in a position to make a final assessment of how close to conclusion the settlement is, but I am confident that the matter can be settled.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister give us his assurance that in any discussions he will have—I refer especially to complications which might still exist with respect to working out back to work arrangements—he will follow the advice he has been taking lately, and the position which I have always taken, that politicians refrain from commenting until the delicate negotiations are completed?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): There is no question about it, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

WHEAT—SALE AT BELOW COST OF PRODUCTION—DELAY IN SHIPPING

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Yesterday the minister confirmed the worst fears of the prairie grain farmers, that not only are we sold out of wheat this year at below the cost of production but also at below the initial price, which means no payments to farmers next spring. At a time when wheat prices are steadily rising, and with the revelation that public money will be required to balance the pool account for wheat, will the minister now have the Auditor General report on Canadian Wheat Board accounts, especially in view of the suspiciously large wheat payment now in the mail in this election year to a quarter of a million producers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is really astonishing how the hon. member can launch an attack against the Canadian Wheat Board and combine it with the fact that the government has to its credit the holding of the initial price at higher levels than we considered safe at the time we set them. It is well known that that was the case. We did that for a variety of reasons, including the fact that we wanted to take the cost of production into account, the fact that with the stabilization plan we knew there was an offset in any case, and that with international agreement discussions forthcoming we wanted to be sure that the world would recognize we did not believe a price below $3 a bushel for our wheat was adequate.

• (1152)

Notwithstanding that, at that time the Canadian Wheat Board continued to compete vigorously for markets, using its best judgment, and if the hon. member really means to attack the board, its process and its judgment, like so many members of his party are apt to do, let him say so clearly. The board used its best judgment and it made sales, while some of the hon. member's colleagues—including premiers who are members of his party in other parts of the country—attacked the board for not being vigorous enough. The Canadian Wheat Board is, in fact, setting a record in terms of sales.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the minister's flippant answer does not bother me, but I wish he would show more concern for the well-being of the half million people on the prairies who depend on the grain industry for their livelihood.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): As the minister continually blames unreliable vessel arrivals for the annual pile-up of shipping in Vancouver, which is once again costing farmers millions of dollars in demurrage charges and is jeopardizing our growing Asian trade, does the minister still get his Asian shipping intelligence from our good friends in a downtown Chinese laundry?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, again the hon. member seems to neglect the fact that with $200 million going out in final payments and with a probable payment under the stabilization plan, we have done a great deal to safeguard the income of farmers. The lack of logic in his position is apparent when he talks about demurrage charges being a worry to the farmer. In fact, when there is a deficit in the pool, it should be obvious even to the hon. member that that payment falls to the government, rather than to the farmer. The truth is that there was a delay in the arrival of ships.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Hon. members from the Tory party, including the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, do not seem to realize that if there is a deficit in the pool, additional costs by way of demurrage obviously fall to the government, which pays the deficit; so it is not upon the farmer.

An hon. Member: It is on the taxpayer.

Mr. Lang: I agree that it is on the taxpayer. At last the Conservatives realize that. I wish they would recognize that generally, including when they attack the user-pays policy and other sensible policies aimed at bringing about productivity increases in this country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NOTIFICATION TO U.S.S.R. OF SATELLITE DISINTEGRATING OVER CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Did the government formally notify the Soviet Union, as we are required to do under clause 4 of article 5 of the treaty governing the return of objects launched into space, and have the Soviets responded in the manner they were obliged to do if we so informed them that an object of a hazardous and deleterious nature had crashed in our territory?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions between officials of the Department of External Affairs and the Soviet government to determine the consequences of this.

Mr. McKinnon: That is not quite an answer to the question I asked. I asked if we formally notified them under the treaty. Discussions are a different thing. Has the Soviet Union asked that the debris be returned to the Soviet Union, and is the minister aware that if we fail to notify them under the treaty, and if they do not make a spontaneous request for the return of the debris, we may well forfeit our chance of having them pay the expenses of the search?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the treaty has been exercised in that manner.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELEVISION—REQUEST COVERAGE BE EXTENDED TO NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Communications.

Considering that several isolated areas in northern Ontario which are not serviced by the French networks are interested in the kind of television programs mentioned earlier by my colleague from Thunder Bay, would the minister be prepared to make a statement on motions to explain the policy she intends to follow concerning that kind of programming?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the programs which are available in the region are not broadcast under a licence. The policy is already well established: anyone who wishes to broadcast television programs in a given area must appear before the CRTC to request a broadcasting licence. I will look further into the specific case mentioned by the hon. member to see if something can be done to make television more readily available to people who do not yet enjoy that service.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN CANADA

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister had any discussions with the automobile manufacturers he mentioned yesterday about doing a reasonable amount of, or even doing any, research and development in Canada?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have encouraged and urged the automobile industry to do more research and development in Canada.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

DEPARTMENTAL VACANCY AT DEPUTY MINISTER LEVEL

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Is there a vacancy at the deputy minister, or associate deputy minister level, in his department concerning the industrial development and research branch and, if there is, will it be filled very shortly?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is a vacancy there. The deputy minister interviewed several prospective applicants this week and we hope the position will be filled within the next week or two.

AGRICULTURE

BURNING OF PLASTIC BAGS AT EVISCERATING PLANT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It has just been brought to my attention that late last year the minister's department ordered the Friendly Family Farms eviscerating plant at Steinbach, Manitoba, to burn $15,000 worth of plastic bags because there were no French markings on them. I ask the minister why this burning was ordered and why the bags were not allowed to be used, in light of the fact that the company's product is marketed only in western Canada.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this and I was not aware that any order would have to be issued, because in other cases where this situation has been brought to our attention, permission has been given to use unilingual bags in unilingual areas. I will certainly check it out and report back, because I do not think there should be that kind of waste. If bags can be used, and if there is no need for them to have bilingual labels, they are going to be used in strictly unilingual areas.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REPORT ON FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Last week there was a meeting of federal and provincial deputy ministers of social services. Can the minister inform the House if any decision was made at that meeting as to the funding of social services? Did provincial officials bring to the attention of the minister's officials the great difficulties caused to the provinces because of the cutback in funds in relation to the amounts offered originally by the federal authority under proposed block funding arrangements for social services?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the result of the meeting of deputy ministers but I can assure the House that no decision has been made yet since the ministers have to decide. Earlier this week I wrote to all my provincial counterparts asking them if they would accept March 6 and 7 as appropriate dates to hold a federal-provincial meeting on social services to know if we might come to some agreement, something I am looking forward to. The $132 million which had to be frozen for a year was an additional amount provided in the initial offer. Unfortunately it has been frozen because of budget restraints that we saw fit to impose.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, since the federal-provincial conference has been postponed, is the minister still planning to introduce in the House at some time in April a new social services legislation?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, there must be some misunderstanding. The meeting I am supposed to have with my counterparts has never been postponed. The date I have indicated is that which my counterparts have requested. I am looking forward to this first meeting, which, depending on the general consensus of opinion, will determine whether the status quo will be maintained, or whether I shall have the honour to introduce a new legislation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

NORTHERN TELECOM—ALLEGED ECONOMIC BLACKMAIL TO OBTAIN RATE INCREASE FOR BELL CANADA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister aware of the economic blackmail statement made by the chairman of the board of Northern Telecom, Mr. Scrivener, who said that Northern Telecom would hire more workers if Bell Canada is allowed to increase its residential rate by 20 per cent and its business rate by 28 per cent? That is the largest increase Bell has ever requested. If the minister is aware of this, would he indicate whether he is prepared to recommend to his cabinet colleagues that the millions of dollars in tax concessions provided to Northern Telecom in the last budget, ostensibly to create jobs—which is not being done—will be terminated immediately?

● (1202)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was not aware of any statement made by the chairman of Northern Telecom and that our tax system is not of such a nature as to permit us to discriminate at will against any Canadian corporation.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Northern Telecom laid off 1,000 workers in the minister's province last year, and in view of the fact they have announced the lay-off of another 280 employees in Montreal and about 100 in Brantford, would the minister reconsider the easy position he continues to take with this company which has no intention of increasing its work force in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the tax incentives which a number of corporations are receiving because of the investments they make in specific areas do not compel them to maintain the same number of job opportunities in other areas or other plants in Canada. The law is there and exists for all industries in Canada, and those industries which qualify under the income tax legislation which the House adopted last December are entitled to these benefits. Under these circumstances, there is nothing we can do on the spur of the moment or following a bad statement made by a corporation official.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROPRIETY OF SIGNATURE OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR ON QUEBEC BILL 101

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister supplementary to that put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Is the Minister of Justice or the Department of Justice considering the question of the propriety of the signature, on the second language copy of Bill 101, of the Quebec legislature, its having been affixed after the proclamation of the original bill, and whether the signature at that late date has any effect whatsoever with respect to the position of the propriety of Bill 101?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Department of Justice will consider the question put by the hon. member. To my knowledge, it has not been discussed by the government. But these facts will probably be considered by the Department of Justice and it is probable they will conclude by forming some opinion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the position that the government has taken previously with respect to litigants under Bill 101, that it is proper to intervene and assist any Canadian involved with the bill, could the minister take up with the Department of Justice the question of what effect this late signing of the second language copy of the bill will have on litigants who are before the courts on a case decided prior to the rather tardy signing of the second language copy of the bill? This is a very important question as to the issue of Bill 101 and all that flows therefrom.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is raising valid questions as to the effect this development may have on litigants. My own mind is teeming with ideas on the subject, but as a non-lawyer I would hesitate to express them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—ANSWERS GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to the astounding and unprecedented statement made a few moments ago in the question period by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). This certainly reflects on my right to seek information in the House, and reflects on the right of every hon. member of this House to seek information which we not only have the right but also the responsibility to seek. My proposition to you, Sir, is that this reduces the proceedings of this House to an unfunny travesty, and indeed relegates us all to a position of impotence with respect to the truth of important matters which come before the House.

I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker, but this is an important matter.

I draw your Honour's attention to a ruling you made in this House many months ago which, even though some of us did not agree with it, nevertheless under the rules of this House we have to and do abide by it. That ruling was to the effect that we cannot ask direct questions of a previous minister of the Crown relating to the affairs of a department or ministry when that particular person was the responsible minister in this House. Presumably the logic behind Your Honour's ruling was that there always has to be a minister or acting minister of the Crown dealing with the affairs of a department, and therefore, if questions are to be asked, they should be asked of the present, not the previous minister.

I draw your attention today, Sir, to the very serious implications of what we have heard from the brand new Solicitor General. First, he does not not intend to answer in this House any questions relating to the affairs of his ministry prior to his appointment on February 2, 1978. Second, he does not intend to discuss or give any information to this House about matters which are the subject matter of two separate judicial inquiries outside this House which relate to very important matters, and about which some of us feel the correct and true information cannot be drawn out in the way both of those inquiries may be conducted at the moment.

Third, on the advice and counsel of this government, no political party is permitted to obtain representation before the one judicial inquiry over which the government has control. Not only is this an effective gag on political parties and reduces the whole political input into this very important political question to an absolute zero, but, more important, we have a minister in this House who says he is not responsible for what happened before February 2, and is not going to discuss it with us.

Where are we headed, Sir? I will be brief and I will be glad to make a written submission or perhaps a more extended submission, as I am sure many other hon. members will want to at a later date, if Your Honour wishes to reserve judgment on this matter. Surely, Sir, your original ruling is wrong or the minister is wrong. It is as simple as that. There can be no other choice. If we cannot ask this minister about matters prior to his appointment—and that is the very substance, basis, and essence of Your Honour's ruling—then where do we go? There is a void. It reduces the proceedings of this House to a travesty. It further reduces the whole proceedings of this House to a state of impotence on an important political matter regarding which we deserve and have every responsibility to seek information.

I suggest to you, Sir, that if this minister is starting off on that track he had better resign, or else the rules must be changed immediately so that we can bring this House of Commons back to the proper type of forum we have every right to expect it to be.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to second the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) concerning what is a fundamental question of privilege.

It is my capacity and every member's capacity in this House not to represent ourselves but to represent our constituents. When we come to this place we assume an obligation to ask questions of a responsible government about matters that come before it from day to day, or matters that we may learn about that had come before it previously. The opposition cannot always know what occurred months ago. But when a ministry changes, surely it is a fundamental principle of this place that the minister is not responsible for what happened with regard to his predecessor. Surely it is fundamental to the practices and procedures of the British House of Commons that that minister should inform himself so our constituents can be informed as to the political responsibility for matters that have gone before.

● (1212)

The answers given to questions which I raised today, Mr. Speaker, are mindboggling concerning the conduct of business in this place. I have not had a chance to check the blues, so I am going to paraphrase the answer that was given, but I certainly came to the conclusion from the answer given that he will not comment on matters before the commission, and that he will not inform himself on matters that have occurred in the past with respect to his predecessor.

An hon. Member: Precisely.

Mr. Leggatt: That is the most dangerous kind of answer and I must say it is the most dangerous way for the new minister to assume his new responsibilities. Surely if that is the kind of left foot the minister is going to put forward, it would be best for him not to sign a lease for his office or purchase any new furniture because he will not be occupying it for long.

The minister must accept his responsibility to inform himself and advise members of this House as to the political accountability of his office, and that includes his predecessor. If he is unable to recognize his duty and obligations, I suggest that a ruling be made in this House as to his responsibility respecting our practices and procedures here in answering questions concerning activities which have occurred in the past.

This is a vital and important matter to the House. It could reduce the question period to a travesty, and if he continues to take that position, Mr. Speaker, I suggest he is degrading the parliamentary process to an incredible degree. I am not suggesting that you make a ruling on this now but perhaps you would like to have something in more detail with more research undertaken on the subject. I will be happy to provide that if I am given the opportunity.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, of course I am interested in the comments made by both hon. gentlemen opposite. They do indeed deal with very important subjects. However, I think there is evidently some misunderstanding on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

There are two aspects to this question. The first one is whether I am in any way obligated during the question period to reply to questions in any form they may be. As I understand the rules, there is no obligation on the part of Ministers of the Crown to reply to questions that are raised. Second is the question of my responsibilities to the portfolio that has been conferred upon me.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: To tell the truth.

Mr. Blais: I have indicated to the hon. gentlemen that I take those responsibilities very seriously and they indeed include actions that took place prior to my nomination. In terms of my own ministerial responsibilities relating to any actions they commence as of February 1, the date of my appointment. With regard to providing information to hon. members, I would have to analyse each and every question that was put prior to my nomination in order to ascertain whether the information can be provided.

The decision which I have made that I will not reply to questions relating to matters presently before the Royal Commission which has been set up by this government—

An hon. Member: Stonewalling.

Mr. Blais: —at the request of the opposition, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Let us do away with the House of Commons and democracy.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is a pretty black day for you.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully and patiently to the hon. gentlemen. I wish they would offer me the same courtesy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: The McDonald inquiry is studying certain issues and matters within very wide terms of reference. It is for that commission to deal with those issues. At the request of the opposition the government set up that commission. I am not going to be led by the opposition to comment on a day-to-day basis on evidence which is adduced before that commission. It would be usurping the function of the commission if I qualified comments made before it respecting the validity or invalidity of one statement or the other. Surely that is part of the process of the investigation itself.

I will, of course, completely inform myself of the proceedings before the commission. Eventually, and I hope soon, there will be recommendations made by the commission, and decisions will be required by this government relating to those recommendations in order for us to take actions which will be encumbent upon us as a result of their conclusions. Until such time as a report is received from the commission, Mr. Speaker, I will not comment, nor will I offer any judgment relating to the value of the evidence or indeed the completeness of it.

In relation to my own responsibilities and the discharge of my duties, in response to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) prior to answering his question, I expressed amazement that although he was making very serious allegations relating to certain statements that have been made, he evidently had not informed himself of the evidence that has been adduced before that commission. I am not saying to the hon. members that they ought not to make themselves completely familiar with the evidence before that commission and make representations to the government; I am just saying that I am not accepting as my responsibility a role as commissioner or counsel before that commission or adviser to the commissioners in some way. I will reply to questions put to me in a way that I feel will discharge the responsibilities I have accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. To a certain extent we are arguing a situation which is hypothetical—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is like the devil, with respect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously before the matter can be tested questions will have to be put and responses received which will be the subject matter of a specific rather than a general argument. In any event, the matter has now been raised and I am prepared to hear further argument on it. It seems to me that we are talking about problems which are going to arise in the future and how the minister will deal with those questions. The argument I have heard today is not related specifically to answers or positions taken by the minister. I am not going to relate it to a question of privilege. If other members wish to do that today, I am prepared to do it.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to get into this matter until I heard the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) speak.

The Solicitor General in his remarks put forward the position he intends to follow as minister responsible to this House of Commons to report upon the activities of that department over a period of time. His position, Sir, which he has stated as the policy of the government, in summary is the following.

He has made it abundantly clear that he feels no obligation to tell anyone in parliament anything at all about anything that happened in the Department of the Solicitor General under his jurisdiction or any other jurisdiction. He said he believes—

An hon. Member: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Clark: He said quite precisely, Mr. Speaker, that there is an ancient parliamentary tradition which allows a minister not to answer questions in the House, and he intends to use that parliamentary tradition not to answer questions which he feels he does not want to answer. That is what he said. It may well be he said that because he received advice from the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp). He got in trouble that way before. That is precisely what he has said. He then went on to say—

• (1222)

Mr. Sharp: I was sitting listening to the member.

Mr. Clark: I regret all these interruptions being shouted across the floor. He then went on to say that if he does choose to answer questions put by members of parliament about public business, he is not going to answer relating to matters that occurred before his appointment.

Mr. Lang: He said clearly the opposite.

Mr. Clark: As my colleague from Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) pointed out, this raises a very serious question for this House of Commons. We are prevented now by a ruling of Your Honour from questioning the three previous ministers. This minister has now indicated that he does not intend to provide information about what went on in that period. The net result is that the House of Commons is left without an opportunity to get any information from anybody in this House about anything that went on in this matter.

The next limitation that he attached to any question he might answer, or any public information he might choose to give to the representatives of the people on a matter of the utmost seriousness and gravity to the country was that he will not comment on matters that are before a Royal Commission which his government established in part to try to evade the responsibility to answer questions here on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Lang: You demanded it.

Mr. Clark: The minister has made his position very clear. He warned us that, even contrary to the practice of his predecessors, he intends to fall back on the idea that he need not answer questions in the House of Commons. It was a very simple, straighforward statement. I give him credit for frankness, even though in my judgment that is an insupportable position for a Solicitor General to take, particularly at this time. He then went on to say that if he does choose to answer, he will restrict himself to things that happened since his appointment.

Finally, he has served notice that he will stonewall and refuse to answer, staying silent in the face of any questions which arise that are being considered by a Royal Commission which this government created in part to avoid the responsibility of having to answer questions in this House of Commons.

This statement of policy by the new Solicitor General is a most inauspicious and dangerous way for him to start on his serious responsibilities, and raises a very serious question of privilege to the House. It is a matter of great surprise to us that this minister would take this position in the early days of his portfolio.

You have asked, Sir, whether there would be more argument later. I think it is clear to say that we on this side would like to reserve our right to continue to comment at a later time and to raise again in much more depth our objections to this most dangerous proposal put forward today by the Solicitor General that will in fact allow him to stay silent in the face of questions in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to be fair to those who want to participate in the discussion, but I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) pointed out in his last comment that he wants to reserve the right to argue further. All members have said that.

What happened is that the minister in his answers today gave an indication of the manner in which he intends to deal with questions in the future. Whether that has been properly interpreted, properly stated by the minister or properly interpreted by those who have argued on the other side of the House, remains to be seen. I think that is the fact.

The Leader of the Opposition said that he wants to reserve the right to reserve argument. I think the opportunities for that argument will present themselves on numerous occasions. Obviously the next time the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) is asked a question can be the next opportunity at which this difficulty is going to arise.

There is no motion at this moment, no specific motion attached to a specific problem. That is my point. It is very difficult for the Chair to rule in the abstract on a declaration of intention.

As all hon. members know, there are circumstances under which ministers may simply take no action in the face of a question. There are others in which answers are not given for reasons stipulated. It would be a very curious and interesting situation if a minister, who in fact does not have an obligation to answer a question, refused to answer a question upon a certain ground, and the argument were then raised that that ground was not well founded. In fact, the ground may not be necessary. These are the kind of abstract arguments with which we are now dealing.

This is a very important point. Obviously it is a matter of great concern to the House. It goes fundamentally to the operation of parliament and the theory of ministerial responsibility.

A good part of the argument relates to whether the minister in fact said he would not answer questions related to previous Solicitors General and, if he did say that, whether he has the right to say it or do it. In fact, no question of that nature was put to the minister today.

That is a very important part of the argument. That is one of the reasons why I say that a specific question, which in fact gives rise to a specific argument and specific motion of privilege, is obviously going to come before us very soon. That is the proper vehicle through which we can argue this matter a little more specifically than we are now doing. We are under the handicap of arguing in the abstract. I do not think we can do that usefully much longer.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you give reconsideration to the statement that you have just made.

I was more than amazed by what the minister said this morning. I was impressed by what he said when he assumed the portfolio, speaking spontaneously without government intervention. He said that in his position he intended to do everything to clarify and clear up the proclivities— he did not use that word—of his predecessors in office. Today he utters in this House a proposition which means that the House of Commons might as well close down in so far as matters that come under his authority are concerned. One now begins to understand the reason for the merry-go-round in the department of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais).

You cannot ask A, who knows more than anyone else. I refer to him as A because I do not want to refer to him by his name or constituency, which I do not recall at the moment. Then B comes along and says that he cannot tell us anything that happened under A. Now we have C. He puts before this House—

An hon. Member: X.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the rate they are going, it will not be long before we have X, there are so many hopefuls sitting opposite. They can all join in the concealment of facts.

Where is parliament today? We cannot ask this minister. He says he does not know, that he just arrived on the merry-go-round the day before yesterday. He says he cannot answer anything with regard to what happens before the Royal Commission. As far as that Royal Commission is concerned, it was set up last July, but did not convene until late fall. At the rate it is going today, there is one thing about which we can be sure. There will be no information come from that commission until after the election. That apparently is the reason for the delays that have taken place.

We cannot get information there. We cannot ask any questions here. The minister has adopted a stonewalling attitude that was clearly defined and brilliantly spoken of by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). The rights of parliament are being tramped on again as they were in 1956.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had hope for this new minister. I thought in the Post Office Department he was lost with the mail. To hear him make that proposition today shows he is one who learns fast in the position of Solicitor General.

• (1232)

This is not a matter which can be brushed aside as hypothetical. It is here today. If this proposition is accepted by parliament we might as well close down. Indeed, the government wishes we would, so that information might not be procurable in the House of Commons. As somewhat of a student of constitutional development, let me say I have not heard such an outrageous statement made by a minister since the days of the Right Hon. C. D. Howe in 1956.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as you may have noted, I rose at the same moment as did the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) to say something about this very point. It was my thought, when I was getting to my feet, that I would simply draw attention to what had been said and reserve the right to raise the matter as a question of privilege some day next week when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is here. That is still my view.

I fully recognize that Your Honour is not in a position to require anyone to answer a question or to make a speech; you can stop us from doing things but you cannot require us to do things. However, it seems to me that the issue raised today is one which calls for a clear statement by the Prime Minister regarding the responsibilities of the new Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), indeed, as to the responsibilities of all ministers.

The Solicitor General did say today he is responsible only as from February 1, 1978. You Honour has frequently told us that we cannot ask former ministers of any department about what went on when they were in charge, and the corollary is that the present minister of any department is responsible for answering questions concerning that department. I dare hope the minister will agree that he slipped a little on that—

An hon. Member: Wait and see!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am prepared to wait and see, but it came to my ears that his responsibility began only on February 1, 1978. But as I say, I am prepared to let that wait until we have had a chance to read the record.

On the point of whether the Solicitor General is going to answer questions I acknowledge, of course, that any minister has the right any day to refuse to answer a question. But for a minister to stand up and say he does not intend to answer any questions addressed to him in a certain area, no matter what they are, relating to the two commissions which are now sitting—

An hon. Member: He did not say that!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He said it, and he admits he said it. There is no question about it. I recognize the minister's right to deal with each question on its merits, but for a minister to tell members of parliament that no matter what questions we ask, if they relate to the McDonald or to the Keable inquiry, he will not answer them, is surely an affront to parliament.

Your Honour has suggested we should wait until some specific case arises. I submit there was a specific case today. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) asked a question about certain evidence before the McDonald inquiry which, in our view, contradicts what has been said on the floor of this House. Surely we are not to be refused answers in a case like that. In my submission the minister's whole position must be reviewed.

As I say, I recognize that Your Honour cannot require ministers to answer questions but I think the Prime Minister owes it to the House to ensure that the principle of ministerial responsibility is maintained and that the appointment of Royal Commissions will not be used as an excuse for withholding information from this Chamber. I reserve the right to raise the matter as a question of privilege on the Prime Minister's return after we have read the record of today's discussion.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no machinery whereby I can hear the person who initiated this discussion a second time. I simply say I have no motion before me dealing with a specific question of privilege in relation to events which have taken place today. I do not want to restrict the argument. I understand that this is a matter of great concern. It has been addressed by several members. If there is a desire to deal with the question today and get a decision I must have something specific before me, and I do not.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I find that to some extent the argument has been exaggerated. Every one of us would agree that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) became responsible for the administration of the department the moment he was sworn in. Otherwise it could be argued that he was responsible prior to that date. I do not think anyone would disagree with me on that point. It is entirely in this context I understood the Solicitor General to use the date February 1. I did not hear him say he felt no responsibility to answer questions relating to the activities of the department prior to February 1. In fact, I heard him say the very opposite, and I believe the record will demonstrate that the Solicitor General did say, when he rose to explain, that he fully intended to do as other ministers do, and as his predecessors did, that is, deal with questions related to past activities of the department. That is the principle under which the government is operating and it is a principle which I understood the Solicitor General to enunciate.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You would have to recast the whole sentence to get that meaning.

Mr. MacEachen: What I believe the Solicitor General was getting at—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this the final interpretation?

Mr. MacEachen: It is an interpretation based upon hearing what has been said. It is probable that each of us would benefit from re-reading the transcript. Inasmuch as other members have put foward their interpretations of what has happened, pending a further review it is surely reasonable that members on this side should take advantage of the opportunity to do the same thing, on the understanding, of course, that we might find that the transcript tells us something different.

Let us situate this issue in the context of the questions which have been asked. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has stated, the issue arises in connection with evidence given before the McDonald inquiry. It is true that each day witnesses come before the commission and give evidence. It may be that the evidence given is contradicted by other witnesses the following day, or it may be contradicted by statements made inside this House, or outside it.

It is a fact that the press reported yesterday that certain evidence had been given by the former Commissioner of the RCMP. On the same point, statements were made in the House of Commons by the former solicitor general. This is well known. But is it the job of the House of Commons to examine the credibility of the evidence coming before the McDonald inquiry?

Mr. Lawrence: Certainly!

Mr. MacEachen: Is it the job of the House of Commons to examine the credibility of the witnesses appearing before the commission? If a former attorney general claims that it is, then he ought to go back to law school. The purpose of the commission is to assemble all the evidence, to hear all the witnesses, including the former solicitor general, and then to reach a conclusion as to what is the credible result.

● (1242)

Hon. members of the opposition are saying that we should transfer the House of Commons, which is a purely political theatre, into a judicial body.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nonsense!

Mr. Lawrence: The House of Commons is the highest court in the land.

Mr. MacEachen: That is exactly what hon. members opposite are doing.

The same point made today by the Solicitor General was made yesterday. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) asked me to deal with what he described as contradictory evidence given before the McDonald inquiry.

Mr. Lawrence: I was referring to the news media.

Mr. MacEachen: It was a report in the news media alleging contradictory evidence. In reply to that I said:

> It seems to me it is now up to the commission to call the witnesses in the order in which it alone determines, and to determine also the credibility of the evidence that is brought before the commission.

That is the point of the commission, to determine the credibility of evidence and witnesses.

Mr. McGrath: How about the House of Commons?

Mr. MacEachen: I went on to say the following:

> It is certainly not the job of the government or the House of Commons to take over and replace the work of the commission.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

That is what I understood when the Solicitor General referred to evidence. He was asserting the same principle, that it was not his responsibility to adjudicate upon the credibility of witnesses or evidence. I agree, and the government agrees, with that position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have watched a lot of things in the House of Commons, but once in a while a tragedy occurs. A tragedy occurred today when an otherwise distinguished and experienced parliamentarian was placed in a position of defending the indefensible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: A black Friday.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has called today a black Friday. This is February 3, 1978, and there is another pipeline bill on the order paper.

The hon. government House leader has said that parliament does not have the right to inquire on a matter which has occupied the attention of Canadians for a considerable period of time.

An hon. Member: He never said that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is exactly what he said. On his second day in office, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) said that he is responsible for past activities of the department, unless they were before a Royal Commission. He will argue that on Monday, Tuesday or whenever this matter will be continued. He is doing two things. He is testing the viability of Your Honour's ruling and the rulings of Your Honour's predecessors with respect to the right of ministers to be questioned about acts or errors of commission or omission. He is testing the viability of that, whether it should be sustained. Also is asking us, as well as the public of Canada, to test that. If that is the position of the government, then Your Honour has to consider in parliament, with its tradition of allowing the questioning of ministers, whether your ruling and the rulings of your predecessors should stand. I do not place it all on Your Honour's shoulders.

Your Honour has said that there is no question before you upon which this matter could be continued. It is important for a question to be before Your Honour and this House so that this matter can be continued. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said, if we cannot ask ministers the questions we want to put to them, notwithstanding that a matter may be before a judicial inquiry or a Commission, regardless of what we may think of the inquiry, then we are truly gagged, and our rights as members of parliament are badly impaired. If it is allowed to continue in that manner, then parliament will move on and on and cease to be relevant.

There is no one outside this House who can believe, when we face a government in this situation, that we cannot ask questions and, if we ask them, the government cannot answer them or ought not to answer them, especially in the circumstances raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). This matter has to be looked at seriously.

If Your Honour finds there is a prima facie case with respect to the matter raised today by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham:

That the matter raised in the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The matter is now before Your Honour, and I think it is time the House of Commons and Your Honour dealt with it appropriately.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member is attempting to set the matter in that context. He will recognize at once that the particular form of words he is endeavouring to use in this motion have been ruled out of order on numerous occasions in the past, namely, that the matter referred to, or described by an hon. member, be referred to a standing committee. As I have attempted to say to the House on several occasions earlier this afternoon, the difficulty is that that is not a specific definition upon which a committee can act. I understand what the hon. member is attempting to do.

I do not think we ought to fear that the matter cannot be continued. Every participant in this discussion today has sought the opportunity to address the House with more detailed argument at a later date after examining the transcript. That has arisen on both sides of the House. That was put forth by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), as well as by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The hon. Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) made remarks indicating that we ought to check the transcript. There seems to be a great difference of opinion as to what the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) said today, and that ought to be clarified. If, after an examination of the transcript, and after consideration of it, there is a considered motion which hon. members want to put before the House for argument at a later time, then I surely give to the House the right to carry that forward at a later date. Any motion ought to be carefully considered after examination of the transcript. I leave it open for the House to do that at a later time.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—MINISTER'S PRESS CONFERENCE

Mr. Speaker: Statements by ministers.

Northern Pipeline Act

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to this matter on the order paper, statements by ministers. I understand the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has scheduled a press conference for later today with respect to the pipeline legislation which appears on the order paper and which he intends to introduce and be given first reading today.

I would not want to put the minister in a position where we would engage in a protracted question period with respect to a statement by him, which a section of the rules would allow, because I do not want to delay him in any way. Given that undertaking, I wonder whether the minister might be prepared to make a general statement in the House now, prior to meeting with the press, in order to set before the House of Commons on the first possible occasion the things he will tell the press outside about a bill which will be introduced a little later today. I do that in the hope that my hon. friend would see the propriety of telling us, in a statement in the House under the conditions I have set forth, what he intends to say outside the House after he has introduced the bill.

● (1252)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): May I say, in reply to the question, that it was not my intention to make a statement. The bill will be given first reading and it will be available to all members of the House. When that occurs, I intend to meet the press and tell them what will be known to everybody at that time, namely, what is in the bill.

NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGENCY TO SUPERVISE PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-25, to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, is there any reason why copies of this bill could not be distributed to hon. members immediately?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think the suggestion is an excellent one and there would be agreement to it from our party, particularly in view of the statement of the minister that copies of the bill would be available immediately before he goes out to meet the press.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that we are in possession of a sufficient number of copies to fulfill that request, but certainly in principle there is no objection from the Chair and no objection is forthcoming from the House. There will be the earliest possible distribution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was told earlier they would be printed and ready.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): So was I.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could agree to pass the motion to establish the special committee. I understand that all members are agreed that we could deal with the motion in my name to establish the special committee so that we can select the members for that committee.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

ENERGY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE LEGISLATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council) moved:

That a special committee, consisting of fourteen members to be named at a later date, be appointed to consider legislation concerning a northern gas pipeline; and

That the said committee have all the powers given to standing committees by Standing Order 65.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 352, 362, 727, 1,021, 1,028 and 1,035.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Text]

CBC—COST OF ONE-HOUR PROGRAM

Question No. 352—Mr. McCain:

1. What is the total fixed and capital cost of making and putting on a one hour programme by CBC?

2. What is the administrative cost including executive salaries, administrative staff salaries, etc.?

3. How much does it cost to put on such a programme after it has been produced?

4. How much revenue from advertising does CBC receive for such a programme for each of the different viewing times i.e. prime time, day time, etc?

5. What does CBC pay to a sports association or individual team in order to televise their games?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The nature of the question is so general that to derive a single figure would involve the use of statistics based on all program activity from, for example, in radio, a record show hosted by a staff announcer to a large orchestral-choral production, and in television from programs and program material that come to the corporation free of charge or for a token fee to a ballet production such as The Nutcracker. Average hourly program costs for local and network programs, English and French, radio and television, are set out in detail in the annual report for 1976-77.

2 and 3. It is not possible to relate these costs to a hypothetical individual program. The averages referred to in part 1 reflect all administrative costs related to the production of those programs. As for the costs of distribution, transmission and where applicable, sales, total amounts for these categories are contained in the CBC's annual report for 1976-77.

4. It is not possible to relate these costs to a hypothetical program. In any event, CBC sells commercial time not by the time of day but by the type of program and the anticipated audience. For example, the following are the costs of 30-second commercials carried in sample programs on the full CBC English television network: Class AA (Front Page Challenge), $5,120; Class A (King of Kensington), $4,330; Class B (Beachcombers), $3,720; Class C (Saturday 5-6 p.m.), $2,190; Class D (Celebrity Cooks), $955. In addition, the following figures represent gross advertising revenue received by CBC during the fiscal year 1976-77.

Radio		376
Television		81,553
	Total	81,929

5. Payments vary according to the leagues or teams involved. It has not, however, been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as the contractual arrangements with business organizations. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to question No. 2,530, May 22, 1975.

EXPENDITURES—CONSTITUENCY OF SAULT STE. MARIE

Question No. 362—Mr. Symes:

From October 1972 to date, what was the total amount of funds spent by the (a) Department of Fisheries and the Environment and its agencies (b) Department of Supply and Services and its agencies in the Constituency of Sault Ste. Marie?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Fisheries and the Environment and Supply and Services as follows: (a) From October, 1972 to October 31, 1977: $20,253,668. (b) The Department of Supply and Services has contracted for $537,000 in Sault Ste. Marie on behalf of other government departments. Contracting activity by regional offices is not available prior to April 1, 1976.

CBC—POLITICAL POPULARITY POLLS

Question No. 727—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation authorized to run popularity polls on (a) political parties, whether (i) federal (ii) provincial (b) the Parti Québécois and, if so, in each case, how does it proceed and how many people are questioned?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: a comprehensive information service should periodically include reports of public opinion polls on a variety of questions. The CBC from time to time makes use, in its information programs, of the results of public opinion polls conducted by poll organizations independently of the corporation. Occasionally, such use is supplemented by surveys commissioned by the CBC. In doing so the CBC proceeds under the objects and powers set out in section 39 of the Broadcasting Act. There is no fixed procedure for carrying out such surveys: the number of people questioned, the areas of the country covered, the length of the interview, the types of questions asked—these and other features of the survey are all dependent on the particular question being investigated and the particular type of program being planned. In most cases the surveys are conducted by independent companies with CBC involvement in the survey design. In all cases the highest professional research standards are observed.

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW LOCK AT PORT SEVERN

Question No. 1,021—Mr. Rynard:

What is the proposed date of construction of a new lock at Port Severn (Lock 45) in view of the capacity of the new marine railway at the Big Chute on the Trent-Severn Waterway?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Parks Canada's capital forecast projects fiscal year 1981-82 for commencement of a new lock at Port Severn (Lock 45).

APPLICATIONS FOR ASSISTANCE UNDER COMPANY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 1,028—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. On December 6, 1977, did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce receive applications for financial assistance under the Company Development Programme from the (a) Province of Quebec (b) Constituency of Richmond and, if so, how many?

2. Under the same programme, did the Department grant subsidies to companies in (a) Quebec (b) the Constituency of Richmond and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Jack Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Under the Enterprise Development Program, during the period from April 1, 1977 to December 6, 1977, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce: (a) Received 109 applications for assistance from companies located in the Province of Quebec. (b) Received one application for assistance from a company located in the Constituency of Richmond.

2. Under the Enterprise Development Program, during the period from April 1, 1977 to December 6, 1977: (a) Fifty-one contributions aggregating $15,784,017 were approved in favour of companies located in the Province of Quebec. (b) One contribution for $10,500 was approved for a company located in the Constituency of Richmond.

FLOOD CONTROL PROGRAMS IN CONSTITUENCY OF FRASER VALLEY EAST

Question No. 1,035—Mr. Patterson:

For each year since 1968, what amount was spent by the government on flood control programmes in the Constituency of Fraser Valley East?

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): Federal expenditures for construction and site supervision under the Fraser River Flood Control Program for each year since 1968 in the constituency of Fraser Valley East are: 1968-69, —; 1969-70, —; 1970-71, $517,500; 1971-72, $607,322; 1972-73, $721,500; 1973-74, $2,176,675; 1974-75, $2,234,272; 1975-76, $524,877; 1976-77, $738,875; 1977-78, $500,000 (anticipated expenditure). These figures do not include the costs of design and administration as such expenditures are not normally made within the constituency. Flood control projects covered by these expenditures are Agassiz, Harrison Mills, Chilliwack, Matsqui, the Vedder River, Abbotsford at the mouth of the Sumas River, Nicomen Island and Seabird Island.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 915 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The questions listed by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 915 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STARRED QUESTION

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 1,020?

*POWER SHUTDOWN AT BIG CHUTE ON TRENT-SEVERN WATERWAY

Question No. 1,020—Mr. Rynard:

1. Was any agreement made with the Province of Ontario for the loss of electric power due to the procedures necessary in the building of the new marine railway at the Big Chute on the Trent-Severn Waterway and, if so, what was it?

2. Was the electric power cut off due to such procedures and, if so, for how many days?

3. Was any compensation paid and, if so (a) to whom (b) by whom?

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. No, not as between the federal government and the province of Ontario. However, an agreement was made between Ontario Hydro and the contractor performing the work, to have the hydroelectric power facility at Big Chute shut down during the construction of the lower coffer dam.

2. While the power facility itself was shut down for a period of four weeks and two days, hydro power was not cut off in the area but was supplied by the provincial hydroelectric grid system.

3. Yes: (a) to Ontario Hydro; (b) by the contractor.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF CERTAIN HARBOURS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 1, 1978, consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent) that Bill C-2, respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday when I called it six o'clock I was expressing concern, along with other members of the House, regarding the nebulous assurances of the minister and the motherhood protection that he will be able to provide under Bill C-2, as has been demonstrated under Bill C-38. In light of the fact that the clock now shows three minutes to one o'clock and that I would welcome the opportunity to speak more fully on Bill C-2 without the interruption of the clock, may I now call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, earlier in speaking on this bill I indicated my concern about the fact that, while giving assurances to east coast and west coast fishermen that under regulations or decisions made by the minister or his officials there would be no onerous charges for wharf facilities laid on the shoulders of the fishermen of each coast, the proposal advanced by the minister has not been acceptable to members of the opposition, and their concern has been expressed not only by me but also by other speakers. I have already indicated to the minister that we received similar assurances from him when Bill C-38 went before committee and, as I think anyone can recognize, that type of assurance is not satisfactory, in light of the fact that the minister may be the minister for a relatively short time, even though he has indicated to me in correspondence that he expects to continue in his present role up until 1979. To quote the minister himself, that assumption is a demonstration of political arrogance. I believe he used that term when he referred to his decision to move a department from Moncton to Shediac.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) made reference to the fact that the department will not abandon wharf facilities and that, indeed, there have been very few abandonments of wharf facilities. I hope that the assurances given by the hon. member, who is the parliamentary secretary to the minister, have some ring of truth to them because the record is very sad in terms of the management of wharves and other similar facilities while they were under the care of the Ministry of Transport and the Department of Public Works. If nothing else, at least now we have some cohesion being demonstrated.

I also expressed concern about the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni regarding remote wharves on the west coast and the east coast, and the fact that there will be an opportunity for fishermen to manage these wharf facilities and small craft harbour facilities themselves. That is fine, but what assurances are there that there will be regular maintenance? Who will cover the cost of that regular maintenance? What assurance is there that there will be an ongoing inspection of these facilities?

During the period of time in which we addressed ourselves to this particular bill at the standing committee level, I made reference to the fact that I have some very serious concerns about clause 10 at page five, which deals with enforcement officers. In the bill it is stated that an enforcement officer may be any person who is, in the opinion of the minister, qualified to be so designated, and the minister can furnish that person with a certificate of his designation. It really does not identify the type of person, the role that person is expected to play, or the qualities necessary to carry out that role.

There were the same expressions of concern with regard to the Ocean Dumping Control Act. The minister had the same opportunity to appoint inspectors and other officials on an ad hoc basis without any indication as to what the background of those individuals must be, what their skills and abilities must be, whether they would be political appointments or whether they would be genuine appointments based on some knowledge of what these people were supposed to do. I note that clause remains unchanged.

