attempted a little song as he wound, but her thoughts would run on the ad ablycet on which they had dwelt all days are now thinking of Charlis Hammeral, the bithey young carpenter, who had built the anux new house in which the Speedwells were now living. He had made his appearance in Brush Fork a year before, but had only tarried six months, the enterprise of Brush Fork not supplying him with work for a longer period, and had the hundred mile distant, where he found no lack of employment.

But short as had been his sojourn at Brush Fork, he carried off Jessie's heart when he left, leaving hig own in her keeping. The exchange of valuables had been defected without spoken words, and he had not even written to ber; but more under the conditions of the condition and among the number that of Charlie Hammeral.

This news it was which cast the gloom over poor Jessie.

She was winding slowly, and thinking sadly, when she was roused by her grandmother's voice.

"Seein' that ball o' yarn, and it being the day it is, puts me in mind of away we used to try our forchuns on New Year's eve, when I vas young."

"How was that?" asked Jessie, trying to appear interested.

"Why you take the ball o' yarn, and go to an old house that nobody don't live in, and throw the ball in at the winder, only keep hold of the end of the yarn and begin to wind, and keep a sayin over and over, I wind—who holds?" You must stand with your back to the winder, and the one you are to marry comes and holds the ball inside."

"We work the winder, and the one you are to marry comes and holds the ball inside."

"Until in there westerder." said Mr. Speedwell in the opinion he had before entertained—that Charlie was "a likely young chap."

The next day when grandma was looking through her work basket, she suddenly exclaimed;

"Well, I swan! if here ain't that ball o' yarn."