I note also that in clause 11 on page 6 of the bill there is provision for an enforcement officer not only to board any vessel—which I can accept—or enter any vehicle—which I can accept—but also to enter premises where or in respect of which he reasonably believes there may be evidence of such non-compliance and that he may make any inspection he deems necessary. That is the point about which I am concerned. We have the assurance of the minister in committee that this refers only to the premises or fishing shacks, or what-have-you, immediately adjacent to the harbour. If that is so, why is it not stated in the bill, or does the minister intend to put it in the regulations? I say it is a gross intrusion to allow an enforcement officer, who is not a law officer, to enter the premises of any Canadian citizen. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that the government does not belong in the bedrooms of the nation; I say the enforcement officer does not belong on the premises of fishermen. For these reasons I must object to this particular clause, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) expressed some of the same concerns that I have about the bill. For instance, it says that the minister may appoint and fix the remuneration of such officers or employees as he thinks proper for the operation. The first thing that I wonder about is whether the remuneration will be in the same form as that for rural postmasters or postmistresses. Will it be an inconsequential sum to be paid those dedicated people, or will it be payment on the basis of the ability, skill and worth of the individual? On the other hand, will it be the subject of pork-barrelling at a very low level? This gives me great concern, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for New Westminster told the House that the fishermen's union on the west coast has sent a telegram to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) to delay the bill until they have an opportunity to go before the standing committee. I am surprised that this was not provided for, since the bill goes to the very heart of matters that concern fishermen on both coasts, and in all fairness I think they should have had that opportunity.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that many things in Bill C-2 are good but, like other government legislation, there is much that is questionable. That is why I cannot support the bill. Of course, I do not think that lack of my support will materially affect its passage, but I hope that some of the concerns I have expressed will be noted, and amendments introduced.

I hope that the minister and officials in his department will address themselves to the problems of small craft harbours which in the past have received little federal support. It is all well and good to pay attention to the east and west coast fisheries—that is of the first order and I accept it—but I have pointed out to the minister, as has the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) that there are other areas of the country which lie within his jurisdiction and have been ignored up to now.

I should like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on Bill C-2. I have no further comments at this time.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate. My colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), speaking in this House on February 1, admirably set forth the major objections we had to the legislation. We are not saying the legislation is all bad; we are saying there are some aspects of it which have adverse implications for a group in which both the hon. member and I are very interested, the commercial fishermen on the west coast.

I would have been perfectly satisfied to leave the criticisms advanced by the hon. member to speak for both of us. When the hon. member sat down, however, both the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) and the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) proceeded to take him to task for those criticisms. At that time I sought to follow those two hon.

members but there were a number of others on their feet and I was not able to catch Your Honour's eye. I feel I should now say just a few things about the criticisms those two hon. members have advanced. The House will have noticed, of course, that both are parliamentary secretaries. They probably feel that if they are to earn their additional remuneration from the Crown then they have a task to do. That task seems to be to rise on every occasion to praise their minister, and then to berate the opposition for not hurrying legislation through, irrespective of whether or not it has been given thorough examination. Mr. Speaker, our task is to examine legislation and determine whether it is in the best interests of the people we represent. That is what the hon. member for New Westminster was seeking to do.

Both the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Niagara Falls endeavoured to make a great deal of the fact that the legislation has been before the House for two years. They accused members of the opposition of filibustering and holding up the legislation, and thus preventing fishermen and users of recreational boats from getting great advantages. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Niagara Falls attacked members on this side because we were not on our feet praising the minister and the legislation he has introduced. Mr. Speaker, we do not need anyone to tell us what our job is with respect to legislation. Our job is to examine it.

Nothing in the passage of this legislation through its various stages would indicate that members on this side of the House have unduly delayed it. It is true the legislation has been on the order paper for two years. It has not been before the House for two years. It was introduced last year and reached the committee stage. If the government had thought it was very important legislation, the House need not have been recessed or prorogued. It could have continued and dealt with that legislation.

When the House reassembled, the opposition parties co-operated with the government to the point where we did not insist that the legislation start all over again. Indeed we agreed that the legislation should be put on the order paper at the stage at which it was when the House recessed, with the result that the legislation started again at the committee stage. If the members will look at it, it is Bill C-2 which is the first piece of legislation on the order paper, because Bill C-1 is a pro forma bill. There has been no undue delay. There is no attempt now to delay the bill or to filibuster the bill. But I think that the government, throughout the years I have been here has failed to have a consistent policy with respect to small harbours and ports.

I am not placing the blame on the present minister entirely, Mr. Speaker. He has been endeavouring in the last two or three years to work out a policy, but it has never been clearly formulated and it has never been given enough money to make it an effective program. It is one of the aspects of the government's over-all responsibilities, in my opinion, of which no government can really be proud.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

In seeking to defend the government's legislation against the criticisms which were advanced by the hon. member for New Westminster, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, speaking in the House on February 1, 1978, as reported at page 2446 of Hansard, put forth some preposterous arguments in defence of this legislation, and as a reason for some of the clauses contained in this measure. For instance the member said:

> This type of clause is required so that we are not bound by this legislation as we were by the old Government Harbours and Piers Act under which it was possible to lease facilities only to municipalities, provinces, or shipping companies. Very recently, for example, a fishermen's union local wished to lease a facility on the west coast in a community in my constituency—Sointula.

He goes on later in the statement and says:

> But, Mr. Speaker, when a group of fishermen, on their own initiative, wish to take over the management of a small wharf or pier in an isolated area, we are prevented under the present legislation from allowing them to do so. Under the new legislation we shall be able to allow people such as those in a union local to take over a pier and run it to their best advantage—

There are two things wrong with that ridiculous statement. The first is that the government has been leasing wharves on Vancouver Island to individuals for a number of years to my knowledge. It did it because under the old legislation it referred to a person, and a person or persons could lease wharves from the government and they have done so. Secondly if the purpose of this legislation is to give power to lease, to license, or to enter into agreements with respect to these wharves with persons other than the federal government, is because the government wanted to make it possible for a fishermen's union or a co-operative to take over a wharf, all it had to do was amend the original legislation and make that provision specific and clear.

That is not what the provision provides at all. The provision says in clause 8:

> The Minister may, subject to the regulations,
>
> (a) lease any scheduled harbour or any part thereof to any person;
> (b) grant a licence to any person for the use of any scheduled harbour or any part thereof; and
> (c) enter into an agreement with the government of any province or any agency thereof for the occupancy and use of any scheduled harbour or any part thereof.

There is a great deal of difference, Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of commercial fishermen, between the government leasing or licensing to a municipality, an agency of the provincial government or a fishermen's co-operation or a fishermen's union, and on the other hand leasing which would have been that of government facilities to private entrepreneurs, because as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni himself admitted in his remarks, there is no schedule in this legislation. There is no provision for setting a schedule.

If the government leases one of the government wharves to an agency of a provincial government or a municipality, to a union local or co-operative, then there is some public pressure to keep the schedule of fees at a reasonable figure. But there is no such protection if that government wharf is going to be leased to a private entrepreneur, particularly on Vancouver Island, and certainly in my constituency and as well in the constituency of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. In many cases these wharves are the only places in the community where wharfage facilities are available.

Our complaint is with reference to the commercial fishermen, who, when they return from fishing, must tie up their boats at the wharf after they have unloaded their cargo. It is not a matter of shopping around. If they do not like the schedule of fees they cannot go somewhere else. Whatever fee is charged, that is what they have to pay. If there is no protection and if there is a private entrepreneur, the charge can be exorbitant. The fisherman has no choice but to pay, or do what one or two of the fishermen in my constituency have done, and that is to berth their boats at a wharf a long distance away and drive back and forth. That seems to me totally unfair.

There could be some provision in this legislation to ensure that if the government is going to lease out wharves which have been built by the taxpayers of this country to a private entrepreneur, then either there be some review board with respect to the fees to be charged to those who want to tie up their boats at a wharf, or the right of appeal to some review body who could ensure the fisherman is not being taken advantage of.

As a matter of fact I have watched, in the last ten to 12 years, a steady attempt by the government to avoid its responsibilities with respect to these small harbours. At one time these small harbours were run almost entirely by the government. Little by little the government has been endeavouring to push the responsibility onto someone else, lease out the wharves to someone else, get some municipality to take over the job. I can give the minister a few examples.

● (1432)

In 1968 when we were just into a by-election campaign in my constituency, the then minister of public works, the Hon. Arthur Laing, came to the town of Chemainus where, for years, they had been pointing out that when a storm came from a certain direction, many of their boats were wrecked. They badly needed a breakwater. He agreed that a breakwater would be built. That was a firm commitment.

When I became the member for this constituency, I took it up with him. It was confirmed that the government had agreed to put up a breakwater. Then the government decided to change its policy. The change in policy was that the government would build the breakwater providing the municipality would spend an equal amount putting in marina facilities.

That municipality stretches a long way from the ocean. To ask them to put up $1½ million in marina facilities to make it possible to provide a service which up to that time the federal government had been providing, was a sure way to ensure they did not have to build that breakwater. In fact, they never did build it. The town of Chemainus has no way by which it can raise sufficient money to match the cost of building that breakwater.

I give the minister an example of the obverse side of that problem. In Cowichan Bay in my constituency they also need a breakwater. They have a serious difficulty when storms come from a certain direction. They applied for a breakwater. The argument presented to them was that since all the operators there are private entrepreneurs, they must put up the same amount of money in marina facilities as the government will spend on the breakwater.

The point is their marina facilities are in first class shape. Most of them have been built in recent years. On what would they spend three quarters of a million dollars? Painting them? They do not need more facilities. They need protection. However, under this so-called small ports and recreational harbours policy, the government has found a means by which it can avoid its responsibility. The people there are told that unless they spend three quarters of a million dollars doing renovations to their facilities which are not required, the government is not prepared to put in the breakwater.

For a long time the government has needed a clear-cut policy with regard to small craft harbours. I do not lay the entire blame on the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). In fact, he has probably tried harder than any of his predecessors to get some money so that he can enunciate a policy. However, he has not been able to get it. The result is that the policy is largely a paper policy.

Both the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Niagara Falls told the House that by debating this legislation, we were preventing many people from getting additional wharves and berths where they could tie up their boats. There is nothing in this legislation which provides for one single wharf or for providing any berthage accommodation.

This legislation provides for shared programs which are dependent upon the provincial government, the municipality or some private entrepreneurs putting up money if the federal government puts up money. If the federal government's allocation of money for small craft harbours is as limited as it has been for the past ten or 12 years, none of those wharves will be built and none of that accommodation will be provided.

This is just an attempt to kid the public, saying that by passing this legislation they will get wharves and accommodation for boats of fishermen and recreational boats. There is no guarantee that is going to happen. It will only happen if money is provided in the estimates and certainly there is no indication so far that money in the quantities required will be provided.

The government has the responsibility with regard to commercial fishermen on both the east coast and the west coast. For anyone who thinks they are getting a free ride, I point out that these fishermen pay income tax and other taxes just like the rest of us. They pay very large sums for their fishing licences for which, by the way, sports fishermen on the west coast do not pay. The commercial fishermen must pay $1,000, $2,000 or more for their licences to catch fish.

When they come back from their fishing expeditions, surely they have a right to a place to tie up their boats at a reasonable figure and not held up to ransom as they have been. As a matter of fact, it is the kind of service which they should be provided with by the Government of Canada. People use airports which are supported by the government. People use other facilities which the government provides for the public in general. There is no reason why commercial fishermen should not be provided with this service. If they are going to pay, surely it ought to be on the basis of a clearly defined schedule of fees which is reasonable and fair. That has not been done.

In his speech the other day, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni made a great deal of the fact that there has been adequate consultation with the commercial fishermen in British Columbia. As reported at page 2448 he stated:

—I do not accept the statement that those in the fishing industry have not had an opportunity to make their views known.

Further on he stated:

Surely it is not the role of parliament to send out invitations asking every Canadian if he wishes to appear before a standing committee.

That statement is as amazing as it is stupid. Nobody on this side of the House, least of all the hon. member for New Westminster, was suggesting that every Canadian should be notified that a bill is going before a committee. However, any government that has an understanding of participatory democracy, about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) used to make speeches, would recognize that when you draft legislation which affects certain groups of people, a draft in the form of a green paper or white paper should be sent to those organizations. They should be given an opportunity even before the legislation is formulated to express their views and to advance their opinions. They should also be notified when the legislation is referred to a standing committee of this House so they will have an opportunity to appear before that committee and set forth their views with regard to the legislation as it affects their members. That has not been done.

I have here a telegram which I understand was sent to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment on February 1. It reads:

● (1442)

Thirty-third annual convention of the UFAWU urgently requests you withdraw Bill C-2 until proper consultation with fishermen and industry organizations. We resent ramrodding tactics. We demand meaningful consultation prior to passage of any legislation affecting livelihood of fishermen. Bill C-2 not consistent with your pledge to UFAWU executive of equitable reasonable wharfage fee.

Jack Nichol, President

So it appears that at least one organization representing the commercial fishermen on the Pacific coast feels it has not been adequately consulted. The telegram goes even further and says the legislation is not in keeping with the commitment made to the fishermen with respect to wharfage fees. This is inexcusable.

The government says the legislation has been before the House for two years. Surely in those two years there was ample time in which to consult with the fishermen—if the minister could not do so in person, then the deputy minister, the parliamentary secretary or some other responsible person could have done so. It is unfortunate that at a time when this legislation is passing through its final stages, the people who are likely to be most affected on the West coast are protesting that they have not been consulted and that the legislation is inconsistent with the commitments they believe the minister made to them with respect to wharfage fees. For this reason I do not feel I can support the legislation, having in mind the interests of the commercial fishermen I represent.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us gives me a great deal of concern. I wish to repeat the warning given by the last speaker with respect to the idea that we are holding anything up. It is obvious that we have a Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc). It is obvious that authority over small craft harbours has been transferred to him, that the votes and expenditures of moneys have come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries, and that the Department of Public Works is the agent for the Minister of Fisheries with respect to moneys spent and wharves and harbours.

What this bill is intended to do, therefore, is to establish by law what is already the case in practice. If we debated the measure from now until this time next year the practice would still go on. The bill before us will change little, if anything. It is, therefore, unworthy of a member of this House to state that delay in passage of the bill is holding up anything with respect to fisheries or harbours. It is merely a ploy used to downgrade the interest of the opposition in legislation introduced into the House, and it is not an honourable ploy. It is a deceitful ploy intended to mislead the public and persuade it that the opposition is extending unnecessarily the time required to do a good job.

I am reminded of an old gentleman who was quite a craftsman in my community. One day he was doing a little job when I happened to be around and one of his workmen came up to him. The employer asked how things were going. The chap who was working for him said, "Oh, I think it is good enough". The old craftsman looked at me and said, "I am sorry. I have got to go because when my man says to me he thinks it is good enough, I know there is something wrong with it; it means it isn't right." Mr. Speaker, when the opposition sees legislation which it feels is not right, it then becomes the obligation of the opposition to take such time as it may choose to try to make that legislation right and proper and fit the purposes for which the legislation was introduced in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: That is precisely what every party on your left, Sir, has tried to do in connection with the bill before us, but with little or no result.

I am concerned about the bill because people in the fishing industry have complained to me since I have been a member of this House that they do not know today whether they are fishing legally or not. They knew they were yesterday. But they do not know today because regulations may change.

I wish to put on record the story of a fellow who owned a processing plant and who spent every nickel he had, and every nickel he could borrow, to bring his plant into compliance with regulations which had recently come into force. When the man was all through meeting the regulations the inspector came along to inspect the plant, prior to final licensing, and said to him; "Sir, I cannot approve your licence." The man, in amazement, said, "Why not? I have complied with every order I have received from fisheries officers with respect to regulations for my plant." "Oh," said the inspector, "did they not tell you that the ceiling in the room in which you salt your fish has to be eight feet high? Your ceiling is only seven feet six." I ask any intelligent man in this House, Mr. Speaker, what possible difference it could make to a fish in salt brine what height the ceiling of the room was? The answer is, obviously, none. But that processor was denied a licence because the ceiling in the salt fish room was not eight feet high.

When I look at Bill C-2 and see the regulatory powers extended to the minister and his staff, I am against the bill. Just last spring three boat-owners needed new boats. They applied for the subsidies which are supposed to be available to owners of their class of boats. They found that during the winter months the regulations had been changed and that because one of the applicants had a boat which was one foot longer or shorter than had been called for before the change was made, he no longer qualified. Because one of the other applicants needed a boat a little larger, in order to go into deeper waters, his application was not acceptable either. The regulations had been changed without notice. The third applicant had sold his boat and had ordered a new one. He found himself in very difficult circumstances when he was told he did not need that particular type of boat for his personal fishing operations. That is the impact of the regulations and I am not in favour of a bill which, clause by clause, fails to legislate, but accomplishes the government's purpose by regulation.

Look at clause 40. It refers to the use, management, and maintenance of every scheduled harbour, the enforcement of regulations and the collection of charges for the use of every scheduled harbour under the control of the minister.

It says in clause 5(2), "The minister may, subject to regulations . . ." Again, in clause 5(3) and 5(4) it says, "The minister may, subject to regulations . . ." Mr. Speaker, the minister is not subject to the rule of law; he is subject to the rule of regulations. The government has lost the art of legislating and governing its own behaviour by law. It wishes instead to govern the people by regulations at the whim and pleasure of any minister who may wish to make a change at any point in time.

Clauses 6 and 7 folllow clause 5 and are somewhat related to it, "subject to regulations". Clause 8 reads, "The minister may, subject to regulations . . ." It is not subject to law, it is subject to regulations. Clause 9 of Bill C-2 reads, "The governor in council may make regulations" for all the purposes outlined. Clause 10 reads, "For the purposes of enforcing this act and the regulations, the minister may designate as an enforcement officer . . ." Again it is subject to regulation. If one looks at each clause of this bill he will find that it is not a legislative document, but rather a regulatory document. The minister may do everything that criminal and civil legislation entitles him to, but the people who are affected by this are subject to the regulations permitted under this bill, and not necessarily to the bill itself. For this reason, among others, the bill is not acceptable.

I should like to refer to the problem of the wharfingers. Repeatedly it has been pointed out that wharfingers have collected fees at their pleasure, from whom they chose, and at a time convenient to them. They did not collect from all fishermen on a equal basis throughout the fishing community. We cannot pit one area against another in this regard, but a few fees were collected in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, the Bay of Fundy and Quebec. The amount collected was piddling and it varied depending on who was the wharfinger and the wish of the government of the day. There will be a return to wharfingers and charges will be collected. The minister has stated that these charges will be assessed according to regulation. He did not indicate how much they would be.

On behalf of the minister, Mr. Reid made a few remarks as reported at page 56 of issue No. 5 of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, dated Thursday, November 24, 1977, which reads as follows:

> Turning to the province of Quebec, there are no charges collected at present. Total revenue collected in 1975-76 amounted to $1,848 with no berthage collections. The proposed new charges for a 45-foot vessel will be $90 per year; $45 for the annual charge and $45 for the extended lay-up, where required.
> Turning to the maritime provinces; charges for a 45-foot vessel may amount to $189 per year under existing regulations.

He went on indicating that the charges will vary from area to area, that they will be higher in some areas of Canada than in others, and that the highest levy will be in the province of British Columbia. He continued:

> In Newfoundland charges for a 45-foot vessel may amount to $189 per year under existing regulations. However, again, the minister has exempted vessels under 45 feet in length; charges for other vessels are collected very sporadically and only from a very few vessels.

The history of wharfingers and their collections is pitiful, yet they will remain in existence. It has been stated during committee hearings that wharfingers will look after boats and wharves. Apparently they will cover a lot of ground in this regard. One may entrust the safety of his boat and harbour in the care of a wharfinger. In contradiction to that, it is also indicated that the wharfinger will be working in an area with a radius of 25 miles. Even if the coast were perfectly straight, that would mean he would be responsible for the supervision of 50 miles of coastline.

How often will a wharfinger be able to visit the harbours along 50 miles of coastline? Could he do it every day, twice a day, once a week or once a month? There is no assurance. If wharfingers are to be assigned an area of 25 miles in radius, it is impossible for them to attend to the security and well-being of the harbours in that long a distance. Obviously this emanates from someone who has not visited a coastline. In a 50 mile distance there could be 20 fishing harbours at the most.

Of course, there may not be any. The wharfinger system will not work any better than it has in the past. Boats may move in and move out, tie up and untie, and pay no charges whatsoever, as was the case in the past.

The Department of Fisheries and the Environment has a substantial staff already in place. Perhaps that staff could assume the responsibility of visiting harbours. Perhaps they could fulfil the duties of wharfingers. I am sure they would do their jobs on an equitable basis, rather than what has been done in the past. It might be necessary to have an extra person or two along the coast.

Someone asked what revenue would be derived from the charges imposed upon the fishing industry along the coast, and the suggestion was $1,500,000. Someone asked what it would cost to put wharfingers in place. If my memory serves me correctly, the suggestion was approximately $900,000. This means that the extra charge to fishermen, which is of no value as far as the security of their facilities is concerned, will result in a $600,000 net to the department.

One significant thing was that the wharfingers would be entitled to travel expenses, which would be paid out of general revenue. The department was not prepared to estimate what those travel expenses would be, and therefore it was unable to indicate whether it would even net a nickel from hiring 300 wharfingers which would be handpicked by the minister, his staff, or by the member in the area concerned. This is another opportunity for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment to act more on a political basis than on an administrative basis. I suppose one does not know whether he could find his wharfinger in Shediac or Moncton under the present minister. Because of the value of this industry, it deserves much better attention.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young), so I decided to take a look at what he said in committee. He was rather critical, and this is what he said, as reported at page 2:12 of issue No. 2 of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, dated November 15, 1977:

> In the figures that I have just been given, your expenditures for 1975-76 over 1974-75 actually dropped from about $2.9 million . . .

That is fairly significant. One must remember that 1974-75 was an election year.

● (1502)

He went on:

> —and then they take a leap in 1976-77 up to somewhere in the $4 million area. I would like to know if that $4 million contains funds that have come from FLIP, from LIP, from Canada Works or transfers from Public Works, work that the Department of Public Works has undertaken to assist in co-operation. This is what I am trying to find out as a member of this committee, and what we had a great deal of difficulty trying to ascertain last spring.

Later he said:

> —I expect—and I am sure every member who sits in the House passing estimates expects—that is the outline, that is the program, that is the goal to which one works.
> [Mr. McCain.]

The goal is to know where the money comes from and how it is going to be spent. He could not find out. He went on to discuss the problems of getting a couple of projects in his constituency completed and he played up to the constituency that day and to the Prime Minister yesterday.

He went on to say:

> I can tell them that my constituency has not seen a dime and, as a matter of fact, I can say to the department regarding the two projects that people would have liked to build in my riding; they have given up; they have just absolutely given up on departmental funding.

He was that critical of the department and its procedures in committee, and yet he was very supportive in the debate here yesterday.

It was interesting to listen to the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) who, in turn, gave the opposition a dressing down for their behaviour and praised his minister. Let me quote him from page 217 of the proceedings of the committee of November 15, 1977. He said:

> However, I, like Mr. Crouse, am disturbed at the downward trend of funds, having fought very hard to increase them. Newfoundland went up in 1974-75—

Like the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) in the election year.

> —but down again in 1975-76.

He went on to say:

> We have to look at our budgets to make sure that an appropriate amount is allocated to Newfoundland for its fishing needs because that, Mr. Chairman, more and more is becoming the economic basis of survival in our province and I think we have to look very closely at the trend that is developing there. I am not happy with it and I want to see a substantial amount of funds allocated to that province for small-craft harbours.

Let hon. members bear in mind that I have just quoted the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. He went on to say:

> I am disturbed at a number of other things though and that is the amount of repair that had to be done. It seems to me that in a number of cases we had to rebuild wharfs the second year. I am thinking of two, for example, now on the Labrador coast, in Forteau and L'Anse-au-Clair, where wharfs were built and breakwaters were built a couple of years ago and now, one or two years later, we have to go through the whole process again to allocate maybe a couple of hundred thousand dollars in each case because the job was not done properly in the first place.

Again that gentleman played up to the Prime Minister and failed to serve the interests of his fishermen in the House because he did not say publicly in the House what he thought he could say safely in the committee, where he would not be quoted and where he would not be found to be in disagreement with his minister and with the Prime Minister.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who spoke on this bill complained seriously about the use of FLIP, LIP and other money, as I did. The department does not vote adequate funds to sustain itself and has to lean on other departments, borrowing and begging support from them. I complain about it not for the same reasons as did the hon. member for St. John's East, which were laudable and very proper, but because every constituency which has inland communities which may require certain services finds itself able to make improvements in the community by improving facilities for athletics, social functions or community social affairs. I submit that the coastal communities are entitled to the same amenities as inland communities, but when federal funds in make-work projects are taken from the make-work opportunity for social purposes and placed into a wharf on the coast, those coastal communities are denied the services so generously afforded to the inland communities, and vice versa. Both inland and coastal communities are equally entitled to these amenities. When the government is not prepared to allocate adequate money to a department and when that department must go begging to others, it means that the government is not acquainted with the importance of the industry to which we are referring at present.

To give the House an example of the degree of begging and borrowing that the department has done, let me turn to page 1:13 of the committee proceedings of November 10, 1977 where Mr. Reid is reporting to the committee. He said:

> This is in sharp contrast to the expenditure levels in recent years which have been as follows: 1973-74, $22,369,800; 1974-75, $30,621,800; 1975-76, $28,848,300; 1976-77, $42,758,000, approximately.

That $42 million which he claims to have spent and with which he hoped to appease fishermen from coast to coast was not voted for the Department of Fisheries in total because $5 million of it was from a special agreement with Quebec—I do not quarrel with that, do not misunderstand me—$5,500,000 was from LIP, and $5 million from FLIP. So actually for 1976-77 the minister was voted less money than in any of the three previous years mentioned. At no time, except for that jump in 1973-74 from $22 million to $30 million, has there been an increment in expenditure in that department which has kept pace with inflation; and at no time has enough money been voted, as would have been voted 25 years ago, to maintain reasonable standards in the port facilities of our country.

Let me quote again, as I have quoted probably four or five times in the House, the words of a high official in the Department of Public Works who was questioned directly some time around 1973 and asked how much money was being spent in terms of real dollars as compared to what was being spent in 1950. That public servant—this does not come from me or from any other member—said: "Today we are spending about 25 cents in real dollars as compared to the dollar we spent 25 years ago".

Since that time, we have not caught up in real dollars. There is no awareness in the Department of Fisheries of the needs which exist in the industry. The fishermen are asking what will result from these extra fees and what will result from the hiring of more wharfingers. Not a thing has been mentioned. People on the Fundy coast are asking how many haulouts they will get, since a haulout has not been built by the Department of Fisheries for so long that they cannot even find the wrecks of those that had. There is not a place where they can bring their boats for painting, repairing, refurbishing or improving, so they are asking whether they will get a haulout when the fees are larger and when we have all these wharfingers.

I have not heard a word from the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Landers) on this subject. I assume he is being asked whether people who pay these larger fees will get winter harbours. We once had a winter harbour, but we were kicked out of it by the National Harbours Board. Now we have to pull our boats out on shore, and they deteriorate at about twice the normal rate when they sit on the shore for the winter. We want a winter harbour, and I would like to have the support of the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster and the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) for that project. If I had that support, I would be able to agree with the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) that the minister is a good minister. However, the 200 boats which were kicked out of the harbour by the National Harbours Board are now dragged up on the beach for the winter to deteriorate at about twice the normal rate.

Are we going to get prompt wharf repairs? In the fall of 1976 a little harbour in my constituency suffered some damage in a storm. The sheathing was coming loose, and the fenders were coming loose. This was reported to the proper office. I went back to that same little harbour the next spring, and the fenders were still loose, the sheathing was looser and nothing had been repaired. People are asking whether their harbours will be fixed more quickly. I went back to that harbour last fall, a year after my first visit, and the fenders were still loose, the sheathing was still loose and the harbour was not repaired.

My constituents want to know whether harbours are to be fixed early and cheaply, or will they be fixed late? Will money be wasted, and will the government wonder why it cannot fix two harbours for the price of one? That is what my constituents are asking about this in light of this new charge and all these wharfingers. There are some harbours at which there is light. At those harbours boats can be moored and their batteries charged. Are we going to have lights at every harbour? There are harbours where there is fresh water. Are we going to have water at every harbour, or will there be lights here and wells there but neither at all harbours?

Are facilities going to be improved in exchange for this extra charge? The roads to some of our fishing harbours, which are the responsibility of the Government of Canada, are in terrible shape. In some cases we have to stop short of the wharves and carry our equipment, water, food and oil aboard when we should be able to drive right up. Are we going to get those roads fixed more quickly?

My constituents are asking whether they will have adequate wharf facilities. At the moment boats are tied up five, six and eight tiers deep along piers, and we do not have adequate breakwaters. We have to move our boats at night. Will there be improvements? If so, that was never mentioned in any discussion of this bill.

My constituents are asking if they will be consulted before wharves are built. Is the minister going to spend $500,000, as was done in my constituency where there were three sets of plans and blueprints drawn up? The minister took a look at the three sets and decided on the cheapest plan. However, he did not consult the fishermen who knew the winds, the tides, the currents and the way the water would flow. After building the cheap one, to which the fishermen objected for years as they waited, the minister is now being requested to build another one in the same harbour because the first one was not built properly.

Ottawa engineers do not know the water, nor does the fellow sitting in some grand office in Saint John. Dollars and cents do not make a good harbour unless they are properly spent. They can be wasted in large or small sums. Fishermen want to know whether they are going to be consulted so that they can have proper harbours instead of wasted public funds. Will that consultation result from this bill? I could not get any answers in our committee, so it is my responsibility on behalf of the fishermen in my constituency to say that this is bad legislation and I have to vote against it.

A harbour in my constituency has needed dredging for three years. The fishermen knew it would cost $50,000 to fix that harbour. When I was visiting there I noted in a little piece in a paper that it cost the government $200,000 to appoint a minister without portfolio, to give him a staff and to put an executive assistant and a constituency secretary in his constituency. It cost $200,000 to set up the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). That money was budgeted from nowhere. But when we asked for repairs to be made to wharves, it was easy for the government to say it was out of money.

We noticed too that the minister of fun and games—excuse me, the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo)—had no budget at all, but it was estimated that it cost $20,000 for the first safari she made across Canada. A little harbour could have been put into perfect condition for $20,000. I was asked how that minister could get $20,000 for a safari when boats were grounding out and when they could get into their harbour only under certain tide conditions.

Mr. Béchard: What was the answer?

Mr. McCain: The answer was that the minister of fun and games had priority. It does not make any difference how money is spent or whether it is voted as long as their is benefit to the Liberal caucus. However, it does make a difference to a fisherman if he cannot get into a harbour. We are talking about an industry which is of inestimable value and of growing value to the Atlantic coast. It has been mismanaged to a degree which is absolutely deplorable.

If the minister can be given credit for anything, I suppose it would be for taking the helm of a department which had previously been thoroughly mismanaged. Stocks had been thoroughly neglected. International agreements had given our wealth away, to the detriment of our people. However, something had to be done, and something was in the process of being done when the present minister took over. He took over a department which had finally taken the advice of members of the opposition that we should have a 200-mile limit. He took over at a crucial time when fisheries had been so neglected by the Trudeau administration that they had nothing but better to hope for. He took over at a time when the former minister had begun to consult with fishermen. Committees of sailors co-operatives, fishermen and organizations from the east and west coasts were invited to the former minister's office and into the committee. Their expenses were paid, and their advice was taken. The minister inherited the fruits of the labour of his predecessor, who stumbled along for a long time but in the last days of office finally took the advice of members of the opposition and people in the field.

Plans were on the drawing boards when this minister took over, and he has coasted ever since. There is much left to do. If fishermen have to pay bigger fees, they want to know if they will get more licences and broader fishing privileges or whether they are to continue to be restricted.

Mr. McGrath: That is another application of user pay.

Mr. McCain: These proposals must have been copied from those of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I wonder if that is possible, or perhaps they too came from the Prime Minister.

● (1522)

The fishermen want to know what to do because we are losing a generation of fishermen. It is all very well for prairie members to grin at that statement, but if they were to visit the coast and see these young people with nothing to do, no licence to fish and their inheritance taken away by regulation and mismanagement, they would not find anything to smile at. This is a serious situation.

In committee I asked how much of an impression it would make on the stocks of the sea if we allowed inshore fishermen more extensive licences and more species to fish. I have not received an answer yet. I know of a father and four sons who all want to fish, but with just one licence the father cannot keep those four sons busy. There is no way they can get a boat, no way they can get a subsidy, and no way they can get a licence even if they had the boat. Fishermen on the east coast want to know if they will get more licensing privileges if they pay larger fees. They want to know, if more wharfingers are appointed, if that means they will be allowed to catch more species and have more flexibility.

A man who had a 70-foot carrier in the Bay of Fundy wanted to know if he could have a fishing licence. He no longer had a job because the fishing industry which he served had been reoriented—and properly so; I have no quarrel with that step. The carrier, who brought the fish from the offshore fishermen to inshore, did not have a job, however, because he could not get a licence to fish anything. So his 70-foot boat, which would cost a couple of hundred thousand dollars minimum today, is tied up and rusting.

I have heard it said that the minister is a good one, Mr. Speaker, but I submit to you that he is a cruel minister who will move young people out of my constituency through regulation without having any proof that the stocks will be seriously depleted if those young people are allowed to make a living at home. Instead they are added to the ranks of the unemployed; they would like nothing better than to work. Mr. Speaker, this is not progress and this is not good legislation.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am also going to vote against this bill for the reasons given by the hon. member who just sat down and for those given by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) when he spoke on third reading on January 31.

I will just summarize those reasons which are already well known to the House. We will vote against this bill because reasonable amendments which we offered in committee were not accepted. We will not grant a blanket authority to the minister and the government to decide what fee structure will be imposed in the future on the use of wharves and other harbour facilities used by our fishermen. We do not agree that the government should have the right to lease wharves to private individuals or other bodies without consultation, there being no requirement on them to consult with any local or provincial authority. These are reasons enough for voting against the bill.

The bill deals with the development and administration of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada. In Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, there are 563 fishing harbours out of 573 harbours, according to the information that the government gives us. In 1973-1974, $218 million was spent on those harbours; in 1974-1975, $6.6 million was spent, an increase which took place because that was an election year. There was election spending in Liberal districts. In 1975-76 spending on the 563 fishing harbours dropped back to $4 million. I do not have the figures for 1976-77 nor for 1977-78 but LIP projects and Canada Works projects are now being used to supplement spending.

In committee the minister said that spending on recreational and fishing harbours increased from $22.3 million in 1973-74 to $47 million this year. When we consider the inroads of inflation on the dollar, that is not much of an increase in real terms. This is particularly so when it is realized that 2,300 small harbours and 4,000 facilities in Canada comprising wharves, breakwaters and other structures would come under the administration of this bill.

The minister asks us to leave the decision to him about what is to be charged to commercial fishermen for use of facilities which they have used for centuries at no charge. I am not aware of any charge that has ever been made in the province of Newfoundland for the use of wharves, breakwaters and other facilities, yet the minister asks us for blanket authority to set charges in the future. I certainly cannot agree to that.

Other hon. members have made the point, and I should like to stress it again, that not enough money is spent on this valuable resource, particularly when it is realized it will be one of the growth industries in Canada for the balance of this century. Rather than being the sick man of the resource industries of Canada the fishery is going to be the growth industry in the next ten, twenty or thirty years, on the east coast in particular. Of course, this government will not be in office much longer so when this party takes over we will increase spending and vastly increase spending on facilities on the east and west coasts.

There appears to be some discrimination in the legislation, Mr. Speaker. A lot more money is to be spent in Quebec than in the Atlantic provinces. According to the information I have, Quebec has 94 fishing harbours out of 364 harbours, on which in 1975-76, $9.8 million was spent in that province. That is double the amount spent on the 563 fishing harbours in Newfoundland. I am not saying that the money should not have been spent on these harbours in Quebec. Obviously it should be spent on them as well as harbours elsewhere in Canada.

The spending is more biased in the supplementary estimates for 1977-78. Of a total supplementary spending on marine programs of $25 million, the four Atlantic provinces will receive $5 million, Quebec will receive $15,700,000, Ontario $2,300,000 and the Pacific coast $2 million. In other words, Quebec is to receive an additional supplementary spending of three times the amount to be spent in the four Atlantic provinces. Of that $25 million in the current and capital account, Newfoundland is to receive $2,430,000 for its 563 ports. Quebec will receive $15,700,000 or 6½ times as much. Doubtless the money is needed in Quebec, but it shows where the political priorities of this government are. The Atlantic provinces and the west coast should receive their share. There appears to be discrimination in this program and that is another reason why I shall not support the bill.

Much work should be done to harbours, wharves and breakwaters in my district. Mr. Speaker, I should say here that I find the personnel in the department to be extremely co-operative but I should like to remind them and the minister of some things that need to be done and that I expect to see in the estimates for the coming year. The most important is the wharf and breakwater at St. Bride's Placentia Bay. That is a community that the Progressive Conservative government of Newfoundland has made vibrant by financing the building of a small fish plant there. As a result of that there are possibly many dozens of fishermen fishing out of St. Bride's bringing in millions of pounds of fish for processing at the plant at St. Bride's operated by Quick Freeze Limited and the whole area has had an economic comeback.

● (1532)

However the wharf is inadequate at St. Bride's. The breakwater is inadequate. Damage was done to it again. The government spent some money on the wharf last year by making repairs. However, they did not do a permanent job, and it has now all washed away. The government has agreed to commence work on this wharf again and hopefully it will be completed before the fishing season opens this year. This is a vital and urgent matter.

Branch is now becoming once again a vibrant fishing centre, Mr. Speaker, with long liners fishing out of that port. The people there are returning to the fishery. But dredging is badly needed and permanent improvements to the channel into Branch also should be made.

At Port Kerwin and the district of Ferryland we need a wharf and a stage. I did my best to obtain two Canada Works projects for that purpose in Port Kerwin this year but unfortunately the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) will not allow Canada Works recipients in Newfoundland to be paid the same pay as workers on the mainland, and so we have the lowest wage rates for people employed by Canada Works projects of any province in Canada. Because of this fact it is impossible to find people willing to work on those projects. Therefore the government will have to build a wharf and a stage at Port Kerwin itself.

At Riverhead and St. Mary's Bay once again the fisheries are making a comeback and dredging is needed.

At Point Lance, which is near Branch, an extension to the wharf is required for the inshore fishermen. At Peter's River, again the fishery is flourishing and men are returning to the fishery. At Point Lance the community stage is adequate. It was put there by the provincial government. However, the wharf needs to be extended. Peter's River in exposed to the open sea and the fishermen cannot be waiting all day in their boats in stormy weather to unload their fish. An extension is needed to the wharf so that they can unload three or four boats at the same time. I have asked the minister to give that matter priority.

At Placentia they are dredging an additional wharf space which is needed in the area called Swans. At Bay Bulls we are waiting to hear what will be done this year respecting the new marine service centre of the Department of Fisheries. We have been told there will be a new wharf built this year. I would like to have it confirmed that there will be a new facility which will be constructed in 1978 at a cost of something like $3 million. This facility will serve the federal fishery and patrol vessels. I would like to know when that project will go ahead, what it will comprise and how much will be done this year. This will be another flourishing fishing centre, Mr. Speaker.

I was at St. Shott's during the Christmas break. The wharf there has been damaged and although work was done on it last year there is need for a much more adequate slipway. The fishermen at St. Shott's fish from one of the most exposed locations in the north Atlantic. These facilities are essential. Arnold's Cove is a place where dredging is required. At Argentia work will be required there. At St. John's a small boat facility and a slipway is needed. At Fairhaven and Placentia Bay a breakwater is needed. At Dunnville, because of the rebirth of the fishery a new wharf is needed for the fishermen. At Ferryland work is required to be done. Mr. Bill Morry of Ferryland is one of the few men left who was an expert in the salt codfish industry. Salt codfish today is as valuable as gold. Light salted, Spanish cured codfish is worth its weight in gold today and there is not very much of it produced because of the amount of work required in the production of it. But Bill Morry is leading a revival this year in Ferryland on the south shore in the saltfish business. He is using his old premises and work needs to be done to assist him there. It is important for us to co-ordinate the salt fishery with the fresh and frozen fishery, particularly during the glut season in June and July when the codfish come inshore and are caught in traps in tremendous quantities. At Portugal Cove South work is also required on the wharfing facilities. These are just some of the requirements that the minister should consider for this year.

This is a very important subject for Newfoundland. I am sorry that I do not have adequate time to deal with it. In Newfoundland we have come full circle. When the Liberal party first got into power in 1949, when Mr. Smallwood, Mr. James and their cohorts were in charge the fishery was a poor thing. We had to get out of the fishery and the only way for Newfoundland to develop and become prosperous was through the development of industry. It was the great Smallwood philosophy of "develop or perish". That great Liberal philosophy—"we are going to develop and you are going to perish." From 1949 to 1971, which is 22 years, Newfoundland suffered under that policy of industrialization. Despite our position in the northwest Atlantic, a strategic location, the fishery went down. That was the fault of our provincial government led by Mr. Smallwood, and the fault of the government here in Ottawa led by the various people during those years, with one brief respite when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was in power.

Now the whole thing has been reversed. When the Progressive Conservatives took power in 1972 they saw the importance of the fishery. They started to agitate for the 200-mile economic zone, which should have been the continental shelf. It makes me laugh, Mr. Speaker, to hear the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) say that we have to make this concession and that concession to the foreign fishing fleets because our fish do not recognize the 200-mile economic zone, that they swim back and forth and we cannot just tell the foreign fishing fleets to keep out of our 200-mile economic zone. He says we must keep on good terms with them because we do not control the fish beyond the 200-mile economic zone, we do not control them beyond the Flemish Cap, and so on. Why did Canada agree to a 200-mile economic zone when it should have extended to the continental shelf, covering all the fish species that are found off the east coast of Canada? It is no excuse for the minister to say that he has to make these concessions.

We have had a tremendous turnabout in Newfoundland. We know that we are not going to be an industrial paradise. We have also had great economic misfortune. Newfoundland was more severely hit than anywhere else in Canada by very high unemployment. We had the collapse of the linerboard mill, the shutting down of an oil refinery, the shutting down of pioneer housing—I believe that is what it was called—in Placentia, and the shutting down of the fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence. We have suffered all of these economic blows.

The one bright spot we have is the fishery, which is starting to flourish once again. Catches are improving and the fishermen are getting higher prices. The industry is better organized and the fishermen now have a strong union which has done a good job for them. The fishery is now widely recognized to be the essential industry of Newfoundland, the essential lynch pin. It is seen that the inshore fishery is of great importance. We even find Liberals, such as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, making a statement on January 26 on fisheries development in Newfoundland. Let me quote from page 3:

Nevertheless, fishery development, along modern lines, is the best economic generator Newfoundland can have.

That is quite a turnaround for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It was he and his Liberal government in Ottawa, and Mr. Smallwood and his government in Newfoundland, that said the inshore fishery was finished. They let it run down in the 1950s and 1960s. They developed a great resettlement scheme financed with federal money from copious funds in Ottawa which removed people from the northeast coast and the inshore fishing communities and brought them into centralized areas where they were to go to work in industrial ghettos. The only problem was we did not get the industry for them to work at. They were taken from places where they could have fished and been productive and moved to places where they could no longer be productive but where they had better schools, highways and the like. That was all done because the Liberal government of the 1950s, the 1960s and up to 1972 did not recognize the fishery as being important.

● (1542)

However, we now have the Secretary of State for External Affairs stating that fishery development along modern lines is the best economic generator that Newfoundland can have. It is a new discovery. I am glad to see they are adopting the policy of the Progressive Conservative administration of Mr. Moores in Newfoundland. The minister went on to say at page 3:

It is part of the social fabric of the province, the main supporter of a distinctive lifestyle. Whatever other elements are added, the Newfoundland fishery must be the key, the foundation for any development strategy.

I am glad to see he has come to this. Now it is recognized. Further down the page, he stated the inshore fishery comes first.

The fact is that how the offshore fishery is managed determines the fate of the inshore fishery and that of thousands of inshore fishermen.

I do not have time to go into everything that the hon. gentleman stated in his 17-page statement. There is much in it with which I can agree. Some of the wording and some of the meaning is not clear, such as the differences between the two governments. I do not have time to go into all that. I notice on page 6 his bias toward the south coast, his own district, when he says:

Even though the general offshore catching capability is more than adequate at present, there are, as noted, some plants, particularly on the south coast, with specific and immediate problems.

There are plants other than on the south coast of Newfoundland with specific and immediate problems, such as the plant at Harbour Grace, Conception Bay. It used to operate 12 months a year when it had a fleet of fishing trawlers fishing there. Since 1968 it has been an inshore plant dependent on the inshore fishery only. Without a trawler fleet, it is only operating five or six months of the year. A proposal has now been made by Ocean Harvesters Limited at Harbour Grace and by Nordzee which could, if accepted, result in that plant operating all year round and having trawlers fishing there. I do not have time today to go into all the pros and cons of that particular situation.

I do want to point out the bias evident in the federal fishery policy in Newfoundland caused by the pre-eminent position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He is concerned with fish plants on the south coast, but much less concerned with fish plants and fishermen elsewhere on the island. The illustration of this is the fact that on January 24 the federal fisheries minister made the statement that he is now considering chartering foreign fishing vessels. Everyone said it was great that the federal government was going to charter foreign fishing vessels and land fish in Newfoundland or other parts of Canada so that our plants would operate toward full time; they now operate at 35 per cent capacity.

It now turns out that the minister is going to charter foreign fishing vessels to land catches in Newfoundland not at Harbour Grace or other inshore plants, but at plants that normally work 12 months of the year but which ran into supply problems last year. In other words, this is to help those plants which normally operate year round. They are nearly all on the south coast of Newfoundland, in the district of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is no help for the plant, the fishermen and the fish workers at Harbour Grace, Twillingate or anywhere else in Newfoundland.

In that statement of January 24, the minister said there were several thousand tons of northern cod unlikely under present arrangements to be taken by Canadians this year. We might keep that in mind when the great debate on possible Nordzee investment comes forward. There is a bias here. The Lake companies had just bought the fish plant owned by Booth Fisheries, formerly located in Fortune on the Burin peninsula. That plant is having great trouble, it is not getting enough fish. The trawlers they have are side trawlers and stern trawlers. The catches they are bringing in are not enough to keep the plant operating 12 months of the year. This plant is in the district of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

What the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) is talking about is a scheme for the federal government to charter foreign fishing vessels, which they will not permit other people to do, to land fish principally at the new Lake plant in Fortune, in the district of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, so that the plant will be able to work 12 months of the year. There is no suggestion of any scheme to land fish elsewhere in Newfoundland, such as in St. John's West, St. John's East, Bonavista-Trinity-Conception or any other area where the plants operate only four or five months of the year.

The minister said that the suggestion that we should divide the ownership of catching vessels from processing plants is an interesting one. He does not say he buys it, but I believe that is the direction he has to go. He said it would be an evolving concept in Newfoundland.

He recognizes that the traditional trap fishery is the backbone of the inshore fishery. That is certainly true. It is the Newfoundland government that is trying to enhance and help this traditional trap fishery. Most of the catch is taken in the six to eight week period in June or July when the cod come inshore. It has studied what can be done and has made proposals in a report just completed. Many of the initiatives and directions have been taken by the provincial government and not by the federal government.

At page 8 the minister comes to the conclusion that salt cod and fresh frozen cod production must be complementary and not competitive. He is following my lead that I gave him in 1974-75. He recognizes the need for more strategically located cold storage and holding facilities in Newfoundland.

The Newfoundland government just moved on this by calling tenders for cold storage and holding facilities at Placentia. It is the provincial government that is doing this. The provincial government does not have two cents to rub together, yet it is devoting its resources to these kinds of things.

The minister went on to discuss quotas and Canada's needs. At page 12, he pointed out something with which I agree. I quote:

Newfoundland is vulnerable as long as we are so very dependent on a single market.

As long as we depend on selling 80 or 90 per cent of the value of our fishery products to the United States, we are very vulnerable. The United States is now developing its own fishery because it has its own 200-mile economic zone. Other countries are still selling there. We will be in a very dangerous position in three, four or five years if we cannot break into the European common market and sell our fish products there. That is another reason why this Nordzee proposal has to be looked into very carefully. It knows that market, the kind of fishery products it can sell there, how they should be processed, prepared and the like.

At page 13 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he did not think any foreign deals should be made at this time that are irreversible or not of an interim nature. I do not know what "foreign deals" means. He does not make it clear that he is against a firm like Nordzee from Germany purchasing shares in the operation of Ocean Harvesters in Harbour Grace. I do not know if that is what he means by a foreign deal. If that is the case, this is the only industry in Canada in which foreigners are barred from investing. The only other exception might be the uranium industry. Certainly the Foreign Investment Review Agency will not be in any position to turn down the application made by Nordzee and Ocean Harvesters.

Since the present minister took over the portfolio in September, 98 per cent of all the applications to the FIRA for new investment and acquisitions in Canada have been approved. Previous ministers approved about 90 per cent. Now the figure is up to 98 per cent. Therefore, the deal cannot be stopped by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) for any convincing economic reason. It may be stopped by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment if he refuses to issue licences to certain trawlers.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

The northern cod stocks that are mentioned are very important. At page 16 the Secretary of State for External Affairs makes the important principle, and I quote:

The division of quotas between offshore and inshore will be governed by how much fish can come to shore without creating an unmanageable "glut".

We have to let the fish come inshore. That should have priority. However, if all of the fish are left, if trawlers are stopped and offshore vessels are stopped fishing to allow all the cod to come inshore, we will not be able to manage the glut. Processing plants will not be able to handle it in six, eight or ten weeks. Obviously that is not necessary. It is a question of balance, how much is going to be required. No one has the answer to that yet.

There is another matter I want to take up here. In 1974 there was another tragedy in Newfoundland, particularly on the northeast coast, right from the St. Barbe coast around the northeast coast, White Bay to the St. John's area and perhaps along the southern shore. We had a tremendous amount of late Arctic ice. Even in July and August ice came into the coves and settlements and destroyed fishing gear. It was a disaster. Fishermen in those areas were wiped out. They could not fish that year.

They would not have been able to fish if someone had not helped to replace all their gear. They were not able to insure the gear. They certainly did not have the assets to buy new gear. Therefore, the provincial and federal governments instituted a fishing gear replacement program.

Practically all of the fishing gear used by inshore fishermen on the northeast coast of Newfoundland was lost. The estimate was that 350 codtraps, 7,500 groundfish gillnets, 2,000 salmon gillnets and 70,000 lobster traps were lost, to an estimated value of $3½ million. That was the estimate made in July from all the information that could be obtained.

On August 28 of that year the present federal minister and the Newfoundland minister announced a special gear replacement program to replace the damaged or destroyed fishing gear and equipment. The federal government approved the use of the peacetime disaster formula to compensate for the gear that was lost. The estimate was $3½ million. If that had been the actual cost, the federal government would have paid 53.9 per cent or $1.62 million and the provincial government 46.1 per cent or $1.3 million. The reason is that under that formula the federal government pays if the losses exceed one dollar per capita of the provincial population. So for the first $500,000 the federal government would pay nothing, on the next million dollars it would pay 50 per cent, on the next million it would pay 75 per cent and thereafter it would pay 90 per cent.

It was realized that measures would have to be taken quickly if the fishermen were to fish that year—those who use gillnets, not those who use codtraps or lobster traps or who had lost gear of that kind. So the two governments together drew up guidelines and established a co-ordinating committee delineating the borders within which fishermen would receive compensation for their lost gear and the method to be followed. The only way of getting results quickly was by accepting the honesty of claimants. Claimants had to sign an affidavit stating how much gear they had lost and place a value on it. Arrangements would then be made for them to get new gear from suppliers and payment would be forthcoming from the government. Compensation was at the rate of 100 per cent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, both then and now, the program was too generous. A certain percentage should have been made deductible. Many of those who tended to be dishonest would have been discouraged if they had been obliged to put up, say, 25 per cent of the amount themselves. It was known that there would be considerable abuse of the scheme by a minority of the people. On the other hand, measures of this kind had to be taken because in their absence nobody would have been fishing on the northeast coast of Newfoundland that year. The gear they had lost in June, July and early August had to be replaced.

It was not possible to take along chartered accountants and lawyers to check every claim. Many people made claims. Incidentally, it was possible for part-time fishermen to make claims. There was no requirement for the registration of gear and there was no way of checking whether applicants actually owned gear, or if they did, how much they owned. It was an impossible program to administer because it was necessary to depend upon the honesty of the people concerned. Many people made exaggerated claims concerning their losses. Others, who had lost nothing at all, nevertheless made claims and were prepared to sign false affidavits. Schemes were cooked up with gear suppliers under which their accounts at the stores would be credited as paid. They never got gear. They would go through the process of claiming for lost gear. If a man owed the gear supplier, say, $2,000, the store would get the $2,000 from the government and the account would be paid off; no further gear would be issued from the store. And so on.

A sizeable number of people abused that program, we do not know how many, and eventually it cost $7.2 million. Seven thousand fishermen received compensation—I am including now compensation for lost lobster pots, salmon nets, codtraps and the like. There were 6,500 claims. The scheme was administered primarily by the provincial government but the guidelines were set by the federal government; it was agreed to by the federal government and the federal people assisted where they could. So the scheme eventually cost twice the amount estimated. How much of that amount went to pay off false claims no one knows.

I notice that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is not here today and neither is his parliamentary secretary. Yet here we are discussing fisheries legislation. I assume they will read Hansard. The minister has not met his obligations to the government of Newfoundland in connection with the 1974 program. Ottawa should pay $5.1 million toward the cost of that program under the disaster formula, but so far $3.7 million is still owing. In other words, the federal government has paid only $1.4 million to the Newfoundland government. It has welshed on its agreement and is pressing the poor little government of Newfoundland by saying: "We can't pay because there was some fault in the program; we need to find out all about this fraud before we pay".

They knew at the time what was happening just as well as the province did. They agreed to the program and to the guidelines. The ministers who are present in the chamber should see that this injustice is corrected before the month is out and that the federal government turns over to the province the $3.7 million not yet paid without further malingering. This money has been owing for two or three years. Let the government stop welshing on its deals.

I might point out, also, that the federal government owes the government of Newfoundland $935,000 in connection with the building of a trawler at a cost of $4.2 million. When the Newfoundland government commenced construction it did so on the word of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the province would receive a 35 per cent subsidy on the vessel, 22 per cent from the Department of Fisheries and 13 per cent from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On the strength of that assurance—the shipyard concerned was in his district—the government of Newfoundland went ahead and built the trawler.

The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has reneged on the undertaking to pay a 22 per cent subsidy under the fishing vessels assistance program. He has defied the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who admits he was involved in the affair from the beginning. He says he cannot pay the money over because there is some legal impediment in the way of his doing so. He tells us he is looking for other ways of doing it. I say to him, now: "Pay up. You are welshing on a promise. Pay the $3.7 million which is owing on the gear program, pay up the $935,000 you are welshing on this trawler, and pay up on the 55 to 65 vessels which the province is now building to assist the inshore and mid-shore fishermen under a program which will cost $35 million over five years." Let the ministers start paying the 35 per cent subsidy on those vessels which the government refused to pay this year.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) on a point of order.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, before consideration of private members' business, I would like to correct the erroneous impression left by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who seemed to imply that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) could not care less about Bill C-2 because he is absent from the House today. I would like to inform hon. members that the minister has left today to defend the interests of fishermen, specially those on the east coast, in a follow up on the conference which was held last December in the Conference Centre in Ottawa. As for the parliamentary secretary, it was just normal and reasonable that he accompany the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in British Columbia.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is certainly not a point of order though it may be a point of debate or correction.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, could we just have clarification from the government side of the House as to whether Bill C-2 will be the first order of government business on Monday?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is what I understand.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I believe that is the understanding. I presume it will be as the hon. member has indicated.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

Order No. 2; the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 4; the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 5; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order No. 11; the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ADVISABILITY OF PROVIDING INCENTIVES TO BUILDERS FOR USE OF SOLAR ENERGY SYSTEMS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of directing the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make appropriate changes in its lending policy regulations to provide incentives to builders and developers who incorporate in their building plans the use of passive solar energy designs and/or solar energy systems for space and water heating.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today, if it were approved this afternoon, in essence would direct the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make changes in its lending regulations to provide incentives to builders. When I refer to builders, I mean Canadians who build their own homes; builders who build on behalf of clients and developers. When I refer to developers, I mean individuals or any business which develops subdivisions in our urban areas. These incentives would be provided to builders who incorporate in their building plans the use of passive solar energy designs and/or solar energy systems for space and water heating.

In order to illustrate, I should like to put forward the following example for consideration by hon. members. A $50,000 house usually qualifies for a mortgage in the neighbourhood of $35,000, if it is approved by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This motion would add the cost of solar energy to the cost of the valuation of the mortgage as part of the mortgage itself. The expense incurred to include a solar package, which could be the design of a home, a domestic hot water heating system or any available technique, would be added and included in the mortgage that is made available to the builder or the developer who comes forward with a plan of this kind. At the present time, the regulations of CMHC do not permit the inclusion of this incentive. This is a very modest proposal in comparison to what the government has introduced so far.

There is in existence a valuable insulation program across this country which was announced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) last year. As a result of the budget of 1976, there is a federal sales tax exemption on the sale of solar equipment. In the province of Manitoba there is a refund by the provincial government to municipalities which reduce the assessments of homes that have solar heating equipment incorporated in them. Thus, there are a number of measures in place which help to show how extremely minute this measure is.

A number of major projects are ongoing in Canada in regard to the development and the tapping of our natural resources. For instance, there is the $4,000 million Foothills pipeline; $3,000 million for the expansion and upgrading of the existing Great Canadian Oil Sands and Syncrude tar sands plants; an equal amount for the proposed tar sands operation; $2,000 million for electrical generation projects in the maritimes, including the Gull Island project; and the latest CANDU reactor now under construction in Le Preau, New Brunswick, at a cost of $684 million. These projects are part of an estimated $1,800 million investment between 1975 and 1990, which will provide a major boost to our economy. If I understand correctly, the federal government will participate in this project to the tune of approximately $1 billion a year, or close to 8 per cent of the total amount.

It is against this background that the motion has to be viewed. It has the merit and advantage of providing the average Canadian with an opportunity to play a role in moving toward self-reliance. It will allow the homeowner who is also a builder, and the developer who works for clients, to incorporate solar features in the homes to be built in years to come.

There have been positive statements on the use of solar energy and renewables in a number of documents which have been prepared by the government in recent years. Such positive statements appeared in the publication entitled: The Way Ahead, as well as in the latest Speech from the Throne. This direction was taken by the government in an attempt to benefit future generations. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has warned that Canada will face an energy crisis in the 1980's.

The motion before the House will encourage Canadians to incorporate solar technology when building their own homes and to benefit from CMHC mortgages. The same will apply to builders and developers. This kind of involvement between governments and the public at large assists the nation in moving one step closer to self-reliance.

For the sake of time, I will limit my remarks today. The measure can stand on its own merits. I submit it for consideration by hon. members in the hope that they will give their valuable support to it.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion presented by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). I should like to make a few remarks regarding the potential of renewable energy in this country, as well as about what the government should do in order to assist individuals, developers and builders to incorporate renewable types of energy in their homes, buildings and businesses.

● (1612)

Here we have a limited example of the kind of suggestions made to CMHC that they provide some type of incentive to builders or developers to place within their structures a source of renewable energy. This would be another expense added to the mortgage. We realize that today the cost of housing is becoming very high in this country, and by simply adding the cost of heating to the mortgage, we will not be encouraging individuals to use those sources of renewable energy, whether solar or any other kind, within their buildings.

It would be far better if the hon. member proposed to the House a tax exemption or a tax credit which an individual or developer could use toward the placement of a source of renewable energy, solar or otherwise, in his home, thus allowing him to write the cost off his income tax, either in the year when he built the home or to spread it over a number of years. In that way the price of the house would be kept down and people could afford to build. Encouragement would be given to businesses, farmers and all types of industry to use sources of renewable energy within their structures, not only new ones that are being built but existing structures. Housing is already out of reach of all but a few individuals in this country, and with inflationary prices, which are added on to mortgages, such as the increased price of labour and so on, the price of houses and other structures is increasing constantly.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) spoke about investment in non-renewable resources and about self-reliance. We on this side speak about self-sufficiency and about providing incentives necessary to allow for exploration of non-renewable resources as well as the placement of sources of renewable energy in existing and new structures in this country. We must spend billions of dollars on exploration of oil and gas and nuclear energy because we all realize that in the immediate future it will not be possible for us all to use solar energy and other sources of renewable energy in our homes, cars, and wherever else energy is required. However, what is also necessary are incentives for individuals to use renewable sources of energy, with a view to the future.

It is often said in these kinds of discussions that technology in this area is just starting to be developed and that we need a larger budget to develop renewable sources of energy and to make these systems available to everyone. I suggest that, although technology has not yet been perfected in that respect, there is sufficient expertise today to allow a large number of Canadians to benefit from solar energy and other types of heating systems. Currently there are many heating systems on the market with a high level of performance. They are available at medium cost. At present there are over 115 individuals and businesses in Canada offering solar heating systems to businesses and to private individuals. Also, there are more than 50 companies manufacturing and distributing these systems or fabricating on site solar heating systems and components. Technology in that area does exist. What we need now are incentives to develop it and employ it.

It is therefore discouraging to read about the research project that was conducted last year in the province of Manitoba in which both the federal and provincial governments participated. They spent $167,000 to place solar energy equipment on the dome of the provincial parliament building and they attempted to monitor its heating effectiveness. The cost of the project got out of hand and so it was abandoned. Surely if that amount of money were put in the hands of scientists and businesses which are in the process of building solar energy units and other equipment using renewable energy, they could have refined the product and made it less costly so that the consumer would have been able to benefit from it. That would have been better than standing back and saying that we cannot proceed with the project because adequate research does not exist at present. I say that the government could start providing real incentives immediately not only for research but to individuals so that they could place equipment using renewable energy within their structures.

Recently a booklet of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources outlined how we could put solar energy technology in Canada to use. It suggested that two benefits would flow from it. One would be the savings to society in terms of the prevention of pollution resulting from conventional heating methods. We all know that certain harmful emissions result from heating our homes with diesel fuel or oil, not so much from natural gas. We also know that renewable sources of heat, such as heat pumps, do not produce emissions and are perfectly safe.

It was also stated in the booklet that savings to society would result from the use of renewable sources of energy in the heating of homes. I believe that some 35 per cent of all the oil and natural gas in this country is used to heat our homes. If renewable sources of energy were used instead, that much oil or gas would be saved, and that much less would have to be imported or would be saved for other needs.

The hon. member for Davenport mentioned that we were running out of non-renewable resources. Surely now is the time to provide all sorts of incentives to save our oil and gas for future needs. I believe that a substantial program of financial incentives should be set up to encourage people to employ renewable sources of energy for heating. The suggestion which was put forward by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), and which I support, is that the federal government, which will be bringing down its budget in the next month or so, should provide 150 per cent tax exemptions on the use of a source of renewable energy in existing or new structures. A heat pump, for example, would cost $3,000. A person placing one in his house would enjoy a tax exemption of $4,500. Solar heating is slightly more expensive. It is suggested that it would cost about $10,000 to put that system into the average sized house. A developer or an individual who installed that equipment would enjoy a tax exemption of $15,000.

If this type of incentive was provided, we would see in businesses and homes a 20 per cent reduction in the amount of oil, gas and electricity which would otherwise be used to heat them over the next few years. We use in the neighbourhood of one billion barrels of oil each year. If that oil costs $12 a barrel, we spend about $12 billion per year on oil and gas. If we save 20 per cent of that, we save $2.4 billion. That may well be an exaggeration because much of that oil and gas is used in cars, but surely hon. members can see that that kind of saving would more than pay for the tax credit or tax exemption, and the results and benefits would be everlasting.

I said I was going to quote the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). He has made two previous speeches about this, and I would like to quote from one speech in which he suggested that 150 per cent and 100 per cent tax write-offs should be allowed Canadians who use renewable energies within their homes. The hon. member stated, and I quote:

> Following up my budget proposals in my speech of November 17, 1977, I submit the following paper at the request of your Parliamentary Secretary.
> At this particular moment Canada's interests require a dramatic incentive for individuals to move towards some form of solar assisted energy savings. This need fits in with the opportunity for potential budgeting.
>
> In almost every case solar hardware is capital intensive. In other words, one large capital investment now versus the usual 20 years of annual energy bills.
>
> My proposal is that any type of capital expenditure to reduce utilization by the individual of traditional energy sources should be given the same tax treatment that business gets, namely:
>
> (a) 100 per cent write-off for proven hardware
> (b) 150 per cent write-off for hardware still in experimental stages

This write-off was in place in tax provisions from 1959 to 1971, but it was removed by a budget of the Liberal government of that time. Our suggestion is that that write-off be put back in place for individuals who are prepared to use renewable energy sources.

Solar energy is not the only renewable energy source available. There are eleven forms of renewable energy which can be placed within various structures. I will state them quickly. Heat pump technology has been available for decades and is widely used in the United States today. With simple modifications it could be used here in Canada. The others are heat storage facilities, methane production, vertical axis windmills, solar absorption air conditioning, residential photovoltaics, individual water recycling, conversion of waste to energy, conversion of cow manure to protein, energy plantation and the production of hydrogen. All these are available in various technological forms today. In individual cases many could be placed economically within the businesses of homes of Canadians, if Canadians were provided the incentive.

At the present time, even with increases in the price of natural gas and oil heating, this is still within the bounds of most Canadians. However, as costs increase and as that resource becomes less and less available, it becomes more and more evident that we should be providing incentives to Canadians.

I was speaking previously about a report produced by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The study took place in 1977. The report states that the lifetime costs of three space-heating energy systems have been calculated. Exempting solar equipment from property taxes resulted in the following cost comparisons: Solar, $7,960; oil, $6,600; and electricity, $11,280. This study showed that solar is still not competitive with oil. The figures I have given are 1977 figures, and since that time there has been an increase in the price of oil and natural gas. Even so, solar heating is and can be competitive with electricity with only a small degree of government encouragement.

Another estimate in a study conducted by Middleton Associates—"Canada's Renewable Energy Sources: An Assessment of Potential"—revealed that the lifetime cost of a space and water heating system using short-term storage—solar—would be $6,105 as opposed to an electric space and water heating system costing $8,400. However, we must understand that the sun continues to shine, and once a solar heating system is set up, the cost over the years is written off, whereas an electrical system is paid for every day.

Other comparisons are also favourable. Heat pumps have an initial capital cost of approximately $3,000 and can save $375 a year on a $500 heating bill in the United States. They are not quite as efficient here because we have more days when the temperature gets down below -10 Centigrade. That problem can be overcome by placing a small water storage facility in the basement or outside, as long as it is fully insulated. By taking heat from water, efficiency can be even greater than what I have just indicated.

It is worthwhile to look at what is being done by the government of the United States. President Carter's energy plan would allow a person using solar energy to have a tax credit of $2,000. Despite its opposition to the plan the House of Representatives recommended that that be increased to $2,150. The Senate agreed that that should be allowed not only for homes but for businesses as well. The government of the United States takes this matter very seriously. Those incentives will soon be in place. That opportunity exists here in Canada, and I hope in the budget which is coming up the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will include it. It would be much more beneficial to Canadians than providing some additional mortgage money through CMHC. We have a long way to go in this area, but perhaps adopting the hon. member's motion would help.

● (1632)

It is true that for some purposes renewable energy resources are just—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak for only a minute or two and in doing so express the hope that the House will pass this motion before this hour expires. As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) has indicated, once you raise the subject of energy in any form, almost anything is in order in that field. The motion before us this afternoon, however, is a very narrow one. It asks for one particular provision and I hope we can see fit to agree to it. I feel I cannot get to my feet on an occasion such as this, faced as I am with a member who is showing a great deal of persistence, without commending him for acting in that way. He has stuck with the subject of solar energy and has already had something improved by the House. He is back at it again today and I hope the House will support his motion.

I think I have to make a slight correction with respect to something he said at the beginning of his speech. If I heard him correctly he said that passing this motion would direct Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make certain adjustments. I point out that the passing of the motion merely expresses the view of this House that the government should give that kind of direction to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is the way things work around here. If the motion were passed—and I hope it is passed unanimously—then woebetide the government that does not pay some attention to the opinion expressed by the House.

I commend the hon. member for sticking with this subject and I hope we support him this afternoon.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) has suggested that the government consider the advisability of directing Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make appropriate changes in its lending policy regulations to provide incentives to builders and developers who incorporate in their building plans the use of passive solar energy designs and/or solar energy systems for space and water heating.

This suggestion by the hon. member is worth, in my view, serious consideration because solar energy is one of the sources to be utilized in our continuing efforts to reduce our dependency upon energy sources which are irreplaceable. It is my intention now, Mr. Speaker, to place before the House some of the practical considerations that affect policy making in the area and then to set out the current thoughts of the government on the subject.

First, to enable hon. members to understand the subject more clearly, a distinction has to be made between active solar heating and passive solar heating. The former involves the reception of solar heating energy by solar panels, thermal storage, the input of electrical energy to drive pumps, fans and the like, distribution systems, and so on. Passive solar heating is defined as the contribution accruing to the domestic space heating load by virtue of glazing, which transmits solar heating energy directly into living space.

I mention the distinction, Mr. Speaker, between active and passive solar heating, in order to emphasis that the solar energy applications can range from the simple use of glazing for passive solar energy purposes to more complex solar energy installations.

I recognize that passive solar heating will not obviate the need for a conventional heating system capable of meeting the total heating requirement. No storage of heat is involved in passive systems and so, if there is no sunlight, the benefits are substantially reduced. Even so, there are no barriers that I am aware of to the designing of a house to benefit from such passive solar energy techniques.

I was pleased to be informed that considerable effort has been made to develop knowledge of the more complex active solar systems. There remains much that still requires investigation. Concerted efforts by CMHC and other federal agencies such as the National Research Council in conjunction with provincial governments, utility commissions, and the private sector are so oriented.

Fortunately, we can draw upon the knowledge presently known and thus the government can respond constructively to the suggestion by the hon. member for Davenport. I am pleased to report that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has directed Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to review its lending policy with respect to solar energy and to present its recommendations to him. He is particularly interested in the impact upon the present lending policy which provides for maximums on loans and also the measures necessary to ensure that only those systems providing effective performance are authorized.

With these few comments, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to indicate that the government agrees with this motion. I should like to thank the hon. member for bringing such a worthwhile motion to the House this afternoon.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak only briefly in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). My brevity reflects the degree of merit I attach to this motion. I sincerely hope that all members will see fit to refer this motion to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works without further debate.

In 1973, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) raised substantially the international price of oil and some of the oil exporting countries curtailed production and applied an embargo against certain oil importing countries. These actions precipitated what has come to be known as the energy crisis of the winter of 1973-74, and since then prices for crude oil have remained high. As a result of this crisis, it became necessary for Canada, along with other industrialized nations, to re-think and adjust our energy policy.

In 1976, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources outlined a new direction in Canada's energy strategy. The objective of the strategy is the achievement of energy self-reliance. One of the policy areas involved in the attainment of self-reliance is increased research and development which has the potential to provide new energy options. One of these new options is renewable energy resources, which includes tidal, wind, biomass, geothermal and solar power. In February 1977, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, realizing that renewal energy sources would be playing an increasingly dominant role in Canada's future energy supply, allotted renewable energy the largest share of the $10 million federal research development spending for the fiscal year 1977-78. Also, it was announced that the Department would establish a renewable energy research branch.

Our goal of self-reliance was reaffirmed in the Speech from the Throne. The relevant passage is as follows:

> In the field of energy, it will continue to be the determined policy of the government to work with the provinces towards the goal of self-reliance, particularly by encouraging exploration and conservation to reduce our dependence on imported oil. Further encouragement will be given to the development of energy saving technology of renewable energy resources and of the application of solar energy.

I should like to take a moment to outline some of the federal renewable energy projects now underway. The solar heating research and development program of the National Research Council has undertaken a number of projects. After completing a feasibility study of solar heating in Canada in 1976-77, several new initiatives were started, which included the sponsorship of the construction of fourteen solar-heated demonstration homes, the funding of seven research and development solar heating contracts and the establishment of an independent solar-collector test facility.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is working presently on a ten-year program, the mini-utility concept, which would develop parcels of land in the suburbs as sites for solar collectors to service communities using solar heating systems.

● (1642)

How does Canada's performance compare with the solar energy activities of other countries? The United States has made a clear commitment to the development of solar energy. Its goal is the provision of at least 7 per cent of the total national energy requirements by solar energy by the year 2000. Japan is also very active in solar research, development and application. In Australia, Sydney University was awarded $5.5 million by Saudi Arabia to continue solar research. Other countries with major solar commitments are France, Israel, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany and Sweden.

Many people may question, why fund the expansion and development of solar energy? First of all, solar energy, unlike the fossil fuels, is essentially perpetual and inexhaustible. It is the basis of all life on earth and it is free. The notion that Canada is too cold a country to benefit from solar energy has been cast aside. We do have sufficient solar energy to meet present and future energy requirements.

Second is the degree of interest expressed by many Canadians. For example, the concept of a "conserver society" embodies the movement towards a greater reliance on renewable sources of energy, such as solar, rather than drawing on the world's stocks of non-replaceable fossil fuels.

I would like to close, Mr. Speaker, on a prediction made by Dr. Harry Swain, head of the renewable energy resources branch of energy, mines and resources. I quote:

> A major crunch is coming in world oil prices around 1982 to 1985. We must get serious about solar power now. It takes time to build up an industry, establish the proper solar equipment and better housing standards, work out suitable lending rates from banks and devise government incentives. If we postpone all this to the next round of the energy crisis, it will be too late.

On that note, Mr. Speaker, I reiterate my support for this motion and urge its acceptance and referral to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works for further consideration.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to you and to hon. members in that I should have paid more attention to the order paper. In so doing I would have recognized that this subject was placed on the order paper for debate this afternoon and I might have better prepared myself. I offer the most sincere compliments to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for his work, as he has already been complimented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I will try briefly to give you some reasons why all parties in this House should support this motion. I would hope that an interdepartmental task force at the most senior level will be struck. I believe that unless immediate action is taken Canada is going to lose a multibillion dollar industry in the next five years.

I might mention that CMHC has given approval in principle to the use of hot water solar panels and I think also space heating solar panels. I would add by way of example that in Australia, if my recollection is correct, one out of every two homes now makes use of solar panels for heating and hot water, and three out of every four homes under construction are making use of that type of equipment.

Other members have mentioned that in the United States there is already considerable support by the U.S. government for a solar panel industry, a decision which I believe we will be facing in Canada in the next five to 10 years. According to my recollection, it is expected that the next sharp and dramatic increase in Arab oil prices will be in 1982 or 1983, about five years from now. I believe the figures indicate it will be something in the order of an average annual increase of 15 per cent in the cost of imported oil. Again based on my recollection—I apologize if these figures are not exact but they are pretty close—it is expected that the cost of electricity will increase by about 12 to 14 per cent per annum in the foreseeable future. The cost of gas will increase by about 11 to 12 per cent per annum.

We are looking at a situation which right now CMHC considers to be profitable in terms of the cost of installation of solar panels, in particular solar hot water heating. From the point of view of the homeowner it will make it worth-while to invest approximately $2,000, resulting in his electricity or oil costs reducing accordingly over the length of his mortgage commitment, with the expectation that in approximately seven to ten years the cost of installation would be amortized by the reduction in the cost of oil and electricity for heating purposes.

We are looking therefore at a new utility, a somewhat similar historical development to the light, heat and power industry throughout the modern world. The question is what role Canada will play in the development of a new utility in Canada. In addition, it could include the question of capacity. It has the possibility of becoming a gigantic multibillion dollar export industry.

These solar panels are useful in a wide variety of climates all around the world. It is interesting to note in our temperate zone that the most successful and the most technologically perfect solar panel systems have been manufactured. When I say in the temperate zone, that includes the most populated part of Canada. Unfortunately there is virtually no manufacturing at all of solar panels in our nation.

There is a significant solar panel industry in the United States. In some cases it is on a sort of a cottage industry basis, and in other cases it is on a fully automated basis. In five years we are going to be buying our solar panels, which are made of copper, and in many cases Canadian copper, and glass and aluminum, in many cases Canadian aluminum, from the United States and from Exxon. These products will have to be purchased there unless we have the brains now to ensure that this industry is developed and that it will be a profitable and necessary industry. This should be the result in view of the increasing cost of other forms of energy.

I reiterate my compliments to the hon. member for Davenport for his recommendation that this kind of information be considered by the government. I hope this motion of the hon. member will be used by the government as an opportunity to review seriously and extensively the entire subject of solar heating. Canada should involve itself in this industry before we become, as we have with so many other things, nothing more than net importers of the finished product, even though in some cases the basic resources of those products are of Canadian origin.

If we required that every federal government building built from now on should utilize solar panels for its hot water heating requirements, it would create sufficient industry in this country to produce the resources, to produce technological expertise, to produce manufacturing expertise and to give us an industrial base to become one of the major exporters in the world.

Backbenchers on this side of the House are saying in a most courteous way that someone on our side is asleep at the switch. I would find it ironic in the extreme if members of the Conservative party were to talk out this motion.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) may find it ironic, but I have to tell him that every member who puts forward a motion or a private member's bill from this side of the House has the same expectation as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), and to a man they are talked out. I intend to talk it out. I hope to do so in a manner that will indicate some support for the general principle of the motion, but I have some criticism of the manner in which this motion was presented.

The motion that the hon. member for Davenport presented, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated, is very narrow. In my opinion it is much too narrow. It reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of directing the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make appropriate changes in its lending policy regulations to provide incentives to builders and developers who incorporate in their building plans the use of passive solar energy designs and/or solar energy systems for space and water heating.

That is what it says, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said he intended that the extra cost of passive solar energy systems would be added to the allowable mortgage amount. In other words, there was not any real incentive, because the mortgage would be bigger to carry the extra cost.

• (1652)

As we know, there is an extra cost in putting a solar system into a home.

To my way of thinking, it is not enough to restrict this idea to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is unfair. There are many homes built in this country which for obvious reasons are mortgaged by private means rather than through CMHC. There should be some method whereby private mortgages could be extended this same benefit. It is absolutely imperative that we have incentives.

I intend to deal for a few moments with those comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). Before doing so, I want to refer very briefly to one or two comments made by the Lakeshore members, Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) and Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker). They made a very valuable contribution to the discussion this afternoon.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore said that solar energy is free. That is a misstatement. Solar energy is not free. It carries with it a very high cost in its adaptation to useful purposes in our northern hemisphere climate. I do not know whether the hon. member meant the fact that the sun shining down on us does not cost anything. In fact, that costs us something as well.

Obviously in the larger metropolitan centres—and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore should know this—zoning laws would have to be enacted prohibiting the obstruction of any building that would block the sun from anyone who has installed a solar heating device. If you knew there was a property immediately to the south of you on which someone intended to build a high rise building and you had put solar heating panels on your house, if a law was in place preventing anyone from shading your property it would effectively restrict the height of any building to the south. If there were no law, obviously putting on solar panels would be a tremendous risk. Anyone could build immediately to the south, southeast or southwest of you and block the sun. That would defeat your purpose. Your expenditure on solar panels would be for naught.

So there is indeed a cost, direct and indirect, in using solar panels. This is a very small criticism, but it is valid. It points out one of the major problems, particularly in urban municipalities, in using solar heat. The situation is not the same in the large rural areas such as those represented by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and myself. However, there is that danger in our communities.

The hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore made a particularly valuable contribution. However, I have to argue with him. He stated that solar panels used for space heating and hot water heating in fact paid for themselves. I have on my desk a volume over three inches thick which covers legislation passed in the United States.

[Mr. Ellis.]

I am sure members opposite are aware of the exposition which took place in New York City last September. It covered virtually all of the equipment made by solar heating appliance manufacturers. I have gone into a great deal of research. To the best of my knowledge, at this point in time there are very few solar heating units, particularly in Canada, which will pay their own way in cost savings. It is still cheaper to use fossil fuels to heat one's home. That is unfortunate.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin mentioned the credit incentive. I intend to dwell on that for a few moments. The hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore made a particularly valid point. He said this could be a major industry for Canada. Everyone knows that in Arizona you can use solar heating panels. We have all seen pictures of solar heating panels that completely heat a home. I would think that in Arizona there would be absolutely no problem whatsoever. I do not care whether it is energy in the form of hot air, hot water or some other medium; you have a vehicle to contain heat and then diffuse it when it is needed.

In places like Arizona and the southwest United States, there is no problem. However, the type of solar heating that is needed is the type which would suit the northern hemisphere, that part of Canada and the United States which lies north of the fortieth or forty-fifth parallel, going up, I suggest with some care, as far as the fifty-fifth parallel. That area contains a large number of people, all of whom could benefit from wide Canadian expertise in solar heating.

One way we could help tremendously would be to properly support the Canadian Standards Association in preparing standards. All members will concede that in a new industry like this there will obviously be fly-by-night operators. They move in, make a quick buck from an unsuspecting individual and move out again. That happens with every new industry that comes along. This happens not only in Canada, but in the United States and other areas. It happened when swimming pools became popular as well as asphalt driveways. It happens now in the construction industry in the building of chimneys. It happens in many areas and we have to put up with it.

In the few minutes I have left, I want to say how much I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. He pointed out that while the technology does exist, it is not all paid for. There must be a credit in order to help pay for this. The hon. member suggested a tax credit. That makes considerable sense.

The hon. member pointed out that in President Carter's energy package there is a tax credit that not only enables an individual to use solar energy as an alternative, but encourages its use. That is the key. There has to be some encouragement to develop a solar energy industry.

Possibly I should have mentioned it earlier, but I assume the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) includes in solar energy energy from wind. After all, wind is produced by the sun. In the county south of me, Wellington, a Mr. Ball has a solar wind-driven generating system in his home.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

NORTHERN PIPELINE—ALLEGATION LEGISLATION DOES NOT ADEQUATELY GUARANTEE CANADIAN CONTENT FOR PIPE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The government's proposed legislation to implement its pipeline agreement with the United States is seriously deficient in a number of respects. There is no guarantee that Canadian manpower or materials will receive preferential treatment in the construction of a pipeline in Canadian territory. There is a serious erosion of legal authority in that there would be only a very limited right of appeal from decisions of the proposed pipeline agency. In view of these and other very serious matters and deficiencies in the bill, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House condemns the government for not including in the bill adequate guarantees for Canadian content, particularly full utilization of the Canadian labour force and the supply of the majority of materials from Canadian sources on the Canadian sections of the pipeline, and that this House condemns the government for denying the rights of Canadian citizens to full access to the courts, which constitutes a denial of rights which have existed from time immemorial under our British system of justice.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

KITIMAT PIPELINE—REQUEST CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATION BE DEFERRED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I desire to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last fall the public hearings being conducted by the west coast oil ports inquiry headed by Dr. Andrew Thompson were cancelled due to the request of Kitimat Pipeline Ltd. that its application before the National Energy Board be held in abeyance. The result has been that many communities in British Columbia have been denied an opportunity to present their views to the inquiry. Kitimat Pipeline Ltd. has now reactivated its application to construct the pipeline from Kitimat to Edmonton, and the people affected have a right to be heard.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That this House urges the government to reactivate immediately the Thompson inquiry and provide facilities and funding for public interest groups to present their opinions, and that the National Energy Board be instructed to delay any consideration of the Kitimat application until the Thompson inquiry has submitted its report to the government.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be made, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DECISION OF ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL ON STEEL BEAMS—PROPOSAL NEWFOUNDLAND AND B.C. BE EXEMPTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Madame Ritchie of the anti-dumping tribunal, in the matter of the dumping of wide-flange steel shapes in Canada and alleged injury to Algoma Steel, found on December 29 that the evidence justified special consideration for British Columbia and Newfoundland, where Algoma did not sell or compete, but that an exemption for Newfoundland and B.C. had to be left to the governor in council, in view of the fact that any increase of duty will raise construction costs in Newfoundland without helping Algoma Steel, which does not sell in Newfoundland, and in view of the submission of the Newfoundland government to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that the tribunal's decision will jeopardize local steel fabricators and 300 jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the governor in council alter the majority decision of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal by exempting Newfoundland as well as B.C. as separate regional markets from the dumping duties on wide-flange steel shapes.

RELOCATION OF VETERANS' HOSPITALS—CONSEQUENT DISRUPTION OF LIVES OF STAFF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The displacement and transfer of staff caused as a result of the transfer of veterans' hospitals is causing serious disruption in the lives of the employees affected. The recent transfer of Westminster Hospital emphasizes the fact that after every transfer grievances arise, adversely affecting veteran patients and denying the assurance of job security, contrary to the spirit of the handover policy of this government. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles):

That all further transfers of veterans' hospitals be stopped until a review of the effects of all transfers which have taken place, to the detriment of veterans and staffs of veterans' hospitals, is made.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST GOVERNMENT NOT ALLOW IMPORTATION OF PRODUCTS MADE IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the employment situation has become nearly disastrous in almost every part of Canada, as that situation can, to a large extent, be blamed on our trade policy which allows goods into the country that we could easily manufacture here, as the very countries from which we import goods depend even more on our raw materials than we do upon their goods, I move, supported by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne):

[Mr. Crosbie.]

That this government completely review its trade policy with a view to encouraging the production in Canada of what consumer goods we now import, and that specifically for the purpose of fighting unemployment efficiently.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER PAY EXPENSES OF TRIP TO B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the expenses of the Prime Minister's political trip to British Columbia last week—which amount to thousands of dollars—will be paid entirely by the people of Canada and not by the federal Liberal party, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House reminds the Prime Minister of his own words in a speech given in British Columbia that "there is no free lunch", and therefore urges him to practice what he preaches and pay back the people of Canada the costs of this political trip.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Presentation of such a motion for discussion can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

WHEAT—CALL FOR HOUSE REVIEW OF 1977-78 POOL ACCOUNTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Wheat is now over $4 a bushel at Vancouver and indications are that it will rise to $5 before year-end. As the minister's confirmation that there will be no further payment to producers above the $3 initial price means bankruptcy for a good many farmers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House review all orders in council bearing on the 1977-78 pool accounts for wheat as they all seem to be milked dry for political reasons.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That because of the nature of the worldwide textile industry, its peculiarities and special problems, the Canadian government ask that textiles be exempt in their entirety from the negotiations on tariff reductions.

"ICE HOGGY" COMPETITION BETWEEN MPs AND MEMBERS OF PRESS GALLERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young), that the result of an "ice hoggy" competition on Friday last, ice hog day, between members from both sides of the House of Commons and members of the press, be tabled, when supremacy reigned and hon. members won a decisive victory. PRIVILEGE

ANSWERS GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Speaker: On Friday last a question of privilege was raised concerning answers given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) during the question period. It was evident at that time that hon. members sought the opportunity to examine the transcript over the weekend and that we have an opportunity, as I said on Friday, to raise again today the same subject and continue the argument after examining the transcript, and particularly to put a specific motion in connection with that incident if that was the desire of members. I have had two notices of request to do so, one from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and one from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

• (1417)

The hon. Leader of the Opposition has further requested, and I have given his request serious consideration since it bears on events that took place in the question period, that the matter ought to be considered before the question period rather than after it. It is only under extraordinary circumstances that that can be done. I believe it is a serious proposition and I will, therefore, hear argument first to see whether or not it will have a bearing on the performance in the question period today. I will safeguard the question period by allotting 45 minutes to it when the time comes.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief in continuing this matter which was raised the other day.

We have available to us now, not only the record of Hansard recording the remarks of the new Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), but also a transcript of remarks which he made outside the House. In essence, sir, the relevant portions of the remarks made by the Solicitor General are as follows. I will quote from page 2511 of Hansard for Friday, February 3:

It will be my policy to leave the McDonald commission to make its own conclusions on the evidence that is adduced. I will not be commenting on a day by day basis on evidence that may be adduced before that commission on a prior occasion.

In other words, the Solicitor General made it very clear that it was not his intention to answer questions in the House of Commons relating to matters that are before the McDonald commission. Later on in relation to ministerial responsibility he offered this view, and I quote:

That ministerial responsibility is dated as of February 1 of this year. What happened prior to that time and prior to the nomination of the previous solicitor general is a matter presently under study by the McDonald commission.

He is referring here to his responsibility for that ministry. In other words, he again seeks to avoid the responsibility of answering questions in this House on those matters because those matters are under consideration by that commission.

I would like to point out that the minister's view of ministerial responsibility and the capacity for it to be curtailed by the appointment of a commission outside this House is a view that, in our judgment, is totally wrong. To underline the dilemma that it has caused for the House of Commons, it leaves us in a situation where we are virtually without a minister to question, and without any opportunity to seek information which, in the interest of the Canadian public, it should have.

I wish to refer to a ruling of your own, sir in relation to the ministers to whom questions can be put, a ruling reported on page 6851 of Hansard for June 20, 1977, and I quote:

Can members ask a question of a minister in that minister's former capacity? The clear answer given time and time again, without any doubt about our practices and precedents, has been no. It is tied very directly to the theory of ministerial responsibility, that the present incumbent of a ministerial office has responsibility which goes back for all time. It does not stop at the time that that incumbent took office. Therefore there cannot be two people responsible to the House in the parliamentary sense for that continuing responsibility.

In your own words that seems to me to answer the suggestion put forward by the Solicitor General the other day to the effect that his responsibilities began only with the assumption of his duties as Solicitor General. There are some statements made by the minister outside the House which indicate that it was no slip of the tongue but a deliberate statement of considered policy by the minister. This refers to his stated intention not to answer questions in the House of Commons relating to matters before the McDonald inquiry. I will read three quotes from the transcript:

—when the alleged conduct, or questions relating to their administration, is before a royal commission or commission of inquiry, surely I am not going to supersede that commission of inquiry—

There is a second statement made in answer to a question from a journalist:

—I may answer questions from the opposition so long as those questions relate to matters that are not within the mandate of the individual commissions.

Finally, in answer again to questions from journalists, he said:

—I cannot answer questions relating to matters that come before the commission, or that the commission is presently dealing with.

● (1422)

It is very clear that the Solicitor General seeks to introduce into Canadian practice for the first time in memory—certainly that kind of startling introduction of a theory of silence before the House of Commons would have been noted had it been tried before—the idea that a government which does not want to answer questions can appoint a royal commission or inquiry to look into those questions. Then, because it has created that outside body, it is itself protected from the lifelong, historic obligation to answer to the House of Commons for the activities of the government. That clearly underlines, undercuts, and destroys any principle of ministerial responsibility in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want you, Sir, to consider the situation in which parliament is left by the clear statement of the Solicitor General, inside and outside this House, and your own ruling, when the only person we can question is the minister who refuses to answer questions relative to the McDonald inquiry. We are left in a situation where there is literally no one we can question about matters which are now before the McDonald inquiry.

It is important for us to recognize as we deal with this question that when we, in the opposition, raised with the previous solicitor general the concern that the terms of reference of the McDonald inquiry were too narrow to allow the kind of inquiry into some of the matters that we thought were essential, the answer of the then solicitor general was that the terms of reference of that inquiry were all-inclusive. In other words, they deal with any matter that might perceivably pertain to the conduct of ministers, the conduct of the security service, or any of the other matters at issue before the House.

If we take those two statements together, it means that the Solicitor General now is saying that he will not answer questions relating to anything that comes before the McDonald inquiry. His predecessor said that every question we might want to raise in this House is a question that can come before the McDonald inquiry. That is to say, there is not a single question that we in this House of Commons can put to the present Solicitor General and expect an answer to because his statement, taken in context with the statement of his predecessor, is that he will not answer anything that comes before a royal commission which can consider every question that we might want to ask. If this position by the minister is upheld, the House of Commons is in a position where we are not able to ask any questions about anything relating to this very serious matter.

When we note this royal commission, it is important for us to understand and to emphasize that the royal commission is not a body that was set up by this House of Commons. Nor is it a body which will report to this House of Commons. This parliament has delegated no responsibility at all to this royal commission. It is a creation of the government. It is an emanation of the government. It is not an emanation of this House of Commons. It does not take any of its powers or responsibilities from this place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What it has done is assume a government responsibility, which was a responsibility to look at past executive actions and examine their propriety. It was appointed by the government. It was appointed with terms of reference which were set out by the government and which were not accepted as being complete by the members of the opposition. Its staff has been chosen by the government and will report to the government exclusively, and indeed at a time, one suspects, when it will suit the government's own convenience.

Unless the government chooses, there will be no debate in this House of Commons about the conclusions or findings of the McDonald royal commission. Even if there had been more agreement about those terms of reference and the purpose of that commission, I think it has been well established in the history of our institution that any commission is complementary to the House of Commons and cannot replace the role and the function of this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, and this is a matter of some continuing concern to us, while it is the view of the government that the terms of reference of that commission are all inclusive, consequently the denial of information by the present Solicitor General to the House is all inclusive.

It is our view that that commission does not have the power to look adequately into questions of ministerial responsibility and into questions of the role of ministers in this whole affair. Nonetheless, it is the interpretation of the government itself that it does have that power. Therefore, by extention, what the Solicitor General was telling this House the other day is that the government feels itself under no obligation to answer questions in this House on any matter relating to ministerial responsibility and the security affair.

It is clearly the right of the House of Commons, and within its power, to reach clear decisions as to the manner in which ministers opposite have carried out their responsibilities. That is something which cannot be delegated to a royal commission. Nor can we allow a situation where the establishment of a royal commission prevents us finding out how ministers have acted and discharged their responsibilities.

The matter of the McDonald royal commission has always been a contentious one. There is disagreement as to the adequacy of the terms of reference which the government has established for that body. The point remains, though, that the government has one very strong view: it is that the terms of reference allow the commission to look into every question which impinges directly or indirectly upon the conduct of the RCMP or the security services. According to the government, nothing is excepted from its ambit. That was the testimony of the previous solicitor general. Now we find the present Solicitor General, both inside and outside this chamber, making it clear that he does not intend to answer questions here related to matters before the McDonald royal commission. Mr. Speaker, every matter involved in this issue is before the McDonald royal commission, so what the Solicitor General is telling us is that no answers will be forthcoming on anything which has to do with this subject.

We are being asked, in effect, to accept a proposition that the executive is not obliged to answer to the House of Commons if it sets up a public inquiry to look into matters which the House wants investigated. That principle is obviously not acceptable to parliament, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that you will find it is not acceptable. The inquiry is an extension of the executive; it is not an extension of the House of Commons. Consequently, it should not be a limitation upon members of this House doing their duty and asking questions.

Parliament would be neglecting its whole purpose, let alone neglecting its rights, if it allowed the principle of ministerial responsibility to be wholly passed over in the course of an inquiry set up by the executive. We would be undermining our rights if we accepted the strange and dangerous doctrine put forward by the Solicitor General that he is not obliged to answer any questions about any of the security issues which might come before the commission.

For these reasons, in the light of the very difficult position in which parliament is placed, in the light of the fact that we are precluded by Your Honour's earlier ruling from asking questions of any of the three previous occupants of the office of solicitor general, and in the light of the Solicitor General's statement that he does not intend to answer questions on matters which are the subject of the inquiry by the McDonald royal commission, and since we are assured that the commission's terms of reference are sufficiently broad to cover every conceivable aspect of these issues, if Your Honour finds that a prima facie case of privilege has been made, I should like to propose the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That the declaration by the Solicitor General that he will not be answerable to the House for certain areas of his responsibility and, in particular, for any matter within his ministerial responsibility which has been, is, or could be before the McDonald commission and the question whether the same constitues a breach of the privileges of this House and of its members be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we might have a copy of the motion which has just been put forward.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall also be pleased to send over to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) a copy of the motion which it is my intention to move.

Sir, I wish to express my strong support of the case made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) with respect to what happened in this House last Friday. Several of us suggested at that time that it would be appropriate to delay further consideration of this matter until we had had an opportunity to study the record. Suggestions were made that maybe some members were misinterpreting what had been said. I believe the interpretation now given by the hon. Leader of the Opposition is certainly a valid one.

● (1432)

The fact is that on Friday, in responding to questions put by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) said the following:

Mr. Speaker, with regard to the initial remark of the hon. member, I want to assure him that I take my ministerial responsibility very seriously indeed. That ministerial responsibility is dated as of February 1 of this year.

The next sentence of the Solicitor General reads as follows:

What happened prior to that time and prior to the nomination of the previous solicitor general is a matter presently under study by the McDonald commission.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition has those sentences, as well as those remarks made outside the House, to support the position we are taking. The Solicitor General said on Friday that his responsibility dates only from February 1; that everything prior to February 1, both in the regime of the previous solicitor general and the regime of the solicitor general before that, is before the McDonald commission; and that he will not answer questions on matters which are before the McDonald commission.

In other words, we have had a very strong assertion by the present Solicitor General that he will not answer questions which relate to anything dated prior to February 1, 1978. As I said in my remarks the other day, I would not quarrel with the right of the Solicitor General to take questions on their merit, to consider each one and decide whether it should be answered or not; but for him to make that sweeping statement, that he will answer no questions on matters dated prior to February 1, 1978, is an affront to parliament.

I am almost inclined to read some of the sentences contained in Beauchesne's fourth edition to the effect that anything which may be considered a contempt of court by a tribunal is a breach of privilege. There are other comments as well. That particular paragraph has a lot of bizarre things in it of which the minister is not guilty; but surely it is in contempt of parliament for a minister to refuse, in advance, and carte blanche, to answer any questions in an area as broad and as important as this one.

When considering matters of privilege, Your Honour and your predecessors have frequently made the point that in order for a matter to have the quality of privilege it must be something which interferes with the capacity of members of this House to do their job. Could anything fit that definition more clearly than what the Solicitor General has said? If we are to be able to do our job, we have to be in a position to ask questions, certainly the kinds of questions the Chair allows. For a minister of the Crown to say before such questions are put that he will not answer them at all, surely is interfering with our capacity to do our job as members of this House. It is on that basis I feel we have a genuine case of privilege.

On the other hand, as I said to Your Honour the other day, although you can stop us from asking certain questions and you can stop the ministers from giving certain replies or wandering from the question at issue, Your Honour is not in a position to force anyone either to ask or to answer a question. Therefore, we would be going a bit far if we were to ask Your Honour to make a ruling that the Solicitor General must answer the questions he refuses to answer. This brings to a head what is really at issue here. That is one of the reasons why I did not want to proceed with the matter on Friday. I wanted to wait until today in the hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would be here, and he is.

What is involved is the entire question of ministerial responsibility and how that responsibility will be exercised. The Prime Minister must clarify this matter in a much better way than his deputy attempted to clarify it on Friday. He must tell us what we have the right to expect of ministers of the Crown, not only of the Solicitor General but of all the other ministers. We accept the proposition, the rule, the tradition that we cannot ask persons who are not now ministers of departments questions about the time when they were in charge; but it has been established clearly that the current minister of any department is responsible for dealing with that department throughout its history.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The reason I feel this is a question of privilege and that the matter should be referred to the appropriate committee is so that the Prime Minister can clarify the situation. I know he has been reported in the media as having said certain things in British Columbia which seem to endorse the position taken by the Solicitor General. I hope, on reflection, and out of his concern for the workings of parliament, that he will study the record and give the matter serious thought. Surely we are not to be left in the position where any new minister can say "I will answer questions concerning my department only after the date I became minister". That gives the government the opportunity, any time things get a bit hot, to appoint a new minister and close the book. If it is true that by referring the matter to a royal commission, questions cannot be asked, what a wonderful way to put a stop to the asking of questions!

I feel very strongly that it is a matter of privilege in the sense that the capacity of members to do their job is being limited by the position taken by the Solicitor General. Also, I feel very strongly that on the issue itself, namely, should the Solicitor General answer or should he not, it is not for Your Honour to rule, but we should receive a clear statement from the Prime Minister himself. Therefore, if Your Honour finds that we have a prima facie case of privilege, even if it means that you will have to choose between two motions, I offer a motion, the wording of which is slightly different from the one you already have, but it makes the point that I feel gives us a valid question of privilege. Therefore, if Your Honour finds in my favour that we have a valid prima facie case of privilege, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

> That the matter of ministerial responsibility, particularly as it relates to the obligation of ministers to deal with questions concerning their departments prior to the date of their appointment, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that the Prime Minister can appear before that committee and clarify the situation.

I conclude by saying that I have tried to word the motion in something other than a provocative way. I have tried to word it in a way that the government could accept. I am not saying that the Prime Minister must appear before the committee. I am simply saying that he should be given the opportunity to appear before that committee. I am not making any charges in the motion. I am simply raising the whole question of ministerial responsibility which many of us in the House feel needs to be clarified after what happened in the chamber last Friday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I knew some of the points I would be advancing would be contentious, but I did not intend to create such a contentious context so early after my appointment.

I should like to indicate that the interpretation placed on the words I advanced on Friday in reply to the question posed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) indeed is a very extreme one. I was addressing myself to a question which was specific and dealt with evidence presented before a commission. The question which was raised, and to which I replied, dealt specifically with evidence before that commission. In reply, and I quote from page 2511 of Hansard, I referred to the McDonald commission:

● (1442)

It will be my policy to leave the McDonald commission to make its own conclusions on the evidence that is adduced. I will not be commenting on a day by day basis on evidence that may be adduced before that commission on a prior occasion.

Later, as reported on page 2511, I said:

The allegation the hon. member has brought to our attention is, again, a matter that was brought forward in evidence before the McDonald commission. I suggest to the hon. member that he not only rely on his interpretation of a reporter's interpretation of the evidence, but that he read the transcript.

Subsequently at page 2518 I am reported as having said:

I am not going to be led by the opposition to comment on a day to day basis on evidence which is adduced before that commission. It would be usurping the function of the commission if I qualified comments made before it respecting the validity or invalidity of one statement or the other. Surely that is part of the process of the investigation itself.

Then as reported on page 2519 I stated:

—I will not comment, nor will I offer any judgment relating to the value of the evidence or indeed the completeness of it.

That was the narrow point on which I resisted the queries from the other side.

I made it quite clear from the context of my replies that I recognize I will have to present information relating to the administration of previous solicitors general when such questions are put to me. In reply to the hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I did indicate I would analyse each one of the questions put to me as they arise in order to address myself as to whether the information can be provided this House.

What amazes and has preoccupied me, and I say this quite readily, as a result of the comments that were made, is the suggestion that in some way I have a lack of respect for this House. I would invite hon. gentlemen to consider that I have been in this House since 1972, and since coming here I have participated in the debates more I think than most members on this side of the House. I have acted as parliamentary secretary to the government House leader and have honoured this House, its concept, and its procedures. What I advanced on Friday was on a specific point, and I stand by that point. Unfortunately, some interpretation has been made, and I suggest to hon. gentlemen who have spoken that this interpretation is not that which they ought to have drawn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, that is an admission of sorts, but if we on this side of the House must rely on that type of indication of what the minister is going to do in future in respect of questions, this is a pretty sad day, and let me assure the House that we do not intend to accept that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We must look at what the minister said. When speaking on Friday he said, as reported at page 2518 of Hansard in the right hand column:

In terms of my own ministerial responsibilities relating to any actions they commence as of February 1, the date of my appointment.

Taking that statement together with statements which have been read into the record by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), together with the answers given at a press conference held by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) after the House had recessed on Friday—the questions do not appear—there is no doubt at all, or there should be no doubt at all in the mind of anybody in this House or in the country that the minister is going to be as limited as he thinks is essential in saving the face of his government and his Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when answering questions in this House on this issue.

What has happened and what will happen if what the government is attempting to do is sustained? This will, in effect, have drawn a curtain over all the events which took place with regard to the office of the Solicitor General from 1971-72 until the early part of 1978. A curtain will be drawn and so far as this House is concerned none of us will be able to peer behind it. That is the situation as I see it. That would be bad enough in respect of any government which had a reasonably decent record in releasing information, but in respect of this government which has all the characteristics of a group of pack rats so far as hiding information is concerned, that is simply not good enough, Mr. Speaker. I am saying that in a non-parliamentary sense, and I think everyone knows the characteristics of a pack rat which takes little pieces of useful information and goods and hides them away.

I would urge you, Mr. Speaker, in the pursuance of the duties of your high office, to bear this in mind. This is more than just a simple procedural point. This goes to the fundamental root and issue of parliamentary government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: It should be considered not simply as just a local issue, but as what would happen, for example, not only in the House but in committees, if we were to be limited in the extent to which we could pursue issues and ask questions. What would happen in this regard not only in respect of the Solicitor General's Department but in respect of other departments? If this is a precedent the government can get away with, how far will it go and how many ministers will be changed?

I have been told that over a period of the last few years there have been 150 ministerial changes. The Prime Minister has taken to heart what was described as being the attitude of a former prime minister of the United Kingdom, "Greater love hath no prime minister than he lay down his friends for his life."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: That is a model apparently followed by this Prime Minister.

In passing, I too support the very serious proposition put before the House and Your Honour who, of course, has the primary responsibility.

This House probably has three very important functions. The first is the handling of money, and it is common knowledge that has been taken away from us. Maybe some of the wounds have been self-inflicted, but there is no question, if one reads what the Auditor General has said, and not just the present Auditor General, this House has lost the capacity to hold the government responsible for the expenditure of money.

Secondly, the House has a function with regard to federal-provincial issues which has been taken over by federal-provincial conferences.

Finally, however, this House has the right to hold the government accountable. We have heard a lot of talk about ministerial responsibility. This government has a very flexible attitude toward ministerial responsibility. It used these words in a green paper in respect of legislation on public access to government documents issued by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) in June of last year. It used the defects of ministerial responsibility to indicate it did not intend to be very forthcoming with regard to piercing the screen around government information. The government said this in that green paper:

> It is the consciousness of the public interest which has led to the parliamentary traditions of ministerial responsibility—

Later it stated:

> The corollary to this privacy of decision has been the insistence on ministerial responsibility. If advisers are to remain anonymous and protected, those who take decisions must bear the brunt of public scrutiny and public responsibility.

How does that jibe with what the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) is trying to do and the extent to which he is trying to escape responsibility on behalf of the government in having to answer for what has happened in his department?

Again at page 4 of that same green paper the following is stated:

> Ministerial responsibility implies, very simply, the answerability of ministers to parliament for the actions taken by them or by public servants responsible to them.

Surely the word "minister" there as used must have some measure of extension. If it is possible for the government or the Prime Minister to take one minister out of his office and put him someplace in the back benches, does that not mean, as far as this House is concerned, we are denied the opportunity to conduct the kind of cross-examination and questioning which is essential if there is to be some remnant of public accountability in this parliament?

● (1452)

I think that is the issue, and on that issue I would urge you, Mr. Speaker, very strongly indeed, not to take the sole responsibility. I know that you must find a prima facie case. I suggest that on an issue of this kind which so deeply affects this parliament, this House of Commons, you should be diligent to find a way by which you could let this matter go before a committee so that in coming to a final decision you will have the benefit of suggestions of the members of the House who are most intimately affected by what would be the result if this motion were denied.

Dealing with ministerial responsibility for a moment before I subside to allow the Prime Minister or somebody on the other side to answer, if they have an answer, let me say that just last year the Hon. Frank Walker, attorney general for New South Wales, a distinguished parliamentarian who holds ministerial office, and who held it at the time he made the statement, had this to say about it:

> According to the theory of individual ministerial responsibility for example, the minister is responsible for every act done in his department. On this basis, administrative accountability would seem to lie in parliamentary scrutiny of the executive—
> The fact is, of course, that parliamentary disapproval of a minister's conduct, whether in his personal or vicarious capacity, will bring him to account only if he has lost the confidence of his party. In other words, in terms of the use of the sanctions of accountability it is to his party colleagues, holding a majority in the House, that he is "responsible".

We all know that to be the case. Under the rules which prevail in the House, and with our limited capacity to ask questions in the House and in committees, if the minister does not want to answer, he does not need to answer. In addition to that, a minister would now have the benefit of not having to answer for anything that took place in his department or for actions which were committed by his officials prior to the time he took office, and that would be a very sorry and very serious situation. I suggest on this issue, Mr. Speaker, you should be very diligent to seek ways by which the House can advise you. Under those circumstances the motions put forward by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should be allowed to proceed to committee.

It is not just on this particular issue that we wonder what may happen in the future. Will we be denied what is the one, main opportunity which this House has to question ministers and to hold the government accountable if the proposition put forward on behalf of the government by the Solicitor General is given effect.

I noticed just today that the former aide to Mr. Nixon, Mr. H. R. Haldeman, has put out his book in which, on the question of concealing information, he makes the disclosure that the 18½-minute erasure on one of the White House tape recordings was done by Mr. Nixon and not by his secretary, Rosemary Woods. What we are seeing here is the application of the same principle. By moving ministers under that system of flexibility of ministerial responsibility which this government seems to have accepted, the ministers will be put in the position of denying us the opportunity to hold the government accountable on this issue as well as on other issues.

In the case of the Berger royal commission the House was not deprived of the opportunity to question government ministers with regard to the voluminous issues which were involved. Now the government, for reasons best known to itself, is very sensitive on this particular matter and is taking a position, which is to take away from members of the House the opportunity to look at the events of 1972, 1973 and 1974 in the office of the Department of the Solicitor General. If that is to be the case, it will be a grave injustice to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): I would add only a few comments, Mr. Speaker.

It is clear that we cannot accept the attitude of a minister who tries to shirk his responsibilities. In the House of Commons the opposition enjoys the acknowledged privilege to question the government about its administration and to see whether it is now trying to hide behind its responsibilities through royal inquiry commissions. We cannot endorse this kind of policy.

We certainly support the Leader of the Opposition in his motion to refer the whole matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, but there is a point I want to emphasize. A lot of questions on various subjects have been asked in this House before now and we already had several examples of the same kind with the solicitors general who came before the present Solicitor General. Even if it is our right to ask questions, it often happens that the answers are only half-truths.

I think that if we refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, we should also find some way of compelling ministers to answer our questions honestly.

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it might be of some assistance if I could direct Your Honour's attention to the questions that were asked on Friday and the reasons given for not providing answers to those questions.

If you will recall, sir, the questions dealt, first of all, with the information that had been provided at the ministerial level by the RCMP to the minister in respect of mail opening and thereby the statements that we have received. Next, they dealt with the question of whether the Privy Council office, not the RCMP, had initiated steps against a legally constituted political party in Canada, the Parti Québécois, and what evidence the Privy Council had to initiate those steps. I think those are both serious and important questions, neither of which deals directly with the RCMP security service. Clearly they deal with the question of ministerial responsibility, and surely that is the distinction that we must make in these kinds of questions.

I am sympathetic when the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) says, "Do not comment on the quality of the evidence before the commission". All of us who have practised law are aware of the fact that we must not try to prejudice, if possible, matters before a court. But when those questions are specifically directed to ministers of the Crown in regard to their carrying out of their responsibilities, I submit they are clearly in order, and I submit that the refusal to answer is a violation of the privileges of every member of the House.

I am sensitive, of course, to the rules in Beauchesne which indicate that a minister is not obliged to answer a question in the House. But I would like to refer you to page 154, fourth edition, where Beauchesne says the following:

> An answer to a question cannot be insisted upon, if the answer be refused by the minister on the ground of the public interest;

The question comes back to this: what is the public interest? I have not heard the issue of the public interest specifically raised by the minister as a defence for not answering these questions. Surely the public interest is that the inquiry not be prejudiced, and I can understand that kind of argument, but there is an overriding public interest that responsible questions to responsible ministers about their responsibilities in carrying out their functions must be permitted and, if they are not answered, the government has to pay the political cost of that kind of stonewalling.

To get back to the initial point, let me state that the questions did not deal with the RCMP; they dealt with the minister's responsibilities.

● (1502)

I am going to quote two parts of the terms of reference under which the McDonald inquiry is operating. Subsection (a) reads in part as follows:

> —to inquire into the relevant policies and procedures that govern the activities of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to protect the security of Canada;

Subsection (c) also deals with the policies and procedures governing the activities of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to protect the security of Canada. The McDonald commission is not an inquiry into the conduct of this government or of its ministers. That is the job of this House, not the job of the royal commission, and I do not expect the royal commission to conduct that kind of inquiry. I agree that the terms of reference could be broad enough for the inquiry to look at some aspects of that, but the fundamental duty of members of parliament is to continue to ask these questions. We are not represented as political parties before that inquiry in any way. We are unable to ask questions in our own committees, and now we are being told that we cannot ask questions in this place if they apply to evidence.

I would like to refer again to questions asked and answers given on Friday. I must say that the award you recently received, Mr. Speaker, should really have been given to the Solicitor General because he has been skating around like you would not believe.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) asked a question to follow up some questions I asked concerning whether the minister was going to advise himself. The hon. member said this:

> Obviously, it is our responsibility to ask the minister these questions so that we can receive the truth in this House. Will the Solicitor General reconsider the rather inflexible attitude which he has just displayed, so that we can ask him these questions in the House about this important matter and not have to rely on what is happening in a judicial inquiry?

The Solicitor General answerd simply, "No, Mr. Speaker". The answer he gave today sounded like a "maybe" or perhaps even a "yes". I am not sure. Perhaps the Solicitor General would like to clarify one of his answers.

Provided we do not refer to information as being evidence before the Royal Commission, can we now expect to have answers to questions we ask about matters which concern ministerial responsibility? Is that what the minister is telling the House today? If that is the case, I will be sure not to use the word "evidence" in any of the questions I ask the Solicitor General. Hon. members can see the ridiculous position the government has been put into by the Solicitor General. There is a genuine question of privilege here. It goes to the root of the way we conduct our affairs in this country, and I would like to support both of the motions because I think they are excellent.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members, I certainly want to look at the minister's very carefully worded statement. I am sure the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has been working hard on the statement—or perhaps others have been working on it over the week end on his behalf—which he gave a short time ago. It may well be that the minister's words indicate a withdrawal and a recantation, which would make the retreat from Moscow look like an air-conditioned bus ride. I am not sure, but we must take a look at it.

However, when the minister stands in this House today and says it is his desire that we take a very narrow interpretation of what he said on Friday, I think we should look again at just exactly what he did say on Friday outside the House. Any hon. member, presuming he is literate, can look in Hansard at what was said in the House. However, just after the exchange in this House on Friday the brand new, heavy-handed, ham-acting Solicitor General went down to the television room below us and there in his few statements to the media the minister gave an impression which was completely contrary to the impression he gave in the House today.

I want to quote from the transcript of what was said in front of the television cameras and the radio microphones in this building on Friday afternoon. The Solicitor General said the following:

I am responsible in the House of Commons to inform the House of the conduct of previous solicitors general, but when the alleged conduct, or questions relating to their administration, is before a royal commission or commission of inquiry, surely I am not going to surpercede that commission of inquiry which was appointed by the government at the request of the opposition in the House by bringing forward information in the House that ought to be submitted to the McDonald inquiry.

I do not know how the minister could be more definite than that. A little later the following question was asked:

Anything done wrong in the last seven years is something the McDonald commission, in my definition, will be looking at.

The Solicitor General gave the following answer:

That is exactly what they are looking at.

The next question was, and I quote:

Then you cannot answer any questions about it?

[Mr. Leggatt.]

The Solicitor General replied:

Well, I cannot answer questions relating to matters that come before the commission, or that the commission is presently dealing with. Yes, that is so.

The next question was the following:

Therefore, no questions in the House of Commons will be entertained that deal with RCMP wrongdoings in the past?

The minister answered:

If the matter has been referred to the commission, no.

The minister later said:

Once the commission has made a report, the opposition will be free to debate fully the terms of that report or whatever matter the House is seized of.

This is too important a matter of principle to be sloughed off by a man having that kind of dangerous concept of the responsibility and accountability of a minister of the Crown to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: In my submission this important matter should be sent promptly to a standing committee, it is to be hoped the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that the matter can be fully determined. It is too important a matter to be sloughed off by the Solicitor General in the way he has attempted to do this afternoon.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, both motions which are before the House have the same objective—to find out the government's position on the question of ministerial responsibility and, in particular, to establish my position on the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. I regret that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) did not ask me that question at the beginning of the question period. I would have given a very simple answer. The hon. gentleman's question could have been followed by supplementary questions, but we could hopefully have dispensed with the last hour or more of argument by the opposition to the effect that ministerial responsibility should be defined in a certain way.

This government agrees with the opposition. As far as we are concerned, there is no debate. Of course the government has to answer for acts committed under its administration. The government as a whole is responsible for things which happen or things which do not happen during its terms of office. A change of cabinet ministers from time to time does not allow the government to escape the duty and obligation of answering for its administration. This is the government's policy; this is the government's belief; this is the government's practice, and this is what the opposition has been arguing—with which we agree. There is no argument, Mr. Speaker. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has to answer not only for his administration in the period during which he will be Solicitor General but he will answer for acts committed or not committed during the period in which this government has held office. This is very clearly our position. That is what I stated—

● (1512)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the opposition would like us to take another position because that would justify their verbiage in the past hour and ten minutes. I was asked this question at a press conference in British Columbia on Friday afternoon. I gave the answer which hon. members are arguing should be the government's answer.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wants me to come before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to find out what I think and so that I can clarify the situation. I would have clarified it at two o'clock if the opposition had not wanted to drag a red herring across the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I stand up now because I see other members of the opposition trying to catch your Honour's eye to carry on the debate. I think it is too bad that we have lost the question period once again as it might have settled this matter.

An hon. Member: We have not lost it.

Mr. Trudeau: That is true. According to Your Honour's ruling, the question period will take place after this matter has been debated. But some members of the government have other business and will have to leave.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Surely any reasonable person in the public would understand that it is not necessary for 20 or 25 ministers to be present—

An hon. Member: Thirty-four.

Mr. Clark: You cannot count them either.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition is so good at numbers he should count them and see if he can reach the number 34. There are not 34 ministers in the ministry and there are not 34 ministers in the House, any more than there are 34 in the front benches of the opposition!

I hope I made the position of the government very clear a moment ago as I think I made it very clear in answering a question from the press on Friday.

The opposition is reading from Hansard and is trying to get the Solicitor General in the position where he would have said something that he did not say. I suggest that the question is very clear on page 2511 of Hansard. The question put by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Solicitor General to clarify his last answer. Is it his position that he will not be informing himself of anything that has occurred previously in his department, in order to advise this House concerning the political responsibility of the government? Is that precisely what the minister is telling the opposition today?

The Solicitor General answered:

Of course not, Mr. Speaker.

The opposition has been repeating for the past hour that the Solicitor General took a position in this House last week; he was asked specifically if that was his position, and he said, "No, Mr. Speaker." It is very clear that is not his position, that is not my position, and it is not the position of the government; so what is the argument all about, Mr. Speaker?

The argument arises because the Solicitor General—quite properly in my view—did not want to put himself in the position of having a day to day running commentary on the judgments of the royal commission on the testimony of witnesses before that commission and on the interpretation of the credibility or otherwise of those witnesses. Surely this is a tenable position.

If the government had not set up a royal commission I am quite sure we would, to this day, be hearing from the opposition that we should set up a royal commission, that the government cannot discharge its duties simply by answering questions in this House of Commons, that the government has a majority in the House of Commons and it will have a majority on any committee investigating this, and that therefore it cannot be trusted to have an inquiry and report on the past deeds or misdeeds of the RCMP. This was the position of the opposition. It was their position not only on the RCMP, it was their position before, whether we were talking about Hamilton Harbour, Sky Shops or anything else.

What happens now? We say that the opposition is right in this particular case, that we should set up a royal commission of inquiry. We set it up so that the opposition and the country will be sure it is not the government investigating itself and controlling that investigation with its majority. But what do we hear, particularly from the Leader of the Opposition, however? We hear that this royal commission is an emanation of the executive—those are his words—therefore implying it cannot be trusted. It is set up by the executive, it is named by the executive, the staff is instructed by the executive, and so on. Why, then, have they been asking us for so many years to set up royal commissions of inquiry if they are going to argue now that they cannot trust this royal commission? What is the point of asking for a royal commission if, in contempt of that royal commission, you attempt to discredit it?

I find it somewhat distressing and perhaps even shameful that the commentary from the opposition parties these past several months has led to the clear conclusion that one can and should trust the Keable commission in Quebec—that they are doing a good job—

Mr. Clark: Another red herring!

Mr. Trudeau: That the commission was set up by the government of Quebec, that it appointed a lawyer who was a former candidate of the Parti Québécois is completely irrelevant—it is a royal commission and therefore its proceedings should be watched with great respect, but the royal commission set up by this government headed by a Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario—of Alberta, associated—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is arguing again that we should not trust this royal commission because it is headed by a judge who at some time in the past was a Liberal candidate. Mr. Speaker, this is a new view of the judiciary and of the role of royal commissions. In that sense we should say that the entire judiciary is an emanation of the executive. After all, judges are named by the executive of the government of the day, whether it be our government or the former government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The judiciary is named by the government of the day, whether the opposition likes this or not. It would be a new theory under our parliamentary system to say that you cannot trust the judiciary or you cannot trust a royal commission because somehow the executive was the source of their nomination.

It seems to me once again that there has been a lot of debate on what the Solicitor General said or did not say. A great deal is made of the fact that he said that before February 1 he would not be responsible for what had happened in the Solicitor General's office.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): First of all, they do not know, and now they are not responsible if they have just assumed office.

● (1522)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, with a minimum of good faith and good will it is very simple to understand the words of the Solicitor General. He is saying that if something wrong was committed by a previous solicitor general—he is an individual, and those are the words he used—he is an individual who is not going to be blamed for a judgment made by a previous solicitor general. In that sense his administration as Solicitor General begins on February 1. If the McDonald commission chooses to find blame for something committed before February 1, the blame will not be upon the present Solicitor General, it will be upon the previous solicitor general.

An hon. Member: Warren, why is your face red?

Mr. Trudeau: There is obviously some disagreement with this, and I will repeat it, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the opposition will then understand. If the royal commission of inquiry finds that some previous solicitor general did something wrong it will not blame the present Solicitor General, who was then the postmaster general; it will say that so-and-so, who was the solicitor general and who committed such an act or admitted to such an act, is to blame. This is very simple.

Of course the government as a whole will be responsible for acts committed during the time of its administration. This point I established at the very beginning of my intervention.

Mr. Fraser: If we find out about them.

Mr. Trudeau: This is the position of the government and of the Solicitor General. Mr. Speaker, if you wish to make a ruling, I can assure you in advance that we will agree to it. But I find no need personally to be brought before a committee of inquiry or a standing committee of the House to state my beliefs and those of this government. I made them very clear a moment ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There were a number of members who were seeking to participate in this discussion prior to the intervention by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I will see as many as is reasonable. However, the matter has been discussed at great length now. I would ask that any other hon. members who wish to participate in the discussion please to have regard to the arguments that were made on Friday and today, all of which have assisted me greatly to this point. I do ask hon. members not to review the same arguments but to let us have the benefit of anything that may not have been brought forward so far.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I feel a little embarrassed today after listening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to think that a man who would put forth such arguments defeated me in three elections.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Very briefly, we would like to know the government's concept of ministerial responsibility. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) said today, as I understood him, that he would treat each case on its merits. On Friday he made it very clear what those merits were. If there was any ambiguity as to what he said in the House, he removed that ambiguity when he spoke to the press. He said:

> Yes, I may answer questions from the opposition so long as those questions relate to matters that are not within the mandate of the individual commissions.

What could be clearer than that, Mr. Speaker?

Miss MacDonald: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Stanfield: Neither he nor the Prime Minister withdrew from that position one iota this afternoon. The Solicitor General also said before the press that there may be situations where certain questions relate to matters that remain in areas of political responsibility, and I think he said "which could be separated" from the terms of reference of the inquiries. I will not take any more time of the House. I think it is as simple as that. The commission has a job, and we have a job in this House. The Solicitor General is trying to prevent us from doing that job.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I never thought that the day would come when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would prove that his mentor was Machiavelli. Over and over again he has praised the manner in which Machiavelli would say one thing today and a different thing tomorrow, and make them coincide!

I presume, in what was supposed to be an alibi, the Prime Minister today has presented a lamentable excuse for the stand taken by the minister on Friday. He trotted forth what he said the other day on one of these trips of his, 90 per cent of which are devoted to praise of the Liberal party and the election of Liberals in the next election. It is not going to be beneficial. The other day he made a joke about Prince Albert, that he would give me assistance by allowing the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to visit Prince Albert. I offered him the opportunity to come to Prince Albert and speak there and if he did, my majority would be more massive than ever before. Anyway, he went on one of these trips, spending the people's money by the thousands.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to insist that all members address themselves only to the procedural matter that is before this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been in this House for some years. I remember very well in 1956 when he had a Speaker with a wonderful record. In a few short days he destroyed it because of the activities of certain ministers of the Crown who endeavoured to lead him along the path that led to the degradation of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not find the right hon. member's last intervention any more tasteful or relevant than the one to which I objected. I have seen to it consistently, as I have just now, that he has an opportunity to participate in a very important discussion, and I am asking him to stay relevant to that discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with great deference to you, I am asking you to allow a debate in this House to take place as it should automatically on a matter so important to the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the Prime Minister say on his little trip? Here is the way it is reported in the Canadian Press, the revised version of today being quite different from what was actually said by the Prime Minister.

> Vernon, B.C. (CP)—Prime Minister Trudeau defended Friday his newly-appointed solicitor general's decision not to answer daily House of Commons questions about RCMP activities.
> In a brief news conference here, Trudeau said he does not believe Jean-Jacques Blais has made a blanket refusal to inform parliament about investigations.

Sir, what the Prime Minister said today is the antithesis of what he said three days ago in Vernon, B.C. If you accept what he said three days ago, you will be accepting a stand taken by the minister from whom I had expected today an apology to parliament, because all of us sometimes say things during the course of debate that, upon looking them over, we conclude we could have done better.

● (1532)

What is his attitude today? Smiling! Laughing! Ministers are turning around, smiling in his direction. You cannot treat parliament that way, I say to the minister. Parliament is entitled to the consideration of the fullest maintenance of parliamentary traditions.

What this government has done, and it has been doing it more and more, is, while multiplying the number of ministers, decreasing the opportunity for answers to be given. The kind of attitude displayed by the minister was apparently in consequence of the viewpoint of government because it was not accepted that he could not have said what he said.

Instead of today endeavouring to defend, instead of facetious casuistry, he should have stood up in the House and said he was wrong. He would have received a tremendous reception. We would be assured that parliament is being maintained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Instead of that, he engaged in simple arguments for the purpose of throwing dust in the face of parliament.

These debates have their use. The Prime Minister won an election by the just society argument. We have not heard of that lately. Is this example of the throttling of parliament at the essence of a just society? We cannot accept the view taken by the Prime Minister, because it is not true. What the minister did was simply carry out a philosophy that the present Prime Minister has imbued his cabinet with, namely, that they are above parliament.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) today quoted a statement made in the British House of Commons by a Liberal leader. When I look at this government and listen to the arguments being advanced today, I think of what Churchill said about an opposition member who wrapped himself in the garments of purity in his endeavour to dissemble what he said. Churchill said, "There, but for the grace of God, goes God". That is the attitude of this government. It cannot be accepted in any way whatsoever.

If you accept that principle, what about setting up a commission on finance? The government has a deficit of approximately $1 billion a year. When I was Prime Minister, the deficit was $750 million, because we assisted the aged and equalized opportunity for the provinces.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Order, says some backbencher.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Setting up a royal commission on finance and then denying parliament the opportunity of asking the government about this deficit would be a grand thing. You could do it in any department. The deficit costs the Canadian people in exchange on the borrowed money approximately $1 billion a year. They could cover all that by setting up a royal commission and say they are not going to answer any questions because a royal commission has been set up. It is a preposterous argument, one that cannot be accepted by parliament.

Today the Prime Minister, with ingenuity but not with much energy, with the realization that he was actually trying to delude the House, put forward the proposition that what he said had not been said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be very brief. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) got to his feet this afternoon and chastized members of the opposition for using all the time but not clarifying the issue. The Prime Minister could have gotten up very early in the proceedings this afternoon, right after the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made his excellent case, and clarified the matter.

When the Prime Minister spoke, rather than clarifying the situation, he made it even more ambiguous. I do not want to waste the time of the House. If the Prime Minister will get up again soon, I am sure he could remove the problem entirely. I want to address myself to what I see as the essential ambiguity in the government's position.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and the Prime Minister have indicated this afternoon that, in their view, there are still some aspects of information pertaining to the royal commission on a continuing basis about which the Solicitor General does not feel obligated to answer questions before the House.

The Solicitor General, ostensibly to clarify his position and partially withdraw it, intimated he would be prepared to consider questions about previous ministers in that portfolio, but would not accept moral responsibility for what went on. He clarified it to that extent.

The Solicitor General indicated, as did the Prime Minister later, that in terms of ongoing testimony before the royal commission, either of them presumably, he did not intend to answer questions in the House. The Prime Minister this afternoon used the word "espoused". He said it was a tenable argument for the Solicitor General to make, that in terms of evidence on a day to day basis before royal commission he did not have to answer questions in the House. With all respect, that does not clarify the situation. It makes it even more ambiguous than before.

The previous position of the government was that it felt responsible from time to time in answering questions about matters that were brought before the royal commission. I refer to an answer given by the Prime Minister a week ago today. I was asking him about certain testimony that appeared before a certain commission which left very important matters in a state of contradiction or irresolution because of positions taken by the previous solicitor general. In the absence of the Solicitor General last Monday, the Prime Minister stated to me in the House:

I will gladly take notice of that question and make sure he provides an answer.

He was saying in the House that he was going to check it out with the solicitor general, whom we subsequently found out had resigned. However, the Prime Minister did take it as an ongoing responsibility for a minister of the Crown, in this case the solicitor general, possibly to answer questions that arose from testimony being given before the Royal Commission. I do not see how ministerial responsibility can be defined in any other sense.

Of course it makes sense not to set up the House of Commons as another judicial body. As a number of members have said, we are not here to do the job of the royal commission. However, we are here to make sure that ministers are honest. We are here to question ambiguities or conflict of testimony given by ministers which might impinge their credibility and the credibility of the government. It is our responsibility to pursue those questions regardless of whether they come before a royal commission.

If the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General want to clarify this and get on to other business, all the Solicitor General has to do is get up and say to the House that he withdraws the comments he made last Friday in the House and that he gives unequivocal assurance that all future questions on this or any other matter will be considered on their merits, with no qualification of the kind he and the Prime Minister gave this afternoon.

• (1542)

Mr. Speaker: I see that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) are seeking the floor. I shall listen to them, after which I believe the Chair will have heard sufficient argument on the matter.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I believe I can add two points to this argument. Before doing so, I would say this: the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) accuses the opposition of wasting an hour this afternoon. Should that be the case, it was the best hour ever wasted if it establishes the supremacy of parliament over the executive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I come, now, to my two points. I am particularly concerned about the first because of the number of hours I spend in standing committee. We on this side submit we have a prima facie case of privilege. I do not think any defence was put up by the Prime Minister with reference to the words used on Friday. They were clear and concise. They were not ambiguous.

As I say, we submit we have a prima facie case of privilege, but if a ruling is made against the opposition today we are caught in those committees because parliament lost the purse strings when the rules were changed allowing the government to move all the estimates to that circus known as the standing committees of the House of Commons where ministers will neither answer questions nor give us information. So Your Honour's ruling is one which will affect all the committees, too; I can almost hear the various chairmen of those committees saying " Well, the Speaker has ruled against you, so you cannot ask those questions." This is an aspect which I sincerely hope Your Honour will bear in mind.

My second point concerns the McDonald commission. Members opposite argue we cannot usurp its jurisdiction. But I would point out that the government has already discredited that commission by its undertaking to bring in a bill legalizing the opening of mail by the RCMP before the commission can even bring in a report. We have asked it to wait, but the government has refused.

Along with those two arguments I incorporate everything else which has been said this afternoon by speakers from this side of the House, and that is quite a lot. The opposition has made out a very good case, and it has done so to save parliament. The hour the Prime Minister talked about as having been wasted will probably go down as the best hour in the history of the opposition.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can confine my remarks to the question before the Chair, that is, whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege which would justify consideration of a motion.

I might say that in all the time I have been here I have never seen a sadder display than that given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today. Time spent defending the rights of parliament and, specifically, the rights of the opposition, is always time well spent. In the last ten years we have spent too much time eroding those rights, to the point at which we are simply a nuisance, as the Prime Minister has described us on more than one occasion, a bunch of nobodies when we are five minutes away from the Hill. I make no apology for participating in this debate if it will have the result of preserving some of the few rights remaining to the opposition.

One of the first observations to be made with regard to the Prime Minister's intervention was that he failed to deal with the real question at issue, namely, the statements made initially by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) in the House—statements which were confirmed by him even more forcefully outside the House. The right hon. gentleman chastised us for taking an hour in which to discuss this matter, one which concerns the rights of the opposition and the rights of all hon. members, yet he himself took almost 25 minutes immediately afterward to intervene in a wishy-washy fashion. That is to be expected of the right hon. gentleman because he does not understand this place. He has no real feeling for parliament. For example, in 1968, when he was minister of justice, the government was defeated on a tax measure by two votes. And those who were there heard the minister of justice, now Prime Minister, say the defeat meant nothing even though the vote was on a tax measure. This was his view, though hundreds of years of tradition demand the resignation of a government in such circumstances. This gives us some insight into the Prime Minister's failure to understand how this place operates.

I wish to comment, now, on the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). If the concept put forward by the Solicitor General last Friday is followed, the ministry can avoid responsibility and take cover simply by playing the game of musical chairs. If that concept were followed to its logical conclusion the entire ministry could escape all responsibility for past actions by adopting the absurd strategy of changing round the whole ministry. The administration would then be able to wipe the slate clean and start afresh. I have never heard of a more ridiculous concept, nor can I find any justification for it in the precedents.

As to whether or not a prima facie case exists, I submit there can be no question that, as Your Honour has ruled on past occasions, the sub judice rule as it applies to the courts does not apply to administrative inquiries and commissions set up by the government. In support of this assertion I could cite May's eighteenth edition, page 328, paragraph 11. If it were necessary to cite a precedent I could refer to the Dorion commission, very embarrassing to the government of the day, set up by the right hon. gentleman's immediate predecessor, and to the Spence inquiry. During each of those inquiries questions were repeatedly raised in this House by members of the opposition, questions which were, in fact, answered by ministers on the government benches.

What the Solicitor General failed to quote from the Hansard of Friday was far more important than what he did quote. Incidentally, the Prime Minister's interpretation of what was said is beyond belief. The Solicitor General asked us to believe we were placing an extremely fine interpretation on his words. He said he was not going to deal with questions concerning evidence given before the commission. Let me read from Hansard what he did say—he did not refer to this in his remarks today. As reported at page 2511 he stated:

> It will be my policy to leave the McDonald commission to make its own conclusions on the evidence that is adduced. I will not be commenting on a day by day basis on evidence that may be adduced before that commission on a prior occasion.

Suppose that evidence gives rise to a question about the conduct of a ministry. Are we precluded, on the basis of the hon. gentleman's theory, from directing questions to ministers and obtaining answers?

On the same page of Hansard in the left hand column the Solicitor General is reported as saying:

> I take my ministerial responsibility very seriously indeed. That ministerial responsibility is dated as of February 1 of this year. What happened prior to that time and prior to the nomination of the previous solicitor general is a matter presently under study by the McDonald commission.

The hon. gentleman did not read that part into the record. Again, on the same page of Hansard, we find a question put to the minister by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), who said:

> Obviously, it is our responsibility to ask the minister these questions so that we can receive the truth in this House.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham asked for the assurance of the minister that he would answer questions relating to evidence adduced, and he received an emphatic no from the Solicitor General.

Privilege—Answers of Solicitor General

As reported at page 2518 of Hansard dated February 3, 1978, the Solicitor General said the following:

> The McDonald inquiry is studying certain issues and matters within very wide terms of reference. It is for that commission to deal with those issues.

I emphasize that comment, Mr. Speaker. He continued by saying in effect that parliament has no right to have its members dealing with those issues as they affect the ministry. The Solicitor General also said:

> Until such time as a report is received from the commission, Mr. Speaker, I will not comment, nor will I offer any judgment relating to the value of the evidence or indeed the completeness of it.

Surely it is within his responsibility as the minister to see that all possible evidence is placed before that commission in order for it to fulfil its terms of reference. These are some of the matters he did not refer to which appear in Hansard for last Friday.

The Solicitor General referred to page 2518 of Hansard by reading the first part of the paragraph which appears in the right hand column. I will conclude that for him. It reads as follows:

> The decision which I have made that I will not reply to questions relating to matters presently before the royal commission which has been set up by this government—at the request of the opposition, Mr. Speaker—

Nothing could be plainer than that. What would be the result, irrespective of whether or not there is a prima facie case before the Chair? What would be the result in terms of the rights of hon. members and the rights of this House? These are questions which the minister could refuse to answer and which we have every right to ask. For instance, we could ask when the Solicitor General was informed of the La Minerve communiqué calling for violent action which was fraudulently and perhaps illegally prepared by the security service—but we would be prohibited from that. We could ask whether there was knowledge on the part of the solicitor general of the day concerning the use of agents provocateurs against left wing groups—but we would be precluded from doing that.

We could ask whether one of the previous solicitors general, the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), was fully briefed on all aspects of the operations involving phone taps which he authorized—but we would be prevented from doing that. We could ask whether the then solicitor general authorized any telephone surveillance of the APLQ and, if so, why did he not bother to fully inform himself about the complete scope of security service operations—but we would be precluded from doing that, if the philosophy of the government is adopted.

We could ask the Solicitor General about his statement indicating that he was not misinformed about operation Cathedral by his director of security, in light of the fact that the director of security knew of Cathedral in mid-October, 1977, and the Solicitor General specifically stated that the mail was not being diverted. He indicated that in his previous portfolio. We could ask him why he misled the House—but that kind of question would be precluded.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

I could continue giving examples of questions we would be prevented from asking if the government's idea of ministerial responsibility were accepted.

The government is attempting to muzzle the opposition further than the restrictive rules now preclude the opposition from performing its function. We have every right to preserve what remains of those rights by adopting the motion which has been put forward by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise to intervene in this discussion this afternoon because I am deeply worried about where parliament is heading. The philosophy which was expounded by the newly appointed Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) on Friday matches dangerously the philosophy which was expounded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on December 9, 1977. At that time, in a press conference, the Prime Minister said the following:

> It is a matter of stating, as a principle, that the particular minister of the day should not have a right to know what the police are doing constantly in their investigative practices, in what they are looking at and what they are looking for, and in the way in which they are doing it.

It is frightening. They are expected not even to have the right to know, so how could they reply to questions from this side? This is a philosophy which undermines the whole principle on which this parliament stands. I am deeply concerned and worried.

It is important for hon. members to understand exactly what is meant by ministerial responsibility. Before dealing with that, I should like to make a comment with respect to questions raised by the opposition on matters before commissions. The notion that the opposition may not ask questions on matters before commissions apparently has no effect on the government.

Mr. Paproski: Or the Prime Minister.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We have learned that the government is planning to introduce legislation relating to the interception of mail, amendments to the Post Office Act, when this matter is before a commission. The government can intervene. Are we to be muzzled and unable to comment on that legislation when it comes before the House? Is that what this ruling will mean?

Returning to the meaning of ministerial responsibility, I wonder if all members understand clearly the basis on which it rests and the importance it is to parliament. To all students of parliamentary government, and until now to most practitioners, the principle of ministerial responsibility is considered to be absolutely basic to the form of parliamentary democracy which we have come to know in Canada and by which Canadians have agreed to be governed. I thought this principle was so deeply imbedded in our traditions that it was indisputably integrated into our parliamentary system and it would never be questioned. I appear to have been wrong. It has been questioned by the Prime Minister, as well as by the Solicitor General.

I should like to refer to what was said by Professor Finer, a British scholar and a student of parliament and its institutions, in an article which was published in "Public Administration" in the winter of 1956. It reads:

> Ministers are expected to explain and defend the exercise of their powers and duties in parliament.

Later in the same article, it continues:

> Each minister has a positive duty to answer to the House for the matters with which he, specifically, is charged.

In his opening remarks to that article, Professor Finer paid tribute to another great scholar, Sir Ivor Jennings. He quoted from the Jennings classic in the area of "Law and the Constitution" as follows:

> Each minister is responsible to parliament for the conduct of his department. The act of every civil servant is by convention regarded as the act of his minister.

Not only observers and analysts of the political scene hold this view, but practitioners have voiced it also. In 1954 Herbert Morrison said in the British House of Commons:

> There can be no question whatever that ministers are responsible for everything that their officers do.

He went on by indicating the following:

> The minister is responsible for every stamp stuck on an envelope.

Not only did he say that in the British House of Commons, but it was repeated in his book entitled "Government and Parliament" which was published in April, 1954. It reads as follows:

> If a mistake is made in a government department the minister is responsible even if he knew nothing about it until, for example, a letter of complaint is received from an MP or there is criticism in the press, or a question is put down for answer in the House; even if he has no real personal responsibility whatever, the minister is still held responsible.

This is fundamental. Herbert Morrison went on to say the following:

> Somebody must be held responsible to parliament and the public. It has to be the minister, for it is he, and neither parliament nor the public, who has official control over his civil servants. One of the fundamentals of our system of government is that some minister of the Crown is responsible to parliament, and through parliament to the public, for every act of the executive. This is a cornerstone of our system of parliamentary government.

One might say that the foregoing refers to the British House of Commons, but it is worth recalling that the institutions developed there over the centuries were transferred to this House. We have benefited from them. We have adapted and adopted them. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that aside from the establishment of responsible government in the colony of Nova Scotia in 1848, we find these institutions were transplanted to Canada as well.

● (1602)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but he is making arguments that are well known and well documented in parliament. I hope perhaps he can be persuaded to summarize his argument in the belief that I have no difference of opinion with him in respect of theories on ministerial responsibility. I hope to set his fears aside, perhaps very soon, so perhaps he could summarize.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am glad you have no differences, Mr. Speaker, but the government does. This government does not understand what ministerial responsibility is all about, and if I have to be professorial about it I think it is time somebody read these precedents into the record so this government knows the dangerous course into which it is leading this parliament and the country.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the introduction to the British North America Act which was agreed upon by Canadians before the text was written in this country, passed by the British parliament, reads as follows in part:

> —the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

I think it is worth underlining those words, "with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom". This means that the constitutional monarchy, the cabinet exercising authority in the name of the Crown, but responsible for its performance to parliament, properly elected, is part of our tradition. That is, the government exercising authority in the name of the Crown is responsible for its performance to parliament properly elected. To me this means, along with sections 12 and 129 of the BNA Act, that not only the forms of governing but also the means of governing were transplanted to Canada at the request of the recipients. Along with all the other things came responsible parliamentary government.

By my reading of these transfers of authorities, we in Canada have inherited and can legally exercise here in this parliament, of which we in the House of Commons are but a part, not only the powers acquired by the British parliament, including those legislated in its own interest by that parliament, but also those still remaining in the royal prerogative. Along with these powers, I suggest, we decided we were prepared to be governed by those British statutes that we do not as a matter of deliberate policy reject.

It is very important, therefore, that the responsibility aspect of the British tradition, developed in the British parliament and transferred to this parliament, should in no way be eroded. I have cited one instance this afternoon, of the manner in which it was being eroded, in the words of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). We heard on Friday another statement which rejected completely the notion that a minister of the Crown would be answerable to this House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that on the strength of this explanation of what ministerial responsibility is, your decision is vitally important.

The future of parliament, to my way of thinking, Mr. Speaker, is very much at issue here. This is one of the most important discussions I have had the opportunity to listen to since coming to the House first in 1972. It is critical and it is vital. We either go on having parliamentary institutions in this country or we do not, and ministerial responsibility is a part of that. If you remove that cornerstone or pillar, the rest collapses.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Earlier in the day I indicated I would hear this argument before the question period began, obviously because it relates to events that might take place in the question period. That is self-evident. That being the case, it seems very difficult to ask that I should attempt to adjudicate on these complicated matters and, perhaps mistakenly, try to make instant law.

On the other hand, that reasoning is going to persist and it is difficult to launch into the question period without at least attempting to resolve some of the issues that have been raised both Friday and today. The importance of the matter is so fundamental to the operation of parliament that I think it deserves that kind of priority.

I should clarify just briefly the procedure involved. I have received two motions which, to the purists of parliament, of course, would raise some fears that I had taken leave of even the most fundamental knowledge of parliamentary procedure. However, it will be recalled that because this is being put forward as a matter of privilege it is necessary first to persuade the Chair that it is a matter which falls so within the definition of privilege, that it ought to be given that priorized treatment often referred to as a prima facie case of privilege.

However it is to be described, it requires some intervening or preliminary decision by the Chair in acceptance of the subject as having that priority attached to privilege so that all other business should be stopped while this is considered and, therefore, those who raised it be given the opportunity, without notice and without the other constraints that stand in respect of the introduction of a motion, to put a motion forward at that time.

Hence, both motions are quite properly in the possession of the Chair in the form in which they were put forward, because both advance the thesis that if the Chair first decides that the matter should be given that priority of privilege then the motion can be examined on its merits to see if it has any other technical flaws. If both of those conditions are met, presumably the first motion, if it met all other criteria, would be put forward and, therefore, the second motion could not be put. On the other hand, if the first motion fell on some technical ground the second motion could be received, and it is on that basis that I am in possession of two motions at this time.

The whole matter and argument are centered around the theory of ministerial responsibility. This is a very clear doctrine that has been repeated and repeated many times, because it touches the procedures of the House so frequently. The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) raised my own paraphrasing of that repeated definition reported on page 6851 of Hansard. It is simply based on the cornerstone that a minister must have responsibility in the informational sense, and here I make the division which was referred to by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). This refers to the responsibility of a minister, since we have said that we cannot put questions to former ministers in their previous capacity simply because to do so would mean that the responsibility of the present incumbent would only go back to the date of his appointment.

We hold to the theory as being very fundamental to parliamentary practice, that the responsibility to this parliament in the informational sense, and I hope this is not a misleading term, goes back for all time. I do not need a standing committee of this House to undertake some kind of study to reaffirm that proposition. In deciding the ambit of responsibility of a minister to whom questions can be directed in this House, we have decided that such responsibility goes back for all time in that portfolio.

• (1612)

Now, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby referred to another aspect of ministerial responsibility, to moral responsibility. I believe that was the term he used. It is obvious that the direct administrative responsibility to parliament of any minister for the department cannot go back prior to the date of his appointment. I think that is fundamental as well. If it turns out that the evidence discloses that a civil servant in that department has been somehow misinformed or has been guilty of misconduct for which the minister has to direct an apology to parliament, surely the minister cannot be called on to resign. However, if it is during the period of time when that minister has been in office, then either the civil servant is fired or the minister resigns—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker:— which is the administrative aspect—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: —perhaps instead of saying fired I should have said disciplined. I do not want to make instant law, but the point is that again I say I do not need a standing committee of the House to undertake a study and report back to me on this issue. If the House takes any comfort in that definition, I am trying to make it as clear as I possibly can.

If the minister says that his responsibility goes back to the date of his appointment, he may be correct in referring to some direct responsibility so far as defalcations in the department are concerned, but he is incorrect if he is referring to the informational responsibility to receive questions in the House in connection with that particular department. I hope that that is clear now.

Now I do want to clear up another matter because it was referred to at some length by both the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). In attempting to involve the Chair in this problem I believe we must make a very clear division. It should be remembered that what was being discussed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) last Friday has a certain obvious limitation. On Friday the Solicitor General could speak only about what position he might take in answering questions. That does not in any way transfer to the Chair the responsibility to provide an opportunity to put questions, which is quite a different thing. It is for the Chair to decide whether the questions that are put are proper questions. What happens when they are put is another area with which I will deal in a moment.

I have already made known my views on the sub judice matters. As hon. members who have taken the trouble to read the report of the Special Committee on Rights and Immunities will know, I take a very narrow view of the whole question, and if it is to be used as a defence in answering a question, it seems to me that it is the minister who seeks to invoke that defence for not answering a question who should be able to justify it. Rare would be the occasion in my tenure of this Chair that I would ever intervene to prevent a question on that ground, because I do not see a situation in which the Chair would be in possession of specific information which would justify that decision. That seems to me to be something which rests entirely in the possession of those who are called upon to make an answer, and therefore I would confine it to that ground.

So we should be clear that we are not talking now about some theory which has to do with the adjudication upon the propriety of questions; we are talking about a theory which has to do with the right of a minister to answer or fail to answer a question, as he sees fit. I believe we must keep that very clear.

Hon. members know, I am sure, that the Chair has no authority to compel an answer for a number of reasons which are well known to all of those who have advanced arguments, not the least of which is the very practical consideration that, if there were such an obligation, I do not know how anybody could judge when the obligation had been fulfilled. I suppose the Chair would have to decide, when a minister rises and says, "I refuse to answer that question", that that probably constitutes an answer within those kinds of rules. So there can be no obligation to provide an answer.

That raises again the very interesting academic position, namely, if there is no obligation upon the minister to answer a question, what difference does it make upon what grounds he chooses to refuse? Since the minister can refuse to answer without grounds, why should the Chair try to make a decision as to whether or not any grounds put forward by the minister for refusing to answer a question were proper grounds? In any case, regardless of whether the grounds are proper or improper, the Chair does not have the authority to compel the minister to answer. These considerations must be taken into account.

In the final analysis, the most serious practical difficulty we have to face is the matter of the executive accountability to parliament. We are dealing with a matter which is fundamental to the whole question period, and the question period, as I have said publicly many times, is a source of great pride to the Canadian parliament. In my opinion the question period here is a session of daily accountability, which is an absolutely paramount feature of the Canadian parliamentary life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Fundamental to the Canadian question period—which, I take it, is an example to be held up to all the legislative bodies around the world—is the matter of the responsibility of the executive to be accountable to parliament in this daily session. As hon. members will realize, that cannot be judged in the procedural sense; it is judged in the political sense, and in the final analysis that is the ultimate sanction of everybody who has the honour of representing his constituents in the chamber. Therefore, in the final analysis, the Chair is not in a position to compel an answer—it is public opinion which compels an answer. However, that does not diminish the importance of this exercise and the importance of the theory of ministerial responsibility, which makes the question period work on a daily basis in the Canadian parliament. Therefore, we are dealing with something which is fundamental to the most important aspect of our Canadian parliamentary system.

On the other hand, both motions that have been put forward call upon the Chair to interpret what the minister said was going to be his future intention in handling questions. In fact, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), whose question has given rise to all of this, said, the minister's comments on Friday were a definite "no"; his comments today were perhaps "maybe" or even "yes". The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said we could have avoided all of this perhaps if it had been made clear by the Solicitor General at two o'clock that if he gave a certain impression which alarmed the House on Friday, it was not intentional and he proposed to proceed today to answer questions and to receive each one on its merits.

I only raise all of this because in both motions what is really being asked is that I rule in such a way as to let the House send this matter to the committee for the committee to decide what the Solicitor General is going to do and how he will handle questions. Surely that matter need not go to the committee. The way for the House to find out what the Solicitor General is going to do in response to questions is to proceed to the question period and ask him questions. On the other hand, I think it would be disrespectful of a very serious argument and of the very serious position put forward by the opposition which is fundamental, simply to push these motions aside.

I think I have exposed the difficulty and I hope I have made my thinking as clear as possible on decisions on which I really do not need any help from the standing committee. Therefore, I think the appropriate action for me to take would be to reserve my judgment on both these motions, not for one day but for several days, because I think I can be aided in my deliberations by determining, in the manner in which I described, exactly what the intentions of the minister are and what will be the reality. Therefore, I propose to set these motions aside for a few days and see what happens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

McDONALD INQUIRY—ALLEGED DISCREPANCY BETWEEN EVIDENCE ADDUCED AND STATEMENT OF EX-SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. I wonder if the minister can explain the obvious discrepancy between the evidence adduced before the McDonald commission through the witness, former commissioner Higgitt, which would indicate that one of the Solicitor General's predecessors, now Minister of Supply and Services, was aware of the APLQ break-in in 1972, and the statement of that minister which indicated that he was not aware of the incident until 1976. Will the Solicitor General explain that discrepancy?

● (1622)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a statement made in this House by my predecessor, the present Minister of Supply and Services, who gave a very explicit explanation in which he denied any knowledge. The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes alluded to that statement in his own statement in this House, and indicated the circumstances as well. In making his statement, the present Minister of Supply and Services indicated that he was making it as though under oath. I accept the statement he made with reference to the evidence which has been given to the inquiry by former commissioner Higgitt. I suggest we wait and see what other evidence may be adduced before that commission, before making any comment. I hope the hon. member will be patient enough to wait until all the evidence is in, so that proper conclusions can be made.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is asking for a considerable amount of patience. Did the previous solicitor general, the present Minister of Supply and Services, authorize any telephone surveillance of the APLQ and, if so, can the Solicitor General explain why his predecessor did not fully inform himself at that time of the complete scope of security operations which were being directed against the APLQ?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, again I refer the hon. gentleman to the statement, which was made on a question of privilege, of the Minister of Supply and Services with reference to the other aspect of the question, I wish to reserve. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will choose to ask that question again at some future time.

Mr. Jarvis: The Solicitor General is well aware, as are all hon. members, that we cannot ask former ministers questions, and we cannot be represented before the McDonald commission because counsel for the minister's predecessor argued against that—unfortunately, successfully. However, is it the policy of the present Solicitor General to continue the policy of his predecessor, whereby before the standing committee studying estimates officials of the department were not allowed to answer questions put to them by members of the committee with regard to the dates upon which certain officials and ministers were informed of certain events? Is that a continuing policy of the present Solicitor General?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I will have to look at the record, consider what the hon. gentleman is advancing and perhaps provide him with additional comment at some future time.

McDONALD INQUIRY—ACTION TAKEN RESULTING IN ARREST OF RED ARMY TERRORIST

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary question I would like to test the Prime Minister with regard to the bona fides of asking and answering questions in the House. At a press conference on November 18, the Prime Minister said that the mail opening activity of the security service resulted in the arrest of a Red Army terrorist. In view of contradictory testimony to the royal commission last week, which indicated that a wiretap, not a mail opening, resulted in the arrest of this Red Army terrorist, can the Prime Minister now revise his statement to coincide with the testimony provided by Staff Sergeant James Pollock?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that that testimony covers some 30 pages: I believe the Solicitor General indicated that in his answer on Friday. I have not read the 30 pages, and I was not present at the royal commission, but I am informed that the purport and intent of the testimony was that the mail opening was very fundamental and necessary.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members opposite have probably read the press reports, but I enjoin them, as the Solicitor General enjoined them on Friday, to read the 30 pages and reach their own conclusions. I have not read them. I have been informed that the testimony of the witness was to the effect that if the police had known at the time that they could get information of future value from other sources, they perhaps would not have opened mail. However, when you are conducting an investigation, you do not know what further evidence you might get in the future.

Mr. Woolliams: There was no evidence as a result of opening mail.

Mr. Trudeau: I am told that that is the conclusion of the witness but, unfortunately, that is not the impression which was created in the reporting of that testimony. I will gladly continue to attempt to elucidate on such questions and so will the Solicitor General, but if we are called upon, on a day to day basis, to comment on the credibility of witnesses, I think it will be obvious to the Chair that we will be engaging in an operation which will be completely unproductive.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am told that in the small portion of Staff Sergeant James Pollock's testimony with regard to Red Army terrorist activity there is no question whatsoever about the interpretation.

An hon. Member: You are told. Have you read it?

Mr. Lawrence: The Prime Minister was obviously wrong in what he said at his press conference on November 18. Who misinformed the Prime Minister? Was the former solicitor general involved in briefing the Prime Minister on this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is admitting that he has not read the 30 pages of testimony. I suggest he do so; then he can make a judgment as to whether that testimony corresponds with, or denies, what I said at a press conference in the month of November. If he still believes what he has said today, I would like him to make that quite clear tomorrow by using quotations from the witness, and not from the press.

Mr. Lawrence: Was the former solicitor general involved in briefing the Prime Minister on this matter, or not? "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the former solicitor general and, indeed, the commissioner of the RCMP, gave me this as an example of the usefulness of mail opening.

ACTION TAKEN RESULTING IN ARREST OF RED ARMY TERRORIST—STATEMENT OF FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in this House, on November 15, the former solicitor general, when citing illegal acts, made reference to the opening of mail but he did not say it was related to the apprehension of this particular terrorist. He was very categorical and I would like to quote what he said:

> Through the mail opening devices which have been described in parliament, the RCMP obtained access to it. As a result of this interception they were able to identify someone who was a member of the Japanese Red Army. He was arrested at the border and deported to Japan.

In a direct voice clip on radio, I heard the constable in question making it clear that the letter opening had absolutely nothing to do in a direct way with the apprehension of this Japanese Red Army member. I would like the Prime Minister to assure the House that he will check with the present Solicitor General as to the basis for this categorical assertion made by the minister's predecessor.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noted the words of the leader of the New Democratic Party to the effect that the witness said that the letter opening had absolutely nothing to do with the apprehension of the terrorist.

Mr. Broadbent: In a direct way.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. gentleman now says, "In a direct way". I am not sure: if it had absolutely nothing to do with the apprehension of the terrorist, obviously I was misled by the commissioner who reported on this.

Mr. Clark: Or the former solicitor general.

Mr. Trudeau: Or the former solicitor general who got the information from the commissioner.

Mr. Clark: Blame the commissioner.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not blaming anyone. I was asked by a member of the Leader of the Opposition's own party who had given me this information, and I told him it was the commissioner. I submit today that the commissioner took that position, and I repeat: my information is that it was confirmed by the testimony of the witness, and not inferred, that the interception of the letter was the first clear link established between the terrorist and the Toronto resident.

• (1632)

I submit that the Leader of the New Democratic Party had better not only hear an excerpt of the testimony, but I enjoin him to read the 30 pages and see if he can stand on his feet tomorrow and reassert his accusation, which I submit is false, to the effect that the letter opening had absolutely nothing to do with the apprehension. If he can make that statement tomorrow, then indeed we will have the question of a witness contradicting what the commissioner has said, and probably will say if he is brought before the royal commission of inquiry. Then what will the House do, Mr. Speaker? Will it ask the government to try and arbitrate between the testimony of the commissioner and that of the witness? Obviously, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Your light is off.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that the Prime Minister has admitted in the House that he has not read the 30 pages—

Mr. Trudeau: Nor have you.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that he has admitted that he has not read them, I find it a little surprising that he makes the categorical assertion that what he says now is the case. Considering that, at least, the excerpt I heard from the man giving the testimony clearly indicated that the apprehension of the terrorist was obtained by a legal wiretap—the obtaining of necessary information—and that the letter opening was not connected with it, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, and we can both read the testimony in the interim, if he will check, before the House sits tomorrow, to find out if there was a direct connection between the letter opening and the apprehension. Or was it merely a legal wiretap, within the framework of the law, that led to this apprehension?

If so, will he admit that the government's intention to bring in legislation which will permit the legal opening of mail is totally without foundation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party suggests that I made a categorical assertion. I did not. I indicated that I had been briefed on the testimony, that my briefing indicated quite clearly that the witness did not say that the mail opening was irrelevant and unimportant and that it did not lead to the apprehension of the terrorists. That is what I have been told by those who have analysed the briefing. They went on to say that the media reports are completely contrary to that.

Mr. Speaker, I stand on that: I stand on the information I have received. All I ask the opposition to do is to have the decency and the honesty to read the testimony themselves before they make this categorical assertion.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I say seriously, but with respect, that just as the Prime Minister is briefed by officials he assumes to be reliable, so are we on this side of the House. We both have some things to confirm before tomorrow.

Referring back to the question of ministerial responsibility that we were discussing earlier today, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, when he does the checking, he will do it with specific reference to the statement of the former solicitor general as reported at the bottom of page 884 of Hansard, where he said:

As a result of this interception they were able to identify someone who was a member of the Japanese Red Army. He was arrested at the border—

That is a categorical link between the interception and the arrest. If, when the Prime Minister checks the record, he finds out there is a clear contradiction between what the RCMP officer said and this kind of assertion, will he find out whether the minister deliberately misinformed him—in which case, would he tell the House—or will he ascertain if it was an official within the minister's department who misinformed the minister? If so, will he ensure that disciplinary action is taken with regard to that official?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have already informed the House of that in answer to the question from the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. I said quite clearly in the House that I had received this information from the commissioner. The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux Montagnes, the former solicitor general, presumably received it from the commissioner, too. It was stated to me by the commissioner in my office.

I think this whole series of questions, Mr. Speaker, proves the wisdom of the Solicitor General when he said we should not engage in a running commentary on the testimony before the royal commission. If the opposition is right in its interpretation of the testimony, and we will see after we read it—

An hon. Member: You will resign.

Mr. Trudeau: —who are we supposed to discipline: the commissioner, or the witness? Obviously, if they are right there is a contradiction between the two. Who are we to discipline? I ask the opposition to give me the answer to that question, Mr. Speaker. Or should we wait for the royal commission of inquiry?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHY OUTAOUAIS NOT DECLARED DESIGNATED AREA

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Answering a question put by the hon. member for Témiscamingue on December 14 last, the minister said that he was considering the possibility of declaring the Outaouais region in Quebec a designated area. The conditions having grown worse since then, could the minister tell us what criteria the Outaouais region does not meet to qualify as a designated area?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, when the question was put, I said that we had received representations and that meetings had been held to discuss the economic conditions in the Outaouais region. I then indicated that negotiations were under way with the Quebec government and that I hoped some decisions would be taken for the benefit of the area. Since then, as the hon. member knows, we have concluded an agreement with Quebec dealing with industrial infrastructures and within the next few months the Outaouais area may benefit from some assistance which could perhaps to some extent contribute to give it an economic impetus. As for designating the area, such request was also made to us. I have also received representations from colleagues on this side of the House. That is something I am not prepared to grant at the moment.

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Would the minister tell the House whether or not eastern Ontario municipalities and the National Capital Commission have made pressures within his department so the Outaouais region does not obtain this designation?

Mr. Lessard: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not receive such representations.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

McDONALD INQUIRY—INTENTION OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS ON EVIDENCE ADDUCED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General because of the ambiguity today and the fuzziness of his argument earlier in the afternoon. My question is very simple, and it may clear the muddy waters.

Is the Solicitor General prepared to answer questions put to him by members of the opposition on any matters that may come before, have come before, and could come before the McDonald commission? I refer, for example, to the statement that it was necessary to open mail in connection with the Japanese terrorist, when in fact the evidence this afternoon seems to be that the real meat of the evidence came from an authorized wiretap. Is the Solicitor General prepared to answer such questions whether on the McDonald commission, the Laycraft commission or the Keable commission?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely, the proper way to test that matter is to put one such question, rather than asking again for an interpretation. I say respecfully that the whole import of what I attempted to do earlier this afternoon was to indicate that the way to find this out is to put the questions. I really do not want to invite a renewal of the rather long, though important, argument we had this afternoon. If hon. members have questions and want to find out whether the Solicitor General is going to answer, they should put them.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I shall come to the last part of my question. In light of the argument between the Prime Minister and the leader of the New Democratic Party, will the Solicitor General take it upon himself to clear the air about the evidence in reference to the Japanese terrorist? Was it, in fact, as a result of a legal wiretap, or the result partly or wholly of opening mail, which was illegal at that time and which the minister is now going to try to make legal?

● (1642)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, surely that is evidence which is presently being dealt with by the commission. There has been evidence, as was indicated by the Prime Minister and myself on Friday, which covers about 30 pages of transcript. I do not know whether counsel for the commission will be calling other evidence on that particular point. I am awaiting that decision with some anticipation.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I certainly bow to your ruling, but I have asked a clearcut question. We have had wiffling and waffling from this minister, even though he has only been in the portfolio for a short time. He may go down as "the minister of wiffling and waffling." I put a direct question to him: Will he ascertain from the evidence, of which he has a transcript, if the evidence determined whether the Japanese terrorist was apprehended as a result of opening mail illegally, or from a legalized, or legal, wiretap? It is a simple, concise and precise question: please answer in the same way.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, indeed, I am proceeding to read that particular transcript in order to draw my own conclusions. They will be my own conclusions.

Mr. Woolliams: Draw them.

Mr. Blais: I will draw my own conclusions, because I am sure they will be germane to the debate on the bill which I will be introducing, hopefully this week, relating to mail opening and amendments to relevant legislation.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the minister says he is going to bring in a bill. Is he prepared, as the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert suggested, to wait before he produces a bill to legalize the opening of mail, that is, to wait until the commission has either brought in an interim or a final report in that regard? Or is he going to rush into this House of Commons, like a bull in a china shop, with the legislation?

Mr. Blais: I will be introducing the bill, hopefully, this week. As was pointed out last week, I believe by the Acting Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice, when a similar question was put, the bill contains a clause whereby the duration of that provision will be limited, I believe, to one year after the McDonald inquiry has made its report.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RIGHT OF MINISTERS TO KNOW HOW SECURITY PERSONNEL OPERATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. In December, the Prime Minister said that a minister should not have the right to know how security personnel are carrying on their work. He went on to say that if there is illegal activity, we have the protection of the courts. I ask the Solicitor General if he discussed this theory with the Prime Minister before his appointment, and does he agree with that theory of ministerial responsibility?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to review the comments of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I presume the Solicitor General wants to reconsider the Prime Minister's comments. Let me put the exact statement to the Solicitor General. The Prime Minister said that it is a matter of stating, as a principle, that the minister of the day should not have the right to know what the police are doing constantly in investigative practices, what they are looking at, what they are looking for, and the way they are doing it. The Prime Minister went on to say that if there is concern about illegal police activities:

> We have the protection of the courts. If you want to break into somebody's house, you get a warrant.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but that is rather a long preamble to a supplementary question.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I will try to shorten it. I should like to continue, as it is a matter of some importance. I will continue the quotation:

A court decides if you have reasonable and probable cause to do it. If you break in without a warrant, a citizen lays a charge and the police are found guilty. So this is control on the criminal side—

That was a statement made by the Prime Minister. Can the Solicitor General tell this House how a court will ever find out about a secret and illegal break-in, keeping in mind the fact that a court cannot do anything until evidence is gathered and a charge laid? I think it is important that the House knows whether the new Solicitor General agrees with the Prime Minister.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, evidently it is a very important statement, and I would like to read it in full. I will comment on it at some future time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD—ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE BY GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether his immediate predecessor in office, once removed, was ever informed of the surveillance activities against the National Indian Brotherhood?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, when the minister does that, will he also determine, for members of the House, whether the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, when he was holding the portfolio of solicitor general, was aware of the approval by the security services of the use of FBI agent Douglas Durham in infiltrating the National Indian Brotherhood. Was he aware of any agent provocateur activities carried out by Mr. Durham?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, without accepting the premise of the hon. gentleman's question, I will take it as notice as well and provide him with a reply in due course.

McDONALD INQUIRY—ALLEGED DISCREDITING BY GOVERNMENT FOR POLITICAL GAIN

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Big guns.

Mr. Alexander: Not big guns.

Mr. Trudeau: Take your hand out of your pocket.

Mr. Alexander: I will keep my hand in my pocket as long as the Prime Minister leans over his desk and points. I am a little confused right now because the Prime Minister has indicated that the opposition is discrediting the royal commission when it asks questions on the matter of the RCMP and national security. On the other hand, the Prime Minister, through his yet to be tried Solicitor General, has indicated in no uncertain terms that he is going to introduce a bill dealing with the opening of the mail. I want to know if the Prime Minister can rationalize that statement, and I charge the Prime Minister with deliberately discrediting the royal commission for political gain.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that opposition questioning would discredit the royal commission.

Mr. Alexander: Yes; I copied it down.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I said the assertion made by the hon. gentleman's leader, that royal commissions were only emanations of the executive, and the inference that we could not trust them, tended to discredit the royal commission. That is what I said.

Mr. Clark: You said it; do not apply your inference to me.

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as questioning by the opposition of the government, of the Solicitor General, on what is going on before the royal commission, I am not saying that is discrediting the royal commission; I am saying it is proving the unwisdom of the opposition, as in the example just given. If we have two people who say opposite things, the commissioner and, according to the interpretation of the opposition, the witness of last week, what is to be the government's position?

Mr. Clark: Find out.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition says we should find out.

Mr. Clark: Right.

Mr. Trudeau: He is suggesting, therefore, the government should do its investigation of witnesses; that we should reach a conclusion and decide which of two witnesses should be disciplined. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the opposition is suggesting that the government should do the job that the royal commission has been set up to do, and that is a contradictory position.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact that the Prime Minister wants us to wait until the commission has done the job which it has been charged to do, would the Prime Minister now like to reconsider the introduction of the bill which would legalize the opening of the mail? You cannot have it both ways. In view of the concern which the Prime Minister has, and because of the importance of the findings of the commission and in order that this House will know which direction to take, will the Prime Minister now state that he has changed his mind? Also, in order to be consistent, will the Prime Minister wait until we are all apprised of the findings of the commission? Does he not think that is the proper approach to take to this very serious matter?

Mr. Trudeau: M. Speaker, if that were the proper approach, it would mean that during a period of months, and perhaps more, the RCMP would be put in the dilemma of either opening mail and doing something illegal, or of not opening mail and perhaps failing in its duty to protect the security of the country. It is a very difficult dilemma, and that is the reason the government has taken the position that the bill which we are introducing will only be for an interim period; it will only last until after we have read the report.

● (1652)

It may be the royal commission will instruct us that the police do not need this authority, that Canada, of all democracies, is a country where the police should not have a right to look at the mail in order to protect the security of the country. If this is the position of the opposition, and if they think that will be the position of the royal commission, surely their role is to argue that when the bill comes before the House. We will hear their arguments at that time. Indeed, if they are convincing to themselves, to the government and the country, the bill will not pass. However, if they do not make that demonstration, obviously the bill should pass.

Mr. Alexander: As I stated in my preamble, I deliberately charge the Prime Minister with discrediting the royal commission. Will he answer that?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if this is a charge, I must say I do not feel broken and crumbled. I wish the hon. member would substantiate that charge in some way. I return to the substance of the question of the hon. member and suggest to parliament and the country, as we will when we examine this bill, that if a man's house, which is his castle and which is very sacred, can be broken into by the police under certain conditions with a warrant, and so on, what is so offensive about a man's mail being looked at under certain conditions? Certainly, there is nothing more sacred than my house, or the house of the hon. member for Hamilton West. He knows that in certain circumstances the police can go into his house, his office or through his belongings and search them. He is not shocked about that, but he would be if they went into his house and opened a letter. That does not seem very consequential.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUBSIDIES FOR EASTERN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

A few weeks ago the minister signed an agreement with the province of Quebec on industrial infrastructures and I realized that nothing new has been provided for the Gaspé area and eastern Quebec, except stale programs from former governments since 1968. Could the minister explain to the House why the government of Quebec insisted on industrial parks and industrial development in the Montreal, Quebec city and Trois-Rivières areas and why it has not scheduled any new initiatives for the Gaspé area and eastern Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in our negotiations and in our review of the proposals which have been made to us and also in our counterproposals, the infrastructures needed to support the industrial development, that is to say, the infrastructures for industrial development, were recognized as those which had to be privileged.

Finally, this was also part of the general plan of the previous administration, namely that we were to help establish infrastractures to facilitate the development of industries within these municipalities. As the hon. member doubtless knows, financial assistance has been earmarked for industrial developments within his Gaspé area and also for fishing industrial developments.

McDONALD INQUIRY—EVIDENCE THAT PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE INSPIRED RCMP BREAK-IN

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It is very similar to the one I asked on Friday and which he refused to answer. He has had the weekend to inform himself of this matter. Will the Solicitor General advise the House whether the allegation is true that it was the Privy Council Office which submitted information to the security service of the RCMP that led to the break-in and theft of PQ records? Can the Solicitor General confirm, whether, in fact, it was the Privy Council office which inspired that activity?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot inform the hon. gentleman at this time. I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Leggatt: In taking the question as notice, will the Solicitor General also provide to the House the evidence which the Privy Council officers relied upon in advising the RCMP security service? Was it rumour, or was it hard evidence which led them to instruct the security service to attack a legally constituted political party in Canada?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

McDONALD INQUIRY—AVAILABILITY OF TRANSCRIPT OF EVIDENCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to all the arguments about the opening of mail. A letter directed to me was opened the other day. I honour the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for having done so. They said there was nothing of an explosive nature in the letter. As long as we have a police force, for which I have tremendous admiration, that will open mail in order to protect the recipients, I am all for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question arises out of the controversy as to the contents of the 30 pages of evidence which the Prime Minister suggested we should read. That is very costly matter today. In my day, 30 pages of transcript could have been produced for possibly $15. I am now told they would cost hundreds of dollars. My simple suggestion is that those 30 pages be tabled in the House, so that each of us can read the transcript and determine for ourselves the nature of the evidence given.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that this whole matter was discussed in an in camera session of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In order to save the expense about which the right hon. member is so worried, perhaps we should ask the members of that committee to refer back to the minutes of that in camera session.

In so far as the position of the right hon. member regarding the opening of mail is concerned, I think he is taking a very sensible and logical position. He was prime minister of this country for some six years. He said he knew everything which went on through actions of the RCMP. Therefore, he was obviously aware that mail was being opened by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the period he was prime minister. He sees nothing wrong with it. I just ask his own party to have a little huddle with the right hon. member before they take the position of the leader of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The clock now shows five o'clock. As hon. members will realize, the question period began at twenty minutes past the hour. The most sensible arrangement would seem to me to continue questions until five minutes past five, and then go on to routine proceedings. If routine proceedings do not prove to be too lengthy, we could delay the commencement of private members' hour accordingly and extend it into the supper hour. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Paproski: It is so agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Prime Minister's answer referring to the 30 pages of evidence, if I were given to be suspicious, I would wonder what he was covering up. I simply want to see those 30 pages. The government has them. They were not discussed in the committee at any time. Why not just produce them, because it would clarify the situation? If the Prime Minister is borne out in his interpretation of what those 30 pages contain, everything will be cleared away. Just produce the 30 pages and we will know who is hiding what, and why.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the testimony in front of the royal commission was obviously public; it was reported upon by the media. It was on the basis of that report that I suggested the opposition was asking the wrong questions. What I said was in camera—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I say to the interrupter from the Tory party that it had to do with the proceedings in front of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. We will ask the McDonald commission if this testimony can be transcribed. If so, expense apart, I am sure the government will have no hesitation in letting anyone in the country see copies of it. However, it is, once again, indicating that we will be engaging ourselves in judging the credibility of witnesses in front of a royal commission.

• (1702)

McDONALD INQUIRY—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON ANSWERING QUESTIONS BEFORE REPORT HANDED DOWN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It goes back to some of the earlier questions which have been answered in the House. I want to be clear as to the policy of the government. Is it the policy of the Prime Minister, in the event of an inconsistency relating to the activities of ministers, or any other kind of inconsistency—an inconsistency as between testimony before the commission and statements in this House, or evidence otherwise becoming available—that the true facts should be hidden from the House of Commons until the royal commission reports? Is that the position the Prime Minister is taking?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. If there is an inconsistency in the testimony, of course it will not be hidden. It will be in the testimony. The hon. gentleman has only to look at it and he will be able to make up his own mind as to whether it is inconsistent or not. What I am saying is that the ultimate decision as to whether a witness is credible or not should be left to the royal commission.

The former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services, in a statement on privilege made to the House, made a position quite clear. I took the hon. gentleman at his word. If something comes out through other witnesses which tends to contradict that statement, the Leader of the Opposition will make up his mind which of the two witnesses is credible; we will make up our minds as to which is credible. All I am saying is that in the last resort we will not trust the judgment of the opposition, and they will not trust ours. We should trust the royal commission of inquiry, and that is the position taken by the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This is an important question for parliament. The Prime Minister is saying that when evidence becomes available before a royal commission, or elsewhere, suggesting that a minister of the Crown was giving inaccurate or false information, for whatever reason, to the House of Commons, the House of Commons must be barred during the existence of the royal commission from finding out the true facts of the case. My question to the Prime Minister is this: Is it the policy of the government that in the event of a contradiction between what a minister of the Crown tells the House of Commons, and evidence before a royal commission, the government, as a matter of policy, will not itself seek out the true facts and make those true facts known to the House of Commons immediately, so that hon. members may know whether or not they can trust the government?

Mr. Trudeau: I have in no way said the opposition would be barred from forming its judgment as to which of the witnesses would be credible. I have made it clear that, as far as I am concerned, I stand by the word of the minister. If the opposition, or a royal commission, judge that another witness is more credible and that, indeed, he contradicts the minister, it will become known. I am not suggesting the opposition should not make up its own mind. Indeed, it obviously has made up its own mind: The government is always wrong and the opposition is always right.

But I repeat, Mr. Speaker: What does the government, or the opposition, do when the commissioner says one thing and a police officer says the contrary? Is the opposition suggesting we should chastise or discipline the commissioner or the police officer? Or is the Leader of the Opposition suggesting, as we do, that the government should wait for the commission to tell us who is credible and who is not?

Mr. Clark: The opposition is saying that when there are facts which are relevant to the role of ministers in the House of Commons, when there are facts which parliament and the people should know, those facts should be made available to the House of Commons. We are not talking, now, about differences in judgment. We are talking about differences in fact. I refer to differences in fact between evidence adduced before a royal commission of inquiry and statements made in the House of Commons.

The government knows these facts or, because it is an employer of public servants, it has the means to find these facts. In face of the kind of contradiction in evidence to which I have referred, will it be the policy of the government to go after those facts right away and publish them for the benefit of the House of Commons, or will it be the policy of the government to hide them until the royal commission has reported?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the government has gone after these facts. It has not hidden them. It has made its own inquiry. It has made its own inquiry into this particular set of facts, and the former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services, in a statement to this House on this particular set of facts said he had not been informed of the APLQ break-in. He also said, if my memory is correct, that the commissioner of the RCMP at that time, Mr. Higgitt, said he could not remember having told him of this break-in. These are the facts. We looked into them, and on the basis of those facts the former solicitor general raised the matter in this House as a question of privilege and made his position clear.

The former solicitor general will obviously be called upon to testify before the McDonald royal commission. He will be asked these questions. I am reasonably certain he will say to the royal commission what he has said to the House of Commons, that he had not been informed of the break-in of the APLQ by the RCMP. We shall, therefore, be placed in the position of having the former solicitor general say he was not informed, and the former commissioner saying either that he did not remember or that he thought he might have told him. What is the government to do? I suggest our duty, and the duty of the Leader of the Opposition, is to allow these facts to be adjudicated upon by the McDonald royal commission.

Mr. Clark: One final question, for the sake of clarification. Is the Prime Minister now telling us that he, himself, after investigating all these matters, accepts and supports the statements of the former solicitor general?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ANSWER GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has left the chamber, because it involves him. A moment ago the right hon. gentleman made a statement which disclosed information concerning certain discussions which took place during an in camera session of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I sat in on those discussions. The Prime Minister informed the House a few moments ago that 30 pages of testimony, to which reference has been made, were somehow made known to members attending that incamera session.

While members who attend in camera sessions of standing committees do not take any oath of secrecy, they are upon their honour not to discuss any of the proceedings with anyone. The Prime Minister has disclosed information with respect to proceedings which he thinks took place in an in-camera session. As one who sat in on those sessions I feel compelled, without disclosing what did take place, to refute the Prime Minister's assertion that those 30 pages of testimony were discussed or produced in any way. I believe my colleagues who sat in with me on those sessions will bear me out in this.

Mr. Speaker: I will examine what was said to determine whether any reference to the meetings of that committee shows evidence of there having been a breach of privilege.

NUMBER OF PERSONS UNDER CONTRACT TO THE BLUE WATER BRIDGE AUTHORITY (CANADIAN SECTION)

Question No. 389—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Blue Water Bridge Authority (Canadian Section) and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Blue Bridge Authority advises as follows: 1. Nil.

2. (a) 1975, $24,449.32; (b) 1976, $2,153.59. None of these amounts was paid to retired public servants.

AIRPORTS FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMME

Question No. 431—Mr. Brisco:

For each year 1970 to 1977 to date, what was the total dollar value of the total number of applications for assistance under the Community Airport Facilities Fund?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The total value of all applications received for financial assistance appears below:

Year	Number of Applications	Total Dollar Value
70	25	2,227,000
71	20	4,979,800
72	47	9,644,900
73	41	9,255,900
74	68	19,417,800
75	59	15,186,200
76	41	11,489,800
77	23 (To November 25)	13,621,600
Total	324	85,823,000

AIRCRAFT MOVEMENTS AT AIRPORTS

Question No. 485—Mr. Bawden:

1. What were the actual aircraft movements at (a) Calgary (b) Edmonton (c) Vancouver (d) Winnipeg (e) Regina (f) Montreal (g) Toronto (h) Halifax (i) Moncton International Airports for the year (i) 1974 (ii) 1975 (iii) 1976?

[Mr. Speaker.]

2. For the same airports, what are the projected aircraft movements for the year (a) 1977 (b) 1978 (c) 1979 (d) 1980?

3. (a) How many terminal services personnel was the Department of Transport first planning for the new Calgary International Airport (b) has the number of personnel been reduced and, if so (i) on what basis was such a decision made (ii) how does it affect the safety factor for ramp control?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Table I, following, contains statistics for the years 1974, 1975 and 1976 on air carrier aircraft movements, total itinerant aircraft movements, local movements and total airport aircraft movements for the requested airports.

2. Table II, following, contains forecasts for the years 1977, 1978, 1979 and 1980 for air carrier aircraft movements, total itinerant aircraft movements, local movements and total airport aircraft movements for the requested airports.

3. A total of 16 terminal services personnel was first planned for the new Calgary International Airport to carry out the functions of ramp control, gate assignment, baggage control, information services and facility monitoring. Since the ramp control function is now being provided as an advisory service by Air Traffic Services (ATS) staff, this allowed terminal services personnel to be reduced to a total of 13. The safety factor for ramp control is unaffected by this change, as this service by ATS is consistent with apron operations at all other airports in Canada, with the exception of Mirabel which uses terminal services personnel to control Passenger Transfer Vehicle (PTV) operations.

CP SHIPS—TRANSFER OF PORT OPERATIONS FROM QUEBEC CITY TO MONTREAL

Question No. 487—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Did CP Ships agree with the National Harbours Board to transfer its port operations from Quebec City to Montreal and, if so, will the two gantry cranes be moved from Quebec City to Montreal and, if not, for what reason?

2. What area of the Port of Montreal will accommodate CP Ships' Montreal port operation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. No agreement has been made between CP Ships and the National Harbours Board to transfer CP Ships' operations from Quebec city to Montreal.

2. In the event that CP Ships transferred its operations to Montreal, the vessels could be accommodated at the proposed Racine Wharf Container Terminal in the area between sections 58 and 62.

CONTAINER FACILITY—PORT OF MONTREAL

Question No. 489—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Did the government consider the possibility of building a container handling facility on the south shore of the St. Lawrence River at the Port of Montreal near the Louis-Hippolyte Lafontaine bridge and tunnel and, if so, what is the government's best estimate of the cost of a one berth facility with two gantry cranes including all dredging costs?

2. Are other locations in the Port of Montreal being considered as sites for container facilities and, if so, which ones?

3. Will the government consider that prior to any construction of additional container facilities at Montreal, that the same degree of private and provincial government financial involvement will be required as was the case at the second Halifax container facility?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. No.

2. Yes, the Racine Wharf Container Terminal between sections 58 and 62.

3. The project has been developed on the basis of financing from accumulated surplus funds of the port of Montreal and loans from the Government of Canada.

PROPOSED PATROL VESSEL "SUPPLY VENTURE"

Question No. 790—Mr. Huntington:

1. Who, in the National Harbours Board, was responsible for conducting or approving the initial marine survey which indicated that the proposed patrol vessel, the Supply Venture, was seaworthy?

2. Who are, or were, the principals of Halifax Fishing Ventures Ltd.?

3. What was the total cost of shipping the Supply Venture from Halifax to Vancouver aboard the Norwegian freighter MS Belstar?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. A reputable firm of marine classification surveyors performed a condition and evaluation survey on the vessel MV Supply Venture. In addition, a certificate of seaworthiness was issued by the MOT Marine Safety Surveyor for the voyage from La Havre to Halifax.

2. Halifax Fishing Ventures Ltd. is unknown but the principals of Maritime Fishing Ventures Limited are as follows: Mr. A. C. Huxtable, President; Mr. Paul P. Russell, Vice-President; B. A. Huxtable, Secretary-Treasurer; Mr. Gordon Elliott, Director.

3. $16,503.61.

TENDERS REGARDING RENEWAL OF CAR RENTAL LICENCES—QUEBEC CITY AIRPORT

Question No. 804—Mr. Beaudoin:

Were any tenders received in response to the Department of Transport's 1976 call for tenders regarding the renewal of car rental licences at the Quebec City Airport and, if so, how many?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, public tenders were called by the Department in 1976 for the awarding of agreements to operate car rental concessions at Quebec city airport. Five companies submitted financial offers.

COST OF CONSTRUCTION OF A HIGHWAY FROM FREDERICTON TO SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Question No. 985—Mr. Howie:

Has the Department of Transport (a) agreed (b) been asked to financially support the cost of construction of a highway from Fredericton to Saint John, New Brunswick?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): (a) The Department of Transport has offered to pay 50 per cent of the cost of a programme to improve primary highways in the Atlantic region. Negotiations on the details of the program are continuing. (b) Yes.

AMOUNT SPENT FOR IMPROVEMENT OF NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD SEAPORTS

Question No. 991—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1976, what amount has been spent for the improvement of each of the seaports under the jurisdiction of the National Harbours Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

AIR TRANSPORTATION TAX

Question No. 1,009—Mr. Howie:

What was the gross revenue from the current $8 air travel tax used to defray the cost of security at airports in each of the fiscal years ending March 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The air transportation tax was implemented on December 1, 1974. At that time domestic and transborder (Canada-U.S.) trips were subject to an ad valorem tax of 5 per cent, maximum $5, while a specific tax of $5 applied to other international trips. On August 1, 1975, the ad valorem tax was increased to 8 per cent, maximum $8, and the specific tax raised to $8. The revenue from the tax helps pay for the cost of airport facilities and services in general and is not allocated to specific services such as the provision of airport security. The annual revenue from December 1, 1974 to March 31, 1977 was as follows:

Fiscal Year Ending	Revenue ($000)
March 31, 1975	$ 7,109
March 31, 1976	53,731
March 31, 1977	71,107

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF MODERN, UP TO DATE CAR SHOP IN MONCTON

Question No. 1,022—Mr. Jones:

With the establishment and operation of VIA Rail Inc., what consideration is being given to the re-establishment of a modern up to date car shop in Moncton, New Brunswick to service, renovate, repair and maintain and possibly construct new modern passenger cars for CN, CP and for VIA Rail or the Department of Transport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): VIA Rail Canada Inc. will be reviewing the need for maintenance facilities and will be considering alternate sites including Moncton.

AMOUNT SPENT BY DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS IN CONSTITUENCY OF NICKEL BELT

Question No. 1,134—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of Veterans Affairs and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Departmental accounting systems are not designed to provide this information by constituency.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie)—Research—Inquiry as to programs to stimulate development of manufacturing sector; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Manpower—Canada Works Program—Date of announcement of third phase—Use of slippage funds; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco)—External Affairs—CIDA grants to foreign countries—Request for government reconsideration.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It being 5.12 p.m. o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

Is there some understanding about the particular notice of motion which will be proceeded with, in view of the lateness of the hour?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the understanding is that we will proceed with motion No. 2 if there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Paproski: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed. It is at the top of the list in any event, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that at 13 minutes past six o'clock the House will adjourn for the supper hour and will resume at the usual time of eight o'clock this evening. Is that agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MERCHANT MARINE

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE DARLING REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reviving the Canadian Merchant Marine, and applying the recommendations of the Darling report.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it is time to start studying serious matters because, as private member of this House, even though I sit in the first row, I am happy to see that television shows the Canadian people how much time is wasted in the House in discussing matters which are already being looked into by commissions or other groups.

In fact, lest I be called to order I shall only skim on the subject, namely the notice of motion I gave the House in October. As you read yourself just a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, this is in fact the tenth time I have taken part in a debate on the merchant marine. In a little while, I shall give the House several quotations to prove that though all hon. members may not have wasted their time, I myself, as member for Lévis, feel that I have wasted considerable time because this is at least the tenth debate we hold on the subject, and the various departments have made costly studies to look into the wisdom of having a Canadian merchant marine.

I have been sitting in this House for 15 years. The first year I gave a notice of motion and also supported the notice of motion of the hon. member, if I remember correctly, of Saint-Jean-Albert. I seriously wonder, today, and I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) who is responsible for those studies or reports, if one must conscientiously wonder whether we have achieved anything. The question I ask myself, and ask on behalf of Canadian shipbuilders, on behalf of the shipyard workers, and not only those of Davie Shipbuilding back home, is whether we will once and for all come to a decision. That is what I ask in motion No. 2, that the government say clearly once and for all where it stands with regard to creating a Canadian merchant marine. Recently I received from Davie Shipbuilding a letter addressed to me and which started like this:

The Canadian merchant marine has been making the headlines for so long that we cannot help smiling whenever the subject comes up. And yet Canada is the country in the world which ought to have a merchant marine. Bounded as we are by three oceans extending over thousands of miles and with our tremendous international trade done mostly by sea, there is no valid argument against a merchant marine. Everything has been said about the matter and it would be useless to repeat it. Expansion of the far north will finally provide valid grounds for launching merchant marine vessels built and operated by Canadians for Canada. It would be unforgivable to miss such an opportunity.

And it is signed by Mr. Louis Rochette, President of the Davie Shipbuilding in Lauzon.

I think we have really reached a turning point. The other day in Quebec city, on behalf of the electors of the Lévis constituency, I introduced a resolution to that effect which will be considered at the national convention of the Liberal party to be held in Ottawa on February 24, 25 and 26. At a meeting with the delegates of the Quebec city area, I was quite moderate when I urged the government to take it in consideration. However that resolution which will be presented to the national convention was amended as follows: That the government take a clear and specific stand on the recommendations of the Darling report.

● (1722)

It would not be a bad idea to repeat the recommendations found in the Darling report, but I will simply mention some. First, the Darling report states that the government has to determine very specific objectives with regard to the problems we have to face in relation to Canadian navigation and international trade.

A second recommendation, or prerequisite to the establishment of a merchant marine, is the unification and co-ordination of responsibilities within the government. There is nobody in the government who has the power to make a decision about the establishment or non-establishment of a Canadian merchant marine. I know that the file is in the hands of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe), but studies and numerous reports have been prepared by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Public Works and others on the costs and possibilities related to the establishment of that Canadian merchant marine. Therefore, what we are asking for, and it is the main recommandation of the Darling report, is to bring together within the government and to put under one minister the whole matter of the final examination of those heaps of reports and studies sponsored by the government perhaps in an attempt to prove—and I am being nasty—that a merchant marine was not profitable or applicable to Canada. But what do you want? Every study we have seen was in support of the establishment of a Canadian merchant marine. I wonder why the government is still waiting to take this position, because, as I said before, I think that legislation on a Canadian merchant marine, for we already have a maritime code, can only bring about new studies and piles of reports that will be shelved as was the Darling report published nearly two years ago, and I wonder how far along is the study by the responsible officials who recommended the drafting of that report. Several agencies are involved, and we keep wondering because each one wants to establish its own priorities. In the end, Mr. Speaker, we no longer have any priorities at all when it comes to a Canadian merchant marine. I for one, as a Canadian, am proud of my country which, as I said a moment ago when quoting the letter from Mr. Louis Rochette, borders on three oceans and boasts a very flourishing international export and import market. I am wondering what the Canadian government is waiting for to consider the question of navigation—I am not saying shipbuilding, Mr. Speaker, I'll bring up that matter in future debates—the issue of shipyards.

Shipping must be considered as being an economic sector like any other, but perhaps more important than some of them. Mr. Speaker, this is what I am asking from the government today, and I hope that I shall not have to come back to it. The last time I spoke on shipping, I told myself: I hope this is the last speech I have to make on this subject. So I hope that today I am introducing some new elements in the debate, some arguments that may have weakened the speech made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, and which may lead to a decision, once and for all. About two years ago, a newspaper of the south shore, of my own area, ran an article entitled "Shipping in Canada" let's settle the matter.

That is all I am asking, Mr. Speaker, that is all I am asking of the Canadian government. I am therefore convinced that it is important to establish a Canadian merchant marine. Several hon. members who will take part in this debate are also convinced of that. All the government has to do is to prove to me that it is impossible to establish such a fleet and we will put an end to this debate that I consider as a lot of repetitions that are of no use to the House. I represent an area where the main employer in metropolitan Quebec city is the Davie Shipbuilding Ltd, of Lauzon, a company which gives us both direct and indirect jobs. It is therefore important to Quebec city area residents that marine construction make a step forward, not backward.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter which was sent to me by labour unions and these people tell me they are worried because they do not know if the shipyard workers will be able to hang on to their jobs. They are also anxious to know if tomorrow they will still have a job to earn a living for themselves and their families, if they will be able to find a job in their own area; otherwise, they could be forced to move.

Mr. Speaker, I also received from the Canadian Labour Congress a letter commenting the recommendations contained in the Darling report signed by President Donald Macdonald. A long time ago a questionnaire was sent to hon. members concerning the Darling report. I never communicated further with Mr. Macdonald to know if some members had answered that questionnaire which read as follows:

1. Do you support the main recommendations of the Darling report contained in the attached summary? Yes or no.

2. If you support the Darling report or if you consider favourably its basic recommendations, will you press for its fast implementation? Yes or no.

3. If the government persists in ignoring the Darling report, would you support a private member's bill to implement its main recommendations? Yes or no.

4. Comments.

You are invited to make your comments.

Mr. Speaker, I think that I am trying to answer that questionnaire now. I wish all hon. members would take that same responsibility and tell us what they intend to do, particularly those who must make that decision. I wonder who should make that decision and I shall ask the parliamentary secretary, when he takes the floor, if that decision should not be made by his department unless he tells us who should make it. I am tired of repeating the same thing and of pressing continuously this government to put an end to those very costly studies. It should stop this and tell us yes or no. I do not think it is all that complicated.

Mr. Speaker, there were times when we were first in global shipbuilding. Since 1867 our prestige has plummeted. It may not have completely vanished, but we now rank very low. I have here another quote from March 15, 1973. That day, I asked the then minister of transport the following question:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the next question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

In view of the brief that was released by the CNTU on April 1, is the hon. minister prepared to make a statement on the creation of a Canadian merchant navy, or does he plan to do so in the fairly near future?

The Hon. Jean Marchand was then minister of transport, and this was his answer:

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have already stated, in the House or outside, that we are steadily beginning to restructure our merchant navy, and also to help our shipyards.

First, we should like to accept the Darling report; we should like to reserve all Arctic navigation for Canadian ships, and we hope eventually to achieve the next stage, that of starting to make our merchant navy truly Canadian . . .

And I would like to stress the words truly Canadian.

—and giving it all the privileges that merchant navies enjoy throughout the world.

Such was the answer given by the then minister of transport, the Hon. Jean Marchand, now a senator, on May 15, 1973. And I still ask myself the following question I am now putting to this House and to the government: "What progress have we made?" The former minister stated we had but one step to go through in order that our merchant navy be made truly Canadian. I am asking for an answer, and it is more than time that we got it.

I have here an editorial signed by Gilles Goyer that appeared in the Quebec newspaper Le Soleil. I quote:

We are spending tremendous amounts of money on rail transport, but we never considered establishing our own Canadian merchant navy.

And he had this to say in conclusion of his study of the Darling report.

The report does not exclude the development of a Canadian merchant marine. On the other hand, it does not consider it an essential condition for developing in Canada a well-defined maritime policy. If a Canadian merchant navy can be developed, it can only be in many stages. According to the report, to be valid, the objective must be in the long term.

This was said that same year, in 1973, nearly five years ago, Mr. Speaker, and nothing has been done since! The then minister of transport told us that we should proceed in stages. Editorials at the time said the same thing.

I have here another statement of which I shall only quote the title:

A merchant marine

It was the newspaper Le Peuple de la Rive-Sud, quoting Mr. Nightingale, who was chairman of Davie Shipbuilding in Lauzon, which said the following:

Canada is losing a good opportunity

This was on June 23, 1976, nearly two years ago. Mr. Speaker, everyone agrees that it would be a good thing to have our own merchant marine. What are we waiting for? This is what I would like to know.

I have here an editorial of Montreal radio station CKAC dated March 1 of last year, which reads as follows:

According to the Chairman of Canada Steamship Lines, Mr. Paul Martin Jr., Canada could lose its control over large areas in the Arctic if the federal government does not decide as soon as possible to promote the development of a national merchant marine on the high seas which would be able to make its presence felt in this area.

Mr. Martin made this statement yesterday at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver. In addition to asserting Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic, a Canadian merchant marine would contribute to the creation of jobs, the development of shipyards, security and the exploration of new natural and energy resources.

Mr. Speaker, I think this editorial speaks for itself. I do not have to repeat it.

I have here another article of the Canadian Press published in an Ottawa newspaper:

Creation of a merchant marine supported by opposition parties

I recall very well that it was the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who supported me and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

● (1732)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, with the exception of how we would go about it, there is no doubt on this side of the House but that a more concerted effort must be made by the government in the very near future to resolve the question of how Canada can protect its imports and exports.

The matter in front of us this afternoon has been very well examined by this chamber and discussed at some length. I would not care to mention the number of times in recent years that I have found myself on my feet in support of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) on this matter and, I might add as well, the number of times I have heard him supporting the position I have taken and the position that has been taken by other members in this chamber in support of the concept he puts forth. Indeed, he is quite correct in saying that this idea enjoys the support of everyone in the House except for the damned government. Nobody on the Treasury benches since the distinguished Senator Jean Marchand, a former minister of transport, has paid any attention to it. The reason probably is quite simple. This government is so preoccupied with the esoterics of life in Canada in the last ten years that it has paid no attention whatsoever, or precious little, to some of the fundamental things that affect our economy and our capacity to help ourselves.

The studies I have conducted indicate—and, to the best of my knowledge, they have withstood any serious contradiction—that we are kicking into the pockets of offshore entrepreneurs some $3 billion annually to haul goods out of the country and to bring them into the country. I have my detractors with respect to the validity of that, and mostly they are—

An hon. Member: —on your side—

Mr. Forrestall: —at the back of me. On the other hand, those gentleman have their own particular views and they have not in any way been in opposition to the principle of Canada getting on with establishing, now in the 1970s and as we approach the latter years of this century, the capacity to protect our own manufacturers, the producers of our raw materials and of our agricultural products which we want to move in processed or semi-processed form. Nobody disputes that it has to be done.

Any nation which leaves unguarded its means of ensuring its export trade—and everybody of course will recognize the degree to which the Canadian economy is dependent upon export markets—will recognize and admit the validity of the proposition that we must protect ourselves, and that we must have the means under our control to protect that vital aspect of our Canadian economy.

There is no question about my position on this issue. I have supported the development of the Canadian merchant marine for 25 or 30 years, so I am prejudiced. As a matter of fact, it is interesting how one's thinking about this changes over the years. I recognize the difficulties posed by some of our marketing people and our agricultural people in rural areas near water, particularly at the extremities of our country. Of course, they have to move their goods at the lowest possible cost. There is no question about that. Aside from the difference between me and one or two of my colleagues to which I have referred, there is no difference at all. I agree with that, and I think the hon. member for Lévis does also.

What I am supporting in terms of the concept put forward is that this government should find an interested institutional vehicle which can take a look at the information which is available on this question. Where there are deficiencies in that information there should be studies to show the government the way to achieve this without impairing the capacity of our traders, be they involved in intercoastal or international waterborne traffic. Members of the opposition should not be left in the position where they have to justify their positions by reaching out into ad hocery in terms of a Canadian merchant marine. As individual members we do not have access to the resources necessary to provide the proper information upon which a realistic policy aimed at the development of a viable Canadian merchant marine could be achieved. There are deficiencies in the information which is available, and they should be examined very quickly.

I will not go over what the late Howard Darling had to say about this because we have dealt with that in this chamber on many occasions in recent years. Rather, let me just conclude this point by indicating the need which continues to exist for Canada to protect its import and export traffic with ships of its own. These ships should be designed in Canada, built in Canada, manned by Canadians, responsive to Canadian law and, through ownership, paying Canadian taxes and subject to our regulations. God only knows that the opportunity to protect for Canadian entrepreneurship the waters north of 60 degrees—one of the most fragile environments in the world—exists with our generation of policymakers, yet we do not seem anxious to respond. That is a matter of regret. If we are not the first in our Arctic with the technology and expertise to meet the requirements for protection which has been based on professional help and data, I predict that we will not be in the north carrying our onw natural gas, minerals and supplies. We will not be able to do that through probably two whole generations of ships, 20 or 30 years down the road, and by then it may be too late.

I will take the liberty of being precise by quoting somewhat from an H. P. Drewry study. That is a company of shipping consultants in London. This is an economic study, numbered 37 of a series, dated July, 1975 and titled "World Shipping Under Flags of Convenience." Some very knowledgeable people in the general marine field, for whom I have a great amount of respect, have put forward certain arguments. Donald Kerr from Halifax, Captain Gold of Dalhousie University and others have argued that perhaps sometimes we malign flags of convenience ships too much. They say that flags of convenience ships are frequently good ships. Sometimes they meet standards which are even higher than Canadian standards. I have yet to see any which do, but I concede that it is possible that flags of convenience ships could exceed our own requirements.

I accept that, but the reality of the situation is quite the opposite. I am not accusing anyone of speaking as a result of a need to represent vested interests. God knows I would not do that. Captain Gold is now an academic in any event. What I want to draw to the attention of hon. members is that while flags of convenience ships may offer the competitive advantage that our processors and manufacturers sometimes feel they need in order to remain competitive in our market and in the market places of the world; I happen to believe that shipping on Canadian registered vessels with Canadian crews does not represent higher cost.

There is a real danger in accepting that it would be useful for our own national purposes to use flags of convenience ships. Incidentally, we do very little of that. On the west coast virtually 100 per cent of our traffic moves in Canadian ships. On the Great Lakes 70 per cent or 80 per cent moves in Canadian ships. On the east coast the figure is 75 per cent. Indeed, I think it is probably a minuscule proportion of traffic, other than our import-export traffic, which moves in ships other than Canadian ships. Canadian shipping companies have demonstrated to users of waterborne modes of transportation that they can be competitive with rail, with land and with ships. When we accept in a general way the proposition that we can safely use flags of convenience ships in Canadian business, there is a very real danger. Apart from the economics of the argument, people say that statistics show that ships which are not flags of convenience ships have more accidents. Indeed, statistics do show this, but that is part of the danger I am trying to get at. Canadian vessels operating in Canadian waters and carrying Canadian goods between one Canadian port and another Canadian port are travelling in restricted waters where navigation is sometimes hazardous, where visibility can be limited, where channels are treacherous and so forth. Generally speaking, flags of convenience ships sail on the high seas and have lots of room to manoeuvre. They are not in danger of running aground if they approach harbours and ports. So in my judgment the argument on the question of safety is not valid.

I should like to quote briefly from the Drewry report, Mr. Speaker. Part V deals with the future development and growth of flags of convenience fleets. In the mid-1960s there were probably 1,000 ships in the world sailing under flags of convenience; today there are probably 7,000 to 9,000. There is every evidence that this enormous and rapid growth will continue and I think we should be on guard against it. I am not taking anything out of context but I should like to quote the following paragraph from part V of the Drewry report.

Obviously these criticisms cannot be applied to all free flag operators, some of whom maintain standards as high, or higher, than those of traditional flag operators. However, when an owner does wish to operate a substandard, ill-manned vessel probably the best means of doing so is through a flag of convenience, where he can feel assured of minimum interference in his activities from government levels. With such owners operating perhaps second or third-hand VLCC tonnage, the threat to maritime safety, particularly in congested waters, and to the environment, through pollution, will be enormous.

As we develop our north, the capacity to handle extractive resources north of the 60th parallel grows and the need for waterborne traffic becomes clear, I think it is incumbent upon this government to bring together qualified and interested people who can do the necessary studies which will enable Canada to gain a reasonable proportion of the traffic in resources that now leave this country in foreign bottoms.

Transportation today is more than a tool of economic development in this country; it is an industry and should be recognized as such. About 15,000 Canadian seamen sail in Canadian ships at present but the industry could employ 35,000 or 40,000 if we accepted the UNCTAD proposal for a 40-40-20 split. That will not be accomplished until the government takes seriously the message that the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) and others have been bringing to this chamber for years. I do not know why there has been delay unless it is because of the direction of this government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. A. Hugh Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it will not surprise too many people that I have a passing interest in this subject. To put into a little historical perspective what the hon. member who just spoke was saying, we should remember that as a young and large nation our initial preoccupation was with transportation within the land mass rather than beyond our external boundaries. We have had less than 100 years to provide railroads, highways and air transportation compared with countries like Germany and Japan which have had thousands and thousands of years to develop their transportation systems. It was not dereliction of duty on the part of governments past and present that caused the problem that exists in relation to maritime shipping; rather it was a question of priorities. Perhaps the vastness of our country led us to be too preoccupied with land and air travel.

The two hon. members who spoke earlier—and I congratulate them upon their presentation—were correct in saying that it is time to consider what has happened in our maritime industry. I suggest that not much has happened in the last ten or 15 years. Reference has been made to the report of Mr. Darling, an expert in the field of maritime economics in Canada. According to him, the principal interest situations confronting Canadians are the movement of Canadian resources in the bulk trades, such as coal, ore, et cetera, the role of Canadian ships in the development of the Arctic, and the interests of the container consortia as well as the bilateral shipping policies of other countries.

I think there is a resistance on both sides of the House regarding the shipment of bulk resources in Canadian bottoms. The argument has been put up that somehow Canadian ships are not efficient and that it would cost more to ship Canadian goods in Canadian carriers than in Japanese, German or those of any other nation.

It has also been suggested that this may damage our export market. The UNCTAD Four conference which was held recently recommended that 40 per cent of the exports of a country and 40 per cent of the imports should be handled by the country either exporting or importing. That means that Canada should be using at least 40 per cent of our merchant marine to export our goods. We export tremendous amounts of copper concentrates from British Columbia as well as coal, for which a number of contracts have recently been signed with Japan and other Asiatic countries. We have an export market but all our coal, grain and copper concentrate is going out in foreign bottoms. The hon. member who spoke previously said this is a $3 billion business. He is right but that does not mean that Canada will pick up the $3 billion. Using the UNCTAD formula, however, 40 per cent would mean a great deal of revenue.

It is not just the revenue from the shipping industry that would come our way; repairs and building are also very important items. So this debate comes at a good time; we are trying to create more jobs in Canada, and here is an area where a Canadian merchant service could be competitive.

● (1802)

I would like to turn briefly now to the shipping scene. Since Darling wrote his report there has been, with the energy crisis and the reopening of the Suez canal, a glut of ships on the world shipping market. Given this glut on the world market, why would Canada at this particular time be concerned with increasing its merchant marine? If what has been said is true, there is no question that the cost of purchasing ships on the world market is now lower than it has been for many years. I would think, Mr. Speaker, that the time to purchase ships is at a time when the price is low. It is obvious that over a number of years prices will increase again. Although these lower costs will not create an immediate market for shipbuilding in Canada, they would certainly help to establish a merchant marine much faster now than later on when we would have to construct ships starting from scratch.

I suggest that the Canadian government should move into some new programs, perhaps a mortgage insurance program to guarantee payment for ships. This procedure has been successfully followed in the United States. I understand that in the United States this program is in the black; in other words, it has made a profit. It is not a program which will necessitate subsidization by the Canadian government; it would in fact pay its own way and would be a great advantage to the people who would wish to involve themselves in the merchant marine service.

Statistics which reveal that Canada's requirement for certified ship personnel has increased by 12 per cent since 1970 and the requirement for officers 27 per cent in the same period concern me. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we do not have the facilities in Canada to train these people. I hope the hon. member who spoke before me will check his figures. I believe he used the figure of 17,000 seagoing personnel in Canada, but I understand the correct figure is approximately 29,000 people. At the present time there is a shortage of training facilities, with the result that we are unable to train people to fill positions, and this has had the effect in the last several years of increasing the number of marine accidents in Canada.

For three and a half years I have petitioned the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to set up on the west coast a coast guard training facility—or call it what you want. We will be setting up a volunteer coast guard operation on the west coast of Canada, but we do not have a training facility. Nor do we have a training facility to give fishermen navigation and similar courses to upgrade their skills. Instead of spending millions of dollars on search and rescue facilities to find people in trouble off the coast, whether they are private boaters or commercial fishermen, what we should be doing is using a small percentage of that money for training facilities so that we have people with navigational skills to sail the west coast waters of Canada, which are no doubt dangerous.

In 1978 a council was set up to look into the situation. We are not going to rectify or solve the problem by setting up an advisory board, and in this respect I hope I have some agreement from members on the opposite side from British Columbia. Rather we should be setting up an institution on the west coast to provide training facilities for native fishermen, commercial fishermen and private boaters, and also for our merchant marine. I hope members from the west will support me when I say to the Minister of Transport: "Do not set up any more commissions or advisory boards to tell us what we need. We know what we need on the west coast; give us the money to build institutions and to hire people to provide training for those who risk their lives in the waters off the west coast of Canada."

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member allow a question?

[Mr. Anderson.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Capilano is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, when I have finished my remarks I will welcome a question from the hon. member.

In this day and age there should not be this serious need for qualified personnel in the marine sector. On the west coast of British Columbia, with the salmon enhancement program, a new era will commence as far as our commercial fishermen are concerned. Therefore, would it not be more appropriate, instead of increased surveillance by teams of destroyers, aircraft, helicopters, which are all very expensive, to funnel a small portion of those costs into the education of people using the waters off the west coast of Canada? We presently face a problem of calamitous proportions in British Columbia in using hovercraft and various other services to help people whose pleasure boats get into difficulties on weekends. This costs a vast amount of money.

I suggest that the establishment of a single facility which could be used by the merchant service, by the volunteer coast guard, by the permanent coast guard, by people in our armed forces, by pleasure boaters and by commercial fishermen is a top priority for the west coast of Canada. Certainly priority is not in the field of a study of what is required in order to train personnel for the merchant marine on the west coast.

I understand there is a coast guard training facility on the east coast of Canada. However, I suggest that the differences between the east and west coasts are great enough to justify two separate facilities.

An advisory council, for all its good intentions, is not what is required at this time. There are 29,000 seagoing people in the merchant marine and other forms of marine activity. The annual revenue is $750 billion, so we are not talking about a penny-ante group or a small portion of Canadian workers. For that reason I support the arguments brought forward by my colleague the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay).

Since we are technologically developed and have a good transportation service in the country inland, it is hoped that the same policies can be applied to making the marine industry strong and viable.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), who said he would allow me a question at the end of his remarks. The hon. member spoke rather extensively about the need for training programs, particularly on the west coast and for native people there. Can he in the few minutes left explain why the government failed to support the training program that the Indian Brotherhood had in place at Alert Bay? They had there a seaman's and fisherman's training program that failed to maintain the support of the government. Why did the government let that fail when it was very badly needed in that particular area of British Columbia?

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to answer that question. I obviously do not want to talk out this motion. Very briefly, I am suggesting there is a need for a totally co-ordinated, overall view of shipping and maritime activities in British Columbia, not just of one group or another. There should be one organization to cater to the needs of people in British Columbia whether they are involved in the pleasure boat industry, the commercial fishery, the coast guard, coastal trade or maritime trade between nations. Instead of a piecemeal approach, we need an over-all approach which will provide a facility to deal with all these questions, not just one small segment of the problem.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian power squadron is in place through which most amateur yachtsmen have taken extensive training. Most people who use the water are quite skilled in their hobby. The hon. member did not answer the question why his government allowed the Indian Brotherhood training program for fishermen on the north coast of Vancouver Island to lapse, particularly in light of his concern for these things.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The time allotted to the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 6.14 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF CERTAIN HARBOURS

The House resumed, from Friday, February 3, 1978, consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent) that Bill C-2, respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I only have four minutes left in which to conclude the remarks I began last Friday. I will do my best with the time which remains to me.

As the minister knows, the importance of the fisheries to Newfoundland cannot be overemphasized. At least 20,000 people are directly employed in the industry as fishermen, fish plant workers or trawler crews. This figure must be seen against the background of a total labour force of 190,000. So the industry has a gigantic impact on Newfoundland. If we use a multiplier factor of only 1.5, another 30,000 people depend on the fishing industry. There are whole sections in Newfoundland—I would say two-thirds of the province—in which people would not be able to live at all in the absence of a fishing industry.

In the last few months the minister has become too dictatorial, too rigid. He may be changing that attitude somewhat; I understand he had a meeting in Halifax on Friday with the provincial ministers, who seemed to be satisfied. Perhaps the minister has learned his lesson and will, in future, be less dictatorial and rigid than he was in 1977. I hope this is the case, because Newfoundland will not be satisfied with any situation in which the federal government dictates to the province how, when or whether it will survive. I should like the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to consider the major issues which are now before the country affecting the fishing industry.

My final point has to do with the community of St. Lawrence. A few days ago the fluorspar mine there closed. Alcan moved out. The Canadian government did nothing to pressure Alcan to keep that mine open. It did nothing to encourage Alcan to remain in St. Lawrence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I find difficulty in following the hon. member's remarks. I cannot see how they relate at this point to the bill before us.

Mr. Crosbie: I will tell you how, Mr. Speaker. Alcan has abandoned the mine and there are now 300 people unemployed in St. Lawrence. In these circumstances the proposal has gone from St. Lawrence to the government asking for assistance in the establishment of a fish plant so that the unemployed miners could work in the fish plant and as fishermen. There is a fine port at St. Lawrence. The fishery is the only way in which these people can now make a living. A proposal has been made by Fishery Products Limited, supported by the Newfoundland government, supported by the St. Lawrence committee which is looking after the unemployed, that a fish plant be built in the town. Some assistance from DREE would be needed and an application has been made to Ottawa. Help is also needed from the fisheries department, because this is to be not just an inshore plant taking fish from inshore fishermen but a year-round operation taking fish from offshore vessels. This would involve Portuguese fishing boats and the minister would have to license them to land fish at the plant before the scheme could go forward.

Two weeks ago an official of DREE said the federal government was a long way from making any decision on this proposed fish plant. According to remarks of his which have been quoted, whether Portuguese vessels would be licensed to land fish at St. Lawrence was a question which was puzzling the minister. I would point out that the unemployed people of St. Lawrence are unemployed in part because the federal government did nothing to oblige or encourage Alcan to continue its operations in a mine which is still a profit-maker, although the government went berserk when Sun Life said it was moving its head office from Montreal. I suppose moving from Newfoundland is different from moving from Quebec.

Anyway, there is a chance of putting a fish plant in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland. I ask the minister not to listen to those officials who say it involves a difficult decision. An assistant to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), one Tom Webb, was quoted on January 20 as saying that the federal government was a long way from making any decision on the proposed plant. Well, if that is an accurate reflection of DREE's attitude toward this proposal, Mr. Webb will be a long way from surviving with the present minister. This month the mine was finally closed and the 300 unemployed people there need a chance to get themselves launched again. I ask the minister to act quickly on this situation at St. Lawrence.

I think my time is about up so I leave the House with the plea that a quick decision be made.

● (2012)

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on third reading of Bill C-2, and I delighted to see the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) in the chamber this evening. I was very interested in the remarks which the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) made last Wednesday. He is also a member of parliament from the province of Ontario, which has more than a passing interest in that portion of the minister's budget that is allocated to small harbours and recreation. There are many anomalies within this bill which we cannot support.

As a representative from one of the principal tourist areas in Canada, small craft harbours and recreational facilities are of the utmost importance to me and to my constituents. I want to emphasize just how important it is that the province of Ontario be represented in this debate. Many people think that, because Ontario is one of the most populated and more wealthy provinces in Canada, we naturally benefit the most when it comes to the spending of government money. That is certainly not the case with small craft harbours. In this case, Ontario is getting the short end.

The estimates for fisheries and marines for 1978 allot only $30 million to the important and neglected area of small craft harbours, a mere $4 million of which is destined for Ontario, which amounts to roughly 10 per cent. Sixty per cent of this will be spent on commercial fishing harbours. What is left over will be spent on recreational facilities, development and maintenance costs. The amount left over, which is the actual amount of money that will go to the construction and maintenance of recreational small craft harbours, is disgracefully inadequate.

I have heard hon. members from the Atlantic provinces and the province of British Columbia speak of the need for funds for fishing harbours and how money allotted for recreational and tourist purposes is being taken away from the fishing area. Recreational facilities are of very high economic priority to my constituency, as well as to the neglected areas of the province of Ontario.

I would like to point out that in my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka people trying to make a living depend very heavily on tourist dollars. Those tourist dollars will be generated if, and only if, we have adequate facilities to accommodate those who want to use them. Perhaps some of the hon. members who begrudge the allocation of funds for recreational and tourist purposes are misled by the word "recreational". Perhaps they think we want only to upgrade the facilities for our own use or for the sake of appearance. We need to improve facilities to protect the valuable tourist dollar and the competitive position of tourist operators in the area. I would argue—and I am sure the tourist operators in my riding would agree with me—that the tourist dollar is just as important as the upgrading of fishing harbours to the fishermen in the Atlantic provinces and the west coast.

We in Ontario must be able to accommodate the increase in boating and the number of boating enthusiasts who visit each summer. Boating is growing in Ontario at the rate of 12 per cent per year. This has placed a considerable strain on facilities. In many instances these facilities are badly in need of maintenance and upgrading. I do not have to emphasize the importance of the tourist dollar to Canada. A few days ago, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) announced some very important proposals in an effort to lower our staggering tourist deficit. These are certainly welcome changes, but what is important in my riding is accommodating the thousands of tourists who visit each summer from Canada and the United States and use our small craft harbours.

The recreational aspect of small craft harbours has been largely overshadowed by the importance of the fishing industry on the east and west coasts. I am not advocating that there should be any less emphasis on that very vital industry. Certainly they have very real economic and unemployment problems, which surpass those in my own riding and in most parts of Ontario. Nevertheless, the absolute need to improve and create new facilities in Ontario must not be ignored. Ontario is not receiving its fair share of federal money for the construction and maintenance of these facilities. We in this province depend heavily on tourist income dollars to help the economy grow. Small craft harbours, their upkeep and growth are very important parts of the tourist industry in Canada.

Ontario has a tourist potential which is unmatched in this country. Approximately 110 million people live within one day's drive of the Great Lakes. In 1972 a study of central Canada indicated that Ontario had 774,000 small craft. With the average growth rate, the estimates indicate that this year there are approximately 1,300,000 craft in Ontario. We must rid ourselves of the idea that recreational small craft harbours are somehow not very important compared to the fishing industry in the maritimes and on the west coast. They are important to the tourist industry, to the economy of the province of Ontario and to Canada. In 1976-1977 the value placed on sport fishing in Ontario by the provincial government was $450 million, which is a considerable amount of money. Unless we are able to continue to provide the facilities, the tourist industry will greatly suffer.

In conclusion, I should like to urge that the province of Ontario be given its due consideration and attention in the area of small craft harbours. When the government comes up with a bill which reflects adequately the needs of Ontario, then I will be prepared to support it.

Once again, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Niagara Falls. I should like to refer to an article which he wrote that appeared in the Canadian Yachting Magazine. It was entitled "The Marina Crunch". It outlined the plight of recreational boating facilities in Ontario. He referred to some very, very excellent statistics, which I am sure are correct. In part that article reads as follows:

—Ontario has 25 per cent of all the freshwater in Canada, several thousand miles of shoreline and approximately 53 per cent of all the small craft in Canada. The bulk of the population of North America lives either in or within easy driving or boating distance making our waterways very heavily utilized. Consider as well that recent studies have projected rates of growth in boating in the Toronto area at 8.7 per cent per year compounded annually and rates of growth in Ontario over-all at 12 per cent compounded annually. By 1980, there will be nearly two million small craft in Ontario alone, and forecasts for the Toronto area show a need to multiply present facilities five to six times by 1990.

Thus, Toronto and Lake Ontario will be bulging at the seams. As I was flying from Toronto today, I met the Metro chairman, Mr. Paul Godfrey, and I said I would put in a plug for Toronto to see if we could get more recreational facilities for that great tourist city, as well as the areas east and west of it. Let me present another statistic certainly worthy of mention that was contained in this report:

● (2022)

In 1974, Canadians spent 3.6 billion dollars on recreational or leisure goods and about ten per cent of this was for sailboats, boats and motors. Dealers indicate sales of 140,000 boats in Ontario in this same year. With residents taking up water sport activities at an ever increasing rate, with spending on leisure goods increasing 21 per cent faster than total income and 58 per cent faster than spending on all other consumer goods, the marina crunch problem is not going to go away—

The money the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) receives in excise taxes through the sale of boats and motors runs into millions and millions of dollars.

I had the privilege this year of spending a day at the boat show looking at the various types of boats, from the smallest canoe to boats valued up to $150,000. They were really something to see, as well as were the huge crowds taking an interest in boating. With the energy crisis sailboats seem to be moving ahead and will begin to be more popular.

Again I am hoping the minister will give serious consideration to making sure more money is ploughed into the province of Ontario for recreational harbour facilities. Out of the $230 million the most Ontario can expect to get in 1977-78 is $4 million, and that is just peanuts, with all due respect to the minister, when you consider the thousands of miles of shoreline with the Great Lakes and the many other lakes of this province, and the greatest tourist industry in the entire dominion of Canada.

I was pleased to hear from the office of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) this evening that under FLIP, the federal labour-intensive program, there has been allocated an expenditure of $300,000 for upgrading the coast guard base in the town of Parry Sound. I understand this will provide 240 man-months of work. Let me add that the entire coast guard facilities there are so old fashioned, or just old, they should be reconstructed entirely, but at least this is a step in the right direction.

Again with a total budget of $230 million hon. members will agree that more should be directed toward this tourist industry which is the second largest in all of Canada, one we should consider very seriously. It is an industry that must be cultivated. The way things have been going lately a great many Canadians are certainly not helping out by heading south, though I admit that the weather we have been facing recently is not the most conducive to keeping Canadians in Canada, especially in January and February. However, when the weather improves and the boating season starts again I certainly hope a great many of our Canadian and American tourists will see fit to come to Ontario, which has the greatest tourist area of all.

The town of Parry Sound is a port used by ocean-going vessels. In August 1976 I had the privilege of attending a regatta or a weekend gathering there of the Great Lakes Cruising Club from Michigan. Most of the participants were from the United States. There was over $3 million in boats tied up in the harbour at Parry Sound. The harbour was taxed to its capacity and the floating docks were not of the best. I suggest the facilities should be expanded greatly, particularly when I see how much money this brings into the area.

As the hon. member of parliament for Parry Sound-Muskoka, I think primarily of my own riding but the same arguments apply to the riding of Niagara Falls and to all other ridings which border the Great Lakes, as well as the many ridings which have inland lake frontage. The tourist industry is very important and, therefore, money spent on facilities, harbours, launching ramps and so on by the minister's department represents money well spent. I suggest to the minister that if he casts his bread upon the waters he will bring in so much money that Treasury Board will probably give him more for 1978-79.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That can be done only with the consent of the hon. member.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to quote some of my remarks made in a speech and in an article I wrote. I wonder if he would now commit himself by saying he has seen the wisdom of the minister's bill, he is willing to join him in support of the measure, and he will help him in getting this bill passed?

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member was not here at the time I told the minister his bill contains a lot of good points, but certainly it leaves a lot to be hoped for and that is the reason I am not prepared to support it at the present time.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question interjected by the hon. member opposite let me say that there may be some things embraced by this bill that are of value to the tourist industry, but the bill itself does precious damn little for the fishermen.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Did you ask them?

Mr. Forrestall: You are a little older that I am, Sir, but not that much. I was handlining halibut in the Annapolis basin in the 1930s too, sir, so I know one end of it from the other. What I have reference to is a $1 billion industry and the value returned to the economy of Canada.

Let me admit at the outset I am not one of those who sat as a member of the committee because of other responsibilities and other commitments. I wish I had been a member and had had the opportunity to listen to the explanation and rationalization of this measure by the minister and his officials. I should have liked to participate and bring to the committee's attention the view of the fishermen on the east coast.

After reading the evidence produced before the committee in respect of this bill, and having listened to the debates when the bill was before us previously, I recognize that the difficulties and problems faced by the fishermen on the east coast of Nova Scotia in relation to this measure are the same as those faced by fishermen in other parts of Atlantic Canada. The concerns expressed by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) going back many years regarding the fisheries in Atlantic Canada and off the west coast are valid concerns. They are concerns based on experience, an awareness of the capacity of government in these areas, an awareness of the realities of the sea, and an awareness of the deficiency of an ad hoc approach to what could potentially be a reasonable stimulant to the Atlantic economy in the years beyond 1980 to the end of the century, and probably even beyond.

It is because of the concern expressed by such members as the hon. member for South Shore that I pay particular attention to his comment to the minister that it is passing strange that the minister and his officials would find it appropriate not to increase the funding available to the fishery but rather to embark, without a useful dialogue, on the halving of the number of small harbours in use in Canada today by our fishermen.

It is particularly strange that the minister seems pressed by his colleagues, by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and by others on the treasury benches, to take that action. I am not sure whether the minister is a member of the treasury group. If he is, then there is no excuse, but if he is not, it is regrettable. I find it startling and somewhat frightening that the hon. member for South Shore should be alarmed, that he sees in this move, out of his experience and background, an attempt by the minister and his department to increase his capacity to work with the ports, not by increasing funding but rather by halving the number of ports with the same amount of money, thereby realizing an increase in the amount of money to be spent on particular ports. It is an odd type of economic approach.

It seems surprisingly strange, against the background of a parliament which will witness the write-off of the Seaway debt, the Air Canada debt and the Canadian national debt amounting to well over $2 billion, that the level of funding for the fisheries on the west coast is as disturbingly low as this. It may be that the comments and observations made by the minister in the House the other day are quite valid. I find difficulty in relating the minister's plea, for example, with respect to what the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said, quite properly, that the reason for restrictions on the Canadian east ports for such things as crew changes, catch transfers, etc., should continue in face of the removal of the very reason why those restrictions were imposed. I find it perhaps acceptable, although I wish the minister could find an opportunity to explain to us in a little more detail how he intends to use these instruments as levers of negotiation. I wish he would be a little more explicit about what it is he thinks he can bargain away with us, because it seems to many of us that now we have an opportunity, as the hon. member for St. John's West observed, to turn our ports into gas stations for the substantial fleet out there.

I think that probably we should go further than that. I think it should be literally one stop shopping. We should take advantage, quite openly and blatantly, of the changed circumstances, for which I give the minister every mark and every credit. We can debate whether or not it was on time and whether or not it should have happened years ago. We can talk about the preoccupation of the government with matters other than those basic to our economy and to our people in Atlantic Canada. We can talk about the very unacceptable impact that that has had in high unemployment in the fisheries and on our general economic well being. But I do not understand the value of this as a bargaining instrument. It seems to me that with the underutilized repair capacity of our shipyards now is the time when we should be trying to attract ships to our yards and to our ports, not only for such things as crew changes and fish catches, but to actively promote the unused capacity of our yards to effect minor and major repairs and overhauls. We are not doing this, and I find this passing strange. It has been a long time since Atlantic Canada has had the opportunity offered by the fishery to help our own people well into the forseeable future. For the government not to take the fullest advantage of the opportunity which is now in our hands is, I think, unacceptable.

It may well be that the minister is fighting his battle alone. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others have clearly demonstrated in the last ten or 12 years that their concern is centred on constitutional amendments, on bilingualism in the country, on national unity and on all these esoteric questions. It may well be that that is the reason the minister is alone, and if it is the cause of the minister's inability to accept the challenge of the opportunity, then he has my sympathy and my support. If, on the other hand, it is not that, then I suggest that he should give more serious consideration to taking over Mr. Higgins' job. He might be better suited for it. However, I suspect it is the former reason. I expect he struggles alone in his fight on behalf of Canadian fishermen. I will just repeat that I find it passing strange.

We have the opportunity, for example, to attract the East Germans to the marine slip in the Halifax shipyards, $1.5 million worth of work, but we have done nothing about it. However, if they were looking for increased quotas, I would not say to the minister he has taken the wrong posture with respect to that because I would not give them increased quotas. The fact of the matter is that it is to their advantage to use our yards, our ports and our facilities. They have had a free ride for a long time, as the minister knows. They have used our navigational aids, our search and rescue capacity, and our ports for emergency purposes, and can continue to do so. I just think it should be done on an organized basis, with the full awareness of the government, so that the provinces, municipalities, ports and towns could capitalize on onshore expenditures and the supply of ships, overhauls and repairs. Millions of dollars are being missed by not being aggressive. In doing that I do not believe the minister would significantly impair his capacity to bargain for the concessions he has in mind and about which we are all aware.

● (2042)

With respect to the bill more specifically, concerns have been expressed with respect to the broad authority and power of the minister to levy fees without adequate consultation. While the minister may have gone ahead with the establishment of fisheries advisory boards on the east and west coasts—some hon. members seem to feel they have been established; others find that there are people whom the government pays $10,000 or $15,000 for advice on what should be done in herring fisheries or other fisheries—to the best of my knowledge the minister has not carried through on his correspondence with me. As a matter of fact, on February 23, 1977, one year ago, the minister indicated that he would be establishing advisory boards.

> Fisheries advisory boards for the east and west coasts, proposed Monday by (the minister), will only benefit the fishing industry if fishermen themselves are appointed board members, spokesmen . . . said—

I wish the minister would find some occasion on which to keep hon. members better advised as to just what is going on. For example, do we have a board on the eastern shore? If we do, it would be very interesting to hear from the board, to know who is on it, to know the work that is being contemplated and to know how the minister feels that he can best be advised by such a board. To the best of my knowledge we do not have one. In late September the minister indicated to me that his officials were presently working on the details of such counsel, but he expected it would be some time before he knew precisely how the boards would work. It would be interesting to follow through a little bit more with that because consultation has been seen to be less than effective or desirable in terms of the input the fishermen are capable of making.

Several years ago the Eastern Shore Fishermen's Protection Association met with federal and provincial departmental people and set out some priorities. They were never followed, and nothing really ever came of them. Apart from meetings initiated by fishermen individually or by the president of that association on their behalf, to the best of my knowledge there has not been an on-going and meaningful consultative process. If the minister wants the benefit of the views and knowledge of fishermen, he should involve himself in discussions with individual fishermen. That can be done only through his department.

I wonder if the minister had any knowledge of what would happen to him when he introduced that little amendment the other night. I am sure the minister is concerned about the sentiments expressed by hon. members. He has shown us the courtesy of being here and listening. He has paid attention as I have watched him today and over the last three or four days. However, in the area of the ability of the department to work with the men in the field, I know this is very difficult, but, on the other hand, it is very important. It is also important that the minister remember that his officials must work closely with fishermen as well as processing and marketing people.

For example, if my information is correct, and I have no reason to believe it is not, the department has had a study in its possession for some time. This study is a very useful one and involves the role large cold storage freezers can play in helping the industry to move from production into marketing or to a combination of both. The department has had this study in its possession for four or five months or perhaps even longer. I know the study dealt with the areas around Sydney, Halifax, Lunenburg, Yarmouth, the strait area and so forth. It dealt with the need for, and the use of, major cold storage centres. I wonder why the study has remained secret. Why can the industry not have access to it? The first complaint I had about this came from the National Harbours Board. Why can the government's Crown agency not have access to studies if they are available? If this particular study is available, I suggest that the minister is not being open and frank with the people in the industry. His failure to consult adequately and continually with fishermen is an admission of his inability to be open and frank with them. There is no question that we need strategically located major cold storage plants. I think they should be privately operated, but it is very important, whether they are in the hands of the industry or of the government, that they be common users. That is a personal feeling I have. If that study relates to cold storage, why can the industry not have access to it? Why do we not know what is going on? Is the minister saving the study for an election gimmick? Is it getting that close?

Far too little has been done in the area of bait freezing and storage capacity. Where attempts have been made by private fishermen to establish bait freezing capacity for their own use in their own areas, those fishermen have been met with frustration either as a result of provincial or federal bureaucracy. Good ideas are frustrated by bureaucracy. I hate the term "bureaucracy", but these people are frustrated by someone reading the letter of the law. The last fisherman I talked to about this is being charged tax on the materials which went into a freezer. It is not a federal problem but it is a federal responsibility. This is a serious question.

● (2052)

There is probably some merit in the suggestion that it is time the provinces began to look at the question of whether control and authority over the fishery should return to them and be taken out of the hands of the federal authority. A hundred years ago or right at the beginning of our fishery it was the old political structure that exercised authority and had responsibility. I am one of those who believe that as the oil in the ground belongs to Alberta, so the fish in the sea off the coasts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia belong to those provinces.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: That is a typical Liberal reaction. You would find fault with any concept brought forward. You have been in there so damn long your mind is closed. You have become lazy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair, but I hope he was not addressing his remarks to the Chair just now.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I am not about to accuse you of becoming lazy or indifferent.

Just as the oil in the ground and the resources belong to the provinces, the resources of the Atlantic area belong to the Atlantic provinces. As long as we continue with ad hoc solutions to the problems and ignore the development of the opportunity that lies before us, the question of the provinces again assuming authority over the fisheries will be debated.

The minister would be the first to admit that there are many areas in which he wishes he could do more. Most fishermen that I know have a fair amount of respect for the minister. In some instances they have come to rely on his judgment, to respect his caution and to accept his word about methods of resolving their problems. I am not going to refer to the minister seeking the leadership of a party somewhere else although he might be an adornment to his province if he did so; but, Mr. Speaker, we must face the fact that the minister might not always be here and in that light his assurances cannot be taken for more than that—just assurances.

The minister will do those things he believes to be important but that is not good enough for the fishery. It is not good enough to say that the schedule of fees will not be usurious but will be applied with care and concern. The people want something more specific and in the absence of an explanation the minister is treading on very dangerous ground. He is assuming a responsibility and authority that the people affected will not accept.

The only provisions in the bill that are new are the schedule of fees and minor changes in three or four areas. For the most part the bill consolidates and brings under one umbrella a lot of practices that are common and acceptable. What cannot be accepted is the assurance that these things will not hurt the fishery. Unless the minister can demonstrate to the fishermen that some of these charges will not be usurious, they will not trust him. Our own view flows from a desire to be open and frank and to tell the fishermen what we would do and how we would do it.

The minister has given himself wide authority and far-reaching powers in this bill. Many people in the fishery are outraged when they see pork barrelling, and an increase in the numbers of wharfingers. They do not like the continuing conflict between the minister and his provincial colleagues. We in this party want a better relationship between the fishery and the search and rescue capability. We also want improved repair and maintenance of wharves and breakwaters. We are told that because we catch only about 2 per cent of the fishery we are only entitled to 2 per cent of the money. Mr. Speaker, how does the minister expect us to do any better unless we are given wharves and harbours so that our young people may be encouraged to go into the fishery?

I asked the minister about dredging the Musquodoboit harbour and he said it could not be done. Mr. Speaker, it has the potential to become one of the finest private small craft harbours on the Atlantic seaboard. The Department of Public Works said they could not do it, but a local firm claimed they could do it in half a day. They said the job was too small for them, however. The Department of Public Works, on the other hand, thought the job was too big for them to tackle. There was only a handful of fishermen there, Mr. Speaker. It was not only the fishermen I asked about, but also the capacity of Musquodoboit harbour to handle boats and become a location for a series of marinas which would encourage private sailing and private use by Americans and people from other parts of Atlantic Canada as they traversed the south and east coasts of Nova Scotia.

We need the co-operation and the understanding of the treasury benches and the government that the fisheries require substantially higher funding. We need to end the disparate attitude which accompanies so much of the decision-making process within government in areas such as the fishery. We need to develop both our inshore and offshore fisheries. We do not need the hocus-pocus that the minister must sometimes go through in order to hide from our Atlantic fishermen the difficulty he has in convincing his colleagues in government that there is anything worth while in the fishing industry.

As a matter of fact, the only other member of the entire cabinet whom I have heard refer to the fishery in the last two or three years has been the Secretary of State of External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). No other minister, including the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), who comes from a great fishing riding, has bothered to mention it at all.

We need a better spirit amongst the people and the generation of enthusiasm. We need more than FLIP and LIP programs to develop our fishery.

The licence fees should be increased and the money used to improve the Loran and Decca systems. I do not mind soaking the foreigners who are off our coasts. For 10 or 15 years they have had a free ride on the backs of those navigational systems. Take the money from them. Do not put it into general revenue unless it is absolutely certain that every nickel is returned to the fishermen by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). Every cent that is raised belongs to the fishermen of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. That money should be poured back into the development of their own resource.

That is the reason for my suggestion of the return of authority and control over the fishery to the provinces. I say return because this parliament, not this chamber precisely, took it away from the provinces in the beginning. The provinces can get it back. We must demonstrate a willingness to help the fishermen develop their own resources and their own livelihood to levels that are acceptable and most important, to bring it to levels that will encourage young people to return to the fishery. I do not blame the provinces for saying they wished they had more control.

If the principle of equalization is to have any meaning over the next 20 to 30 years, it will have to find justification, rationalization and a changed attitude on the part of this government toward the fishermen. But I think the minister has been abandoned. There has been such a preoccupation in the last ten years with matters other than those which are basic to our way of life that our basic primary resources have suffered. I repeat, we do not need ad hoc programs; we need programs that flow from reality. We need more money. We need to open up our ports. We need to create jobs in the shipyards. These things have to be done. Trust must be re-established between the minister and the fishermen with respect to the scheduling of fees. What will be the amount of the fees and how great will the impact be on the fishermen? These are the essentials. We must seize the opportunity, but with caution, and ensure that this economic generator is developed in the best way possible for the advancement of people on the east and west coasts as well as the advancement of our very rich nation.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to say a few words about Bill C-2. I am not given to praising people too highly because I am always afraid it might go to their heads. But the fact remains that in all sincerity I must say to the minister that I am under the impression that in the present circumstances he put in a lot of heart and time to try and bring a little help and relief first to fishermen and then to vacationers, those who have pleasure boats.

Personally, I am not jealous that others have marinas and fishing harbours. I think, and the minister is certainly aware of this, that Quebec is clearly underprivileged when it comes to recreational and fishing harbours for small and medium size boats when you consider that certain provinces have over 2,000 recreational harbours and there are only some 30 of them in Quebec at most, I believe.

This brings me naturally to talk about the Lower St. Lawrence area that I represent, namely Rimouski. I do not know whether the minister knows the Rimouski area but I think he knows it quite well. He is no doubt aware that Rimouski is a rather strategic area for pleasure boats. Indeed, judging from last year's business figures, the port of Rimouski is the second most important after, I think, Sept-Îles.

There are also many social clubs, sporting clubs and many owners of pleasure crafts in Rimouski. There are also a dozen fishermen living mostly off fishing there. Unfortunately they have no place to moor or tie up their craft. Of course there is the port of Rimouski but it is exposed in bad weather and there is difficulty in keeping the boats secure. Those fishermen fishing for cod, red fish or other species of fish in the gulf estuary would be quite happy naturally, even if they had to pay reasonable mooring fees to have a place to tie up their boats, land their catches and occasionally be able to make a few minor repairs.

● (2112)

Mr. Speaker, nor should we forget either pleasure craft owners who would be quite willing to pay mooring fees inasmuch as these fees are reasonable and that adequate services are available. As the minister knows, the city of Rimouski is some 350 miles downstream from Montreal and close to 200 miles from Quebec city in the quadrangle formed by Rivière-du-Loup, Saguenay, Matane and Baie-Comeau. The river width in these places can reach 50 miles. Sometimes the sea can be rather rough especially when there are strong winds which are called "nordet" in that area, or northeast winds if you want. I think it is more or less comparable with prevailing conditions in the Chaleur Bay so there is a lot of danger when we do not have any safe place to moor our boats.

The city of Rimouski has some 30 to 40 small boat owners. The city also boasts a marine school and a research centre sponsored by the University of Quebec. In addition, Rimouski has a university which can provide any courses related to fisheries and navigation.

Mr. Speaker, it is for all these reasons that I am asking the minister to provide us with adequate services because Rimouski and the areas of Bic, Sainte-Flavie and Sainte-Luce have been deprived of such services for too long. As I said earlier, we are not very well known, but I think that it would be high time now, in the spring of 1978, to build a marina suited to and worthy of the largest city in the lower St. Lawrence region. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay this debate any longer and I am urging the minister in the name of the people of Rimouski to put an end to the delays which the whole population of the lower St. Lawrence has been enduring regarding the building of a marina in Rimouski and at the same time provide improvements to the existing services for the dozens of fishermen in that area. I am also asking the minister if the Canada-Quebec agreements have now been signed and if he will indicate to me in his answer if he can really grant my request.

[English]

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, this is the first occasion I have had to speak on either Bill C-2 or its predecessor which was introduced for second reading and debate on December 10, 1976. I reread the speech made by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) on that occasion. I listened with real interest to the debate that took place on Bill C-2.

I do not want to delay the House for too long; however, there are a few matters on which I would like to comment as well as a few points with regard to the measure as it affects the province of British Columbia. The legislative provisions deal with two particular interests of our society in general. Both of these are of great importance to British Columbia. I refer to the fishing industry and also the recreation and tourist industry.

In introducing this bill, the minister stated, as recorded at page 2413 of Hansard:

> This act will provide the necessary legislative authority to develop and administer commercial fishing and recreational harbours in Canada in order to meet the changing requirements of the fisheries and the growing needs of sports fishing and recreational boating.

It is well known that the fishing industry is of paramount interest to the province of British Columbia. Because of the extent of that industry, it is vital to the maintenance of a healthy economy as well.

With regard to the commercial fishery, direct employment in the British Columbia fishing industry is about 100,000 persons. The direct export value of the product is about $250 million per year. The level of investment in the fishing fleet, equipment, plant and machinery is approximately $1 billion. Therefore, we see that this is not a small sector of the British Columbia economic picture or just a small part of the national picture. It is of substantial concern and interest.

The question may be asked why I, living somewhat more distant from the coast than some of my colleagues, would have an interest in the fisheries. I would point out that consideration must be given to the fact that the Fraser fishery is the mainstay of the British Columbia fishing industry. I have the honour to represent part of the Fraser river area. It is questionable whether the industry could remain viable without the fishery of the Fraser river.

The British Columbia fishing industry is one of a very few industries in Canada which is entirely vertically integrated, responsible for harvesting, processing and marketing of renewable natural resources in the finished form. The Pacific Trollers' Association points out it is also labour intensive and highly export oriented. What makes the industry unique is its relative independence from any direct support or subsidy by public funds. It does not require elaborate tariff and non-tariff protection for its existence. The association presentation also points out that the industry accounts for some $250 million annual in direct exports. Therefore, we can see that fisheries is an important industry in the province of British Columbia.

In our consideration of this industry, we ought to give a little more attention to the west coast fishery. Many times we find that we are left out of the discussion and debate. Since coming here some years ago, I have found that in many areas of activity British Columbia seems just a little bit too far away to be brought into the usual area of concern, discussion and debate.

Reference was made to the sports fishery. Statistics show that the sports fishery in Canada employs over 100,000 individuals and generates about $1 billion for the economy. The present value of sports fishing boats in Canada is approximately $2 billion. At one point in the minister's presentation he mentioned that a great proportion of this activity would be in the province of British Columbia. In participating in this debate, I want again to emphasize the importance of the fishing industry. The bill before us certainly does concern itself with this industry.

British Columbia's extensive coastline and relatively small number of wharves and facilities presents the possibility of a greater, healthier, and more economic industry if proper steps are taken, not only to catch up with present requirements, but to provide future growth opportunities.

Sometimes we are content just to look at the situation as it exists at present. We try to adapt our proposals, legislation and programs to meet the situation as it is at the moment. There must be vision in the matter of providing facilities. We have to look far beyond the present. If we are to have the growth that we desire, we must plan for the future.

I wish to make a few comments with regard to recreation. It is equally well known that our tourist and recreational aspects make British Columbia the land of recreation for Canadians. In spite of what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) said, we still believe that British Columbia is Canada's evergreen playground. It is true there are times when the green is covered by a white substance, but that only adds to the beauty and attractiveness of the area.

● (2122)

Recreation is not only a local effort. It is tied in with tourism which has become one of our principal industries. Some people might suggest that in the face of the tremendous problems confronting Canada the government should concentrate only on areas which are a major source of concern and that in the field of recreation the people directly concerned should provide whatever is required.

The recreational aspect of the bill has a wider application than just meeting the needs and desires of local people in the community. It has a bearing upon the tourist industry. If facilities are not available we shall not be able to attract tourists to our country, and to British Columbia in particular. This is a matter of major concern. There has been a great deal of debate about the imbalance of the tourist account and it seems to me this is an area which requires a good deal of attention.

Urbanization has resulted in an effort on the part of a growing number of people to find relaxation and renew their physical and mental health in less populated areas. In British Columbia, roads have reached the point of such congestion—and this is true of other regions—that people hesitate to go out on them on holiday weekends. Nevertheless, more people than ever are finding their way to the waterways, lakes and camping areas and it is essential to provide wharves, marinas and ramps to meet their needs. Accordingly, I believe the inclusion of recreational facilities as one of the benefits of this bill is understandable. My own province would benefit not only directly but indirectly through the tourist industry. We should be looking not only at the present but to the requirements of future development.

There are several features in the bill which are causing apprehension and I should like to refer to some of them. They have already been dealt with to some extent, perhaps to a considerable extent, by my hon. friends, but I should like to associate myself with what they have said because they have been expressing the concern of a great many people across the country.

Reference has been made to the fee structure. The uncertainty with respect to this feature of the bill is a major problem. I realize that in the debate in which the minister took part he pointed out, as recorded at page 2414, that he did not intend to take any precipitate action, that nothing was contemplated at the present time but that at some time in the future consideration would have to be given to the imposition of a fee schedule so as to provide income for the various programs contemplated by the department.

This is not a sufficient assurance. It has been pointed out on many occasions that no matter how well intentioned the minister of the day might be no one knows when the situation will change. Some new minister might come along and say: "This is a matter which should have been taken care of during the debates on Bill C-2; we shall impose a fee structure without further delay." This is what is bothering those in the industry. I believe the minister should be more specific in outlining his intentions for the future as far as a fee structure is concerned.

He has indicated there will be a varying set of fees; in other words, that fees will not be the same across the country. This type of thinking is all too prevalent in the government's planning. We see it in tariffs, in transportation and in other directions. It is a source of real resentment among the people of British Columbia who feel they are treated differently from people in other parts of the nation. It is irksome. People are wondering when the government will come to the conclusion that British Columbia is an integral part of the nation. If national unity is to be maintained the government will have to look upon British Columbia as being an essential part of Canada and act accordingly.

I notice that as reported on page 2414 the minister said:

> The nucleus of the proposal we will bring to the fishermen is how we can best devise a fee system which will not only recognize market demand and relate to the level and quality of services provided but which will recognize regional differences. Obviously this means we are not going to be illogical enough, particularly in the case of east coast fishermen, to subsidize on the one hand and take it back through an unreasonable fee structure on the other.

We have no objection to consideration being given to the problems facing the fisheries on the east coast, but I believe if we are going to consider fees on that basis we must also take into account the needs of fishermen on the west coast. Speaking in another debate some time ago I pointed out that the industry in British Columbia was facing almost insuperable obstacles in its fight to maintain markets in the centre of the nation because of subsidy programs, lower wage rates and lower transportation costs in the east. I suggested that, as a measure of justice and equity, some form of compensation ought to be provided. When we come to the imposition of a fee structure, this aspect has to be taken into account as well.

I should like to refer now to a letter, a copy of which was sent to me, having to do with a statement made by the federal Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) to the Vancouver Province. The minister said that while details of the licensing arrangements still have to be worked out he is committed to the principle of a tax to cover some of the cost of salmon enhancement programs. The problem, the minister said, was making sure the cost of an enforcement of the program did not eat up the benefits. There would be some enforcement but it was not desirable to let the administrative produce so much ill will that it had to be changed.

Replying to this statement, the minister of energy, transportation and communications of British Columbia wrote to the minister under date of January 25. I wish to quote one or two passages from that letter. He said:

> We looked into this matter carefully when I was Fisheries Minister and the cost of the scheme was comparable to the revenue produced. And the research or statistical value was just about nil. You don't get a complete record of the number of fishermen involved and you don't get any data on the number of fish caught. So it won't help us to manage the fishery either.

This is the opinion of one who was minister of fisheries here in Ottawa and who is now minister of energy, transportation and communications in British Columbia. He pointed out that these matters were considered, but that it was not worth the work, the time nor the animosity which would be stirred up because the revenue produced would be spent on operating the program. Also he pointed out the problem in regard to the fee structure. The closing paragraph of his letter reads as follows:

● (2132)

> So I again urge you to treat us the same way that sports fishermen are treated in other saltwater areas of Canada. Keep the federal bureaucracy to a minimum and we'll all be better off as a result.

The minister should take cognizance of this particular reference which was made by one of his former colleagues. Perhaps there is some question as to the application of fees, but the real thrust of this letter is the unequal application of the program on the west coast as compared to elsewhere.

The degree of consultation was a matter brought to the attention of the minister. The government is not noted for its willingness to engage in productive consultation. Rather, confrontation has been the order of the day. It is not necessary for me to refer to the various measures brought before the House, nor is it necessary to refer to government attitudes which have been discussed before. Rather than engaging in consultation, the government partakes in a brief discussion and then proceeds. It says, "Take it or leave it. This is the way it will be, regardless of what you think". The minister should enter into real consultation with the provinces and those concerned in order to arrive at something which is acceptable and equitable, that will apply in an equitable fashion to those engaged in similar industries.

The matter of ministerial power has been mentioned by a number of hon. members. I will not refer to this at any length, except to say that this particular measure provides the minister with the authority to move out and lease facilities to any person. He can designate those who will be the enforcement officers. It does not stipulate their qualifications or anything else about them. It provides the minister with the ability to make decisions unilaterally without respect to any other considerations, which is unacceptable and could cause a great deal of harm to the minister because of the possibility of patronage.

I want to associate myself with the concerns which have been expressed by my colleagues in the hope that perhaps our combined efforts will move the minister to respond in a positive way to the reservations and views which have been expressed. If he responds in a positive manner, this bill could be made much more acceptable than it is at the present time.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-2, an act respecting the administration and development of certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada. While that language is perhaps typical of the title necessary for the drafting of a bill, it is broad and indefinite enough to make me nervous of the contents of the bill. As soon as the title refers to "certain fishing and recreational harbours in Canada", I become somewhat twitchy.

Some years ago I questioned the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) about the size of the bureaucracy in his department, and I found out that approximately half of the public servants in the fisheries department work in Ottawa.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): No way.

Mr. Friesen: No way? Have they been scattered? Have they been reduced?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): They are all over the place.

Mr. Friesen: Certainly they are not up the river streams and along the river beds of British Columbia. During the Christmas break I spoke to the fishermen. They indicated that they have been looking for those officials and they cannot seem to find them. When there are more people working in the offices than up the streams, then the entire department is in trouble.

Mr. Ellis: They are out poaching.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Mr. Friesen: I doubt that. The people who are out working in those areas are honest and dedicated. If it were not for those beleaguered few, the fishing industry would be in real trouble.

As some of my colleagues have already pointed out, several clauses in this bill tend to make us apprehensive. I should like to refer to clause 5(1) which reads as follows:

> The minister may undertake projects for the acquisition, development, construction, improvement or repair of any scheduled harbour or any fishing or recreational harbour to which this act applies.

Perhaps that language is normal, assuming the people out in the fishing areas are extensions of the minister. Too often that is not the case. The decision-making power still rests in Ottawa. While there may be a decentralization, it is a decentralization of administration and not of the decision-making process of the government. Thus, fishermen in the extremities of our country are faced with decisions made in Ottawa which do not properly apply to the regions.

For example, some time ago the minister and his officials decided to upgrade, rebuild or construct a new facility in Steveston Harbour. I am sure the minister is well aware of that project because it is sizeable. In fact, it is a $12 million project. The harbour was designed to accommodate ultimately 1,000 boats. Is that correct? I see the minister is nodding his head. The first phase of that project is designed for 350 boats. No one can argue about that. If it is to be expanded to accommodate 1,000 boats, one must assume the boats will come from far up the Fraser river to use the facilities at Steveston Harbour, unless the majority of the boats are recreational. It would be expecting an awful lot of fishermen to come from far up the Fraser river to use Steveston Harbour. This is an example of the minister deciding which harbour should be developed and developing it to the size he feels is necessary. That is not what the fishermen want. I was talking to them during the Christmas recess. I spent time with them in my office. I went to the harbours that we are talking about. They need facilities on site where their boats and homes are. Rather than one large complex at Steveston, the fishermen require a smaller one there, plus one at Ladner, one at Gunderson and one at New Westminster. I understand there will be a development at Ladner. I will elaborate on that later. Rather than one development for 1,000 boats, why not have four developments for 300 boats each?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Basically Steveston Harbour is a winter tie-up.

Mr. Friesen: As much as I hate to admit it, even in December it is winter in British Columbia. I was at the Gunderson slew. There are boats tied up five deep at Gunderson, 15 or 20 miles away from Steveston. They are on land and in dry dock. They are all over the place along the Fraser river. The minister refers to Steveston as mainly a winter tie-up, but does he expect the fishermen to go 15 or 20 miles downstream, into open water and around to Steveston harbour to tie up? To me, that is another example of an Ottawa decision.

• (2142)

I am happy to hear that the Ladner harbour is to be the recipient of something in the neighbourhood of $300,000 under FLIP. This really is no skin off the nose of the small harbours department because this is a winter works program, but it is a good thing for the fishermen and I am glad to hear of it.

The minister was in Vancouver on January 26 and spoke to the fishermen there. They in turn brought a number of things to his attention, one, for example, in respect of licensing fees. I know some of my colleagues have already brought this to the minister's attention, but there is a great deal of concern out there relative to the expected cost of licence fees. Is the fee to be $2, or $2 a foot? First of all, it is passing strange that we would adopt a fee schedule that has been used for pleasure craft and apply it to fishing operations. Is the fee to be $2 on the west coast and $1 on the east coast? We do not know, but again the feeling is that the very sweeping powers contained in the bill are too great.

I refer particularly to that part of the bill which states that the governor in council may make regulations prescribing schedules naming and delimiting or describing fishing or recreational harbours under the control and administration of the minister, the granting of licences to persons, and so on. Some of these things are logical but the fishermen have a right to know what they are going to have to pay. They certainly have the right to equity in that the fees ought to be the same on the west and east coasts. This is one concern they brought to the minister's attention.

The fishermen feel very strongly that the licence fees they are already paying for fishing ought to be sufficient. They are paying anywhere from $100 or $400 and feel perhaps that ought to be enough to cover the cost of mooring at docks. I know the minister says that the money goes into general revenue and then into the salmon enhancement program. I do not know that the fishermen are convinced this always happens. The fishermen see the amount of money paid into the licensing program and the amount being spent on the salmon enhancement program for British Columbia, but I think they would like to have some concrete evidence that the amount of money going into general revenue does end up for salmon enhancement. The minister shakes his head and I will not suggest what he is thinking because this is a polite society. No doubt he will have something to say about this a little later on, but I am telling the minister this is what the fishermen are concerned about. They are not convinced that the minister is playing ball with them. They wonder if some of that money going into general revenue is not being used in some other way.

There is another clause of this bill that was brought to the attention of the minister, and it is of great concern to me. This is the provision in clause 11 regarding search and seizure. Let me refer to that for a moment. It states in part:

> Where an enforcement officer believes on reasonable grounds that a provision of this Act or the regulations is not being complied with, he may
> (a) board any vessel or enter any vehicle or premises where or in respect of which he reasonably believes there may be evidence of such non-compliance and make any inspection he deems necessary;—

On the surface that seems to be reasonable. I am sure there could well be hanky-panky along the coast. Obviously when you are out in the "boonies" you might be tempted to play hanky-panky with the law, but this seems to be a very broad provision. Perhaps the minister will correct me, but it seems that the search and seizure described is without warrant. Am I right in that regard? There seems to be no need for a warrant on the part of an enforcement officer. Who are the enforcement officers? Are they to be fisheries officials, harbours officials or police officers, or will they be anybody deputized by the minister who will be allowed on any kind of suspicion to go on board a vessel and search, seize and hold properties, as I read the bill, for a specified length of time?

Perhaps the minister will clear these matters up when he responds, but at the present time I am concerned about the kind of powers contained in this bill. When the minister was in Vancouver he said to the fishermen that nothing was final. Those are words quoted to me by the fishermen. He said nothing was final.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Read my two speeches.

Mr. Friesen: Your two speeches?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Yes.

Mr. Friesen: Did you say to the fishermen that nothing was final?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): My words are in Hansard.

Mr. Friesen: The fishermen understood the minister to say that we were approaching report stage on this bill and nothing was final, implying obviously that things could be changed. Yet I have not seen any changes forthcoming. Even if the thing is final we are supposed to trust the minister. I think he has been doing a pretty good job as Minister of Fisheries. I do not always agree with him but on the whole I think he is doing a good job. I do not mind trusting him as I do not think he would abuse his powers, nor would he like it if his officials did.

This minister holds this portfolio now, but what are we going to do if, for example, the present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) were to become the minister of fisheries? Then we would be in trouble. What would be even worse is if the present Minister of State (Environment), the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), were to become the minister of fisheries. Then we would really be in trouble. As I say, I do not mind trusting this minister, but there are 33 other ministers and if any one of them were to become the next minister of fisheries what new climate would exist?

There is one final matter I should like to introduce to this debate, and this at least transcendentally relates to search and seizure powers. There are a number of recreational craft in my riding and in the neighbouring riding of Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. Since my riding impinges on the 49th parallel and crosses waters of the Pacific Ocean, this means that people using their pleasure craft occasionally travel into United States waters. This is bound to happen.

Last week I received a distress call from a party whose father had just moved to White Rock from Winnipeg, bought himself a pleasure craft and gone sailing out in the bay. He drifted into U.S. waters and landed there. He did not even know he had landed on United States soil. A customs officer met him, found out he was a Canadian, and after a little tête-à-tête the father returned to Canada thinking everything was fine. Three months later, after the United States customs office sent their records to the Canadian customs office, this man had a visit from a customs officer and received a fine of $400 for not reporting to Canadian customs. On going into the United States he reported to the customs.

When I got back to my constituency office in Surrey I found a letter from a party from Delta to whom a similar thing had happened. The party was in a boat and another boat carrying some friends had motor trouble. Out in the open water the natural law of the sea is that you help somebody in distress. They drifted into United States waters. When they returned, because of the distress they had experienced they forgot to report to Canadian customs. A few months later when the records came to Canada from United States customs another $400 fine was assessed. I have a Xerox copy of the report made by a man from the mobile inspection section on leaving Canada.

Let me first of all say I agree with the customs and excise people that they ought to enforce this law in a very stringent way. When there are many miles of open water, as is the case along the British Columbia coast, one can imagine what could happen if we did not enforce the law very stringently.

There could be smuggling of dope or liquor, illegal immigration, or any kind of smuggling going on on those open waters if we did not enforce the law stringently. But two things should happen. First, the small harbours branch of the minister's department should be co-operating with the U.S. authorities. There should be a liaison between the Canadian and the U.S. authorities so that when Canadians go to U.S. harbours and dock there and report to the U.S. customs officials, U.S. customs officials are encouraged to tell those Canadian boaters that when they land in Canada they should report to the Canadian authorities. All of the boaters who come back do so in good faith, otherwise they would not even have reported to the U.S. authorities. They are not law breakers. They land there, report and then come back. But if for some reason or another they forget to report, zap, they get a $400 fine. They receive no warning whatsoever, just a $400 fine.

Second, many times they drift into U.S. waters without even knowing it. There are almost no market buoys in U.S. waters in that area. If they land somewhere in the U.S. where there is no customs official, who is to say that they will not be apprehended when they come back to Canadian waters? Although the minister wants to assess licence fees for these people, we are getting scant service when it comes to the particular area along the forty-ninth parallel in the open waters along the B.C. coast. As I said, while I subscribe to the stringent enforcement of the law, it seems to me that something should be done with regard to other kinds of traffic violations. Many a time if there is a traffic violation on the highways, some kind of warning is given by police officers. So it seems entirely reasonable for the same kind of system to be applied with respect to customs and excise.

I bring these matters to the attention of the minister in the hope that he will get in touch with his colleagues in the cabinet and will do something about these unfortunate people who, in spite of wishing to be law-abiding citizens, unwittingly run afoul of the law and are fined $400 without any kind of warning. I encourage the minister to take this matter in hand and do something for the people who use their pleasure craft and get caught in this way.

I am concerned about these areas in the legislation before us and I hope the minister will answer some of the questions I have raised. If I am wrong, I would be glad to hear him tell me so and have him explain to me what is wrong with the perspective I have of this legislation.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry it is so late in the evening, but I feel the minister would not mind if I made some comments, or even if I call it ten o'clock.

Before I make any comments directly on the bill I think it is up to me or to one of my colleagues to pay tribute to the national director of the small craft harbours branch who will be leaving the department to take up a position with DREE in Prince Edward Island. Aside from the fact that many of us are not fully satisfied with the provisions in the act regarding small craft harbours for fishermen in our districts, we owe him a word of commendation. I say that to him through the minister and I hope that the person who will replace him will do as good a job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: I would also like to commend the minister on the fact that in my district now there is a mini-department of environment with an area manager who represents small craft harbours and a staff to deal with problems of fishermen on the spot.

I should like to make a few comments on the bill before us. It started out as Bill C-7 and was introduced on October 21, 1976. Anyone who would criticize the opposition for not giving it speedy passage should remember that the bill was only referred to the committee on June 6, 1977. Apart from the clauses in the bill dealing with its purpose, I believe we should concentrate our attention on priorities and on what fishermen need in view of the newly proclaimed 200-mile limit and the prospects which this presents to the fishing industry in Canada, particularly in eastern Canada.

I have just completed a tour of my district, which I started during the Christmas recess and continued in the past two weeks, because I know, having been here for ten years, that at about this time every year damage to fishing gear and to small craft harbours needs to be assessed and I can bring the matter the attention of both the provincial and federal governments. I should like to say, without passing out too many bouquets, that I have had the complete co-operation of the area manager and the provincial government in my investigations and assessment of the situation. My conclusion is that we are forgetting our priorities. We will never reach our objectives if we do not first ensure that there is a sufficient number of small craft harbours before charging our fishermen the licencee fee to use them.

What has struck me in particular is the effort being made under the Canada Works program to provide many small craft harbours. Recently I came across members of a community employment strategy association who are trying to create employment. They seem to have the money, and yet the small craft harbours branch of the Department of Fisheries does not appear to have sufficient funding to provide those harbours which are so essential to fishermen. Perhaps the minister could check with his officials because this problem has been causing a great deal of frustration. Fortunately we are providing some small craft harbours under the Canadian Works program, thus ensuring better service to fishermen in the future. But more funding is needed to provide appropriate harbours with a good engineering design to which the minister's officials could dedicate their efforts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would like to ask the minister whether he plans to carry on with this bill tomorrow before we go on to Bill C-17.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I am so informed, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been adopted.

RESEARCH—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO STIMULATE DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, last year Canada's deficit in manufactured goods amounted to more than $10 billion; this year we are looking at a $12 billion deficit. A story in the Financial Post of December 17 last entitled "Think Industry or Forget Jobs" indicates that as a provider of jobs the manufacturing industry has eroded to the point where today it accounts for only 19 per cent of the nation's work force, as against 25 per cent in 1950. Canadian industry does not have a strong technological base. Without the auto pact, defence production sharing and similar bilateral arrangements with the United States, Canada would have few exports of manufactured goods.

• (2202)

Our lack of technological innovation and the problems of transferring technology from government laboratories to meaningful functions in our manufacturing industries are major problems, but not the only ones. Businessmen also point to excessive controls, high taxes, uncertainty about nationalist sentiment, high costs of production and more advantageous wage rates in other nations with lower living standards.

Examples of Canadian industrial success exist, but they must be built upon and multiplied. To do this, a favourable milieu must be established through the development of coherent national policies aimed at enhancing our industrial base.

In a January 25, 1978 news release Hugh Morris, chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada, cited the 30 per cent decline in research and development since 1970 as a major contributor both to last year's $12 billion deficit in end-product trade and to the capture of almost one-third of all domestic sales by imported goods. Mr. Morris pointed out that our trade deficit in manufactured goods has grown by almost $9 billion since 1970, of which $7 billion is an imbalance with the United States. Mr. Morris suggests that the latter figure represents a loss of more than 350,000 Canadian jobs over a seven year period.

John Bullock, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, has underlined the drain of Canadian industry and has pointed to our stale, second-hand technology, and the need for research which can make us world leaders in selected manufacturing areas.

Let us take a look at some of the examples of the emerging problems in our manufacturing sector. The answer to order paper question No. 528 shows that in 1970 imports served 26.2 per cent of the total Canadian market for manufactured goods. In 1973 this percentage had risen to 29.2 per cent, and in 1976 it stood at 29.8 per cent.

The answer to order paper question No. 529 shows that in 1970 84.1 per cent of the Canadian market for computer and office equipment was served by imports, and this figure was 85.9 per cent in 1973 and 87.8 per cent in 1976.

The answer to order paper question No. 531 tells the tragic story of the Canadian market for consumer electronic products served by imports. The figure in 1970 was 33.1 per cent; in 1973 it was 42.2 per cent; and in 1976 it was 59.1 per cent.

The answer to order paper question No. 536 cites one area where we should perhaps enjoy a natural advantage, the field of agricultural machinery. But here again imports have been rising and now control a major portion of our market. In 1969 the figure was 76.2 per cent; in 1972 it was 83 per cent; and in 1976 it was 82.6 per cent.

The answer to order paper question No. 522 shows us the estimated gap between the domestic market for secondary manufacturers and domestic production of secondary manufacturers in millions of dollars. In 1977 the production gap was $111 million; in 1973 it was $2,665 million; and in 1976 it rose to $5,009 million.

● (2207)

Order paper question No. 690 shows us that as of March 1977, the latest date for which information is available, only 284 out of 712 companies in the electronics sector were known to be conducting research and development programs. This would account for 78 per cent of all companies in the sector with annual sales over $300,000.

Clearly, research and development is the great multiplier that enables Canadians to maintain and improve their high standard of living by producing goods in our industrial sector for sale in Canada and abroad at competitive prices. There is a clear need for a strategy to stimulate significantly our innovative research and development potential in those industries in which we have the potential for a comparative trade advantage. Our performance to date is not good and is getting worse. I urge the ministry of science and technology to roll up its sleeves and, in concert with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, launch an industrial strategy to get this nation moving forward again.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first, let me assure the hon. member that I am as concerned as he that the Canadian manufacturing sector should be strong; and it is a matter of first priority with me that the research and development component of that sector should be a vital catalytic force. I say that representing the minister, as a fairly strong nationalist personally, and as a member of the engineering community which is associated with the research effort in Canada.

The government has three distinct sets of measures to stimulate industrial R and D in Canada. In the first place, there are tax measures. Beginning on April 1, 1977, the government extended the investment tax credit to scientific research and development. This means that both current and capital expenditures on research and development will enjoy a credit ranging from 5 per cent to 10 per cent of qualified expenditures depending on the region in Canada where the research is undertaken.

We estimate that the benefits received by industry from this measure in 1977 is estimated to be in the order of $30 million to $35 million. They will accrue mainly to large and medium size firms carrying out research in Canada. In addition, it is important to note that, as well as the investment tax credit, an immediate deduction for both capital and current expenditures on scientific research related to the business of the taxpayer is permitted. This treatment is quite generous since these costs are often not directly related to the earning of current income.

A second measure taken by the government to stimulate research and development in the manufacturing sector is the contracting out policy. For several years, Canadian business has been invited to provide on a competitive basis certain scientific and technological services required in support of new R and D programs. Last year, this policy was extended to ongoing R and D programs as well as related scientific activities. Research contracts have increased from $18 million in 1972-73 to approximately $100 million in the last fiscal year.

A third avenue of stimulation for research and development exists in the enterprise development program, established by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on April 1, 1977. This program provides direct government assistance to industry in the form of loans or grants. The objective of this program is to enhance growth in the manufacturing and processing sectors of the Canadian economy by providing assistance to selected firms in either the area of structural adjustment or innovation, in order to make them viable and internationally competitive. Ministry officials are particularly active in contributing to the decisions of the innovation panel within the enterprise development program.

There are numerous other activities, which I have not detailed in this short response, but which are equally as important as some of the above.

The three major thrusts which I have described, namely, tax incentives, the purchase of R and D by the government and direct grants, offer a diversified program of assistance to R and D in Canada, one on which firms, whether they be small, large or medium size, can draw. These programs will be the subject of constant assessment and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) will put forward, as needed, proposals for their extension or modification.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

MANPOWER—CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF THIRD PHASE—USE OF SLIPPAGE FUNDS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, it is not too often that I get a chance to speak twice within a few minutes! On December 17 I sought information from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) about the ongoing Canada Works program. I was surprised to learn another change was going to take place. I cannot understand why a good program has to be changed so often. As a result these objectives tend to be forgotten. These objectives were to provide financial aid or assistance to communities, groups or organizations to enable them to use their initiative in providing an economic base or employment opportunities in their area.

● (2212)

The LIP program, Mr. Speaker, started out back in 1971 or 1972. I commended the program for its objectives. After three or four years the monitors, co-ordinators and the people working within the program knew their districts. They knew the people who were sponsoring projects and they knew of the needs of the area. But there was one failing in that it did not provide a program on a five year basis which would allow communities to plan five years ahead. The five year plan would result in an economic base which would provide jobs on a long term basis. I was pleased with the change and I commended the program, as I still do. It can provide what we are seeking.

On December 12, in reply to a question which I posed, the minister indicated that there was to be a further change. This was after I had appealed to people serving on ministerial advisory boards to put the plan on a five-year basis. The program would be in two phases per year, enabling better planning of projects suited to the spring and summer followed by those projects suited for the wintertime. The minister now says that they are going to change the program once more. It will be a one phase program as of next September. Not only did the department change the program, they changed the whole set-up.

After four or five years of the LIP program, I indicated that we had experienced people. When the government implemented the Canada Works program those people experienced on the LIP program were no longer required. They hired new people to learn all over again. We have built up such a bureaucracy in the Canada Works program that it has become confusing to sponsors and to the people who are supposed to help. All those people flying around the country connected with these Canada Works programs have a different interpretation of how it should be run. The employment centres have a different interpretation of the hiring practices, with the result that they are splitting up communities and creating animosity. The member of parliament is caught in the middle.

Perhaps the government would listen to the advice that we are trying to give them. We are always being asked by the other side to tell them about our ideas. I say that the objective of this program is sound. But let us remember what the objectives and aims are. They are to allow every community to define their priorities, and to give themselves an economic base so that not only can they provide short term jobs for the people who need the work but also provide long term jobs, whether it is fisheries, farming or whatever. If the government will only look down the road at this program over the next five to seven years, they will find that every small community in Canada will be able to provide the economic base to give them long term employment. I hope the minister will consider that proposal and review the program as it exists.

I wish I had the time to go into many of the other failings of the program. However, I hope that all members, whether on the government side or on the opposition side of the House, will be able to develop a program which will enable them to obtain the best value for the dollar, to the betterment of this country.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on December 19 the hon. member posed a question to the minister dealing with several of the points he raised tonight. At that time he also asked the minister a question dealing with the slippage funds.

To recap, on December 22, 1977, members were sent a letter informing them how the slippage funds were being distributed. The amount available for distribution was $4,630,-000. It was decided that this small amount should be applied to those constituencies which received an allocation lower in phase two than the allocation they received for phase one. The basis for this distribution was that each of these constituencies receive an amount equal to the difference between the constituency allocations for the first and second phases providing that the amount did not exceed either $100,000 or the amount for which there remained acceptable unfunded applications.

To respond more appropriately to the point the hon. member has made this evening, on December 20, 1977, the minister sent a letter informing members of his intention to reorient a significant portion of Canada Works funds for the 1978-79 fiscal year, in order to put more emphasis on the creation of permanent jobs in the private sector. This reorientation involves some $50 million for the economic growth component of Canada Works and the operation of the Canada Works community projects in one year-round phase, rather than two overlapping phases as occurred in 1977-78. Applications for the community projects will be available to the public on April 3, 1978; the application deadline will be June 24, 1978, and projects will commence in September, 1978.

Canada Works is one element of the employment strategy which is to operate over a five-year period ending 1981-82. Each year the government decides the funding distribution to each element in light of the performance of, and changes in, the economy in order that distribution may be directed toward specific situations. So, as the reorientation of the 1978-79 Canada Works program demonstrates, although the employment strategy encompasses a five-year period, it and its elements are nevertheless flexible and subject to yearly assessment and planning.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CIDA GRANTS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to have the opportunity to address so many members of the House. This evening I would like to speak on the issue I raised with the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to CIDA funding to Ethiopia. On January 31 I asked about the $7.9 million in funding to Ethiopia to develop rural water supplies. The acting minister's response to my question was surely the most ridiculous and unacceptable statement on Canada's foreign aid program. He said and I quote:

We had not taken the view the programs of international economic development should be terminated or interrupted because of the political activities of the government of the day.

If that is the case, why is CIDA winding down all their aid programs to Uganda? Is this not being done because Idi Amin is a bloody murderer, bent on tribal genocide, ruling by brutality and the fear that it engenders? Is the minister not saying that? Is the aid program winding down for some inexplicable, strange, fanciful reason of the Department of External Affairs, some decision made within their inner sanctum?

Why did we cease aid and funding to Cuba during the period of its confrontation with the United States? Agreed, as conditions warranted later, that situation changed. However, the simple fact remains that aid was stopped at that time.

● (2222)

Why should we be funding Mozambique, a communist-dominated country which in 1976 received $2.8 million from Canada and in 1978 will be receiving 11 million tons of wheat worth some $2 million? I was always under the impression that Russia grew some of the finest wheat in the world. What is wrong with Russian wheat?

Angola, another communist-dominated country with Russian and Cuban troops in place, will receive about $2 million for medicine, clothing and roofing materials. I see nothing wrong with the humanitarian aspect of that, but it cuts both ways. If Russia or Cuba are in a position to provide military aid, if they are prepared to move in with troops, arms and guns, surely they can also provide the aid which is essential for reasons of humanity.

Take Ethiopia. CIDA has been sitting on the fence for two or three years trying to decide whether $7.9 million should be spent on a scheme to provide for a water supply in the rural areas. Yet what do we find? We see Ethiopia receiving arms shipments sufficient to overthrow Somalia. We see a heavy Russian presence. We hear warnings from President Sadat that the west should be paying attention to the Russian intrusion in Ethiopia. Yet this government is sending $7.9 million to that country.

A community in my riding, the city of Castlegar, needs $3 million to develop a water supply and I have been trying to get that amount out of the minister for DREE for two years. The stability of the economy of that area, as well as hundreds of jobs, hinges on that $3 million. Besides, I was under the impression that we had an unemployment problem in this country. Surely we should be thinking in terms of Canada first at least in preference to countries which are communist-dominated, communist-oriented, communist-supplied, communist in direction and communist in political persuasion as well as brutal in terms of fellow human beings, countries where humanity is the least consideration.

I say the government is wrong, wrong, wrong in supporting countries of that type and that the money which is wastefully spent in this direction could better be applied to economic programs in this country. If we count up the millions we are throwing down the tube by making grants to those countries, we would probably find we had enough to provide a small Canada Winter Works program for municipalities. I am not selfish enough to advocate that the money should be channelled into my own riding, but I do submit that much could be accomplished by using the money so wastefully directed to some of these nations to which I have referred.

Finally, I am sure that if I were able to take a poll today of Canadians across this country, members would find they would agree with the position I have taken this evening.

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be with the hon. member in this large assembly that we have today. Before making specific comments on the project signed by the government with Ethiopia, I would like to tell the House that after listening to the hon. member saying that this government was wrong, wrong, wrong and that it gave too much assistance to those communist countries, communist in essence, Mr. Speaker, I believe that even though I was a bit young during the McCarthy era in the United States, the speech made by the hon. member could easily be compared with a speech made by McCarthy at that time.

Mr. Speaker, whatever the economic problems of our country and certain communities such as those mentioned by the hon. member or certain villages of the riding I represent, whatever these problems, I believe that a country like Canada cannot forget so easily its duties towards the international community. It is in this spirit that last December the governments of Canada and Ethiopia ratified a protocol of agreement concerning this water resource development project for southern Ethiopia. The hon. member quoted a figure of $7 million, but I must inform him that the figure is not $7 million, but $9 million, and I know he will be even more shocked. It is up to $9 million that Canada has promised to donate to Ethiopia for the professional services and the various types of equipment required for this project. For its part, Ethiopia is willing to contribute a sum equivalent to $3 million in local currency in the form of staff, offices, accommodation, equipment and building materials and other types of required services which are available locally.

Essentially, the long term objective consists in improving the capacity of the Ethiopian government to develop and put to use the water resources of the southern part of the country. As you know, this area is in the Sahel zone which in the last few years has been very seriously affected by droughts which are very difficult to control. In particular, many lives have been lost in this area. I think that everyone saw television programs which showed the tragedy that has afflicted this part of the African continent. There have been many deaths in Sahel, as well as important losses of cattle, and economic goods.

That disaster has shown how urgent it is to develop systematically water resources to prevent repetition of such a disaster. However, the lack of technical resources and expertise in that area has considerably affected the efforts of the Ethiopian government to lower the level of suffering and privation in the population. It is to alleviate that situation that Canada favourably answered a request by the Ethiopian government for the development of that project. Other giving countries have also answered favourably requests asking first of all for the reduction—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Therefore this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

LAY-OFF OF MINERS AT MARMORA, ONT.—SUGGESTION PRICE OF IRON ORE BE SUBSIDIZED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to present the following motion. The Marmoraton Mining Co. has announced that it will lay off 275 employees early this year when it closes its mine at Marmora. Left in the mine will be minerals which could provide a further two full years of employment at regular production rates. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the government be directed to approach every Canadian steel mill and attempt to sell the ore at a subsidized price, and that the subsidy be equal to the amount that would be spent on unemployment insurance and other support for the 275 people unemployed, on the basis that they would prefer to work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ECONOMIC GROWTH COMPONENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and I am sure the Minister of Employment and Immigration will give his consent to it. The minister has indicated that there will be a reorientation of Canada Works programs under an economic growth component to provide long-term jobs. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration be ordered to make a statement on motions today relating all details of the $50 million expenditure under the economic growth component and all its objectives, and that he do so forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT LEADERSHIP—REQUEST PRIME MINISTER CALL GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that the government since the Christmas recess has indicated its complete lack of capacity and will to govern by naming a Solicitor General who refuses to answer questions about scandals, by producing an alleged planning document for the first ministers' conference which contains no plans, by betraying Canadian workers in obtaining no job guarantees on the Alcan pipeline and, finally, by the economic policy which has produced 1.6 million unemployed Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House, noting that the Prime Minister has failed completely to provide economic leadership and is, instead, spending his time on electioneering trips at the public expense, urges him to call a general election.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RADIO-MUTUEL—SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY BE PROHIBITED PENDING SETTLEMENT OF LABOUR DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter.

S.O. 43

Considering that Radio-Mutuel network station employees have been denied their basic union rights; considering that that conflict has now lasted for a year; considering that the ministers involved have been advised to examine the matter; and considering the bad faith shown by the employers and owners of those stations who received their operating license from the CRTC, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That all government advertising on Radio-Mutuel network stations be prohibited pending the settlement of that dispute and that instructions to that effect be given by the House to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST SPECIAL MEASURES BE TAKEN TO IMPROVE SITUATION IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the percentage of men at work in the province of Quebec alone has gone down from 76 per cent to 69 per cent between 1966 and 1977; that the statistics on the rate of unemployment released this morning confirm that the rate of unemployment for this government is no longer a problem but rather a shame to this nation; and finally that the people of certain areas must cope with an unemployment rate of over 20 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House unanimously urge the minister concerned to introduce immediately very special measures designed for those regions which deserve special consideration because of their rate of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSAL FISH PROCESSING PLANT BE BUILT AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. That the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion be directed to respond affirmatively, immediately, to a proposal from Fishery Products Limited and from the community of St. Lawrence for financing and for licences to enable the construction of a fish processing plant at St. Lawrence, utilizing offshore as well as inshore fishery resources, and that this House censure the government and its creature, the Export Development Corporation, for the assistance given to Alcan to create jobs in Ireland while doing away with jobs in Newfoundland.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

Whereas both the CN and CPR have adopted policies of cutting back on service, eliminating operations in small towns and moving the reduced service to larger cities, and having been contracting out such railway activities as contract maintenance, and whereas these policies have led to reduced service and a sharp decrease of 10,000 employees in the last two years, therefore be it resolved that the Minister of Transport discuss with the railways the reversal of this policy of centralization which is the exact opposite of the federal government's policy of decentralization.

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO FIRST MINISTERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It is prompted by the latest figures from Statistics Canada. These figures have outraged the country. They show that unemployment now is officially at one million, or 9.5 per cent; or in real, hidden terms we have 1.6 million unemployed in the country. I can assure the Prime Minister there is nothing subtle about that. I ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared today, in response to these startling figures, to take the House and the country into his confidence and tell us what strategy he is going to present to the first ministers to deal with this situation immediately when he meets with them next week.

● (1417)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, of course, knows that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rates decreased in January.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am not indicating that they decreased to a level or at a speed which is giving the government any comfort; I just want to remind the hon. member that if he is trying to interpret the effect of government policies and the reaction of the economy to them, he should take this into account. Of course, that is what we plan to do next week at the first ministers' conference which, as the hon. member knows, will last three days—Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ASSIST JOBLESS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. As of January there were 36,000 fewer jobs in the manufacturing sector than there were at this time a year ago, and job lay-offs are increasing at a rapid rate. Apart altogether from the employment tax credit bill and the make-work project policies of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, does the Minister of Finance have anything to offer the Canadian people who are concerned that we have more people, in real terms, unemployed in Canada today than during the great depression?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member that beginning January 1, 1978, we put in place programs that are working to help Canadians at this moment. We have indexed the exemptions by 7.2 per cent, which is a stimulus of $800 million. We have a program for cutting taxes in January and February for seven million taxpayers, which will cost the government $750 million. There are many other tax incentives. This is a $2.5 billion package to stimulate the economy in 1978. These policies are extremely stimulative to the Canadian economy. We are preoccupied with the level of unemployment. This matter was discussed last week with the ministers of finance of all provinces, of all political stripes. They stated that we must carry on with our present policy. It will take some time, but everyone seems to agree that we are on the right track.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Minister of Finance, like the Prime Minister, is operating in a vacuum. He is the only one who considers himself on the right track. Does the Minister of Finance have any relief to offer the provinces, given the fact that 36 per cent of the unemployed have been out of work for three months or more, and over one-half of the unemployed are no longer eligible for unemployment insurance because of long-term unemployment? Is the minister prepared to offer any relief to the hard-pressed provinces which now have to meet additional welfare payments as a direct consequence of the failure of the minister ot bring in meaningful policies?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, last week I spent two days with the ministers of finance. There was no request of that nature by any minister of finance of any province.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST SPECIAL MEASURES BE TAKEN TO IMPROVE SITUATION IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Earlier in a motion I was referring to very special regions with an unemployment rate of over 20 per cent. Considering these circumstances, I think the minister would agree with me that this situation cannot last any longer. Therefore I would like to ask the minister responsible whether he will introduce very special measures for those regions which are recognized as such because of their high level of unemployment.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 last we introduced a program in the House of Commons and most of the proposed measures have come into force as of January 1, 1978. We have offered special credit incentives that those industries can obtain if they are making investments, as well as more advantageous incentives in parts of Canada where the situation is worse. In the program I proposed to the House just two weeks ago for job creation in the private sector, there are exemptions or incentives provided for the maritime regions and other areas in Quebec which have a higher rate of unemployment.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the minister is always quick reminding us of his government's good intentions. Since these measures are not likely to produce results for several months, could the minister advise us whether he will let these regions cope with this excessively high unemployment rate, or whether he has special measures in store for them?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I indicated a moment ago that we have stimulated the Canadian economy since January 1, 1978 with total incentives of some $2.5 billion, and that two thirds of these incentives have been given to consumers to increase their purchasing power. As a matter of fact, we have granted in January and February an additional $50 tax cut to some 7,000,000 Canadian taxpayers, an amount which we feel has and will spur consumer spending in both these months and will in turns boost productivity in Canada. I am glad to see that the unemployment rate went down from 8.5 to 8.3 per cent in January.

● (1422)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's optimism and taking into account our findings over nearly a year, would the Minister of Finance be honest enough to recognize that the measures proposed and the wrong predictions made by his department over the past year have been a complete failure? Moreover, is he willing to admit this failure which the Canadian public is quite aware of by now?

Mr. Chrétien: I think, Mr. Speaker, that there are many factors involved in the current situation. One of these factors which are a cause of great concern is the progressive deterioration of the unemployment situation in the province of Quebec. I feel it would be quite beneficial to assure political stability there as soon as possible, because we can see that the situation is improving in both Ontario and the maritimes, while it keeps on deteriorating in Quebec.

SUGGESTION BY PROVINCES THAT GOVERNMENT REDUCE TAXES TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Considering that the great tax cut the minister boasts about amounts to about $2 a week for a typical family, that unemployment, in real terms, has now reached 1.6 million, and that there has been a loss of 250,000 jobs in one month—the worst record, I am sure, in any single month in Canadian history—will the minister now give serious thought to a proposal which all provincial premiers, from all political parties, made at St. Andrews last fall, when they recommended that the government cut taxes for middle and low income people in order to stimulate the economy?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I am very surprised that the hon. member should now suggest I do what I did on October 20. I cut taxes then by $2.5 billion. I know the hon. member does not think $2.5 billion is very much. He does not understand that there are a thousand million per billion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. Broadbent: I realize the Minister of Finance was not trained as an economist before he took the job, but even a lawyer can read a first-year textbook in economics. I should like him now to come to grips with the problem of unemployment, instead of trying to make cheap cracks in the House. At that meeting in St. Andrews, the premiers also urged the federal government to do now, in 1977-78, what was done back in 1971 and 1972 when unemployment was at a lower level, namely, to bring in a municipal capital works assistance program to provide jobs right across the country. Will the Minister of Finance follow that advice?

Mr. Chrétien: We decided in October to stimulate the Canadian economy to the tune of $2.5 billion. This decision, to take effect in January, means the economy has been stimulated to a greater extent than has been the case for years. For the hon. member to come here at the last hour and say that perhaps we should put something more on top of that is surprising to me. We have to realize that it is not possible. We are being blamed by the official opposition for running a deficit of $8.5 billion. We cannot stimulate the economy further, because it would be counterproductive to do so. Last week I made a certain suggestion to the provinces because their fiscal stance was more favourable than ours. I suggested that perhaps they should do what we have done. But there have not been many takers for that proposition.

Mr. Broadbent: If the minister would look at page 78 of his own document produced for the first ministers' conference next week, he would find the best argument around in favour of cutting taxes. Will he look it up? In view of the minister's refusal to either cut taxes now or to aid the municipalities with winter works, is he really telling the people of Canada, with shipworkers laid off in Halifax, with Christie's bread workers being laid off in Toronto, Inco workers laid off in Manitoba and Sudbury, woodworkers being laid off in Vancouver, that he would rather spend $4 billion on unemployment insurance hand-outs than on job creation?

● (1427)

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think the hon. member is saying anything new. We have followed what I consider to be a very stimulative policy in the last few months. I discussed it last October and last month with my provincial colleagues of different stripes in the political spectrum of the Canadian society and, generally speaking, they have not pressed me to change the fiscal policy of the government at this time. It is very easy for the hon. member to say, after we have stimulated the economy to the tune of $2.5 billion, "Me too, and a little more". It does not take an economist to say that.

INQUIRY HOW PRIME MINISTER WOULD JUDGE LEGALITY OF SEPARATION OF QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has previously stated that he would not hesitate to use the army to stand by force in the way of the will of independence in Quebec, if he judged that that will has been expressed through illegal means; since such a statement remains equivocal and ambiguous, would the Prime Minister tell the House how he would judge whether that will has been expressed legally or illegally?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have said a great many times both in the House and outside that it was not the government's policy to use force to prevent the legally expressed will of Quebec from moving in a certain direction. If the hon. member is referring to the suggested assumption of illegality, he might refer to the transcript of the question which was put to me before TV cameras in December and he would find what I said about the assumption he is wondering about.

INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION OF GOVERNMENT IN QUEBEC REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House what position his government intends to take during the referendum campaign on Quebec sovereignty, in other words does his government feel that it will be proper for personalities from outside Quebec to take part directly or indirectly in the referendum campaign?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, instead of worrying about what the government and the hon. members will do at that time, the hon. member would be well advised to take up the matter with the representatives of the Péquiste government and tell them to have the courage to put the question clearly to the Quebeckers as soon as possible.

FORECAST OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN 1978-79—GOVERNMENT ACCEPTANCE OF OECD FIGURES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As it is obvious from the answers he has given today that the die is cast as far as unemployment in this country is concerned, and that the minister and his colleagues have retired into some kind of bunker to see the year out, would the minister indicate what rate of unemployment he sees for the balance of 1978? In short, what does he anticipate unemployment to be in this country this time next year, bearing in mind that in December OECD spelled out very clearly that, notwithstanding the stimulative measures to which the minister referred today, and the October 20 statement, unemployment will likely be higher by the end of 1978 than it is currently? Would the minister indicate whether that is also his impression?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): If the people in OECD would look at today's figures, they would see that we have managed to reverse the trend this month.

Mr. Stevens: The figures that I referred to in the OECD Economic Outlook of December, 1977, refer very specifically to every stimulative measure announced and referred to by the minister today. In spite of that, they indicate that unemployment will increase markedly, by about 50,000 or, in total, 1,050,000 Canadians will be out of work this time next year, according to the government's own figures. Would the minister indicate whether he denies those figures published by OECD?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said in the House: We stimulated the Canadian economy to the tune of $2.5 billion as of January 1 this year. Ours is probably the most expansionary policy at this time of any of the countries in the OECD. I feel quite confident that if we achieve our objective of 5.5 per cent economic growth in 1978, the rate of unemployment will go down in Canada, and I am happy to see that for last January, the adjusted rate went down from 8.5 to 8.3 per cent.

FAILURE OF BUDGET TO CREATE NUMBER OF JOBS ESTIMATED—MINISTER'S REACTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that his October 20 statement is simply a rewarmed version of the March 31 budget of his predecessor, and the previous minister of finance stated that 250,000 jobs would be created this year and the government has fallen 20 per cent short of that figure, would the minister indicate why that forecast did not materialize? Why were so few jobs created in 1977 compared to the estimate of his predecessor?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in 1977, employment in Canada grew by over 200,000 jobs. We would have liked that figure to be even larger, but I believe that in proportion to the Canadian population, it probably represents the highest growth of any of the OECD countries.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HIGH LEVEL OF YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is responsible for unemployment. In view of the fact that there are now 426,000 unemployed young Canadians, that the unemployment rate for Canada's youth is now 14.9 per cent, seasonally adjusted, but over 16 per cent in real terms, and considering that the programs the government announced outside the House last week will provide 3,000 less summer jobs in the government than comparable programs provided last year, what will the minister do to restructure his programs in order to bring them in line with the critical youth unemployment problem?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on more than one occasion I have indicated the entire series of programs which is in place, directed specifically to the area of youth unemployment. The student summer program is only one of a series of summer job programs. There is the student summer assistance program, the programs we are operating with the provinces in the co-operative education fields, and the individual students we are placing through our Manpower offices.

With regard to the placing of students, we expect to place approximately 250,000 this year, which is not a bad response to a very, very difficult situation. That is not to indicate there is not concern, but the suggestion seems to be that there is nothing being done, which is just not in accord with the facts.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in 1973 the government spent $85.4 million to provide 67,000 summer jobs for youth in the government, at a time when the youth unemployment rate was 9.7 per cent, and considering inflation since then, why is the government spending less real money in 1978, and providing less summer jobs for young people now, when the youth unemployment rate has gone up to 14.9 per cent?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member talk to the research bureau of his party and check out those figures.

Mr. Paproski: They are your figures.

Mr. Cullen: When the hon. member goes down the list of all of the programs which are in fact in place, he will find that those figures are not correct.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, last week the minister announced that more than 250,000 young Canadians will be placed in jobs in the private sector this summer through the Canada employment centres for students. Considering the fact that in 1977 those centres made only 135,000 placements in the private sector—some only of a few days' duration—could the minister now tell the House how he expects to place 250,000 young Canadians in summer jobs in the private sector, now that the economy is in a worse position than it was at the same time last year?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, in point of fact, those figures were put down after very carefully analysing the people we had in place and the number of jobs we anticipate will be put in place this year. It was specifically spelled out in the press release following the research work we had done. So we are satisfied that figure is correct, in addition to the 60,000 jobs which will be created by the other programs on which the hon. member neglected to report. They were mentioned also in the press release.

UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFECT ON SMALL INDUSTRIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister is aware of the depressed state of the economy in one-town industries, but the situation is exacerbated when service industries that grow up are also feeling the effects, which further defeats the situation. Can the minister indicate what action he has taken to deal specifically with these smaller industries, before whole areas become so depressed that they are obliterated?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the specific problem to which the hon. member refers is hardly the responsibility of my department alone. I think it covers a whole series of areas where there is, in fact, responsibility. I have indicated that in so far as my department is concerned, we will be providing an emergency response feature, which we have done in several regions across Canada to the benefit of those who were laid off.
